THE DEBATES

OF THE

SENATE OF CANADA

IN THE

FOURTH SESSION OF THE SEVENTH PARLIAMENT OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR DESPATCH OF BUSINESS ON THURSDAY, THE FIFTEENTH DAY OF MARCH, IN THE FIFTY-SEVENTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, March 15th, 1894.

THE SPEAKER took the chair at 2:30 p.m.

Prayers.

The House adjourned during pleasure.

After some time the House was resumed.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

This day, at THREE o'clock P.M., HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL proceeded in state to the Senate Chamber, in the Parliament Buildings, and took his seat upon the Throne. The Members of the Senate being assembled, His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and that House being present, His Excellency was pleased to open the FOURTH SESSION of the SEVENTH PARLIAMENT OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA, with the following Speech:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In the Queen's name I greet you, for the first time since assuming the high functions intrusted to me by Her Majesty; and it is with feelings of the liveliest satisfaction that I thus meet you assembled for the labours of another session of Parliament.

This feeling of satisfaction is enhanced by the opportunities which I have already enjoyed of visiting, and in my official capacity renewing acquaintance with, several of the chief centres of the enterprise and activity of this Dominion; nor need I refrain from assuring you that I have been deeply impressed by the heartiness of the reception accorded to me as Her Majesty's Viceroy and Representative, a reception which has once more manifested the loyalty, the cordiality and the public spirit of the Canadian people.

My predecessor was able to express gratification to you last year, on an increase in trade and on the continued progress of the Dominion. It is gratifying to me to observe that the expectation which was then formed—that the volume of trade during the then current year would exceed that of any year in the history of the Dominion—has been fully realized, and that Canada's progress continues with every mark of stability and permanence.

It may be observed with satisfaction that a large proportion of this increase is shown to have been due to an extension of our commerce with Great Britain.

It is a cause of thankfulness that our people have been spared in a very great degree from the sufferings which have visited the populations of some other countries during many months past, and that while the commercial depression prevailing abroad could not but affect the activity of business in the Dominion, we have been free from any extensive financial disaster or widespread distress.

The revenues of the year have been ample for the services which you provided for, and have met the expectations on which the appropriations of last year were based.

The peaceful conclusion, by the award of the arbitrators at Paris, of the controversy which had prevailed so long, with respect to the Seal Fisheries in the Pacific Ocean and the rights of British subjects in Behring Sea, has removed the only source of contention which existed between Great Britain and the United States with regard to Canada. There is every reason to believe that Her Majesty's Government will obtain redress for those Canadian subjects of Her Majesty who were deprived of their property and liberty without just cause while the controversy was in progress.

At an early date a measure will be laid before you having for its object a revision of the Duties of Customs with a view to meet the changes which time has effected in business operations of all kinds throughout the Dominion. While my Ministers do not propose to change the principles on which the existing enactments on this subject are based, the amendments which will be offered for your consideration are designed to simplify the operation of the tariff and to lessen, as far as can be done, consistently with those principles and with the requirements of the Treasury, the imposts which are now in force.

There will also be laid before you a measure on the subject of Bankruptcy and Insolvency which will, it is hoped, make more adequate provision than now exists on that subject for the increasing trade and commerce of the country and for the greatly expanded trade between the several provinces of Canada.

Measures will also be submitted to you making more effective provisions for our lines of steam communication on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, for improving the law with regard to Dominion Lands and with regard to the management of Indian Affairs; also a Bill respecting Joint Stock Companies, another with respect to the Fisheries, and several less important measures which experience has suggested with regard to various matters under your control.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The Public Accounts will be submitted to you at an early date and also the estimates of the expenditure which has been considered necessary for the ensuing year.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

While it is hoped that the public measures which will demand your attention will not be very numerous, some of them will be of great weight and importance, and it is my earnest hope and prayer that the care and zeal which you will apply to the deliberations of the session may be aided by the abundant blessing of the Almighty.

NEW SENATOR.

Hon. Donald Ferguson, of Marshfield, P.E.I., was introduced and took his seat.

THE SENATE.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE LATE SENATORS ABBOTT, BOYD AND MONTGOMERY.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, it is my painful duty to express the regret which I am sure we all feel at the death of Hon. Sir John Caldwell Abbott, the late leader of this House, who, after a long and wasting illness, was called to his rest in November last. His removal is a serious loss to this House and to the country. By all of us he was esteemed for his sterling character and admired for his great ability. In manner he was singularly unostentatious, and yet there were few men in this country of richer talents. As a lawyer he stood at the head of his profession, and as a statesman he exhibited that sagacity and unshakable patriotism which made him of great service to his country. He entered public life when yet a young man, but his splendid abilities were soon recognized, and in 1862 he was called to the high office of Solicitor General. He held that portfolio until the fall of the John Sandfield Macdonald Government in the following year. His career was marked by restless activity and by the creditable discharge of high public and private trusts. He entered this House in 1887, and by his unchanging affability and perfect fairness, soon won the confidence and admiration of political friend and opponent alike. As the leader of this House the public records attest his attention to duty and his mastery of the legislation in hand. It will be long before another of such attainments and capacity for leadership will fill his place. With these few utterances I desire to record my own deep sense of loss by the death of an old and long-tried political and personal friend. The hand of death has also taken from us two other highly esteemed members of this House—the Hon. Donald Montgomery and the Hon. John Boyd. We shall all miss the hon. member from Prince Edward Island for his genial and kindly nature, as well as for his counsel. His twenty years of service were marked by faithfulness and ability. The circumstances surrounding the death of Hon. Mr. Boyd were particularly sad. After fifteen years of earnest service in this House he had been called to the honourable position of Lieutenant-Governor of his adopted province, and had hardly more than assumed the high functions given him than he was suddenly stricken down. His memory will long linger with us for his goodness of heart, and the aid he afforded us by his judgment on all matters brought before the House. I can only express my sense of the great loss which this House has sustained through the death of its late leader.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I most cordially agree with all that has fallen from the lips of the leader of this Chamber in reference to the late Sir John Abbott. It was my privilege to know him intimately, personally, more than thirty years ago, and I can therefore vouch, from my own knowledge and experience, that the Minister, in expressing himself as he has done, in reference to the qualifications of the late Sir John Abbott, has not, in any sense, exaggerated. He was above all a warm personal friend. Though we had been politically separated for many years, it in no way disturbed the social relations existing between us. I think that is the best test of the character of any man—that he is true to the natural instincts of a gentleman. Sir John Abbott would, no doubt, have occupied at a much earlier period in life, an important position in this country, had he so chosen. I was with him at the time when he was offered the position of Solicitor General for the province of Quebec. We sat in Parliament together at that time and were in each other's confidence. Had Sir John Abbott chosen to follow more closely than he did a parliamentary career, I have no hesitation in saying that at a much earlier period, he would have occupied the high position which two years ago he was called upon to fill in this country. I did not know the late Senator Montgomery before he became a member of this Chamber, but I have reason to appreciate all that has been said by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in reference to his excellent qualities. Always kind-hearted, always open, candid and frank, he gave his judgment on the committees of this House fairly, and with every desire to do what he thought was right and proper. While a close adherent to his own party in all political matters, he was nevertheless courteous and considerate towards those who differed from him politically. I may say the same of the late Mr. Boyd. He was a man possessed of high qualities, an able speaker, a most interesting lecturer—one who was socially, I believe, in his own province, highly esteemed for his many excellent qualities. It was a very great source of regret to us all to hear that he had been cut off so suddenly and so soon after the honour of the Lieutenant Governorship had been conferred upon him. I am quite sure had he continued to fill that position for the allotted term, no man would have been more personally popular in the position to which he was called, than would have been the late Hon. Mr. Boyd.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Having been for many years on terms of intimate friendship with the late Sir John Abbott, I may be allowed, perhaps, to say a few words on this occasion. I wish to add to the very feeling and appropriate remarks to which we have just listened from the leader of the House, this further remark, that in the late Sir John Abbott we had the example of one who sacrificed his own ease and comfort, and even health itself, to what he considered to be a matter of public duty. I know well that so far as any personal considerations were concerned, no one could have been less desirous of assuming the high position to which he was called, than was Sir John Abbott, and that it was entirely from a sense of public duty, that he consented to make the sacrifice, and assumed the duties and responsibilities which led undoubtedly to the failing health which was so soon to terminate his career. For these reasons the name of Sir John Abbott ought always to be held in honour, and especially in the House of which he was so long the leader. The Senate has indeed been very fortunate in the men who have led its deliberations for many years past. In Sir John Abbott, like his predecessor, Sir Alexander Campbell, we had a leader not only of great ability, but whose tact and courtesy conduced not a little to the satisfactory conduct of the business of the House and to the preservation of good feeling among all the members, and we have reason to congratulate ourselves that these traditions are being perpetuated under the present leadership of the House. On this occasion I think it is only fitting that we should renew the expression of our strong sense of the advantage it was to this House in having for many years as its leader such a man as the late Sir John Abbott, as well as the deep appreciation of the great sacrifices which he made in the service of his country.

Hon. Mr. ARMAND—(in French)—I wish to add my tribute to the memory of our illustrious colleague who has lately departed to his long home amid the general regrets of his country. Sir John Abbott was one of these men of humble origin, practical and industrious, who appear from time to time, but rarely and at long intervals. When Sir John Abbott left the paternal roof, he carried with him for his sole patrimony a pen behind his ear. Subsequently he demonstrated to the intelligent and industrious young men of his country the truth of that saying that "Where there's a will there's a way." Sir John Abbott showed that by industry, courage, activity and perseverance one can always win honour and fortune and rise in the social scale. I need say nothing more, his career is before us. The history of his life will be a mirror in which the industrious youth of the country can study and learn the means to take to win the success which he achieved.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think the hon. leader of this House has omitted to mention the name of one who has left us, and one who was greatly valued here—Mr. Carvell. He was long a member of this House and was known for his geniality towards all, and his usefulness in this Chamber. He did not often address this House, but when he did his phrases were very well turned and he spoke on every subject in which his island was interested. I think the loss of the late Mr. Carvell has slipped the memory of the hon. leader of this House.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I assure the House that it was not from any want of respect or admiration for the character of the hon. senator from P.E.I., that I failed to mention his name, but I thought I was going a little beyond my duty in calling the attention of the House to the demise of Mr. Boyd, who was no longer a member of the Senate when he died. Mr. Carvell having left the Senate some four or five years ago, I frankly confess it did not just come to my mind in the same manner as in the cases of two gentlemen who were members of the House and one who had left it since we last met. Had I thought it was my duty to call attention to it, I should have done so, and I assure the House it was not from any want of feeling for the loss of Mr. Carvell or from any want of respect for him that I have not referred to him.

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.) moved:

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the respectful thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious Speech he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament: namely:—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir John Campbell Hamilton-Gordon, Earl of Aberdeen; Viscount Formartine, Baron Haddo, Methlic, Tarves and Kellie, in the Peerage of Scotland; Viscount Gordon of Aberdeen, County of Aberdeen, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom; Baronet of Nova Scotia; Governor General of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency:—

We, Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly thank your Excellency for your gracious Speech at the opening of this Session.

We gratefully acknowledge the greeting which Your Excellency has given us in the Queen's name, for the first time since assuming the high functions intrusted to you by Her Majesty; and we rejoice to hear that it is with feelings of the liveliest satisfaction you thus meet us assembled for the labours of another session of Parliament.

We are deeply gratified to feel that this satisfaction is enhanced by the opportunities which Your Excellency has already enjoyed of visiting, and in your official capacity renewing acquaintance with, several of the chief centres of the enterprise and activity of this Dominion; to receive your assurance that you have been deeply impressed by the heartiness of the reception accorded to you as Her Majesty's Viceroy and Representative; and that you recognize in this reception one more manifestation of the loyalty, the cordiality, and the public spirit of the Canadian people.

Your Excellency's predecessor was able to express gratification to us last year, on an increase in trade and on the continued progress of the Dominion. It is gratifying to us to observe that the expectation then formed—that the volume of trade during the then current year would exceed that of any year in the history of the Dominion—has been fully realized and that Canada's progress continues, with every mark of stability and permanence.

We hear with satisfaction Your Excellency's statement that a large proportion of this increase is shown to have been due to an extension of our commerce with Great Britain.

We cordially agree with Your Excellency that it is a cause of thankfulness that our people have been spared in a very great degree from the sufferings which have visited the populations of some other countries during many months past, and that while the commercial depression prevailing abroad could not but affect the activity of business in the Dominion, we have been free from any extensive financial disaster or widespread distress.

We are glad to be informed that the revenues of the year have been ample for the services which we provided for, and have met the expectations on which the appropriations of last year were based.

We rejoice that the peaceful conclusion, by the award of the arbitrators at Paris, of the controversy which had prevailed so long, with respect to the seal fisheries in the Pacific Ocean and the rights of British subjects in the Behring Sea, has removed the only source of contention which existed between Great Britain and the United States with regard to Canada. We are also pleased to be informed that there is every reason to believe that Her Majesty's Government will obtain redress for those Canadian subjects of Her Majesty who were deprived of their property and liberty without just cause while the controversy was in progress.

We thank Your Excellency for informing us that at an early date a measure will be laid before us having for its object a revision of the duties of customs with a view to meet the changes which time has effected in business operations of all kinds throughout the Dominion; and that while Your Excellency's ministers do not propose to change the principles on which the existing enactments on this subject are based, the amendments which will be offered for our consideration are designed to simplify the operation of the tariff and to lessen, so far as can be done, consistently with those principles and with the requirements of the treasury, the imposts which are now in force.

We also thank Your Excellency for the information that there will also be laid before us a measure on the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency to make more adequate provision than now exists on that subject for the increasing trade and commerce of the country and for the greatly expanded trade between the several provinces of Canada.

Your Excellency having been pleased to inform us that measures will also be submitted to us making more effective provisions for our lines of steam communication on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, for improving the law with regard to Dominion lands and with regard to the management of Indian affairs, also a Bill respecting joint stock companies, another with respect to the fisheries, and several less important measure which experience has suggested with regard to various matters under our control, we respectfully assure Your Excellency that all these measures shall receive our most attentive consideration.

We respectfully concur in Your Excellency's opinion that of the public measures which will demand our attention some will be of great weight and importance, and we sincerely share Your Excellency's earnest hope and prayer that the care and zeal which we shall apply to the deliberations of the session may be aided by the abundant blessing of the Almighty.

I fully appreciate the honour conferred on me by the extension to me on this occasion of that courtesy by which the duty I am about to discharge is usually assigned to a new member. I am sure that in the performance of this duty I will receive, on the ground of my inexperience, the generous consideration of hon. gentlemen. It is true that I have had some experience in another place, yet the greater magnitude of the questions requiring consideration here, the contact on this floor with gentlemen (such as I see around me) of great training and experience in public life, together with my entire unfamiliarity with the rules and usages of this honourable body render my task one of considerable difficulty. The sound of a new voice on this floor reminds hon. gentlemen of the removal of one of their number, a landmark in the political history of Prince Edward Island. The Hon. Donald Montgomery was probably the oldest legislator in the Dominion. He entered the House of Assembly of Prince Edward Island in 1838, and continued a member of either branch of the Legislature until 1873, when he was called to a seat in this honourable House. Although Mr. Montgomery was not a prominent debater yet his strength of character was amply proved by the duration and continuity of his legislative career, while his sterling honesty and charming personality endeared him to the people of his native province, as I am sure they did to the members of this honourable House. Amongst the many changes which have occurred since the prorogation of Parliament, the departure of the late Governor General and the arrival of his successor, are the most important. It is not too much to say that in relinquishing the Government of Canada, and returning to a political career in Great Britain, the Earl of Derby carries with him the highest esteem and best wishes of the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. During his administration of the Government he fully maintained the high standard which had been set up by his illustrious predecessors, and has left a noble record for ability, impartiality and devotion to the interests of the people over whom he was called to preside. Not soon will the people of Canada forget the earnest efforts of Lord Derby and his amiable consort to promote the moral, educational and material interests of our Dominion. In the appointment of Lord Aberdeen to the office of Governor General, Her Gracious Majesty has given another proof of her great regard for the interests of Canada. All the appointments of Governor Generals since Confederation have been made from the front rank of British statesmen. The influence of these appointments has been very great in the past, not only in elevating and directing the tone of public life amongst us, but in securing for Canada, in the persons of retiring Governors, most devoted and influential friends in the councils of the Empire. The present Governor General and the noble lady who shares his joys and responsibility are not strangers to us; indeed, we may claim them as belonging to ourselves, and, as a farmer, I rejoice in the elevation to the Vice-royalty of Canada of a practical and enthusiastic Canadian farmer. It was my good fortune, in the summer of 1892, when on the Pacific coast, to pay a visit to one of the farms of our Governor General in the beautiful valley of the Okanagan, and I was impressed with the greatness of the work that Lord Aberdeen was there doing. I had not at that time seen the Governor General, nor was I very well acquainted with his political career, but I was struck with the educational character of his work in the introduction of new modes of husbandry in that part of our Dominion, and it is a matter of congratulation to the farmers of Canada that the gentleman who has been called to the very high and responsible position of Governor General is one who takes such an active interest in agriculture.

The Speech from the Throne expresses satisfaction at the increased trade and continued progress of our Dominion. It is a cause for congratulation at the present time, when the nations of the earth have suffered from a wave of depression, which has been felt with painful effect in the great republic to the south of us, that in this country we have experienced so little of its effects. It is a matter of great pride and satisfaction to Canada that such is the fact. The speech refers to the great increase in the trade of Canada within the last two years, and expresses satisfaction that a large proportion of that increase is due to an extension of our commerce with Great Britain. While I am proud of any extension of our commerce with the nations of the world, I think I speak the sentiment of Canadians generally, when I say that it is always a ground of satisfaction when the trade follows the flag, and when the increase of our commerce is well maintained with the countries which own allegiance to our Sovereign the Queen. In this connection I shall quote the following figures:—

TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

In 1890-91	$ 91,328,384
1891-92	106,254,984
1892-93	107,228,906
Increase in 1891-2 over 1890-91	$14,926,600
1892-3 do 1891-92	973,922
1892-3 do 1890-91	15,900,522

Our trade with the neighbouring republic has also made satisfactory progress during the same period. Although there was a slight falling off in 1892, the increase has been marked in 1893:—

TRADE WITH UNITED STATES.

In 1890-91	$ 94,824,352
1891-92	92,125,599
1892-93	102,104,986
Decrease in 1891-92 compared with 1890-91	$ 2,698,753
Increase in 1890-91 over 1891-92	10,019,387
1892-93 do 1890-91	7,286,634

Increase of trade with Great Britain for two years 17·4 per cent.

Increase of trade with United States for the last two years 7·6 per cent.

There are several reasons which, I think, make it satisfactory that this increase of trade has occurred with Great Britain. An increase of trade strengthens the bonds of union which, I am sure, we are all desirous should exist between Great Britain and Canada. There is another consideration, that whatever trade we once secure with Great Britain is more likely to be permanent than the trade that we have with any other country. We do not apprehend any danger from very serious fiscal changes, or from any unfriendly attitude towards us, and for that reason we may count on more permanent trade with Great Britain than with other countries. There is another feature of our trade with Great Britain that makes it satisfactory, and that is that the British market generally calls for better products than other countries, and it stimulates the people of Canada to send what they have to spare to the markets of the world in the very best form, in order to command the highest prices. I have often met the statement that our tariff discriminates against the trade of Great Britain, that the fiscal policy of Canada imposes a larger duty on British than on United States goods. That I regard as an incident of all tariffs. On looking over the figures, I find that the very same result occurred under the different tariffs that we have had since confederation, and I attribute it to the fact that Great Britain is not so large an exporter of raw material as the United States. It has been more or less a feature of the different tariffs that we have had since Confederation to allow raw material for manufacturing purposes to come into the country, if not entirely free, at a much lower duty than manufactured articles. Rate of taxation on United States goods, dutiable and free, from 1880 to 1893, inclusive, 14·76 per cent.

The rate of taxation on British goods during the period from 1880 to 1893, was 5·79 per cent higher than on United States goods.

I would not call it a discrimination, but the operation of the tariff during the first period of five years was rather more against British trade than it has been during the last fourteen years. The difference is not very great, but whatever difference there is, is against the first period. I account, as I have already intimated, for this difference in taxation collected on United States and British goods by the fact that we import raw material more largely from the United States, as is shown by the following figures from the returns of last year :—

	From U. S.	From G. B.
Anthracite coal and coal dust ....$	6,349,819	$ 5,466
Tobacco manufactured for excise............	1,616,201	546
Cotton wool	3,188,145	13,307

Excess of free goods from the United States	18,380,780
Total dutiable goods from United States..	33,699,389
do do Great Britain..	31,869,267

Items of this character fully account for the difference which must unavoidably exist in regard to the operation of the tariff.

The Speech from the Throne congratulates us on our comparative escape from the depression which has prevailed in almost every other country during the past year. I am inclined to attribute the immunity of Canada from this great and serious depression to causes, some of which I shall refer to—causes which hon. gentlemen will bear me out in saying are very potent influences in warding off such a depression as that which has been passing over the earth. One is our banking system—the adaptability of our system of banking to the wants and necessities of the country. One very powerful reason why our republican neighbours have suffered so severely is that they have not adjusted their banking system to the wants of their country. That system was an abnormal growth of the civil war, and the statesmen of the neighbouring republic have not been alive to the necessities of the time. Had they been, they would have more thoroughly adapted their banking system to the wants and necessities of their country. Another reason is found in our climate. Notwithstanding the grumbling we sometimes hear among our people about the rigorous climate of Canada, I believe, and have always felt, that our climate is calculated to develop a more vigorous and robust type of manhood than more southern latitudes. In no small degree our people are indebted to our rigorous climate for their ability to face difficulties so bravely and successfully as they are doing. Although we sometimes cast jealous eyes on the neigbouring country and envy them the comparative mildness of their climate, I believe that the best part of the republic is found in the strip of country lying within one hundred miles to the south of our boundary, possessing a climate similar to ours, and that if it were not for that portion of their country, the United States would not be as great as it is to-day. It is in the northern portion of the republic that the greatest development is taking place. Although some hon. gentlemen may not agree with me, I think that the moderate character of our fiscal system has had something to do also with our ability to successfully stem the tide of depression prevailing around us. Although we are in the habit of speaking of our tariff as a very extreme one, we should bear in mind that it is very moderate as compared with that of the United States, and just as the banking system of Canada has proved itself to be adapted to the wants of the people, our fiscal system, though it may not be perfect, and may require, as I believe it does, very serious consideration and adjustment, has saved us from disaster—the test of experience has proved that the principles underlying it are adapted to the condition of our country. I feel like congratulating the Government on one very gratifying feature of our public affairs —that is, that having long ago grappled with great public enterprises, such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, and having accomplished what they had undertaken, thereby considerably increasing the debt of the country—having still liberally provided for such great works, there has not been any serious increase in the taxation of the country during the last ten years. I look upon that as a very gratifying circumstance. In expressing to the members of the Government my views on this point, I am pleased to be the medium of conveying to them the congratulations of a very much greater authority than I am—one whose good opinion, I know, they will very highly appreciate. Ten years ago, a very distinguished gentleman, still distinguished in the political affairs of Canada, Sir Richard Cartwright, declared himself in the words which I am now about to read to this House. I am quoting from a speech of his, in reply to the Budget Speech, in 1884 :—

Now, I admit that abstract propositions cannot always be depended on. But I say that in matters financial you can almost certainly, with safety, lay down this proposition: that whenever, without war or some other extraordinary cause like that, you find the taxes of a country increasing very rapidly, increasing out of all proportion to its population, you may rest assured that the Government has been grossly extravagant, and in all probability grossly corrupt. And when you find the taxation remain stationary for a term of years, you may feel equally assured that the Government has been honestly and economically conducted.

In connection with this proposition I have here some figures that I have taken from the Public Accounts.

During the last year a most important exhibition of the industries of the world was held in the city of Chicago, and it is a matter of great satisfaction and gratification to the people of Canada that our country took such a good position on that occasion. I have been looking over the reports, as far as they are available, and find that in two articles especially Canada has made extraordinary progress: one is in the matter of dairy products, especially of cheese, and the other manufactures.

At Philadelphia, in cheese, Canada received 49 awards out of 195 entries, whilst at Chicago, Canada received 736 awards out of 849 entries. At Philadelphia, the Canadian cheese was very uneven, some made four points over any American cheese, others of very low grade.

It is most gratifying, that almost the entire exhibit from Canada was of such a high character at Chicago that it almost debarred United States cheese from taking awards at all.

In another department Canada has proved herself to have progressed admirably, that is in manufactures. It is true that at the Chicago Exhibition there were not as many Canadian exhibitors as there were at Philadelphia, but the more important and higher character of the exhibits is proved by the larger percentage of awards given to Canadian exhibitors on that occasion, and it is worthy of note that a very eminent authority, the Hon. Robert Thurston, who was chairman of the committee on jurors and awards at Chicago, made a statement which is certainly in the highest degree creditable to Canada. He is from Cornell University, a professor in that university, and was officially connected with the Centennial Exhibition as well, and he stated that he had examined the Canadian exhibit of general and agricultural machinery with very great care, as he had sixteen years before at Philadelphia. In design, construction and smoothness of running, he considered ours equal to any in the exhibition, and he considered that Canada had in these sixteen years shown greater progress than any other nation. I may say that this is a matter of great satisfaction to us, because it is not so very long ago since Canada was dependent upon the neighbouring republic for its agricultural implements, and it is a very unsatisfactory state of things indeed when a country has to depend upon foreign nations for its agricultural machinery. It is less than twenty-five years since Canada—at least the part of it from which I come—was the dumping ground for the agricultural implements of the United States, for mowing machines and reaping machines which were passing out of use in their own country; these machines were dumped upon us and our farmers were using them years after they had become unsaleable in the United States. They purchased them at very high prices indeed, and it is very pleasing that during the last few years our manufacturers have so successfully grappled with this question and placed Canada on an equality with the United States in the matter of agricultural implements. I believe that our manufacturers have the trade in these machines at this time very well in their hands, except to a small extent, it may be, in the North-west. Canadian manufacturers have not had so long an experience in manufacturing for the prairie country as their competitors in the South, but this difficulty will, no doubt, be overcome before very long. It has been overcome so far as the old provinces are concerned, and we have implements well suited to our wants, and I think as good in quality as can be found in any country under the sun. The state of Canada in respect to farming implements might be compared to that of the children of Israel under the rule of Saul, the son of Kish. It is perhaps unnecessary to recite to hon. gentlemen, who are well acquainted with this little bit of biblical history, how in that time :—

There was no smith found in all the land of Israel. For the Philistines said lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears. But all the Israelites went down to the Philistines to sharpen every man his share, and his coulter and his axe and his mattock. Yet they had a file for the mattocks, and for the coulters, and for the forks, and for the axes, and to sharpen the goads.

We were not quite as badly off as that twenty or thirty years ago, but our condition approximated to it. We remember the extraordinary industrial development of the Israelitish nation under King Solomon when the temple was built fifty or sixty years afterwards. The change in Canada has, perhaps, not been so great, but it is very gratifying that we now find manufactured in our own country a line of agricultural implements well suited to our wants, excellent in their character and cheap in their price. I am not expressing any opinion whatever as to the rate of duty imposed on these articles, whether it may be reduced or otherwise. I am not in a position to express any opinion on that point at the present time. If these manufacturers are as well established as I believe they are, and can now maintain themselves with a smaller rate of duty, the farmers of Canada will hail the change with a great deal of satisfaction. I congratulate Canada on the showing made at the Chicago exhibition, and on the admission of the chairman of the committee of jurors and awards, that Canada had progressed well in the matter of manufacture of agricultural implements since the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia. Similar testimony was given by the commissioner representing the Austrian nation on that occasion to which I would also refer. While speaking on this subject, I may also say a word about the breach of comity on the part of the American managers of the exposition in regard to these very agricultural implements. It was most extraordinary conduct, according to the information I have obtained—the treatment which Canadian exhibitors of farming implements received at Chicago. It appears that Canada and even Great Britain had no representative on the committee of jurors. There were five American gentlemen upon that committee, and a representative each from Austria and Russia. Neither Britain nor Canada was represented upon that board of jurors: nevertheless awards were made to the Canadian binders, mowers, reapers, threshers, separators and all the different classes of implements. The awards were made, but were either changed after they passed out of the hand of the jurors, or suppressed afterwards, so that they have not been given to the manufacturers of Canadian goods. This is a matter of very great regret, for it is the only unpleasant thing and the only cause of unpleasant feeling that has arisen between the two countries in connection with this Chicago Exhibition. I might here refer to the examination of the Hon. Mr. Thacher, the chairman of the executive committee of the exposition, at a meeting of the National Commission held at Washington in September last, where he was asked some questions on this subject of awards to Canadian manufacturers. He said:

There are only three exhibits so far as I can understand, represented by foreigners of the class that were ordered into the field, and those exhibits were examined, but as I stated in my paper here, they did not receive an award—that is information which I perhaps ought not to give.

Q. Does that cover the entire ground that they will not receive an award ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then there will be no cause for alarm on the part of American exhibitors that foreign exhibits will be examined on the floor in any way to harm the trade of the home exhibitor at all ?—A. No, sir.

Was it not outrageous that the management of the exposition conducted the matter in this way, intercepting the awards on their way from the committee of jurors to the manufacturers who had fairly won them, intercepting them in the interest of the United States manufacturers in order to see that they would not harm their trade? This is a most regretable incident in connection with the awards, and I am sure that every hon. gentleman in this House will be ready to share my sentiments.

It is a matter of satisfaction to the people of Canada (satisfaction which I am sure is not confined to gentlemen of any political party), that in the arbitration which has been held during the past year in reference to the Behring Sea fisheries, the contention of Canada has been so thoroughly vindicated. It is a great point that when a contention of this kind has been pronounced upon by independent arbitrators, it is found that the Government and people of Canada were right. It gives them a character commanding the respect of the nations of the earth, of which they may very well feel proud. Some of the regulations made by the arbitrators may not meet with the entire and perfect concurrence of our people, but at the same time it cannot fail to be observed that the commissioners representing the United States, with whom our great contention arose and with whom it was settled at Paris, as well as one of the commissioners representing Great Britain, dissented from these regulations: therefore, although some of our own people felt hardly in the matter, I cannot help feeling that as the representatives of the United States as well as one of our own dissented from these regulations, while all the foreign arbitrators and one of the arbitrators from Great Britain agreed with them, it may be that these regulations are after all in the general interest of the United States as well as of Canada. I do not profess to have any exact information on this subject, but the circumstance of the disagreement of the arbitrators points very strongly in that direction.

Reference is made in the Speech from the Throne to a subject which cannot fail to be of very great interest—that is a rapid mail service on the Atlantic and the Pacific. For my own part, I may say, as one who long ago advocated the principles upon which this great union of the provinces of Canada is based, I look upon more perfect communication with the mother country, entirely between our own ports, and perfect communication westward and southward from the Pacific coast to other parts of our empire, as a consummation of the great plan of confederation. Confederation will not be fully complete until we have such perfect communication with the mother country as will not be second to any other upon the ocean. The Speech from the Throne intimates that a measure with respect to Dominion lands is about to be introduced. I do not know what that measure is to be, but I have a very lively interest in our great North-west. I have had the pleasure of making two visits to that part of Canada, and have traversed a great deal of it and I feel a deep interest in its progress. I regret very much that the tide of immigration has not set in more strongly in that direction. It was quite easy to understand that the great American nation, with the enormous inducements which they were holding out—I may be permitted to say the abnormal inducements which they were extending to the people of other countries—should draw a population to the United States and that they should be enabled to fill up their prairies before ours were occupied. They had indeed begun work long before we acquired the North-west, and the stream of immigration had set in there before we were in a position to offer lands to settlers at all. I am also aware of the fact that within the last year or two there has been an extraordinary depression in the price of wheat, that great staple of Canada, and that this circumstance has had a very serious tendency to restrict immigration to that part of the country. From what I was able to see, from the impressions I was able to form through coming into contact with the people of that great North-west, and from the observations which I made in almost every part of it, I feel convinced that there never was at any time, that there is not at the present time, anything at all to prevent active, earnest, hardworking people from going into that country and becoming successful farmers, not entirely as wheat producers, but as mixed farmers, raising all productions that the climate and the soil are adapted for, and they are very varied and numerous. I believe that the commerce of that great North-west will be very active in the future—I hope it will, for it is a magnificent country. I dare say that most of the hon. gentlemen whom I am addressing have visited that country, as I have done. If so, they must have formed a very high opinion of it. Manitoba is a magnificent province, standing in the very gateway of the North-west Territories, and it has received during the last few years a portion at least of the tide of immigration from the old world. Going further west we enter the great territories of Assiniboia, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Athabasca. In traversing that country one feels that his tread is not on an empire's dust, but that on every hand is to be heard the tread of pioneers of nations yet to be. I earnestly hope that there will be no difference of opinion, either in this House or in this country, upon any policy that may be adopted to encourage settlement in and immigration towards that great North-west, for the future of Canada, if I am any judge at all, is there, in that magnificent heritage which we have in the great North-west. In the discussion of such political questions as come up before us, in the sharp divergence of politics, it sometimes appears to those on one side that their opponents are not quite as patriotic as they ought to be, that they do not always stand up as well for our own country as they should, but whatever may appear on the surface, I am satisfied that in the ranks of both political parties in Canada there is a united sentiment and desire that our country should prosper and become great and glorious in the future; and I am sure when any question arises affecting the honour and the dignity of Canada, there will be found in the ranks of both political parties and among the leaders of both parties men who will stand up for Canada and apply to the occasion the words of the Scottish bard, Robert Burns, in addressing the Dumfries volunteers:—

> The kettle of the kirk and state
> May hae perhaps a flaw in it,
> But de'il a foreign tinkler loon
> Shall ever put a claw on it.
> Our fathers' blood the kettle bought
> Then wha would dare to spoil it,
> By Heavens, the sacrilegious dog
> Shall fuel be to boil it.

The arena of political discussion in Canada is surely wide enough without encroaching on ground which can be regarded as unpatriotic. We have a territory extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific capable of maintaining an immense population in the latitudes, as I have already stated, in which have been nurtured the men who for centuries have controlled the destinies of the world. Canada has at present a population of five millions of hardy self-reliant people, unfettered by any grievance or by any condition unfavourable to national growth. Our dominion enjoys a connection with the most powerful empire on which the sun has ever shone, giving perfect security with entire exemption from the responsibility of national defence. We have an unsurpassed railway system, unequalled facilities for internal navigation, and shipping interests only surpassed by Great Britain, France and the United States. Canada has to-day resources far more extensive than those possessed by the original thirteen colonies even twenty-five years after they attained their independence.

Can it be that the gospel of blue ruin is the message which the press of Canada is intrusted to deliver to the men of this generation? Can it be that the children of men who never quailed are unequal to the task of going forward in days of peace and plenty with the work which had its foundations so firmly laid in the midst of toil, danger and privation? No, above the hoarse, uncertain growl of political disputation may be heard the clear ringing voice of enterprise, inviting the men of Canada to come up and possess the heritage which God has given them. If there be a man amongst us who has no faith in Canada, no word of cheer to offer to the brave toilers who in the workshop, on the deck, in the mine, on the farm, or in the forest are labouring to make our country great and glorious, I would address to that man the words of Henry V. at the Battle of Agincourt:

> He who hath no stomach for the fight,
> Let him depart. His passport shall be made,
> And crowns for convoy put into his purse,
> We would not die in that man's company.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In availing myself of the honour of seconding the resolution, I beg to also avail myself of the privilege of seconding the noble sentiments, which have been so admirably presented, by the mover and in extension of the views which he has expressed, I can do little more than reiterate the hope that they will be unanimously endorsed by this House.

It is indeed a pleasure to those concerned with the Parliament of Canada, to enter upon our labours with the knowledge that the representative of Her Majesty in this country is one in whom we have not only unbounded confidence, but who has already awakened the strongest feelings of respect and the deepest sentiments of affection. It is truly a compliment to Canada, and an indication of the high status which she occupies as a portion of the Empire, that a statesman whose counsels have been earnestly sought for by leading statesmen of the realm, and whose experience in other and difficult stations earned for him a reputation as an Imperial representative which few have attained to, should be asked to represent Her Majesty in Canada; and it is the strongest indication of the value which is set upon this Dominion by the Imperial Government and by our beloved sovereign, whom he represents. We naturally hail with delight the arrival on our shores of any statesman bearing such an important trust, but it is doubly satisfactory to the people of Canada to realize that ever since His Execllency set foot upon Canadian soil, at the old and historic city of Quebec, every action and every movement which His Excellency has made has more firmly convinced us that he has the welfare of the country at heart and is determined to more firmly cement Canada as a portion of the Empire, and continue within our borders that deep feeling of loyalty which throughout our history has been characteristic of our people.

The prosperity of the Dominion as evinced by reports from every authentic source, is indeed a matter of congratulation. It is true that the depression which has been sweeping over other countries has affected one of our staple products, but no one can successfully contend, that this is true of our general trade or that Canada to-day does not occupy a most enviable position as compared with other countries. So far as my own province is concerned, I need only quote from the annual reports of the cashier of one of our leading banking houses to show that our prosperity is not a mere illusion, produced by political bias or asserted for political purposes, but indeed a genuine verity. In his reports this gentleman says:

Everything farmers have raised this year has yielded profits and given good results for their labour; therefore the value of the production of the year, from that source has been considerably increased and for these causes the business of the community at large and its general trade, which directly depends for the activity on the farmers return, has been good. The power of purchasing has been increased by the good return, and as a natural consequence, farmers budgets all round have been replenished. Country storekeepers have purchased very freely, and remittances from the country have been satisfactory. The sales in wholesale trade have been maintained and the volume of business has been materially over the average of last year.

That this prosperity may continue and increase is the heartfelt wish of every well wisher of our country, but in this connection I may add that our prosperity can only be continued by adhesion to those principles which have protected Canadian industries from the whirlwind of depression which has raged to the south of us.

The intimation contained in the Speech of His Excellency, of the consummation of a steamship communication between Canada and England and between Canada and Australia is an event of more than continental importance. Canada has hitherto occupied a position at the further extreme from that occupied by the Australian colonies. She is now to be placed immediately in the pathway of connection between the great Australian continent and the centre of the Empire. She cannot but reap advantages hitherto unknown to us, and it gives her new possibilities of development never before possessed. Her position as an integral and indispensable portion of the Empire is, by this enterprise, permanently assured, and the wisdom of the undertaking reflects the highest credit upon the Government which has given us this additional boon.

In seconding this resolution, permit me to express the hope that the labours of the present session, may be both useful and harmonious and that we may all enter upon our duty with a fervent desire to promote the well-being of this fair Dominion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I desire to offer my congratulations to the Senator from Prince Edward Island, who has been selected by the Government to move the resolution on which to base the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. That hon. gentleman need not have asked the forbearance or indulgence of the House—although the Senate would be always ready to grant an indulgent hearing to all its new members —for he has given us evidence that he is not unaccustomed to addressing deliberative bodies. The hon. gentleman was clear and explicit, from his own standpoint, and, although I do not agree with him in all his conclusions, yet, I admit that it was a very interesting speech that he delivered to this Chamber, and, I have no doubt, in the future we shall have an opportunity of hearing his voice on the various subjects which come up for consideration. The hon. gentleman who seconded the resolution did so with the good taste which he always displays when he addresses the Senate, which, I regret to say, is not very often. The hon. gentleman possesses sound judgment, and on the committees of the House his opinion is always looked up to with great consideration and respect. I join most cordially with both hon. gentlemen in all they have said in reference to His Excellency the Governor General, and in according to him as warm a welcome as it is possible for us to give when he has assumed the position of the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada. His Excellency comes from a distinguished family, whose ancestors served the State, both in Scotland and in England. They occupied very high positions. His Excellency comes to us under circumstances that are somewhat peculiar and different from those which attended his predecessors, making his advent to Canada one of much greater interest to the Canadian people than has been usual in the selection of his predecessors. In the past, the position of Governor General in this country has rather been regarded as a stepping-stone to advancement, than as the ultimate ambition of English statesmen. The late Lord Elgin went from Canada to India. Lord Lansdowne did the same; after serving a term in this country he was appointed Viceroy to India. Lord Dufferin likewise followed in the same path, and subsequently occupied very high and distinguished positions in the diplomatic service. With Lord Aberdeen it has been somewhat different. He was selected some six years ago to fill the first position under the Crown of Great Britain in a representative capacity—that of Viceroy to Ireland. We all know that he conducted himself there with such success and such tact that he not only softened the hearts of the Irish people towards the British Crown, but he and Lady Aberdeen endeared themselves to the people by the very great interest they took in all that tends to the amelioration of the people of any country. His departure from Dublin Castle was marked with an event which indicates the success which attended his administration. I believe the bands of the national societies had not played "God save the Queen" for many years before, but they played it on the occasion of the departure of Lord Aberdeen from Dublin. It is only an indication of what tact and sympathy with the people he was called to preside over can accomplish. These characteristics are possessed by our present Governor General. As has been very happily observed by the hon. gentleman who moved these resolutions, His Excellency took an interest in Canada long before his name was connected with it in an official character. He manifested his appreciation of the future of Canada by investing his money in it. At that time there was a general expression of opinion that he might possibly be the next Governor General, and the hope was heralded forth through the country that Mr. Gladstone might possibly select him and that if he did so the Canadian people would welcome his choice. Having said that much, I part company, to some extent, with the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address. I think it would have been only due to Parliament had the Government explained why we were not called together at an earlier date. Recently there has been an unwritten agreement that Parliament should be called together about the beginning of February each year. It would be found more convenient for business men to leave Ottawa before the middle of May or the beginning of June. This year, if we have the usual session, it may be extended to the end of June, or possibly the beginning of July. I think Parliament was entitled to some explanation from the Government of the reason for the extraordinary delay in summoning the House.

The next paragraph of the Address refers to the gratifying fact that the volume of trade last year exceeded that of any year in the history of the Dominion. I do not think it anything very wonderful that a country possessing the elements of greatness that Canada has and such wealth of resources should increase in trade as the years go by. The increase has not been at all commensurate with the circumstances of the country. I looked up the figures while my honourable friend was speaking on that point, and it did not occur to me that the growth and development were of that magnitude that he would lead us to believe. I find that so far as our exports go, the export of the products of the mine was less than it was the preceding year and the year before—that the export of the products of our fisheries was less than it was the preceding year and the year before. Our forests gave a considerable part of the increase. The exports of the products of the forest rose from $22,000,000 to $26,000,000. The export of animals (the products of the farm) rose from $28,000,000 to $31,000,000 between 1892 and 1893. So far as other sources of agricultural wealth go, they were about at a standstill. In 1892 they were $22,000,000 and in 1893, they were $22,000,000, so it will be seen that the additional amount of export was due entirely to the products of the forest and the products of animals. These are two sources of wealth to this country that are susceptible of the most extraordinary development. So far as the wealth of the forest goes, it depends entirely on whether our foreign customers can buy our lumber. When the United States or Great Britain are booming there is a greater demand for Canadian lumber; when there is any depression in the United States or Great Britain, but more particularly in the United States, the demand for lumber falls. The trade is not dependent on any innate factor in Canada, but on causes outside. So it is with animals—facility and cost of transport and incidents of that kind govern our ability to place them on the markets of the world as low as the producers of other countries are able to do. The growth of our trade is due entirely to the industry of the Canadian people. It is in no way dependent on the fiscal policy of the country. The fiscal policy is adverse to them. It bears heavily on the articles that they consume. There is no special credit to be claimed by the Government. Then, again, we are told that one gratifying phase of it is the increase of trade with Great Britain. I find the increase there is only about $1,000,000 over the preceding year. The trade with Great Britain was $106,000,000 in 1892, and in 1893 it was $107,000,000; but a very singular coincidence is that 20 years ago it was $107,000,000. Going back to 1873 it was exactly $107,266,000, and in 1893 it was $107,228,000, which is a few thousand dollars less than it was in 1873. Now that is not very much to boast of—nothing that can be held forth as evidence of great development in the trade of the country, when we have so many more broad acres under tillage, when we have so many more people engaged in agriculture, when we have so many more facilities for its transportation, and when we ought to be in a position to buy so much more than we did twenty years ago. Our trade with the United States last year was $102,000,000, as against $107,000,000 with Great Britain. It must be remembered that the British market is open to us. We can readily increase our aggregate trade with Great Britain by taking down our tariff. If we do, our trade will certainly increase. The British market is always open to us. We do not pay a farthing on anything we send to that market, and therefore it rests entirely with ourselves to say whether our trade with Great Britain shall be increased or not. There is a constant reference to the advantages of the British market. I am most anxious to increase our trade with the British market, but to do so let us take down our tariff—that is the common sense way to do it. On their part there is no tariff barrier. The only wonder is that between the McKinley tariff on the one side and the Foster tariff on the other there is any trade between this country and the United States. What is surprising about it is that in spite of the difficulties created by both countries, we have $102,000,000 trade with the United States, only $5,000,000 less than with Great Britain. I may be told that that is due to some extent to the passage of bullion back and forth, but even allowing four or five millions of dollars for bullion, it shows an extraordinary expansion of trade with the United States in spite of all the difficulties and barriers thrown in the way. The hon. gentleman seemed to think, from the course of his remarks, that there was a degree of prosperity in Canada that we ought all to appreciate, and he did not seem to think that we were a highly taxed people or that we had anything to complain of with regard to the tariff. He comes from a part of the Dominion where nature has been most bountiful in her gifts—where they have not only the wealth of the land, rich soil for agriculture, but they have the wealth of the ocean around them. They have in addition to that an opportunity for recuperating the soil by gathering shells from the sea shore and enriching the land, yet Prince Edward Island has not made that progress which, under fair and ordinary conditions, from my standpoint, it should have made since it entered confederation. When I come to discuss the question of taxes, I think I will be able to show to the hon. gentleman that there are two ways of paying taxes—that the $23,000,000 that we pay as customs duties and the $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 that we pay as inland revenue—or those who drink whisky and wine pay—represents a very small part of the taxes levied upon the people. Coming to Prince Edward Island I find that in 1874, the year after they came into confederation, they imported for consumption into the island $1,900,000 worth of goods on which they paid a duty of $219,000—that is a duty of about 12 per cent. Last year they only imported $481,811 worth on which they paid a duty of $142,000. Although they imported one-fifth of what they had imported before, they paid about half as much duty on that one-fifth. Of course it will be said that the reductions in the importations was due to the fact that they were buying in 1893 very largely from Ontario. They bought those agricultural implements that my hon. friend has lauded so much, giving the manufacturers the benefit of 30 or 35 per cent that the tariff of this country enabled them to charge over and above the fair value of the article in a free market; but I find also that, taking the five years from 1873 to 1878, the first five years after Prince Edward Island came into confederation, they sold abroad $7,500,000 worth, and during the last five years from 1889 to 1893, they only sold $5,500,000 worth—$2,000,000 less in the last five years than in the former period. That must have had some effect on the island. I think Prince Edward Island is situated, for the purposes of trade, for opportunities of reaching the world's markets, in a more favourable position than any other part of the Dominion. It is within easy sail of the markets along the New England coast, and it is nearer the markets of Europe, and, therefore, the progress of Prince Edward Island ought to be great, but if we want the clearest evidence that the growth is not there that it is entitled to expect, we have only to point out the fact that her sons have emigrated to other parts of this continent. The census of 1881 showed a population of 108,000, and in 1891 there were only 187 more persons, men, women and children in the island than there were ten years before. In the face of that fact, the hon. gentleman required a great deal of faith in the policy, in the tariff, and all the other acts of the Administration to laud them, as he did, in ascribing the success that this country has achieved, in the last ten or fifteen years, to their policy. The hon. gentleman endeavoured to prove to us—and he quoted figures from Sir Richard Cartwright's speech—that Canada was not unduly taxed. He pointed out that, apparently, the taxation was not greater in 1893 than it was ten years ago. But there are other ways of paying taxes than paying into the Treasury. If the hon. gentleman were to enumerate the taxes that we pay on our cotton goods, which go to swell the dividends of the cotton lords, and if he were to mention the taxes that we pay on all the iron used in this country he would find that the burden is very much greater. For instance, if he will take the taxes which we pay on sugar to the refiners of Canada and the taxes we pay on our coal oil—I will not go on and enumerate a long list of articles—he will find that the $23,000,000 that we pay in customs and the six or seven millions of dollars that we pay in Inland Revenue, are very small items in the amount. Take sugar as an illustration, because while he was speaking it occurred to me that I might quote the figures. The average amount of sugar that we consume is about 150,000,000 pounds. An hon. member near me says it is more than that. It is put in the official return at 200,000,000 pounds, but that includes some of the coarser kinds that we would not use, those below 14. There must be a large loss in refining such sugar, but I will put it at 150,000,000 pounds. The refiner gets eight-tenths of a cent—that is the duty on sugar, the quality which is consumed in a country like Canada. If that four-fifths of a cent went into the treasury it would mean $1,000,000 or a little more added to the revenue. But what went into the treasury last year for sugar? I have just turned up the amount on sugar and it is $9,000. Somebody must get the benefit of the balance. The refiner has to get his prices a shade below foreign prices in order to keep out the foreign article. Suppose he takes only a half cent (and the figures I have given are within the mark) we should receive three-quarters of a million dollars. Now that is quite plain. My hon. friend shakes his head—it seems to me that if he were to try to experiment we would find it so. Between 1873 and 1878, we derived a considerable revenue from sugar and closed the refinery in Montreal. But is it not better that we should get a revenue from sugar and the people have their sugar cheap than that we should have a few people employed in refining sugar in this country? Would it not be better, if need be, to pension off the few people employed in refining sugar and let the people have cheap sugar? The same argument applies all through. I might go on and illustrate that every other article which is protected imposes an indirect tax on the consumer. What is the object of a protective tariff? It is to force the consumer to purchase in the home market. If we could all get a little advantage over each other and be put on a footing of equality, I could recognize the fairness of it, but we are protecting a favoured few—fifteen per cent of the population—and the other eighty-five per cent have to pay the shot. It is unfair—it is robbing the country, and disturbing the financial equality that we ought all to stand on. Is it not a fact that a few men in Canada are getting richer and a good many are getting poorer or cannot make headway? There is no land under the sun as favoured as Canada is, no country has such forests and fisheries. No country has finer land to till. No country can produce cheaper under normal circumstances than Canada, none can more successfully compete with the world in everything that is indigenous to the soil, but because it suits the policy of the Government to favour a few individuals who, it is said, reciprocate one way or another—of course I do not speak of the Red Parlour or any reciprocity of that sort—but for some reason or other there is a disposition to tax the consumer for the benefit of the few. While Canada has been growing richer, there is no doubt about it, the wealth is not fairly distributed. It runs into particular lines, it runs into particular industries that are subsidized by the State, because it is a subsidy by the State where you compel people to purchase the articles they desire from certain producers. That is a subsidy given to the producer by the State at the expense of the consumer. There is no other way of looking at it. The hon. gentleman ascribes the depression in the United States to their defective banking system. Their banking system is not as good as ours—there is no doubt about that—but that could not disturb, to the extent that it did, the condition of the United States. It was due simply to the protective policy. The silver men of Nevada and California made a ring with the iron, the coal and other interests of the United States and said "here we are in the swim, we want the United States Government to buy our silver." The Government of the United States agreed to buy one million dollars silver every week, and they have been throwing over fifty millions of dollars a year away—they might as well have thrown it into the sea. They have been buying an article that is daily being depressed in value, an article they cannot get rid of. They would go into bankruptcy in a few years if they persisted in it. They now have $500,000,000 of silver in their vaults. Is not that enough to create a depression in a country? That $500,000,000 is held at a national loss. That is the cause of the depression, and the gold is being exported rapidly from the country. The reserve of gold from week to week was decreasing. It was simply the outgrowth of their extreme protective policy. When you get a protective policy—happily it has not got such a hold on the Canadian people as it had on the people of the United States—it is almost impossible to shake it off. The people of the United States decided in favour of free trade or a revenue tariff a year and a half ago, yet to-day they are powerless, because even Democrats get into the ranks, just as in this country opponents of the Government get into the combines, and favoured and subsidized companies are incorporated, and the moment they do that they become true Tories and upholders of a protective policy. The moment we are ourselves interested, we are influenced. My hon. friend thinks that is an admission — it is an admission simply that human nature is weak, and we are all, Grit or Tory, liable to the same influences. Every man is a protectionist in his own business and a free trader in every one elses. That is the supreme law of human nature. We may as well be frank; there is no use deceiving ourselves. When persons become interested in any particular business they naturally want to keep others out. They get 30 per cent protection, and then they want 35; they get 35, and then they want 40, and so it goes on. Unless the policy of the Government gets a rude shake at the next election, it may continue going on in this country for the next 25 years, because if you give the leading and influential men in the country an interest in its growth and development, you cannot shake it off. The mass of the people do not understand the matter. It is only recently that the farming interest has taken this question up, and why? Simply because the McKinley tariff and the Foster tariff were two blessings in disguise. They taught the people to reason and to look for the origin of things, and to endeavour to find out what was the cause of the depression and of the hard times. It was a very difficult matter to convince them, because the tariff was thought to be some ingenious way of putting money into the exchequer without seriously affecting anybody's interest or making a drain on anybody's pocket. This was a delusion under which the people remained for a long time, but owing to the McKinley tariff more particularly, the people began to discover that the tariff was simply a tax which contributes to the support of the revenue or to the support of the individual who was reaping the benefit of the fiscal policy. But I am glad to know that under the influence of a high tariff the people of this country are being educated up to the truth. If 75 per cent of the community choose to go and enrich the remaining 25 per cent and pay their quota to add to the wealth of that 25 per cent they have themselves to blame for it. Unless the Government come down with the changes which they have foreshadowed to some degree, they will find a considerable upheaval in public opinion at the next election. They tell us in the next paragraph of the speech that they do propose to make some changes, which is an indication that, at all events to some extent, I am right. They say it is lopping off the mouldering branches. The minute you begin to lop off those branches you have to make the admission that the tariff was too high. If you take anything off cotton, is it not a fair admission that the cotton men are getting too much of an advantage and that their market was too heavily protected? You give them the raw material free and they have many other advantages. Selling in the country in which they manufacture, they have a great advantage over the foreign producer or manufacturer in the matter of freight, and they should be satisfied to a large extent with that. But the very fact of your consenting to lower the tariff is an admission that undue advantage is being taken by persons who are in those special lines of business which are so highly protected. Of course you will find, to use a vulgar expression, that somebody will squeal. If you begin to talk about taking away the privileges from a class they begin to remonstrate. They make it appear that their business is being injured. The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island spoke about the agricultural implements that we produce. I quite agree with him that we do produce as fine agricultural implements as are made in any country, and I think if the raw material were made free altogether our manufactures would be able to compete with the world. I have no doubt that my hon. friend opposite was very much pleased when he saw those Massey-Harris agricultural implements for sale in Australia, and heard them so highly spoken of. It was a compliment to the country, and I am sure he felt justly proud. Now, why could not the Massey-Harris Company sell in Canada as well as in Australia? They send their machinery to Australia and there compete with the United States, Germany, Great Britain and all the rest of the world. Why should they have the privilege of making Canadian farmers pay more for their binders, or their reapers and mowers than they would pay in Australia? Of course the prices are increased in Australia, no doubt, because these articles are not manufactured there, but in Australia this company is in competition with those of the United States and on an equal footing. The hon. gentleman seems to think it was rather unfortunate that Prince Edward Island was used as a dumping ground for machines from the United States. I doubt very much whether he would find that the opinion met with general approval in Prince Edward Island. I think there are men there who would like to buy agricultural implements a little cheaper than they can be bought in Ontario during the last ten years—at all events give them a chance, let them have the opportunity, let them be the judges whether they will pay the Massey-Harris Company, or buy their agricultural implements in the United States, or in some other conntry. It is, of course, fair and proper to put a tax on these articles up to the point of the requirements of the revenue, but not above that point where the duty goes into the pockets of the manufacturers. It is a fair thing to tax anything coming into the country so long as that tax is shown to go directly into the public exchequer, but it ought not to be used as a lever to benefit the manufacturer in Canada. We come next to that paragraph in the Address in which we are asked to rejoice at the peaceful conclusion of the Behring Sea controversy. I am gratified that the Government did seek that method of settling this question. Whether the decision was for us or against us was quite immaterial, so far as concerns the propriety of the submission to arbitration. It is, of course, the true tribunal to which we refer all international subjects, and we must recognize the fact even though we may fail where we thought to succeed; that is something we cannot help. Having made the bargain we must adhere to it. Under any circumstances, no matter what the result may be, it is an immense advance, and I hope in the future the precedent may be followed that wherever we have these international difficulties they will be referred to an independent tribunal for settlement. There is no doubt that we have suffered in this, as we have suffered in many other things. We are overshadowed by the mother country. Britain must be on good terms with the United States. They each do with the other their largest trade; they buy and sell with each other more largely than with any other country, and Great Britain cannot afford to quarrel with so good a customer. I need not cover the ground which I have gone over so often before in this House, but this illustrates my principle. It is a matter of history now, but it seems rather curious that on this occasion all the points were settled in favour of Canada. The contention of the United States that Behring Sea is mare clausum, and their pretensions that they bought from Russia the right to the whole of the Behring Sea, on which they founded their claim to exclude us, were decided against them, and Canada was declared perfectly right. And so in regard to the Pribyloff Islands; it was decided that England, France, Newfoundland and Canada all had their rights up to the three-mile limit. Having gone thus far, one would suppose that the natural consequence would be some proposal from the other side as to what Canadians were willing to do about it as to whether they would make a bargain—some proposal to have an international talk on this and other international questions, as to the preservation of the seals, and as to the three-mile limit—but no, the Alaska Company had the ear of the United States Government and the United States, by some very clever method, seem to have obtained the ear of those gentlemen who were on the board. They say "we will give the United States the control within a zone of sixty miles." That seems to be a rather paradoxical way of settling matters. Practically, I suppose, it gives to the Americans, if they can enforce the regulations as against the rest of the world, exclusive control in those waters in the future to a very large extent. No doubt some of the seals will come outside of this zone, and if they do our clever Canadian sealers will be able to continue their work, but not to the extent that it was carried on formerly. It does seem to me a very curious conclusion, and I quite appreciate the reasons which prompted the representative of Canada to decline to sign the convention. While saying that, I am quite sure that Canada had a very faithful and able representative, and that it was through no omission or want of consideration of his or of the ministers who prepared the factum. It is my firm conviction that had the arbitrators been influenced by the reasons which ought to have prevailed, the matter would have been differently settled. However, it seems to have been settled on the ground of expediency, and I am glad it was settled, no matter what the result. We can afford to lose even that much, so long as we feel that we are living up to the arrangement which we ourselves have been a party to, and when things go against us, the best policy is to accept the decision with good grace. We are next informed that some very important legislation is to be brought under the notice of Parliament this session on a matter that has for some time agitated the minds of the mercantile community—I allude to the subject of insolvency. No doubt hon. gentlemen are aware that partial legislation, as far as the province could enact it, has already been adopted in at least one province, but it is unsatisfactory in many ways. The decision of the Imperial Privy Council rendered the other day, like some other decisions of that august body, has not proved quite satisfactory to some. I am very glad indeed that the Government has taken the subject up and will submit to Parliament a bill dealing with insolvency. The subject is one which specially appertains to the department over which the hon. leader of this House presides, and I would ask that he take charge of the bill in this Chamber and give us something to do while they are discussing the tariff in the other branch of the legislature.

Then the last paragraph of the Address refers to the question of steam communication on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, no doubt foreshadowing what has been the subject of a very great deal of discussion in the press, and of what is known in the east as the fast Atlantic service. It of course is a subject of very great gratification to Canadians if they can make Canada the highway between the motherland and Australia. If they can divert even a reasonable amount of the passenger traffic or the light freight traffic through Canada, it will be a very desirable object to attain even at considerable expense. I myself, however, speaking of course with the imperfect knowledge of a layman, fear that it may not prove feasible or attractive to the British investor, for I suppose it is in Great Br'tain that the project will have to be floated. We have had, as hon. gentlemen know, an offer of a very handsome subsidy on the statute-books for a good many years, to any company that would start such an enterprise, placing on the Atlantic a fast line of steamers, and it has not attracted capital. I presume, from the manner in which it is mentioned in the Address, that it is in'end d to supplement this amount with some considerable addition. It is doubtful if, even with that addition, it will be taken up, and, if taken up, whether the enterprise can be ultimately made a success. To shorten the time means a higher rate of speed. That would no doubt be a part of the contract—twenty knots an hour was what was discussed. Hon. gentlemen who have crossed the Atlantic must know that when you approach Newfoundland, and particularly when you come up through the straits, there are such things as fogs and icebergs met with at most periods of the year, and it is extremely dangerous under such conditions to run at a high rate of speed. It is very well known that the fast steamers that run between New York and Liverpool, and New York and Southampton, favour a route a long way south of the latitude of New York, and even then they occasionally meet with fogs, although not very often; and it must be remembered that the fast steamers can only be maintained, under our present system of obtaining power, by an enormous expenditure, and that heretofore the greyhounds, as they are called, have not paid except during a comparatively few months of the year. We know that these very fast steamers have been laid up in the winter when the extensive passenger travel is over. They run during the months of July, August and September, and therefore, judging from the experience of other Atlantic lines, we have to calculate whether, even with this short distance to be traversed between Halifax and Liverpool, under conditions so adverse to us, we can succeed in attaining that speed and attract a sufficient amount of travel in order to make it a remunerative enterprise. It has its attractions, I must say, and no doubt, if it could be proved feasible it would be undertaken by some company. It is to be, no doubt, subsidiary to the steamers on the Pacific that are now running between Vancouver and points in Asia and Australia. We were glad to hear of the cordial reception to the hon. leader of the House in Australia and of his many efforts to develop trade between Canada and that country. Heretofore the trade has not assumed large proportions. It has not grown at all. It may be said that it has not had those facilities which are necessary. It is not attractive in itself. I quite appreciate the fact that in all cases of that kind, where a country is so distant, the attention of those interested in the products of either country has to be called to such a distant market, and it may be, and probably will be, that we shall find that there are articles in the products of both countries that can be mutually exchanged. Heretofore the quantities we have sent to them have been small and they have sent us, I believe, wool and cotton. Certainly, so far as these articles are concerned, there has been nothing to interfere with the growth of the trade, because they pay no duty. We have sent them lumber and fish and recently some agricultural implements, and I am glad to hear that the trade in the latter article is likely to increase. I can only hope that the foreshadowing of this trade may meet with results that probably some of us at present are skeptical of. It will no doubt lead to the laying of a cable across the Pacific. In that I should take a good deal of interest, as I think it will be probably the precurser of a trade that might follow. It would draw public attention, more particularly in the motherland, to the very great advantages that Canada offers for alternative communication with those remote colonies. Whether it will end, as some hon. gentlemen who are great federalists anticipate, in our making a fusion with these colonies is questionable. I very much doubt whether it is practicable or advisable. We can commercially be on the best terms with them. We can commercially have the freest trade, and I have no doubt that at this convention to be held here in June next, this subject will be duly discussed, and as we have now a federalist at the head of affairs in England, Lord Rosebery, who has very great faith in the welding together of the various colonies, it is quite possible that the project may be revived. So far as all the colonies are concerned, I think it would only be a graceful act if they were to commercially unite. It is not at all essential that we should be united on the question of administration. If we throw our ports open to each other we can certainly cultivate the broadest possible friendship which ought to exist between the members of the same family.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—In attempting to reply briefly to the remarks of the hon. leader of the Opposition, I shall endeavour to do so in the spirit which has characterized his utterances. I congratulate the House, and I congratulate the hon. gentleman himself, if I may be permitted to do so, on the spirit with which he has approached the different subjects mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, but before doing so, I join with him most heartily in congratulating this House upon the admission to it of the hon. member from Prince Edward Island. His address to-day has been one which gives promise that in the future he will be of great advantage to us, however old or experienced we may be in our legislative duties, and however perfect, or rather I should say imperfect, in our ideas of governing the country. His address gave evidence of thought and perfect knowledge of the wants and requirements of this country. After long study and a good deal of experience in the political sphere of his own province he has come to a conclusion which I am certain every thinking man in the whole Dominion will not only appreciate but approve. The remarks of my hon. friend from Windsor were strictly to the point, and I can only echo the remarks of the leader of the Opposition, when he said that they were of a practical character, and gave evidence of thought and contemplation in the consideration of questions affecting this country. I also join most heartily in the eulogies which have been passed on Lord Stanley, our late Governor General, and also on Lord Aberdeen, our present Governor. I must, however, and I suppose it is natural, dissent to a certain extent from the opinion expressed by the hon. gentleman when he said that Canada was made a stepping stone for advancement in imperial politics. It is true that many Governors General, after having left us, have been promoted to what is considered a higher and more responsible position in the governing of the empire, but that has not always been the case, and the Governors and Viceroys of India have been appointed from other colonies than Canada. If Sir Henry Norman, the Governor at present of Queensland, one of the smallest colonies of Australia, was offered the viceroyship of India after the retirement of Lord Lansdowne, I scarcely think I should be correct in stating that the appointment of a Governor of Queensland was made a stepping stone to the higher position. I am inclined to the opinion that in the selection of viceroys for India the statesmen of England look more to the capacity and the ability of the nominees than they do to the positions which they may have held, either in Canada or any other portion of the empire. Looking at the men who have been sent to India, we can but come to the conclusion that it is their character, their ability and intellect that governed the selection. Lord Elgin, whom my hon. friend referred to, was known to be a man of very great ability and very great intellect. Lord Dufferin and Lord Lansdowne have been appointed for their experience and their fitness to govern the country, and if the gentleman who is now at the head of affairs in this country should receive that honour, it will be, I am sure, from the knowledge that they have of his governing ability, rather than from the fact of his being the Governor General of Canada.

The hon. gentleman, I notice, has pursued in this debate the same course and used the same arguments and objections that have been heard in another place. He complains that Parliament was not called together at an earlier date. I do not know that it is necessary for me to enter fully into the reasons why this was not done. He has called attention a number of times during his speech to the relative position which Canada holds to the United States, and what might follow if a certain policy were carried out. Now, I am not blind to this fact, that, being contiguous as we are to the neighbouring Republic, so far as our fiscal policy is concerned, our legislation may in the future be governed to a greater or less extent by their action. It may not be politic to say so, but I believe in dealing with questions affecting our country, as we would with one another, and wherever a fact exists, no matter what party is affected by it, we should not fail to recognize it and to govern ourselves accordingly. While I say that, I wish to be distinctly and positively understood as not being one of those who are desirous of framing our fiscal policy, or any other policy, upon the basis upon which the United States govern their people. What I think we should do as Canadians is to consider first what is in our own interest, what is to our greatest advantage, and just as soon as we have come to that conclusion, our policy should be along that line and along no other. At the same time, while a neighbouring country places on its statute-books any law which materially affects us, if we can gain any advantage by following in their footsteps in that particular, I do not hesitate to say that in the interests of the people of Canada, we should follow that course, but where it does not have that effect, where it has a contrary effect, we should never be, as an independent people, the slavish followers of any foreign country, particularly as affects our fiscal policy and our tariff arrangements. These are the views that I hold, and I believe they are held generally by the party with which I am connected in this country—Canada first, and in all particulars we ought to govern ourselves in our own interests. The hon. gentleman repeated statements that we have heard very often as to the trade policy of this country. He tells us that our increase in trade has not been wonderful during the past year. It is not as great, I presume, as any of us would like it to have been, but when we contrast the trade of Canada and its present financial, moral and industrial position with that of any other portion of the world at the present day, there is no Canadian who knows anything of his country but must be proud of the fact that he is a Canadian. Has not our trade increased in a greater ratio than that of our neighbours across the border? Have we not displayed in all our enterprises more caution, and have we not attained to a greater height in the length of time that we have been working under the policy which my hon. friend condemns so strenuously, than any other country in the world? I will not attempt to waste the time of this House in discussing the causes which led to the depression that prevails in the United States. It is a happy thought with the hon. gentleman opposite and those who oppose the policy of the present government, to attribute it to the silver question. My own convictions are that the great depression in the United States at the present day, is, to a very great extent due to the fact that people are in an unsettled state, not knowing what the Government intend to do. It is true, as he says, the late elections in the United States gave the impression, at least to the people of the outer world, that Congress was to reduce the tariff, and, with that expectation, trade at once became disturbed to a very great extent. When I say trade, I mean the buying and selling, and the importing from foreign countries. No man will import and pay a high rate of duty when he is looking forward with fond expectation to the duty being lowered. What are the facts? The hon. gentleman has admitted that the people of the United States are not to receive the advantages that they anticipated after the election. Look at the Wilson Bill itself. Take it in all its details: while there is a reduction in the tariff, it is from 15 to 25 per cent higher than our tariff. That is the position in which it went up from the House of Representatives. How does it present itself to us to-day? Are they to have a tariff based upon free trade principles, and which we are asked to follow? Would my hon. friend be willing to enter into a reciprocity treaty, pure and simple, with the United States, taking their tariff as proposed by the Senate, or as it is likely to be placed on the statute-book?—We are told that the McKinley tariff in the United States and the "Foster tariff" in this country have been the cause of great depression in the country. Why, the "Foster tariff," as he terms it, or the Canadian tariff, has been 30 to 50 per cent less than that of the United States, and I am one of those who believe, and have not hesitated to express that opinion, not only in this country, but in the Antipodes, when I was addressing the chambers of commerce in Australia, that instead of the McKinley tariff ruining the trade of Canada and injuring our farmers, it has only compelled Canadians to seek other markets, and in seeking those markets, they have not only secured them but have obtained better prices and a better profit from the change. In speaking of the trade of the Dominion, we are constantly reminded of the year 1873. I venture the assertion that there is scarcely a gentleman in this House who has not heard the same thing repeated in every speech made by gentlemen of the opposition, on this question. The year 1873, as hon. gentlemen know, was abnormal in the history of Canada, so far as our imports and exports are concerned, but it must also be borne in mind that, although the trade of 1873 was very large and greater than at almost any other period, it was before the hon. gentleman opposite attained to office;—that the very moment he and his party began controlling the destinies of this country, it sank from $217,575,510 in 1874, to $153,-455,682 in 1879; on being 64,109,828, during the five years they were in power. I do not know that it is necessary for me to point out that fact, but it is a fact, as proven by the Trade and Navigation returns. If the hon. gentleman had been a little more fair in dealing with this question, he would have dealt with it in the aggregate, and not selected any particular article, whether it be lumber or animals, to base an argument upon, to show that the country is not progressive, because the exportation of that particular article has decreased during a certain time. Let him take the trade of the whole country and then he can have a correct idea of what the advance has been during the last five or ten years.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that the debate be adjourned until to morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is the intention of the Government to adjourn after Wednesday's sitting until the following Tuesday, but it has been suggested to me, and I think the suggestion is a very goood one, that before recommending to the House the appointment of the different committees, I should give notice, after the adoption of the Address, of a reference of the rules as they were laid before the members of the last session of Parliament, to a committee of the whole House, in order that we may consider them fully, and then, after their adoption, appoint a committee to strike the committees and have our committees in the future based upon these rules. If that meets the views of hon. gentlemen, I give verbal notice now that I will to-morrow move that the rules be referred to a Committee of the House.

The Senate adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, 20th March, 1894.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayer and routine proceedings.

THE LATE SENATOR BOTSFORD,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called it is again my painful duty to call the attention of the House to the death of one of its oldest members, since our meeting yesterday, our old and esteemed friend Senator Botsford has been called to his long home. I do not know that any words from me are necessary in eulogy of the character of the departed gentleman. He was well known in this House, particularly to the older members, and I think I am not saying too much when I state that no man who ever sat in the Senate of Canada was more highly esteemed than the departed gentleman, Senator Botsford. He had occupied very prominent positions in the public service. He was twice Speaker of this House, and was on a number of commissions of very great importance, not only in his own country, but also to Washington, when difficulties arose between that great republic and the province of which he was a native. We shall all miss him. It is a warning to the whole of us, and I can only hope and pray that a like duty may not devolve upon me again for some time to come. Those who have occupied seats with the late Senator Botsford in the Senate of Canada, will be better able to speak to his merits and good qualities and his unswerving integrity, and his devoted patriotism than I can. I wish again to express my very deep regret at the loss sustained by the Senate and by the country of which he was a native.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I entirely concur in all that has fallen from the leader of this House in reference to the deceased gentleman. Mr. Botsford was a character peculiar to this country. Descended from United Empire Loyalist stock, he through a long life showed that he possessed the finest character that any man can possibly aspire to. Few men have been blessed with so long a life, few have been given so many opportunities as he possessed to serve his country. He held an important position in the public life for over 60 years. I remember on the anniversary of his 50th year the members of the Senate of that day were only too glad to attend a reception in his honour and congratulate him on the many services he had been able to render to his country. During the two months that on one occasion he filled the Chair of the Senate, now so worthily filled by yourself, Mr. Speaker, there was a unanimous feeling in this House that no one could have been fairer or more reasonable than he proved himself to be. A gentleman in every way, he inspired confidence in the Assembly that he presided over. His is a career to be pointed to as worthy of imitation by those younger than himself in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The echoes of the tribute paid to the memory of our late leader had scarcely died away when we heard of the death of my late friend and neighbour Senator Botsford. Living as we did for a long period of our lives, extending certainly over 60 years, within a few miles of each other, it is but natural that I should take this opportunity of paying at all events my tribute of respect to his memory by saying a few words. Born in 1804, our late friend, Mr. Botsford, came of good stock. His family was one of the oldest and most honoured in New Brunswick. His father was a judge of the Supreme Court of that province and his grandfather was one of the U. E. Loyalists who came to this country in consequence of the condition of affairs during the revolution and became the first Speaker of the first Legislature of the province of New Brunswick. His father was a speaker of that same House and it may be said that the son was literally born in the purple, so far as legislation is concerned, because that has been carried down in the family up to the present time through about a century and a quarter, and we may therefore speak of him as having been, in connection with his two immediate ancestors, born in the legislative purple. My hon. friend from Ottawa has paid a very proper tribute, and just what I might have expected from him, to the excellent qualities of Mr. Botsford. I am sure that no one who was with him, as he and I have been since the early days of confederation, could have spoken with greater propriety than he has with regard to the feeling of members on all sides of the House. Mr. Botsford was first called into public life in 1833—over 61 years ago now—to the Legislative Council of his native province. He left that position in the year 1867, at the call of the Queen, to become a member of the Senate of the newly formed Confederation of Canada. In reference to the qualities which have been spoken of by my hon. friend, I would also like to ask the attention of the House to this fact, that those qualities seem to have been recognized by persons high in position a great many years ago. Many years before the majority of the members of this House entered into public life at all, over 50 years ago, Mr. Botsford acquired the confidence and, I may add, the friendship of three successive governors—the late Manners Sutton, Sir Edmund Head and Sir Arthur Gordon, since elevated to the peerage, who was a well-known scion of the family and a near relative of the present Governor of Canada. Mr. Botsford acquired their confidence, showing the integrity of the man and his high character wherever he was known, and he was on two or three occasions sent on confidential missions to Washington and to Quebec, especially during the time of Lord Durham. He was also a commissioner who was called upon to lay out the boundary between his native province and mine some fifty-six years ago. He was also called upon to lay out the boundaries, and was employed in that work some two or three years, between his native province of New Brunswick and the old province of Canada. I mention these facts to show the estimation in which he was held in his own country by his own people before he had got through the forties of his life. We have all known him so well that it is scarcely necessary to enlarge on the subject. Personally I dislike, as I am sure he would dislike to discuss such a matter at any greater length, but if I were asked what where his peculiar characteristics, I would say that Mr. Botsford had by sound observation and extensive reading become a fairly good constitutionalist and deeply acquainted with parliamentary practice, and we have had the benefit of his services in both these capacities. I say peace to his ashes, and may his example act upon even the youngest members of this House who were not, as I have been, among his contemporaries. May his example long remain, and may we always remember that such a man as Amos Edwin Botsford was one of the oldest members of the House, one who had always done his duty in the positions which he occupied and one who was always a credit to the province from which he came. I therefore respond (as far as I can and under circumstances which prevent me from continuing the subject) to what has been said in his memory. I thank hon. gentlemen on both sides for the kind opinions they have expressed, and I trust that they will be some balm to the feelings of those that he left behind in his native province.

Hon. Mr. WARK.—I ought not to allow this occasion to pass without joining in the expressions of regret at the decease of our late colleague. There is perhaps no man living who was so long connected with him in public life in one way or another as myself. It is true, as my hon. friend opposite has remarked, that he entered public life several years before I did. He was appointed to the Legislative Council in 1833, sixty years ago. I was connected with the House of Assembly in 1842, nine years after, and from that time down to the present we have seemed to run, as it were, together. After sitting in the House of Assembly eight years, I was appointed to the Legislative Council. That brought him and me into closer connection. It is true that we differed on most public matters, but there was one question on which we cordially united, and that was the union of the provinces. We both took a very deep interest in that and we both lent some assistance to the carrying out of the measure. When it was carried we both came here in 1867, and since that time we have stood together as representatives from the same province. He was a man of extensive information, especially on public matters, and I join cordially in everything that my hon. friend opposite has said with regard to his qualities. I may say in conclusion that the Government will find it difficult to find any one equal to him to take his place.

THE ADDRESS.

The Order of the Day being called "resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech, on the opening of the fourth session of the seventh Parliament."

Hon. Mr. BOWELL said—I have first to thank the leader of the Opposition for the courtesy extended to me yesterday, when I was labouring under a bronchial affection which prevented me dealing as I should have liked to do, with the subject before the House. I will, however, in as brief a manner as possible, endeavour to reply to some of the observations made by the hon. gentleman. When the House adjourned I was on the point of referring to the trade of the country. My hon. friend, while acknowledging that it had progressed, and was greater in the aggregate last year than at any previous time, could not help using the expression that it was "not at all wonderful." When we reflect upon the financial and commercial depression in the different countries of the world at the present moment we have cause to be thankful that the trade of our country, both in its exports and in its imports, is so sound, and to claim that it is really wonderful we occupy as proud a position as we do to-day. The hon. gentleman said among other things that the principal increase had been in lumber and in animals. I admit the truth of that statement, but I think I am justified in repeating what I stated yesterday in reference to that mode of argument—that it is unfair to the country, unfair and misleading to ourselves, to pick out any particular article and base an argument upon it as to the progress, material or otherwise, of the country. We must take the trade as a whole, and if it shows a healthful increase it is an evidence, at least to that extent, that the Dominion as a whole is prospering. Now, on turning to the Trade and Navigation returns of last year, page 26, we find that the trade of 1893 consisted of the following items :—

Products of the mine.....	$ 5,625,526
Products of the fisheries.....	8,941,357
Products of the forest.......	27,632,791
Animals and their products..	32,775,879
Agricultural products......	27,093,195
Manufactures...............	8,487,271
Miscellaneous articles.......	392,327
Total............	$110,948,346
Coin and bullion..	4,133,698
Estimated amount short at inland ports..............	3,482,308
Grand total......	$118,564,352

The two former show a decrease as compared with the exports of the preceding year, but in the products of the forest there is an increase of about two and a quarter millions. Now, I wish the House and the country to pay particular attention to this fact: It has of late been the stalking-horse, so to speak, of all those who oppose the present policy that prevails in this country, to take up and champion the farmer. One would suppose, to hear the speeches made in the different representative bodies in this country by the opponents of the Government, and more particularly by those who indulge in this kind of argument out of doors, on the stump or when addressing the people, that the poor unfortunate farmer of this country had become so reduced in his ability to produce from the soil or from the forest or any other source, or in the manufacturing industries of cheese and butter, as to deserve the commiseration of the people of this country. Notwithstanding all that has been said about him, we find that it is in that particular branch of industry in this country that the greatest progress has taken place, giving evidence of two facts—first, that they are producing more from the soil and from the industries which they pursue, and also that they have become richer than they were before. Whether it be the result of the present policy or not, the pleasing fact is made clear that they are better off to-day, for the reason that they are producing and exporting more, and consequently receiving more,—unless the prices have become so low that there is no profit, which is a matter absolutely beyond either their or our control. So when these people are represented as labouring under enormous taxation we have but one conclusion, with these trade figures before us, at which to arrive: That they are better off to-day, progressing more rapidly and doing better than at any other period in their existence. The next item is that of lumber. As my hon. friend says, our export trade depends in a great measure upon the requirements of the foreign market, and that it might have increased is not to be wondered at, but was just in proportion to the demands both in England and Europe, and the United States. In manufactures there has been also an increase of three quarters of a million dollars, a matter which is to me, believing as I do, firmly in the correctness of the policy which has been in existence in Canada for the last fifteen years, gratifying in the extreme. I am gratified for many reasons. First, it shows we are producing in this country an article which can compete successfully in other portions of the world against other manufacturers. As the hon. leader remarked yesterday, it must have been pleasing to me to learn, when in the antipodes last fall, that our manufacturers were successfully competing there. I can assure him that it was. One establishment in Ontario made its first exportation to that country about five years ago, when they were laughed at, and when Canada was looked upon as an outside part of the world situated somewhere near the North Pole—some of them had scarcely heard of it. He was told to take his five machines that he had taken to that country back again, that they could not be sold; but with that true enterprise which characterizes the people of this country—and by the way he was a Nova Scotian from Cape Breton—he said, "I came here to sell these articles, and I propose to sell them or give them away." He was urged not to undertake it. Why? Because the agent of the MacCormick Machinery Company desired to keep the whole of that market. He succeeded in selling the five machines; the following year he sold twenty-five, and last year he put on that market together with mowers and other agricultural implements and parts thereof, 8,000, and sold them all. If that can be done through enterprise and energy, why should not we protect them until they are enabled to compete in other markets? I know my hon. friend will say "if they can afford to manufacture them in this country and send them abroad, why do they need protection." I will tell him why? They require protection for the same reason that protection was given to manufacturers in England in the olden times and in the United States in later times—until they had acquired a position which enabled them to compete in every market. I am glad to know that the Canadian people are possessed with as much energy and "push" to use an American expression, as any people in the world. I look forward at no distant day to see not only the distant colonies of Australia, but the different islands of the Pacific, supplied by the manufacturers of this country with as good articles as can be produced in any other part of the world. And what is more gratifying—the manufacturers under that protective tariff which my hon. friend condemned so earnestly yesterday, have been enabled to attain a position of wealth and to acquire the skill and efficiency to compete with others in outside markets. When I was urging this system of reciprocal relations between New South Wales and Canada, in talking with the Premier and the Finance Minister of that colony, after I had pointed out these facts as an illustration of what could be done between the two countries, and said that if we had direct communication we could take their products in exchange for those we had to sell—how was I met by the treasurer of New South Wales? He said, "That is just what we have done: we are trying to prevent your people bringing those things into this country, and we desire to establish manufactures of our own." My reply to that was "you are quite right to do precisely as we Canadians did." Before 1878 Canada was made the "dumping ground," as my hon. friend designated it the other day, for all the surplus stock that they had in the United States or nearly the whole of it. We were depending on them for nearly all we required in this country for our agricultural wants. Now, I said, "we put a high duty on imports. We encouraged people to invest their money in manufacturing industries, and they did invest it—they went on progressing until they have reached the status which they now occupy. They have carried on the competition not only in Canada but in France, England and your own country, and succeeded in carrying off the prizes, giving evidence that they produce as good or a better article than any other country. Go on precisely as we did. I have no fault to find with you; but until you have attained that efficiency in the manufacture of agricultural implements and other things that we can supply you with now, we want you to take them from us instead of the United States." He said, "I have no objection to that." My reply was: "If you desire to buy, buy from us, from your kin, your brothers, living under the same flag"—and I am glad to say that that feeling prevails not only now, but has for some time prevailed in the Australian colonies, and they will deal with us in the future, I am quite satisfied, when they desire to obtain those articles which they do not manufacture themselves, rather than deal with any other country, if we can only have direct and continued communication with them. So much on that point. My hon. friend then says, "Throw down the barriers—wipe out the distinction that exists between our tariffs." I do not know that he intended that remark to apply particularly to England, where there is free trade. If he did not, then it simply means this, that we are to destroy all our industrial establishments in Canada and to provide a a market for our friends across the border.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I spoke of the colonies. I said we could easily get up a trade with Australia by taking down our tariff.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL.—That is precisely the policy of this Government, and that is the very reason why the Government sent me to Australia to try to accomplish such an object. Having given, by the sanction of Parliament, without a dissenting voice, one hundred thousand dollars to establish direct communications between the Australian colonies and Canada, the next thing to accomplish was to establish a trade, if possible; and if, when the convention meets, anything like fair propositions are made by which we can have access to their markets for that which we have to produce—lumber, fish and other articles—we shall be very glad to reciprocate, so in that respect the hon. leader of the Opposition and myself and the Government are for once, at least, in accord. Has the protective policy done that harm and injury to the people that my hon. friend says it has, or do not the figures, as given in the Trade and Navigation returns, show that we are progressing and that our markets are equal to, if not better than they ever were before? Has it been a loss, except of a temporary character to this country, to the farming community particularly, or to any other class of people, to have partially lost the United States markets? I readily admit that any violent or sudden change in the fiscal policy, or the tariff, of any country, particularly in countries lying contiguous to each other, as do Canada and the United States, must of necessity have a serious effect at the time. Now, as an illustration, it would be folly for me to say that the imposition of 30 cents per bushel on barley did not temporarily affect the people of my own province of Ontario. But the farmers of Ontario—and my remarks apply as much to the people of the other provinces as to the people of Ontario—showed that they were quite able to meet any emergency. When the reciprocity treaty was repealed we had an illustration of this. Then the United States was the market for all our coarse grains and animals. That was cut off. Then our farmers turned their attention to other pursuits, particularly in the way of dairying, and I do not hesitate to say that they—I am speaking particularly of the section where I have resided for the last half century —are better off to-day than they were under the old reciprocity treaty. They have turned their attention to an industry by which they concentrate the products of the land into a small compass, and that concentrated product can be transported to distant lands where a good market is found; whereas if they had confined themselves to their old mode of farming, in the production of coarse grains; the freights would have eaten up the profits, so that they are better off under the present system than they ever were before. There is one thing I am glad to know, that that little island in the sea, to which the leader of the Opposition referred yesterday as having suffered from the National Policy, is turning its attention now to the production of that which will find a ready market in England, and which will supplant the cheese and butter now sent from Denmark, Norway, and other portions of Europe, to the British Islands. I predict that the people of that island, after they have pursued this industry which they are establishing all over the island, for a few years, will soon find they are not dependent on the markets of the United States, or of any other foreign country—other than that of England, if that may be termed a foreign market. Turning my attention again for a moment to the foreign market, I should like to place upon record and lay before the Senate what the result of the McKinley Bill has been, during the last five years, upon our trade with the United States and with England:—

	Great Britain.	United States.
1890	$ 22,240,548	$ 13,485,727
1891	26,245,171	11,608,225
1892	39,187,861	8,509,703
1893	42,495,261	8,083,955

Now, if any figures could possibly prove to this country that our natural market is England, they are the figures that I have quoted. They show the people of the country where their interests, financially and otherwise, lie; it certainly is not to the south of us, but in the motherland, for which we all have an admiration.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Because it is an open market.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—My hon. friend says it is because it is an open market. I admit it is an open market, but I should like my hon. friend to tell me if the English people would eat any less because they had to pay two cents a pound on cheese and five cents a bushel on wheat? I rather think that the consuming powers of that people would be just as great under a 5 per cent tariff as it would be with free wheat. There are many other things that suggest themselves to me in connection with that remark of my hon. friend from Marquette, but I will not detain the House with them at the present moment. Let me look again at these returns, because, if I am not wearying the House, I desire to have this point impressed upon the minds of those who take any interest in it, that Great Britain is the ultimate market to which the products of our soil must be sent. If we take the period from 1890 to 1893 with reference to the exportation of animals and agricultural products to the United States, we find the following results:—

Horses	$1,887,895	$1,123,339
Cattle	104,623	11,032
Sheep	761,565	1,088,814
Eggs	1,793,104	324,355
Barley	4,582,562	638,271
Hay	922,797	854,958
Potatoes	308,915	259,176
	10,361,461	4,299,945

Now, with regard to sheep, if the House will examine the facts, they will find that more than two-thirds of those that are termed sheep were lambs, and no matter what duty the United States Government may put on—at least that is the feeling of the trade—the Americans will have Canadian lambs. There has been a decline in the exports of barley. It may be argued that that is the result of not having a profitable market for this particular product. The Ontario statistics show that the agriculturists were alive to their own interests, that if they lost that American market it was quite proper to turn their attention to something else, and last year the area sown with barley was only a little over 468,000 acres, while the year before it was 875,286 acres. The acreage sown last year was only one-half of that which was sown the year before

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They may put in a good crop this year.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I do not know; I am not so sure of that. If the Bill which is now before the United States Senate induces the Canadian farmer to return to his old habit of raising barley, and 20 cents is not found a pretty high protective duty on an article which is to-day selling at 60 cents per bushel, I do not know what is. And then, if my hon. friend has paid any attention to the farming operations of the United States as far west as Michigan, Ohio and Wisconsin, will know that the western farmers are producing barley to-day and sending it into the state of New York, competing with the Bay of Quinté barley, which was the best in the markets of the continent.

An hon. MEMBER—It is not equal to our barley.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I did not say it was. It is nearly equal to it, and if they go on progressing, as they have done, and paying attention to the seed and the production of the crop, it certainly is an article which will, in the future, as in the past two years, come into competition with and displace that which formerly was held in such high esteem in that country. The world moves, although it might appear that my Liberal friends, who are supposed to be the progressive party in that country, do not know it; but it does move and move rapidly, and people adapt themselves to all circumstances which may come up, and there is no class of people who have more active intelligence in that respect than the farming people of this country. No tariff of the United States, I care not if it be three times as high as the McKinley tariff, can crush the industries of Canada, while they have a market which is more profitable and better for them than the one to which they formerly sent their products. The same thing is precisely the case with hay and potatoes. Taking the whole of these articles we find that while the Americans bought from Canada in 1890, $10,371,461, last year they bought only $4,299,095. If these people are determined to pursue a course hostile to Canada, we have, at least, this evidence that we can live without them, however desirable it may be to live on terms of amity and goodwill. I do not wish in this discussion to introduce questions which, probably, might arouse the ire of the hon. gentlemen opposite, but I do say this, that we should have less difficulty and less trouble in effecting amicable trade relations in such articles as would be of benefit to both sides of the line, were it not that there are certain politicians in this country who are so unpatriotic that, in their great desire for power, they urge upon United States statesmen not to make concessions to Canada, because if they did, it would drive us further away from annexation. I say this is a matter of serious moment. It is a matter which every honest and patriotic Canadian should take to heart, that when attempts are made by others to do that which opponents of the Government declare to be in the interests of Canada, they should not throw obstacles in the way of our dealings with foreign countries. If the policy of the Government does not meet their approval, it is their right, as British subjects, to turn them out on the first opportunity. No one can blame them for that. I assisted in doing that on one occasion, and I do not blame any one else for taking the same course, but let them pursue an honourable patriotic course, and not a course which tends to make a foreign people believe that the more they legislate against us, the nearer they are to forcing us into a political alliance with them. I will not weary the House by pointing to the advantages which there are in exporting the cereals of the country to Great Britain instead of the United States. While I am anxious and willing that we should reciprocate in such articles as, I think, would be advantageous to the country at large (not speaking of the advantages to be derived on our side, because it always takes two to make a bargain), I am not prepared as a public man, and a Canadian, to make concessions simply in the interest of a foreign country, which would carry no advantage to ourselves. There is another point which I think is of some interest, and more particularly as it affects that portion of the argument of the leader of the Opposition in which he tells us that we were building up the barriers and preventing the trade of this country increasing. I propose to give one illustration to show what effect the imposition of the high duty has had upon one particular branch of agriculture. In giving that illustration I shall simply content myself with saying that it is applicable to almost every article grown by the farmers. My hon. friend says "pull down the barriers." Let us take the question of the hog product alone, and see whether the protective duty has assisted our farmers in this country, I took the trouble to prepare a table showing the total hog product imported and entered for consumption, not that which is imported into the country and then exported, but the product imported into this country for home consumption. This table gives the figures since 1884, by years, and if you will examine the figures you will find that until the duty which we imposed upon the article got sufficiently high to keep out the foreign product, the importations into this country were large; but just as soon as it was properly protected, then the importations fell off and our own people produced that which was required, not only for home consumption but for exportation also. Wipe off the duties as my hon. friend suggests, and you would return instantly to the same position you were in some 10 or 15 years ago, that is, the farmers would be deprived of their markets here and the Americans would bring in their cheap hog products and destroy the Canadian industry. Now, I shall read the figures, and give the totals in bacon, hams, shoulders and sides, which bear one particular rate of duty, and pork, which under the late tariff bears a duty of one and one half cents per pound and lard which bears another duty. All these articles we imported for home consumption in 1884.

HOG PRODUCTS, ENTERED FOR CONSUMPTION.

When we imposed a high duty, in 1890 the importation was 26,368,125 pounds. The farmers had not yet had time to turn their attention to the production of this particular kind of meat. In 1891 the importation fell from 26,000,000 pounds to 14,679,021 pounds and in 1892 it tumbled down to 11,218,302 pounds and last year it fell to 4,680,331 pounds. Will any one in his senses tell me, or can he convince the agriculturists of this country that if the duty had not been increased to 3 cents upon hams, 1½ cents upon barrelled pork and 2 cents on lard, we would have had this, which my hon. friend terms a marvellous change, in the importation of this particular article? But is that all? Let me turn your attention next to the exportation of hog products during these periods, and the figures will prove that not only has the protective policy secured the market to the farmers of this country for that which the country consumes, but it has induced them to carry on the industry to such an extent as to enable them to export as much in proportion as the importation from the United States has fallen off. In 1884 we exported all these three articles to which I have called attention, the product of Canada. The figures are:

Here begins the operation of the high tariff. In 1890 we exported 7,813,415 pounds, and in 1891, 7,749,658 pounds; 1892, 12,316,650 pounds; in 1893, 20,116,993 pounds of the product of the hog of this country alone. Now, this shows that, for instance, from 1889, when we imported for home consumption no less than 27,000,000 pounds of the product of the hog, which was consumed in Canada; last year the importation amounted to four and a half millions, while our exportation of the product of this particular animal, which consumed the coarse grains which the Americans used to take, actually amounted to over 20,000,000 pounds of the product of Canada; and yet people will tell me that the protective policy has done nothing to help the agriculturists of the country. My hon. friend says: "Wipe out the tariff, let us have free trade." That is the doctrine now, I believe, in favour with the Liberal party. A little while ago it was commercial union,—which my hon. friend, although a Liberal, repudiated some little time ago. Then, it was the more plausible doctrine of unrestricted reciprocity.

An hon. MEMBER—Is not the market regulated by the export?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Not always. The market may be regulated in a great measure by the demand and if we had not had any to export, the trade would not have grown so much in the last few years. If the demand in England had been greater than it was, and we had not the pork ready to send there, they would have got it somewhere else. I do not desire at all in my argument to deal with the abstract question of the principles of free trade or protection. I prefer to deal with the question as it presents itself to me and to every intelligent man in this country, that is to say, from a practical standpoint. I find that the imposition of a duty keeps out of the country that which we produce ourselves and enables us to export one hundred, yes, one thousand per cent more than we did before; that is all I care about so far as political economy is concerned. If our farmers can put the value of twenty million pounds of pork into their pockets in a year, that has more to do in convincing me, and I think it will have more to do in convincing the people of Canada generally, of the benefits which are derived from that policy, than if you preach the abstract theory of free trade until doomsday. I will give my hon. friend before I sit down a quotation from a gentleman who is an ardent free trader, who was in this country last year, upon that particular point. I might deal with these matters at greater length, but I do not think it necessary to do so. I have taken this course because of the remarks of my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, who tells us that we are taxed to death, that the effects of the policy have been to grind the poor unfortunate producers, who toil for their livelihood, down into the very ground, though I think these facts which I have cited will show him that the policy is not so bad after all when compared—and we can judge of its effects better by comparison than by any other mode—with the results of the period during which he had the honour of advising Her Majesty through her representatives in this country. Now, what were the taxes levied upon goods imported into this country during the five years, or rather the six years the Liberals were in power, because I consider the Liberal party responsible for the year after my hon. friend ceased to have the honour of being a member of the Government of this country. What were the taxes as compared with a later period of five years, being from 1889 to 1893? In looking at these figures I think they will show that while we have placed a high protective duty upon many articles, there are equally as many articles which formerly were taxed under the rule of my hon. friend opposite, that are now on the free list. I wish to draw the attention of the House in this manner to the fact that those articles, which are upon the free list to-day, are articles which are not produced and cannot be produced in Canada. It is a part of the protective policy, as I understand it, that we should protect that, which we can produce, and that we should allow to come into Canada free, or to the greatest extent that may be possible, all those articles which we cannot produce ourselves. We have placed upon the free list sugar and tea; we have relieved the newspapers from their postage in sending them through the country and we have removed that tax which was considered to be such an odious tax, namely the stamp duties. I might go on for half an hour reciting these instances. Over 120 articles are on the free list to-day, placed there by the present government, which were taxable under my hon. friends opposite, and they are all articles which are not produced in Canada. My hon. friend will say, I have no doubt, that that was done for revenue purposes and I am quite willing to admit that. I reply we have provided a sufficient revenue and we have secured ever since we have been in power a surplus, instead of ruining the industries of the country and having a deficit every year, as was the case in the period during which my hon. friend was in power,—that is to say, except the first year.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is making a great mistake there. Your Government has had some pretty big deficits since 1878.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The first year, when we had to assume the responsibilities of your administration, I admit that we had a deficit. I stand corrected, and I am very much obliged to the hon. member from Halifax, for calling my attention to the fact. I hope he will be equally candid in acknowledging that the deficit for 1879, the year after we took the reins of power, was the result of the baneful effects of the legislation and the administration of the affairs of this country by my hon. friends opposite.

Hon. Mr. POWER. There were at least three other years in which there were considerable deficits.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman is right, I stand corrected, but if he will look at the facts I think my hon. friend will find that he is in error. However, there is one cause for gratification: if there were one or two, or even, to please my hon. friend, say three deficits, there have been surpluses since that time to more than cover the deficits of the first year or two. The country had not to be encumbered with additional debts in order to provide money for running expenses, as was the case during the regime of my hon. friend. They had to borrow every year except one, I think, in order to make up the deficiency in the revenue and to carry on the ordinary affairs of this country. Going back to 1889, the percentage of duty levied on goods entering Canada for home consumption was during the past five years:—

1889	21·65	per cent.
1891	20·06	"

In 1883 the people of Canada paid $5.23 per head for duty, while in 1893 they paid but $4.26 per head. A reduction of nearly one per cent per annum in the rate of duty for the past five years, and a reduction of ten cents per head per annum in the amount of taxes collected during the past ten years make it pretty clear that the Liberal-Conservative party has been doing considerable tariff reforming for some time past. There was a gradual decrease during these five years from 1889 to 1893 in the taxation of the people of the country, although we had raised the duties upon many articles. Let me turn your attention to the period between 1874 and 1878, and precisely the contrary effect was the result of the administration of the Liberal party. In 1874 the taxation per head was 11·32 per cent, in 1875, 12·38, in 1876, 13·44, in 1877, 13·03. The last year that they had control of the destinies of this country, it was 14·03, thus showing that from the moment they attained office, the moment they began to administer the affairs of Canada, the rate of taxation began to increase greatly year by year, while on the other hand the taxation during the last five years has been greatly decreased. My hon. friend made use of an expression, which I do not think he intended should have the full force of his utterance, although he qualified it by saying it was human nature when a man becomes pecuniarily interested in anything to change his belief if his interest leads him to do so. Now I am not prepared to admit that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was pointing to the Democratic senators.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Not the Canadians.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a little human nature in some Canadians too.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I think the House will agree with me that human nature on this side of the line is about the same as that to the south of it, although I am quite willing to admit that his estimate of the integrity and honour of Canadian statesmen is justified. However, I am inclined to be a little more charitable, although I am accused of having very strong opinions on most things. I am inclined to think that people can change their opinions, and change them honestly. I do not believe that a man, although he may have been born in a certain rut, must always remain in it. I know in my own family my father was an ardent English Whig when he came to this country, but he was not here long until he saw what he thought were the very malign influences of the Liberal party, and I think that I can apply that to an hon. friend opposite me. I know a more ardent English radical than his father I never heard of in my life, but when he came to this country he thought that it was not right for a man who loved his country to continue connected with that party. That was his opinion. Although in my early youth I was brought up in the Whig school, the opinions I hold today are honestly entertained. I am quite willing to credit my hon. friend opposite with equal honesty and to admit that men may change their opinions and change them honestly. When men saw in this country in the years from 1876 to 1878, everything in a state of stagnation and our industries paralyzed, they began to think that something was wrong, and when they observed the progress which was made in the United States under the policy which had been pursued there for a quarter of a century, they came to the conclusion that unless we in Canada changed our policy and our system we should become poorer and poorer every year we lived. Hence many gentlemen belonging to the Liberal party, in the province of Ontario, particularly—I speak of this province because I know the fact—seeing that something must be done to change the condition of affairs, joined hands with the late illustrious leader of the Conservative party and wiped out of existence a party that had declared themselves utterly unable to do anything to assist the industries of the country. They joined with those who had sufficiently progressive ideas to change the whole fiscal policy, and I leave it to the judgment of this House and the country to state the results which have followed. But the hon. gentleman says you have placed all these millions in the pockets of the bloated—no, I do not think he used that word—the pockets of the manufacturers of this country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Increased their dividends.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—He complains that the cotton lords, the sugar dukes—they must be sweet—and a variety of other people have grown comparatively wealthy under the system. It is a levelling principle with which I have not the slightest sympathy. I have no sympathy with that cry against people who through their industry and integrity have acquired a competency in the course of trade which they are pursuing. That is a species of socialism which I commend to my hon. friend from Marquette, who seems to have the bugbear of protection constantly before his eyes. It haunts him by day, and I have no doubt by night. I like to see the country progress, and no country can progress unless the institutions of that country are immutable in their character and the people become satisfied and contented with their lot. Now, my hon. friend's argument would be correct if he had taken the trouble to prove that these cotton lords had taken out of the pockets of the people the full amount of the duty that had been imposed. If he could have proved that these sweet sugar dukes, who were revelling in luxury, had taken out of the pockets of the people the amount of the duty which is imposed upon sugar, I readily admit that he would have established a position which every Government should take steps to prevent, if possible, just as the present Government did when it was shown that a monopoly and combination existed in the case of salt. They at once struck a blow and broke up the monopoly by opening the markets. Has it been the fact, or is it the fact that the people pay the amount imposed in the way of duty in addition to the fair price of the goods?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I allowed a margin, I put it down at one half cent a pound. I did not go into the cotton question.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—My hon. friend might have made a better statement if he had looked at the Trade and Navigation returns, and he could have increased his income to a very much greater extent than he did. If he will take the duty on 300,000,000 pounds of sugar imported he will find that we should get between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 revenue. He says, "I allow a margin for the dirt that is washed out of the sugar." Now, that applies to raw sugar, but not to imported refined sugar, when they do not pay for dirt. The refined sugar is made out of raw sugar. If we import 300,000,000 pounds, and pay eight-tenths of a cent upon it you will see how much should have gone into the treasury—some $2,400,000, but instead of that we imported the raw material. We encouraged an industry which exists. Perhaps it may be interesting for him to know it, and he will probably be surprised if he looks at the Trade and Navigation returns to find that our manufacturers of raw sugar did, to a certain extent, export refined sugar from Canada to the United States. I have under my hand a statement showing that we exported between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 pounds of sugar to the United States and Newfoundland last year and I also have letters from the refiners at Halifax showing that they exported some 10,000 barrels of sugar to Boston alone, and from the Redpath refinery showing that they sent over 5,000 barrels to the market of Chicago in the previous year paying the freight upon the whole of it and paying six-tenths of a cent per pound upon it and underselling the United States refiners who were getting two cents per pound bounty on all sugar grown in the country—even maple sugar—and were allowed all sugar free under 16. Is not that evidence that the consumers of this country did not pay the eight-tenths of a cent duty imposed on sugar? My hon. friend says wipe out the industry. You will have the opportunity then of destroying the carrying trade of our shipping to the extent of over 300,000,000 pounds of sugar a year. You will destroy all the industries connected with it—the cooperage industry, the wharfage, the cartage and others connected with it. What do with it, if has all that got to you can raise a cry and convince the people of the country that they are having taxes extorted from them that should not be? I have just one point more on this question I add here a statement of the prices of sugar every week from January to December in 1892, in New York and in Montreal. It is as follows:—

You will observe that for over six months of that period refined sugars were cheaper in Canada than they were in the United States, and that has all been done through judicious management of business under a protective policy. Now my hon. friend says the consumer pays all the taxes, that the imposition of the duty has but one result, and that is the bearing down heavily upon the poor unfortunate consumer. There was last year a deputation of English journalists to the World's Fair, and they visited Canada. Among them was a Mr. Carr, a very eminent literary man, who edits a newspaper in Cardiff, Wales. I met him at a club in Toronto, where he made a most violent free trade speech at a dinner given by the Board of Trade, in the course of which he told us that he looked forward at no distant date to seeing the period described by Macaulay when the New Zealander would be found sitting on the ruins of Blackfriars Bridge looking at the ruins of London. He said also that protection was a robbery of the people, and went on in a very learned style to show what a pair of trousers should cost a man and claiming that they should not be taxed. On his return to England he published a brochure on what he had seen while travelling on this continent and he did me the honour to send me a copy. He was horrified to find that under a protective tariff things were actually cheaper than in that elysium, as my hon. friend considers it, free-trade England. I will read one paragraph for the information of those who take strong views on the other side of this question. He writes in his letter upon "Economical Heresies in the United States," the following:—

Mixing as I have done of late amongst all classes of republican workmen and manufacturers —having witnessed the phenomenal prosperity alike of capital and labour—informed as I have been of the extent and strength of the enormous interests created by the American policy of protection, I cannot help realizing the fact that those of our English people are living in a fool's paradise who believe that the result of the recent democratic victory in this country, although based on the cry of tariff reform, will result in any measure that will open the markets of the United States to the manufactured goods of England or the Continent of Europe.

He was a true prophet as has been proved not only by the Wilson Bill itself, but as has been proved by the revision of that bill in the Senate. Then he goes on to say:—

There is no American statesman living who dare precipitate such a national economic crisis. It would not be reform—it would be revolution. I am, as you know, a convinced free trader. Protection is to me an economical heresy, the fraud and folly of which are capable of mathematical demonstration—demonstration as absolutely convincing as that by which the solution of a problem in Euclid is arrived at. And yet throughout the length and breadth of this vast continent one is almost daily brought face to face with solid indisputable facts that seem to give the lie to the soundest and most universally accepted axioms of political economy. Let me give you just one example. Under the shadow of a stringent protective tariff, the manufacture of paper was commenced in the United States. Paper is still subject to a heavy import duty. According to our theories, that ought to enhance its price to the consumer in this country. As a matter of fact, the New York newspaper proprietors buy their "news" at a less price than that at which it could be supplied to them in London, and some of the paper mills in New Jersey are actually exporting paper to the old country. Unless it can be shown that this paper industry would have grown up without the aid of a protective tariff, it is futile—nay, it is an impertinence—for an outsider to say that the Americans have acted unwisely in taxing themselves for a few years in order to establish in their midst a great industry giving occupation to a great quantity of highly paid labour. And it seems to me that this set of facts and the arguments based on it apply to many of the other industries which are assuming such colossal proportions throughout the length and breadth of the land.

There is the evidence of a confirmed free trader of England showing the beneficial effects of a protective tariff in the United States. If this Mr. Carr had travelled further and inquired more into the effects and results of the protective tariff in the United States, he could have applied the same remark to hundreds of other things that they have succeeded in producing under that protective tariff as cheaply as they do in the older countries, and are actually exporting to that free trade country which we all admire so much. Although a free trade policy may be right in the abstract to a great extent in England, it would be destructive in a new country like Canada. I have but a few words to say with reference to my hon friend's remarks on the question of trade and cable communication with Australasia. I was pleased to hear his remarks on what was the result of the Behring Sea arbitration, because he viewed that question, to my mind, from a broad statesmanlike standpoint so different from that in which it was dealt with by his own leader in another branch of the legislature and the opposition press of the country. I readily admit with him that we did not, as Canadians, get all that we should have liked to obtain, but there is this cause for satisfaction—and I am only reiterating what the hon. gentleman said—that every constitutional issue that was raised, every point that was taken by our Minister of Marine and by our Minister of Justice, the leader of the Government, and by the Government of Canada in reference to the rights of this country and of the world generally in Behring Sea, were sustained by that arbitration, and if there is anything wrong it may be through too strict regulations. Both of the representatives of the United States, and the arbitrator for Canada, who was acting on behalf of the British Government, refused to sign them—so that taking the old adage, when nobody is pleased it must be right—when neither the United States nor Canada was pleased with the proposed regulations they were as near right as foreigners at least could make them. It has been said that it will ruin our industry. I have it from a British Columbian that he has already sent out two or three vessels this year, and that as large a fleet has gone into that business this year as last year. My hon. friend shakes his head—perhaps he knows better than I do. I am giving this statement, not on my own authority but on what I conceive to be good authority—that is, those who are engaged in the trade themselves. My hon. friend, spoke very pleasently about my trip to Australia and the manner in which the Canadian representative was received—I can only say to him that he did not exaggerate that reception. I did not accept that as a tribute to myself, because if my hon. friend or any one else had gone as representing Canada, he would have received the same attention. Greater warmth of feeling and a greater desire to discuss the object of that mission, and a more earnest interest taken in the building up of a trade between the colonies to bring closer together the people of the British race, could not be exhibited anywhere than in every part of the four colonies which I had the honour of visiting, and I shall never forget, personally, not only the attention, but the kindness which was extended to me during that trip. My hon. friend said that the trade of the country was falling off. It is true that the trade with Australia in the last year has fallen off. Is it necessary for any reasoning person—is it necessary for any one who knows the financial position that Australia has been in for the last two or three years—is it necessary for those who have read the papers and know the position of the American continent generally, outside of Canada, to come at once of a conclusion as to the reason of that tailling off? Has it fallen off more than the trade of the United States? I tell the hon. gentleman that it has not. In 1892 our trade with Australia amounted to $436,603. It fell off last year to $288,352 being a falling off in that year of $148,581. But I find in looking at the figures that for the last five years the aggregate trade between the Dominion of Canada and Australia has been $2,446,391, while for the previous five years it was only $1,852,873, showing when you compare the two periods, that our trade has been gradually increasing, although we have had no direct communication with that country other than by sailing vessels, while the United States has had a subsidized line of steamers running for the last 20 years between the Australian colonies and San Francisco. We find that in 1892 the trade of the United States with Australia was $11,246,474, and in 1893 it fell to $7,881,000 being a greater percentage of falling off with a country that had direct steam communication than with a country that had no communication other than by sailing vessels, and that only occasionally. I predict that with steamers that trade will steadily increase as the years roll along. As an illustration, take the six months ending the 30th December, we did only some $7,000 worth of trade with the Sandwich Islands, the capital of which as my hon. friend knows, is Honolulu. During the last six months, that is during the period of the existence of this line of steamers, it has run up to between $60,000 and $70,000. It is not much, I admit, in the trade of a country, but it shows a gradual growth and I think we may look forward to a time when we shall be pleased with the idea that we subsidized that line and created that connection. My hon. friend did make use of an expression that I deeply regretted to hear fall from his lips. I say it in all sincerity. It is a misfortune in this country, whenever a proposition is made by which we hope to build up our country either by subsidizing steamship lines or by the construction of railways, opening up and developing its resources, that some politicians begin to decry the enterprise at once. It is not long since we were told that we were expending hundreds of millions of dollars in order to make a connection across the mountains with British Columbia. The present Opposition at one time told the people of this country that the Canadian Pacific Railway would never pay for the grease that would be necessary to lubricate the axles of the trains running across the country. Another ardent politician told the country that the ties at one end would be rotted out before we could finish its construction through the Rocky Mountains. It was by this kind of statements—I cannot dignify them by the term of arguments—that difficulties were thrown in the way not only of the Government but of those who had the great enterprise in their hands and were endeavouring to carry it out. What do we find to-day? The same policy exactly pursued in connection with a fast line of steamers across the Atlantic. We were told in the other branch of the Legislature and the remark was repeated here the other day—that the route by the St. Lawrence could never be navigated to any advantage which would justify the expenditure of that amount of money and the establishment of that line—that fogs, icebergs and other obstacles were constantly presenting themselves to the navigators of this route. Was that all? Why, worse than that, my hon. friend made use of this unfortunate expression that he did not believe it would be profitable to British investors to put their money into this enterprise. What effect, I ask, can that have upon the money market of England, when Mr. Huddart, who has entered into this provisional arrangement, goes upon the market and asks the capitalists to assist him in establishing this line? No man knows better than my hon. friend that there is nothing so sensitive as the money markets of any country, for the moment you touch a man's interest that moment you lead him to refrain from touching speculations that he would otherwise enter into. I say it is unfortunate, coming from the leader of a great party like the Liberal party in this Dominion, that he should throw his great weight and influence into the scale, to ruin an enterprise of this kind, which I look upon not only as apt to promote the lasting interests of the country, but absolutely necessary in order that we may have in the near future an imperial highway from the mother land across Canada, making its terminal ports in the Colonies of Australia, carrying not only a great proportion of the wealth of the country, but making a highway for travellers who will spend their money with us, as well as the profit to be derived from the carrying of freight across the country. What do we more need in the interests of that down-trodden class of people we have heard so much of—the farmers—than facilities for carrying to the English market the perishable articles that they produce,—facilities in the way of refrigerated storage in our ships; and I assure the House that that is one of the conditions which we made in dealing with the gentleman who has taken this great enterprise under his management and control, namely, that all steps possible must be taken to enable the farmers to export their butter, eggs, cheese, turkeys, and in fact whatever produce is of a perishable character, including, of course, fruits, to the British market. When the time arrives that the exporter of fresh eggs can place them on the London markets in six days, thereby furnishing a good fresh article, that is the time when the Government will be able to present to the legislative bodies of this country statistics showing that our exportation has increased ten, yea, one hundred-fold over that which I have already shown for the last few years. I say it in sincerity and friendliness that if it should be my lot to live long enough to sit on the other side of the House, I promise my hon. friend that whenever any proposition is made—if his party has the courage to do it—or any offer is entertained to promulgate a scheme for the advantage of the country, it shall have my most ardent support. I give them this promise in advance, although I hope in the interests of the country that the time is far distant when its destinies will be placed in their hands.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of replying to the hon. the leader of the Government. I think the House has reason to congratulate itself that his cough interrupted his speech yesterday; because he has started in to-day with a clear voice and a supply of material which he might not have had at his command yesterday. I would make one observation on the speech of the hon. gentleman. He tells us that the Liberals, although their name would indicate that they were progressive are not the progressive party of this country; that they remain stationary. Now, I could not help thinking when I heard certain passages of the hon. gentleman's speech that that want of progress was not confined to Liberals. During part of the hon. gentleman's speech, I could fancy myself back in the days when my hon. friend from the Quinté division and the hon. gentleman who represents the Saugeen division in this House made vigorous onslaughts on the policy of the Mackenzie Government. During another portion of his speech, I could imagine myself here when the tariff Bill of 1879 was before the House. I may be excused for saying so, but I think we have had a disproportionate amount of talk on the tariff, considering that we are now dealing with the Speech of his Excellency the Governor General and not with the Tariff Bill. When that bill comes before us, we shall try to discuss it to the best of our ability. However, there is this advantage, in the course pursued by the hon. gentleman. I think he has given us some inkling of what the proposed tariff changes are to be. For instance, I notice, that the hon. gentleman pointed out that in the matter of agricultural implements we would be able to defy the United States manufacturers. I take it for granted that that indicates the reduction of the duty on agricultural implements. Then, the hon. gentleman later on pointed out that under the beneficent influence of protection, the hog product of this country has marvellously increased. Canada instead of importing over twenty million pounds of pork as she did some years ago, imports only four million pounds, while the export has grown correspondingly. I take that to mean that the Government proposes to put such a duty on pork as will obliterate the small importation which now takes place.

Having said so much with respect to the speech of the hon. the leader of the House, I propose to go back to the speech of the hon. gentleman who moved the resolutions now before the House. I must express my gratification at the fact that the Government have called to the Senate a gentleman like the hon. member from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson). His speech was able and well reasoned. Its language was good; and more than that, it was a common-sense speech; there was no spread-eagleism in it—no denunciation of people who happen to differ from him in their political views as being enemies of their country. I regret to say that the speech of the hon. the leader of this House was not similar in that respect. I am surprised that one so clear headed as the hon. the leader of the House, should undertake to lay down the proposition that nearly one-half the people of this country are not patriots and do not wish for the well-being of their country; that they are in some kind of a conspiracy with foreigners to injure the country in which they live, and in which they expect to make their living and ultimately to die. We had here, as most members of this House will recollect, a gentleman fron Marshfield in Prince Edward Island, who was one of the model members of this House, and I am glad to think that the hon. gentleman who now sits in this House from Marshfield is not an unworthy successor to him—I refer to the Hon. Mr. Haythorne, a gentleman universally loved and respected.

It is unnecessary to say anything about the speech of the hon. gentleman from Windsor (Mr. Casgrain). That hon. gentleman does well everything which he undertakes.. Perhaps it is unnecessary to say that he spoke well, as the French members of this House all speak well, and I only wish that we English-speaking members could do as well as they. Before beginning to deal with the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General, I may say that I think Canada is to be congratulated upon the choice which Her Majesty has made of a Governor for this country, and we have especial reason to rejoice, because the distinguished statesman who now presides over our destinies did not come to Canada without knowing what he was doing, He did not take a leap in the dark. He had lived in Canada, had identified himself with the interests of the country before coming here, and he knew what he was coming to; and he came voluntarily and with pleasure. Hon. gentlemen who know anything of his record in Ireland, and I suppose we all do, must look forward with pleasant expectation to His Excellency's career in the Dominion. In Ireland Lord Aberdeen was the most popular Lord Lieutenant who had represented the Sovereign there since the early part of the century, and I trust that when the time comes when we shall have to part with His Excellency we shall have the same feeling towards him which the people in Ireland had when the scene took place, described by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa (Mr. Scott).

With respect to the second paragraph of the Speech, which deals with the increase in trade and the continued progress of the Dominion, I may say that we are all gratified to know that at a time when there is undoubtedly depression in other places, Canada has not suffered very materially; but I do not think there is any reason for boasting, because, as was pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, we can go back twenty years and take up the trade returns and find that at that time the aggregate trade of this country was nearly as great as it is now; and considering that Canada is a young and should be a very progressive country, I do not think that there is any special reason for the expression of exultation or surprise at the fact that there has been a moderate increase in our trade,—in our exports and imports. The same observation applies to the next paragraph, which says "It may be observed with satisfaction that a large proportion of this increase is shown to have been due to the extension of our commerce with Great Britain." If we look at these same trade returns—I do not take the year 1873, because, as the hon. gentleman said, that was an abnormal year: I might reply to him that 1893 was an abnormal year, but I shall not do so--let us take 1874, and we find that the aggregate trade of this country with Great Britain in 1874 was $108,083,000. Last year it was $107,-228,000. It is actually less now than it was 19 years ago. I do not think that these figures afford any special ground for satisfaction. It is well that the trade with Great Britain is larger than it has been during the past few years, but looking at our history in a broader way than by simply comparing one year with the year before, I do not think there is here any special reason for boasting.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I hope my hon. friend has not overlooked the question of values.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I presume there has been some change in that. I think in some respects the values have fallen and in other respects they have risen. I imagine that the value of wheat is probably less; on the other hand there are cheese and other things of that sort which have gone up, and I presume lumber must be worth more than it was at that time.

Now, the third paragraph of the Speech is as follows:—

> It is a cause of thankfulness that our people have been spared in a very great degree from the sufferings which have visited the populations of some other countries during many months past, and that while the commercial depression prevailing abroad could not but affect the activity of business in the Dominion, we have been free from any extensive financial disaster or widespread distress.

That paragraph is put in a very becoming way; it is very guarded and modest in its wording and I do not think that any one could quarrel with it, but some of the speeches that have been made in relation to this paragraph are very much more exaggerated than the paragraph itself and are not justified by the existing circumstances. Any one who goes to the Lower Provinces, to Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, or even Nova Scotia, with all its varied resources, will not find that things are very flourishing. They might be worse, as the last speaker says, and I have no fault to find with the paragraph. In the hon. gentleman's own province, I understand there are in the city of Toronto some thousands of persons at the present time looking for work or for assistance from the city. If that had happened in the old regime to which he referred so often, I have no doubt we should have heard a good deal about it in this Chamber, but it has not been mentioned and I do not lay any special stress upon it.

The fourth paragraph of the Speech, the paragraph which deals with the Behring Sea award is one upon which I propose to say a few words. Unlike the paragraph of the Speech which deals with the tariff, this matter of the Behring Sea award has not to come before the House again, and for that reason I hope the House will bear with me if I deal with the matter at a little length. In the first place I might call attention to the fact that the wording is a little peculiar. It says:—

> The peaceful conclusion, by the award of the arbitrators at Paris, of the controversy which had prevailed so long, with respect to the Seal Fisheries in the Pacific Ocean and the rights of British subjects in Behring Sea, has removed the only source of contention which existed between Great Britain and the United States with regard to Canada. There is every reason to believe that Her Majesty's Government will obtain redress for those Canadian subjects of Her Majesty who were deprived of their property and liberty without just cause while the controversy was in progress.

Now, it is a rather curious fact that we are told that a controversy existed with respect to the seal fisheries in the Pacific Ocean, and the rights of British subjects in Behring Sea. I have always understood that the controversy was with respect to the seal fisheries in Behring Sea, and the rights of British subjects in that connection, but here there appears to be distinction made between the Pacific Ocean and the Behring Sea, which I do not understand. Perhaps some hon. gentleman will explain it later on. If hon. gentlemen will carefully examine the language of this paragraph of the Speech, it will be found, I think, that there is no objection to it whatever. There is no word of boasting in the paragraph. I should not say much about it, only there has been some exultation indulged in by the friends of the Government with respect to this award of the Behring Sea arbitrators. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down, expresses his great gratification that every principle of international law—I do not know that he used that expression, but that was the gist of it—that every principle of international law, which had been contended for by Canada, had been upheld by the tribunal. Now, if we were told some day that the Dutch had taken Holland, we should not think that the Dutch had achieved anything remarkable. That is exactly what has been done in this case. If we were told that two and two made four, and that the Board of International Arbitrators had so decided, we should not be very much surprised, and this is really just about what this award has done. If we look at the award, which is not very long, we shall be satisfied on that point. The first point submitted to the arbitrators was:—

> 1. What exclusive jurisdiction in the sea now known as the Behring's Sea and what exclusive rights in the seal fisheries therein did Russia assert and exercise prior and up to the time of the cession of Alaska to the United States?

That question is a mere question of fact and it was a question about which there was no doubt, and the arbitrators found that—

By the ukase of 1821 Russia claimed jurisdiction in the sea now known as the Behring Sea to the extent of 100 Italian miles from the coasts and islands belonging to her, but in the course of the negotiations which led to the conclusion of the treaties of 1824 with the United States and of 1825 with Great Britain, Russia admitted that her jurisdiction in the said sea should be restricted to the reach of cannon shot from shore, and it appears that from that time up to the time of the cession of Alaska to the United States, Russia never asserted in fact or exercised any exclusive rights in the seal fisheries therein beyond the ordinary limits of territorial waters.

That was simply two and two make four—the Dutch taking Holland. The next question was: "How far were these claims of jurisdiction as to the seal fisheries recognized and conceded by Great Britain?"—another question of fact, and one American arbitrator as well as all the rest of the arbitrators decided and determined that Great Britain did not recognize or concede any claim on the part of Russia.

The next question was: "Was the body of water now known as the Behring Sea included in the phrase Pacific Ocean as used in the treaty of 1825 between Great Britain and Russia, and what rights, if any, in the Behring Sea were held and exclusively exercised by Russia after said treaty?"

The arbitrators were unanimous as to the first part, and as to the second part as to what rights, if any, in the Behring Sea were held under the said treaty, the arbitrators with the exception of Senator Morgan held that:

No exclusive rights of jurisdiction in Behring Sea and no exclusive rights as to the seal fisheries therein, were held or exercised by Russia outside of ordinary territorial waters after the treaty of 1825.

That was as plain as possible. No sensible or reasonable man ever supposed that they had any more claim upon those seals outside of the three-mile limit than they had upon the fish which swim in the territorial waters when found outside the limit, and on that point a majority of the arbitrators decided that the United States has not any right to exclusive jurisdiction in Behring Sea and no exclusive rights as to the fisheries therein, outside of ordinary territorial waters. That was the decision. It could not be otherwise, there was no room for any other decision. No lawyer, no man governed by any common sense ever supposed that there could be any other decision than that which was given as to the law of the matter. The important matter, what we were all interested in was not the decision of law, because we knew that there could be only one decision, but the question of what sort of regulations the arbitrators would provide and how our seal fishing was going to fare under these regulations. I do not hesitate to say that if the decision had been the other way, if the decision had been that those absurd and ridiculous claims set up by the United States—I fancy just for the purpose of getting regulations to suit themselves—if those claims of the United States had been upheld, the regulations could hardly have been more unfavourable to our fishermen than they actually were. I take up the regulations. Now remember it had been decided that outside of the three-mile limit the United States had no more rights in the waters of Behring Sea and the Pacific Ocean than England had. Let us see what sort of regulations have been made under these circumstances. The first article is:—

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall forbid their subjects respectively to kill, capture, or pursue at any time and in any manner whatever, the animals commonly called fur-seals within a zone of sixty miles around the Pribylov Islands, inclusive of the territorial waters.

In order to give that provision the widest meaning, this regulation goes on to say that the miles mentioned in the preceding paragraph are geographical miles of 60 to a degree of latitude; so that there are almost 70 miles around the islands reserved, and our fishermen are not allowed to kill seals there. What was the proposition made by the English commissioners with respect to the Pribylov Islands? They suggested that there should be a zone of 20 miles. That would have been reasonable, and I think one of the mistakes made by England, particularly in dealing with such a country as the United States, was that England should have made such a reasonable demand. If England had claimed that there should be no zone around the Pribylov Islands, then a reasonable and proper zone of twenty or thirty miles might have been established. England had other negotiations with Russia with respect to the Commander Islands, while those negotiations with the United States were going on—those islands are situated similarly to the Pribylov Islands—and the zone agreed upon between England and Russia is a zone of thirty miles. This zone of 60 geographical miles is calculated to render it almost useless for Canadian sealers to go to the neighbourhood of the Pribylov Islands. The Alaska Commercial Company is given a practical monopoly of the seal fishing in the neigbourhood of the Pribylov Islands. That is the first regulation and that is bad enough. The second regulation is:—

The two governments shall forbid their citizens and subjects, respectively, to kill, capture or pursue, in any manner whatever, during the season extending each year from the 1st of May to the 31st of July, both inclusive, the fur-seals on the high sea, in the part of the Pacific Ocean, inclusive of the Behring Sea, which is situated to the north of the 35th degree of north latitude and eastward of the 180th degree of longitude from Greenwich, till it strikes the water boundary described in article 1 of the Treaty of 1867, between the United States and Russia, and following that line up to Behring Straits.

This article forbids the killing of seals, not in the Behring Sea only, not even in the open sea to the north and west of British Columbia, but actually forbids the killing of seal east of longitude 180°, from about the latitude of San Francisco north to Behring Straits. You start from the latitude of San Francisco, and run west to the 180th meridian of longitude, and then north to Behring Strait, and in all that region, our sealers are not to be allowed to kill seals from the 1st day of May to the 31st of July, which is just the season when they go out after seals. They can kill seals, if they can get them, in August, September and October, and afterwards; but the seals are not to be had then. At the season of the year when the privilege of killing seals is of any value, our fishermen are forbidden to kill seals, not only in Behring Sea, but in the whole Pacific Ocean, east of the 180th meridian. The hon. gentleman says Americans are excluded too, but the Commercial Company of Alaska is not excluded. It just means this, that the most extreme care is taken to provide that the greatest possible number of seals shall go to the Pribylov Islands, where they can be slaughtered by the Alaska Company.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I cannot see it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That must be the result. If nobody else is allowed to kill seals in the Pacific Ocean or Behring Sea, it follows of course that the men who are allowed to kill them at the Pribylov Islands to which they all resort, are going to be benefited and nobody else. There has been nothing whatever done to prevent the indiscriminate and unlimited slaughter of seals while they are on the shore. A regulation to that effect was proposed on behalf of Canada, but refused by the United States. Article 6 of the Regulation says:—

The use of nets, firearms and explosives shall be forbidden in the fur-seal fishing. This restriction shall not apply to shot guns when such fishing takes place outside of Behring Sea, during the season when it may be lawfully carried on.

Now the only way in which our Canadian sealers as a rule have killed seals has been by shooting them with shot guns. They are not to be allowed to use shot guns in the Behring Sea at all, and not on the Pacific Ocean, at the season when seals are to be found there. Practically the regulations are prohibitory. It has been stated by the hon. leader of the Government and I think by some other hon. gentlemen, and it was stated in another place also, that vessels were fitted out this year for the seal fishing as usual. I happen, for the best of reasons, to know something about that matter. Where have the vessels gone that have been fitted out in Victoria this year? They have gone to the regions west of the 180th meridian. They have gone to the coast of Japan and the coast of the continent of Asia. The people of British Columbia interested in the sealing business look upon these regulations as being practically prohibitory. If the people of the United States had succeeded—if their claim to exclusive jurisdiction in the Behring Sea had been recognized, could things have been worse? They did not claim exclusive jurisdiction in the Pacific Ocean, they claimed it only in Behring Sea. If their claim to exclusive jurisdiction in Behring Sea had been recognized, our sealers would have been better off to-day, because then they could have killed seals in the Pacific Ocean without restriction, while now they are shut out from the Pacific Ocean at large as well as from Behring Sea. I can readily understand why the Canadian arbitrators should not have assented to these regulations. This paragraph of the Speech is in itself unobjectionable, because there is no tone of boasting about it; and I agree with the gentlemen who have spoken that even though our interests have been sacrificed in the matter still the sacrifice to the country at large is not as great as would have been a war, but I cannot help feeling, too, that seventy or eighty years ago England would have taken a totally different line. When those three vessels were seized in 1886, at distances from seventy to one hundred and fifty miles from the shore, there would have been very serious difficulty in a short time, and the United States would have surrendered those vessels with a very little hesitation. Numbers of hon. gentlemen are old enough to remember the case of Slidell and Mason, and if the same attitude had been assumed by the Imperial Government in connection with those Canadian fishing crews that was assumed with respect to Slidell and Mason we should have had none of those troubles at all and our fishermen would have been allowed to conduct their lawful occupation during all those years.

I do not propose to say very much on the remaining portion of the Speech. The next paragraph is that which deals with the tariff. It is well to know that amendments are to be offered for our consideration and that they are designed to simplify the operation of the tariff. The hon. gentleman who leads the House should, from his long official experience, know that the tariff will bear simplification, and I have no doubt but that in his capacity of Minister of Trade and Commerce he has given very valuable advice in that direction. This paragraph is rather enigmatical. It does not say that all the changes which are proposed to be made are to be in the direction of diminution, although it seems to imply that. It says they are to "lessen so far as can be done consistently with those principles and with the requirements of the treasury the imposts which are now in force." I hesitate after listening to the very elaborate speeches of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa and the hon. leader of the Government about saying anything with respect to this question. I may make one observation, however, as to the conduct of the Ministry with respect to these proposed changes. A committee of the Ministry went around the country during the past year making inquiries on the spot in various places as to the operation in those places of the existing tariff; and I think that on the whole that was probably a rather judicious course of action. It is not a usual course, but still I think there was a good deal to be said in favour of it. They came, for instance, to Halifax, and heard there the representatives of the importers and the representatives of the manufacturers and of other classes. They went round the country and gave fair and reasonable hearings to the representatives of the various classes, the representatives of the consumers as well as those of the manufacturers; but I have noticed that since that time there have been numbers of hearings given here, at Ottawa, to the representatives of the manufacturers. They appear to have been allowed, in every case, to have the last word with the Ministry, and every one knows that the last word is often a very valuable and important word. As one of the consumers, I regret it.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—If the Ministry were very forgetful it might be, but that is not likely.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that the speech of the hon. leader of the House this afternoon did not indicate forgetfulness at any rate. I think he remembered a good many things that he might just as well have forgotten. With respect to this tariff question, I feel tempted to say something, but probably the less said the better; but I cannot help making this observation. The government told us that protection was a capital thing—that it had no drawbacks—that it made things cheaper than they were before—and did not hurt anybody; but still, in spite of that, some little time ago, they reduced the duty on sugar very considerably, and then their newspapers and speakers all over the country asked the people to fall down and worship the government because they had taken off three millions of dollars taxation. They told us before that things were not made dearer by a tariff and that there was no taxation in reality. They asked credit for putting on the duties, and then when they took off the duties, they asked credit for taking them off. There was a duty on coal oil, and that was reduced. They took credit for having done so much in the way of reducing the burden on the consumers.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—We did not put on that tax. Your friends put it on.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand, our friends diminished the duty. It was a specific duty, and a duty which was reasonable in 1874 had become an unreasonable duty in 1893. But at all events, if the protection of the Canadian oil maker was a good thing, why should you cut down his protection while you kept it up for other people?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The duty was not lowered.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There were changes made which were equivalent to a reduction. Then the duty on binder twine was reduced one-half. The duty on cordage was supposed to be a capital thing, yet we are called upon to thank the Government for reducing the duty. To be consistent we should have been indignant with the Goverment for reducing that duty. If it was a good thing to put on the duty, we must have been worse off for the reduction. The truth does, in spite of the shrewdness of our friends opposite, come to the surface occasionally. They do feel, and have acknowledged in various instances that a duty is a tax, and that it makes things dearer; and I only hope that in the proposed changes in the tariff they are going to recognize that principle to a very considerable extent. While my hon. friend across the floor was talking about how much had been done for the farmers, I could not help thinking that, possibly the fact that the Patrons of Husbandry in the west had been making a good deal of noise over the tariff lately had much to do with the character of the hon. gentleman's speech. Those farmers in Ontario and Manitoba have been enjoying all the blessings of the duties on pork and flour for some years, but they do not seem to be satisfied; and they ought to know their own business. Probably the farmer of Ontario thinks he was just as well off when he was doing his business in another way when he was selling his grains close at hand, and that he could find a better use for his coarse grains than feeding them to hogs.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I do not know of any better at present.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No better at present; he is driven to that. There is a paragraph which speaks of a measure on bankruptcy and insolvency which it is hoped will make more adequate provision than now exists on that subject for the increasing trade and commerce of the country. I am quite aware that the law with respect to insolvency is not in a satisfactory condition, but I trust that the measure which is foreshadowed in that paragraph of the speech will be altogether different in principle from the Insolvent Act which we had before. Under the Act of 1875, insolvency was encouraged, and the creditors, as a rule, got practically nothing. The assignees and the lawyers concerned in the settlement of insolvent estates generally came off very well, but as a rule—I speak, of course, only of my own province, I cannot speak of other provinces—as a rule the creditors got next to nothing. The present system is unsatisfactory, but there is one thing about it, insolvency is discouraged. As it is now, a creditor can get a judgment against a man and hold it over him, and, if a debtor makes an assignment and acts dishonestly, and afterwards attempts to go into business, that judgment is there in terrorem and can be enforced. Insolvency is discouraged. There is, undoubtedly, in some of the provinces room now for unfair preferences; but I think that on the whole the present system is better than the one we had in 1879. They have in England an Act which works well, and if the measure which the Government propose to introduce follows generally the lines of the English Act it may improve the condition of things; but I for one should not care to commit myself to an unqualified approval of this measure until I see what it is.

The next paragaph is important but does not need much comment now, because the measure to which it refers will be before us. It is with respect to what is known as the fast Atlantic service. The leader of the House became very emphatic in dealing with that service, and condemned in advance any one who ventured to express a doubt as to the entire wisdom of the course indicated by the government. I do not propose for one to be scared by any declaration of that sort. We are here to use our best judgment with respect to the measures which come before us, and if a member of this House honestly thinks that any measure that is proposed is going to cost more than it is worth, it is his duty to say so and oppose the measure; and I have no hesitation in saying with respect to this Atlantic fast line that it is going to cost a great deal more than it will ever be worth. I do not hesitate at all to say that. I have said it in Halifax and I say it here, and I am prepared to say it and defend it anywhere. In the first place the game is not worth the candle. What does it come to, supposing we do get our mails a day quicker than at present? That is not such a wonderful advantage. It is a good thing, but not an important advantage. Supposing a passenger who wishes to come to Canada direct can get from England to Canada a day quicker than he could otherwise, that may be desirable, but it is not a very important thing, and when it comes to paying $750,000 a year for that advantage, taxing all the rest of us to that amount, I am perfectly safe in saying that that game is not worth the candle. Hon. gentlemen have talked a good deal about its being a magnificent thing to have to travel from England passing through Canada to the Pacific. I fail to see that that is any great advantage to Canada. It is just like water passing through a funnel. Passengers going from England to China, Japan and Australia across Canada, how much do they leave in Canada on their way?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A great deal to the railways and hotels.

Hon. Mr. POWER—How long do the passengers who are making these quick trips spend in hotels?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They have to pay the railway fares and other charges.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am satisfied that they will never leave $750,000 a year in the country. I can readily understand how the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should be desirous that that line should be established—I do not know whether they are or not, but I can understand why they might be—because it would have a tendency to secure more passenger traffic for their line. I should not mind paying something for it, but I think we are asked to pay too much. Another objection to the proposed line—I do not hesitate to state that fact, notwithstanding what the leader of the House says—is that it is impracticable. Any one who knows the Straits of Belle Isle route or the route between Newfoundland and Cape Breton, knows that in the spring and early summer months it would be madness for a shipmaster to run his vessel at twenty knots an hour. There are four of these vessels to be constructed. Within two years I am satisfied that those four vessels would have left their bones somewhere in the neighbourhood of Newfoundland or our Gulf shore. Another objection is that naval science has not got to that point at which it can construct a vessel to carry a large quantity of freight and run twenty knots an hour—it cannot be done. The ocean greyhounds which run to New York never carry more than 1,000 tons of freight, and until the science of naval construction has advanced further than it has now, we cannot have a fast line which will carry any reasonable quantity of freight. Mr. Huddart has been spoken of as a gentleman who is going to bring this line into operation. As I understand it, Mr. Huddart is not a capitalist himself. He is not a ship builder. The Government have been for some years engaged in negotiations with shipbuilders and ship-owners in the old country and have failed to get any one to undertake this service. Is it reasonable to expect that where the Government have failed in dealing with ship-owners and ship-builders, Mr. Huddart, a private gentleman from Australia, is going to succeed? The thing seems to me absurd. Until I saw it in the Governor General's Speech I thought it was something got up to influence the late election in Halifax.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—You should not have drawn conclusions in advance of facts.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have seen so much of the ways that are dark and tricks that are sometimes vain of our opponents, that I am justified in drawing the conclusion.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is only a matter of fairness to Mr. Huddart to say that he is the principal proprietor of the Australian line of steamers. He has been engaged in shipping from his boyhood up and his father was a ship-builder. It is true he is not a ship-builder himself, but he has been connected with ocean steamers all his life.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that Mr. Huddart is connected with the line between Australia and British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have not only said so, but I have stated that he is the principal owner and manager of the line, and has been running lines of steamers between the different Australian colonies for years.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That will not seriously modify the position.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It modifies it to this extent—the hon. gentleman stated that he was not a capitalist, but merely a private individual, intimating that he was simply a speculator.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With regard to the Australian line, our Government has given so generous a subsidy that I do not think a man needs much capital to run a line between Vancouver and Sydney.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is quite evident that the hon. gentleman knows very little about it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no difficulty in chartering steamers to do the work for that subsidy. Then there is another objection to that scheme, which I think is important. Enterprising Canadians have, after struggling with difficulties of various kinds for many years, succeeded in building up excellent lines of steamships. I think it is unfair to our own people and our own industries, when they have got things into a satisfactory condition—they have not attained perfection, but they have reached a reasonable degree of perfection—it is unfair to push them to one side and give those immense subsidies to outsiders. I think we could by a slight increase of the existing subsidy to the Allan line and the Dominion line obtain a service of sixteen or seventeen knots an hour which would better serve the purposes of all Canadians and more particularly of Canadian farmers than the proposed line. I find to my great disappointment and surprise that I have detained the House some ten minutes longer than I expected.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—How much a head would it be on the community per annum? Only 15 cents—that is all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It just depends on how many are paying it.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am very much taken by surprise by the speech of my hon. friend from Halifax. There is but one paragraph of the Address to which he has referred on which I agree with him, and that is with regard to the bankruptcy law. The evils of the last Bankruptcy Act were very great. In fact, it brought more injury on the commercial community than any act of the same character that was ever put on the statute-book. I agree with my hon. friend that the lawyers and assignees, and interim assignees pocketed the estates, and with the experience which the Government have had of the inefficiency of that Act, I hope they will be on their guard against repeating the evil. If they will give us a simple bankruptcy act, which will equitably dispose of the assets, and where the case is clear that through no fault of his own, but through misfortune, a man has been brought to bankruptcy, that in such case only shall the debtor have a discharge ; the legislation would be acceptable and in the interest of the trade of this country, but if it goes beyond that, if it induces people of no means, without experience and without character, to embark in business in which they have everything to gain and nothing to lose, and lead to the slaughter of bankrupt stock on the market, destroying the enterprise of honest traders, then we had better do without a bankruptcy act altogether. I am very much surprised at my hon. friend's position with regard to the proposed fast steamship service. He must know that he is speaking for himself only, and that the people of the whole Maritime Provinces are in favour of it, and he knows, or will find out that all men of business, ability and energy, all who put country before party, go heartily in favour of that enterprise. The Government has been more than once censured for delay in this matter, but it has been no fault of theirs that the line was not established long ago. It was simply because those who were anxious to go into it found that the subsidy was not sufficient. My hon. friend from Halifax says that it is not fair to other steamship lines.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They can take it up if they like.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Year after year they continuously for several years had the offer before them, and if they considered their own enterprises sufficiently lucrative and had not ambition enough to extend their operations, the fault is theirs. I consider that this is going to give unequalled advantages to the trade of Canada, especially to the farmers of this country—something that they never have had, and will never get except by a large subsidy. Without it we would have to send out light freight and our passengers to New York. Should we continue to do so? No. I believe our country has become so important that we need not depend upon the United States for communication of any kind with the mother country. By a direct line we shall not only benefit merchants and the travelling community, but the farmers will be especially benefited in the shipping of dairy produce and fresh meat, fruit of all kinds and many things which we do not at present think of sending to the English markets, enabling them to compete more favourably with our neighbours. In every enterprise that the Government has undertaken we have had this opposition from our Liberal friends—I might say from our illiberal non-progressive opponents They seem to think that anything the Government proposes cannot be good or useful to the country or else are envious of the progress and prosperity that abound under wise administration. Their sole object seems to be to obstruct, yes, even to destroy, any enterprise which tends to enhance the popularity of the Government or would give to Canada that prominence which her great heritage and her position in the empire demands. The remarks of the leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentleman from Halifax are not in harmony with the sentiment of the people of Canada but are the expressions of a class of people who decry any enterprise which tends to advance the prosperity of the Dominion. If capitalists are scared out of this enterprise, if it fails, the opposition in this and the other branch of parliament will be held responsible by an indignant people.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH resumed his speech. He said : At six o'clock I was endeavouring to show that this fast steamship service would give unequalled facilities to the farmers of this country to reach the best and only profitable market for their produce. When the service is established we will have direct, easy and shorter communication with the greater part of the commercial centres of the world, and thereby increase our commerce and international relations. We must recollect that in this country we hold a great and noble heritage and no mean position in the empire. We have a territory which includes one-half of North America and more than one-third of the whole of the empire, with capabilities and possibilities beyond anything that we are fully conscious of. Our heritage is great and our duties and responsibilities must correspond with it Our country faces both shores of two mighty oceans and we have 1,000 miles of inland navigation. If we remain true to ourselves and united and loyal to our country in the face of external rivals and internal foes, having confidence and faith in Canada, there is a future of greater prosperity and progress for this country than any of us can realize. We have Australia, on one side with its immense area and undeveloped resources and great possibilities, and we are bound, as they are, to go forward with the march of improvement and help as far as our grand position enables us, to unite together this great empire of which we form a first and commanding part. England and her colonies are becoming conscious of our commanding position and of the vast capabilities and possibilities, of our immense and as yet largely undeveloped area, and though not a nation, we have in many ways the interest of a nation to consider. Therefore this question of rapid steamship service is one which no patriotic man should raise his voice against, certainly not the hon. member who comes from Halifax, the winter port of the service, and yet while Mr. Huddart is endeavouring to start this project and interest capitalists in it on the other side of the Atlantic, we find the leaders of the Opposition in both Houses of Parliament here with the senior member from Halifax throwing cold water on the enterprise, yes, even attempting to strangle it. If Mr. Huddart should meet with failure, the country has a right to and would lay the blame at the door of the Opposition in Canada. My hon. friend from Halifax touched on the Behring Sea question, and assured us that there was really no question to be decided at all, and yet we all know that it was a question that brought England nearly to the verge of war. He said that it was as plain as that two and two makes four, or that the Dutch had captured Holland, and he virtually told us that the people of the United States were pirates and marauders on the high seas. I do not quite agree with him in such an assertion. We had, as we always held all the rights of law on our side, and in all of them we have been sustained, it is true, but still there was a serious as well as a large subtle, and I might say a sentimental contention on the other side, and I am surprised that my hon. friend should imagine that a complicated case, such as it was, could be so easily disposed of, requiring no more capacity to determine than what two and two make. We got our rights by arbitration, and we maintain our right to float our flag, the British flag, as British subjects on the high seas—rights which were threatened to be taken ruthlessly from us when our vessels were captured and our people imprisoned. The regulations were a matter of minor importance. It may be that they are not such regulations as we conceive to be in the least in the interests of Canada and we hear that our neighbours are equally dissatisfied, but they were made by able and impartial men and are intended to protect the seals as much from the citizens of the United States as from our own people. My hon. friend from Halifax says that by these regulations we will be thrown out of the sealing industry altogether. If so the citizens of the United States must be thrown out also. The only place where they have the advantage over us is on the islands, and if the Government of the United States really wish to protect their seals, their police force united with our force will see that the regulations are observed on the islands, and that the annual slaughter of seals is kept within limits agreed on between the United States and the seal company. I do not think the Government of the United States would pursue such a suicidal policy after all the trouble and expense they have incurred, and even straining after rights that they did not possess, as to destroy the sealing industry by an indiscriminate slaughter on their own islands, protected by the 60-mile zone or girdle. But there is one thing certain to us, that these regulations apply only to citizens of the British empire and of the United States, and our sealers may go under a foreign flag and pursue pelagic sealing with impunity. We have not the control of them outside of the three-mile limit, and I think it would be a good policy on the part of the United States and Canada to get all other nations to join with them in the arrangement for the protection of the seals, especially Russia and Japan. Even if those countries joined with us, it is a question whether we can so effectively police and guard the seal fisheries as to enforce the regulations ; it might perhaps involve a greater expense than the seal pelts are worth. At all events, it is an industry in which British Columbia is deeply interested, and one also in which the people of the United States are interested. We from Lunenburg have sent some of our best vessels and fishermen to pursue that industry, and it is yet believed to be a profitable business. When my hon. friend from Halifax speaks about the whole thing being given up, he assumes to know more than the people who are engaged in the industry. The seal fishermen that have engaged in that industry continue in that industry and are prosecuting it since the regulations were framed. They evidently do not think that sealing has been destroyed. If they thought so, they would not have this winter bought vessels in Nova Scotia and invested capital to fit them out for the enterprise. They are practical men, know their own business and mind it, and they are satisfied that the industry is not destroyed. My hon. friend referred to the stand taken by the English Government in the Mason and Slidell case sixty years ago, and he told us that if England were to-day what she was at that time she would soon have terminated this dispute in war. Well, we were very nearly brought to war on this question—we were verging upon it as England was compelled to uphold Canada's rights as British subjects when this arbitration was agreed to. I may say that I do not wish to see war with the United States, and I am glad to know that on this, as in all other matters of international dispute, we can have a peaceful settlement by means of arbitration. Why should it be otherwise, situated as we are alongside of a nation who are of our own kindred and blood? We should be sorry to have war with our neighbours, and it should never be contemplated except as a dernier ressort. Canada would have everything, at least very much, to lose by such a conflict. Therefore, I am glad that this dispute has been amicably settled, and that an example has been set to all the nations of the world, showing them that the most unyielding questions and claims of nations may be settled by arbitration and not by the sword. It is the most Christian, just and humane manner in which to dispose of disputes which cannot be adjusted directly by the parties interested. My hon. friend is disposed to think it very improper that those connected with the Inland Revenue and Customs Departments, after getting all the information they could regarding the wishes and interests of all industries while travelling through the country, should allow persons interested in manufacturing industries to confer with the Ministers. I have yet to know that our Ministry has every failed to see, and communicate with, and confer with gentlemen who come here on public business. It would be a strange thing indeed for our Government to do. They have always shown themselves anxious to get the opinion of the people of Canada upon everything affecting the public interest, and therefore I do not think it is improper, when persons interested in any manufacturing industry come to interview the Government that they should be heard. They may possibly furnish information that may be valuable to the Government and to the country, and it is but right that they should be heard. I know it was different when the Liberal party were in power. At a time when the country was in a desperate state, people came from all parts of Canada asking them or reasoning with them to adopt certain measures for the benefit of the country, and they were told by the Minister of that day to go to a warmer place. I do not think that is the way our Ministers would act, and I should have very little respect for them if they were to treat any person or any delegation from any class of the people, or from any part of the country, who approach them in a respectful manner with such scant courtesy or bad advice.

The hon. leader of the Opposition told us that Prince Edward Island is not as prosperous to-day as it was in 1873—that its trade is not so great now as it was then. But he ought to remember that that was among the years of Conservative prosperity. My hon. friend must also have forgotten that it was not until July, 1873, that Prince Edward Island entered the confederation and that much of its trade which was then considered foreign, as the Canadian trade then was, is now intercolonial trade. Her imports and exports were largely with England and the United States, and it took some time to divert them into Canadian channels. Now we know that the great bulk of their trade is with other provinces of Canada and therefore not accounted for in the trade returns of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman never took that into account: we must in charity suppose he forgot it. Prince Edward Island's trade with us is most profitable, it is alike profitable to them and to us—the trade of Prince Edward Island has largely increased since it united with us—and its prosperity has increased. If the Opposition imagine that they can deceive the people of Prince Edward Island by such statements as came from the lips of the leader of the Opposition in this House, they must credit them with very little intelligence. The people of that province, as I have said, well know that their prosperity has increased year by year, and that they have lost nothing, but in every way increased and multiplied since they entered the confederation. Their industries, as every one knows who know anything about it, have increased, and their markets have been enlarged since they united with us. My hon. friend talked about cotton lords and sugar lords. I think the leader of the House rebuked him sufficiently on that point. I can remember not many years ago when on the floor of this House he twitted the Government with inducing people to embark in those enterprises and lose their capital, and I would ask how much profit they made on those industries. I know that those who went into them jeopardized their capital and lost money for want of knowledge and skill, because too many persons engaged in them, and from enemies in and outside of Canada who plotted their destruction.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Confined markets.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not know where then or now you could find a bigger market, certainly not in free trade England; because we were told then and we now know that in the United States those great sugar and cotton kings are not making money out of it, but the hon. gentleman forgot to tell us that the very moment those industries are put on a proper footing the manufacturers make but a small, possibly a reasonable profit. They do not make large profits. Any one can buy their stock at par, probably below that, if he thinks that the profits are attractive. We all know that sugar was never cheaper in Canada than it is to-day. It is cheaper than you can get it in the United States. You can get two pounds more sugar for $1 in Canada than you can get in the United States, and cheaper by half than it was not very long before confederation. That cannot be contradicted. What would be our condition if our local and Dominion industries were destroyed? In the years from 1873 to 1879, when the Liberal party were in power, the sugar industry then existing in Montreal was destroyed by the policy of the Government. The leader of the Opposition admitted that. What would be our position if we, after building up those industries with a protective policy, were to throw open our markets to foreign competition? It would be just like from 1873 to 1878, when here and elsewhere had to be established soup kitchens for those who wanted work and could find none. We would be worse off than they are in the United States. They could flood our markets, break down our local industries and then charge us what they thought proper. My hon. friend did not dwell much on the condition of affairs during the five years his party were in power. We know what their record was, every industry of the country was paralyzed. Do they want the country to go back to that condition again? The Opposition have not changed their policy. If they are honest in their professions, they are on the same track now that they were then, and as like causes would produce like effects they would soon bring this country to the verge of ruin as they did before. When they were in power they increased the taxes beyond what they had been before, but they did not increase the revenue and they piled up the debt of the country with very little or nothing to show for it. Could they point to any industry or any enterprise of importance on which the public money had been expended? The only prominent conspicuous industry they could point to as having b en established under their regime was the soup kitchens, and even those were the work of those who had sympathy with the starving people. Many of us can remember when honest workmen filled the streets of Ottawa and came to these buildings begging, not for assistance, but for work. They were cast to one side, treated at least with indifference and told that they should eat less—I believe that was practically the advice and encouragement given them. This Government when taking office in 1879 initiated a new era, and there has been progress in the country. Talk of the people going out of the country; the exodus was at flood during the five years the Liberals were in power. The country was fast becoming depopulated. Anybody who looks over the United States statistics will see that the exodus was not so great in the decade between 1881 and 1891, as in the preceding decade. It was not stopped at once after the change of Government, it is not easy to stop such an exodus—the rush was too great. It takes years before you can turn the flow of the population again into proper channels, and when my hon. friend rejoices over the exodus from this country to-day, he knows in his heart that the flood gates were opened wide for the departure of our people to the United States long before the National Policy was initiated. My hon. friend states that 75 per cent of the people of our country are so ignorant that they do not know they are taxed and downtrodden by the other 25 per cent of the population. Well, the present Government have been in power for fifteen years and have been sustained at the polls every time they appealed to the electors. The people know that the Government have been true to the trust reposed in them and have sustained them in carrying out the principle of protection in this country. The policy now is the policy of 1878, and I hope it may long remain so. I see no reason why they should depart from it. No doubt changes will be needed to adapt a tariff to the ever changing wants, necessities and developments of the country. Any law of this kind affecting the revenue of the country must adapt itself to time and circumstances. Our tariff to-day on all classes of imports is on the average not more than 17½ per cent, not more than it was during the five years of the Mackenzie regime, on all non-enumerated articles. I do not believe the Government have done anything to forfeit the confidence of the country, or that they should depart from the principle of protection which has brought prosperity to the country. On the contrary, I believe they have as much of the confidence of the people as they had fifteen years ago. It is remarkable to me that Canada has maintained its prosperity when all the commercial nations of the world have felt the pinch of trade, and our neighbours to the south of us have been paralyzed financially. It is singular that this country has escaped such widespread depression, and I ask the House to consider why we have escaped it. In my opinion, it is because for the last fifteen years our Government have so carefully watched over the interests of the country, its banking and other monetary institutions, and developed its resources, giving us railway facilities, and deepening and enlarging and improving its canal system, and giving us all the facilities, not only for interprovincial but outside trade, that the consequence is that the shock in the commercial world outside of us has not materially affected us. If we had adopted the policy advocated by the Opposition, where would Canada be now? Where would we have been if we had not our wall of protection up against the United States? The surplus production of that country would have been brought into our markets destroying every local industry. It is only that wall of protection that saved us, not only from financial depression, but from being brought to a paralyzed condition which it would have taken years for this country to get over. Therefore, I think the people of Canada have been in safe hands, and I congratulate the Government on the success which has attended their administration which has brought peace, contentment and prosperity to every part of the Dominion. My hon. friend from Halifax and the leader of the Opposition question all this. In our province of Nova Scotia there is no question about it, and yet we do not believe that we are in a better position than any other province of the Dominion. My hon. friend states that the wealth of the country was in the hands of these cotton lords and sugar kings. In my own province, speaking for my own county, I know that the wealth of the country is widespread, as can be seen by looking at the reports of our monetary institutions and savings banks. Men of the humblest walks of life have saved up and safely invested money for their old age. It is the same throughout the province. It might be better, perhaps, if the money were in circulation, but I mention it to show that the earning power of the people of this country has been and is great, and that they are prosperous. If the statements of my hon. friend were correct, what would our position be? If the people were going out of the country with their productive wealth, if our resources were not being developed, could the people give such evidence of prosperity? If the policy of the Opposition were adopted, and we were not bringing raw material into the country to be manufactured and our people were leaving the country to find occupation in the United States where would our farmers be? The best market for the farmer is the home market, and if our people are driven out of the country to find employment the farmer loses his home market. Such a policy would be suicidal and no one would suffer more from it than the farmer himself. If we had free trade the farmers would be subject to direct taxation. The Address says that it is gratifying to observe that the expectation formed last year as to the continued progress of the Dominion had been fully realized. I do not think any one will cavil at that. I do not think the statement is made in too glowing terms. The trade of Canada increased last year some $6,000,000, while the trade of our neighbours to the south of us decreased $143,000,000. This shows, as a matter of comparison as well as of fact, that this country is improving. We note that Canada sold to England of agricultural products $3,000,000 worth more and purchased $2,000,000 worth more than in the previous year, and at the same time we purchased from the United States about $1,000,000 less. I think we can very well endorse the statement made here in the Address and boldly assert that this country is beyond all comparison the most contented, prosperous and happy of all the countries on the face of the globe. I am satisfied that every man here feels in his heart that such is the fact, and that they are safe from financial and commercial depresssion. As evidence of the fact, during the last year the liabilities of those who failed were less by more than $1,000,000 than the preceding year, while in the United States the increase was from $188,000,000 to $383,000,000. There can be no doubt as to the prosperity of the country and that prosperity will continue so long as we are true to ourselves and stand shoulder to shoulder in promoting everything that tends to the interest of the Dominion, and in speaking well of our country at all times and in all places, and showing that we have confidence in its future. If we continue to march on these lines and continue to be guided by the principles which were laid down fifteen years ago as the well understood wishes of this people, I believe we will go on prospering and to prosper. Our revenue has been adequate for our purposes meeting all claims upon it, while in the United States, they have a deficit of about $100,000,000. That we have escaped such a financial calamity is owing to our stable, certain and sure protective policy. If it had not protected our industries our position would be no better than theirs. I have already referred to the Behring Sea award, which suggest to me the fact that by the force of Canada's position and compulsion of circumstances, the statesmen of the Dominion have become the statesmen of our great empire. They have been sought by England in the discussion of some of the most vital questions involving the rights and interests of the empire, and their advice has been essential to the wise conduct and to the maintenance of the just rights of our country, and they have been worthily honoured. It is a matter of pride to us, as colonists and as members of the great empire, that we have men who are capable of holding important positions under our sovereign, men in whom the empire has sufficient confidence to place them in high and important positions to deal with matters in which the empire at large, and especially this part of it, is deeply interested.

The next paragraph intimates that it is not intended to change the principle on which our tariff is based. I hope that the Government will not be influenced by any interest, or any section, or by any class in the community, to depart from the sound principles which have guided them thus far, and that in any change they may make in the tariff they will have a due regard to the interest of the whole Dominion. That is the position they have maintained in the past and which I hope they will continue to maintain. We should be careful in all that we do to keep our operatives in this country. They are a source of wealth to the Dominion, and we should be careful not to adopt any policy which may injure the industries in which they are engaged. On the contrary, we should seek to multiply those industries and thus build up the Dominion. We must be jealous of and ever ready to guard and protect their rights and interests. If we should do anything which would lead our operatives to desert us, it would be a blow to the development of the country.

Some remarks have been made with regard to the ocean steamship service. I am glad that the leader of this House was sent to Australia with a view of increasing our trade with the Australian colonies. I am satisfied that whatever he said or did while on that mission was in the true interest of Canada, and that we shall soon hear of beneficial results from his trip. Already we have had an intimation that delegations will be sent to this country from the Australian colonies to confer on questions affecting the trade between Australia and Canada, with a view to establishing a closer connection commercially between these two great sections of the empire. It is only by means of a steamship line, and what of necessity must follow, a cable between Australia and Canada, that such closer connection can be brought about and successfully prosecuted. I believe that before many years the interests of Australia and Canada will be so blended together that they will only wonder that they were so long separated.

There has been some reference to the Dominion lands in the Address. I do not know what the measure is to be, but if it in any way affects the settlement of those lands it is a question of great importance to Canada. We have a splendid country in the North-west, with great capabilities and great resources, and it is in the interest of the Dominion that they should be settled as rapidly as possible, and that immigrants, when they come to this country will find ready means of communication with the unsettled territories in that part of Canada. If they find the country a desirable one, they will be the best immigration agents. They will report to their friends abroad what they find here, and their success will encourage others to join them. Therefore it is to our interest, as far as we can, to place every immigrant well that he may send a favourable report abroad to his friends. It was by such means that the United States filled up their country and it is the way that we can succeed in filling up ours. Settlers should be directed to the best lands and those easiest of access. We all know that prosperous settlers are the best emigration agents —their friends and neighbours come by their reports and advice. We may soon expect immigrants not only from Europe, but from the United States, who find this a better country. All the best lands in that country have been taken up, and of late the capabilities and resources of our own vast territory are becoming better known. It is our duty to watch earnestly and exert every effort to advance the industries and development of the resources of our country—a country of which all of us may well be proud.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I have no doubt the House will be highly pleased when I inform them that it is not my intention to go through the whole bill of fare, like the hon. gentleman who has just made his speech. My remarks will be confined to one or two paragraphs in the Speech from the Throne, but before referring to those paragraphs, I desire to call the attention of the House to the omission of a clause from the Address which appeared in the Speech from the Throne last year. It was considered worthy of a place in the Speech from the Throne in 1893, and I regret to see it has been omitted from the one under consideration. I refer to the ninth paragraph of the speech of last year, which promised that provision would be made by which voting by ballot should be extended to the North-west Territories. I always took strong grounds, from the time that the very first Act was introduced in this House to give the North-west Territories representation in the other branch of the Legislature and in this, that they should have the ballot the same as the provinces. I held that no exception should be made as to the manner in which elections for the Dominion House should be conducted in these territories. Depriving them of the ballot I looked on as a slight, and I might say an insult and a reflection on the intellect of the people of that portion of our great Dominion.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, there is a bill now before the other Chamber—it may have been read this afternoon for all I know—introducing a measure in compliance with the wishes of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I am very much pleased to hear it. I was not aware that the Government had brought down a bill of that nature. It having been named in the Speech of last year, I thought it was only reasonable to assume that if they intended to make the desirable change it would have been mentioned in the present speech. I am very much pleased to hear the announcement that the hon. gentleman has made.

The first paragraph in the speech which I desire to criticize for a short time is that which has reference to the Behring Sea Arbitration. I had the pleasure, a few nights ago, of listening to the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government of this country in his reply to the gifted leader of the Opposition, and when he came to deal with the criticisms of the leader of the Opposition with respect to the Behring Sea Arbitration, he stated emphatically, and I have his speech here as reported in the Commons Hansard, that the present regulations would not diminish or injure the sealing industry in the province of British Columbia. I can assure this House and the hon. the leader of the Government in this Chamber and the hon. the leader of the Government that they have been misinformed. In order to show how the award and regulations of the Behring Sea Arbritation are viewed in my province and by those engaged in the industry, perhaps I cannot do better than read a few articles and editorial comments from the leading Conservative organ in the province of British Columbia, namely the Victoria Colonist. I have no doubt the leader of the Government here and others will probably attach more importance to the statements made by that Conservative organ than they will to anything I may say here. The following is an editorial from the Daily Colonist of August 18th, 1893:

THE ARBITRATION.

It is not a little singular, but still, in a measure it is not surprising to notice the manner in which the award of the Behring Sea arbitrators is regarded by the people of Great Britain and the United States, who alike seem to have gained their point —the one in the maintenance of the principle for which they contended, the other in securing the object which they had in view. This is well expressed by the New York Herald, which says, "it gives the Government and to its lessee, the fur company, all that was, rightly asked." Our neighbours have, it would appear, reason to congratulate themselves; for though they are beaten they, as it is said, have gained all and more than all, which the late Secretary of State Blaine demanded. Britain's victory is for Canada worse than a defeat, for though it is logically expected to have secured to the British Columbia sealers indemnification for the losses to which they have been subjected by undue United States interference, it has, it is claimed, destroyed a local industry in which a capital of over $500,000 has been invested, and in which some 1,500 or more men earn their own living, and at a low estimate that of from four or five thousand women and children. "Schooners for Sale!" will undoubtedly be the announcement on all hands, and the United States or the Alaska

Commercial Company will be able to come in and obtain cheap vessels and outfits for the prosecution of that industry which they have managed to lock up against those who were the first to develop it and to demonstrate its possibilities. Captain Warren's point would appear to be well taken: "The arbitrators agreed we were in a legal and legitimate business," his question being only the natural corollary, "but why should it be taken from us without payment for value received?" Doubtless there are many who will be disposed to agree with Captain Cox, although they will hardly undertake to say so, when he remarked that the decision is "not to protect the seals" while "the arbitration was merely a farce, the motive of which was to give some shadow of colour, some reason which England could advance when told of the injury, wanton and illegal, done to vessels flying her flag. She did not want to protect them, but must have an excuse for neglect." This, it may be remarked, is a most serious reflection.

The question, however, not unnaturally, arises whether or not, since the regulations submitted are outside of the questions presented to the Board, although it was intended that suggestions for the better protection of seal life in the future should be made—are binding. The principle at issue was whether or not the course of the United States was justified by international law, the proposed regulations being, it is claimed, merely suggestive of mutual action for the future, and that being the case, should be open to revision and amendment. There were five questions arbitrated upon involving matters of principle, and the correctness of the British position with regard to them was fully vindicated by the award. Not having committed any international wrong—and this was the contention of even the British Government—the Canadian sealers ought not, they say, to be compelled in spite of themselves to submit to regulations which, as even the American agent, Hon. John W. Foster, with others, has declared, are "much better than Mr. Blaine vainly offered to Lord Salisbury in 1890 as a settlement. Mr. Blaine then proposed as the seal restriction of pelagic sealing to prohibit within sixty miles of the Pribylov Islands. The present settlement is also more advantageous than the one proposed by Mr. Bayard in 1888, as he asked no protection for the seals during May and June."

There is, however, a silver lining to the cloud even should it unfortunately have burst upon us in its fullest intensity. There is the prospect, unless the Americans repudiate their obligations, of the British Columbian sealers receiving indemnity for the vessels that have been illegally seized—some of them confiscated—for the losses to which their owners have been put, on account of an unwarranted interference with them in their legitimate avocation, and for the hardships to which the crews and hunters have been subjected, because of the enforced stoppage of their lawful pursuits. Great Britain, although our sealing men are, some of them, inclined to complain of her action, has paid the bill for the injuries inflicted by reason of the sudden putting into force of the modus vivendi, and it is now for the United States to meet their obligations, otherwise the feeling of dissatisfaction and injury will be intensified.

But there is a strong element of dissatisfaction in the United States. Secretary of State Gresham, who occupies the position formerly filled by the late Mr. Blaine, is among this number, his views, it is said, being shared by his colleagues. But that is not on account of the stringency of the regulations, but because they are interpreted to mean that the United States will have entailed on them the cost and worry of patrolling Behring Sea without benefit to their sealers, while Russia, Japan, and perhaps other nations reap the harvest, the regulations being binding only on Great Britain, Canada and the United States. It is claimed that as a consequence of the regulations in the close season, during May, June and July, both Great Britain and the United States will be obliged to maintain a fleet of naval vessels to police the sealing waters, and it is believed at the Navy Department that this will result in the establishment of a permanent Behring Sea squadron for duty during the three months named. The United States will also be obliged to maintain watch on the waters within the sixty-mile zone around the Pribylov islands during entire mild season from April 1st to September 1st, and it is probable this duty will be discharged by vessels of the revenue marine service. And for what object is all this? To secure a monopoly of the seal trade for an American company. The New York Sun thus puts the case:

The truth is that we never had the faintest grounds in international law for the claim that the Behring Sea was a mare clausum, or that by cession from Russia we acquired exclusive jurisdiction over the eastern part of it, or that we possessed any right of property in seals outside of the three-mile limit. The money spent on the assertion of such a bare claim has been thrown away. So far as the case made by our State department, it met with deserved and derisory collapse by the Board of Arbitration, but the protection of the fur seals, which the arbitrators deny the right of the United States to give, and for giving which we must pay damages to the owners of seized Canadian vessels, will henceforth be assured to the animals by virtue of a decree of the international tribunal. The arbitrators have taken measures to fulfil, the humanitarian purpose of safeguarding seal life, which, however, was notoriously nothing but a pretext in the mouth of the Alaska Trading Company. As to claims of exclusive jurisdiction, or of special rights of property in the seal fisheries, these are treated with contempt.

It may be remarked that in the sole interest of the Alaska Commercial monoply the American citizens and sealers have been placed in precisely the same position as the British Columbia sealers, and well may they complain. On them will be levied the cost entailed in the so-called protection of seal life, which means the maintenance of a monoply purely and simply in the hands of a few Republican politicians. The situation is a most unsatisfactory one—unsatisfactory to the bulk of the people both in Canada and the United States; and it is not, we confess, every British Columbian who can regard it with the same equanimity as the editor of the News-Advertiser, who says:

The practical conclusion of the whole matter is, that whilst Canada gains in regard to all sealing things of the recent past submitted to the arbitrators' decision, the United States and their Alaskan vessels must incidentally profit largely by the results of the decision as to things future. The reason for this latter consequence being, however, an intention to protect seal life, we can console ourselves in the matter with the reflection that the Canadian case lost nothing from any want of able argument, as also with the feeling that, if the arbitrators' view is correct in fact, the restrictions, somewhat arduous though certain of them seem, tend to prevent a still greater evil, namely, the extinction of a valuable fishery by utter depletion. We feel, moreover, considerable confidence that the skill and energy of those engaged in our sealing industry will, despite the restrictions in question, render good and profitable account of themselves year by year.

I will only trouble the House with a couple of short extracts more. What I read was in the Colonist of the 18th August; on the 3rd September, the same paper makes the following comment:—

"A HUMANE PURPOSE."

The New York Herald, in its congratulations as to the outcome of the Behring Sea arbitration, is inclined to be humorous. Indeed, the attitude of the United States in this matter has had about it a very great deal of the ludicrous; but, for all that, there was the constant presence of the eye to business. In its editorial on the decision of the arbitrators it says: "The position taken by the United States in the Behring Sea affair was the outcomè of a humane purpose." Where has been manifested the humanitarian aspect of the case? Was it upon the Pribylov Islands, where the hunters have, under Government protection, perpetrated the most atrocious cruelties upon the unfortunate seals, and is it to be demonstrated in the future in the unsparing use of the spears and clubs which are certain to be so effectively used on the island and other rookeries? How the well-known fur dealer, Mr. Liebes, appreciates the humanitarian aspect of the case he describes when he says: "In that decision we got just what belonged to us, nothing more and nothing less. Our rights have been preserved, and those of England have not been infringed upon. We have the seals and England dyes the skins." Blood and fur is what the Alaska Company will have secured if the regulations go into force.

Dr. Dawson placed his hand on the weak part of the award when he directed attention to the fact that the arbitrators were precluded from making any arrangements for the preservation of seal life on land. It does look almost absurd to see the arbitrators making elaborate and stringent regulations for the preservation of seal life on the sea, where the creatures have many chances of escape, while they could not interfere with the massacre of the seals on land, where they are completely at the mercy of the pursuers. Dr. Dawson said recently:

Our investigations show conclusively that heretofore the greatest injury to the seal fishery has resulted from excessive killing and careless methods upon the Pribylov Islands, where the seals land to breed each year. Being within the territorial limits of the United States the regulation of sealing upon those islands was not submitted to the decision of the arbitrators, but, as the United States may now rely upon more than adequate external protection, it remains for the Government of that country to carry out its professions with regard to killing there. The responsibility with regard to the future prosperity of seal life now rests mainly with the United States, and if the seals do not increase and multiply it will be because of their acts upon the islands.

But the preservers of seal life, who sat five months in Paris to consider how best they could accomplish the end they had in view, have not been able to do anything whatever towards lessening this "excessive killing" or towards improving or suppressing the "careless methods upon the Pribylov Islands." It is on those islands common sense points out that protection ought to be given. It is there that it is most required, and there only can it be made effective. It is said that there is a limit to the seals which the Commercial Company may kill. Granting this for the sake of argument, and for that only, there is no limit to the number which the company may mutilate and torture in their efforts to get the seals which it pays best to kill.

When the American claim to property in the seals was disposed of, all that remained for the arbitrators to do was to make such provision as could most effectively extend to the seals which it was said the preservation of the species imperatively required. But they must have felt that any regulations they might make, as long as they could not touch the principal cause of the diminution of the seals, must be ridiculously inadequate. As long as the Commercial Company can do as they please with the seals on land, the restrictions on pelagic sealing will do very little towards the preservation of seal life. The sum and substance of the whole matter seems to be just now that it is the Commercial Company alone which will receive any immediate benefit from the award of the Behring Sea Arbitration. Dr. Dawson says that the United States Government may carry out its professions with regard to killing seals on the Pribylov Islands. That Government has hitherto been most lax in its oversight of the company's operations and practices, and there is no reason for concluding that it will not be equally lax in the future.

The editor goes on for half a column more commenting in a more severe manner than he did in the first editorial which I read. I have another one of a somewhat later date, which contains an expression which I do not approve of. Yet, as it expresses the views of the sealers, I feel it to be my duty to read it to the House.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Could not the hon. gentleman hand it in?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—No, I do not propose to hand it in. Probably the hon. gentleman himself would not be anxious to hand in anything bearing on free trade.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Free trade is a much more important question than one of this kind.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—While I admit that free trade is a very important subject, yet the question I am discussing is an exceedingly important one to the Pacific province. The article is entitled: "Called a Babbling Ass." This is the expression I referred to a moment ago—"that babbling ass should be silenced," was what Captain J. C. Cox said. This Captain Cox, I might inform the House, is the President of the Sealing Association of the province of British Columbia, a man who has been in the business from its earliest history, and a man who is thoroughly conversant with every phase of the industry. He applies that term to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper. I do not sympathize with Captain Cox, when he applies the expression "Babbling Ass" to the young Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, for I claim that he has few superiors in the House of Commons either in point of intellect or ability. He is a man whom I have always held in the highest estimation, and as far as ability is concerned I am not afraid to say that, in my estimation at least, he stands not only equal to, but superior to his talented dad, and that is saying a good deal.

CALLED "A BABBLING ASS."

WHAT SEALING MEN THINK OF SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER, K.C.M.G., AND HIS REMARKABLE PROPHECY—HIS STATEMENTS IF BELIEVED WILL GRIEVOUSLY AFFECT PRICES AT THE OCTOBER SALES IN LONDON—WHERE THEY ARE UNTRUE.

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, K. C. M. G., was interviewed at Ottawa yesterday by the Colonist's representative at the capital and is quoted as saying that "the British side of the arbitration had to fight hard to secure permission for pelagic sealing, and they did well to secure the regulations they did. At the same time," he added, "they are not my ideas of what the regulations should be, even as a means of preserving seals. They are neither in the interests of the United States or Canada in that respect, and, mark my words, next year's catch of British vessels will be the largest in the history of pelagic sealing. That this great slaughter will occur at a time when it may be most destructive to the seal species will be the fault of the regulations."

This choice morsel of intelligence was very pleasantly received by the sealers this morning. "That babbling ass should be silenced," was what Capt. J. G. Cox said. "His prophecy is a falsehood pure and simple, and can have but effect if his words bear any weight in London. It will injure the price of our skins taken this year. We have a good catch, probably the last we will ever make, and have counted on getting a fair price for it. The skins are not sold yet, most of them being now en route to London for the October sales, and if it is believed there will be any kind of a catch next year prices will be grievously affected. Here young Tupper says next year there will be "a great slaughter," and the catch will be the largest in the history of pelagic sealing. He must have known this to be false when he uttered it. Anybody who has read the regulations knows that it will be impossible. Why, I tell you that the things we fear the most will be the rules made at Ottawa for carrying out the Paris regulations. Ignorance may lead them to bind us both hand and foot. I believe now sincerely that the future of the industry is destroyed. We may be able to do something in the first season ending June 1st, but I would not send a white crew out after Aug. 31st. They can get no seals outside of the sea, and cannot enter it. The Japan sea offers little relief. The hunting grounds are small and too many schooners render it unprofitable. This year only about nine schooners made good catches there. You see, the season is longer, and it takes a better catch than on this side to equalize the expenses."

"As to the scheme to memorialize the government to purchase our vessels and outfits I do not think there is much in it. What can they expect from a government not in sympathy with them. The government, in full possession of all the facts, has placed us in this predicament. What nonsense to expect them to extricate us. And then the situation is no darker than when, early in the dispute, our vessels were seized and confiscated and our men thrust into jail.

"A great deal has been said to the effect that the regulations cannot be enforced and that it would take an 'Armada' to do so This is all wrong. The captains will be required to keep a carefully prepared log showing the number and sex of the seals killed, with the place they were taken. Now with 25 men on a schooner it will be out of the question to do anything wrong, for the licenses will be more valuable than the schooner. And then, again, as they have gone thus far they can name a dozen points of rendezvous on the coast and make the schooners report when the close season arrives."

Capt. Cox uttered the sentiments of a dozen others in what he said as to the asinine genius of young Mr. Tupper.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I understood that Capt. Cox denied ever having had that interview.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I saw that statement made some time afterwards, but it is only too true that he did have such an interview, and expressed himself in the manner I have mentioned. Probably he got fresh light on the subject and thought it was not good policy for him to reiterate such views in public. I believe firmly that the hon. gentlemen who represented Canada at that arbitration, namely, the right honourable the Premier of this country, and Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, Dr. Dawson, and the learned Dr. Robinson, the lawyer, did everything that lay in their power for Canada, yet it is my firm conviction that they were completely overshadowed by the members representing the mother country. Most of us are probably aware of the fact that the first seizure took place in August, 1886. Three vessels were seized at distances of from 60 to 130 miles from the Pribylov Islands. They were there plying their legitimate avocation, and without any warning or pretext they were seized by the United States revenue cutters and run into United States ports, the captains and crews were imprisoned, and the vessels' cargoes confiscated. The same thing occurred, notwithstanding the remonstrances made by the British Government through the British Minister in Washington, in July and August of the following year. Remonstrances still continued to be made by the home Government, I believe, but little or no attention appears to have been paid to their representation. In 1888, fortunately for the British Columbia sealers, no seizures were made, but the following year, 1889, five more vessels were seized in Behring Sea and treated like the former ones, and three others were peremptorily ordered out of Behring Sea. It may appear rather strange that while these acts of piracy (for I cannot consider them in any other light) were being perpetrated on the high seas and in Behring Sea on British vessels, British men of war should be lying quiet at anchor in Esquimalt Harbour only 600 or 700 miles distant from where these outrages took place. I could not help this afternoon endorsing the sentiments expressed by the hon. the senior member from Halifax, when he said that the United States, or any other nation, would not have tried to take such a position as that 70 years ago. If the British Government had stood firm to their guns and demanded a cessation of these unlawful acts of the United States Government, because I suppose it was on the authority of the United States Government that these seizures were made, I firmly believe that Brother Jonathan would soon have stopped his nonsense, and that not one shot would ever have been exchanged between the two nations. I cannot conceive of anything that would produce such a state of affairs as to bring on a war between the United States and Great Britain. It only requires firmness; and in my judgment where the United States took advantage of the position was this, that unfortunately for nearly the whole of the last century every time Great Britain and the United States arbitrated over any matter or interests affecting Canada, such interests were sacrificed. Take the state of Maine, for intance—we lost a very large portion of that state and a winter port. Look again in the North-west, and the North-west angle of the Lake of the Woods. Take again on the Pacific shore; what properly belonged to us and ought to have been a portion of this great Dominion of Canada was sacrificed. Canada ought to have extended, not merely to the 49th parallel, but down to the Columbia River. Three large and important states have been carved out of that territory which we gave up to a species of bluffing practised by the United State on the people of Canada. I might refer also to an island in the Gulf of Georgia, the important island of San Juan, the last portion of territory wrested from the Dominion Government. All these concessions made from time to time were due, in the first instance, in the early days of Canada to the gross stupidity of English statesmen. The policy was continued by men of undoubted ability, such as were on this last arbitration, but whose interest and feeling and sentiments were British and not Canadian. This leads me to make the statement that I sincerely hope and trust that the late arbitration held in Paris will be the last that ever will be held when Canadian and United States interests are under consideration and where English statesmen will have a seat on the board. There is one noticeable incident in the history of this country, and it is the only one, where Canadians were permitted to deal wholly and solely with the interest of their country and that is the only time in the history of this country when Canada did not take a second place but a first place. I refer to the Halifax award, and while I yield to no man, in this room or out of it, in my loyalty to my Queen and to Great Britain, yet above all I am a Canadian, and Canadian interests shall always receive my deepest and warmest support, even at the expense of Great Britain if it comes to that. Holding these views, I sincerely hope that Canada in the future, as she did once in the case to which I have referred—the Halifax award—will have the opportunity of managing her own affairs. When the Halifax award was under consideration, very considerable pressure was brought to bear on that good and honourable man, gone to his rest a year or two ago, Alexander Mackenzie, heavy pressure was brought to bear on him by the Imperial Government that an Imperial officer should have the guidance of Canadian affairs, but like a true patriot that he was, ever having the interests of this country at heart, he refused stubbornly, and the Imperial Government yielded; and I have no doubt the Canadian Government, if they would pursue the same course now, would attain the same result. This is not a party question; it is most foreign from my thoughts to introduce anything of a party nature in connection with this question. I sincerely hope and trust, from this time forward, whether it be a Liberal Government or a Conservative Government that is in power, that if any friction should arise and arbitration be decided upon between this country and the United States, that Canada will insist upon managing her own affairs, because Canadians are quite capable of taking care of themselves, even against the shrewd and wily American, and I trust that this is the last we shall have of similarly constituted commissions. I forgot to draw the attention of the House to a matter which, however, has been mentioned once or twice by previous speakers, and that is that these regulations, if enforced, will only be binding and obligatory on two nations, namely, Great Britain and the United States. All others, European, Central American and Asiatic nations, flying whatever flag they may, can come in and fish right up to the territorial waters—up to the three-mile limit, and neither Great Britain nor the United States can expel them from these waters. No might will ever be exercised in that relation, so that the decision of this tribunal, while it disposed of the monstrous pretensions put forward by the United States, is not for the benefit of Great Britain and its colonies, but for the benefit of all the world.

We may put whatever construction we please on this arbitration, but as the New York Herald has very aptly put it—Great Britain has all the honour and glory, the United States has all the material advantages. Great Britain got the shadow, the United States the substance. It was all the material substance that she was after, and the award and regulations have given it to the United States. I cannot believe for a moment that the late Mr. Blaine, or his successors in office, were for one moment serious when they put forth their monstrous claims to the exclusive right and jurisdiction in the Behring Sea, but I suppose they came to the conclusion that unless they asked a great deal they would get but very little. There is just another observation or two that I desire to make before I sit down, and it is with respect to some remarks that first fell from the talented hon. gentleman who moved this Address. It was in speaking of the prosperity we enjoy as compared with the condition of the neighbouring republic. He and others attributed the depression in the United States to the silver question and their insecure system of banking. There can be no doubt the silver question was a very important factor in bringing about the crisis in the United States, and it goes without saying that our banking system is vastly superior to that of the neighbouring country. I believe it is equal, probably, to any banking system in the world. While I say that, yet I am one of those who believe that it is not perfect but can be still further improved, but there are other and more important causes that led to the terrible financial crisis in the United States, and which we suffer from more or less. I attribute it wholly and solely to the high protective tariff of that country. Up to 1872 the United States collected $13,000,000 from duties on tea alone. The revenue of the United States was increasing so rapidly that an enormous surplus was declared every year. To protect the favoured manufacturers at the expense of the great mass of the taxpayers hundreds of millions were unjustly taken, yes, stolen from the people and deposited in the treasury. The enormous accumulation became so great that the Government had to devise ways and means to dispose of it. As I have already stated, the first step taken in that direction was to take the duty off tea which amounted to $13,000,000 annually. Speaking of tea, I would remind this House of the fact, and I have no doubt the leader of the House is fully aware of it, that in the Antipodes which he visited last year, the Australians are the greatest consumers of tea in the world. They consume per head no less than 8·14 pounds of tea. Great Britian comes second with 4·90 pounds, Canada stands third with 4·65 pounds, and the United States 1·33 pounds. The revenue collected in 1890, according to the Statesman's Year Book, in Great Britain on tea alone amounted to $23,000,000. Canada retained the duty on tea until 1881 or 1882, and collected a revenue of about $900,000. Although the Government professes to admire British statesmen and follow British precedents, yet, in this instance, they preferred to copy from Washington rather than from Westminster, and placed tea on the free list, which I venture to say was a mistake. Tea is a luxury and not a necessary of life and ought to be taxed. To remove all duties from actual necessaries, to lighten the burdens of the toiling masses should be the main object and aim of all humane and patriotic governments. Going back to the United States, to show the causes of the financial crisis of that country, their pension list in 1873 only amounted to $29,000,000. In 1883, ten years after, it had increased to the enormous sum of $56,000,000. In 1893 it reached no less a sum than $159,000,000—$130,000,000 of an increase in the annual charge for the pension list,—pensions created by circumstances which had occurred 30 years before that. It went on increasing at an enormous rate, notwithstanding that all those who were entitled to pensions and for whom they were originally intended had passed away. It was, I venture to say, the greatest swindle ever perpetrated by a Government claiming to represent the people. That was done in order to get rid of the enormous surplus that was accumulating under a protective tariff and which rendered such a condition of things possible. Such a condition of things is certain to overtake us unless we abandon the principle of protection.

The Sherman Silver Bill became law in 1890. It provided for the purchase of $50,000,000 worth of silver, which was to be bought at a dollar an ounce, when its commercial value was only from 60 to 70 cents per ounce. The promoters of the bill had a three-fold object in view—first to dispose of $50,000,000 worth of surplus, and secondly to buy the political support of the great silver-producing states, and thirdly, to perpetuate themselves in office. The value of silver, owing to the enormous production in the United States and in Central and South America, increased to such an extent that the commercial value of silver went down, until a few days ago I saw a quotation from the English market where it had got down to 53c. per oz., and I am informed that even in Toronto there is quite a considerable amount of counterfeit silver coin in circulation. That coin is composed of pure silver, very much purer than the silver we have in circulation—the intrinsic value of it is much greater, though of course it has not the authority of law.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Do you mean United States silver?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I mean Canadian silver.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I never heard of any counterfeit silver there.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It was certainly reported in the British Columbia papers.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—There is nothing at all about it there.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It is quite reasonable. You can buy silver at say 60c. an ounce; if you can coin it and pass it off as a dollar, it is a very profitable business.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—They are not so green up there.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Perhaps not. That aroused the people of the United States six years ago to such an extent that the aggregate vote cast in the presidential election was in favour of Cleveland, although he failed to obtain a majority in the electoral college. To show that it was not a spasmodic act of the people of the United States, they emphatically declared in favour of a reduction of the tariff, and Cleveland was elected on that issue four years later. The House of Representatives is largely in favour of a revenue tariff, but unfortunately, as was remarked by the leader of the Opposition, a few members, no doubt largely engaged in manufacturing and belonging to the Democratic party, have very materially altered the Wilson Bill, and it is not the same measure that it was when it went from the Lower House to the Senate. I am very sorry indeed that it has been so changed. The declaration of a majority of the people of the United States six years ago, and the unmistakable majority given in favour of revising the tariff two years ago, unsettled commerce in the United States. Not knowing what changes would be made in the tariff, the manufacturers and commercial men have been very chary indeed of entering extensively either into manufacturing or importing. The trying ordeal through which the United States, is now passing, can without doubt he directly traced to the evils of a high protective tariff. I say let us take warning from their sad experience ere it is too late.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Is the Wilson Bill, as it went to the Senate, higher or lower than the Canadian tariff?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The Canadian tariff can be called a 35 per cent tariff.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Taking the average it is about that. The Mackenzie tariff was 17½ per cent. The United States tariff, as it stands at the present time, is 49 per cent, but as the bill came from the House of Representatives it was only a 35 per cent tariff, and although the alterations made in it in the Senate have been very extensive, yet on the whole they have reduced it, I think, to 34 per cent.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman, in making this statement, include all the goods imported, or merely the dutiable goods?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The dutiable goods only, not the free. I must congratulate the government that they are about to revise the tariff, and I sincerely hope that they will reduce it to a much lower point than it is at present—that they will raise the excise duties of this country, and lower the customs duties. A short time ago I had occasion to look into the excise and customs duties of 1879—the last year of the Mackenzie administration, and compare them with the duties of 1890. I found that the customs revenue for the fiscal year 1879, when the Mackenzie policy was still in force—under a 17½ per cent tariff—was $12,000,000. In 1890 they were $23,900,000—almost double. I found that the excise duties in 1879 amounted to $5,400,000. I found that in 1890 they had only increased to $7,700,000, an increase of only $2,300,000 not 50 per cent, whereas the increase in customs was nearly 100 per cent.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Do you want free liquor?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—No, I do not. I am not a teetotaller; I am not an extremist on that subject, but I say this: I think the tariff ought to be framed in such a way that it would bear heavily on the luxuries, and not on the actual necessaries of life.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Quite right.

Hon Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—That is the reason why the English tariff has been so framed, and I suppose the hon. gentleman is perfectly aware of the fact that the revenue of England is in round figures $450,000,000.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is the worst tariff in the world for the poor.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—One half of that enormous sum is derived from excise duties, on spirit in its different forms, from tobacco, duties on tea, raisins and coffee—half the English revenue is derived from those articles—$225,000,000 in round figures.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Within the last few years the tariff has been materially raised upon imported spirit, and the excise duties have been increased. If you make the duties any higher you offer an incentive to smugglers.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It is not keeping pace with the customs. The customs have been increased very much more than the excise. If it had been increased at the same rate, we would have collected $10,000,000 instead of $7,000,000 from excise.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentleman's deduction is quite right, if the people drank as much, but the relative increase has been quite as much in the excise as in the customs.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The hon. gentleman said he made a calculation and found that the customs duty was about 35 per cent now.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—About that.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What is the present excise duty? It is 700 per cent in some cases.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I crave your indulgence if I address a few remarks to the House at so late an hour. I shall hurry on as fast as possible to come to the points in dispute, but I cannot help joining with the members of this House who have been addressing you before me, in tendering my thanks and congratulations to the two hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address. We have heard them with very great pleasure; they have given us the hope that we will hear them often, and I am sure it will be to our great advantage. I join also briefly in the congratulations expressed upon the choice of the distinguished statesman who represents Her Majesty in this country. We could not have had from the other side one who would take a more active interest in Canadian affairs. We may say to a certain extent that we have a Canadian as Governor General, since a Canadian landlord is at the head of the Government. I will now come to a point upon which the hon. members on the other side of the House exhibit differences of opinion among themselves. The leader of the Opposition has, in a very graceful manner, spoken of the Behring Sea arbitration. He has had words of praise for the distinguished members who represented us there, and he has accepted with a good grace the judgment of the court. It cannot be expected that we could dictate that judgment. We appeared there before a tribunal composed of distinguished men from different countries. England had representatives. There were what might be called neutral representatives furnished by Norway, Italy and France, and we had our representatives there. Perhaps I do not qualify properly the right hon. leader of the Government when I call him our representative in the court, for he was not really a representative. He was there exercising judicial functions. Upon the decision of the legal questions that were brought before the court, I say that we have reason to congratulate ourselves. We carried the majority of the opinions of the learned judges that composed the court. The hon. senior member from Halifax thought that the questions submitted to the tribunal were of little importance. He read the five questions that were referred for decision to the arbitrators, and in his judgment they were so trifling, so plain, that any man of common sense could have come to a speedy decision upon them. This reminds us how easy it is today to discover America, after Columbus discovered it first. It must not be forgotten that those law points, which were so simple and plain that any man of common sense could have pronounced upon them, were argued during three months by the counsel for the United States and the counsel that represented the Canadian interests before the court, and then it took several weeks for the arbitrators to come to a decision. But of course we had not the advantage of that speedy justice that the hon. member from Halifax could have given us on such an important question. The questions were more serious than one would believe at first. Of course some of the contentions of the United States, as put at first, could not be supported. Their first contention was that Behring Sea was a closed sea—that it was all their own, like Lake Michigan—that we had no business to sail there at all, that we could not go in there without their permission. This first contention was decided against the United States. Notwithstanding that, for weeks and weeks they argued to maintain the privileges that a closed sea would have given them. For weeks and weeks they argued that they were the only nation that could have a right to capture seals within Behring Sea. For days, again, they argued that the ukase of the Emperor of Russia in the first quarter of the century, forbidding anybody to hunt in Behring Sea, had acquired by time and practice the force of law, and that the United States in purchasing the rights of Russia had also acquired the exclusive right to hunt and fish in Behring Sea, and that England was bound to accept this law. That was their contention. Upon that point also they were defeated, because it was shown that England had never submitted to the injunctions of the Emperor of Russia, and that a protest had been made in due time by England, although at that time we made very little use of Behring Sea. The hon. gentleman from Halifax also stated that he did not quite understand the wording of the paragraph in the speech referring to differences between England and the United States in relation to the Pacific Ocean. He seems to ignore that the contention of the United States did not apply only to Behring Sea in relation to seal hunting, but that they claimed the seals were their own property (having their principal resort on the Pribylov Islands) and that they had a right to follow them in the wide ocean beyond Behring Sea to the exclusion of all. As to that position again, we had the best of it. It was acknowledged and pronounced by the tribunal that the seals, when they had left the Pribylov Islands, were the property of whoever could catch them. As to the regulations, they were framed by the majority of the tribunal. They were not agreeable, I may say, to any of the claimants before the arbitrators. They are not agreeable to the United States. They are not agreeable to us either, and the right hon. gentleman who happened to be one of the judges representing the interests of Canada declined to sign them. The criticisms that were made of the regulations are fairly illustrated by a cartoon which appeared immediately after they were enacted. There were three parts in it. Brother Jonathan, reading the award and saying "it should be better." John Bull on the other side reading also the award and saying "it might have been worse," and the third part was represented by a seal emerging between the two of them saying "they might have made the close season twelve months." Exception has been taken to the fact that the regulations are binding only on the citizens of the United States and England. It cannot be otherwise. We were the only two parties before the court, and the adjudication of the court only applied to the parties who appeared before them. Of course, it is not binding on Russia, or Japan; they were not in the case. But in the common interest of the industry, a day may come when Russia and Japan will find it to be in their interest to have regulations and act jointly with England and the United States. They may not be the present regulations, which experience may show to be wrong, or not the best that could have been made, and which, in the course of time, may be modified and improved. The hon. gentleman from New Westminster, who addressed this House, read several editorials from the Victoria Colonist criticising the award and the regulations. He might have read just as bitter attacks from the press of the United States, because at the first delivery of the judgment, they were not more satisfied than we were, but time and reflection have brought people to more moderate views. We have been told that the industry of sealing has been completely destroyed by the decision of the arbitrators and especially by the regulations. Now, we must understand that our rights as to sealing were limited. We had no claim on the Pribylov Islands. They were not our property. Therefore, we could not go and slaughter seals on the land. We have lost nothing there. I said that our rights as to sealing were limited: they were limited to the pelagic sealing and that right has been preserved to us, subject to restrictions that apply not only to our people but also to the citizens of the United States. They have the advantage over us it is true, of being the owners of the Pribylov Islands. But we cannot help that. How can we reasonably pretend that we shall dictate what they shall do on their own land? No more than I could make laws against the hon. member for New Westminster to regulate the killing of chickens in his own yard. He is the sole master there—it is his property. In the same way we could not regulate the killing of seals on the Pribylov Islands—it was not Canadian or British property. But I read in the documents, that the Americans are just as keen as we are about the protection of the seals.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—What the sealers of British Columbia complain of is this: that they cannot go out, as they could in the past, two or three or four thousand miles in the Pacific and meet the seals on their way to the Pribylov Islands and kill them on the high seas. We never pretended to any right to go to the Pribylov islands, but we complain that we have been deprived of the right to kill those seals on the high seas.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—We have not been deprived of the privilege of killing seals on the high seas except where the regulations make a close season.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—That is the season.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Then the arbitrators may have made a mistake in the regulations.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We cannot kill prairie chickens in the close season.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They may not have fixed a proper season, but we could not help that. We had better information and we argued before the court that they were not choosing the proper months for a close season. Again, upon this point the Americans are interested also, and when they will have found out that the close season is not at the proper time, undoubtedly they will some day come to a new agreement and alter, very likely, the time of the close season and choose a better one, but as to our right to pelagic sealing on the high seas, we have it just in the same way that the Americans themselves have it. It has been said that the limit around the island should have been only three miles. If it had been so, there was no need whatsoever of an arbitration. The common international law laid it down to be the rule, but this was an exceptional case. The habits of the seal, the way they gather on the Pribylov Islands, the necessity they have to go out for food made it an absolute necessity that they should have a sufficient circuit around the islands to feed in, where nobody could attack them. I stated that we could not dictate to the United States the way they should slaughter the seals on the islands any more than we could make laws to regulate the killing of chickens in our neighbours' yard, but their interest is equal to ours in the preserving of seal life. It is even greater than ours—they have more advantage than we have from the fact that they are the owners of the islands and, so far, all the leases that have been made by the Government of the United States have limited the number of seals to be slaughtered each year. So far they have observed a certain rule in relation to the class of seals to be slaughtered. They do not slaughter the cows, the bulls, nor the pups. They only go for the bachelors, from the age of two to six years. They all gather together on the same ground, and it is from there they drive them to be slaughtered.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What about the old maids?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Since the laws of the seals admit the harem, there are no old maids among the tribe. I shall refer now to a few other points which have been brought before this House. I have heard the leader of the Opposition say that Prince Edward Island had made little progress since it joined the confederation—that her trade had diminished considerably, had in fact been crippled—that her population had not increased and that her sons had left for the United States and elsewhere. My hon. friend the Senator from Lunenburg has given a very satisfactory explanation why in appearance the trade of Prince Edward Island has decreased, and shown that as a matter of fact it has increased. He pointed out that previous to confederation they were doing a foreign trade—a trade that their own blue-book or ours would show, but since then the nature of the trade has necessarily changed. Not being obliged at present to pay long and heavy freights to export abroad, they have a ready market in Canada for everything they produce; and instead of their market being in England, the West Indies, or the United States, it is in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec, where they find ready purchasers for all they have to sell. But this interprovincial trade does not appear in the blue-books. Their trade to a certain extent may be said to have been crippled, not by the fact of their being a portion of Canada, but by the alteration of the tariff in the United States; a thing over which we have not the slightest control. They were shut out from the Boston market by the McKinley tariff, but they were not slow in finding a better and more profitable market—that is when they went into the dairying industry—and it will not be long before they take a leading place in the production of butter and cheese. They have all the necessary elements there for such an industry. They have beautiful fields, fertile soil, a favourable climate for grass and for the growing of everything that is necessary to feed large herds of cattle.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—They are now supplying part of British Columbia with beef and mutton—all that distance—4,000 miles.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I am glad to hear it. As to the increase of their population, it must be remembered that there is not an acre of wild land in Prince Edward Island—not another acre of land available for settlement—every inch of it is taken up. Would it be wise for the farmers, who own on an average 100 acres, to divide their farms into small strips to keep their sons at home? I think it would be a bad policy to do so and that it is better to induce their sons, as they are doing, to go and settle in the North-west and British Columbia rather than cut up their farms.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There are very few of them in the North-west. They mostly go to Boston.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They have gone to Boston, but the hon. gentleman knows that there has been an active agent within the last twelve months to bring every Canadian that went to the United States back to his own country, and that agent is the depression that has fallen upon the republic. Some reference has been made to that part of the Speech from the Throne stating that we should be thankful for the present condition of Canada as compared to the disastrous condition in which other countries are placed, and the opinion has been expressed that our increase of trade during the year was not large enough. Hon. gentlemen will please bear in mind that that paragraph in the Speech from the Throne has in view the relative positions of the United States and Canada. In this country the exports have increased by $4,600,000 and the imports by $1,668,000. The imports for consumption show an increase of $4,726,000 and the aggregate trade of Canada an increase of $6,269,000 over 1892. What is the position of the United States? Whereas in 1892 their exports were $1,030,000,000, in 1893 their exports were $847,000,000, an enormous decrease in one year of $182,600,000. True, in their imports they have an increase over the previous year of $38,998,000; but on the aggregate trade of the United States there remains a decrease of $143,614,000. It may be interesting to the House to know in what special items the decrease took place. You will be astonished when you hear that in the exports of their agricultural products last year, there was a decrease of $183,945,000. Had the silver question, which was pointed out to be the cause of the present crisis in the United States, anything to do with that? Had the silver question anything to do with making their lands lose their productiveness? Had the silver question anything to do in reducing the production of the farm, for that decrease is notably in cattle, hogs, prepared meats, ham, bacon, and also in grain? Now what could the silver question have had to do with that?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Or the tariff?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Why not acknowledge at once that excessive protection has knocked the bottom out of the United States?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The tariff had nothing whatever to do with it. When they wished to send the produce of the farm abroad, there was nothing to prevent them from doing so and still they had the decrease that I have mentioned. In mining they also had a decrease of $692,000; in productions of the forest they had an increase, a small one, hardly noticeable, $169,000; the same in reference to fisheries, $137,000; miscellaneous an increase of $97,000. But what will surprise every one in this House, I believe, is that they had a decrease in manufactures last year to the extent of $487,000. It has been claimed that protection knocked the bottom out of their trade. How could protection reduce their manufacturing and exporting power? There is a lesson for us in this, if we compare the condition of Canada on the very same articles. The domestic exports of Canada in agriculture, in which the United States have had an enormous decrease, show an increase of $3,077,000. In the productions of the forest they had a small increase of $169,000, we had the enormous increase of $4,078,000. In manufactures where they had a decrease of $487,000, we had an increase of $652,000. Wherever the United States have been deficient in their exports last year we have an increase, so that we may reasonably come to the conclusion that our efforts in trade are so active and so great that we are shoving them out of the foreign markets. In butter and cheese they are going down all the time in quality and quantity while we are rising in proportion. Last year we exported to the value of $13,407,000 worth of cheese; the United States only $7,624,000. We now supply to England 50 per cent of the cheese she imports. I might draw the attention of this honourable House to the fact that perhaps we have reached the maximum of our exports in cheese, and that in the future the exertions of our farmers should be directed towards the production and exportation of butter. The quantity of butter we export to Great Britain is insignificant compared with what we should export. Great care, however, should be taken to maintain the high standard of our cheese. I have often heard, and I have more frequently read in the Liberal press that our natural market is the United States. In my opinion nature has not willed it so, from the fact that the portions of the United States that are most productive and that are adjacent to Canada produce exactly what we produce ourselves. We are their competitors in the sale of cattle, sheep, hogs and breadstuffs. Our market is abroad, in countries which do not grow in sufficient quantities the staples we export, not in a country which produces exactly and in abundance what we raise ourselves. This is demonstrated by the following figures: We exported last year to the British empire, that is to Great Britain and English colonies, $44,288,000 worth of our farm products, while to all other countries, including the United States and the continent of Europe, the exports of the same products amounted only to $9,502,000.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—A free trade market.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It matters not how that market is called, as long as we can reap from it good sound sovereigns. It is often said that we have not, in Canada, that energy and enterprise that we see in our neighbours in the United States. That they are better traders than we are, better manufacturers, and that everything would be turned into silver and gold and into milk and honey, if we had commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, and I do not know what else—annexation under the veil of those denominations—but we are far from it and never more so than to-day.

The sentiment of the people of the Dominion of Canada, and I have had the opportunity of witnessing it from Victoria to Prince Edward Island, is completely opposed to it. I have not met a good citizen who was in favour of any change in the present relations existing between England and Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What about the recent Governor of the North-west Territories?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The ex-Governor of the North-west Territories has written a pamphlet, which is in opposition to the feelings of the people of the province of Quebec, from which he has been absent for five years. Let me point out to the House that when the Governor General of Canada travels out of Ottawa, there is not a city in the whole Dominion more enthusiastic, and that shows more courtesy to the representative of the Queen than the old citadel of Quebec, and that is the point from which spreads over the province the true feeling of loyalty. That is the spot where every morning is hoisted at sunrise the British ensign, which only goes down at sunset, according to regulation. If the people were allowed to use their own discretion it would never go down at all. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has referred to this matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You challenged me to name one man. I name one, I can name more.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If you do you will have to go into your own ranks.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know one man in my own ranks.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Of course we know there are men who go into the United States and preach annexation, but the people of the province have passed judgment upon these men and their leaders. Now, I have been called away from my argument. The House must forgive me. I was saying that we are as good manufacturers and as good traders, as good agriculturists, as good producers in Canada, as the people of the United States. The population of the United States in June last was 66,737,000. In C nada it was 4,961,000. The total export trade of the United States was $866,400,000. The total export trade of Canada was $118,564,000. Consequently, the exports of the United States amounted to $13 per head, while those of Canada amounted to $24 per head. I think that shows very clearly that we have nothing to envy in the United States, either in their producing capacity or in their energy or enterprise, when we, to-day, export 85 per cent per capita more than the Americans do. I must apologize to the House for detaining hon. gentlemen so long, but I will close with one remark in reference to the fast line. I was sorry to hear that the interest the Government had taken in the matter had not been fully appreciated, especially by the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Power). He has said that the enterprise would never succeed, that it could never pay, and that the dangers of navigation in coming to the Canadian ports, either in winter to Halifax, or in summer to Quebec, were so great that nobody would invest his money in such an enterprise, and that if he did it would be a failure and a loss. Now, this notion with regard to the navigation of the St. Lawrence being dangerous and difficult, is an erroneous one. It is picked up from a book called the "St. Lawrence Pilot," which gives the sailing regulations of the St. Lawrence and the coast of Nova Scotia, written by Admiral Bayfield, and you must bear in mind when this book was written. The surveys of the St. Lawrence were made from 1828 to 1860, and Admiral Bayfield wrote his book about 1834. He advises masters of ships not to run their vessels any faster up the St. Lawrence than 5 knots an hour. Why? They were sailing ships. They could not prudently go near land. The St. Lawrence was not then provided with light-houses. There were no light-houses in the river proper at all. They were sailing vessels and five miles an hour was half of the speed of any sailing vessel at that time. But now the conditions have changed altogether on the St. Lawrence. When you lose a light over the stern, you have a light in view over the bow, and you can go from light to light. I might say that a careful master might take his ship safely up to Quebec without a pilot; it does often occur. It was also said that 20 knots an hour was a speed which entailed very great danger coming up the gulf. The danger is not greater when the vessel is going 20 knots an hour than when it is going 14 or 15 knots. There are here men of experience in sailing matters, and they will corroborate my statement. You can manage a steamship as safely when steaming 20 knots, than when she is steaming ten knots. The danger of the St. Lawrence is much exaggerated and a thing of the past. The Government, through the Hon. Peter Mitchell and the Minister of Marine who succeeded him, and under the administration of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, have improved the navigation of the coast and River St. Lawrence by means of lights, fog-horns, etc., so that it is as safe to come into our ports as it is to go in to New York. You have to wait for the tide in New York, for large vessels. You have none of these dangers in the St. Lawrence. There is not a spot between the ocean and the port of Quebec where a vessel drawing 27 or 28 feet of water, need stop to wait for the tide. I recollect the time when New York had only side-wheel vessels, while on the St. Lawrence we had vessels with screw propellers, and then we carried the American mails and many American passengers. At present, owing to the fact that they have fast steamers, during seven or eight months in the year they carry from New York every Canadian traveller these fast vessels if we wish to benefit by the mission of my hon. colleague to Australia. It is necessary also for the traffic that we are doing with China, and for the communications that England wishes to have with India. It is claimed that the Canadian Pacific Railway is in favour of that project, but that we should take no interest in it. I think to the contrary. I think the country is bound to do its utmost to see that such a great enterprise as the Canadian Pacific Railway is completed by oceanic fast lines. It is the duty of every government, anxious for the welfare of the country, to do their utmost to foster this project, and I hope the reflections that have been made in this House upon the enterprise, will not have any influence in preventing its success. It has been objected that vessels of that class, to be fast, cannot carry freight in sufficient quantities. That class of vessels is not intended for burdensome freight, but for staples which are most valuable—the condensed products of the farm. The vessels shall be provided with refrigerated storage for the shipment of cheese, butter, fruit and meat, and all perishable goods. That is a class of merchandise that can afford to pay a reasonable freight to be carried speedily across the ocean. Therefore, I hope the enterprise will be a successful one, and will crown the endeavours that have been made for the last twenty years to develop Canada and to bring her into close connection with England, to make her a necessity to the mother country, and to bring her in communication with the other important colonies that lie in the Pacific Ocean. I thank you, gentlemen, for your kind hearing, and I again beg the pardon of the House for having addressed it at such length at this late hour.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL gave notice that he would, to-morrow, move that when the House adjourns it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 27th inst., at three o'clock p.m. He said: I also desire to call the attention of the House to what I think is a little irregularity in the notice given in reference to the rules of the who goes to Europe or that comes back. Why should that be? It is as safe, and over 500 miles shorter, from Quebec than from New York, to reach Liverpool or London. It is safe to assume that when we have this fast line every Canadian traveller, and a large number of Americans, will take advantage of it. We shall have the Pacific traffic also to come over this line. It is really a necessity that we should have House. After consideration, I ask the House to discharge the notice I have given and instead thereof I give notice that I will, to-morrow, move

That the Draft Rules and Standing Orders submitted by the Special Committee appointed, last session, to consider and revise, or add to, the Rules, Orders and Forms of Proceeding of the Senate, be referred, for further consideration to a Special Committee to consist of the Hon. Messieurs Allan, Bellerose, Dickey, Lougheed, Macdonald (P.E.I.), Macdonald (Victoria), Miller, Pelletier, Power, Scott, and the mover, with power to report from time to time.

This is the same committee as last year, with the exception of Mr. Howlan. I substitute Mr. Macdonald of P. E. I. for him. My reason for taking this course is simply this: there is a rule that anything which is before the House to be considered, all business, drops at the end of each session, and the suggestions of the committee, which were presented last year, although the journals say that they were adopted, were not, as another resolution follows it, referring the subject to either a committee of the House, or the consideration of the House,—I am not sure which. But by this mode it will keep the records of the Senate correct. I ask the consent of the House to the course I propose to adopt as the most regular, and one which will not produce any delay. The committee can meet, if they like, pro forma and make their report an hour afterwards, unless they desire to reconsider, which I presume they do not. Then the House can take up the matter.

The Senate adjourned at 11 o'clock p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, March 21st, 1894.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I would ask leave to substitute for the motion, which I gave yesterday, the following. I think the one which I gave yesterday was equally irregular with the one of which I gave notice two or three days ago. In order to rectify it, I will commence de novo and move for the appointment of a committee to whom shall be referred the rules of the House, and the committee can report to the House whenever they find it convenient to do so. With the consent of the House, I move that the following motion be adopted presently:—

That a Special Committee be appointed to consider and revise, or add to the Rules, Orders and Forms of Proceeding of the Senate, and that such Committee do consist of the Hon. Messieurs Allan, Dickey, Miller, Power, Pelletier, Bellerose, Scott, Macdonald (Victoria), Macdonald (P.E.I.), Lougheed, and the mover, with power to report from time to time.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have another motion to which I ask the unanimous consent of the House. It is with reference to the reception of the petitions for private Bills. The time would expire before the meeting of the House next week and in order that those who have petitions to present, may have the full time allotted them to present the petitions, I will, with the consent of the House, move the adoption of the following motion:—

That the time limited for receiving petitions for Private Bills which expires on Saturday, the twenty-fourth instant, be extended to Thursday, the fifth day of April next; and that the time limited for presenting Private Bills which expires on Thursday, the twenty-ninth instant, be extended to Thursday, the twelfth day of April next.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that when the House adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday next at 8 p.m.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION ADOPTED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech, on the opening of the Fourth Session of the Seventh Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON said: I must premise my remarks by uniting with the hon. leader of the House and the mover and seconder in the regrets they expressed at the loss that this House had sustained since we last met in the death of Sir John Abbott, the Hon. Mr. Boyd, the Hon. Mr. Montgomery, and I regret to say only the night before last, the death of the Hon. Mr. Botsford. We can all sympathize with the families of these gentlemen who have departed and the bereavements they have sustained. It is a matter of congratulation for us to know the fact that the late Mr. Botsford who only the night before last departed, as the hon. member from Cumberland has told us, attained his 91st year as a Canadian. He was born in New Brunswick, and was Speaker of the Legislative Assembly and was for 60 years a representative of the public life of Canada, and never missed a session. His father, his grandfather and he himself had been Speaker of the Legislative Assembly of his province, New Brunswick. I think it is worthy of note to draw attention to this fact at a time when there are people looking with lukewarmness upon the value of the Canadian Senate, and when we realize what hon. gentlemen like Mr. Botsford, Mr. Montgomery, Sir John Abbott and others who are and have been active members of our honourable House: I say the country would be losers to be deprived of the benefit of the experience, independence, uprightness, patriotism and loyalty of such men, who in their legislative capacity are of material assistance in perfecting the laws. I have much pleasure in congratulating the Government upon the appointment of our hon. friend of Prince Edward Island, the mover of the Address, and also in complimenting him upon the manner in which he presented the views of the Government to this honourable House, and I also compliment the seconder of the Address. He has shown himself in the past to be a man of few words, but the manner in which he expressed himself showed he thinks a great deal. We regret the loss of our late Governor General, Lord Stanley, and Lady Stanley who have gone and have been replaced by another Governor General. Lord Stanley's administration during the past five years will always be noted as the period in which the Behring Sea arbitration was initiated and brought to a successful conclusion with our American cousins. For that I think Lord Stanley is to be congratulated. I only trust that the term of office of Lord and Lady Aberdeen may be signalized by some event such as the passage of free trade in Canada. There are five years to discuss the question in and he has those five years ahead of him, but before he leaves I hope he will see that solid bond of sympathy that now exists still further cemented between Canada and Great Britain on the intelligent basis of free trade. Speaking of the Behring Sea arbitration in connection with Lord Stanley's name I cannot agree, I am sorry to say, with those gentlemen who have criticised it adversely. I think that the Behring Sea arbitration has been brought to a successful conclusion and upon a reasonable basis for the country. The hon. member from New Westminster last night read a great many columns of newspaper articles from United States and Canadian newspapers, in order to show that both amongst United States and Canadian seal fishermen the arbitration was unpopular and considered unjust. The principle of arbitration was concluded for the purpose of protecting seal life and preserving to the world at large the trade and commerce that spring from the protection of a valuable fur animal such as the seal is, and what is nobody's property is sure to go to destruction. We had a noticeable instance of that in the North-west. The buffalo, a most valuable article of food and commerce, has been entirely destroyed simply owing to the jealousy and greed of the people living to the south of the boundary line, and of those living north of the boundary line thirty years ago. The buffalo, which at that time, numbered hundreds of thousands and even millions in the North-west Territory thirty and forty years ago, is to-day extinct. They were corralled and driven into gulleys and slaughtered wholesale for their hides which were then only worth a dollar apiece—hides which to-day would bring $10 and $20 apiece, while the carcasses would be available for food. That is a sample of what might take place with the seal fisheries if due obligations were not entered into to protect the value of the commerce that can be brought into existence through the preservation of those animals. It is natural of course that those people who live close to the seal fisheries should feel they have inherent rights and that they are deprived of those rights to a certain extent, but it is a protection which is in the interests of the people of British Columbia. If you adopt free trade you will largely divert the benefits of the seal fisheries no matter whether the furs ultimately find a market in the United States or London, or wherever it may be, to Vancouver and Victoria, because they are naturally situated for the furnishing of the fleets engaged in those seal fisheries. We have seen in the south seas the annihilation of the fur seal which used to be a valuable article of commerce—in the Falkland Islands, off the coast of South America, and the islands lying near New Zealand were the home of the seal. It used to be a profitable occupation to hunt them there, but they are decimated owing to their habits, which render them an easy prey to the destructive genius of man, and are destroyed for want of proper protection, and the same result would overtake the seal fisheries in Behring Sea, if this international arbitration had not been entered into. We have also to congratulate ourselves upon having united with the Government of Great Britain in bringing before the world the principle of arbitration as the settlement of a question that would, as hon. gentlemen stated yesterday, have been productive of war fifty or seventy years ago. It is to the honour of Canada and the honour of the United States that that principle has been so successfully brought out in the present arbitration between the two most interested parties. And while it was an Imperial question, the conduct of it was assigned to Canadian statesmen under the Imperial prestige.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We have to trust to the honour of the Government of the United States in carrying out the principles of the arbitration owing to the power they exercise over the seal life, through their territorial rights which have been respected: that I think may be relied on. To that end all the arbitrators recommended co-operation in the regulations of the shore life of the seal, and if the Imperial Government would continue negotiations to that end it would be to the advantage of all. For these reasons it is worthy of more than a mere passing notice in the discussion of an address in reply to a Speech from the Throne. I might add further, in order to strengthen the case and in order to show that it is in accord with public opinion, that in our great North-west Territories we have some very valuable animals, notably the prairie chicken. We take the most stringent means to protect them. There is the great open prairie and the prairie chickens are flying wild and are anybody's property, but the people support the Government and aid one another in their protection because they are valuable to the population, and the people desire that they shall not be totally destroyed simply because it is nobody's business to look after them. I would like to congratulate the Government also on the success that has attended the many exploring expeditions—notably during the past year, the expedition of Mr. Tyrrell to our northern territory and that of Mr. Low to the coast of Labrador, both of whom reached points on Hudson Bay. These explorations are of inestimable benefit in bringing to light such articles of commerce and waterways as may exist in our country but which lie hidden from view. It is through the intrepidity and enterprise of such men as Mr. Tyrrell and Mr. Low, Dr. Dawson, Mr. Ogilvie and others that we are able to ascertain what resources we possess in distant parts of our territory which is so extensive. It is a matter of satisfaction that we have men in our service to send forth, men who are capable of going through the hardships which exist in penetrating such distant regions through such great difficulties as meet them on their way in northern latitudes. The World's Fair is also a matter of congratulation to the country and to the Government in the success that Canada has met with. I am sorry that the Hon. Minister of Agriculture is not in his place. I did intend to express my regrets that, instead of confining our building to offices, he did not put up a building large enough to contain products of Canada to be shown as a whole from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in the face of the enormous assemblage of people that went there this summer. It was an opportunity for advertising the country that I think was lost, and would have had a great effect as a supplement to the individual exhibits in the World's Fair buildings. In the province of Manitoba the Provincial Government felt that they had such a very valuable collection of agricultural and other products to exhibit to the world at the fair that the space allotted to them, as a small population, was not sufficient for them, and therefore they put up a building themselves in order to show them. Being a province of Canada they were not admitted inside of the fair grounds and therefore they were obliged to build it outside at a considerable expense and at a great loss probably of advertising in consequence of it. Its wisdom led to a great deal of controversy. I only mention this fact because it was open to Canada to put up any building they chose in the fair grounds—while it was forbidden to a province of Canada. Notwithstanding that, the hon. Minister of Agriculture has cause for great satisfaction to feel that in matters pertaining to agriculture Canadians have carried everything before them; for that reason our most successful industry should be the especial care of the Government. With the World's Fair is intimately associated the trade policy of the country. The hon. mover of the Address in reply to the Speech dwells very largely with the trade question. As hon. gentlemen know, I have already upon three or four occasions taken the opportunity of presenting the trade policy of the country in a different light than it has hitherto been placed before hon. gentlemen in this House, and that is from an entirely free trade aspect in opposition to the protective aspect that it has been viewed from for the past fifteen years. I know hon. gentlemen will forgive me for taking up the time in the House in renewing this subject, but one of the great mediums of success in the propagation of any new ideas is to simplify and repeat, and that is what I propose to do so long as I do not exhaust the patience of hon. gentlemen in order to bring to a successful conclusion the question of the advantages as divided between protection and free trade. The hon. leader of this House has given to us a list of the products of Canada which are exported. The wealth of a country is of course gauged by the power it possesses to export a surplus after the people have supplied themselves with all the requirements of life. A farmer's wealth is gauged entirely by the amount he is able to export from his farm after he has supplied his family with what he has produced on it, and so it is with a country. The wealth of a country must be gauged entirely by the exports. The Trade and Navigation Returns show us that we have sent of

The products of the mine...	$ 6,000,000
do of the fisheries.	9,000,000
do of the forests..	23,000,000
Of animals and their products	30,000,000
Of agricultural products....	30,000,000
Of manufactures.....	7,000,000

I have put the figures in round numbers so as not to be tedious, but I wish to point out this, that out of one hundred and eight millions of dollars $7,000,000 are manufactures and $101,000,000, the products of the mines, the forests, agriculture and animals and products and the products of the fisheries—$101,000,000 from these natural resources that we possess are from our soil, our timber and our fisheries. I wish to put it to hon. gentlemen in this House: Can you point out in what way free trade will injure the prospects of the production of any one of these products which amount to $101,000,000, and what is the object of protection? It is to protect the manufacturer and encourage the export of $7,000,000. There is the difference between the two. Free trade will enable the people who are producing from the forest, or the soil, or the fisheries, or the mines to produce cheaper and compete for the sale of those products in the markets of the world better and at more profit, while protection charges them an exorbitant rate in order to encourage or develop and sustain an export of $7,000,000 worth of manufactures. That is the way we have to put it to ourselves, the way we have to realize it, that every one of the 5,000,000 of the people in the country who are residing here and who are producing the $101,000,000 worth of exports that go forth to the markets of the world are all taxed, and what for? In order to encourage the export of $7,000,000 worth of manufactures from the country, which shows only an increase of $1,000,000 during the past year, and only a growth of some two or three million of dollars since protection was instituted, and I verily believe in many of our main manufactures a less number of men are employed in manufacturing in 1891 than in 1881, which can be easily ascertained by the census returns. We see an agitation springing up from one end of Canada to the other for tariff reform. The Government recognize such an agitation, because four members of the Government of Canada have been moving about to ascertain in what way they can reduce the cost and reduce the tariff in order to meet the agitation that they have to face, and the question of course when a change is going to take place is what form shall that change take. Should it go back to the revenue tariff of 1878 or should it be maintained with its protective feature, or should it take the form of commercial life an example of which Great Britain has set us for the past fifty years in which such remarkable results have followed their policy of free trade? I have come to the conclusion, from a study of the question so far as my humble capacity has enabled me to do so, that free trade is adapted to Canada, and will redound quite as largely to the profits and advantages of the people of this country as it did to the people of Great Britain when they adopted it in 1846. The hon. leader of the Government and the mover of the Address have drawn attention to the very satisfactory fact that our trade with Great Britain has increased in late years while it has fallen off with the people of the United States. Well, I say that that is in consequence of free trade. The purchasing power of the people of Great Britain has not fallen away. The purchasing power of the people of the United States under protection has fallen. When you want to get good prices for your products send them to England. If you are satisfied with poor prices you can find them in the United States. Great Britain has not decreased in wealth at all although it may have fallen off in trade. If you send good beef, good mutton, good eggs, cheese or anything else to Great Britain you will find the highest possible price that is to be obtained for them in any portion of the world, but you must only send the best. To what is that owing? That is owing to the purchasing power given to the people of Great Britain who live from one year to another under the free trade policy they have instituted. I say that the falling off of the trade in Great Britain is largely due to the falling off in the importations of raw cotton from the United States, and in consequence of that there is naturally a falling off in the exportation of manufactured cotton. The falling off in the export of cotton is nearly half the falling off of the foreign trade of the United States. It is in articles of that kind that the trade of Great Britain has fallen off, and why has it fallen off? It is simply in consequence of the McKinleyism that attempted to rob the markets of Great Britain for British labour in South American and other markets where they exported their manufactures. The United States wanted, by means of reciprocity treaties, to trade their manufactures off at an increased price in exchange for sugar, coffee and hides produced in those countries and to take away that market from England by reciprocity treaties of discrimination. Fortunately for the people of Great Britain, under free trade their market is so valuable to them that the people of Brazil and other countries would not trade on that basis or under reciprocity treaties which would discriminate against Great Britain. All the same it produced an injurious effect on the trade of Great Britain, and what has been the effect of McKinleyism on the United States? It has reduced the purchasing power of the people of Great Britain for the purchase of the commodities supplied by the United States, and which has during the past year reduced their export by $150,000,000, reduced it to such an unprofitable basis that it is reacting on every agricultural industry in this country such as the prices for our wheat and other large items of our industry. It is not a question that free trade is hampering England or that the bottom has fallen out of free trade in England, which some like to assert—it is that the bottom is falling out of the protected countries that are customers of Great Britain. In the condition of those countries may be found the cause of the falling off of British trade in its exporting and importing power, and not in the principles of free trade. With regard to our exports to Great Britain and the congratulations that have been offered us in consequence of the higher prices we receive there, I observe that our exports to the United Kingdom for cattle are $74 head. I am inclined to think that the exports are swelled somewhat in those prices—that that is not the prices at the point of departure but at the port of arrival in Great Britain—that the export value given to our cattle is the value at Liverpool and not at Montreal. It is open to criticism whether that is a fair exhibit of the value of the exports as conveyed to us in the Trade and Navigation Returns. It is the same way with sheep—the value is $9 a head, the value of eggs 13 cents a dozen, and of cheese 11½ cents per pound. Now are those the prices that our farmers or merchants receive who sent them from Montreal, or are they the prices received in the port of Liverpool? If our export returns are based on that basis then it should be shown that it is so, so that the people of Canada can understand how far the Government of Canada, in giving those returns of the industries of Canada, are incorrect and if so to what extent. I do not say that it is an unfair showing, only I would like to know if the difference between Montreal and Liverpool is included in that return. I know as far as our imports are concerned the Government fix arbitrary values on imports. That may be sound under protection in order to protect the country against false invoices, but I have been told that the Government very frequently raise far above the invoice price of an article at the port in order that the duty may be raised upon the article as it presents itself to the mind of the Customs authorities and as it presents itself to the mind of the manufacturer in whose interest the protective tariff has been designed. If the imports are raised on one hand and the exports raised on the other, it does not present to us, I will not say a true statement of the case, but it should be represented exactly as the facts are in order that we may judge of it correctly. Now, so far as congratulating the House upon the value of the imports and exports to Great Britain, the price of cattle through the exports returns is $74 per head to Great Britain and the value of cattle sent to the United States $25 only. Sheep sent to Great Britain $9 per head, sheep sent to the United States $3.50. The value of eggs sent to Great Britain is 13 cents per dozen and to the United States 11 cents. It is such prices which show the value of a free trade market over a protective market. Here are 65,000,000 people living across the lake or the river, as the case may be, connected with us by the closest ties with transportation facilities and everything else to facilitate trade—65,000,000 of people that are supposed to be exceedingly wealthy as a nation, and yet we are able to get those larger prices from a population living across the ocean with all the difficulty of transport in the way and of unlimited competition interposed—38,000,000 of people under a free trade policy are able to give us those prices so far exceeding the prices that the 65,000,000 of people close to us can give for products. Now, if that is the case, if it presents itself to your mind as it presents itself to my mind, you will not be very long before you can argue out the matter in your own mind to feel and know that in order to give purchasing power to the people of Canada and make trade flow rapidly and vigorously through all the channels of communication we possess, the adoption of a policy of free trade, instead of a policy of restriction, should be followed by the Government of Canada, when they come to change their tariff policy in any direction whatever, and the country will soon realize what the advantages of a policy of that kind will prove to be. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce last night in his speech seemed to congratulate the House upon the success that Canada had met with in the decrease of importations in pork, bacon and ham from the United States. I say that it is no matter of congratulation that we have been able to import less bacon and hams during the past eight or ten years than we were able to do eight or ten years ago. I say the more that we import the better it is for the country. Yes, hon. gentlemen, it is so because you will secure no imports in your country unless there is labour in the country to produce something to export in exchange for them. Trade is not conducted on a basis of money, but on a basis of trade, and if we import 10,000,000 pounds of pork, there has got to be the product of labour, perhaps more profitably employed than in the production of bacon and hams, in order to pay for the importation of those articles. There is a difference between feeding pigs and raising them: protection compels you to raise them, but limits your power to feed to the production of the country. Free trade will enable you to feed or raise, as the farmer may find most profitable. You cannot buy, as an individual, unless you have labour or something that you possess yourself to give in exchange for it. No more can a country import unless they have something to exchange in the products of their labour or the money to pay for it, but, as a matter of fact, the trade of international exchanges is made entirely on a trade basis. The exchange of bullion is of very small dimensions in comparison with the general trade of the country, and, therefore, it is not a matter of congratulation to feel that imports have fallen off in any degree whatever because exports must fall in sympathy. As a matter of profit it is of no advantage. True we are putting on an import duty in order, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, to protect those who are engaged in the industry of producing pork and manufacturing into hams and bacon, but the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce knows perfectly well that the price that is paid for our pork and our bacon and hams is entirely gauged by the export value of the articles, because we export $1,800,000 worth of it to Great Britain, and the United States at the same time exports to Great Britain $30,000,000 worth. Therefore, if Great Britain is the ruling market for the prices in the United States and Canada, where is the benefit to the Canadian producer of the article of pork in consequence of the duty that is imposed upon it? Davis & Sons, of Toronto, are the largest pork packers in Canada, or about the largest; I saw letters over their own signatures stating that they could give no increased prices to the Canadian producers of pork for the manufacture of bacon and hams over and above the export value they get for it in Great Britain; and if that is the case, and I am prepared to take the statement of practical men of that kind to prove to my satisfaction at any rate that such is the case, and therefore as the people of Canada are taxed by the import duties and that the taxation reduces their power to get cheaper bacon, I say an injury is done to the consumers of the country by so doing and that the taxation imposed to encourage that pork industry does not go to the producers but to the curers, as I can show you in other lines of manufacturing. Of course it is very difficult to prove many things in connection with the increased cost given to the necessaries of life through the duties, but there is one item which is largely discussed and has been more largely discussed probably than any other because it is an article that is easily traced through its whole ramifications, and that is the article of coal oil. We can easily ascertain the cost of coal oil to our people in consequence of the duty. I make this statement here, that the protection given to the pork does not go to the producers in consequence of the export value regulating prices, but to the curers. Now, I distinctly say that coal oil is one of those articles by which I can prove my case. For instance, we import 6,000,000 gallons of coal oil from the United States at a cost of $437,000 and we pay duty on that $430,000. The figures are in these Trade and Navigation Returns that cannot be refuted. There is 100 per cent duty on the value of coal oil brought into the country. There is in addition to that 1 cent duty on the cost of the barrels and the inspection as well. Now at Petrolia the oil costs 6½ cents per gallon, so that American oil that is brought to the boundary and sold and delivered at the boundary at 7⅕ cents per gallon is increased to the extent of 7⅕ cents per gallon. What for? To make the people of Canada pay a profit of 7⅕ cents per gallon for what they consume for the benefit of the Petrolia Oil Works. Is there any sense in that? In connection with the Petrolia wells only 347 men are employed both in the production and the refining of the oil. The Minister of Trade and Commerce referred, in tones of exultation, to the barrel and cooperage and all other industries connected with it. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce will look at the census returns he will see that there are fewer coopers employed in Canada to-day than there were in 1881, by 300 men. If that is the case, and I say it is the case, that there are less men working at the cooperage and that there are only 347 men working at the coal oil refineries and wells and that the whole of the 5,000,000 of people in Canada are taxed 7⅕ cents per gallon to produce that result, when we realize that an injustice of that kind prevails, when it is clearly shown that it does exist, should we hesitate for a moment as to the policy the Government should pursue in the question of tariff reform? I say that it is not a revenue tariff that we want, but a sweeping away of every tax on the labour and industry of the country in order to place Canadians in a better position to export to the markets of the world which are infinitely better than the restricted market of 5,000,000 of people to which their power of production is limited. Now, we feel this question of coal oil in Manitoba and the North-west Territories exceedingly, because it is not an increase merely of $7\frac{1}{5}$ cents per gallon there, it is an increase of 19 cents per gallon in consequence of the duty, and I will show you how that is arrived at. The American oil wells compete with the Canadian oil wells. The American oil that comes into Canada is about 6,000,000 gallons. The Canadian oil produced in Canada is about 10,000,000 gallons. The American oil which comes into Canada in competition with Canadian oil is subject to a duty of $7\frac{1}{5}$ cents per gallon, and 1 cent a gallon on the barrel, for inspection a quarter of a cent, that makes $8\frac{1}{2}$ cents paid to the Government for the duty on the oil coming from the United States. The hon. the Finance Minister discovered a hidden tax in the shape of its distribution in tank cars being prohibited—that it cost so much to purchase barrels and to barrel it up, which added to the leakage increased the cost of distribution, and in that he discovered there was a very heavy taxation in addition to the duty, and in the agitation for tariff reform last year he says, I will remove this restriction, but he halted half-way like a good many who are checked when their resolutions are good—and unfortunately there are too many of them who turn from their good resolutions and feeling gratified at the virtue they have shown treat their good resolutions and thus go back to their old ways. That is why I am afraid of half-way measures, and it has proved itself in this instance, because tank cars are only admitted into the city of Winnipeg, the town of Brandon and the town of Portage la Prairie. Anybody in Manitoba and the territories living beyond the range of those places has to submit to the cost of rebarreling and the distribution in barrels. The result is it involves a cost of $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents in transferring from tanks to barrels. That makes 12 cents over and above the cost of the oil in Winnipeg. Then in consequence of this rebarreling taking place there is 2 cents a gallon charged to persons outside of Winnipeg for the local freight. When a car of coal oil comes from the oil wells of the United States it comes through to Winnipeg, a very slight increase in the through rate will carry it through to its destination two or three hundred miles farther, but when its bulk is broken you have to pay a local rate from Winnipeg to Russell, where I live, at a cost of about 2 cents a gallon. Now that makes 14 cents a gallon added to the cost of the coal oil before it gets into the hands of the retail merchants at all. Of course the retail merchant charges his profit on the cost to him of the oil—his legitimate profit on his business. In the west there is so much leakage and heavy insurance that the profits that our retail merchants charge amount to $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent on oil. Therefore to the 14 cents per gallon has to be added the profits that the merchants legitimately charge on handling the goods for us. That is 5 cents, or 19 cents per gallon added to the price of coal oil for every farmer in the province of Manitoba. Is there any justice or right in it? Can you say that I am wrong or any man coming down from the West is wrong to come here and tell the people in Eastern Canada of the injustice and the difficulties that we are labouring under in consequence of a state of affairs of that kind, and that you are labouring under in the East, though not so glaring? Now, when I realized that I had to pay 45 cents a gallon for my coal oil, as I have had to do through the long winters, and that we only get 40 cents a bushel for wheat, and that a bushel of wheat will not pay for a gallon of coal oil, you will understand the difficulties that we labour under in that country which has been developed for the advantage of Canada. We are willing to bear any burdens that may be necessary for the benefit of Canada, but we do not want to be oppressed or unjustly dealt with. I took occasion to write to the Hon. the Finance Minister in order to point out to him—not as a member of this House, but as a private individual, while the Government was considering the tariff—I had just as much right to present my claim or the case of my neighbours as anyone else, and so I wrote and pointed out that we laboured under that difficulty paying 45 cents a gallon for our coal oil and that in any consideration of tariff reform the duty should be removed. So I wrote to the Finance Minister on the 6th of February, representing to him very much what I have represented to you this afternoon. This is his answer:—

OTTAWA, 19th February, 1894.

DEAR SENATOR BOULTON,—I have your letter of late date containing a copy of an article which was to appear in the "Russell Chronicle," and has I suppose already appeared. I am afraid I would scarcely agree with all the points that it contains, but that of course would not prevent me from giving careful attention to all items in the tariff which affect the North-west as well as other parts of Canada. You will find upon inquiry that coal oil can be bought to-day in Winnipeg for from 15 cents to 20 cents, and if that be so, as it is, there seems to me no good reason why it should sell for 45 cents at Russell. Canadian coal oil is being sold now in tanks at Petrolia at 6½ cents per gallon, and can be taken in tanks to any city or town in Canada as far as any restriction imposed by the Government is concerned. There is of course a commercial restriction imposed by small consumption in out-of-the-way places where it would not pay to take oil in tanks either because of the small consumption or for other reasons. You will no doubt have an opportunity this winter of discussing this matter in your own place, and there is no need of us entering into a written controversy on the question.

Yours truly,
(Signed) GEORGE FOSTER.

Hon. Senator Boulton, Shellmouth, Man.

When I received that letter I wrote to the agent of the Standard Oil Company, which is the competitor of the Canadian Oil Company, in order to find out from him the correctness of these figures and to ascertain where the blame rested. This is the reply that I received from him :—

WINNIPEG, MAN., March 7th, 1894.

Hon. Senator Boulton, Brandon.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to the quotation made by Mr. Foster that Canadian oil is being sold at 15 cents in Winnipeg, I have no knowledge of any such price in existence, and as they are our direct competitors it is very likely that if such a price was given we would be very apt to know it. In fact it is hardly possible for any quotation to be made and we not know it. The price of Canadian oil has been undoubtedly reduced to a very wonderful degree during the last six or seven months. For instance, the oil that was sold previous to the first day of September at 28½ cents has been recently reduced to 23½ cents. Take the best grade of Canadian oil which was sold to the dealers up to the 1st September last at 28½ cents it was reduced to the dealers to 23½ cents, and the other brands of Canadian oils in the same proportion. Mr. Gerrie started in to sell oil in Winnipeg by retail at 20 cents and 25 cents on the 1st September, and in order to bear out the statement made last year in Parliament that Canadian oil could be sold in Manitoba retail for 20 cents and 25 cents, Mr. Gerrie was placed in a position to do it. While he was retailing this same oleophene oil at 25 cents at times the merchants buying it by the barrel would pay 26½ cents for it, or 24½ cents in bulk without any package. Mr. Gerrie selling this same grade of oil under the name of Headlight at the retail price of 25 cents per gallon, of course, was not doing it without a profit. He told me himself distinctly that he paid the Imperial Oil Company 20 cents per gallon and 5 per cent discount, equal to 19 cents per gallon, for this same oil in bulk, which would cost the dealer 24½ cents in bulk, or 26½ cents with the barrel.

On the 12th February there was another reduction made on Canadian oil at Winnipeg to 23½, including the barrel, or 22 cents in bulk for oleophene oil. In order to make these prices a little plainer, I beg to inclose you a full price list of both American oils and Canadian oils previous to the 1st September, and the changes which have taken place since. We all know right well why this reduction recently made has been done, that it is simply to bear out the statement thst Canadian oil can now be sold so cheap that there is no necessity to take off the duty from American oils, and that they hoped to work this scheme to a successful issue through Mr. Gerrie. We have had, of course, to lower American oil down as far as possible to meet these prices, in hopes that the reduction of duty would better enable us to do so at the next session of Parliament, but we have strong reasons to believe that the influence that is being brought to bear from Petrolia is very likely to be successful in keeping that duty on.

The quantity used in the country of American oil runs about 16,009 barrels a year, but I cannot say for certain how much the Canadian importers handle, perhaps 10,000 to 12,000 barrels. The people of this country appreciate the best article they can find, and certainly should be supplied with it as cheap as possible to make it, but unfortunately the duty is against us in bringing down the price of oil to the basis it should be sold at; but were the duty removed we could at once place the people of the North-west in the same position as their neighbours across the line, excepting the difference of freight on the costs of their oil. It is claimed by the Government that American importers have been granted the privilege of importing in tank cars, which should make a great reduction in the price of oil. This we grant them, were there not such unreasonable restrictions placed upon that privilege as to destroy the benefit accruing to us from the privilege. These restrictions we have found to be so severe as to become almost prohibitive to the handling of tank cars into the country, as for instance when the tank car arrives (this is now the best facilities they can offer us). The car is first weighed at the railroad depot when it arrives, by the Customs. That, we may say, is all right. We then deposit a marked cheque for the amount of duty called for in the invoice of the car of oil; the car is then permitted to be taken out to our barrelling establishment and warehouse, where we are obliged to draw off every gallon of oil it contains and barrel it up, weigh every barrel separately again, stencil every barrel with the usual marks required by the Inland Revenue; then draw off a sample of this oil and have it tested, and every barrel signed bv the Inland Revenue officials. We are then, as a very great favour, permitted to empty those barrels out by hoisting them up about 10 ft. to the top of the iron tank, and dump them into that tank, to be delivered for the city of Winnipeg trade alone. Immediately after the barrel is emptied, we are required by the law to erase every mark that we have had put on when we filled the barrel from the end of the barrel again (though it may have been marked 15 minutes previous), and necessitates a good deal of extra work at our warehouse, and a good deal of cost to the handling of the oil. A few days ago two tanks arrived that I wanted to use for the city trade, and I went to the Inland Revenue official, brought him out to our warehouse and showed him the whole situation, the tanks having been already weighed by the Customs. I asked him if he could not grant me the privilege of dumping the contents of those two cars directly into our stationary tank, returning the empty tank cars, and having them weighed again by the Customs, and pay duty on all the oil found in the tanks, and also inspection to his department, estimating, if he liked, 42 gallons of oil to the barrel, instead of 50 gallons, which the law allows, but he said "No," he could not do it, but the law must be carried out as it stands, and I then went with him to the Customs Department to see if we could effect some arrangement between the two departments, as the oil had already been weighed by the Customs, which would enable us to avoid the roundabout way of barrelling up all that oil and then emptying it out again in order to comply with the letter of the law. I was told by the Collector of Customs that we could not do anything of the kind, but the law had to be carried out. I do not think that it is the intention of the Government at Ottawa to place such unreasonable obstructions in our way of handling our goods, but it seems to me that the officials are granted a good deal of discretionary power as to the carrying out of the law, and I regret to say that at this port in Winnipeg we find it one of the most difficult ports to do business with perhaps in the Dominion of Canada, if not in the British realm. I have had occasion repeatedly to apply to Ottawa to get possession of tank cars that were held up ten and twelve days awaiting the decision of the officials here as to the mode they would handle the goods, and only did I get permission to carry out the law and barrel up the goods for inspection when they were so instructed from Ottawa. In one case it cost me $13 in telegrams to the authorities at Ottawa to get instructions to the officials at Winnipeg to thus deliver me the goods that were standing on the railroad track. So on the whole I do not see as we could be much worse dealt with than we are at the present time by these restrictions and obstacles in our way of doing business in this country.

Yours truly,

D. WEST, Manager.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS. What letter is that?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON. That is the letter from the agent of the Standard Oil Company at Winnipeg, Mr. D. West. I give it to the House for what it is worth. It is the result of my labours to try and ascertain who is to blame for the price that we have to pay, 45 cents per gallon, for coal oil. Our farmers do not want to have to produce wheat at 40 cents per bushel and have to pay 45 cents a gallon for one of the primest necessities of their life in the North-west. The statement that was made in this letter which I produce to the House was that Mr. Gerrie was put in a position to sell his oil at retail in Winnipeg for a less price than the merchants in the interior could buy it at wholesale. I said that is a serious charge to make and I do not want to produce the letter unless you give me an affidavit as to the conversation which you state took place between you and Mr. Gerrie and I will feel justified in producing that alongside of the letter. This is the affidavit that he furnished me :—

To Wit. }

I, David West, of the city of Winnipeg, and province of Manitoba, do solemnly declare that on the 25th day of September, 1893, in conversation with Mr. Charles Gerrie with reference to the reduced price at which he was retailing coal oil in Winnipeg, he, Mr. Gerrie said to me as follows :—

"I get a rebate of 5 cents per gallon on all the oil I sell. I pay the Imperial Oil Company in full regular market prices for the oil, and last week I received the money for rebate. I am not to know where it comes from, nor is Mr. Sharpe, as it comes from another source."

I asked him "Are you sure of getting this rebate? Have you anything in writing that would hold them to it?" To which he replied "Oh, no, it would not do to put it in writing as in the event of it getting out it would do a great deal of harm, but I receive my money all right and that is all I care."

During the months of December and January Mr. Gerrie showed me the oil he was selling for 25 cents per gallon, and in the latter month I took a sample of the oil known as Oleophene and had it tested by the Inland Revenue officials at Winnipeg, and found the gravity to correspond with oleophene oil gravity. On this oil Mr. Gerrie told me the price to him was 20 cents per gallon with a discount of 5 per cent, and was billed to him as Headlight oil, which is an inferior brand.

The price to the merchants on this Oleophene oil from the 1st of September to the 12th of February was 24½ cents in bulk, and 26½ cents per gallon in the barrel.

That this oil was retailed by Mr. Gerrie for 25 cents per gallon I saw done by the oil being drawn out of a barrel, measured out to the customer and 25 cents in cash paid for it while I was looking on.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

Declared before me at the city of Winnipeg in the province of Manitoba, this tenth day of March, A.D. 1894. } D. WEST.

WM. BEMISH,
A Commr. in B. Q., &c.

I read that to you in order to show what we suffer from in consequence of the duty and in consequence of the efforts of the Imperial Oil Co., which is only an offshoot of the Petrolia Oil Wells to extract from the agricultural population of the west who have in the competitive prices they receive more than they can labour under and suffer from in the North-west—to extract a larger share of profit than the duty accorded to them. It is only the result of a protective policy ; it is a policy of greed and selfishness in order to get as much out of one's neighbour as the neighbour's intelligence or means of self-defence will enable him to do. We have to pay so much for coal oil, one of the great necessities of our life out there, one of the necessities that comes back to us in exchange for the articles we send out, the products of our labour. Every single thing that we purchase with that product of our labour is increased more or less by a similar principle of protection whether it is cotton, coal oil, agricultural implements, wire, nails, wire fencing, binder twine or anything else—everything that we purchase with the product of our labour in the North-west has been thus added to in cost, exactly in the same way though perhaps not in the same proportion as in the case of coal oil, but still excessive amount added to its cost. When you realize that such is the case that when the Government is considering its tariff measure even if they will not abandon that principle of protection which they tell us in this address they are not going to abandon, they at least might punish those men who are shown to be illegitimately fattening on the people of the North-west and they will sweep away every vestige of the protection on the oil industry in Canada. Free trade will not kill it, but it will put it on the same plane as wheat. There are some other things that I should like to refer to in regard to this. Hon. gentlemen will realize that I am introducing a new subject—that I am arguing for a free trade policy from an entirely new standpoint—a standpoint never before presented to the Canadian Parliament, and for that reason I may be pardoned for detaining the House a little longer than is justifiable on an important occasion of this kind when the Government is waiting for the passage of the Address, but I should like to refer to the visit of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to Australia. He told us about the export of agricultural machinery to that country and how proud he was when he was told of the success of the Massey-Harris Co., one of our largest exporters, one of our wealthiest men at the head of an institution that I believe as far as capital is concerned is equal to anything on the continent. He told the House with great pride that the Massey Co. had been able to sell 8,000 machines of one class and another in Australia in competition with the United States manufacturers. Now, there is a valuable market there, I am quite aware, and we may take a just pride that our Minister of Trade and Commerce had gone to Australia in order to view the scene for himself and bring back such intelligence as he could to the people of Canada as to what opportunity did exist there in the opening up of trade with our fellow-subjects in the antipodes, but if we want to open up a trade in agricultural machinery with Australia what is going to enable us to do it—what is going to enable us to compete with Great Britain who sends agricultural machinery there—what is going to enable us to compete with the United States whose agricultural machinery is sent there? Is it putting the people of Canada in a better position to economically manufacture those articles? Adding to the cost of them through heavy duties on other lines of industry is not going to enable us to compete with those two powerful and wealthy countries; but knock off the duties and put the people of Canada in a better position, then it will not be 8,000 machines, but 80,000 and possibly as population increases in Australia, 800,000. What did the United States do to encourage that trade which the hon. gentleman has pointed out as being in existence? In the United States, under the McKinley Bill, the manufacturer gets a rebate of the duties that have entered into the manufacture of agricultural machinery. Every penny that they have to pay on such materials is remitted to them when they export this manufactured article, and in that way they have been able to sell to the people of Australia at a less price than to their customers at home. Why? Because the duties they pay on the article manufactured at home must of necessity increase the cost of manufacturing it. The reduction of duties enables them to sell it at a cheaper rate to the Australian. It is on that very principle that we have to act if we want to export our agricultural machinery.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—What? The paying of the rebate, you mean?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, free trade, rebate on everything. I do not believe in the people of Canada paying money out of their pockets in order to make cheap machinery for Australians or Americans, or for the Argentine Republic or any other nation. These are all competing with us in the production of wheat, and the policy of cheapening the machine for them alone is giving them an unfair advantage over us, but what I do believe in is taking the tax off all the industrial employment of the country in order to make labour compete more successfully with the world at large—in order to sell the product of its labour from Canadian soil and cheapen it for all customers alike. With regard to agricultural machinery, we have seen it stated that the United States proposes to take off the duty which protects their agricultural machinery, and that they are going to throw their market open to Canadian competition, and that the Massey-Harris Co. are going to be at liberty to compete there; but can they compete under existing affairs? Can they compete under a protective tax? No, because every single thing that they require to manufacture their machines with is subject to duties varying from 30 per cent to 40 per cent—their bar iron, their coal oil, their coal—every single thing that they require in manufacturing their machines, and a very large portion of it is imported from the countries where their machines are supposed to go into and compete.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Perhaps the hon. gentleman is not aware that the same system prevails in this country, as in the United States, in reference to a drawback of duties on articles which enter into the manufacture of machinery exported, so that the manufacturers of Canada stand in that respect precisely in the same position as the United States manufacturer who exports.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—So much the worse for the Canadian people; so much the better for the manufacturers. The Canadian people are paying taxes out of their pockets to make the machines cheaper for the American than for the Canadian. That is no better argument than the tu quoque which is so frequently used.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentleman advanced that as an argument in favour of the exportation from the United States, and condemns us for following the same course.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON. I say the United States, in order to compete with England in Australia for the sale of machines, offered a bonus to the manufacturers of the United States to the extent of the duty, and that the rest of the people had to pay for the making of these machines cheaper for the stranger. They were bonused to that extent, and I was merely deducing from that that if it was necessary for the American manufacturers to do that, how much more necessary is it for the Canadian manufacturers to remove the duty off every industrial necessity in the country in order to enable them to reach the Australian or English markets, or any other market in the world, or, in other words, to exchange the restricted market of 5,000,000 people in Canada for the extended markets of the world which can be reached by Canadian labour if they are only placed in a position to do so under the economic conditions of free trade. Supposing you have all your raw material admitted perfectly free—supposing everything you require for your manufactures are admitted perfectly free, and all the labour engaged in the manufacture or production of any articles, whatever it may be, get all the necessaries of life admitted perfectly free—what is to prevent the Canadian labourer from competing with any other labourer, either in Great Britain or anywhere else? What is the disability that he labours under? He is physically strong, he is intelligent and industrious, he has powers of distribution through the channels of communication that we possess and which are unrivalled. He has every facility for the distribution of the products of his labour, either from the farm, mine or factory. At present every industry that we are engaged in, manufacturing, production from the mine, or the forest, or any industry, is increased in the cost of production by 25 per cent through the duty, and if you take off that 25 per cent you will place, it is perfectly evident, every producer and manufacturer in the country at an advantage of 25 per cent over the position he occupies to-day. Hon. gentlemen know very well what 25 per cent means if they had to pay it in the shape of interest on a mortgage or anything at all—that it will very soon ruin them; and when I say 25 per cent I do not wish to make a statement without being able to prove that such is the case. Our imports are $121,000,000. The free goods are $51,000,000, and the dutiable goods $70,000,000. That is the position in which we stand with regard to our imports. On the $70,000,000 of dutiable imports there is $21,000,000 duty collected—that is 31 per cent exactly. That is the average. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce, probably, and others will say there is $51,000,000 of free goods admitted free and therefore it is unfair to charge that this 31 per cent is reduced only to 25 per cent. Hon. gentlemen must understand that of the $51,000,000 of free goods the bulk is raw material for manufacturing purposes, and that while that raw material for manufacturing purposes is admitted free the consumer does not purchase it free of duty as I have shown in the case of coal oil where it bears 100 and 200 per cent to the consumer in Manitoba. So if you take the value of free goods imported in raw material and add it to the dutiable goods, you will find that 25 per cent is added to the cost either through revenue or added price and that my statement is well within the mark. If our agricultural machinery men, or leather men, or manufacturers of any kind or description—I do not care whether they are woollen or cotton or paper or anything else—if they are all manufacturing with 25 per cent taxation resting on their shoulders, can you expect them to get to any extent beyond the boundaries of our own country except with natural products which we posess and which we are not getting the value of as it stands to-day? A man engaged in our nickel mines said to me "if what you say is correct and that we are working under a tax of 25 per cent, if you remove that 25 per cent we would beat the world. The sale of nickel is limited, but working it 25 per cent cheaper would enable us to command the market. At present we are working under difficulties and find extreme difficulty in making profitable sales." Take off that 25 per cent, and there is nothing to prevent Canada multiplying its manufacturing power, utilizing its water privileges, increasing the wealth of the people and the trade and industry of the Dominion. What have both parties always striven for in this country? Has it not been to get reciprocity with the United States? But it has been found that the reciprocity that they are willing to give us is not of a character that we are prepared to accept. The hon. gentleman quoted from Mr. Cards' pamphlet yesterday to show that the people of the United States had no intention to adopt free trade—that that was the conclusion he had come to after travelling through the United States from one end to the other. He found the sentiment among legislators was against free trade. In the United States the people find it difficult to get out of the grasp of protection which permeates all classes, but if we adopt free trade in Canada and admit the products of Great Britain and other portions of the world along our frontier, extending for 4,000 miles from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, it will not be long before the United States will be compelled to adopt free trade also in self-defence, and all will be brought about in a friendly way, and in accordance with the verdict of the people of the United States. There can be no national enmity between the people of the United States and the people of Canada, if the barriers are down, while there can be no doubt that enmity will be aroused if protection is to be perpetuated—if we adopt free trade, and thus place ourselves in an economic condition which possesses superior advantages to their own, we will find that some of the American manufacturers will take advantage of our great resources and capabilities and establish branch factories, in order to utilize our resources. Then we will have an influx of capital and skilled labour. We shall then be able to hold those returning Canadians the Minister of Agriculture spoke of, and find employment for them, we shall attract unemployed capital, and the men who are now developing our resources and helping to place Canada in the front rank, will receive an acquisition to their ranks from the British Isles and the United States. Such men as Massey and E. B. Eddy were citizens of the United States. If we can bring more men of that kind into this country, who adapt themselves to our constitution and to our laws, who possess industrial skill and plenty of capital —are we not going to benefit our country? Is there not the sum of $350,000 paid out in Ottawa annually by Mr. E. B. Eddy, and will not other places be benefited similarly by having other men of his stamp come into the country?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The men you mention did not come in under free trade.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Mr. Eddy came in 40 years ago: but the very moment they supply the requirements of five millions of people, they have to limit the production to the requirements of these five millions. There is room for no more of them. England imports several million dollars worth of paper pulp annually, and not one dollar's worth of that product is sent to England from this country, (and yet paper pulp is produced from one of our natural resources), although there is an opening for it, and why? Because Mr. Eddy is taxed on everything he requires in his manufacture of paper pulp.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Why don't the Americans?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They are labouring under the same disadvantages as we are: as the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the hon. the Minister of Agriculture have told us, their tariff is far above ours.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—They export paper to England.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—A very small quantity.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Mr. Card says so.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The English came to America to manufacture.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—English capital has been attracted of late to the Southern States to develop their natural resources there, and the United States have established factories in England, in order to manufacture in England for the markets of the world. It will bear no argument that the United States are in any better position than England is. Look at the Trade and Navigation returns of both countries—it can be proved that the paper industry has developed enormously because the Americans have been able to come into our forests and take the logs from which paper pulp is manufactured across to their own country perfectly free and under the most favourable conditions for transportation, viz., by way of Lake Superior to their mills in Wisconsin, and they are making paper there, and it is true they have increased their production, but it must be understood that the United States are suffering at the present time from over-production. They can produce in six months all they require for a year. With no outlet for their surplus, a depression in prices and a throwing out of employment results, disastrous alike to capital and labour. We have to face the same depression as existed in 1873. I will not detain the House any longer, although the subject is not an uninteresting one. I thank the House for the patience it has exhibited, and I thank the Government for the consideration which they have shown. As I know that they are anxious to close the debate on the Address, in order to get on with the business of the session, I will relieve the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce from any necessity of replying to my observations, but when he does tackle them he will, I know, discover some knotty points.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think the Behring Sea question is the one which comes most prominently before the House on this occasion. It is one in which I have taken great interest, and I have urged the question on the attention of the Government, and tried to get them to impress it on the English authorities. It must be very gratifying to Canada and to England also that the finding of the court at Paris has settled a very important international question—the question of maritime jurisdiction, and I think a great deal of good has been done in that way. In view of the importance of these questions, I was very much surprised to find an hon. member of this House, a gentleman of ability and astuteness, belittling the matter and intimating that it did not amount to anything. It was simply a question of two and two make four and of the capture of Holland by the Dutch. I think these questions are highly important. They represent the contentions of sixty-five millions of people, backed up by armed force. They are the contentions which have led to the seizure of British property and to the imprisonment of British subjects. Are not these very grave and important questions? They are also the contentions of a nation of people who are not all fools, people who know pretty well what they want and generally manage to get their own way. No question which has been before the country since the Treaty of Washington has been of so much importance as this question submitted to the arbitrators in Paris. My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McInnes) intimated that he approved of the result of the Treaty of Washington, on account, no doubt, of the money paid over by the United States Government, but I may say that that treaty was the result of an application of the same principle as was the treaty recently arrived at in Paris. A board of commissioners were appointed and a Canadian was given a seat on the board. He was the first one ever appointed in connection with the making of a treaty of that kind. I refer to the late Sir John Macdonald. I was a member of the House when the bill was brought in by the Premier, which had for its object the ratification of that treaty, and I recollect very distinctly that there was a howl from end to end of the country; that everything was going to ruin in this country, and the dissatisfaction was general. It may be that this treaty will be another example of the same kind. We cannot say what the results will be at this time. At the time of the Washington Treaty even the friends of the Government complained that we had done a wrong thing, and I recollect that one of the first subjects upon which I spoke in this House was that very treaty, and I am free to say that I did not undertake the task with a very good grace, because the result was not one of which I approved. It now is clear that those who opposed that treaty were wrong and that it really was a benefit to Canada. It brought about peace between the two countries, and no one is inclined now to complain of its provisions. If the arbitration at Paris had stopped at the point of entering upon the task of framing regulations, all would have been well, and if this Government and the Government of the United States had been allowed to arrange their own regulations, things would have been better, but that was not the case. Regulations were suggested by the arbitrators, which I may say have not yet become law, which do not please the Government of this country, and do not please the Government of the United States, and they certainly do not please our people in British Columbia, or indeed the people of any part of Canada. I believe they are now under discussion at Washington by the British Minster there and the Secretary of State for that country, and here I claim the ear of the Ministers, while I suggest the policy to be pursued. While special care should be taken in any modification of the regulations, or in the framing of any of the regulations, that the Americans do not get undue advantage, I would suggest that experts, who know the habits of the seal, should be consulted, and, if any opportunity is presented, to see that regulations are framed with a little more fairness towards Canada and towards British Columbia. If the zone of 60 miles can only be lessened, and if the use of firearms in Behring Sea can be allowed, then the valid objections to the treaty would be overcome. I do not know what may be possible, but I trust that the Government will use the greatest care before assenting to any regulations covering the seal fisheries in the Behring Sea. I myself am not able to say what the close season should be, but I think there should be a close season to prevent the destruction of the seal species. Forty or fifty of our vessels have left British Columbia and have gone to different parts of the ocean, some away down to California, some across to Japan and to different points, but they are all working under a great deal of uncertainty. They have no idea whether these regulations will be enforced or whether the modus vivendi that has prevailed during the past few years will be resorted to or not. They would prefer the modus vivendi which would enable them to use the weapons they have used in the killing of seals. Now, the enforcement of the regulations will be found very cumbersome and expensive, and, in fact, almost impracticable. The Government of England having no direct interest in the matter, would, I think, use every means to avoid the great expense and great trouble and labour incident to the patrol of the Northern Pacific Ocean. What the outcome will be we shall see later on, but at the present time I am firmly of the opinion that the Government of Canada at least should not carry on any patrol of that kind. It would not be worth the expense. It would be cheaper to buy out the sealers at once and give them compensation for the vessels, which would not amount to very much.

Having said so much about Behring Sea and hoping that the Government will weigh what I have said on the subject of the regulations, I wish to say a word about the fast Atlantic service. There can be no question it would be of vast benefit to this country. The bringing of our mails and of a certain class of passengers and of light freight to our shores as quickly as possible would be a great stimulus to the country, and I confess to hearing with surprise the remark of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, who belittled and decried this service. It is quite unaccountable to me, because we all know that one of the matters which all nations hold to be of the highest importance, is the obtaining of rapid communication between foreign countries and their own ports. The hon. gentleman from Halifax asked what benefit such a service would be, what benefit it was to bring mails and passengers a few hours earlier than by ordinary lines. Why, the benefits are enormous. Any one can see the benefits which would accrue. As soon as we establish a line which will carry people comfortably, quickly and safely across the Atlantic, we will have a large travel, and we all know that incoming settlers, even immigrants, bring a great deal of money into the country, but still more would be brought by the wealthy travellers. Even the supplying of food, of fuel and other things required for their immediate consumption on arrival in this country, would be of vast benefit to the city of Halifax. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture speaks of the many passengers who go to Europe by way of New York, and the reason is obvious. They have there the fastest and the finest steamers, making the passage in half the time our steamers do. When we have a line of steamers on an equal footing with those entering the port of New York, we will be able to divert a part of the travel from the United States to Europe, as well as to carry all passengers from Canada. The hon. gentleman from Halifax also said that this was to be an election cry in Nova Scotia. If this is the case, what does it show?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That it is popular there.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)— It shows that the service would be appreciated by the people of Nova Scotia. It shows also that the sentiments of the hon. gentleman are not those of the people of Nova Scotia. It further shows that if the improvement of communication and the opening up of avenues of trade were left to a certain political party, this country would be to-day a terra incognita. The whole of this vast Dominion would be occupied by a few fishing vessels and Indian wigwams. Fortunately, the destinies of this country are in the hands of men who have courage and enterprise, who are full of hope for the future progress of this country, men who intend that Canada shall take a front place.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I do not intend at this late stage of the debate to trespass at any length upon the time of the House, but there were a few remarks which fell from the hon. the senior member for Halifax, about which I should like to say something, and which have been noticed by the preceding speaker. I allude to the illustration which he used, that the volume of traffic by the C. P. R. resembled water passing through a pipe. I cannot think that he really intended it seriously. I think his intention was to confine his remarks particularly to the passenger traffic across the continent. He remarked that he did not see that the results which would accrue from that passenger traffic would amount to any more than a volume of water passing through a pipe. I do not think he could have been serious. There is this difference between the two, that in the one case it is merely water that is passing through the pipe; in the other case, it is the transit of a large number of intelligent men and women over our continent who have their eyes open to the resources of this country of ours, and who will not be silent about these resources, but will publish an account of them wherever they go. It seems to me that were such sentiments as these to receive the endorsement of any large proportion of our people, we should be safe in concluding that, somehow or other we are born out of time, that this country of ours is an anachronism; that her history is an anachronism; that her prosperity is an anachronism, and the prevalence of sentiments of that kind surely would have a tendency to relegate us to mediæval times, with all their dark environment, when the pluck and energy, enterprise and intelligence manifested by our Canadian people were unknown quantities. I cannot think the hon. gentleman is really serious in the illustration, or looked ahead to see what the result of such a conclusion would be. In regard to the Atlantic service, I am very much surprised at his position, coming as he does from Halifax—he asks what difference does it really make if we should have a service that would be 24 hours ahead of any other service? We know that sometimes the most momentous issues depend, not upon 24 hours of time, but on a very few hours: and then again a nation which proposes, as I hope our young nation does (having already taken large strides in that direction) to attain a foremost place in the ranks of nations, must be up with the times and in active communication with the outer world, and it strikes me, hon. gentlemen, that it is a thing of very great importance indeed that we should have a fast Atlantic service, completing the magnificent transport service which we already have across the continent by the Canadian Pacific Railway and across the Pacific Ocean by the fast line to Australia. Our Australian fellow subjects are taking a very deep interest in this matter, and that at least should have a tendency to prove to us that the matter is one of no mean moment. These are the two remarks which fell from the lips of the hon. gentleman, to which I take exception, and for this reason that I wish to disabuse the minds of hon. members of the House of the idea that such sentiments as these prevail to any great extent in the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this House, or in the province of Nova Scotia at large. I feel confident that they do not.

One of the paragraphs of the Speech from the Throne contains the statement that Canada's progress continues with every mark of stability and permanence. I think that is contingent, and I think it would read well if we were to insert what the legal fraternity are accustomed to call a caveat there—adding the words "provided always" that the custody of the interests of this country be retained in the hands of the men who brought her out of comparative obscurity to take the place—the foremost place among the nations of the world which she even now occupies. Her prosperity and advancement are due to their determination not to rest satisfied with present attainments, but to push on still further to the front.

Hon. M. BERNIER—Je demande la permission de prolonger de quelques minutes encore ce débat, malgré qu'il ait duré assez longtemps déjà. Toutes les parties de l'adresse ont été discutées assez longuement. Peu de choses ont cependant été dites touchant la loi de faillite que nous annonce le discours du Trône. J'aimerais à faire quelques suggestions à cet égard. La dernière loi de faillite que nous avons eue était la loi la plus démoralisatrice que j'aie connue. On s'en est aperçu, quoique un peu tard, et elle a été abrogée. Il s'agit de législater de nouveau sur cette importante matière. Pour ma part, j'admets volontiers qu'il y ait des raisons de donner aux négociants des lois qui règlent leurs rapports entre eux. Mais il me paraîtrait juste d'exempter la classe agricole des effets de ces lois. Le cultivateur ne fait pas faillite. Pourquoi en ferions-nous une victime du négociant, qui n'a jamais fait autre chose que de tirer du bénéfice du cultivateur? Il sera nécessaire également de bien définir ce qu'on devra entendre par le mot "négociant." Les définitions de l'ancienne loi étaient trop élastiques. Il est arrivé trop souvent que des individus, criblés de dettes, n'apercevant aucune issue par où s'échapper de l'abîme, sont parvenus à se prévaloir de la loi de faillite, quoique n'étant pas négociants. Les syndics officiels les aidaient en cela. Ils leurs suggéraient de faire un commerce quelconque. Et ces particuliers ou devenaient charretiers, ou se faisaient brocanteurs, marchands de bric-à-brac pendant quelques mois, juste le temps nécessaire pour être considérés comme négociants aux termes de la loi, et finalement, déposaient leur bilan entre les mains du syndic officiel qui les avait si bien instruits. C'était une fraude manifeste, couverte par la loi. Il y a là un écueil à éviter dans la rédaction de la nouvelle loi. Je viens de parler de l'une des roueries auxquelles s'adon-naient les syndics officiels. Il faut aussi signaler ce que l'on pourrait sans exagération appeler les turpitudes de quelques-uns de ces officiers. Ceux-ci avaient établi tout un système d'agents qui se faisaient, pour ainsi dire, les pourvoyeurs des syndics officiels. Ces derniers—il y avait sans doute d'heureuses exceptions—se constituaient eux-mêmes limiers, et pourchassaient les malheureux dont les affaires ne reposaient point sur de solides bases. Ils finissaient par les amener à la faillite. Et si l'on demande quel intérêt les syndics avaient à commettre ces scandaleux abus, il suffira de faire remarquer que leur rémunération consistait dans les percentages qu'ils moissonnaient sur l'actif de la faillite, et dans les honoraires qui leur étaient accordés sur les diverses procédures auxquelles donnait lieu la liquidation. Je sais qu'il faut préposer quelqu'un à l'administration des biens qui composent ce qu'on appelle l'actif et le passif d'un commerçant en déconfiture. Que l'on appelle cet officier, syndic, greffier, liquidateur, ou autrement, peu importe. Mais il importe beaucoup de ne point leur donner un intérêt direct dans les affaires qui tombent entre leurs mains. On devrait leur donner une situation analogue à celles des officiers d'un tribunal. Leur rémunération devrait consister en appointements fixes, et déterminés d'avance. Le système du percentage et des honoraires, est défectueux. L'intérêt du syndic est alléché par ces honoraires, et il administre non pour le profit des créanciers ou pour celui du failli, mais pour son propre bénéfice. Aussi, est-il fréquemment arrivé sous l'ancienne loi que l'actif d'une faillite était absorbé par le syndic, laissant les créanciers en face d'une caisse vide. Il est une autre suggestion que j'exprime mais sans vouloir y mettre plus d'insistance qu'il ne faut : c'est de créer des tribunaux de commerce. Je ne suis pas prêt à dire que l'opinion publique, et le commerce entr'autres, accepteraient volontiers cette suggestion. Mais il me semble que le projet mérite la considération du gouvernement. L'indépendance de ces tribunaux, et celle de leurs officiers, assureraient aux négociants, aux créanciers comme aux faillis, au public lui-même, une liquidation équitable des biens de la faillite, et préviendraient les abus qu'entraînait le système des percentages et des honoraires. Sous l'ancienne loi il fallait au failli, pour obtenir sa décharge, le consentement d'une certaine proportion de ses créanciers, en nombre et en valeur. Je me demande s'il ne vaudrait pas mieux tout laisser à la discrétion des tribunaux. Je conçois fort bien que les créanciers aient des intérêts sérieux à sauvegarder et qu'il ne faille pas les mettre à la merci de leurs débiteurs. Mais du moment que l'on autorise un tribunal à décider sur l'avis d'une majorité des créanciers, en opposition à l'avis de la minorité de ceux-ci, c'est admettre déjà que l'on puisse en certains cas ne point tenir compte des réclamations de quelques-uns des créanciers. Aller plus loin dans cette voie n'est qu'une question de mesure. La loi de faillite elle-même est une dérogation au droit commun. Laisser au tribunal seul la responsabilité de refuser ou d'accorder la décharge au failli ferait disparaître, à mon humble avis, l'un des abus de l'ancienne loi. Sous l'opération de cette dernière, il arrivait neuf fois sur dix, j'oserais dire, que le débiteur, pour obtenir le consentement de quelque créancier, était obligé de faire à celui-ci quelque avantage préférentiel. Il lui promettait, par exemple, de lui payer toute sa créance aussitôt après avoir obtenu sa décharge. Ou bien, il consentait avant de déposer son bilan, des billets pour un montant double ou triple de sa dette réelle. C'était violer l'esprit de la loi, qui mettait tous les créanciers sur le même pied. L'égalité du partage de l'actif n'existait plus. La justice n'était plus observée. Mais ce qu'il y avait de plus grave encore, c'est que le parjure, l'odieux parjure venait sceller les derniers arrangements. Le projet de loi que le gouvernement doit soumettre à la considération du parlement durant cette session, sera conçu de telle façon, j'en ai l'espoir, que les abus que j'ai signalés ne puissent plus se produire avec la même facilité. Si cette nouvelle législation devait ressembler à l'ancienne, il vaudrait mieux ne pas l'adopter, car elle aurait pour effet, comme l'ancienne, de pousser les populations dans la voie de la malhonnêteté commerciale. Notre devoir est au contraire de réagir contre d'aussi déplorables tendances, et de fortifier la conscience du négociant, en lui ouvrant largement les voies de l'honneur, et en le mettant à l'abri, quand il y est engagé, de toutes les séductions qui ne manquent point de le solliciter durant le parcours. Du reste, en tout ceci, ce sont les abus que je poursuis. Ce sont ces abus qui ont soulevé les clameurs contre l'ancienne loi. Que le gouvernement et cette chambre veuillent bien porter leur attention de ce côté, et je n'insisterai pas plus qu'il ne faut sur l'adoption de telles ou telles mesures, pourvu que celles que l'on adoptera nous donne ce que nous recherchons tous.

HARBOUR MASTERS' ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL introduced Bill (A) "An Act to amend the Harbour Masters' Act," and moved that the bill be read the first time. He said: This is simply to make provision in the Act for the appointment of deputy harbour masters. It very often occurs when there is a vacancy that a deputy harbour master is required, and sometimes his appointment lapses before another harbour master can be appointed. It is necessary that the Government should have power to appoint a deputy to act in his stead during his absence.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the first time.

SABLE ISLAND BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL introduced Bill (B) "An Act to amend the Act respecting lighthouses, buoys and beacons, on Sable Island," and moved that it be read the first time. He said: This bill is simply to give power to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to appoint keepers whose salary does not exceed $200. At present no appointment can be made, however small the remuneration attached to it may be, without going to council. It often occurs that men have to be employed temporarily and as a rule it costs more to make the appointment in the way it is done now than if the Minister had the power to make the appointment at once. These men are not on the superannuation list, and no injury can result from giving the Minister power to make these small appointments.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the first time.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER, from the Special Committee appointed to consider and revise or to add to the rules, orders and forms of proceeding of the Senate, presented their first report. He said: Hon. gentlemen have had the draft report in their possession since shortly after the close of last session and the committee appointed this session have made very few changes in the draft, and those not of an important character. Apart from merely verbal changes, there are only three or four. Rule 44, as it stood, conflicted with a previous rule, No. 12, and the committee propose to remove any difficulty by inserting at the beginning of the rule "Notwithstanding anything in rule 12." This is simply to make the meaning clear. Then, in rule 79, paragraph 6, the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, as provided for in the draft, was to consist of 20 Senators; it is recommended that the number be increased to 25. Then, there were certain slight changes made with respect to some of the rules of divorce. In rule 100 a few lines were stricken out, which were repetitions of something in previous rules. Under rule 101, as it appears in the draft, the evidence taken before Divorce Committees was to be printed under the supervision of the clerk of the committee. That was the law clerk, who acts as clerk of the Divorce Committee. The Committee, after due consideration, left that it should not be the work of the law clerk to take charge of the printing of the evidence and the work has been placed under the supervision of the clerk of the journals, who takes the place of the law clerk. Rule 114 has been stricken out as being a repetition in so many words of the previous rule. The last paragraph of rule 113 has been stricken out for the same reason. A slight change has been made in rule 115 to make the meaning clearer. There is no change in the substance of the rule, but a slight change in the phraseology. In rule 121 the last three lines have been stricken out because they were unnecessary and the words "continue to" are stricken out of rule 122. These are the changes which the committee recommend in the draft rules. It is now a matter for the House to decide, whether they shall proceed to deal with this report at once or postpone its consideration to a future day. If it should be thought desirable to proceed at once, we can suspend rules 14 and 18 and adopt the report of the Committee to-day.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I can see no possible objection to acting upon the suggestion which has been made by the hon. member from Halifax. These rules were printed last session and were distributed, I believe, during the recess. There are no material changes, as the hon. gentleman intimates, and more than that, I see by looking at the records that they were actually adopted by the Senate last year and then, at the suggestion of some hon. gentleman, it was considered better to leave them over till this session in order that they might be considered by the members during the recess. That being the case, and the committee having met this morning and gone over them very carefully and made only a few slight alterations, I would suggest to the House to allow the rules to be suspended in order that the report may be adopted at once. I would then ask the Senate to suspend the two rules referred to by the hon. gentleman to enable me to move for a committee to appoint the Standing Committees, who could then meet to-morrow and as soon as possible have the report made by the several committees of the House. I move that rules 14 and 18 of the Senate be suspended, in so far as the same relate to the report of the Standing Committee appointed to consider and revise the rules and orders, and forms of proceedings of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the report be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Another question occurs, to which I direct the attention of the leader of the House. In the hurry of adjourning this morning the Committee recommended that 200 copies of these rules be printed for immediate use. We should have recommended that a certain number of copies be printed in French. We ought to have 50 copies in the French language printed at once. I therefore move that 50 copies be printed in French in addition to the 200 in English.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Carrying out the suggestion which I have just made, in reference to the appointment of a Select Committee, I would ask the unanimous concurrence of the House to permit me to do so. Under the 78th rule of the new rules it is provided that at the commencement of each session a committee of selection be appointed to name the members who shall serve on the several Standing Committees of the House. These rules having been adopted, and in order to facilitate business, I would move with the consent of the Senate that the following gentlemen be appointed to nominate senators to serve on the several Standing Committees: —Hon. Messrs. Allan, Angers, Scott, Miller, Lougheed, Power, McClelan, Macdonald (B.C.) and the mover, and to report the same to this House.

The motion was agreed to.

HARBOUR MASTERS' ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (A) "An Act to amend the Harbour Masters' Act." He said: This is simply to give power to appoint a deputy harbour master in cases where it may be deemed necessary to do so.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

SABLE ISLAND BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called, second reading (Bill B) "An Act to amend the Act respecting lighthouses, buoys and beacons and Sable Island."

Hon. Mr. BOWELL said:—The hon. Senator from Mille Isles has raised a point as to whether a bill of this kind should originate in the Senate, it being for the purpose of giving power to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to appoint keepers of lighthouses whose salaries are under $200. The point raised by my hon. friend is this—that as it involves the expenditure of money it should originate in the House of Commons. I would ask the House to allow the Bill to stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—I did not raise an objection, I only suggested the possibility of such a point being raised. It is interfering with the salaries of officers—I may be mistaken, but it struck me that way, and I mentioned the matter to the leader of the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There may be something in the objection taken by the hon. gentleman, but I think it is a matter of some doubt. The object of the bill is not to allot salaries to officers appointed by the Government, but to give power to the Minister to appoint, without reference to the Governor in Council, officers who have already voted to them by the House of Commons, or by the law, salaries of a certain amount—that is the object. At first blush I was inclined to agree with the hon. Senator from Mille Isles, but on looking further at the bill, I think it may properly come within the jurisdiction of this House, and is not at all an infringement on the rights of the House of Commons, because we do not attempt to give or fix the salaries of the officers in question.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There can be no harm in allowing the matter to stand until to-morrow. I did not wish to convey the impression that the hon. gentleman from Mille Isles raised the objection, but when he made the suggestion I thought it better to allow the bill to stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The bill only prescribes what officials shall be appointed by the Minister and what officials by the Governor in Council, and does not at all fix the salaries.

The order was allowed to stand until to-morrow.

HARBOUR MASTERS' ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (A) "An Act to amend the 'Harbour Masters' Act.'"

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the Committee, reported the bill without amendment.

SABLE ISLAND BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (B) "An Act to amend the Act respecting Lighthouses, Buoys and Beacons and Sable Island."

He said: This is the bill the second reading of which I was about to move yesterday when the suggestion was made that it was a measure which might be regarded as interfering with the rights and prerogatives of the House of Commons. On closer examination of the bill, it will be found that it is not of a character which interferes in any way with the appointment of officers to whom public money shall be paid. The law already provides for the appointment of superintendents and keepers of lighthouses by the Governor in Council. The object of this bill is simply to change the mode of appointment of keepers whose salaries are less than $200 a year. It will be seen at once that it is merely giving the head of the department power to do that which was formerly done only by the Governor in Council. It is simply to facilitate the business of the department where it is necessary to make these minor appointments more rapidly than they could otherwise be made if left to the Council.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Clause 3 of the bill provides that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may make contracts for and purchase supplies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the present law.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—This bill amends the present law. It gives authority not only to pay but to create a liability. This clause is only substituting one section for another, but at the same time it is legislation which we are initiating in this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the present law. There is no change of the law in that respect.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I know it is the same, but still we are repealing one section and substituting another for it, and there may be a question whether we are not giving power to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to create certain liabilities.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There are no new powers given to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries by this bill. We are simply repealing a section in the law as it stands and re-enacting the same clause with the additional powers to which I have referred. No power is given to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that he does not possess at the present moment, under the Revised Statutes, except that of appointing lighthouse-keepers whose salaries are under $200.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My contention is that if it were not a substitution, it would be giving authority to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to create liabilities.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to object?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is not granting new powers to the minister, but re-enacting a law which already exists and which empowers him to do what is provided for here.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—What I contend is that if it were a new clause it would be a tax on the public reveuue, and therefore beyond our jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There can be no harm to allow the bill to be read the second time to-day, and the objections which have been raised can be considered in Committee of the Whole. I do not look upon this measure as a money bill in any sense. It is not a measure which imposes taxation or grants money for any purpose, but a bill, in the first place in regard to the appointment of certain officers, regulating by their salaries, as a gauge, the class of officers that may be appointed by the Minister instead of by the Governor in Council, as at present. There is no taxation imposed on the public and no interference with the right of the House of Commons in any way to grant supplies. The objection to the last clause appears to have a stronger face on it, but still it must be recollected that we do not attempt to grant any moneys for the purposes indicated in that first clause. All the appropriations must be initiated in the House of Commons and granted by that House and the law is on the Statute-book empowering the Minister to do the thing that is mentioned in the bill. The objection raised by the hon. member from Lunenburg to the last clause in the bill is worthy of further consideration and it might be well for the Minister to consider whether that last clause should be dropped or not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand it, the hon. member from Lunenburg does not object to the clause, but says that if this were a new clause instead of a re-enactment of the existing clause, he would object. This is useful information but not important.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

INSOLVENCY ACT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce if the bill dealing with bankruptcy and insolvency is to be introduced into this House, and if so, when it may be expected.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is the intention of the Government to have a bill dealing with insolvency introduced in the Senate, and I am in hopes that I shall be enabled to introduce it for the first reading to-morrow; if not to-morrow, certainly the day after.

THIRD READING.

Bill (A) " An Act to amend the Harbour Masters' Act."—(Mr. Bowell.)

SABLE ISLAND BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (B) " An Act to amend the Act with respect to lighthouses, buoys and beacons, and Sable Island."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand it, there was a change proposed in the first clause of this bill, so that it would read as follows: " the Governor in Council may appoint keepers whose salaries are over two hundred dollars a year and superintendents." It was the intention that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should appoint keepers whose salaries were less than $200, but the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was not to appoint superintendents in any case. It would read this way: " The Governor in Council may appoint keepers whose salaries are over $200, and superintendents and such other officers as are necessary for the purposes of this Act."

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is correct; it was so amended in the bill that I introduced. It should read: " The Governor in Council may appoint keepers whose salaries are over $200, and superintendents, no matter what their salaries, and such other officers as are necessary for the purposes of the Act"; and then the second subsection gives power to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to appoint officers whose salaries are over that sum.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON, from the Committee, reported the Bill with an amendment which was concurred in.

The Senate adjourned at 4.45.

INSOLVENCY BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Before the ordinary motions on the notice paper are presented, I think it well, in view of the importance of the subject, that I should at the very earliest possible moment, lay before the House the reasons why the Government have proposed to introduce a bankruptcy law, and in doing so I shall be as brief as possible. I shall, however, refer to the former Acts that have been passed by the Parliaments of Canada and which have been on the statute-book since confederation, and also point out as clearly and succinctly as possible what the law is as its exists to-day in England, and then I think if the House, and probably the country, would take the trouble to read the statements which I may make they would be better able to judge of the relative merits of the different legislation, whether it be the old law as it existed, the English law as it stands upon the statute-books, or that which we now propose for the consideration of the Parliament of Canada. I shall ask the indulgence of the House in doing so to refer in a much more extended manner than is my habit to the notes which I have prepared upon this subject. I do so for this reason: it is a question of vital importance to the commercial community of this country, and I do not care to trust to my memory of the different clauses of the Acts which were in force some years ago, or the law as it stands upon the statute-book in England, or that which we propose to enact in this country. Hon. gentlemen will find, on reference to the British North America Act, that bankruptcy and insolvency are among the classes of subjects assigned to the legislative authority of the Parliament of the Dominion, and that in 1869 Parliament passed a general Act for the Dominion known as the Insolvency Act of 1869, the main provisions of which were as follows: The Act applied to traders only. Provision was made for voluntary assignments by the debtors to an official assignee resident within the county or place wherein he had his domicile, or if there was no official assignee, then to an official assignee of the nearest place in which such an assignee had been appointed, and the assignee called in the Act "interim assignee," forthwith called meeting of the creditors, and if at such a meeting the creditors failed to appoint an assignee, the interim assignee became assignee of the estate. Provision was also made for the compulsory liquidation of the debtor. This was effected in two ways:—(a.) By a demand on the part of the creditors to the amount of $500 or over that the debtor should make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors; or (b.) By the issue of a writ of attachment on the suit of a creditor for not less than $200, and in such case the estate was placed by the sheriff in the custody of an official assignee, or if there was no official assignee, in the cnstody of some competent person, to act as guardian under the writ until the creditors appointed their assignee. The official assignees were appointed by the board of trade of the county or adjacent county. In case there was no board of trade, or the board of trade failed to make a nomination, the judge could nominate the official assignees. There was to be at least one for each county and at least three for each district in Quebec. The security to be given was fixed by the board of trade, or judge, and an official assignee could be removed from office by the board of trade which had appointed him, or by the judge having jurisdiction at the domicile of the assignee. One or more inspectors might be appointed to superintend and direct the assignee—their services to be either gratuitous or paid for as the creditors might decide. The assignee was to wind up the estate, by collecting and realizing upon the assets, and dividing the proceeds among the creditors. In default of other instructions he was to make weekly deposits, at interest, in the name of the estate, of the moneys of the estate. He was subject to the orders and directions of the creditors, or the unanimous direction in writing of the inspectors, and he was also subject to the summary jurisdiction of the court or judge to the same extent as ordinary officers of the court. He might be removed by the creditors, or he might resign, and his remuneration was fixed by the creditors, but if not so fixed before the final dividend after the question had been brought up before a meeting of creditors competent to deal with it, an amount was to be put into the dividend sheet at a rate not exceeding five per centum upon the cash receipts—subject to contestation by any party interested as being insufficient or too much for the services rendered in the same way as other items in the dividend sheet. The remuneration of the interim assignee, if not fixed at the first meeting of creditors, was to be taxed by the judge and constituted a first lien on the estate. It was the duty of the inspectors, and of the assignee under their directions, to examine claims filed, and power was given to them to order the contestation of any claim. In case of contestation of claims, the assignee heard the case and made the award, subject to appeal to the judge. As soon as possible after the expiration of one month, and thereafter at intervals of not more than three months, the assignee was to prepare accounts and statements of his doings as such assignee, and at similar intervals to prepare dividends of the estate. In the case of claims depending on a condition or contingency, a dividend was to be reserved until the condition or contingency was determined, and if this would keep the estate open too long, the claim was to be valued and thereafter ranked as a debt payable absolutely. If a creditor held security for his claim, he set a value on the security and might either retain it at such value, or the estate might buy it at an advance of ten per cent on the value so set. In either case the creditor ranked on the estate for the excess over the value or price paid for the security. Clerks had a preferential lien for four months' arrears of salary which might be increased by the creditors. Leases more valuable than the rent were to be sold on order of a judge. In case the lease was not sold and extended beyond the current year, the creditors were to decide at a meeting, held more than one month before the termination of the yearly term of the lease then current, whether the property should be retained for the use of the estate only up to the end of the then current yearly term. The landlord might claim damages and would rank on the estate as an ordinary creditor for the amount awarded, but the measure of damages was the difference between the value of the premises leased when the lease terminated under the resolution of the creditors, and the rent which the insolvent had agreed by the lease to pay during its continuance. The chance of leasing or not leasing the premises again was not to enter into the computation of damages. In Ontario, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, the landlord's preferential lien was restricted to one year's arrears, and during the time the assignee retained the premises. Contracts made with intent to impede or defraud creditors with the knowledge of the person contracting with the debtor, and which had the effect of impeding or defrauding the creditors, were null and void. Gratuitous contracts within three months of insolvency, no matter with whom made, and contracts by which creditors were injured, made by a debtor unable to meet his engagements and afterwards becoming insolvent, with a person knowing such inability or having probable cause for believing it to exist, or after such inability became public or notorious, were presumed to be made with intent to defraud creditors. Contracts for consideration, by which creditors were injured, if made within thirty days before insolvency by a debtor unable to meet his engagements to a person ignorant of such inability, and before the insolvency of such person became public and notorious, were voidable. Fraudulent preferential sales were void, and if made within thirty days before insolvency were presumed to have been made in contemplation of insolvency. Payments made within thirty days before insolvency by a debtor unable to meet his engagements in full to a person knowing or having probable cause for believing such inability to exist, were void. Transfers of debts within thirty days of insolvency for the purpose of enabling the debts so transferred to be set off, were void. Punishment by imprisonment, for a term not exceeding two years, was prescribed in case of a person purchasing goods on credit, promising advances of money, etc., knowing himself to be unable to pay. Provisions were made for the discharge of a debtor under a deed of composition and discharge, or by consent of creditors, or after the expiration of one year without the consent of creditors. The deed or consent of the creditors required to be executed by a majority in number of the creditors having claims over $100 each, and representing at least three-quarters in value of the liabilities of the insolvent, subject to be computed in ascertaining the proportions required. The discharge before being valid had to be confirmed by the court and might be granted absolutely, or the court might direct the operation thereof to be suspended for a period not exceeding five years, or might declare the discharge to be second class, or both, or the discharge might be refused altogether. A discharge obtained by fraud was void. No definition was made in the Act of the term "second class." Under the English law discharges were of three classes:—1st. Where the bankruptcy arose from unavoidable losses and misfortune, and 2nd. Where the bankruptcy had not arisen wholly from unavoidable losses and misfortunes, and 3rd. Where the bankruptcy had arisen from avoidable losses and misfortunes. Provision was made for the examination of the insolvent at a meeting of the creditors to be called for the purpose, and for further examination before a judge upon petition by the assignee or a creditor. The word "judge" was interpreted to mean a judge of the Superior Court in Quebec, of the County Court in Ontario and New Brunswick, and a judge of Probate in Nova Scotia, and provision was made for appeal in Quebec to the Court of Queen's Bench, in Ontario to the Superior Courts of law, or to the Court of Chancery, and in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to the Supreme Court of the province. The Act was to remain in force for four years from 1st

September 1869 and it was by subsequent statutes extended to the end of the Session of 1875. Questions discussed at meetings of creditors were decided by the majority in number of creditors for sums of $100 and upwards present or represented at the meeting, and representing the majority in value of such creditors, and if the majority in number did not agree with the majority in value, the views of each section were embodied in resolutions, and the resolutions, with a statement of the vote taken, were referred to the judge, who decided between them. In certain cases the votes of creditors under $100 might be computed. These were the general provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869. In 1875, a further Act was passed known as the "Insolvent Act of 1875," which repealed the former Act. The chief changes made by this Act and the Acts passed in 1876 and 1877 amending it, were as follows :—The Act defined who were traders. Creditors having claims under $100 could not vote. Voluntary assignments were done away with. The official assignee acted in all cases, whether the proceedings were on demand or under writ of attachment. The official assignees were appointed by the Governor in Council, one or more for each county or district. The official assignee had to give security to Her Majesty of $2,000 if the population of the county for which he was appointed did not exceed 100,000 ; and $6,000 if the population was over 100,000. This security was enacted in the interests of all estates in his hands. In addition to this, he might be ordered by the judge to give additional security for the special benefit of the creditors of any particular estate. The creditors' assignee was paid by commission on the net proceeds of the estate—5 per cent on amounts realized under $1,000, 2½ per cent additional up to $5,000, and 2¼ per cent additional on amounts realized in excess of $5,000, but the creditors might give additional remuneration. A meeting of creditors had to be held before a discharge with consent of creditors could be confirmed. Discharge was not to be granted without consent of creditors, unless (except in certain cases) the estate of the insolvent paid or was likely to pay 50 cents on the dollar. Clerks had a preferential lien for two months of arrears and for one month of the unexpired portion of the current year of service, during which period they had to perform, under the direction of the assignee, any work or duty connected with the affairs of the insolvent. The landlord's lien, except in Quebec was reduced to six months' arrears, and so long as the assignee retained the premises leased. A register had to be kept by the assignee, and the information therein had to be sent to the Minister of Agriculture. The assignee was not to act as the attorney or agent of the creditor, and a person was not to act as such attorney or agent in reference to his own appointment as assignee. The Act also provided for procedure in the case of incorporated companies, except banks, railways, insurance and telegraph companies. The Act was repealed in 1880. The chief features of the English Bankruptcy Act are : It applies to all debtors. The proceedings to bring a debtor within the provisions of the English Act are by petition to the court for a receiving order. The debtor may petition as well as a creditor. On a receiving order being made, an official receiver is vested with the debtor's estate, until the creditors meet and appoint their trustee. The official receiver could not be trustee except in the case of estates under £300, in which case he became trustee. Provisions are made for a public examination of the debtor before the court, which examination may be continued from time to time until the court thinks his affairs sufficiently investigated and orders it concluded, but no such order can be made until after the day appointed for the first meeting of creditors. The debtor is adjudged bankrupt if the creditors, at their first meeting, resolve that the debtor be adjudged bankrupt, or pass no resolution, or do not meet, or if a proposal for a composition scheme for the settlement of the debtor's affairs is not approved within fourteen days after the conrclusion of the examination, or such furthetime as the court might allow, and thereupon the property of the debtor became divisible among his creditors and vested in the trustees. The trustee is appointed when the debtor is adjudged bankrupt, or the creditors resolve that he be adjudged bankrupt, but the creditors may resolve to leave the appointment to the committee of inspectors. In case of failure on the part of the creditors to make the appointment, it is made by the Board of Trade (one of the departments of the English Government), but the creditors or the committee of inspection may afterwards appoint a trustee to take the place of the trustees appointed by the Board of Trade. The trustee may be removed by the creditors, or in certain cases by the Board of Trade, subject in the latter case to appeal in the higher court. The trustee appointed by the creditors has to give security to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade, and the Board, if satisfied with the security, certifies that the appointment has been duly made, and the appointment takes effect from the date of the certificate. The Board may object to the appointment on the ground that it was not made in good faith, or the person was not fit, or his connection with the bankrupt, or with a particular creditor, made it difficult for him to act with impartiality in the interests of the creditors generally, or that he had been previously removed from a similar office for misconduct or neglect of duty. If such objection is made, it is, if required by a majority in value of the creditors, to be referred to the high court for decision. The creditors may appoint from the creditors qualified to vote, or holding general powers of attorney from such creditors, a committee of inspection to superintend the administration of the bankrupt's estate by the trustee. The committee is to be not more than five, nor less than three. The debtor may be discharged either before or after being adjudged bankrupt on a proposal for composition in satisfaction of his debts, or a scheme for the settlement of his affairs, if approved by resolution of a majority in number of his creditors and representing three fourths in value of all the creditors who had proved claims, and if approved by the court. He may also, at any time after being adjudged bankrupt and after the conclusion of his public examination, apply to the court for his discharge which may be granted absolutely, or the court may, on the proof of certain facts, as that his assets were not equal to ten shillings in the pound of his unsecured liabilities, or that he had not kept proper books of account, etc., etc., refuse, or suspend it for a period of not less than two years, or suspend it until a dividend of not less than ten shillings in the pound had been paid, or it may require, as a condition of discharge, the payment by the debtor out of future earnings, or out of acquired property of any balance or part of any balance of debts provable against the estate not satisfied at the date of discharge. A person having notice of an Act of Bankruptcy available against the debtor is not entitled to prove for any debt or liability contracted by the debtor subsequently to his having notice. Clerks and servants have prior claim for wages in respect of service during four months before the date of the receiving order, not exceeding £50; labourers and workmen for two months not exceeding £25. Landlords may distrain for any rent due, either before or after the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, but if the distress is levied after the commencement of such proceedings it shall only be available for six months, and for the surplus he proves against the estate. Official receivers are appointed by, and act under the general authority and direction of the Board of Trade. The remuneration of the trustees is fixed by the creditors by resolution, but if one-fourth in number or value of the creditors dissent from the resolution, or if the bankrupt satisfies the Board of Trade that the remuneration is unnecessarily high, the Board of Trade fixes it. The courts having jurisdiction in bankruptcy proceedings are the High Court and the County Courts, but the Lord Chancellor may exclude any County Court from having jurisdiction. Provisions is made for appeal from the High Court or the County Court to Her Majesty's Court of Appeal, and from the latter court by leave to the House of Lords. Power is given to the Registrars in bankruptcy of the High Court, and to the registrars of the County Courts to hear petitions, make receiving orders, examine debtors, grant orders of discharge, etc. The receiving order is not made against a corporation, or against a partnership, association or company registered under the Companies' Act. Provision is made for the summary administration of estates when the total value of the property does not exceed £300. Such are the provisions of the Insolvency Act in England, as it exists to-day.

The bill which is now submitted for the consideration of the Senate differs in some material respects from former Canadian Acts and also from the provisions of the English Act, particularly as to the class of debtors who can take advantage of its provisions. In previous Canadian insolvency laws, traders only could assign or be put into bankruptcy by their creditors. The English Act however extends its benefits to all classes of debtors. The proposed bill provides for two classes of debtors: First, traders who are fully defined in section 5 and debtors who are not traders as defined by that section. The former, that is the trader, can only assign or be placed in bankruptcy by the action of a creditor; that is he cannot make a voluntary assignment, while the latter class, that is the farmer, rancher, grazier or other debtor, can make a voluntary assignment and ask for relief under the Act, but cannot be forced into insolvency. The reason for this distinction is to prevent any one or more creditors from placing an agriculturist or other similar debtor into bankruptcy when there might be a probability of his being able to pay his indebtedness after a good or average harvest, when, if forced into bankruptcy his farm and other property might be sacrificed and thus ruined by costs, etc. I think the Senate will agree with the decision which the Government has made in this respect, that while the creditor should have full control over the debtor in the case of actual and bona fide traders, that they should not have the power to rush into the Bankruptcy Court, and thereby ruin that class of people who are termed debtors by the Act. Section 6 sets forth the acts which constitute insolvency and which render a trader liable to have proceedings instituted against him in this particular, following closely the Act of 1875. I think it is important in this respect, and I will read it. Section 6 provides that:—

A trader commits an act of insolvency and becomes liable to have proceedings instituted against him under this Act in any of the following cases:

(a) If he ceases to meet his liabilities generally as they become due.

(b) If he calls a meeting of his creditors for the purpose of compounding with them, or if he exhibits a statement showing his inability to meet his liabilities; or if he gives notice to any of his creditors that he has suspended or is about to suspend payment of his debts; or if he otherwise acknowledges his insolvency.

(c) If he absconds or is about to abscond from any province in Canada with intent to defraud his creditors or any of them, or to defeat or delay the remedy of any creditor, or to avoid being arrested or served with legal process; or if being out of any such province in Canada, he so remains with a like intent, or if he conceals himself within the limits of Canada with a like intent.

(d) If he secretes or is about to secrete any part of his estate or effects with intent to defraud his creditors, or any of them, or to defeat or delay their remedies or demands.

(e) If he assigns, removes, or disposes of, or is about or attempts to assign, remove, or dispose of any of his property with intent to defraud, defeat, or delay his creditors, or any of them.

(f) If he makes any general conveyance or assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors; or being unable to meet his liabilities in full he makes any conveyance of the whole or of the main part of his stock in trade or assets, without the consent of his creditors, or without satisfying their claims.

(g) If he permits any execution issued against him under which any of his chattels, stock in trade, assets, land, or property is seized, levied upon, or taken in execution, to remain unsatisfied until within four days of the time fixed by the sheriff or seizing officer for the sale thereof, or to remain unsatisfied for fifteen days after such seizure.

(h) If with intent to defeat, defraud, or delay his creditors, or any of them, he procures his chattels, stock in trade, assets, land or property, or any portion thereof, to be seized, levied on or taken under, or by any process of execution.

Perhaps it would be well also to read the 13th section, which provides exclusively to other classes of persons who can make assignments voluntarily. That is described in the Act as the debtor, in contradistinction to that of the trader.

The 13th section provides:

A farmer, grazier, or rancher, or a debtor not being a trader within the meaning of this Act, may present a petition that a receiving order be made in respect of his estate. Such petition shall allege that the petitioner is unable to pay his debts and that he had resided during the six months immediately preceding the date of the petition and then resides within the jurisdiction of the court to which the petition was presented; and the court, on being satisfied by affidavit or otherwise, of the truth of the allegations contained in the petition, and that an order should be made, may make a receiving order. Provided always, that no petition so presented can be withdrawn except with the leave of the court.

Section 7 deals with the proceedings required to bring a trader under the Act, namely, on the petition of a creditor for $250 and upwards, for a receiving order, which may be issued in the first instance, in all cases except when the act of insolvency relied upon is that the debtor has ceased to meet his liabilities generally as they become due, in which case the order is issued only after notice to the debtor. In case the order is issued ex parte the debtor may move to set it aside. As I have already indicated, provision has not been made whereby a trader may make a voluntary assignment or whereby a receiving order may, as in England, be issued on the trader's petition. The Act of 1869 provided for voluntary assignments by the trader; the Act of 1875 provided for assignments only on demand of creditors. The issue of a receiving order vests in the official receiver the estate of the insolvent. Sections 17 to 20 deal with the appointment by the Dominion Government and with the security to be given and the duties to be performed by the official receiver. In the interests of the creditors, provision is made that the business can be carried on in the interval of time between the issue of the order and the appointment of the liquidator, for example to finish unfinished contracts; and provision is also made that as full a statement and inventory of the estate as possible should be presented at the first meeting of creditors. The liquidator must be appointed at the first meeting of creditors, to be held within 20 days from the making of the order, and if not then appointed or appointed by the inspectors immediately afterwards, he is appointed by the court. Section 29 provides for the appointment of inspectors and sections 30 to 34 provide for assistance being given by the debtor in the winding-up of his estate, for his examination under oath or the examination of any other person having knowledge of his affairs, for the arrest of the debtor in certain cases and for the delivery of his correspondence to the receiver or liquidator. This clause may seem somewhat inquisitorial in its character, but it is contained in the English Act, as well as in the old acts which were passed by the Parliament of Canada. Under an order from the court, his letters and correspondence can be taken possession of and read in the presence of certain officers of the court, and the debtor or trader as the case may be, and if they relate to his business they will be retained, and if not, they will be handed back to him. Sections 35 to 53 make provision for the discharge of the debtor, which may be effected in two ways: First, under deed of composition and discharge executed by a majority entitled to rank on the estate, or, secondly, without consent of creditors after the expiration of a year. In both cases the deed, or the discharge, has to be confirmed by the court and provision is made for notice to creditors. The court may confirm, refuse, or suspend the operation of a discharge, and in case of a deed, it may, following the English Act, impose conditions as to payment of further dividends out of future earnings or after acquired property. A meeting of creditors must be held specially to consider a deed of composition, but the notices of application to the court to confirm the deed may be given concurrently with the calling of the meeting. The meeting must, however, be held at least one week before the application is heard. Appeal from the decision of the court, confirming or refusing to confirm a deed is allowed in all cases. Applications for discharge are not heard by the county court judges as n case of other proceedings under the bill, but by the judges of the higher courts. The provisions of the bill have been cast with a view of simplifying the proceedings and lessening cost to as great an extent as possible. Section 54 extends the provisions of the Act relating to discharge to traders and debtors who, since the repeal of the Act of 1875, have made general assignments without preference or priority. In this case they would have to undergo the same examination and pursue precisely the same course as a trader or debtor desiring to be relieved of his debts under the Act. Part 3 of the bill deals with the debts which are provable against the estate, the effect of the insolvency on antecedent transactions, and the realization and distribution of the property of the estate. These sections are based upon the Act of 1875, and can better be considered when the bill is in committee, and dealt with section by section. Attention may, however, now be called to the provisions of section 58, which enumerates the privileged claims to be paid in full before payment of dividends, namely, official receiver, liquidator, and employees for three months' salary and landlord for three months. In the case of a landlord, the right of distraint is taken away, but a preferential lien is given for the time his premises are occupied by the liquidator for the benefit of the estate. Section 80 follows the English Act which allows property to be disclaimed in certain cases, when burdened with conditions which would render it valueless as an asset. This latter section was not in previous Insolvency Acts in Canada. Part 4 (Section 93) provides for a more summary method of winding up small estates. This section applies only to estates in which the value of the property is not to exceed $5,000 of available assets. There are similar provisions in the English Act, but they only apply to estates under £300 ($1,500). We considered that in drafting this, we might safely, under the peculiar circumstances of our country, extend that amount to $5,000, where the creditors could, by mutual agreement with a trader or debtor, take possession of the estate and make the most possible money out of it, at the least cost. No special remarks need be made in relation to Part 5, which deals with the duties, etc., of the liquidator. His remuneration, as well as the remuneration of the official receiver, is left in the hands of the creditors or inspectors, subject to review by the court. Part 6 refers to offences and penalties, and calls for no special remarks, nor does Part 7, which provides for procedure generally, except that attention might be directed to tbe method in which questions are decided by creditors. We have adopted the principle of the English Act, namely, by the majority in value of the creditors present at a meeting and entitled to vote. Such are, in brief, the provisions of the present Act, the first reading of which I propose to submit to the Senate. I think, after this explanation, that it would be well to defer the second reading for some eight or ten days at least, in order that the Bill may be printed and circulated, and members of the Senate and merchants in the country, who are interested, and the traders and debtors who are equally interested with the creditors, may have an opportunity of seeing and reading it, and making such suggestions as they may deem proper under the circumstances. My hon. friend has suggested that probably it would be well in this connection that a larger number be printed than are printed of ordinary bills in order that members may have an opportunity of sending copies to the merchants in their locality, and if that be the view of the House, the clerk will give instructions to have a larger number printed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Can the hon. leader of the Government inform me as to whether the Bill will be circulated in a short time, because the fixing of the date after the second reading would largely depend on when Senators might expect to receive the copies. Perhaps the hon. leader of the Government would say when he expects to have the bill printed, so that we can fix a date for the second reading.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The bill as originally drafted is now in type; it has been materially altered in some respects, but not to any very great extent, by Council, and I hope to have it circulated the day after to-morrow. It will have, however, to undergo the supervision of the law clerk and it will be one or two days before it is printed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask if it is the intention of the Government to refer it to a special committee, or have it dealt with by a committee of the whole House?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—These bills are always dealt with by a Committee of the Whole House, and I think it would be a better way. I would move the second reading on the 13th, and if the House is not ready, we can postpone it.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I would like to ask if the Government are in possession of the decision recently rendered by the Privy Council in England as to the Insolvency Act passed by the province of Ontario? It may be desirable that it should be before the House when the bill comes to be discussed, and the decision should be very fully considered, to see how far we are authorized to go. I hope my hon. friend will be able to secure a copy of that decision.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I do not think the Government has any further knowledge than that which has appeared in the public press, but I can say that steps will be taken to secure it, if there are copies in the country. My impression is that the decision of the Privy Council on the Ontario Act does not in any degree affect the powers which the Dominion Parliament has to deal with the question of the Insolvency Act, but it does define the powers that the local legislatures have to enact laws for the distribution of estates. I am only speaking as a layman, however, and I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman is a very good one, and I will endeavour to procure a copy and lay it before the Senate before we enter upon the discussion of the details of the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the explanation given by the leader of the House of the recent decision is correct. The effect of the decision was that the limited assignments, under the Ontario Act, were legal, in the absence of any Dominion Act. Of course, an Insolvent Act of the Dominion would supersede any Act of a local legislature. The same thing happened in the States. State laws were passed, but they were always over-ruled when Congress passed a law on the subject. It is only in the absence of any Dominion law that these Acts are recognized.

The bill was read the first time.

THIRD READING.

Bill (B) "An Act to amend the Act respecting Lighthouses, Buoys and Beacons, and Sable Island."—(Mr. Bowell).

THE STANDING COMMITTEES.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called,

Consideration of the report of the Committee of Selection appointed to nominate the Senators to serve on the several Standing Committees for the present session.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL said: If there are no objections the report can be adopted as a whole, but if the House prefer it, the committees can be appointed separately.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Our practice has been to appoint the committees separately.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Under rule 16 of the new rules, a special summons must be sent to the Senate to consider any amendment proposed to be made to a Standing Order. No such notice has been issued for the consideration of clause 2 of the report, which recommends that rule to be amended.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have not got to that yet.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the adoption of the report so far as it relates to the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament and the Joint Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the adoption of the report so far as it relates to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY called attention to the fact that of the nine members of this committee, four were from the Maritime Provinces and none from any part of Canada west of Ontario, and asked that the name of Mr. Kirchhoffer be substituted for his.

The clause was amended accordingly and adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the adoption of the clauses relating to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, Railways and Telegraphs and Harbours and Miscellaneous Private Bills.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the adoption of the clause relating to the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.) asked that the name of Mr. Reid (Cariboo) be substituted for his.

The clause was amended accordingly and agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the adoption of the clauses relating to the Committees on Debates and Reporting, Divorce and Restaurant.

The motions were agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The Committee appointed to select these committees thought that the title of the Contingent Accounts Committee did not really cover the powers with which that committee was invested and they suggested that it should be called the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts, which I think the House will agree in saying covers the duties of the committee much better than the simple words "Contingent Accounts." The following resolution was therefore adopted:—

Your Committee recommend that Rule 80 of "The Rules and Standing Orders of the Senate" be amended so that "The Committee on Contingent Accounts" shall be hereafter styled "The Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts."

We might by unanimous consent adopt this clause. It does not affect the general principle of the rule but it makes more explicit and distinct the duties of the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the suspension of rule 16 with reference to this clause.

The motion was agreed to and the clause was adopted.

THE MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST SCHOOL ACTS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, copies of all school ordinances, school regulations and amendments thereto, adopted by the Legislative Assembly, the Executive, and any Board or Council of Education, in reference to the establishment, maintenance and administration of Schools in the North-west Territories since 1885;

Also, for copies of all petitions, memorials and correspondence in reference thereto;

Also, for copies of all reports to the Governor General in Council, and all communications and representations to the authorities in the North-west Territories.

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, copies of all petitions, memorials and correspondence in reference to the appeal made in the name of the Roman Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba, in reference to the school laws of that province;

Also, copies of reports to and Orders in Council in reference to the same;

Also, copies of the case submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, respecting aforesaid appeal, including factums and all materials in connection therewith put before the Supreme Court, and of all judgments rendered and answers given by said court on or to the questions referred to them.

He said: In making the motion which is now before you, I do not intend to raise a complete and final debate on the questions dealt with in the papers, the production of which I seek for. Those questions are so momentous, the interest which the people take in them is so great, and our debates may have such an influence throughout the whole Dominion on the ultimate moulding of public opinion in connection with such questions, that we must approach them calmly and dispassionately and not urge any body to commit himself until we are in possession of all the papers, and until we are made aware of all the facts connected therewith in their most minute details. It is with this view, it is for the purpose of affording everybody an opportunity of getting a full knowledge of those facts and of the contentions of all parties concerned, that I am moving for this address. Having so stated my intention, it might seem to many that I could here very properly cut short my remarks, and let my motion be carried without occupying any more of your time and kind attention.

I feel, however, as if my duty would be better fulfilled by taking this opportunity of prefacing, as it were, any further action I may have to take in these matters, with such considerations as may lead the public to a full understanding of our position, of the deep sense of duty and responsibility we are labouring under, of the true feelings we entertain, of our sincere desire for a peaceful, equitable and constitutional settlement of the questions which are now so deeply agitating the people of this Dominion, and also of all the alarms and suggestions which are creeping in our hearts with regard to the future welfare of the confedération. In the performance of this duty, I may exceed in my remarks the proper limits. But so long as I do not trespass too far on your indulgence, I hope to be allowed to go over even that wider range which would not otherwise be in order. I believe that it is most important that some misapprehensions be dispelled, and some historical facts recalled, and the protection of the minorities in confederation as a fundamental point of our constitution be insisted upon. It cannot be denied that these school questions have a disturbing effect upon the population of Canada. It would be unwise to close our eyes to the fact that from one end of the confederation to the other, there exists a feeling of anxiety which prompts all thinking men to look forward and see whether the storm will permit the ship to reach in safety the port pointed out to future generations by the patriotic and high minded statesmen known as the fathers of confederation.

There are 5,000,000 of people in Canada. Of that number, 2,000,000 are Catholics. It cannot be expected that such a large proportion of the nation shall remain silent and restful whilst, in some part of their own country, their rights and liberties as British subjects are intruded upon in violation of the true meaning and intent of the agreements entered into by all parties, by the local interested parties as well as by the Canadian and Imperial authorities.

The questions which are now before the public are of the same nature as those which brought about the state of affairs which prevailed immediately previous to confederation. Such being the case, a query suggests itself to our mind: shall we, after 25 years of confederation, be obliged to confess that this regime, instead of realizing the great expectations that were entertained at the time of the union, has had no other effect than to bring us back, after a long circuit, to the starting point, to the same uncertain and gloomy issues? This aspect of affairs is worthy of being taken into serious consideration by those who were instrumental in the inauguration of our present constitution, by all true and well meaning lovers of their country.

Let us recall the period of our political history previous to the 1st of July, 1867. It is an easy task. The hon. gentlemen sitting in this House were all then sufficiently advanced in years to appreciate the difficulties of the time. The administration of affairs had become almost impossible in United Canada. Political strifes were so intense that no man, no party, could with any likelihood of success, undertake the honourable duty of carrying on the government of Her Majesty. From 1862 to 1864, no less than five different governments had been in power. The prosperity of our land was hampered; according to certain expressed opinions, the very existence of Canada as a British colony was endangered.

Men of all parties and of all shades of politics, said Sir John A. Macdonald, became alarmed at the aspect of affairs; * * * * unless some solution of the difficulty was arrived at, we would suffer under a succession of weak governments, weak in numerical support, weak in force, weak in power of doing good, * * * * leading statesmen on both sides seemed to have come to the common conclusion that some step must be taken to relieve the country from the dead lock and impending anarchy that hung over us."—Conf. Debates, page 26.

Sir Etienne Taché, who was then the premier of Canada, said also:

Legislation in Canada for the last two years had come almost to a standstill * * * * the country was bordering on civil strife * * * * in our present condition we could not continue to exist as a British colony * * * * he would also ask if it was not the duty of both sides to do all they could to prevent the unfortunate results which would have followed.—(Conf. Debates, page 6 and 9.)

Another great leader in the political arena of the old times also laid stress on the situation. Whilst expressing his satisfaction at the confederation scheme, he admitted the urgency of the measure for the sake of peace and in view of the future stability of the country:

I cannot help feeling, said the Hon. Geo. Brown, that the struggle of half a lifetime for constitutional reform, the agitations in the country and the fierce contests in this chamber, the strife and the discord and the abuse of many years are all compensated by the great scheme of reform which is now in your hands. And again: I am further in favour of this scheme as a remedial measure, because it brings to an end the doubt that has so long hung over our position and gives a stability to our future."—(Conf. Debates, pages 84 and 96.)

Such was the condition of affairs when confederation was discussed and came into existence. And as I have already said, that condition of affairs had been brought about precisely by the same vital questions which are now confronting ourselves. And in order to find some lessons to guide ourselves in the present contest, it is interesting to know the course taken by our predecessors of nearly thirty years ago. There is something refreshing in the political events of that time. Irrespective of the intrinsic value of the scheme which has since been adopted and accepted as our constitution, irrespective of the different opinions that were expressed pro and con, then took place what will ever be considered as some of the most illustrious pages of our history. Men who up to that time had bitterly fought against each other, paused for a while before the abyss; they realized the intensity of the crisis, they took advice from the situation and from their patriotism, they rose superior to their passions and above their political and personal feuds, they dropped their prejudices and burying the tomahawk and joining together to relieve the country from depression and from dissensions, they engaged in the noble work of sowing and fertilizing the seed of the national tree, the fruits of which were to be distributed amongst the members of the Canadian family, and whose branches were to give shade and shelter to every one in the land, irrespective of race or creed.

And that tree rooted in the valleys of the great lakes and of the St. Lawrence, was to be extended east, to the Atlantic Ocean, and west to the Pacific Ocean, covering also our immense prairies. That was the magnitude of the scheme. Even then it was contemplated to extend the prospective blessings of confederation to the North-west, and some of those blessings were expressly said to be the suppression of religious and race dissensions, the permanent settlement of all such difficulties in a broad, generous, national and lofty spirit. "We cannot stand still," said the Hon. George Brown, "we cannot go back to chronic sectional hostility and discord."—(Conf. Debates, p. 87).—And a few minutes before he had said:

The vast Indian territories * * * * will ere long, I trust, be opened up to civilization under the auspices of the British American Confederation; * * * * our scheme is to establish a government that will endeavour to maintain liberty, justice and Christianity throughout the land.

"When?" interrupted Mr. Walbridge,

"Very soon," replied at once, Sir Geo. E. Cartier.—(Conf. Debates, p. 86).

Most assuredly, when the walls of the legislative buildings in Quebec were echoing these sentiments, when the people of Canada through their representatives, were settling their differences in that generous spirit, when they were devising the future of Canada and working for the near annexation of our territories, they could not have had the intention of fomenting in those distant and fertile plains, the discord which had brought Canada to such a gloomy condition that the leaders of the nation were concerned about the stability of British institutions on this soil. Yet, what do we see at present? The spirit of the legislation of the fathers of confederation is violated. After twenty-five years of peace, harmony and prosperity, men who do not know how to love their own country are raising discord, are turning men against men, classes against classes, race against race, creed against creed, exciting hatred against a large portion of the people of Canada whose rights and religious liberties I have here to affirm in this House in the most unequivocal terms. We are brought back, as I have already said, to the same condition that we were in previous to confederation, by the adoption of certain laws relating to education, which the author of those very laws has himself practically declared not more than three or four weeks ago in Winnipeg to be unjust to Catholics and even unconstitutional. Again, the prosperity of Canada and possibly British institutions will be brought to a deplorable state of instability.

The raising anew of those once settled questions is, to my mind, quite unaccountable. It appears the more so when we take into consideration the numerous promises and pledges that were given at the time of confederation and on many occasions since.

Ontario and Quebec were the first provinces to enter into the path of reconciliation and of mutual regard; they were the first to pledge themselves to be tolerant to the minority.

I am exceedingly glad to be able to state here that Ontario, the great province of Ontario, has, up to the present time, faithfully kept its pledges; and let us hope that notwithstanding the recent agitation and clamours, whether they come from any individual or association, the province of Ontario will in the future as in the past, remain faithful to the compact entered into in 1867. It would be to its everlasting honour to pursue such a policy.

Quebec also has kept its pledges, and in its case there have been some peculiar circumstances worthy of remembrance. When the resolutions in respect to confederation were discussed at Quebec, the minority of that province expressed a fear that they were not sufficiently protected, especially in educational matters, against the possible encroachments of the majority. They asked for some changes. Their request was acceded to, and the changes asked for were to be embodied in a law. Parliament, however, was prorogued sooner than it had been expected and the bill could not be passed, and again the minority gave expression to their fears. At a subsequent session an attempt was made to pass the bill but unsuccessfully. Then it appears the minority became alarmed, and so jealous were they of what they considered to be their rights, so anxious were they to get protection for the same that they would have refused to enter into confederation had not Sir George Etienne Cartier solved the difficulty. He pledged himself to the minority that as soon as the confederation would be formed, when Quebec would have a parliament of its own, one of its first acts would be to put upon its statute-book the law that they were obliged to drop on that day.

The Protestant minority accepted these promises, feeling confident that such a solemn promise would be observed, and the pledge was effectually redeemed. The Legislature of Quebec passed the law promised by its chieftain for the protection of the minority. Although there was no written law binding them, the people of Quebec did not try to evade their responsibility, they did not take the matter before the courts, they acted honourably and in good faith; they redeemed the pledges given on their behalf.

I will ask you, hon. gentlemen, and ask the country to compare the noble conduct of that Catholic province with the conduct of some politicians of our own days.

Let us come now to my own province and to the North-west Territories. To the Catholic minority there, solemn pledges were also given. In the first place, we have the right to rely on the general promises of protection contained in the federal constitution as explained during the debates on the resolutions placed before the Parliament of old Canada in 1865. Then fears were entertained and vigorously expressed by the opponents of the measure as to the condition in which the minorities might afterwards find themselves. But it was repeatedly said that all through confederation, and for all time to come, the minorities would receive protection and be accorded the free and full enjoyment of their language, and especially of their religious institutions and liberties. Why! Confederation was conceived and passed and adopted expressly with that view! In support of this proposition, I am able to quote the words of an hon. member of the old Legislative Council, the Honourable Mr. Christie. He said:

> We had reached a condition almost bordering on anarchy * * * It is a cheering fact that in the midst of this state of things we have found men patriotic enough to merge former differences and unite together for the purpose of framing a constitution which will secure exemption from the evils under which we have laboured.—(Conf. Debates, p. 212.)

The sentiments expressed in these words by the hon. gentleman were the sentiments of the whole country.

But I have just said that protection to the minority had been promised, and this I must prove. Here again I am in a position to quote the language of some of the then members of the Executive Council, who went so far as to emphatically declare that in case of injustice the federal authorities would interfere.

Here are the words of Sir Etienne Taché then the Premier of Canada. In the quotation I am about to make, the hon. gentleman is speaking with regard to the Protestant minority, but it is obvious that these words are applicable to the Catholic minority as well:

> If the lower branch, of the legislature, said Sir E. Taché, were insensate enough and wicked enough to commit some flagrant act of injustice (I desire to remark here that Sir E. Taché does not limit his declaration to acts within the constitution, he speaks of any act of injustice) If the lower branch of the legislature were insensate enough and wicked enough to commit some flagrant act of injustice against the English Protestant portion of the community, they would be checked by the general government. But the hon. gentleman argues that that would raise an issue between the local and the general governments. We must not, however, forget that the general government is composed of representatives from all portions of the country—that they would not be likely to commit an unjust act—and that if they did so, they would be met by such a storm of opposition as would sweep them out of their places in a very short time. (Conf. Deb., pp. 236-7.)

On the other side of the House, Sir A. A. Dorion, the leader of the Liberal party in Lower Canada, spoke in the same strain:

> I think it but just that the Protestant minority should be protected in its rights in every thing that was dear to it as a distinct nationality, and should not lie at the discretion of the majority in this respect.—(Conf. Debates, p. 250.)

Sir Narcisse Belleau also said in answer to an objection, and in speaking of the minorities:

> Their religion is guaranteed by treaties; they will be protected by the vigilance of the Federal Government, which will never permit the minority of one portion of the confederation to be oppressed by the majority.—(Conf. Debates, p. 184.)

A few moments before, the same gentleman had said:

> Even granting that the Protestants were wronged by the Local Legislature of Lower Canada, could they not avail themselves of the protection of the Federal Legislature? And would not the Federal Government exercise strict surveillance over the action of the Local Legislatures in these matters? Why should it be sought to give existence to imaginary fears?—(Conf. Debates, p. 183.)

No clearer words could disclose the true spirit of our constitution, and I quite understand that the solicitor general of the time, the Honourable, now Sir Hector Langevin, could say:

> The basis of action adopted by the delegates in preparing the resolutions was to do justice to all—justice to all races, to all religions, to all nationalities, and to all interests.—(Conf. Debates, p. 368.)

As I have already said, these utterances were to apply to all parts of confederation, as it might ultimately be composed.

> "I say," declared the leader of the government then, "I say without hesitation, that what will be done for one portion of the country will also be done for the other portions—justice égale distributive."—(Conf. Debates, p. 344).

I hope I have succeeded in completely demonstrating the proposition which I have enumerated, namely: that in the course of the debates on the confederation measure, definite pledges were given for the protection of the minorities, and that those pledges are applicable to the whole North-west, inclusive of Manitoba.

But more distinct and special promises have been made. These promises came from different authorities, and first of all, from the Imperial authorities.

In a despatch from Lord Granville to Sir John Young, the Governor General of Canada, we note these words:

> That the old inhabitants of the country will be treated with such forethought and consideration as may preserve them from the dangers of the appr aching change.

The change took place, but, as you are aware, amidst many unfortunate circumstancies. Thus it came that the Governor General had to issue a royal proclamation, in which these words are to be found :

By Her Majesty's authority I do therefore assure you that on the union with Canada, all your civil and religious rights and privileges will be respected, your property assured to you, and that your country will be governed as in the past under British laws, and in the spirit of British justice.

This proclamation applied to Manitoba and the North-west as a whole. Because, then the distinction between Manitoba and the North-west did not exist. Both formed only one immense territory, the annexation of which was referred to in that proclamation. This view is confirmed by the following words which I read in a letter of February 16, 1870, from Sir John Young to His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface :

The Imperial Government, as I informed you, is earnest in the desire to see the North-west territory united to the Dominion on equitable conditions.

And what were these equitable conditions? The same letter gives us the meaning of those expressions :

The Imperial Government has no intention of acting otherwise than in perfect good faith towards the inhabitants of the North-west. The people may rely that respect and attention will be extended to the different religious persuasions; that title to every description of property will be carefully guarded, and that all the franchises which have subsisted, or which the people may prove themselves qualified to exercise, shall be continued and liberally conferred.

After the transfer of our vast plains had been made to Canada, after the province of Manitoba had been formed, then came the laws of this province of Manitoba. The first enactment of the legislature was to legislate according to the above promises. Our rights and privileges were recognized. And in coupling this immediate legislation with the seventh clause of the Bill of Rights providing for an equitable division of the money in matters of education between Protestants and Catholics, we have the best and the surest construction of the Manitoba Act. It was a practical interpretation given, whilst everything was fresh in the minds of all, and when no dissenting voice could have been heard. And this practical interpretation has stood for twenty years.

That was the first pledge given by the province. It was not the only one, though. I wish here to make known to this honourable house, a page of history full of interest. The legislature of Manitoba gave to us another pledge under circumstances very similar to those under which Sir Geo. Cartier gave his pledge to the Protestants of Quebec—with this objectionable difference, however, that it was afterwards disregarded.

During the administration of Mr. Mackenzie, the Local Government of Manitoba came to Ottawa for better financial terms. Mr. Mackenzie was not willing to help the province at the time except on condition that the province would abolish its Legislative Council, then a part of the legislative machinery. Our Manitoba pilgrims went back to Winnipeg, and made the proposition to their colleagues. The Legislative Council could not be abolished without the co-operation, and, in fact, the consent of the Catholic representatives of the province, who felt at once that it was for them a most serious action to take. The Legislative Council was considered as their safeguard against any future aggression upon their rights and privileges. An appeal was made to their intelligence and patriotism. And at last, for the sake of the provincial interest at large, they did consent and by their action assured the improvement of the financial condition of the province. As soon as the vote had been registered, a most interesting parliamentary scene took place. The generosity of our representatives on this occasion, the public spirit exhibited by them, and their expressed confidence in the loyalty of their English and Protestant countrymen had made a deep impression on the minds of their fellow-representatives, and one of these immediately arose, and amidst the enthusiasm of the moment, and on behalf of the English and Protestant population, on behalf of the province, he eulogized the Catholic and French population, and pledged his people and the province that the rights and privileges of the Catholics would never be interfered with, and for doing so he was cheerfully applauded by the whole House. That man was Mr. Luxton, who is still living, and was then a prominent member of the legislature. He at least, I must say, used his best efforts to have this pledge faithfully kept, and I am happy to send to him from my seat in Parliament the expression of the gratitude of the people whose rights he has so vigorously defended.

But I am sorry to say that, unlike the province of Quebec under similar circumstances, our province of Manitoba, as a whole, has failed to honour itself as did the old province on the banks of the St. Lawrence, and since 1890 we have been deprived, by the will of the legislature, notwithstanding that solemn pledge, of our most cherished rights and privileges, our schools and the official use of our language.

I have seen it stated in the public print that delegates of the North-west are here for better terms. If that is so, there is, in the action of Mr. Mackenzie, in connection with the Manitoba Legislative Council, a hint for us all. Conditions might also be imposed upon the North-west delegates before their request be granted. Everybody may understand what, in my humble opinion, these conditions should be.

I now come to another pledge given in a most remarkable way, and under most interesting circumstances. But here I beg leave to read from a speech made a year ago, in the Manitoba Legislature, by a prominent member of the Liberal party in our province, —Mr. Fisher—who was at the time, when the pledge was given, the president of the Liberal Provincial Association in Manitoba:

I now desire to speak of a delicate matter, which may be somewhat distasteful to some who hear me, but I am bound to tell the truth, even if it may offend some. I make the grave charge that this school legislation was put upon the Statute-book of this province in defiance of the most solemn pledges of the Liberal party. In January of 1888, an event occurred which brought the Liberals into power in this province. My hon. friends had for years been engaged in an effort to defeat the Norquay Government in which I helped them all in my power.* The crisis came when the St. François-Xavier election took place at the time I have mentioned. Dr. Harrison was at that time premier of the province, and he chose as his provincial secretary Mr. Joseph Burke, who though he bears an Irish name, is really a French Canadian. He was living among his own people in the district of St. François-Xavier, and had been elected a member of this House in 1886 by acclamation. On accepting office he went back for re-election. It was proposed that we should oppose him, though for myself I thought it was useless. Mr. F. H. Francis, an English speaking Presbyterian was asked to take the field against Mr. Burke in this French constituency. He could not possibly be elected unless he got a large proportion of the votes of the French population. Without this, I say his election was an absolute impossibility. Now I state, on information and belief, that Mr. Francis, when consulted by leading members of the Liberal party and asked to accept the nomination, said he would not accept unless empowered to give the electors a pledge that if the Liberals got into office they would not interfere with the institutions of the French, their language or their school laws. I am informed that he was authorized to make that promise, that he went to the electors and gave them the pledge. I did not know that of my own knowledge, but I knew from the newspaper reports, and from information brought to the Winnipeg Liberals, that strong speeches were being made by Mr. Burke and his friends in the riding, calling upon half-breeds and French Canadians to vote against the Liberal candidate, on the ground that Liberals would likely pass laws interfering with their institutions. It was said, "are you going to put into power people, who, when they get into office, will legislate away your school and your language," and the electors were appealed to to oppose Mr. Francis for that reason. This became practically the leading question of that campaign, and the contest was a crucial one. Should the Liberals win, it was plain, in the view of the losses sustained by the Government, that they must resign. So that the success of the Liberal candidate meant that the party would at once attain power, while the election of Mr. Burke would almost certainly have insured the continuance of the Liberals in opposition till this day. It became necessary for the party leaders, therefore, to meet this appeal to the religious and race feelings of the French and half-breed voters, the pledge given by Mr. Francis appearing to be insufficient to satisfy them. Now the Liberals had a defined platform.* The idea of interfering with rights guaranteed, or supposed to have been guaranteed, by the constitution, had never been suggested. On the contrary, it had frequently been pointed out on the public platform by Liberal leaders that these institutions were protected.* When the question about the Liberal policy became so prominent and urgent in St. François Xavier I was consulted with others about it, and Mr. Martin was asked to go out and assist the candidate. I was told that he went out and attended the meeting, and I was told of promises he had publicly made, which were, to my knowledge, in accord with what was intended he should make. I went with him myself to a second meeting. It was a large gathering mainly composed of French and half-breed Catholics. The same charges were made by Burke as to what the Liberals would do if in office. The same appeals were made to his countrymen and co-religionists to defeat Mr. Francis for that reason. Mr. Martin in a powerful speech, denounced the statements of Burke and his friends as false. He told the meeting that it had never been the policy of Liberals to interfere with the language or institutions of the French Catholic population, and he appealed to them to trust the Liberals, and to support their candidate. At that time I was president of the Provincial Association of Liberals, and Mr. Martin referred to my presence at the meeting, and said I could put him right if he was wrong. He went further, and not only said Liberals had no idea of interfering with these institutions, but gave a positive pledge in the name of the Liberal party, that they would not do so. I have always thought that the movement to establish the present school law, abolish all Catholic schools, against the strong protest of the minority was, under the circumstances, and in the face of that promise, a gross wrong. Personally I made no promise, but I felt as much bound by the pledge given as if I had given it myself.* I know that Mr. Greenway, the Premier, was a party to the giving of that promise.* I say that the pledge was given in the name of the Liberal party, for a party purpose, and that it did bind them under the circumstances in which it was made. Without that promise the party could not have carried that election, and by that election alone they attained to power. That power was obtained on the faith of that solemn pledge, and it was the Liberal party, as a party, that benefited thereby, and that accepted power and took advantage, for that purpose, of the votes given on the faith thereof.* I think we made a mistake and that we ought to retrace our steps and do what is right in this matter.

These pledges, publicly given to the Catholics of Manitoba under the circumstances above referred to, were renewed by Mr. Greenway, in his official capacity as the Premier of Manitoba. When he was forming his Government, he went to St. Boniface, and with the knowledge and consent of the leaders of his party, he promised His Grace, Mgr. Taché, through the Vicar General of the Archbishop, that his Government would not interfere with the rights and privileges of the minority in so far as their language, their schools, and their electoral divisions were concerned. And in evidence of this new pledge, I will read brief abstracts of two solemn declarations given, the first by the Vicar General, and the other by Mr. Alloway, then a political friend of Mr. Greenway :

The Hon. Mr. Greenway then stated to me that he had been called to form a new Government in this province, and that he was desirous to strengthen it by taking into his cabinet one of the French members of the legislature who would be agreeable to the Archbishop, whereupon I remarked that I did not think that His Grace would favour any French member joining the new administration unconditionally and without any previous understanding as to certain questions of great importance to His Grace. Mr. Greenway replied that he had already talked the matter over with his friends and that he (Mr. Greenway) was quite willing to guarantee, under his government, the maintenance of the then existing condition with regard.

1. To separate Catholic schools.
2. To the official use of the French language.
3. To the French electoral divisions.

* * * *

On the following morning, in pursuance of the appointment so made, I attended at the office of Mr. Alloway in Winnipeg, and then again met the said Hon. Thos. Greenway, and I then communicated to him the message of His Grace, so intrusted to me as above set out, and Mr. Greenway then expressed to me his personal gratification at the said message and attitude of His Grace, and he then assured me that faith would be kept by his Government with His Grace ; and then again, and in specific terms repeated to me the assurances that :—

1. The Catholic separate schools.
2. The official use of French language.
3. The number of French constituencies would not be disturbed during his administration.

I had promised not to violate the confidence of the Hon. Mr. Greenway, by disclosing the particulars of said promises and assurances by the said Mr. Greenway on the floor of the Legislature notwithstanding that he had violated the terms of same before that time, and but for such open denial by him of such promises and his misstatements of what took place, I would not have felt at liberty to now disclose the same.

Mr. W. F. Alloway was present at his office during the second interview with said Hon. Thos. Greenway, as above set out.

The following is the affidavit of Mr. Alloway :

I, William Forbes Alloway, of the city of Winnipeg, in the county of Selkirk, banker, do solemnly declare that I have seen and read the statutory declaration of the Very Rev. Vicar General Allard, made before Alex. Haggard, a Commissioner of the B. R., etc., on this first day of April, A.D. 1892, and I say that I was present as therein stated by him, and I did on said first occasion introduce the Hon. Thos. Greenway to the Vicar General, and I say that the account of said interview, as set out in said declaration of the Vicar General, is true in substance and in fact.

I was present at the whole of the said interview and heard all that transpired between the Vicar General and said Thos. Greenway.

I further say that I was present at my banking office on the following day when the Vicar General and the said Hon. Thos. Greenway met according to appointment made the day previous, and I heard most of the interview that took place between them on that second day, and I say that the promises and pledges as set out in the Vicar General's said statement were repeated on the said second interview, and the said Greenway then expressed himself as very much gratified with the attitude assumed by His Grace the Archbishop, towards his Government, and expressed such satisfaction not only then, but in my presence afterwards.

And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Act respecting extra-judicial oaths.

This is the history of the whole transaction and the origin of our troubles—no public good in view, but mere party advantages. Now, turning our eyes to the North-west Territories, I say that the pledges given in the name of Her Majesty, pledges to which I have referred above, should be sufficient to protect her loyal subjects, the Catholic population, against any encroachment upon their liberties. But there is something more. We find another pledge, we find a distinct agreement between the people of the North-west and this Dominion in the Act of this Parliament sanctioned in 1885. Section 14 of said Act declares in no uncertain terms the rights of the Catholics to their schools. Yet, you will see by the papers which will be produced on this motion, that the legislature of the North-west has respected neither the pledge nor the agreement. You will see that their recent legislation is simply an evasion of the law, thus adding derision to wrong.

I have now explained to you some of the circumstances under which our province and the north-west became part of the Dominion. You have in a brief form, some of the pledges that were given for the protection of the minority; you know the actual condition of things, and from all that you may well imagine why we are to-day so seriously aggrieved and you will forgive us if we vent our sentiments. The provincial pledges, the federal pledges, the imperial pledges themselves and all the most solemn agreements have been disregarded, and a large proportion of Her Majesty's subjects are subjected to the most iniquitous injuries, against the peace and prosperity of the country, to the damage of its good renown, and for what? Only to get, as has been said by Mr. Fisher, party advantages; I know that some other reasons are given, but they do not bear examination.

It is not, perhaps, the proper time to go fully into these objections. With the kind permission of the House, I will briefly refer to them in order to elucidate the situation, and with the hope of dispelling some misapprehensions. In the first place I may mention the reproach very frequently made against our schools of not being adequate to the requirements of modern education. In answer to that let me simply read to you the programme of our schools:

1. Religious instruction in the child's language.
2. Reading.
3. Spelling.
4. Grammar and analysis.
5. Composition.

(2–5: In French and English.)

6. Penmanship.
7. Linear drawing.
8. Calculation, arithmetic, mensuration and algebra.
9. Bookkeeping, single and double entry.
10. Geography of all parts of the world.
11. Sacred history, history of Canada, England and France.
12. Good behaviour, politeness and becomingness.
13. Vocal music.
14. Useful knowledge, from the most rudimentary to the elements of physics, chemistry, agriculture and astronomy.
15. For the girls, domestic economy, sewing, embroidery, etc., etc.

Is not this programme sufficiently comprehensive for a primary school? I do not hesitate to say that most of the unprejudiced experts in pedagogics would look at this programme as one which could not be extended without danger of overturning into cramming, the most disastrous system for the health and the intellect of the child.

Moreover, allow me to state that at a provincial exhibition held at Portage la Prairie, in Manitoba, our schools got a diploma for general excellency. Allow me to state also that at the London Colonial Exhibition, eleven of our schools sent exhibits, which were the ordinary work and exercises of the schools, and the result was that medals and diplomas of merit were awarded to nine of those eleven schools. And the character of our exhibit at the Chicago Fair should not be ignored. There, by friends and foes, by English, French and German visitors, by the United States educationists, by our own people, by experts of all countries, and finally by the official judges in that section, the Catholic school exhibits have been proclaimed to be in the front rank of the educational display of the whole world. Surely this evidence should receive the utmost consideration, and at least should cause the enemies of our institutions to pause before allowing their hostility to go so far that the word injustice is not too strong to qualify it. The statement has also been made that our schools were church schools, and under the control of the hierarchy.

This is altogether a misapprehension. There has not been for years any such things in Canada as church schools, in so far as primary education is concerned; except, however, in mission countries where no other schools can be had. In Manitoba especially, our schools were purely public schools in every sense of the word, like the other schools then in existence in the province. They were not controlled by the church but by the parents. They existed by virtue of the same law and under exactly the same conditions as the schools attended by the Protestant children. The only things which were subject to the approval of the church authorities were the books in connection with religious and moral instruction. Surely this cannot be refused to the church, which is the proper authority in the matter, and the state instead of objecting to that should, on the contrary, be thankful to the church for its care— because high and sound morals constitute a blessing to the state in all its civil and political manifestations.

In fact, in all our contentions, what we claim is not church schools, but parental schools.

It is the duty of parents to care for their children, and to educate them. Since it is a duty they must have the right of accomplishing that duty. It would be an absurdity, a derision or a tyranny to tell me that I am bound to perform a certain duty, and at the same time to put in my way such obstacles as would take from me the liberty or the possibility of performing the same. The State cannot interfere to curtail the rights of the parents. But it can undertake to assist the parents in their duty. Neither the church nor the parents have ever refused to the state its legitimate interference. Everybody is in accord in wishing a large and intelligent diffusion of knowledge. Taking into consideration the circumstances surrounding modern communities, the church and the parents admit the assistance of the state in that noble work. They admit that the State has an interest in the education of the people. They admit that the State has a right to see that the assistance given is not misapplied, they admit that the State has a right to exact a full compensation in the form of knowledge, outside of religious instruction, for the money they hand over to the parents to help the latter in the fulfilment of the duties imposed upon them by nature and their religious convictions. As a matter of fact, they only retain practically now-a-days the right of guiding the morals of their children and of teaching them how to worship their God upon this earth. Thus understood, there is no inconsistency in our theory, there is no clashing between the rights of the parents and the right of the State. On the contrary, there is a fruitful and harmonious accord which has its continual and delightful echoes in the hearts of all good citizens and brings them together and contributes to the national unity.

This brings me to the consideration of another assertion. It is frequently heard that in educating the children of all denominations together in the common schools, or in the so-called national schools, harmony would result amongst all classes of the people. The theory may be a laudable one, but facts go against it. By forcing people together against their will, you may form a crowd, a mass, a multitude, but that is not social or national unity. Unity does not consist in uniformity of colour or calling. It rather depends upon a common love for our country, a common devotedness to its interests. Now, we deny to all the right to say that we do not love our Canadian home, that we are not devoted to its best interests. Harmony is desired. Most sincerely we long for the day which will see harmony restored. But cast a look upon the countries where such school questions are raised. Harmony does not exist in those countries. Within our own borders, what do experience and history teach us?

In 1865, and for years previously, no harmony existed, just on account of the same sort of contentions. The leaders of the nation had to declare that extreme discord reigned and that the country was on the verge of anarchy. By the confederation measure those school questions were settled in accordance with justice, and immediately peace and harmony began to reign.

Previously to the raising of these questions in Manitoba and in the North-west complete harmony prevailed there. In evidence of this fact, I will quote from the writings of gentlemen whose testimony cannot in this respect, be suspected:

In 1882, Rev. Dr. G. Bryce wrote a book entitled "Manitoba, its infancy, growth and present condition." In that book he said:

> Lord Selkirk's scheme of perfect religious equality and toleration is that still subsisting in Manitoba. One of the results of this is a friendly feeling subsisting between the different churches. Denominational rancour is one of the greatest hindrances to progress in a new country. It is satisfactory that there is no bone of contention to disturb the prevailing harmony. No church is given any place of precedence, except what its own energy and usefulness to the community at large secures for it.

The following is from a report addressed to the Lieutenant-Governor by Mr. J. B. Somerset, superintendent of Protestant schools, dated 29th April, 1886:

> It is gratifying to all lovers of good citizenship, as well as of educational progress, to note that from the organization of this system of management in 1871, at which period the Protestant schools numbered sixteen and the Catholics seventeen, to the present, there has been an almost entire absence of the friction and disagreement that have marked the progress of education in some of the sister provinces.

I will read another extract from Dr. Morrison, who is now in the lower provinces, but who at one time lived in the province of Manitoba. I take this extract from a speech of his published in the St. John Sun, 26th and 27th February, 1894. He said :

Throughout all these years, from 1871 until 1888, no complaint was ever made with the workings of the separate school system. No injustice was complained of by anybody in any public manner * * * * There was no Manitoba School question. The people, Protestant and Catholic alike, were perfectly contented with the school system as it then existed ; and the Protestant and Catholic population lived together in peace and harmony, and with perfect satisfaction with the school system as it then was.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Who is Dr. Morrison?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—He is a Protestant.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—He is a friend of Mr. Greenway, is he not?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I do not know. Now, can there be any doubt that we were then living in peace and harmony? But now, seek throughout our immense prairies, east and west, and tell me where union is to be found? Our country is in a spasmodic mood throughout, and it will be so until our grievances are equitably and constitutionally settled. No, harmony will not be restored, nor promoted by depriving us of our rights and of our religious liberty. Harmony will not be fostered by forcing us to educate our children in schools to which we object, but mutual regard will do it. Let every one cease to misrepresent our people, our institutions, our sentiments. Let every one cease to cast odium upon us, let every one refrain from spreading all kind of groundless accusations, and especially the undisguised accusation of disloyalty. This is, to say the least, particularly annoying and unfair to us.

I make here, as a Catholic and as a public man, the following statement : We do not owe any civil or political allegiance to the Pope. He is the head of our church, and as such we look on him as the pure fountain of truth with regard to morals and religious doctrine. But he is not, he does not pretend to be, and we do not regard him as our temporal sovereign. I make this statement without any qualification whatever, without any mental reservation, in perfect good faith, and without any apprehension of its being contradicted or disapproved of by any clerical authorities. I go further : Instead of disaffecting the Catholic subjects of Her Majesty against her rule, the Pope commands, and the Catholic doctrine teaches us full and absolute allegiance to our Most Gracious Queen, to her successors and to the British flag. Facts are in accord with the doctrine. And to prove what I say, I have only to refer to the daily behaviour of Catholic people and to Canadian history. Were it possible for those who are constantly arraigning the Catholics to attend our religious services, they would see every Sunday the Catholic people kneeling before the altar and publicly praying the Almighty to bless and to save our gracious Queen. Going back to the time of the American revolution, what do we find? It was only a few years after the surrender of New France to England; there were still living people who had seen the white flag floating at the top of the Quebec citadel and who had fought under it. Lafayette made his voice heard amongst us. He urged our forefathers to join in the rebellion against British rule. That was a French voice, and it sounded like the trumpet of liberty, yet it had no echo. We listened to another voice—the voice of the Catholic Church. Bishop Briand, of Quebec, reminded his flock of the duties of a loyal people, and we remained faithful to our new masters. Again in 1812 and 1813, our southern neighbours marched against Canada. But again also the voice of the Catholic Church was heard. The great Bishop Plessis, the same who, on the request of Lord Selkirk, sent missionaries to the North-west to help that good Presbyterian to establish a colony under British rule, sent a pastoral upholding the rights that England had to our allegiance, and urging our militia to go to the front, and to the front we went, under the command of the illustrious de Salaberry. We saved Canada to England, as we had saved it some 35 years before. Yes, on these two occasions we upheld the British honour and the British flag. Had we joined the rebels of the thirteen colonies, England could not then have saved Canada any more than she could Boston and the surrounding states, and the British power would then have sunk for ever on this continent. In support of these ideas allow me to quote a remarkable paragraph which is to be found in a letter of Lord Nugent, published in 1826 :

Canada, which, until you can destroy the memory of all that now remains to you of your sovereignty on the North American Continent, is an answer practical, memorable, difficult to be accounted for, but blazing as the sun itself in sight of the whole world, to the whole charge of divided allegiance. At your conquest of Canada, you found it Roman Catholic: you had to choose for her a constitution in Church and State. You were wise enough not to thwart public opinion. Your own conduct towards Presbyterianism in Scotland was an example for imitation; your own conduct towards Catholicism in Ireland was a beacon for avoidance; and in Canada you established and endowed the religion of the people. Canada was your only Roman Catholic colony. Your other colonies revolted; they called on a Catholic power to support them, and they achieved their independence. Catholic Canada, with what Lord Liverpool would call her half-allegiance, alone stood by you. She fought by your side against the interference of Catholic France. To reward and encourage her loyalty, you endowed in Canada bishops to say mass and to ordain others to say mass, whom, at that very time, your laws would have hanged for saying mass in England: and Canada is still yours in spite of Catholic France, in spite of her spiritual obedience to the pope, in spite of Lord Liverpool's argument, and in spite of the independence of all the States that surround her. This is the only trial you have made. Where you allow to the Roman Catholics their religion undisturbed, it has proved itself to be compatible with the most faithful allegiance. It is only where you have placed allegiance and religion before them as a dilemma that they have preferred (as who will say they ought not?) their religion to their allegiance. How then stands the imputation? Disproved by history, disproved in all states where both religions co-exist, and in both hemispheres, and asserted in an exposition by Lord Liverpool, solemnly and repeatedly abjured by all Catholics, of the discipline of their Church.—Lord Nugent's letter, pp. 35, 36.

Have those sentiments and conditions undergone any change in the latter part of this century? To any one having doubts on this matter I am in a position to point to the action of our missionaries in the far west, in that very portion of our territory whence the troubles come.

In 1869-70, a first insurrection arose in the North-west. Archbishop Taché was in Rome attending the solemn deliberations of the Vatican Council. You may well imagine, honourable gentlemen, what a source of delights it was for an old christian missionary to be in the Eternal City at a time when bishops from all parts of the world were gathered there in the interest of their church. Yet, as soon as the Canadian and Imperial Governments had expressed their earnest desire of availing themselves of his services for restoration of peace and of the legitimate authority, he went at once to the Holy Father, who, in giving him the necessary dispensation, blessed him, blessed the mission that he had just accepted from the civil authority, and blessed also the flock of the old bishop, but that flock he blessed only on condition that they were to listen to the Bishop's advice, to go back to their homes and live in peace and charity under our flag. Finally the old Bishop left Rome and returned to his own country. In Ottawa he met the Governor General who remitted him a letter in which we read these significant words:

> I am anxious to express to you, before you set out, the deep sense of obligation which I feel is due to you for giving up your residence at Rome * * * and undertaking in this inclement season the long voyage across the Atlantic, and long journey across this continent for the purpose of rendering service to Her Majesty's Government, and engaging in a mission in the cause of peace and civilization. Lord Granville was anxious to avail of your valuable assistance from the outset, and I am heartily glad that you have proved willing to afford it so promptly and generously.

After he had received his instructions the Bishop proceeded to the North-west, and peace was restored, and the dignity of the Crown upheld. Does this resemble anything like divided allegiance?

In 1885, at the time of the second rebellion, the Church again, by its missionaries, was the main influence which kept in peace the majority of the inhabitants. The following is a re-translation from a French translation of an article in the Evening News, of Winnipeg:

> When the whole of Canada feared and trembled to see the Blackfeet side with the rebels, who firmly stood before them? who prevented them from rushing upon us? Was it the Canadian Government or the forces of the empire? No, the poor, humble and devoted Father Lacombe was the man who did so? To him the Canadian mothers owe their thanks for not having to-day to mourn their sons; to him, many happy wives today owe their gratitude for not having to sob over the tombs of their husbands. Lacombe and his companions, the Fathers André, Fourmond, Cochin, and other brave soldiers of the Cross, did not hesitate; they went and faced the deadly weapons; they threw themselves between the Indians and the Canadian people, at a time when danger was extreme, and they prevented the shedding of blood and saved millions of dollars to the public treasury.

Prevented shedding of blood and saved millions to the treasury! and for that blood and for those millions of dollars which have been spared to the country, these very men, and their flocks, in the very field of their labours and services, are now accused of dividing their allegiance, of refusing to work in harmony and for the interest of their country, they are tracked as helots, they are ostracised in their own country which they have so bravely and so devotedly served, and their vested rights are confiscated! That is their reward, and by whom has that mischief been done? By some who have themselves been saved from the fury of the Indians, and by some others, new comers, young men, inexperienced young politicians, full of presumption but forgetful of the services of those who have kept the country for them and prepared their bright future and their lovely homes. Shall Canada be a party to that questionable gratitude?

In vain the opponents of our Catholic schools try to misguide public opinion by appealing to national sentiment and by styling their system a national one. In a christian country no others than christian schools can be called national schools. To call national a system of atheistic schools in a country where christian rule obtains, would be a misnomer. As a matter of fact, the struggle is not between the different christian denominations, but between christianity and atheism, and we are fighting the battle of christianity. Speaking in the House of Lords in 1891, in connection with the Australian schools, the Duke of Argyll —a Presbyterian, if I am not mistaken— testified to this sincere and fundamental feature of our action in the following words:

> The Catholics had the high honour of standing alone and refusing to pull down in their schools the everlasting standard of conscience. This resistance on the part of the Roman Catholics, I believe, may be the germ of a strong reaction against the pure secularism, against which I venture to call the pure paganism, of the education of the colony.

But leave aside, if you will, that aspect of the question, what remain with the partisans of secularism! A mere theory! Now, with us it always remains a matter of conscience. Then which view should give way? Is it conscience that should give way to theory, or is it not rather theory that should give way to conscience? It seems to me that the answer cannot be doubtful. Allow me, hon. gentlemen, to urge upon your consideration the lesson that was given in antiquity by a man who still enjoys after centuries an uncontested reputation for wisdom. Solon, the Athenian legislator, was asked one day whether the laws that he had given to his people were the best laws that could be devised. "I may not have given to the Athenians," he replied, "the best laws that could perhaps be made, but I have given them the best laws that could be applied to them." This is an answer worthy of our consideration. It shows that our duties are not to make the people for the laws, but to make the laws for the people. It reminds me of a few words of the late Hon. Alex. Mackenzie, speaking on the school question. He said:

> For many years after I held a seat in the Parliament of Canada, I waged war against the principle of separate schools. I hoped to be able—young and inexperienced in politics as I then was—to establish a system to which all would ultimately yield their assent. Sir, it was found to be impracticable in operation and impossible in political contigencies.

I am now coming to a close. I have brought to your recollection the condition of the country previous to confederation. I have laid before your eyes the noble example given by the fathers of confederation in rising above their political divisions for the sake of getting their country out of the existing discords, and of replacing it in the path of harmony and prosperity; I have pointed out the spirit in which our constitution was framed; I have recalled the pledges that were given to the minorities in all parts of the Dominion, including Manitoba and the North-west, for the protection of their rights and usages; I have thought it my duty to call your attention to the unwarranted way these pledges have been violated; I have tried to dispel certain misapprehensions which seem to exist in the minds of many. Now, let me impress upon your mind the difficulties which are in store for us, if we do not settle in an equitable and constitutional way the burning and irritating question which has been forced into our political controversies.

There is no use of trying to evade our responsibility. Sooner or later we will have to face the difficulties. The Catholics of the whole Dominion will follow the matter from step to step; if necessary they will take their case to the Imperial Government and even to the foot of the Throne; our children and their mothers will send their prayers to our beloved Queen, who has honoured the throne not only as a Queen and as a woman, but also as a mother. In my humble opinion both parties are under peculiar obligations with regard to these questions and their solution. There is a binding obligation upon the administration of the day on account of their being in office and of the responsibility they are under for the good government of the country. The Opposition are also bound—and here I beg to remark that I do not speak in a spirit of antagonism—the Opposition are bound on account of the initial action of their friends and political associates in Manitoba. In the latter province the Reform party is the cause of all the existing discord and mischief. For party advantages they have violated in an unworthy way their promises and pledges. As Mr. Fisher has said, "they have made a mistake ; they ought to retrace their steps and do what is right," and their political friends here are bound to use their ability and influence for the repairing of the ruin made by their party in Manitoba. That is their special responsibility. There is a common responsibility on both sides in Parliament. The Canadian Parliament, as a whole, is the custodian of the honour and dignity of the country. Now, for four years the public good faith, the honour of the country has been in jeopardy ; it is our common duty to put an end to such a situation.

Under those circumstances, is it too much to expect that both parties should, for once, join hand in hand, and provide an equitable settlement of our grievances? Is it too much to hope for a repetition of what took place at the time of confederation? Then the party leaders joined together for the sake of the harmony, prosperity, and stability of British institutions. The difficulties they had to face then are meeting us to-day, and I feel confident that the statesmen at present at the head of the two great parties in this Parliament would not consent to take an inferior rank in intelligence and patriotism? This time our present regime cannot be changed. We have to solve our difficulties by the application of the true principles of the constitution with a firm determination of carrying out in all fairness the rules of equity to all as laid down in the debates on confederation in 1865, and according to the subsequent pledges and agreements. In my humble opinion, the future of the country lies in the gradual and normal development of confederation under the rules of justice, toleration, liberty, and fair play, and in the honest redemption all over the land of such pledges as those outlined in these words of Sir John Rose :

> We trusted each other when we entered this union ; we felt that our rights would be saved with you ; and our honour and good faith and integrity are involved in and pledged to the maintenance of them.

Unless we act in the spirit of these utterances, unless that trust is faithfully and honourably kept and carried on in accordance with the well known agreements entered into, and of the true spirit of the constitution, unless the dignity of the Crown is maintained by the prompt and unequivocal redemption of the pledges given on its behalf, no one can say that the future historians will not have to relate the failure of confederation, in so far at least as are concerned its ability and power to check injustice and to protect the minorities whose rights and privileges have been intrusted to the loyalty and generosity of the majority. But to those who would like to prevent such an unfortunate issue, to those who generously, sincerely and loyally desire to join with us to maintain this confederation, to uphold its integrity, to foster and increase its prosperity, to maintain peace and union between all the different classes which compose the people of this Dominion, to assure the stability of Canadian and British institutions on this soil, to those we gladly and cheerfully say: "Tender us your hands, here are ours."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 6.10 p.m.

THE DOWNEY DIVORCE CASE.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN, from the Committee on Divorce, presented their first report relating to the Downey Divorce case. He said: It was found impossible to effect personal service on the respondent in this case. Efforts were made to bring the matter to his notice by serving members of the family, who were supposed to be in communication with him—by advertising in the papers and otherwise endeavouring to discover his whereabouts. It was found impossible to serve him personally and, under the circumstances, we consider the service sufficient. I propose to move the adoption of the report presently.

Hon. Mr. POWER. I hope the Chairman will have no objection to allowing the report to stand over until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN. None whatever. I move that the report be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

The Notice of Motion being read,

That he will call the attention of the Senate to certain promises made and certain engagements solemnly undertaken, at and in respect of the Confederation, but before its adoption, upon various subjects and particularly upon the question of education; also to the non-performance of these engagements; and to the difficulties which exist at the present time and those which have existed at various times since the Confederation became an accomplished fact, difficulties which are the consequence of these violations of promises and engagements.

And that he will inquire of the Government whether it proposes to take the necessary steps to remedy these difficulties and to render justice to that class of Her Majesty's subjects who suffer from these violations of promises.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said: On Monday last I said that I would give way to the hon. member from St. Boniface, and after hearing his speech, I would decide whether I should go on with this motion or not. The speech of the hon. gentleman yesterday leaves very little for me to say on this question, at the present time at all events, and nothing of great importance. I may, on some future occasion, refer to this matter again, but I have no present intention of doing so, and I therefore ask the House to allow the motion to drop.

The notice was dropped.

MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST SCHOOL ACTS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being read,

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Bernier:—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, copies of all school ordinances, school regulations and amendments thereto, adopted by the Legislative Assembly, the Executive, and any Board or Council of Education, in reference to the establishment, maintenance and administration of schools in the North-west Territories since 1885;

Also for copies of all petitions, memorials and correspondence in reference thereto;

Also, for copies of all reports to the Governor General in Council and all communications and representations to the authorities in the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: The subject referred to in the motion made by the hon. senator from St. Boniface is one which has excited a good deal of attention, not alone in Manitoba and the North-west, but over all parts of this Dominion. A very considerable body of Her Majesty's subjects feel that a right which they considered had been effectually secured by the British North America Act and by subsequent legislation has been rudely withdrawn and as hon. gentlemen are aware the subject is now being discussed through the public press and is likely to be discussed in another branch of the Parliament. The attack on the Manitoba separate schools has been successful. The school system that had been guaranteed by the Act under which Manitoba came into the union has been swept away. The guardians of the rights of the minority seemed powerless, apparently, to counteract the movement. Emboldened by the success there, the same process, to a very nearly equal degree, was attempted and I am sorry to say has been partially successful in the North-west. Those who are opposed to what is known as the system of separate schools, further emboldened by the repeated successes that have attended the efforts of those who are so intolerent as to oppose the existence of those schools, have now attacked the citadel in Ontario. As hon. gentlemen are probably aware, a bill has already been introduced in the Legislature of Ontario having for its object the crippling of the school system in that province so far as the rights of the minority are concerned. Under those conditions and circumstances it requires no apology from me if I go at some considerable length into this subject in order that hon. gentlemen who are perhaps not familiar with this question may be fully advised of the present condition of the subject. Before doing so, however, I think it is due to the hon. Senator from St. Boniface that I should offer him my congratulations on the admirable speech to which we were treated yesterday afternoon. I am sure it will be admitted that he took a calm, dispassionate view of the subject. He might be pardoned for exhibiting some degree of heat, coming as he did from the province where the rights of the minority have been so flagrantly violated as in the case to which he so fully referred. There are a number of points not covered by the observations and speech of that hon. gentleman yesterday, to which I shall feel it my duty to call the attention of this House, satisfied that the calm judgment of all fair-minded men will go with me in the conclusion that I have reached, that a gross breach of the constitution has been perpetrated. As a preliminary it is necessary that we should understand the condition of things that existed anterior to Manitoba's coming into the Union. As hon. gentlemen are no doubt aware, the settlements in the North-west were largely made in the first instance by French-Canadians and it is on that account, probably, that our French-Canadian friends from Lower Canada feel more keenly on the subject than the minority in any other province of the Dominion. Contemporaneous with the advent of the missionaries and with the civilization of the Indians, schools were established, and we have records at a very early date of the existence of those schools, and when Lord Selkirk's settlers went into that country they followed the example of the Catholic missionaries and established denominational schools in connection with their churches. So far back as 1825, so marked were the advantages already derived from the education given by the Catholic missionaries, that on the second day of July the chief factors of the Hudson Bay Company assembled in council at York Factory, passed the following resolution :—

> Great benefit being experienced from the benevolent and indefatigable exertion of the Catholic mission at Red River, in the welfare and moral and religious instruction of its numerous followers ; and it being observed with much satisfaction that the influence of the mission under the direction of the Right Reverend Bishop of Juliopolis has been uniformly directed to the best interest of the settlement and of the country at large, it is resolved That, in order to mark our appreciation of such laudable and disinterested conduct on the part of said mission, it be recommended to the honourable committee, that a sum of sixty pounds per annum be given towards its support.

Thus we find that so early as that period, the only sovereignty that existed in that country contributed to the support of the schools. In the year 1857 Professor Yule Hind who, as hon. gentlemen are aware, made a very elaborate report on the condition of things in Manitoba and the North-west, reported in chapter 10 of his work :

> Education is in a far more advanced state in the colony (Assiniboia) than its isolation and brief career might claim for it under the peculiar circumstances in which the country has been so long placed. There are seventeen schools in the settlement, generally under the supervision of the ministers of the denomination to which they belong.

Further on :

> All of the foregoing establishments are independent of the Sunday schools properly so-called in connection with the different churches.

Then the Bishop of Rupert's Land reports with reference to their school money :

> The sources of income vary much ; ten out of the thirteen schools are connected with the Church Missionary Society. * * * * *
> In the other schools about one-half may be paid by the society, sometimes less, and the rest is made up by the parents of the children. * * *
> The sum paid by parents is fifteen shillings a year ; when Latin is taught one pound. * *
> The parochial school connected with my own church is equal to most parochial schools which I have known in England.

Then there were two Presbyterian schools which were thus referred to by the Rev. Mr. Black in a letter :

> First, then, as to the school : it is entirely supported by the people of the district, or rather by those of them who send their children to it. You are aware that we have no public school system in the colony, and this, like the rest, is therefore essentially a denominational school.

There is no manner of doubt—it is practically admitted in the case that went to the Privy Council, that denominational schools in the fullest and freest acceptation of the word existed at the time in Manitoba and the North-west. The term "denominational schools" is a familiar one to all gentlemen who are at all intimate with the early history of Canada ; it is a very well known expression to those of us who had seats in the old Parliament of Canada. Since 1841 this question of denominational schools and separate schools has been discussed. There is no uncertainty about what it means. All those who had to do with the question, and all representative men in both chambers in earlier years thoroughly comprehended what the meaning of denominational and separate schools was. There can be no possible doubt upon that subject. Then the next question that we ought to consider fairly is, was it, at the time that Manitoba came into the Union, thoroughly understood that those denominational schools, as they then existed, were to be preserved and continued for all time to come? Was that a part of the charter that was given to Manitoba? In order to do that I will just quote some official documents and I think I will satisfy hon. gentlemen that so far as those who may be considered the promoters of the movement, and so far as those who were the actors in ratifying the agreement were concerned, they themselves left nothing undone to carry out what was considered at the time a fair and equitable settlement of the question in reference to Manitoba and that territory.

Now, in 1869, at the time when we were agitating for the union of Manitoba and the North-west, we had paid our money and were trying to get possession of the country. The home Government had shown a very large interest in the subject, as in all questions of that kind, where the rights of colonists are concerned, they have invariably taken a fatherly interest in the matter. We had endeavoured to bring about the desired result by friendly methods by the interposition of those who had the confidence of the people, and to bring it about by methods of peace. On the 6th December, 1869, Lord Granville, then Secretary for the Colonies, sent a despatch to the Governor General advising the issue of a proclamation assuring the people of the North-west that their rights should be preserved. I quote the exact language of the proclamation issued by Sir John Young:

> By Her Majesty's authority I do therefore assure you in union with Canada all your civil and religious rights will be respected.

Now there is no uncertain sound about that. It speaks as plainly as the English language can convey an idea. On the strength of that, and with a view of bringing about an arrangement, delegates were named in the North-west. They were Judge Black, Father Richot and Alfred Scott. They came to Ottawa; I perfectly recollect the event myself. I was here at the time and remember it. There was very considerable feeling all over the country in consequence of the events that were then transpiring in Manitoba, in Fort Garry, and a very few days after they arrived in Ottawa Scott and Father Richot were arrested. What was the effect of that? The home Government cabled out immediately to the Governor General asking whether it was with the sanction of the Government of Canada that the delegates were arrested. This Government promptly replied that it was not, and they intervened and the two delegates were discharged. Judge Black did not come at the time, but Father Richot and Scott did. They met Sir Geo. Cartier and the late Sir John Macdonald, who acted on behalf of the Federal Government, and they had their conferences at Ottawa day by day. On the 23rd April Lord Granville feeling anxious about the matter cabled to the Governor General to accept the decision of Her Majesty's Government in all particulars of the Settlers' Bill of Rights, referring to the Bill of Rights that the delegates had brought down and which had been agreed upon at Fort Garry before they left. If anybody takes the trouble to analyse this Bill of Rights he will find that a large portion, referring to the language, the schools and the lands, is embodied in the Manitoba Act, evidently showing that those who drew up the Manitoba Act were also familiar with the Bill of Rights. The 7th clause in the Bill of Rights provides:

> That the schools be separate and that the public money for schools be distributed among the different religious denominations in proportion to their respective populations according to the system of the province of Quebec.

That was the system then in existence in the province. It was only natural, as they had lived in peace and harmony among themselves, and as there never had been any disagreement among the different churches, that they should desire to perpetuate that kind of fraternal feeling, and so that section formed one of the clauses of the Bill of Rights. The 16th clause provides that the English and French languages shall be used in the legislature and the courts, and that the Acts of the legislature shall be published in both languages. The language of the Manitoba Act on that subject is almost identical with that of the Bill of Rights, showing that the Bill of Rights was an important factor in those negotiations. Now those gentlemen were here during the month of April, and in that month the conferences took place. On May 3rd, a cablegram from the Governor General to Lord Granville stated :

Negotiations with delegates closed satisfactorily.

On receipt of that, Lord Granville sent the following despatch :

I am glad to learn that the proceedings adopted against the Rev. Mr. Richot and Mr. Scott were promptly disposed of and not renewed, and I take this opportunity of expressing the satisfaction with which I have learned from your telegram of 3rd inst. that the Canadian Government and the delegates have come to an understanding as to the terms on which the settlement of the Red River should be admitted into the Dominion.

Can anything be more specific and definite? It is clear that the Imperial Government understood the situation thoroughly. The matter was discussed by the public press. I know there was a great deal of hostility shown because the Government had recognized those gentlemen as delegates. They thought it was better to do so with a view to acquiring that territory in a peaceable way, and endeavouring to sooth the animosity of people that had been raised by other circumstances. Some papers commented on it in an unfriendly manner. The Globe of May 7th has this editorial on the subject, commenting on the fact of the delegates being listened to at Ottawa :

The constitution proposed for Manitoba must evidently have been submitted to Messrs. Black, Richot and Scott, before coming before Parliament at all; as they graciously approved, no further trouble was anticipated.

That was before the Bill was considered in the House of Commons. On 5th May Earl Granville read a telegram in the House of Lords, after the introduction of the Bill—so anxious was the Government to feel that they had the approval of the Imperial Government, and knowing the interest they took in the friendly and equitable solution of the question. The despatch was from Sir Francis Hincks to Sir John Rose, and was as follows :

Ruperts Bill passing Commons, concurred in by delegates and Canadian party—in fact by all in territory.

That was the conclusion. The delegates had finished the conference and the bill was before the House of Commons, and it was then going through. That was on 3rd of May. It came up for its second reading on the 10th May. I quote from the Parliamentary Debates of 1870:

After several clauses of the bill had been discussed and voted on Mr. Oliver moved that the educational clause be struck out.

Hon. Mr. CHAUVEAU hoped the amendment would not be carried. It was desirable to protect the minority in Manitoba from the great evil of religious dissensions on education. There could be no better model to follow in that case than the Union Act, which gave full protection to minorities. It was impossible to say who would form a majority there, Protestants or Catholics. If the population were to come from over the seas, then the Protestants would be in a majority. If as had been asserted, Manitoba was to be a French preserve, the Catholics would be a majority. He did not care which, because he desired only to see the new province freed from discussions, which had done so much injury in the old provinces of Canada. They presented a problem to the whole world, and the question was, could not two Christian bodies, almost equally balanced, be held together under the British Constitution. He believed that the problem could be worked out successfully.

Now Mr. Macdougall was an opponent and had been an opponent of separate schools all his life. He had opposed the separate school Bill which was carried by myself in 1863. He was opposed to the principle of the bill, but voted for it on the third reading. Mr. Macdougall said :

The effect of the clause if not struck out would be to fix laws which the Local Legislature could not alter in the future.

Mr. Macdougall was one of the gentlemen engaged in the drafting of the British North America Act; he had attended the convention at London and Quebec, and was perfectly familiar with every clause of it. Mr. Macdougall knew what the effect would be, and the House knew it. They did not vote on an uncertainty; they voted with a perfect knowledge that if this motion were rejected, then for all time to come—except through the intervention of the provinces and the Imperial Government—the separate schools, both Protestant and Catholic, would continue to exist in that province. Mr. Macdougall advised that it should be struck out; he thought it better to go to the Provincial Legislature and let them settle it. That was his view :

Sir George Cartier referred to the manner in which the Red River country had been settled, and grants of land which had been made to the clergy for the purposes of education.

Mr. Mackenzie was prepared to leave the matter to be settled exclusively by the local legislatures, and he thought it better it should be relegated to them. Mr. Mackenzie lived long enough to feel that his view expressed on that occasion was wrong. He subsequently admitted in Parliament, on several occasions, that it was entirely a mistake. When in the Parliament of Canada, he had always opposed separate schools; but in after years he supported that system as best for a mixed community like ours. However, the question was debated, and no language could put it more tersely than Mr. Macdougall puts it :

> If Oliver's motion was not struck out, the effect would be to fix laws which the local legislatures could not alter in the future.

A vote was taken, and eighty-three voted against it and thirty-four for it ; the majority was more than double, and it is gratifying to feel that there was a majority of the Protestants in the House of Commons opposed to Mr. Oliver's proposition to deprive Manitoba of its schools. It cannot be said that it was imposed on Manitoba by a Lower Canadian vote. Among the Protestants who voted for it were Archibald, Bown, Burton, Cameron (a distinguished gentleman who was at one time a Grand Master of an important order, but whose prejudice never carried him so far as to refuse to recognize the rights of the minority), Campbell, Carling, Gibbs, Hincks, Pope, Shanley, Tilley and others. Now these gentlemen knew what they were voting for. My hon. friend, the leader of the House, when he cast his vote, must have known perfectly well what he was voting against. There was not the least uncertainty about it. That was the only vote taken upon it and when the Bill came up again it was allowed to pass unchallenged in the House and then it came up to the Senate. Now the Senate discussed several clauses of the bill. They did not, however, interfere with that clause ; they took no vote on it, but allowed it to pass, so that this House unanimously approved of the clause, because public attention had been called to it ; it was discussed in the newspapers and the minority's rights were not challenged there. The papers discussed it. I do not find any hostile position taken by any of the papers. The Toronto Globe, which now takes a very strong attitude on the subject, had an article 10 days after, calling attention to the educational clause. The House rose a few days after the Bill passed, I think the 12th May, and in giving a résumé of the business of the session the Globe of May 23rd has the following observations in reference to the educational clause, put in language which means the same, but which is more convincing from the fact that it differs verbally from those in the Act itself :

> It is specially enacted that no law shall be passed by the Provincial Legislature injuriously affecting in any way denominational schools, Catholic or Protestant. An appeal against any educational act that infringes upon this proviso will be to the Governor in Council, and if powers are required to enforce his decision, the Parliament of Canada may be invoked to compel due compliance by an act for the purpose.

That is what the Globe said ; put it in plain English. There is no protest against it, no declaration that the establishment of denominational schools is a violation of the rights of British subjects. All parties accepted it. Now in order to show that all parties for years afterwards considered the case settled beyond all question, I will call attention to some remarkable utterances. In 1875 we had the North-west Territories Bill, under which separate schools were established there before us in this chamber. I had charge of it. Reference was made in that debate to the advantage of settling this question, and we pointed to the instance of our dealing with the question so far as Manitoba was concerned, and congratulated ourselves that it never could arise in Manitoba, that we had settled it so solidly, so sacredly and so perfectly that it could not cause trouble there. I will quote from the speech of the hon. member from Richmond first. Speaking of the powers of Parliament, Mr. Miller said :

> Parliament had an undoubted right under these circumstances to make such provisions regarding the question of education, or any other question, for this new territory, as in its wisdom it thought best for the future peace and well being of the country. The difficulties they had already encountered in the old provinces in regard to education should be a warning to them to prevent similar troubles arising in the provinces they hoped to see spring up in the North-west. This policy had been applied to Manitoba, and who can deny that that course had been wise, and would save that province from all the discord and bitter agitation throughout which the older provinces were either passing or had already passed. It was unfortunate that the Act of Union had not settled the educational rights of all the old provinces on a just and liberal basis, as had been done in Ontario and Quebec.

Remember this was only three or four years after we had settled the Manitoba question. We had some little time before been discussing the New Brunswick School Act, and the question had also cropped up with reference to Prince Edward Island when that province was coming into the Union. Those references therefore show most conclusively the unchanged opinion of the whole Dominion. No man arose to protest against it. All accepted it as conclusive, as absolute and as complete. Nothing could be more so. No language could be framed to give stronger expression to the wishes of Parliament, and to the views of those who were the chief actors in this agreement. When we dealt with that North-west question in 1875, there was a good deal of feeling, not in the North-west, but in some remote parts of the Dominion where they found fault with this Parliament for dealing with the question, and it was brought up in the Senate on two or three occasions. It was on a petition from New Brunswick, I believe, and a debate arose as to what we had done in the past in settling the question in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. The late Senator Girard, in 1876, said:

> If there was anything in the bill that afforded satisfaction to the people of the Territories, it was that provision. They had in Manitoba to do battle on this question, but they had been enabled to establish a basis which would do away with the difficulties that existed in the other parts of the Dominion.

Mr. Miller, like other hon. gentlemen, believed that it was settled irrevocably—that it could not arise again; that, as Mr. Macdougall pithily put it, the local Legislatures had nothing more to do with it; that if they did, there was an appeal to the Governor in Council. I am not aware that there was any agitation preceding this act of the Manitoba Legislature. The interesting dissertation given us by the hon. member from St. Boniface was news to me as to the trickery and fraud resorted to in connection with the foundation of this movement. It is greatly to be regretted, and the parties to it will one day have cause to regret their conduct. They will not enjoy hearing those words, which were uttered 1,800 years ago: "Blessed are the peacemakers for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Those who sow discord will verily reap their reward. There are intolerant men in all churches, Catholic as well as Protestant. It is our duty, and it is the duty of every man who loves his country and his fellow men, to set his face against movements of that kind. This country is broad enough for all of us to enjoy life to the fullest extent. We ought, in these matters which are dear to us, all to bear and forbear, where we cannot possibly agree. If we could agree on this question of religion in the schools, I, for one, would go in heartily for it, and have our children educated together, but we know it is impossible. It has been tried over and over again and failed. Is it not better that we should educate our children in the various religious professions of this country, and make them good citizens? All our christian churches teach religion and morality—teach men to be better. Is not a pious Catholic better than a bad Catholic? And so it is with all the denominations. (A laugh.) My hon. colleague from Rideau division treats the question with levity. I think it is a serious question, affecting not only the interests of our own population, but the interests of people in all lands. The trend of public opinion in all civilized countries is towards Christian education. I come now to the Manitoba Act. Let us see whether it carried out the agreement that was discussed by the delegates and the members of the Canadian Government. The Manitoba Act itself reads in this way:

> In and for the province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:—
> (1.) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

Now, if we come to the corresponding section of the British North America Act, it reads word for word like that, except the introduction of the word "practice" in the Manitoba Act. Now, why was that word introduced there? Was it not to meet the special conditions which existed in the Red River settlement? We all know that there was no law existing in that country except the law of the Hudson Bay Company, which was not a recognized one, not having been enacted by the people's representatives assembled in legislature, and therefore there was no law under which schools were established—they existed by practice. The word does not occur anywhere else. The word "practice," I think, was brought out in a discussion with regard to the New Brunswick schools. It commenced back in 1869, and I find that word used in a speech of the late Mr. Justice Grey who came from the province of New Brunswick. We know that denominational schools had been in existence in New Brunswick, in some parts of it by practice, but not recognized by law, and consequently the Parliament of this country, though they would have liked to carry out the views of the people, were unable to do so or to give any relief at the time. This word "practice" was introduced there. It was evidently considered the most suitable word under the circumstances. In the British North America Act there is an appeal to the Privy Council from any act affecting the rights of the Protestant and Catholic minorities. Even that was changed in the Manitoba Act. Parliament made it more specific. The appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of the legislature of the province. These words do not occur in the British North America Act. No other province that came in had those four words introduced in their Constitutional Act. They are peculiar to Manitoba alone, proving most conclusively that there was a jealous resolve on the part of the framers of the Act at the time that there should be a direct appeal to the Governor General in Council from any hostile decisions—that they were not to be forced into the courts—that the remedy was to be short and quick. Those words are very unusual. How did they occur? I think I know something of the history of them, inasmuch as the original words were introduced in an Act that I drafted in the year 1862 or 1863. I hold in my hand the original Act of 1863 with the print of Messrs. Desbarats and Cameron who were then the Queen's printers. The conferences I had in drawing up the Separate Schools Act in old Canada in 1861, 1862 and 1863, were chiefly with Dr. Ryerson. There was not on any occasion any clerical interference. It has been recently stated that when Parliament sat at Quebec, the Archbishop of Quebec interfered. I deny that. The conferences were held with Dr. Ryerson in the library, and it is due to his memory to say that I found him always ready to meet the wishes of the minority—that he exhibited no prejudice or bigotry, that had larger concessions been sought for, Dr. Ryerson would not have thrown any obstacle in the way. There was only one occasion when a clerical gentleman was present—the Rev. Mr. Macdonald, of Kingston, vicar general—and he was the only clerical gentleman who was present on any occasion at the framing of the clauses. I had circulars sent out to the trustees all over Ontario asking for suggestions and advice with a view to making the law more workable. Dr. Ryerson offered no impediment, but there was a strong feeling prevailing with Catholics that he was hostile to the Act. People believed that he was always decidedly against separate schools. I am not aware that, after this Act was passed, there was a single appeal under it. We had not in those days a Minister of Education, but we had Dr. Ryerson, the chief superintendent of education, and I drew up this clause :

> In the event of any disagreement between trustees of Roman Catholic separate schools and local superintendents of common schools, or other municipal authorities, the case in dispute shall be referred to the equitable arbitrament of the chief superintendent of education in Upper Canada, subject, nevertheless, to the appeal to the Governor in Council, whose award shall be final in all cases.

There is where the idea is taken for an appeal as provided in the British North America Act. It was only to be found in this particular Act and it was simply based on that idea that the chief superintendent was not friendly to the separate school system, which was a mistake, because he was sincerely anxious to do what was really fair to make the law workable. That is where the appeal comes in. It does not exist anywhere else. I intended the appeal to be prompt and direct. It was thought the Governor in Council would be the fairest tribunal and they would dispose of it at once. This Manitoba case went to our own Supreme Court. The late Chief Justice Ritchie and Mr. Justice Patterson gave written judgments upon it. That court was unanimous in regard to the correct interpretation of the act. Neither of those gentlemen can be accused of having Catholic proclivities, or being desirous to strain the law with a view to help the minority. Their judgment was clear, terse and positive and given without any hesitation. They knew the condition of things existing there, knew what denominational schools meant, because they were conversant with the history of this country. Unfortunately that court was not a final one; otherwise this agitation that has arisen over this new Act in the North-west, that has now become law, and the agitation in Ontario, would not have occurred. It is all due to the unfortunate decision of the Manitoba case by the Privy Council. Between 1863 and 1890 hon. gentlemen know very well that there was no agitation in this country in reference to the school question—none whatever. We all got on amicably together.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was the New Brunswick question?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am speaking of the old provinces of Canada. In New Brunswick there was an agitation and there was also one in Prince Edward Island. In the latter province the minority claimed, when they came into confederation, that denominational schools were in existence there. So they were, but not by force of law. I had to consider the question in conjunction with the then Minister of Justice. I was in the government at the time. They sent up their delegates here, and I pointed out to them that they came in under the British North America Act, which makes no provision for the rights of a minority except they existed under the law of the legislature before the union. I said to them: "You are not in the position of Manitoba, because there the schools in existence by practice are permitted, but in Prince Edward Island and British Columbia that is not the case. Those special provisions are only to be found in the Manitoba charter," and so we had to tell the delegates from Prince Edward Island that their case could not be considered. They thought it a very great grievance, because a bill which oppressed them very much had been introduced and passed there. We told them they would have to bear it and hope for a better condition of things. I believe since then a better condition of things has arisen—that the law passed in 1874 or 1875 was found to be too stringent and affected the minority there too seriously, and I think the legislature modified it, but the Federal authorities could give them no relief for the very reason that there was no provision for it in the British North America Act. Had it been known that such conditions existed in Prince Edward Island, no doubt it would have been arranged before the islands came into confederation. Had the educational clause in the Prince Edward Island charter been similar to the Manitoba charter, the rights of the minority would have been protected. The Manitoba case went to the Privy Council, which I think was exceedingly unfortunate. There is a very strong feeling that the judgment of the Privy Council is manifestly unfair, that the gentlemen who rendered it did not thoroughly comprehend the question—that they either did not take the trouble to look into it carefully, or the subject was so entirely fresh and new to them that they did not comprehend it, and they rendered a judgment contrary to the facts. It is illogical on the face of it, and has caused great hardship to the minority in Manitoba, and it has shocked the sensibilities of the Catholics of this Dominion. I think it is exceedingly unfortunate that there should still be an appeal to the Privy Council. When we were framing the Supreme Court Act it was pointed out that we could not cut off that appeal—that it was an appeal to the Sovereign which had existed from time immemorial, and that all subjects of the Crown had the right. Very well; if it was an appeal to the Sovereign, I would cheerfully support and maintain it. I am satisfied that had our beloved Sovereign read all the papers bearing on the case her conclusion would have been entirely different from that of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In early times, in Saxon days, before the Norman conquest, appeals from the subjects of the Crown lay direct to the Sovereign personally. The Sovereign held the court—it was the final appeal, and was a right that all were supposed to enjoy; but in modern times such an appeal does not exist—the judicial committee is no more than any other court, and therefore it is absurd for us to appeal to the Privy Council. As a matter of fact, the decisions of that court have been most unsatisfactory, not in this matter alone, but generally. The greatest uncertainty prevails. They are gentlemen who cannot be expected to take an interest in our affairs. They know very little of the circumstances of our country, and they have been guided, evidently, more by United States precedents than by colonial precedents. They have gone on the principle that the sovereign power lay with the provinces and not with the Dominion. We know how the United States Government was formed—that the states came together and formed a federal government, to which they gave up only a part of their sovereignty. Whatever they gave up to the central government became common to all. But in Canada it was just the reverse. We, under a written constitution, delegated to the several provinces certain specific powers. The residuum, whatever it may be, remains with the central power. If you take the decisions of the Privy Council during the last ten or fifteen years, you will find that in all cases it has been sustaining provincial rights—that has been the current of their decisions—evidently guided by United States precedents and authorities, not certainly interpreting the Canadian constitution truly, because under our constitution the provinces possess only what is given to them. Our constitution is definite and clear. When this matter was before the Privy Council, they admitted all the facts just as I have given them to you. They tersely narrate the condition of things in Manitoba. I have now the judgment of the Privy Council before me. They refer to the views of the several judges of our court, They state :

Ritchie, C. J., held that as Catholics could not conscientiously continue to avail themselves of the public schools as carried on under the system established by the Public Schools Act, 1890, the effect of that act was to deprive them of any further beneficial use of the system of voluntary Catholic schools which had been established before the union, and had thereafter been carried on under the state system introduced in 1871.

Patterson, J., pointed out that the words "injuriously affect" in section 22, subsection 1, of the Manitoba Constitutional Act, would include any degree of interference with the rights or privileges in question, although falling short of the extinction of such rights or privileges. He held that the impediment cast in the way of obtaining contributions to voluntary Catholic denominational schools by reason of the fact that all Catholics would, under the act, be compulsorily assessed to another system of education, amounted to an injurious affecting of their rights and privileges within the meaning of the sub-section.

Then they go on and quote the language of other judges all in the same direction. They narrate the circumstance of the existence of schools before confederation, they describe what those schools were, that wherever the Protestants had the majority they controlled their schools, and wherever the Catholics were in their majority they ruled theirs. They quote Archbishop Taché's statement which was uncontradicted, and admit all the facts just as they were given. Then they allude to the passing of the Act of 1871. That Act, which was passed immediately after Manitoba came in, was in the terms of the British North America Act, and made special provision for denominational schools. Now, is it not at all events a point that is worth noting, that immediately after this Manitoba Act was passed the Legislature, at its first meeting, established the denominational system of schools as laid down in the Act? Would not one fairly infer that they understood the question thoroughly there, and that they drew up this Act in harmony with the British North America Act, because the whole subject was fresh. It had been discussed in Parliament and in the press and the Local Legislature followed just in the lines of the Act. I need only call attention to the fact, it has been referred to so often ; but the Privy Council advert to that, and they say they do not think they could very well take judicial notice of that, although it is a very strong point. They quite admit that it ought to have its influence, but still they do not consider themselves bound to take note of the fact that immediately after confederation, and at the very beginning of the first session, an Act was passed recognizing denominational schools and making allotments to the different classes as provided for in the British North America Act. They quote it, however, but say that they do not think it binds them : and they quote also the Act of 1881, which is all in the same direction, carrying out the Act of 1875, making further and better provision. Their lordships say :

From the year 1876 until 1890, enactments were in force declaring that in no case should a Protestant ratepayer be obliged to pay for a Roman Catholic school, or a Roman Catholic ratepayer for a Protestant school.

Their lordships explained the school system as it existed before Manitoba came into the union :

The practice which prevailed in Manitoba before the union is also a matter on which all parties are agreed.

The statement on the subject by Archbishop Taché, the Roman Catholic archbishop of St. Boniface, who has given evidence in Barrett's case, has been accepted as accurate and complete.

There existed, he says, in the territory now constituting the province of Manitoba a number of effective schools for children.

These schools were denominational schools, some of them being regulated and controlled by the Roman Catholic Church and others by various Protestant denominations.

The means necessary for the support of the Roman Catholic schools were supplied to some extent by school fees paid by some of the parents of the children who attended the schools, and the rest was paid out of the funds of the church, contributed by its members.

During the period referred to, Roman Catholics had no interest in or control over the schools of the Protestant denominations, and the members of the Protestant denominations had no interest in or control over the schools of Roman Catholics.

There were no public school in the sense of the state schools.

The members of the Roman Catholic church supported the schools of their own church for the benefit of Roman Catholic children, and were not under obligation to, and did not contribute to, the support of any other schools.

It is manifest from the above extract from the judgment that their lordships recognized that denominational schools were the only schools in existence in Manitoba before the union. In the following extract it is equally clear that they appreciated the object of the framers of the Manitoba Act in introducing the words " by practice," in addition to the words in the British North America Act. Their lordships say :

Subsections 1, 2 and 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 1870, differ but slightly from the corresponding subsections of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867.

The only important difference is that, in the Manitoba Act, in subsection 1, the words " by law " are followed by the words "or practice," which do not occur in the corresponding passage in the British North America Act, 1867.

These words were no doubt introduced to meet the special case of the country which had not as yet enjoyed the security of laws properly so called.

It is not perhaps very easy to define precisely the meaning of such an expression as " having a right or privilege by practice." But the object of the enactment is tolerably clear.

Evidently the word "practice" is not to be construed as equivalent to " custom having the force of law."

Their lordships are convinced that it must have been the intention of the legislature to preserve every legal right or privilege, and every benefit or advantage in the nature of a right or privilege, with respect to denominational schools, which any class of persons practically enjoyed at the time of the union.

It is equally clear that their lordships appreciated the intention of Parliament to preserve the legal rights and privileges of the minority, yet by their judgment those legal rights and privileges have been lost by the court sustaining the Act of 1890, or as their lordships express the change :

In 1890 the policy of the past nineteen years was reversed, the denominational system of public education was entirely swept away.

Their lordships recognize that the effect of the Act of 1890 is to tax the minority for the public schools in addition to supporting their own, and their lordships regret that, " owing to religious convictions which every body must respect and to the teaching of their church that Roman Catholics find themselves unable to partake of advantages which the law offers to all alike."

Their lordships say : "That Roman Catholics are free to establish their own schools throughout the province." No doubt they are, but at the same time they must pay the public school tax, and their schools will not receive any share of the public funds allotted for school purposes. The logic used and the conclusions reached will equally apply to Quebec and Ontario. According to their lordships' opinions, separate schools in Ontario and Quebec might be swept away, and the minority in each province would not be prejudicially affected, because they would still be "free to establish their own schools." It is quite clear their lordships did not understand the situation and the subject, as we have it existing in the older provinces. The most charitable thing to say of them is that they did not understand it. It is all that one can say, but it is a pretty hard matter for the people who do understand this question, and who know that a grievous wrong has been perpetrated, to have it pointed out to them that they must be satisfied with the decision. I say it in all sincerity, and without any desire to reflect on anybody—I think it is to be exceedingly regretted that the simple course pointed out under the act of Manitoba was not taken and the bill vetoed at once. This question of provincial rights is not one that is germane to the school question at all. There is no other question of provincial rights that is relegated to the Governor in Council—none whatever. You will search the British North America Act, or any constitutional act, in vain to find that there is an appeal to the Governor in Council from the passage of any other law than this particular one. It was, no doubt, framed for the very purpose of meeting cases of this kind, and I do feel that if it had been promptly met before any agitation or excitement arose in the community, not a word would have been said about it. The parties who passed the law, I am quite satisfied, felt sure that it was ultra vires. It was done, evidently, by a trick, as pointed out by the hon. member from St. Boniface, not done after an agitation by the press or by the people ; it was done by political tricksters (no one else would have sown all this discord) just to meet their own political purposes. I care not whether they were Grit or Tory; it makes no difference. The hon. gentleman said they were Liberals. Well, if they were Liberals, they were not worthy of the name. No man can be considered liberal if he is intolerant. No man who does not respect the rights of his neighbour should call himself liberal. If he acts as though his religious views were alone to be respected and those of all other people slighted, he is not liberal; and there is not a Protestant statesman to-day who does not approve of religious instruction in schools. Everyone who reads up this question will find that that is the trend of public opinion; educate our children in Christian schools. No matter what particular church they belong to, they teach respect for authority and charity towards one another. You find that those who are religious in their own way, in the religion in which they believe,are the best people. If we desire to leave a legacy to posterity, would not the best legacy be one which would establish a Christian population throughout the land? I think it is a very great misfortune that the men who brought about this confederation, that the men who brought about the first union between Upper and Lower Canada, are not alive to-day. If they were we would not have this dissension in the country. Are there no statesmen among us? None strong enough to stay the angry tide that is rising up, becoming intolerable to a degree that makes life unbearable? I often feel that if that distinguished statesman whose ashes now repose near Kingston, had been alive and in his health, all this agitation would have been stayed. He at least had power and influence on those behind him to prevent their marching on and encroaching on the rights and liberties of their fellow citizens.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—They have not done it yet. The other party have done all this.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—One would suppose from the way that some gentlemen talk that this was a fad of the Catholics in Manitoba —that it was something unwarranted, but if they will look to the record of the mother land they will find that there they consider religion in the schools a most important matter. Unfortunately, we borrow too many of our views from the United States. This question of disassociating religion from the schools arose there, and its consequences are already evident in that land of liberty, that land where divorces are so numerous, where a man could stop over at a station and get a divorce, where domestic ties are broken up and socialism of the worst description is rampant, and all due to the fact that they are departing from the principles of religious education. Go to any city in the United States, go to Boston, which has been the centre of refinement and religious thought, or was supposed at one time to be such, and take any of the churches there, and take the corresponding church in Montreal or Quebec, be it Methodist, Baptist, Catholic, or any other, and you will find that a very small proportion of the population in the cities of the United States attend the churches. That is just the effect of the system adopted in that country. In a matter of this kind one would suppose that we would draw our inspiration from the Motherland, where the best examples are given us. What do we find there? That all denominations who desire to establish schools are liberally provided for; they have separate schools in England, Wales and Scotland, where the Catholic element is very much in the minority, where it has not the supposed influence it ought to have here. They there get six times as much allotted to their schools as we do in Canada. I hold here the returns of the government grants to the various schools in England; where they recognize perfect toleration. They recognize that some non-conformists prefer the secular system of education, and that various religious denominations prefer having schools under their own control, and so all are provided for; there is no hard and fast rule forcing all the children into one school; they recognize that the several religious bodies have divergent views on the subject of education, and that they are brought up under different conditions, and you cannot fuse them all, you cannot send them all into the one school; you have got to recognize certain principles, and British statesmen do recognize them. Now take the Wesleyan schools; for 1892 the annual grant was £115,000; these are the returns for England and Wales I am reading from. In England and Wales there were nine hundred and fifty-six Catholic schools. They received £171,975—over $4 a head. In Ontario, my hon friend said, we boast a great deal of liberality. Well, I had to smile; we are supposed to have a great deal of liberality; we are supposed to enjoy great liberty so far as schools are concerned. Taking the Catholic population of Ontario, we get the munificent sum of 5½ cents per head per annum. For the children that attend the schools, somewhere about 75 cents per head, considerably less than a dollar. In England it runs up to $4, and in Wales, where the Catholics are in a minority, it amounts to $4. In Scotland, in the days of John Knox, there was a good deal of intolerance, but the Scotch people to-day are not the illiberal, intolerant people they were credited with being in early times. They give liberally to all schools; they recognize that we cannot all think alike on the various ways of worshipping our God; they recognize that, and take it into account, and so in Scotland the schools of the various churches—the schools in connection with the Church of Scotland, the Episcopalian schools and the Roman Catholic schools receive public aid. There are only 173 Catholic Schools in Scotland. It is well known the Catholic population is small there, and yet they give £36,843; we have in Ontario 280 separate schools, and yet they only get altogether less than $20,000—between $18,000 and $19,000.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Is not the appropriation for the school funds in Ontario distributed equally in proportion to the children of both schools, whether they be Protestant or not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is for the public schools. Oh, there is a fair distribution so far as relates to elementary schools.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I thought you intended to infer there was a distinction drawn between the Catholic children and the others.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. Taking the Catholic population 380,000 or 400,000, the $18,000 allotted to the separate schools in Ontario would be about 5½ cents per head of the Catholic population.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Is it not the same proportion for the Protestant population?

Hon Mr. SCOTT—The whole grant in Ontario is between $600,000 and $700,000. The Catholics get their share of what is allotted to what is known as the elementary or public school, they get no share in the Collegiate Institute or any of the higher school education. The whole educational grant in Ontario is $600,000.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Neither are they taxed for the higher schools.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have to pay their share of the taxes.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No. I was chairman of the board for a great many years in the town in which I lived, and the Catholics were not taxed for the support of the higher schools for which they received no benefit.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is right with reference to the tax that is collected. The tax collected is the tax that goes to the common school, but then the contribution of the additional amount that goes to make up the six hundred thousand comes out of the public revenue. The Catholics bear their share. It is an allotment out of the revenue. The people are not taxed directly for that. There is no direct tax. The direct tax for the common school is what is collected in the municipality through the collector for school purposes.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—They are now called public schools.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but the hon. gentleman will see that there is a great difference between the allotment for the common and separate schools and the school grant which is over $600,000. I can turn it up and show how it is allotted; but the residue goes to schools that Catholics cannot avail themselves of; it goes to the higher education. They contribute to keep up the higher education, but they are not directly taxed more than the protestants; neither are taxed for higher education; that comes out of the general revenue of the country. The only school tax we have in Ontario is the school tax imposed by the municipality; there is no provincial tax.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The point is this: the Catholic children have the same right to attend the high schools as the Protestant children.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Ergo they receive the same benefit in proportion to the number who attend it as the Catholics. If they do not go it is their own fault.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is open to them, the same as any other public institution, but what I do say is that they do not practically get the benefit of it, because they do not as a rule go to higher schools in proportion to their numbers. Now, when I was interrupted I was just reading the allotments. I had before me the last official returns and you will find that what I have stated is substantially correct. Wherever the separate schools are established the Catholic rate is struck by the Catholic school trustees, just as the public rate is struck by the public school trustees. The same collector collects for both.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—Are there not church schools?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT: They have the same rights as the catholics have to establish if they please. The method is this: the trustees of the public school strike a rate. It is necessary to support the schools in conjunction with the government grant, and the grant is based on the per capita attendance. The separate school trustees strike their rate and they are both handed in to the municipality and the tax is put on the collector's roll and in the end is paid either to the common school fund or the separate school fund: so that they tax themselves just as they please. The separate school trustees may put on so many mills on the dollar; they may be higher or lower than the public school or vice versa. Now one point I desire to make is that there is really not enough in it to create all this agitation which is going on Ontario, the attack that is to-day made upon the separate school system. The whole amount paid in 1892 was $18,248. Now there are many counties in Ontario where not a dollar is paid to separate schools. I suppose they do not exist in those counties In many localities the Catholics and Protestants, being both small in numbers, make an arrangement among themselves and they agree to bear and forbear. The very fact that either can establish a separate school induces a feeling of toleration; and that is a safety valve: so, feeling that they cannot individually support a school, they make their own arrangements, and instead of disuniting they combine to carry on a school and they settle the question of teaching religion in a friendly neighbourly way.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I might inform the hon. gentleman that that is also done in the county in which I live in the two of the largest townships where the Catholics predominate largely, particularly in Tyendinaga where they have 900 votes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the county of Hastings, the whole sum paid for separate schools is $14. Where both parties know they are protected by the law they make up their minds, in carrying out their school systems, to agree if possible, each is tolerant of the other and they get on in a friendly, neighbourly way; but if the law was different you would find there would be dissension and disunion among them. The very fact of their weakness and the inability of each one to establish a school leads to a union, and so they get on in a friendly and amicable manner. I dare say where the agitation most largely prevails for the abolition of separate schools is in places where they have no separate schools; that is where the feeling is strongest. It is a myth to them. It is a purely sentimental question. For instance there is no separate school in Brant, Dufferin, Elgin, Haldimand, Haliburton, Halton, Lincoln, Oxford, Prince Edward or Victoria, yet there is considerable agitation for their abolition in some of those counties. For the small sum that is given to the school system in Ontario, is it worth while that there should be this excitement and agitation and attempt to take away the small remnant that is left to the minority? One would think, certainly, that as we made that arrangement when we went into partnership with the sister provinces the influence there would have some weight upon the people of Ontario—that they would say that the generous liberal treatment accorded by a province that is not as rich as Ontario should have some weight and influence with the other provinces of the Dominion. As explained by the hon. member for St. Boniface, when confederation was taking place in 1866 there was a feeling in Quebec that the rights of the minority had not been protected, but they took Sir George Cartier's word that they would be after the union. Sir Alexander Galt went out of the Government because it could not be done at the time. The circumstances were such that in the short time allowed they could not run a bill through Parliament and Sir George Cartier pledged his word of honour that if they would trust the majority, after they became a province an Act would be passed for their protection. The province of Quebec was not bound except by the word of an honourable man, to enact any such law. How did the majority in Quebec carry out that pledge? There are nine hundred Protestant schools in Quebec that get an equal amount per capita with the Catholic schools there. In addition to that what did Quebec do? Quebec granted large sums of money for higher education. In Ontario at the time of confederation, the higher educational establishments of that province were receiving aid and assistance. For instance, Regiopolis college at Kingston was in receipt of $3,000; Queen's college, Kingston, a Presbyterian institution under Principal Grant, was getting $5,000 a year; Bytown college, $1,400; St. Michael's, $2,000; Trinity college, in connection with the Church of England, Toronto, $4,000; Victoria college, Cobourg, an institution under the control of the Methodist body, $5,000; L'Assomption, at Sandwich, a small institution, $1,000. Now, that was continued after confederation, but the intolerant spirit of Ontario was against those grants and they had to be swept away. Did they follow suit in Lower Canada? No; they did not. What did they do there for superior education? The legislation in the province of Quebec relating to the rights of the minority in that province is fully set forth in the following official letter from the Superintendent of Education to the Premier:

QUEBEC, 26th January, 1890.

To the Honourable the Premier of the Province of Quebec.

SIR,—By your letter of the 28th December last you submit four very important questions to which I have the honor to reply as follows:—

1st. What was the law on the first of July, 1867, in connection with the Protestant minority in this province?

At that time there was no law concerning the Protestant minority in this province.

Chapter 15 of the Consolidated statutes of Lower Canada was the only law in force. It provided that the religious minority in the municipality might separate themselves from the majority and control their own schools. The grants made by the Government were disturbed among the common schools in proportion to the number of the population. The grant for superior education was distributed upon the recommendation of the Superintendent with the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, the Protestant institutions receiving a share of the grant along with the other institutions. The grants to dissentients who formed the religious minority in each municipality were distributed in proportion to the number of children attending the schools of the dissentients as compared with the entire number of children attending school at the same time in the municipality.

2nd. What amendments have been made since the first of July, 1867, in the same connection?

The Statutes of Vict. Chap. 15, of 1868, 33 Vict., Chap. 3, of 1871, and 33 Vict., Chap. 15, of 1875, contain the principal amendments that have been made since the first of July, 1867, to Chap. 15 of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada in respect to the Protestant minority.

3rd. What is the practical difference between the privileges enjoyed by the Protestant minority on the first day of July, 1867, and to-day?

On the first July, 1867, the laws concerning education were general, and there were no privileges properly speaking, either for the majority or for the minority, but since the 1st of July, 1867, the Protestant minority enjoy the following privileges:

First. The Council of Public Instruction is divided into two committees, the one composed of Roman Catholics, and the other of Protestants appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, the latter have the right to associate with themselves five persons of their own faith who form part of the Protestant committee.

Second. A Protestant Secretary, having the privileges and salary of deputy head (the Rev. R. I. Rexford) has been appointed in the Department of Public Instruction representing the Protestants.

Third. The Protestant Committee of the Council has control of the schools of their own faith.

Fourth. The Protestant School Inspectors, appointed upon the recommendation of the Protestant committee, visit and inspect the Protestant schools.

Fifth. Separate boards of examiners for candidates for teachers' diplomas are appointed on the recommendation of the Protestant committee of the council.

Sixth. The text books in use in all the Protestant schools are authorized by the Protestant committee.

Seventh. Apart from their share of the Superior Education Fund which is appropriated according to the population, the Protestants have the privilege of distributing the funds arising from the celebration of marriages by Protestant Ministers.

Eighth. An absolute division of the school taxes in the cities of Quebec and Montreal is provided for by 32 Vict., Chap. 16 of 1868, and the school taxes imposed on the Protestant property belongs to the Protestants, and they receive a proportional share of the taxes on property belonging to corporations or incorporated companies, or to persons not belonging to the Roman Catholic or Protestant faith, or whose religious faith is unknown, or belonging partly, or jointly to persons belonging, some to the Roman Catholic, and others to the Protestant religion, or to persons who declare in writing their desire of having their property inscribed on the list known as "neutral" or to firms and commercial partnerships who shall not have declared through their agent, or one of their numbers their desire of being placed on the first or second list. These provisions also apply to the Protestants in the towns of Sherbrooke and Richmond.

Ninth. The school commissioners representing the majority in all rural municipalities collect the school taxes from corporations and incorporated companies, and pay over to the minority their proportion of the taxes for the support of the dissentient schools.

Tenth. All dissentients may cease, if they so desire, from paying their taxes to dissentient schools.

Eleventh. All non-resident proprietors in a municipality may divide their taxes between the commissioners and the trustees of the municipality.

Twelfth. The dissentients of one municipality may unite to a neighbouring school municipality of their own religious faith.

Thirteenth. If there is no dissentient school in the municipality, any head of a family residing in the municipality and professing the religious faith of the minority, and having children of school age, may send his children to a school of his own faith in a neighboring municipality and pay his taxes in support of a school, provided that the school is not more than three miles distant from where he resides.

Fourteenth. The Protestants receive a proportional share according to population from the revenue of the Jesuits' estates, and according to 51-52 Vict. Chap. 13, an additional sum of $60,000 has been granted to them as an indemnity.

4th. In every case where is an amendment, please tell me what was the law at the time of the amendment, and what was the practical difference made by the amendment, always in connection with the Protestant minority?

The answer to this question will be found in those that precede it.

In conclusion I may say that the Protestant minority has always enjoyed all the protection that could be desired, and that since confederation the school laws have conferred upon the minority well defined privileges which have increased according to the needs of the minority.

The whole is respectfully submitted.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

(Signed) GEDEON OUIMET,
Superintendent.

The Government granted aid to McGill college, which we know to be a Protestant institution, and the grant has been continued, and the grants have been increased instead of diminished since confederation. They grant McGill University $5,950; University of Bishop's college, in which theology is one of the subjects taught, $2,550; also a grant of $1,750 to another religious institution, I think in connection with the Church of Scotland, Morrin College; St. Francis College, $1,000; the Normal School, established to educate Protestant teachers, gets no less than $13,806. The appropriation for higher education in Quebec alone for those institutions I have named is far in excess of the whole amount allotted for Catholic education in the province of Ontario, though the Protestant population in Quebec is less than the Catholic population in Ontario; but more than that, there are through Lower Canada in the various towns what are known as high schools and special schools for Protestants, at Montreal and Quebec, and Compton and Stanstead, and so on. The total amount paid to the high schools was $3,470. There are more modern institutions called academies; they are to be found at various places throughout the province. The sum of $4,325 is voted by the province of Quebec for these academies under Protestant management. Total amount paid for higher education for Protestants in Quebec, $32,611. That is all in addition to the amounts voted to the ordinary schools of the country, the 900 odd Protestant schools to which I have referred. One would suppose that those facts would have their influence in the province of Ontario; it should have its influence all over this Dominion, the fact that our French Canadian allies are so liberal in their treatment of the minority. They approach it from the statesman's point of view; they recognize the importance of religion's being taught in the schools. Now, can you point to any place in the world where the spirit of toleration is as strong and inherent as in the province of Quebec, where the two classes get on in such a friendly way together? There is no part of the Dominion where the same kindly feeling exists, or where the Protestants and Catholics are more religious in their own way. If you go to Montreal and look in the Protestant churches there, you will find a larger proportion of people than in any similar church in any city in the United States and the reason is that religion there permeates every walk of life. Children are educated and brought up in it. What is the effect of it? To make them intolerant and hate each other? No, the reverse, to make them love and respect each other, to make them recognize that each section has its good qualities and each is doing a work in the community, and to bring them to be more tolerant and charitable towards each other. You cannot point out to me any part of the world where the same kindly feeling exists between the two bodies to such an extent as it does in the province of Quebec. Surely that is an object lesson that we cannot ignore. These are facts which appeal to the comprehension of every man. You cannot cast them aside. They are illustrations pointed out year by year. Ask the Protestants of Quebec how they feel about it? Let me just read the opinions of some Protestants. I shall read from an official report—the sessional papers of the province of Quebec, a statement by S. P. Robins, LL.D. Principal of the McGill Normal School. He says, and I think these words should go throughout the length and breadth of the land:

> I should do less than justice to leading politicians of all shades in this province if I were not to state my admiration of the attitude which they maintain towards education. During an association of more than thirty years with the public education of Quebec, an association which has repeatedly brought me a suitor on behalf of education into contact with men of influence of all political parties, I have found a universal desire for the spread of popular education, a willingness to listen patiently to the view of practical educators, a wide love of fair play for the educational rights of the minority, and a determination to hold the precious interest of education aloof from the turbulent arena of political party strife.

A large portion of that relates to the time when Protestants had no law to protect them and they had to rely simply upon the kindly feeling of their Catholic neighbours, who recognized that they were entitled to all they received. They did not require a law to protect them, but when the question was raised at the time of confederation, Sir George Cartier pledged himself to see that such a law was passed, making it hard and fast. He knew the character of those whom he represented, and the moment Quebec became a province of the Dominion, a law was passed by the local legislature giving to the minority everything that they could possibly desire. I will now read from another sessional paper a resolution moved by the head of the Church of England in that province, and seconded by Sir William Dawson. It is as follows:

> On the motion of the Lord Bishop of Quebec, seconded by Sir William Dawson, it was resolved: That the Hon. Gédéon Ouimet, having on Monday last completed the 10th year of his administration of the Department of Public Instruction in the province of Quebec, the Protestant Committee of the Council of Public Instruction desire to place on record their high sense of equity and ability with which his duties have been discharged and to congratulate him upon the advance which, under his energetic superintendence, education has made, and is making, in the province.

Can there be a higher tribute paid to any man than this which I have just quoted? Does it not speak in eloquent language of the kindly and generous feeling which prevails in the province of Quebec towards the minority? The Hon. Mr. Joly recently visited the province of Ontario, and spoke and addressed meetings at Toronto and Kingston. I should like to read from one of his speeches a tribute that he paid to the majority in his own province. Mr. Joly stands very high in the estimation of all the people in this country as a man of honour, of ability, and of great refinement. He is a Protestant, and speaking recently in Ontario, he said:

> As to the educational rights of the minority, he desired to point out that Sir John Rose, in the debate of 1865, on Confederation, had shown that the right of separate education was accorded to the Protestants of Quebec before the Union, when they were in a minority, and entirely in the hands of the French-Canadian majority. The distribution of the State funds for education under that condition of affairs was entirely satisfactory. A like statement was to be found in the report of the Commissioner of 1890 on the education of the minority in Quebec. During all those years there had been the same liberty, the same justice to the minority.

He goes on to quote, that in certain of their institutions one could not gain the advantages, in a medical or legal course, that were possessed by some of the Catholic universities, but when attention was called to it an Act was passed, putting the Protestant universities on the same level as the University of Laval, which has removed every possible complaint which could exist. And now, I should like to draw attention to the opinions in England on this question of whether it is best in all schools that we should give our children some religious instruction. This question has excited a good deal of attention in the mother country, and in 1886 a royal commission was issued and a number of distinguished gentlemen, representing the different churches, were asked to take up the question of education and report upon the subject. On that commission were the Earl of Harrowby, Earl Beauchamp, Frederick Bishop of London, Cardinal Manning, Baron Norton, Sir F. R.

Sandford, Sir John Lubbock, and a large number of the leading men of the day. That commission occupied some two or three years in its inquiry and made a most exhaustive report. They took up this question of education, not only as it affected the three kingdoms, but also as it affected all Europe, the United States and Canada, and I will read a few of their conclusions in regard to this question of religious instruction. I will just read an extract or two from their report. They refer to the fact that in France and other countries where religion has been proscribed in the public schools, these schools are deserted and private schools are established, although they are taxed for the support of the public schools. They say:

As to religious instruction in the public schools, it is not given in France, Holland, and Italy (but in Italy religious instructions may be given, if asked for outside of school hours). In Geneva and Neufchatel the instruction is secular. In Berne and Zurich religious instruction is given. In Vaud religious teaching is said to be given from a historical point of view. In Ticino, religious instruction is not compulsory, but in all the schools of the canton the priest of the parish teaches the catechism of the Roman Catholic Church in the ordinary school hours.

In Belgium the communes may be given religious teaching at the commencement or at the end of the school hours, but children are exempted, at the request of their parents, from attending such instruction.

In Austria the religious teaching is under the supervision of the church authorities.

In Bavaria religious instruction is part of the curriculum, and is given by the parish priest.

In Holland the school premises may be used, out of school hours, for religious instruction, and in 1885, 620 school premises were used for that purpose.

In Hungary religious instruction is given according to the denomination, the members of the denomination providing it.

In Norway the Evangelic Lutheran religion is taught.

In Prussia religious instruction is compulsory.

In Saxony religion is taught to Protestants by the master, in Catholic schools by the priest.

In Sweden religion is taught, but children of parents who profess a foreign faith may be exempted.

In Wurtemburg, we are told that a third of the whole school time is devoted to religious instruction.

We append to this chapter the replies (sent through the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office) to our circular of inquiries as to the systems of education now in force in the leading countries of Europe, in our principal colonies, and in the United States of America, as regards religious and moral training in elementary schools.

After hearing the arguments for a wholly secular education, we have come to the following conclusions:—

(1.) That it is of the highest importance that all children should receive religious and moral training;

(2.) That the evidence does not warrant the conclusion that such religious and moral training can be amply provided otherwise than through the medium of elementary schools;

(3.) That in schools of a denominational character to which parents are compelled to send their children the parents have a right to require an operative conscience clause, so that care be taken that the children shall not suffer in any way in consequence of their taking advantage of the conscience clause;

(4.) That inasmuch as parents are compelled to send their children to school, it is just and desirable that, as far as possible, they should be enabled to send them to a school suitable to their religious convictions or preferences;

(5.) We are also of opinion that it is of the highest importance that the teachers who are charged with the moral training of the scholars should continue to take part in the religious instruction. We should regard any separation of the teacher from the religious teaching of the school as injurious to the moral and secular training of the scholars.

What could be more positive or more satistory than that? The first men of the age, selected from the various churches, meeting together, and knowing the various systems that prevailed over Europe and America, draw those just and fair conclusions. I have quoted from the final report of the commissioners on elementary education, 1888. I should like to add that in our public schools in Ontario, as they were originally established, religion was intended to be taught. I have in my hands one of the early reports made by Dr. Ryerson, who, as every one familiar with Canadian history knows very well, was the gentleman to whom our common schools system is largely indebted for the fundamental principles on which it is based and which have led to its efficiency to-day. He was sent abroad to examine the systems in England, Germany and the United States, and I should like to read a few extracts from one of his reports on this question of religion in the schools. He was a man of very large observation, and one whom I always found free from prejudices and possessed of a fair and just mind. He says:

In France, religion formed no part of the elementary education for many years, and in some parts of the United States the example of France has been followed. Time is required fully to develop the consequence of a purely godless system of public instruction. It requires a generation for the seed to germinate,—a second or third for the fruit to ripen.

However, the consequences have been too soon manifest both in France and America.

The French Government has for many years employed its most strenuous exertions to make religious instruction an essential part of elementary education; and experienced men and the most distinguished educational writers in the United States, speak in strong terms of the deplorable consequences resulting from the absence of religious instruction in their schools, and earnestly insist upon its absolute necessity.

The practical indifference which has existed in respect to the Christian character of our own system of popular education is truly lamentable. The omission of Christianity in respect both to schools, and the character and qualifications of teachers, has prevailed to an extent fearful to contemplate. The country is too young yet to witness the full effects of such an omission,—such an abuse of that which should be the primary element of education, without which there can be no Christian education; and without a Christian education there will not long be a Christian country.

On a subject so vitally important, forming, as it does, the very basis of the future character and social state of this country, a subject too, respecting which there exists much error, and a great want of information, I feel it necessary to dwell at some length, and to adduce the testimony of the most competent authorities, who, without distinction of sect or country, or form of government, assert the absolute necessity of making Christianity the basis and the cement of the structure of public education.

The sentiments of English Protestant writers. and of all classes of British Protestants, are too well known to be adduced in this place; and the fact that the principal objection which has been made on the part of the authorities and members of the Roman Catholic Church to certain colleges proposed to be established in Ireland, relates to an alleged deficiency in the provision for Christian instruction, evinces the prevailing sentiment of that section of our fellow subjects.

I have, of course, a good deal of information of that kind, but I do not think it is quite fair to weary the House with it; however, I should like to point out some evidence that Dr. Ryerson's prophecies have been to a considerable extent fulfilled in the Eastern States, where this system of separating God from the schools was first introduced. An article in the Boston Evening Post contains the following: In an address delivered by the Rev. Dr. Shaw, he—urged the recognition of religion in both schools and universities. He regretted the growing tendency to secularism which is now appearing in the present reaction against separate schools and advised the leaders of the movement in Manitoba and Ontario to be careful least while they ask for bread they find they are getting a stone. He quoted from the transactions of the Presbyterian Synod of New York showing the alarming growth of secularism in that state, as illustrated by the fact that in some cities the Bible is never read in the public schools. In nine cities prayer is never heard and in fifteen religious instruction is positively forbidden, and in 1884 the State Superintendent officially decided that religious exercises cannot be permitted during school hours. The preacher considered the local option principle now recommended for Manitoba as no safeguard against secularism. He pleaded for greater interest in educational work in the Methodist Church, stating the gratifying signs of progress which exist.

Evidence of the decline of religion among the people who remain is hardly less abundant or less truly official. A late number of the Hartford (Conn.) Religious Herald quotes the Rev. Dr. Emory J. Haynes of the Boston Tremont Temple as saying, "We have raised a generation of infidels on the hill-sides of New England. They are the worst heathen that I find in Boston. This cold agnosticism bred in New England is the most indigestible thing that we have to do with. The saddest thing in New England to-day is the old country churches falling in, and the people abandoning all forms of religion." To which the Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon added: "What Dr. Haynes says is true......I believe more and more in the local church. That is our main dependence, the local church." And the Boston Watchman says: "The recognition of both the Boston pastors above-named is worthy of especial notice, particularly so as relates to the position which is here maintained as to the central and the necessary importance of the local church." The Immigration Commissioners may populate the "abandoned farms," but they cannot prevent "the old country churches falling in, and the people abandoning all forms of religion"; their scheme is not likely to touch, even indirectly, "the saddest thing in New England to-day."

I have a great deal more material of the same kind which I do not wish to inflict on the House, because any hon. gentleman who desires to pursue that subject knows very well where to find abundance of evidence similar to that just quoted, not merely from Catholic authorities, but from Protestant sources. I may, however, quote a pastoral issued on that subject a few days ago by the Bishops of Quebec. It is as follows:

The parents who have received children from God with the authority to bring them up properly; the pastors whose duty it is to teach and to enforce the divine law; the heads of the state, whose duty it is to support intelligently and efficiently the pastors and parents; the educators of children whose mission is to complete in the schools the work of the parents; all those who love the church and their country must have it to heart to see that the education is sound, and such as to form excellent Christian, honest, virtuous and learned citizens, devoted to their country.

Over the schools, which are founded by private initiative or by the state, it is duty of the church to exercise an attentive oversight, in order to exclude any teaching, which might be contrary to Catholic doctrine. Moreover as religious education should progress by the side of intellectual culture, the ecclesiastical authorities can and should require that no one destined to the teaching of the Christian doctrine shall be chosen and appointed without the ratification of previous approval of those whom Jesus Christ has intrusted with the care of preserving intact the sacred deposit of faith. *

* These sacred rights of the church it is our duty and firm intention to maintain in all their entirety. No doubt, very dear brethren, in a mixed society such as ours, that is composed of widely differing religious elements, it would be difficult to expect that people will recognize in the Roman Church certain prerogatives which it might enjoy in an exclusively Catholic country. The Catholic church, whose origin on this continent, dates from the cradle of American civilization and which has not ceased during more than three centuries, through its apostles and missionaries, to spread the light of Christianity over this country, can legitimately claim without, therefore being saddled with a double school tax, the right of bringing up the children who are intrusted to its care in the faith of their fathers, and of giving to these children an education consistent with the religious principles which they profess. There is in that, we proclaim it, a question of justice, of natural equity, of prudence and of social economy which is intimately connected with the vital interests of this country. The Canadian episcopate has never hesitated, as is well known, to teach on all occasions peace, concord, mutual confidence, a sincere loyalty to the British Crown, and it hopes that, thanks to the wise and firm intervention of our legislators, and thanks also to the fairness and spirit of conciliation of the several elements which make up the population of Canada, the uneasiness which actually exists in certain provinces shall soon be replaced by a feeling of general satisfaction.

These words breathe principles of peace: there is nothing to anger or irritate anybody. It is an appeal on the very highest grounds. I have felt it my duty to make these remarks, because I see that there is to be an attack upon the separate school system in Ontario. At a recent gathering of a very important body, with whose doings the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has, no doubt, in the past been very familiar, this declaration on the subject of separate schools was made by the leader of the organization from Ontario:

There can be no doubt that the people of Ontario are awakening to the fact that the separate school laws at present in force form the most direct violation of these principles. As Orangemen we object to separate schools on principle. We believe them to be unjust to the Roman Catholic people themselves, and we know them to be a source of national weakness and disintegration. I am one of those who believe that all constitutional acts may be amended in harmony with the onward march of progress and the widening consciousness of freedom, from age to age; so I do not admit the truth of the position that because separate schools were continued in existence by the British North America Act they are therefore to exist for ever.

Now, this is a very serious declaration, made by a gentleman who professes to speak for a very large body of people in this country. It is very much to be regretted that he should have gone out of his way to lay down the principle that the separate schools of Ontario are to be attacked, and that he should draw to his aid a society that has recently been established for the avowed purpose of putting down Roman Catholicism. He heads one part of his address with these significant letters, "C.P.A.," and proceeds to say:

It gives me much satisfaction to note the rapid growth of other organizations, notably the Sons of England and the Canadian Protective Association, whose advocacy of the principles of Protestantism is evidently sincere. While one of these associations has been fiercely attacked recently, we should remember that Orangemen too have been grossly misrepresented, and we should therefore not believe the exaggerated statements made by interested enemies about any other society with aims of a charter similar to our own. We should certainly sympathize with, and as far as possible co-operate with, any society whose great purpose is to prevent an organized hierarchy from ruling free America in accordance with the dictates of the Pope.

Now, those two societies are said to be increasing in numerical strength and are attacking our school system, if one is to believe the statements that appear about them in the newspapers. I am exceedingly sorry that the Orange order has seen fit to take up the cudgels. If they will look at the early records of the society, they will find that those feelings did not prevail in days gone by. It was my fortune to sit in Parliament with the first, second and third grand masters of the Orange organization, and, perhaps, the fourth. I knew Ogle R. Gowan, who was the first grand master, and established Orangeism in Canada. I was in Parliament with him, and I may say that I never found in him any of that intolerant spirit that is manifested in the extracts that I have just quoted. On the contrary, I can show that in a division on this separate school question, even Mr. Gowan voted with me. His successor, Mr. Benjamin, always voted with me on those semi-religious questions. Mr. Anderson, who was the Grand Treasurer of the order, and whom I knew very intimately, voted with me. It so happened in the old Parliament of Canada, that it was my lot to take charge of a good many bills of a semi-religious character, and Mr. Benjamin and Mr. Anderson, as a rule, supported me in those measures. I found no intolerance in them; they were respected by the order, and they kept the order in subjection and good temper. The Hon. John Hilyard Cameron, once a grand master, recorded many votes in Parliament in support of minority rights. I mention this to show that the intolerant spirit which is now manifested did not prevail in those days. Those of us who were in Parliament were good friends, and when those semi-religious questions came up, they did not separate us. Why is it that we have fallen on such bitter times? Why is it that intolerance is left to our day and generation? I suppose it all springs from this unfortunate Manitoba question, which is creating discord and impairing the harmony which should prevail throughout the Dominion. I do not want to take up too much of the time of the House, but those two motions having been moved together, I will dispose of any observations that I have to make on the second one, the school question in the North-west Territories. I had the honour of being a member of the Government at the time the Act relating to the North-west was passed, and I know what was intended. Certainly, it was intended in passing the Act of 1875, that it was to be a charter for all time to come, so far as the school question is concerned. At the time, there were not very many people in the North-west. The largest portion of the population at that time were Catholics, but since then, the Protestant element has largely increased, and outnumbers the Catholics. But the intention in passing that Act was to make permanent for ever the rights of the minority to separate schools. When the draft of the bill was brought in first, the educational clause was not included. Mr. Blake was not then a member of the Government—he had gone out, and I should like to draw attention to Mr. Blake's observations on the omission of the educational clause, from the Act relating to the North-west Territories as it was originally drafted. Mr. Blake said:

He regarded it as essential under the circumstances of the country and in view of the deliberation during the last few days that a general principle should be laid down in the bill with respect to public instruction. He did not believe that we ought to introduce into that territory the heart burnings and difficulties with which certain other portions of this Dominion and other countries had been afflicted. It seemed to him, having regard to the fact that, as far as we could expect at present, the general character of that population would be somewhat analogous to the population of Ontario, that there should be some provision in the constitution by which they should have conferred upon them the same rights and privileges in regard to religious instruction as those passed by the people of the province of Ontario. The principle of local self government and the settling of the question of public instruction seemed to him ought to be the cardinal principles of the measure.

What did Mr. Mackenzie say? He was then Premier and had charge of the bill. He said:

As to the subject of public instruction, it did not in the first place attract his attention, but when he came to the subject of local taxation he was reminded of it. Not having had time to insert a clause on the subject, he proposed to do so when the bill was in committee. The clause provided that the Lieutenant-Governor by and with the consent of his council or assembly as the case might be, should pass all necessary ordinances in respect to education, but it would be specially provided that the majority of the rate-payers might establish such schools and impose such necessary assessment as they might think fit; and that the minority of the rate-payers, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, might establish separate schools; and such rate-payers would be liable only to such educational assessments as they might impose upon themselves. This, he hoped, would meet the objection offered by the hon. member for South Bruce.

Sir Donald Smith, who represented a constituency in that country, and, of course, knew a great deal about it, alluded to it in his speech. He said:

The point brought up by the hon. member for South Ontario was an important one and he was glad to find that the First Minister intended to introduce a provision in committee, dealing with the subject.

Mr. Mills also spoke on the subject. He said:

There was another matter it seemed to him ought not to be disregarded; and that was the terms and conditions under which these people would ultimately be formed into a province. It would be better that the people who settle in that territory should know beforehand under which they would become an organized part of the Dominion. He saw no objection when the population became sufficiently large to allow that territory to be represented in the Dominion Parliament before it was organized into a province.

Further on, he said:

That country was taken possession of by the French. They established forts at several points in the Red River Territory and the most western fort was at the Forks of the Saskatchewan. They had appointed Captain La Corne to govern the territory under a license from Quebec. The whole country was occupied by the French Government as a part of Canada, and was made by the Order in Council of 1791, part of the present province of Ontario. The late Government had organized the province of Manitoba within those limits.

There was no further debate—no one made any proposition to oppose it. Now, it will be observed that in that debate not a single French Canadian or Roman Catholic uttered a word. The whole debate was carried on by Protestants, gentlemen who felt that they were only doing what was fair and just, and that the principles they were enunciating were those which would be in the best interests of that country in the future. It was not necessary that there should be any appeal to them to protect the rights of the minority. Their own sense of what was right and honourable, having in view the conditions under which we live in this country, prevailed. The bill went into committee and no opposition was offered to it. It was referred to in the press, but no one took exception to it—as Mr. Mills said, it was well that people should know before going into that country under what conditions they were going there. The Hon. Geo. Brown was then a member of this House. He had always opposed separate schools, but once they were established, Mr. Brown never again interposed—he never sought to break up the system. He was conscientiously opposed to the initiation of the separate school system, and in 1862, when the particular bill to which I have already alluded was passed, he opposed it, but after it became law he was most anxious that it should be worked out in the way best suited for those for whom the law was enacted. In 1875 I had charge of the North-west Territories Bill in this House and the subject was fully discussed here on that occasion. I think it was Mr. Aikins who moved to strike out the 11th clause. Mr. Brown, Mr. Miller and myself also spoke. I have already quoted a part of Mr. Miller's speech; I do not think it is necessary that I should quote any more of it—it was all in the same direction, that Parliament had a right to lay down a fixed principle now, when they were establishing a new government in the North-west Territories. He referred to the fact that we had settled the question as far as Manitoba was concerned, and it was desirable that it should be settled so far as it applied to the North-west Territories. What did Sir Alexander Campbell, who was then leader of the Opposition, say? He said:

> It would be much to be regretted if the amendment passed. The subject of the bill was to establish and perpetuate in the North-west Territories the same system as prevailed in Ontario and Quebec, and which had worked so well in the interest of peace and harmony with the different populations of those provinces. He thought the fairer course, and the better one, for all races and creeds, was to adopt the suggestion of the Government and enable the people to establish separate schools in that territory, and thus prevent the introduction of evils, from which Ontario and Quebec had suffered, but had judiciously rid themselves.

It is clear Sir Alexander Campbell understood that the bill perpetuated the system of separate schools as they existed in Ontario and Quebec. What does Mr. Brown say? He says:

> By this bill they might raise the very serious issues in the North-west which had proved so troublesome to Quebec and Ontario. No one would regret this more than he, and for this reason he would support the motion of the hon. member for Peel. The moment this Act was passed, and the North-west became part of the union, they came under the Union Act, and under the provisions with regard to separate schools.

After discussion the House accepted it as a finality. The House of Commons had accepted it unanimously, and this House on a division after discussion. After the defeat of the Mackenzie Government, the question came up again several times and everybody considered it a settled matter, and no one suggested that it should be reopened. The bill was introduced in the House of Commons on the 13th of March and it stood over until the 1st April, so that the country had ample opportunity to give expression to its views, if anybody thought it was important enough to arouse the people and excite an agitation against it, but so far as I can find, the press and the people took little or no notice of it. Attention was called to the Act in this House in 1876. The Hon. Mr. Haviland presented a petition from Prince Edward Island, objecting to separate school in the North-west, but this House simply sat upon it and would not consider the matter. He was called to order, I think, at the time. It came up again in 1886, when Mr. Girard made the speech to which I have just alluded, and congratulated the House on having settled the matter so satisfactorily in the case of Manitoba. It came up again in 1887, and in 1888, after which the question was allowed to rest until Mr. McCarthy brought it to the notice of the House of Commons in 1891, when he moved the motion against the dual language and the separate schools.

I am afraid I shall have to ask the forgiveness of the House for having kept them too long on this subject, but really it is a very important one, and it is just possible that some of the facts to which I have drawn attention may have the effect in some way of quieting public agitation. I shall be very glad if it has that effect. I have not pointed out in any way how I think a remedy can be provided. I do not think it wise or prudent at this stage to enter upon that discussion. It is unfortunate that when the question first came up the agitation was not nipped in the bud by a veto. I think if it had been, no agitation would have arisen, that it would have been accepted as a right and proper thing to do. I will do the Government the credit to believe that had they supposed the final determination of the Privy Council would have left us in the ditch as it has, they never would have permitted it to go there. But no public man who understood that question thought it was possible for any tribunal on earth to come to the absurd conclusion the Privy Council has—absurdly illogical, absurdly contrary to the facts, absurdly in ignorance of the condition of things existing there. All gentlemen who are at all familiar with the two Canadas know this very well and understand it. There is no mystifying any such gentleman as to what denominational schools or separate schools mean. Unfortunately the Privy Council did not possess that knowledge. It would really amuse hon. gentlemen, if they would take the report and wade through it as I have and read some of the arguments upon it, and the absurd questions that were put to counsel by the members of the Privy Council utterly ignorant of the conditions of the federal system. They do not know on the other side the A B C of the federal system. Since this Home Rule question has come up they are beginning to learn something about it, but when Mr. Gladstone's bill was introduced in 1886, even Mr. Gladstone himself could not comprehend the federal system when he proposed to exclude the Irish members from the British Parliament. That was his idea of granting home rule. Any statesman in Canada could have told him that it was not in conformity with the federal principle to leave Ireland unrepresented in the Imperial Parliament. If Mr. Gladstone had had a Canadian statesman at his elbow, he would not have landed in such a predicament as to have a federal parliament with no representative from one member of the union. Of course they have since learned more about federal and provincial autonomy, but they did not understand it then. I have thought, myself, that there was one way in which this question might be solved. Hon. gentlemen are quite aware that we have a very large area of lands for the benefit of the schools in Manitoba and the North-west. We have kept control of those lands ourselves. They have not passed under the jurisdiction of the local authorities that I am aware of.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—You are right.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When I was a member of the Government, I always said that I did not think it was prudent that those lands should fall into the hands of the Provincial Governments at this period of the history of the country. In Michigan, we know of the magnificent provision they have made for higher and elementary education. We can do the same for the North-west without injustice to any interests. We can give to the public schools of the North-west all they require, enrich them, and there will still be enough left to satisfy probably, the supporters of separate schools. That may be the solution of the difficulty. I have not consulted anybody in giving expression to this view, but it did occur to my mind that the spirit that prevails, unfortunately amongst the people against the separate schools, may be too strong a tide to stem at present. I quite recognize the position and acknowledge the difficulty existing at present, but I have thought that possibly, that was the way to solve the problem. There is an abundance of land still unallotted in that country sufficient to place education in Manitoba and the North-west on a very high plane, and there are millions of acres that will be worth millions of dollars in, I think, not too distant a future. Those lands can enrich higher and elementary education if properly distributed, held until their value goes up, as the Canada Company held their lands formerly in Canada, until population went in and gave an increased value to them. Lands that away back in the thirties and forties could not be sold for 25 cents an acre, afterwards sold for $15 and $20 an acre. History will repeat itself in the North-west. The time is coming when the United States will have to depend upon the North-west for their food supply. I hope we will live to see the time when lands in the North-west will realize good prices, when as we have made liberal allotments for school purposes, statesmen in the future may see their way to protect the minority rights in that way from the interference of their intolerant neighbours, if a better feeling does not ere then arise. I hope that this wave of intolerance which is now sweeping over Ontario and the west will pass away; I have no doubt it will. I have seen it before. Anybody who looks back for a period of years knows that from time to time just such expressions of bigotry have arisen in the community, but they were short-lived. Yet they did much mischief at the time, and in some instances they left bitter feelings behind. I am in hopes that a better day is dawning in the country and that these questions, difficult now to deal with, will at a latter date, under the control of other men, be solved in a way satisfactory to all parties. That is my sincere wish. I hope that that may be the result. I desire, as we all desire, to see nothing but peace in the country; we will have peace whether the minority are deprived of their rights or not. They can bear the loss with fortitude and resignation, but I do not think it will be pleasant for the majority in the country to feel that "Owing to a decision which is unjust, the minority are deprived of certain rights and they never more will enjoy them, although they were promised them by the majority." I do not say that the minority will feel aggrieved with the majority, but they will feel that they were not treated fairly, not treated on an equal basis; but the same friendship will prevail and we will all join in making this country one of the finest in the world. Yet there will always be the remains of that feeling that in an important matter, affecting rights that are dear to the hearts of the minority, they were deprived of those rights by foul play, not by British fair play. They will feel that had this question been relegated to the Sovereign, as questions of this kind a thousand years ago were, it would have been decided very differently and I think it ought to be the occasion of our once and for all cutting off any appeal to a court made up of judges who do not seem to understand the questions arising under our constitution. It is simply a sentimental matter, referring a question to Her Majesty, when we know that she takes no part in its settlement, and we know there is not the same care exercised in the Privy Council that there is in our ordinary courts. And we know the Judicial Committee cannot possibly be as familiar with the correct interpretation of questions arising under our statute law and more particularly under our constitution as the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada are; and I think it would be prudent in the future to restrict appeals to that court and especially that references under the Supreme Court Act should be limited to that court. The prestige of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has now gone, at least in the opinion of the Catholic minority of Canada, and they should mark their sense of the wrong thus inflicted on them by advocating that the reference of similar questions to the Supreme Court hereafter should be final.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—I am not going to discuss the question of Privy Council with the hon. gentleman, but the court of Manitoba decided the same way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That court divided according to religious belief. I presume the popular prejudices of the province had their influence at the time. The Supreme Court rendered the judgment that was in harmony with the interpretation of the Manitoba Act given by those who framed the Act and by the Parliament that passed it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

THE INSOLVENCY ACT.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—A number of applications have been made for drafts of the Insolvency Bill. I have received an application also from the Board of Trade: and with the unanimous consent of the House I will now move that 2,500 copies be printed for distribution.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 6 p.m.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.), from the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills, presented their second report. He said: I desire to inform the House that the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills expires to-day. The committee have not recommended any extension of time, because the House of Commons has made no extension of time. Whether we ought to extend the time or not I cannot say, the House might express an opinion on the subject.

FREIGHT RATES ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved:—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, a schedule of the passenger and freight rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company including the rates from St. Paul and Minneapolis to the seaboard, now in force.

He said: In the North-west as you are all aware we are dependent entirely on railway communication for our means of transit. Hon. gentlemen who live down by the sea in the Maritime Provinces or in the provinces of Quebec or Ontario where they have ocean navigation and a fine system of inland navigation to supplement and compete with their railways for transporting their produce to foreign markets or from one part of the country to another can hardly realize what it is to reside in a country where we have to pay railway freight rates varying from 1,000 up to 2,000 miles which is the case in the country I reside in. The effect is such at the present moment that the province of Manitoba is feeling a depression beyond anything it has felt since it became a province of the Dominion. The financial position it has been brought to in consequence of a variety of circumstances, the low price of produce, the excessive freight charges and the exceedingly high prices we have to pay for all the necessaries of life through the protective tariff, as I have explained to this House on a previous occasion. What I am dealing with just now is the question of freight rates. It is a question that is severely felt by all classes, Conservative and Liberal alike, mercantile interests, farmers, cattle raisers, and every one are feeling the oppression of the excessively high charges that we have to pay on the goods coming into the country, and the transport of our produce out of it. It is not a question of paying freight rates which are equal over the whole country, but it is a question of paying freight rates which are discriminating against us in our efforts to earn our living far beyond what other portions of the country or neighbouring centres like St. Paul or Minneapolis have to pay. It is a sense of injustice that is meted out to us, not a sense of oppression which may be caused by circumstances over which we have no control. The question resolves itself down into the fact that the distribution of the profits of the labourer in the North-west country are not fairly and equitably adjusted, as between the tillers of the soil who produce the traffic that so largely supports the Canadian Pacific Railway and the capital that demands dividend for the shareholders from the people. It resolves itself into that question. Now, hon. gentlemen will understand that petition after petition have been sent to Mr. Van Horne, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, representing to him from boards of trade, from farmers' meetings and from the patrons of industry—from all parts of the North-west as to the difficulties they labour under. The answer universally made by Mr. Van Horne was that it is essential to the success of the Canadian Pacific Railway that the dividends of the company shall be maintained in order that its credit may be kept up. Now, I take issue with the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway on that point because it is open to question as to how far dividends should be, 2, 3, 5 or 6 per cent as the case may be. The Canadian Pacific Railway credit does not suffer until fixed charges are not met, and there is about 3½ million dollars of net revenue over and above interest on fixed charges. What I contend is so far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned it is a great national institution and which I would not willingly injure in the credit of the world or in any way that would be likely to impair its usefulness, but there is a point beyond which a suffering people cannot go and when it comes to be a question of the dividends payable to the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway extracted from the farmers who are producing those dividends then it becomes a matter of equity in which the Government of the country have a right to step in and say there shall be equity in the distribution of the earnings of the people, who are earning money for the country and distributing it throughout the various channels throughout the country. Now, hon. gentlemen will understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway company have shares amounting to $65,000,000, that these shares were granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway company, 45,000,000 of them, I think I am stating it correctly, at 25 cents on the dollar, and, further than that, the Dominion Government received from the Canadian Pacific Railway—which I presume was from the proceeds of a portion of a sale of these shares—$20,000,000, and deposited this amount with the Dominion Government to be paid out during the last ten years at the rate of 3 per cent interest in order to maintain by the guarantee of the Dominion Government the credit of the $65,000,000 stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway during construction. Therefore, hon. gentlemen, we are paying interest, or rather the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the answer that he has given to the various public bodies that have petitioned him in regard to the hardships under which they are suffering—the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway is claiming dividends upon stock which was purchesed at 25 cents on the dollar, claiming dividends on stock which was appropriated for the purpose of making additional dividends, and in that respect, hon. gentlemen, the country is called upon to pay interest upon interest. Now, hon. gentlemen know perfectly well that in private life if an individual or a corporation or a public body of any kind conducts its business on that plan, there comes a time when something has got to snap. It is utterly impossible for a corporation like the Canadian Pacific Railway to continue to increase the dividend claiming power of their stock, and expect people who are going to supply the traffic and earn the money, to maintain the dividends upon them—there must be a limit at which that has got to stop. As you are all aware, hon. gentlemen, last year the Canadian Pacific Railway got a bill passed through Parliament which empowered them to increase their share capital by $35,000,000 of preference shares. In addition to that, the bill empowered the company to increase their stock to an unlimited extent, subject to the approval of the Dominion Government. Last year the Canadian Pacific Railway had issued $6,000,000 of their preference shares. I saw it stated in the papers that these preference shares were sold and that the money was used to replace a surplus of seven million dollars that was in the treasury of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which surplus had been used for construction of railways, presumably the Sault Line, or some other line the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were engaged in, and that the proceeds of this $6,000,000 of preference shares would release this surplus which would then be available for dividends. Now, hon. gentlemen, these preference shares are a mortgage ahead of the ordinary stock. It is quite evident that the sale of these shares has depreciated the value of the Canadian Pacific Railway stock. These shares were put upon the market and we have seen that the stock has gone down this year 65 per cent.

A VOICE—70 per cent.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—At any rate the placing of $6,000,000 of preference shares ahead of the ordinary stock, has had the effect of depreciating the value of the ordinary stock ; therefore, of their own free will, for their own purpose of paying dividends, they have depreciated the credit of their road, and they cannot contend that in order to maintain the credit of their road, they have to heap an injustice upon the people of the North-west country, in order to maintain the credit of their road by unduly forcing money out of them. The dividends that the Canadian Pacific Railway have of late years paid out of their net earnings have been 5 per cent upon the $65,000,000 of share capital, over and above the fixed charges that are necessary in order to meet the liabilities for bonds and bonded indebtedness of all kinds. Now, hon. gentlemen, that 5 per cent is 5 per cent upon the stock which was sold at 25 cents on the dollar, $20,000,000 of which was deposited in the shape of interest, and paid out to them again in the shape of interest ; and that this 5 per cent earnings is for the payment of the dividend upon that interest. Now, on the top of all that, we have again added to the dividend claiming stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway this $6,000,000 that was issued last year, at a fixed charge of 4 per cent for interest. Now, hon. gentlemen, if another $10,000,000 has to be added this year, if another $35,000,000 which the law has empowered is to be added and placed in the shape of a mortgage ahead of the ordinary stock, and dividends upon that $35,000,000 have to be earned, if the credit of the company is going to be maintained, it is a great deal better that we should look these facts in the face in time, because the Canadian Pacific Railway is a great national undertaking, heavily subsidized by the Canadian Government, a railway company in which every individual in the country is deeply interested both in its success and in its financial credit, and I realize that, if the financial credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway should go down, in the way that the financial credit of railway companies in the United States has gone down, by loading down their railways with watered securities it will affect every nook and corner in Canada equally, and therefore I say we are interested in pointing out to the Canadian Pacific Railway, where we think their financial methods are wrong and are likely to lead to disaster, if not to them, at any rate to the country. Honourable gentlemen must agree with me, I think, in all fairness, that 5 per cent upon shares that were obtained at this low price, shares that had been obtained in the shape of dividends, is an excessive charge for a stock of that kind. When I say a stock of that kind, I say that the Canadian Pacific Railway stock is a permanent stock ; that, as long as Canada is Canada the wheels of the Canadian Pacific Railway will go round. As long as the wheels of the Canadian Pacific Railway go around, its earning power will be maintained more or less according to the prosperity of the country, and when the Canadian Pacific Railway attempt to take 5 per cent out of the earnings of the people in the North-west, and I say it advisedly, because there is discrimination against them in the rates, and the extraction of high dividends is made, when the population of the North-west is only some 250,000. I say, gentlemen, it is grinding it out of a few people —out of a weak country—an undue proportion of their honest and hard earned gain, and there should be some means taken in order to check the Canadian Pacific Railway in that policy. I say that the Canadian Pacific Railway company should be willing to wait upon their profits and be satisfied with 2 per cent until the volume of trade increases as the country progresses ; that they will insure the credit of their company to a far greater extent than they insure it under the system they are pursuing at the present moment. I thoroughly believe that the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway is going to be an exceedingly valuable stock, that its earning power will some day, without any injustice to the people of the country, reach 5 per cent interest, but that 5 per cent interest cannot be got out of 250,000 people. They have got to wait until there is a million and a-half of people in that country, and when there is a million and a-half of people in that country producing from the soil and distributing the trade that will be distributed, then, I say that the shares of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the dividends of the Canadian Pacific Railway will accrue to them in an honest and just manner, which I regret to say, is not accruing to them in an honest and just manner at the present moment, and I speak with all knowledge of the feelings of the people in that western country, who are suffering the burdens under which they lie, the burden of discrimination in rates. People who do not want to see the dividend claiming power of the shareholders increased in any way against future earnings by adding to their share capital for any thing, except legitimate and economical construction. I see by this year's report that the fixed charges for interest have increased by nearly seven hundred thousand dollars in two years. If it was a case that the rates we were paying for our traffic and for our trade, were the same all over Canada, I have not a word to say about it, because there is justice then ; but the point is that we are charged two, three and four times higher in some cases, than are charged in other portions of the line. Now, I would read to you, hon. gentlemen, from a paper published in Winnipeg, the Nor' Wester, I may say that the Nor' Wester is a paper now edited by the former editor of the Winnipeg Free Press, who lost his position on the Winnipeg Free Press, and has started another paper in opposition to the Canadian Pacific Railway, who are the chief shareholders in the Winnipeg Free Press, so I am not quoting this for anything more than it may be worth at the present moment, though I believe in its accuracy. The paper says :

On first class goods the C. P. R. charges its American patrons from New York to St. Paul $1.15 per 100 pounds. It charges Canadians from Montreal to Winnipeg, $2.09 per 100 pounds—the distance being practically identical, 1,400 miles and 1424 miles respectively. Now, this is a comparison of the charges between St. Paul and New York on the one side and Winnipeg and Montreal on the other.

On second class goods, it charges the Americans 99 cents and the Canadians $1.77. On third class goods, it charges Americans 78 cents and Canadians $1.40—very nearly double. On fourth class goods, it charges Americans 52 cents and Canadians $1.08, very nearly double. Of fifth class, Americans 44 cents and Canadians 89 cents.

Now, these are the charges, according to this paper that are made, distances being comparatively the same. The comparison is made between the rates from New York to St. Paul and the rates from Montreal to Winnipeg. It goes on to say :

On lumber the Canadian Pacific Railway charges from Rat Portage to Winnipeg, 15½ cents per 100 lbs. From Ottawa to Montreal, practically the same distance, it charges 5 cents per 100 lbs. There is three times as much to carry lumber to the North-west as it carries lumber between Ottawa and Montreal, for the distance being very nearly the same. The rate from Rat Portage is equivalent to $3.50 or $4.00 per 1000 ft, according to the condition of the lumber : the rate from Ottawa is equal to $1.25 per 1000 ft.

The people of Manitoba are made to pay an excess of $2.50 on every 1,000 feet of lumber they purchase ; a contribution to the extortion of the the Canadian Pacific Railway.

In consideration of the enormous subventions in aid of the road, amounting to $75,000,000 or $100,000,000—some estimates are even higher—it was understood that the Canadian Pacific Railway would deal liberally in freights, especially to the North-west, and more especially on such necessaries as coal.

From Fort William to Winnipeg the Canadian Pacific Railway charges $3 per ton on coal, both hard and soft. From Duluth to St. Paul the charge is $1.50 per ton of hard coal and $1 per ton, soft. Duluth occupies to St. Paul the same relative position as Fort William to Winnipeg. The Minnesota rate is exactly half what we pay on the high priced coal and exactly ⅓ on the other. The Minnesota roads discriminate in favour of the poor man's coal. The Canadian Pacific Railway charges the same rate on both.

The Canadian Pacific Railway charges Manitoba farmers for carrying their wheat from Manitoba to Montreal 46c. per 100 lbs. It carries Minnesota and Dakota wheat from Minneapolis to New York for 32½c. ; in other words it charges Manitobans 40 per cent more than it charges Americans.

My object in asking for this information is to have the rates laid on the table in order that we may be able to see for ourselves whether the discrimination complained of does really exist and to what extent. There are other complaints—for instance, that traffic is carried from New York to Vancouver for less than it will be carried from Winnipeg to Vancouver—that is to say. it is carried double the distance for less than it is carried from Winnipeg to Vancouver, merely because there is no competition. Now it is impossible for that western country to develop impossible for us to get up effective competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and therefore we owe it to ourselves to devise means by which justice will be meted out to the people of the province who supply the traffic and consequently the dividend earning power of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I may say that the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway is detrimental to the interests of the country in so far as its policy of high rates is driving a great many men away from tilling the soil. When a man in the North-west country produces a $100 worth of wheat he is adding that amount to the wealth of the country. Between the places of production and the sea board it is distributed as it paases through the country among the people. Last season a young man, a thorough type of a young Canadian farmer, 25 years of age, who had never been off the farm in his life—a sober, healthy and industrious man—came to me and asked me if I could help him to get a position on the Canadian Pacific Railway as a wiper—that is the lowest position on the road working up to the engineer. I said "How is it that you are leaving your farm?" He replied "I cannot make it pay." I said "If you cannot make it pay, who can? Have you not had a good crop? He said? "Yes, I raised 1,400 bushels of wheat last season and sold it for 42 cents per bushel and hauled it to Whitewood, a distance of 23 miles." Any one can understand that a man who raised and hauled 1,400 bushels of wheat that distance did a good year's work and for that he received altogether $588, out of which he had to pay for the expenses of his family for his binding twine, his machinery, thrashing bill, cost of marketing and everything used in the production and marketing of his wheat. When he came to figure out the result of the season's operations he found that he had virtually worked for nothing and was left in debt and he said "I prefer to get a job on the Canadian Pacific Railway. I know what I am doing when I get a job there."

Now there was a producer of $1,400 of wealth to Canada, of which he only got $588. The distribution of that $1,400 between his farm and the point of consumption was a benefit to everybody, whereas he wished to transfer himself from the soil to become one of those who earned only a portion of that $1,400, and the country was going to lose the benefit of a highly skilled producer. Now that is going on in the North-west at the present moment to a very great extent. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have reduced their rates hardly at all. We know the price of wheat has fallen, and although Mr. Van Horne, in one of his replies last year, stated that the price of wheat would go up or he would consider himself a false prophet, he has failed in his prediction, because the price of wheat has not gone up, and more than that, I can see very little hope of any material rise in the prices in the near future. The Argentine Republic is increasing its output of wheat enormously every year, as other nations are doing, and there does not seem to be any indication of a time within a reasonable period when the prices in wheat are likely to rise. The salvation of the North-west is in the economy with which our farming can be carried on. We have always believed, and do still believe, that our No. 1 hard wheat is worth 15 cents more than any other wheat; we have had practical proof of it through testing it in the bakeries; but that value of 15 cents does not stay with us, it is absorbed by the monopoly, protection and the Canadian Pacific Railway together exercises over us. If the present state of affairs goes on, there will be great disappointment to the people of Canada generally as to the position of the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. I will admit that in the North-west they do not feel it to the same extent that we do, because there is a considerable amount of Government expenditure on the mounted police and the Indian Department amongst a smaller population, but in the province of Manitoba and those portions of the North-west where they are thrown entirely on their own resources—we can obtain nothing for our families but what we produce from the soil and sell at those prices. I leave it to hon. gentlemen to see for themselves what prospect there is for advancement or encouragement to remain in the country under such conditions. Farming is the only occupation we can engage in—there is nothing else at present to which we can turn for employment except we look for situations on the railways or in the mechanical or professional walks of life in which we become consumers instead of producers. It is the interest of Government and of this country to look into this matter and to act as arbitrators between the people of that great western country and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, whose powers are excessive. They have the power to exact a revenue of $20,000,000 a year. That is an excessive power and whether it is used in a mild and just manner to all concerned is a matter of great moment to the Dominion. For that reason I have thought it advisable to bring this question up and ask the Government to lay upon the table a statement of the rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway at present in force in order that we may examine them for ourselves and present our views to the Government and to the railway committee of the Privy Council as to what extent discrimination against us does there exist and what injustice does oppress the people. A railway commission it is possible would be the best mode of dealing with that matter in the future. However, in the interim before a Railway Commission is considered we have machinery at our disposal in the Railway Committee of the Privy Council which can be made effective, The Minister of Railways, I believe, notified the Farmers Central Institute or the Patrons of Industry of Manitoba who made complaint of some of the subject matter of my remarks and they were requested to come down here and present their claims and point out to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council wherein the discrimination and injustice existed. Of course it is not easy for men especially at the present time of financial distress in the province of Manitoba to find the means to make a journey of that great length in order to come down and present their claims, but if the rates are placed upon the table and we get the official information, the Patrons of Industry can then take hold of them, and can either make arrangements through some one here to represent them or come themselves and submit their grievance to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. The Government will then have it in their power to take up the whole question and decide in a manner such as has been done lately in Great Britain, when the Imperial Government took up the case between miners and their employers—between those who are earning the money and those who are providing capital for the carrying on of the work. We are in very much the same position only on a very much larger scale and controlling greater and more vital interests, and while the miners had the means of self-defence in their strike the farmers have to submit to reactions without redress, except by the means I have pointed out. We have a grand country : I have nothing to say against it. The possibility of its future is all that has been painted, but there is such a thing as a greed of capital pressing upon the country and nipping its prosperity in the bud and throwing it back years and years, and preventing us from making it such a country as we all hope and expect it will become under Canadian enterprise with all working together, hand in hand for its common good.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is no objection to the adoption of the motion. I may point out to the hon. gentleman that the lists of these freight rates are very voluminous, and it may be some time before they will be prepared in order that the Government may be in a position to lay them on the table, but the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will be communicated with at the earliest possible moment, and as soon as the returns are received they will be laid before the House.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I happen to have before me a paper in which appears a letter from the Rev. Mr. Gaetz, who went to the North-west in the autumn of 1883 to see what the country was like. He states :

My object was to see whether a man in my position with impaired health, limited means, and a large family could likely live and rear a family in a fairly respectable way. I returned in April, 1884, with a wife and ten children, a man and maid servant and nurse girl, and am living on the spot where I first drove down my tent pins. At that time there was no railway north of Calgary.

We had much to engage our industry. The soil was rich and productive, the climate, in my judgment, the best in Canada. That does not say that we have not at times severely cold weather. Nor does it say that we can grow all the vegetables, or many of the fruits that can be grown successfully in some other parts of Canada. But the atmosphere is dry, the winters are short, many of them very mild, so that cattle and horses are absolutely independent of the stall, except, of course, working teams or milch cows. Hay, however, is abundant, so that in more severe winters, or a cold snap, or storm in mild winters, feed is abundant, and no loss need ever occur. The springs are early as a rule. There is a vast preponderance of bright weather. The autumns are long and delightful. The rainfall is under the average for Canada, but for the ten years we have been here we have had no approach to killing drought. There are few severe storms, no blizzards, nor hot winds. Taken all round, it is a delightful healthy climate. We have rich and abundant pasturage, pure water, good supply of wood, an inexhaustible supply of coal. These are some of the natural advantages which seduced us in the early days, and our love to the country has not decreased with the years. As civilization has come to us in the forms of post office, school, church, society, railway, law and order, open accessible markets, the best all-round prices for farm produce anywhere that I hear or read of—why should I think less of this great inheritance which God has given to loyal Canadians, and the people of all the earth who are willing to become loyal Canadians—part of the greatest empire on earth ?

The country still has room for bona fide farmers, with a little capital and a whole lot of sense and push, and stay-with-itness ; but for adventurers, ne'er-do-wells, and birds of passage, there is no room. It is particularly adapted to mixed farming possessing every known condition for successful dairying. I am persuaded there is no better country open for settlement to-day.

Hon. Mr. COCHRANE—What part of the country is that in ?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The Red Deer country. I simply read this to show that those who go into that country have little or nothing to complain of. Mr. Gaetz is probably known to many members of this House. He was a very able minister of the Methodist church and I have known him for many years, His friends reside in my country. He his a man of push and industry and a man of economical habits. He does not indulge in luxuries as people generally do in the North-west. In Nova Scotia we know that when people go into the back woods to begin life, they began it in a log hut and live in a very simple way, but in the North-west they often go there with extravagant ideas and live beyond their means and get into debt, and we know what that means in a new country where interest is high. My hon. friend talks about discriminating rates against the farmers in the country, but certainly where there is competition as there is in some parts of the North-west the rates are lower. We find that it is the case in the United States. I read an article recently by the ex-mayor of Regina, who has made a special study of the rates in our country and the United States, and in comparing the rates he says that they are not excessive in this country. But these great earnings of the railway and the money expended in preference stock is for opening up of new branches of railway. It is not the main branch railway of the Canadian Pacific Railway that makes the profit, but the branch railway which the Canadian Pacific Railway has opened up for which this preference stock has been granted and which must operate to the great advantage of the railway and it is from those branches that the great profits, if there are any, must now accrue. I wish to impress on the House and on the country that this North-west of ours is not so handicapped as my hon. friend would lead us to believe. The hon. gentleman may be right as to some parts of the Canadian Pacific Railway—there may be, comparitively speaking, excessive rates, but these are of such a character that I presume they can be fully justified by any information or report that the Canadian Pacific Railway may submit.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the honourable gentleman from Shell River was perfectly right to bring this matter before the House. He did nothing more than his duty to the people of the North-west among whom he lives. If the farmers of the North-west continue to raise wheat and do not go into mixed farming as they are advised to do by honourable gentlemen who perhaps do not know as much about farming in the North-west as people who live on the spot—if they raise wheat and find that the grain simply pays its freight to the seaboard, one can readily understand that these people will complain and they naturally come to the government of the country to asked to be placed in a better position. I do not profess to know whether any change can be made or not, but I understand that the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway may be regulated by the Governor in Council, and I think the honourable gentleman from Shell River is perfectly right in saying that in dealing with this matter we should not regard altogether the dividend earning powers of the railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway is not in the same position as railways built by private capital. This railway has been practically built by the money of the people of Canada, and hon. gentlemen who were here in the session of 1881, when the charter of the company was going through, will remember that the position taken at that time by the advocates of the company was not just the attitude which is assumed to-day. At that time it was contended that we should have a road which was to be for the exclusive benefit of the people of Canada. That was the ground taken. There was, I think, an amendment moved in the House of Commons to the effect that, for the time being at any rate, the company should be allowed to build their road by the Sault Ste. Marie route, and the objection was taken that this was to be an all-Canadian road for the benefit of Canada and that it would be very unpatriotic to allow any portion of the road to run through the territory of the United States. That was a very fine sentiment, and it apparently secured the support of a great majority of members of both Houses at that day. What is the position to-day? We have this state of things, that practically all the great termini of that road are in the United States. The Atlantic termini are in New York and Boston, the Pacific terminus is somewhere in the state of Washington, I think,—I mean the terminus to which the most freight goes.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Possibly it may not be the case with the western terminus, but it certainly is with the eastern terminus. In the lower provinces we have to see the freight which in those days we were promised should come down, and by its transshipment, being loaded and unloaded in our ports, make us all rich—we had to see that freight loaded and unloaded at Boston and New York. If the report in the newspaper quoted from by the hon. member from Shell River is correct, and the disparity in the charges between certain points in the United States and certain points in Canada is so great, there is reasonable ground for careful inquiry by the Government, and inquiry with a strong inclination to see that the people of Canada are placed as nearly as practicable on the same footing as their neighbours in the United States. I am quite aware, as has been said, that where freight is hauled a long distance the rates are proportionately less than where it is hauled a short distance. There is no question about that, and also railway companies make lower rates for freight between competing points than between points which are not competing, but there is a medium in those things, and I think where the freight is, as mentioned by the hon. member from Shell River, between points in Canada double the rate for the same distance in the United States, that there really should be some modification of the rates allowed to be charged. This road was intended, when it was built for this country and paid for by this country, for the good of our own people and it should be run to a certain extent, at any rate, with a view to that fact. One of the great arguments in favour of the construction of the road at the expense of the Dominion was that this North-west country would be peopled very rapidly. Now, owing to some circumstance —I do not know whether, as stated by the hon. gentleman from Shell River, it is all largely owing to the rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway or not—but owing to some reason, the population has not gone into that country as rapidly as we hoped and were promised it would, and if a reasonable reduction of those rates will cause a greater influx of population in the future, I think that is the most desirable thing.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I perfectly join with the hon. member from Halifax in regretting that the terminns of the railway is not Halifax instead of Portland. There was a report in the papers and it was generally supposed that the Canadian Pacific would buy the Intercolonial from St. John to Halifax. I want to know from the hon. member from Halifax who it was raised their voices most against it. Perhaps it is not right to relate private conversations. I think I spoke to the hon. gentleman himself about it. He said no, that should never be allowed. I think I am correct in that; if he says I am not, I withdraw it, but certainly the papers which he supports cried out loudly against the Canadian Pacific Railway having anything to do with the Intercolonial, though it ran from Halifax to St. John. If they had been allowed to do that, then the Canadian Pacific Railway would have owned the line from Montreal to Halifax. They were not allowed to have that road, and were told it was no use their trying to get it because a large portion of the population of Halifax were opposed to it, and, therefore they went to Portland, which is geographically nearer to Montreal than Halifax. The only reason they could have had to run to Halifax would be that they would own the whole road between Montreal and Halifax and send their freight straight through. If the hon. member from Halifax will move that the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway be fined for running the road to Portland perhaps it would be better.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may be allowed to perhaps answer my hon. friend's question. I have not found any fault with the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They are business men and they do business in a businesslike way. I was speaking of the Government, not of the Canadian Pacific Railway directors. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right with respect to the transfer of the Intercolonial. As it is now we have railway competition in the lower provinces, and we have low rates, I mean the local rates are low, and that is a thing of very great consequence to the province at large. It is barely possible that to the city of Halifax alone, it might be a more advantageous thing to have the Intercolonial in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I must say I doubt it, because I think as business men the Canadian Pacific Railway would still continue to send their freight to Boston and New York rather than to Halifax.

The motion was agreed to.

RETIRING ALLOWANCES TO OFFICERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON rose to Ask the Government what retiring allowances were made to Lieut.-Colonel Villiers, Lieut.-Colonel Van Straubenzie and Major Street?

He said I want to know what retiring allowances were made to these officers in consequence of their having attained the age which is fixed for the retirement of officers from the military service. I understand they get two years' pay as retiring allowance, and I wish to take the opportunity of their retirement to present to the Government the fact that soldiers are the only officers in the service of the country that are not provided with retiring allowances in the evening of their age, that soldiers are of all others less provident or have an opportunity of being less provident that ordinary civil servants of the Government. They have a uniform to provide for themselves, they have a social position which they are expected to fill which does not devolve upon other officers to the same extent, and here are three gentlemen at the age of sixty turned upon the country with two years' pay in their pocket. A soldier is the last man in the world to know how to invest a little loose cash, even if it was worth investing, as a means of livelihood or to provide for the future, for ten, fifteen or twenty years of their lives. What is two years' pay towards that man? I happen to know that two of these officers have families, and that their circumstances are exceedingly straitened, and that neither of them is able out of that small allowance to make any provision for the future of his family or himself at a time when it is impossible for them to turn their attention to other occupations. They are turned out of the civil service because they are no longer suited to fill the office, and with two years' pay, and as soon as that is gone, probably at the end of a year or eighteen months, there they are left without the means of support. Now, these gentlemen went up in 1885; they took their chances before the enemy of being killed; they went out in the defence of their country, and for twenty or twenty-five years, as the case may be, they have been at the call of their country. I certainly think that it is an injurious thing that soldiers in Canada are the only ones that are left unprovided for in the evenings of their age. I do not think there is any country in the world that has to say the same thing of men who are always supposed to be ready to be called upon at any moment, in order to preserve law and order or to defend their country. For that reason I put my motion in that way, not with any desire of cavilling at the amount, but merely to draw the attention of the Government to these facts that I have brought to their notice.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—In answer to the query put by the hon. member from Shell River, I can inform him that Lieut.-Col. Villiers was retired on an allowance of $3,-720. Lieut.-Col. Van Straubenzie, who had not served as long as Lieut.-Col. Villiers, was retired on an allowance of $2,040. No gratuity or allowance was given to Major Street, who occupied a somewhat different position to that of the other two officers, but it is the intention of the Minister of Militia and Defence to ask Parliament to give him a grant in order to place Major Street in the same position as the other two officers. The other question to which the hon. gentlman has alluded, that of adopting a system of pension for the volunteer force, is one which I think this House will agree with me in saying is of very great importance and one which deserves serious consideration on the part of the Government. They have not yet arrived at a decision to adopt the principle suggested by the hon. member. There are many reasons why in all countries the families of soldiers should be looked after and pensions given to them when they have fallen or become aged in the service, but whether that principle should be extended to a country like ours, which has purely a volunteer system, I am not prepared to say. The pension list of the neighbouring country is one which should make us think very seriously before adopting a system of that kind. The hon. gentleman is not strictly correct—I have no doubt it is unintentional—in saying that no other class of Government employés is unprovided for. A large class of engineers and many men who occupy very important positions, who receive their salaries and pay nothing to the superannuation fund, and consequently are not entitled to any pension or retiring allowance. When their services are no longer required they receive nothing. They simply retire the same as they would from the employment of a railway, or steamboat, or any other company. I am, I confess, personally opposed to the pension system. It is only those who have been injured in the service of their country that I would pension. There is no difficuly whatever in obtaining a deputy adjutant general, or brigade major, in any portion of the country. They know when they accept the position what the remuneration is and what the allowances are, and they have a very good idea that should they be called out in the defence of law and order or in defence of the general liberties of the people, or to defend their country against an invasion, no Parliament would refuse to recognize that service and pay them a pension, or take care of their family, in case they lost their lives; but whether that should extend to those who are in every civil position, such as gentlemen who occupy positions similar to those referred to by the hon. member, is a question that I do not think this Government is prepared at present to adopt, as the hon. gentleman suggests. They know what their salary is, and they should do precisely as others have to do. They know that at a certain age they are liable to be retired, when the country gives them a retiring allowance, in proportion to the services they have rendered in that semi-military and civil position, and they should be satisfied.

THE MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST SCHOOL ACTS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Resuming the further adjourned Debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Bernier :—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House copies of all school ordinances, school regulations and amendments thereto, adopted by the Legislative Assembly, the Executive, and any Board or Council of Education, in reference to the establishment, maintenance and administration of schools in the North-west Territories since 1885

Also, for copies of all petitions, memorials and correspondence in reference thereto ;

Also for copies of all reports to the Governor General in Council, and all communications and representations to the authorities in the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Hon. gentlemen, I have to thank my hon. friend from St. Boniface and also my hon. friend from Ottawa for the very moderate way in which they have dealt with the matters under consideration in connection with the Manitoba School Bill, and the ordinance respecting education in the North-west Territories. Particularly do I appreciate this when I consider the fact that both of these gentlemen hold very intense and pronounced views upon this question. It is satisfactory to be able to say that they have reviewed the matter in such a way as not to give offence in the slightest degree to those who might differ from them. We are all well aware of the fact that there is no question upon which men differ so widely, and more calculated to raise the passions of those who have strong feelings on such questions, as those subjects in which are involved religious or sectional questions. I would be a very poor judge of human nature were I for a moment to consider that any remarks which I would make upon this question would change the convictions or principles which hon. gentlemen who preceded me may hold upon these important questions. I now refer to the general principles involved in the questions and in the facts at issue. I therefore have no intention of directing my remarks to any of the general principles involved on the religious phase of the case ; but rather to make an explanation of the facts in connection with the two statutes in question. I very much doubt if I would have asked the indulgence of the House to make, in fact, any remarks upon this question, had not my hon. friend from St. Boniface introduced the two questions together, and failed to draw any distinction between either of them. He was good enough to say that the remarks which he made upon the Manitoba School Bill were equally applicable to the North-west Territories Act, and my hon. friend from Ottawa was apparently equally oblivious to any distinction being made between those two statutes. I, therefore, consider, in justice to the people of the North-west Territories, that it is my duty to inform this House, that there is as wide a difference between the two acts in question as there is between day and night. The Manitoba School Bill entirely abolishes separate schools, while the other bill not only recognizes and maintains, but is committed in its present shape to the principle of perpetuating separate schools, so that I fancy no matter how intense the feelings may be of certain hon. members of this House upon these questions, yet these feelings will be of a sufficiently generous and magnanimous character, to recognize that a very wide distinction exists between these two Acts. I purpose saying a word or two in connection with the Manitoba School Bill before I deal with the question which I propose to discuss, viz., the North-west School Ordinance. In regard to the Manitoba School Bill, it will be conceded, I think, by most of the Protestant majority that the Roman Catholic minority have been dealt with under circumstances constituting very great hardship. It will be generally admitted that the action of the Manitoba Legislature was, to say the least of it, of a very indelicate nature, and did not take into consideration the feelings or the sensibilities which might have arisen in the mind of the Roman Catholic minority in reference to the rights to which they considered they were entitled. I therefore, do not for a moment, in dealing with this branch of the subject under consideration, vindicate the passage of the bill by the Manitoba Legislature. We are fully aware of the fact that the Roman Catholic minority, since confederation, and since that province entered into confederation, enjoyed certain rights and privileges by which they were able to maintain their separate school system, and by which the provinces contributed to the maintenance of separate schools in that province, through this fact they considered themselves entrenched behind the rights and privileges which they had enjoyed for some seventeen or eighteen years prior to the repeal of the old school ordinance. One is, therefore, not surprised that upon a repeal of that Act, very strong feelings of animosity were excited in the minds of the Roman Catholic minority, and they asserted in very strong terms the rights and privileges to which they considered themselves entitled and which they considered should be maintained in their integrity. I would remind hon. gentlemen and particularly my hon. friend from Ottawa, that it was not a Protestant majority of the province of Manitoba as Protestants who took the initiatory steps in repealing that bill, or who were responsible for the agitation which preceded the repeal by the Legislature, but the Liberal party, of which my hon. friend is such a bright and shining light, assumed the whole responsibility for that particular act. If my hon. friend will take the pains to inquire into the history of the late bill and of the present bill in the Manitoba Legislature, he will find that the Conservative party of Manitoba strongly upheld the rights of the minority, and to-day do not conceal in any way the very strong feelings which they have upon the subject, and express denunciation of the course which was pursued by the Liberal party in that province. Not only does it appear to me that the Liberal party were responsible for the passage of the Act, but it appears to me that the Liberal party of the Dominion have taken the first opportunity which presented itself to them to accord their gratitude to the father of the bill, viz., Mr. Martin, the present member for Winnipeg, and so far was that gratitude extended that we find upon the return of the Liberal member for Winnipeg and upon the defeat of the Conservative member, that a halleuiah chorus was raised from the Atlantic to the Pacific, by reason of the defeat of the supporter of the present administration in that constituency. Upon the arrival of the father of the present Manitoba School Act into the House of Commons at Ottawa, we find him being received into the fold of the Liberal party and at once considered one of the faithful and trusted members of the Liberal family. We find Hon. Mr. Laurier, the leader of the party taking hold of him by one arm and the hon. member for Queen's, Mr. Davies, taking hold of him by the other arm and presenting him to the House of Commons, and at once registering him as the champion of the Liberal party, for that part of the Dominion west of Lake Superior. It appeared to me rather peculiar that upon that occasion he should have been introduced not only by the leader of the Liberal party, but by Mr. Davies, the member for Queen's. My hon. friend from Ottawa made reference to the Prince Edward Island School Bill. As hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island are familiar with the passage of that Act, it will be known that Mr. Davies was at the head of the Government in Prince Edward Island when the Bill which conserved to the Roman Catholic minority their school privileges in the province of Prince Edward Island was repealed and the Davies Act passed which gave very great offence. My hon. friend says they never had any bill, but I know this, that at that time, His Grace, Archbishop McIntyre, then the Roman Catholic Bishop of that diocese, petitioned the Government of the day, of whom my hon. friend from Ottawa was a member, for a disallowance of that Act, passed by Mr. Davies's Government, and my hon. friend at that time acknowledged, apparently, to such an extent, the rights of the provinces to legislate upon this subject, that he and his Government failed to see that they should exercise their veto powers and disallow the Act in question. Therefore I say that it appeared to be something more than a coincidence, that Mr. Martin, the member for Winnipeg, the father of the Manitoba School Bill, should be introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Laurier, the leader of the Liberal party, and Mr. Davies, the father of the Prince Edward Island Bill. I would not have made any allusion to the political phase of the Manitoba School Act, had my hon. friend from Ottawa, not cast reflection upon the present administration for not disallowing the Manitoba School Act at the time it was passed by the Local Legislature. I am of opinion that these subjects are often too dangerous in their results to be introduced into political warfare, and I therefore would have felt a sense of delicacy in referring to the matter from a political standpoint, had not my hon. friend made that allusion. I would point out to the House that at that time my hon. friends of the Mackenzie Administration felt themselves placed in such a delicate position and were so committed to provincial rights that they at that time absolutely refused to disallow the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I explained why I did it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am quite aware that my hon. friend explained, but I fail to see that the Prince Edward Island case was not a perfectly parallel case with the Manitoba School case, and if the administration of that day refused to allow that Act, certainly the administration of to-day could not well disallow the Manitoba School Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are not analogous at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Now, in reference to the Manitoba School Bill, it may have been unfortunate for the Roman Catholic minority that about the time the Manitoba School Bill was passed by the Provincial Legislature—that is the present Act—that a very strong feeling prevailed in the province of Manitoba respecting provincial rights. For some time previous to that the federal veto had been exercised in the disallowance of several railway acts, and other legislation of the Manitoba Legislature, and so intense was the feeling in that province that recourse was had to physical force for the purpose of the province asserting the rights, which they at that time considered themselves entitled to, viz., in the building of certain railways, and to such an extent had this feeling asserted itself, that at the time of the passage of the Manitoba School Act, it would have been dangerous for the internal peace of that province had the Federal Government, entirely apart from the constitutional aspect of this Act, endeavoured to intervene by the federal veto. Consequently, under the circumstances, the matter resolved itself for settlement into a constitutional question. The legal aspect of the case at once presented itself: in fact, it assumed such shape, it was perfectly impossible for the Federal Government to interfere. The Roman Catholic minority, so far as my recollection serves me, did not refer the matter to the Federal authorities, but at once instituted proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench, for the purpose of having a judgment of the court upon the question as to whether the Act was ultra vires of the legislature or not. The consequence was the court did hold that it was within the powers of the province. It then went to the full Court of Queen's Bench, which is equivalent to a Court of Appeal, and the full court held that the Act was within the powers of the province. Now, my hon. friend went out of his way, I think, yesterday, to cast a reflection upon the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba. My hon. friend said that the court was thoroughly preju diced in the case, and was, consequently, unfit to pronounce judgment upon so important a matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said they were acting under the pressure of public opinion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend I think, used the word prejudice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps I did.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend did make use of such an expression acting under the pressure of public opinion I think the people of Manitoba would strongly resent such an imputation being cast on that court. Although I am not a member of the Manitoba bar I am sufficiently familiar with the personnel of that court to make this statement with confidence, that there is no province in Canada that possesses a bench in which the Protestants and Catholics of that province repose greater confidence in its ability, probity and sense of right. I am satisfied there is no court in this Dominion better calculated to deal out impartial justice than the Court of Queen's Bench in Manitoba. That case, as you are all aware, came before the Supreme Court of Canada, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench was reversed. It then went to the highest court of the realm, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England. It appears unnecessary to say that there must be some central authority by which controversial questions of this character must be determined, and amongst the political parties of this country there is no party so committed to deciding the rights to which the provinces are entitled under the British North America Act as the party of which the hon. member from Ottawa is leader in this House. The reflections cast by my hon. friend upon the Privy Council as to their want of knowledge of our federal system, of their want of ability to give proper consideration to questions of a constitutional nature arising out of our British North America Act, I think is untenable and unfounded. If there is one question more than another upon which the provinces of this Dominion have congratulated themselves it is the very fact that the Court of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has been the battle ground in which most provinces of this Dominion have won their victories over the federal authority. There is no court in this broad realm more familiar with the constitutional system of Canada, no court in which there are more decisions bearing upon our constitutional questions than that of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If my hon. friend from Ottawa will look at the reports of the Privy Council he will find that few reports issued in which are not reported some constitutional question arising out of the conflict of opinion between the provinces and the federal authority. Therefore I think, my hon. friend could not have given proper consideration to the assertion when he made it that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is entirely unfamiliar with our federal system.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I made the statement, and I make it over again.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend makes it over again—all I can say is, that does not establish the fact that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is not calculated to deal with very great ability upon questions of this nature. I make this statement, that there is no court in the realm so well able to deal with questions such as these now under discussion as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. We well know that questions of this character have to be removed beyond the strife and turmoil and animosities which necessarily arise in discussing such questions. Take for instance the Bench of this Dominion—that Bench may unconsciously become tinged with feelings of partiality or prejudice upon those questions which are discussed in our press and in the public places of this Dominion, but it cannot well be said that the members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council are influenced in their judgment upon such questions by reason of any associations, or sympathies contracted in belonging to one or other of the political parties in Canada. Therefore I say that so far as the Manitoba School Bill is concerned, while I do not vindicate the bill in any way whatever, while I am not here either as an apologist for the bill or as its opponent, yet I say that that bill having been delegated for final decision to the authority recognized by our constitutional system, and that authority having finally decided upon the question, I think it is in the interest of all parties that they should recognize that that central authority has dealt impartially with the bill upon the strict legal and constitutional phases which invest such a question and that there it should rest. I say unhesitatingly that it would be in the interest of all parties, both the Roman Catholic minority and the Protestant majority, that they should accept the pronouncement of the highest tribunal in the realm as deciding respectively the rights of the parties in respect of this particular question. So much for the Manitoba School Act. Now, coming to the ordinance respecting education in the North-west Territories. I was rather astonished on my arrival in Ottawa to find that many gentlemen who acquaint themselves most familiarly with the legislation which is enacted by the various provinces in regard to these matters were entirely unfamiliar with the provisions of the North-west Territory school ordinances respecting separate schools. I found from the opinions which had been expressed in the Quebec press and which had been expressed in other quarters that the opinion did prevail that separate schools in the North-west Territories had been entirely swept out of existence—had been absolutely abolished, that the rights of the minority had been ignored or wilfully violated, and that the territories were in the same position as the Province of Manitoba. Now, as I said on the threshold of my remarks the contrary is entirely the case. For the information of hon. gentlemen I will say this, that from the petitions presented by the Roman Catholic minority of the territories respecting the present School Act the statement is made without equivocation, without any reservation whatever that until the passage of the present School Act, namely in 1892, the school system of the territories, in fact the two systems in the territory, namely, public and separate schools, were carried on in absolute harmony without any friction whatever, and that the Roman Catholic minority enjoyed all the rights and privileges which they could expect, and had no complaint whatever to make against the legislation existing before that particular date. Hon. gentlemen who are familiar perhaps with the limited constitution which we have in the territory know that in 1888 we only had a Legislative Council in the North-west Territories—that there was no one responsible, except the Lieutenant Governor of the Territory to the Federal Government of the day for the expenditure of public moneys or for the carrying on of any of the institutions of a provincial nature. That there was no machinery by which the North-west Council could supervise educational institutions in the Territories except they delegated the authority which they might exercise in council to somebody else outside the council. They therefore provided for appointing an educational board. That board consisted of a certain number of Protestants and a certain number of Catholics, and to that board were delegated the powers conferred on the North-west Council for the carrying on of the educational institutions which might be established in the territories. The members thereof were appointed by the Lieutenant Governor. In 1891 additional powers were given to the North-west Legislature by which the Executive Committee, somewhat analogous to a Provincial Cabinet but more limited in power, were appointed by the House and responsible to the House for the expenditure of all public funds and for the carrying on of the various institutions of a provincial nature within the territories. This did away with the necessity for the existence of a board of education which up to that date had existed. The consequence was that the Legislature provided that the Executive Committee composed of four members of the Legislature should deal with this question, but they desiring to take both the Protestant majority and the Roman Catholic minority into their confidence provided for appointing two Roman Catholics and two Protestants on that board. It is true they had no vote but they were an advisory body to confer with and advise the Executive Committee of the Assembly. We therefore find them doing away with the old board of education which had existed, and the new board passed regulations of a more modern and advanced character than previously existed upon questions of education. I do not say for one moment that that was the most perfect ordinance that could be passed. I do not say that I vindicate or oppose the ordinance—we are only dealing now with the question as to whether the North-west Assembly had power to pass that ordinance which we find placed on the statute-book and the regulations promulgated thereunder. In 1892 the present educational ordinance was passed and no complaint was then made in regard to this until a very recent date. Sometime during last season a movement appears to have been set on foot to urge the disallowance of this ordinance and petitions were sent to the Governor in Council against its remaining on our statute-book. I make this statement upon the authority of the present superintendent of education, that in the first place no change whatever has been made in any of the schools ; that during his last visit of inspection of the separate schools of the territories he put the question to each school if any change had been made under the new regulations and the answer was given that no change had been made. They however expressed themselves apprehensive that there was a possibility of change being made by reason of the majority of those who had charge of the educational institutions in the territories passing regulations which might be objectionable to the Roman Catholic body.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—All I can say with regard to this is that the Roman Catholic minority in the North-west Territories or the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec, or wherever minorities have an existence must place a certain amount of confidence, in the good will and in the recognition by the majority of those rights to which they are entitled. The mere expression of an apprehension that there is the remote possibility at some future time of there being an invasion of such rights I scarcely think is a reasonably tenable ground for contending that there should be a disallowance of all such legislation. So that we may thoroughly analyse this case, I take the liberty to read to you the petition of His Lordship Bishop Grandin, and several of the clergy of the territories, belonging to the Roman Catholic minority, as against the present ordinances and regulations. The principal objection to the regulations appears to be in this paragraph relating to text books:

(7.) Another of the said regulations of the Council of Public Instruction impose a uniform course of instruction and a uniform selection of text books alike for all schools whether Public, Protestant or Catholic. As to such a regulation, it is impossible that it can meet with the approval of both Protestants and Catholics. The text books now prescribed are in many instances of a character highly objectionable to Catholics. These text books are for the most part Protestant, and are offensive to Catholics by asserting many things which Catholics have always contended, contradicted the facts by entirely ignoring, or greatly minimizing, misrepresenting or misinterpreting the part of the Catholic Church and her members in history and in all departments of literature and science, and by propagating religious and philosophical theories which Catholics reprobate or disapprove.

Now, I want to deal with this question of text books. This appears to have been one of the principal objections to the regulations which have been passed under the existing ordinance. Upon the petitions in question being received by the Governor in Council, the Privy Council made rigid inquiry for the purpose of thoroughly examining into the truth of these statements and ascertaining as to whether there had been a violation of the rights and privileges which the Roman Catholic minority had enjoyed. This document has been made public, and the report of the Privy Council of Canada has been that there has been no interference with the text books which have been used in the Roman Catholic schools since 1888. That the text books which were selected by the Catholic section of the board of the separate schools in the North-west are the same text books which are in use to-day, with the exception of the Roman Catholic readers. Now permit me to say in connection with this question that the question of readers, as hon. gentlemen know, has already raised a very great deal of question in the minds of supporters of separate schools. Under the old system of separate schools and previous to 1892, the separate schools of the territory used what was known as the Metropolitan Series of Catholic Readers At the instance of some of the separate schools in the territories the educational board—mind you, before the passage of the present regulations—asked liberty from the educational board to discard the Metropolitan Readers and to use what is known as the Ontario Reader, namely, a Catholic text book which is used largely in the province of Ontario. Now, in regard to the Metropolitan Series of readers, my hon. friends from Quebec are probably acquainted with this fact, that at a late meeting of the council of public instruction in the province of Quebec presided over by His Eminence, Cardinal Taschereau, the Metropolitan Series was discarded and other readers substituted in their place. My authority is the official document which I hold before me—so the readers which are in use in the separate schools in the province of Ontario are those that are used in the North-west Territory. Consequently, they are not only the recognized readers of the Catholic separate schools in other parts of the Dominion of Canada, but they have been placed on this list, I find from the documents before me, at the instance of the Roman Catholic schools of the territory. Therefore, so far as that objection is concerned, I do not think it is tenable, inasmuch as those readers have been in use previous to the passage of the Act of 1892 and are the readers practically selected by the Roman Catholics themselves. The next complaint deals with the question of inspection. Under the present regulations a uniform system of inspection had been established and is now followed out. Permit me to say this, and upon your perusing the petitions against the present ordinance you may be surprised to find that the Roman Catholic petitioners did not appear to be aware that previous to 1892 and under the old system a uniform system of inspection did prevail. Consequently, it cannot reasonably be said that the institution which was established by both parties and with their mutual understanding is objectionable and a ground for complaint. The next question which appears to have created a great deal of friction under the present Act is one relating to the training of teachers. Previous to 1892 there had been no normal schools in the territory. In 1892, after the passage of the present Act, it was deemed desirable that a normal school should be established. The Roman Catholic minority appear to think that two normal schools should have been established, and I think that is one of the complaints. I do not for a moment say that it is not a complaint well-grounded.

Supporters of separate schools may have pronounced opinions on such a question, but I will read to you a resolution passed by both sections of the Board of Education in 1888 in regard to the establishment of a normal school, in which resolution both parties agree upon the establishment of one normal school, in which all the branches of training might be acquired, and in which school it is implied both Roman Catholics and Protestants might attend and receive certificates therefrom :

At a meeting of the Board of Education, held on the 25th January, 1888, it was resolved :—

That in the opinion of this board, it is necessary to make provision for the instruction and training of teachers for our public schools in the science and art of teaching :

That the Board feels that the appointment of a normal school principal, whose duty it would be to hold normal school sessions in different parts of the country, would have the best possible results in increasing the efficiency of teachers and stimulating education.

Therefore resolved :—

That His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor be requested to urge upon the Dominion Government the advisability of granting the sum of five thousand dollars for the next financial year for normal school purposes.

At that meeting, among other members present and approving, were Rev. Father Leduc and Mr. A. E. Forget.

Again, on the 3rd September, 1891, the Board of Education, on the motion of Mr. A. E. Forget, a Roman Catholic member, passed the following resolution :—

That all persons in the inspectorates of Eastern and Western Assiniboia, who obtained non-professional certificates at the recent examination of teachers, not holding certificates of normal training, and who desire to obtain professional certificates, be required to attend a normal session either at Moosomin or Regina ; such normal session to commence on the reopening of the union schools, after the Christmas holidays, and to terminate, for third class teachers, six weeks, and for first and second class teachers, three months, from the date of commencement.

On this occasion were present and approving, the Rev. Father Leduc, the Hon. Mr. Justice Rouleau, and Mr. A. E. Forget, all the members of the Roman Catholic Section of the Board.

Apparently at that time there did not exist any difference of opinion in respect of the desirability of establishing only one normal school, and that that normal school should be for the equal advantage of both sections of the community, namely—Roman Catholics and Protestants.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Will the hon. gentleman tell me whether the board of examiners was composed as it is now under the new ordinance ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In 1891?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—In 1888 and 1891 was there a Catholic on the board ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, three.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—And had a right to vote ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes. In the absence of an executive committee it was necessary that to somebody should be delegated the duties to look after education, but when the Parliament of Canada gave the right to the Assembly to appoint an executive committee and responsible to the House they then assumed the responsibility of attending to those duties themselves. They then appointed two Roman Catholics and two Protestants on the board, but without votes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has given us a great deal of very interesting information, and that is a thing which we all very much need, and it is with a view of suggesting one or two points on which light is needed that I ask leave to interrupt him. The hon. gentleman speaks of normal schools. The resolution and extracts from which he read does not describe normal schools—it speaks of lectures to be delivered in different parts of the territories on normal school subjects. That is a totally different thing from establishing normal schools, and that section does not appear to contemplate the establishment of one normal school. The last extract I did not quite apprehend. I do not know whether that meant that there was to be a regular normal school conducted at Regina and another at Moosomin.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend is right in the remark that he has made. When I spoke of normal schools I did not refer to the building of normal schoools, but I referred to the normal school course being established. We have no normal school buildings in the North-west, but a superintendent and inspectors are appointed and they at points throughout the territory hold normal school sessions. This is what we term a normal school. At that time, viz., 1888, hon. gentlemen will observe both parties appeared to have determined upon this method of educating their teachers together, and recognized the necessity of a uniform course being adopted, I suppose to avoid expense and possibly to ensure efficiency. Now there appears from a close perusal of the petitions the fact that the objections are generally limited to those three complaints, namely, qualification of teachers, text books and inspection. Hon. gentlemen will see that before the passage of the ordinance and for some years prior to that time practically the same system which then obtained is in operation to-day. At that time it produced no friction and to-day is apparently producing no friction, except the remote possibility which I have already mentioned, and which the Roman Catholic minority fear, viz., that there may possibly be enacted regulations and enactments which are entirely contrary to the spirit of the North-west Territories Act, I would furthermore make this statement, that the Privy Council has not only dealt with the point which I read to hon. gentlemen, but has dealt with all the points in question. They considered the question of inspection, also the question of text books, and the question of qualification for teachers. They find from this report which I hold in my hand and which has been published that there has been no interference. I will read, hon. gentlemen, the last clause of this finding, which will indicate to you the satisfaction which the Committee of the Privy Council had in examining into the alleged grievances and in ascertaining that the rights of the separate schools had not been invaded :

The committee have not ascertained that any act done or regulation made by the Council of Public Instruction under the ordinance of 1892 is contrary to the rights or interests of the minority in the territories.

I think hon. gentlemen must express a sense of satisfaction at knowing that the rights of the minority have been preserved to the extent stated in the report which I have read. And furthermore that the rumours which have been circulated regarding the very great apprehension felt by the minority are not of a character to give rise to the fears which are expressed in those petitions and which are stated in the press and which many hon. gentlemen in this House appear to think may possibly become materialized into actual results. This, like most of the other school questions which have arisen throughout the Dominion, largely partakes of a legal character. It is quite natural that supporters of separate schools in the territories should view with a great deal of jealousy the rights which have been given them, in view of the fact that there is claimed to have been a violation of those rights throughout the Dominion since confederation in some of the provinces. I must congratulate hon. gentlemen in taking this position ; it is perfectly right and it is commendable to a very great degree, that they should do every act possible for the purpose of protecting themselves in those privileges which have been given them under the various statutes, which to-day are safe-guarding their interests, but I would ask them in considering this fact, to consider the further fact that the Protestant majority also consider that they have rights, that the Protestant majority may possibly put an entirely different construction upon the statute law in which those rights are embodied to that put upon it by the Roman Catholic minority. This must be viewed in a broad and liberal-minded sense. Because some may express a grave apprehension that their rights are being trampled upon, that they are being crushed by the majority, it does not necessarily follow that such is the case. Hon. gentlemen must recognize that there are two sides to every question of this character, that invariably these questions resolve themselves into constitutional questions, and that our constitution is so framed as to safe-guard them from any deliberate and violent invasion of those rights to which they are entitled. Now, in case some hon. gentleman may say that I purposely overlook dealing with one point which has caused friction and created some degree of animosity in the territories, I would deal with it before proceeding further. A difficulty appears to have arisen from the fact that the members of religious communities are required under the present regulations to have certain qualifications before they can teach in the separate schools or before they can teach in any schools. Under the old system they were required to possess certain qualifications and under the new system they are required to possess normal school qualifications, or qualifications of an equivalent character.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—What are we to understand by normal school qualifications ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am glad that my hon. friend has asked me that question. Under the regulations it is provided that all those who desire to teach shall attend the normal school sessions and shall pass certain examinations upon prescribed subjects dealt with by the lecturers in normal school sessions. The objection has been raised by ladies of religious communities there that they cannot possibly attend those public lectures. Now, I would say that they are not compelled to attend those normal school sessions, that if they pass the examinations indicating that they are possessed of qualifications sufficient for teaching and indicating proficiency in a normal school training elsewhere it is quite sufficient to qualify them to obtain a certificate. I will read a communication sent by Mr. Haultain, the Chairman of the Executive to the Lieutenant-Governor for the purpose of forwarding to the Governor in Council, so that you may see how far this question goes.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I would like to ask the hon. gentlemen before he proceeds any further, who is to examine those lady teachers?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There are inspectors appointed for that purpose. Remember, hon. gentlemen, there is a uniform system of inspection, and had been previous to the passage of the present Act. There are four inspectors; one of those is a Roman Catholic inspector, but the Roman Catholic inspector inspects Protestant schools, and the Protestant inspectors have a right to inspect Catholic schools; there is a uniform system of inspection and the examinations are conducted by those inspectors. The document which I am reading from is dated 4th January, 1894.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Since the petition?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, since the petition, in explanation of certain questions submitted to the Lieutenant Governor for information:

By subsection 6 of section 10 and section 12, chap. 59 of the Revised Ordinances, 1888, the general examination of the licensing of teachers was vested in the whole board of education and not in the sections of the board.

Previous to the passage of the present ordinance there was no sectional method of examining teachers.

The board of education was composed of five Protestant and three Roman Catholic members.

With regard to the training of teachers I might say that our regulations do not compel any teacher who possesses equivalent qualifications to attend our normal sessions.

Teachers are required to possess scholarship and professional skill. If any member of a religious order presents evidence of these, she can obtain her certificate without attending the normal school, but if she does not present such evidence, under our regulations she is not entitled, in her religious character, to any more than other lady who wishes to teach in a Government school and obtain a Government grant.

I might say, in case I should overlook it later, that my hon. friend dealt yesterday with the great liberality towards Roman Catholic schools in Great Britain and Quebec and referred to the small grant in Ontario. Now in the North-west Territories the State contributes about 50 per cent of the entire expenses of the schools; so therefore, hon. gentlemen, I think it is not an unreasonable contention to say that as the State contributes about 50 per cent of the expenses for the schools, that the State should retain a certain amount of authority and should say what qualifications teachers should possess and what system of inspection should prevail, so that the most efficient system possible of education could be had in these Territories, and I think such is the case to-day. I think statistics will show that there is no portion of this Dominion in which its public schools—and by that designation I include separate schools—have attained to a higher grade of effi iency than in the North-west Territories of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Have not those in Ontario the right to certificates?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I will read further, and you will see how the matter stands:

As a matter of fact many members of religious orders are specially and splendidly trained as teachers and our regulations will admit them without any attendance at our normal classes.

No member of a religious order teaching in the Territories is affected by the normal school regulations and for the future members of religious communities wishing to engage as teachers in schools drawing public money in the territories must conform with regulations on which they have had full notice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to ask whether he understands the statement of Mr. Haultain to mean that a teacher can, by passing an examination, show his qualifications as a teacher and be admitted as a teacher. If a teacher can show a qualification by passing a severe examination that ought to be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes, I fancy that is it. They would pass an examination in Ontario and would be qualified to teach in Quebec without any further examination.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—For the information of my hon. friend from Quebec I would say that at one period—I am not aware whether that school is in existence now—the Roman Catholics of Manitoba had a normal school at St. Boniface, and up to the present time they have accepted the certificates of a normal school of the province of Manitoba as a sufficient qualification for teaching in the territories. The following are the regulations as examined by the Privy Council upon this question :

A person holding a professional certificate of the first or second class issued in Ontario or Manitoba since 1886 may receive a certificate of equal standing upon presenting (a.) a statement from the Department of Education in his own province that his certificate is still valid, (b.) a certificate of moral character of recent date, (c.) a certificate from his last inspector of having taught successfully.

Persons holding non-professional certificates of the first or second class issued in Ontario or Manitoba since 1886 may receive certificates of equal standing upon presenting proof of character and age.

Persons holding certificates from other provinces of the Dominion or from the British Islands may receive certificates of such class as the Council of Public Instruction may deem them entitled to.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—They are not in the same position as those from Ontario and Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, because the institutions in Ontario and Manitoba are much of the same class or grade as those in the North-west Territories.

Persons holding certificates of educational value from institutions other than those mentioned may receive such certificates as the Council of Public Instruction may deem them entitled to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is all left to the Council of Public Instruction.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Here is another clause which might satisfy my hon. friend:

With regard to the training of teachers I might say that our regulations do not compel any teacher who possesses equivalent qualifications to attend our normal school. Teachers are required to possess scholarship and professional skill. If any member of a religious order presents evidence of these she can obtain her certificate without attending our normal school.

Such, hon. gentlemen, are some of the regulations to which I have referred. Now permit me to say this that entirely apart from the guarantees by which the minority in the North-west Territories is safeguarded, I for one should regard it as a very regrettable circumstance that the slightest apprehension should exist in the mind of the minority as to the rights and privileges to which they are entitled. Under our governmental system it is impossible, it would be unwise and impractical, on controversial subjects of this character, for the Federal Government to exercise the power of disallowance where both parties may honestly differ in respect of their rights. It will be apparent to all discerning minds that there can only be federal intervention or the right of veto exercised where a province has clearly exceeded its powers or where so manifest a wrong has been done that it must be obvious to the entire public, as contra-distinguished from those controversial questions which are constantly arising in the provinces between different sects. In regard to those there must be some central authority which shall have power to decide the issue one way or the other. The minority may think one way and the majority the other way, and they both may be equally honest in their decision. Now this method was persued in the solution of the present difficulty. The matter was brought before the Governor in Council, a very close examination was made in regard to the Ordinance and the regulations which have been passed and we find the report of the Committee of the Privy Council of the most satisfactory character, and particularly to the Protestant majority as indicating that they have observed in their integrity the rights to which the Roman Catholic minority are entitled. I think that the hon. gentlemen who may be apprehensive of the rights of the minority being trampled upon will have a certain degree—in fact they should have an unlimited degree—of confidence in the personnel of the Privy Council of Canada, made up as it is I believe of an equal number, or nearly so, of Roman Catholic and Protestants. This is the best guarantee which the minority can have, that their rights will not be invaded and that the principles which have been assured to them by statute will be guarded in all their integrity. There is no section of this whole Dominion in which Roman Catholics and Protestants live in greater harmony than on the broad prairies of the North-west Territories. Its boundless character has a widening effect upon men's minds. I believe the Roman Catholic minority in the North-west Territories have every confidence in the Protestant majority that their rights will be preserved, and that there will be no wilful violation of them. As the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec have received generous and magnanimous treatment at the hands of the Roman Catholic majority, so have the Protestant majority in the North-west Territories endeavoured to emulate the example set them by the Roman Catholic majority in Quebec. They have ever been willing to accord to the Roman Catholic minority the same privileges they themselves enjoy and I hope in the territories as well as the rest of the Dominion they will ever be animated by that spirit. Now it must be apparent to all of us who are familiar with our constitutional system that minorities no matter whether it be a Protestant minority in the province of Quebec or the Roman Catholic minority in the North-west Territories must necessarily rely upon the majority according that spirit of liberality, equality and fair-play which throughout the whole British empire is the fundamental principle of our liberty. I say without hesitation that in the North-west Territories this will be acceded to the Roman Catholic minority in no less degree than in the very heart of the Empire itself. I should regret it personally if there should be any violation of the rights of the minority. The majority by so doing would perpetrate upon themselves a greater wrong than they would upon the minority by thus violating the principle upon which our constitution rests, namely, the securing of civil and religious rights to Her Majesty's subjects throughout the Dominion. Now, in conclusion, let me say that I hope this explanation which I have given of this Ordinance may in some degree contribute to an assurance in the mind of this honourable House that the rights of the minority have been respected, and that the people of the North-west Territories will ever consider it not only a statutory duty but a pleasurable one to regard the rights of the minority inviolate and sacred.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the North-west Ordinance carries out in any possible degree the generous, manly views he himself has expressed in regard to the treatment of the minority by the majority?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What I did say was that I am not called upon to vindicate the present Ordinance; neither am I here as an apologist for the present Ordinance, but what I do say is that the Ordinance is within the rights of the North-west Legislature.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Mon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And has been found so by the Committee of the Privy Council, and that being the case I say it would be unfortunate if there was a disturbance of that Ordinance which possibly might create greater animosity than at present exists.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—If the Government have no objection I move that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have no objection to the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow, but I should like to have it terminated soon. I would not suggest anything which would look like an attempt to curtail the debate, especially as it has been carried on in such a calm, liberal and dispassionate spirit. The whole question of separate schools,—the advisability of their establishment, the relative liberality of each province has been largely dealt with, and we have had a history of the whole question. It has struck me that the debate has been as wide as it could possibly be under the circumstances, without adhering to the question that was really brought before the House by the hon. member from Provencher. I will say this before I sit down, that I personally, on behalf of the Government, compliment him, not only upon the courteous, but on the scholarly, cool, calm, and dignified manner in which he presented the subject to the House. I am sure it must have met with the approval of every one who heard it no matter whether he agreed individually with the hon. gentleman's views or not, I thought he had set an example to the whole of us in dealing with a question which is intricate, but is one of great delicacy. He discussed the question in a spirit that all of us might profitably follow in the future.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If the House thinks it would be well to extend the time for receiving petitions for private bills, the Government has no objection of doing so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The time under the new rule is much longer than under the old rule, and the very object of lengthening the time was to prevent these extensions.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The House of Commons positively refused to extend the time and our committee thought it was not advisable to grant an extension in this House, when it was refused in the other.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Under the circumstances it is not advisable to do so. More than that, I know that trouble has arisen very often in the lower House over the extension of the time. People who want private bills have a whole year to make up their minds about it, and they know our rules and should comply with them and not postpone presenting their petitions and delay the business of parliament.

The Senate adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 6th April, 1894.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE BEHRING SEA ARBITRATION.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask and get a reply from the hon. the leader of the House with respect to a cablegram that appeared in this morning's Citizen, anent the Behring Sea Bill that is now before the Imperial House of Commons. I find that, during the discussion, the following question was asked by one of the members of the House, Mr. Gibson Bowles, Tory members for Lynn, "was the agreement of Canada unconditional, or the same as that of 1891, when a modus vivendi was agreed to, on condition that Canadian sealers should receive compensation?" The reply made on behalf of the Government, by Mr. Buxton, Parliamentary Secretary of the Colonial Office, was the "hon. member must wait for a decided answer until the Government receives the papers," and then he adds, "The Government understands that Canada has not attached any condition and that compensation has not been asked for." I may say, hon. gentlemen, that I refuse to believe that the Government would so far neglect their duty and the interests of Canada as not to ask for compensation. If the hon. leader is not in a position to answer the question to-day, I hope that he will do so at the next sitting of the House, without any formal notice.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am afraid that I shall have to give the hon. gentleman an answer similar in character to that received by a gentleman holding a name very much like mine; that is, he will have to wait until I obtain the particulars with reference to the question which he has asked. If the hon. gentleman had given me notice that he intended to ask that question, I would have made myself acquainted with all the facts. I am quite safe in saying, however, that a large portion of that answer is not strictly correct, as I understand it.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—That is the last portion?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—As the hon. gentleman has called my attention to it, I shall look into the matter and hope to be able to give him a definite answer on Monday.

THE WESTERN CANADA TRUST AND GUARANTEE CORPORATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (D), An Act to incorporate the Western Canada Trust and Guarantee Company.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I hope that when that bill goes to committee, if it does go there, my hon. friend will not object to an alteration in the name. There is an old established company which bears the name of the Western Canada Loan and Savings Company, and I think very great confusion would likely arise in consequence of that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have so explained to the mover of the bill, and he is quite willing that the name should be changed to meet the views of my hon. friend.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST SCHOOL ACTS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Resuming the further Debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Bernier :—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, copies of all school ordinances, school regulations and amendments thereto, adopted by the Legislative Assembly, the Executive, and any Board or Council of Education, in reference to the establishment, maintenance and administration of schools in the North-west Territories since 1885;

Also, for copies of all petitions, memorials and correspondence in reference thereto;

Also, for copies of all Orders in Council, reports to the Governor General in Council, and all communications and representations to the authorities in the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said: It is not my intention to make the speech on this occasion that I intended to deliver when I gave notice that I intended to call the attention of the Government to this subject. That notice was as follows:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to certain promises made and certain engagements solemnly undertaken, at and in respect of the confederation, but before its adoption, upon various subjects and particularly upon the question of education; also to the non-performance of these engagements; and to the difficulties which exist at the present time and those which have existed at various times since the confederation became an accomplished fact, difficulties which are the consequence of these violations of promises and engagements.

And that he will inquire of the Government whether it proposes to take the necessary steps to remedy these difficulties and to render justice to that class of Her Majesty's subjects who suffer from these violations of promises.

I have my views as to the course which should be pursued under existing circumstances. My friends have other views. In a case of such great importance, I thought I should subordinate my opinions to those of the majority, especially when I consider that my province is not interested in either of the two cases with which the House has to deal at the present time, so I asked to have that notice dropped. Should my hon. friend in due course adopt my views, then I shall be ready to give expression to the opinions that I hold as I have prepared them. Referring to the question as it is now before the House, it is my intention to answer as well as I can the statements that have been made by the hon. member from Calgary. I am not a lawyer, as he is, and it is difficult for me to meet his statements; nevertheless I have a duty imposed on me, and that duty I must fulfil to the best of my ability. The hon. gentleman took exception to some statements of the hon. member from Ottawa and the member from St. Boniface, and insisted that the School Act in Manitoba and the North-west ordinance are not alike. I am ready to admit that there is a good deal of difference between the two, but I regret to say that neither of them can meet our conscientious views, so these gentlemen were justified in expressing their objection to both. In principle the two Acts are alike to us, because we cannot accept them. The hon. Senator from Calgary told us that he would take up the Manitoba school question first, and then deal with the North-west school question. I will follow the same course. The hon. gentleman says that separate schools in Manitoba by the Provincial Act are altogether abolished, and we ought to hear no more of them since they have no longer any existence. That is true—the judgment of the Privy Council is final and we must submit to it, as we always have been ready to submit to authority. Catholics are obliged to do so, and they would not be doing their duty if they did otherwise. The hon. gentleman said that only the constitutional question could be dealt with. Very well, I am ready to deal with that, and it will be in this way—I shall have to take the judgment of the Privy Council and examine it and see whether justice has been done to the minority in Manitoba. The judgment surprised me. I have long been accustomed to vindicate the character of the Privy Council in England. That body, in all matters in which our church appealed to them, generally rendered good judgments and gave satisfaction, but in this instance I regret to say that the judgment cannot satisfy any man who understands what he reads. I will give some evidence of that. You find in the reasons given by their lordships this :

Notwithstanding the Public Schools Act, 1890, Roman Catholics and members of every other religious body in Manitoba are free to establish schools throughout the province ; they are free to maintain their schools by school fees or voluntary subscriptions ; they are free to conduct their schools according their own religious tenets without molestation or interference.

No child is compelled to attend a public school. No special advantage other than the advantage of a free education in schools conducted under public management is held out to those who do attend.

But then it is impossible for Roman Catholics, or for members of the Church of England (if their views are correctly represented by the bishop of Rupert's Land, who has given evidence in Logan's case), to send their children to public schools where the education is not superintended and directed by the authorities of their church. Roman Catholics or members of the Church of England who are taxed for public schools, and at the same time feel themselves compelled to support their own schools, are in a less favourable position than those who can take advantage of the free education provided by the Act of 1890.

That may be so. But what right or privilege is violated or prejudicially affected by the law ?

It is not the law that is in fault. It is owing to religious convictions which everybody must respect, and to the teaching of their church, that Roman Catholics and members of the Church of England find themselves unable to partake of advantages which the law offers to all alike.

That was not the question which was before their honours ; the question was whether the rights of the Catholics at the time of the union were violated by the Act of the Legislature of Manitoba. Though the minority have a right to establish schools of their own, they still have to pay taxes in support of the public schools. In judging as they did, their lordships either did not pay sufficient attention to the facts, or the facts were not properly submitted to them. Otherwise they would not have given such reasons for their judgment. Their duty was to see whether the local authorities had exceeded the powers given by the constitutional Act of Manitoba to the Provincial Legislature. I say this is what they did not do. Their lordships further on state that the educational clause was not clear, and that the parties who drew up that clause should have taken care that it was properly worded. That is no reason for their decision. If the clause was not clear, was it not the duty of the judges to ascertain what it really meant ? Is there not a rule in common law that when a clause in an Act is not clear you have to look at the intention of the parties when they contracted ? If this had been done, their lordships would have seen that the reasons which they then gave could not be received with satisfaction by those who were interested in that case. No doubt the School Act of 1890 does not directly forbid separate schools, but it evidently does so indirectly, when it forces people to pay taxes for the support of the public schools it creates. It is evident that the promoters of this law expected that such would be the consequence. They evidently thought that this new system would prevent the continuation of separate schools, the expenses of maintaining them falling only on dissentient minorities who would have only to pay taxes for public schools. This view of the case was so evident that the presiding judge of the Privy Council, in giving judgment, could not help admitting the fact, when after referring to the different complaints made by both minorities, Catholics and Protestants belonging to the Church of England, he adds : "It may be so." Continuing, his Lordship states : "But what right or privilege is violated or prejudicially affected" ? Is it not a privilege to be exempted from paying taxes, whether municipal, scholastic or political ? What is a privilege, if not an exceptional law ? The word "privilege" is derived from the Latin word : privilegium (privata-lex)—exceptional law —whether written or unwritten, matters not, since at common law, an old custom is law in absence of written law. If so, the privilege which the minorities had of paying only for their own schools, schools of their creed, is then altogether violated and most prejudicially affected, when they have now, under the law of 1890, to pay taxes for public schools. His Lordship then goes on : "It is not the law that is in fault. It is owing to religious convictions, &c., &c., &c." I wonder by what forced construction his Lordship brought the Churches of Rome and of England, as well as their teachings, into the question which he had to decide ! What was the question ? Simply whether the minorities had, before the union of this province with the Dominion, any privileges which might have been prejudicially affected by the new law. Whether those minorities look to Holy Scriptures for their rule of faith, or whether they look to their church for such rule, has evidently nothing to do with the question submitted to their Lordships. His Lordship was then altogether wrong in this instance, as he was when he said : "It is not the law that is in fault." It was the law that was in fault, since it could not destroy the privileges which the minorities enjoyed at the time of the union. Even if the law was right, as the Privy Council has decided it was, and the minorities had no right to complain, it would be the law which would be the cause of the disadvantage which the minorities would be laboring under. You could not say that it was due to the convictions of the people in a country where religious liberty exists. Then another motive is given in the judgment in the following words :

It can hardly be contended that, in order to give a substantial operation and effect to a saving clause expressed in general terms, it is incumbent upon the court to discover privileges which are not apparent of themselves, or to ascribe distinctive and peculiar features to rights which seem to be of such a common type as not to deserve special notice or require special protection.

Now, I must say I was greatly surprised to learn that the Privy Council had dealt with such an important case in that way. They treated those rights as though they were rights of a very common type and not deserving of notice, and if that is the way they treat religious liberty I pity their lordships. It does not confirm the idea which I had of the Privy Council in England. On the contrary, I contend it was their strict duty to inquire and see what those general terms meant. That could have been easily done. I suppose the Government having had the case under consideration, had possession of the documents and had forwarded them to the Privy Council. Their lordships should have looked into the Bill of Rights which was accepted by the federal authorities in 1870, when the delegates came to Ottawa to negotiate for the admission of the North-west into the confederation. They presented a Bill of Rights which had been accepted by the people at a general meeting held in Winnipeg, and in that Bill of Rights I find No. 7 positively stating that they reserved their separate schools, and that the taxes for public schools should be returned to them in proportion to their number in the population. But the Privy Council did another injustice. There is a rule of common law that if a party puts a clause in an Act which is favourable to him, but which is obscure, it must be construed against him and not against the party who is innocent. In this case the population of Manitoba have to pay the penalty of the fraud that was perpetrated, though the Government were the sole agents at the time. They alone, were capable of passing the Act—the people of the west could not come into this House or the other House to investigate the details of it. So that if, as the Privy Council says, it is in such "general terms," the fault is ours, it is the fault of the Executive, but according to the judgment we have nothing to pay for that. Those people will have to bear the burden, because they will have to pay taxes for schools which they had been promised they would never have to assist in maintaining. It must be recollected that this is only a beginning. Even since this judgement has been published in Canada, endeavours have been made in Ontario to belittle the importance of the separate school law, and I have no doubt there will be many more such attempts since they have succeeded so well in Manitoba in deceiving the people and forcing them to pay for the support of public schools. The whole Catholic population of the Dominion is interested in this question. It is a matter of great importance to about two millions of our population, over two-fifths, and it deserves the consideration of every man who wishes to be honest and deal well with his neighbour. Then their lordships go on to say :

In their lordship's opinion, it would be going much too far to hold that the establishment of a national system of education upon an unsectarian basis is so inconsistent with the right to set up and maintain denominational schools that the two things cannot exist together, or that the existence of the one necessarily implies or involves immunity from taxation for the purpose of the other.

Well, hon. gentlemen, I am sure that their lordships never heard that objection. I defy any man to prove that that objection was taken. Our objection is that we have to contribute to the support of public schools which our children cannot attend, and then if we want to have private schools we must maintain them at our own expense. Had the law been passed in such a shape that the whole population would have to pay for the public schools, but that the separate schools would receive their fair share of the public money, there would be no objection.

So that this remark of their lordships which I have just quoted, is nonsense: it is simply giving reasons against an objection which was never raised. I went over that judgment, and I may say the same thing of every part of it. What I have already quoted is quite enough to show that the judgment did not receive that consideration which they generally give in England to matters of importance; and this is one of very great importance. I believe the hon. member from Calgary added that it is now only a constitutional question. Well, I am ready to meet him on that point, and I would tell him this: Among the numerous documents which have been put before Parliament, is one from Sir John Thompson. I thought I might find in it some good argumet in favour of the course followed by the Executive and himself and his collegues, in dealing with this question, but sad to say, such is not the case. On the contrary, the reading of these papers convinces me that the Thompson Government, as well as the preceding administration under Sir John A. Macdonald, determined to shirk the responsibility of dealing with those cases. They had full power to act and they decided not to do so, and relieved themselves by leaving the whole question to be dealt with by the Privy Council. As a consequence of this determination, the case of Manitoba has been before the courts for three years, and God knows how many years more the question will be discussed. Was this right? No, far from it. The hon. gentleman knew better than any one else the difference which exists between his tribunal, the Executive, and the judicial tribunal. The judicial tribunal would decide those questions strictly in point of law. The Executive themselves had been a party to the negotiations which preceded the entry of Manitoba and the Territories into confederation. The Executive would therefore have to consider all the circumstances of the case, and the intentions of both the contracting parties at the time of the union. The Executive would have considered that at the time of the negotiations the delegates from the west had made the school question a sine qua non one, as is shown by the Bill of Rights, which was the basis of the negotiations. The seventh article is in the following words:

> That the schools shall be separate and that the moneys for schools shall be divided between the several denominations pro rata of their respective populations.

As a consequence, as I said before, an injustice has been done to the people of Manitoba. It seems not only in the House, but outside that the great point is overlooked, and minor points, which have nothing to do with the question, are insisted upon. The only question which we have to deal with when speaking of that educational clause is this—whether at the time of Confederation it was understood that separate schools should exist in Canada. In 1864, the delegates from the different provinces decided that they would meet together in Quebec, in October, 1865. They met and adopted a series of resolutions, one of which dealt with that very question. Those resolutions had to be submitted to the different legislatures in the several provinces. It has often been said that the Confederation Act was a compromise. I wish to quote words that were uttered at the time, in the Parliament of old Canada, to show that it was so understood by all parties. Sir John Macdonald said in his speech reported in the Confederation Debates:

> The resolutions on their face bore evidence of compromise; perhaps not one of the delegates from any of the provinces would have propounded this scheme as a whole, but being impressed with the conviction that it was highly desirable with a view to the maintenance of British power on this continent that there should be confederation and a junction of all the provinces, the consideration of the details was entered upon in a spirit of compromise.

At that time a coalition Government was in office. The leader of the other party, the Hon. George Brown, said in the same debate:

> To assert, then, that our scheme is without fault, would be folly. It was necessarily the work of concession; not one of the thirty-three framers but had, on some points, to yield his opinions; and, for myself, I freely admit that I struggled earnestly, for days together, to have portions of the scheme amended. But Mr. Speaker, admitting all this—admitting all the difficulties that beset us—admitting frankly that defects in the measure exist—I say that, taking the scheme as a whole, it has my cordial, enthusiastic support without hesitation or reservation.

Now what is a compromise? Is it not an agreement in which both parties give up some of their views? If so let us see which of the Protestant views were given up at that time. I quote again from the speeches of those two gentlemen to whom I have already referred. Here is what the Hon. George Brown said as to giving up some of their views on the subject of education:

Now, I need hardly remind the House that I have always opposed and continued to oppose the system of sectarian education so far as the public chest is concerned. I have never had any hesitation on that point. I have never been able to see why all the people of the province, to whatever sect they may belong, should not send their children to the same common schools to receive the ordinary branches of instruction. I regard the parent and the pastor as the best religious instructors—and so long as the religious faith of the children is uninterfered with, and ample opportunity afforded to the clergy to give religious instruction to the children of their flocks, I cannot conceive any sound objection to mixed schools. But while in the Conference and elsewhere I have always maintained this view, and always given my vote against sectarian public schools, I am bound to admit, as I have always admitted, that the sectarian system, carried to the limited extent it has yet been in Upper Canada, and confined as it chiefly is to cities and towns, has not been a very great practical injury. The real cause of alarm was that the admission of the sectarian principle was there, and that any moment it might be extended to such a degree as to split up our school system altogether. There are but a hundred separate schools in Upper Canada, out of some four thousand, and all Roman Catholic. But if the Roman Catholics are entitled to Separate schools and to go on extending their operations, so are the members of the Church of England, the Presbyterians, tha Methodists, and all other sects. No candid Roman Catholic will deny this for a moment; and there lay the great danger to our educational fabric, that the separate system might gradually extend itself until the whole country was studded with nurseries of sectarianism, most hurtful to the best interests of the province, and entailing an enormous expense to sustain the hosts of teachers that so prodigal a system of public instruction must inevitably entail. Now it is known to every hon. member of this House that an Act was passed in 1863, as a final settlement of this sectarian controversy. I was not in Quebec at the time, but if I had been here I would have voted against that bill, because it extended the facilities for establishing separate schools. It had, however, this good feature, that it was accepted by the Roman Catholic authorities, and carried through Parliament as a final compromise of the question in Upper Canada. When, therefore, it was proposed that a provision should be inserted in the Confederation scheme to bind that compact of 1863 and declare it a final settlement, so that we should not be compelled as we have been since 1849, to stand constantly to our arms, awaiting fresh attacks upon our common school system, the proposition seemed to me one that was not rashly to be rejected. (Hear, hear.) I admit, from my point of view, that is a blot on the scheme before the House, it is, confessedly, one of the concessions from our side that had to be made to secure this great measure of reform. But assuredly, I, for one, have not the slightest hesitation, in accepting it as a necessary condition of the scheme of union, and doubly acceptable must it be in the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite, who were the authors of the bill of 1863.

In view of these statements we Roman Catholics may fairly ask how is it that after such a compromise, and after the Protestant population had accepted the situation—how is it that these questions arise? How is it that people who are educated, who can read and write, who understand the law, raise this question from time to time until it has become one of those subjects on which, as the hon. member from Calgary has said, one can hardly speak without becoming excited? I wish now to read what Sir John Macdonald said on the question of separate schools at the time that the Confederation was formed:

As to the school question, it has been announced by Hon. Mr. Galt, at Sherbrooke, that before confederation took place, this Parliament would be asked to consider a measure which he hoped would be satisfactory to all classes of the community, There was a good deal of apprehension in Lower Canada on the part of the minority there, as to the possible effect of confederation on their rights on the subject of education, and it was the intention of the Government, if Parliament approved the scheme of confederation, to lay before the House this session, certain amendments to the school law, to operate as a sort of guarantee against any infringement by the majority of the rights of the minority in this matter.

Hon. gentlemen will see that the Catholic majority in the province of Quebec were more liberal than the Protestant majority in Ontario have been. We accepted the union without any special guarantee, but in Quebec the Protestant minority required a guarantee. An Act was to have been passed, but it was too late in the session and the time was too short. When Sir George Cartier was asked how the matter was to be dealt with, he told them that they had his word of honour that the moment confederation was carried a law would be passed on the subject of separate schools that would satisfy the minority. Sir John Rose said, "we are satisfied, we rely on your word."

And the province of Quebec did their duty: the majority passed that Act and redeemed Cartier's pledge. At the present moment the educational authorities in Lower Canada are willing to appoint two superintendents of education, but we have never had but one, and why? Because the Protestants say "We won't have one; it would be spending money for nothing. Your Catholic superintendent has always rendered justice to Protestants, and we won't have another superintendent." That is the way the Protestants were treated in Quebec, and if there is any trouble and if those questions are now being discussed, it is because the Protestants of Manitoba and the North-west raised the cry first. In 1870 delegates came from the North-west to Ottawa to negotiate with the Government. Arriving amongst us here, and finding the representatives of the three parts of the Dominion all contented with their lot and satisfied with confederation, they thought that the Act gave sufficient protection to the minority, so they accepted the Manitoba Act, which had the same clause as to education which is in the British North America Act. That explains how it was that they so graciously accepted the Act that was offered to them to assure them that their rights on the question of education would be protected. The hon. member from Ottawa reproached the Government for not having disallowed the Manitoba Act. The hon. member from Calgary took exception to that, and he even added that it was better that they had not done so. I cannot concur in that view. I believe the Government were wrong in not vetoing the Act. It would have been a good deal better had they taken prompt action. It was their duty to veto the legislation and I will tell you why. A good many members of this House perhaps are not aware that in 1872, when Sir John Macdonald was Premier of Canada, we had to deal with the questions of the schools in New Brunswick. Sir John announced then the policy of the Government, that the right of vetoing would only be exercised in two cases, first, if the Act was unconstitutional; second, if constitutional, the Act was injurious to the whole Dominion. These were the two cases. Now, I say that either the School Act of Manitoba is ultra vires, or, if intra vires, it was injurious to the Dominion, and in either case they were wrong in not deciding the matter by a veto. These questions of religion have, before now in other parts of the world, caused great difficulty and trouble. If so, was it right for the Government to allow that Act to become law? Was it because the Catholic minority of the Dominion has always submitted to anything whether reasonable or not? If it was on account of that, they were wrong. Although there are many things we can accept for the good of the country, there are other things which we cannot give up because they are more of a religious character, and conscience cannot give way and we have to agitate and try to give every one his own rights. In this instance, at all events, whatever has been done, is done, but surely there is something more to do. The Government having failed in their duty in not disallowing the Act, under the two rules laid down at the time of confederation by the Government themselves, then, I say that to-day, when they have sent these cases before the courts, they should try to have a final decision of the Privy Council in England as to the opinion given by the Supreme Court at Ottawa where the court was divided, three judges against two, but there may be an appeal from that, and if that appeal was placed in a proper light before the Privy Council, then we might have a chance of saying, "Well after all the judgment in this instance is good, and we have to submit cheerfully," but as I said before, we cannot submit cheerfully, because we say it is not as equitable a judgment as the Privy Council generally gives. Now, I come to the North-west Territories School Act. On this question the hon. gentleman from Calgary made a speech which I admired very much. He was eloquent, but so far as the force of his argument is concerned I must say it suprised me how little there was in it. His speech, if hon. gentlemen will remember it, can be reduced to a few words—I cannot approve of the Act, but it is a good one. The hon. gentleman explained that the Catholics were as well situated in the North-west as the Protestant minority is in the province of Quebec. He proceeded to show that one thing after another had been accepted by the Catholics in the past, and that therefore everything was all right now, but he terminated his speech by saying that the House must not understand that he in any way wished to express approval of the law. After all the good things he said of the law, why could he not approve of it? That is the most curious thing to me. And that is why I said that the hon. gentleman from Calgary while asserting that the North-west Territories Act was just as good as the Quebec Act, admitted that he would neither reject nor approve of it. I am very glad that he does not approve of it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What I said was this—that I did not feel called upon to express myself in regard to the nature of the bill, except as to the fact that it was within the province of the Legislature of the North-west Territories to pass the bill.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I knew very well the hon. gentleman would find some way out of it. He knows very well that his speech did not catch anyone nor will his explanation to-day. I will answer the hon. gentleman as to the character of the North-west ordinance by showing him that it denies the Catholics of that country very many rights which they possessed under the old ordinance of 1888. I have here before me a summary of the Ordinance of 1888, and of the Ordinance of 1892, which I will read to the House, and I will ask hon. gentlemen to say whether, in their judgment, justice has been done to the Catholics of the North-west Territories :—

The Ordinance of 1888 accorded to Catholics, as such, the following rights :—	The Ordinance of 1892 accords the following to Catholics :—
1. The Lt.-Governor in Council may name and constitute a Council of Public Instruction, composed of eight members, of whom three shall be Catholics. The three Catholic members have a right to vote.	1. The members of the executive council and two Roman Catholics shall form the Council of Public Instruction. The nominated members shall not have the right to vote (5).
2. And all questions on which there may be an equal division shall be decided in the negative (9). No vote to negative hostile regulations.
3. To judge all appeals from the decisions of school inspectors and to pass such regulations concerning them as they may deem requisite.	3. Nothing.
4. To provide a uniform system for the inspection of schools and pass such regulations as they judge necessary, relative to the duties of inspectors.	4. No power.

15. To cancel the certificates of all teachers ;	15. No power.
16. There shall be a general bureau of examiners for teachers' certificates ; one half of the examiners to be named by one section of the bureau, and the other half to be named by the other section of the bureau (12).	16. No right of nomination.
17. Each section of the bureau shall have the choice of text books for the examination of teachers in history and science (13).	17. No power to choose the books.
18. Each shall have the power to prescribe all other additional subjects for the examination of school teachers in its section (religious instruction), for example).	18. No power.

20. There shall be taught in all the schools the following branches, namely : Reading, etc., (82). In the French districts all branches may be taught in French.	20. There shall be taught in all the schools in the English language the following branches, viz., reading, etc.

27. The Catholic Inspector may grant provisional certificates to competent applicants recommended by the trustees of schools.	27. Upon the recommendation of an inspector, the Superintendent may grant provisional certificates of qualification.
28. Under clauses 177 and 178 union schools could be established in Catholic institutions and have their high school branch as Catholics.	28. Where union schools are established, the high school department of such schools shall be non-sectarian (184), that is to say non-catholic.
29. The board of education may authorize the establishment of a Normal Department and the trustees of any such school shall thereupon establish such Normal Department, Catholic as well as Protestant.	29. High school departments of union schools being non-sectarian the Normal Department must be such and the Catholics, as such, have no right therein.

Under the old law, Catholics could select their own text books: under the new ordinance the Protestants select the books for the Catholics. Under the old law, Catholics had their own board: to-day there is only a Protestant board. Under the old law, the schools could not be opened without prayers—that was when they believed in God in that part of the country. Now they do not believe in God and their schools are opened without prayer. Although this Senate is never opened without prayers every day, the schools of the North-west Territories must be opened without prayers. You prevent the children in the North-west from being taught to offer prayer to the Almighty. Is not that very curious? Yet such is the length to which fanaticism will carry men. Now, hon. gentlemen, I leave it to you to decide as to the correctness of the argument of the hon. gentleman from Calgary on this point, but I would ask the hon. member for Calgary and other hon. gentlemen of this House to tell me, if you were in Quebec and the Catholic majority were to enact such a law, would you submit cheerfully and say that it was right? You would not, not one of you. If you have a conscience, how is it that you force others to do what you would not like to be forced yourselves to do, you readers of the Bible especially? I was happy to hear the hon. gentleman, at the close of his speech, use these words, or something like them—I quote from a report in a newspaper that is friendly to the Government and consequently friendly to himself—

> The tone and substance of Senator Lougheed's address seems to indicate he did not consider it his duty either to vindicate or condemn the Act, holding rather that the question resolved itself into whether or not the Ordinance was within the rights of the legislature.

Very well, but it was not optional with the hon. gentleman to say so. He had done his best to prove that the present law was very good, and if it was he was bound to accept it. It simply means that he is ashamed of the law as it stands, and I am not surprised at that. I have always believed that the hon. gentleman from Calgary holds sound views, but thinking that he was in duty bound to defend the Government of the Territories, he hurried over that part. I suppose that he thought he could not help it and had to make the best of it. I cannot do less than congratulate him on the way he did it, but I cannot congratulate him on putting the matter in a proper light, because he put it in such a way that a good many could be deceived by what he said. But he is not the only Protestant who holds the belief that this law is not acceptable. Only a few days ago a gentleman from Montreal, who, I always thought, was opposed to our views on educational matters, wrote a letter to the Montreal Gazette on the 2nd April on this very question. I refer to Mr. William Clendinning. He says:

MANITOBA SCHOOL LAW.

A PROTESTANT SYMPATHIZER WITH THE MANITOBA MINORITY.

To the Editor of the GAZETTE :

SIR,—Under constitutional government parliamentary acts and judgments of courts are a power, and have an authority which individuals and communities are bound to respect. Yet both together cannot void a natural law, cancel a divine injunction, or relieve anybody from the penalty of transgressing against either. Now, God and Nature have made the parents the guardian of the child. Under the law of God the parent is commanded to train up the child in the right way. The conscientious Catholic believes that he can only discharge that solemn duty by instructing his child in the doctrines and teachings of his church and, therefore, dreads allowing his child to be brought under any influence that might lead him away from that faith.

A vital point in the Protestant belief is the right of private judgment, and yet in Manitoba you see a Protestant majority actually taxing a portion of their fellow countrymen for exercising that right in a matter which to them is as dear as life. If I believe that my child's eternal welfare is endangered by going to a certain school, and yet am willing and anxious to educate him so that he may be qualified to discharge the duties of a good citizen, is it fair—is it just for the State to step in and say : Yes, you may educate your child as you like at your own cost, but you must support the other school, even though you do believe that the course of instruction given there is such that you would not let your child receive it?

It is to be regretted, as you said in your article of a few days ago, that there seems to be no constitutional remedy in view for such a state of things as exists now in Manitoba. I freely admit the importance of provincial autonomy, but a united and contented Dominion has much greater import. But so long as a certain portion of our population are treated so unfairly and so unjustly as the Catholics of that western province are in a matter of such moment as the education of their children, it seems to me that we cannot have that united Canada which is needed to make the foundation stone of our grand Dominion sure.

W. CLENDINNING.

Montreal, March 30.

Now I know no better Protestant that Mr. Clendinning, and I must say I was surprised to read that letter in the Gazette; yet it is there, and it seems that even he is ashamed to see his co-religionists act as they have done, and he says it openly so that the world may know. I have a great many of those letters, but so much has been quoted that I think it unnecessary to read them, but I will take a letter from the other side of the line —in the United States. Here is a letter from Mr. Glen who lives in that country but who, I believe, was at one time a member of our House of Commons :

DEFENCE OF THE CATHOLICS.

A PROTESTANT THINKS THAT THEY MAKE GOOD CITIZENS.

To the Editor of the Brooklyn Eagle :

It was with very great pleasure that I read your editorial in Saturday's issue entitled "The Great Flag Question." Every line of it was right. My great grandfather of Scotch Presbyterian descent served under Lafayette in the war of the revolution. My grandfather served in the war of 1812 at Sackett's Harbour. I belong to the extreme low church wing of the Protestant Episcopal church, and for the past thirty years have opposed the attempt of the high church wing to steal and wear the livery of the Roman Catholic church. I may fairly claim to be an American and a Protestant. St. Patrick's is an Irish benevolent society, St. George's an English society, St. Andrew's a Scotch society. Americans of New England parentage have a New England society. They all do ten thousand times more good than harm. Why repress them in any way? Why not encourage and promote them? There is not a more loyal class in our country than the brave sons of St. Patrick. Our army records prove it. The long roll of honour is filled with Irish names. We have nothing whatever to fear from Roman Catholic disloyalty or domination. Those of us whose parents immigrated from Ireland, England, Scotland, Holland or Germany to our shores prior to 1776, sometimes imagine that we have divine rights which those whose ancestors came across the sea a little later do not enjoy, or at least that we are better Americans than those who were not born upon our soil. The truth is we who are native born are Americans from mere accident of birth, while those who come to us from other lands are Americans from choice and to gain American citizenship often make great sacrifices and suffer many privations. I cannot but feel that this flag issue is an expression of Protestant bigotry which was entirely uncalled for at this or any other time. I regret being compelled to differ from our reform mayor, whose record thus far has been admirable. I have made a patient, persistent and careful study of the good and weak features of Catholicism in this country and Canada for the past thirty-five years, and desire to call the attention of your many readers to some facts bearing upon the constant attacks of Protestants upon Catholics. First, That west of the coast of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania and Virginia to the Pacific the pioneer missionaries were chiefly Roman Catholics. They suffered great privations and practised severe self denial to serve humanity, civilized and uncivilized. They made noble Christian records. Second. The Roman Catholic church has been a great bulwark in defence of the sanctity of the marriage tie and the family. These two institutions are the very foundation of all organized moral human society. There have been more divorces granted in the city of Newport, R. I., in a single month than in the great Roman Catholic province of Quebec in thirty-five years. Third, funds contributed to Roman Catholics charities are more economically administered than those contributed to Protestant charities. That is to say, a larger percentage of such contributions reach the suffering and needy through Roman Catholic administration than through Protestant administration. Fourth, There is a far higher percentage of illegitimate children born in Presbyterian Scotland and Protestant Episcopal England than in Roman Catholic Ireland. While we are granting divorces in our city courts at wholesale, let us cease to throw stones at Roman Catholics. Let us first cast the beam from our Protestant eyes that we may see clearly the mote in our Catholic brothers' eyes. Let us cease to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. The claims which I have presented for our Roman Catholic fellow citizens cannot be disproved or justly ignored. They are vital and fundamental in their nature ; and, unless they can be proved invalid, should be frankly acknowledged. Upon Washington's and Lincoln's birthdays and independence day let only the American flag float from our public buildings. But upon any other days any flag. which is not an emblem of disorganization and not intended as an insult to our flag or to question its absolute supremacy, can do no harm when it flaps in the wind over our city hall or other municipal homes. My faith in the overcoming power of American leaven is boundless and therefore I have no fear that harm will come to the republic or government by the people because our big hearted, impulsive, loyal Roman Catholic fellow citizens fling the green and gold to the breeze over our city hall one day in the year. I recognize any man and woman as an American citizen and as entitled to all the rights and privileges of American citizenship without regard to race, religion, colour, social and financial position or place of birth who is loyal to the American flag and ready to defend it when attacked. I detest and abhor nihilists and anarchists. They have no excuse for promoting their devilish sentiments in this free land. I have no sympathy with any organization which tends to destroy or demoralize organized moral human society. No such charge can be justly made against St. Patrick's, St. George's, St. Andrew's or other kindred societies. There is work enough for all sincere lovers of humanity in destroying evil organization without attempting to repress those which make for peace, order and good fellowship.

FRANCIS WAYLAND GLEN.

BROOKLYN, March 19, 1884.

Then there is another article in an Ottawa newspaper which, far from condemning, I may say I was happy to read. It is either a retraction or explanation of a few words which had fallen from the lips of the Hon. Clarke Wallace as reported in the press. He made an explanation to the Ottawa Citizen, and I am happy that he did so, yet there is something in what he said to which I shall have to allude. His explanation was as follows :

> I entirely disclaim any intention to be either unjust or offensive to any organization or religious belief in Canada. I have never been so, and though always holding and always intending to hold my own opinions strongly, as I accord all others a right to do, I have striven and always shall strive to do this with charity to all, and hard feeling against none.

I do not see that this word "charity" is properly applied. Mr. Wallace is like many others who are opposed to Catholics on this question. Is that charity? The other day I went to the table of the Senate and opened the Protestant bible and in it I found in the Gospel according to St. Matthew, 7th chap. and 12th verse, these words "whatsoever you would that men should do unto you, do you even so unto them." If Mr. Wallace is sincere in his statements he should endeavour to have Catholics given the right to do their duty according to their conscientious convictions. In Quebec we say to the Protestants "you think we are wrong: very well, here is your money, we will keep ours. You go your way, we will go ours." I believe that this question ought to be considered by every one in this country as one of great importance. The Government should deal with it in such a way as to arrange the whole affair so that greater difficulties may not arise by and by. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was in the House of Commons with me in 1872, when I rose in my place and showed that the Government were wrong in not dealing with the New Brunswick School Act in such a manner as to settle it, and I told him then that it would cause trouble in the Dominion. I told him if there was a question which ought to be settled at the very beginning, it was one of that kind. The reply to me was that there would be no difficulty about it. But what have we found during the last 25 years? Has there been a single year in which you have not heard of those dissensions and religious difficulties? As long as justice is denied us you will hear of it. Why is it that in Quebec the minority are satisfied? It is because they not only have what they are entitled to, but they have more than strict justice calls for. If you look at the public accounts of the province of Quebec, you will find that the Protestant minority have more than their share, and we give it because we say we are the majority, and we should give the minority the best part. Why do not the Protestants do the same when they are the majority? They are British subjects and are always proud of British fair play. Let them give us British fair play when we ask for our rights. They may be sure that we will then have peace and harmony and that this country of ours will go on every day increasing in strength and prosperity.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I wish to say a few words to close this debate, as I understand that nobody else intends to speak.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not follow at all.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It may not follow logically, but in appearance it does. I do not intend discussing the matter upon the merits; I think I should be offered the opportunity of closing the debate by giving the consent of the Government to the motion which has been made by the hon. member from St. Boniface. My object is mostly to congratulate this hon. member on the way he has dealt with the question, to compliment him on the line of argument he has followed and which was acceptable to every member of this House. He dealt fairly with the case, without prejudice, and in a way which created a very good impression, and which I hope will have a moral influence all over the Dominion. I must also congratulate the hon. member from Ottawa on the way he spoke on this question. He was the father of the legislation relative to separate schools, or if not the father, he took a very great share in it in the past history of Canada. He has also dealt with the case fairly and justly, and with an object, which I have very much admired, not of creating obstacles, as might have been expected from a member opposing the Government, but in the direction of assisting to solve, if possible, the difficult question which is now agitating public opinion. He has stated what he thought himself, or what he hoped to be, a remedy.

After having said so much, I shall only refer to one or two points which address themselves directly to the responsibility of the Government. It has been stated, referring to the Manitoba School Act, that the law should have been vetoed. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that the case was immediately brought before the courts. Would it have been right for the Government by disallowing the Act to remove the question when submitted to the courts? Every fair-minded man will answer that at this stage of the case, it would have been an improper course to adopt. Moreover, it is established by the documents and the correspondence that has taken place upon this subject that the interested parties did not wish that it should be disallowed. It was not their prayer: it could only be disallowed, as the hon. member from De Lanaudière said, either on the ground of its being ultra vires or because contrary to the general interests of the Dominion. First of all, it could not be disallowed on the ground that it was unconstitutional, as the results obtained before the courts have shown the law of Manitoba to be within the jurisdiction of the Legislature of that province. Could it have been disallowed as contrary to the general interests of the Dominion, when the people who were the best judges of that interest at the time,—the people that lived in Manitoba, did not wish for it? The hon. member for Ottawa, discussing this matter, has pointed out the difficulty of disallowing the law at that time. He recalled the agitation and the difficulties that had occurred in Manitoba relative to railway acts, which had been previously disallowed, and that, under the circumstances, perhaps the peace and welfare of the Dominion required that the Act should be left to the decision of the courts. Therefore, I say that upon this point the Government in no way avoided their responsibility. Now dealing with this Manitoba case, have they again avoided their responsibility when they referred the case to the decision of the Supreme Court, and when it went before the Privy Council? The Government in this instance has followed exactly the wish expressed by Parliament, when they passed the Act, that, whenever questions arose relative to legislation on education, these should be referred to the Supreme Court. There again they have purely and simply followed the instructions of the Parliament of Canada, laid down by that law, inspired by the resolutions that Mr. Blake proposed to the House the previous session. Referring to the North-west Ordinance of 1892, I must state that it is not a proper time for the Government to discuss this case, nor is it possible to discuss the matter with sufficient information, before the documents are brought down. Moreover, as the House has been informed, an Order in Council has been passed, making representations to the Executive Committee of the North-west Territories, relative to this law, drawing their attention to certain grievances expressed by the minority in that section of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—To that Order in Council, His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, and the Privy Council, have not received any answer yet, therefore it would be out of place to discuss the matter at this time before we have the answers of the authorities of the North-west Territories. Therefore, I cannot be expected to follow the hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House on this question, but I confess that they have spoken with a great deal of moderation, and that during the whole debate upon this burning question, not a word has been uttered by either speaker that could be offensive to the belief or the opinions held by any member of this House. The Government gives its assent to the motion of the hon. member for St. Bonifice. I hope every man of good-will in this House will study the documents thoroughly, so that, if possible, fuller justice may be done in the premises.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hon. gentlemen, I think perhaps it might have been more considerate and more courteous on my part if I had spoken before, but the position was this: The hon. gentleman from St. Boniface had spoken and taken one view of the matter, and the hon. gentleman from Ottawa had expressed, on the whole, the same view; then the hon. gentleman from Calgary had taken a view slightly different from them, and the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière had again concurred with the views of the hon. member from St. Boniface and the hon. member from Ottawa, so that the discussion did not assume the form of a debate. As my views on the whole were somewhat similar to those of the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface and those who agreed with him, I did not care to stand up until I heard some one expressing a different opinion, as it makes speaking rather dull work if all take the same view. While it might have been more courteous on my part to have spoken before the hon. Minister, I do not think there is any absolute rule about it, and I am perfectly within my rights in speaking now. I quite concur in what has been said by the hon. member who has just sat down as to the character of the speeches which have been delivered here; and I think there is no question at all as to the importance of the subject to which the motion of the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface refers. In my humble opinion, this question is really of more importance than the question to which so much attention is now being given in the other House. The changes in the tariff are not really of such consequence to the future of the country as this school question which is being discussed here; and it is a subject for congratulation that the speeches made in this House upon the subject, have been of such a tone and character that in future days any member of this House can look back to them without any other feeling than one of pride and satisfaction. I do not think that any hon. gentleman who has spoken has said anything which he may hereafter have occasion to regret. I might perhaps qualify that statement and say that the view of the decision of the Privy Council taken by one speaker was perhaps a little extreme. Now, hon. gentlemen, the misfortune is that those speeches, which might be calculated, if known to the public to influence popular opinion in the proper direction, are unfortunately not very likely to reach the public, unless the gentlemen who have delivered the speeches take particular pains to see that they do. No matter of how little consequence the subject under discussion in another place may be, or how little wisdom there may be in a speech, it gets before the public. The representatives of the press are there, and they take care that what every member says is put before the public. In this chamber, no matter how important the subject nor how great the wisdom of the speakers, the public as a rule knows nothing about what is being said. Having said so much by way of preface, I may be allowed, with all diffidence, to place my own views on the subject before the House. I think if there is one characteristic which is supposed to be peculiarly that of the present day, it is religious toleration. Not only is there supposed to be nowadays no attempt to make the minority conform to the views of the majority by coercion, not only is there no resort to torture or fine or imprisonment or banishment by way of convincing the minority that they are wrong, but the legislature nowadays professes to have regard for the conscientious convictions of every citizen. Legislation now professes that it not only does not compel a citizen to do anything contrary to his honest views of what is right, but that it permits the citizen to do whatever his conscience directs him to do; provided always, of course, that his conscience does not direct him to do anything which will seriously interfere with the welfare and comfort of his fellow-citizens; and, hon. gentlemen, this fact has been made clear by the experience of the last few years in Canada—and I think that the same might be said of the United Kingdom and the United States,—that no section of the community can be oppressed or can be made to feel that it is labouring under injustice for any length of time without ultimate serious injury to the majority, as a result of that condition of things. Any political party which for any length of time treats a minority with injustice is sure itself to suffer in the long run. Hon. gentlemen need not go back a great many years to find that that has been the experience—I think in all the older provinces of the Dominion. I know it has been so in my own province; it has been so in Ontario; and I am satisfied that the party who in the province of Manitoba are to-day dealing unfairly with the minority, will themselves suffer ultimately for what they are doing, unless they retrace their steps and do to the minority that which is fair and generous. It is clear nowadays that the conscientious convictions of the minority have to be respected. The conscientious conviction of Catholics as a body, is that religious training should accompany secular training. I do not say whether we are right or wrong in that view; but that is the view entertained by the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical authorities, and by the great bulk of the Catholic people—we feel that sufficient religious training cannot be got on Sunday, that if you keep clear of God Almighty all the week, you hardly get very close to him on Sunday. It is felt by our people that children should be given instruction in Christian doctrine during the week, and should be taught religious exercises. A great many people say in reply, that this can be done by the parents and by the pastors. If parents were all perfect, if no parents were ignorant or drunken or careless, that would be quite true, but we all know that a great many parents are not qualified, or have not the leisure nor opportunity to give their children that religious instruction which they should get. Other gentlemen say you can have in the common school, where all can go, religious instruction as far as all denominations agree on the great fundamentals of religion. It has been found by experience that that is quite impracticable. You cannot have religious instruction in matters that are common to all forms even of Christian belief, because there is no article of Christian doctrine so fundamental that it is not denied by some body which calls itself Christian; and if religious instruction is to be given only in those articles upon which all Christians agree, the religious instruction will amount to nothing at all. Experience has shown that, and we have to bear it in mind; so that rightly or wrongly—I am only expressing what is the Catholic view on the matter—Catholics as a body hold that schools should be taught by Catholic teachers, and that those teachers should give instruction during some portion of the day in Christian doctrine as well as in worldly knowledge. Catholic authorities hold that this rule applies more particularly to primary and elementary schools where the younger children are taught. After children reach the age of 15 or 16 it is not considered so necessary, but it is held to be indispensable in the case of young children. The modern principle being toleration and regard for the conscientious convictions of citizens, and the view of Catholic citizens being as I have put it, that means that they should have separate schools, and it is a breach of this modern principle of toleration for a Government to say to a Catholic citizen "we shall give no public help to any school to which you can conscientiously send your children, and at the same time we shall by taxation take your means to support schools of which you cannot conscientiously avail yourselves," and to add, "if you must have schools to meet your peculiar views you must pay for them out of your own pockets in addition to paying for those schools of which you cannot approve." Clearly that is a grievance and according to the priciples of toleration which prevail nowadays, that position is not tenable. It is substantially the same position as is taken by the advocates of state churches—substantially state schools are in the same position as state churches—that is, to the people who disapprove of state schools. No-one to-day would dream of establishing a state church in America and compelling people of other denominations to contribute to its support ; yet the people who would be the last in the world to do that are just the people who are most strenuous in advocating compulsory state schools. It is clear that there is a very strong, to my mind a conclusive argument in favour of granting Catholics separate schools; that is, of course, where the Catholic population is large enough to justify their having separate shools. What are the essentials of those separate schools? The first essential is Catholic teachers —I think all Catholics agree about that. The next essential is that at some time during the school day, instruction shall be given in Christian doctrine and more or less in religious practices; and the third point, which is necessary to place the Catholic on the same footing as his neighbour, is that the Catholic schools shall receive payments from the public. Those payments may be based upon different principles. The payments may be made from school rates levied on the Catholic rate payers. That is the case in Ontario—the Catholic separate schools receive certain rates which are levied on the Catholic ratepayers with their own consent and concurrence. In addition to that a comparatively small sum is received from the provincial Government. The same amount per capita is paid out of the provincial treasury to the Catholic schools as to the other schools in Ontario, but the great burden of supporting the separate schools in Ontario is borne by the Catholic ratepayers. That is one plan. Another plan is that a part of the general school fund equivalent to that contributed by the Catholics should be set apart by them. That is, that the same machinery should be used for collecting funds for both the dissentient and the public schools, and the dissentient schools should receive the amount contributed by the dissentient ratepayers. It is the same in substance, but it saves the additional machinery. The other way is—and that is the plan which was provided by the bill of rights in Manitoba, as stated by the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière—that the dissentient schools should receive a portion of the school funds, proportionate to the number of Catholics, bearing the same proportion to the number of Catholics that the amount granted to the public schools bears to that of the Protestants. I may say that in my own province, where in some places they have practically separate schools, the money is paid out of the general school fund—there is no separate assessment for Catholic purposes. I take these conditions which I have laid down to be essential, these are the essential conditions as to the Catholic schools and these only. On the other hand, if public money is paid to aid separate schools I think the public have a right to be satisfied that the teachers in the schools are qualified to give satisfactory instruction in secular knowledge. The state does not inquire as to the character of the religious instruction, but the state, if it contributes money in aid of a school, has a right to be satisfied that the secular instruction given in that school is up to a reasonable standard. With this object it is perfectly fair and reasonable that the schools should be examined by a duly qualified inspector, and I do not think it would be unfair to require that each teacher should furnish satisfactory evidence of proper training. What would be the effect of the introduction of a system of separate schools of the character indicated? In the first place, it would meet the reasonable demands of the Roman Catholic minority without seriously injuring or interfering with any other denomination. There would be—what the state could fairly require—a guarantee that all children in the state were receiving proper training in worldly knowledge; and I do not think that giving to members of a dissenting denomination, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, the money which they themselves contributed would be a ground for reasonable complaint on the part of anybody else. There is this other feature about it, which is not considered, perhaps, as frequently as it might be—that the system of separate schools gives the majority a chance to have schools more according to their wishes than they could have if the children of the minority attended the same school. For instance, it is quite practicable that King James's Bible shall be read in the public schools if there are no Catholic children present. Whatever may be thought about separate schools by our friends of other denominations, in other provinces, we know what they think about separate schools in the province of Quebec. In the province of Quebec Protestants are in the same position in which Catholics are in the other provinces. I suppose there are not fifty Protestants in the province of Quebec who to-day would be satisfied to abolish the separate schools in that province. Our brothers of other denominations in other provinces ought to bear that fact in mind, and be prepared to deal with others as they wish to be dealt with themselves.

Having tried to make clear what separate schools mean, I may be permitted to ask the House to glance briefly at the history of the question. We heard from the hon. gentleman from Ottawa the history of the question in the old Province of Canada. They thought there that the measure introduced by the hon. gentleman himself in 1863 settled the question for good. There had been dissension and ill feeling, and this bill when passed was supposed to have done a great deal to put an end to that, and for a great many years there was very little of that ill feeling. In the lower provinces the position is somewhat different. Free public schools, except, I think, in Nova Scotia where they date back to 1865, have been introduced in all the provinces since Confederation. In the province of Nova Scotia, although there is no provision in the law for separate schools, the people of the province and the governments of the province of both political views, have been so tolerant and have shown such tact in administering the law, that there has never been any serious ground for complaint on the part of the minority. I may mention one fact, that in certain districts in the province of Nova Scotia where the population is largely French, the Government have for years been in the habit of supplying the children with bi-lingual readers. They learn French as well as English. All this is done without any disturbance or excitement or any petitions to the Throne or anything of that sort. Everything is the result simply of common sense and toleration. That is just about what it comes to. In the province of New Brunswick a different course was adopted. Hon. gentlemen know, and reference has been made to the subject during this discussion, what feeling there was in this Parliament something over twenty years ago in connection with the New Brunswick schools. The decision was against the minority in New Brunswick; and if I remember rightly the decision in the Privy Council—I think the case went to the Privy Council—was based on the fact that the minority there had nothing guaranteed them by law. They were in a position to establish that there had been separate schools by custom and practice, but the decision went against them because it was not stated in the British North America Act that custom or practice should be equivalent to law. The decision was against the minority in the province of New Brunswick. Notwithstanding that, the people who won the victory have since, in a great many instances at any rate, come round to the views of their neighbours in Nova Scotia, and practically the schools in many places in New Brunswick are conducted in the same way as the schools in Nova Scotia, and there is very little friction or difficulty I think in New Brunswick to-day; and my impression is—I do not undertake to speak very positively—that in Prince Edward Island the case is about the same. The hon. gentleman from Calgary made some reference to the political aspect of the matter in Prince Edward Island. I do not think that hon. gentlemen in this House who are familiar with what took place in Prince Edward Island would endorse what the hon. gentleman said, because in Prince Edward Island, if I am not misinformed, neither party was prepared to meet the views of the Catholic minority.

Since that time and under the administration of Mr. Davies such measures were taken as, I believe, in a great measure at any rate, to meet the view of the minority. As I understand it, there is no very serious dissatisfaction in Prince Edward Island now. There may be, but I have not so understood it I do not speak positively with respect to Prince Edward Island; I simply give my impression. I know that steps were taken several years ago, in 1877 or 1878, which met, to a certain degree at any rate, the views of the Catholic minority in Prince Edward Island.

Now we come to the province of Manitoba. In Manitoba there was, as several hon. gentlemen have stated, a system of denominational schools existing before confederation. They were not state schools, and were not public schools. In 1871, after the entry of the province of Manitoba into the union, an Act was passed providing for separate schools; and that Act was in conformity with the article of the Bill of Rights to which the hon. member from DeLanaudière has called the attention of the House. There is just one circumstance with respect to the Manitoba Act of 1870 to which attention has not been called, and which I think is a matter to be very much regretted. If hon. gentlemen look at the 93rd section of the British North America Act, they will find this provision in the third paragraph :

Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the Union or is thereafter established by the Legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

Now, it is very much to be regretted that the words "or is thereafter established by the Legislature of the province," were not inserted in the Manitoba Act. If those words had been found in the Manitoba Act of 1870, the difficulty which the minority in that province are now labouring under would not exist. Therefore the responsibility for the existing condition of things rests to a certain extent upon the administration who were in power in 1870 and who did not put that provision of the British North America Act into the Manitoba Act. There is this provision that :

(2.) An appeal shall lie to the Privy Council from any act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

As to the effect of that I am not perfectly clear. The appeal to the Privy Council took place on the first paragraph :

And I think that probably the construction put on it was that paragraph 2 applied only to the cases referred to in 1 ; but it will be seen that the Manitoba Act does not contain the provision which is in the British North America Act and I think it is very much to be regretted that it does not. Now, hon. gentlemen, supposing that there was no provision in the Manitoba Act for the protection of the Catholic schools, I think that it would have been the duty of the majority in that province not to have interfered with the rights or privileges—if you choose to call them privileges—which had been granted to or exercised and enjoyed by the minority. I think that, looking at the treatment received by the minority in the province of Quebec at the hands of the majority there, and even apart from that, looking at the thing merely from the standpoint of fair play, the conduct of the Legislature of Manitoba was exceedingly ungenerous ; and under the actual circumstances of the case this law of 1890 was a gross breach of faith. There is no doubt about that, and I think there is no doubt that the law as to Manitoba, if interpreted in a broad and liberal spirit, was quite clear enough ; and in my humble judgment the decision of our own Supreme Court is a much sounder decision than the decision of the Privy Council. Now, what has been the result of the decision of the Privy Council ? It is practically that as far as regards the province of Manitoba, the good feeling and harmony which had existed there from 1870, from the time when the province came into the union until 1890, has disappeared to a very considerable extent, and not only the people of Manitoba, but the people throughout the country are in a certain measure thrown back into turmoil and dissensions such as prevailed in old Canada in the early sixties and between 1855 and 1860. Of course, hon. gentlemen, the fundamental cause of all this difficulty, of the popular feeling of animosity which exists between people of different denominations, is largely the want of knowledge. I think that there is generally in this feeling of hostility very little unadulterated malignity ; it is simply the result of want of knowledge ; people do not know one another and do not understand one another, and what they do not know and do not understand they think is something objectionable and bad. That is the fact at any rate as regards the masses ; and on the part of some of the leading members of the community—these are the people who as a rule make the trouble—the ill-feeling is the result of a want of honesty. I do not see what our views as to questions of religion or our religious beliefs have to do with our duties as citizens. Of course, presumably a good Christian is a better citizen than one who is not a Christian, but I do not think that the particular form of Christianity which a man professes ought to have very much to do with the manner in which he is regarded as a citizen. For instance, take the hon. leader of the House and your humble servant: the hon. gentleman probably thinks that I am very foolish to believe that if I try to lead a fairly good life here I may succeed in getting to purgatory after I leave this world; and I may think it is a great pity that the hon. gentleman who is so good a citizen may afterwards go further and fare worse. I can respect the hon. gentleman and co-operate with him in trying to conduct the business of this House or any other business which as citizens we are interested in, just as well as though I thought he was perfectly certain to "climb the golden stairs." There is one other point which I think it might be well to make clear in dealing with this point that it is want of knowledge, want of familiarity which leads to ill-feeling. Take the province of Quebec, there we find that the members of the different Protestant denominations are perfectly easy as to the attitude assumed by the Roman Catholic majority. Go down to the Lower St. Lawrence where there is perhaps one Protestant in 1,000 of the population, and that one man sleeps as comfortably at night as though the people all round him were of his own creed. It is only up in Western Ontario, and away out on the prairies, where there are hardly any Roman Catholics, that people go to bed at night afraid that they may be massacred before morning by the emissaries of the Pope.

So far I have not said anything as to which there can be much difference of opinion. As to the responsibility for the condition of things which unfortunately does exist, although perhaps not to so great a degree as some people believe, I do not altogether agree with some hon. gentlemen who have spoken. In the first place there is no doubt that just at the present time there seems to be a wave of intolerance passing over the northern part of the continent. There is a good deal of it in the Western States as well as Western Canada. It has been said—I notice that the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface made reference to the fact once or twice, I do not say improperly—that it was a Liberal administration which had caused the difficulty in Manitoba.

An hon. MEMBER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am glad to find that my hon. colleague agrees with me so far; I hope he will continue to agree with me. Now where did this feeling originate? Was it in Manitoba? Not at all. This feeling, which has broken out with considerable strength in Manitoba, originated in Ontario. And with whom did it originate? It originated with Conservative opponents of the administration of Mr. Mowat. Since 1886 the Conservatives in Ontario have adopted the policy of hostility to Catholics as part of their programme, not avowedly perhaps in 1886 and 1887; but in the provincial election campaign of 1890, every one knows that the cry of Mr. Meredith's supporters was "hostility to Catholics and particularly to Catholic schools." And every one knows that since the election of 1890 that same policy has been pursued by the same party. The people who introduced the school difficulty in Manitoba might very well have taken lessons from the Conservatives in Ontario; but more than that, a gentleman who at that time occupied a very prominent position in the Conservative party in Ontario went up into Manitoba and the North-west and lectured there and stired up anti-Catholic feeling.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—And that gentleman has joined your party.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, he has carefully refrained from joining our party; I suppose if our party would adopt his platform, he would join us; but he has not done so. If hon. gentlemen opposite say that Mr. Meredith is not to have the support of the Conservatives during the coming election, then we can perhaps absolve them from any responsibility for the state of things which exists in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is not my province to defend Mr. Meredith; but if the hon. gentleman will quote a single sentence of Mr. Meredith's utterances during the campaign, or before it, in which he raised that cry, I would like to hear it. I have paid some attention to politics, and I have failed to find it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are hon. gentlemen who keep scrap books, but I have failed to do it. I do not know what Mr. Meredith has said or what he has not said; but I know and everybody else knows that the great cry of the Conservatives in Ontario at the last local election was hostility to the separate schools.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The introducer of the Manitoba school law simply took a leaf out of Mr. Meredith's book; and as his constituency was a different one, he had more success than Mr. Meredith had. What do we find to-day? I read in the Ottawa Citizen this morning of certain transactions which took place at Hamilton. I read there that the Provincial Secretaiy of Ontario, Mr. Gibson, is not to be opposed in the city of Hamilton by a regular Conservative: but that the P. P. A. are bringing a candidate and that the Conservatives of Hamilton are to support the P. P. A. candidate.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Who says that?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is what the Citizen says this morning, and I have seen the item in another paper too. That rather goes to show that there are other people than "Yellow Martin," whose record will not bear looking into.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman hold himself responsible for everything which appears in the Liberal press?

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is in a despatch. The Citizen is good authority until it is contradicted. Every hon. gentleman here is perfectly aware that the principal cry upon which it is expected to oust Sir Oliver Mowat at the next election is just that intolerant cry.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman know who was elected mayor of Hamilton by the P. P. A.?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I do not.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Well, Mr. Stewart, a member of the P. P. A. was elected.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That may be so. This mayor was elected oy the Conservatives.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—A straight Conservative ran.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I had proposed to make some reference to certain statements made by other hon. gentlemen, but if the debate is to close this afternoon I shall end now. I understand, however, some other hon. gentlemen wish to speak, and that being the case, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST SCHOOL ACTS.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Resuming the further adjourned Debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Bernier:—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the House, copies of all School ordinances, School regulations and amendments thereto, adopted by the Legislative Assembly, the Executive, and any Board or Council of Education, in reference to the establishment, maintenance and administration of Schools in the North-west Territories since 1885;

Also, for copies of all petitions, memorials and correspondence in reference thereto;

Also for copies of all Orders in Council, reports to the Governor General in Council, and all communications and representations to the authorities in the North-west Territories.—(Honourable Mr. Power.)

Hon. Mr. POWER said: I may be allowed, perhaps, before concluding the observations which I had proposed to make, to correct a misapprehension which appears to exist in the minds of some hon. members as to the meaning of the language which I used on Friday last. I laid down the proposition that animosity between different sections of the community and more particularly between sections which differ in their form of religious belief, were, as a rule, the result very largely of want of knowledge, want of acquaintanceship one with the other, and I used as an illustration the case of a Protestant living down on the lower St. Lawrence, where 99 out of 100 of the population, or a larger proportion than that, belonged to the Roman Catholic faith, and pointed out that this one Protestant was perfectly easy and comfortable and not nervous about any possible harm being done to him by his neighbours, and took on the other hand the case of a man of the same creed in western Ontario, where Catholics were very scarce, and who was very much alarmed for fear some serious mischief might be done to himself and his family by his Catholic neighbours. When I used that illustration I did not mean to intimate that the evil results of this want of knowledge were confined to the Protestants. I meant to intimate that the same thing was true of Catholics although perhaps not quite to the same extent, and that Protestants as a rule were fairer minded and more disposed to be tolerant and generous to their Catholic fellow-citizens than Catholics who were not well acquainted with Protestants, supposed them to be. I can furnish illustrations of that fact from my own experience: for instance, it was my fortune to be for nearly thirteen years a commissioner of schools for the city of Halifax, where the great majority of my fellow commissioners did not belong to the same creed as myself, and during all those years I found, as a general rule, that if our case was put fairly and calmly, and in a friendly spirit, the majority of the board were disposed to do what was fair and liberal towards us. Then, hon. gentlemen, I proceeded to intimate my opinion that the conditions of popular feeling which now unfortunately exist to a considerable degree in the west did not originate so much with the honest, even though ill-informed masses, as with persons who knew better, but who were not honest, and who were prepared to excite popular prejudices to further their own personal or political ends. I think that this proposition will be generally admitted; and, then, inasmuch as some hon. gentlemen who had preceded me had taken the ground that the firebrands, if one may call them so, were chiefly members of the Liberal party, I pointed out the fact that this fire did not originate in Manitoba, but that it had originated in the province of Ontario, where it had been used for the purpose of the Conservative party, and where, as I understand, it is still being used for those purposes.

Having said so much by way of explanation, let me turn to the history of the case again. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from DeLanaudière that the Act of 1890 should have been disallowed. The Manitoba Act of 1870 in its 22nd section provides that the legislation of the province with respect to education shall be subject to the following provisions:

> Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

Now, hon. gentlemen, the Catholics at the time of the union had the right to have their denominational schools, without being called upon to contribute by way of taxation or otherwise to any other class of schools. That was an exceedingly important privilege, yet that privilege has been taken away; and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have apparently decided that that was not a privilege. The second paragraph of this section which I have read says:

> An appeal shall lie to the Governor in Council from any Act or decision of the Legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

I should not care to speak too positively, but it seems to me that under that paragraph an appeal now lies to the Governor General in Council from this Act of the province of Manitoba. There is no limitation to the time here—it is not a case similar to the disallowance of a bill. This is a special provision with respect to education which contains no limitation as to time, and in my humble opinion it is still in force, and under it the Dominion Executive are still in a position to disallow the Act; and I think they should disallow it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would ask my hon. friend if he is aware that under that particular clause a reference has been made by the Governor in Council to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court of Canada has held it did not apply to Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am disposed to think that the Government made a mistake in allowing the first reference to the Privy Council, and that they made a further mistake in allowing this reference to the Supreme Court. I think they should have taken the bull by the horns and disposed of the matter. There might have been an excitement for a few months, but then it would have been all over. The Minister of Agriculture gave as an excuse for the inaction of the Government the fact that the Catholics of Manitoba went to the courts in the first instance. I presume that the action of the local people did not preclude the Governor in Council from taking the action which they had a right to take, and I think, further, that if it had been intimated that the Governor in Council proposed to act, in all probability no action would have been taken on the spot. I may be allowed before concluding to make a few observations on the speech of the hon. gentleman from Calgary. I have already dealt with the point as to the responsibility of the Liberals for the Manitoba Act of 1890. That is admitted—that the Liberal Government were responsible for the passing of that Act; and I have already expressed my opinion that they will in future pay dearly for their action. The hon. gentleman went further in trying to lead the House to the belief that this was entirely a Liberal movement. He referred to the recent election to the House of Commons of a member for Winnipeg; but the hon. gentleman, while telling us that Mr. Martin was the introducer of this objectionable school measure, did not tell us that Mr. Campbell, who opposed Mr. Martin, was just as strong an advocate of the Manitoba School Act as Mr. Martin was, and that so completely was that the case that Archbishop Taché gave his people to understand that there was no difference between the two candidates, looked at from the Catholic standpoint, and that his people were free to vote whichever way they pleased; so I do not think there is very much weight in what the hon. gentleman said on the subject of that Winnipeg election. Then the hon. member drew the picture of the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg being introduced between the leader of the Opposition and Mr. Davies. Suppose that Mr. Campbell had been elected, does any hon. gentleman suppose that he would not have been introduced by prominent Conservatives? The probabilities are he would have been introduced between the Premier and the Controller of Customs. The hon. gentleman, in order to make his argument stronger, to the effect that the Liberals were the people who were hostile to the separate schools, went down to Prince Edward Island and talked about what had been done there by Mr. Davies. As I understand —I speak subject to correction—the Act passed by the Davies administration in Prince Edward Island did not in any manner affect the school law with respect to the various denominations. It made better provision for the support of the schools, but did not alter in any way the relations of the denominations to the public schools, so that there is no parallel at all between the case of Prince Edward Island and that of Manitoba. Leaving this rather burning question of Manitoba, the hon. gentleman dealt with the case of the North-west Territories and he seemed to think it unreasonable that the Catholics in the North-west Territories should be nervous as to the fate of their separate schools. Having the example of Manitoba before their eyes, it is not to be wondered at that the supporters of the dissentient schools in the North-west Territories were a little nervous. I trust that, as the hon. gentleman has said, there is no intention on the part of the Government of the North-west Territories to unduly interfere with the dissentient schools there. To be frank about it, I do not myself attach very much consequence to the change with respect to the inspection of the schools. I think that in a country where the public funds are as limited as they are in the North-west Territories, it is rather too much to expect that the country should pay for two sets of school inspectors. I think that one inspector, if he does his duty fairly, ought to be enough to inspect the schools of a district—the schools of all kinds. Of course when he goes into a Catholic school he will not make an inspection there as to the manner in which the Christian doctrine is taught, or anything of that sort, but it would be his duty to see that in the matter of secular knowledge this school was on the same level, or nearly so, as the public schools.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is his duty to see that no religious instruction is given before half-past three. He cannot permit a catechism or religious book to be used.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that that is a little unreasonable, but still it is not a vital matter altogether.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—What does the hon. gentleman call unreasonable?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said I thought it was somewhat unreasonable to forbid the giving of religious instruction up to half past three; and if the schools are recognized as separate schools it does strike me as being perhaps a little unreasonable to prevent religious instruction at any time of the day. I presume the idea is that a certain number of hours shall be given to secular instruction. The only thing that strikes me as being very seriously objectionable in the present school regulations for the North-west, as far as I could gather from the speeches made by hon. gentlemen and from a hasty perusal of some of the regulations myself, is that there does not seem to be an easy method provided for the supplying of teachers to the dissentient schools. It is not to be expected that the members of a religious community, shall go through the normal school or even attend the normal school lectures, and there does not appear to be any provision made in these regulations which especially authorized the admission of a dissentient teacher to teach, on passing an examination showing that that teacher is qualified to teach the branches which are required to be taught in public schools. It may be that the regulations are intended to allow that, but it is not so expressed and I think that that is to be regretted. Going back for a moment to the disallowance of this Act, the hon. gentleman from DeLanaudière quoted a well known opinion of Sir John Macdonald's to the effect that there were two cases in which a provincial law might be disallowed. It might be disallowed if it was unconstitutional and it might be disallowed if it was injurious to the whole country. Now, hon. gentlemen, whether this Manitoba Act could have been disallowed on the first ground or not, I think it certainly could be disallowed on the second ground. I do not think there is any doubt that this legislation has been injurious to the whole country. It has done a great deal to stir up ill feeling where there was peace before and this is most injurious; and is likely to have a very serious effect upon the prospects of Manitoba and the North-west. It is very likely to prevent the immigration into that country of people from the province of Quebec and of Catholics from other parts of the world; and we want all the people that we can get in that country; that is just what the country needs. We have a vast country there which we have spent immense sums to develop; and all that the country wants is population. Any legislation, which is calculated to keep out any considerable number of immigrants to whom there is no special objection, is injurious to the whole country. So that I think on that ground the Government would have been perfectly justified in disallowing the legislation. One may call attention to the fact that bills have been disallowed where there was a question as to the right to disallow; for instance take the Rivers and Streams Bill of Ontario. That bill was disallowed, I think, three times; so that when the Government had made up their minds that a bill was objectionable they had not much hesitation in undertaking to disallow it and they did not wait for a decision as to the constitutionality of the Act to disallow. The question is what is to be done now? And it is a question that is not very easy to answer. My own impression still is that under the Manitoba Act of 1870 the Government are at liberty to disallow the Act; and I think that if that be the case it would be their duty to do it so as to give time for calm consideration and to allow the Legislature of Manitoba to do justice to their Catholic fellow-citizens.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Has not the time for disallowance expired?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know; that is just the question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, for disallowance, but not for appeal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think, hon. gentlemen, that whatever may be the duty of the Government, the duty of every Canadian citizen is to try and inspire broader views into the minds of our people, and to cultivate more charitable feelings between the various denominations of which our population is composed; and that above all we should frown down all attempts by politicians to use religion as a political instrument, and that we should try and infuse into the hearts of our people both east and west a philanthropy that shall be at least as wide as Canada. We can hardly expect to see what the poet did expect to see some 50 years ago, a time when the battle flags should be furled in the Parliament of man, the federation of the world; but at least we should try to have the battle-flags of contending denominations furled in our federation of Canada.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I would not trespass upon the time of the House if it were not for the speech of my hon. friend from Halifax. I agree with him to some extent, and I am glad that he has qualified the statement that he made at the close of his remarks the other day. My hon. friend spoke of the alleged trickery by which the Greenway Government deprived the Roman Catholic schools of their rights in Manitoba. He endeavoured to make it appear that it did not originate in Manitoba; that it emanated from Ontario, and in particular he mentioned the Meredith party. I am inclined to think my hon. friend in making that assertion was drawing largely on his own imagination. He knows no more about it than I do, and I prefer leaving that question to be dealt with by the people coming from that part of the country, who are more conversant with the facts and local political matters than I am. If he had listened to the remarks of my hon. friend from St. Boniface, he must know that the Liberal party in Manitoba got into power on false pretenses, on a pledge that constitutional privileges which had been given to the Catholics in Manitoba would be kept inviolate. Mr. Martin and Mr. Fisher and the present leader of the Government declared positively that they did not intend to interfere with the constitution of Manitoba as regards separate schools; that it was their right, and should be maintained that they had it under the constitution and it would not be interfered with. Upon that pledge they succeeded in defeating the provincial secretary, Mr. Burke, I think his name was, and returned a man who was opposed to the Government. We find also from the remarks of my hon. friend from St. Boniface that the Liberal party imposed upon the credulity of His Grace, the Archbishop of Manitoba, to such an extent as to make him believe that their policy would not interfere with their separate schools as constituted by law. But no sooner had they got into power than they violated all their pledges, and Mr. Martin introduced the following year a bill not only to deprive them of the use of the French language, but also of their separate schools —not only confiscating their schools, but their school property. From first to last, I believe it was a plot of the Liberals themselves. I believe the Jesuit Estates Bill in Quebec and this bill in Manitoba were intended to kindle a flame against the Catholic Church and which could be used for political purposes—that this was well understood, and that they believed then they were acting contrary to the constitution. They believed that the legislation was ultra vires and that the Federal Government would veto it and thus raise the old Protestant cry throughout the country. That was the position they took, but their plan failed, and why? Those who were in favour of continuing separate schools appealed to their own court. That court confirmed the legislation and pronounced it intra vires. Had the Government of Canada interfered at that stage, after the court had pronounced upon the constitutionality of the Act of 1890, they would have committed a great wrong, and created hostility throughout this country. The Liberals would have raised the provincial rights cry; they would have raised the cry of Catholic ascendency in the country, and no Government could have stood the pressure which would have been brought to bear against them. The Government did what I believe the leader of the Opposition would have done had he been in power, the same as he did with Prince Edward Island when they came here asking for separate schools for the minority there. It is very easy to be wise after an event happens. My hon. friend believed in the appeal to the Privy Council of England. He had full confidence in the Privy Council and believed, as most people believed, that the result of that appeal would have been quite different from the judgment that they rendered. I do not fully agree with the decision of the Privy Council; at the same time, it is now established and this Government would be neglecting their duty and violating the law and the constitution if they were to interfere in the way proposed by my hon. friend. But the hon. member from Halifax would like nothing better. He would fold his arms and see this country from one end to the other torn to pieces over this vexed question. My hon. friend knows well enough that should a question of that kind arise here, and the Government take the course which he has indicated, it would not last many days. The Government would have popular feeling against them; the representatives of the people would be unable to support them, because the feeling of the country is that such matters should be decided in a constitutional way. The judgment of the Privy Council, although in harmony with the highest court in Manitoba, is, in my humble opinion, inconsistent with the intention and meaning of the word practice in the Manitoba Act of 1876. The Act of 1890 certainly does prejudicially affect the rights and privileges of denominational schools as held, practised and enjoyed for nearly twenty years. Renowned as the law lords rightly are for scholarship and ability, and knowing the weight and effect which necessarily must attach to their opinions, yet carefully looking into the case, to me it would appear that their Lordships did not grasp the full and correct meaning of the terms denominational and separate schools, and their right to exemption from public schools tax under the Manitoba Act of Union. It is here well known that the spirit and intention was to preserve to the Roman Catholics in Manitoba all their rights, privileges and advantages as they then enjoyed them in relation to denominational schools. Though some of us may very much disapprove of the decision of the Privy Council, we must, nevertheless, bow to it and endeavour by all means to live harmoniously together and reconcile these discordant elements in the population. I am in favour of separate schools myself. Our church, the Anglican, as well as the Roman Catholic, always has favoured separate schools. I do not believe in Godless schools. I believe they make clever men devils. If all we live for is to make men clever, it might be very well; but we should educate people in a proper way, not merely to live for this world but to prepare them for another. Much as we may regret the fact, it seems impossible that Christians of different denominations can agree upon the fundamental principles of Christianity and prepare text books which all may agree to use Possibly some day we may arrive at an agreement upon that subject. In this House we have agreed upon a form of prayer and selections from the Scriptures which all of us can accept. Societies throughout the country are able to meet together and use some form of prayer, and read some texts of Scripture, so it is quite possible that some day we can agree upon the cardinal principles of faith and without endeavouring to enforce our peculiar ideas, we can have a certain amount of religious instruction given in the public schools. But this question must be left entirely to the provincial authorities. The people of Manitoba have their provincial rights and those rights have been confirmed by the decision of the Privy Council. The only course open for the minority is to endeavour, if possible, to act in a manner which may induce those who are in power in Manitoba to show a Christian feeling and do justice to them as far as possible, allowing them, in sections where they are sufficiently numerous, to have religion taught in their schools so that they will not be entirely godless schools. My hon. friend from Ottawa gave us the history of the separate schools and in all that he said I quite agree with him, but I think it ill became him to disparage the highest court of appeal of the Empire. I am under the impression that my hon. friend had a high opinion of the Privy Council until this decision, and he, like many other lawyers who lose a case, blames the court for its decision. We, lawyers, are accustomed to put off our clients, when we lose a case, by saying it was the stupid judge or the stupid jury. If the decision had been the other way in this case, my hon. friend would have been strong in the expression of his approval of the court which he used to regard as the great bulwark of our constitution, but as the decision has gone against his views, and he has strong religious feelings in the matter and thinks that his church has been wronged and injured, and I am entirely with him in that view, he has ventured to make remarks with regard to the Privy Council which are not consistent with the facts. I had the pleasure myself of visiting that court of appeal and was very much impressed with the dignified manner with which it was conducted. The hon. gentleman's disparaging remarks about the court must have been founded on his own fertile imagination. The court is composed of the ablest jurists in the land. men familiar with every question coming up from the remotest parts of the Empire, and men as qualified to judge, with regard to the right of every person under our federal system, as any men in the world could be. I think the hon. gentlemen went far out of his way in making the remarks that he did and he should eliminate these remarks from his speech. His criticism was uncalled for and had no foundation in fact and arose simply from ill-feeling and discontent caused by the judgment of the court. My hon. friend appealed for peace, toleration and liberty of the subject in Canada. In that I am quite with him. That is the only way in which we can have this difficult question, which is causing so much controversy, properly terminated. We must endeavour to live in harmony and the only way is to be just and tolerant. A minority cannot long suffer wrong ; the people will rise against it and demand justice to all. On the other hand, I do not approve of the suggestion that the Dominion Government should have disallowed the legislation of Manitoba. Even now, my hon. friend from Ottawa would not undertake to say that this Parliament, in defiance of the decision of the highest court in the empire, should take any action which would counteract the will of the people of Manitoba. He knows very well that the government which would sanction such a course, would raise a storm which it would be difficult to quell. They would have been hurled from power in a very short time. Therefore I am with the Government in the course they have taken. It commended itself at the time to all parties, Catholic as well as Protestant, and we must only regret that these people in Manitoba have violated their pledges and passed a law without having the public opinion of Manitoba with them at the time. They did it in violation of their pledges to the Catholic body, and I believe that it will recoil on them acting the way they did. It was an injustice and a violation of their pledges given to His Grace the Archbishop and the people of the country, and it must redound to their disadvantage. The spirit of Nemesis yet lives, and will punish the tyrannical abuse of power. But my hon. friend must feel that this whole thing has originated in Manitoba with the Liberals themselves. My hon. friend denounced them as tricksters. He said what was perfectly right—that they, through misrepresentations and false pledges to the clergy and to the people, especially the French-Canadians, got into power, and having got into power they endeavoured, for political purposes, I believe, to override the constitutional rights of the minority and place the Government of Canada in a false position. The Government, in my opinion, took the proper stand in this matter. Had it done otherwise it would have aroused party feeling and religious bigotry throughout the country which would not have been easily allayed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.) I have to ask the indulgence of this House, as one of its youngest members, while I offer a few observations on the subject which has engaged the attention of the House for the last few days. It is very unfortunate indeed that questions of this nature should come up here. I think it is particularly unfortunate that they have come up when they do not point to any distinct termination or action on the part of Parliament as to what is to be done. The discussion of these questions, as we are discussing this subject now, is unfortunate, notwithstanding the admirable manner in which it has been introduced in this House by the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface, who made a speech which was not only a credit to himself but to this parliament. Although he introduced it in the most delicate manner and very ably indeed, I still feel that there is danger of this discussion doing as much harm as good. I noticed when my hon. friend from Halifax was speaking to-day that he found it necessary to refer to some misapprehensions which might arise from remarks that he made last Friday. We must remember in discussing those questions on which the public mind is so sensitive, after our words go outside of the House they get into the press and the discussion is taken up by others less intelligent than hon. gentlemen here, they are apt to be taken up warmly and lead in the future to other misunderstandings and a fresh crop of just such legislation as we are now dealing with. I do not think that the question of whether denominational schools or public schools are the best is at all one for discussion on this occasion, although a good deal of time has been devoted to that point. As this question has been so very freely discussed and strong views put forth upon it, I may just as well in passing, express my own opinion that I believe in a public secular system of education. It would be my choice. I was struck by the remark which my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax made a few minutes ago about the desirability and necessity of people knowing and understanding each other. In a mixed community such as we have in almost every part of Canada, we have to fight the battles of life side by side, whether we are Roman Catholics or Protestants, and as we have to do that, for my own part I think it is desirable that our children should learn to know each other and to trust each other and to appreciate each other in the class room and on the playground as well as when they have chosen their employments and assumed the more responsible duties of life. I myself have had my children educated in the public schools. Of course we look carefully after our schools—look after the tone of morality in them, and I have still to learn that the fundamental principles of our common Christianity have been eliminated from those schools. They do not go into details. My creed is not taught there, as distinct from the creed of another denomination, but the fundamental doctrines of Christianity are not eliminated from the instruction. While I hold the view, and hold it warmly, and assert it here as I have on many previous occasions asserted it elsewhere, that a public school system is best for a mixed community, I have taken this further ground: I recognize the fact that there is a very large proportion of my fellow-subjects in this country who believe differently from me, with whom it is a matter of conscience that their children should receive a denominational education, and therefore, more than 20 years ago I took the stand that when the assertion of that right or when the granting that privilege to them trenches upon no right or privilege which I or my fellow Protestant citizens value or esteem, I am willing to let them adopt the system of education which they conscientiously believe to be the best. I took that stand in my own province 20 years ago, when the school question was up there, under the leadership of the Honourable Jas. C. Pope. I fell in the fight which took place over it, but, looking back, I hold the same views now as I did then. I took my stand in favour of free public undenominational education, but, at the same time, I never pushed my views so far as to persecute or injure those who wished to have their education conducted in a different manner where it was possible to be so conducted, without interfering with the carrying on of public schools. A good deal has been said in this discussion with regard to an alleged breach of faith, with regard to this school question in Manitoba. Now, I feel bound to say, honestly and candidly, from the observation that I took of public questions at the time the Manitoba School Act was passed, and from what I learned with regard to it, that I have always been under the impression that privileges were conceded to the minority of that place by law. That was my honest conviction; but the matter has taken such a shape that it almost bothers a layman to tell exactly how it stands to-day, but I have been long enough in public life and business life to think that I am a perfect judge upon another phase of this question, and I shall now refer to the conduct of the men who passed the Manitoba School Act of 1890. We have already heard in the speech of the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface, an extract from a speech delivered by Mr. Jas. Fisher, M.P.P., in the legislature of Manitoba. I have read it carefully, because I have the pleasure of being acquainted with Mr. Fisher, and I feel that I can place very great reliance upon what he said; I have read that speech of Mr. Fisher's and I can come to no other conclusion than that the passage of that Act was a very base betrayal of the people in that part of the Dominion on the part of Mr. Martin and Mr. Greenway. We find that these gentlemen went to the electors authorized to speak for their party. There was a contest upon this very subject, and it virtually affected the condition of parties in Manitoba. They gave a solemn pledge, a pledge that was repeated on more than one occasion, and backed by the authority of the president of the Liberal Association in the province of Manitoba, that if they gave their confidence to the Liberal candidate, the rights and privileges which they had enjoyed in regard to education would be preserved to them, by the party who expected to get into power. Notwithstanding those pledges, so solemnly given, we find that the very men who spoke for the Liberal party in Manitoba on that occasion, after reaping the benefit of that election, and having got the votes and support of the people on that pledge, turned around and deprived those people of the advantages they had enjoyed in the matter of education. Mr. Martin and his friends gained that election, and they followed up their victory by passing this legislation which is so obnoxious to the minority in Manitoba. Their conduct, to my mind, has been extraordinary. No wonder my hon. friend from St. Boniface and his friends and sympathizers feel strongly over it. Their feeling must be somewhat similar to that of the dying eagle, as described by Byron, on finding a feather from her own wing attached to the arrow which had pierced her heart :

> Keen was the pang, but keener still to feel
> She nursed the pinion that impelled the steel.

I was very much surprised, in view of the facts to which I have been alluding, and others to which I shall refer before I resume my seat, at a remark that fell from my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, when he delivered his long and interesting speech the other evening on this question. He ventured the assertion that he believed if that venerable and able statesman who now lies in his grave at Kingston were living to-day, he would be able to suppress the intolerance now growing up amongst his followers. Attention has already been called to the fact that it was the Liberal party that was guilty of this intolerance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was speaking of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—We will come to Ontario later on. As far as Manitoba is concerned, my hon. friend will not dispute that the intolerant feeling and the treachery in regard to this question did not appear amongst the followers of the late Sir John Macdonald, or of the Government party of this country, but in the ranks of the party of which he is the representative leader in this House. In answer to the statement of my hon. friend the member for Ottawa, the leader of the Opposition in this House, I will just read to hon. gentlemen a few words from the pamphlet published by Archbishop Taché on the history of the schools in Manitoba during fifteen years. In this pamphlet he says, speaking of the discussion which took place on the Manitoba School Act in the year 1890, when it was before the Provincial Legislature :

> Mr. Prendergast placed himself in the foremost position, being endowed with a superior order of literary, historical, political and social knowledge. Nothing was neglected to defend the Catholics. The five Protestant members of the Opposition joined them in the very heat of the battle, but numbers, that ultimate resource of constitutional regime, crushed every effort.

All the Protestant members of the Opposition who are Conservative, joined their Catholic fellow members in the House against the Liberal party in the province of Manitoba, in order to preserve for them the privileges which they enjoyed in the matter of education. As far as Manitoba is concerned, I think my hon. friend will freely admit that the intolerance, of which he expresses such horror, is to be found entirely in the ranks of his own party.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not spare them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—My hon. friend made, in this very connection, another observation, which I was glad indeed to hear. I am not very well acquainted with the Orangemen of Ontario, but he made this admission —that he found the leaders of the Orangemen more liberal than the members of his own party in dealing with this matter of education.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In early days.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—Yes, I think that was the remark, and he named some grand masters—he mentioned three or four of them—who had always stood up for what they considered fair play, and had approached all these questions in a highly tolerant manner. Reference has been made to another organization which has within a very short time made its appearance, I believe mainly in the province of Ontario, an organization of which I do not know very much ; it is called, I believe, the Protestant Protective Association, and my hon. friend from Halifax attached whatever odium belongs to that association, as an intolerant institution, to the Conservative party. If my information is right, it was the Liberal party in western Ontario, that imported the Protestant Protective Association into Canada. Hon. gentlemen may think that is very unlikely, but my information is this, that the Orange body, being largely in favour of the Conservative party in western Ontario, some of the Liberal leaders felt the necessity of some organization that they could use as a counterblast, and the Protestant Protective Association was introduced into the county of Lambton by a leading Liberal.

Several MEMBERS—No, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—And it may be it has not turned out well on their hands. I think this information is correct. My hon. friend from Ottawa may be an excellent authority on many subjects, but we will excuse him if I do not regard him as one on the Protestant Protective Association, and the source from which I have my information is not at all likely to be wrong. It may possibly turn out that this Protestant Protective Association—if its real object is to protect Protestant interests—will find out before long that the best way to do that is by practising and preaching toleration. When they do that and stand on a sound platform, my hon. friend will find that there is really no need of the organization, because there will be no better way of injuring the interests of Protestantism than by means of an organization, the object of which is to ostracize and persecute any other religious body in the community. Bnt, there was another observation made, and I think it came from my hon. friend from Halifax. He said it was from Mr. Meredith's party in Ontario, that this rabid spirit of intolerance had been imported into Manitoba. Mr. Meredith may have advocated measures of which I would not approve if I understood them properly. I do not understand these questions in Ontario very well, but I have yet to learn that Mr. Meredith ever proposed as his platform, or put forward as his own views, the abolition of separate schools in Ontario. If that is true, he could hardly be guilty of sending out to Manitoba principles and views which he did not advocate in Ontario; but there is another gentleman who, I think, you will all agree, has had a good deal to do with starting the trouble in Manitoba—I refer to Mr. McCarthy. We know he did go up there and made a speech, and that he fraternized with Mr. Martin on that occasion. Mr. Martin moved a very cordial vote of thanks to him after he had made his speech, stirring up all these troublesome questions, and he may be entitled to the credit, to some extent, of starting his friend Mr. Martin upon this crusade against separate schools in Manitoba. It is worthy of note that a short time after Mr. McCarthy came back from Manitoba, he addressed a large meeting in the city of Toronto, and announced himself as a supporter of Mr. Mowat.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—He so announced himself at a meeting in Toronto. I think it was the time Mr. Parkin was there. In moving a vote of thanks, he announced that he would support Mr. Mowat—

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E I.)—My memory is not very often at fault, and I remember distinctly that the Empire articles, which, it has been alleged, read Mr. McCarthy out of the Liberal party, charged him with being untrue to Mr. Meredith in local politics.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Was that after the Manitoba Bill?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—Yes, it was a week or two before the appearance of the article in the Empire which read Mr. McCarthy out of the ranks of the Liberal-Conservative party. At all events, we will agree this far, that, if anybody went up from Ontario and carried the fire of intolerance to that province, it was Mr. McCarthy, and we recognize the fact that Mr. McCarthy is falling right into line with the Liberals in Dominion politics—so much so that the Liberal leaders were able to announce days in advance the exact time when he and his friend Col. O'Brien would speak on the tariff question in another place. There seems to be a thorough understanding between these gentlemen and the Liberal party. References have been made to the case of Prince Edward Island. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the school election, as we call it, took place in Prince Edward Island in 1876. Mr. Davies took the leadership in that campaign. It is a fact that the Government which carried the school legislation at that time was not a purely Liberal Government. There were Conservative gentlemen who shared Mr. Davies's view upon this school question, and they formed a coalition government, and passed the bill which is called the Public School Act of Prince Edward Island. It is also true that this bill was petitioned against by Bishop McIntyre, and by others. I think my hon. friend from Ottawa was Secretary of State at the time, and was the medium of communicating the decision of the Mackenzie Administration to the Government of Prince Edward Island, that they would not interfere with or disallow the measure. I think it will be found upon close examination that the Act of Prince Edward Island was objectionable to Catholics.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—In the meantime, I will read to hon. gentlemen an extract from one of the memorials which Bishop McIntyre presented against the Prince Edward Island Act:

Your memorialists assure Your Excellency that they cannot withdraw their children from the schools which, at so much expense to themselves, they have erected, for they are restrained from doing so by the strength of convictions which they cannot overcome. They will therefore be compelled to pay for secular schools in addition to those which they feel bound to support.

They believe this to be an act of injustice to them, but it is an act of injustice which a majority possessed the power of imposing upon a minority, and therefore, while they protest against it, they must submit. But, in addition to this, the statute introduces a new and unheard of principle, for it, in effect, makes it a crime, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for your memorialists to send their children to their own schools rather than to those established under its provisions.

Section 15 provides that unless the average attendance in a school district 'shall be fifty per cent of the children of school age within the district,' that a deduction shall be made from the salary of the teacher.

Section 16 provides that such deduction shall be made up and levied as a rate upon those parents who, by not sending their children to the schools, have caused the number of scholars to fall below the average required by section 15.

The effect of these clauses will be this: If your memorialists continue, as they will continue, to send their children to their own schools, and from such attendance the average of children attending the schools under this Act should fall below fifty per cent, then, notwithstanding your memorialists have paid their taxes into the public treasury and that their children are attending efficient schools, built and maintained by themselves; notwithstanding this, they are to be fined because they will not withdraw their children from the religious teaching they prize so highly, to send them where all instruction in the Christian religion is, by law, carefully and rigorously excluded.

The argument that the Bishop uses is that section 16 compels the parents of children that are withdrawn from the public schools in order to attend the denominational schools not only to pay for the maintenance of their own schools but taxes them for the support of the public schools as well; and they are not only taxed, but they are liable to a fine or imprisonment for keeping their children away from the public schools. That is the argument that Bishop McIntyre makes.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—What was Mr. Davies when he passed that Act?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—He was leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Mr. Davies was defeated in 1879, I think, and from that time up to about two years ago Prince Edward Island was continuously ruled by Conservative Administrations, of which my hon. friend himself was a distinguished member. Did any of those Administrations alter that law?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I was just coming to that point. I was going to show that after the passage of this law the Catholic people of the province, as well as those who sympathized with them in the matter, finding their opposition useless, accepted the situation. Indeed, before the change of Government, which occurred about two years after the passage of this Act, there was a distinct understanding on every hand that the school question was not going to be further agitated—that the Catholic people accepted the situation and would not offer any further opposition to the Act. When that stage was reached four Conservatives, members of the Government, retired from it. One of the principal reasons which they assigned for doing so was that, while they believed in the principle of undenominational schools and had stood by the Davies Government until the battle was over and the law had been accepted, when that had taken place they would not remain in a Government from which Roman Catholics were proscribed and therefore they retired in order that a mixed Government might be formed, a Government composed of Roman Catholics and Protestants which was the only Government that could be popular or just in a province like Prince Edward Island, where the proportion of Protestants to Catholics is about three to two. I very well remember, and must not forget to deal with the fact before reaching the point which the hon. gentleman from Halifax raised, that Mr. Davies denounced these gentlemen who withdrew from his Government in very unmeasured terms because they did withdraw. It was not merely his view that the Roman Catholics should be under the disability which the School Act imposed upon them, but that Roman Catholics should be proscribed from office altogether. He denounced a member of this House as a black-hearted traitor, I think those were the words, for announcing his determination to retire from the Government because it was his desire that the Government should represent all classes of the community. I will come to the fact to which the hon. gentleman from Halifax has drawn my attention, and that is that the coalition Government, of which Mr. Davis was the leader, went out of power some two years afterwards and a Conservative Government was formed of which I had the honour of being a member. When we took office, the school question had been dropped. If was understood on all hands that there should be no further agitation on the matter. In fact, we were pledged (feeling as all parties did that there had been enough of this fight which could lead to no beneficial results) to go on legislating on other and more pressing questions and not to disturb that school question in any way whatever. Therefore, the hon. gentleman will understand that it was on account of this resolution on the part of the supporters of denominational schools in the province that the Conservative party continued in power, and did not attempt to amend or change the School Act of 1879. There is a point upon which the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member from Halifax have enlarged at a very considerable length in different parts of their speeches, and put forward very strongly—at first rather gently and afterwards with more emphasis— the duty, as they considered, of the Federal Government to disallow the Manitoba Schools Act. I wish to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the record of the Liberal party on this question of the disallowance of educational measures—I will not go beyond that. There was a great deal said, as we all know, for a number of years in Canada in public life over the disallowance of provincial measures, and my hon. friend from Halifax just a few moments ago cited the disallowance of the Rivers and Streams Act on two or three occasions to show that the Liberal-Conservative leaders whenever they thought proper could practise disallowance, although they did not do it in the case of the Manitoba School Act, which, in his opinion, so fully called for it. My hon. friend will remember that the disallowance of those measures occurred some years ago, and that there has been a very great change in the constitutional position of both political parties, I might say, but especially of the Conservative party on the question of disallowance since that time. But I will lead up to that. In the meantime, I will call the attention of the House to a resolution moved by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie as far back as 1872 in the House of Commons, upon the New Brunswick School Act. As my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, has argued that it was the duty of the Government of the day to disallow the Manitoba School Act, I want to show what had been the policy of his own party—what was the policy of the Government of which he himself was a very distinguished member—through a number of years on this very question of disallowance, and especially the disallowance of educational measures. In 1872, Mr. Mackenzie moved this resolution which was adopted :

> And that this House deems it expedient that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown in England and if possible the opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council should be obtained as to the right of the Legislature of New Brunswick to make such changes in the school law as deprived the Roman Catholics of the privileges they enjoyed at the time of the union in respect to religious education in the common schools, with a view of ascertaining whether the case comes within the terms of the fourth subsection of the 93rd clause of the British North America Act of 1867, which authorizes the Parliament of Canada to enact remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions respecting education in the said Act.

The law on the matter of reference to the Privy Council of England was not then in the position it is now, so much so that Mr. Mackenzie in this resolution put in the words that an appeal should be made to the Privy Council if possible. He thought it would be difficult to get a decision of the Privy Council on a question of this kind at the time, and he felt that if he could not get one opinion he could get another, so he included in his resolution the law officers of the Crown. Here we find that Mr. Mackenzie, 22 years ago, while leader of the Liberal party in Parliament, took almost precisely the same view of the New Brunswick School Act as the Government of Sir John Thompson has done with regard to the Manitoba law. I dare say my hon. friend will tell me that the case was much stronger in Manitoba than in New Brunswick. I grant it, but the Government were not presumed to know that—they were only trying to find out the law as it applied to both cases. Mr. Mackenzie did not profess to know what should be done in the matter and how far the power of remedial legislation lay with the Federal Government at that time, and therefore he asked, and his views were carried in the House of Commons at that time, for a reference of the New Brunswick school question to the Privy Council or the law officers of the Crown.

We will come to 1875, when Mr. Mackenzie was leader of the Government and my hon. friend from Ottawa was one of his able and most trusted colleagues. Mr. Mackenzie made a speech in which he said:

Sir, it must be apparent to every one that if we were to attempt violently to lay hands upon that compact for the purpose of aiding a minority in New Brunswick who have a grievance, no matter however just what that grievance may be,—and from my point of view I think it is one they have a right to complain of—however much we might entertain that feeling, we have no right to do anything that will violate our obligation to defend the constitution under which we live. I may point this out to hon. gentlemen in this House and to the country that if it were competent for this House directly or indirectly to set aside the constitution as regards one of the smaller provinces, it would be equally competent for this House to set it aside as regards the privileges which the Catholics enjoy at this moment in Ontario.

Mr. Mackenzie on that occasion, at the conclusion of the speech from which I have read this extract, moved the following resolution:

In the opinion of this House, legislation by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, encroaching on any powers reserved to any one of the provinces by the British North America Act, would be an infraction of the provincial constitution, and that it would be inexpedient and fraught with danger to the autonomy of each of the provinces for this House to invite such legislation.

This was an amendment to a resolution made by some hon. member asking that the Parliament of Canada might be called upon to amend the British North America Act. Here Mr. Mackenzie again, as the leader of his party, moved this resolution and carried it in the House of Commons on this very question of education. But when my hon. friend from Halifax asked the House to remember that the Conservative Government had disallowed the Rivers and Streams Bill and measures of that kind, I have already said he should remember that that matter of disallowance stands in a different position to-day from what it did when that disallowance took place. I will just remind the hon. gentleman how that came about. In the session of 1890 Mr. Blake moved in the House of Commons a resolution which was adopted unanimously, Sir John Macdonald accepting the principle. It was placed on record and, as you might say, made a law of Parliament. It was as follows:

It is expedient to provide means whereby, on solemn occasions touching the exercise of the power of disallowance, or of the appellate power as to educational legislation, important questions of law or fact may be referred by the executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration, in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented, and that a reasoned opinion may be obtained for the information of the executive.

This resolution, as I have said, was submitted by Mr. Blake, and unanimously adopted. In submitting the resolution to the House Mr. Blake made a very able speech indeed, a speech well worthy of perusal and re-perusal. It was evidently thought over with the greatest care, and he brought to bear on every subject that he touched the results of great experience and great ability. He says:

I would say that recent current events and impending events have combined to convince me that it is important, in the public interest, that this proposition should receive attention during this session.

Yet, sir, no legislative or executive can, any more than any private individual, act at all without considering and in a sense deciding for itself the legality of the acts and so in some sort entering upon the judicial department, but upon the domain of the judicial power, because our opinion that our acts are valid does not make them so, their validity depends upon the decision of the judicial authority, and on that alone.

There can be no doubt that the absolute union of these departments (executive and legislative and judicial) is neither more nor less than absolute despotism. United in one hand, I care not whether it be the hand of an autocrat or the hand of a council, the power of legislation, the power of interpretation and the power of administration, and you make the most absolute despot that is conceivable. The separation therefore, the degree to which, without our weakening or our complicating the action of the machine, you can separate them, marks the degree to which, in this respect of a constitutional question, you have attained perfection.

The first of the two cases to which I shall allude is that in which the proposal comes from the Executive to disallow an Act of a Provincial Legislature on the ground that that Act is ultra vires. If it be so the Act is void; and I think I may say that it is now generally agreed that a void Act should not be disallowed but left to the courts.

Mr. Blake says that owing to recent and current events it was important that that resolution should receive attention that very session.

Every word that Mr. Blake said in this speech went to establish the principle that on an important question like this and especially an educational question, the Government of Canada should not attempt to deal with it but that it should be dealt with by the courts. He continues:

Those members who have long been here will well remember the New Brunswick School Case, which was agitated for many years and in the course of which agitation I had hoped, that some political aspects of that and of analogous questions were finally settled—settled at all events for the party with which I acted, and for the humble individual who is now addressing you.

Here Mr. Blake says the precedent established in the case of the New Brunswick School Act settled this question of disallowance as far as the Liberal party is concerned, of which the hon. gentleman from Ottawa is a distinguished member. He goes further and says that it settled the matter as far as he is concerned :

I regard it as settled for myself at any rate, first of all that there shall be no disallowance of educational legislation, for the reason that in the opinion of this Parliament some other or different policy than that which the province has thought fit to accept would be better.

My own opinion is, that whenever, in opposition to the continued view of a Provincial Executive and Legislature, it is contemplated by the Dominion Executive to disallow a Provincial Act because it is ultra vires, there ought to be a reference ; and also that there ought to be a reference in certain cases where the condition of public opinion renders expedient a solution of legal problems, dissociated from those elements of passion and expediency which are, rightly or wrongly, too often attributed to the action of political bodies. And again, I for my part would recommend such a reference in all cases of educational appeal—cases which necessarily evoke the feelings to which I have alluded, and to one of which, I am frank to say, my present action is only due.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those decisions were not binding on the Government.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—Mr. Blake distinctly said there should be a reference.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He could not carry his resolution unless he accepted Sir John Macdonald's interpretation of it which I have before me.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—Sir John accepted the resolution pretty much in the spirit in which it was offered ; so much so that it was embodied next year in an Act of the Dominion and it is now the law of the land. Mr. Blake adds :

But, Sir, besides the great positive gain of obtaining the best guidance, there are other, and, in my opinion, not unimportant gains besides. Ours is a popular government ; and when burning questions arise inflaming the public mind, when agitation is rife as to the political action of the Executive or the Legislature—which action is to be based on legal questions, obviously beyond the grasp of the people at large ; when the people are on such questions divided by cries of creed and race, then I maintain that a great public good is attainable by the submission of such legal questions to legal tribunals, with all the customary securities for a sound judgment ; and whose decisions—passionless and dignified, accepted by each of us as binding in our own affairs involving fortune, freedom, honour, life itself—are most likely to be accepted by us all in questions of public concern.

My hon. friend says that Mr. Blake's resolution would not have been carried unless Sir John had given an interpretation of it and given an assent to it. Well, whatever qualification Sir John gave it, he accepted it in its integrity without the alteration of a single word, and it finds its place now in the statutes of Canada just in the words in which Mr. Blake presented it, and whatever my learned friend will make out of the few words of qualification that Sir John used, he surely cannot go back on Mr. Blake's words when he said he regarded these questions as settled for the party to which he belonged, the Liberal party of Canada, and at all events they were settled as far as he himself was concerned. I may say, in my humble way, that I have been watching the course of public events upon this question for many years, and I must say that I have long since regarded this provision in the British North America Act which provided, or which looked towards remedial legislation in reference to any privilege conceded at Confederation in the matter of education to a minority in any province, as a very unwise provision and one which has, to my own certain knowledge, injured the minority in the province of Prince Edward Island. I remember very well that many people who were not indisposed to meet a reasonable view in the matter of education pointed to that clause and said: We would not mind giving way in the cities and towns, where there are no geographical objections in the way, but don't you see under that part of the British North America Act if we once established separate schools in any place, remedial legislation will come in from Ottawa and we will lose our power, and we must oppose every concession on account of the provisions of the British North America Act. Trouble has arisen in consequence of this : I know it has arisen in Prince Edward Island. We know how that provision in the British North America Act grew up as far as Ontario and Quebec is concerned. There was a legislative union of Ontario and Quebec before confederation and they had provided for dissentient and separate schools in both of these provinces; and as at confederation they were going back as it were to take up political housekeeping on their own account, there was a bargain between the two provinces that the exemptions which had been mutually given should be continued thereafter, and to that, as far as Ontario and Quebec were concerned, there was no very great objection; but when the question came up of extending this provision to vast territories upon which there was a very limited population, and before it was known what the character of that population would be, I confess I saw from the first that when that country would fill up with a population holding distinct views of their own on this question, they would not be bound by the terms originally adopted, and my fears have been verified; and there will be greater trouble over this question in the future. Now, with regard to this matter of disallowance, my hon. friend from Halifax and the hon. gentleman from Ottawa have put forward pretty strongly the idea that the Government of Canada ought to have disallowed these measures; and my hon. friend from Ottawa does so notwithstanding that when in office and when a member of the Federal Government he pursued a very different course himself.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No parallel case.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—The cases may not be exactly parallel; I admit all that; but this much he will admit, that there were almost as strong complaints made from Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick as from Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, quite as strong.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—But there were questions of law involved in both cases, my learned friend will admit that. Therefore the views of Mr. Blake and Mr. Mackenzie as leader of the party, that there should be a decision by a judicial body where passion and prejudice should not come in, were followed. The New Brunswick case and the Prince Edward Island case were not as strong as the Manitoba case, but that could only be found out after a reference had been had. The principle is precisely the same, and the degree of strength between the case of one province and the case of another does not affect the question in the slightest degree. I want to quote the views of a gentleman who is well known by reputation in every part of Canada. I refer to Archbishop Taché. Deeply interested as that venerable prelate is in this question, more probably than any other man in Canada, yet still I want to point out to this honourable House, that he, speaking the words of truth and honesty, and not for a political purpose (for, as the hon. gentleman from Halifax says, he has no preference as far as that is concerned for either party,) but speaking in a calm and dispassionate manner, having this deep interest in the Manitoba School Act, did he say that disallowance is possible? No. Here is what he says:

> After these explanations of the Premier, the motion of Mr. Blake was unanimously voted by both sides of the House, by the right as well as by the left, by the Liberals as well as by the Conservatives, by those who to-day place upon me the responsibility they then assumed, as well as by those who are loyal enough to recognize that the question of disallowance was thus killed in the Commons, I do not know the thoughts of those who voted without speaking, but I know what I thought: what suffering in learning that a fortnight after its arrival at Ottawa, our petition asking for disallowance was paralyzed by the unanimous vote of the Commons of Canada.

That is what Archbishop Taché says, and he adds:

> This circumstance brings me face to face with certain accusations made against me. The most unreasonable is perhaps the one that throws upon me the terrible responsibility of having sacrificed the Manitoba Schools, because I did not obtain the disallowance of the laws of 1890. Among those who made that accusation there are many who voted in favour of Mr. Blake's proposition. By this unanimous vote Parliament made the disallowance morally impossible.

I am surprised that my hon. friend from Halifax, knowing that this resolution of Mr. Blake's had entirely altered the constitutional aspect should cite the Rivers and Streams Bill of Ontario, and say that it was plain sailing and they could have disallowed this Manitoba Act in a moment. Here is Archbishop Taché, an honest and conscientious man, speaking the sentiment of his heart when he says:

> I am forced to say they do not know the first word of the situation, or that they construe it in a strange manner. To be absolutely and candidly sincere I must add that I do not think that there is in Canada an educated man so small minded as to believe that it was possible for me to obtain the disallowance against the vote of the whole Legislature. Enough for such unlawful and unjust accusations and insinuations. It is evident that many of those who speak of the disallowance of the Manitoba School laws are not the ones who desire it. It is not necessary to be very cunning to read between the lines on this subject.

And with regard to that very question of the interference of the Federal Parliament in provincial legislation, I will quote another very eminent authority, one who has long since passed away, but whose name is dear to his compatriots, and I may say to all the people of Canada, for the very important part which he took in building up and founding this great confederation. I refer to Sir George E. Cartier, who said, on the 20th May, 1872, as follows :

If it was admitted that the subject could be dealt with by the Dominion Parliament, it would place the question of education at the mercy of a Parliament of which a majority were Protestants. If this principle was followed the Protestant minority in Quebec might come to this Parliament with a grievance against the Catholic majority of that province. It was a dangerous principle to adopt.

And I think, therefore, on the strength of these eminent authorities, that this House will agree with me that whatever remedy there is for the grave difficulties that exist in Manitoba, it may not, and should not, be found in the disallowance of the Act. The time for disallowance has passed over ; in fact, disallowance was not strongly pressed. The reference which the constitution provided was the remedy which was applied for and a remedy has not been found, I must admit. However, I must not take up very much more of the time of the House in speaking on this subject. The hon. gentleman from Halifax made a reference to the Winnipeg election, which took place not very long ago, and said that the opponent of Mr. Martin in the Winnipeg election was also a supporter of the Manitoba School Act. It is quite possible that Mr. Campbell took that view ; but certainly there is a wide difference between a man who was then in private life, as I presume Mr. Campbell must have been from what my hon. friend has said, expressing his honest convictions upon the question of the schools in Manitoba, and a man like Mr. Martin, who had violated the promises made to the French people of the North-west, and who betrayed them most ignominiously—betrayed them after having secured their confidence.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If there are no other gentlemen who intend speaking on this question, I desire to say a few words. I was in hopes however, after the few pertinent remarks made by my hon. colleague that the motion made by the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface would have been carried without further discussion. However I have no complaint to make, at least I ought not to make any complaint because gentlemen thought proper to exercise the right which every member of this House has to discuss questions particularly of so important a character as this, to rise even after a member of the Government had asked the House whether there were any others who desired to discuss the question and if not he would make a few remarks and close. I repeat I have no right to object to any person addressing the House even after such an intimation, nor should I add anything to what has already been said.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman refers to me. The hon. gentleman will remember that when the Minister of Agriculture made that remark I intimated that there were others to speak, so that he was not taken by surprise.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am quite aware of that fact. My hon. friend asked the question whether any one desired to address the House before entering upon his speech and the remark made by the hon. member for Halifax was while my colleague was speaking, not before he commenced. However, it is not my province to find fault with that, because every member of the House has a right to address it at such time as he thinks proper. I was going to say I should not have addressed the House at all on the subject were it not for the fact that the leader of the Opposition, and also the member for Halifax, tried to fasten upon the party to which I belong certain responsibilities in connection with this question of which certainly they were not guilty. If the question had been discussed in that calm and judicious manner in which it was introduced and followed by most of the gentlemen who spoke, other than these two hon. gentlemen, it might and in all probability would have ended there. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, who has just spoken, has dealt so fully with certain portions of this question that I shall not weary the House with repeating them. He has referred in a much more able and eloquent manner to the different points which he brought under the notice of the House than I could have done, and I shall only continue the argument a little further than he has done in reference to the position taken by both parties on this very important question. The leader of the Opposition and his first lieutenant have laid down the principle that the Government should, under the circumstances, have disallowed both the Manitoba Act and the Ordinance passed by the North-west Territories. That question has been fully dealt with by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island. He has quoted from the opinions of the leader of the party (Mr. Blake) to which these hon. gentlemen belong, showing that they, in order to avoid difficulties and heartburnings which always arise on questions affecting the creed or religion of the people, it should be removed from the political arena as far as possible, by sending all these constitutional questions on which there are differences of opinion, to the court. The hon. leader of the Opposition, I notice, took refuge in the remarks made by the late Sir John Macdonald when he accepted the resolution moved by Mr. Blake. Sir John Macdonald, in taking that position, acted as all constitutional lawyers and all men who understand anything of the constitution which governs this country and governs England and her colonies should. He held that they cannot deprive the executive of the day of any of the powers which are given to them by the constitution under which they govern, and while he accepted that resolution as the solution of what he believed to be a disputable constitutional point, he laid down the principle at the same time that it did not relieve the Government from any responsibilities which would devolve upon it in dealing with questions which he thought interfered with the rights and privileges of the people and affecting the good of the country. That is the position that Sir John Macdonald took, and that every man who knows anything of the provisions of the constitution as it exists in the British Empire must necessarily take. He took precisely the same position when a motion was made in the House of Commons to make all appeals to the Supreme Court a finality. He at once pointed out that under the constitution of the country every subject of Her Majesty, no matter how low or high he might be in society, could not be deprived of the right of an appeal to the foot of the Throne; and for that reason he opposed the motion which was made by Mr. Irving in the House of Commons when he desired to make all decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada a finality. So that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is welcome to all that he can take out of the objection he has taken on that point. As my hon. colleague suggests to me we have not the power to prevent any subject from taking an appeal to the foot of the Throne—it is the right of every subject. Hence in accepting the resolutions of Mr. Blake, Sir John did well from a constitutional standpoint to reserve to the Government of the day the power of disallowance as given by the constitution. The question arises of course as to when that important power should be exercised. When that question comes before the Government, if it should ever come, or before Parliament, it will then be time enough to discuss it. It must have been really amusing to members of this House who have lived long enough in Canada to know the relative positions taken in days gone by, by the two parties on this subject—that is the Conservative party and the Liberal party,—on the much vexed question of separate schools; to me, who have lived long enough to know what has taken place in the past, who has been more or less in politics from his boyhood up, and connected with a body of men who hold strong views on both sides of the question,—for me to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition trying to excuse his late leader, the Premier under whom he acted, and hold him up as a beacon light to those of his own way of thinking and to try and leave an impression on this House that he had been in favour of separate schools, and that he forsooth had given up the opinions which he advocated long, long ago, sound very strange. He did tell us, and he was quite correct in that, that there were certain leaders of the Conservative party—certain Orangemen, to whom he referred and of whom he spoke, I was going to say with a good deal of pleasure, at least to whom he attributed opinions and feelings which were liberal in their character. Trace back the whole school question from its inception long before the hon. gentleman from Ottawa introduced his bill in 1863, and you will find that the Conservative party under Mr. Draper's leadership who was afterwards Chief Justice, of all the parties, if there were any who were entitled to the credit of granting equal rights and privileges to the different religious bodies in this country, should be credited with fair and liberal actions. What the hon. gentleman says is true that the Orange leaders voted with him to amend the separate school law, on different occasions, in days gone by. If the hon. gentleman will look at the division lists of times past, he will see that there was one prominent Orangeman who took exception to separate schools or to giving any privilege to Roman Catholics in that particular, I speak of the late Mr. Ferguson. I hold the division list in my hand. I have that which the hon. gentleman opposite seems to dread so much, a scrap book, with the whole history of the school question in it, and I find that Mr. Ferguson who was a leading Orangeman always took strong ground against separate schools; but did that bind the whole Orange body of Ontario to his views? Then why should the hon. gentleman hold the whole body now and the leaders of it in Ontario or any part of the Dominion to an opinion enunciated by one gentleman in Ontario to-day?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My point was this—that it is very different now from what it was then. There is a difference of thirty years between the two.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Thirty years have elapsed between the time the hon. gentleman referred to and the present time—does that make any difference? There was one gentleman then who took an extreme stand against this bill and that gentleman was an Orangeman. Notwithstanding, he has pointed out that the whole of the leaders of the Orangemen at that date supported him, I have called attention to the fact that to-day there is one gentleman who has asked for the repeal of the separate school system. I say the hon. gentleman has no more right to hold the whole of the Orange body responsible for that gentleman's opinions to-day than he had, or would have had, to hold the whole body responsible for the opinion held by one Orangeman, in similar circumstances, thirty years ago. Now for his benefit and the benefit of this House, if he will turn to the division upon this bill he will find that almost every Liberal led by Mr. Mackenzie, Mr. McKellar, Mr. Biggar and others voted against his bill; while for his information and for the information of the House, and in order that they may know that the Orangemen to whom he referred were liberal in principle and not only in profession, I will read to him the names of nearly every Orangeman in the House in the division list and it will be seen they were on his side—Mr. Anderson, who was grand treasurer, Mr. Benjamin who was grand master, John Hilyard Cameron, afterwards grand master, Mr. Daly the respected father of the present Minister of the Interior, who was also a leading Orangeman. There was John A. Macdonald, I suppose the hon. gentleman knew him—also an Orangeman, Mr. McCann—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think Mr. McCann was.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon—I think I have a better knowledge on that subject than the hon. gentleman has.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I bow to the hon. gentleman's superior knowledge on that point.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Then there was Mr. Powell of Carleton, Mr. Rykert of St. Catharines, Mr. Walsh and Mr. Wilson and two or three others that I might name. I mention this to show that the charge which the hon. gentleman has made was not correct, and that the remarks he made afterwards were not justifiable, because after giving these gentlemen credit for liberality not only by profession and sentiment, but in practice, he coolly told the House, and I think very unfairly, that probably they were political Orangemen. If I were to follow that same line of argument and refer back to the event of 1863 when the hon. gentleman introduced his bill not to establish but to amend the Separate Schools Act, it might not redound to his credit. I find on going into the history of this question that just before the election which was to take place in the old province of Canada that the hon. gentleman allowed his bill to fall through on two occasions.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, it was talked out.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Whether he was influenced by the baneful influences by which he was surrounded I will not say, but I should be sorry to even insinuate that he was actuated by political motives, because I believe him to have been sincere in his desire to obtain for his co-religionists all the privileges he sought to obtain for them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In 1862 it was talked out. Sandfield Macdonald then made a pledge, when Mr. Ferguson and another member said they would not allow the bill to go through, that the following year he would see that the bill was passed.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I remember the circumstances distinctly—I was defeated that year in my election because I refused to give a pledge that I would vote to repeal the hon. gentleman's bill. I was called a "green back" Orangeman by the Liberals, because I took the ground that Roman Catholics of this country had acquired rights and privileges which no British subject should take from them, and because I would not pledge myself in a constituency composed largely of Protestants I was defeated. But why was I defeated? Because there was not one Reformer in the whole riding who cast his vote for me. By making a division, as divisions on questions of this kind can always be created, I was defeated by a tolerably large majority. When I was asked to make the pledge I replied : "This country cannot be governed on the principles that you lay down. If I am never elected in a constituency like this, I will never make the pledges you ask me to make." My hon. friend who sits just behind the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Read) voted, and he is an Orangeman, with the hon. gentleman, and so in fact, did every one, or nearly every one, who holds the views he does. I tell the hon. gentleman this, there is no teaching in that society in the shape of bigotry, and no desire to deprive any man of the rights he holds as a British subject. On the contrary, and I appeal to the hon. gentleman's sense of right and honour, to justify that remark from the fact that every leading man belonging to the Orange society, supported him in obtaining the rights and privileges which he says should be enjoyed by his co-religionists in this country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I referred to the fact for the very purpose of showing that the Orangemen in those days were liberal.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I know the hon. gentleman did, but almost in the same breath, he very ungraciously accused them of being actuated by improper motives in so doing. If I had acted from political motives instead of conscientious convictions, I would have acted in the manner he attributed to the others as being political rather than sincere Protestants in that respect. I have no more to say on that point. I hope the hon. gentleman in his future remarks will not attempt to cast reflections upon gentlemen though they may hold different views on theological questions from himself, and who by their actions have shown that they are just as liberal as he could possibly have been, simply because some one member of the community, shows a different spirit and asks that a different course be taken. I did intend to deal to some extent with the question of disallowance, but the hon. member from Prince Edward Island has done that so well and so fully, that I shall only continue what few remarks I may have to make on this subject by referring to a debate which took place in this House upon the question of referring disputed constitutional points to the courts. When the late Mr. Abbott introduced a bill upon this subject he referred distinctly to its provisions, pointing out that the object in introducing it was to remove these questions from the political arena and throw the responsibility to as great an extent as possible on the courts of this country. He said :

> This is a bill to make several small changes with reference to procedure mainly, but it deals with one very important matter, which is new. It has been a subject of discussion for some time past before the public and in other places, and the government have now endeavoured to embody it in legislation in such a way as to make the suggestion useful. It is with regard to obtaining the opinion of the Supreme Court as to questions touching the constitutionality of provincial legislation and as to other matters which it is important to have defined by the courts. For instance, the appellate jurisdiction which appears to have been given to the Governor in Council by the constitution with reference to separate schools, which is somewhat difficult of construction as it stands. This bill, by one of its clauses, with several subsections, provides for the taking of the opinion of the court upon such questions as these, and the subsections provide for the procedure.

I now return to the remarks made by the leader of the Opposition, the hon. member from Ottawa, in which he says :

> The bill gives very considerably increased powers to the Supreme Court, which, I think, are quite in accordance with the demand that public opinion has been making for some time, and I think the bill itself is a great improvement on the Act.

Now, if I am to draw any deduction, or this House to form any opinion from the expression of the leader of the Opposition, it must be that of a distinct approval of the policy of the Government of that day in enacting a law which would remove from the political arena vexed questions of this kind. The hon. gentleman declares the bill to be a great improvement on the Act as it stood, from the fact that it would relieve the Government of the responsibility which, under the constitution, they had of deciding vexed questions where it was difficult to decide whether they were strictly within the constitution or not. Then, I find the Hon. Mr. Miller made these remarks:

I think the 4th section is the most important in the bill—that repealing the 37th clause of the Act as it now stands. The clause is as follows:—

Important questions of law or fact touching the exercise of the power of disallowance of provincial legislation, or of the appellate jurisdiction as to educational matters vested in the Governor in Council by the British North America Act, 1867, or by any other Act or law, or touching the constitutionality of any legislation of the Parliament of Canada, or touching any other matter with reference to which he sees fit to exercise this power, may be referred by the Governor in Council to the Supreme Court for hearing or consideration, and the court shall thereupon hear and consider the same.

I think that is a very necessary and a very desirable amendment in the law as it now stands. If this amendment had been the law on several occasion when questions of the most exciting characters, in connection with the disallowance of provincial legislation came before the Federal Government, a great deal of the trouble, agitation and bad feelings which were engendered in this country with regard to important legislation on those occasions would have been avoided. It is certainly very desirable that the question of deciding with reference to the allowance or disallowance of provincial legislation should be largely given to a tribunal without a semblance of a partizan character or complexion. For instance, if the question of the disallowance of the Act of the Quebec Legislature in reference to the Jesuits' Estates had been submitted to the Supreme Court instead of to the Minister of Justice and the Government, all the unfortunate excitement which took place with regard to that measure might have been avoided. So on other occasions, and they have been numerous, as we are all aware, since Confederation, of conflicting claims of the Local Legislatures and the Federal Government with regard to the limit of their authority or powers of legislation. I look upon this as a most important change contemplated in the law, and I consider it a very desirable one indeed, and I have no doubt it will receive the unanimous approval of this House.

Then I find the Hon. Mr. Kaulbach dealt with this subject in the same spirit and almost in the same language though probably putting it a little stronger:

As the hon. gentleman from Richmond has said, it is well that the Government are providing a means by which these questions can be disposed of, instead of leaving them to the Government themselves, because the deciding of such questions by the Dominion Executive provokes a great deal of jealousy. The opinion of some prominent member of the Government who may hold strong views on any particular question may predominate or influence the decision of the cabinet upon such questions. I think the Government have acted wisely in relegating all such questions to the Supreme Court, to obtain an expression of opinion that will guide them in any action they may take. For these reasons I think this bill is a very important one, and under its provisions the Government can dispose of a great many questions without irritation that otherwise would create bad feeling between the provinces and the Dominion with regard to provincial rights.

These are the opinions held by members of this House when the bill was under discussion. The measure received the unanimous approval of the Senate, and the first member of this body to express an opinion as to its benefits, was the hon. leader of the Opposition himself; and now he tells the House that questions affecting education—and questions affecting the schools of the country—do not come within the class of subjects which should be relegated to the courts, but that the Government should take the matter in their own hands and disallow such measures at once. I should like to ask in all honesty and sincerity, what would have been the state of feeling in this country if the Government at the time when the agitation was aroused in the province of Quebec, and in my own province more particularly, in reference to the Jesuits Estates Act—had the Government of the day disallowed that measure? That was a question that was strictly within the power and authority of the Quebec legislature. No matter who might have disapproved either of the preamble of that bill or the disposition of the funds, the funds belonged to the province of Quebec, and the legislature of that province had the right to deal with them; but the disposition of these funds was objected to by some parties from prejudice, by others from a belief that the funds of the Jesuits' Estates should not have been divided as they were, and that they should have been allowed to remain just as they were previous to the passage of that Act. What would have been the state of public opinion in the province of Quebec had the Government here taken the responsibility of disallowance? I do not say that I approve of that bill, but I do say this, that I think the preamble was uncalled for and injudicious, and that if it had not been put there for a purpose it certainly would never have appeared. I did not hesitate to take from the very first the broad stand that that bill and the disposition of that money was within the purview of the Provincial Legislature, and that under no consideration would I record my vote or give my advice to have it disallowed. I know what the consequences were in my own constituency afterwards, but when the matter was explained to the electors in cooler moments, they saw that it would have been a fatal error for the Dominion Government to have interfered with that legislation, and so you may apply this reasoning to almost every question affecting the different interests, particularly of an educational or religious character in any of the provinces. The hon. gentleman says, and so does the hon. member for Halifax, that this question should have been disallowed at once without any reference as to its constitutionality or the rights of the province. I disagree with them on this point, and I do it for this reason, that when you consider the character of the question, how it agitates the people, and when you consider the rights of the province to deal with any question within its jurisdiction, you must come to the conclusion that it is dangerous for any government to carry the question of disallowance to too great an extent, and more particularly when it affects burning questions of this kind. In the Quebec conference of 1887, when the Liberal premiers of all the local governments met together to discuss questions affecting the different provinces, what was the fundamental principle of their resolutions? The maintenance of the autonomy of the provinces—and it was from that sprung the agitation against the disallowance of any Act passed by any province—and the principles enunciated in these resolutions, were the principles of the Liberal party to which my hon. friend belongs. Is he upon this, as upon many other occasions, when it does not meet his particular views, willing to repudiate his party for the time being and advocate other opinions and other principles? I must pay the hon. gentleman the credit of saying that from 1860 to 1863, when he introduced this bill regarding separate schools, he had not the baneful influences surrounding him of the Liberal party. He was then allied with men of more liberal and judicious principles. He was then a good follower of the late Sir John Macdonald. He supported Mr. Draper and others of the leading Conservatives. I am sorry to say he has become less tolerant since he has fallen from grace; however, we cannot help these things, and I am quite willing to believe and accredit to him just as much honesty in the course he is pursuing to-day, in repudiating the views of his party, as he possessed at that time, because I know from the very character of the education of the hon. gentleman that he has no sympathy with nineteen-twentieths of the politicians with whom he is associated to-day. But, unfortunately, having left the paths of rectitude which he used to follow, politically I mean, and fallen into the winding and devious paths led by the Grits of this country, he has found it necessary on every important question brought before the House, to repudiate them to the fullest extent. I hope I may be excused if I apply language of Watts:

> "While the lamp holds out to burn
> The vilest sinner may return."

It is just possible that before long he may again find himself in a position where he will not have to repudiate so often those with whom he acts as he has done within the past few years. The hon. gentleman also referred to the position taken by Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Macdougall at the time the Manitoba Act was passed. If he refers to the journal he will find that Mr. Mackenzie voted to strike that clause out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said so.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—He will find that a large number of the Liberal party voted to strike it out. He intimated that I voted with him. That is quite correct. I have always taken my stand on these questions very much in the light of the explanation given by the hon. member for Prince Edward Island. I accept his explanations in these matters as expressing my views. But the leader of the opposition had no right to claim any liberality on a question of that kind for those with whom he has acted the most of his life.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He admitted afterwards he voted wrong on that occasion; he stated that he had changed his views.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I did not doubt that. There are a great many politicians who change their views as soon as they get into power, and it was for that reason I refused positively in my early political days to pledge myself to a course which I knew, should my party obtain power — John Sandfield Macdonald was then in power—they could not carry out; and it is by pursuing a course of that kind in this country at all times that the Conservative party has held sway so long. It is too much the fashion when gentlemen are in opposition to promulgate opinions in resolutions which they place upon the Journal of the House which they ought to know they cannot carry out when in power; and that is just the position Mr. Mackenzie found himself in when he repudiated his former opinions. I remember distinctly when the resolution was moved; there was a nice little by-play which only old politicians could understand. Mr. Blake, who was the power behind the throne, suggested something should be done to secure to the French and the half-breeds and the Catholics of the North-west Territories whatever rights they might have in that province, and then, as if it were a spontaneous effort on his part, and as if it had been sprung upon them, and it was something that they had never thought about, Mr. Mackenzie got up and gracefully accepted the suggestion. He changed his opinion; he was in Parliament; he had the responsibility of Government on his shoulders; and he found he could not do what he attempted to enforce when he was in Opposition. I do not want to weary the House much further; all we have to do in considering questions of this kind, more particularly of a character of such vital importance to the well-being and the peace of the community, is to consider two things—whether it be education or any other question which affects the people generally—to consider how far each province has legislated within the powers which are given to them under the constitution. I do not hesitate to say—and I think it will be affirmed by every member who heard the speech of the hon. member for Prince Edward Island, when he read the objections taken to the Prince Edward Island School Bill and the points of objection which he made were certainly stronger and greater reasons were advanced for the disallowance of that bill, than anything that has been shown to exist in the North-west Territories ordinances.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But the Confederation law was not the same. Prince Edward Island had no special Act; it came in under the general Act.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I do not conceive it necessary that I should be informed of that fact If the doctrine as promulgated here, is to be carried out, it was an interference not only with the Roman Catholic population of Prince Edward Island, but it was compelling them to send their children to a school of which they did not approve; it was compelling them to pay taxes to the support of a school to which they did not conscientiously think they could send their children; and yet the hon. gentleman took precisely the same position that we have taken: It was within their power; it was within their authority, to pass that Act, because they were not bound by any clause in the constitution which had been given them at the time of the union to maintain separate schools, and therefore he assisted, as he told us himself, in giving an opinion to the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Laflamme, not to disallow the Act. There is no evidence to show that in the Ordinance of the North-west Territories they have repealed, or that they have attempted to repeal, the Separate Schools Act. They have, it is true, changed the mode of conducting and managing these schools. How far they were justified as a matter of policy or in the interests of schools to take the position they did, I am not going to argue. The fact that the Government has suggested to the North-west Council the propriety of removing any objection which the minority have and to give authority and power to manage their own schools—rather not to interfere with their management either in the carrying on of their schools or in the books which they should use—is the best evidence of the individual opinion of each member of the Government that they desire to see everything removed from that Ordinance not consistent with the efficiency of the schools, and if it would be possible to do so, all that might give offence to the minority in this country; but what we have to consider, and what I think the hon. gentleman from Ottawa would have to consider, and what he did consider in dealing with the Prince Edward Island Bill, is whether that legislature acted strictly within the constitutional rights they had in passing that Ordinance, and if they did then the question would arise as to whether any Government would be justified in interfering with it. My hon. friend said we should. The same principle exactly prevails in the province of New Brunswick. The Catholics of that province thought that their rights were interfered with; they appealed to the courts. Sir John Macdonald as Minister of Justice reported that the New Brunswick legislators were strictly within the constitution. The Catholics of that province as well as the Protestants in other provinces under the Confederation Act were guaranteed all the rights and privileges that they had by law at the time of Confederation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—By law.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—By law. I said so. Then when the question was tested it was found they were strictly within the constitution. The hon. gentleman raised another point which I did intend to refer to, the words "the law and practice" in the province of Manitoba. Now if we are to accept—and I am not going to give an opinion contrary to the Lords of the Privy Council or any other court whose special duty it is to decide questions of that kind—we must abide by their decision. They have decided that no rights which they had in Manitoba either by law or practice have been interfered with. My hon. friend from Lunenburg said he did not agree with that. There are many others who are not lawyers who disagree just as my hon. friend did, and I am merely pointing out what they decided, and they decided it upon these grounds, that while separate schools existed---I am speaking subject to correction and I think I am correct —that while denominational schools existed in Manitoba at that time they were voluntary schools and no one person was asked to subscribe or to be taxed either for one or the other; and the Lords of the Privy Council say you can go on and do the same thing now. How far that is either equitable or just I am not now discussing.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—But we have to pay for the others just the same.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am aware of that. I wish hon. gentlemen to understand that I am neither justifying nor condemning. I am giving the grounds upon which the Lords of the Privy Council gave their decision; so that the effect of the words "by practice" being inserted in the Manitoba Act or in North-west Territories Act does not affect the general question to the extent to which the hon. leader of the Opposition contended. I know that many have very different views upon that question, but we have to deal with it as we find it on the statute-book, and I say it in all honesty and sincerity that the less we have to do with the disallowance of any Act, no matter what has been done in the past, of the Local Legislatures, which is passed under the constitution under which they are governed and which they have a right to pass, the less we have to do with it the better for the peace and harmony of this country. There are no separate schools in Nova Scotia, in the sense in which we understand it; my hon. friend from Halifax has been on the board of instruction himself for a number of years, and he tells us they never had any trouble. I believe that until within a year or so the schools have been working amicably and have been conducted without any friction in the province of Prince Edward Island and also in New Brunswick, over whose bill so much difficulty arose in Parliament. I believe with a little concession on the part of the community and each class of the people that all these things will soon right themselves in the west as in the east. I shall not detain the House by referring to the attempt made by the two hon. gentlemne to fasten upon the Conservatives of Ontario the desire to repeal their separate schools. In the first place the leaders of the Conservative party and the rank and file of the Conservative party with very few exceptions are not so—shall I use a very strong word —not so stupid as not to know that whatever may be individual views there the constitution of the Government which governs them maintains the rights of the minorities in that province and that there is no power to take them away and no man in his senses, no man but an idiot, would ever suppose that any party could attain sufficient strength in the Commons and Senate of this country to pass an address to the Imperial Parliament asking them to repeal that particular clause of the Confederation Act. No one but a madman would attempt it, and if he did attempt it the result would be ignominious defeat. Hence, my hon. friend, with his new associates in Ontario, need be under no misapprehension or fear; he can go to bed in peace and never allow the question to disturb his mind, as to the action of the Conservative party in Ontario upon that question. I can assure my hon. friend from Halifax that there are no Protestants, not even among the Orangemen of Ontario, who go to bed and look under it to see if there is going to be a Guy Fawkes explosion. Oh, no; we live in peace and happiness in this country with all classes, except where the political agitator interferes, whose desires are to arouse the passions of the people—as your friend from Winnipeg has done, and a former friend of mine politically. We all get along very happily in this country. Some one referred to the kindly feeling which exists in the Lower Provinces, particularly in the province of Quebec, where Protestants are selected to fill offices in a strong Catholic community. I know that and have experienced the same thing in my own county. I can tell him that in the county in which I live, perhaps in one of the strongest Protestant townships there are—they elected a reeve for that municipality for nine successive years, and he was an honest straight-forward Lower Canadian French Catholic Tory; that accounts for his being elected there. I instance that to show that we can live harmoniously in Ontario, no matter how strong our individual opinions may be; that even where the large portion of the community belongs to one religious creed, they do not overlook the worth of those with whom they live and with whom they associate. My hon. friend from Quinté knows well the gentleman to whom I refer; he was held in high esteem; they never asked him whether he went to the Roman Catholic Church or English Church; they knew he was a man of worth and they agreed with him politically and elected him at the head of the municipality for nine years in succession. I could give you other illustrations among those people whom the hon. gentleman thinks go to bed at night and watch to see if there is a Papist under the bed. That does not exist in Ontario, I am afraid he got his information where he got his inspiration when he spoke of the position taken by Mr. Meredith.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. member should not attribute a sentiment to me which I did not utter. I said in western Ontario where people had not associated with Catholics they had those views. My views are the same as those of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is no place in Ontario where there are not people of all classes and all creeds residing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—How is the P.P.A. so strong there?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Because of the reason given by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, and the bigoted agitators, who belong to the hon. gentleman's party.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—My hon. friend will repudiate them also. A P. P. A. candidate has been elected for the local legislature against both the Conservative candidate and the supporter of Mr. Mowat. He is a Liberal and belongs to Mowat, and the mayor of Hamilton, to whom I referred the other day was also a strong supporter of Mr. Mowat, I refer to Mr. Stewart. Not only that, but he is one of the most rabid of the Liberal party that there is in that city and has been for years, and he hopes to be elected either to the Commons or to the Local House under the same auspices. I have no sympathy with that society. I have no sympathy with any society which bands itself together to ostracize any class of the community, and I say when you associate them with the society to which we have referred in this debate, you do a gross injustice to the teaching of those men who belong to the latter society, as has been shown by their action in Parliament, and by the votes and support which they have given for the last 40 years, to principles similar to those the hon. gentleman has enunciated. I congratulate him on the fact that he is now associated with the men who have raised nearly all this discussion. The hon. gentleman himself designated the gentleman who was introduced into the House of Commons, by the leader of the Opposition and who has been taken to the bosom of the Liberal party, as a "trickster." The hon. gentleman from St. Boniface proved beyond peradventure that he deceived the people, that he played the part of—well I won't use any other adjectives. It is not necessary. All I do is to refer you for the answer to the opinions which these two gentlemen have of Mr. Martin who is now a shining light in the Liberal party, and who will no doubt be one of the Opposition leaders' colleagues, should the country ever be so unfortunate as to have them obtain power.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I beg leave to propose the second motion which is on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I doubt if that is in order, because the hon. gentleman said that motion was to stand.

The SPEAKER—The motion which is in the Orders of the Day is carried. I presume this is what the hon. gentleman wants. As to the other motion it is proposed it should stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—When the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface made his first motion I understood him to say that the discussion could be taken upon both motions, and after the passing of this motion which has now been carried, he would then move the other which is set down for to-day. That I think was the understanding, and he has now moved the adoption of the second motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no objection, except that when the motion was called by the Speaker to-day, he said it should stand, and that was presumably passing it over to a future day. There may be some hon. gentlemen who wish to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentleman said "let it stand" on the understanding that the full discussion was to take place on the other.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, copies of all petitions, memorials and correspondence in reference to the appeal made in the name of the Roman Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba, in reference to the School laws of that province;

Also, copies of reports to and Orders in Council in reference to the same;

Also copies of the case submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, respecting aforesaid appeal, including factums and all materials in connection therewith put before the Supreme Court, and of all judgments rendered and answers given by said court on or to the questions referred to them, not already brought down.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 6 o'clock.

RED DEER VALLEY RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) presented the fifth report of the Committee on Standing Orders relating to the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company. He said: In this case the petition was signed by the attorneys of the company, and not by the proper officials, but there is a guarantee that a signed petition will be presented to the House in a short time, and if that petition does not come, of course, the bill can be blocked in the committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There is no recommendation made?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No recommendation yet.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I should like to inquire if this bill is reported. If it is not, there is no recommendation, and it will go no further.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is no recommendation.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Then, there is nothing on which to found a motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand, this bill has been reported on by the Standing Orders Committee without any recommendation, leaving the Senate to deal with it, and I think the hon. member who is in charge of the bill had better make some motion, either to move that the seal be dispensed with, under the circumstances, or make whatever motion he thinks proper.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It would require a recommendation of the committee for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The committee thought they would not make any recommendation. They reported it to the House, for the action of the House. I think the committee might have made some recommendation, but they did not.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think the report is virtually that the Standing Orders have been complied with. I do not see that any motion can be made in the absence of the recommendation of the committee for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the intention of the committee was to kill the bill.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—The committee felt, when the petition was before them, that it was not a petition that should ever have got away from the clerk, and never should have reached the committee. It was not properly signed, and the committee referred it back to the House. Th· committee can suspend the rule of the House with regard to the seal, and then it could go on

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The House could suspend the rule only on notice, or on recommendation of the committee, and the committee has made no recommendation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As I have charge of the bill, I might make this explanation to the House; that the seal of the company and offices of the company are in England, and under a misapprehension, the idea prevailed that the solicitors of the company in Toronto could sign the petition and the petition was presented in that way. Now, it would be rather unfortunate if this bill were blocked at the present stage, because the railway has been under construction during the last season, and a very considerable amount of money has been spent upon it—practically, the work of the whole of last season—and it is simply a technicality, the opinion having prevailed amongst the legal gentlemen who have to do with the company that the time had expired for the construction of the road, and it simply asks for an extension of the time for the necessary expenditure of money, and for a revival of the charter, if necessary. I will, therefore, move that the 37th rule of the House be dispensed with, in so far as the same relates to the petition of the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is out of order

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand the rule could be dispensed with by the unanimous consent of the House. If the House objects to it, I must only give notice. The opinion did prevail in the committee this morning that that requisite should be dispensed with, viz., fastening the seal of the company to the petition.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—You had better give notice, I think.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No harm can arise.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then, I will give notice, in accordance with the motion I have read, that the 37th rule of this House be dispensed with in so far as the same relates to the petition of the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company.

Hon Mr. MILLER—I should like to call the attention of my hon. friend from Calgary to the rule which refers to the motion that he has just made. It is as follows:

17. No motion to suspend, modify or amend any rule or part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule proposed to be suspended, modified or amended, and the purpose of such suspension. But any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate; and the rule proposed to be suspended shall be precisely and distinctly stated; and no motion for the suspension of the rules upon any petition for a private bill shall be in order, unless the same shall have been recommended by the Committee on Standing Orders.

I do not think the motion is in order.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In the absence of any recommendation of the report, I move that the report be referred back to the Committee on Standing Orders.

The motion was agreed to.

PICTOU HARBOUR BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL introduced Bill (F) "An Act further to amend the Acts respecting the Harbour of Pictou in Nova Scotia."

He said : This is simply to quiet the title to a wharf which has been constructed by the harbour commission. The expenses connected with this have been paid by them and they are advised that it is necessary to have a short bill in order to confirm the title in the harbour commission.

The Bill was read the first time.

THE SAFETY OF SHIPS BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL introduced Bill (G) "An Act to amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 77, respecting the safety of ships."

He said : This bill partakes to a certain extent of the character of a consolidation of those acts, merely defining what the West Indies are. Some difficulty has arisen in the past in reference to the wording of the Act and also to provide for deck loads, giving the right to have a deck load of six feet when vessels are trading between the Dominion and the West Indies, but retaining the three feet on all vessels that are carrying lumber or deck loads to England. That is in accordance with the Imperial Act, and if we were to depart from the provisions of that Act and give by statute the right to load higher than that upon vessels' decks, of course they would not be allowed to land, under penalties, in England. When we are in committee I will describe the measure more fully.

The bill was read the first time.

THE BEHRING SEA QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—Before proceding with the Orders of the Day I should like to remind the hon. leader of the House of the question that I asked him last Friday. I should like to know if he is in a position yet to answer it.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I owe the hon. gentleman an apology for having overlooked the question, and I have to thank him for calling my attention to it. I made inquiries as to the statements made in the Imperial Parliament by Mr. Buxton and Mr. Bowles in the discussion of the Behring Sea Bill and find that so far as the seal fishing of this year is concerned, the Government is not aware that there is anything for which compensation could be asked. So far the seal fishing has been carried on without restriction. We have not yet received the text of the bill now before the British House of Commons, and until we do so it is impossible to say whether there may be ground for asking compensation or not. No such claim would be justified under the draft bill which was forwarded for our consideration provided our suggestions for its amendment have been adopted. The Government have received no claims from those interested in the fishing in relation to the bill now before the Imperial Parliament. That is about the way in which the matter stands at the present moment. Of course the House will understand that that does not affect in any way the claims which have been made for seizure in the past.

COMMUTATION OF THE DEATH SENTENCE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, copies of all petitions, or communications to the Governor General, or the Government, or any member thereof, asking for interference with the death sentence passed by Mr. Justice Harrison upon the two Chehalis Indians, Peter and Jack, in November, 1893, for the murder of the late Albert Edward Pittendrigh, in New Westminster, British Columbia, on the 27th October, 1892; of all replies thereto, and all correspondence between any member of the Government and any other person on the subject of commutation of such sentence ; of all reports or recommendations on the said subject by any member of the Government to His Excellency, and of all replies thereto, and of all Orders in Council in anywise bearing upon the subject of the commutation of said death sentence to imprisonment for life.

He said : It is at the instance of a very large number of the most intelligent and influential citizens of British Columbia, and more particularly of New Westminster district and city, that I have brought this matter before the consideration of the House. I say New Westminister City, because it was in that place that the unfortunate young man, Albert Edward Pittendrigh, was murdered on the 27th of October, 1892. The people of New Westminster, as would naturally be supposed, take a deeper interest than others in the circumstances connected with the case. I may say before proceeding any further, that I am one of those who believe that it is only on rare occasions and under exceptional circumstances, the action of the Governor in Council should be questioned or adversely criticised in dealing with the commutation of the death sentence. While I am prepared to make that admission, I also claim that it is only on rare occasions and under extraordinary circumstances that the Department of Justice should recommend the commutation of the death sentence of any prisoner, unless the recommendation emanated from the judge and jury who tried the case ; or unless fresh evidence of an unmistakable character is adduced after the trial. Because taking everything into consideration, hon. gentlemen must know that a judge and a jury, knowing all the circumstances and hearing all the evidence, are the best judges of what the sentence should be. The vast majority of the people of the main land of British Columbia believe that a gross miscarriage of justice has taken place in the case under consideration, and it is in order to carry out their views and to inquire into the facts of the case that I have brought this question before the House. When some of the principal facts in connection with the case are made known, I think the House will come to the same conclusion as the people of British Columbia and hold the same views that I entertain on the subject. To perfectly outline the history of the case, I will say that this young man, only twenty-five years of age, who was murdered in the suburbs of New Westminster in October, 1892, was the son of Captain Pittendrigh, a gentleman who occupied a high position for a number of years in the Imperial Army and served in different parts of the empire, and for his long, valuable and faithful service, and for his heroic acts, his breast is literally covered with medals. Captain Pittendrigh moved to New Westminster nineteen years ago, accompanied by his late son. Since that time he has occupied many positions of trust and responsibility. For several years he was the agent of the Dominion saving bank. Subsequently he became the principal justice of the peace in the city and district of New Westminster, and off and on for several years acted as police magistrate in the city. In addition to filling those positions of trust and responsibility, he is and has been for several years a coroner for the district. As to his son who accompanied his father when only a lad of six or seven years, I have only to say that he was educated in New Westminster and lived in New Westminster city and district from the time that he arrived there until his unfortunate death occurred in 1892, and owing to his kind and generous disposition he became a general favourite. His conduct and bearing were such that he was held in high esteem by all classes in the community, and, different from most young men, especially in the wild west as it has been called, he was not addicted to drink or any other vices that would lower and degrade him in the scale of morality and manhood. Without saying too much, I can speak of my own knowledge, for I knew the lad from the very day he arrived there up to the time of his death, and a more promising and better citizen New Westminster did not possess. As I have said, he was murdered in the suburbs of New Westminster on the 27th October, 1892, by the Indians Peter and Jack, and Peter's wife Mary, happened to be there at the time. Although they were taken in custody, almost caught I may say red-handed in the act, they were not brought to trial until December of the following year—about 13 months afterwards. Their trial extended over a week, and the reason was this : that it was nearly all Indian evidence that was given, and the Indian testimony had to be filtered through an interpeter. After hearing all the evidence, the judge had no hesitation whatever in charging against the prisoners. The jury retired and were only in their room for a very few minutes when they returned and handed in their verdict of guilty, without a recommendation to mercy. Sentence was passed and they were to have suffered the extreme penalty of the law on the 15th January last, but to the astonishment of the people of British Columbia, about a week before that date the sheriff received word from the Department of Justice that their sentences were commuted to imprisonment for life. I need scarcely mention than a wave of indignation passed over the whole country and loud and long and strong were the protestations made against the abuse of executive clemency. They went so far as to call meetings, but cooler heads prevailed on them not to interfere in that way, that no particular good could arise from holding public meetings and passing resolutions condemning the action of the Department of Justice. They were at a loss to understand the reason for this commutation of the sentence. There had been no recommendation made by the jury. There was no recommendation by the judge, no petition circulated to have the death sentence changed, and it came on them like a thunder clap. The first indication that they had for the reason of the change in the sentences was found in the Ottawa Citizen of the 7th January, I will read it for the benefit of the House, and knowing that the Citizen was a paper in the confidence of the Government, as much as it is possible for any paper to be, they took it for granted that the reasons assigned in that issue of the Citizen were those upon which the Government recommended to His Excellency a change of the sentences. The executive reasons are given by the Citizen as follows :

> The principal witness was Peter's wife, on account of whose alleged intimacy with Pittendrigh the shooting took place. She was a klootchman of the Douglas tribe, and the Chehalis witnesses testified that she had confessed to having done the shooting herself. Her friends, however, gave strong evidence against the accused. In consequence of the feud between the two tribes of Indians, it was thought to be more conducive to better state of feeling to exercise mercy rather than make it appear to the one that the lives of their friends were sacrificed, and to the other that their ill-will had been satisfied. The sentence was, therefore, commuted to life imprisonment.

Hon. gentlemen will see that there are two reasons assigned for the commutation of the sentence. The first one is intimacy with the wife of Peter, one of the murderers. I have only to inform this House, and if the hon. Minister of Agriculture has the evidence before him he will bear out what I am about to say, that during that trial the learned counsel who defended the prisoners made only a passing reference to that intimacy. You could not lay a foundation on that, and he rested his case entirely upon proving an alibi. The second reason assigned here is that of a feud between the two tribes, the Chehalis and the Douglas tribe. Now that was news to us out there. There is an old saying that you must go abroad to find news. Nothing of the kind exists, or has existed for the last twenty years that I have been there. They live in perfect peace and harmony, they intermarry, they visit each other, and work together in our fisheries and our sawmills, and in the different industries in which Indian labour is employed in British Columbia, so that there is not a shadow of a foundation for that plea. But supposing that the plea is correct, take it for granted for argument's sake, if it is correct, I ask what condition of things would we have out there in a short time if tribal differences and feuds would be the excuse behind which Indian criminals could shelter themselves? It would not be safe for a white man to go beyond the cities or settlements of that country. We were very much surprised indeed that no stronger and truer reason could be given than this of feuds between two tribes. Now, it may be asked by hon. gentlemen if a feud did not exist between these two tribes, and if the alleged charge of intimacy with the woman Mary was not true, then what was the motive of this murder? What induced those Indians to kill young Pittendrigh? I will inform the House, and it came out at the trial. The Citizen took good care to conceal that and not give it to the public. Two years before this, Albert Edward Pittendrigh, who was in the employ of the Dominion hatchery out there, went to the Harrison River to catch salmon for the purpose of getting ova for the hatchery, and he had several Indians in his employ. Among the number was this man Peter, and through incompetency and insolence he was not only discharged, but young Pittendrigh, losing his temper, cuffed his ears. That I believe firmly was the only reason why his life was sacrificed about a year or a year and a half after that.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—What remedy does the hon. gentleman seek, or is there a remedy against the exercise of the prerogative of clemency or mercy?

Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I am not questioning for a moment the right and prerogative of the Crown, but I am questioning the expediency of the recommendation made to His Excellency the Governor General. That is the point. As I said before, that was the only reason that could be assigned why this promising young man lost his life. Unfortunately, in the past we have had many Indian murders in our province. I am sorry to say that a great number of the murderers have escaped the punishment due their crimes, but when a case was brought home so unmistakably plain as the one I am now discussing, I think that a more unwise course could not have been followed by the Government, for this reason—that in the province of British Columbia the entire population is only 100,000, including Indians, Chinese and white men. Of that number we are credited with 35,000 Indians, or more than one-third of the entire population. The main body of the white population is confined to the cities. The Indians are scattered over our wide domain of over 375,000 square miles, and in many portions of the province there are thousands of Indians for every white man. Had this unwarranted act of clemency been bestowed upon a white man the consequences would not have been so serious, but the very fact of this interference with the due course of the law, I fear, will have a tendency to cause many good and worthy men to lose their lives when away in the fastnesses of British Columbia. In fact a premium is offered for the commission of crime by Indians. We have a good judiciary in the province of British Columbia. We are proud of our judges, and if there is one thing more than another that the people of the Pacific province appreciate it is the administration of justice. I say it here with pride that I believe there is not a portion, not only of the Dominion of Canada, but of the vast empire of which we form a part, where life and property are safer than in British Columbia and where the laws are more faithfully and justly carried out. In the past whatever those in authority promised Indians, was always fulfilled. If we promised to reward them for some meritorious act, we did so; if we promised to punish them for some infraction of the laws the punishment was inflicted, and the consequence was they were brought to respect the laws of the land probably better than any other Indians on the continent. It makes no difference whether a man is white, black, red or yellow, or what his creed or nationality may be, when he is brought to trial before any of our tribunals he can depend upon having justice, nothing more, nothing less, meted out to him. I might read here for the next two or three hours extracts from editorials and letters published in newspapers in New Westminster and Vancouver, bearing out, in much stronger language than I have used, the views that I have expressed to-day. I may say in conclusion, a great many of our people in the Pacific province, whether rightly or wrongly, think that some undue or secret influence was brought to bear on the Department of Justice to commute this sentence. I am loath to believe anything of the kind, but in order to quiet the feeling of a very large majority of the people out there I ask that the recommendations for the change of sentence should be laid before this House that we may know by whom they were made, because it is rather strange that executive clemency should be extended to these wretches without a recommendation from the judge or jury or a public petition to that end. I may say in reply to what has fallen from the hon. gentleman from Toronto, I do not for a moment question the right of the Department of Justice or of the Government to recommend the exercise of the prerogative of mercy to His Excellency the Governor General. I bow to that, but as I said before, I question the policy of recommending such a course. I believe that the less we interfere with the deliberate judgment of judges and juries the better will the laws be observed.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman has taken a very extraordinary course. If he had simply asked for papers relating to the matter, I probably would not have said a word, but when he denounces the Government for unwarranted interposition in this matter before the papers are brought down, he is pre-judging the case and in that he is doing wrong. If he wished to express any opinion he should have waited until the papers were brought down, but to say in advance of the papers being submitted that the Government have done wrong in exercising clemency is, to say the least of it, taking an improper course.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman has moved for the papers relative to the the trial and sentence of the Indians Peter and Jack and commutation of their sentence. The Government have no objection to bring down those papers, but I am sorry that in dealing with the question of the prerogative of clemency, which admittedly is only exercised now on the recommendation of the responsible advisers of the Crown, he has made a charge against the action of the Government. His speech should be followed by a vote of censure upon the Government for having recommended to the Governor General the exercise of the prerogative of mercy.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I hope the hon. gentlemen will excuse me. I am not making a political question of this in any sense of the word. I am not censuring the Government; I am merely expressing the views of the people in New Westminster, in which I concur to a very great extent, as to the expediency of making that recommendation.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman in endeavouring to differ from me agrees perfectly with what I have said, that it is censuring the Government for having recommended the exercise of clemency in this instance. The evidence in the case of Peter and Jack was most unsatisfactory before the judge and the jury. As the hon. gentleman has stated, all the evidence was from the Indians. It was difficult to adduce it before the courts. They had to use interpreters. There were two tribes interested in this trial, the tribe of the two prisoners and the tribe to whom belonged the wife of Peter. The evidence showed that Peter's wife had admitted having shot the white man; on the other side the wife alone gave evidence that it was her husband and his father that had shot the white man. The jury came to the conclusion that Peter and Jack were guilty, and the verdict was entered accordingly without any special recommendation to clemency. The hon. gentleman has stated that in no case should clemency be recommended unless the jury has made a recommendation to that effect.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—I did not go that far.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Very nearly that far, from what the hon. gentleman said. Very often circumstances occur, which are the occasion for exercising clemency. I believe in this case the recommendation was well founded. It occurred, from further evidence that this woman had admitted to several of her friends and relations, that she had shot this white man because he was attempting to have improper intercourse with her. If, on the contrary, the husband shot the man, the motive would appear there that this young man had no right to be where he was on that occasion, for the body was found just a few feet from Peter's tent, a place which was not on the thoroughfare, a place which was out of his proper course, and what is extraordinary, the evidence shows now that the night before this occurred, a friend of young Pittendrigh, called Heron, told him "you had better be on the lookout; if you interfere with Peter's wife, he will shoot you." Now, that is an extraordinary circumstance that will go to show that if Peter shot the white man, he must have had some reasonable provocation at the time. Otherwise, why would this warning have been given to the young man the night before? It has been said that great excitement prevails throughout New Westminster, because this sentence has been commuted. I am surprised that this should be the feeling of the people of New Westminster when a sentence is commuted. The people should not think of holding indignation meetings against the exercise of clemency, but, on the contrary, should lift up their hands and thank God that a judicial murder, perhaps, has not been perpetrated. It has been stated that this case had produced no excitement among the Indians. It is quite the contrary—there was very great excitement between the two tribes.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—I did not say that there was not.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There was very great excitement between the two tribes in relation to this sentence of hanging two Indians for the death of one white man. Of course we all know that those Indians are half civilized—that their notion of what is justice is limited to a certain extent, and that as a rule they are very suspicious. Some few months before a man had shot an Indian on Carroll Street in Vancouver, for which he was sentenced to the penitentiary for 12 years. The Indians in that district and all through there could not understand that a white man for shooting an Indian should only be sent to jail for 12 years and that two Indians should be hanged because one white man had been shot. Undoubtedly, according to their own notions it is eye for eye, man for man, and very likely the Government exercising clemency in this case has saved the life of another white man. They have now less cause of revenge than they might have had before. It was stated that no petitions had been presented to induce the Government to recommend the exercise of clemency. The Indian agent and the Rev. Mr. Tate, a Methodist clergyman in the district, wrote concerning this case and were very much troubled about the consequences, if the death sentence should be executed. I shall refer to the letter sent to the authorities and signed by the Rev. Mr. Tate. I may say that from the information I have, the two Indians that had been sentenced were Catholics, and that the agent who mostly interfered in their behalf, in this instance, was the Methodist clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Tate :

I feel quite troubled about the sentence of Peter and Jack. There was certainly not sufficient evidence to warrant such a verdict and sentence of this kind. The strongest evidence against them was given by Mary, and both judge and jury seem to have overlooked the fact that she was suspected of having done the deed herself. In answer to a telegram, I sent down Mary's little boy, but his evidence was not taken. If these men killed Pittendrigh, it was because he was where he ought not to have been. This question was assiduously avoided on all sides, but the fact of his body being found a few yards from Peter's tent, tells the tale too plainly. If such is the case, I think the sentence ought to be commuted to penitentiary, in fact, it ought, in any case, to await further developments, for the truth will certainly come out. I have almost decided to lay the matter before His Excellency the Governor General. Would Bishop Durieu do anything? What would you advise? It seems terrible to have the poor fellows hung if they are not guilty. Please write me at once, and oblige,

Yours truly,

C. M. TATE.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH--To whom is that addressed?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—To Mr. Devlin, Indian agent at New Westminster, and this document was accompanied with the report upon the case by the Indian agent, showing what was the feeling amongst the tribe, that they did not think that proper justice had been done, stating also the unsatisfactory nature of trial, from the difficulty of obtaining evidence, stating the feuds that existed between the different tribes and the parties interested. It was represented that this was a case to exercise clemency, and the Government came to that conclusion, and made the recommendation to the Governor-General, which he accepted; and I am quite sure that when the papers are brought down and read by hon. members, the House will agree with us that the course followed was the proper one.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Has the hon. Minister the report of the judge under his hand?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, I have not the report of the judge here; it is in another file, but the judge only reports the trial in a very summary manner.

Hon. McINNES (B.C.)—I suppose the Government have no objection to bring down the papers.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS--We will bring them down.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—There are just two points to which I wish to refer. One is as to where the body of Pittendrigh was found. It is stated that it was found at a place within a few yards from Peter's house.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Peter's tent.

McINNIS, (B.C.)—And that he had no right and no business to be there. I have gone up that very path probably 500 times myself. It is between Front street and Columbia street, and there is a small winding path there through shrubbery and Indian tents or houses. There is no regular cross street within a quarter of a mile of it, and I would inform the Minister of Agriculture that the man who found Pittendrigh, probably about 15 or 20 minutes after he was shot, found him lying on that path, so that it is a path which is invariably used. It is probably not more than a foot and a half wide, and winds zigzag up an elevation of something like 75 feet between the Front street and Columbia street, so that there is nothing significant in the statement that the body was found in a place where the murdered man had no right to be. Now, with respect to another case that the hon. gentleman has instanced, that an Indian was shot in Vancouver a month or two before Peter and Jack were placed on their trial for the murder of Pittendrigh, I may say that that occurred on one of the main streets in the city of Vancouver, and the murder or rather manslaughter, because murder must be premeditated, was committed by a man who was a raving maniac from the effects of whiskey. I do not think there is any analogy whatever between the two cases. The jury brought in a verdict of manslaughter in the Vancouver case, but the verdict in the other was murder.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—But the Indians did not appreciate that. They did not find that there was any excuse for shooting an Indian because the man who committed the crime was in whiskey.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I can only say that the Indians in British Columbia are shrewder and understand a great deal more than most people on this side of the Rockies give them credit for. They must have known the difference between the two cases. As far as Mr. Tate is concerned, I know him and have known him ever since he went to that country. He is stationed about 50 miles from New Westminster where this murder took place; and is probably not conversant with all the facts. Had he known them he would not have written to the Indian agent, Mr. Devlin, at New Westminster in the way he did. However, that is just one of the things I want to find out and I want to ascertain who the others were that sent in recommendations to the Indian agent or to the department. I submit with all due deference that those recommendations ought not to have been filtered through an Indian agent. If it was the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the province I would attach a great deal more importance to it, but Mr. Devlin is merely a sub-agent. However, I hope that the Government will in a very short time bring down the return that I have asked for.

The motion was agreed to.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the House adjourns I have to ask the permission of hon. gentlemen to make a personal explanation. When I was addressing the House yesterday on the motion of the hon. member for St. Boniface, I took occasion to state that shortly after Mr. Dalton McCarthy had been at Manitoba, agitating the question of denominational schools there, he made a statement at a public meeting in Toronto to the effect that he had become a supporter of Sir O. Mowat. The accuracy of that statement was called in question by several hon. gentlemen, and I now submit to the House the proof of the statement I then made. I am reading from the Toronto Globe the report of Mr. McCarthy's speech on 30th November, 1892.

> They had seen the great leader of the Reform party in this country, the greatest man whom they had ever produced, denounced by a section of his followers because of his loyalty to the mother country, and because he in the exercise of his right dismissed a man from his office who was speaking treason. He was not one who desired to stifle free thought or free speech, but he did say that if Sir Oliver Mowat had never done anything worse he deserved the confidence of all the loyal men of this country. He, for his part, said to Sir Oliver Mowat that if he had lost the support of Elgin Myers he had gained Dalton McCarthy's support in the future.

The Senate adjourned at 4.35 p.m.

THE HUDSON BAY ROUTE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Niagara) rose to Call the attention of this House to the feasibility and importance of an Ocean route via Hudson's Ba and Hudson's Straits, for the transport to Europe of the cereal products of the northern portion of America, especially those of Manitoba and the North-west Territories of Canada; and inquire of the Government whether they have received any further information on the subject of the navigation of Hudson's Bay and Straits since the report made thereon by the late Lieutenant Gordon, in 1887.

He said:—The subject of this motion is of such vast importance that I will ask you to kindly bear with me for a short time, while I endeavour to present to you some of the evidence that has been adduced from time to time, showing not only the feasibility but the practicability of this line of communication between our great North-west Territories and Liverpool and the markets of the world. I am, from all I have read and can learn, convinced that the Hudson Bay will become to the great North-west what the St. Lawrence has been and is to the great fertile valley which bears its name. That is the reason why I bring the matter up in this House. I may tell you that I have no connection, directly or indirectly, with any scheme or project with reference to that great route. I speak in the interest of the country in which I was born and in which all my hopes and aspirations are centred, and because I am firmly convinced that if we are to become a great country it is by opening up a short and cheap line of communication between our great North-west and the markets of the world. I would ask you for one moment to turn your minds to the geographical position of Hudson Bay, that vast inland sea, half as large as the Mediterranean, lying in the very heart of our continent, halfway between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, the western boundary of it being rather nearer to the Pacific than to the Atlantic. Port Churchill, which according to the testimony of all, is a magnificent harbour, lies four degrees west of the Mississippi River, four degrees west of Minneapolis and St. Paul and St. Louis. It bears the same relation to our great North-west Territory that the Chesapeake Bay would to the United States, if it penetrated 250 miles west of the Mississippi River. Therefore, I am convinced that the Hudson Bay has been placed there for a wise and good purpose, and that purpose is to serve as a means of transport for the products of our great North-west country. If you will direct your mind for a moment to the geography of that country and the position of Hudson Bay, you will see that it must have a very important bearing on the future advancement and development of our North-west. Hudson Bay, as you are probably all aware, lies between the 51st and 64th degrees of latitude. I draw your attention to this, because I intend to refer, before I get through, to what has been done in other countries lying far north of latitude 64. The bay lies between the 79th and the 95th meridians. This vast sea is therefore about 900 miles long and 600 miles wide, with an area of 500,000 square miles, equal in extent to one-sixth of the whole territory of the United States, and one-seventh of the whole of British North America—a peaceful, calm sea, where storms do not prevail, and which is navigable in all its parts, having a uniform depth of from 70 to 200 fathoms of water. It never freezes, only near the shores where the fresh waters come in from the rivers. The waters of the bay are about 14 degrees warmer than those of Lake Superior, the temperature of Hudson Bay being about 52 or 53 degrees. It is surrounded by a country abounding in many varieties of valuable mineral deposits, reports of which have been made by the great Dr. Bell, one of the most distinguished explorers and scientists to-day on the continent of America. I shall also refer to the valuable fisheries to be found there, when I reach that branch of my subject. Hudson Bay is a great basin, into which half a continent drains. It drains the whole of British North America east of the Rocky Mountains and north of the water-shed of the Mississippi and the St. Lawrence, a country extending 2,100 miles from east to west, and about 1,500 miles from north to south. This bay, as I will endeavour to point out, is rich, not only in the minerals abounding in the territories surrounding it, but rich in the depths of its waters as well. I will show you the vast wealth that the New England States are drawing from that sea from year to year. Questions have arisen as to the navigability of Hudson Straits. No such question arises at all with those who are acquainted with it and those who are familiar with ice navigation. Hudson Straits extend five hundred miles from east to west and one hundred to forty-five miles from north to south, the widest part being one hundred and the narrowest forty-five miles. I draw your attention to this particular fact, if your attention has not been directed to the matter before, to show that no great ice jam can ever take place in the straits; from its vast width open water has always been found somewhere in it. These straits are from one hundred and fifty fathoms to, so far as we can learn, about three hundred fathoms deep. On either side of these straits the shore is high, ascending in most places two thousand feet, so that beacons or lights placed there would guide the navigator. As it is, the day there being, except for a short part of the season, in the fall, eighteen and twenty hours long, the twilight remaining the rest of the twenty-four hours, very little artificial light is required; in the summer season there is daylight almost throughout the twenty-four hours. Now, I will refer for a few moments to the evidence produced by those who have been there, by those who have explored and successfully navigated these straits for the last 274 years — navigated these straits with small and ill-constructed craft of only 50 tons burden and with 15 or 20 men. I desire to read the evidence itself, because any assertion I make in this House, might have no weight upon the subject. Sir Thomas Button in the year 1612 said:—

Sir Thos. Button, who commanded the expedition of 1612, in the "Resolution," proceeded through the Strait in June, and reached Digges Island without much hindrance from the ice. He wintered on the west coast of Hudson Bay, and returned through the strait in the summer of 1613 without any difficulty whatever.

Now, remember this date, the 1st June, because some of our weaker hearted men say you cannot get in there until the 15th July. The most experienced will tell you that you can get through the straits in June. You will find that Wm. Baffin got in on the 1st July. Captain Hawkridge in 1619 encountered no difficulties in reaching Hudson Bay by way of Hudson Straits. Capt. Luke Fox in 1631, gives a description of the ice there, which is perhaps too long to read; Fox had little difficulty in passing through the straits into Hudson Bay by the 21st of July. The return voyage during October, was still more favourable; he encountered no obstacles whatever and he was off Resolution Island, which is at the outer portion of Hudson Straits, on the 31st October. I call your attention to this date because I think I will be able to establish that even in the month of November there is good navigation through these straits by well-equipped vessels. If you go on you will find that Capt. Middleton in 1741 visited Hudson Bay:

The next important expedition was that commanded by Capt. Middleton, which left England in 1741; and this was followed by another, under Capt. Moor, in 1746. Middleton passed through the Hudson Straits without difficulty, and although Moor was baffled by pack ice for several days, he succeeded in making the passage early in the season. Mr. Wales, who was sent out by the Royal Society in 1768, also passed the strait with ease. In fact, he was only nine days in going through, during which time he met with no ice to interfere with the progress of the ship, although he was delayed by contrary winds and calms.

I wish to call attention to the fact that nearly all the delays which have occurred in Hudson Bay have been occasioned by calms and contrary winds, and not by ice. During the whole of the 18th century the Hudson Bay Company sent their ships as regularly as the seasons came, one or two every year, to ports on the Hudson Bay. If they had required to send 100 ships to carry their freight out of that country, their trips could have been made with equal regularity, but the cargoes consisted of valuable furs and one or two ships could carry out all that the company had to send. During the whole of the 18th century these ships were carrying out the most valuable cargoes, and so secure was the passage that the company did not deem it necessary to insure their vessels. During the whole of that century not a solitary ship was injured or lost in Hudson Straits. Two or three were lost during that period in Hudson Bay itself, and since then two or three have been lost in the bay because of bad navigation. They did not keep far enough from the shore and were wrecked. I come now to the expeditions of Sir Edward Parry in 1821-23; of Capt. Lyon in 1824 and of Sir Geo. Back in 1836:

The events of these memorable voyages are well known, and are indeed matters of history. Parry encountered much ice at the entrance of Hudson Strait on the outward voyage, and nearly the whole month of July was occupied in getting through it. But the delay was occasioned as much by adverse winds and calms as by the ice. On July 21st Parry wrote: "Bodies of ice became less and less numerous as we advanced up the strait from Resolution Island, and no ice was seen after we had proceeded a few leagues beyond the Upper Savage Islands." On the 25th he reported the sea almost free from ice, and on the 27th and 28th "ice in great quantities, but the pieces so loose as easily to allow the passage of a ship with a free wind. This ice was so honeycombed, and rotten, that it appeared in a fair way of being dissolved in the course of a few weeks." That was, in all probability, ice that had drifted through Fox's Channel. The weather was on the whole fine and clear, only four foggy days being recorded during the month of July. During the return voyage in September, 1823, Parry was only five days passing through the strait, during which time no ice whatever was to be seen.

If these ships, depending on wind and tide, and the elements to propel them, could make their way through Hudson Straits for two and a half centuries, I want to know why to-day it is considered dangerous and impracticable to navigate these straits with the great improvements in naval architecture and increased knowledge of tides, and winds, and ocean currents? Com. Markham, as you are aware, went through the straits with Lieut. Gordon, and I will read what he says on that subject. In the first place the "Alert," which was used by Lieut. Gordon that year, was too weak in steam power, and was too small and unfit for the service. She had only about fifty horse power, and was perfectly useless in the ice. Com. Markham says:

Through some mismanagement or want of experience in ice navigation on the part of those who were occasionally intrusted with the charge of the ship, she was allowed to be beset by the ice. No advantage appears to have been taken of her steam power to extricate her.

I could read you evidence by the half hour to show that the most experienced navigators are of opinion that these straits are navigable. Now, with regard to the ice, the Esquimo who have lived there so long, bear testimony to the fact that ice never forms on the straits until December and up to that time every year the straits are open. We have now Commander Markham's testimony with regard to this. I will read you a few extracts from his report to show that he was of the opinion that Hudson Straits were navigable:

Steam has made a great revolution in ice navigation. A well-found steamer is able to make her way with ease through the ice in Hudson Straits in June and July, when a sailing ship would be hopelessly beset, and incapable of pushing on.

On the 5th July, we reached the entrance of Hudson Straits, where we were detained for some days, partly by thick weather, and partly by loose streams of ice; but the latter was never packed sufficiently close to prevent even a slow steamer like the "Alert" making fairly good progress. From the 9th to the 11th July scarcely any ice was seen, and a distance of 200 miles was accomplished in about 36 hours. This fact alone, without further evidence is in itself sufficient to show how free the eastern part of the straits was from ice; for the "Alert" if driven at her full speed could only steam about six knots an hour, Steam has now effected a complete revolution in ice navigation, and the most advantageous time for pushing on is when the ice is loose. Under similar circumstances, a sailing ship would be utterly hopeless. It is, therefore, only reasonable to infer that what has been performed regularly, and, year after year, by sailing ships, can be accomplished with greater regularity, and certainty by well-built steamers, specially constructed for ice navigation, and provided with powerful machinery.

He puts the open season at from three and a half to four months. I can also quote from the report of the Geographical Society in England where they take a very strong and deep interest in this subject, but these reports are all before you and I shall not weary the House by reading any more on the subject. Lieutenant Gordon speaks of the value of the fisheries in that region. He says that a very large trade is being done in fish by the New England fishermen. I have in my hands a petition sent to me by the Geographical Society of the province of Quebec. It is addressed to the Minister of the Interior and calls attention to the value of these fisheries in Hudson Bay. The petition says:

Whereas, from the rather imperfect and incomplete information obtained concerning that section of the Dominion, it is known that the bay is possessed of fisheries which are considered as being on a par with those of the Gulf of St. Lawrence;

Whereas, the said fisheries are reported to have been practically monopolized by foreigners, without any hindrance whatever, for nearly half a century;

Whereas, according to the report of the Commissioner of Fisheries of the United States for the year 1875-1876, American whalers hailing principally from the states of Massachusetts and Connecticut, have made not less than fifty round trips to the Hudson Bay, and have taken thence cargoes of fish and fish products valued at $1,371,000, at least, or an average of $27,420 per trip, per vessel, during a period of eleven years preceding 1874.

According to this estimate, there has been this large quantity of fish taken out of these waters by the whalers and fishermen of the United States. Doctor Bell in his report to Parliament, speaks of the period of navigation in the straits as being four and a half months:

From all the evidence that can be collected on this subject, from the days of the Danish captain, John Monck, who wintered at Churchill in 1619-20, up to the present time, the author is induced to believe that Hudson Bay Strait and Bay can be navigated by steamers, and the harbours entered during an average of four and a half months of the year. Annual records of the opening and closing of the Albany, Hayes and Nelson Rivers, extending over periods of fifty years and upwards, show that these streams are open for an average of at least six months each year.

The most experienced and intelligent of the American whaling masters who have navigated the Straits say that during the summer and autumn months, at any rate, should drift ice occur in these parts, open water suitable for the passage of steamers can always be found between it and bold shores.

Messrs. Job Bros. & Co., of St. John, Nfld., say :

There is no doubt of the practicability of navigating the straits and bay with proper steamers during the five months from June to October inclusive. This, with the time necessary for making the first outward ocean passage in the spring and the last homeward passage in the autumn, would represent nearly six months of navigation. The Hudson Bay route will thus bear comparison with that of the St. Lawrence, which is, perhaps, equally troubled with ice in the spring and fall.

It would be well to bear in mind the fact that it is to the interest of those who are trading in that part of the country to keep the people of Canada in the dark with regard to the practicability of navigating the straits. We all know what has been done in the past by the Hudson Bay Company to keep our people in ignorance of the value of the North-west Territories. The evidence with regard to the Hudson Straits and Bay is drawn from unwilling witnesses. The fishermen of New England have no interest in telling us that the straits are open for navigation for a considerable period of the year, and that the waters of Hudson Bay abound with fish, yet Capt. Jacob Tabor of New Bedford, says :

The entrance to the bay can be made from the 1st to the 15th of July. Steamers would have great advantages over sailing vessels, as they could steam inside of all obstructions from ice, water being bold close in shore, tides strong, say six to seven miles, but quite regular. No trouble about coming out up to November 1st, and some seasons later. Nearly all the danger from ice at that time would be outside Resolution Island. The ice comes down from the north and sometimes grounds to the south, and there piles up to the north until it closes the mouth of the straits. Hudson Bay is open all winter, and what little ice makes on the shore, breaks up with every gale of wind. About thirty feet rise and fall of the tide (in the straits and northern part of the bay), and currents are swift.

Remarks by Captain St. Clair, ship "A. Horton," of New Bedford :

June 13th, 1877, entered into the bay. Came out September 15th to 25th, 1878. Captain St. Clair had lost all his memoranda and log books, but was of the opinion that a steamer could go in by July 1st and come out as late as in 1878, in which year the ice did not make its appearance until November 12th.

Remarks by Captain Elnathan B. Fisher, who made eight voyages to Hudson Bay, covering some sixteen years :

A steamship can enter and go through the straits some ten days sooner than a sailing vessel, say by 1st July, and might some seasons sooner. Whalemen never had any trouble in coming out, as they leave as soon as the summer whaling is over, and are always out by November 1st. Ships do come from Cumberland Inlet later than that, and it is somewhat further north. The only trouble is in Hudson Strait, and that is caused by the ice coming down from Fox Channel and lodging among the islands in the straits, blocking up the narrowest part, which is about midway of its length.

A steamer could "crawl" out by keeping close to the rocks inside of the ice, as there is always open water more or less between the rocks and the great body of ice. The tide runs six or seven miles an hour, and at every turn of the same, more or less breaking up occurs, and a steamer could take advantage of all such changes, where a sailing vessel would be at a standstill if the wind was ahead and blew any way fresh. The bay is open all winter, except a little ice that makes near the shore, and that breaks up in every gale of wind. It was never very cold where we wintered, in a small harbour to the north-west.

Captain E. White, of New London, made two voyages into Hudson Bay, and one to Cumberland Inlet, and I should say was a very intelligent man on ice navigation :

On second voyage, July 4th, 1864, sighted Resolution Island. August 1st the ship was inside, but became somewhat damaged by the ice. A sailing ship has got a poor chance going in and out. With a good strong steamer one could enter the bay sure every year from July 1st to 10th; and he thinks she could count on three months sure of such navigation, that she could pass in and out.

Captain Clisby, of New London, Connecticut, who has had fourteen years' experience in those waters : Four months, and often five.

Captain William Kennedy, who accompanied an expedition in search of the remains of Sir John Franklin, and who has had eight years' experience of the Straits : From June to November.

Mr. William A. Archibald, for many years in the service of the Hudson Bay Company at Moose Factory : From June to December.

Captain William Hackland, in the Hudson Bay Company service for 39 years : Straits never freeze; no reason why steamships should not navigate at any time.

The Canadian Government sent three expeditions to the straits and bay, 1884-85-86, under command of Lieut. Gordon, in all of whose reports the period of free navigation is placed at four months.

Captain J. J. Barry, the first officer in each of the expeditions, thinks ocean steamships can enter as early as June, and can certainly come out as late as December.

Mr. W. A. Ashe, Superintendent of the Quebec Observatory, the officer in charge of the north coast of the straits, from August, 1884, to September, 1885, says the straits are navigable from 4½ to 6½ months, varying according to the class of ship.

Mr. C. R. Tuttle, secretary to the first year's expedition, places the period of navigation at eight months.

Mr. William J. Rynner, an officer who accompanied the three expeditions : From June to December.

Mr. J. D. Beaton, who made the round voyage with the expedition of 1885, reported the straits navigable from May to December.

Admiral Markham, R. N., an experienced Arctic navigator, accompanied the expedition of 1886: He reports, "I believe the straits will be found navigable for at least four months of every year, and often five or more. There will, I have no doubt, be many years when navigation can be carried out safely, from the first of June until the end of November."

Captain John Macpherson, of Stepney, London, as first officer and captain in the service of the Hudson Bay Company, made voyages from London and Stromness to Hudson Bay, and returned annually for twenty years says : "There is no reason why steamships could not make the passage of the straits as early as the first of June, and come as late as the middle of November."

From 1719 to 1748 the Hudson Bay Company sent from two to four vessels per year to the bay. In those days the navigation of the straits was considered perfectly safe and comparatively easy by those men. I think men had stouter hearts in those days than have the men of the present day who speak against the route. The navies of France and England have fought battles in Hudson Bay. In 1782 the French Admiral La Perouse sailed in with three battle ships, one carrying 76 guns and two carrying 36 guns each, and dismantled Fort Prince of Wales. In 1847, 1848, and 1849 the British Government sent troops there from England and Quebec. Lord Selkirk brought all his people in the early settlement of the Red River country by that route. They went through the straits with small schooners, with which people would not now navigate Lake Ontario, and strange to say scarcely the loss of a vessel in Hudson Bay, with the exception of the four I have spoken of, during 150 years has been recorded. Henry Lefroy who was president of the geographical section of the British Association, says this :

Churchill Harbour will undoubtedly be the shipping port for the agricultural products of the North-west Territories, and the route by which immigrants will enter that country.

The Deputy Minister of Marine, Mr. Smith, says that Port Churchill is a magnificent harbour, as good a harbour almost as there is to be found on the Atlantic coast. Dr. Bell says the same thing, and so do others; the testimony of all witnesses on this subject is to the effect that Hudson Bay and Straits are navigable. Some put the season as low as three months, others put it at five or six ; others say the straits are open all winter. Dr. Bell, who has been six seasons around that bay, and also made three trips through Hudson Straits on the Hudson Bay Company's vessels, and those who have lived at Port Churchill and those who have been there, say that Hudson Bay at Port Churchill freezes over at the entrance to the harbour only and not more than half a mile from shore, and this not earlier than the 1st of November, and that the ice could be easily broken. The advantage of that port is this: that the moment you are outside you are not in a river like the St. Lawrence with hundreds of miles of river navigation, but in the open sea and you are never troubled with ice. I think that our inland sea is bound to create a great revolution in the North-west. If we could establish that route and show the people of the world that agriculture can be carried on profitably in that country, there would be no need of any more emigration agents; all you want is to show the world that capital can be profitably invested in this country, and capital, labour and emigrants will pour in there without solicitation. One hundred and fifty years ago the Gulf of St. Lawrence was considered more impracticable for navigation than Hudson Bay is to-day; that was the testimony of nearly all who wrote on the subject. Capt. Vaunton in 1716 wrote that "of all known countries the navigation of the Gulf of St. Lawrence is the most difficult and treacherous." The number of shipwrecks in that gulf is perhaps better known to many of you than to me, but I have taken the trouble of looking up a few of the shipwrecks which occurred in former years when the navigation of the Gulf of St. Lawrence was about as little understood as that of Hudson Bay is to-day, and I find that the percentage of shipwrecks was greater in the Gulf of St. Lawrence than in Hudson Bay. In 1690 Sir William Phipps, after an unsuccessful attack on Quebec on his way home, lost nine of his ships; in 1694 "Le Carvasel," a French ship, was lost; in 1711 Sir H. Walker, after that celebrated and historical event, on his return from attacking Quebec, lost eight of his transport ships on Egg Island. In 1725 Captain Baton lost one frigate and three sloops, and the loss of the "Chameau," two miles from Louisburg, took place; in 1729, "L'Eléphant," a French ship, was lost; and so on. In 1776 "L'August" was lost; in 1736 "La Renanmio" was lost; in 1738, at Mackerel Point, the "Colborne" was wrecked, and during the whole of this time the navigation of the straits was going on, ships passing in and out of the bay, and in the Hudson Bay Company's reports we have no record of any loss of life whatever. It is easily seen, if one's attention is directed to it, that if a fog should prevail in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, there is danger that ships may run upon rocks and strike heavy ice floes that are carried down the St. Lawrence as late as the month of June. The Arctic current coming from the Arctic Ocean down through Davis Strait past the entrance of Hudson Straits flows down by the Straits of Belle Isle. This ice does not dissolve to any appreciable extent, the water off the Labrador coast being (according to the testimony of those who have tested from time to time) about 32° temperature. Hence as much obstruction exists on account of ice at the Strait of Belle Isle as at Hudson Strait. Besides this, you have greater fogs at the former than at the latter. The reason of this is that as you approach the meeting of the warm Gulf Stream and the Arctic current off Newfoundland, the stratum of warm air overlying the former laden with vapour comes in contact with the stratum of cold air overlying the latter, and condenses the vapour into fog. Just as much ice passes the Straits of Belle Isle as passes the Hudson Straits, but the dangers are greater at the entrance of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, because greater fog prevails. Now, there are very few storms in Hudson Straits, and very few storms at all in Hudson Bay. Why is it you have few storms there? I account for it from this fact: that Hudson Bay is far removed from the great storm king of the Atlantic, which is the Gulf Stream. Hudson Straits are far from the Gulf Stream; and that is the reason you have few storms in either Hudson Straits or Hudson Bay. I believe that the navigation of Hudson Straits will yet be considered as safe as the navigation of the Straits of Belle Isle. The St. Lawrence 150 years ago was considered almost an impracticable route; but what has been done by the efforts of our Canadian Government during these years? By putting up lighthouses and danger signals everywhere, they have overcome all the difficulties of navigating the St. Lawrence, and to-day the Gulf of St. Lawrence is about as safe for good ships as any gulf in any part of the world. The Allan Company have lost many vessels in the St. Lawrence River, yet nobody is afraid to navigate the St. Lawrence. You will find that insurance companies—and I have investigated it—will insure vessels as cheaply to Hudson Bay as they would to Quebec through the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at as low a rate as to any other port in the world, because the experience of the last two centuries and a half has shown them that there is very little danger in navigating these straits. Let me direct your attention to what other countries have done with regard to their navigation and to carrying on trade, even within the Arctic circle. Look at what Russia has done, the trouble she has taken to reach her port of Archangel. The route to that port lies between 61 degrees and 71 degrees north latitude: to pass through Hudson Straits, you have only to go as far north as 62 degrees. The greater part of the route to Archangel lies within the Arctic circle. All around is desolate and sterile, of course, as it is in all northern countries, but in the southern portion of that territory, as far north as the 61st degree north latitude, excellent cattle are raised and potatoes grown. In 1874 the exports of Archangel, which were mostly sent to England, amounted to no less than £1,234,390 sterling: 284 ships, of which 62 were steamers and 220 coasting vessels, entered and cleared at Archangel that year, though the harbour is only open from June until October. In Archangel the longest day is 21 hours, which enables them to navigate with safety. The day in the Hudson Straits is not quite so long, but almost as long as it is in Archangel. Now, take Siberia; not including Central Asia, the population of that country is 4,313,680. The whole trade of the country to which I am now referring—a portion of Northern Siberia—has reached the Arctic Ocean, through the mouth of the Obi River, the Gulf of Kara, which lies as far as 73 degrees north. On looking at the map, you will see that all the great rivers of Siberia east of the Ural range and north of the Altai range, running through Turkestan to the sea of Okhotsk, pour into the Arctic Ocean, and the trade of that country has gone out to the Arctic Ocean as far north as the 72nd and 73rd degrees of latitude, and has found its way to England, and the markets of the world by that route. The population lying north of 58 degrees north latitude was 3,968,609 ; in towns there were 345,471 ; population of Central Asia or southern Siberia, 4,675,267 ; in towns 651,831, ; population of Finland, 1,984,801 ; in towns 191,620. In the Obi River, about which I was speaking, and Kara Sea, all within the Arctic circle, and as far north as 75 degrees, we find 134 steamers, and 240 barges, representing a tonnage of 40,000, or a capacity of 1,320,000 bushels of wheat, plying annually down the Obi River, carrying the trade of that country to the Arctic Ocean, in order to reach the markets of the world, and they are doing it with comparative safety. Speaking of the Gulf Stream, you will find that the Arctic current sets into the Kara Sea, east of Nova Zembla, just the same as it sets south through Davis Straits, and no advantage can be derived from any warm current to the ocean, with regard to the navigation of these seas and rivers. The Russian Government, I may add, is constructing a line of railway 2,200 miles in length from the Japan Sea on the south east of Eastern Siberia, away North-west of the mouth of the Yenisei, lying in 74 degrees north latitude, for the purpose of carrying the trade of Eastern Siberia to the Arctic Ocean, to get the products of Eastern Siberia from Russia to the markets of the world in that way. They are to-day carrying the rails for that railway round by the Arctic Ocean to the mouth of the Yenisei River. I feel satisfied that what Russians are doing Canadians and Englishmen can accomplish, and in opening up this great Hudson Bay route we will have, without doubt, the assistance of the mother country —for this reason, that if ever it should be necessary for her to send troops to the far east she need not send them through the Suez Canal or by any other foreign route. She can send them through our territories to Vancouver, and from Vancouver to the east by a route a thousand miles shorter than by any other route that is open now. I will leave the question of Arctic navigation, but let me invite your attention to a few of the products exported by Russia which ought to be and can be profitably raised in our North-west so that we will reduce the volume and weight while increasing the value of the freights to be removed from that country. The number of vessels in 1890 that went back and forth between the White Sea and the ocean amounted to 596,156 tons and the number of vessels that cleared was 582. Now this is a port that is only open from June to October, whereas the evidence which we have from all sources is that our route is open at least from the 1st July to the 1st November, and with good steamers I believe all through the month of June. The southernmost part of the White Sea is 65 degrees north latitude and the vessels have to pass to the 72nd degree of north latitude. I grant you the Gulf Stream moderates the temperature there, but while it does so, it increases the storms caused by the meeting of the cold water of the Arctic Ocean with the warm water of the Gulf Stream and makes navigation much more difficult than it otherwise would be. I will just draw your attention to a few of these exports from the northern part of Russia. In 1890 Russia exported no less than 95,000,000 dozens of eggs, a product which can well be raised in our North-west, valued at $7,000,000. Of preserved eggs, $222,000 worth, making of eggs alone, $7,222,000 worth. Flax, $34,-000,000 worth, and a large portion of this came from Archangel. Hemp, a great portion of it from Northern Russia, $10,000,000 worth. The total exports of these commodities alone reached the enormous figure of $51,220,000. Of raw petroleum or naphtha, in 1890 Russia exported 2,672,320 lbs. ; oil for lighting, 962,416,000 lbs.; oil for greasing, 97,616,960lbs. ; waste, 159,398,-000 lbs. ; total, 1,121,103,280 lbs. All these articles can be profitably produced in our North-west and could be carried out of the country by rail perhaps as well as any other way, but certainly they can be produced in that country. The advantages to be derived from this route are so great that immediate efforts should be put forth by the Canadian Government for the purpose at least of finding out whether it is feasible and practicable. All the evidence so far shows that it is, and I think what I have read of it is conclusive. I have only read a small portion, but the testimony of every one and the experience of 250 years teach us that the route is practicable and feasible, and with lighthouses and bell-buoys and other improvements which navigation requires the season of navigation could be prolonged very much. The right class of vessels would be constructed and the season of navigation so lengthened that the great trade of the North-west would be done by that route. Now let me give you a few of the distances that I have marked here between the ports of Europe and parts of the interior of this country :—

So we would have, by opening up this route, a means of transporting the agricultural and other products of our great North-west to the markets of Europe, effecting a saving of some 1,031 miles of land carriage, which, you all know, is very expensive. Not only would it carry the products of our own country, but it would carry the products of Minnesota, Dakota, and others of the north-western States, because it would shorten the distance very nearly as much for them as for us. There are immense petroleum fields in the North-west, which are of great importance. Russia exports very large quantities of petroleum to the markets of the world, as I have shown. We have large petroleum areas, and I find that they are within 350 miles of Port Churchill, so that if we could only open up that route, it would be of great advantage to the country. I do not believe, as some do, that the opening up of this route will be a disadvantage to any existing line, nor do I think it will be any disadvantage to the eastern provinces. All you want is to put people in that country; without people no line of railway can continue for any great length of time to be successful. No line can exist in Canada unless it pays expenses at least. The Canadian Pacific Railway is doing it and no doubt under the magnificent management they have they will do it for a long time to come. Even the Canadian Pacific Railway, in which we all have so great an interest, which we are all so proud of, to which we all wish the greatest possible success, would profit by the rapid settlement of that country, the increase of local traffic and the increased inter-provincial trade that would arise. It would be of more advantage to the Canadian Pacific Railway than to any other line. If we had five millions of people in the North-west, no one line or two lines of railway could carry the products of that country out. The productiveness of the soil in the North-west is so much greater than in the older sections of Canada that it would require increased facilities to carry out the products of the country to the seaboard, so that the Canadian Pacific Railway would have as much to do then as now, and would do its business at a much greater profit. Nor do I think it would be any disadvantage to the older provinces. I believe it would increase the trade of Montreal, Quebec, and the maritime provinces because these people then would furnish a market for us. We would become the manufacturing centre and produce for the requirements of the population in the North-west, so I am satisfied that every portion of Canada, from Vancouver to Halifax, would benefit by putting a large number of people into that country. As I said before, you require no emigration agents or societies. If you can show the people of the world that capital can be profitably invested in that country it will go there. If you can show that capital can be profitably invested in developing the petroleum fields in that country, people will go there. I have always looked upon emigration agents as being of no use to any country. It is a great expenditure of money with no results. There is no use of putting people into any country unless you can show them that it is not only a good climate but that they can live there with profit and advantage to themselves. As soon as you show them that, you require no emigration agents and no donation or appropriation made by Parliament to encourage settlement. Put that appropriation that you make from year to year for emigration purposes into capital and invest it in having Hudson Bay and Hudson Straits properly surveyed and charts made showing the world that it is a feasible and practicable route, and you will find that it will become an important line of communication between our great North-west and the markets of the world. I have detained you too long; my apology is that from all I can learn and read I am filled with the importance of this subject. I may not live to see the day, but I hope to live to see the time that the Hudson Bay route will be opened up. I do not think the time is many years distant when you will find the great heavy trade of the North-west passing through Hudson Bay and Straits to Liverpool and the markets of the world.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I sympathize fully with the position taken by the hon. Senator. There can be no doubt that, looking on the map of the world, the fact that Hudson Bay reaches far into the heart of the continent, must make it a very attractive subject to every commercial man and in saying the few words which I propose to address to the House, I would disclaim at once and in advance the slightest jealousy on the part of any eastern man or any one interested in the St. Lawrence route as regards the proposed navigation of Hudson Bay as a means of developing the North-west. If I do not fully share my hon. friend's couleur de rose views in every respect, I am substantially with him in this, that if it can be proved that the navigation of Hudson Bay is commercially possible it would be a very great thing for the North-west, and I for one would hail it as a great thing for the whole of us in Canada. But unfortunately, while it is in the power of our Government and in the power of our Parliament to subsidize communication between all parts of the North-west and Port Churchill on Hudson Bay, it is not in the power of either the one or the other to control the physical fact which we have to encounter in emerging from Hudson Bay into the great Atlantic Ocean. I am encouraged to take the liberty of speaking on this subject without previous consideration of it, especially at this moment, because, attracted by the very facts which have been so ably laid before you to-day, I was one of a band of adventurers who took up this subject fully ten or twelve years ago. We surveyed the country from Winnipeg to Port Churchill for a railway, we procured from the Government a grant of land necessary for the formation of a port at Fort Churchill. In the course of that inquiry I obtained all the evidence which has been so well put before you to-day, and notwithstanding all the facts that were laid before us, there was an element of doubt which paralyzed our action at the critical point and finally induced my confederates and myself to abandon the project. We were never organized, but we paid our money to investigate the matter, and we are out of that money yet. The result of our investigation was to produce a rather lukewarm feeling with regard to the commercial prospects of the enterprise, and we decided to stand aside and let others take up the project. The fact that Hudson Bay and Straits have been navigated, impresses my hon. friend as it impressed me, but it really goes a great deal short of convincing me that commercially that route could be a success. I may be mistaken, and this I will say, that if that can be established there is no man in this Senate or in this Dominion who will hail the fact with greater joy than I myself will. You may have noticed, as I did, that occasionally the hon. senator proved a little too much. In one part of his speech he claimed that Hudson Straits were entirely free from ice for a very long time; and if you will notice the evidence which he produced on that point—

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I said at certain seasons of the year.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Yes, for a period of from three to five months.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In all the outward voyages of these vessels none were detained by ice in September and October, and most of them found the straits comparatively clear of ice.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The information which I obtained was to this effect, that at a comparatively early period of the year the straits were filled with ice for 150 to 200 miles. Shortly after that, with the advance of summer, the northern ice descended from the inlets and practically the whole of the strait was covered with floating ice of enormous strength and thickness, and then at a subsequent period the strait cleared itself once more and the navigation into the bay was all that could be wished for. It has been proved beyond all question that Hudson Straits have been navigated for a very long period by vessels, yet it does not carry to my mind the idea that a modern ship would meet with the same fate as the small insignificant vessels which were used during the periods referred to. We should not forget that the vessels which, under the charter of the Hudson Bay Company entered Hudson Bay so long ago, were small wooden ships, comparatively light in weight and that the modern tendency is to construct enormous vessels of immense carrying capacity and in consequence of their great weight and the enormous cargo they carry, the peril from floating ice or thick ice is proportionately increased. The hon. gentleman said that the invention of steam had revolutionized navigation through ice. Very likely that is so, and you see the truth of it in these steamers which navigate the ice clad shores of Newfoundland late in the spring after seals. The pursuit of seals by modern steamers of small size, specially prepared for that purpose, is rendered much easier by the fact that they are propelled by steam, but the commercial navigation of Hudson Straits and Hudson Bay by a modern ship, which alone can compete in economy of transport with what exists on other routes, is an entirely different matter, and my fear is that the very existence of floating ice would deter all those ships from going there at all. Now, if that be so—if it requires a ship to be specially prepared to encounter ice fairly, you neutralize the advantages of the route because the fact which gives a commercial importance to the Hudson Bay route is economy. If it should be practicable to have a railway to Port Churchill and bring the products of the North-west there, I, for one, would most certainly desire to see it. Perhaps with better light on the subject, I may think more favourably of the project. I am only speaking from the light given me to-day by the hon. member. I believe the evidence he has placed before us to be absolutely authentic. It is information given by an advocate of the project from one point of view, and I, for my part, go hand in hand with him to a certain point; I am simply introducing into this matter a question which a wise and prudent man would consider before putting his money into any business. Although the route may be 1,300 or 1,400 miles shorter, although Port Churchill may be that much closer to Liverpool than Montreal is, the very fact that one ship carries five or six thousand tons, dead weight, and another, only 1,500, would render the difference of the voyage of very little importance in the actual cost of the transport. Now, I am not here to discourage the hon. member; I am not here to oppose the inquiry which he makes. On the contrary, I am here to say that the subject is of such vital importance that I hope every information will be obtained upon it, and that the Government will consider it to be their duty to grant an inquiry which will set this question practically at rest; but the hon. gentleman, as I said a moment ago, occasionally in his address, conveyed to me the impression that he was proving too much. Any contrast between the wrecks which have taken place in the navigation of the gulf of St. Lawrence and the wrecks that have occurred in Hudson Bay is to my mind entirely futile. The fact that the St. Lawrence has been navigated by hundreds and thousands of ships in the course of a year and the Hudson Bay by 5 or 6 or 9 or 10 or a dozen, is a sufficient reason, apart from other considerations, to ensure that the percentage of wrecks will be much larger in the one case than in the other. As regards insurance, I doubt very much whether any insurance company has ever been asked to quote a rate for ships trading to Hudson Bay. I think the hon. gentleman stated that the Hudson Bay Co.'s vessels were not insured, but I doubt very much whether outside of these ships any insurance company has ever been asked to quote a rate, and general expressions on the question are absolutely of no value as to what insurance companies would charge. Now with regard to the contrast of the navigation of Hudson Bay and the navigation of the Russian and Siberian ports, we must bear in mind that all the products of the North-west have had a ready access to the south, and the conditions are entirely different. In Siberia they had no access to the south, and it is a question of reaching the markets of the world through these ports in the north of Siberia and under the circumstances which the hon. gentleman has so fairly set before us, or of not getting out at all. I do not think that any one will put me down as an opponent of this project, because I explicitly and once again disclaim anything of that kind. I engaged in the question before, and I make the assertion now, that I am ready and anxious to be engaged in it again if I should see a possibility or a probability of success, and these statements on my part, I think, should relieve me, as a citizen of Montreal, from any suspicion that there is any jealousy whatever. Nothing of the kind exists ; but let us hasten slowly and find out the facts. Ascertain, if you can, whether commercial ships of the modern type would go to Port Churchill to load if you provided them with freight to carry, and then we would have absolute proof of the fact that this is a possible venture or the contrary. For my part, I think there is no such proof before us, and while I shall most certainly support the hon. member in his desire to urge the Government to give attention to this subject, I caution this House that it is not quite so easily settled, nor so plain of proof as the eloquent address which we have just listened to would lead us to suppose.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not care to be misrepresented—not that the hon. gentleman had any intention of misrepresenting me—it was a misunderstanding. I did not say there was no ice in Hudson Straits at any time of the year, but I said that the ice is of such a character that any vessel can easily make its way through it. I did not compare the wrecks of the Gulf of St. Lawrence with the wrecks in Hudson Bay. I said that in the early days of the St. Lawrence, with the ships coming up to Quebec, the percentage of loss was large as compared with Hudson Bay. So far as the insurance is concerned, I am credibly informed that inquiries have been made at Lloyd's in London, and that the facts have been ascertained on that question. I wish to make the explanation, so that I may not be unin tentionally misrepresented in what I said.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The exhaustive review of the Hudson Bay as a trade route which has been given by the hon. mover has been most interesting to me and I think interesting to those members of the House who listened to it. He has taken the subject up from a number of points of view, many of them not hitherto, as far as I can understand, thoroughly investigated, with the result that he has given us a large quantity of new and fresh details regarding a subject, whose interest had even prior to this information, appeared almost unbounded. It is more commendable however that he has brought this view before the House because it will have the effect of eliciting discussion upon this subject, which was apparent from the thoughtful remarks which we have heard from the last speaker, which I am very pleased to say he prefaces by stating that he is not to be considered as an opponent of the scheme, and the result of the discussion will be that we will have further investigation and more light thrown upon the subject. For there is no question about it that this matter has hitherto been confined, as far as the information is concerned, to a comparatively limited number of individuals, for although the Hudson Bay Company has been known for a great number of years, for centuries in fact in many English speaking portions of the globe, any very great extent of information with regard to them or their undertakings, their possessions or their productions, has been confined to their employés and officials and to those traders and merchants and trappers who had business relations with them. Even as recently as 1858 Lord Palmerston, in referring to the Hudson Bay territory on which a select Committee of the House had taken evidence and reported in a previous session, says :

> One could easily imagine that a wilderness in the northern part of America where nothing lives except fur-bearing animals, and a few wild Indians but little removed from the lower creation, might be confined to a company whose chief function should be to strip the running animals of their skins, and keep the bipeds sober.

Mr. Gladstone took a more favourable view as to our North-west, because, in the debate during the same session, he remarked —and we all know now a good deal of the truth of what this contains :

> There is a large portion of the surface of earth with regard to the character of which we have been systematically kept in darkness, for those who had information to give have also had an interest directly opposed to the imparting of it. Now, the truth is, beyond question, that a great part of this country is highly valuable for colonization purposes, and it is impossible to state in too strong language the proposition that the Hudson Bay Company is, by its very existence and character, the enemy of colonization.

Now it is almost needless to remark that the great far-sightedness of that statement has been verified since then in a manner which at that period would have never been even dreamt of. That this great corporation has kept the North-west a terra incognita for so many years is but a part of the system which has long since recognized the fact that the fur trade has to retire before the steps of an advancing civilization. It cannot be doubted that the advantages of the country have been decried while the dangers and difficulties of the navigation of the bay and straits have been systematically magnified and exaggerated. And yet I do not agree with the hon. gentleman who last spoke that there should not be a contrast drawn between the navigation of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and that of the Hudson Bay route. I think it is eminently proper that such a contrast should be drawn, because the history of the early navigation of the Gulf of St. Lawrence corresponds almost exactly with that which has taken place of recent years with reference to the northern route. There is no doubt in my mind that the dangers that beset the navigator in the northern route fade into insignificance before those which the early mariner in the Gulf of St. Lawrence met with. He had to contend with the narrow and shallow channels of varying depths with all their sunken rocks and hidden shoals, and the fogs and the ice which beset that passage, while those which have investigated it tell us that the northern route is comparatively free from a great many of those dangers. Professor Bell, to whom the mover has alluded, in his report to the Royal Geographical Society on the navigation of Hudson Bay, states as follows :

The main body of the bay is entirely without shoals, reefs or islands. Its depth is very uniform, and nowhere does it present any great irregularities. It averages about 70 fathoms throughout, deepening to 100 and upwards in approaching the outlet of Hudson Strait. While in the strait itself the soundings along the centre run from 150 to 300 fathoms.

And a still further comparison of the routes I think does not certainly show to the disadvantage of the northern. The reports of the navigation of the St. Lawrence present a ghastly record of the loss of the noble ships and gallant lives sacrificed in the prosecution of the investigation of that route at an early date when the object was to attain the same information with respect to the then unknown channel of the St. Lawrence, and to the then almost unknown land situated in the neighbourhood of Quebec, as we later on had to contend with in the Hudson Bay route, and I think that we can contrast it, and can do so favourably to the northern route, when we take the record of the numberless wrecks and the large sacrifice of lives that the hon. mover has spoken about. Contrast that with the record of the Hudson Bay Company (which I think is a marvellous one) trading between the British Isles and that great inland sea for 225 years; they have only lost two vessels, the "Graham" and the "Kitty," and during that time—although my hon. friend has belittled the extent of navigation which has taken place into the bay—during that time over 1,000 vessels have passed into the straits and into the bay, and successfully navigated it with only the loss of those two ships, and these vessels have been of all kinds, British troop-ships, emigrant vessels, men-of-war of the English and French navy and vessels on voyages of discovery, of trade and whaling—all the different businesses connected with the northern waters, and I say that if those northern seas had been successfully navigated for that length of time by those small and ill-equipped sailing vessels, we can easily see what we might expect from a properly equipped fleet of steamships placed on that northern route. I think that the remarks of the last speaker, although thoughtful as I said, and designed to promote a discussion on the subject, should not be taken as condemning the route at all. I think the hon. mover has shown that the route is not one which could be condemned, but one which must eventually be opened up and form the outlet of our northern country, because from the evidence produced undoubtedly the consensus of opinion goes to show that the straits and bay are open for navigation on an average of five months in each year, and although the hon. member for Montreal spoke about the ice which was to be met there, the trouble which has been experienced by ice being met with in the straits and bay has not arisen from its being solid ice at any period of navigation, but from the fact that vessels employed there were sailing vessels, which when they got into the ice were becalmed and unable to move and drifted up and down with the ice for days and sometimes weeks at a time. But we must bear in mind that this terror to navigation would be removed by ships equipped in modern style, and the navigation of the bay may be safely said to be open and the harbours to be open for five months in the year, and I think much more than that can hardly be said for the early navigation of the St. Lawrence. Now, taking for granted that it is advantageous to have that northern route opened up, I would like to look at its connection with our possessions in the Northwest, the part of the country in which I am myself very much interested and of which I am a resident. We have all our lives been accustomed to hear of the great extent of the territory of British North America, a territory transcending in area that of the United States and forming a very large proportion of that great empire upon which the sun never sets, but until comparatively recent years of what value was this vast territory? It was practically valueless, it was locked up; it was of no use; it might contain (as it does contain) millions of fertile acres sufficient to afford a food supply for the whole of Europe, it might contain as it does millions of homes for settlers who are now eking out an existence in the older world; but all this was practically valueless until, as we know, the wisdom of our Canadian statesmen gave that aid to our great national highway which has resulted in placing us in connection with, and giving us access to the wheat fields of Manitoba and Assiniboia, the ranches of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the immense deposits of coal and petroleum, and the minerals which at varying intervals underlie all that country. The immediate result of the opening of that country by the railway was that a large influx of population took place, a comparatively extensive area of land was brought under cultivation and a considerable sum of money was expended both in public and private enterprises, in promoting the development of the country; but hon. gentlemen, although that development has been large and rapid, it would be idle for me to say that it has kept up either in pace or in volume with the expectations or hopes of its promoters and well-wishers. And the reasons are not far to seek. Difficulties incident to the settlement of any new country have been encountered of course, but have been successfully met and overcome; other burdens such as those imposed by tariff and other fiscal regulations have been also felt, but having been brought to the notice of the powers of the day they have been either mitigated or removed; but there is one disability under which we live which renders nugatory a great part of the hard work and labour of the settler which hinders him from obtaining anything like a full result of his hard work and labour, and which prevents the full, free and rapid development of that great country in which I think we are all so largely interested; and it is this that, situated as we are in the centre of a vast continent, with but one route to the seaboard, with but one outlet to those European ports which are the ultimate and inevitable market for all that north-western produce, we are almost hopelessly handicapped by the freight rates which absorb so large a proportion of the value of what is raised as to leave an infinitesimal part to reward the hard work of the settler who has actually produced it. He is the one who really suffers, because he is the one who gets the least reward, although he has produced the article which is carried out. Now, I do not want to join in any great outcry against the Canadian Pacific Railway for their not having immediately reduced these rates as soon as they were called upon to do so. I look upon that institution as being one of the marvels of the age; there is no doubt about it, and the same people who now are finding fault with the large fortunes which have been amassed by the promoters of that road forget, if they ever knew, the great trials and difficulties under which that road laboured in its inception, and the failure that more than once was imminent and was only averted by the wisdom of those who recognized that the failure of that road would have meant a death-blow for years to come to progress in our Dominion. There is no question about that, and also that this road is not a philanthropic concern; it is a business institution. It is managed by some of the most astute and most sagacious minds on the continent, and I presume they know what is best for their own interest. Recognizing, as they must do, the fact that the future progress and success of their road depends very largely upon the future progress and success of the North-west country and equally that that country cannot progress in the ratio in which it is entitled with its other advantages, without having a large influx of population; recognizing also the fact that immigration to that country, is practically at a standstill and also that, as my hon. friend has stated, the best immigration agent is a happy and prosperous and contented settler who is already in the country; if the managers of that road, recognizing these facts, have not considered themselves able to meet the wishes of the people, by reducing those rates, it must be because those rates are already down as low as the financial condition of the road will allow them to be made at present. I can see no other reason for it, but it is all the more evident that it behooves the settler who can see no relief from any other source, and the members of the Government who should be, as they are, anxious to see this country and that great north-western country developed as largely and as rapidly as we all wish and expect, to turn their attention to some other source which will allow of the free export of the illimitable resources of that great north-western country. I, for one (and I know in this opinion I am joined by a great many gentlemen) do not see any other hopes for the proper development of that country but the opening up of this Hudson Bay route. I do not want to trouble the House with any statistics, because the subject has been very largely gone into by the mover, but I should like to call attention to these facts. As he has said, from Churchill on Hudson Bay to Liverpool is seventy miles shorter than from Liverpool to Montreal, and over a hundred miles shorter than from Liverpool to New York. The distance from Montreal to Winnipeg is 1,400 miles, that from Churchill to Winnepeg 700 miles. There is a saving of one-half of the land carriage. Now it costs 46 cents per hundred pounds to forward wheat at present from Winnipeg or Brandon to Montreal. That is at the rate of about 30 cents a bushel. If the land carriage costs at present that rate, and that land carriage could be reduced by one-half, then fifteen cents per bushel would be the rate, and that rate on twenty millions of bushels would mean a saving to Manitoba alone of three millions of dollars divided amongst those settlers who are now crying out for some relief. As far as the navigation of the bay is concerned I would tell my hon. friend that I am informed by Mr. Sutherland, who is the president of the Hudson Bay Railway and is very largely interested in that concern and has spent an immense amount of energy, and the last ten years of his life in promoting it and sunk a great deal of money in it without any return so far, that an arrangement has been effected with the steamship company, owning a large fleet of steamships in England (which steamship company controls the whole of the navigation of the Baltic and the European Arctic seas) whereby a fully equipped fleet of vessels will be placed on this route as soon as the traffic warrants it, and I think there is no doubt that it can be done, because the steamship company is already in existence and has the trade and has the vessels which have been engaged in the trade, and they are thoroughly acquainted with northern navigation and the dangers which beset it. It has been stated that one difficulty to be met with on the northern route would be the fact that we would not be able to move the crop in the year in which it is produced. This is undoubtedly the case. We would not attempt to do so nor do we desire to do so. The fact is that a very small percentage of the western crop ever reaches the markets of the world in the year in which it is raised. As far as our farmers are concerned their time is taken up, after they gather their harvest until the frost sets in, in doing their fall ploughing, and experience has taught us that to export new wheat in bulk in the holds of vessels through the damp warmth of an ocean voyage exposes it to the danger of heating and it is likely to reach the port to which it is consigned in a damaged condition. Therefore it will be necessary that a large portion of the crop should be stored at different points awaiting shipment and the fact of its being held over in our northern climate only causes it to mature better and to acquire in the highest degree that flinty hardness for which it is so justly celebrated. Of course it would involve the necessity of having a system of elevators with large storing capacities such as exist already at Fort William and other points. It would only have to be done on a larger scale. Access to this bay could be had in many ways. Tributary to it there are a number of very large rivers, one of which I know has a navigable length of over a thousand miles, and there are others of very large volume. In addition to bearing the produce of that western country to the bay, there are upon these rivers some wonderful water powers, and these we can certainly look forward to becoming the centres of manufacturing industries of great value at a future period. I understand that on the Nelson River, a hundred miles from its mouth there is a water power which exceeds the volume of any other (except probably the falls of Niagara) on the continent of America, and it is not too much to look forward to the establishment in that northern country of manufacturing centres which will rival those in the great republic to the south of us, and will be the means of giving employment to thousands of Canada's sons who now expatriate themselves for the purpose of earning a livelihood in the great cities to the south of the line. And not only the produce of our own North west but that of the Western States also, will find an outlet over this route. Once get the route established, and the trade must follow it as surely as the night follows the day. I do not think that the great corporations to which we have alluded, should be adverse to this scheme. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, with its enormous land grant, and the Hudson Bay Company, owning as they do one-twentieth of all the land in Manitoba, would certainly find that any small loss they might have to put up with at the present time would be far more than counterbalanced by the enormous expansion of the business of the country which would take place, and by the extension of the local trade, and by the increased value of their lands in that country. I do not wish to take up the time of the House further. The matter has been exhaustively opened up, and I trust it will result in a discussion which will promote great good for the enterprise. I always feel that while the name of Sir John Macdonald will always be indelibly associated with the Canadian Pacific Railway, that the Canadian statesman whose name will be identified with the opening up of the Hudson Bay route, will hold as high a niche in the temple of fame, and it is eminently proper that this honourable body, by their action, should take the best means in forwarding and promoting the project, and share in the achievement by impressing the importance of the subject upon the Government.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I am sure the House is very thankful for the information that has been given on this subject by the hon. gentleman from Niagara, and those who have taken part in this debate. The Government has in the past given much attention to the subject of opening up a commercial route for our great North-west through Hudson Bay and straits. In 1884 and 1885 the Parliament of Canada decided to station officers in the straits and on some of the islands at the northern part of the Hudson Bay for the purpose of procuring information. At that time, as to-day, nobody opposed the project of seeking an outlet for the North-west by that route, but it so far remains a question whether it is commercially practicable. There is no doubt that the straits are navigable and have been navigated by sailing vessels for three centuries and recently by steamships also, but I think the hon. member for Kennebec has given a warning when he put the question whether it was commercially practicable. We all know that the vessels that are sent there are specially built for that purpose. They are strengthened in the bow in such a way that they can sustain a very heavy shock without being destroyed. They are vessels of limited capacity. Formerly they were only sailing vessels. Some advantage has been gained by the fact that now steam is used, but the question arises, can the ordinary vessel used for the transport of merchandise to-day, be made use of for carrying the North-west grain, should it reach the port of Churchill? I think there is a doubt about that. If it is answered in the negative, then we have to look at the question whether it would be a paying enterprise to build a special fleet to carry freight from Port Churchill to England.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Whalebacks.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—How long is the navigation open in Hudson Straits, is another question which I think can be wisely put. From observations made during the two years under the supervision of the Government of Canada and from the records of the Hudson Bay Company, it is safe to assume that navigation in the straits does not fairly open before the beginning of July and closes at the end of October. You have therefore navigation in Hudson Straits during three or three and a half months. Is it, moreover, such safe navigation as would encourage the building of a fleet for the purpose? If we refer to the log of the "Alert," in 1884 and 1885, we find that she was detained during twenty days by ice in the straits, from the 1st to the 20th of August.

Referring to the great advantages offered by Port Churchill we must also look at the fact and put the question—when does that port close? The records show that the port is closed at the very beginning of October—that early in October and towards the middle of October the river is frozen over and there is drifting ice in the harbour. Those are all difficulties in the way of shipping from that port at that season of the year. If I make these remarks it is not with the object of discouraging the enterprise, but to draw the attention of the House to the report of Captain Gordon an officer of the navy giving the result of observations made in 1884 and 1885, and the records of the temperature, of the drift of the ice, of the opening of navigation, and the closing of it during the two years that those officers sent by Canada were stationed in Hudson Strait. I may say, in reference to the remarks made by the hon. member from Brandon, that no people are more anxious than the people of the east and of the centre of Canada to see the North-west prosper. Nobody feels more desirous that the capital invested in that country should be profitable. He has stated that the freight rates were a great drawback to the settlement of the country and to the settlers there at present—that the freight perhaps prevented settlers from going in as fast as they should, but this is an accidental condition. The freights on the Canadian Pacific Railway, I believe, are no higher for the same distances than they are upon any of the American roads, but the trouble this year is the low price for the products of the country. Of course when wheat is only 42 cents per bushel the freight will appear very high, whilst the same freight, the hon. gentleman will admit, would be reasonable if the price of wheat were, what it usually is, from 60 to 70 or 80 cents per bushel. The rate would not be so oppressive as it may appear to-day. If any further light can be thrown on this question of having access to Europe by the Hudson Bay route, the hon. member and all the members from that section of the Dominion, may rest assured that there is no jealousy, no narrow-minded feeling, on the part of the people of the east that would oppose it on the ground that it could hurt the traffic of the River St. Lawrence. In answer to the question put by the hon. member from Niagara, I am to state that the Government have no fresh information regarding the navigation of Hudson Bay since 1887, except the report of Mr. Ogilvie, which relates only to James Bay, and would throw no light on the navigation of Hudson Bay and Hudson Strait.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Niagara)—The hon. member has said that the vessels were built specially for that trade. I would refer him to the statements of those who sailed ordinary vessels in Hudson Bay years ago. Those vessels were not built specially for that trade, but were, nevertheless, for years used in the navigation of Hudson Strait and Bay. I think the hon. Minister will find out, by reading the records, that the port of Churchill does not close up about the first of October, nor does it until the first of November. I would refer him also to the House of Commons Committee report in 1884. After sitting for days and taking evidence of the very best witnesses of the time, their report is of the most favourable character. They state that the route, in their opinion, is practicable and feasible. I would refer him also to the report of the committee of the Manitoba Legislature where they took for days the evidence of the most practical witnesses, men possessing the greatest experience and knowledge, and the report of the committee was most favourable. If the hon. the Minister will look at these reports, he will find that all the evidence goes to show, as I stated before, that for three or five months of the year there is open navigation through Hudson Straits. I may say also that I have been informed, from the most authentic sources, that what I said with regard to rate of insurance is correct. I do not desire to say one word against the Gulf of St. Lawrence, because it would be no use to say anything. Its practicability has been too long established to be questioned. But I said that 150 years ago there was more prejudice against the St. Lawrence route, than there is to-day against the Hudson Bay route, and that the prejudice has been overcome by the skill and ingenuity of man. With all the improvements in naval architecture, and all the knowledge we possess, if science is not able to do to-day what was done 200 years ago, it has been of little value to mankind. The evidence gathered from any source you like, even from the mouths of unwilling witnesses, proves that the straits can be navigated for three to five months, or perhaps longer, with the improved system of vessels. If that can be done, the advantages are so great that I would ask the hon. Minister to urge upon the Government the desirability of spending a little money in getting charts and surveys of these straits, and I would rather put money into that than into the hands of emigration agents.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would call the attention of the hon. member from Niagara to the fact that this matter has been discussed on two or three occasions in the Senate, and if the hon. member will consult the Senate Debates for 1890 and 1891, he will find that pretty nearly all the evidence he has produced was brought before the House and the subject was fully discussed then.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Niagara)—I desire to thank the hon. gentleman for the information, but I have not seen that evidence nor have I examined it, and I think his remarks were uncalled for.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not want to reflect on the hon. gentleman at all. I simply wanted to call his attention to the fact that the subject was fully discussed in this Chamber before.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The object of the hon. gentleman from Niagara was to find if there was any further information since that time, and I think his inquiry was a very proper one.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not wish to reflect on the hon. gentleman at all.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The remarks from the hon. gentleman from Halifax were of a character from which there could be only one deduction, and that is that the question of the Hudson Bay route having been once or twice discussed in this House, it should be tabooed for the future.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I know the hon. gentleman did not say so, but that is the inference I drew from his remarks and I think most hon. gentlemen in the House did the same. I beg to remind the hon. gentleman that no great scheme has been propounded in the past (and I fancy it will be the same in the future), but it had to be brought under the notice of the people a great many times before they became sufficiently acquainted with the subject to invest their money in it. There is another point in connection with this matter, that all great enterprises have been brought under the notice of the public by men who have given them special study and have adhered to their idea until they achieved success; and depend upon it, the man who pursues any course of that kind through life is apt to succeed. I shall not be at all surprised if my hon. friend, who is young in years, will hear this question discussed a great many times more. I was not only interested, but very much instructed by the remarks of the hon. member from Niagara, which were well supplemented, though not strictly from the same standpoint, by the hon. gentleman from Kennebec, and supported very ably by one of our young senators, the hon. gentleman from Brandon. While we have time, as we have had to-day, I should be very glad, as one member of the Senate, to hear speeches of the character that have been delivered here to-day. They showed deep study and research in the subject with which they dealt, and I hope they may have in the future the effect of convincing my hon. friend from Halifax that his opinion and mine upon this and some other subjects are not always right

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—It is not often that I can say a word in favour of my hon. friend to the left (Mr. Power) but I did not understand, nor did I think he said anything to offend the hon. gentleman to the right of me (Mr. Ferguson.) Some of the older members of the House will have a clear recollection that this thing has been thrashed out pretty well, and if the hon. leader of the Government had been here some years ago, he would have heard a discussion upon this same matter.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I heard it in the other House.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Consequently this question is not new to us. I have spoken once or twice myself on the matter and it has been pretty well ventilated. I must thank the hon. gentleman who brought up the subject to-day for throwing a little more light upon it; however, a great deal of it is in the Debates already. I hope my hon. friend to the left of me has not said anything to offend; it is very seldom I can defend him because he is very often in the wrong.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think I have a right to make a little explanation. My language has been misconstrued altogether. I was aware of the fact that the hon. gentleman from Niagara was not in the House at the time this subject was discussed before. It has been discussed on at least three different occasions. The first time was on the motion of the gentleman representing the Victoria division, the Hon. Mr. Ryan; and it was discussed at considerable length and very fully on a motion made by the hon. gentleman from Shell River in 1890, and again in the session of 1891 the matter was discussed at very considerable length and amongst others by the hon. gentleman from Sarnia in connection with a bill which was then before the House. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech made by the hon. gentleman from Niagara and also to the speeches made by the hon. gentlemen who followed, but it struck me as being rather singular that those gentlemen all spoke apparently in ignorance of the fact that the matter had been debated here before, and I thought, for instance, it was hardly fair to the hon. gentleman from Shell River that the discussion which had ensued upon his motion in 1890 should not have been noticed at all. I did not mean to find any fault whatever with any of the gentlemen who have spoken. I simply called the attention of the House to a historical fact that this matter had been discussed bfore.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not wish to make an address on this matter, but I would simply tell the hon. member that there is an old saying that it is usual to exaggerate difficulties where local interests are not in the line of their removal. Where parties do not desire to find a mode it is sometimes difficult to find one. I am not going into the discussion now, because it is closed, and it would be unwise to do so, but I believe the time will come when the Hudson Bay route will be opened up and be the great highway for the trade of the North-west. I do not regard it as impracticable. I believe the straits can be navigated, and all the difficulties which exist can be overcome. In Prince Edward Island we had the same experience; it was considered impossible to maintain communication across the Straits of Northumberland through the winter season, but we overcame the difficulty there. They say Port Churchill is frozen up in October. Now I believe it can be kept open for about half the year. I thank my hon. friend from Niagara for bringing the subject before the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Niagara)—In order that new members might not make a mistake, I would suggest that these subjects which, for the last forty years, have been discussed before the House, should be posted up somewhere, because the suggestion is that we should not speak on any subject which any senator heretofore for the last forty years has spoken about. I think that some such notice should be put up. You must remember that the public have forgotten that discussion. The hon. gentleman has the Debates under his hand from day to day, and 99 per cent of the people of the country have not that advantage, and the only way we can get it before the people is to bring it before the House and before the press of the country. But I will try to avoid this trouble again, and will consult hon. gentlemen as to any subject which has been discussed for the last half century in order that I may not trespass on their tender feelings.

The Senate adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

THE DILLON DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

Hon Mr. GOWAN, from the Divorce Committee, presented their report on the Dillon Divorce Case. He said: All the rules have been strictly complied with in this case and the respondent was personally served. I therefore move that the report be adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to have this report left over until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—When all the rules have been complied with it is seldom that an objection has been raised to the adoption of a report. I can see no reason why the adoption of this report should be delayed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The report can only be adopted to-day by unanimous consent and if the hon. gentleman does not wish to comply with my request, I shall simply have to object to the adoption of the report to-day.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—There is no question whatever about the due publication of the notice, and the service was personal. Of course, if my hon. friend has any particular reason for wishing to have the report stand until to-morrow, it does not lie with me to object. Personally I have no objection to the report being deferred until to-morrow.

The report was allowed to stand.

SPEAKER OF THE SENATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS introduced Bill (Q) "An Act respecting the Speaker of the Senate." He said: This bill was introduced last year, and some discussion took place upon it in this House. It was adopted here and went down to the House of Commons at a late stage of the session. It was dropped at the close of the session, and it has become necessary to introduce it again in this House. It is exactly the same bill that was before us last session, except that there is a fourth clause added:

> This Act shall not come into force until Her Majesty's pleasure thereon has been signified by proclamation in the Canada Gazette.

This clause is put in out of deference to the members of this House, who raised the constitutional question whether we had the power of introducing such legislation, or should go to England and ask for an amendment to the Act of 1867. This clause, if the bill is accepted by this House and the House of Commons, will evoke in England the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and consequently they will have to decide the constitutional question. If their judgment should be opposed to the opinion of the majority of this House, it would then be in order to petition the Imperial Parliament for the necessary amendment to the British North America Act to empower this House to elect a Speaker under the circumstances mentioned in the bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the first time.

The Senate adjourned at 4.30 p.m.

THE MANITOBA AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

PETITION PRESENTED.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté), presented the petition of Walter Barwick, for leave to present a pétition for a bill relating to the Manitoba and North-western Railway Co.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is undoubtedly the rule, where an ordinary petition is presented for a private bill, that that petition goes as a matter of course to the Standing Orders Committee, but I am rather inclined to doubt whether a petition for leave to present a petition (which is not an ordinary one but a privilege asked from the House) should not by motion go to that committee. Having turned the matter over in my mind since a petition of this sort was presented to the House during the present session, I am rather inclined to think that in the case of a petition for leave to present a petition (which is something out of the usual order, being a special motion not provided for by the rules of the House) a motion to refer that petition to the Committee on Standing Orders would be the proper course. I think it would be wise if the House should understand that that would be the course pursued in similar cases.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Then I beg leave to move that the petition of Walter Barwick be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté) moved that the petition be read.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—You cannot do that; it has to go to the Committee on Standing Orders. There is no other course open.

COBOURG, NORTHUMBERLAND AND PACIFIC RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté) presented the petition of the Cobourg, Northumberland and Pacific Railway Company, praying for the passing of an Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The time has expired—I think on the 5th April—and the petition cannot be received. I would suggest to my hon. friend that where a petition has not been presented within the time limited by the rules of the House, there is another course for him to pursue. If the bill is presented in the House of Commons and it comes here before the second reading, after the first reading and before the second it can be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders as a petition to be reported upon by that committee. That course will save a good deal of trouble and it is provided for by the rules of the House.

THE INSOLVENCY ACT.

ORDER DISCHARGED.

The Notice of Motion being read:

That after the second reading of Bill (C) intituled: "An Act respecting Insolvency," he will move that the said bill be referred to a Joint Committee to be composed of equal numbers of senators and members of the House of Commons, and that on the part of the Senate the members of such committee be the Honourable Messieurs Allan, Bolduc, Bowell, Dickey, Drummond, Desjardins, Ferguson (P.E.I.), Gowan, Kaulbach, Landry, Lougheed, McClelan, Macdonald (B.C.), Pelletier, Power, Sanford and Scott.

That a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses to examine and report upon the Bill (C) of the Senate, intituled: "An Act respecting Insolvency," and informing that House that the Honourable Messieurs Allan, Bolduc, Bowell, Dickey, Drummond, Desjardins, Ferguson (P.E.I), Gowan, Kaulbach, Landry, Lougheed, McClelan, Macdonald (B.C.), Pelletier, Power, Sanford and Scott, will act on behalf of the Senate as members of the said Joint Committee, should the House of Commons agree to its creation.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL said: After consultation with a number of members of this House and also with the Premier, I have come to the conclusion that probably it would be better to leave the Insolvency Bill to a large committee of the Senate exclusively. We shall then be able to meet as often as necessary in one of the large committee rooms and receive the different deputations that may come to Ottawa for the purpose of expressing their views upon the measure. I know that there will be a number of bankers and representatives of boards of trade and commercial men, who, I have no doubt, would like to place their views before the committee. I have received several letters since the introduction of the bill, in which the writers express a desire to interview myself personally. I shall take the liberty, after the second reading, to move the appointment of a committee, consisting of members of this House who are largely connected with the mercantile, banking and farming interests of the country, in addition to those mentioned in the notice of motion.

The notice was dropped.

THE BEHRING SEA QUESTION.

AN EXPLANTION.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to direct attention to a cablegram which appeared in the newspapers this morning, in reference to the subject brought under the notice of the Senate by the hon. member from New Westminster the other day, in which he asked what the Government had done with reference to a claim which was supposed to have been made, and which a member of the Imperial Government was reported to have said had not been made. I do this more particularly to show the unsafety—perhaps I had better say impropriety—of calling the attention of either House of Parliament to cablegrams affecting almost any important subject, knowing as we do that they are nearly all filtered through the United States telegraph offices. You will remember that the question was asked here whether the statement that was reported in the press was true, that the Government had made no claim for losses sustained by those who had been engaged in the Behring Sea Seal Fisheries. The cable published this morning is as follows :

> Mr. Hanbury asked if Mr. Buxton had seen the speech of the Canadian Minister of Commerce in the Dominion Senate, declaring that a large portion of Mr. Buxton's statement in the House of Commons that Canada had given an unconditional assent to an agreement that Canadian sealers should not ask for compensation was not strictly correct.
> Mr. Buxton said he had seen the speech, but the statements made therein were doubtless due to the fact that he (Buxton) had been misrepresented. He had never said that Canada had not asked for compensation.

I should not have taken the trouble of calling the attention of the House to this matter, were it not that the question which was put by the hon. member for New Westminster and my reply are on the records of the Senate. You will see that Mr. Buxton says he never made any such statement as that which was attributed to him.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL introduced Bill (S) "An Act amending and consolidating the Acts relating to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal." He said : I shall not detain the House by entering into any explanation now. That can better be done on the second reading and when the bill goes before the committee. I might, however, mention the fact that it repeals about thirty-three Acts that now stand on the Statute-book regulating the harbour of Montreal. The bill that I have introduced is to consolidate the whole of these Acts into one, or such portions of them as may be necessary to enable the Harbour Commissioners to perform their work and duty easier and with more expedition than they do at present.

The bill was read the first time.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY'S BILL.

WITHDRAWN.

The Order of the Day being called,

> Second reading Bill (H) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Rocky Mountain Railway and Coal Company."—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED said : As this bill has been introduced in the other House, I move that the Order of the Day be discharged.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I presume the object of my hon. friend is to get rid of the bill in this House ; he should therefore ask for leave to withdraw the measure.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With the consent of the House, I will put it in that shape.

The bill was withdrawn.

INSOLVENCY BILL.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL gave notice that when Bill (C) "An Act respecting Insolvency" has been read the second time he will move that the said bill be referred to a Select Committee, to consider and report thereon, and that the said Select Committee be composed of the following senators :—

The Honourable Messieurs Allan, Angers, Bernier, Bolduc, Bowell, Clemow, Desjardins, Dickey, Drummond, Ferguson (Niagara), Ferguson (P.E.I.)., Gowan, Kaulbach, Landry, Lewin, Lougheed, Macdonald (B.C.) MacInnes (Burlington), McClelan, Miller, Pelletier, Power, Read (Quinté), Sanford and Scott.

He said : I have selected this committee of twenty-five senators, but I may state that I am not wedded to any particular number, and after consideration of these names, if the Senate thinks there are any other members who have a knowledge of the subject whose names have been overlooked and should be added to it, I shall only be too glad to accept the suggestion.

HARBOUR OF PICTOU BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (F), "An Act to further amend the Acts respecting the Harbour of Pictou in Nova Scotia." He said : This is simply to vest the wharf in Pictou Harbour in the commissioners of that harbour. It has been in their possession since it was constructed, but some doubt has arisen as to certain rights which the Harbour Commissioners have, and this is simply to remove whatever doubt may exist.

The motion was agreed to

RED DEER VALLEY RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (L) "An Act to again revive and further amend the Act to incorporate the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company." He said : The object of the bill is to revive the company and to extend the time for the completion of the road. A considerable portion of the road has been constructed and the time has expired for the completion of a certain section of it ; the object is to have an extension of time.

The motion was agreed to.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF MONTREAL BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Second reading (Bill S) "An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal,"

Hon. Mr. BOWELL said : This bill, as I explained before, is a consolidation of all the measures that have been passed, some 33 in number, regulating the harbour of Montreal, and it has met the approval of the harbour commissioners. The amendments are for the purpose of giving certain powers to the harbour commissioners which they have not possessed in the past and make provision for filling vacancies, for the resignation of commissioners, fixing the time at which the commissioners shall be appointed by the Government, extending and regulating the limit of the harbour, giving certain powers to the commissioners to remove vessels or what may be termed movable property, and a variety of minor powers of that kind which are important in their character so far as the management of the harbour is concerned. If the House has no objection on the ground that the bill has not been printed in French, I would move the second reading, on the understanding that I will not ask the House to consider the bill in Committee of the Whole until it is printed in both languages.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—It is a very important bill, and I think we should not proceed with the second reading until we have it before us. We should not risk losing our reputation for exercising great care in examining into the details of all bills submitted to us.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no particular objection to the second reading, because the second reading is simply endorsing the principle of a bill and there is not any principle to be endorsed here, as it is simply a re-enactment of existing statutes with some slight alterations, but members prefer to have a bill before them when they are asked to sanction the second reading. I rise for the purpose of directing the attention of the leader of the House to the unsatisfactory way in which the printing of the Senate is conducted now. I hope he will use some efforts to see that we are better treated in the future. A great many members of this House felt when the power of dealing with the printing was taken away from the Senate that we were making a mistake, and that it was a pity we should have handed over to the Bureau our powers of dealing with our own printing. The results prove that those who were opposed to the change were right. If things do not improve, the Government might take into consideration the advisability of going back, so far as parliamentary printing is concerned, to the old system.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—In deference to the opinion expressed by the hon. member opposite, I move that the order be discharged and that the bill be read the second time on Thursday, by which time I trust it will be printed and circulated in both languages. I will make inquiry as to the cause of the delay in the printing.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC HARBOURS BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL introduced Bill (U) "An Act respecting public harbours." He said: The object of this bill is to give the Governor in Council power to define limits of public harbours, to extend the limits of existing harbours and to give the Governor in Council the usual power of making the necessary rules and regulations. At present the Harbour Masters' Act, chap. 80, Revised Statutes, provides the Governor in Council with the machinery, by the appointment of a harbour master, to regulate all ports and harbours which may be from time to time proclaimed; but the Act does not, as will be seen by section 3, apply to the following ports:—Quebec, Montreal, Three Rivers, Toronto, Halifax, Pictou, St. John, N.B., all these ports being governed by the provisions of special Acts passed either before or after confederation. Difficulties have arisen at the port of St. John, N.B.. which was created and its limits defined by royal letters patent dated August, 1819. In this patent the city council was given control over the harbour. Then by an Act passed in 1824 (4th George, chap. 24) power was given to the city council to regulate the throwing of ballast and rubbish in the roadstead. Regulations were made taking charge of the harbour for three miles beyond the limits of the city, but great complaint is now being made that the harbour still further out into the bay is being filled up by vessels depositing ballast, rubbish, etc., and there is no way at present to prevent this being done. The harbour of St. John is now governed under section 45, Victoria, chap. 51, by harbour commissioners appointed under that Act, but they have no specific power to do what is now proposed—that is the preventing of the filling up by the deposit of ballast and other materials in certain portions of the harbour. What is proposed by the bill is to extend the limits of the harbour seaward to such a distance that there will be no possibility of injuriously affecting navigation in the manner complained of. Under the terms of this bill the management of the harbour, as extended, will remain as at present. I may add that the "Harbour Masters' Act" does not specifically give the Governor in Council power to define the limits of harbours and ports, a defect which this bill is intended to remedy.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the first time.

The Senate adjourned at 3.40 p.m.

NEW SENATOR.

The Hon. K. F. BURNS, of Bathurst, New Brunswick, was introduced and took his seat.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (29) "An Act to again revive and further amend the Act incorporating the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Co."—(Mr. Dobson.)

Bill (25) "An Act respecting the Canada and Michigan Tunnel Co."—(Mr. MacInnes, Burlington.)

Bill (20) "An Act respecting the Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle Railway Co."—(Mr. Bernier.)

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I would call attention to the fact that a bill of the same name and similar in character to this last one is before the Senate and on the Orders for the second reading to-day. Strictly speaking, leave should have been asked to withdraw the bill introduced here before the introduction of the other one from the House of Commons. When we come to the item on the Order Paper, the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface should ask to have it discharged.

THE INSOLVENCY BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being called,

Second reading Bill (C) "An Act respecting Insolvency,"

Hon. Mr. BOWELL said : Of course, it will be with the permission of the House that I move the second reading of this bill, as it has not even been translated into French and certainly not printed in that language. My colleague tells me, after inquiry, that it will be four or five days before the bill can be translated and it will take some further time before it can be printed in the French language. If, however, it is not objected to, I will move the second reading now and appoint the special committee of which I gave notice, for its consideration and then by that time I am in hopes that the French edition will be ready. While on this subject I might also mention that I dropped a note to the Secretary of State in reference to the complaint made yesterday of the delay in the printing for the Senate, particularly the Senate bills, and I learned from the Queen's Printer this morning that though the bill affecting the Harbour of Montreal which was introduced by me some days ago, appeared upon the Order Paper as having been printed in English, the copy of it had not yet reached the printing office. There must be culpable delay somewhere. I hope the Contingent Accounts Committee will take this matter in hand and try to remedy these defects if possible. I may also intimate that the corps of translators, as I understand, is very weak in this House and it will be for the committee to decide to-morrow whether it would not be advisable to employ two or three additional translators temporarily until at least they catch up with the work of the Senate. Whether it is because we have had more bills and of a more important character this session than formerly, I do not know, but it is quite evident that no provision has been made in the past for the rapid translation and preparation of bills to be considered in the Senate. I throw out these hints with the hope that the committee will take them up to-morrow. With the consent of the House I shall move the second reading of the bill and the debate can then take place. The House will remember, when I introduced this measure, I entered very fully into its provisions, comparing it with the English Act, and also with the old Canadian Act, and therefore I do not deem it necessary at the present moment to enter at length into them again. I therefore move the second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no subject probably that could be brought before Parliament on which we can legislate, that would create a wider or more divergent opinion than the wisdom and propriety of an Insolvent Act. It seems to be an incident in all commercial countries that from time to time Insolvency Acts must be introduced, or, as they are commonly known in other countries, bankruptcy laws. They arise naturally from the tendency of modern times more particularly, to overtrade and to take the chances of getting rich in a hurry, departing from the early methods of trade. The leading feature of the bill now under consideration of the House is that in reference to the distinction between the classes of people affected by it; and in the distinction which is laid down in the bill. It departs from the principle that was recognized as a wise feature in the Act of 1869, and it also differs from the English Act. It differs from the Act of 1869 and the improved Act of 1875, inasmuch as it first makes provision for all traders going into insolvency,—"All persons who are engaged in any kind of business." Then, it lays down the principle that persons outside of that, a large class, embracing practically everybody else, but specially defined in the Act as "farmers, graziers and debtors." This word "debtor" means every other person, no doubt. The Act of 1875 specially excluded farmers, graziers, labourers and workmen. This Act takes in all classes. It is quite true that they cannot be placed in insolvency; they cannot be forced into it, but they have the option of entering the insolvent court. That is really the crucial point, whether it is wise and prudent to enable persons who have no right to take any chances in business, who are not called upon to give credit, who are practically masters of their own calling, of their own trade, to enable them to enter into speculative deals, with the hope of afterwards having their liabilities wiped off through the insolvency court. I think that is the question which is really the most important one for us to consider. The details of the bill are not so necessary for us to consider as that important question, because the details of the bill, as I believe from a partial and hasty reading of it, are very fairly carried out, if the principles laid down are considered wise and proper. In England it is quite true that every one may become bankrupt, but the conditions under which they may become bankrupt there are different from the conditions under which non-traders are permitted to become insolvents or bankrupts here. A person in England who comes under the definition of "non-trader," as laid down in this bill, can be made to equally distribute his estate if he becomes unable to pay all his creditors in full. Any dishonest act or any fraudulent preference on his part renders him liable to be forced into the bankruptcy court. Now, there is that element that is lacking in the present bill, so far as my reading of it goes; that a person who is simply a debtor, farmer, grazier or a non-trader, may give a preference to the creditor and yet is not liable to be forced into insolvency under this bill. That seems to be the crucial test, and one, of course, that will have to be considered by the House as the important one for consideration. If farmers, graziers and ordinary individuals, gentlemen living on their income, who choose to go into a speculation with the hope of making some money, fail in the speculation and lose their money, they can go into insolvency or not as they please. If we give that class of persons the facilities of going into the insolvent court, it is a question whether it would not be wise and prudent to adopt the English principle and enable a creditor to force them into insolvency; because we know very well there is just that tendency of persons who are not business men, who do not propose to go into business, who have speculated improperly, bought simply with the object of making money, not in a legitimate way, and find a failure has followed, to give a preference to the individual without, at the same time, rendering themselves liable to be forced into the court, or compelled to divide up their estate equally between all the creditors. If it is decided to include in the provisions of the Act those who are known as debtors and non-traders, farmers, graziers, and ordinary individuals, outside the commercial classes, I think it would be better to adopt the English principle, as I have explained it. Of course, it may be urged that where it can be shown to be absolutely fraudulent, the courts may set an assignment of that kind aside, but it is very well known that it is sometimes very difficult to have those assignments set aside. It may appear—it often does appear—that the party who was favoured was not aware that the person making the assignment was really in insolvent circumstances. It may all be done designedly and the fact may be protected and covered up by straining the truth, and, therefore, I think it is a matter of very grave consideration for us to now decide—because that is a part of the principle of this bill—whether it is really wise and prudent to make it optional only with that class of persons who do not properly come within the Insolvent Act, or who have the option of taking advantage of it if they so please, because I can quite see where a considerable amount of injury may arise to innocent parties, by allowing an individual who is not a trader to practically make a choice among his creditors, and give that particular favoured creditor the whole, or a larger slice of the estate than is justifiable under the conditions of his ability to pay his creditors. The Act of 1875, as I said before, specially excludes that class. The words in that Act were "farmers, graziers, labourers and workmen are not to be included." Now, we know very well that there is a very large class of people who are dependent upon salaries, who run into debt and make a failure. They are sued and brought before the court and ordered to pay so much a month. Under that bill that class of persons could come into court and apply for relief. If it appears that they have been living beyond their means and their inability to pay their debts is due to extravagance, the court may refuse to grant a discharge, but we all must have noticed that after a time sympathy is excited and discharges are granted. That was the result of the Act of 1869. Very often it was found that business had been so carried on that a party was not entitled to any consideration, and they refused to give a discharge. After a year or two the court softened, and finally a discharge was obtained. Now, what I fear is, that the facilities for obtaining a discharge under this bill are such that it may prompt a very considerable number of persons to go into rash speculations, knowing that they may get a discharge. At present there is a class of persons who know very well if they risk their money or the money belonging to other people—generally borrowed money—that they are for ever after liable for it, that they have no way except with the consent of the particular creditor who lent the money, of getting relief or getting any discharge; and therefore they are checked and cautioned in any business transaction they may undertake. That is really the crucial point that we ought to consider in this particular bill. The Act of 1869 was, as hon. gentlemen are aware, made law after a good deal of opposition. A very considerable number of members in both Houses believed it was not wise or prudent to place on the Statute-book an Act of that kind. In 1875 the law was amended, and in 1880 it was repealed. After 1880 the business of the country for several years up to 1887 or 1888, at all events was considered fair and the number of insolvents and people who applied for relief in the courts of the various provinces was small, because in all the provinces there are Acts—I may speak more particularly of Ontario and Quebec—under which a somewhat equal distribution of an estate may be made, in Quebec through the sheriff, and in the province of Ontario under the legislation authorizing assignments for the benefit of creditors; but in the last two years, business owing to causes probably that prevail to a greater extent outside of Canada, than within Canada, the number of insolvents and persons seeking relief from the pressure of debts they are unable to pay has very largely increased. I noticed that last week the number, according to Bradstreet's returns, was 32 as compared with 22 of the corresponding period a year ago, and I noticed in the last Ontario Gazette that there are no less than nine different cases where either a meeting of creditors was being called, or notices by assignees that meetings would be held, showing that there is a very considerable necessity for some law that will fairly and equally distribute the estate of a person that is unable to pay his debts. There is no doubt about that, and it might be and I think probably is wise, that we should have a law of this kind, at all events for a limited period. The only question is whether this bill does not go too far —whether it would not be more prudent to adhere to the Act of 1875, or, if we do adopt the wider range that is given in this measure of allowing all persons practically to avail themselves of the provisions of it, whether we should couple with that the facilities that creditors would have to force such persons into the court and declare them bankrupt. There would be this advantage about it, that in England there are so many decisions in the courts, and the experience gathered there is so large, that it would be of very considerable value in the interpretation of our own Act, if we followed their lines in that particular branch of the Insolvency Act, then I should think we ought to go further and introduce these clauses which apppear in the British Act that enables the creditor, or the creditors of a person who is a non-trader, to force that person into insolvency, in order that the estate may be divided among the creditors.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—No fault can be found with the manner and the moderate tone in which this bill was introduced a fortnight ago, befitting the Minister who brought forward such an important matter affecting the interests of the country. Having been in charge of the bill of 1880 which repealed the insolvency law at that time, it may be expected that I should make a few observations on this measure by which it is now proposed to have a third insolvency law placed upon the Statute-books. In doing so, I certainly have no intention of imitating the example of my hon. friend from Ottawa and discussing this bill at large, because I have understood that the very object of referring the bill to a special committee was to get all the information that we could possibly obtain bearing upon this question before entering upon such a discussion. It would be inconsistent for me, from the course which I propose to take on my own part, to enter upon a discussion at large at the present stage of the measure. In the very lucid exposition which we had from the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the first reading of this bill, the history of insolvency legislation in this country was very clearly set forth. We were told that the first Act had a life of some five or six years and the second a life of another five years, so that in the 27 years of the history of this Dominion we have had 16 or 17 years without any insolvency law, and 10 or 11 years with legislation of this description on the Statute-book. In the year 1879, less than four years after the Act of 1875 had come into operation, a bill was passed in the House of Commons by a large majority for the purpose of repealing that Act. It was opposed by the Government, and it was defeated ultimately by the narrow majority of four. It was again introduced in the year 1880 and on that occasion, to which I wish particularly to call the attention of the House, the repeal bill was carried by the very decided majority of 47 to 17. That result was largely due to the course taken by the then leader of this House, the late Sir Alexander Campbell. In 1880 he explained why he had not in 1879 consented to the passing of the bill repealing the Act, and his chief reason was this, that the Act had been pressed on, he thought, at a very inopportune moment. He said that if we had passed it in 1879, we should have given no opportunity to the various provinces to supply the blank thus left in the insolvency legislation, and that he though it better to let it stand for another year, but, he added, in the meantime he had put himself in communication with the members of the Ontario ministry and the result was that they enacted legislation to supply the void in the province of Ontario thus enabling him to vote for the repeal of the Dominion law altogether. That was the reason why, within twelve months after the first division the Act was repealed by such a decided majority. It is a curious coincidence that we are in an almost analogous position at the present moment to that which was occupied then by Sir Alex. Campbell, and which induced him to consent to the repeal of the Act. Recently a decision has been rendered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council which has settled once for all the legality of the legislation passed in Ontario. We were promised that we should have access to that decision, but as yet, so far as I know, we have had no official copy of it. We have had the explanations of the hon. member who introduced this bill and my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and we know that the decision was of a satisfactory character as far as it went, and the reason why we should have access to it obviously is that we should know how far the local legislatures of the different provinces who have not yet legislated on the subject are justified in providing a substitute for this legislation which is submitted for our consideration here. If the position taken by the late Minister of Justice, Sir Alexander Campbell, was correct, we obviously on the present occasion should take the same course and have this matter understood thoroughly, in the first place as to our powers (and we can only ascertain that by having access to the recent decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council) and in the next place we should then see whether an opportunity should not be given, as he suggested it should be given at all events for 12 months, to the different legislatures to legislate on the subject so far as they can, especially in regard to the difficult subject of preferential assignments. That is one of the reasons given here on a former occasion, and I cite this as a precedent for the guidance of the Government at the present day. I may be told that the country will have an opportunity of inquiring into that, but I submit that it is vain to talk of the country having access to this bill and deciding whether it should pass or not—it is in vain to say so, because I myself having tried my best to get a few copies to distribute and have been unable to procure even one copy, since the introduction of this measure. That is the position of the matter and if I am asked what course I intend personally to pursue, I say this—I have not come here for the purpose of making any factious opposition to this measure or any other measure. I have no objection to this bill being read the second time with the understanding that all members are free to take any course they choose at its future stages. That is, I find, in accord with the general sentiment of the House, and it renders it unnecessary, if I may be allowed to say so (at all events for me), to enter upon a full discussion of the principle of the bill, because as yet we do not know in what shape exactly the measure will be ultimately presented to us. It is going out of our hands into the hands of a committee and there is a certain degree of consistency in the course that has been taken, for this reason—ever since this bill has been printed it has all the time been in a shifting, changing attitude. We were told on a former occasion that great benefit had been derived from the suggestions of the Ottawa Board of Trade. Those suggestions are embodied in certain clauses of the bill, and the bill with those clauses has been reprinted. That is a step arising from paying deference to the wish of other people to be consulted on the principle of the bill. We have not only done that—we have taken another step. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has put the same view on record with regard to this matter, and I do not find that view at all inconsistent with the position I take on the subject. I do not propose to offer any opposition to the appointment of a committee to consider this bill. By referring it to a committee, we shall be making some progress and doing something to lighten the labour of legislation hereafter upon this question. What I do intend to urge most strongly upon the Government is, that no bill of this kind can be expected to be successfully worked unless it has received fair consideration from all the people who are interested in it. I am justified in that view by my hon. friend who introduced this bill. He told us that:

> It would be well to defer the second reading for some eight or ten days at least, in order that the bill may be printed and circulated, and members of the Senate and merchants of the country who are interested, and the traders and debtors who are equally interested with the creditors, may have an opportunity of seeing and reading it, and making such suggestions as they may deem proper under the circumstances.

Now, that is a principle worthy of the Minister who laid it down, and it is the principle on which this important bill (for it is a vital measure) should be treated. I think especially those persons who are interested in it should not have it in their power to say "this bill has been thrown before us as a surprise, and we have had no opportunity of being consulted, and it is hasty legislation." The Dominion of Canada, having been left for the long period of fourteen years without this legislation and without a suggestion of legislation of this kind, can hardly suffer very much from this bill being left over for another year in order that the country may have an opportunity of being consulted about it. That is a proposition which will hardly be combatted. At the same time, if the Government and the House think that it should go before a committee, I am perfectly willing to go and do my share of the work and help the bill on as far as we can, but it would be a great misfortune to all parties, and a misfortune to this House, if we were to originate and press forward and pass a bill without the persons concerned having an opportunity of being consulted on the subject and at the same time it might perhaps be defeated in another place. That may be a selfish and narrow view of the subject, but, at the same time, it is one that ought to occur to every one who has the honour and reputation of this House at heart. On that ground I hope the Minister will consider the question hereafter. Of course he will be guided by circumstances, and I must leave it in the hands of the Government to take whatever course they think best on the subject after due consideration, but I do think that we ought all of us to be guided in this matter very much as the late Minister of Justice, Sir Alexander Campbell, was, and act only in accordance with the well understood wishes of the people. The Minister and the Government should be perfectly satisfied in following this precedent set by Sir Alexander Campbell. They should do it for that reason, and for this other reason that the local legislatures in the provinces who have not yet legislated on insolvency, should have the same opportunity that was given to Ontario to legislate upon the question, and then we might perhaps have a measure that would commend itself to the good sense of this House. If we are to have a well considered measure, one which is to commend itself to the good feeling of this House, it should be one which has been submitted to those interested and which has not been decided upon ex parte views on the side of the people interested here, but that it should go over the wide extent of this Dominion and that every one interested should have an opportunity of expressing his views upon it. When we come to look at the catalogue of people interested in the list mentioned by my hon. friend from Ottawa, you will find that this legislation affects directly or indirectly every man throughout the wide borders of this Dominion. The hon. Minister, I am sure, will give me credit for the motive by which I am influenced of not desiring to obstruct this measure in any way, yet I hope he will see the necessity of taking the course which his predecessor did and giving the provinces an opportunity to legislate upon the subject and perhaps save us all the necessity of legislating upon it here, because after all, so far as I can understand the feeling of the country, it is this—a feeling of distrust and opposition to bankruptcy legislation so called. But on the other hand there is a feeling, perhaps not so strong, in favour of legislating against preferential assignments which have made such a disturbance. If he takes that course and approaches the question in the way I have suggested, I hope the House will be spared the necessity of considering this question again—at all events for another term of fourteen years. As we have a precedent and as the country has gone on increasing in progress and prosperity during the whole of the time we have been without an insolvency law, it will be for the House to decide, each one for himself, whether he will take the responsibility of pressing this measure before the country has been consulted and expressed its approval of the proposed legislation.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—The hon. gentleman speaks about the decision of the Privy Council relating to the prerogative of the local legislatures, which I take it applies to all the legislatures. Would the hon. gentleman favour the House with the scope of that decision?

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I am afraid I cannot. I must give the same answer to that question that the Minister gave the other day—I can only speak from what I saw in the papers. My impression from what I read is that it goes the length of enabling these provinces to legislate on this crucial question of preferential and fraudulent assignments and the fair distribution of the assets of insolvent estates.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I wrote to the Minister of Justice on the very point raised by the hon. gentleman from Albert, asking him if the Government had yet had an official copy.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I have it as reported and find in it no bar to the proposed legislation.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The Minister explained it in a note that it decides this point that the Provincial Governments have a right to pass laws for the distribution of the assets of judgment debtors in the absence of an Insolvency Act.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I desire to say a very few words in a general way on this important measure. A system of bankruptcy had no place in the early history of Western Canada. On the contrary, in the first Act passed by the first Parliament of Upper Canada, in adopting the laws of England as the rule of decision in all matters of controversy relative to property and civil rights, the laws relating to bankruptcy and the poor laws were specially excluded. The condition of the country, the small trade and the scattered population did not warrant anything of the kind and the spirit of the people was rather adverse to the adoption of a bankruptcy system. And so it continued for some fifty years in Ontario. As time passed on, and as commercial transactions expanded and the trade of the country largely increased, it was deemed necessary and just to pass a bankruptcy law in Western Canada, but it never quite took root with us. The laws were all of a temporary character. They were to continue for a certain period and were afterwards enlarged as occasion called for it. I think the first Act of the kind was passed in 1843.

It was found necessary to amend it, and it was so amended in 1846—these are points which my hon. friend the Minister has not touched—it was amended so as to extend it and to continue it for a longer period. Then came the Act of 1849 giving the bankruptcy law another lease of life and it was followed in 1855 by legislation continuing the law until 1856, when it ended. It cannot be said —and I have had some experience in the working of it—that any of these acts was entirely satisfactory. There were two principles to be considered and acted upon, two views to be taken with respect to the administration of a bankruptcy law; one view was to delegate the management and conduct of the estate largely to the court, the other that it should be largely in the hands of creditors. Neither view was fully carried out, and several Acts that were passed were unsatisfactory. One reason for this was that the laws provided for the appointment of an official assignee, and the official assignee had not always that business knowledge to enable him to conduct his business properly in the best interests of the estate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—It was very often found that it was the cause of throwing the estate into bankruptcy to be eaten up. The creditors, unless the estate was large and a paying one, stood aside and very seldom interfered and the affair was run largely by the official assignees. They were perhaps somewhat over-desirous to better their means and they certainly made a good deal of money out of the estates that were placed in their hands. A difficulty was often experienced on account of the creditors standing aside and the official assignee acting largely as the representative of the debtor. There was always a difficulty in determining whether the debtor was entitled to a discharge, whether he had fully and fairly complied with all the requirements of the law and acted honestly; the official assignee gave very little aid to the court in determining that question, and the creditors did not feel, in many cases, sufficient interest in the matter to take any part in it. The hon. Minister has made a very clear explanation of the proposed Act, and also indicated wherein the measure before the House differs from previous Acts and all must find the advantage of his able exposition. With regard to Dominion legislation, I would merely say that in my experience the law of 1869 worked fairly well on the whole, but when it expired no one shed a tear, I think. The imperfect working of that Act was largely due to the carelessness of creditors, and possibly something to the greed of official assignees. At all events the bankruptcy system has remained dead for several years. Upon the principle of the bill—the policy of a bankrupt law for Canada—not without hesitation I have arrived at the conclusion that having regard to the present expanded condition of trade and commerce in this country, with the contigencies incident to commercial transactions on a large scale, the time has come when in the public interest the trading community are entitled to a bankruptcy law as a permanent necessity. The dealings of our business men with merchants of other countries have become enormous. Commerce and mercantile credit are easily affected and have delicate movements. Those who trust are sensitive, and naturally the outside creditor wants to know the aids and protections the law gives for the collection of debts and the punishment of fraudulent debtors in the country of his debtor, and to find it together in one general law for the whole country. Yes, I think the time has come to enact one general bankruptcy law for the whole Dominion. It is, however, not to be dealt with in a hasty or perfunctory manner. A bankruptcy system is not the simple thing that people suppose it to be. It bristles with difficulties, as all commercial nations have found. True the objects and principles of such a law are clear enough and may be comprehended in two points :—

1. The collection and distribution of an insolvent estate, in an economical and speedy manner amongst his creditors.

2. The discharge of the debtor from all liability, if he has acted fairly and has not been guilty of fraud or fraudulent concealment.

The difficulty lies in combining and regulating these two objects. Without at present entering into details, upon which I reserve myself for other occasions, looking at the bill before us in a general way, I think in the main it is the best measure of the kind I have seen and the most suited to Canada. The Government are entitled to credit for preparing it and taking the responsibility of introducing it. I do think it has been framed with a singleness of aim in the best interest of commerce and of the Canadian poeple, and in this, as in all other matters, I have full confidence in the desire of the Government to act justly and in the best and highest interest of the Canadian people without fear, favour or affection. But it must be remembered, all the suggestions for the measure and its details come from one side only, the creditor—necessarily so, for few men are willing to contemplate the possibility of their becoming bankrupt, and that the debtor side has not been brought before the Government, we may conclude at least not fully. The importance, therefore, of a thorough examination of the measure is obvious, extending a full opportunity to all to be heard and particularly those who at any time or in any way were engaged in working under previous bankruptcy laws. I am glad, therefore, that my hon. friend and leader has recognized the duty of doing this, and I think in the best way, by the appointment of a large special committee for the purposes he has indicated. I will have satisfaction in voting for the second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If no other hon. gentleman wishes to address the House, I shall say a few words on this measure. I concur with the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat in thinking that this bill contains the elements of a better measure than any of its predecessors since the time of confederation. The framers of this bill have had the experience of the workings of the previous insolvency laws, and they have had the benefit of suggestions from persons interested in insolvency legislation in different parts of the country. The course adopted by the Government, in sending copies of the bill into the different business centres, was a very wise one, and as the hon. gentleman from Amherst has said, the result has been that very considerable modifications have been made in the drafting of the bill, and, further, since the repeal of the Act of 1875, which took place in the session of 1880, there has been passed in England a bankruptcy law which is generally recognized, with the amendments made since its original adoption, as being decidedly better than any previous bankruptcy law which existed in the mother country, and the government here have had the benefit of the recent English legislation as an example. I am glad to know from the bill that they have followed the example of the mother country to a very considerable extent. I humbly submit that they might have followed that example still further with advantage; but while I agree with the hon. member from Barrie so far, I cannot say that I agree in his conclusions altogether. The Act of 1875 was repealed in 1880. There was some hesitation on the part of the Government in allowing the repeal. It was postponed from the session of 1879 to that of 1880; but I do not think that any hon. gentleman who voted for the repeal of the Act in 1880 has ever since seen any reason to regret his action. The general feeling throughout the country when that Act of 1875 was repealed was one of relief, and the question is whether anything has taken place since 1880 to render it desirable or necessary that we should undertake to a certain extent, to renew the condition of things which existed between 1869 and 1880. It does not strike me that anything has taken place; on the contrary, I think that one of the reasons why the country has not suffered perhaps as much from the recent commercial depression as some other countries, is just the fact that owing to the non-existence of any insolvency law business has been conducted in Canada during the past few years on very conservative lines. As things now stand, there being no general insolvency law, the creditor is very careful before giving credit to know the character of the man to whom he is asked to sell goods. He examines carefully, and he does not give credit further than he has good reason to believe is safe; and on the other hand the purchaser proposing to buy, is not likely to take more than he thinks he can pay for, as he feels that the result of his buying more than his business will justify will be to land him in insolvency, out of which he is very unlikely to come better off than he goes in, but that he will have to pay his debts in full or suffer severely. I do not think there is any such crisis in our commercial history as to render it necessary that we should depart from the existing mode of transacting business. I do not think that this is a time when we should encourage speculation. The conservative course which we have taken is the best and we had better continue in the line in which we have gone during the past few years. The hon. gentleman from Barrie, intimated that he thought the time had come for an Insolvent Act. Well, he did not produce the evidence to show that it had. If commercial houses were going down like nine pins, in all the business centres of the country, the Government and Parliament might feel that some measure of this sort was necessary ; but there has never been any wholesale collapse of business houses ; and I do not think that there is any need for the adoption of a law such as this would be, if passed. The hon. gentleman referred to the general objects of insolvency laws, which he very truly stated were two : one, the equitable distribution of the estate of a debtor who is unable to meet all his liabilities ; the other, the discharge of the honest debtor, after his goods have been handed over to his creditors and distributed amongst them. Now, hon. gentlemen, under this decision of the Privy Council, which I have not had the good fortune to see, it appears that the provinces can legislate for the equal distribution of insolvent estates. I think that is the important thing, and as a rule if a debtor acts honestly ; and his goods are equitably distributed amongst his creditors, the creditors in this country, at any rate, are not disposed to be hard upon him. There are, of course, exceptional cases where creditors do deal harshly with their debtors, but these exceptional cases are not so numerous as to justify us, in imperilling the commercial condition of the country, to get rid of them. The one object will be met by the provincial legislation and the other object is not of any great practical consequence under present circumstances. Under the insolvent law, as it was operated before —whether it would be the case under this bill if it became law or not, I do not know—as a general thing the equitable distribution was a distribution between the assignees and the legal gentlemen who were employed in settling the estate. As a rule, the creditors did not get very much of a distribution ; and I am not at all clear, no matter how much pains we may devote to this measure which is now before us, that we shall be able to produce a measure which will have a very different result from that which we had before. There is another point of very considerable importance ; as far as I am aware, there has not been any wide-spread demand for this legislation. The country generally was resting in a state of perfect calm and content on the subject of an insolvency law. I think that 99 men out of 100 had not the slightest desire that such a law should be enacted.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Some persons and some classes of persons, are anxious that there should be an insolvency law, but I do not think the great bulk of our population look for it. We have not had any large number of petitions placed upon our table, asking for the enactment of this law, and as the present condition of things has been on the whole fairly satisfactory, and has produced much less discontent than the insolvency legislation of former years led to, I do not think it is the duty of Parliament or the Government to introduce or at any rate to adopt legislation with respect to insolvency now. Of course there is not any serious objection to the line suggested by the hon. gentleman from Amherst ; it will be very useful exercise for the mental faculties of the members of this House to meet in this committee and to carefully consider this bill and suggest amendments to it, so that if this time of commercial stringency, which I hope is not in the immediate future, should arrive at some future day, we shall have a measure ready to introduce for the purpose of relieving the number of insolvents who will be anxious to take the benefit of an Act of that kind at that time. But, meanwhile, I hope that after the Government get the benefit of the wisdom of this House in connection with this bill, they will allow it to remain quiescent for an indefinite time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend from Halifax must surely have overlooked the representations which have proceeded from the leading boards of trade throughout the Dominion of Canada in regard to the necessity for the passage of an Insolvent Act at a very early date. My hon. friend from Halifax appears to be very uneasy in mind, by reason of no demand having been made by the public for this legislation. From my own limited observation upon this question, I find that all or most of the leading cities throughout the Dominion have demanded from this Parliament the passage of such legislation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Halifax has not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would remind my hon. friend that the commercial interests of the Dominion are not entirely wrapped up in Halifax. There are other points throughout the Dominion which speak commercially as well as Halifax.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend said all the leading commercial cities. I simply said, Halifax had not—that was all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I was about to observe when my hon. friend intervened, that if he had closely examined the text of the recent decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, because I think very few have had the opportunity of seeing the judgment as fully reported, he would have observed from the text of that judgment, the necessity of an immediate action on the part of this Parliament in the passage of legislation of this character. That decision has gone so far as to intimate that the various provinces of the Dominion have the right to pass insolvency legislation in the absence of the passage of such legislation by the Dominion Parliament. This will lead to a diversity of legislation which will prove very serious to the commercial interests of Canada as a whole. It is unnecessary to point out to this House the necessity of having uniformity in legislation with regard to the protection of all commercial interests throughout this Dominion, particularly where those interests are of such a large and diversified class as we find in this country owing to geographical distances. At the present time we find the provinces in the far west legislating in regard to distribution of debtors' estates without the knowledge of those living as far east as the Atlantic and who may be equally interested in those estates. We have some legislatures of the provinces enacting legislation of a very restrictive character in which creditors are compelled to do within a limited time certain acts, otherwise they cannot participate in the distribution of those estates. The consequence is we have manufacturing houses near the Atlantic coast deeply interested in debtors' estates on the far Pacific and yet if they do not take a particular action within a limited time they are debarred from participating in those estates. Surely this is of considerable importance to the commercial world. Surely it is of importance that the commercial classes throughout the Dominion should have knowledge of the legislation which is on the Statute-books in regard to those interests in which they are particularly interested, so that those who are residing in one province will not be able to absorb the whole of the estate to the disadvantage of those who are interested in that same estate living at the other extremity of the Dominion? I would point out to the hon. member from Halifax and other hon. members who are opposed to the passage of this legislation at the present time, that if legislation of this character is not immediately adopted we will have every province of the Dominion following out the intimation given by the Privy Council as to the power of the provinces under the British North America Act to pass insolvent legislation. Each province will become a law to itself in regard to this question, so that those residing distant from the debtor's estate would be entirely precluded from participating in it through want of knowledge of this diversified legislation. Therefore I say it is the duty of Parliament to see that uniform legislation respecting insolvent estates is placed on the Statute-book so that diverse views will not be held and enacted by the various legislatures throughout the Dominion. I think this is a question of the very greatest importance to us as legislators. Now, my hon. friend appears to be very apprehensive in case the estate should be swallowed up by assignees, and the legal gentlemen who surround the assignees whenever there is an estate t be distributed. I would remind my hono friend that under the present provincial .system the same difficulty confronts us. At the present time the power or authority is given under the statutes for the sheriff to take possession of the estate and to distribute amongst the creditors. Power is also given for receivers to be appointed and for legal fees to be contracted payable out of debtors' estates so that we have a repetition of this same difficulty being enacted at the present time in many of the provinces. Now surely it does not require one of very great discernment to immediately see that under a uniform system, safeguarded by legislation as it will be by this Parliament, those difficulties can be easily obviated which have been referred to by my hon. friend, and which are in existence to-day and asserting themselves fully as prominently under provincial legislation as under the old Insolvency Act of which mention has been made. I think the time has come, regard being had to the recent decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, when this legislation should be enacted.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I feel very much towards this bill as my hon. friend from Amherst does. It is placed before us in a somewhat exceptional attitude having been duly foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne, it is therefore a Government measure, and yet it is to be submitted to a large committee for careful consideration. It is very important for us to know at this stage, whether in agreeing to the second reading of the bill we are absolutely committed, according to the general rule, to the principle of the measure. I take it to be understood, after the expression of my hon. friend from Amherst, which has not been dissented from, that we may go on and pass the second reading and after that discuss the details of the measure without being absolutely committed to its principle. The importance of a Bankruptcy Act seems to be acknowledged both in England and in this country, at times, but there seems to be a great deal less hesitation in getting rid of such laws than there is in the passage of them. That has been the case not only in Canada, but in the United States, where, if I mistake not, during the last 100 years or more they have had the advantage of a federal bankruptcy law only some 15 or 20 years altogether. I may say in reply to the hon. member from Calgary, who has just taken his seat, that if difficulties would spring up from giving provincial legislatures in this country the right to legislate upon matters of insolvency, how much greater would be those difficulties, according to his reasoning, throughout the United States, where the commercial interests are so much greater and more extended than ours? There, as I understand it, they have only had the advantage of a federal law for short periods of time, I think the result of two or three enactments during a whole century. The state laws there are sufficient to enable them to deal with insolvency in each particular state. Another thing occurs to me in connection with the legislation in the United States regarding insolvency, there has been a clamour there occasionally, as there has been here occasionally, for a general law, and very recently there has been a considerable agitation for such legislation. Two insolvency bills of different characteristics have been submitted to Congress. One which is call the Terry bill, is very highly commended by leading jurists all over the country and by a great many boards of trade as being an improvement upon the former Federal Insolvency Acts. That bill, so far as I remember, has an advantage over the measure submitted in this House for our consideration in so far as its brevity goes, and I think brevity is an important point. A long bill is apt to confuse the public, laymen at all events. It may be very useful for lawyers, but it is very desirable, in passing a general law regulating the commerce of the country, that it should be as simple and plain and as easily understood as possible, and without being too long in its provisions. The Terry bill, which is so highly spoken of in the United States, is all embraced in 70 sections, while the bill that is before us has nearly double that number. Of course the number of sections does not altogether indicate the length of a bill, but the Terry bill itself is not half the length of the measure which is now submitted for our consideration. I was very much interested in hearing from the hon. gentleman from Amherst that there had been a decision affecting the powers of the local legislature of Ontario, and of course provincial powers generally, because I differ somewhat from the view put forth by the hon. member from Calgary—I think that the difficulties that he pointed out of having different provincial legislation would not be so great as the advantages of having legislation adapted to the peculiar circumstances which may locally exist. For instance, in the east there may be circumstances connected with the trade of the country which might require a different enactment from legislation required on the Pacific coast. Therefore, I can see very considerable advantages that might be derived from allowing the local legislatures to exercise full jurisdiction in these matters. My observation with regard to insolvency practice in the province from which I come is that there is no real law bearing upon the subject. The course taken is by making an assignment. The objection taken to that course, so far as I have heard, is not serious. The estate is wound up very cheaply and the proceeds are divided among the creditors. The great complaint made about it is that the insolvent gives preferences, and those preferential creditors take perhaps all there is and some of the creditors, who are just as much entitled to a portion of the estate, are left without anything. There seems to have been heretofore no power in the local legislatures to prevent that system of fraud I may call it—because it is dishonest and immoral. If legislation could be devised by which any effort at concealment, or anything which is intended to defraud the honest creditor could be prevented, the practice which exists now would seem, as far as my observation extends, to meet the case as well as a cumbrous Dominion bankruptcy law would. I am speaking more particularly of what I happen to know about the rural districts and villages in New Brunswick. The cities seem to clamour for a law. A good many of the boards of trade —not all of them—have passed resolutions favouring a bankruptcy law. I think some boards of trade in cities are opposed to such a law, but we most recollect that periodically the boards of trade of cities make a demand for a Bankruptcy Act. The singular feature of it is that they do not continue it. They have not the advantage of being stable. After two, or three or four years, generally by common consent, these laws are repealed. Now that is a very great evil. It would be very much better, if we are to have a bankruptcy law like this, to amend rather than repeal it. If it is really a desirable principle, that we should have a bankruptcy law on the Statute-book, certainly if any of its provisions should be found not to work as well as expected—because that is common to all laws—and public opinion justifies an amendment, it should not be necessary to repeal the law altogether. But that has not been the experience either in Canada or in the United States. I rose merely to set myself right with regard to this matter, and to say that while I am not particularly favourable to the passage of such an Act this year, yet if my hon. friend's view is a correct one, that we can consent to the passage of the second reading with a view to examining it more carefully and making it as perfect as possible, I am willing that the bill should be read the second time and referred to the committee.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not agree with my hon. friend from Albert, that it is well that each province should have its local legislation with regard to the distribution of insolvents' estates. In this country, where the trade is so extended throughout every part of it, we should have a uniform law preventing preferential assignments and providing for an equitable distribution of the assets of estates. I do not agree with my hon. friend from Calgary, who says that there is a great clamour for this Act. I believe the demand comes principally from men who are reckless in giving credit and thereby demoralize the trade of the country by throwing large amounts of bankrupt goods on the market. I agree with my hon. friend from Halifax, when he says that the country breathed freely after we disposed of the Bankruptcy Act, in 1880. We all felt that it was a relief. Since then, business has been done on a better commercial basis. There has not been the reckless credit that was given before that, and the country has profited by the repeal of the Act. I approach this question with a great deal of timidity, fearing that whatever law we pass may entail the consequences which followed the legislation of 1869 and 1875. I believe that those laws were largely injurious in consequence of the creditors themselves not looking after the estates of the debtors, and the incapacity largely of the officials which had control of estates. If this bill should become law, I hope that men of capacity and capable of managing estates will be chosen for the position of assignees, men whom it will be safe to intrust with the assets. I quite agree with the hon. member from Amherst that we should hasten slowly with this legislation. When we consider the great injury which the other Acts brought on this country, when we remember the widespread desolation, I may say, that accompanied the existence of those Acts, we ought to hasten slowly, give every one an opportunity to carefully consider this bill in all its details, and make representations to the committee to be appointed, so that when we approach this bill again, we may have heard from every part of the country and from every person who is disposed to help us in perfecting this legislation. Bankruptcy and Insolvency Acts are innovations of the common law. We all know and are familiar with the principles upon which they are based—that for persons, traders, unable to pay their creditors in full, means should be provided as far as possible of satisfying creditors out of debtors' estates, relieving the debtors from their pressure and burdens, which they would not likely by their own unaided efforts overcome. This looks well and is very nice in theory, but has proved very bad in practice, at least in this country. Difficulties always have attended and probably always will attend the framing of such laws, and much more so the administration of them so as to make them perfectly satisfactory to all parties. The greatest object to be sought after and promoted in a Bankruptcy Act should be the raising of the general tone of commercial morality, by doing all that is possible towards securing honest and fair trading, and to diminish the number of failures. But this ideal has never been reached. The repealed Acts of 1869 providing for voluntary assignments, and of 1875 for compulsory assignments, were failures and everybody seemed glad of their repeal. They did not promote honest and fair trading, or diminish the number of failures, but the reverse. Gradually since then the mercantile community have been pressing for some law whereby debtors would be debarred from making preferential assignments, and their assets would be equitably divided among all their creditors, punishing reckless traders and those who buy knowing they cannot pay, and that it should be a uniform law applicable to the whole of Canada. I do not know that more than that has been pressed for, that it should extend beyond traders, the principle of distinction between them and non-traders being that the creditors of traders always were to some extent considered partners in their speculations, whilst common debtors, non-traders, were considered alone responsible for their insolvency. The bill before us recognizes some distinction between the two classes, as by it the traders can only assign or be put in bankruptcy by the action of creditors, whilst all other debtors can make a voluntary assignment and apply for it under the Act, but they cannot be forced into insolvency. The English Acts since 1861 extend their benefits alike to all classes of debtors. I observe this Act is also intended to apply to all traders and debtors who, since the repeal of the Insolvent Act of 1875, have made assignments without preference or priority. We should hasten slowly with this bill, giving the remotest parts of Canada ample opportunity of fully considering it in all its details and to make representations thereon, and thus, if possible avoid the errors of the Act of 1875 which we repealed in 1880.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I hope the leader of the Government will not push the bill through this House too rapidly. The people throughout the country should know what is going on here. Some hon. gentlemen who have preceded me say that the public want this legislation. The Board of Trade at Montreal does, I believe, so does the Board of Trade here in Ottawa and the Board of Trade at Toronto, but we had a petition yesterday from the Board of Trade in Belleville against it; and I believe that 90 per cent of the people of this country are against this legislation. I have a lively recollection of the old bankruptcy law. I was in the House of Commons when it was passed, and I was there when it was repealed, and I know there was an expression of relief all over the country when that Act was wiped from the Statute-book. While that law was in force there was no chance for the honest trader. Now, who are asking for this legislation, the debtors or the creditors? Are the people of the country asking for it? Are the farmers asking for it? You put the farmers in for what? The board of trade likely wants to put the farmers in as a makeweight to make the legislation popular in the country, to lead the farmer to believe that if he gets into trouble he can get out of it. Does the labouring man want it? Do the millers want it? Do the stone-cutters want it? Does the producer or consumer want it? We have heard a great deal about the producer and the consumer during the last week in the debate on the tariff,—do they want this legislation? No, a few traders want it—men who are speculating and living on other people's industries. I know that under the present system somebody gets his pay. Under the old bankruptcy law—and this will be no better—the assignee and one or two hangers-on got it all, and nobody else got his pay. I suppose the Government will prevail with this measure, but I warn them to be careful; the people of this country are watching them. In 1878, that old bankruptcy law had a good deal to do with changing the political situation in this couhtry. I have a lively recollection of that, and I would say now, if my vote could throw out the bill right here, it should be given without hesitation. I shall not object to the second reading of the bill now because it is not printed in French. I do not want to exercise that right, but I think that time should be given for its proper consideration, and that it should not be forced through. It is not right, I contend, to read it a second time now; we should wait until we hear from the people of the country. Why should I be committed to a bill that I am satisfied is against the interest of the people of this country, which I am satisfied the people do not want? If they only understood it, this House would be flooded with petitions against it. What petitions have we got for it? Who is asking for it? No one is working for it, and why should we be anxious to force legislation on the people when it is not demanded? They will tell us when they want it. After you get through a great commercial crisis in this country, you may put such a law on the Statute-book, but a country as sound as Canada is to-day does not need a bankruptcy law. While all the rest of the world is going through a financial crisis, the institutions of the Dominion of Canada stand on rock bottom all the time, and here you are bringing in an insolvency law to give relief when none is needed. I say it is a libel on the country, to bring in such a law.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I desire to make a few remarks on this bill before the discussion closes. We are all aware this is one of the most difficult problems to solve—the passing of a bankruptcy law which will meet the changing needs and requirements in business. It is an exceedingly difficult problem to solve, but it appears to me, as legislators in this country, it is our duty to endeavour to solve the problem; and I believe it can be solved. The speakers who have preceded me condemn the old Insolvency Act in no measured terms, and I am not surprised at it. I have suffered very severely from it, but who is to blame for that? It was due to the administration of the Act and not the Act itself. The creditors themselves were largely to blame for the manner in which that Act was administered. My own opinion is that what we want is the simplest possible law under which the assets of the insolvent will be equitably distributed amongst his creditors. The old system of appointing assignees ought to be done away with altogether, in my opinion. The assignee of a bankrupt should be the court, which has the means of administering and the machinery for doing it and is amenable to the law. I quite agree with what has been said with reference to this Act. It is capable of being made an admirable Act. With the amendments which it is hoped will be made to it in committee I have no doubt that we shall solve the problem of giving the country a good bankruptcy law. I remember in the old times when there was a class who went into business designedly for the purpose of making money out of their creditors rather than out of their business, and the effect upon the general trade was exceedingly demoralizing. The honest man who was struggling to pay his debts and make a living for himself had no chance against the man who purchased his goods and paid for them at 50 cents on the dollar. I think that a bankruptcy law such as we have before us will prevent that sort of business, and I shall certainly vote in favour of having the bill submitted to the committee.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have had considerable experience in the working of the old Acts of 1869 and 1875, and wish to say a few words with reference to the matter now before us. This bill is certainly an improvement on the old Act; it reduces the amount of preferences to a very great extent, and I have no doubt that if this bill is passed the good effects of it will be felt throughout the length and breadth of the country. I have heard it stated that there is no demand for this legislation. The commercial bodies to a great extent throughout this country have, through their representatives, the boards of trade, demanded such an Act, and I believe our trade with England has suffered to a certain extent for want of such legislation. We require a law as simple as possible, in order that the assets of an estate may be realized with the least possible delay and the least possible cost. If the creditors themselves make injudicious appointments, it is their own fault. I believe under this Act that the proper men will be selected, and the law will be carried out in a business way and will have a beneficial influence on the credit system of the country. I contend that there is too much credit in the country—that people are too anxious to give credit. The trouble does not rest altogether with the debtors; the creditors are continually sending their runners throughout the country and forcing their goods in every direction. They do not exercise a proper discretion, and to that cause I attribute a great deal of the trouble in the past. I believe, however, that they are taking cognizance of that fact, and will act more judiciously in the future. If the debtors and creditors of this country know that there is an Act under which the honest man will have his remedy and which will act as a deterrent to the dishonest man, I believe it will have a beneficial effect. A great deal of the trouble and disasters and failures which have occurred in this country are not to be attributed to legitimate transactions entered into by the individual, but to outside speculation. The moment a man finds he has a few dollars to spare, he goes into some outside speculation, and this is the cause of a great many of the failures that have taken place. Now that could be made a fundamental cause of complaint; and I contend that it is necessary that a trader should be obliged to keep a set of books, which would be open to public inspection, and that an accountant should be allowed to examine those books and say whether he has conducted his business properly or has acted in a reprehensible way. If his conduct has been reprehensible, he should not be given a discharge on any consideration. That would have a good moral effect. I know that there has been injustice done to the creditors in the past under the old Acts. Debtors have gone to Montreal to make arrangements, and have asked "What is the current rate going for making compromises?" That was the state of affairs until the people became so enraged at the consequences of the old insolvency law that they were willing to repeal it at any sacrifice; but time has revealed a different state of things and I believe that if you polled a vote of the Dominion to-morrow you would find the majority of the country in favour of a judicious law whereby the honest man would be protected and the dishonest man should receive such punishment as would deter others from committing the same offence. In all commercial countries they should have such a law. I believe that is generally admitted, and I do not see why this country should be an exception to the rule. Of course it should be well administered, as every law should be, and I believe this law is capable of being so administered that every man will agree as to its benefits. The purpose of the committee is to allow every man to come before the committee and express his views freely, and I have no doubt the Government will be pleased to entertain any suggestions which may be made, and will endeavour to make the law as beneficial to all classes of the community as possible. With respect to non-traders, that is a moot question; there is great diversity of opinion upon that point and it is very difficult to come to a decision. For my part I do not like to encourage speculation. The people do not feel the responsibility at the time they go into it; everything looks very well, but the day of reckoning comes when they have lost all they had and they have no assets and no estate. It is no punishment to that man to be forced into the insolvency court, or to go into the insolvency court, but whether you should relieve that man from his liability or not is a matter which should be well considered, and I have no doubt this committee will consider it. For my part, I would rather have it apply simply to traders. I am sure that the committee will give all the time necessary and it does not follow that the bill should be rushed through this year, it is before the hon. gentlemen of the Senate, and I do not think a more appropriate body could be selected. They are all gentlemen well versed in trade and commerce, and if they give it attention I think they will make a perfect bill, whether they take three or six or nine months to do it. I would advise them to take the necessary time to make a bill that will give satisfaction to all parties in the country and I have no doubt the Government will consent to that. I do not think they are desirous to force this bill on the country if the people are not prepared for it. I have understood that it was the cry throughout the country than an insolvency law was required, that the country was suffering from the want of it, and our credit in England was weakened; if that is the case, I think it is time to take cognizance of the matter and enact a law which will overcome this difficulty. It is a matter of business, and we are all business men and have had business transactions, and I think if we bring our knowledge to bear upon the subject in the way that I have indicated, it will have the desired effect. It is a matter of very great importance and general interest to the country, and we should all be willing to do everything we can to bring us a law which will reach the desired end without entailing disastrous results on any section of the community. Those are my views. From my past experience I am of the opinion that a law of this kind is necessary in the interest of the trading community; I do not think it is desirable to wait any longer, especially as it is understood that these enactments of the local legislatures give no power to relieve the honest man who, through misfortune becomes unable to pay his liabilities. If I go and sign off to-morrow for a man indebted to me in Ontario, that man is not discharged from the payment of that liability at any future day if he is ever possessed of means to do it. I do not think that is fair. If a man gives up all that he has and his whole estate is distributed he should be relieved from responsibility; and that is one of the safeguards in the Act before us. Then, concerning the judiciary, I should like to see that reduced to a minimum, because, with all due respect, the judiciary are very anxious to make orders to carry out a certain practice and that causes loss of time and expense, and in many instances it is not satisfactory. I suppose it is not going out of the record to say that the legal gentlemen, and particularly judges of the inferior courts, as far as Ontario is concerned, are not business men; they do not understand the first principles of business and I do not therefore consider myself safe in allowing them to consider a pure business transaction. For my part, I should allow the creditors to have every opportunity of disposing of the estate and to settle in a business like manner everything pertaining to it. Other matters of a legal nature, where questions of law might arise, such as the application for a discharge or questions relating to fraud or other acts of a questionable character, might be taken before the county judge, but in all other cases, as much as possible leave it in the hands of creditors because they are in fact the only people interested. They are the only parties who lose in the transaction, and I think they should dispose of all matters relating to the business affairs and transactions in settling the estate. Let the legal gentlemen have such fees as are necessary for the purpose of getting the discharge from the creditors, but do not let them obtain heavy fees for discussing and arranging business matters.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Niagara)—I do not rise to discuss the merits of the bill, but I desire to endorse the sentiments of the hon. member from Amherst so well expressed. This is a most important bill and I think the traders of the country should be consulted. I have sent out a few copies of the bill to have opinions margined upon them and sent back to me. I have not had sufficient answers yet. If we could have some legislation by which creditors could be protected from their own injudicious and imprudent conduct it would be the wisest act we could possibly pass in this House. The old Bankruptcy Act might be called an act for the purpose of destroying honest traders. I know in one town in particular where I lived, under the old law, men were constantly failing. I knew of men to fail periodically; their goods were put upon the market and sold for 40 and 50 and sometimes 30 cents on the dollar, to the same man who had failed to the detriment of the honest trader alongside who was paying 100 cents on the dollar from year to year. That dishonest trader very often ruled the honest trader who was in business on the same street. All these things have to be wisely considered. Therefore, I think it is well that we should not hurry this bill, and I am not satisfied the Government do not intend to hurry it. If we are to have a bill of the kind at all, it ought to be passed by this House after the most deliberate consultation with the people of the country, both creditors and debtors, and the creditors ought to particularly take care in this bill to protect themselves against their own imprudent conduct.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It is evident from what we have heard of this debate, to-day, that very little can be said in favour of insolvency legislation. The experience of the province from which I come does not warrant anybody in asking for such legislation. The only reason I can see why we should now legislate on this matter is that several of the provinces of the Dominion have already legislated on the subject, and there is a divergence in the laws passed by the different legislatures in that way. While it is very desirable that there should be one uniform law for the whole Dominion, I am prepared to give my support to this bill and let it go to a committee of this House for consideration. It is very desirable that we should have a uniform law, and that that law should be as simple and as inexpensive as it is possible to make it. We know that the former Act, which some hon. gentlemen thought would be the means of curtailing credit was the very means of extending credit and wholesale dealers, knowing that they had this law to fall back back upon, gave credit more extensively than they have been doing recently without an insolvent law. I fear that if a law of this kind should be enacted it will have the same effect with the wholesale dealers—they will consider that under an insolvency law they will have a certain claim upon the estate of the debtor and will be more lavish in giving credit than they are at present. As it is now, we know that in the Maritime Provinces, which get their principal supplies probably from the Upper Provinces, numbers of commercial travellers go to traders and endeavour to sell them as large quanties of goods as possible. They are only desirous to supply the traders with all the goods they will buy and when they do that and endeavour to force their goods on the market, they should take the chance of the debtor being able to pay them. If a crop fails and the merchant is unable to collect his bills, the probability is that under an insolvency law he is forced into the bankruptcy court, whereas without a law of that kind the merchants who supply him are willing to carry him forward through that year to enable him to tide over the bad time and carry on his business successfully with benefit to the supplier and to the trader himself. We know that by the former Act, as stated by some hon. gentlemen, persons in trade who become insolvent had their goods thrown on the market, and the very fact of these goods being sold at 30 cents or 40 cents on the dollar, was the means of ruining men who had been in a good position alongside of the insolvent. We must be very careful in legislating now to prevent, as far as possible, any difficulty of this kind arising. The expenses under the former Act were entirely too large. An estate when once put into the bankruptcy court seldom paid any considerable dividend. The officials generally collected a very much larger proportion of the estate than the creditors did, and it is desirable, in passing a law of the kind, to make it as simple and inexpensive as possible. If we do not do that, it will be an injury instead of a benefit to the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL.—It is not my intention to make any observations on the details of the bill, commendatory or otherwise, but I rise to say that if it should be considered that the House in adopting this motion for the second reading of the bill committed us to adopting the principle of the bill without any further question, I should be strongly inclined to range myself with my hon. friend from Monck and join him in throwing it out. I do not consider, however, that the second reading of the bill, if adopted, would involve any such consequence after the explanations that have been made. Rule 42 provides that "the principle of a bill is usually debated at the second reading." That is not a very binding rule—it simply states the fact. The use of such an expression intimates that on certain occasions it might be considered desirable that that practice should not be followed, just as in the present instance. It is quite true further on in our rules we read that no arguments are admitted against the principle of a bill in Committee of the Whole. You will observe that it is not proposed that this bill shall be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole. The proposition is to send it to a special committee, and in that committee we should not be bound by the rule which is here specially confined to our doings in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—After the committee report.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—If it is submitted to a committee of the whole, after it is reported, it could not be discussed in the committee. In the meantime, the proposition is not to submit it to a committee of the whole, but to a large special committee for the purpose of carefully investigating the contents of the bill and obtaining all the information and assistance they can from persons well acquainted with commercial matters and interested in the bill—a very wise and proper course, in my judgment, in dealing with a question of such vast importance, for I entirely concur in the sentiments expressed by the hon. member from Amherst as to the importance of the measure. It is quite obvious, from the remarks made by those in favour of the bill and opposed to it, that it is a measure which requires very careful consideration. Without going into the merits of the bill, one of the details appears to involve the very principle—that which the hon. gentleman from Ottawa has called attention to, defining who is a non-trader. It is a part of the very principle of the bill; you could not discuss it without discussing the principle of the bill, and I am inclined to agree with him in his view of the matter. But as far as that is concerned,

I am prepared to wait until I have had the advantage of the examination which is to be made by the committee to which it is to be sent. We shall then have the views and information which they may collect before us, and also the benefit of their mature judgment upon every section to be submitted to our consideration. I think that it is well that the bill is in its present shape. I should be unwilling to throw it out, because I consider the circumstances of the country immediately require it. I feel strongly impressed with the idea that has been presented to us that we have done so well without a bill for a long time that there is a question whether it should be produced at all, but I feel the weight of the arguments on the other side. The arguments adduced by the hon. member from Calgary are very important and well worthy of consideration, and the very fact that in a great business country like England, where commercial matters are so well understood and well managed, they found a bill of this kind necessary, is an indication that it might be desirable in our circumstances. It is quite true that the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Barrie, which have been criticized, that our present circumstances are different from our former position, and what was unwise and impracticable then might be required now, might be fairly criticized because he clearly said to us that it was the very small character of the commercial transactions taking place in the country at that date that rendered the bill so comparatively unnecessary. The great advance we have made in trade and commerce generally has altered our circumstances, and I conceive it quite possible that a bankrupcy bill should be introduced, but the experience which we have had of the insolvency law passed here, and the fact that we repealeditand that the repeal met unquestionably with the approval of the country generally, should I think make us very cautious in putting on the Statute-book a law of the same class unless we are very fully convinced that the circumstances of the country require it. I see no objection to the second reading if it is understood that the principle of the bill can be discussed at subsequent stages.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As several hon. gentlemen desire to know the limit of the jurisdiction of the province, I may refer to the decision of the Privy Council and the law. In Ontario there are two Acts, The Creditors' Release Act under which, if a creditor obtains an execution against the debtor, the other creditors may come in and rank pro rata.

In case a sheriff levies money upon an execution against the property of a debtor, he shall forthwith enter in a book to be kept in his office, open to public inspection without charge, a notice stating that such levy has been made, and the amount thereof; and the money shall thereafter be distributed ratably amongst all execution creditors and other creditors whose writs, or certificates given under this act, were in the sheriff's hands at the time of the levy, or who shall deliver their writs or certificates to the said sheriff within one month from the entry of notice.

That Act has been referred to approvingly by the Privy Council. The other Act, which was the subject under consideration by the Privy Council, is that relating to assignments by insolvents. Briefly that Act declares void any preferences given to one creditor over another. For instance, a judgment give to one creditor in preference to another is void:

2. Every gift, conveyance, assignment or transfer, delivery over or payment of goods, chattels or effects, or of bills, bonds, notes, securities, or of shares, dividends, premiums or bonus in any bank, company or corporation, or of any other property, real or personal, made by a person at a time when he is in insolvent circumstances, or is unable to pay his debts in full, or knows that he is on the eve of insolvency, with intent to defeat, delay or prejudice his creditors, or to give to any one or more of them a preference over his other creditors, or over any one, or more of them, or which has such effect, shall, as against them, be utterly void.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Is there no limit to the time?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. Of course the longer the period antecedent to the act itself to which notice is called, the more difficult will it be to establish the fraud. Then clause 9 provides:

9. An assignment for the general benefit of creditors under this Act shall take precedence of all judgments and of all executions not completely executed by payment, subject to the lien, if any, of an execution creditor for his costs where there is but one execution in the sheriff's hands, or to the lien, if any, of the creditor for his costs who has the first execution in the sheriff's hands.

What the Privy Council say, is:

The Act of 1887, which abolished priority as amongst execution creditors provided a simple means by which every creditors might obtain a share in the distribution of monies levied under an execution by any particular creditor. The other Act of the same year, containing the section which is impeached, goes a step further and gives to all creditors under an assignment for their general benefit a right to a rateable share of the assets of the debtor, including those which have been seized in execution. But it is urged that inasmuch as this assignment contemplates the insolvency of the debtor, and would only be made if he were insolvent, such a provision purports to deal with insolveney and therefore is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament. Now it is to be observed that an assignment for the general benefit of creditors has long been know to the jurisprudence of this country and also of Canada, and has its force and effect at common law quite independently of any system of bankruptcy or insolvency or any legislation relating thereto.

And so they hold that those assignments are good :

It appears to their Lordships that such provisions as are found in the enactment in question, relating as they do to assignments purely voluntary do not infringe on the exclusive legislative power conferred upon the Dominion Parliament. They would observe that a system of bankruptcy legislation may frequently require various ancillary provisions for the purpose of preventing the scheme of this Act from being defeated. It may be necessary for this purpose to deal with the effect of execution and other matters which would otherwise be within the legislative competence of the Provincial Legislature. Their Lordships do not doubt that it would be open to the Dominion Parliament to deal with such matters as part of a bankruptcy law, and the Provincial Legislature would doubtless be then precluded from interfering with this legislation inasmuch as such interference would affect the bankruptcy law of the Dominion Parliament.

Practically their Lordships decide that if we pass a bankruptcy law it would override the two statutes in question—that in the absence of any such bankruptcy law, the legislation which allows all creditors to come in and file claims with the sheriff, and also that which permits an insolvent to make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors is good.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—That would enable any other province to exercise the same power within their own limits?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—There is no provision for the debtor's release under these Acts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, they could not grant a discharge.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—That seems to be a matter requiring as much attention as any other part of the Act.

Hon. Mr. WARK—I would suggest that it would be advisable to move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I hope my hon. friend will not press his motion. I think we can get through in a very few minutes. I have only a few words to say. I wish to express my gratification at the manner in which this important matter has been discussed. I know it is one upon which there is a very great diversity of opinion. I am also aware of the dissatisfaction that existed under the old law, particularly as to the manner in which it was administered. In the framing of this bill, the Government has tried, as far as possible, to avoid the shoals upon which the ship was wrecked in the old law, and we hope that in referring this to a large committee composed of such gentlemen as I have suggested and others who have had large experience in business matters and also in the administration of estates, and in the working of the old Insolvency Act, we may if possible simplify it to a still greater extent and make the procedure, as indicated by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island, as inexpensive as possible. The very fact that the Government propose to send this to a large committee composed of members of the House instead of a committee of the whole, as is usually the case with Government measures, is the best evidence I can furnish of their desire to give every one interested in the Dominion an opportunity of appearing before that committee and expressing either approval or disapproval of the bill. If they should approve, they can make any suggestions that they think would tend to make the bill more perfect; while if they disapprove, and fancy that it may become law, they can endeavour to make it as innocuous as possible. That is the object we have had in view, and I propose, after the second reading, to delay the reference to a committee of the whole until some time in May—some fifteen or twenty days hence—which will give the special committee ample time to consider the measure, and the people of the country who are interested in it, ample time to appear personally or by proxy to discuss the merits of the bill. I think the House will credit the Government with a desire to give it the widest possible publicity and to obtain, as far as it is possible to do so, the opinions of the people in the country. My hon. friend from Halifax says that he knows of no agitation for this bill—at least I so understood him. He said that he knew of nothing that would justify the Government in introducing the Act. I might say to that hon. gentleman, so far as the commercial community of this Dominion are concerned, they have been pressing upon the Government for a number of years the necessity of passing an Insolvency Act, and the Government have resisted it, until the pressure became so great that they believed it to be in the interest of the business community particularly that some such measure of relief should be placed on the Statute-book, so as to prevent the fraudulent assignments which are constantly made, in different parts of the Dominion, to their disadvantage. As long as each province has the disposing of, the regulating and the distribution of insolvents' estates, just so long will these difficulties occur. Probably if all the provinces were to adopt the system which prevails in Quebec, which I believe is the most perfect of any of them, the difficulties which have arisen would not have appeared to such a large extent; but even if that were the case, there is the point raised by the hon. member from Toronto, that there is no provision in any of the legislation of any of the provinces to relieve an honest debtor, who has become involved, from his liabilities. I know of no mode of protecting creditors to which my hon. friend from Welland has called attention, unless we should enact a law prohibiting people from giving credit, or pass a law preventing any creditor from collecting his debts. Those are the only two means that suggest themselves to my mind for the protection of creditors. I shall not argue the point raised by the hon. member from Ottawa, in reference to what are termed the non-trading class. I shall, however, for the information of my old and esteemed friend from Monck, tell him that he is altogether in error in supposing that the Boards of Trade or the bankers suggested this clause.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I did not say bankers.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Well, merchants—suggested the insertion of this clause in order to sugarcoat the pill to enable the people to swallow it with less difficulty. Now, the fact is the Boards of Trade are opposed to the placing of a clause of that kind in the Insolvency Act, contending that it should be confined to traders. I have always held the opinion—and I expressed it in the House of Commons at the time that my hon. friend and myself had the honour of sitting there and discussing this question—that I could see no reason in the world why a farmer who had been ruined by a trader, either by endorsing, or by selling grain and not being paid for it should not have the same advantage as the man who had cheated him out of his property. If any one is responsible for this clause, I am myself, whether it be right or wrong, and that is the reason for it. I have only again to thank the House for the manner in which they have discussed this bill. I see nothing in the rule to which my hon. friend refers that binds any member of the Senate to the principle of the bill. It does not say that in passing the second reading you even affirm the principle, the rule says "the principle of a bill is usually debated at its second reading." That is what you have done to-day, and many of you have expressed strong opinions against the principle of the bill, but I hope when it comes from the committee that the House will accept it and allow it to become law. I may say further that if on the 2nd May, the time that I propose to refer it to a committee of the whole House, sufficient time has not been had, the Government will be quite prepared to further extend the time.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—When this committee reports will this bill be taken up clause by clause in the House?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Is it the intention of the committee to send copies of the bill to the different Boards of Trade, or will that matter be left to individual Senators?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I might inform the hon. gentleman that I have already circulated nearly 150 to the different Boards of Trade from the Pacific Coast down to Cape Breton, and sent some eight or nine copies to Montreal, ten or fifteen to Toronto and

Hamilton, and I shall be very glad, as long as that edition lasts, to supply any member with copies to send away to his constituents,

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—It is also right to bear in mind that those copies sent to the Boards of Trade might never reach the persons who are affected by the Act—the farmers, graziers and traders. The Boards of Trade are in large cities, and there may be tens of thousands of people in the same county who never will see or hear of it.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The only way by which that can be remedied is by each member supplying those most interested in his own constituency. I have no doubt the House could do that. Fortunately for us in Canada, the farmers are a reading community, and the newspapers circulate in every part of the Dominion, and any one who desires to read the papers will see that this Insolvency Act has been referred to a large committee for the purpose of being considered by them. If sufficient time has not been given, we must try and remedy that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Niagara)—I would like to ask the Minister when we would expect the further copies of this bill. My own idea is to send one to each Municipal Council and County Council in the different districts that I represent, and have their opinions, because they, and they only, know the opinions the farmers hold upon the matter of this bill. I will undertake to send to the whole Niagara district, copies of the Bill, if we can only get them.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Orders were given for 2,500 additional copies for the ordinary distribution, and if the House thinks that is not enough, we will print two or three thousand more.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Now that the bill has been read the second time, there is just one observation I should like to make with reference to the procedure. I gathered from the language used by the hon. leader of the House that he proposes to move that the bill be considered by a committee of the whole on the 2nd of May. The motion now is that it be referred to a select committee, and the House has to wait until that committee has reported before a date can be fixed for going into a committee of the whole.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved :

That the said bill be referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon ; and that the said committee be composed of the following senators :—The Honourable Messieurs Allan, Angers, Bernier, Bolduc, Bowell, Clemow, Desjardins, Dickey, Drummond, Ferguson (Niagara), Ferguson (P. E. I), Gowan, Kaulbach, Landry, Lewin, Lougheed, Macdonald (B.C.), MacInnes (Burlington), McClelan, Miller, Pelletier, Power, Read (Quinté), Sanford and Scott.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I should like to have a word to say about my name being placed on the committee. I have not said anything on the second reading of this bill, awaiting an opportunity to express my views on several clauses of the bill hereafter. My opinion, however, is that this special committee is altogether too large. If it were divided into three or four sections, the different sections of the committee could discuss the bill among themselves separately, and get together again, and then there would be some sense in it, but I have come to the conclusion long ago that a committee of thirty or forty never arrives at any conclusion at all.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—We can make subcommittees.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I think a committee of twenty-five is cumbersome, and if it can be made more effective by subdividing it, I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 6 o'clock.

FRENCH TRANSLATION.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts, presented their report. He said; This report contains just two recommendations, the first authorizing the Clerk of the Senate to employ such temporary assistance, to assist the French translators, as may be necessary under the present pressure of business before the House. The second is to authorize such necessary short hand assistance to the Law Clerk as may be found necessary from time to time by the chairman of the committee. It is not in either case intended to be permanent. In both cases they are supposed to be temporarily employed, and as in one of those cases particularly, it may be urgent, I move that the report of the committee be adopted to-day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to the adoption of the report, but simply to point out that it does not embody exactly the recommendation of the committee. I did not understand that the assistance to be given to the translators was simply in translating bills. It happens that there is more translation of bills to be done this session than usual, but in addition to that there is other work which the translators have to do, and as to which they will need help. The word "bills" should be stricken out so as not to limit the assistance.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That cannot be done in the House.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think the report might be accepted as it is, and should we find later that it is necessary to give assistance to the French translators, for the translation of other documents than bills, the committee might report again.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a matter of fact that report does not embody what the committee intended to recommend, because I remember the hon. gentleman himself dilated on the additional work imposed on the translators of the House by the reports from his own department and the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—If that is the case, the report should be referred back to the committee.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not contradict the hon. member from Halifax when he states that the report does not exactly convey the recommendation of the committee, but to avoid delay, I propose that it be accepted as it is, and should it be found that the French translators require more assistance, another report might be brought in making the work of the temporary translators general.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I do not think there is any difficulty about it, because the men to be employed might be put at the bills, while the other translators are doing something else.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Surely, we can, with the unanimous consent of the House, amend the report at the table?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I doubt very much if we can.

The motion was agreed to.

WESTERN CANADA TRUST AND GUARANTEE CORPORATION'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (D) "An Act to incorporate the Western Canada Trust and Guarantee Corporation," with amendments. He said: The first amendment is in respect to the name adopted for the company. The name was almost identical with that of another company in Canada, and difficulty was found in finding another name, because so many companies exist, that it was not easy to find one which would not clash with some of them. The committee finally decided that a name which would do as well as any other, is the one now adopted, "An Act to incorporate the Trust Corporation of Canada." The next amendment is to the clause which provides what the trust shall be. The clause has been amended so as to make it more full and precise, to guarantee the repayment of principal and interest or both. The next two or three alterations are simply verbal. The next is in the clause which prescribes in what securities the corporation may invest. This clause is amended so as to prevent the investment of money in the bonds of municipalities with a population of less than 10,000, or where the assessment does not exceed a certain amount, because the committee did not think it would be safe to allow them to invest without some limit of that kind, both as to the population of the municipality and the amount of its assessment. The next amendment provides for the class of securities in which the corporation may invest moneys forming part of its own capital or reserve. The last amendment of any importance is with regard to preference stock. It is to provide that any such by-law shall only have force or effect after it has been sanctioned by a two-third vote of the shareholders present or represented by proxy at a meeting to consider the same. The last amendment refers to the clause relating to the notices of meetings and provides that notice may be sent by circular, addressed, postpaid and registered, to each shareholder, at his last known address. The House will see that all these amendments are in the direction of greater security to those who may be intrusting their money to this corporation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the report be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS introduced Bill (V) "An Act further to amend the Insurance Act." He said: I shall only state now that this bill refers to a number of clauses in the general Insurance Act which require amendment. I think it would be more useful for the members of this House to hear what explanations I may have to offer concerning it, after the bill has been printed, than upon its first reading. The bill deals with a number of sections, and the explanation which I could give now would not be so well understood as it will be with the text of the bill before the House.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the first time.

SAFETY OF SHIPS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (G) "An Act further to amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 77, respecting the Safety of Ships." He said: I have adopted a different course to that suggested by my hon. colleague. I explained the bill when I introduced it. Its provisions are more for the sake of explaining certain portions of the old Act and defining certain words which are contained in it, and also to permit the deck-loading of vessels to the extent of six feet when visiting Newfoundland, St. Pierre and the West Indies, without interfering with the deck-loads as provided in the Imperial Statutes, to which we must confine our ships when they are going to England.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question so that he may be able to answer it in committee. There does not seem to be any reason why ports in South America, Brazil and Guiana should be treated differently from the ports in the West Indies. I know from ports in the lower provinces, ships go to Brazil just in the same way as they do to the West Indies, and I do not see why the restrictive provisions should apply to those vessels going to South America when they do not apply to those going to the West Indies.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Paragraph "f." which defines what the words "West Indies" means, covers the objection. It reads as follows:

> The expression "West Indies," means the West India Islands, and includes the Bahama and Bermuda Islands, and any port or place in the Gulf of Mexico not being a port or place in the United States of America, and includes any port or place on the mainland between the Gulf of Mexico and the south-eastern extremity of French Guiana.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That covers Guiana, but does not cover Brazil.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am very glad that my hon. friend brought that to the notice of the House, but the bill, certainly, is a great improvement on the law as it stood, and I am glad that the Government have considered the representations made by the lower provinces as regards the restriction upon vessels sailing from certain ports. The restriction was a very unnecessary one, and it was difficult to get the law complied with. After a long delay we have accomplished this, and I am sure those engaged in the West India trade from the port of Lunenburg, will consider it a great privilege that they are allowed to conduct their trade in a way which they know to be safe without hindrance.

SECOND READING.

Bill (K) "An Act to incorporate the Canada Mutual Life Association."—(Mr. Clemow.)

WOOD MOUNTAIN AND QU'APPELLE RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being called,

Second reading of Bill (R) "An Act respecting the Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle Railway Company,"

Hon. Mr. BERNIER said: A bill the same as this having come from the House of Commons, I beg to move that this order be discharged and the bill withdrawn.

Hon Mr MILLER—The hon. gentleman's object I suppose is to get the way clear for the bill which has come from the House of Commons. His motion does not do that. The proper motion would be for leave to withdraw the bill, because this motion may at any time hereafter be placed upon the paper.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I first have to move for the discharge of the Order of the Day, and then move to withdraw the bill. I beg leave to move that the Order of the Day be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—My hon. friend must see the position he has placed himself in now. He is going to make a motion in relation to a matter which is not on the Minutes at all. He cannot make any motion in regard to it without putting it on the Minutes again. My hon. friend had better amend his motion to have it read in this way: that the Order of the Day be discharged and that leave to withdraw the bill be granted by the House.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I beg leave to move according to the suggestion that the hon. member has just made.

The motion was agreed to.

HARBOUR OF PICTOU AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (F) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Harbour of Pictou, N.S."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—The town of New Glasgow is some seven miles from Pictou up the river. It would not appear that the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of Pictou Harbour would extend up the river to that distance. I was just looking at the original Act. I do not find anything about it here. Perhaps the hon. Minister is in a position to explain that.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This bill was prepared by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The Minister presiding over that department, as my hon. friend knows, is from that section of the country, and his note to me is as follows:—

The wharf at New Glasgow in the county of Pictou was built by the Pictou Harbour Commissioners out of dues collected on vessels arriving at Pictou, and the commissioners wish to control and regulate the wharf.

Some doubt has arisen as to their power and authority to do so, although they have been controlling it and collecting dues there since it has been built, and they have been informed by the legal advisers of the department that this bill was necessary in order to place the harbour fully under the control of the commissioners. If my hon. friend asks why the words "New Glasgow" are used I am not able to say.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said it was about seven miles up the river from Pictou, and I did not think it would naturally come under the jurisdiction of the commissioners and I asked for an explanation.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

DEBATES AND REPORTING COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The Order of the Day being called,

Consideration of the First Report of the Standing Committee on Debates and Reporting,

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said: The committee having considered the matter and called the Queen's Printer before them, ask leave to withdraw this report, and the other which was substituted for this one presented yesterday will take its place on the orders.

The report was withdrawn.

MONCTON AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY AND FERRY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER moved the second reading of Bill (I) "An Act to amend the Acts relating to the Moncton and Prince Edward Island Railway and Ferry Company."

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think the hon. gentleman should give some explanation to the House. This seems a very long extension to grant.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I think I can give an explanation which will be satisfactory to the House. This is altogether a bona fide enterprise, but through circumstances which the company could not control, these delays are unavoidable. Hon. gentlemen are aware that there has been for many years a scheme to connect the mainland and Prince Edward Island by means of, first, a sub-way, and then a tunnel. This company does not wish to do anything to prejudice the other scheme. When they brought in this bill for the first time, simultaneously our friend who has recently left the Senate to fill a better position, introduced his sub-way scheme. This company thought that they should not do anything that might prejudice the other company believing that both projects are for the benefit of the islanders, and leaving to the island people the choice of what they considered the best scheme. The year before last the Government decided to have borings between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine in order to ascertain what the cost of the tunnel would be. That resolution having passed, this company would not press the bill and remained necessarily in the position they are in. These borings were attempted two years ago. There was, I believe, ten or thirteen thousand dollars voted for the purpose of making them. In order to ascertain the cost so that the company could decide once for all whether they should proceed or not, two years ago Mr. Palmer had charge of the borings and some borings were then made, but there was some falling off and all the borings could not be completed. There was still a portion of the money not expended, and it was to be applied last summer towards the completion of the boring. For some reasons, for which this company certainly are not responsible, the parties who were to make the borings only arrived on the spot with their necessary instruments in the month of September, and they were in a position to commence the remainder of the borings according to contract when a severe tempest set in and destroyed all their machinery, or at least put them in a position that they were not able to finish their borings. Now the report was not made to England, and the Government have not yet ascertained what the exact cost of the tunnel would be. It is, I believe—I am not speaking officially, but from what I have reason to believe is true—the intention of the Government to have those borings completed this summer with the remainder of the money voted. That being so, this company is forced to ask an extension of time. You can see by the bill that it is only a few months, in order to wait until those reports are made and to see what the Government is going to do. If the tunnel is to be bored, I think I may safely say that this company, though they have some money and are perfectly ready to go on, may very likely drop the project, because then the people of the island will be satisfied, and the company does not wish to be an obstacle to the realization of the other scheme. But on the other hand, if the report of the engineer should be unfavourable, if it should be decided that the cost, as is anticipated, would be so great as not to warrant the Government in undertaking the building of the tunnel, then this company wishes to be in a position to give the islanders (provided Parliament and Government are agreeable to it) the benefit of their scheme. They have been ready for the last four years to proceed with it, but it has been postponed for the reasons I have given—bona fide reasons which every member of this House will understand.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—The communication with Prince Edward Island, proposed to be established under this bill, is it seems now to be undertaken only after the tunnel is abandoned. The reasons given by the hon. member who has moved in this matter for asking for an extension of time do not appear to be sufficient. The people of Prince Edward Island have some interest in the means of communication which this bill is proposed to effect, and the people in the western portion of Prince County, where it is proposed to run a ferry between Richibucto and the west pôint, are to a great extent interested in this matter. A bill was passed here in 1890 for the purpose of establishing this Moncton and Prince Edward Island railway, and they considered they were going to derive some benefit from that railway and ferry. They saw after two or three years had elapsed that nothing was being done and they became dissatisfied. Last year they found that a bill was passed here extending the rights and privileges of that company—increasing their capital from $750,000 to $1,000,000 and giving them power to raise money on the road to the extent of $1,500,000 and I think further power to raise a certain amount of money on the plant of the ferry, and they supposed when that bill was passed and the time was limited within which operations were to be commenced on that road, that it would be gone on with, and they are very much disappointed that such has not been the case. I fail to see why, if this company have had that right and privilege so many years, they have not yet spent any money on the undertaking. Under their Act they have the right to build that road and dispose of their charter to any other company, and I think it is injurious to the interests of the people of Prince Edward Island as well as the people of New Brunswick, that any company should be enabled perhaps to shut out those who would undertake to do the work and go on with it. With that view of the case, I think we should very seriously consider whether it is for the interest of the people of those two provinces that the time should be extended and this company given rights and privileges that it would be impossible for any other company to obtain. I should like to know what has been done in this matter—has any money been expended, has any money been paid up according to the requirements of the Act passed in 1890 which was revived by the legislation of last session? Now we have a bill introduced here for the purpose of extending the time within which they may commence their operations for another year and a half beyond the time mentioned last session. I fail to see what advantage we can derive from extending a charter of this kind. The work would be much better in the hands of people who would go on energetically if they were allowed to do so.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Money has been expended. This year, to my knowledge, three expert engineers have gone there to get information from some persons appointed by the Government concerning the ice, and they came there and made soundings and completed their investigation as to the feasibility of the scheme and the company is ready to go on with the work. Other companies have often come before Parliament for an extension of time and as far as that is concerned this company is not introducing any innovation at all. All that is asked now is a little extension of time so that the report as to the borings may be made known and then the fate of this company will decide it one way or the other. But I beg to remind this House that this company has not, so far as I know, been in the way of any other enterprise. If such were the case there would be something in the argument of my hon. friend, but I am not aware that this company is injuring any private individual or enterprise, or that by asking an extension of its charter it is affecting the rights of anybody or asking any thing that has not been very frequently granted in this or the other House. I hope, therefore, that this honourable House will sanction the second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Will the hon. gentleman explain why in the amendment he now proposes he leaves out words which are of importance, especially in view of the arguments presented by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island? I notice in the original bill there are words which declare that if the railway is not completed within five years from the passage of the Act the charter shall be forfeited. Now, these words are entirely left out in the bill before the House, and there seems to be no forfeiting of their charter by reason of the non-completion of the work, because all the words after "force" are struck out so that the whole of that provision in the section is struck out. Is that done intentionally?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—That was amended last year.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It is last year's Act that I am speaking of. You retain the first section of last year's Act and you leave out those words. I am asking if it is done intentionally or otherwise, because they are important words, that the charter will be forfeited if the work is not gone on with. You strike them out and do not replace them with anything.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It is stricken out, but it is replaced with similar words except as to dates. Instead of replacing it in an amendment it is replaced in a subsection verbatim.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Except that this penalty is left out—that if the work is not completed within a certain time the charter shall cease.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The company will be perfectly willing to have that inserted in committee.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think my hon. friend had better ask for a longer extension of time. It is impossible that this work can be commenced within the time specified. There is no intention on the part of the company to expend money and commence work until such time as the Government decide whether the tunnel is to be built; if the Government decide not to build the tunnel, then only is the company to go on with the work and I think the time should be extended longer than fifteen months.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The explanation given by the introducer of the bill conveys the idea to this House that it is specially in the interest of Prince Edward Island that the work is not pressed forward at the present time, but it appears to me that the object of the company is simply to find out what the cost of the tunnel is going to be. Then they will be able to make a deal on the amount that the tunnel may cost, so as to be in a position to offer the Government to do this service for a few dollars less. If the company are prepared to establish this communication with Prince Edward Island without any subsidy from the Dominion, I am sure the islanders, as a people, will not object to the communication proposed under this bill, but if it is simply to postpone the undertaking of the work until the borings are completed and an estimate given to the Government of what it would cost, so as to enable them to put in a scheme involving a subsidy a little below what the tunnel would cost, I do not think it is in the interest of Prince Edward Island or any other province; because I am satisfied that the communication, if established and successful so far as the extreme west end of the island is concerned, will not be of the same advantage to the public generally. It appears to me that the proposition of the hon. gentleman is playing well into the hands of the Government. They are in no hurry to spend eight or ten million of dollars to establish communication between Prince Edward Island and the rest of the Dominion, and so long as they have any excuse for delay, they will say we are wiling to give you communication, but we are waiting to see what somebody is going to do at the west end of the island, and this company says "we are waiting to see what the Government is willing to do," and thus the people of Prince Edward Island are to be left out in the cold for two or three years to come. This question has been played with a little too long already, and it is pretty near time that some active work was commenced. It appears to me exceedingly singular that borings promised to be undertaken last year should have been postponed until the month of September, at a time of the year when, as every one knows, it is impossible to go and take soundings in an open strait 6 or 8 miles wide. Evidently it was not intended to be completed last year. I hope the Government will see that the borings are commenced in proper time this year, in the month of May, so that they will have the whole calm season of the year to complete them and be able to report as to whether they are prepared to give this communication to Prince Edward Island or not. If we are not to have this communication, I for one, would like to know what they are going to do about it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I observe that hon. gentlemen are a little impatient at having local matters discussed in this House (cries of "Oh! no!") I admit that this is not the time or occasion for such a debate, but I hope that some member from Prince Edward Island will bring up the whole matter before the close of the session. If no one else will introduce the question, I will do it myself. I make this remark to show hon. gentlemen that it is no wonder that we are a little sensitive on this subject. If hon. gntleemen will go to the reading room they will find that the latest paper from Prince Edward Island is dated the 6th of April. This is the 18th of April, and it has therefore taken 12 days to get a newspaper from Prince Edward Island at this time of the year. Hon. gentlemen will understand that it is not much wonder if the people of Prince Edward Island feel a little sensitive when a matter of this kind comes before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it would be rather hard on the hon. gentleman from Acadia if his bill should come to grief owing to a demand for an explanation made rather by way of jest than otherwise. I think his explanation is satisfactory. He says the company who promote this bill are prepared to go on and construct the work whenever the Government have made up their minds as to what they are going to do about the tunnel. That does not give any excuse at all to the Government for delay. This company is composed of gentlemen who, I presume, are willing to put their own money into the undertaking and expect to get a return from their investment. Suppose those gentlemen were to go on, as suggested by hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, with their work now, and after the borings of next summer the Government decided that the tunnel should be constructed, then the project of this company would become practically valueless, and naturally, as business men, they do not wish to put their money into an undertaking which might be rendered almost completely useless by the construction of the tunnel. I think that the hon. gentlemen who represent Prince Edward Island here, if they find fault with any one, should not find fault with the promoters of this bill who are anxious to do all they can for Prince Edward Island, consistent with their own interest, but should find fault with the Government for not doing the work they have in hand. The tunnel has effected one of its chief objects already, and it probably is not so likely to be proceeded with.

The motion was agreed to.

SPEAKER OF THE SENATE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (Q) "An Act respecting the Speaker of the Senate." He said: we had a long discussion in the Senate last year upon the principle of this bill. It is still fresh in the minds of hon. members. The bill of last year met with a certain amount of opposition—not large as to numbers but valuable as to the weight of the opinions expressed. However, the bill went through the Senate and I have no doubt would have passed in the lower House with as good a result had it not come before the House of Commons at a very late date in the session. It was intimated in the brief discussion which took place there that the result of pressing it would be to delay the prorogation three or four days, and the Government thought it advisable to allow the bill to drop. It has been brought up again here, and in deference to the opposition expressed last year in this House, the clause has been introduced so as to remove all possible scruples from the consciences of any members of the Senate. If, as contended last year, this Bill is ultra vires, the law officers in England will have an opportunity of pronouncing upon it and the Government can then petition the Imperial Parliament to amend the constitution in that respect. That mode I think is the most advisable, rather than to petition before the Parliament of Canada has expressed an opinion about it and to be told, possibly, that the power we are seeking is already vested in us. Therefore, I think that it is unnecessary to state at length the ground taken last year by the Government and some members of this House for adopting the bill. My own personal opinion has not changed about it. I have had occasion to consult with the Minister of Justice and he also is of opinion that the bill is within the powers of the House.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I have to thank my hon. friend the Minister for putting off the second reading a day. It enabled me to see the bill which was yesterday distributed. I find it a transcript of the bill of last session as it passed this House, with one clause added, to which I shall presently advert. The measure was somewhat fully discussed on that occasion, the debate extending over five days. It will be found in the Senate Debates of the 16th, 17th, 20th, 21st and 22nd days of March last.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the words used last year were that the Senate would "appoint" the Speaker, and it was suggested that the word "choose" would be better, and that word "choose" is the one now used in this bill.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, this is the bill as adopted by this House and passed, and transferred to the House of Commons. All the modifications that were suggested last session are made in this bill; amongst others, the suggestion made by the hon. member from Ottawa, to substitute the word "choose" for the word "appoint." The House did not argue it on the amended bill. There was a very brief discussion there.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—There was a speech made by Mr. Mills, and also a speech on the other side, and many points were brought up. A strong sense of duty compels me to a persistent opposition to what in itself only might be a convenience. But if brought about let it be done in a constitutional way. The first clause provides that when the Speaker from illness or other cause finds it necessary to leave the Chair during the sittings of the Senate he may call on any senator to preside in his place. The second section provides, that whenever the Senate is informed by the Clerk at the table of the unavoidable absence of the Speaker the Senate may choose a senator to preside as Speaker. The third clause provides that every act of a temporary Speaker shall be as valid as if done by the Speaker himself and the fourth that the Act shall not come into force till Her Majesty's pleasure thereon has been signified by proclamation in the Gazette. I do not care to enter upon any verbal criticism. But what does "unavoidable absence" mean. How will a Clerk at the table construe it? What is to be done if the Clerk is ill or declines to act? No doubt illness of body might cause unavoidable absence, but perhaps he might hold that nostalgia, in case of a Speaker, say one from Prince Edward Island or Victoria, was worse than an attack of gout. The power to determine is too serious to confer upon any subordinate official, but I will not say any more on this head. To come to the point upon which I feel the danger of action as proposed lies. As I said the measure was debated last session. The objections then taken to the bill, briefly and generally stated, were these: that in passing such a measure we would be exceeding the bounds of our assigned jurisdiction under the British North America Act, inasmuch as the proposed law would change the terms and conditions of the sections providing for the constitution of the Senate as part of the machinery of legislation. That the constitution and powers of the Senate were enacted, and must be looked for in the statute alone, that it would in fact be an amendment of the Imperial Act; a creature of the statute undertaking to rearrange itself by taking something from the appointing power laid down by statute. That the question is not one of mere convenience but a question of jurisdiction and power to constitute a new presiding officer. That our constitution has reserved no power to Parliament to deal with a matter of the kind and that the general words under section 91 "To make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada" did not, as contended, confer the power to pass this bill, that the whole frame-work of the British North America Act demonstrates that the organism of Government was not to be interfered with by Dominion legislation. The section 91, relating to the distributing of power between the different governments, but not meant to confer the right to change the fundamental provisions regarding the component parts of the Senate, sections 34, 35 and 36, which are specific and clear as to the constitution and organism of the Senate. While the provinces received power to amend their constitution (sec. 92, subsection 1) it was withheld from the Dominion. Therefore such a measure as proposed would be unconstitutional and void and contrary to the spirit and meaning of the Imperial Act, our written constitution. Moreover, it was contended the provision in the bill was an invasion of the prerogative and an unlawful interference with the appointing power delegated by Imperial enactment to the Queen's representative in Canada. I do not propose arguing out again the points taken in the former discussion. Hon. gentlemen will see the whole debate in the Hansard if they will refer to it, and I trust will be convinced of the gravity of what has been urged. Not only is the question one of construction on our written constitution, but the proposed bill substantially alters the terms agreed upon as the basis of confederation, and this fact must ever be borne in mind that the British North America Act is sui juris, a solemn league between the several provinces, and so treated when before the Imperial Parliament. Our constitution was agreed on between ourselves, its binding force and authority consummated—created by a statute of the Empire. We possess such powers as it assigns to us and none other. Should we undertake on our own authority to alter or amend an integral part of the machinery of legislation provided for us, who can say where it may end. If the broad and unlimited power contended for under the words in section 91 be well founded, will it not admit of changes and disturbance in other provisions, going to wreck confederation? Should this bill go on our Statute-book, will it not be a precedent for other infringements of the compact which the provinces entered into? I maintain that an absolute plenitude of power was never contemplated and cannot be sustained on any fair construction. The matter dealt with by the bill may be small, the alteration convenient, but once the door is opened to change by mere Dominion legislation, who can forecast the end, who say that the plenary power claimed under section 91 may not be invoked directly or indirectly to impair provincial or other rights, or to fritter them away? True a province might be a dangerous subject to handle in this way, but why pave the way? The distribution of power is not in all cases so clearly expressed as to leave no opening for contention that the paramount power doctrine should come in. I am sorry that this bill is pressed. We have got on very well under the law as it is ever since 1867, but if the change proposed be essential, why not take the regular constitutional course of asking an amendment by the authority that passed the British North America Act as was suggested last session by my hon. friend the senior member from Halifax, and then pressed upon the Minister. The new clause added since last session doubtless was intended to take some of the sting out of the measure, and I accept the concession in the spirit in which it is made. But it does not touch the argument that in undertaking to alter the organism of the Senate we are exceeding the bounds of our assigned authority under the British North America Act. I doubt if section 4 of the bill—a new method—is not itself outside our Constitution. Under section 55 a bill passed both Houses is presented to the Governor General for the Queen's assent. He declares in the Queen's name assent or dissent, or that he reserves it for the Queen's pleasure. When the Governor General assents to a bill, the Queen in Council may disallow it within two years, in which case the Act becomes null. Section 57 provides for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure. But the 4th section of this bill now before us provides a new method not known to the constitution. It is hard to say what reception Her Majesty's ministers would give to a bill presented with such a clause. My impression is such method of action could not be recognized as a proper foundation for Her Majesty to act on. The British North America Act declares it expedient not only that the constitution of the legislative authority in the Dominion be provided for, but also that the nature of the executive government therein be declared. How can we venture outside of the express provisions of the Act? I think it but candid to point out this dilemma; I do not care to expand upon it. Holding these views, I feel it my duty to vote against the bill.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—This question was thoroughly discussed and threshed out a year ago, and I do not propose to repeat any argument that I used on a former occasion, for the reason that, like the hon. member who has introduced this bill, I have seen, upon further consideration, no reason whatever to change the opinion, I then expressed as to the competence of this Parliament to pass the bill. I should not rise now were it not for the purpose of adding a very small contribution to the literature of this question. Having had occasion to consult a new work which has just come out, I happened to alight upon a portion of the Imperial enactments, referred to in that work, which seem to have some bearing upon this question. The book that I allude to, is, I am proud to say, a Canadian work, written by a Canadian, and printed and published in Toronto. It is the work of Mr. Clement, on the law of the Canadian Constitution, and it only came into my hands within two or three hours. In the appendix, I find an Imperial Act which bears upon this question, passed in the year 1865, intituled, "An Act to remove doubt as to the validity of Colonial Laws." In the interpretation clause, the word "colony" is made to include all parts of the Queen's dominions which have the benefit of legislatures. In the 5th section of this Act, I find the following:

> And to make provision for the administration of justice therein and every representative legislature shall, in respect to the colony under its jurisdiction, have, and be deemed at all times to have had, full power to make laws respecting the constitution, powers and procedure of such legislature.

I am aware that it may be said that this does not apply to the present discussion, because we are acting under a written constitution, and unless we find within the four corners of that constitution the power to make these laws, we cannot look outside of it; but a careful consideration of this enactment will show that it has a very wide reaching scope, and I bring it forward as an earnest, at all events, of the desire of the Imperial Parliament to confer all these powers upon colonial legislatures; and as such, I think it is my duty to call the attention of the House to it, and I will do so without intending to further interfere in the discussion. In that Act, they call us all colonies, and the definition of the word "colony" shows it means all dependencies under the Crown which have legislatures. The word "colony" includes "all Her Majesty's dominions abroad, where exist legislatures as hereinafter defined:" therefore, it includes this legislature. The question is a very important one, but at the same time I have no doubt whatever that it is the feeling of the House generally that any doubt which hon. gentlemen may have felt as to the power of Parliament to pass this bill, will be, if not removed, at any rate lessened by the 4th clause being added in the measure this year, to provide that it will come under the purview of Her Majesty's law advisers in England. It will not be the first time that we are indebted to them for amendments to the British North America Act, but at least we have the consolation to know that this Act, whether it be intra vires, or ultra vires, can have no effect until the law officers have advised Her Majesty upon this subject and Her Majesty has issued a proclamation to give effect to this legislation, and if they think it is not within the scope of the powers conferred by the British North America Act, the constitution under which we live, then they will do as they did on a former occasion—advise that that Act should be amended in a particular way, so as to leave no doubt as to our power to pass such a law.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not suppose my hon. friend from Barrie desires us to open up a discussion now. This question was fully discussed and determined last session, and I think the last clause of the bill fully meets any objection raised. Any doubt which may arise as to the constitutionality of the Act will be determined by the legal advisers of the Crown. It would be a waste of time for us to open up a discussion now and I do not think any of us would change the opinions that we held last session. I hope the Government will press the bill through as quickly as possible. We last year saw the necessity of such an Act. At any time a crisis might arise, and great inconvenience occur, and I hope the Government will get the decision of the law officers of the Crown as early as possible.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The arguments being so exhaustive last year in this matter, I do not propose to make any speech other than simply to call attention to the fact that some hon. members here and hon. gentlemen who discussed this matter in another place will persist in looking upon this as an intrusion upon the prerogative of the Crown, as if we were superseding the power of the Crown. One hon. gentleman used the argument that if we had a right to appoint a temporary Speaker, we had a right to do it permanently, that we could set the British North America Act aside altogether; but the argument was predicated on the assumption that we were appointing a Deputy-Speaker, in the sense in which the term is understood in another branch of Parliament. We never professed to do anything of the kind. It was always admitted that the Crown could step in and supersede our locum tenens. It was simply to allow business to be carried on. My hon. friend from Amherst very properly called attention to the Imperial Act of 1865, which has a bearing on this question, and I see that that very Act was brought into existence on a parallel question. It was passed because the legislature, having some degree of common sense, supposed that in the temporary absence of the Speaker of the Legislative Council, they would have a right to place some other member in the chair. It was contended that the power of appointment rested with the Crown. It was a case of that kind that had to be met, and this Act is retroactive. It not only applies to courts but to legislatures.

And every representative legislature shall, in respect to the colony under its jurisdiction, have, and be deemed at all times to have had, full power to make laws respecting the constitution, powers and procedure of such legislature.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—My hon. friend will see that that statute was dealing with questions which arose two or three years before the passing of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am aware of that, but the same principle applies. The parallel is precisely the same. They did not profess to interfere with the prerogative of the Crown, but if the Speaker took ill they assumed that they had the right to place one of their number in the chair until the Crown intervened. With regard to insolvency, many hon. gentlemen learned in the law have asserted that the provincial parliaments have no power whatever to deal with the estates of insolvents, because in the British North America Act the subject is specially reserved to the Parliament of Canada. The provincial legislatures have no right to pass such a law, yet we had the subject up yesterday, and we learned that the Privy Council have held that in the absence of the exercise of power by the Federal Parliament a provincial legislature might pass such a measure. The moment we exercise our power, of course, it supersedes theirs. Just in the same way, if the Crown is satisfied that a temporary locum tenens should not be in the Speaker's chair the Crown can issue a patent to another member who will take the chair. We do not interfere with the prerogative of the Crown, but if the Crown does not exercise those rights, and it is in the interest of the public business that a temporary make-shift should be adopted, surely as men of common sense—and law is supposed to have a little element of common sense about it—we would not allow the whole machinery of government and parliament to stand still for want of somebody to fill the chair temporarily. As practical men we should regard it as expedient and right, so long as we do not interfere with the constitution. Our appointee has no absolute possession. In arguing this matter in the other branch of Parliament they dealt with it very unfairly—they persisted in assuming that we were anxious to appoint a Deputy Speaker. We did not propose to do anything of the kind. The bill shows on the face of it that we did not, and there was no ground for such an assumption.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—The Senate is certainly not constituted without a Speaker. The 35th clause of the British North America Act provides that fifteen members, including the Speaker, shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its power. A member in the chair, elected or appointed by the House, is certainly not the Speaker, within the meaning of the Act.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Even at the risk of falling under the charge of the hon. gentlemen from Ottawa of lacking common sense, I have seen no reason to change the views expressed by me last session on this bill. I do not desire for a moment to take up the time of the House with any argument upon the question now, because I think it is pretty well a foregone conclusion. I merely desire to justify myself in the course that I propose to take. I adhere to the opinions that I expressed last year, and they have been strengthened rather than diminished since then. With regard to the clause inserted at the end of the bill, and which seems to be considered by some hon. gentlemen as removing some of the objections which were made to it before, I can only say that I do not consider that the eventualities which the bill is to provide for are likely to occu so often that it is well to expose ourselve to the possibility of being told that we have exceeded our powers, and that we must petition for an alteration of the British North America Act to bring about the much desired change contemplated by this bill.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Having looked into the question during the recess, I still hold to the views I expressed last year as to the constitutionality of this bill. I still believe that it is ultra vires of our Parliament. However, I make an exception as to the first clause. I took the same position last year. I believe the first clause is wholly within our jurisdiction, that at any time the Speaker can call any one of us to replace him in the chair, and the discussion may go on while that gentleman is there, as legally as if the Speaker himself were presiding, and that without any special enactment of ours, provided that when a vote is taken or anything is to be recorded the Speaker is in the chair. Therefore, so far as the first clause is concerned, if that alone constituted the bill, I would give it my support ; but as to the other clauses, I still entertain the ideas that I expressed last year. I do not share the opinion that the hon. gentleman from Ottawa expressed, that the Speaker of our House has less power than the Speaker of any assembly in the world. He had likely in mind the presiding officer of the House of Lords, but ours is different. The position of the Speaker here is pretty similar to that of the Speaker of the House of Commons, and if, by the British North America Act, provision is made for the election of a Deputy Speaker, or for the absence of the Speaker of the other House, it certainly was done because it was deemed necessary that the power should be derived from the proper authority. Hon. gentlemen remember well how it reads:

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, in case of the absence for any reason of the Speaker from the Chair of the House of Commons for a period of 48 consecutive hours, the House may elect another of its members to act as Speaker and the member so elected shall, during the continuance of such absence of the Speaker, have and execute all the powers, duties and privileges.

It positively gives them those powers, which means that without such a provision in the Act those powers could not exist. Such powers are not given for the substitution of a Speaker in our House. That goes against what the hon. leader of the Opposition asserted, that our Speaker was the least among the Speakers in the land. Article 35 of the Act expressly says that our Speaker is somebody and is not merely a figure head, but an essential article of our constitution. It is as follows :

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, the presence of at least fifteen senators including the Speaker shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its powers.

Therefore our Speaker is necessary in order that we should sit constitutionally, and if it should be enacted that our Speaker is essential to that end, I do not see how a substitute appointed by us and not deriving his powers from the proper source could constitute with us a constitutional body. However, I will not repeat the arguments that were used last year, I understand perfectly the desirability of this legislation. We should not be always under the necessity that we were in before of appointing a new Speaker in case of the sickness of the actual Speaker, as was done I believe in the case of Mr. Botsford, who was temporarily appointed. Provision should be made to relieve our Speaker, especially now when we are entering upon a new departure and taking a larger share of the burden of legislation and when questions may arise on which there will be night sessions. We should provide, but constitutionally, for the substitution of some among us to come to the help of our Speaker, whoever he may be. I am reconciled with the bill on account of the 4th clause, which proposes to refer the constitutionality of the Act to the proper legal authorities. It will have the effect of giving us a decision as to whether we are intra or ultra vires. On account of that clause, although holding the same views that I held last year, and recognizing the advisability of having some means of relieving our Speaker when necessary, I shall vote for the second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to vote against this bill. I think the object of it is a very desirable one and one in which every member of this House concurs. It is a great pity that originally the power which is sought to be given to the Senate by this bill should not have been bestowed upon it, but that not being the case, it is much to be regretted that in 1875, when legislation was had to increase the powers of the two Houses, this matter was not provided for. I concur with what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Barrie. I do not propose to go over again the discussion that we had last year when the bill was debated at considerable length, but I thought on the whole that the gentlemen who considered the measure was not constitutional, made out a fairly strong case. However, I learn from the hon. gentleman from Ottawa that it is impossible to see how anybody who had common sense could take the opposite view from that which is taken by that hon. gentleman. I was at first disposed to feel very much humiliated by this statement, but when I remembered the language which had been applied to a very august court by the same hon. gentleman a little while before, I did not feel so badly. I suppose my colleagues who took the same view of this measure last year that I did would be content to be put on the same level with the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I may say, I understand the hon. gentleman has since intimated that his language was used in a Pickwickian sense, and under those circumstances we can all feel relieved. The hon. gentleman from Amherst has undertaken to throw a little additional light on the subject. I had heard last year of the existence of this Imperial Act of 1865—I do not know whether it was referred to in this debate or not. I do not think that it materially alters the position, because it was in existence in 1875 wh n it was thought necessary to pass the Act of that year in order to give the House of Commons the power which they supposed they had and the same rule of course would apply to us. The hon. gentleman from Amherst quoted from one or two sections of this Act of 1865, but I shall call the attention of the House to the 2nd section of the Act which I do not think tells in favour of the contention of that hon. gentleman :

> Any colonial law which is or shall be repugnant to the provisions of any Act of Parliament extending to the colony to which such law may relate, or repugnant to any order or regulations made under authority of such Act of Parliament, or having in the colony the force or effect of such Act, shall be read subject to such Act, order or regulation, and shall, to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative.

If under the British North America Act we had not the power to do what we propose to do now—if the Senate could not be constituted without a Speaker in the chair, then an Act which is repugnant to that provision of the British North America Act is to the extent of that repugnancy null and void, and consequently this Imperial statute does not really and materially affect the argument. I quite concur with what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Barrie with respect to the course taken by the Government. It would have been perhaps the quickest way to reach the end which the Government were anxious to attain, had they adopted the suggestion made last session and passed an address to Her Majesty asking for power to enact this measure. Had that been done, the Act would have been passed by the Imperial Parliament last year, and we would at the beginning of this session have been in a position to have passed the measure, and it could have been done without any delay—there would not have been any opposition to it and our Act would then have gone into operation for the present session and relieved His Honour the Speaker during the present session. As it is now, there is no knowing when the legislation will become operative here. We have to pass this bill here ; it has to go the old country and be considered there by the law officers of the Crown, and every one knows they are not particularly rapid in their movements, and the benefit of this measure will not be felt until next session at any rate. It is very much to be regretted that we cannot have the benefit of the measure during the present session. Of course if the other contingency occurs—that is, supposing that the law officers of the Crown decide that we have a right to pass this measure that will be the case : but if they decide the other way, when is the change to be made? We shall have to deal with the matter next session, I presume, and dear knows what Speaker we will be relieving when the measure gets through.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I ask the hon. Minister who has introduced this bill if he had taken this into consideration —in the event of the law officers reporting this as ultra vires of the Dominion Parliament, whether Her Majesty could not by proclamation signify her pleasure with regard to it ?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would it not have been better to have memorialized the Imperial Parliament to amend the British North America Act and place the matter beyond any peradventure?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If the Government and a majority of the Senate had been of the opinion that this was not within our power, the proper course would have been to petition, but we find that a majority of the Senate and the unanimous opinion of the Privy Council is that the law is within our power and consequently it is our duty to deal with it squarely and fairly and not to vest in others duties and attributes which belong to us. Now, supposing that the majority here and in the Privy Council are all wrong and that we have not the power which we think we possess, the consequence will be that when the measure is adopted by the Parliament of Canada, the law officers reporting contrary to our contention may lead to the passing of an Act in England removing the doubt, as has already been done on other occasions. That is one way of doing it. Or the Queen may assent to the Act and signify her pleasure, which will be notified here by a proclamation. An objection has been made to the 4th clause by the hon. member from Barrie. He says even that 4th clause is contrary to the constitution, because the British North America Act says that the Governor General shall give his assent in the name of the Queen to an Act passed by the Parliament of Canada, or will reserve the same for the signification of the pleasure of Her Majesty, and it is not within the wording of the Act of 1867 to enact in the way that we propose to do. I say that it is. Surely the Parliament of Canada has the same power as the Privy Council, which is only a committee of the Parliament of Canada. Surely the same thing may be done by the principal body as by one of its committees: therefore I think that that clause is not beyond the wording of the constitution, that gives the Governor General the power to sanction or to reserve, which power to reserve is always exercised upon the advice of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I should like to remind my hon. friend what has been done on former occasions. We passed a bill well known as the Oaths bill on which I had the misfortune to differ from the other members of the House, because I held that it was ultra vires. The bill was passed and sent home. What was the result? The law officers of the Crown decided that it was ultra vires. They did not wait until we petitioned here. Within two or three weeks afterwards a bill was introduced into the Imperial Parliament to give us that power. That is all the damage that can be done in case the worst should happen in this instance.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think there is another instance in the case of the Manitoba Constitution. The Parliament of Canada gave Manitoba a constitution and the question arose whether the Parliament of Canada had the right to do so, and when it got to England they passed a bill ratifying the constitution given to Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—Section 4 of the bill is new to me in form, and I wish to ask my hon. friend if the clause will enable compliance with the rules laid down by the Imperial Government in respect to applications from a colony for the opinion of the law officers of the Crown on any important question which has arisen, especially questions of a constitutional nature?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman does not wish me to answer a question that deals with the future. I should like to have the full weight of his question, and the proper way is to give notice of it.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I have taken this mode of doing it, and I think it is the proper way. I merely mention it now so that I may not take him by surprise in bringing it up in committee. When that clause is reached I could put the question to my hon. friend. I do not expect him to answer it now, but when we come to that clause in committee I will certainly like to know what the intention of the Government is specifically.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (W) "An Act for the relief of Orlando George Richmond Johnston."—(Mr. Clemow.)

The Senate adjourned at 5.30 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, 19th April, 1894.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

IRREGULAR PETITIONS.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.), from the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills, presented their thirteenth report. He said: In the cases of all the petitions mentioned in this report there was no notice sent to the Clerk of this House of the advertisements in the local papers, and we thought it as well to report the fact to the House, in order that it may be placed on record as a warning to those who are interested in those bills, that they have neglected their duty in the matter. If the House think it advisable, the report can be referred back to the committee for further consideration. In the House of Commons, the papers were complete, but they were not sent in a complete form to this House. There is no evidence that the regular advertising has been done in the local papers.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Had the committee any person before them representing the promoters of the bills?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—No: but notice was sent by the clerk of the committee to those who were interested, and only one person responded this morning.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Perhaps some hon. gentleman interested in these petitions which have been reported upon, might move that the report be referred back to the committee. It would be very hard to prevent those people getting their legislation through, unless there is really good ground for it.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—My impression is that it would have been better not to have reported on the petitions at all, but simply let the clerk notify those persons interested and let the petitions stand until the notices were furnished.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—The object in reporting was that the report might be placed on the journals of the House as a warning for the future.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the report be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (X) "An Act respecting the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company of Canada."—(Mr. Lougheed.)

THIRD READING.

Bill (F) "An Act further to amend the Acts respecting the Harbour of Pictou, in Nova Scotia."—(Mr. Bowell.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (N) "An Act to incorporate the Wolseley and Fort Qu'Appelle Railway Company."—(Mr. Perley.)

Bill (25) "An Act respecting the Canada and Michigan Tunnel Company."—(Mr. MacInnes, Burlington.)

Bill (20) "An Act respecting the Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle Railway Company."—(Mr. Bernier.)

Bill (29) "An Act to again revive and further amend the Act to incorporate the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Company."—(Mr. Dobson.)

THE SENATE DEBATES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved the adoption of the second report of the Standing Committee on Debates and Reporting. He said: I have not much to say with reference to this report. It speaks for itself. The object is to do away with the unrevised edition of the Debates and replace that by a galley which the printers will send every day to be distributed to members whose speeches appear in the report. Each senator is allowed twenty-four hours to look over the report of his speech, and after twenty-four hours it will be the duty of the reporters to send back the galleys, whether they have been revised or not, because complaints are made every day that there is too much delay in receiving the reports, and the only way to remedy that is to force members to return the galley or unrevised report in time. The second part of the report relates to the charges for extra copies which senators obtain from the Printing Bureau.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There is an unrevised edition circulated. Is that to be dispensed with?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—There will be no more unrevised copies such as we have now. Instead of that the galleys will be sent here.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Have we the power to fix the charges for extra copies?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The tariff is given by the Queen's Printer.

The motion was agreed to.

WESTERN CANADA TRUST AND GUARANTEE CO.'S BILL.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day having been called, Consideration of the Report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce in re Bill (D) "An Act to incorporate the Western Canada Trust and Guarantee Corporation."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the report be adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In looking over the Minutes yesterday at the amendments proposed by the committee to this bill, I find at least two errors. They are merely clerical errors and I presume the clerk at the table can correct them.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The question is whether they were in the original report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If they are not in the original report they should go back. If the hon. gentleman is going to move that the report be referred back, I wish to observe further that the title which the committee has seen fit to substitute for the original bill is, in my humble judgment, nearly as objectionable as the original title, "The Western Canada Trust and Guarantee Company." The new title is to be the "Trust Corporation of Canada." Now, there are several trust corporations in Canada, and I think the new title is misleading. We have the Eastern Trust Corporation in Nova Scotia, and there are several other trust corporations in the country, and I think this name is liable to lead to confusion. If the report goes back to the committee they might perhaps consider the desirability of getting some less universal name.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It is not such an easy matter as the hon. gentleman thinks to find names not used before by any other company. The committee did look through the index relating to all the incorporated companies and we found that there was less likelihood of confusion with the name we adopted than any other, because we know how constantly these companies are mentioned by the first word or first part of their designation; and the object was to avoid that very prefix of Western. There is no other company that I know of with which this would conflict. There are two large companies in Toronto, I forget the exact designation of them, but neither of them has that word Canada in its title; and I doubt very much whether you can get one that will be less likely to lead to confusion than the one we have selected.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When the bill comes up for the third reading, if my hon. friend chooses to make a motion regarding the change of title it can then be discussed, but I might say the committee referred it to the hon. the Chairman of the Banking Committee and to the clerk and to the promoter of the bill, Mr. Symons, to change the name, and this one was selected. It does not appear to conflict, so far as I can ascertain, with the title of any of the other companies. My hon. friend from Amherst has made a suggestion in regard to the present name used, but there was an objection to that name inasmuch as it conflicted with an existing company. If the word "Western" is used it is also considered that that would conflict with another company of a somewhat similar class. I think the House had better concur in the amendment proposed by the Banking Committee inasmuch as they have reported the bill. My motion is that the report be adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Without the amendments.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As they are simply clerical errors the clerk will see that they are corrected.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I understand they are merely clerical errors in the printing; the report itself is correct.

The motion was agreed to.

SPEAKER OF THE SENATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (Q) "An Act respecting the Speaker of the Senate."

(In the Committee,)

On the 1st clause,

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—At the second reading of this bill an inquiry was made, and the answer to it was not given as promptly, perhaps, as the hon gentleman who asked it might have expected. If I understand the nature of the inquiry, it is whether the fourth clause, which provides that the bill shall not go into force until Her Majesty has expressed her pleasure, will elicit the opinion of the law officers of the Crown in England and whether the bill will be accompanied with the reports of the debates upon it in the Canadian Parliament. I have no hesitation in answering the question in the affirmative. The Privy Council in England, upon receipt of such a bill, will have to advise Her Majesty as to the propriety of giving or refusing her assent. This advice cannot be given to Her Majesty before the Government inquires into the constitutional question and makes a close study of the debates in the Canadian Parliament, upon the point in question. I think, therefore, it is quite plain that when the bill passes, the Government will send it to the Secretary for the Colonies, accompanied with reports of the debates of last year in both Houses.

The clause was adopted.

On the 2nd clause,

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I think it is well to give some attention to the argument adduced by the hon. member from Barrie yesterday. It strikes me that the word "unavoidable" is not appropriate there and should be struck out.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have no very great objection to striking out the word, but it was put there to show that the Senate will have recourse to this proceeding only on unavoidable occasions—exceptional occasions. "Uncontrollable" might be a better word, but I have explained the object we have in view. It has occurred, for instance, that the Speaker, while on his way from his home to attend a meeting of the Senate, has been detained by a storm. His absence in that case was unavoidable. We do not wish to leave it to his free will to be away from the chair. I think the word should remain.

The clause was adopted.

On the 4th clause,

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yesterday, the suggestion was made that this provision was unusual. I do not see that it is unusual at all. The House often passes bills which are to come into force only by the proclamation of the Governor General, and this 4th clause does no more, except that instead of the proclamation of the Governor General, it is a proclamation issued at the request of the Imperial Government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I presume that the language is borrowed from the wording formerly used in the case of Divorce Bills. The operation of the bill was suspended until the Queen's pleasure had been signified. I presume the phraseology is the same.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think it is.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. READ, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time on a division and passed.

The Senate adjourned at 4.10 p.m.

THE HUDSON BAY RAILWAY BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON introduced Bill "An Act to provide for the construction of a Railway to Hudson Bay as a public work." He said: In introducing the bill I would ask the permission of the House to explain at some length the purposes of the measure. It is to provide for the immediate and economical construction of a railway to Hudson Bay and also to unite the Dominion, the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories in one combined purpose for the construction of that road. We have heard several interesting discussions upon the utilization of the waters of the Hudson Bay and the advantages that would accrue therefrom to the great North-west Territories, which are now in progress of development, and have been so largely aided in their settlement by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. A population of some 250,000 souls has already been settled in that country. The House will remember that I have already, before this session, brought up the question of excessive freight rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have pointed out that where there was competition the rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway were lower than where there was no competition, and that in fact there has been discrimination against the population of that country in the matter of freight rates. A great deal of interest also has been taken in the question of opening up the Hudson Bay as a navigable route. Hon. gentlemen will realize that there is an enormous inland sea to the north of us nearly as large as the Mediterranean, larger than the Baltic, and larger than any of the great inland seas of the world, entirely surrounded by Canadian territory, but inaccessible to Canadian enterprise, and the reason that it has remained so long so is because there is already an outlet to the east, and the eastern population of Canada are not, to the same extent, interested in its development. In fact, I may say that there is a disposition on the part of some of our eastern friends to maintain the current of freight and traffic between that western country and the sea coast, in eastern channels, in order that it may not be diverted from eastern points. Hon. gentlemen will realize that we who reside in the North-west find it absolutely necessary that we should develop that competition that will lead to the more economical disposition of the products of our labour, in order that it may benefit the producers of the country at large, and unless we have the facilities for that economical disposition of the products of our labour, the country will be disappointed in the results of the efforts they have put forth to develop the great North-west. We have a rich territory, a country that Canadians may well be proud of, but it is, as I have remarked before, an inland territory, dependent upon very long railway connection to find an outlet to the markets of the world, and the power that a single monopoly possesses to discriminate against that country in its freight rates, is such that it is cramping the interests and disappointing the expectations of our people. Hon. gentlemen know that a charter for the construction of a railway to Hudson Bay, was obtained from Parliament some twelve or thirteen years ago. In fact, there were two charters obtained, one called the Nelson Valley Railway, to run from Winnipeg to York Factory, and the other, the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway, to run from Winnipeg to the mouth of the Churchill River. In 1883 these two charters were amalgamated and formed what has since been known as the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company. The terms and conditions upon which that charter was granted were such that the work had to be commenced within three or four years and completed within ten years. The ten years have elapsed and the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company are now applying to Parliament for a renewal of their charter, and of the privileges granted them under that charter. The people of the west have for some time felt that the construction of a work of such importance leading to a sea that has yet to be developed both in the trade and traffic that may surround its shores and also the local traffic that may intervene between the settled part of the interior and the coast —they have long felt that it is beyond the capacity of a private corporation—in fact that if a private corporation is going to carry it out, aid sufficient to guarantee that private capital against all possible losses must be forthcoming, before there are hopes at all of securing the construction of the line. If the public have to find most of the security necessary for the construction of the railway it is just as well that the expenditure upon its construction should be controlled in the public interest and by the public at large, and that when its construction is completed the public should own it and control its destiny in their own interest. As hon. gentlemen will realize, there are many of those who undertake the promotion of railways in Canada and on this continent generally, who are more interested in the financial profit connected with the construction of the railway than in the final disposition of the road after its construction. In the western sections of the country with regard to the Hudson Bay Railway the people are not so interested in the construction of the road itself as in the advantages that are to be obtained from the connection with an outlet that may possibly be a competing route for the traffic and trade of the west with the existing lines of communication, and for that reason the promotion of a railway such as I am speaking of as a public work will be found to be of great national interest to Canada and to those people of the west who have been seeking for years assistance for the promotion of this enterprise. The development of the Hudson Bay is of great importance both from the enormous amount of territory that will be brought within the range of Canadian enterprise by providing an outlet, and from the value of the fisheries in those waters—at least every one believes, and I think we have every reason to believe, that they are valuable. It has been stated on former occasions in this House that the northern waters are the best for fisheries. We know that the best fisheries in Europe are on the coast of Norway and we were informed by the present Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island, while he was a member of this House, and who is a good authority on the subject, that the best fisheries of Russia are in the Arctic Ocean. The fish products of Asiatic Russia amount to $11,000,000 per annum and all European Russia to two and a half or three million dollars. It is perfectly evident that the Asiatic fisheries must have been entirely developed in Arctic waters while the European fisheries must have been in Baltic and the Black Sea and more southern waters. When Russia is able to develop fisheries in the Arctic Ocean amounting to $11,000,000 per year as compared with two and a half or three millions of dollars in European waters of Russia, it is evident that the Arctic waters contain elements of wealth to a far greater extent than the waters in more southern latitudes. Our own experience is that our fisheries are far more valuable than those of the United States. We have no positive information as to the value of our fisheries in Hudson Bay, but we know what the enterprise of the United States has done in the territory of Alaska, for which they paid $7,000,000. They have developed great wealth in the Arctic regions of that country by their enterprise. In the same way an immense fishing industry may be developed in our Hudson Bay by the opening up of this route. The best market for the fishing industry of those northern waters will be the North-west Territories and the north-western states. We have developed a large amount of fishing on Lake Winnipeg. The value of fish taken from the waters of the province of Manitoba is I believe $1,200,000. These fisheries have been developed by the facilities afforded for the distribution of the products of the fisheries. As you proceed further north there are large numbers of inland lakes containing great fishing wealth in themselves—fish of a very valuable merchantable character. The fish taken in the waters of Lake Winnipeg are distributed not only through the North-west and the north-western states, but to eastern Canada as far east as Ottawa itself. But the great fisheries of Hudson Bay will be of no value to Canada until a route is opened up by which the product of the fisheries can be distributed in the interior of the country. Other charters have been granted by Parliament to provide access to the shores of Hudson Bay. One route projected is from Sault Ste. Marie to James Bay; another is an extention of the Toronto and Nipissing Railway to James Bay, and still another to connect the province of Quebec with James Bay. These would all accomplish the purpose that I have in view so far as our fisheries are concerned, but they would not furnish the means of distributing our fishing wealth to the west and south-west, nor would the earnings of these roads be supplemented by the trade and traffic of a highly productive country which would seek an outlet in that direction. In considering the question of the opening up of this route it is well to look at the possible development of further traffic in connection with other interests besides the fishing, in order that the construction of the road may be profitable after its completion. In addition to the fishing wealth that may be existing in Hudson Bay, there is the advantage it possesses as an outlet for the carrying trade of our north-western country. There is a doubt in the minds of the people as to what the future may have in store for us with regard to the outlet by Hudson Straits, but we know enough to say that we should not close our eyes and declare that it is utterly impossible that that route can be made available for commerce, for a portion of the products of Canadian industry and enterprise, because as some hon. gentlemen stated here the other day, in excellent speeches that were made on the subject, we need not be astonished at anything that may be in store for us in future. The development of the human mind has been so great that the greatest difficulties are overcome by the enterprise and ability of the race of the present day. Scientific knowledge and scientific appliances that are brought to bear are such, that we need not hesitate in the promotion of any national enterprise, lest it should not come up to the expectations that we have formed from our imperfect knowledge of the circumstances; therefore we should divest our minds of the idea that we are taking any chances or risks in opening up such an enormous portion of our territory by the construction and operating of a railroad to the waters of Hudson Bay. There are evidences that our friends in Montreal are opposed to the opening of that route. When the hon. member for Welland introduced the subject of the Hudson Bay route the other day, the hon. member from Kennebec who lived in Montreal, opposed the scheme on its merits. After having identified himself with it at one time, and ascertaining the facts connected with the project, he said he thought it would not be a profitable or practicable undertaking. They may, however, result from the sources from which he derived his information—his interests do not lie in the direction of Hudson Bay, but that fact should not operate to stop the enterprise of the very large population situated in our north-western country. The interests of the east as a distributing route, will not suffer by the opening up of the Hudson Bay route, because it is well known that under the most favourable circumstances, the navigation of Hudson Straits will be limited to about four months of the year, from the 1st July to the 1st November. Beyond that period the risks and the difficulties will be so great that we are not likely to be able to profitably extend it beyond that, but four months of navigation, if it is practicable, is of immense value as an outlet for the productions of the country. For eight months of the year whatever development takes place, in consequence of the construction of the new outlet, and the competition that that route will develop, must of necessity find its outlet through eastern channels, and therefore if there is any fear in the minds of our eastern friends, situated in Montreal, as an eastern centre, that it may affect their interests, they have to compare what value the trade that will be developed by the Hudson Bay route will have on the commerce of the country for two-thirds of the year as compared with the loss of some of the existing traffic for one-third of the year, owing to its diversion to the Hudson Bay route. Whatever will develop the commerce of the country and increase its population, is bound to increase the wealth and development of all parts of the country upon the lines that have already been laid down. I do not wish to detain the House, because this bill will come up for a second reading, but as it is necessary that hon. members should know what the purport of the bill is, I wish to explain in order that when the bill does come up for second reading the House may know exactly the lines that I have laid down for their consideration, in bringing forward a bill which perhaps some may say is of an unusual character. There has been so much said about the advantages of this route by other hon. gentlemen that I will not take up the time of the House by enlarging on the subject. What I want to say is, that the private charter to which I have already referred, and which is now before the House for renewal, is promoted by a private corporation; that the aid which has been granted to that corporation amounts to 6,400 acres per mile, within the boundaries of the province of Manitoba, and 12,800 acres for the portion outside of the limits of Manitoba, and in addition, a cash subsidy of $80,000 a year for the extension to the Saskatchewan River. For thirteen years, notwithstanding the aid granted to this corporation, no advance has been made towards the construction of the road. It shows that unless this aid is greatly supplemented, it is beyond the power of a private corporation to carry out the work. It is, therefore, a matter of importance to us in the west to know that another ten years is not going by without something practical being done towards carrying out the project. The bill which I am submitting to this House provides facilities to enable the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories to combine, in order to assist in the promotion of this enterprise. It provides that they shall bear the cost and the burden themselves, and, inasmuch as it is a matter of national importance, that the Dominion Government shall assist them by a guarantee of the bonds necessary for the construction of the road at a rate not greater than 3 per cent interest. We have a precedent for the idea that I am now bringing before the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Does the hon. gentleman think that we have power to pass such a bill in this House?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, I think we have. However, I am prepared to submit to superior knowledge as to the constitutional powers that we possess; at all events it is absolutely necessary that I present my bill and explain its object before we are able to say whether it is constitutional or not. So far as the guarantee of the Dominion Government is concerned, this bill does not provide for that. It has to be provided for by a special Act for the purpose. This bill merely provides the machinery by which the province and the territories may unite with the Dominion and carry out the work; in so far as it is confined to that, it is within the province of this House. It is quite possible that the Dominion Government may feel that it would be better for the Government to take the matter up itself, but it is necessary, in order to move public opinion on a great question like this, that those who are most interested in the promotion of the project should provide details for a fair and honest discussion of the merits of the question. I have had no communication on the subject with the Government of Canada or the Governments of the North-west. It is an idea that I have already developed by correspondence in the public press, and I desire now to put it before Parliament for consideration. As hon. gentlemen are aware, the Intercolonial Railway was constructed in 1867, and the Imperial Parliament gave an Imperial guarantee on $15,000,000, at 4 per cent interest, and with that aid Canada was enabled to raise money for the construction of the road at a very much lower cost than it otherwise would have done at that time, and the Intercolonial Railway has been of great international importance to Canada since its construction. And such has been the progress of Canada since that day, the guarantee of the Federal Government of Canada at 3 per cent is of as much value as the guarantee of the Imperial Government was to Canada at that date. I do not think that any one in Canada will complain and say that we ought never to have undertaken the construction of that work even though it has cost a very large sum up to the present moment. I do not think anyone looking back will say that if we had to do it over again we would not undertake it. The Intercolonial Railway has been a bond of union between the Maritime Provinces and the Western Provinces, and as a public work undertaken at that time at the public cost has been of immense value. In the same way the Grand Trunk Railway was promoted in 1850 or 1851, and the Government of Canada gave by way of a loan $15,000,000 to that enterprise at the time—$15,000 a mile for a thousand miles of railway so long ago as 1854. The Grand Trunk Railway, notwithstanding that large subsidy, has been loaded down with a great many securities which have brought discredit on the country in consequence of their not being able to pay dividends upon these securities. It was a wasteful method of construction at that time, and many of those who put their money into it have felt the burden of that waste from that day to this. I do not think it is in the interest of the country that we should launch any enterprise that would have the same effect in the opening up of the Hudson Bay Railway route. It should be a public work backed up by the credit of the country and by the assets that were granted to the private corporation referred to. Then again, we have the Canadian Pacific Railway. The country gave to that railway in subsidies and otherwise equal to eighty, ninety or one hundred million dollars, as the value of the land might be computed, and although the Canadian Pacific Railway has cost the country a great deal of money I do not think any one will look back and say we have done wrong or that if we had to do it over again we would not undertake it, but what I do want to say is this, it has been a wasteful method on the part of the Grand Trunk Railway and on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway. At the present moment the net earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway are 3 per cent on the cost of $280,000,000, or the cost of 5,500 miles of road at $50,000 per mile. That is the burden that the traffic of the country has to bear in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway and in addition to a subsidy of $80,000,000 or $90,000,000, that has been granted to that enterprise. I point this out to show that it is a wasteful method and that a more economical way of undertaking it as a public work is worthy of the best attention of hon. gentlemen of this House. I am bringing it forward in the interest of our people in the western country, in order that by the opportunities that exist through our Debates the details and the information that I am able to furnish may be distributed to the public. The bill I prepared is modelled on the Intercolonial Railway bill which was passed in 1867, and seemed to be a method by which the very best economy combined with the very best workmanship could possibly be obtained. It was not an expensive road in its original construction and I believe it ranks with any other railway in the country in the excellence of its construction and its permanent way. The same results will accrue, I believe, to the Hudson Bay Railway if undertaken on the same principle. The bill provides that it shall be undertaken by commissioners, one of whom shall be appointed by the Provincial Government of Manitoba, one by the Government of the North-west Territories, and one by the Dominion Government, and one by the joint action of the three Governments, and in that way there is a community of interest. I will read that portion of the bill that deals with that question :

Whereas it is desirable to open up the Hudson Bay to Canadian commerce, and to further utilize the traffic of its waters for the cheapening of its transport for the producers of the western territories of Canada;

And whereas it is desirable that the utmost economy should be exercised in the construction of a railway that must of necessity for many years be limited in its local traffic, and dependant on its through traffic ;

And whereas the opening up of the Hudson Bay waters is of national importance and will add to the national welfare of Canada, it is desirable to assist in the construction of a railway to a port on Hudson Bay by lending the credit of the Government of Canada by a guarantee of the bonds necessary for its construction, at a rate of interest not exceeding three per cent under certain terms and conditions hereafter specified.

And whereas the chief benefit derived by the construction of a railway to connect our western territory with the Hudson Bay will accrue to the people occupying those territories, the aforesaid guarantee shall not go into force until the Legislatures of the province of Manitoba and the Territorial Governments shall pass acts agreeing to indemnify the Dominion Government against any loss that may be sustained by the guarantee of the construction bonds ;

And whereas for the better carrying out of the aforesaid contention the construction of the said railway shall be carried on by a body of four commissioners in whom shall be vested the powers necessary to hold the assets, to carry on the work of construction, and to levy rates upon the assessable property of the province of Manitoba and the territories to indemnify the Government of Canada against loss. And that the three commissioners shall be appointed one by the Dominion Government, one by the Provincial Government of Manitoba and one by the Territorial Government and one by the three Governments jointly :

Therefore in fulfilment of the duty contained in the foregoing preamble and in order to carry out the intention therein expressed and to the raising of the said loan so to be guaranteed as aforesaid, Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows :—

Then follows the bill modelled on the one adopted for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, which, in addition, provides for the transferrence to the commissioners the public aid which had already been appropriated for the construction of this railway, to be managed by them as a trust, the cash subsidy of $80,000 a year to provide for the interest during construction, the land grant as an additional security for the bonds. I will not read any more of it as it will appear in our Debates, and hon. gentlemen can read it for themselves, so that when it comes before this House for the second reading we may have an intelligent discussion upon a question that is of very great importance to the Canadian Government and people, because any population that is brought in by the Hudson Bay route will remain in the country and increase the public revenue.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You could not bring them in that way without freezing them.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They have been coming in for 200 years that way without being frozen. It has been long used as a route for access to the great plains of the North-west. First of all it was developed by the Hudson Bay Trading Company and they carried on their trade with the interior by that route for a long time. Then we had the North-west Fur Trading Company and they found an inlet by the Canadian route. Afterwards the two companies were amalgamated and altered their route and found their way into the country by St. Paul and through United States territory. That has since been changed and it is now by way of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If we open a road to Hudson Bay it may take its turn again as one of the routes for the development of Canada. The advantages it possessed in the past in the development of that great western country will be just as apparent when that railway is an accomplished fact as it was in the time of the old voyageurs who found their way from Churchill and Nelson to the interior of the country by the York boats on these rivers. With these remarks I beg to move the first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I rise to a question of order. This bill, on the face of it and on the showing of the promoter, who addressed us, is not a public bill. It is a private bill prepared, I should say from the speech we have just heard, at the instance of the Government of Manitoba and the Government of the North-west Territories. It should have been preceded by a petition, and a deposit no doubt has been made for the introduction of a private bill. The Standing Orders Committee should have reported on this petition. It cannot at all be treated as a public bill. Moreover, if it were a public bill the hon. gentleman should have kept it for a future occasion when he could have the authority of the Crown for its introduction, because its enactment would authorize the levying of taxes necessary to build this work. I think, therefore, that it is not in order on either ground—if the bill is a private one it cannot be introduced at all, and if it is a public bill, it could only be introduced by and with the sanction of the Crown, and not in this House at all, but in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I think that it is entitled to a first reading and if it is found to be as the hon. Minister of Agriculture says it is, then after the discussion on the second reading it can be ruled out. I think a bill of that description is, at any rate, entitled to its first reading in order that it may go before the House and be discussed on its merits.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—To give the bill its first reading would imply, that we know, very little of the constitution of the country. It is a bill intended clearly to impose taxation, and provides for a guarantee of the country for a great public work, and therefore could only be initiated in the House of Commons and then on a message from the Crown. We have no control over measures such as this for initiation even.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I would extend my objection also to the publishing of this bill in the Debates. I think the House should not allow that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The House could by unanimous consent do that. The hon. gentleman has made a speech and it must appear. I quite agree with the hon. member from Richmond on the point of order, but the hon. gentleman should have an opportunity to give his views to the House and to the country.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not object to that at all—the speech has to be published, but the hon. gentleman made a request that the bill should be published at length in the Debates, and to that I object.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I quite agree that this bill cannot be introduced in this House, for the reasons that have been given, at the same time my sympathies are with the hon. gentleman. He cannot too strongly agitate, in the House and outside of it, the project of giving a port on Hudson Bay to Manitoba and the North-west, either as a private enterprise or as a government work. and if at any time it can be done, it will be of vast importance to the Dominion.

The SPEAKER—The House seems to be perfectly unanimous as to the bill not being in order and the promoter of the bill himself has not asked for a decision.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I ask for a decision.

The SPEAKER—I am of opinion that the bill is out of order.

THE FRENCH TRANSLATORS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved :

That the Clerk of the Senate be authorized to employ such temporary assistance for the French Translators as is necessary, and to pay therefor the same rate per printed page as that paid for similar translation in the House of Commons.

He said: In the report of the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts, adopted last Wednesday, the duties of the extra translators to be employed was confined to the translation of bills. As the work of the translators is far behind, it is necessary that the assistance should be general.

The motion was agreed to.

THE COMMITTEE ON THE INSOLVENCY BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved:

That the Honourable Mr. Smith be added to the Select Committee to whom was referred Bill (C) intituled: "An Act respecting Insolvency," and that the said committee be authorized to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

The motion was agreed to.

WESTERN CANADA TRUST AND GUARANTEE CORPORATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill (D) "An Act to incorporate the Western Trust and Guarantee Corporation."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I gave notice the other day as follows:

That when the Order of the Day is called for the third reading of Bill (D) intituled: "An Act to incorporate the Western Canada Trust and Guarantee Corporation," he will move that the title of the said bill be "An Act to incorporate the Alberta Trust and Guarantee Company," and that the name of the company be "The Alberta Trust and Guarantee Company."

The Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom this bill was referred, recommended that the title of the bill and the name of the company be altered, but it does not seem to me that the title of the bill or the name of the company is yet what it ought to be. My motion is for the purpose of trying to improve things. To a certain extent it may be an infringement on the rights of the hon. member from Calgary, but it is desirable that the company should have a proper name. As I understand it, this is a company organized in Calgary, to do business in that part of the Dominion. The title which is recommended by the committee is "An Act to incorporate the Trust Corporation of Canada." Now, that title is clearly not correct, because it is an Act to incorporate a corporation. If it is already a corporation, there is no necessity to incorporate it. You incorporate a company but not a corporation —a corporation is something which is already incorporated. There is that objection to the title of the bill. Then, this is a company to do business in the North-west, with headquarters in the district of Alberta, and the title of the bill and the name of the company should give some indication as to the sphere of action of the company when it is incorporated. When you call it "The Trust Corporation of Canada," it has the boundless Dominion for its sphere. I suggest that it would be advisable to make the territory a little smaller. Alberta has a pretty large area, and this company will find scope and room enough for their operations under that title. I therefore move the amendment of which I gave notice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I appreciate the solicitude shown by the hon. gentleman from Halifax in reference to the title of this bill. It appears to me that the hon. gentleman assumes more anxiety at times than he is called upon to bear. Had my hon. friend acquainted himself with the facts concerning the selection of this title, he would have found that the matter was fully discussed in the Banking Committee, of which my hon. friend does not happen to be a member, and that the Banking Committee delegated to a sub-committee the selection of a name in lieu of the title which had been decided upon by the promoters. That committee was composed of the hon. gentleman from Toronto, who is Chairman of the Banking Committee, the promoter of the bill and the law clerk, and they selected the name which appeared in the report of the committee as one not conflicting with that of any other company. Consequently, I think it but reasonable to conclude that that sub-committee was in a very much better position to determine whether this is a proper name for the company than my hon. friend who was not there when the discussion took place and is not familiar with the circumstances of the case. Permit me to say, in the first place, that the company would object to the name proposed by the hon. gentleman. He seems to wish to place a limitation on the operations of this corporation. Because this company proposes to do business in the North-west Territories, it does not follow that it may not do business as far east as Halifax. Therefore, the company object to the very local name proposed by my hon. friend. In the next place his contention is untenable that the word "corporation" should not be used. My hon. friend says that "corporation" presupposes the existence of a corporation. I would ask my hon. friend how would a corporation ever be organized if we could not give it a name as a corporation in this way? It must stand to reason that at some juncture of the history of a company a name must be given it as a company or a corporation. We are merely asking that a name be given to this company and that it be called "The Trust Corporation of Canada." I find that the report recommended that the name be changed to "The Trust Corporation of Canada." Now, inasmuch as this does not conflict with the name of any other company, and has been recommended by the committee after a very careful inspection of the names of other corporations of this description, I see no reason why the House should not confirm the report of the committee.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—On behalf of the committee I may be permitted to say that when the bill was first introduced in the House, I, myself, objected to the proposed title of "Western Canada Trust and Guarrantee Corporation," because it was a name which conflicted with the names of several other companies—The Western Canada Loan and Savings Company, for instance, one of the largest of our loan companies. When the bill was before the committee a good deal of difficulty was found in fixing upon a title which would not clash with the name of any other incorporated company. We sent for the index to the statutes of those various companies and found that "Western Canada," "North-western" and other titles of that kind had already been appropriated, and after some little consultation we thought that a name which conflicted less with any existing company than any other was that of the Trust Corporation of Canada. There is not much force in what the hon. member from Halifax said with regard to the term "corporation." I have at this moment in view several companies that were incorporated under similar names—The Ontario Trust Corporation for instance, was incorporated under that name and therefore I do not see any objection on that ground. I think the name as it stands is not objectionable. If there is anything objectionable at all, it is perhaps that the title is a little too ambitious, but I do not understand that it is the intention of the company that their operations shall be confined to a particular portion of the North-west which would justify limiting the name to the "Alberta Corporation." These are the reasons which weighed with the committee in recommending the name submitted to the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With the concurrence of the seconder, and with the permission of the House, I ask leave to withdraw the motion. I might have moved to call the corporation the Universal Trust Company, but perhaps that might have been objected to.

The amendment was withdrawn and the bill was read the third time and passed.

The Orders of the Day being read,

Second reading Bill (J) "An Act declaring and confirming to William Roper Hull, certain water rights and privileges in Fish Creek, in the district of Alberta."—(Mr. Lougheed.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I wish to explain to the House that this bill has been postponed on the Order Paper in anticipation of the Government bringing down a general Irrigation Bill. I therefore desire, with the indulgence of the House, to have it remain on the Order Paper until that juncture shall have arrived. I therefore move that the Order of the Day be discharged and that the second reading of the bill be fixed for this day week.

PUBLIC HARBOURS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (U) " An Act respecting Public Harbours."

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give some explanation of this bill.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I did that at the introduction of the bill. The first clause gives power to the Government to extend the area of any harbour. I think the hon. gentleman will remember that when I called attention to this provision before, he mentioned that the language used in this clause conveyed the idea that a harbour might not be wholly covered with water. I explained then that there might be an island in the harbour and under those circumstances it would be necessary to take power to extend the limit beyond the island. The second clause provides that any public harbour created by proclamation under this Act shall be deemed to be a port within the meaning of the Harbour Masters' Act. The third clause provides for giving power to the Government to make such regulations as may be necessary for the government of said harbours. The last clause provides a penalty for not carrying them out. I might mention that the necessity for this bill was more particularly brought under the notice of the Department of Marine and Fisheries on account of the depositing of ballast by a number of seagoing ships in the roadstead at the entrance of the harbour of St. John, New Brunswick. The harbour does not extend sufficiently far to enable the corporation, which derives its powers by royal charter, to prevent ships from depositing the ballast which they may have, or any other rubbish, in certain portions of the roadstead. They represented that these deposits are filling up that portion of the entrance to the harbour of St. John, and they ask that power be given to extend the harbour so as to bring that portion of the bay within the limits of the harbour. It is a very necessary provision. The only fear that was expressed by my hon. friend to my left was that we were taking certain powers from the royal commissioners and from the corporation of the city of St. John. The bill does not interfere in any way with any of the powers or rights which are given to any corporation under royal charter or by special act of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No doubt it is a very meritorious act on the part of the Government to try to improve the harbour of St. John. The only question with respect to this bill is that it is general in its provisions. Nobody would dream of objecting to it if it related only to the harbour of St. John. I do not speak against the bill in any sense, but there are one or two features of it which deserve the attention of the House before it goes through. Hon. gentlemen are probably aware that there had been a conflict of jurisdiction between the local legislatures and the Parliament of Canada with respect to what are called the foreshores. There was a decision by the Supreme Court of Canada in a Prince Edward Island case, the case of Holman and Green, to the effect that the foreshores come under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. The decision of the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island had been given unanimously the other way, and the counsel who was engaged in the case on behalf of the owner of the property whose views had been sustained by the Prince Edward Island Court, was perfectly satisfied that if this case had been taken to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada would have been reversed, and the decision of the Prince Edward Island Supreme Court been sustained. The Government of Canada indicated that the law as laid down in this case of Holman and Green, was not altogether satisfactory, because some two years ago a Government measure was passed here which placed the foreshores throughout the country as a rule under the jurisdiction of the local governments. Under this bill, if it become law, the Government may by proclamation decide that any bay, even though it is not used as a harbour at all, may be declared to be a harbour. The Government could claim under this Act that they had jurisdiction over it, and then a port warden could be appointed, even though no vessels went to the harbour. I do not think it is probable that anything of the sort will be done, but it might occur if this bill were to become law, and the question of jurisdiction deserves the serious consideration of the Government. I presume it will receive that consideration. The Governor in Council under these regulations may take the greater part of the foreshores of the country and make regulations and provide penalties for the infringement of those regulations. The language of the bill is rather sweeping, and before the measure is finally passed here, the Government might take steps to have the language to some extent limited.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It seems hardly right for any member of this House to indulge in petty sarcasm whenever the name of St. John is mentioned. We know St. John has no jealousy towards Halifax. Our harbour will accommodate the largest ships afloat. We have a depth of 27 feet of water at lowest tide. The largest ship in the British Navy entered our harbour a few months ago, a ship that drew 27 feet of water, and remained there at low tide. Under these circumstances it is hardly right that hon. gentlemen should indulge in such sentiments towards St. John. Halifax, we admit, has a fine harbour and is a fine city, but its harbour is not visited with such a large class of merchant shipping as that which comes to St. John. But there is no reason why we should not get along without these petty jealousies on the part of the two cities on the maritime coast. I appreciate the desire of the Government to improve the harbour of St. John, if it is necessary to improve it, but it strikes me that there is no necessity to deepen the entrance to the harbour, except in connection with the recent improvements, when a large quantity of ballast was unnecessarily and in violation of the contract deposited in the channel. The Common Council of St. John have always provided wharfs and improvements and placed our harbour in such a position that to-day we can accommodate any commerce that Canada may have or that the world may offer us without any danger of vessels finding a deficiency of water or impediments that might interfere with navigation in the slightest degree. Therefore, I think the hon. gentleman from Halifax should not be so ready to indulge in assumptions that are incorrect as to the navigation of the harbour of St. John.

Hon. Mr. WARK—One reason why such legislation as this is necessary is that very frequently vessels on arrival may be prevented by strong outward currents or unfavourable winds from casting anchor and to save time and expense begin to discharge their ballast so near the entrance of the harbour as to injure it. By this means they utilize the labour of the crew who would otherwise be idle during the detention and save the expense of labourers to discharge the ballast inside and perhaps teams to haul it away. The bill will enable the Government to extend the limits of the harbour and give the corporation control over such extension and thus prevent obstructions at its entrance.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Whether this was prompted by the condition of St. John harbour I do not know, but it is important legislation. I know the port of Lunenburg does not cover a sufficient area to prevent people throwing ballast and débris too near the entrance of the harbour. Several years ago some vessels dumped their ballast in a place where it had to be dredged out again, and therefore I am glad to see this bill introduced. I know the same difficulty is experienced not only at Lunenburg and St. John, but in other ports, to the detriment of navigation.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

LINDSAY, BOBCAYGEON & PONTYPOOL RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (29) "An Act to again revive and further amend the Act to incorporate the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. DOBSON moved that the bill be now read the third time.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I call the attention of the House to the fact that this motion is in direct violation of Rule 70. That rule is explicit. It provides that no private bill shall be read the third time on the day it is reported from committee. It will be necessary to move the suspension of the rule before it can be done.

Hon. Mr. DOBSON moved that the bill be read the third time to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.), from the Committee on Standing Orders, presented their fifteenth report, recommending that as the time limited for receiving reports on private bills will expire on the 26th instant, that that part of Rule 52 which relates to the same shall be dispensed with for the remainder of the session. He said: The extension of time may perhaps be considered too long, but it does not give any relaxation so far as the public are concerned. It is a matter of internal economy and routine. It gives time for the members of the House to report up to a later period of the session.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think it is without precedent to recommend an extension for the whole of the session. We are only in the early part of the session yet, and to suspend a rule of that kind for the remainder of the session is, I think, unusual. I do not intend to oppose it, but I doubt if there is any precedent for it.

PUBLIC HARBOURS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (U) "An Act respecting public harbours."

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Strictly speaking the hon. gentleman should move the suspension of the rules.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Public bills can be read the third time if there is no amendment. The rule only applies to private bills.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I thought we made amendments.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—They could scarcely be called amendments. They were merely corrections of clerical errors. Rule 41 says that no bill shall be read twice the same day; no Committee of the Whole House shall proceed on any bill the same day the bill is read a second time; and no bill shall be read the third time the same day that the bill is reported from the committee when any amendments have been made in the committee. It really implies that it can be read if no amendments are made. I have no objection to let it stand, however.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am simply calling attention to the rule; that is all.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (29) "An Act to again revive and further amend the Act to incorporate the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Company."—(Mr. Dobson.)

THE SAFETY OF SHIPS AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole on Bill (G) "An Act to further amend the Revised Statutes, Chapter 77, respecting the safety of ships."

(In the Committee.)

On the 1st clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER said: I gathered from the observations made by the hon. Minister on the second reading of the bill that the object of this legislation is to give a little more freedom to the movements of our ships without bringing them under the provision with respect to deck loads. This bill hardly carries out the intention of the Minister, if that is his intention. Section 7 of chapter 77 of the Revised Statutes says that no master of any ship "when sailing after the 1st day of October or before the 16th day of March in any year on a voyage from any port in Canada to any part of Europe shall place or permit to be placed," and so on "on any part of the upper deck of such ship" certain sorts of timber. That was the provision in section 7 of chapter 77 of the Revised Statutes and there is a similar provision in the 8th section of that chapter. The provision refers to a vessel going from any port in Canada to any port in Europe. In 1889 an Act was passed, chapter 22 of the statutes of that year, amending this chapter 77 of the Revised Statutes. There was this alteration in the language of the 7th and 8th sections of the chapter of the Revised Statutes:

Subsection 1 of section 7 and section 8 of the said Act are hereby amended by striking out the words "port in Canada to any port in Europe" in the 3rd, 8th and 9th lines thereof respectively, and inserting the words "port or place in Canada to any port or place out of Canada, not being a port or place in the United States, Newfoundland, St. Pierre, Miquelon, Bermuda, the West Indies or South America" in lieu thereof.

Hon. gentlemen will see that in the language of the chapter of the Revised Statutes the law with respect to deck loads applied only to vessels sailing to ports in Europe; under chapter 22, of 1889, the provisions were extended to other ports not being ports in the United States, Newfoundland, St. Pierre, Miquelon, Bermuda, the West Indies or South America. Under that amendment of 1889 a vessel could go to any port in South America, and not come under the provisions of the Revised Statutes with respect to deck loads. The bill which is before us proposes to limit the powers of our shippers still further. Instead of allowing them to go to any place in the West Indies or South America, it will allow them to go to the West Indies, and the West Indies are made to include any port or place on the mainland between the Gulf of Mexico and the south-eastern extremity of French Guiana. Now, there is a very large portion of South America, beyond French Guiana, with which our vessels trade. There is a great deal of trade between Canada and Brazil, and a very large trade, particularly in lumber, between Canada and Uruguay, the principal port of which is Montevideo, and Buenos Ayres the principal port of the Argentine Republic. As I understand this bill —and I submit my views to the Senate with all proper deference—if it becomes law the prohibition as to deck loads will apply to vessels going to Brazil, Montevideo and Buenos Ayres. There does not seem to me to be any sufficient reason for extending the prohibition to vessels going to those places. Once a vessel gets as far as French Guiana there is no probability of her meeting with tempestuous weather anywhere north of Buenos Ayres. If she were going round Cape Horn to the west coast of South America, she would be very liable to meet with tempestuous weather, but as far as Buenos Ayres she is not, and in the interest of the lumber shippers of Canada it is not desirable that this deck load law should be applied to vessels trading to Brazil, Uruguay and the Argentine Republic, I hope the hon. gentleman will see his way clear to so amend the bill as to allow the law upon that particular point to remain as it is.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The hon. the the leader of the House said he thought that this bill embraced South America. As it does not do so, I hope he will extend it as far as he says it should go. After passing the Gulf of Mexico, or West Indies, sailing is less difficult or hazardous and there is not the danger to shipping that there is in the Gulf of Mexico. There is a large trade with South America, as my hon. friend says, and I hope this bill will be extended to include South American countries. I am sure there is no objection to it on the part of the insurance companies. I can speak for the companies in which I am interested; they see no difficulty, and make no extra risks on vessels going to South America. Of course, if vessels were going round the Horn it would be another thing, but if the operation of the bill is confined to the eastern coast of Brazil and the places that my hon. friend mentioned, there is no reason why it should not be extended, whilst it would benefit the trade and place us on an equal footing with vessels carrying deckloads to the same ports from the United States.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—There is something in the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I do not see why these ports should be excluded from the right which is accorded to the vessels bound to the Gulf of Mexico. It appears to me a very singular thing that while a vessel is permitted to go to those distant points and to foreign ports, and carry a deck load as provided for in this Act, the same vessels going on a part of that voyage cannot carry the same load. If ships are prohibited from carrying deck loads under this Act to ports in the United States of America, the provisions of the Act appear rather singular. There is also a difference between the present bill and the Acts that we have now on our Statute-book. In the 16th clause of this bill it is provided that vessels may carry a deck load up to 6 feet to ports in the West Indies and certain ports in South America. Under the former Act the limit was four feet and a half, or not higher than six inches over the rail, which I think was a wise and prudent provision to make in a case of this kind; but I contend that to permit vessels, such as very frequently sail from the coasts of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island and from other Canadian ports, to take lumber to the West Indies and to ports in the Gulf of Mexico with deck loads up to six feet is imprudent and dangerous. It is risking the lives of the crews of those vessels to take such heavy deck loads. We know many of those vessels are used in the fishing business in the summer—very fine schooners, it is true, but generally having low rails, perhaps two feet and a half or two feet eight or nine inches in height, and if they are to take a deck load of three feet above the rail, it must be a very risky business indeed. The law which we are about to pass is very different from the laws in force in Great Britain with respect to carrying cargoes of this kind, and I think that the former Act under which the vessels were permited to take deck loads of four and a half feet, or six inches over the rail, was quite sufficient for vessels of small capacity such as are owned in the ports of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Charlottetown, in the course of his observations, has condemned, not the suggestion which I have made, but the existing law altogether. The point which I make is this: If you allow a vessel to go to the United States and to the West Indies and to Newfoundland with the deck load mentioned in this bill, there is no reason why the same vessel should not be allowed to go to ports in South America south of British Guiana. I did not make my remarks as clear as I might have made them, perhaps. The clause which is now before the committee defines the term "West Indies," and it gives a more extensive definition to "West Indies" than the usual one, but if hon. gentlemen will look at the Act which is to be repealed by the bill now before us, they will see that less liberty will be given to our ships under this proposed enactment than they have at present.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL--Not at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is the 4th section of chapter 22 of 1889:

Subsection 1 of section 7 and section 8 of the said Act are hereby amended by striking out the words "port in Canada to any port in Europe" in the 3rd, 8th and 9th lines thereof respectively, and inserting the words "port or place in Canada to any port or place out of Canada, not being a port or place in the United States, Newfoundland, St. Pierre, Miquelon, Bermuda, the West Indies or South America" in lieu thereof.

The prohibition as to deck loads does not apply under this Act of 1889 to vessels going to the United States, Newfoundland, St. Pierre, Miquelon, Bermuda, the West Indies or South America. The third clause of the bill before us says:

No master of any ship, when sailing after the first day of October or before the sixteenth day of March in any year, on a voyage from any port or place in Canada to any place or port out of Canada not being a port or place in Newfoundland, or in the United States of America, or in St. Pierre, or in Miquelon, or in the West Indies.

And it leaves out South America altogether so that vessels, which at the present time are allowed to go to Brazil and Buenos Ayres and Uruguay, will not be allowed to go there, if this bill becames law. There is no reason for the prohibition.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman inform the House in what respect the bill before the House interferes with clause 4?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have tried to do it, but I am afraid I have not made myself clear. Clause 3 of this bill exempts only Newfoundland, the United States, St. Pierre, Miquelon and the West Indies, and section 4 of the Act of 1889 exempted also South America; the West Indies is so defined in this bill as to include the coast of South America as far as the south-eastern extremity of French Guiana; and that leaves under the operation of the deck load law all the portion of South America lying to the eastward and southward of French Guiana, and that portion of South America includes Brazil, Uruguay and the Argentine Republic.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island understood that this bill applies to vessels going to the United States. Such voyages are not affected by this bill and the United States are not restricted in carrying deck loads to the West Indies and South America as we are. They are not interested there as regards deck loads at all; it simply restricted them as regards the Gulf of Mexico. Now my hon. friend has some knowledge of the class of vessels owned in Nova Scotia; I do not know whether they have any in Prince Edward Island engaged in this trade, but in Nova Scotia they are all constructed for this kind of deck load, and are said to be safer with it than without it, and when a vessel gets to Gulf of Mexico or West Indies all the danger is comparatively over from that point. It is between Nova Scotia and the Gulf of Mexico that there is any danger.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It appears to me the hon. member from Halifax is arguing from wrong premises altogether. The object of the bill now before the House is to extend privileges to the shipping trade of the country. At present there are restrictions which prevent the loading of vessels beyond a certain extent. The object of the bill is to permit them to load to six feet, and to prevent, as we necessarily must do, the carrying of deck loads beyond a certain height upon vessels going to England ; for the reason that the Imperial statute makes certain provisions which we have no power to override, and if vessels were to load beyond the height prescribed in the Imperial statute, they would be subject to seizure and penalties as the hon. gentleman knows. Another object in this bill, although we are discussing the whole of it instead of clause by clause, as I think would be much more convenient while in committee, is to give a wider interpretation to the expression "West Indies." In the past the words "West Indies" simply, without defining the meaning, have been construed by many to refer only to certain islands in the West Indies. I called the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the other night after the debate to the remark made by the hon. member from Halifax in reference to the restriction. He said "quite the contrary," that while this defines what is to be meant in the future by the term "West Indies," giving the words a wider range than they had under the old law, a vessel may be loaded under this clause six feet above her deck and can go to any portion of Mexico, South America, the Argentine Republic, anywhere except across the Atlantic to England. There is no restriction in this law as the hon. gentleman has called attention to in the House nor is it the intention. I will call the attention of the Minister of Marine to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman, but I see no provision in the Act to prevent a vessel going to any part of South America. In defining what the "West Indies" means, it does not necessarily follow that a vessel with a deck load could not go to the Sandwich Islands or to Australia or to the Argentine Republic or any portion of the Pacific Ocean. If the clause could possibly bear that interpretation I am quite sure that the Minister of Marine would have included South America with the other countries. With this explanation I think the hon. gentleman will see that it is not only not the intention of the Government to restrict the operations of Canadian vessels, but on the contrary it is to widen and to remove the difficulties of interpreting the law which has been on the statute-book in the past.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is perfectly true this is more extended than it is under the ordinary interpretation. I simply called attention to the point which I wished to make, that an amendment should be made, not here, but a little further on when we come to the third clause.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I do not at all agree with the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg. The United States, I take it, under the bill which is now before us, is in a different position from Newfoundland or certain other ports. Under the clause referring to the ports the following is provided :

3. No master of any ship, when sailing after the fifteenth day of November or before the sixteenth day of March in any year, on a voyage from any port in Canada to any port in the West Indies, and during the voyage while within Canadian jurisdiction, shall, if she is a single decked vessel, place or cause or permit any cargo whatever to be placed or remain upon or above the deck to a height of more than six feet above the deck.

Now I take it that under that a vessel cannot carry the same quantity of deck loading to a port of the United States that she can to a port of the West Indies or South America.

The clause was adopted.

On the third clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause, in my humble judgment, needs amendment. I am not questioning the intention of the department at all, but in this House we have to judge of intentions by the bills submitted to us. I hope that I shall be able to make it clear to the hon. Minister that the language of this bill is not as extensive as was intended, that is, that the exemption from the deck load law is not as extended as the exemption which exists at present. The exemption at present existing is contained in section 4 of chapter 22 of the Acts of 1889, and section 7 and section 8 of the chapter of the Revised Statutes, which has already been quoted. Now the deck load law applies to any port in Europe and also any port outside of Canada, which is not in the countries mentioned. That is the law as it stands to-day, and under it we can go to any port of South America without coming under the prohibition contained in the deck load law. If this bill passes what will be the case? In this third clause there is no mention of South America at all.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have no objection to inserting South America.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move that after the words "West Indies" the words "South America" be inserted.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—That, perhaps, would be more extensive than was at first intended. There are ports in South America which vessels cannot reach without going round Cape Horn.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—They are not likely to go that way, therefore there can be no objection to the amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the clause was adopted.

On the title of the bill,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As I understand, this is a departure from the principle which governs the English laws in reference to deck loads. That is, the Act is not in harmony with the English law. We are allowing deck loads to a greater height than is permitted under what is known as the Plimsoll Act. I presume the Government have received sufficient information to justify the change, and I presume it is predicated on the assumption that there is less danger going south on the eastern side of the American continent, and even round Cape Horn, than in crossing the Atlantic Ocean. Those who are not familiar with navigation and have not made a study of this subject, are somewhat startled at the change, because we know it took many years to educate the public mind, in England, to the reduction of the deck load to conform to the deck load as provided under the Plimsoll law, and unless we had very good grounds for departing from that principle, it would seem to me to be rather an unwarrantable infringement on a recognized principle. I speak subject to correction, because I do not profess to know anything more than I have gathered on the subject from general reading.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—In Nova Scotia the men engaged in this business and the insurance officers who know what they are about and have a proper regard for the safety of life and property, have for years been pressing on the Government to make this change. The present law, they consider, is an unnecessary restriction on the trade of the country, and giving the United States advantages in the carrying of deck loads. It is considered in the interest of our trade, and it is only after long and tedious supplications that the Government are taking action.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. leader of the Government is correct in saying that this is a deviation from the principle of the English Act, but it does not apply to vessels sailing between Canada and England. It gives to Canadian vessels in any part of Canada that are engaged in this particular trade the right to carry the same deck load that is carried by a United States vessel or a European vessel other than English, going to those ports. At present they are under very great disadvantages in that respect, and consequently foreign ships compete very successfully with Canadian vessels. It has been decided after a good deal of investigation that there is no danger in allowing vessels to load to the height of six feet on the deck when they are going to the West Indies or ports on the Pacific coast as provided in this Act, though there might be a danger in crossing the Atlantic. But whether that be true or not, the English law prevents us from trading with England in the same manner that we can trade with other countries.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments which were concurred in.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved the adoption of the fifteenth report of the Committee on Standing Orders. He said: This report is to suspend the part of Rule 50 which relates to reports of Committees on Private Bills. It is thought by some that the time is too long, but in the House of Commons there is no limit to the time for receiving reports of committees, and there can be no harm in extending the time to the end of the session.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think that is asking rather too much of this House. The rules have just been revised and to ask now for an extension of time to the end of the session would indicate, if such a thing is desirable that the rule should be changed.

Then my hon. friend must see that if the report of a committee may be brought in at the end of the session, the whole of that rule should be extended.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—The portion relating to the reception of petitions was extended some time ago.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It was not such an extension as the committee now recommend. It is asking too much. If any special case comes up requiring the indulgence of the House, it might be granted; but to interfere with the general rule and extend it as my hon. friend asks is demanding too much. It might delay the consideration of a private bill until the end of the session and imperil its passage. I think the extension should not be so great.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Being a member of that committee and having agreed to the report which has been submitted to the House, to recommend the suspension of this part of the rule, it may be well to call attention to the fact that it is a part of the rule which has no very great significance beyond the mere management of our own business—no public interests whatever are affected by it. The public interests are sufficiently guarded by the provision which we have made that no petition shall be presented and no private bill shall be introduced after a certain date. Those two provisions cover all that can come before the House, and this other one is just a matter between the committee and the House. The sixth week of the session will end to-morrow and it appears to me that while the other provisions are very desirable in order that business shall be conducted properly, this latter part of the rule interferes with the action of our committee. The committee in discussing a bill may be anxious to obtain additional information on some of the things connected with it. Why should they not have it? What reason can there possibly be that the hands of our own committee shall be fettered in any way?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—They can get an extension by asking for it.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Why make it necessary to ask for it in every instance? The committee is asking now that the rule be suspended in order that they may be free to act and take whatever time may be necessary for the proper consideration of a bill and not hurry through. I can see no valid objection to the House adopting the report of the committee and suspending that part of the rule.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This rule was adopted for some purpose and that purpose must have been to facilitate the business of the Senate. If the concession be made as indicated by my hon. friend from Sarnia, then there is no necessity for having the rule at all. The object, I take it, is to inform people having business with the Senate that there is a time in which they must present their petitions and have their bills introduced. Otherwise they might be introducing new bills just at the very end of the session when there would be no time to take them into proper consideration. If the circumstance should arise that the hon. gentleman from Sarnia has called attention to, that is that the committee desire to obtain further information before they would consider themselves justified in reporting to the House upon any bill, they could report the reasons for asking that the rule be suspended so far as relates to that case and that no public interest would be injured thereby. I am giving my own individual opinion only, but I should be inclined to make the rules as rigid as possible. Otherwise there is no object in having them. It is too much the habit (I have seen it in the House of Commons and there is much more laxity in this House) that people put off doing that which the rules provide for until the very last moment, and if they find that the Senate will be lax in enforcing its rules they will pay less respect to those rules than if they were obliged to comply with them literally. I would suggest an extension for a limited time, particularly if my hon. friend's motion is to prevail, that this Senate adjourn for a week or so, by which those desiring legislation would be prevented from complying with the rules. I would suggest the middle or the end of May.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—The hon. gentleman's argument is very good with reference to the first part of this rule, but is not applicable to the latter part. The rule in the House of Commons gives the committee up to the last hour of the session to report, and if these bills come down here towards the end of the session we will require a separate motion for each one of them. Every bill that passes here must come before our committee and it may come in the last week of the session and we should have time to report.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out a further difficulty in regard to this matter. This rule fifty-two has a very much more restricted meaning than the committee who revised the rules were disposed to give it. It prevents the consideration of any private bill, even by the committee, after the expiration of six weeks. Now it is quite manifest that any private bill coming to this House must necessarily be sent to a standing committee. For instance, the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours is a committee that has to deal with private bills, so is the Banking Committee, and the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills. I do not think, according to the practice of this House, that the rule would apply to such bills as I refer to, but the rule is so drawn and is so wide in its application that it would undoubtedly apply to all private bills. I therefore think it is impractical to observe the rule according to its letter.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—This rule, as it stood in our rules before, applied to petitions presented for private bills in this House and to private bills introduced in this House, and did not apply to private bills coming up from the House of Commons, which must necessarily come at a much later date in the session. If the time were limited as to them in the same way as to bills introduced in our own House, it would of course stop them at once. But hon. gentlemen may observe that whereas the time for presenting petitions for private bills to the Senate is limited to three weeks, and for introducing private bills is limited to four weeks, the time for receiving any report on any of these bills is extended six weeks—that is to say, the committee have a fortnight to report on any bill after it has been referred to them. It has been the practice in this House for years to extend the time for presenting petitions and private bills. Whenever a motion of that kind is introduced extending the time for presenting bills beyond the four weeks, then it would be proper for the Committee on Standing Orders to recommend that there be a corresponding extension of the time within which they can be reported upon the case of reports of committees, and that is all that should be asked for.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—A motion was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the extension of the time for receiving petitions for private bills. The rule refers to all bills—it does not specify any class of bills. Our recommendation does not refer to petitions, it merely refers to reports of committees.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman will read the whole of the clause he can put no interpretation on it but that of the hon. gentleman from York. If the interpretation which is placed on this clause by the hon. member from Truro and the hon. member from Victoria is correct, then you will be legislating contrary to law in passing any bill which comes from the lower House unless you suspend the operations of the rule for the time being. The clause provides that no petition for private bills shall be received by the Senate after a certain time. If you read the whole of the rule you will see that it relates to bills introduced in the Senate. I am speaking now of the old rule, which is similar to that which was adopted the other day. It simply fixes the time within which petitions shall be received, for the consideration of them, and for the working of the committees, and if the bills which have been presented to the Senate had not been presented within the limit provided in this clause, then the committee certainly could not report upon them. It also declares how long the committee shall have to consider bills presented for adoption by this House. I do not think by any possible stretch of interpretation you could make that apply to bills coming from the Commons.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If that is the interpretation of the rule it should be amended and made more clear, because it says we cannot bring in "any report"; it does not specify a report of a bill introduced in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—You must read all the clause together, you cannot separate one part of the clause from the other.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I do not know whether the House can amend a report or not.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—Then I move that the report be referred back to the committee.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I am inclined to adhere to the opinion I have expressed. I consider the provision which is made in the rule, that there shall be no neglect on the part of the persons applying for legislation, is maintained. The committee does not ask that there should be the least interference with the time allowed for presenting a petition for a private bill. It merely asks that the time for making a report should not be limited—that it is inconvenient to have the time limited in that way. It is a matter of management between ourselves, and why the committee should, under any circumstances, be hampered as it were, or restricted from taking all the time needed to examine the bill and obtain information from a distance, I cannot understand. I am quite sure that if the committee had named a day a month hence, the matter would have passed without a word.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I ask the hon. gentleman if all the bills introduced into the Senate have been reported upon ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—They do not all come to us ; they go to other committees.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the ground taken by the hon. gentleman from York and the leader of the House is undoubtedly correct as to the substance of the rule, because while we may control the introduction of petitions and bills in this House and deal with the reports upon bills which have been introduced in our own House, we cannot undertake to control the action of the other House, and in the other House, as I understand it, reports of committees on private bills are accepted up to the end of the session. If a person seeking a private bill has introduced it in the House of Commons and has complied with the rules of that House and his bill comes up here at any time before the end of the session we could not refuse to consider that bill simply because it has been detained in the Commons beyond the time mentioned in our rules. I feel very sorry to have to admit it, but I am afraid that the wording of the rule is not just what it might be ; and no particular harm can be done by adopting the report of the committee. Probably we had better adopt the report now, because after all, as I believe all the bills introduced here have been reported upon, no harm will be done, and the relaxation of the rule asked for by the committee will apply only to bills coming from the Commons, and which we would be bound to receive. It certainly was not the intention of the committee which revised the rules to interfere with bills coming up from the Commons.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Certainly not, and it does not say so either.

THE BALFOUR DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

The petition of James Balfour, of the city of Hamilton, praying that certain exhibits filed in his divorce case last session be restored to him, being read,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED said: In reference to the petition of James Balfour, which has just been read at the Table of the House, I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Divorce, for the purpose of reporting in regard to the request made by the petitioner for the return of certain exhibits which are on file in connection with the bill passed by the House last session of Parliament. I am aware that the Committee on Divorce cannot absolutely deal with the subject, but they may be able to report to this House upon the propriety of returning those original exhibits for which the petitioner asks.

Bill (G) "An Act to further amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 77, respecting the safety of Ships."—(Mr. Bowell.)

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA BILL.

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved the second reading of Bill (34) "An Act respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada." He said: This is a short bill which empowers the directors of the company to borrow money to the extent of 75 per cent of the actual paid up capital, when they are authorized to do so at a meeting called for the purpose by a two thirds majority of the shareholders.

The motion was agreed to.

ATLANTIC AND NORTH-WEST RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington) moved the second reading of Bill (30) "An Act respecting the Atlantic and North-western Railway Company." He said: This is a bill asking for an extension of time and for permission to spend more money in completing the railway. I should perhaps state to the House that the portion of the road which extends from Montreal to St. John is part of the Short Line, and by its various lines it is carried as far as Renfrew, and 20 miles have already been constructed from Renfrew to Eganville, and a further extension is required to continue the line to the eastern shore of Lake Superior.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESERVATION OF GAME IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I take this opportunity of introducing a bill for the preservation of game in certain parts of the North-west Territories in Canada. Its provisions will be best understood after it has been printed, when the House will be better able to judge of its merits. I may, however, for the information of the House state that it has come within the knowledge of the Government, through information received from explorers who recently visited the northern regions of Athabasca and the Mackenzie Basin, and from persons intimately connected with the country in question, that the fur bearing animals which are at present the only source of revenue in this vast northern district, are fast disappearing as the natural result of their indiscriminate slaughter. The preservation of the birds and animals in that region is of paramount importance to the Indians and natives who rely upon hunting for food, raiment, and the necessary trade which supplies them with their other requirements. The object of this bill is to protect, as far as possible, what remains of this important resource of the country for the Indians and natives who would, in the event of the extermination of the animals, either starve to death or make their way out to the settled parts and become the wards of the country. The native himself would appear to have no idea of protecting fur bearing animals, but slaughters all that come in his way. It is true that the North-west Council has ordinances in force protecting game and animals, but the provisions do not extend beyond the legislative districts. It would be unreasonable, of course, to expect the Indians to observe laws preventing them from killing animals when they require them for food, and care has been taken in the bill proposed that it shall not operate to cause them any hardship, but it is considered of imperative urgency that some immediate steps should be taken to restrict the indiscriminate slaughter of fur-bearing animals by the adoption and enforcement of stringent regulations such as those contemplated by the provisions of the proposed bill. The necessity for taking immediate action in this relation will be more apparent when it is borne in mind that whilst very strict laws and penalties protect the buffalo where none have been seen for years, no attempt has so far been made to preserve the few that do exist in the north. It is estimated that not more than one hundred in all exist to-day of this once common and valuable animal, which formerly roamed in countless numbers over the north-west country. Notwithstanding its scarcity, however, and the difficulty of getting near it, white men are not deterred, it would appear, from going into the region that they now inhabit to try and secure a few, for no other reason than the sport it affords, as the paucity of their numbers and the difficulty of getting the robes out precludes all idea of its consideration as a commercial enterprise. The same remarks apply to the musk-ox, which inhabits the district commonly known as the "Barren Lands" lying along the Mackenzie River, north of that along Great Slave Lake and its affluent streams, and west of the Hudson Bay. Their grounds would appear to have been entered twice already by white men, and it is only a question of time and dollars until these animals will be hunted extensively. What are known as the "Barren Lands" are also the abode of numberless herds of cariboo during the summer months, travelling north to the Arctic coast in the spring and returning south to the wooded country in the fall, and it has been reported that during their migratory journeys large numbers of them are killed by the Indians, often through sheer love of slaughter. The attention of the department has also been drawn to the great and rapid decrease in the number of beaver all over the unceded portions of the North-west, caused by their wholesale slaughter at all ages, particularly in the spring and early summer. The Government being convinced of the importance of adopting regulations for the preservation of the fur-bearing animals in the district mentioned, and in compliance with the numerous appeals which have been made in that behalf by persons more particularly connected with the matter, it is considered that the Act proposed will to a great extent meet the object in view without imposing any hardship upon the Indians or the traders. I might add that the bill provides, as far as it is practicable, for the carrying out of its provisions. It will be readily understood that great difficulties will present themselves in carrying out the law to preserve the game in the unorganized territories where scarcely any white people exist, except those who go there for sport, as they term it—for the purpose of destroying these valuable animals. Past experience of this country proves the great necessity of taking steps at as early a day as possible for the preservation of the natural food supply of the natives and the Indian tribes. I remember distinctly when the North-west Territories were first ceded to Canada, that the present Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, the Hon. Mr. Schultz, called the special attention of Parliament to the fact that unless stringent laws were passed for the preservation of the buffalo in the North-west Territories in a very few years that animal would become extinct; and his prophecy has proved true to the letter. The result is that it is costing this country now nearly half a million dollars a year in order to feed the natives and Indians of that country, which expense might, to a very great extent, have been prevented had his advice been taken at the time. I need scarcely say that most of us living in the older province had very little idea of the importance that should be attached to the recommendations which were thus made by the then member for Lisgar. There may be some difficulty in enforcing the provisions of this Act; still, by appointing guardians with magisterial powers to enforce it, and in securing the co-operation of the Hudson Bay Company, it can be done. It is as much in their interests as in ours, that the game and the fur-bearing animals in the North-west Territories should be preserved for the food supply of the Indians. I may add this bill does not interfere with the killing of any animal by the Indians, when it is done for the sake of food, to prevent them from starving.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is the bill of a prohibitory character or does it simply contemplate the establishing of a close season?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Both. If it establishes a close season it would necessarily be prohibitory during that season, except when the Indians need an animal for food; then it would not be prohibitory.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the bill make provision for the shooting of game say by sportsmen, at particular seasons of the year? Is it permissive in any degree?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes, as to certain animals; it prohibits the killing of certain animals for five years. That would apply to the buffalo, if there are any, and to the musk-ox.

The bill was read the first time.

MONCTON AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY AND FERRY COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (I), "An Act to amend the Acts relating to the Moncton and Prince Edward Island Railway and Ferry Company," with amendments. He said: There are two amendments in this bill: one is verbal, substituting the word "undertaking" for "railway." The other is a provision allowing an extension of time for two years, and then the power of construction shall cease as regards all parts of the line which are not made complete. There is no objection to those amendments that I am aware of.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

WOLSELEY AND FORT QU'APPELLE RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (N) "An Act to incorporate the Wolseley and Fort Qu'Appelle Railway Company," with amendments. He said: These amendments in the first clause are wholly unobjectionable. They are rendered necessary by a wrong description of the incorporators. In the third clause the amendment being of a somewhat novel character, is one to which the House will probably pay attention hereafter. The clause reads this way: "The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches." That is the usual gauge, and the amendment is to add those words "or of any narrower gauge that the company may deem desirable." There is a consequential amendment to this in the fifth clause which regulates the amount of capital stock. The fifth clause provides that the capital stock of the company shall be $400,000. It is proposed to add to that as an amendment, "Provided the road be of a gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches, or $250,000 if of narrower gauge." In the seventh clause there is an amendment which is wholly unobjectionable. The word "assembled" is struck out of the 35th line, and after that is substituted "the persons present, personally or by proxy." As the third reading of the bill is to be deferred until Monday, I would suggest that these amendments be taken into consideration at the same time.

FREIGHT RATES ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I would like to ask the hon. leader of the House, if he has any information to furnish yet with regard to freight rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No, I have not, but I will make inquiry as to the probable time they will be received. They are not furnished yet. I may say, that one of the officials stated some time ago, after the adoption of that motion, that it would take some little time before they could be prepared. However, I will make inquiry and let the hon. gentleman know at the earliest possible moment.

THE COMMUTATION OF THE DEATH SENTENCE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. leader of the House when we may expect that return which I asked for a short time ago with respect to the commutation of the sentences of those Indians ?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It escaped my mind, I will make inquiry and let the hon. gentleman know on Monday.

THE DOWNEY DIVORCE CASE.

The Order of the Day being called,

Consideration of the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Downey Relief Bill,

Hon. Mr. GOWAN said: Before proposing the consideration of this report for today I had arranged all the evidence with my own hand to be passed on to the printer, expecting that it would be in the hands of hon. members yesterday morning, but for some reason or other the evidence has not been printed. Under the circumstances I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and that this report be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

STEAM BOILER AND PLATE GLASS INSURANCE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (35) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Steam Boiler and Plate Glass Company of Canada." He said: An Act was passed in 1891 to incorporate the Steam Boiler and Plate Glass Company of Canada. The object of the company is sufficiently indicated by its name. The bill which is before the House proposes to amend the Act of incorporation and to allow the company to insure not only boilers and plate glass, but also the lives of engineers and firemen who are in actual attendance on the boilers insured by the company. There is also a slight amendment to the third section of the Act

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that a bill is now before the House which distinctly denies the right of any company to engage in more than one or at the outside two branches of insurance—life cannot be associated with other classes of insurance.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I presume that the committee to whom this bill is to be referred will consider whether or not this company should come within the provisions of the general bill that is now before the House.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté) introduced Bill (AA) "An Act to amend the law relative to conspiracies and combinations formed in restraint of trade"; and moved that it be read the first time.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman explain the object of the bill ?

Hon. Mr. READ—It is customary in this House to make such explanations at the second reading.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the first time.

THIRD READING.

THE INSURANCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (V) "An Act to further amend the Insurance Act." He said: As I gave no explanation when this bill was read the first time I shall do so now. The first section of the bill deals with the first clause of section 8 of the Act.

As it stands at present, Government securities mentioned in said section when taken as deposits are to be estimated at their market value, and the proposed amendment provides that the value at which they may be accepted shall not exceed par. When this section of the Act was passed, American securities were, I believe, below par; but they are now quoted at a high premium. The Treasury Board in March, 1886, ruled that United States bonds could not be accepted at a higher rate than par, even in a case where their market value was considerably above par. In view of the words of the Act, the accuracy of this ruling was questioned, and the object of the amendment is to set the matter at rest in accordance with the ruling of the board. It is not intended that any securities at all shall be accepted at a quotation above their par value.

The second section of the bill deals with the fourth clause of said section 8 and the amendment proposed is intended to make the meaning of the clause clear beyond a possibility of a doubt. A case arose several years ago where a company sought a return of a portion of an additional deposit (with which the clause deals) contending that the Governor in Council on the report of the Treasury Board could order such return. Mr. Lash, then Deputy Minister of Justice, gave an opinion to the effect that no such return could be ordered and that the additional deposit referred to must be dealt with as if it formed a portion of the original deposit. In a more recent case, that of the Life Association of Canada, Mr. Burbidge, then Deputy Minister of Justice, gave a similar opinion which was concurred in by Sir John Thompson. The proposed amendment will leave no room for question as to the intention of the clause being in accordance with the opinions just referred to.

The third section deals with section 11 of the Act from which it is proposed to strike out the words "any company's deposit is unimpaired and." It is uncertain what these words mean as applied to companies which are required to make increased deposits from time to time, as their liabilities increase, as in the case of all foreign companies. If a company's deposit is to be deemed impaired when it is less than the Act requires, great inconvenience and even loss would arise, if the interest coupons were withheld until a deposit is brought up to the necessary amount for which purpose companies are by the Act allowed sixty days after demand therefor has been made. The practice has been not to withhold the coupons under such circumstances. As it is by no means clear what was intended by the words quoted and as the remainder of the section affords sufficient protection it is proposed to strike out the words referred to.

Section 4 proposes to make it clear that a company applying for a release of its deposit must give the notice in a newspaper which section 17 requires, before such release can be granted. The notice required by this section has generally been given in such cases; but, in one instance, it was overlooked, and the company contended that it was not necessary, and in this view the Deputy Minister of Justice concurred. It is, therefore, proposed to make publication in a newspaper absolutely essential, as it must be regarded as of much more value, so far as giving notice to the public is concerned, than publication in the Gazette.

Section 5 proposes to repeal sections 19, 20 and 21 of the Act, and to re-enact their substance, in a slightly different form, with the change following :—

(a) In the case of foreign companies, the Act at present requires statements of the company's business, under the oath of its chief agent.

There was some doubt as to the person intended, and the amendment proposes to remove all doubt in future by requiring the statement of the Canada business to be verified by the oath of the company's chief agent in Canada, and the statement of general business to be verified by the oath of the president or vice-president and the secretary or actuary of the company, and requires (subsection 3 of section 20 at the foot of page 2), that the chief agent in Canada shall keep a complete set of books and records wherein shall be entered full particulars of everything which relates to the Canada business of the company.

(b) In the case of foreign life companies, it is proposed to call for a preliminary abstract to be delivered on or before the 15th day of January, similar to that which is now required of Canadian life companies.

Dealing with that clause in the existing Act, I may say that it has met with a certain amount of objection, and that it is proposed to amend the bill now submitted to the House, so that the companies may find it easier to comply with the requirements of the law. "Such agent shall keep at the chief agency in Canada all books, records, etc." This has been objected to. It was stated it would involve very great expense and a very large amount of work and would actually eat up a large proportion of the profits. I shall, therefore, when in Committee of the Whole, propose an amendment to that clause requiring the companies to furnish records and documents sufficient to enable the chief agent in Canada to prepare and forward the statement of Canada business in this section provided for, and that said statement of Canada business may be readily verified therefrom, which will not exact from them the keeping of books, registers and records as was at first thought.

Under the existing Act the penalty is $500 for failure to file the statements as required and $100 for each month during which a company neglects to file such statements. The penalty prescribed was very large and no special provision for its collection was provided. It is now proposed to make the penalty $10 per day for each day's default and to make the money recoverable at the suit of Her Majesty instituted by the Attorney General and to apply the penalties received towards the expenses of this office; that is the superintendent of insurance office. This will probably insure promptness in the delivery of the statements.

It has occurred recently, I believe, that men have made it a business to harass and bring suits against companies who have neglected, during a very limited time, to produce the statement required, and they are molested by suits for a $500 fine and $100 a day or month for every subsequent delay. It is thought that the law is too rigorous in that respect, and that it is not necessary to enforce the companies' duties by the imposition of such a very heavy fine.

A further provision (subsection 2 of section 21) is to the effect that if the penalties provided for are not paid the license shall not on expiry be renewed.

The 6th section proposes to define the word "policy holder" in section 34. The proposed definition is in accordance with an opinion of the Minister of Justice given some years ago in the case of the Life Association of Canada, and has been acted upon in all cases that have since arisen. In the case of a policy of the Citizens' Insurance Company the Deputy Minister of Justice has recently held the view that the beneficiary and not the person to whom the policy was issued is to be regarded as the policy holder. The amendment proposed is intended to set the matter at rest.

Section 7 refers to assessment companies and is in accordance with recent legislation. Clauses similar to those proposed to be added to section 39 were inserted in the charters of the Home Life in 1890 and in the charters of the Woodmen of the World and the Catholic Mutual Benefit Association in 1893.

By section 8 it is proposed to make section 47 relating to fire insurance companies harmonize with section 33 which relates to life companies by requiring the concurrence of the Treasury Board to a release of a deposit instead of that of the Governor in Council. It has been found more expedient to have a meeting of the Treasury Board than of the Governor in Council and less difficulty is anticipated if the Treasury Board is authorized to deal with the matter.

By section 9, section 49 has been redrafted and made to harmonize with the remainder of the Act as far as possible, by requiring as in the case of section 47, the concurrence of the Treasury Board in the issue of a license other than those specifically provided for by the Act (viz., life, fire and inland marine) instead of that of the Governor in Council as at present required. The present Act is principally a consolidation of several earlier Acts in the first of which the concurrence of the Governor in Council was required in the case of release of deposits, etc. This related to fire companies. In a later one relating to life companies the concurrence of the Treasury Board was required under similar circumstances, and in a still later Act (1885) relating to assessment life companies, the concurrence of the Treasury Board was required for the registration of Canadian assessment companies, calling for further deposits in the case of foreign assessment companies, etc., and it is proposed to harmonize the whole by requiring the concurrence of the Treasury Board in all cases. Under the present section 49, which provided that the Governor in Council shall determine in each case thereunder whether any and if so what deposit shall be made, it has been practically determined that a deposit shall in every case be necessary and the section as redrafted so provides.

Section 10 is new so far as the Act is concerned. Subsection 1 thereof is based upon the following Order in Council which has been acted on since its adoption :—

1882—Combination of Life with other Clauses of Insurance Business. The Board having had under consideration an application from companies for a license to transact accident insurance business in combination with life insurance, and having considered the report of the Superintendent of Insurance thereon, are of opinion that it would not be in the interests of the public, or consistent with the policy indicated by the Parliament of the Dominion, by refusing charters of this nature, that the business of life insurance should be combined with any class of insurance, and would recommend to Council: (1) That in future no license be issued to a company which desires to transact business of life insurance for the purpose of transacting any other business of insurance in combination therewith.

And it is considered advisable that it should be embodied in the Act. Subsection 2 of section 10 provides that cyclone or tornado insurance may be transacted in combination with fire and marine. There is not as yet much cyclone insurance done in Canada. Subsections 3 and 4 make provision for classes of insurance which may be combined and subsection 5 limits the classes to two except in the case provided for in subsection 2. This clause has attracted a certain amount of attention from existing companies and when in Committee of the Whole, I propose to offer the House an amendment which would form a 6th subsection to this clause:

The provisions of the section shall not interfere with the renewal of licenses heretofore granted:

That is, the intention is to ask the House to legislate only as to the future, and not to affect any of the companies now existing and doing business.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then companies at present having two classes or three classes of insurance may continue?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They will be able to continue: it is not intended to in any way give the bill a retroactive effect. It is only as to the granting in future of new licenses and not as to the renewal of licenses.

Section 11 is founded upon the following Orders in Council which have been acted on since their adoption, with, it is believed, very beneficial results, and it is thought desirable that they should be embodied in the statute:

Charter Powers of Foreign Companies.—The Board recommend that it should be laid down as a general rule that a license will not be granted to a foreign company whose corporate powers are in excess of the powers which would be granted to a company by the Dominion Parliament. (O.C. 21st January, 1891.)

Provided, however, that any company, regardless of its charter powers, which has a paid-up capital of at least $500,000, wholly unimpaired, and in addition thereto, holds over and above all liabilities estimated according to Government standard, a rest or surplus fund equal to at least 30 per cent of such paid up capital and the market value of whose stock is at a premium of at least 30 per cent,——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is 20 per cent in the bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is this a departure from the present section?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No; the sectio intended to put in the law what was exacted or what was being carried on in the past by an Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What you are reading now is entirely different from section 11, which appears in the bill.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, that is the Order in Council I am reading from.

—and has carried on successfully for a period of at least ten years the business for which a license is sought, being only one class of insurance, or if more than one, then such classes as may be properly combined, shall be deemed eligible for and entitled to such license upon agreeing to keep and maintain assets in Canada, as defined by the Insurance Act, over and above and in excess of the amount required by sections 9 and 10 thereof (said Sections to be deemed applicable to such company) to such an amount as the Governor in Council on the report of the Treasury Board shall fix and determine, not, however, exceeding the sum of $200,000, such excess to be looked upon as the company's Canadian capital and such agreement to be deemed a condition precedent to the issue of such license.

And provided further, that the application for a license of any company not in all respects complying with the requirements of the foregoing proviso, yet not materially falling short in any of the essential particulars thereof, may form the subject of a special reference to be dealt with on its merits. (O. C. 30th January, 1892.)

Section 12 is in the Act introduced in 1893 and not proceeded with. Section 62 of the English Companies Act contains the following provision:

In default of any regulations as to voting each member shall have one vote. * * * That is to say, it matters not how many shares a member holds if there is no regulation (by-law) as to voting each member has only one vote—and article 44 of the standard regulations contained in the schedule to said Companies Act is as follows:—

Every member shall have one vote for every share up to ten; he shall have an additional vote for every five shares beyond the first ten shares up to one hundred, and an additional vote for every ten shares beyond the first hundred shares.

The bill last year was opposed by Mr. Mulock and Mr. Edgar. Sir Richard Cartwright and Mr. McMullen urged that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and it was not carried through the House. Mr. Cockburn urged delay; so also did Sir Hector Langevin. Sir Richard Cartwright's proposition was that there should be minority representation; for example, if a shareholder owned one-tenth part of the stock he should be represented on the board of directors by one-tenth part of the board. Hon. David Mills endorsed Sir Richard's view. Mr. Sutherland also spoke in opposition to the bill. The discussion which took place will be found at pages 3002 to 3016 of the Hansard for 1893.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Does that apply to all insurance companies?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It would apply to every company in the future to whom licenses would be granted.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—All newly organized companies?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; it is those that derive their authority from the Parliament of Canada—not outside companies.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No; simply companies formed in Canada; it could not apply to companies formed abroad; only to companies formed in Canada, and the object of the clause is this, to prevent one large share-owner from controlling the investment of a capital five or six times larger than his own holding. A man in an insurance company may hold, say, $75,000 of shares; he may control the vote of the whole company, and that insurance company may have the investment of perhaps three-quarters of a million, or half a million. The question was put, is it right that one single man should have it in his power to invest such a large amount of money, perhaps for his own benefit, by investing it next to a property that he holds himself? When in Committee of the Whole I propose to add another clause to the bill, which will be the thirteenth clause, and it is to this effect, that whenever an error occurs in life insurance in the giving of the age of the insured, this error should not make the policy void, except, of course, if it had been the subject of a fraud. As we all know, very few men solicit the opportunity of insuring themselves. The contrary is the fact. Men are solicited to insure, and agents take very little precaution, so long as they get the risk. Everything is easy, and everything is good; they verify nothing, and they take a declaration, take the premium and send you a policy. If the insured dies in an unexpectedly short time, everything is closely investigated, and if there is the slightest error in the age of the insured, the companies immediately take a most rigorous advantage of it and decline to pay. Very often this refusal of payment is made to the widow of a labourer, a woman in distress, unprovided with the means of going to law, and they frighten her into a composition of fifty per cent or less; therefore, I think it is right that some provision should be made to deal with cases which have occurred in good faith, where an error in the age of the insured has happened—some provision should be made that the insurance should not be void, but that the company should have the right to collect the premium that would have been collected had the age been properly given, and that the amount, after that assessment has been made, should be paid to the policy-holder. Some of the provinces have made enactments in relation to this subject, and I think a rider should be added to that clause so that we may not be unwittingly going beyond the limits of our jurisdiction. Of course we have the right to make laws in relation to insurance, and especially in relation to insurance companies incorporated by the Parliament of Canada; but as this provision is perhaps not an essence of the insurance law I would also suggest that this section is subject to the provisions of any legislative enactment of any of the provinces of the Dominion. I know that in Ontario they have adopted similar legislation. Another object for inserting this clause in the Insurance Act is on account of the fact that last year the Parliament of Canada passed an Act to insure the Civil Service officers desirous of taking insurance. Under the Act regulations were made, and amongst the regulations is the enactment of this new clause which I propose, that in case of error concerning the age, the proper premium may be collected and the balance must be paid.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This bill deals largely, no doubt, with the details of the insurance law, but there are some important questions connected with it, which I think affect us all as policy-holders. Any increased expense for maintenance of insurance companies of course falls on the policy-holders, because it comes back to this—that the companies have entered into such a union as has led to the fixing of uniform rates all over the Dominion (at least in the older provinces of the Dominion) and these rates are regulated from time to time on such a basis as to enable the companies to draw what they consider a fair dividend on all moneys invested. Therefore, anything that unnecessarily entails expense on the insurance companies ought to be avoided unless some practical result is to flow from it. As far as I can see in reading over the bill, its object is to facilitate book-keeping in the department that has control over it, and to secure this result some of the companies are to be put to a large annual expense. They are made to conform to a rule which, as far as I can see, has no real, practical benefit or advantage. In the first place, they are told that they must make up their statements to the 31st December. Now to a company doing a business, as some do, of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 a year, it is a serious matter to make up a second annual statement, because all those companies have their days of meetings for the stockholders, and all parties interested in the affairs of the company meet at the usual time, and under the keen criticism of the auditors a careful investigation is made. As a rule those meetings take place at an early period of the year, somewhere between March and July, but under this bill the policy of the authorities is to require them to make up their statement to the 31st December. Uniformity may be all very well, but if it is to be purchased at too serious and inconvenient a rate, and if no actual advantage is to be gained, I do not see why, for the mere purpose of gratifying, I will not say the whim, but the idea of some official of the department, the statement should be made up to that period. The statements of the insurance companies will be much more faithfully recorded if we take their annual reports to the policy-holders as submitted at their regular meetings. I am glad to say that none of the insurance companies doing business in Canada are in a suspicious position. They all have a large amount invested with the Government as protection for policy-holders, but apart from that, their standing is such that we are not warranted in assuming that any substantial advantage is to be gained by requiring them to make up a particular statement for the purposes of the annual report of the Superintendent of Insurance. I understand that this bill affects very prejudicially fifteen to twenty companies doing an enormous business in Canada. It is well known that the bulk of the insurance in this country is not done by Canadian but by United States and British companies. They hold over five-sixths of the insurance of this country, and therefore we ought to deal with them in such a way as not, at all events, to force them to a larger outlay than is really necessary. While I would not for a moment maintain that they should be in a position, I will not say to secrete, but not to present the fullest and most perfect statement for the purpose of the annual report, yet I think from the standing of the companies doing business in Canada we may assume that the statements that meet the approval of those directly interested at their annual meeting are satisfactory and more particularly if it is confirmed and sworn to by such officials as the department may see fit to require of the company. The important provision is really in subsections 2 and 3 of clause 20, under which every outside company is required to have a chief agent in Canada. Now, that is really the crucial point, as I understand, and I am advised that this will mean an annual cost of over one hundred thousand dollars. Those companies are not going to lose that money. They will simply charge it up against the policy-holders and unless some substantial gain is to be derived from it I do not see the necessity of such a regulation. There has been no loss heretofore owing to the manner in which the returns have been obtained, and many of the companies, I am advised, where they do their business with the local agents, find that they are in more direct touch with them and can issue their instructions more imperatively than through a chief agent. If an outside company has an agent at Montreal or Toronto, called a chief agent of the company, then all the instructions from the head office have to be filtered through that particular official, whereas if they communicate direct with each local agent that agent assumes the position of chief agent of the company. With many outside companies you can go to the local agent and, without referring to any other official in Canada, after paying your premium you can get a policy signed by the company. He does not need to communicate with anybody outside. You pay your premium and the agent hands you your policy. That is a convenience that ought not to be disturbed or lightly dealt with simply because the department require reports which would be more convenient to them as coming from one of the chief officers of the company. Take for instance a company, probably one of the oldest companies in Canada, the Ætna of Hartford. They have been established in this country since 1821. As everybody knows they are a very respectable company. You rarely hear of their disputing a loss under their policies. They deal directly with their own agents. They have refused heretofore to appoint a chief officer, for the reason, they say, that they have more control over the agent by having him report directly to the head office. That company is entitled to very large consideration. I find in the returns that that company has paid over $5,000,000 to policy-owners in Canada since its introduction here, and you very rarely hear of their name in the courts They paid over a quarter of a million dollars at that great fire at St. John, N.B. Any outside company that can do that, without undue delay, is surely entitled to some consideration at the hands of Parliament, and unless the hon. Minister, or those who have instructed him in this matter, can show that there is some real, substantial injury resulting from the present position of affairs, I do not think they should ask that the system, which has been in existence for years, should be altered capriciously. You cannot point to any substantial loss that results from the present system. I know up to the present time the reports have been received from the chief agent, but in the bill you are laying it down as a hard and fast rule that they shall be from the chief agent in this country. I would ask the Minister to reconsider this question, because the insurance companies are to-day in a combine. You go into any insurance office for insurance and you find that the rate is the same as that of all other companies. The rates are fixed by the Underwriters' Board, and if we unduly entail additional cost on the companies, it naturally comes back on the policy-holders, because the companies are not going to lose that money. Therefore, we are all interested, wholly appart from the question of fair-play. The legislation does not seem to be warranted by any substantial gain. I understand, so far as some of the companies are concerned, they have offered to pay the expenses of any officer that may be sent down to the head office in the United States to make an investigation of their assets. Of course the companies that I have named are of such undoubted character that it would not really be necessary. I therefore would ask of the Minister to consider the propriety of making such a change as will meet the necessities of a case of that kind, because our interest is rather to encourage outside companies that have a high financial credit to do business in the Dominion. The policies carried in Canada by Canadian companies are only about one-fifth of the entire insurance. The returns show that Canadian companies carry only $112,000,000., while outside companies carry over $556,000,000. But I am told it will have an injurious effect on some of our companies that are doing business in the United States. The British American, a Canadian company, doing a large business in Canada, has agencies now in the United States. What will be the effect of this bill on them? They are not called upon to appoint a chief agent in the United States. Their returns are accepted as correct when coming from the head office. Of course the president, or the officers who are called on to make the report, conform to the requirements of the department, and make the necessary affidavit as to the business done, the premiums paid and the assets of the company, but the effect of this legislation will be that Canadian companies doing business over there will be subject to the same rule. That will be very embarrassing to them, and probably force them to withdraw their officers. I cannot, therefore, for a moment see why it should be desired to lay down an arbitrary system that is simply going to embarrass the business of Canadian and foreign companies. Then, in reference to a remark made by the hon. gentleman that suits are being brought against the companies, it can only be for a technical omission of matters of that kind.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—For the protection of the companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I think it is unfortunate that they should be subject to harassing actions at the instance of informers. All actions of that kind ought only to be brought under the control or jurisdiction of the Justice Department.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—So it will be now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am glad the change is being made. If it were possible I think we should protect the companies, because a mere clerical omission to comply with a rule of that kind should not subject the companies to a penalty of $500 and so much per day for each day the omission is extended over. There would probably be correspondence between the company and the officials here as to the form of the return, the officials perhaps insisting on a particular form, and the return not being made in time would form a basis of an action by an informer. I think the informer should only be permitted to bring an action where substantially some injury is inflicted on the whole community by the omission to furnish information, because the chief element to justify the action of an informer is wholly wanting in a case of this kind. It is not pretended that any companies who hold licenses in the country are of doubtful credit, or that they have not deposited sufficient means with the Canadian Government to justify the extent of business they are doing, and therefore there is really no basis to warrant an action by an informer. I would throw out the suggestion that if it were possible, by any retroactive legislation, to nullify such proceedings it certainly would be our duty to do that, unless it was a direct and intentional breach of the laws of the country and not merely a technical omission to make a formal return because the department and the company were discussing as to the form in which it should be made. That surely should not render a company liable to a penalty of perhaps thousands of dollars. I think the law was not intended for a case of that sort, and the circumstances as they exist would be ample justification for the basis of an Act by Parliament which would relieve the companies from the payment of those penalties. I do not propose to discuss at present the other clauses of the bill, which are not so important. We can do that better in committee. The two important amendments are those to which I have adverted; one that it would be very much safer and more satisfactory if we would accept the latest returns of the companies presented at their last meeting. That was the law in regard to outside companies. It was the usual balancing days at all events of the outside companies, and certainly the return, if it was made in the ordinary course of business, would be much more satisfactory than a return specially made on the 31st December for the purposes of the Insurance Department.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would say for the information of my hon. friend that life insurance companies are compelled to have their returns in within a limited time after the 1st January, and fire insurance after the 1st February.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, so I understand. The other point to which I desired to draw attention was that I hope the Government will see their way clear to meet the positions of these companies, a very considerable number of which are doing a large business, that object to the establishment of what is called a head office in Canada. They say that they are more in touch with their offices by allowing the business between the head office and their local agents to be conducted as at present. I cannot see any advantage to be gained by the proposed change and therefore I hope the Minister will consider the suggestion, which I am told has been pressed upon him by a number of outside companies.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not think that any outside company doing business in Canada should be put in a better position than Canadian companies. The same safeguards should be given to the Canadian companies as are offered to foreign companies and they should both be subject to the same supervision. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to speak of the high standing of foreign companies. That is all very true, but there are companies constantly springing up on the other side of the line and some of these may be bogus concerns. I know of one company started in Nova Scotia, it did not succeed and some persons lost money in it, and I think all companies doing business in Canada should have a head office in which all the business of the company can be supervised and their returns verified by the books and records of the principal office.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)–I think it is very desirable that we should furnish all possible safeguards for those people of Canada who take policies from foreign companies. Circumstances may arise in which they would have no recourse against those companies for the amounts of their policies. In case of war or difficulties arising between the two countries, the policy-holders in this country would have no recourse against the foreign company for their insurance. In years past, it is very well known that a great many persons in Canada lost money by insuring in companies who had no deposit in this country for the safety of the policy-holders. Since the present Act has been passed that difficulty has been avoided to a great extent, and I know myself, and have good reason to know, that if it had not been for the Insurance Act, a great many persons would have lost money by the failure of some of our own companies. Under the provisions of that law, and under the direction and guidance of the Superintendent of Insurance, those who referred their cases to him were enabled to obtain policies in companies of good standing in place of those which they had held in failing companies. Those who were not sufficiently posted in the manner of making such an application, merely allowed their premiums to lapse, and in this way lost all recourse against the companies for the money they had paid. Under the present law policy-holders in all Canadian companies are well secured and it is absolutely necessary that foreign companies doing business in Canada should be placed on an equally sound and good footing for the business that they do here. There is a vast amount of insurance, as stated by the hon. member from Ottawa, taken out by Canadians with foreign companies, and they perhaps are not aware of all the risks they run if their policies are contested in a foreign country. Under the circumstances, I think it is very necessary that a bill such as has been introduced here should become law, that all proper safe-guards should be placed on our statute-book in order to insure the safety of policy-holders.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—The obvious intention of this bill is the protection of the public interests, and so far as I can judge from reading it hastily, any powers that it confers are for the purpose of enabling proper supervision to be kept over the different insurance companies now authorized to do business in Canada. The business of life insurance a few years ago was almost unknown to Canada; of late years it has assumed enormous proportions, and hundreds of thousands of people have all their savings invested in these insurance companies. The main principle of the bill, as I take it, is this: to enable the authorities to watch over the business of these companies and to be able to arrest them if they are not in a solvent condition, thus to afford protection to those people who cannot watch the progress of a company and find no adequate means of ascertaining the way in which they do business. I am, therefore, strongly impressed with the notion that the fullest power of supervision should be given. It may be that some of the provisions of the bill as to returns may be attended with inconvenience to certain companies, but I cannot see that, with companies that are well kept, it could make any great difference to make a return at a particular time. The importance of life insurance cannot be exaggerated. There are a great many people who are putting so much yearly into life insurance, and who are not disposed to save money in any other way, and it is the duty of the Government to watch those companies, and to see that the poor people who put all their means into their keeping are not disappointed when the time for repayment comes. With regard to the additional clause which my hon. friend proposed to add to the bill with reference to the age, I am not aware, as far as my experience goes, of any respectable company in Canada, taking advantage of an error made in a proposal for insurance; at the same time, I quite agree that it is just as well that it should be expressly put upon the Statute-book. A similar policy was followed in Ontario with regard to fire insurance companies in regard to conditions which were very stringent and which enabled any company that was so disposed to fight it out to avoid payment of a loss, in case loss occurred, and if I rightly remember the very provision or a similar provision to that which my hon. friend suggests now exists in England. I hope that after the second reading of the bill it may be altered without injury to the public interest, because I think it is the duty of the Government to consider first the public interest, and not the interests of the companies. They will not enter into business unless they can make money. Of course every regard should be paid to them so far as is consistent with public safety, but the public interest and the safety of investors ought to be the first and paramount consideration of the Government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—With the hon. gentleman's permission I would like to say a word or two. It would seem some hon. gentlemen inferred, from the drift of my remarks, that I had advocated a policy that was going to weaken the security of the policy-holder. I said nothing whatever about the deposit; on the contrary I think our securities would be very much better if we had the returns of the ordinary meeting of a company than a special return made up for the purposes of the department. My observations had no reference whatever to the deposit. We all recognize the importance of the deposit and no comment was made in reference to that point. I infer from the observations made by some hon. gentlemen that they assumed that I had taken a line that was going to weaken that position; on the contrary, I thought my suggestion was rather in the direction of strengthening the position of the shareholder.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—With the kind permission of the House I shall refer again to clause 20, which seems to have been mostly the subject of the debate. Now, you must not look at clause 20 as a new enactment, or as requiring anything from the companies which, under the present Insurance Act, they are not obliged no supply. Under the Insurance Act, companies are required to give in statements of their business in Canada and of their general business; but the question has arisen, who is to give this statement of Canada business? It used to be given and it is in many cases given by the agent abroad.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The president of the company.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The president, secretary or actuary of the company abroad.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At the head office.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS.—Yes, for the Canadian business. The law courts of Canada have held that that was wrong, and that the law intended the Canadian business to be sworn to and given by the Canadian agent; and consequently, to make the law clear and in accordance with the decision of the courts, the real amendment is here, that business in Canada shall be given and sworn to by the Canadian agent of that company, whose head office is abroad. That is the object. They are bound by the present law to give a statement of their general business. This bill provides also that they shall do that. It is not a new enactment. This statement they shall give through their present secretary or actuary abroad. There is nothing there too stringent upon them. Now it is said you are going to force every company to have a chief agent in Canada. I say that in fact every company doing business in Canada is bound to have a chief agent here. They are bound to have some one to receive the summons of a court when necessary. All that the hon. gentleman has said would apply to the bill as printed first. I think he had seen the agents of the foreign companies before I met them, and that all the objections they made to this clause when speaking to him, they made to me and I have taken steps to satisfy them on that point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Has the bill been reprinted?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, but I read an amendment which I propose to make to the clause which will remove all objections raised by the companies. It is to the effect that such chief agent shall keep at the chief agency in Canada records and documents sufficient to enable him to prepare and furnish the statement of Canada business in this section provided for, and such that said statement of Canada business may be readily verified therefrom. Now that is not imposing, as my hon. friend thought at first it was, $100,-000 expense on the companies. It is necessitating, perhaps, a few postage stamps to pay for the correspondence between the head offices abroad and the chief agents in Canada. If he does not get directly all the returns that are made by the sub-agent, if they go to the offices in the United States or in England, they will just send them back to their chief agent in Canada, or send copies of the necessary documents and records to put them in a position to give a statement of the Canada business and the statement of the business done abroad shall be furnished by the secretary or president or actuary of the company wherever he is, so that in fact this clause provides for nothing that is not required now of the company, except that it complies with the judgment of the court that when they speak of Canadian business it means that it must be sworn to by the chief agent of the company in Canada.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

WOLSELEY AND FORT QU'APPELLE RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved the adoption of the report of the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours on Bill (N) "An Act to incorporate the Wolseley and Fort Qu'Appelle Railway Company." He said: This report provides for some amendments in the first section, which are of no material importance, merely affecting the residence of the charter members. The most important clause has reference to the gauge of the railway. The bill provides for the ordinary gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches, but it was thought advisable to add that a narrower gauge might be adopted if the company felt it desirable for the construction of the road. If this company could not borrow the money for a line built on the broader gauge, it might be able to borrow for a line with a narrower gauge, and they are given that option. The next amendment has reference to the capital stock. In the case of the broad gauge it is fixed at $400,000, in the case of the narrower gauge it is $250,000. The last amendment provides for voting by proxy at the annual meetings.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (37) "An Act to incorporate the Duluth, Nepigon and James Bay Railway Company."—(Mr. Perley.)

THE DILLON DIVORCE CASE.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of the Bill (T) "An Act for the relief of James St. George Dillon."

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Generally the Roman Catholic members of the Senate though opposing those divorce bills, take no objection to their passing, because they know that a majority of the House is in favour of them, and they are satisfied with the report that such a bill has passed on a division. I do not know whether my information is reliable or not, but I hear that the two parties in this case are Catholics, and I think that in a matter of this kind, the House ought not to grant the prayer, holding that Catholics consider the marriage tie binding upon them. The House ought not to interfere with the parties and the Bill should not be read the second time. I see by the bill, the second reading of which is now proposed, that Dillon is to be given the right to marry again. That is the most objectionable part, and there is a difference when the parties are Protestants. Protestants do not believe that the tie is binding, and this explains why the majority of the House gives the right to divorced persons to marry again.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—How can they be Catholics if they rebel against the Church?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I know very well that this act of theirs will show that they are not the Catholics they ought to be, but there are good and bad Catholics as there are good and bad Protestants. Every day we see good readers of the Bible who will do the contrary to what the Bible says. I think we should not give bad Catholics the right to marry again. Under these circumstances, I believe it is my duty to move that the bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time six months hence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest that the hon. member allow this matter to stand until the evidence is taken. It is a dangerous precedent to introduce in the House to disapprove of the prayer of the bill upon mere hearsay as the hon. gentleman now proposes. There should be some evidence before the House, on oath or otherwise, that my hon. friend's contention may be proved correct in fact.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not see what the House has to do with the fact as to whether the parties are Catholics or not. If they apply to this Parliament for divorce, and can show themselves entitled to it before the committee, I do not see why they should not obtain it.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—It appears to me we are usurping the power of the Church. I think the matter as to whether the parties should live together or not, should be left to their clergy to decide.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Miller). If I understand what he said, he contended that the House has nothing to do with the question of whether they are Catholics or Protestants. I believe we have something to do with it, because the House, I am sure, has no intention to grant a power to any individual in this country to do what he himself feels he cannot conscientiously do. As Catholics consider the tie binding, I am sure the House would not grant such a prayer to Catholics. We should look into that question just as we look into other questions, before granting what is asked. At all events, I have felt in duty bound to say what I have said, but I believe that the hon. gentleman from Calgary is right. The bill has to go before the committee, and if it should transpire there that both parties are Protestants, I would not care to meddle with it. After the bill is returned to this House from the committee, it can then be dealt with. I beg leave to withdraw the amendment.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

YOUTHFUL OFFENDERS' BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved the second reading of Bill (Y) "An Act respecting the arrest, trial and imprisonment of youthful offenders." He said: This bill has been printed and distributed in English, but if I am to take as a guide the Orders of the Day here, I do not see the letter "F" appended to it indicating that it has been printed in French. I must, therefore, throw myself upon the indulgence of the hon. gentlemen who desire to have the bill printed in French as to whether I may be permitted to go on with it under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It is an important bill. You might wait, I think.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—It is high time that the printing in French should be brought up to the mark. The bill is not yet printed in French. The English version of the Insolvency Bill has been distributed throughout the whole country and we are going through it as if everybody knew all about it, but it has not yet been printed in French. We wish to do only what is reasonable, but I think that these bills should be printed and distributed in French. The committee has taken means to have an extra staff to have bills printed in French and it could be done. If it is not done next week, as an individual member of the Senate, I shall object to every bill brought into the House unless it is printed in French.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Do I understand that the hon. gentleman objects?

Hon. Mr. MASSON—No, I do not object to this bill.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I would like to go on with the bill if there is no objection to it.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I may explain to the hon. gentleman from Terrebonne that I have given instructions to the Clerk to employ all the hands possible in order to facilitate this work, because there is no doubt we have been kept waiting day after day for the want of the French translation. I hope that the difficulties which have occurred in the past will be remedied.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—I do not want the Senate to think that we are the least unreasonable, but in future I shall object to every bill unless it is printed in French.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Last year I had the honour to introduce a bill in this House, embracing somewhat similar provisions to those contained in the bill now before you. Some objections were made to its details by the Deputy Minister of Justice, and as it was late in the session, I judged it better to withdraw the bill rather than run the risk of its not being carefully and patiently considered. The bill which is now before the House is, as I have said, somewhat similar to the one of last year. I may mention that I have received very valuable assistance from the law clerk of the House in its preparation, and it has also been submitted to the criticism of the Deputy Minister of Justice, and I hope that in its present shape it will meet with the approbation and approval of this honourable House. The object of the bill, as set forth in the preamble, is to make provision for the separation of youthful offenders from contact with older offenders and habitual criminals during their arrest and trial and to make better provision than now exists for their commitment to places where they may be reformed and trained to useful lives instead of being imprisoned. Before going into the details of the bill, I may perhaps be permitted to say a few words in regard to the general subject of the treatment of youthful offenders and the care and protection of neglected children. I presume it must be well known to all hon. gentlemen who take any interest in this subject, that the condition and arrangements of our jails and lock-ups have long been of the most unsatisfactory character. Of course, I am speaking generally—no means exist for the proper classification of prisoners. Youthful offenders awaiting their trial for a first offence, perhaps a comparatively trivial one or undergoing sentence after conviction, are placed in the same cells with old and hardened criminals from whom they can learn nothing but what is evil, and in whose degrading company they soon lose in all probability whatever little self-respect they may have left. With a few exceptions, one is the jail in Toronto where prisoners are classified, as well as the construction of the jail will permit it to be done—this is the present condition of things. Indeed I may point out that even in such places as the Central prison, at Toronto, and the penitentiary at Kingston, no means exist for the separation of youthful offenders from the most depraved and hardened criminals. In view of this condition of things, the Prison Reform Conference, the Prison Reform Association and the Prisoners' Aid Association of Canada have, ever since 1891, been strongly urging the establishment of a Dominion reformatory for youthful offenders, and if the House will allow me I should like to read an extract from a report of the Inspector of Prisons, Mr. Moylan, in a letter sent to the Minister of Justice in 1891 on the subject, because what he says there with regard to the separation of youthful offenders from hardened criminals, applies to the very principle contended for in the bill before the House. Mr. Moylan says:

It is one of the recommendations of the Ontario commissioners to establish an industrial reformatory, where "young men between the ages of seventeen and thirty, who have been convicted, for the first time, of a felony or serious misdemeanor, and who, in the opinion of the judges imposing sentence, are proper cases for reformatory treatment," should be sent and "committed for an indeterminate period." This recommendation is a good one and must commend itself to general approval. Its taking practical shape would be, for first offenders, the realization of what has been urged in these reports, so frequently, for convicts well disposed and who give promise of reform. They should be separated from the habitual and hardened criminals. It requires no argument to show the paramount importance, the crying necessity there is to make some fit provision by which so great a number of young men may be saved from being thoroughly corrupted and ruined by constant association with the depraved and vicious, who, by their tact and cunning will escape being committed to the prison of isolation. Allow me to bespeak your best consideration in behalf of this large array of human beings, on the threshold of manhood, who are standing perhaps, on the very brink of destruction by becoming confirmed criminals. They may be saved from this fate, if timely sceps be taken to rescue them from further contact with vice, and from the contaminating influence of wicked associates. The architectural construction of our penitentiaries does not permit the complete separation and classification required to prevent the baneful effect arising from the co-mingling of the neophytes in crime with those who are seasoned in guilt. I beg leave, therefore, earnestly, to recommend the establishment of a prison, wholly reformatory in its character and management, wherein persons, between the ages of sixteen and thirty, convicted of their first known crime, entailing upom them a sentence of two years and more, would be confined, in view of being subjected to such discipline and treatment as their previous habits and training, disposition and age may render necessary.

I very earnestly hope that the Government may see their way this session to meet the very urgent representations which have been made to them on this most important subject, and that ere long we shall have a reformatory for first offenders established for the whole Dominion. It is this very principle of the separation of youthful offenders from the contaminating influences of association with hardened criminals just at the very turning point of their lives for good or evil, and bringing them under kindly and reforming influences, instead of condemning them to imprisonment where they will come in contact with offenders who can only have the most pernicious influence upon them, that I venture to submit this bill as it is now drafted for the approbation of the House. The first clause of the bill enacts :—

1. Section 550 of "The Criminal Code, 1892," is hereby repealed and the following section substituted therefor:

"550. The trials of young persons apparently under the age of seventeen years, shall take place without publicity and separately and apart from the trials of other accused persons, and at suitable times to be designated and appointed for that purpose."

2. Young persons apparently under the age of seventeen years who are :—

(a) Arrested upon any warrant ; or

(b) Committed to custody at any stage of a preliminary inquiry into a charge for an indictable offence ; or

(c) Committed to custody at any stage of a trials either for an indictable offence or for an offence punishable on summary conviction ; or

(d) Committed to custody after such trial, but before imprisonment under sentence,—

Shall be kept in custody separate from older persons charged with criminal offences and separate from all persons undergoing sentences of imprisonment, and shall not be confined in the lock-ups or police stations used for older persons charged with criminal offences or for ordinary criminals.

I desire to call attention to the second clause first, that which relates to the custody of a youthful offender before and after trial. As matters stand now, a boy or girl of tender years may be arrested for some comparatively trifling offence, led perhaps into wrong-doing by neglect or ill-treatment at home. If that child has committed an offence against a Dominion law, he is liable to be sent to a police cell or a jail to pass the time before they are brought up for examination, in the company of men or women of the most degraded moral character. That is as the law stands now. These people, as we all know, make a jest of wrong-doing and from contact with them the young offenders can learn nothing but evil. They are then brought up for trial in a crowded police court, the place often filled with idle curious people and loose characters of both sexes. They are exposed to the coarse jests and remarks of those who are gathered there. If, as I have said, the boy or girl is a novice in wrong-doing, if it is the first transgression, the first departure from the right path, can any treatment be more thoroughly calculated to break down all remaining self-respect and make them feel that they are so disgraced, that they can never hope to recover the lost ground? Let me quote a case in point as reported in one of the Toronto papers :

"Where practical and expedient, all cases of children under sixteen shall be tried separately and apart from adults," so runs the clause of the Criminal Code referring to juvenile offenders. It is difficult, however, to induce the police and magistrates to comply with the spirit of the Act, as two cases called in yesterday's Police Court go to show. I. B., aged fifteen, was charged with stealing a hat from her sister, and A. N., aged thirteen, was charged with stealing 65 cents, and a brush and comb from her employer, Mrs. W. The N. girl was remanded on bail till to-day, and B. was allowed to go on remanded sentence. This was the first time either of the girls had been in the hands of the police. They were arrested on Saturday night, kept in the police cells all night, carted to the jail on Sunday, and placed with some pretty bad characters ; taken from jail in a van, crowded with the very worst class of women and men, and brought up in open court, and made known to all the bad characters who frequent the building, so that in future these two children cannot pass along the streets without being recognized by the very class of people from whose clutches, it is claimed, the arrests were made to save them. Mr. Duvernet, acting for Mr. J. J. Kelso, Provincial Superintendent of Neglected Children, made an effort to have the case heard privately, but the magistrate refused to hear the cases in private.

That is only one of a good many other cases of the kind. But suppose the case of a boy, an older offender who having unhappily fallen among bad and vicious associates has been gradually going on from bad to worse. It may not be the first time that he has made his appearance before a magistrate. He takes his place in the dock rather as if he thought himself a hero, and is so regarded by his associates among the spectators in the court. Take away the notoriety which his public trial confers upon him for the time and he will regard the situation in a very different light. Try him publicly, send him down to spend the time of his detention or his punishment with old and hardened offenders and he will go on very probably graduating in crime until he becomes a candidate for the Central prison or the penitentiary. I do not think then that there can be any question, that it is most desirable that the trials of youthful offenders should take place without publicity and apart from other accused persons. I am glad to say that under the law as it now stands in Ontario, youthful offenders charged with offences against the laws of the province must be tried separately and apart from other offenders, but as in the large majority of cases children are brought before the magistrate on some petty charge of larceny, which is an offence against the Dominion law, and the Criminal Code only declares that the trial shall take place without publicity and separately so far as the same may be expedient and practicable, the result has been pretty generally that the magistrate has not found it expedient or practicable and the law has become a dead letter. It is for this reason that I ask the House to make the clause obligatory and imperative. I do not think that there can be any serious difficulty in making the necessary arrangements for the separate trial of young offenders and for this reason, that in the province of Ontario, at all events, that is now the law with regard to all offences against provincial laws. There has to be provision made both as to separate trial and separate confinement of youthful offenders both before trial and when committed to custody after trial, and there can be no reason therefore why the same course should not be carried out in the case of all offenders against Dominion laws.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What is the age in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Sixteen. I come now to the third clause which provides as follows:

3. If any child, appearing to the court or justice before whom the child is tried to be under the age of fourteen years, is convicted in the province of Ontario of any offence against the law of Canada, whether indictable or punishable on summary conviction, such court or justice, instead of sentencing the child to any imprisonment provided by law in such case, may order that the child shall be committed to the charge of any home for destitute and neglected children or to the charge of any children's aid society duly organized and approved by the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario in Council, or to any certified industrial school.

I have made this and the subsequent clauses applicable to the province of Ontario only, because it is only in that province, so far as I am informed, that the necessary machinery exists for dealing with young offenders as suggested by these clauses. Clause three supposes the case of a child under fourteen years of age, convicted say of larceny. Instead of sentencing so young a child to be simply punished by a term of imprisonment, from which he will in all probability, come out worse than he went in, the judge will have it in his power to order the child to be committed to the charge of a home for destitute or neglected children, or to the charge of a children's aid society. What is wanted in dealing with such youthful offenders, who in nine cases out of ten have drifted into wrong-doing from utter neglect or the evil example of drunken or vicious parents, is not merely to punish but to reform them, to place them where by kindly treatment and christian teaching they may be weaned from evil habits and sent out again into the world to do their duty as good and useful citizens. The next clause 4 deals with the cases of children of still more tender age:

4. Whenever in the province of Ontario, an information or complaint is laid or made against any boy under the age of twelve years, or girl under the age of thirteen years, for the commission of any offence against the law of Canada, whether indictable or punishable on summary conviction, the court or justice seized thereof may give notice thereof in writing to the executive officer of the children's aid society, if there be one in the county, and shall allow him opportunity to investigate the charges made, and may also notify the parents of the child, or either of them, or other person apparently interested in the welfare of the child.

2. The court or justice may advise and counsel with the said officer and with the parents or such other person, and may consider any report made by the said officer upon the charges.

3. If, after such consultation and advice, and upon consideration of any report so made, and after hearing the matter of information or complaint, the court or justice is of opinion that the public interest and the welfare of the child will be best served thereby, then, instead of committing the child for trial, or sentencing the child, as the case may be, the court or justice may, by order:—

(a) Authorize the said officer to take the child and, under the provisions of the law of Ontario, bind the child out to some suitable person until the child has attained the age of 21 years, or any less age; or

(b) Impose a fine not exceeding $; or

(c) Suspend sentence for a definite period or for an indefinite period; or

(d) If the child has been found guilty of the offence charged or is shown to be wilfully wayward and unmanageable, commit the child to a certified industrial school, or to the provincial reformatory for boys, or to the refuge for girls, as the case may be, and in such cases, the report of the said officer shall be attached to the warrant of commitment.

I may explain with regard to the children's aid societies, referred to in this clause, and their officers, with whom the judge may advise and counsel, that under a most admirable law, placed upon the Statute-book of the province of Ontario a little more than a year ago, called the Children's Protection Act, when, in any municipality, a children's aid society has been duly organized and approved by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, their officers may act as constables for enforcing the provisions of the Act, and the society may, under certain circumstances, act as the guardians of the child, and appear in behalf of any neglected or defendant child before a magistrate, and may, if the judge so order, have the child taken to their temporary home or shelter, until placed in some suitable foster home. It is these provisions of the Ontario statute that I think it is most desirable that we should avail ourselves of in dealing with offences against Dominion laws, by children under twelve or thirteen years of age. It is surely a reproach to us that children of that age should ever be sent to a common jail at all, and that the efforts of the State should not be directed to rescue them from their surroundings, too often of vice and wretchedness, and see that they are placed in some well ordered home where they may be trained up in honest habits and fitted to become good citizens, instead of allowing them to become by degrees hardened transgressors and ultimately to swell the numbers of those whose evil career lands them at last in Central Prison or the penitentiary. In connection with this subject there is a certain change which the Prisons Reform Association of Ontario and the Children's Aid Society have very earnestly urged upon the Minister of Justice of the Dominion Government and it is this, that there should be Dominion legislation to confer on the Provincial Government and its officers all requisite authority to pardon, parole or apprentice out and generally to exercise control over all children and youth sentenced or committed to reformatories or refuges or industrial schools in the province, and they point out that acting as the provincial authorities, with a thorough and intimate knowledge of all the circumstances of each individual case, they would be in a position to deal with all such offenders much more intelligently than can possibly be done if each case were referred to the authorities at Ottawa. I will not vouch for the correctness of it, but I was told in one case where a boy was placed in the reformatory and representations were made of his good behaviour and permission was sent to allow him out on parole, the permission did not arrive until after the date of the boy's sentence had expired. Now I mention this matter more particularly because, as I have said, it is a subject which has been brought up for the last two or three years at almost every meeting of the Prison Reform Association and the children's aid, and on their behalf I brought the matter under the notice of the Minister of Justice in the early part of the session, but I do not think he saw his way exactly to granting any such request, although we thought that when a deputation waited upon him with a similar object at Toronto some years ago, that he had expressed himself rather favourably to doing so. However, under the circumstances, I did not think it was safe to put anything of the kind in my bill; but as the matter has been so strongly urged by those who take a very great interest in the whole of this subject, I thought it only right to mention the matter to the House, and I hope yet perhaps the Dominion Government may see their way to granting that power. These are, briefly, the aims and objects, so far as I have very imperfectly endeavoured to set them forth, of the bill now before us. I shall be very glad when the bill goes into committee, if the House allows it to pass the second reading, to go through it clause by clause and make any explanation in my power.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I may have misunderstood the hon. gentleman, but I think he stated it was only in Ontario that these institutions where children could be sent were to be found.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—No; I said it was only in Ontario that these children's aid societies existed. I did not refer to reformatories and industrial schools which do exist in other provinces, and I ought to have mentioned that there is a clause in the bill which provides:

No Protestant child dealt with under this Act shall be committed to the charge of any Roman Catholic Children's Aid Society, or be placed in any Roman Catholic family as its foster home, nor shall any Roman Catholic child under this Act be committed to the care of any Protestant Children's Aid Society or be placed in any Protestant family as its foster home. But this section shall not apply to the care of children in a temporary home or shelter.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is no objection, I believe, to allowing the bill to be read the second time, nor do I know that there would be a valid objection to its becoming law. However, it is a question of very great importance, and one which the hon. gentleman knows was discussed in this House last session, when some question arose as to jurisdiction. I called the attention of the Minister of Justice to the provisions of this bill just before coming to the meeting of the Senate to-day. He said he had looked at it, and said, speaking under correction, that he had an interview with the hon. gentleman and saw no objection to it. However, questions may arise as to how far this bill will affect the whole Dominion. I notice that in the 3rd clause it refers specially to Ontario. I have not examined it sufficiently to form an opinion myself upon the scope of the different provisions, and ascertain whether he intends it to apply to all the provinces or simply so far as the 3rd and 4th clauses that it should be confined exclusively to Ontario. It is a matter, however, which I shall leave in the hands of my colleague who is a lawyer and better able to judge not only of the constitutionality of the bill itself, but of the effect it would have upon the provincial laws in the different provinces. The object of the measure is commendable and laudable. No one could have listened to the remarks of the hon. gentleman without being convinced that he has had practical experience himself of the absolute necessity of some provision being made by which juvenile offenders, particularly those of tender age, when incarcerated, should be kept from the baneful influences of the older and hardened criminals.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I see nothing in this bill which conflicts with the rights of the different provinces. Certainly, every member must be in favour of a bill of this character for the moral training of youthful offenders, and keeping them from contact with hardened criminals. But a question may arise with regard to the private trial of youthful offenders as to the class of crime committed; it may be a serious offence of a capital character, and in such cases publicity should be given to it, and it would act as a deterrent upon other people. It is therefore questionable whether the trial should be held in private, because youths should see the result of crime and a warning would be salutary to them and to the general public which would not be the case if the examination were entirely private. I think a great deal depends upon the nature of the offence. If it were a very heinous one I think a private trial would not be suitable for youthful offenders; punishment should be blended with the greater object of reform under moral and religious influences.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—We must all sympathize with the benevolent object of the bill. Indeed it has a double object: one is to have a private trial in certain cases of young children, and the other is, when the time comes for trying them, or for confining them in pursuance of a sentence, it is very desirable that they should be kept separate and apart in some reformatory or public institute for reformation or for punishment. That is provided for by this bill. But as the mover has very candidly explained, the provisions of this bill contained in this first, second and third sections are obligatory, and it is my duty in connection with that to call attention to the existing law which this proposes to amend. This law provides not only that a private trial should take place, but that these child-offenders should be sent to reformatory or some industrial school or some such institution and confined there. Now with regard to the first point, I am not aware, so far as my acquaintance with the shire towns outside of the capital in Nova Scotia extends, that there is any provision whatever for this separate confinement in that province. Then, again, with regard to the second branch of the bill which deals with the position of the offenders after judgment, there is no provision practically outside of Halifax, I think, which would enable this bill to go into operation there. All these difficulties were patent two years ago when the Act, of which this is an amendment, was under discussion and they were provided for by the Act in this way. The 550th section which this bill proposes to amend is to this effect:

The trials of all persons apparently under the age of sixteen years shall, so far as it appears expedient and practicable, etc.

This bill has not that qualification, but makes it obligatory, and then comes the question, how can this bill be carried out in provinces where there are no conveniences for separate trials at all? I submit that point because it is of some importance, inasmuch as if these persons were confined in the common jail, it might be the subject of an application for a habeas corpus to discharge them. If this is obligatory, as a matter of course they must be confined in the place of confinement provided for by this Act, or their confinement would be illegal altogether. I think that is a point of very considerable importance. The other provisions of the bill are strictly applicable only to the province of Ontario and can only be considered with reference to that province. I dare say they may be workable in that province, and if so they will have a good object and a good tendency, inasmuch as they will get rid of the scandal of young people being brought into prison with hardened offenders; and after judgment they will be kept in a reformatory instead of being in a cell with these hardened offenders. I therefore approve of the general principle of the bill, but I think in legislating we ought to be careful how our legislation can be carried out. As yet I have heard no reason why this change is made in the section. There is another point that I should like to call attention to, that the age in the Criminal Code is sixteen. By this bill the age is raised to seventeen. I do not know why it is raised; we have heard nothing on this point. I think perhaps those matters may be better dealt with in committee.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I should have thought my hon. friend had heard quite sufficient reasons why I sought to amend the clause as it stands in the Criminal Code, because I stated that, practically, the present law had become inoperative. A magistrate naturally enough, I daresay, desires to save himself the trouble of having a separate trial of a youthful offender, and he does not find it practicable or expedient to do so. The case which I alluded to, of those two little girls, is pretty strong proof of the necessity which exists for some arrangement of that kind. In Ontario, of course, there may be no difficulty now, because under the Children's Protection Act, which I have alluded to, the magistrates are compelled in all such cases to hold these trials separately. I may state that I first submitted the draft of the bill to Sir John Thompson, and suggested that there might possibly be a difficulty as to a separate trial and confinement in other provinces. I proposed first to limit it to towns of a certain size, but the Minister of Justice did not seem to think that necessary or desirable, and, therefore, I did not put in any such limitation; but, after all, surely it is worth while that some little trouble and some little expense should be gone to if need be to provide a separate room where these children could be tried, and to make some arrangements even in a jail where they can be separately confined. Surely if it is admitted that it is a crying evil that children are tried publicly, and sent down to jail to associate with hardened criminals, it is worth while to take some little trouble and expense to provide the necessary means for carrying out the proposed law. However, when the bill comes before the Committee of the whole House, I presume each clause can be taken up and discussed.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

PRESERVATION OF GAME IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (Z) "An Act for the preservation of game in the North-west Territories."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to express my hearty concurrence in the principle of the bill. I think that the Government have taken action in good time, and that their action deserves to be commended. I am always ready to find fault with them when they do what is wrong, and I think it is only proper to praise them when they do what is right. I rise further for the purpose of indicating to the hon. Minister in charge of the bill two or three points as to which I think the bill would bear amendment when we go into committeee on it. The fifth clause of the Bill provides for a close season. The close season is as follows in paragraph b of the fifth clause :—

Elk, moose, cariboo, deer, mountain sheep and mountain goats, between the 1st April and the 15th July.

Our experience in the lower provinces is that it would not do at all to allow the killing of moose or cariboo as early as July ; there the killing is prohibited until the middle of September ; and I do not think that the killing of those animals in the month of July and the first half of August should be allowed. Then between the first day of October and the last of December is also a close season. Of course the conditions in the North-west Territories are different from those in the lower provinces, but it has been found that the greatest slaughter of those animals takes place in the early spring months, while the snow is still on the ground and there is a frozen crust on the surface of the snow, so that the animals are not able to escape from the hunters. No one should be allowed to hunt moose, cariboo or deer with dogs in the months of February and March. The close seasons for grouse, partridge, pheasants and prairie chickens is from the first of May to the first of August. There, again, the close season is too short ; it certainly should extend to the first day of September.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—And March, too.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Possibly March too, but I am speaking now of the termination of the season. In the month of August the birds are very young. All young grouse and partridge and pheasants, and I presume prairie chickens are helpless. They go in coveys and can be slaughtered without difficulty. If the Minister takes the matter into consideration and consults with gentlemen who are familiar with that North-west country, he will find that it will be desirable, if the bill is to have a useful operation, to extend the close season at any rate to the first of September. I mention these things at the second reading of the bill simply to suggest to the Minister in charge the points in which I think the bill will bear amendment.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—If the conditions in the North-west are the same as they are in Nova Scotia, my hon. friend is quite right. In Nova Scotia the close season is not long enough, especially in the autumn, This bill no doubt is one of very great importance and very comprehensive in principle, although necessarily curtailed and local in its operation, in consequence, I presume, of the different provinces having their own game laws. It would be very important if there could be some arrangement between the provinces so that there could be uniform regulations for the preservation of game in the country north of the St. Lawrence and the great lakes. It ought to apply to all that northern country. Of course there is an objection that each province has its own game laws, and that we cannot interfere with them only as far as our territorial rights apply. The bill seems to be very comprehensive. It is very desirable that the game should be preserved and if it could possibly be that the same rules with regard to the preservation of game could be applied to all the country north of the St. Lawrence, it would be of far greater advantage to the country. There should be joint action to avoid extinction of the various and valuable animals peculiar to Canada's northern regions.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Suggestions of this kind are very valuable, more particularly in a bill of this character, which will, I hope, have a beneficial effect in the portions of the country to which it refers and over which we have jurisdiction. Of course it is known that we have no power to deal with the game laws so far as the provinces are concerned, but the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg is worthy of consideration, that the law should not only extend to the North-west Territories and to Keewatin, not included in the territory governed by the North-west Council, but also to those territories north of Quebec which are portions of the Dominion, but not within the province of Quebec. That is a matter to which I will call the attention of the Government. I might mention, for the information of the senior member from Halifax, that this bill has been already submitted to the Hudson Bay Company's officials, who have a thorough knowledge of the seasons at which the different animals and birds should be protected. However, it is a question which I will further inquire into, but having first submitted it to them they made certain suggestions as to the close seasons and pointed out the periods of the year at which game should not be hunted. Still I will see that that point is properly looked into before we go into committee, and if it should be found advisable to extend the close season we shall be only too glad to do it. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman's remark that by taking time by the forelock we may prevent those disasters which have occurred already in the North-west Territories. I repeat what I said when I introduced the bill, that if we had years ago taken the advice of those who had a thorough knowledge of the habits of the Indians and the means of subsistence which they had at their hands, and passed a bill prohibiting the killing of game during the close seasons in the North-west Territories, in all probabilities we should have prevented the destruction of the buffalo.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—You could not have populated the country then.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We found with respect to the preservation of moose and cariboo in Nova Scotia before the union with Canada, that it was necessary to prohibit the exportation of moose and cariboo hides and heads.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THE DOWNEY DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN moved the adoption of the tenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce. He said: I find that members generally object to any detailed examination or review of the evidence in divorce cases. It is printed certainly, and before them, and they can examine and judge for themselves. I will only say the evidence in this case shows that the husband was guilty of many and persistent acts of adultery which his ill-used wife forgave, every one of which, however, the husband's own conduct revived, by the recommittal of the same offence, after forgiveness. The evidence further proves the commission by the husband of other acts of adultery, which were unknown to the wife at the time he deserted her. These last were established by a witness who saw the respondent in the actual commission of the crime, with the unfortunate young woman named in the evidence. These, or any of these acts proved, entitle the petitioner to the relief she seeks. The committee had no hesitation in finding her case was fully made out, and have accordingly recommended that the bill for her relief be passed, thus as far as possible freeing a blameless woman from the stigma of being called the wife of a faithless husband—a grossly immoral man—who ended his career in Canada by deserting the woman he had vowed to love and cherish to his life's end.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—An additional number of copies of the English edition of the Insolvency Bill has been printed for distribution. It is only now that the French edition is before us, and as we would like to have some copies for distribution in the province of Quebec, I move that one thousand additional copies of the French edition be printed.

ATLANTIC AND NORTH-WEST RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (30) "An Act respecting the Atlantic and North-west Railway Company," with an amendment. He said: There is but one amendment. It is in the clause which relates to the power to amalgamate with or lease to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. This clause is strictly framed according to the model bill, but as it relates to a railway which extends practically from ocean to ocean, an amendment is made in the part of the clause which refers to the notice to be published in the newspapers. We thought it reasonable that the clause should be modified in such a way that this notice would not require to be published in every county between the termini of this railway, that is to say, in every county through which the railway runs across the continent. Therefore, the clause relating to the publication of the notice is amended to provide that it shall only be in the counties covered by the agreement between these two companies. So if there is any provision for amalgamation or lease with the other company, the notice need only be given where it is necessary that it should be known. I see no objection to the amendment.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington) moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION.

The SPEAKER presented the report of the Library Committee.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved the adoption of the report. He said: The only matters of any moment in this report are with reference to the commemoration plate regarding the first steamship which crossed the Atlantic. A sub-committee has been appointed to investigate the papers which were submitted to the committee, but not read, proving that there is no question about it, Canada has the honour of having owned the first steamship that crossed the Atlantic. The other recommendations are with reference to the purchase of copies of Mr. Clement's book on the constitution of Canada, and copies of Mr. Kingsford's History of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I understand that it is not customary to take up a report of this kind until it is adopted in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I understand it is to be adopted there to-day.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—As this report involves an expenditure of a considerable sum of money, I would suggest that it would be better to postpone its adoption until we know that it has been adopted in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Of course nothing can be done until the report goes through the other House.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (BB) "An Act to enable the Government of the North-west Territories to unite with the province of Manitoba in the construction of a railway to Hudson Bay as a public work."—(Mr. Boulton.)

Bill (CC) "An Act further to amend the Indian Act, Chapter 43 of the Revised Statutes."—(Mr. Bowell.)

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved that when this House adjourns to-day it stands adjourned until Tuesday the 15th instant at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved in amendment that when this House adjourns to-day, it stand adjourned until Monday next at 8 p.m.

After some discussion the motion and the amendment were withdrawn.

CANADIAN MUTUAL LIFE ASSOCIATION BILL.

The Order of the Day having been called,

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to (Bill K) "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Mutual Life Association."

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said: This is the report of the Committee on Banking and Commerce, in respect to the Canada Mutual Life Association which was to be taken into consideration to-day. I have all the various amendments here before me and am prepared to explain them to the House, but I understand it is the intention of the hon. gentleman who has charge of the bill (Mr. Clemow) to move that the report be referred back to the committee for further consideration, I believe upon the ground that one amendment that the committee made increasing the number of members from 200 to 500 and the amount to be subscribed from $100,000 to $500,000, was objected to by the promoters of the bill. What is desired is that this should be referred back to the committee in order that it may first be seen in what shape the amendment to the General Insurance Act, introduced by the Government and now before the House, will pass and, as I understand, if the amendments pass as they are now in the bill, both as regards money and subscriptions which companies must have before they can be incorporated, then no further objection can be made to the report of the committee. I do not know whether it is worth while taking up the time of the House explaining the amendments if my hon. friend intends to make the motion, and therefore I wait until I know what he intends to do.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The hon. gentleman has correctly stated the effect of the resolution I intend to move. I do not object to the bill introduced by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and I therefore move that the whole bill be referred back to the Committee on Banking and Commerce for further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (37) "An Act to incorporate the Duluth, Nepigon and James Bay Railway Company."—(Mr. Ferguson.)

Bill (P) "An Act for the relief of Joseph Thompson."—(Mr. Clemow.)

OTTAWA GAS COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (26) "An Act respecting the Ottawa Gas Company." He said: This is a bill merely to allow the Gas Company to raise money to the extent of half of their paid up capital to enable them to make certain improvements on their work, They wish to lay new pipes preparatory to the city paving the streets, and to make other improvements. It is consented to by all the shareholders and I suppose there will be no opposition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the arguments presented by the hon. member are sufficiently strong to induce this House to pass that measure. We have on the order paper a bill introduced by the hon. member from Quinté for the purpose of limiting the powers of such companies and I do not think we should read this bill a second time until that is disposed of. It does not appear to me the gas companies suffer much from want of power. They appear to be a comparatively comfortable lot of gentlemen and I think they had better try and get along as they are until it is shown that the measure is absolutely necessary.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—There is no difficulty in showing in the committee that the company have not borrowing powers and it is absolutely necessary to lay new pipes in the city. It is going to cause a large outlay of money and it is necessary that the company should be enabled to raise this money. I do not think the public have anything to do with it.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—It might be well to lay this over. We might set off one bill against the other.

The motion was agreed to.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have the honour to move that when this House adjourns to-day it stand adjourned until Friday afternoon at three o'clock.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I object to that motion.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—You cannot.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I can, because it is necessary to give sufficient notice. You must give two days' notice before you can make a motion.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman will understand why the motion is made. The 3rd rule says: "The time for the ordinary meeting of the Senate is at three o'clock in the afternoon, unless some other time shall have been previously ordered." To-morrow being a holiday it is not the desire of the senators to be in attendance here. To-morrow is a legal holiday and it is necessary therefore to move that when the House adjourns it stand adjourned until Friday, otherwise you would have to sit to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There is the Divorce Committee which is going to sit to-morrow. However, I will withdraw my objection.

Hon. Mr. FLINT—I move in amendment that when this House adjourns to-day it stand adjourned until Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This amendment would be out of order.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it is necessary there should be a special motion. There is not a special motion for adjourning over Saturday or Sunday. To-morrow is a statutory holiday. We do not sit on such days, under our constitution, and therefore there is no objection that I can see to the motion.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Under the rule we have to sit to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman's motion is, I think, necessary. Rule 7 provides that when the Senate adjourns on Friday, unless otherwise ordered, it stands adjourned until Monday. There is no provision as to statutory holidays, and I think the motion is necessary.

The amendment was withdrawn and the motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 4.40 p.m.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being read,

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill S), "An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal."—(Honourable Mr. Bowell.)

Hon. Mr. BOWELL said: Some objection has been made to the extension of the harbour as laid down in the bill, and the harbour commissioners were to have communicated with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on that subject. He has written them, he tells me, and they promised to give him their views, and he asked me not to go on with the bill until he had heard from them. I therefore move that the Order of the Day be discharged and that the bill be taken into consideration on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 3.45 p.m.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF MONTREAL BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (S) "An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal."

(In the Committee.)

On the 5th clause,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL said: I would ask that clauses 5 and 6 be allowed to stand for the present as a telegram has been received from the Harbour Commissioners to the following effect:

At a special meeting of the Harbour Commissioners to-day, I was authorized to telegraph you that, as there is opposition to the extension of the harbour limits by some of the municipalities interested, it was decided to ask you to have the proposed extension of the harbour limits expunged from the bill now before the Senate and to insert therein the limits as defined by Acts 36 and 18 Victoria.

As; however, by these Acts the northern and southern limits of the harbour were not defined and the eastern boundary was rather indefinite, it was intended to have these three sides defined as per a memorandum now in the hands of the law clerk of the Senate, which it is thought might be inserted in the clauses defining the limits of the harbour. Under these circumstances it is thought advisable by the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the Government that the request of the Harbour Commissioners should be acceded to, and the law clerk is now preparing a new clause to be substituted for these two, defining the harbour as it has existed for years, and the eastern limit so as to make it definite and complete, or in other words to affirm by law what has been the practice since the Harbour Commissioners have taken over the trust from the Trinity House.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—Has the hon. gentleman a plan showing the limits as proposed, and as they are to-day?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I was in hopes that I would have had it for to-day, but I have not yet received it. I will have it before the consideration of the Bill is completed.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I think it is very important that we should have the plan. There have been a dozen law suits at least to my own knowledge, some of them running for a dozen years, arising out of those limits.

Clauses 5 and 6 were allowed to stand.

On the 8th clause,

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—I think it is time that a change should be made. It is a long time since the port of Montreal ceased to be a merely local port and I think it would be quite desirable, looking at the case from a Dominion standpoint, to have authorities who would be more directly responsible to the public than the commission as it is now constituted. It is true that the majority of the Commissioners are appointed by the Government, but the different bodies who send members have such an influence that instead of the interests of the harbour of Montreal being always considered when the question of improving or extending it arises, local questions and sometimes quite sectional questions are much more considered than the important one of building up a harbour for the good of the Dominion. Although we see as the result of new blood having been recently introduced into the commission, that the narrow views of the question are beginning to improve and the subject is being looked upon from a broader standpoint, yet I think the Government should take a more direct interest in the question itself, and hold itself more openly responsible for whatever is done in connection with the harbour. Although it may appear that the Government control the harbour because of the number of commissioners appointed by them, yet the number of other commissioners who are sent there to represent interests from a local point of view, is such that the importance of the harbour to the Dominion is prejudiced to a certain extent. The Govrnment therefore, should see what could be done, after spending so much on the improvements of the St. Lawrence River and canals and subsidizing railways to convey the traffic of the west to Montreal, to insure the success of the route, and create a national through line of transhipment from one end of the Dominion to the other, and prevent local interests interfering to such an extent as to defeat the object of the sacrifices made by the country.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I would like to continue a little further the remarks of my hon. friend from Hochelaga. It is very much easier to find fault with what is being done than to suggest a remedy; but it may not be the best plan to have these members appointed as they are, from the Board of Trade, the Corn Exchange, the Chamber of Commerce, etc. These men may be very suitable members of the Chamber of Commerce, or the Board of Trade, or the Corn Exchange, but may know very little, indeed, if anything, about the improvements in the harbour, and if they did understand the subject tolerably well, they are there for a short term only. Then the Government, I do not hesitate to say—and I would say it if I were before the Harbour Board now—are very particular about the parties they have in their offices here, and some of them, we think, would be able to continue to work a little longer when they are superannuated, but certainly we have some members on the Board of Commissioners that should have been superannuated ten years ago; and if any means could possibly be taken to secure their resignations, it would be better to accept them. Their ideas are local; and their term of office being temporary, they will simply do what they can to please their constituents for the time being. I think the system is bad; how to remedy it I am not prepared to say, but as my hon. friend from Hochelaga says, the Government in their wisdom are supposed to know everything and able to do everything, and I think it would be much better if they would look after it and have the board constituted on a better system. They should appoint men who are likely to be kept there, not for one or two years, but for five or ten years, because works that are beginning to-day will not be finished in five or six years; the Government should see that they have the best men that can possibly be put upon that board. One of the members of the board stated to me on Saturday afternoon that is such an important matter that he feels almost afraid of the responsibility, because there are some of the members who do not know what they are doing or any more about the business than children.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Do you mean the appointees of the Government or the other commissioners?

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Both. I was simply speaking of some of the appointees of the Government who, from old age are not as well fitted now as they once were do that or any other business.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Antiquated ideas.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—No, not antiquated ideas, they have not any ideas antiquated or otherwise. At least one of them ought to be superannuated at once.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman appears to overlook the fact that these commissioners are appointed for four years, not for one.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is right so far as it applies to some of them. The importance of the harbour at Montreal is beyond a question, not only to the city of Montreal, but to the whole Dominion, particularly the western section and those who come from the east with vessels. How the appointments could be improved, or whether the Government should assume the full and whole responsibility of the management of that harbour, is a question that I am not aware has been considered, but it is a very important one. The hon. member who spoke first, if I understood him correctly, is desirous of having the whole of these appointments (if appointments are to be made) in the hands of the Government, and if they are not to be made, that then the harbours should be managed and controlled by some one of the departments of the Government. That would be a very important change in the law and it is very questionable whether it would give satisfaction. The remarks made by the hon. member from Alma in reference to the composition of the board may apply to both sections of it. Some members, he says, are "antiquated" and some have "no brains." If the antiquated ones and the brainless ones are the commissioners appointed by the Government, then the law gives the Government the power to remove them. If the hon. gentleman will look at the 8th clause, subsection 2, he will see that it is provided that six of the commissioners shall be appointed by the Governor in Council and shall hold office during pleasure, so that if there are any unfit for the position, either from old age or any other cause, it would be the duty of the Government, on these facts being presented, to remove them, but no such representation has been made. Then the 4th subsection provides that four commissioners shall be elected, one by the Montreal Board of Trade, one by the Corn Exchange Association, one by the Chamber of Commerce for the District of Montreal and another by the shipping interest. One can scarcely conceive that a board composed of gentlemen who are members of the Board of Trade would select any person as a commissioner who was not qualified to act. Those men are too deeply interested in the proper management of the harbour to make appointments such as those described by the senator from Alma. The same remark would apply to the Corn Exchange and also to the Chamber of Commerce, and certainly the shipping interest. The gentlemen who are most deeply interested in the shipping of Montreal with whom I have come in contact are not such as are described by my hon. friend. It seems to me that those are four bodies quite capable of judging as to what is in the best interest, not only of the city of Montreal, but of the shipping interest and the management of it. My hon. friend shakes his head. He may be quite correct. I only take it for granted that bodies composed of such men ought at least to be capable of making proper appointments. My hon. friend will see by the 10th clause that the commissioners do not go out every year; consequently they have an opportunity of learning their business. The provision is that they shall go out, after the organization of the board under this Act, one next August, the next in 1895, the third in 1896 and the fourth in 1897. The gentleman appointed by the Board of Trade next August would retain his position for four years, so that he would have full opportunity, if he is not of the character described, as brainless and antiquated, to learn this business. There is also in the 3rd subsection a provision for a re-election if deemed fit for it, of any commissioner who may have served six years. The suggestion raised by the hon. member from Hochelaga was a very important one, but I hope he will not press it at present. I will bring it under the notice of my colleagues before the third reading.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—I do not want it to be understood that I wish to reflect in any way on any of the members of the commission. It was my duty to sit with them for one year, which was long enough for me to know the deficiencies of the commission as constituted. I do not mean that they are not qualified personally, but I refer to the special kind of interest they are there to represent. The influences that are brought to bear on the commission by the different bodies who are called to a seat around its board are such that the commissioners appointed by the Government are apt to overlook the fact that they are there themselves, not to represent merely local interests, but to represent the general interest of commerce so far as the harbour of Montreal is concerned. If the commission were constituted otherwise, it is more likely that instead of looking to special parts of the harbour or special interests which might be affected in some way even when the general interest of the country is at stake, they would take a broad view of every question brought before them. For instance, it is but natural if they find that those who have already access to the harbour are satisfied that they have enough berth and space in the harbour for their own traffic, they consider that everything is all right. They do not want any more space and they are not anxious to build up new trade in the harbour; they have enough traffic for themselves, and they naturally object to attract competition, and it is quite to be expected thus they should look to any extension of the harbour as something which may disturb their own affairs; and it is in that way that the business of the harbour of Montreal has outgrown very much the accommodation which this port can now offer. It is unwise for the Government, when we consider the millions of money which have been spent to establish a through line of transhipment from one end of the country to the other, when the most important point of their system is reached, to divest themselves of their responsibility and control and put it in the hands of men who may not be able to consider the business interests of the country. The building up of the harbour of Montreal must be considered when we have to fight to keep within our own borders the great highway of traffic. We know very well that the harbour of Montreal is not sufficient, that it is powerless to cope with the requirements of the trade, that it is powerless to cope with the requirements of the trade, and the increase of commerce which has been obtained by the building of our great systems of railways. We have been subsidizing lines whose traffic we cannot control. We see the largest part of it going to another port, and why? Because the Montreal harbour is not equal to the requirements of a rapidly growing trade. And why is it not sufficient? Because the Montreal Harbour Commissioners as constituted now, have been looking more to the local interests of Montreal than to the interests of the great national traffic. In that way I think it is very important for the Government to consider whether it is not time to look at the whole organization.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 16,

Hon. Mr. POWER said: This clause, too, requires amendment. I think to allow a number of gentlemen to fix their own salaries is unwise. There should be some limitation of the powers of the commissioners in this respect.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I think they can be safely trusted to exercise all this power. Most of the members of the board spend from half an hour to four hours at a meeting, to my certain knowledge, and for this they are paid the magnificent sum of $5, when the majority of them, if they were not influenced by public spirit, would not give their time for ten times as much. They are only paid for the meetings which they attend, and that has been the case only since the time of the Mackenzie Government. Before that they never received any remuneration.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—I understand that this subsection has been inserted because there was no authority for giving any compensation for their attendance. I know that they have never received more than $5 per meeting, and then only when they were present.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The remarks of the hon. gentlemen from Alma and de Lorimier do not bear upon my objection. I do not know what the commissioners have been paid, and I do not know that they had been paid anything, or what would be a reasonable sum; but this is the first time in my experience that employees have been allowed to fix their own salaries, and there should be some limitation to that power—the salaries which they decide upon should be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council; or there should be a limit fixed beyond which they could not go. I do not see why the other members of the board should not be paid in the same way as the chairman, with a deduction for every meeting which they do not attend.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Have they not the right to govern the expenditure in other ways? If they have, and have proved themselves capable, I think it should be left to them to fix the amount of their own remuneration. It looks bad to name an amount.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not objecting to the amount at all, I am simply objecting to the principle of allowing any body of officials to fix their pay without limitation or restriction; and I should suggest that the Minister let the clause stand and take the matter into consideration.

Hon. Mr. LOWELL—In the past there has been no express provision giving power to the board to pay themselves any fees, and it was thought that there should be a provision in order to prevent any dispute in future upon this point. If they have been managing these matters for some fourteen years and receiving the magnificent remuneration of $5 per meeting for their services I think the gentlemen who compose this board might be allowed to exercise the discretion given by this clause. If they indulge in extravagance, or attempt any abuse of their powers, then the suggestion of the hon. gentleman may be acted upon. As a rule, where officers are appointed by the Government a salary is fixed, but these commissioners stand in a different position from officers, in the general acceptation of that term. My hon. friend from de Lorimier, who was mayor of Montreal, knows whether this clause is likely to prove detrimental to the interests of the harbour.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should suggest, with a view to meeting the difficulty, that we add to this subsection the following words: "Approved by the Governor in Council." There should be some check.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—It would be very much better to leave the clause as it stands, because the members of the harbour commission have heretofore been exceedingly careful and economical. I do not think the majority of them would feel very much pleased to have this clause amended as suggested. They would be likely to say "you can keep the five dollars, we do not want it." As the leader of the House has suggested, if any extravagance should occur —of which I may say there is not the slightest danger—it will be time enough to adopt some such protection as the hon. gentleman has advocated.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—It will be quite easy to discover if they abuse their power, because their report is published annually.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is establishing a bad precedent. It is not too much to ask that the by-law should be approved by the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I think it would be better to keep the Governor in Council out of it. By referring too much to the Governor in Council it may be used as a precedent hereafter for throwing the whole thing on the country.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 18,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause provides that the corporation may appoint a harbour-master, &c., in the port of Montreal. The next clause provides that the Board of Harbour Commissioners shall be the pilotage authority for the city of Montreal. There is another officer who, I think, should come under the jurisdiction and power of the Harbour Commissioners—that is the shipping officer of Montreal. A good deal of feeling has been excited during these few days by the Government appointment of a gentleman, who, I have no doubt, was a very worthy gentleman, but who had had no experience of shipping, and against whose appointment a unanimous protest has come from the Board of Trade of the city of Montreal. Inasmuch as you hand over the appointment of the harbour-master and subordinate officers of the harbour and of the pilots, and men coming under the Pilotage Act, to the Harbour Commissioners, the appointment of shipping officers should be handed over also. It would come just as properly under the jurisdiction of the commission as that of those other officers.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is slightly in error. In the first place the protest of the Board of Trade was not unanimous—some members did not take the extreme view that others did. The 18th clause is changed to give power to the Commissioners which was exercised under the old law by the secretary and the harbour-master. That is a change which not only meets the views of the Government, but also the views of the Harbour Commissioners. There is no extra power given to the commissioners, so far as pilotage authority is concerned—it simply enables them to appoint three commissioners to act as a pilotage authority. The commissioners pursued this course, but the courts decided that they could not act in either capacity as Harbour Commissioners except as a whole commission; and this enables the board to appoint three commissioners to act in that particular capacity without sitting as a whole board.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—It is far better done.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is far better done—in fact it makes the commission workable, which was not the case under the old system. I scarcely think that we can accede to the request of the hon. gentleman from Halifax to put the appointment of the other officer in the hands of the Harbour Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What does the hon. gentleman from Alma Division say about that proposition?

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—He has nothing at all to say about it.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—The only objection I have to the composition of the Harbour Commissioners is that these bodies are sometimes inclined to look to the merely local interests rather than to the general interest, which the Government is in a better position to judge of.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suppose the appointment of a gentleman who has some experience and knowledge of shipping is to be looked upon as regarding the thing from a local and sectional standpoint?

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—It was not so regarded in the appointment of his predecessor—he was taken from the outside altogether, and perhaps it was better, because he was independent of any interest which he was required to arbitrate upon.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 25,

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Does the provincial law at all interfere with the working of the commissioners? If so, and if the law is constitutional we cannot override it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—In a matter of trade and commerce the Dominion would be paramount.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I do not think we are disturbing the law at all—it is simply to prevent them getting into trouble.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I find that this clause is exactly the same as the old law, 24 Victoria, chapter 68, section 6. My impression is that this clause was placed in the Act of 1861 and has been so amended as to prevent any Acts of the old province of Canada interfering with the management of trade and navigation, which are by the Confederation Act exclusively vested in the Dominion Parliament. This is the only extent to which this clause can possibly go. If there are local rights, then this legislation cannot take them away, because it would be ultra vires.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The meaning of the clause in question is this—that where a local act, or any by-law passed under a local act comes in conflict with the paramount authority of this Parliament, then such by-law must give way. This bill relates to trade and commerce, one of the subjects exclusively given to the Federal Parliament, and of course where an enactment made under that authority conflicts with the local legislation, the latter must give way.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—That applies, so far as it affects laws made before Confederation; but this clause applies also to laws made by the Quebec Legislature. If the Quebec statutes are constitutional, we have no right to declare that they are unconstitutional. A case in point comes to my mind now: between the Island of Montreal and the south shore of the St. Lawrence the municipality possesses certain ferry rights and these rights are declared to belong to the Local Government and not to the Commission. What I object to is this—to declaring that certain Acts of the Quebec Legislature shall be set aside. If they are constitutional we have no right to do that; if they are not constitutional, this law of course will prevail without naming the local legislature directly.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The clause applies only in so far as they attempt to restrict the Harbour Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The point which the hon. gentleman wishes to make is that possibly they might exceed their powers; but if they go beyond the jurisdiction of this Parliament, their action is null and unconstitutional.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman does not correctly apprehend what I say. My point is that under the clause we declare that the laws of the province of Quebec shall be set aside.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Only in so far as they relate to the harbour.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—It does not rest with us to do that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Nothing that we can say here can interfere with the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature. The language of this bill is restricted to the jurisdiction and constitutional power of the Parliament of Canada. If the laws of the province of Quebec are ultra vires, they have to be set aside.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 26,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL.—This clause embodies the powers of the old Trinity House and the Harbour Commissioners, simply reviving them, and in subsection b there is a verbal change to make it read better, and subsection c deals with the restriction of the use of the channel in whole or in part. It gives the power over the whole channel instead of certain portions of it. The only change in subsection e from the old law is the giving of the power to the commissioners to prohibit the depositing of ballast in certain parts of the river; and subsection f limits the control of preventive measures, which under the old Act the commissioners had full control of. In subsection i the word "explosive" is substituted for the word "powder." When the old Act was passed explosives were confined almost exclusively to powder; now you have dynamite, nitro-glycerine and a number of others. Subsection n I should like to drop. That refers to the control and management of tow-boats. The general legislation of the Dominion applies to the management of tow-boats: and the Steamboat Inspection Act and the Safety of Ships Act cover this. The Minister of Marine informs me that it is not necessary and is merely duplicating power. I therefore move that it be struck out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does not the Minister think it is desirable that this corporation should have the control and management of tow-boats?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The Minister of Marine and Fisheries says the general law provides for it and also for subsection s, which reads: "The maintenance of order and regularity and the prevention of theft, &c." That also is provided for in the Criminal Code, which code provides for all these offences.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The prevention of theft and depredations would be, but not the other.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I think we might keep that provision in the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The criminal law interferes when a theft has been committed, but it is the duty of the commissioners to make regulations to prevent the theft.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—You could not make regulations to prevent a man stealing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But such regulations can be made as would render it difficult to perpetrate a theft.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Then we might leave the whole clause in. Subsection s, for regulating the procedure of the corporation, merely contains the statutory provisions, and the procedure is repealed and the Criminal Code adopted, as you will see by section 44. Subsection u is for the introduction of new and uniform rules as to penalties. The reason for that is that the Trinity House had the power of imposing penalties to the extent of $80. The Harbour Commissioners' law only gave them power to the extent of $40, and this makes the one penalty $40.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As to the matters upon which the commissioners may make by-laws, I should submit to the Minister that it would be the right thing to insert here the power to make by-laws with respect to the remuneration of the commissioners. That is one of the things which they have to do. After "v" insert "and fix the remuneration to be paid for their services to the commissioners other than the president of the corporation."

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—That is provided for in the section to which my hon. friend objected a short time ago.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause we are dealing with sets out the various matters upon which the corporation may make by-laws, and we decided in clause 16 that they should be paid what they fixed by by-law and now I shall simply wish to insert in the list of matters on which they may make by-laws this matter of fixing the remuneration to be paid for their services to the commissioners other than the president of the corporation.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is only repeating it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would come in after line 11 on page 10. The corporation have power to do such and such things by by-law and the power of fixing their remuneration should be included.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It seems to me the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman would simply be a duplication of powers. You have asked to place as subsection w the power to enable them to pass a by-law to pay themselves. Well now, subsection 2 of section 16 states what they can do. The commissioners may be paid such remuneration for their services as the corporation may determine by by-law. That gives them the power to pass a by-law to pay themselves, whether by the year or by the day or by the meeting. Some hon. senators were not in the chamber when we discussed this matter before. The commissioners have been in the habit of paying themselves $5 a meeting. There was no statutory power for that, and this provision is to place it beyond a question.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—And the Governor in Council must confirm what is done by by-law.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 35,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is no extra borrowing power given in this clause. In the 4th subsection the words: "By the tenor of the bond or debenture" have been added.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—Is the amount of one million dollars available now?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes, they have not exhausted their borrowing powers. This is simply a re-enactment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is barely possible some question might arise under subsection 3. The hon. gentleman from DeLorimier who has been a member of the board would know whether any difficulty would arise or not. Supposing the corporation was allowed to borrow a large sum, and in error borrowed in excess of that amount, it might be held that the power was taken away as to the whole amount and not merely as to the excess over the amount which they had the right to borrow. If they were authorized to borrow a million dollars and borrowed a million dollars and $50,000, apparently, under the wording of this clause, the borrowing of the million would have been ultra vires.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I do not think the clause can bear that construction. This gives the power to borrow a sufficient sum of money to redeem debentures that may be falling due, but in no case must they exceed that amount; that is, if a million dollars of bonds are falling due bearing 5 per cent, they could borrow on new debentures a million dollars at 4 per cent if they liked; but they could not borrow under that clause more than a million dollars; if they did they would exceed their power.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am quite aware of that, but supposing they had the power to borrow a million and really borrowed a million and $50,000, my contention is that under the wording of this sub-clause it might be held that the whole loan would be void.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I think the only trouble is that those parties who loaned them the extra $50,000 might be in trouble.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—Supposing a million dollars borrowed had been exhausted and the bonds were becoming due—I think sub-clause 3 is to provide that they cannot exceed the amount which is falling due.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes, but it does not confine them to any one issue of debentures. You might have a million dollars coming due next month and you could borrow and renew the loan. If you had another million dollars next month, you could go through the same operation, but in no case could you exceed the amounts to cover the debentures. The hon. gentleman asked, supposing they went beyond that, what would be the result? Well, if they did, they would go beyond their powers and they would be subject to penalties provided under the circumstances.

The clause was carried.

On clause 36,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to call the attention of the Minister to the very long and probably expensive provisions contained in sub-clause 4:

> When any such thing so found had not been claimed the secretary of the corporation shall advertise during four weeks in English and in French, in two or more newspapers published at Montreal.

Unless the thing is pretty valuable the advertisement will cost about as much as the property is worth.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is a question whether this whole clause should be continued in the bill. The whole thing is provided for by the Wrecking and Salvage Act. The Minister of Marine informs me that it is unnecessary, as it is fully provided for by the law now upon the Statute-book, but I do not see myself any particular harm it can cause. It only re-enacts what really exists now, and which would be an indication to the Harbour Commissioners what their authority and power was in dealing with salvage goods or wrecks. We might drop it for the reason which I have given, that it has already been provided for.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We actually undertake to define by this clause how it should be advertised. It shall be advertised during four weeks in English and French in two or more papers published in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—They do not go to auction every day. They advertise at a certain time in the year. If some articles are found, they wait until they have sufficient to warrant them in calling an auction, and at a certain date every year they advertise.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman's objection is this: he does not object to publication but to advertising during four weeks. That might mean to publish it in two newspapers every day for four weeks; but it might also be in one newspaper once a week for four weeks. The advertisement would extend over the four weeks just the same. That is a matter which I think should be dealt with by the Harbour Commissioners. It might be once a week for a month, but you must give the four weeks' notice before the sale takes place.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 41,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The only change is in subsection b; it reads, "any magistrate having the power of two justices." The old Act provided for any magistrate of Quebec, Three Rivers or Montreal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is improved considerably.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 47,

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—This is the clause which exempts the officers and members of the corporation from serving on juries or inquests. There is a doubt if we have the right to enact this clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With regard to criminal matters the Government would have the right.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY.—It would be well for the leader of the House to consider this question. It is a matter of some importance, because it might lead to a conflict of laws, and that is unnecessary. It is saying nothing in favour of the enactment to mention that it has been already enacted, because it is quite within my own knowledge that a great many enactments have taken place which are palpably ultra vires. I think the question should be considered before the bill goes to the third reading.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL.—I will reserve the clause until I make inquiries at the department.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the bill and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

THE DILLON DIVORCE CASE.

REPORTS PRESENTED.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN, from the Committee on Divorce, presented their report on bill (T) "An Act for the relief of James St. George Dillon," and moved that the same be taken into consideration on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH, from the same committee, presented a minority report, and moved that the same be taken into consideration on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I think it would be proper that the report of the minutes should be before the House, as well as the ex parte statement which has just been submitted.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I certainly should not raise any objection to the whole of the minutes going in, as well as the pronunciamento of my hon. friend who seems to have influenced the committee.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I move that the Clerk of the Committee furnish the full minutes of the proceedings before the committee, so that the whole matter may be in the possession of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MANITOBA AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill (X) "An Act respecting the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company of Canada."

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I gave the following notice:

That when the Order of the Day is called for the third reading of the Bill (X) "An Act respecting the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company of Canada," I will move that the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by striking out the words "not exceeding," in the fifteenth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "not less than."

The bill before us is for an extension of the company's charter, because the time has lapsed according to previous legislation which would entitle it to continue. It is now asked that the work authorized by this extension shall be completed within ten years from the passing of this bill. What is asked for by this company is that it shall have power to extend the time for the completion of the road to Prince Albert, the terminus fixed by the charter, for ten years, and that it shall not be compelled to build a greater mileage than 20 miles in any one year commencing in 1896, and that they shall not be compelled to build that 20 miles except with the approval of the Government. It might happen under this clause that half a mile in each year would protect their charter. The object of my amendment is, not so much to interfere with the legislation that the company is asking for, as to bring certain facts and figures in connection with this enterprise, before this House. I regret to say, as I live on that line, some one hundred and eighty miles from the Canadian Pacific Railway, that it is one of the railways in our country which has passed into legal difficulties and is now in the hands of a receiver. The railway company issued bonds upon 180 miles of its road, which bonds were sold in the English market, and the interest has not been paid by the company, and the bondholders had a right to foreclose in June last. Before the bondholders could claim their right to foreclose, the principal stockholders of the company who were also creditors for a certain portion of the bonds west of the 180 miles that were covered by the English bondholders, applied for the appointment of a receiver as a creditor of the 42 miles of road in order that the road might be continued as a single line under the supervision of the courts. That is the position in which the railway company is at the present moment. When a railway like that gets into difficulties, it is a matter of great importance to us, who reside in the interior of the country and are so dependent on railway communication, to understand how it is that a railway company that has been subsidized so largely should become discredited and pass into the hands of a receiver. The reason of it is that the railway aid that has hitherto been given by the Government has proved a wasteful system for providing railway communication and cheapening rates and maintaining the credit of a line such as this. The Manitoba and North-western Railway is projected on the route that the Government originally selected for the Canadian Pacific Railway through what is called the fertile belt, a very rich portion of the country, but its progress and development has been retarded in consequence of the deflection of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the south. A few years after the Canadian Pacific Railway was commenced, this line was projected. Messrs. Allan, who are the owners of the road behind the bondholders, complained that they have been very large losers in their operations connected with the road. The Railway Committee heard the statement of the solicitor that between one and two millions of dollars were the losses sustained by the Messrs. Allan in addition to the securities placed on the road. I should like to read the public reports in order to show the position the railway is placed in, so far as the information is conveyed to us in the public documents. We have here a summarized statement of the capital with regard to all the railways in Canada in 1893. I see that the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company is 234½ miles long, with an authorized ordinary share capital of $12,000,000. The paid up capital is $5,837,500 ; the authorized preference share capital is $465,000 paid up ; the subscribed bonded debt is $3,241,000; the Provincial Government aid by the province of Manitoba amounts to $650,294.27 ; the municipal aid given by the various municipalities along the line was $215,600 ; the total paid up capital, that is including the subscribed shares paid up and all the amounts that I have mentioned, amounts to $10,359,-594. and the total subscribed capital to $16,522,000. The floating debt is $1,335,866 and the total cost of the railway and the rolling stock is $3,605,024.74. That is the public return as to the cost of the construction of the railway, the issue of bonds, the public aid which has been given to it, and everything in connection with the road. In addition to that, there was a land grant given to it of 6,400 acres per mile from Portage la Prairie to the town of Prince Albert, of which 234½ miles have been earned, and of the land grant that has passed into the hands of the railway company, there has been sold 584,000 acres, realizing $954,000 in addition to the amounts I have already read over to you. It is possible that this $954,000 has not been realized in money. Perhaps payments have been postponed in order to accommodate the purchasers of those lands. However, it is an asset of the company amounting to $954,000. Now we can see that the total amount received by the company, including the floating debt of $1,335,866, is $6,400,000. That is the cash that has been received by the railway company for the construction of 234½ miles of road, including the floating debt of $1,335,000 for which I presume value has been given in construction or services in some way or other, and that as against that $6,400,000 of money, received by the company, the cost of the road as stated in the public returns, was $3,500,000 or a total of $16,000 per mile for the 234½ miles of road that have been constructed. There seems to me a very great discrepancy between the cost of the road as returned to us, and the money shown by these returns to have gone into the treasury of the railway company, and therefore, looking at it as it is presented to us, it seems to be impossible that any loss could have been incurred by the promoters of the road—that the road has had securities and sold securities to more than cover the cost of construction of the railway and to pay the interest and indebtedness of every kind in connection with the enterprise. If that has been the case it seems hard that the country should be retarded in its development by a road that is virtually in the hands of the liquidator and the court at the present moment. It cannot be an effective instrument for the development of the country in which I reside. In consequence of the statement that I partially made at the Railway Committee the other day when the solicitor of the company was present, he has written me a letter which I received this morning. He wrote it seeing that I had given notice of an amendment. This letter bears on these figures that I have already mentioned and is as follows :—

TORONTO, 7th May, 1894.

The Honourable Senator Boulton, Parliament Buildings, Ottawa.

DEAR SENATOR BOULTON,—I understand that you have given notice of intention to move an amendment to the Manitoba and North-western Bill when it comes up for its third reading to-morrow, and in view of what you said with reference to the bond issue of the company, I would like to correct the opinion you expressed which I will show you is entirely without foundation in fact. The bonds and debenture stock issued in respect of the railway is shown by the following statement:—

First division bonds..........	£540,000 =	$2,628,000
Shell River Branch Bonds....	34,500 =	167,900
Saskatchewan and Western Branch bonds..	37,200 =	181,400
Debenture stock..............	126,000 =	613,200
Total.	£737,700 =	$3,591,300

As a matter of fact the only bonds which have been sold are those issued in respect of the first division £540,000. The Shell River Branch bonds, £34,500, have never been sold, nor have the bonds issued in respect of the Saskatchewan and Western Branch, £37,200, nor has the debenture stock issued in respect of construction of the 42 miles between Langenburg and Yorkton, £126,000. These three classes of securities have been deposited as security for advances obtained by the Messrs. Allan which were expended in construction of the line. The following is a statement showing what bonds were issued in respect of the first 180 miles, and how the proceeds of these bonds were applied:—

First mortgage bonds, £540,000	$2,628,000 00
In addition to that the company received the profits of provincial debentures earned for construction of that portion of the main line between Minnedosa and the boundary of the province, 90 miles, and in respect of the Shell River Branch and Saskatchewan and Western Branch.......	789,408 40
In addition the company received small balances in respect of a previous issue of bonds which were retired by the above issue of £540,000.	4,442 04
	$3,421,850 44

This amount applied as follows:—

Discounts and expenses of issuing and floating bonds, commission and interest	$ 694,081 64
Expenses in construction and equipment..	1,894,334 62
Payments on account of interest due on bonds and loans...... ...	411,778 80
Land department expenses..........	16.000 00
Subscriptions for stock in Commercial Colonization Society... ...	89,401 69
Bonds transferred to old bondholders £67,000..	326,066 67
Balance......... ...	187 00
		$ 3,421,850 42

The above statement may be taken as absolutely authentic and an offer to verify it was made to the Government, but it was not thought necessary in view of the assurances given of its correctness. The item of discount and expenses of issuing and floating bonds, commission and interest seems enormous, but it is to be explained by the fact that at the time these bonds were issued, a portion of the provincial debenture issue was sold at 80, another portion at 95, and that two sums of commissions paid English brokers on sales of two lots of first mortgage bonds were respectively $222,-382.31 and $87,490.50.

The net amount left after paying expenses of the issues and applying $16,000 towards developing the company's lands, and after investing $89,400 in the effort to establish a commercial colonization society was $1,894,334, about $10,000 a mile. This did not begin to pay the cost of construction, equipment and expenses in connection with the acquirement of terminal facilities.

As I say above, this statement may be taken as absolutely authentic. I have verified it myself, and can, if required, give the items showing how each one of the above mentioned sums is made up.

Yours truly,

WALTER BARWICK.

Mr. Barwick has left out of this calculation two items—one of $984,000 realized from the sale of a portion of the land grant, and $215,000 municipal aid which would swell the amount to upwards of $1,000,000. The discounts and expenses of issuing and floating bonds, commissions and interest, $614,000 on 230 miles of road, as shown in this statement seem to be excessive. This amount, of course, forms a portion of the capital expenditure and the interest upon it must be borne by the traffic of the country. Another large item is $411,000 payable for interest due on bonds and loans, overdue interest—I do not know exactly what that is, because in the published statement there is also an item of $1,335,866 floating debt, a portion of which I presume is overdue interest; but here we have $1,100,000 for discount on the floating of the bonds and interest and one thing or another all of which adds unduly to the cost of the 234 miles of road, and it is for the purpose of pointing out the disabilities under which we labour in providing that railway communication which is so absolutely essential to the development of the country and to the necessities and comfort of the settlers, that we have to pay interest on almost 50 per cent of the capital expended in the construction of railroads for the development of that country in discounts and interest, and that the land grant that has been given to aid in the development of the railway, is also to a great extent wasted. So far as the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company are concerned, they cannot hold their lands for the development of the country as an asset of such value that it will accomplish a great deal more than it has accomplished in the construction of the railroad up to the present moment. What I mean by that is, that the railway lands are subject to taxation, and when some two or three millions of acres of land are liable to taxation, it is almost impossible for a private corporation to hold that land until it becomes of certain value to enable it to realize its full value, after the railway has developed the country. The value of lands through which this railway is passing—that is to say the intrinsic value of them so far as far as their productive power is concerned—is equal to $5 per acre. The man who pays $5 per acre for his land within eight miles of the railway is as well off, in raising produce, as the original homesteader who went in and got his land for nothing, because he finds everything ready at his hand to make the very best of the produce that he raises on his farm. What I desire to point out is that if that wasteful method is proved to exist, cannot the Government come to the aid of the North-west? Because it is evident to the commonest observer of the condition of our country at the present moment that the North-west Territories have failed to come up to our expectation, both financially and commercially, and every way after nearly 25 years of development—that the depression which exists there is such that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has of late discharged some 2,000 hands in consequence of the decrease of traffic which decrease the company claims mainly comes from the North-west Territories. The reason of that I explained to hon. gentlemen the other day—that we were labouring under such difficulties in consequence of protection and high freight rates that it was impossible to pursue agriculture as an occupation up there with any degree of profit, and that, in consequence, the production was decreasing instead of increasing and the railway that was built in order to carry the produce of that country has been obliged to discharge a certain number of its hands. That reacts on the whole country, and, therefore, the question that interests the country at large is, what is going to develop and fill up that western country of ours? Whatever fills up the North-west Territories will add to the prosperity of the whole of Canada to the east and to the west where we find our markets as they prove most profitable to us. It is not, therefore, a mere question for the few settlers who are developing that country, but a question of interest to the whole Dominion, because if there are half a million of producers or a million of producers in that country who can produce profitably, it is going to benefit all the channels of communication and all the commercial centres that assist in supplying us with the necessaries of life, and which must, under any circumstances, continue to do so in consequence of the facilities which they possess through their nearness to that country. The Dominion Government holds the lands of the North-west Territories and of the province of Manitoba. We are not in the same position as the provinces in the east and west. We have no assets. We have no mines, no timber, no lands—nothing at all to fall back upon to assist ourselves, and therefore, we have to depend upon the assistance that can be obtained from the Central Government. Now, is it not in the interest of the Government and the people of Canada to assist in the development of that country by a more economical method than that which has been shown in the correspondence and the facts and figures which I have submitted? Is it not possible for the Dominion Government to assist us to get over that great disability under which we labour, by which one million five hundred thousand dollars out of a total expenditure of three million five hundred thousand dollars, has to go to pay discounts and commissions? The traffic of the country has to bear excessive rates in order to meet these heavy demands for capital and for interest. The interest upon these bonds is six per cent, and that burden is double what it might be. With regard to the bill before the House, it calls for a postponement for ten years of the conditions upon which the Manitoba and North-western Railway was to be pushed forward to develop that North-west country, in its fertile belt. There is another alteration under which they may not be required to build more than half a mile a year, if the Dominion Government see that there are certain difficulties in the way which would prevent it and thus deprive the company of its charter if it was held to the agreement to build more than half a mile a year. The company had a land grant of 6,400 acres a mile to Prince Albert. The extension of this bill may lock up this valuable asset. I do not know whether it really does or not—whether the Government still have it in their power to dictate terms in relation to their land grants, or whether the railway company holds the land grant with the extension of the charter. That, I am not in a position to say, but what I do say is, that if it does lock it up, it is locking it up to the detriment of the country—postponing the development of that particular part of the country virtually for ten years. It is advisable that the Government should alter the aid in such a way that it may be made not more wasteful, but that it may be made more economical and effective for the construction of the railroad and the development of the country after the railroad is constructed. When I say made more wasteful, I do not agree with the policy that we have pursued in two or three instances, and that is supplementing the land grant with $80,000 a year subsidy. I say that is a wasteful method. It does not assist the settlement of the country or the promotion of railroads as it should—it is only increasing the assets in the hands of the promotors and giving a larger margin for the abstraction of discounts and cost of floating the company without any commensurate advantage to the settlement of the country and facilities of transportation after the railroad is built. A more economical method, without imposing any greater tax upon the country, would be for the Government to take the land grant back from this railway company and other railway companies in that country, and set it aside as a trust in the same way that they have done with the school lands and fix an upset price at say $5 an acre and then guarantee the bonds of the railway at 3 per cent interest, taking also a lien on the road in case, through bad management or any other cause, the company fail to meet the interest on the bonds. In that way the Government would be perfectly secured; they would have the railway, the land grant, and the subsidy of $80,000 a year which has been given in two or three cases, which $80,000 a year is sufficient to pay the whole 3 per cent interest for 17 or 18 years, at least, of the time. In that way the traffic of the country would not be burdened with a greater charge on it than 3 per cent interest. The company could go into the money market with security and independence in the floating of those bonds. They would not be obliged to meet stock brokers in the money market and be told "this is a speculative property, and although the interest is 6 per cent a year yet we have to charge you enormous discounts in order to take the chances and run the risks we incur in accepting securities of that kind." The country would be relieved of that. There would be less money going out of the country to meet and pay those dividends, and the profits of the farmer would be distributed by the farmers themselves to the great advantage of every commercial interest of the country, In consequence of the land grant being still the property of the public, accumulating in in value for public advantage, no taxation is imposed, but when it is transferred to a private corporation taxation accumulates, and while the people do not object to public lands being exempt so long as they are held for the public benefit, they object to property held for private advantage being exempt, their labour and industry is giving value to the vacant lands, and the private interests in the vacant lands should bear with them the burden of taxation, in that way the lands are a much more valuable asset in the hands of the Government, than in the hands of a corporation. A land grant properly husbanded might then be utilized by the Government for the promotion of four and five times the milage as roads become self-supporting. With regard to the road in question, many hon. gentlemen will remember that when a similar bill was before this House two or three years ago and the same proposition was presented for an extension of time—because an indefinite period was being fixed for the construction of this railroad, to meet the opposition that was then raised to this indefinite extension the then Premier, Sir John Abbott, suggested that if the company were absolved that year from any construction they should be compelled to build forty miles the following year—settlements that had been placed there at the instigation of the Government and immigration promoted by that Government. Here are the words of the late Sir John Abbott at that time:

I think it is a question whether we ought not to do something or other to give encouragement to these settlers and others who may be expected to go to that part of the country, and I would ask the gentlemen who compose the Railway Committee whether it might not make a good point in favour of this immigration and show our desire to do justice to these people if they were to say that in consideration of our abstaining from enforcing the twenty miles condition this year, they should be required to build forty miles next year. Forty miles is nothing to a railway company if they can get the necessary capital, and without it twenty miles is more than they can undertake. I think if they are granted this delay they should build forty miles next year. It has been represented to me, and I think with some force, that for this autumn coming the loss and inconvenience to these settlers will not be very great, because they have just settled there, and will not have much to export—they will need all they produce for their own consumption—but next year they should have a good deal to export, and it would be well to encourage them to expect some proper accommodation when that time arrives. I therefore would commend to the consideration of the members of the Railway Committee the advisability of requiring the company to build forty miles next year if they are not required to build any this year.

That is tantamount to a pledge from the Dominion Government in 1892 that steps would be taken to enforce the condition upon the company that 40 miles would be completed in order to meet the demands and necessities of the settlers who had gone in 40, 50 and 60 miles ahead of railway communication, and I think that when a bill like this is before the House it is only proper for me a resident in that district, to whom the settlers look for assistance in protecting their interests, that I should urge upon the Government to take this matter into their serious consideration, and while I do not move this amendment with any view to obstructing the legislation sought for I desire to put the responsibility on the Government, that they should make the aid of such a character that the railway company will be enabled to push their line forward and that the aid shall be given in such a manner that the most economical methods can be applied to the construction of the railroad, and all railroads that are required in that country. It is taking a new departure, but it is a departure well worthy the consideration of the Government. As I have already stated repeatedly here, we are not like the people who live on the Pacific or Atlantic coasts, or on those magnificent water ways which penetrate the interior of the country as far as Port Arthur; we are living a thousand or fifteen hundred and two thousand miles from water communication, and these railways are absolutely necessary for the development, of the country, and the economical construction of our roads is essential to the properity of the people themselves. I, therefore, move the amendment of which I have given notice. At the present moment the road is in litigation. If the road is to be continued in litigation (and we know how indefinite litigation is in regard to such large matters) it will remain unfinished to the detriment of those settlers who went in there believing that that was to be the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it is going to be detriment not to them, but to the whole of the North-west in retarding the development of that great country, in consequence of the destruction of our credit for similar enterprises through no fault of the country.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There is one other point that my hon. friend did not make. He spoke of the detriment to that country through this delay, but he did not say that the credit of the country is imperilled also. Capitalists have invested a good deal of money which is locked up. I do not know whether they can realize on that until the whole road is completed. They cannot take over or utilize that 180 miles of road, nor can they do anything until the line is built. Therefore it is a great detriment to those bond-holders if they cannot take possession of that section of the road which their money has constructed. It is not only a wrong to the bondholder, but also an injury to investments in this country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—With regard to the point that the hon. gentleman has made, the bondholders from England sent out a commissioner to inquire into the position of the road, and he reported that it was in fair condition but that the rolling stock was deficient—most of it belonged to the construction company. The net earnings of the 180 miles of road were sufficient to pay one and a half per cent interest on the bonds up to the present, which is a satisfactory showing so far as the earnings are concerned. Of course, on the newer portion of the line, under the circumstances that I have detailed to you, the earnings have not been so great, and the one and a half per cent interest which should go to the English bond holders is absorbed in maintaining the line beyond. That is what I gathered from the report.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While I fully appreciate the value of the statement made by the hon. member from Marquette with regard to his section of country being opened up by railway communication and the completion of this line, if possible, yet there are more important considerations than those to which he has referred. I may say, for the information of the House, that over 250 miles of this road have been built. The difficulty up to the present time has been in respect of the road being bonded in two sections. We have the English bondholders making an application to sever from the whole road the section which is covered by the bonds which now they hold. This matter has been in litigation for some time. The courts of Manitoba have fully ventilated the question, and the road is now in liquidation, and being operated by the receiver. Though I am in charge of this bill, if I thought the motion of the hon. gentleman from Marquette would accomplish the end which he has in view, I should not press the bill in its present form; but there are other considerations which have to receive our attention, viz., those of a financial character and which operate most seriously against the proposition of my hon. friend being carried out. I think this Government initiated a mistaken policy in dealing with colonization roads, in compelling them to build from year to year an arbitrary extent of railway. I took occasion to express myself in committee the other day with respect to this matter, and I now repeat that colonization roads of this character being commercial enterprises can only be built on a commercial and paying basis, and if the Government or the public insist upon such a road attempting to accomplish more than will have successful results financially, so sure will that road immediately become crippled and so sure will it operate to the detriment of the people through whose country it is built. Nothing can be more fatal to railway interests in the North-west Territories and to the interests of the settlers in that country than to make it compulsory for railways of this character to pursue a course which must cripple themselves and ruin the reputation of the country in the financial market. Thus we render it almost impossible to raise capital for the carrying out of such enterprises. This has been the case in promoting this particular line. The Government heretofore has insisted upon a certain amount of this road being completed at stated intervals. The progress sought to be made was of an arbitrary character; the financial results were not taken into consideration, and the consequence is we have a colonization road which started out under very favourable auspices, but attempting to build beyond their ability, was absolutely crippled. Is it wise to compel an enterprise of this kind to so cripple itself? The results are very manifest in the fact that this road is now in liquidation and with very poor prospects in the near future of being again placed on a sound financial basis. The difficulty which has been pointed out by my hon. friend in appealing to the Government of the country to come to the aid of this road, is that the company do not ask assistance from the Government. Last session and the session preceding that, they exhausted all their persuasive powers in trying to induce the Government to come to their aid, without success. I therefore fancy that the company are fully pursuaded that the Government will not assist them any more than has been done in the past. They have received munificent Government assistance, not only from the Dominion Government but from the Provincial Government of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And from the municipalities.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And with the results which we have seen. My hon. friend from Marquette proposes that this company shall be compelled, after 1896, to build 20 miles of road every year. We have staring us in the face a bankrupt corporation—a corporation absolutely crippled and utterly unable at the present moment to pay the interest on its bonds—only in receipt of revenue sufficient to pay running expenses and nothing more. How in the world is such a company, at the expiration of 1896, to build twenty miles of road per year until they reach Prince Albert?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—How does the company propose to get out of the difficulty?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The only thing I see the company can do is to run the road to the best possible advantage. The hon. gentleman may be perfectly assured of this fact, that if the construction of twenty miles of road would further cripple the company, they would not build it. I would furthermore point out what is an insuperable obstacle in the way of this railway to raise money on isolated sections of that character. Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with financing enterprises of this kind know perfectly well you cannot cut up a railway into sections, particularly a concern of this kind, and bond twenty miles of road this year and then float a bonded indebtedness the following year for another twenty miles with entirely different parties. It is utterly impossible that this could be financially carried out, therefore the proposition made by my hon. friend from Marquette is an impractical one. Those interested financially in the road, as soon as they see that extension of the railway will result in a fair financial return, will be prepared to go on with it. The proposition made by the company to leave it with the Governor in Council to say whether they are in a position to proceed with so much of the section of 20 miles per year is most reasonable and the Government is in a much better position than the public to say whether the needs of the country are of such a character and the position of the company of such standing as to proceed with whatever length of road the Government may insist upon. They are in a position to make inquiry into it and if the settlers in that section will make representations to the Government that the company should proceed with a 20-mile section per year, I have no doubt the Governor in Council will consider whether it is in the interest of public policy that such a proposition should be carried out. I therefore submit to the House that the company should not be further crippled—that they have made a reasonable proposition, and in view of the immense amount of capital already expended this bill should pass as it has come from the committee. I would further more point out this fact, although my hon. friend has gone into figures which appear to be at variance with the figures submitted by the solicitor of the road, that the financial extravagances enumerated by him will not further assist the matter. The fact that this company has been financially embarrassed up to the present time—if the amount of money stated by my hon. friend has been sunk in the enterprise it will not assist in promoting the road in the future. It would have the contrary effect than that pressed upon us by my hon. friend. Therefore I think the bill should be read the third time in the shape in which it has come from the committee.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not desire to extend my remarks any further, nor do I wish to push the amendment to a vote. As I explained, my object was to point out to the Government the position in which we are placed, not with the object of interfering with a bill that the company wish to get passed, but in order to present these views to the Government. There is a great deal that my hon. friend has said which I cannot agree with. If that country is going to be blocked up by a company already in liquidation, then the question how long that company should be allowed to stand in the way of the development of that section of the country is a pertinent one. I ask permission to withdraw my amendment.

With the leave of the House the amendment was withdrawn and the bill was read the third time and passed.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (V) " An Act to further amend the Insurance Act."

(In the Committee.)

On the fifth clause,

Hon. Mr. ANGERS said : I propose to make the amendment, which I indicated at the second reading of the bill, in the third subsection. I want to substitute a clause which will render it less expensive and troublesome for the companies to comply with the requirements of the Act.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—We have more than one chief agent in Canada for some of the larger companies. I know that one of the largest companies in the world has two chief agents in this country—one for western Canada, and one for eastern Canada, and it would be well to make provision that each of these chief agents should keep the necessary documents for his own district.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have no objection whatever to the amendment.

The clause was amended accordingly and adopted.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL suggested an additional clause to relieve companies in respect to whom no complaint had been made, from the possibility of being subject to penalties for making reports signed by the secretary instead of by the chief agent, as called for by the Act.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I would be very willing to come to the relief of the companies that are sued, but I draw the attention of the House to the fact that it is an exceptional thing to legislate away the rights of litigants before the courts, and I am afraid that the purport of this amendment is to relieve companies which are now being sued.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Observe the expression "and in respect of which no complaint has ever been made."

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—You might substitute another word for "complaint"—"in respect to which no action has been taken."

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The object is to prevent the company from being blackmailed —parties suing them to make money. Where they have no chief agent in the country, the documents have been attested by the secretary instead.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Ought we not to protect the companies under those conditions if we have the power? They have complied with the law, but because the document is signed by the secretary instead of the agent, it gives the right to an action which is a mere speculation and which should be frowned down. The object of the return having been complied with, the Government are perfectly satisfied. Everything has been clearly explained and the returns are satisfactory and yet because the returns are made by a secretary instead of a chief agent, the company technically becomes liable.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The objection is not that it was sworn to and given by the secretary instead of the president or actuary, but that it was given by an agent out of Canada; the courts hold that it must be by an agent in Canada. It is for the House to consider the propriety of interfering in an action which is pending before the courts. I think it is an extreme power for the House to take to interfere between the plaintiff and defendant in a pending action. I have never seen it done before.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think I have, and it is just one of those cases where the court is powerless. There is not the slightest iota of merit in any such action; it is a mere speculation. The company has made its return, which is honest and fair, and it has been accepted by the Government, and no injury has accrued to anybody, but technically it has not been made by the proper officer.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There is more than that. Besides the return having been made by an officer that had no right to do it, some of the companies have neglected to make any returns, and I do not know whether these law suits turn upon the fact that they completely neglected to make the return or not. I do not think Parliament should interfere. I have never read a statute of the Parliament of Canada or any legislature that interfered in a law suit pending before the court. We can accept the amendment which relieves the companies for the future, but we cannot relieve them when they have been brought before the court. I think that is the furthest we can go. The amendment will come in immediately after subsection 3.

The amendment was adopted.

On subsection 5,

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—Subsection 5 limits the time for making the statement required to the 1st January, or within two months thereafter. This would make the last on the 1st of March. I am requested by several companies in Quebec to state that they are accustomed to make their returns in the first two weeks of March, and it would be very hard on them if they were required to make their returns otherwise. If you could make it three months it would not make much difference to the Government.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I would accept the amendment, and say "within three months."

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have an amendment to propose to section 10 by adding a sixth subsection, that this section shall not interfere with the renewal of licenses heretofore granted, or to any application for license pending on the 1st April, 1894. It is not intended to interfere with companies that have been combining the business of life, fire and accident insurance. We have an application which was made in the month of December last by the Ætna, I believe, which has not yet been adjudicated upon. Now, whatever their rights are to-day, we do not wish to interfere with them in this bill ; we do not wish to acknowledge that they had any right, but we desire that the case should stand upon its own merits as if this bill had not been introduced, and therefore there is a reservation to that amendment to the effect that it shall not apply first of all to companies doing several kinds of business now, nor shall it interfere with the applications made up to the 1st of April—that is, previous to the introduction of this bill in the House. That amendment comes in as subsection 6 of section 10.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I move that the bill be amended by adding a 13th section which has the effect of providing for a case of error as to age in life insurance. I gave full details of the object of that clause and read the amendment to the House the other day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been suggested that instead of adopting the explanation of the word "premium" as it is here, "the net annual premium," it should be the actual office premium, the difference being the reduction of profits. I had a letter from Mr. Ramsay, president of the Canada Life Company, suggesting that in giving an explanation of the word "premium" the fairer way would be to put it "actual office premium." That would be the amount without any deduction for profits.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The head office or the Canadian office?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The head office of the company. They have a premium; when a policy is taken out with profits to be deducted from the annual premium, then the profits are deducted from the premium and the person is charged with the balance.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think the amendment should not be accepted. You insure in the company with profits ; you remain insured fifteen years, and accordingly your premium diminishes every five years in certain companies. That premium, after you have been insured a length of time, is the real premium representing an insurance for such a period, and the amount to be paid should be calculated accordingly, and if the premium is to be increased, it should be increased from the date that you first insure to the end, varying every five years. I think it is better to keep the word "annual" as it is there, because otherwise you considerably reduce the capital to be paid the insurer. This amendment has been prepared with very great care by the Superintendent of Insurance, and it is a copy of the regulation made for the insuring of the Civil Service.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The clause is taken from the Ontario statute word for word. However I am not going to press that matter. I would like to ask why the third subsection was added here, making the preceding provisions subject to provincial legislation.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I stated the reason the other day. The provinces have legislation upon that subject, and it is in case we should exceed our own powers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—By that clause you allow our legislation to be superseded by theirs, whether intra vires or ultra vires.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, because they might be dealing with civil rights, which do not belong to us, and in view of that I wanted to acknowledge their own jurisdiction in matters of that kind. That was the only object.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should suggest that the Minister insert after "enactments" the words "intra vires," so as to show that constitutional enactments are meant.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have no objection to that.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have the honour to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. The bill is not quite completed. I have received this afternoon letters and telegrams from gentlemen wishing to meet some members of the Government in relation to this bill, and I have answered that I would be willing to meet them to-morrow. They may have valuable suggestions to make and with the view of improving the bill, if it is necessary, or preventing injustice, I ask that the committee be authorized to sit again if so desired.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit to-morrow.

SECOND READING.

Bill (O) "An Act for the relief of Samuel William Piper."—(Mr. Clemow.)

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (F) " An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 5,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is no necessity for making any change in clause 5, the consideration of which was postponed from yesterday.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that section 6 as it stands in the bill be struck out, and a clause substituted defining the limits of the harbour. He said : I may say this substituted clause was prepared by the law clerk and forwarded to the Harbour Commissioners in Montreal, and received this morning the approbation of that body.

The motion was agreed to.

On clause 47,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The questions arose as to the constitutionality of sections 25 and 47. In reference to 25, that was passed, but I promised the hon. gentleman from Montarville to make inquiry as to the point raised by him. The law officers and the Justice Department are of the opinion that clause 25 is fully within the powers of this Parliament, but it may be a question as to the advisability of allowing it to remain in the Act. I informed the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that that clause had passed, although I had promised to make inquiries upon those points, and he has promised to give the matter further consideration and to consult the Harbour Commissioners as to the propriety of its retention in the bill. For his part he thought there was very little use for it, and unless they had some good reason for retaining it he thought it would be better to drop it. I informed him that I thought the Senate would allow it to remain in the bill and that if he found it was unnecessary he could strike it out in the Commons. I move that the 47th clause be struck out of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 5.30 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 9th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES SCHOOL LAWS.

PETITION PRESENTED.

Mr. BOWELL presented the petition of Cardinal Taschereau and the Roman Catholic Bishops and Archbishops of the province of Quebec in relation to the school laws of the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE asked if it was the intention to have this petition presented.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Personally, I have no objection. If it is placed in extenso in the minutes of proceedings, it might be regarded as a precedent for similar publications hereafter. I think it should take the usual course.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—If the House has no objection, I would move that the petition be printed after the reading of it to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Has the same petition been presented in the other House?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—It has.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Then, would it not be better to let it go before the Printing Committee?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Documents are sent to the committee as a matter of course, but petitions are read at the Table and they then go into the waste paper basket or are pigeon-holed in the department. That is why I move that this petition be printed for circulation after it is read to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I have very much pleasure in seconding the motion, because I think that a petition presented by people of such importance should be printed and circulated.

The motion was agreed to.

THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES SCHOOL ORDINANCES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER inquired:

Whether the Government have received from the Executive Committee of the North-west Territories, or from any official or authority in the North-west Territories, any answer to, or any communication in connection with the following representations and requests as set forth in a letter of the Honourable the Secretary of State to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories, dated the 15th February, 1894, viz.:—

I am now to inform you that His Excellency in Council regrets that the changes made in the ordinance relating to education should have been such as to cause unwittingly dissatisfaction and alarm on the part of the petitioners, and I am to urgently request that the complaints set forth by them be carefully inquired into, and the whole subject be reviewed by the Executive Committee and the North-west Assembly, in order that redress be given by such amending ordinances or amending regulations as may be found necessary to meet any grievances, or any well founded apprehensions which may be ascertained to exist.

And, in case the Government having received no answer to the above, is it their intention to urge again an early answer from the proper authorities in the North-west Territories?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No reply has been received by the Department of the Secretary of State further than the acknowledgment of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories, dated the 24th of February, 1894, stating that the observations above quoted should be submitted to the Executive Committee and to the Legislative Assembly of the Territories for their consideration. The Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories has not since been assembled, and the representations made by His Excellency in Council cannot yet have been laid before them for their consideration. It is impossible, therefore, that any proper request to make such a reply as they deem advisable, can be made before they do assemble.

THIRD READING.

Bill (S) "An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal."—(Mr. Bowell.)

RED DEER VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill (L) "An Act to again revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company." He said: This bill has been deferred from time to time awaiting the arrival of a petition from England duly signed. That petition has been received, and I now move the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

DOMINION WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL moved the second reading of Bill (56) "An Act to incorporate the Dominion Woman's Christian Temperance Union." He said: Hon. gentlemen are no doubt acquainted with the existence of this very useful and influential body. They are seeking an Act of incorporation simply to enable them to hold such lands and property as may be necessary for their purposes, with the usual restrictions as to the value and length of time the property may be held which may come into their possession. The second clause of the bill sets forth the whole substance of it. Hon. gentlemen will see that the object for which they are united is purely a benevolent one against which no possible objection can be made. It is simply to do what in their power lies to rescue those who are perishing and to restore those who are fallen. They do not expect to make any money by it—there is nothing of that kind in it. It is simply to enable them to associate as a corporation capable of holding property.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (33) "An Act respecting the River St. Clair Railway Bridge and Tunnel Company."—(Mr. Ferguson, P.E.I.)

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (V) "An Act to further amend the Insurance Act."

(In the Committee.)

On subsection 5,

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—In answer to a request made yesterday, I met some of the agents of the company who represented that the delay in making the preliminary report was too short, and that they should be given a month. Instead of being required to furnish it on the fifteenth of January they wanted thirty days. I therefore move an amendment to meet their views in that respect, fixing the date the first February.

The amendment was agreed to and the clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think it is better to drop the third subsection which made a reservation as to the provisions made by the local legislatures. I move that the clause be omitted from the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported bill with amendments which were concurred in.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES GAME PRESERVATION BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (Z) "An Act for the Preservation of Game in certain parts of the North-west Territories of Canada."

(In the Committee.)

On the first clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, when this bill was at the second reading, made a suggestion that it should apply to a portion of the country outside of the North-west Territories; and it occurred to me at the same time—I did not catch what the hon. gentleman said—that it might be applied also to the territory of Labrador. I rise for the purpose of suggesting to the leader of the House that the title might be amended so as to read, "The Territories Game Preservation Act." That will cover all the territories outside of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I do know that there is any objection to that.

The clause was amended accordingly and adopted.

On the second clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think this clause ought to be amended in this way. The bill applies to those portions of Canada which are not included within any of the provinces or the provisional districts of Assiniboia, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That will cover Labrador.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Before adopting an amendment like this, it would be well to have the opinion of the experts who drafted the bill. The habits of birds and animals on the Labrador coast might not be the same as those of the birds and animals west of Hudson Bay.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend's suggestion might possibly invade the rights of the provinces in regard to such legislation as this.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I propose to alter this clause so that it shall not. With respect to the objection made by the hon. gentleman from Kennebec, the bill as it stands was intended to apply to all the territory west of Hudson Bay and north of these provisional districts mentioned here, and if we extend it so as to include Labrador, the moose and caribou would be protected. Their habits are very much the same as those of the same animals on the west side of Hudson Bay.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—That is what I was in doubt about.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I do not care to adopt that suggestion until I make further inquiries, more particularly as to the habits of the birds and animals that live on the Labrador coast and to the north, more particularly north of Quebec, and which would be included in the provisions of this bill if the suggestions of the hon. gentleman from Halifax were adopted. I have made a note of it, however, and if it is deemed advisable at the third reading, I will refer it back to committee for the purpose of giving it the wider meaning conveyed in the hon. gentleman's suggestions, but without further information I do not think I would be justified in giving it so wide a range. If the habits of the moose and the birds are the same on the Labrador coast within the Dominion as they are to the west of Hudson Bay, his suggestion is one which should be adopted.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5,

Hon. Mr. POWER—In respect to that provision, if the bill is really intended to afford any protection to these animals, the end of the close season should be later. I have examined the game laws of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba, and I find that in no case are any of these animals allowed to be killed before the 1st September, and the general rule is that the close season ends on the 1st October. In Quebec, for the moose, caribou, &c., it is the 15th September, and for deer, the 1st October. Instead of the the 15th July I suggest that we should insert the 1st September. The hon. member for Wolseley, who is not in the House now, told me that he quite agreed in this view with respect to the termination of the close season.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I have no doubt the hon. leader of the House has obtained all the information that he thinks necessary with regard to the habits of the different animals, but I should suppose that what is stated by my hon. friend from Halifax would apply to deer. Unless their habits and breeding seasons are totally different in those districts the same rule would apply.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The close season for those animals has been fixed after full consideration and suggestions on the part of those in the Hudson's Bay Company, and other officials in the North-west. I might better read the suggestions made by the Commissioner of the Hudson Bay Company at Winnipeg, Mr. Chipman. He says:

> The close season for musk oxen is suggested with a view of the prevailing slaughter of these animals when the snow is soft and they herd together, and are most easily killed in large numbers; they will be sufficiently protected by this close season, which should also be observed by the Indians. The other animals are in their prime or fat condition from about the 15th July to about the middle of September, and during that season all hunters are busy hunting these animals, curing the meat and storing it for winter use. Many of the missions and the company's posts also depend upon the meat cured at that season for their use during the winter.

I suppose long experience has led them to the conclusion that if they are prohibited from being killed up to the period mentioned it would be quite sufficient. He also added:

> The Indians inhabiting the country adjacent to the barren lands depend upon the caribou for winter clothing. During the early part of August they go to meet these animals in the barren lands migrating from the Arctic coast to the wooded country, and there secure the skins they require before the hair of the new coat of the animal becomes too long.

I made special inquiries on this point, after the short discussion which took place when I introduced the bill, and in clause f I propose to extend the time as suggested by the hon. member from Lunenburg, but I think we should let the other dates remain.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The bill does not contain any provision to prevent the exportation of hides. I do not know whether the hon. Minister proposes to insert any provision as to that matter, but with respect to the elk, deer, caribou, moose, etc., the Indians go to meet these animals some time in the middle of August. In clause 8, paragraph a, it is provided that the birds and beasts mentioned may be lawfully hunted, taken or killed by Indians who are inhabitants of the country to which this Act applies. So there is nothing in that argument; they will not be affected by this bill when it becomes law. The paragraph goes on "and by other inhabitants of the said country;" so when you say the law shall not apply to the inhabitants of the country, then, as regards outsiders at any rate, you may make the law a little strict.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I take it for granted that those who had the fixing of these dates —the company that has been engaged in the killing of the animals for furs, &c., and food for 200 years—ought at least to know as much about it as we do, and I am quite willing to accept their suggestions under the circumstances. If they were to attempt to say to me at what period they should kill deer in Hastings County, Ontario, I should be inclined to dispute it, but I think the House might accept the suggestions of those who are really more interested in the preservation of those animals, than any other inhabitants of the Dominion. They make their money from it. They have to supply the Indians when they are out of food by advances which they have to make, and I take it for granted when they tell us that the game will be sufficiently protected by establishing a certain close season, that they know what they are talking about; otherwise there would be very little use in submitting the bill to them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If I understand the argument of the hon. leader, it is that the House is bound to accept the bill as it comes from the Hudson Bay Company. What is the object of submitting it to us if we have to take it as it comes? If it must pass as it comes from the Hudson Bay Company, then it is a solemn farce putting the bill through this House. My hon. friend read a memorandum which comes from the Hudson Bay Company. They give as a reason for allowing the killing of these animals in August, that at that time the Indians meet the caribou on the barren grounds; and I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that in a later section of the bill it is provided that this restriction shall not apply to Indians at all, so that the argument of the Hudson Bay Company's representative really amounts to nothing. We are dealing with the elk, moose, caribou, deer, mountain sheep and mountain goats. The paper which the hon. gentleman read refers to the caribou, and if the law does not apply to Indians at all, what is there in that argument that the Indians go to meet the caribou? If it is desirable to preserve these animals, then hunters from the United States and elsewhere should not be allowed to go in and slaughter them at the time of the year when they are very easily killed and when they are not allowed to be killed in any other part of the country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The conditions in that north-western country are very different from the conditions in the southern country. The caribou meet in large numbers, hundreds of thousands of them meet on the barren grounds during the summer time and fatten up very early. The Hudson Bay Company send out their trappers, half-breeds and Indians in order to collect these skins and possibly to make pemican of the flesh for winter use, and I daresay they are further prompted in that by their desire to secure as many hides as they possibly can during that season when the caribou are herded together. Later on, in the latter part of the months of August and September, they divide up into bands, and find their way south. Now that is a very different thing from providing protection for game in other countries where settlements exist in larger numbers; and I think that the hon. member for Halifax would realize these facts with regard to all our game that is so far north as that; our wild fowl prepare to leave those latitudes in the month of August, and are gradually flying south and passing through our neighbourhood in September and October. In the country where I reside there is a difference of a fortnight between the periods during which the game may be hunted; that is to say, the close season extends to the 1st September in Manitoba, but it extends only up to the 15th August in the North-west Territories, and they are next to us and extend over a greater field taking in Prince Albert and Edmonton. This bill, I understand, is for the purpose of protecting game to the north of Prince Albert and Edmonton, and those higher latitudes with which we are not so well acquainted, and I think the hon. gentleman from Halifax should take the view that these gentlemen who have advised the Government in this matter probably are better acquainted with it than we are ourselves. No one realizes the importance, more than I do, of affording ample protection to game of all kinds from wanton destruction either by the Indians or trappers, and this bill is the first step in the direction of exercising that lawful control in these isolated tracts of our country, which will no doubt need amendments from time to time as experience dictates to us the effect of its working.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The senior member for Halifax will not object, if I dissent from his reasoning and his logic. He lays down the principle that because he assumes this bill came from the Hudson Bay Company, therefore it is a farce if his suggestions are not accepted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentleman says if we are to take the bill as it is presented, then it becomes a farce. The bill is presented to the House for its approval upon the responsibility of the Government, after having sought the best possible information they could obtain. We are very glad to have any suggestions from the House which would tend to improve the bill and the best evidence that this is the spirit with which it is introduced is that the suggestions made by the hon. member from Lunenburg and the hon. member from Halifax have been accepted in reference to grouse, partridge and pheasants. It does not become a farce because the Government seeks to obtain the best possible information in the country in the framing of an Act which affects such a large portion of the Dominion, and which is intended to supply, the food of those whom we would have to support by feeding them as we are now doing in the North-west if this legislation were not adopted. I have given the reasons why this bill is introduced and the information upon which the Government have framed the clauses. I do not complain of any remarks the hon. gentleman may make. That is his province, but he must not fancy the bill is a farce because we do not accept every suggestion that he makes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think no better source could be applied to than the Hudson Bay Company for information of that character. I would be prepared to accept the information presented by the hon. leader of the House in regard to section 5, but it appears to me the very infirmity is contained in section 8, and that that is what is operating principally in the mind of my hon. friend from Halifax. I therefore would be prepared to accept the close season as mentioned in section 5.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not wish the language I used to be misapprehended. As I understood the hon. Minister, he said that the suggestions had come from the Hudson Bay Company, and the conclusion which he drew was that the House had nothing to do but accept them.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That was the impression which was left on my mind, and I said the natural consequence then is that if we are to accept what the Hudson Bay Company suggest, the submitting of the bill to the House is a farce, and I think that although the word "farce" is not a very parliamentary expression, and I regret that I should have used it, still it very nearly describes what I thought the performance was going to be.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I think that the Government deserve credit for introducing a bill of this character with reference to that country, because I have been impressed with the information I have received with regard to the enormous quantities of reindeer that exist particularly in that northern country, which will be subject, no doubt, in the future to indiscriminate slaughter unless something of this kind be provided. With regard to the close season named, I rather agree with the remarks made by the hon. member from Halifax. The Government have taken the best means to obtain information with regard to that, and therefore I do not suppose any suggestions of mine would be of any avail, but I rise more particularly to say that perhaps the difficulty could be overcome by putting a clause in leaving it open to the Governor in Council, on receiving further information at any time, to change the close season and thus in the future obviate the enactment of any amendment.

The clause was adopted.

On subsection g,

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Has anything happened to the swan that it is not necessary to require as long a period of protection? I think it should come under the same category as other wild fowl.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have no objection to that. I might add, for the information of the committee, that this bill has been framed after consultation with Mr. Ogilvie, who has been out in the North-west two or three years, and has given a very great deal of information in reference to the large quantity of deer, caribou and other animals there, and has, during the period he was in that country, studied the habits of these animals.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg is not quite right about this, because, I understand, the object is to allow the shooting of game of that sort when they are going north, so that the close season would cover the time when they are breeding, and the young are too small to be able to shift for themselves. If instead of the fifteenth August you would say the first September, that would be quite sufficient. The birds fly north in April and the beginning of May.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 8,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is there any reason why this should not be made to read "food purposes for Indians." I think the principal danger to-day arises from the indiscriminate slaughter of game by the Indians.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—What is covered by other inhabitants?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Settlers.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There are inhabitants of that country who live in the same manner as the Indians do, and you will see by the clause b that explorers, surveyors or travellers, are excluded from the operation of the clause. The object of the bill is to prevent, as far as possible, the indiscriminate slaughter of game for the purposes of mere pleasure or sport. All the inhabitants of the country to which the bill applies are practically dependent upon game for food, and exceptions are made and must be made in their favour. Numbers of parties engaged by the Hudson Bay Company are what may be termed half-breeds, and do not come under the category of Indians, but they live in the same manner and their habits are very much the same, and it is impossible to interfere with that class of people in that section of the country without endangering its peace.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is not objected to. What is objected to is that these parties should have a right at all seasons of the year to indiscriminately slaughter animals and birds. Subsection a is not limited to the slaughter of animals and birds for the purposes of food. That appears to be the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Quite true, and that latitude is given after a great deal of thought and consideration. You cannot deal with Indians and those who live as Indians do, in the same manner that you deal with what you might term civilized people. Hence, in framing a bill of this kind it is necessary to give as much latitude as possible, but at the same time make as many restrictions as you can for the preservation of game.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—This would apply very well to the preceding clause, but it surely cannot apply to mink, fisher, beaver, etc., which are useless except for their skins. You might as well say that everybody can kill those animals in and out of season. If the hon. gentleman wants to provide for that, why does he not exclude purely fur-bearing animals which are not articles of food in that country? If that clause is allowed to pass as it is, there is no use in the measure at all.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Sportsmen come to this country and employ Indians to slaughter animals. They might employ Indians simply for the purpose of securing the antlers and hides. That ought to be provided against.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Many difficulties must exist in framing a bill of this kind, and in criticising one may be speaking without proper knowledge of the subject. It is a question in which I take a good deal of interest. I presume the principle which underlies these subsections of clause 8 is just this —that in a country like our North-west the Indians and others who happen to be living there, depend entirely upon these animals and birds for food, and it is not desired to restrict them in any way from obtaining whatever they require for their support, but while there is that desire, the object of the bill would be to some extent to prevent either the Indians or other inhabitants from slaughtering the animals except for food. They would undoubtedly have the right under this clause to kill fur-bearing animals and possibly eat them too. It strikes me that the clause requires some little alteration, but I make the suggestion with all deference. because I am speaking perhaps in ignorance of the subject.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—The Indians are particular not to slaughter either fur-bearing animals or fowl only when they are prime, or when necessity compels them to slaughter them for food. The reason is that the hides are of no value during the close season. They know that, and consequently are prevented, by that knowledge, from slaughtering those valuable animals out of season. That of itself would prevent them killing those animals that are not prime.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—The inhabitants of that country must be much wiser than the people of this part of Canada, and they must be changing from what they were in the old time. I remember reading that in the olden times the Hudson Bay Company had to refuse large numbers of skins because the animals were killed out of season.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—You would surely let the Indians live, anyway.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If you inserted at the beginning of the paragraph "for food," it would meet the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The explanation given by the hon. gentleman from Selkirk is the reason why this clause is framed as it is. The Hudson Bay Company had very stringent laws for the preservation of these animals, and that has been necessitated by the very reasons given by the hon. gentleman from Terrebonne. They have laid down the principle of not buying furs taken out of season. They refuse absolutely, I am informed, to purchase furs of animals killed out of season, hence the Indians are sufficiently cunning not to kill them except when it is absolutely necessary for food for their own sustenance. It was deemed inadvisable, so far as they are concerned, and the class of people to whom I have referred who live in that country and have the same habits as the Indians. There would be some difficulty in carrying out even the provisions of the bill which are not as restrictive as we would like to see them, and in order to do so, the Hudson Bay Company's officials will have to be utilized in large portions of that country. For a small remuneration they will act on behalf of the Government, if we will give them the power to do so. I may also add, the Hudson Bay Company have agreed to carry out the provisions of this bill to the fullest possible extent, and have also informed the Government that for a very small remuneration to some of their officers they will accept the responsibility. Otherwise it would be impracticable to enforce the provisions of this measure, except by the expenditure of a large sum of money. I think that the committee had better let the clause pass as it is. In the meantime, I have made a note of the suggestions that have been made, and if at the third reading it should be considered advisable to accept them, I will be glad to do so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the hon. gentleman any information as to the number of sportsmen who yearly visit those un organized districts? My impression is that they are very few indeed. Most of them are old country people who usually make it a point to publish a book on their return home. They are extremely few and the difficulty of heretofore has arisen from the Indians and other inhabitants of the country indiscriminately slaughtering the animals and birds. My experience confirms what has been said by the hon. member from Terrebonne. The Indians in my section of the country kill indiscriminately in the close season. They slaughter with clubs and other weapons the birds and animals they come in contact with. The most destructive element we have in that country is the Indians themselves, and it is only with a desire to see this bill made as effective as possible that I have thrown out the suggestion that they should only be allowed to kill animals out of season for necessary food.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Are independent traders numerous in that country?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, and they would come under the designation of inhabitants.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—The Hudson Bay Company would not poach or do anything wrong, but the independent traders would secure the furs that the Hudson Bay Company would refuse, and they would employ the Indians to kill the animals out of season.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a large portion of the Peace River country in which there are other people besides the Hudson Bay Company's employees. The district of Athabasca also is very much frequented by people from the south, and this law is to apply to Keewatin in which region there are many strangers, people who are not employees of that company, and if it is made clear that the Indians and other inhabitants of the country can kill all they require for food, that is all they should expect. It has been stated by the hon. gentleman from Selkirk that the Indians do not kill the animals out of season, except what they require for food. If that be the case, there can be no objection to provide by law that they shall continue the practice which they have adopted. If the Indians do not make a practice of killing these animals out of season for their furs now, there can be no objection whatever to saying that their practice shall be the law.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I had the impression that this clause was too wide, but the assurance of the leader of the House that he would consider the suggestions I look upon as sufficient.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would it not be possible for those parties designated in subsection b to obtain a license? I can appreciate the position of surveyors and those performing governmental duties in that country. It appears to me that "travellers" is a very wide designation.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—That could be carried by expunging subsection a.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—That would leave it under subsections a and c.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Every sportsman could designate himself a "traveller."

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—He is permitted only to shoot for food. If he exceeds that, he is subject to a penalty. "Travellers," I think, would cover the class of gentlemen to whom the hon. member referred. There are many sportsmen who like to spend some months in travelling through, not merely the North-west Territories, but the unexplored portions of Canada, for the purpose of hunting and shooting. Their whole aim is to kill, and knowing that they cannot take out what they slaughter, they kill everything they come across, even when there is no market for it. The object of the bill is to prevent travellers going through that country from killing anything beyond that which is necessary for food. Under the regulations which the Governor in Council has the power to adopt, these licenses can be granted. They can be issued at certain periods of the year to other persons who may go into that country during the prohibited seasons.

The clause was adopted.

On the 15th clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct the attention of the Minister to a very probable abuse of the provisions of this clause. The intention is good but I do not think that the clause as worded will carry out the intention. It provides as follows:—

Every one who enters into any contract or agreement with, or employs any Indian, whether such Indian is an inhabitant of the country to which this Act applies or not, to hunt, kill or trap, contrary to the provisions of this Act, any of the beasts or birds mentioned in this Act, or to take, contrary to such provisions, any eggs, is guilty of an offence against this Act, and liable on summary conviction thereof to the same penalty as that, if any, incurred by any Indian so contracted or agreed with or employed by him.

Under section 8, the Indian is not liable to any penalty, and this man is only liable, on summary conviction, to the penalty that the Indian would incur. As the Indian is not liable to any, the employer of the Indian would not be liable to any either. The language of the clause should be changed.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This is a provision that meets the very cases to which the hon. gentleman referred a few moments ago when discussing clause 8—that is of employing Indians to violate the law. Here is the provision for the purpose of preventing that. I have no objection, however, to make the language clear if the committee think it necessary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend from Halifax is quite correct. The offence complained of is the offence committed by the Indians.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The Indians who shall be employed to do it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The employer is liable to the same penalty as the Indian. It should read that the employer is liable to the same penalty as if he himself had committed the offence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My suggestion is that this clause should be left over for consideration.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On the 17th clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause provides that the convicting officer may have the bird or animal for his own use. That is rather offering a temptation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Should he not account for the proceeds thereof to the Receiver General? He should account to somebody. For instance, there may be a confiscation of a very large amount of property.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—He cannot sell it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think he ought to make a return of the articles seized.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would furthermore point out this consideration, that many of the officers administering this Act will be largely irresponsible. There will be no possibility of appealing from their conviction or judgment, and no inducement should be held out to those parties by which they might connive at the commission of an offence for the purpose of making such a confiscation as is mentioned here.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—That would be a good suggestion, probably, if they were living in this part of the world. But supposing a musk-ox has been shot illegally, either the party who has committed the offence must be permitted to retain it for his own use, or it should go into the hands of the man who caught him in the act of violating the law, otherwise it would be allowed to spoil. The provision here is to prevent the sale or exportation of them. Hence there is no possibility of profit arising in that respect to the party other than that which would follow from the fact of his having a larger quantity of food.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I fully appreciate the difficulty of making any disposition of the property, but what I do object to is that there should be placed on the Statute-book anything which would encourage in the minds of officers the conniving at the commission of such an act. For instance, he might find in the possession of some one a very large number of skins worth a large amount of money. What I should like to see on the face of the bill is that he should be liable at any time to account for such property coming into his possession if it be not of a perishable nature.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This applies to a beast or bird or an egg and does not go beyond that. If an officer found a bale of furs, for instance, and confiscated them, I could see the force of the hon. gentleman's remark, but this only applies to the limited extent to which I have referred. In the distribution of penalties, particularly in a country like that, where there could be no possibility of disposing of the beast, bird or egg, except by eating it, or preserving it for food, I do not know that we could make a better disposition of it than this.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the hon. gentleman see any objection to the convicting officer making a record of the conviction and the disposal of the article?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No, I see no objection, and I have made a note for the purpose of considering it further.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It is very objectionable to give a convicting judge or magistrate a power of this kind. It will have the effect of bringing the judge into very bad odour with the people. If a seizure is made, no matter how trivial its value may be, the party from whom it is taken feels aggrieved, and if an article or an animal is appropriated to the judge's own use, the man will be convinced that the seizure has been made for the personal benefit of the officer and not in the public interest. It is very objectionable that any judge or justice of the peace should be allowed to appropriate property of this kind for his own use or benefit. It would be much better to have it burnt or destroyed and let the judge be above suspicion of having confiscated the article for his own use.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 19,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This provision is entirely inconsistent with one of the best established principles of jurisprudence, namely, that a man should not be presumed to be guilty until he is proved guilty, and especially is this the case as it is proposed to vest judicial authority in officers who by reason of great distance from centres of settlements are not practically subject to any court of appeal, but are empowered to bring offenders before them and have the alleged offender prove himself innocent before there is any evidence of guilt before the court.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I think the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman is, in the main, correct, but there are exceptions to it, which will be found in the customs regulations in all parts of the world. In all customs laws and inland revenue laws, exception is made in a case of this kind, for the reason that the person supposed to be guilty of infraction of the law is the only one who can give evidence of his innocence. The fact of the man having the prohibited bird or eggs in his possession should be prima facie evidence of guilt, and if he can show, either by his own oath or any other means, that he has obtained it without violating the law, he is the only one who could possibly do it. Take a traveller having one of the prohibited articles in his possession, which he should not have at that season of the year, he is the only person who can prove that he obtained it properly. Under the general principles of law, he would turn round and say to you: "Prove that I stole or killed this bird at an improper time of the year," and there would be nobody there to prove. I think it is a wise provision, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, and for the reasons I have given.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The argument of the hon. Minister is quite correct, as applied to clause 18, but it does not appear to me to apply to clause 19. I think there should be a prima facie case made out first, because in a country like that, where the men acting as magistrates will be largely irresponsible, and in some cases probably interested in the conviction, an opportunity is given for revenge under the guise of legal process, and that should not be encouraged.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why should not the laws of evidence which apply to the commission of all criminal offences be applicable in this case? If any one charged with the commission of an offence under this Act is caught in the act, or found in possession of the eggs or of any of the animals in question, of course there is a prima facie case made out immediately; the onus is upon him to prove his innocence. But supposing some game guardian or Hudson Bay officer should choose to lay a complaint against A. without a scintilla of evidence, then A. is at once subject to a criminal prosecution, and the onus is on him to establish his innocence.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I would not agree with what the hon. gentleman said about clause 18. I think that is the same as we have, or nearly so, for the preservation of oysters and salmon in the lower provinces. It seems to me clause 19 goes too far, and it would never do, because the person happens to be charged, that the proof of his innocence should be thrown upon him without any prima facie case.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—In the abstract the principle is obnoxious to all British subjects, but you will find a corresponding provision in very many Acts upon the Statute-book affecting the revenue and violation of laws where you have no means of obtaining evidence to convict except from the person himself. It is not confined exclusively to this measure, nor do I suppose it could have been placed in this bill were it not for the fact that if you had to rely exclusively upon the general laws you would scarcely ever get a conviction. I think it is a wise provision. I have seen very many cases of fraud in which it was utterly impossible to arrive at the facts unless you compelled the person who was accused to prove his innocence; otherwise the law would be an utter nullity. I do not hesitate to say that if that provision was not in the Customs Act and in the Inland Revenue Act, the law would scarcely be worth a snap of your finger; people might go on defrauding the revenue from year to year and never could be reached.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That only applies in the case of seizures where there is prima facie evidence.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No, it applies in cases where you suspect a man of smuggling, and where you have no evidence other than the fact of the belief that he has smuggled, from the face of the invoice which he may have presented, or that he may have in his store a much larger quantity of goods than would be inferred by the entries which he had made, and which he may have purchased in Canada, and not imported at all. In a country like the North-west, where the laws of evidence could scarcely apply, I think it is a wise provision, however obnoxious it may appear on the face of it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The customs laws and inland revenue laws are in operation in centres where there are courts of appeal, and where, if you imprison a man a habeas corpus could be obtained in a couple of hours. But if a man is arrested out on these barren lands, where there are no courts within his reach, he might serve the full term before there could be any communication with a judge.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—I readily understand if a man is in possession of an article which he should not have, or in a place where he has no right to be, that he should be compelled to explain. Take the case of a hunter or a traveller; his dog may get loose and run after game, and a zealous officer might come forward and make an accusation against him. That man will have to prove he is innocent and that he had no intention of violating the law, while the officer will say: "I have nothing to prove against you, I saw the dog running, you must prove you are not guilty." I can understand some cases where it would apply.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—How would it be possible to convict the traveller in the case to which the hon. gentleman refers, if the traveller had some hounds and set them on some buffalo and killed them? The officer comes and finds him there and he says, "Well I did not set the dogs on: they went themselves."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The present law of evidence would apply in that case and fasten a prima facie case upon him.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Where would you get the evidence if he were there unless you put him on oath?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The fact that his dogs ran after the animal would be a prima facie case against him.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—But the hon. gentleman says you should prove that he did it with the intention of killing the animal.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I must say I consider the language of that clause very broad. I think it would be better to defer the consideration of it, to see if one or two words could not be imported which would somewhat qualify it. I know in the customs law it is necessary to have some such analogous law as this. I think the clause is almost too wide.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 22,

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—In relation to clause 22 I venture to throw out the suggestion that perhaps it would be better, in the case of persons who travel in that part of the North-west, to make collections of birds or animals for scientific purposes, to provide that they shall furnish themselves with a certificate to that effect, signed by some one in authority outside of the territory, to show that they really are travelling for scientific purposes. This clause leaves it in the discretion of the game-guardian, who perhaps may not be always the very safest person to deal with it or the best judge as to the objects or qualifications of the traveller. I think it would be much better that persons going there with that object should obtain a certificate before entering the country rather than take the chance of afterwards getting permission from the guardian. I venture to suggest, for the consideration of the Minister, whether that would not be a safer provision. The last lines of the clause seem to me very wide, and if it were made obligatory upon any person avowedly going there for the purpose of collecting specimens, to obtain a certificate from some one in authority before they go there, it would be a very much safer plan.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The suggestion made by the hon. member from York is a good one, and I will allow that clause to stand to see if we could not compel parties who go in there to kill and obtain specimens, to have such certificates with them, and I take it for granted he would have to present it to the guardian, who would also have to be convinced before he would allow the killing of the animals or the taking of the eggs, that the certificates were not bogus. Whether it should be issued by the Secretary of State or the Department of Inland Revenue, or the officers in Manitoba, I do not know. I will consider that matter.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is this argument in favour of the contention of the hon. member from York. These game guardians would be gentlemen who are not particularly rich in this world's goods, and a man who wanted to violate the law going in would not hesitate to pay $10 or $20 and get permission probably to do what he chose. There is the possibility that bribery might be used; and that clause which you have just passed, clause 20, gives a very arbitrary power to the game guardians to cause a man to be arrested without any warrant. It does not provide that there shall be sufficient cause shown before the game guardian for the arrest. He should have some grounds for it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In connection with section 22, I understand that is to be considered; and I would suggest that it be provided that the applicant for such a permit should make a declaration before the game guardian that he is working in the interests of science. I would point out that there will possibly be game guardians in that country who may not have come in contact with the scientific world for some decades of years, and there will be trouble in ascertaining by such a person what constitutes science in this age. The Government should enact a provision compelling the applicant to make a declaration that he was in pursuit of a scientific object and not leave it with the game guardian to determine.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 26,

Hon. Mr. POWER—The suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Hopewell might come in here, that there might be a subclause added that the Governor in Council should, on being satisfied that the close season should be altered, have power to make the change.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I will note that.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.), from the committee, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

THE FILMAN DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN moved the adoption of the report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Filman Relief Bill. He said: There are no special circumstances in this case. The unfortunate woman deserted her husband, and committed adultery with the hired man, and the committee unanimously recommend the passing of the bill.

The report was adopted, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (CC) "An Act further to amend the Indian Act." He said: Section 1 of the bill repeals section 20 of the Act and substitutes a new section, the object of which is to extend the liberty of Indians in devising their property, and to provide a more complete law of devolution. Under the present law an Indian cannot devise either his real or personal property to other than a relative not farther removed than a second cousin and entitled to reside upon the reserve, and the will must be consented to by the band and approved by the Superintendent General. It is considered that an Indian should have the same rights as a white man in the devising of property, except land on a reserve: and therefore it is provided in the proposed bill that an Indian may bequeath his property of any kind in the same manner as other persons, except that no devise is to be made of land in a reserve or interest therein to any one not entitled to reside on such reserve. Objection was made by leading Indians to the provision in the present law requiring the consent of the band to a will. It was pointed out that no good purpose was served by the provision, and that it put a power in the hands of Indian councillors which could be greatly abused. The objection was well-grounded, for an Indian might make a very wise and strictly legal division of his property, and from some personal pique or interested motive a chief might succeed in having the required consent of the band withheld, and thus render the will void. The proposed law does not, therefore, provide for the will being submitted to the Indian band or council, but simply that it should be approved by the Superintendent General. As the law at present stands, if the Superintendent General did not wish to approve of any particular part of the will, he had to disapprove of the whole; but under the proposed law he may approve of a will generally and disallow any disposition made of land in a reserve or of any interest in such land. The main reason for providing that the will must be approved by the Superintendent General is to guard against land in a reserve being alienated, and to enable the department to keep track of the holdings in reserves. Subsection 1 of section 20 provides for the devising of property by Indians. Subsection 2 provides for the descent of property on the lines of the Ontario law. It is to take the place of subsection 4 of section 20 of the Act, which has been found to make very inadequate provision. It provides for the third of the property going to the widow, and the remainder going to the children in equal shares, but says nothing as to what is to be done with the third of the estate if there be no widow, or if the widow is not competent under the law to receive her portion; and under it grandchildren are cut off. The proposed law supplies these defects. The law as it stands provides that the widow, in order to be entitled to her share, must have been living with her husband at the time of his death. This is considered a very unfair provision, as a woman who would have been fully justified in leaving her husband, would be debarred from receiving her share of his property under it; and therefore in the proposed law it is simply stated that she must be a woman of good moral character. It is also made clear in the proposed law that the property which the widow may be given the right of occupying during her widowhood is only property on the reserve, and that property held by an Indian off the reserve, either real or personal, will devolve in the same manner as if the Indian were a white man. Subsection 3 of the proposed section 20 takes the place of subsection 5. Under the law as it stands, a widow must have been living with her husband at the time of his death in order to entitle her to the administration of his property. This is considered unfair, as a woman might, with good reason, not be living with her husband, and sufficient safeguard is afforded by the stipulation that she must be of good moral character. The only difference between the present and the proposed law is that the Superintendent General's approval is made necessary for the conveyance of the children's part of an estate to them when they pass from under the guardianship of their mother. This is to enable the department to keep track of an Indian's estate and of the disposition of land in reserve. Under the proposed law the right to share in the estate of an intestate Indian who leaves neither widow nor issue is restricted to his brothers, sisters and parents. Under the present devolution it extends to cousins, but as Indians use the term cousin in a very broad sense, it is found difficult, if not impossible, to clearly trace the relationship. It is open to question whether the law as it stands applies to women. To remove all doubt, provision is made to cover that point by subsection 5. Subsection 6 is the same in effect as the present subsection 7. Subsection 7 is the same as the present subsection 8. Subsection 8 is to replace the present subsection 9. Under the law as it stands, the Superintendent General is empowered to decide all questions respecting the distribution of an estate among those entitled, but it is not at all clear that he is empowered to decide who are entitled. The latter power is essential to the proper exercise of the former, and therefore it is expressly given to the Superintendent General in the proposed law. It is not clear under the law as it stands whether Indian wills can be entered for probate, although there are instances of wills having been so entered. It is thought that those interested in the estate of an Indian should have the option of obtaining probate. There are many wealthy Indians, and it is felt that the heirs of such Indians should have the security afforded by the courts in the different provinces clothed with power to enforce the carrying out of the provisions of wills, and the due administration of estates, the department not having machinery to provide efficiently for the administration of large estates. The object for providing that the consent of the Superintendent General must be had to the applying for probate is to prevent unimportant cases being subjected to an expensive system and to enable the department to keep track of such wills as go to probate. Section 2 of the bill substitutes a new section for section 21. The present law prohibits the occupying of any part of a reserve, but a trespasser does not become liable to a penalty until he returns after being notified to remove. Under the proposed section 21, every one who uses any part of a reserve without authority becomes liable to fine or imprisonment. It is found that the law as it stands is not effective in preventing the temporary use of part of a reserve. Indians and other persons come on a reserve quite prepared to leave when notified, but before being notified, they can do much harm, particularly in the west. Section 3 of the bill substitutes a new section for section 38 of the Act. Under the law as it stands, the department must obtain a surrender from a band before leasing, for the benefit of Indian children, if they happen to have guardians, land to which they are entitled and which they are unable to utilize. Nor can it without a surrender lease for the benefit of Indians engaged in occupations which preclude them from working the same, land to which they are entitled, unless the occupations come under the head of teaching school, practising one of the learned professions or engaging in a trade. It is not considered fair that a band should have it in its power to debar orphan children with guardians from deriving the benefit which they could derive without consulting the band from land to which they are entitled if they had not happened to have guardians. Nor is it considered fair to draw a line between the non-agricultural occupations which entitle Indians to have their lands leased for them without the consent of the band. The proposed law wipes out these objectionable distinctions. It also provides for land to which neglected children are entitled being leased for them without a surrender, as it is considered but fair that such children should have the same rights in the matter as orphans. Section 4 of the bill substitutes a new section for section 72. A case of peculiar hardship came under the notice of the department and led to the change embodied in the proposed section. An Indian, by his cruel treatment of his wife forced her to leave him. He was just as guilty, if not more guilty, than if he had deserted her; but under the law as it stands he could not, as in a case of desertion, be punished by having his interest money, etc., cut off and applied to his wife. The law has been changed so as to meet such cases. The amendment proposed to be made by section 5 of the bill to section 75 of the Act is necessitated by the fact that when a chief is now deposed under that section he can present himself as a candidate at the election to fill the vacancy caused by his deposition. A case in point occurred recently. An Indian leading a scandalous life was elected chief. Evidence was submitted and the department was asked to have him deposed. Immediately on his deposition he was re-elected. Similar complaints are now before the department against him, and they are only too well founded; but as the law stands he can be again immediately re-elected if we dispose him, so that deposition becomes almost a farce. The following amendment, therefore, proposes to put it in the power of the Governor in Council to disqualify for a term a chief who has to be deposed for misconduct. Section 6 of the bill adds a subsection to section 94 of the Act, the object of which is to give a broader application to that section which makes it an offence to give or sell liquor to an Indian. The meaning of "Indian" as defined by the interpretation clause of the Act is so restricted as to leave a broad way of escape, especially in the west, to parties who are guilty of selling liquor to men and women who are to all intents and purposes Indians, but who cannot be held to be "Indians" in the restricted sense given to the word for the purposes of the Indian Act. Section 7 of the bill substitutes a new section for section 99 of the Act. The first four lines of section 99 of the Act are considered superfluous. Under section 98 no order could be recognized except that of a clergyman or physician, and even then the burden of proof is on the accused. The latter part of the section makes it an offence punishable with fine or imprisonment for one found drunk or gambling in an Indian village or settlement after sunset to return after being notified to leave. This enactment has been found ineffective. It often happens that white men go on reserves on occasions of public gatherings with a bottle of whisky which they retail to the Indians. Then Indians and others come to gamble or have a spree. Notification to go off is of very little effect. What the agents require in order to effectively act in such cases is to be able to cause the immediate arrest of such parties. It is not expected that there will be many occasions of putting the proposed law in force, but it is believed that its enactment and promulgation will have a good effect. Section 8 of the bill substitutes a new section for section 117 of the Act. Subsection 1 of the proposed section is designed to give agents the powers which they had under the law as it stands, before the enactment of the Criminal Code. The part of the Code mentioned takes the place of the "Act respecting offences against public morals and public convenience," and the sections of the Code mentioned are sections which formed part of the Indian Act. Under the law as it stands, an Indian agent has magisterial jurisdiction which is practically unlimited as to territory. But in a case which arose, it was held by the court that agents should have more clearly defined jurisdiction as justices of the peace. The department has therefore adopted the practice of defining in the appointments of agents the territory over which they may exercise such jurisdiction, but it is always necessary to give an agent a much more extended jurisdiction as a justice than as an agent; and the wording of the latter part of subsection 1 is designed to make it clear that the two jurisdictions are not coterminous. A jurisdiction covering the counties adjacent to a reserve is found sufficient in old Canada; but so restricted a jurisdiction has been found to hamper agents in the west in their efforts to enforce law and order. Subsection 2 is therefore designed to remove the hampering restrictions. Section 9 of the bill substitutes a new section for section 132 of the Act. Originally every section under which a fine was imposable provided that it should be funded for the benefit of the Indians; but in amending the law from time to time this provision was frequently omitted. It has, therefore, been thought well to have such a general provision as is made in the first part of the proposed section. That part of the proposed section which permits the payment of fines to provincial or municipal authorities is the same in effect as the present section. The additional provisions contained in the last two lines of the proposed section is necessary in order to enable the department to act in cases of doubt which sometimes arise as to the band entitled to a fine. Though it was not intended to have that effect, section 134 of the Act has been held to prohibit the directors of industrial schools from selling to the Indians articles manufactured in the schools, and from procuring supplies from them. Serious inconvenience and loss is consequently caused the schools, and the department has been appealed to for relief. The amendment proposed to be made by section 10 of the bill is designed to remove all occasion of complaint by putting it in the power of the Superintendent General to grant licenses to trade to the classes prohibited from trading with Indians under subsection 1 of section 134. Section 11 of the bill adds three new sections to the Act, viz., 137, 138 and 139. Sections 137 and 138 are designed to give power to the Governor in Council to make regulations with a view to a more general extension of the benefits of education among the Indians. The former provides for the making of regulations by the Governor in Councl for the compulsory attendance of Indian children at school as ordinary day pupils; and the latter for the committal to industrial schools of Indian children who by reason of neglect, are growing up in ignorance, and are deprived of the advantages of proper home surroundings. As it is not considered that all Indians of Canada are in a position to admit of such regulations as are contemplated by these sections being generally applied it is thought better to provide for their being made by Order in Council as occasion demands, rather than by an Act of Parliament. There is no reason why regulations similar to the laws of some of the provinces respecting compulsory education and the care of neglected white children should not with great advantage be applied to very many Indian bands. At present it is found very difficult to secure the regular attendance of children at day school on reserves on account of the carelessness of parents and their lack of interest in education. Great difficulty too is often experienced in keeping children in industrial schools. Just as a child is in a fair way of acquiring a trade and being equipped as a self-supporting citizen the parents may come and demand him, and the directors of the school have no authority to ignore the demand, though they be well aware that the parents will undo whatever good has been done. Section 139 is intended to remove doubt as to whether the capital moneys, or part thereof, at the credit of a band can be expended even with the consent of the band and the authority of the Governor in Council. The department has with such consent and authority been expending capital for works of a permanent nature; but the point, it appears from the records of the departmant, was taken in Council that the Governor in Council had no legal authority for sanctioning such payments. Provision has been made to cover this point. As the House knows, all the Indian tribes are treated as wards by the Government, and it has been found necessary, after a long experience, that the Act should be amended in order to give more liberty to certain classes of Indians and to preserve to the fullest possible extent their property in the reserves and make provision for the better training of their children, and, so far as possible, to repress the immorality of the grown up people.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Do I understand my hon. friend to say that no Indian will shall be valid unless the Superintendent General shall assent to it?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No will is valid under the law as it now exists unless it is approved by the Indian council and by the Superintendent General; but if the Superintendent General had objections to any portion of the will he would have to reject the whole.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The bill implies that the Indian, when he dies, leaves only one widow. The Indians in my part of the country are unselfish and leave several.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Can an Indian devise or bequeath any property or land outside of the reserve?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The intention is to allow an Indian, who owns property outside of the reserve, to dispose of it as he thinks proper without the permission of anybody, but the land within the reserve he cannot devise otherwise than as provided by law.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

THE COMMISSION ON PROHIBITION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to know whether the report of the Royal Commission, appointed some two years ago to inquire into matters pertaining to prohibitory legislation, has been made to the Government, and if so when we may expect to have it.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There has been a partial report, I believe, but I am not able to answer the hon. gentleman as fully as I should like to do. If he will kindly put the question to-morrow I hope to be able to give a more definite reply.

THE COMMUTATION OF THE DEATH SENTENCE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I would remind the leader of the Government in this House of the order that was issued a month ago for a return of all communications in respect to the commutation of the death sentence of two Indians in British Columbia. I should like to know when the return will be brought down. I reminded the leader of the Government some 10 or 12 days ago that I had not yet received it, and I have heard nothing more on the subject since.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have made inquiries and can only say that the return will be brought down as soon as it is finished. It has not been given to me yet to be laid on the table. The return is being prepared in the Departments of the Secretary of State and Justice. The reply to my inquiry was that they would prepare the return.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It cannot be a very voluminous return.

THIRD READING.

Bill (V) "An Act further to amend the Insurance Act."—(Mr. Angers.)

TRIAL OF YOUTHFUL OFFENDERS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (Y) "An Act respecting the arrest, trial and imprisonment of Youthful Offenders."

(In the Committee.)

On the first clause,

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—At the suggestion of the Minister of Agriculture, I propose to amend this clause so as to make the age correspond with that mentioned in the section of the Criminal Code which is to be amended by this bill. I move that the word "sixteen" be substituted for the word "seventeen" in the clause.

The amendment was agreed to and clause as amended was adopted.

On the second clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the latter portion of the clause, there might be some modification of the language. In a great many places there is only the one building in which persons about to undergo trial can be confined, and I think that these last lines go too far. As long as the juvenile accused is kept in custody separate from older persons and all persons undergoing sentence of imprisonment, that is sufficient. I do not think we should undertake to impose on the municipalities the expense of putting up separate buildings for juvenile offenders.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—With regard to that I should have no objection myself that the clause should read "and shall not be confined in the lock-ups or police cells used for older persons," but what I want is this: that if the House concurs in the provisions of this bill and it subsequently passes the Commons and becomes law, it really shall be carried out honestly and bona fide. I should be sorry, indeed, if this legislation should end in the letter of the law only being complied with while the spirit of the law is set aside altogether. My object is that these young offenders shall be kept entirely separate and shall not come in contact with older criminals or have the opportunity of conversing with them, or being in their company in any way, and if it is thought there will be such very great difficulty in providing separate buildings as places of confinement for them, I have no objection to have that word "stations" altered to "police cells."

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I would suggest that the taking out of the words "used for" and substituting the word "with" would meet the case.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Yes, that would be better and will answer my purpose as well of keeping juvenile offenders separate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the 35th line the word "for" should be struck out and "with" substituted.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On the 4th clause,

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—This clause deals with another class, children of a tender age, that is, boys under 12 and girls under 13. I may explain that the reason why this clause and the subsequent ones in the sub-section are made to apply only to Ontario is that at present it is only in Ontario that the machinery exists now for carrying out these clauses. I hope that we may see these children aid societies duly organized and appointed under the Lieutenant Governors of the different provinces. I am quite sure that the experience of the enormous amount of good that in a very short time the children's aid societies in Ontario have effected, will be sufficient inducement for our friends in the other provinces to establish the same organizations, but at present it is only in Ontario that the necessary machinery exists for carrying out the provisions of these clauses.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—My hon. friend is mistaken. In Montreal we have a society for the protection of women and children which has the same object exactly and will cover that ground, I do not see that it should be confined to the province of Ontario, but it might not be applicable to other parts of the country where there is not the requisite machinery.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I may answer hon. gentlemen as to that. I am glad to hear that there is such a society in Montreal, but I ought to explain that it is under a special Act of the Ontario Legislature, called "An Act for the protection of Children," that the necessary machinery is given for making use of these children's aid societies, and that is the reason why, for the present, I have made it apply only to Ontario. I move that in line 9 the word "shall" be substituted for "may."

The clause, as amended, was adopted.

On sub-clause (a),

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I desire to add to sub-clause (a) "or place the child out in some approved foster home." I may explain that one of the best features of the Children's Aid Society in Ontario is the authority given to the officer of the aid society to place out children committed to their charge in certain foster homes, so that the family tie, and the wholesome influences that go with it, shall not be broken in the same way as when you place a child in some charitable institution, where it is only one of fifty or sixty others, and where the influences of a home are all lost. I think that is one of the very best features in that Act, and I desire, therefore, to give power not only to bind out the child to any one until it becomes of that age, but also, if it is thought desirable, to place it in an approved foster home.

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—As to sub-clause (b), power is given to bind the child out till it attains the age of 21. I would ask the hon. mover of this bill if that is not too long. In the Home with which I have been associated for the last fifteen years, we found that in the case of girls the period of 17 or 18 years was probably the outside, and of boys the age of 19. You cannot hold a lad very well after he has attained the age of 21 years if he has average energy and ability. He will be desirous of striking out for himself before that time.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The hon. gentleman will observe that it is not compulsory that he should be bound out for that term. It can be done for any less age. In the great majority of cases the children will be placed in foster homes, very much I think to the child's advantage, and I should not like to have the clause imperative that a child should be bound out till he is 21 years of age. The clause leaves it in such a way that the child can be bound out for any less period. Twenty-one years is the extreme limit.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments which were concurred in.

THE DILLON DIVORCE CASE.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being read,

Consideration of the fourteenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce re Dillon Relief Bill.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN said: I find for some unaccountable reason the evidence was not distributed until late last night. Under these circumstances, I could not ask hon. gentlemen to pass on this case, especially as it involves questions of a large character that may affect other cases similarly circumstanced. There is good cause to complain (and I hope the hon. leader of this House will note what I say) of the gross delay that has occurred. I took a great deal of trouble to have the papers prepared and sent off as rapidly as possible to the printers. The proofs in this case were sent to the printer on Monday last, and one would have thought there was ample time to distribute the printed copies of the evidence the same night or the following day. I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and that this report be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Order of the Day being read,

Consideration of the minority report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Dillon Relief Bill.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and that the consideration of the report be fixed for Tuesday next. He said: I presume by Tuesday next the two items can be taken up as the one report.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I was surprised to see that those two reports formed two Orders of the Day. They are one and the same thing. They may differ in the conclusions arrived at, but they are on the same subject, so I should think that they should be considered together. Otherwise the objection may be raised that if we refer to the minority report we allude to another item and that it is not the proper time to do so. The two reports cannot be discussed unless they are taken up together. I hope it will be understood that the two items will come up together for discussion.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Would it not be better to suggest that it be made the first Order of the Day? (Cries of No, no.) It is very likely to take up the whole afternoon.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (32) "An Act respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company."

WINDSOR AND ANNAPOLIS RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of the Bill (50) "An Act to authorize the purchase of the Yarmouth and Annapolis Railway by the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, Limited, and to change the name of the latter Company to the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company." He said: The Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company own the line from Windsor to Annapolis in the province of Nova Scotia, and they operate the line from Windsor to Halifax; so that they operate a railway from Halifax to Annapolis. The Yarmouth and Annapolis Railway extends from Annapolis to Yarmouth, and arrangements have been made between the two companies for the purchase of the Yarmouth and Annapolis Railway by the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company which will then operate the whole line from Halifax to Yarmouth. This bill is to legalize the sale.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

TRADE COMBINES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté) moved the second reading of Bill (AA) "An Act to amend the law relating to conspiracies and combinations formed in restraint of trade." He said: This is no new bill in this House, and I rise with a good deal of diffidence to approach the subject, feeling as I do that there are a number of gentlemen in this House who have discussed this matter twice already. I know there are some hon. members who never heard it discussed in the Senate, and as I believe it is a bill which is demanded by the country, I have taken the liberty of introducing it, and I must claim your indulgence for a short time while I try to make out a case. No doubt every one in this House is aware that in 1888 a committee was appointed by the House of Commons to take evidence upon the question of combines. That committee sat for a great part of the session and introduced a bill which did not get as far as this House that year. In 1889 a bill was introduced in the House of Commons, passed through all its stages without a division and was sent to the Senate where it was amended—impaired, I should say, in my opinion. The House of Commons believing that such a bill was necessary passed the same bill the next session without a division and it was sent to this House where it received the same consideration and was impaired as the bill of the former session had been. I do not think that any action of this House has brought so much discredit and severe comment on the Senate as the amendment of the Combines Bill. Wherever you went you met with this charge against the Senate. This House has done a great deal of good work—more good work than the people of the country generally believe. Its deliberations are quiet and orderly and to the point. They do not have to speak to the country, because newspaper reporters are not here to take down the debates and when they do make reports of our proceedings, their criticisms upon it are very severe. Only a day or two ago I saw in a Toronto paper that Mr. Eddy, a gentleman living in Hull, was to be appointed to the Senate. The paper said if it was any honour to receive the appointment that he was as good a man to have it as any.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think it was a Tory paper that said that.

Hon. Mr. READ—I do not know whether it was or not, but I saw it in a paper. We do not find a Tory paper even giving us a good word. The criticisms seem to me to be so severe that this House should be very careful what they do. It is well to let the country know what the Senate is doing. I have tabulated some of its proceedings for quite a length of time. It will not take long to read it and it will appear in our Debates if it goes no further. I will read a list of Government bills introduced and amended in the Senate for a number of years.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—And impaired.

Hon. Mr. READ—I do not say impaired. I say the Senate has done good work, but we may make mistakes. When this bill that I am talking about was under discussion, the argument was used, try it and if it does not work well we can amend it. We have had five years' trial of the Combines Act and the best lawyers in the country will tell you that they cannot advise their clients to bring an action under it. One eminent lawyer, who appears before the Senate Committees every day, says: "I cannot advise a client to bring an action under the Combines Act." That is sufficient reason for me to introduce this bill to amend the Act. As I have said, I thought it well to prepare a statement of the government bills which have been amended in this House and have been accepted as amended by the House of Commons. The statement is as follows:—

It appears when the Liberals were in power they had not so many bills to amend.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was because they were so good.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Perhaps they were past curing.

Hon. Mr. READ—Then I have got a list of the private bills sent up from the House of Commons and amended in the Senate and the amendments to which were accepted by the House of Commons. It is as follows:

There is quite an array of business that has been transacted by this House and no doubt most of it very well done. Consequently, the Senate is doing an important work—there is no doubt about it, but the press, as I said before, criticise it very severely. I will mention some important matters in the recollection of hon. gentlemen here. This House has interfered materially with Government bills. I remember the bill respecting the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway, which the Senate in its wisdom threw out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And passed afterwards.

Hon. Mr. READ—Yes, a long time afterwards, and under very different conditions. Another Government bill which the Senate rejected was that relating to the Short Line Railway. We did get a little credit in the country for that. It is supposed generally that the Government controls this House. I very much doubt it, because the members of the Senate are independent. That Short Line would have cost this country, the Government said, two or three millions of dollars. We know what that means—it means something more like four millions of dollars. We threw out that Government measure, and that occurred only four or five years ago. As I have said, we got a little credit from the press for that. Events have proved that we were right, because the Government never thought proper to introduce it in this chamber again. In the interest of the country I want this bill amended. I believe from all that I can gather that there are combines which are detrimental to the best interests of the country—combines affecting materially the country's progress. One of them to which I will call attention is what is described in the circular as a combine of the steamboat companies in Montreal in the carrying of cattle to Europe. We have only to look back for a few years to see how the country has grown and if this circular is correct it is necessary that we should try to remedy a growing evil. This cattle trade, like the cheese trade within the last few years, has grown very much. In 1877 we only exported 6,000 cattle. A very few years later we exported 120,000 head of cattle. Now with the sort of cattle we ship to Europe, valued at from $60 to $80 each, we are dealing with a trade the future proportions of which we can hardly estimate. However, the export has been decreasing during the last three or four years, and it is down now to about 80,000 head. I do not say that it is all the fault of the shippers or the shipowners. We know that the scheduling of cattle in England has had a serious effect on the trade. There is one matter, perhaps, which would escape the notice of some hon. gentlemen—the scheduling of cattle prevents a certain class of being sent at all, that is milch cows. We will admit that perhaps we send away the goose that lays the golden egg, but when people are offered $50 or $60 for a good cow they are inclined to take the money and look pleasant. That class of cattle when they are scheduled cannot be sent at all because they are of no use. This circular to which I have referred says that $75,000,000 have been brought to this country through that cattle export trade. What does the circular say? It says:

As a rule shippers do not know the rates they are to pay until the cattle have been purchased, brought to Montreal and loaded and the vessel is ready to sail. In some cases the rate is fixed after the ship has sailed and the cattle on board. In securing space shippers at times have to agree to pay whatever are the going rates. This means whatever the agents of the vessel owners combine upon when the shippers are in their power.

Now there would be none of this if they had free handling. It is true that a tramp vessel may get cattle, but when steamship companies can meet as quickly as a telephone will bring them together at a certain point and agree on the rates of the day it is easily done. Why is the cattle trade treated in this exceptional manner? For butter, cheese and eggs and everything else you get your price, but cattle must go to Montreal. They cannot go any place else, and vessel owners know it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Why not go to Halifax?

Hon. Mr. READ—Well they might go to Halifax at some seasons, but they must go to Montreal, because that is the shipping port. Now why should there not be competition in that trade as well as in anything else? Suppose the vessel owners were to say to the cheese-makers, "We will give you a price the day we get the cheese on board." The cheese-makers would say to them, "We will not do that; we will send it to New York." But we cannot do that with cattle because there is a quarantine of three months. The result is that feeders have been losing money. I do not say it is all the fault of the shippers, but the distillers are only this year feeding 27 per cent of the usual number of cattle. Now the feeding of cattle is one of the profits of the distillers. They get from $4 to $5 for the refuse of each beast they feed, without any expense or trouble to themselves or any outlay.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Why is it that the distillers in Canada charge $1.10 for the same goods that can be purchased in New York for 50 cents?

Hon. Mr. READ—That is another question which we will have to take up some other time. We cannot go through that now. There is a heavy duty.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—No duty at all.

Hon. Mr. READ—I have the best information that where the distillers formerly fed ten to twelve thousand head, this year they are only feeding 27 per cent of that number; consequently the trade is seriously depressed in that direction. No doubt the low price in England somewhat accounts for it. Another complaint is that there are steamship companies that tell these shippers that they must insure in the company which they name. They do not allow them to take their own risks. If a man has a thousand or five hundred head of cattle, they say to him, "you must insure in the company we name." They do not all say that, but in many cases it is the fact; and these people feel it a grievance which they ask Parliament to remedy. I am proposing a remedy which I think would deter them somewhat, and I do not know of any other remedy that I could suggest. This circular also adds:

In these and other ways the whole export trade of Canada is now paralysed by one of the hugest combinations in Canada.

Now these are not the men so seriously affected as you would imagine. The man who is affected most is the producer. These men are mostly traders. They are going to ship their cattle upon such terms as will enable them to get out safely, and it is the producer who is suffering in this instance, according to my opinion. It is the duty of Parliament to look into this matter, because a trade that is so enormous in its proportions demands attention. I do not know whether this bill will have that effect, but I think it will.

There is not an individual in Canada who is not interested in these combinations. Look at the insurance companies, how alive they are about this bill. Every man that is insured is interested ; otherwise the companies would not be making quite such a stir about it. They do not want it ; they want this little combination by which they can charge what they please. One of the worst combinations is the undertakers'. If you read their constitution you will see how you are situated. I have a letter from a gentleman, the Rev Mr. Nichols. He was in my room the other day, and I was speaking about the undertakers. "Well," he said, "I could give you a case which came under my notice and which I know about." A man was a member of a benefit society and died. The undertaker was treasurer of that benefit society. The man's wife was entitled to one hundred dollars, and he said he saw the undertaker take $97 of the amount and give the widow the remainder $3. That might be all right, but the poor woman did not get much ; the undertaker got the best of it. A case occurred in Ottawa since we have been here. A poor man died, and his mother, I think it was, was not able to bury him.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—His mother-in-law.

Hon. Mr. READ—Oh no, his mother. She was not able to bury him. Some kind Samaritan took upon himself to collect a little money, and he called upon me for one and I had a little bit of silver in my pocket which I gave. He did not want much ; because the expenses had not been very great. I said "how is that?" He said "I got it done with a very little, and I do not want much of you—half a dollar or a dollar or something." That roused my curiosity and I said "now I will hear about this. How do you manage it?" "Well," he said, "there was a man there that belonged to a burial society in England and he said he was a carpenter, and would make the coffin. He got the material and made the coffin and got some lining for it and went to a hardware store and managed to get something that would do." I cannot do better than to read his letter, which he gave me :—

SIR,—I am glad to see that you have introduced a bill into the Senate to remove the present ambiguity which exists as to what constitutes an actionable conspiracy or combination formed in restraint of trade.

There is one conspiracy—for that is the mildest term that can be applied to it, which is peculiarly oppressive—that of the undertakers. We all know what it is to lose some of our near and dear ones. To lay them in the ground with as much reverence and respect as possible becomes a paramount duty and little is thought of expense—very often most unwisely. This not unnatural feeling has been taken advantage of and it is on record that the undertakers have formed a ring and under its cover ; are extortionate and veritable Shylocks.

Sworn evidence is on the records of the House of Commons that the coffins for which $75 are charged in the bill are only at cost $12.50 each and so all along the line a similar system of imposition goes on.

But there is more than that. The ring is so compact, and the conspiracy so well organized, that no person who does not bow the knee to this gloomy Baal of the grave can purchase what are called "supplies" that is the material required in the manufacture of the coffin.

A case in which this was brought conspicuously under my own notice occurred not long ago. The son of a poor person died, and she was not able to incur the expense of the funeral herself. A carpenter, who had been connected with what are know in England as Burial Guilds—associations I am told very numerous in Church of England parishes—said he would make a coffin on the ecclesiastical pattern he was used to. This differs from the ordinary coffin in some respect, being of an antique style, the sides being straight and tapering towards the feet and the lid coped. In the case I refer to I may mention that the carpenter in question helped to make the plain coffin—almost, he said, similar to the one I refer to—in which the late Duke of Westminster was buried—to the great disgust of the London undertaking fraternity. The cost was very small, merely the wood, some skilful use of saw, plain and hammer, and some hot oil. Then came the fittings and when application was made for a few handles and a plate, the friendly carpenter was told that he would not be permitted to purchase them under any conditions. More than that he was jeered at and his work derided. But being of a determined disposition he simply went to a dry goods store and obtained some cheap material for lining, and at a hardware store picked out some handles which answered all purposes and were quite as handsome as the cheap and nasty gewgaws with which the professional undertaker adorns the coffins sent out with the sanction of the conspiracy.

But this was not all.

No bearer could be obtained. The ring would not permit it. But this did not matter very much as the cemetery was not a great distance from the cottage where the death occurred, and at seven in the morning, kind hands and willing hearts bore the body to the church—the deceased was a Roman Catholic—and thence to the cemetery. Only a few days ago it was taken from the vault and buried. The whole cost amounted to some $16, including the grave. This is a method of getting round the combine, but of course such a case cannot be generally imitated. But surely the opposition to the carpenter who was willing to act as undertaker was a piece of tyranny not to be tolerated in a civilized country. Your bill, as projected, if it brings the like within striking distance of the law, will be a public benefaction.

At the same time, I may add that if the undertakers' combination continues, it would not be amiss if the various churches organized funeral guilds on the English model. Patterns of the material needed could be obtained and the rest would be easy. I note that "Funeral reform" is one of the questions of the day in the mother land, and that simplicity and absence of ostentation is being made the general practice.

I had a little experience myself this winter. A lad of about twelve died and the family thought they had some claim on me, or I had assisted them, because while they were being assisted by the corporation and other charitable people, the father was sick and an invalid, and the family were all sickly. I was coming out of church, and the brother-in-law met me and said: "Willie died last night." "Well," I said, "I did not expect he would live when I was there a few days ago." "Well," he said, "What are we going to do about burying?" I said, "I do not know. What have you done?" He said, "I have been all around and cannot get him taken to the morgue for less than $25." "Well," I said, "that is a very extravagant price; cannot you do better than that?" He said, "No, they say that is the lowest price, they will take no less." I said, "How can they make it that much?" He said, "Well, its $5 for laying him out." I said, "You can lay him out yourself." "Oh, well," he said, "they charge that anyway." I do not know whether that amount was paid, but that was what he said to me. These, amongst other things, show the necessity of something being enacted as a sort of intimidation, and when we are told that under the law, as amended in this House, the best lawyers in the country will not advise their clients to bring an action, is it not our duty to amend the Act? We have impaired it. The House of Commons in its wisdom has twice passed the Act without division, and they certainly know what the feeling of the country is. I only ask you to strike out two or three words from the Act: it is a very little thing to do. It will restore the Act to the condition in which it passed the House of Commons and will be satisfactory to the country, and the House will get credit for the legislation.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—The arguments of the hon. gentleman are so strong against burial that I think in future all bodies should be cremated.

The motion was agreed to and the bill read the second time.

PRESERVATION OF GAME IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of Bill (Z) "An Act for the preservation of game in certain parts of the North-west Territories of Canada."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—When the bill was last before the committee we changed the title of it, at the suggestion of the hon. member from Halifax, to read "The Territories Game Preservation Act." I find that this name would conflict with a measure of a similar character passed by the North-west Council. I would therefore suggest that it be called "The Unorganized Territories Game Preservation Act."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think this is a decided improvement upon the name that I suggested.

The clause was amended accordingly and adopted.

On the 15th clause,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This clause was allowed to stand on account of ambiguity in the wording. I move that the 15th clause be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor, to form clause 12 of the bill:

Any one who shall enter into any contract or agreement with or employ any Indian or other person whether such Indian or person is an inhabitant of the country to which this Act applies or not, to hunt, kill or take, contrary to the provisions of this Act, any of the beasts or birds mentioned in this Act, or to take contrary to such provisions any eggs, &c.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The clause as now presented to the committee is better than before, but there is still some little question about it, because the penalty is imposed if you employ the Indian to do this contrary to the provisions of the Act. Under clause 8 it is not contrary to the provisions of the Act for an Indian to do these things.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—A close reading of the bill will show that a person who employs an Indian to do anything of the kind is as guilty as if he had done it himself. I drew attention to that very point, and it was thought that this new clause met the objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

On clause five,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have prepared a special clause which will give the Governor in Council a right by Order in Council to change the different dates for the close season. It has been suggested further, and it is worthy of consideration, that this law being placed on the Statute-book and being the only source of information for the people of that country, it would be inexpedient to give the Governor in Council power to change any of these dates lest the parties having the Act in their possession might not obtain the Order in Council changing the dates, and therefore might unwittingly violate the law.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—Still the Governor in Council would give due notice.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The Governor in Council might give due notice that the change would take effect the following season. I move the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to and the clause as amended was adopted.

On the 19th clause,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If the clause is to remain, I would suggest that the words "on reasonable suspicion" be inserted after the word "charge" in the first line.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it better to strike that clause out altogether.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I made inquiry with reference to this clause and the fear of the department is that unless you throw the onus of proving his innocence on thè party charged, it would be impossible to carry out the law, owing to the difficulty of obtaining witnesses, and various other reasons of a like character, in a country like the North-west Territories. In legislating for such a country you have to take extraordinary powers to make the law at all effective. I move that the words which I have read be added.

The amendment was agreed to and the clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 22,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—At the suggestion of the hon. member from York, this clause was allowed to stand on the ground that the game guardian would not be a proper person to judge of the character of a man or his scientific knowledge. Acting on this suggestion, I propose the following amendment: Strike out the words "any game guardian" and insert "the Minister of the Interior or any officer or person duly authorized by him may issue a permit to any person, &c." Then I propose to add "except buffalo or bison" after the words "beasts or birds." The object is to prevent even scientists killing these animals before 1899. I think that will improve the clause.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The Act is wide enough to drive a coach and four through. If a resident of that country, entitled a game guardian, has power to issue a permit for scientific or other useful purposes the Act will be of very little use. Under the eighth clause a person in these territories may kill beasts and birds for food, and if you add to this the power to give permission to kill them for scientific and other useful purposes—or purposes which the game guardian may consider useful—you open the door to indiscriminate slaughter.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I move that the words "or other useful" be struck out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Considering that those permits are to be issued only by the Department of the Interior it would be better on the whole not to strike out the words "or for other useful purposes." The department might require those animals themselves for other than scientific purposes. I do not think you can call taxidermy a science altogether, and those animals might be required to be stuffed as specimens not necessarily for scientific purposes.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Certainly that would be for scientific purposes.

The amendment was agreed to and the clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I think that clause 19 should be struck out altogether. It is a wrong principle to oblige a man to establish his innocence. It may be difficult—in fact utterly impossible—for him to establish his innocence.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—It is a very dangerous thing to interfere with the law of evidence which has been in existence for hundreds of years.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This is the principle of the criminal law as it stands already in relation to certain offences against the Crown. I referred to this question before and showed how necessary it is in enforcing the revenue laws. There are some violations of the laws, which can only be dealt with in that way. Whether it is quite necessary to admit the principle in this act or not, I am not prepared to say, but those who framed the bill thought it was necessary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. Minister's natural love of liberty has suffered seriously from his long administration as Minister of Customs. He had to deal in a great many cases with people who were trying to defraud. I put this case to the Minister: under the Summary Convictions Act it is not necessary that the accused should be present. If he is served with a summons commanding him to appear and he does appear, he can testify on his own behalf. If he does not happen to appear he may be convicted in his absence although there is no evidence submitted at all. The fact that a charge has been made and a process issued insures his conviction if he does not appear and prove the negative.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It seems to me the hon. Minister should make a distinction between the laws governing the customs and the laws governing the poor man who is up in the northern part of the country in an unorganized territory and accused of killing a poor bird. I think the instance quoted by the hon. gentleman is not analogous.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Supposing a traveller or hunter be found with a buffalo in his possession.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is evidence of guilt which would throw on him the onus of establishing his innocence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is provided for by the preceding section.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I know it is prima facie evidence of guilt, but that will not convict a man.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, it will.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The onus of proof is at once shifted.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Supposing he had a bird or a buffalo in his possession and he was accused of having killed it, he would simply say: "You must prove I killed it." How are you going to prove it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—You would say that under the preceding section of this Act possession is prima facie evidence that the accused has broken the law and he has to remove that presumption.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Supposing a man in the month of August goes out in the North-west with his rifles and ammunition to shoot and is accused of having in that season been hunting musk ox; how will he prove that he was not hunting musk ox? He cannot prove it if there is a musk ox in the neighbourhood. An officious guardian will claim that he has been hunting musk ox. He has the right to hunt elk, deer and other game. How can that man prove his innocence if an over zealous officer makes an accusation against him? You provide that that man will be obliged to prove he is not hunting musk oxen. He may say "I have been hunting caribou," and the guardians will say to him: "There are musk oxen in the same country and you have been hunting them." He cannot prove anything at all. The fact of the season being open for one month does not prove anything.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—There is quite a difference between this case and the customs law, because in the latter case the party accused has invoices and is in a position to prove by his invoice and former entries whether he has made a proper entry of all the goods that his warehouse contains. In this case there might possibly be considerable oppression exercised by the officials. I admit the difficulty in both views of it, because it is very important to be strict, but certainly it is quite possible that cases may arise where parties may be accused of having violated this law who should not be charged with it at all, and there might be cases in which it would be impossible to prove the negative.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The suppositious case put by my hon. friend from Terrebonne is covered by the 18th section. It does not say you may accuse a man who did such and such a thing, but the crime is having in his possession a buffalo or a bison, dead or alive, during the close season mentioned in the Act. It is then for him to say how he got it.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—No, there are two clauses; one is with reference to killing, hunting, &c., and the other is having the beast in his possession. He cannot in that case contend that he has not got the animal, because it is there in his possession; but the question is on the 5th clause, with reference to hunting musk oxen at certain seasons. A vindictive official might say a man was hunting musk oxen out of season.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The clause covers all cases and is as broad as it can be made. It not only relates to possession but to all offences where a man is charged with contravention of this Act. The case cited by the leader of the House is not applicable; it is one which would be met by the present law of evidence, because the best evidence possible against an offender is the fact of his having possession of the article in question. He is caught red-handed, practically, and if he swears he did not kill the animal the justice of the peace is not bound to believe him; he can exercise his discretion as to whether that man is telling the truth or not and he can fine him. Possession of the animal is certainly almost the best evidence obtainable. Allow me to illustrate wherein an abuse of this may be made evident. Some officious guardian or officer armed with judicial authority, seeing a man come in from a distant part of the country with a gun under his arm, says to him "I charge you with killing animals out of season." The man denies the charge on his oath but the justice of the peace says "I do not believe you; bring somebody else to swear to it." And that man might be convicted; might be sentenced to punishment of a very severe character with no recourse whatever to a court of appeal, owing to the absence of such in that distant country, so that the full penalty might be visited upon him. I do appeal to the leader of the Government that this clause should be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Strike it out.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I think the clause is wide enough to cover all the offences previously mentioned in the Act, but the argument of the hon. member from Terrebonne could be met if the word "hunting" were not applied to that. A man might be accused of being engaged in hunting an animal which he had no right to hunt at the time and under clause 5, the hunting of such animal is an offence. If in this clause we put in the words "who is accused on reasonable suspicion of killing any of the animals mentioned in this Act" then I think it would be correct.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—We must not take away the protection from the people in order to protect the animals.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If the suggestion of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken were adopted we would have two rules of evidence and that would be complicated and it would be much better to have the ordinary rules of evidence or to retain the clause as it is. In view of the feeling expressed in the House I move that the clause be struck out.

The motion was agreed to and clause 19 was struck out.

On clause 8,

Hon. Mr. MASSON—The hon. Minister was to reconsider clause 8 which gives Indians and other inhabitants liberty to kill animals out of the close season. There is no close season for buffalo.

Hon. Mr BOWELL—I did make inquiry as to that, and it is not considered advisable to interfere with the habits of the Indians or other inhabitants of those territories, who are really more Indians than the Indians themselves, and any attempts to control them would be fraught with a good deal of danger until they become a little more civilized and more used to the habits of the civilized parts of the country. I may also say that the Indians there for years past have received instructions from the Hudson Bay officials, who are as anxious to preserve the game of all kinds as we can possibly be, and they dissuade them under all circumstances from killing any animal out of season when the fur is not good, except when they actually want it for food; and if you attempted to punish them you might create Indian wars which would cost a great deal more than these animals are worth.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Did the Minister strike out paragraph (b) of clause 8 yesterday?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No, that was passed as it stands. I only said that I would make inquiry as to why this was left open and I have given the reasons furnished me by those who have given it a great deal of study. The title of the bill will have to be changed, so that it will read "An Act for the preservation of game in the unorganized portions of the North-west Territories of Canada." Clause 27 provides for the time at which this bill shall come into force. I shall have to leave that till the third reading.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD, from the committee, reported the bill with certain amendments, which were concurred in.

CANADIAN MUTUAL LIFE ASSOCIATION BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (K) "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Mutual Life Association," with amendments.

He said: The House will remember that this bill was reported upon about a week ago, and on the motion of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa was referred back for reconsideration by the committee in reference to the clause which prescribes the conditions upon which the association may issue certificates of membership and insurance policies. The promoters of the bill were very anxious that the membership should be something like 300 and the amount of insurance should also be reduced. The committee considered that clause very fully to-day and have recommended an addition to it. Clause 2 reads as before, 500 applications and $500,000 insurance, but the following words are added to the clause:—

> Or such applications for membership calling for such an amount of insurance as may be required by any amendment to the Insurance Act that may be passed during the current session of Parliament.

What was desired in respect to the clause was this—in case a less amount should be prescribed in the General Insurance Act than 500 applications and $500,000 insurance, that this company might not be obliged to have a larger amount inserted in their bill. So far as this House is concerned, I presume the general bill will pass in its present shape, but in the event of any alteration being made when it goes to the House of Commons and a lesser amount of applications and insurance be required, this company can have the amount prescribed by this bill reduced also, so that it will agree with the amount prescribed by the general Act. Then another alteration was made in the name. The original title had already been adopted by another company, and the committee altered it to the "Colonial Mutual Life Association." The other amendments have already been before the House as reported a week ago.

THE PROHIBITION COMMISSION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN — Before the Orders of the Day are called I beg to remind the leader the House of his promise of yesterday to furnish some information respecting the report of the Prohibition Commission.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—To be frank with the hon. gentleman, it escaped my mind, but I will endeavour to have the information for him by the next meeting of the Senate.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (CC) "An Act to further amend the Indian Act."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This clause repeals section 20 of the Indian Act and is substituted therefor. It deals with the willing of property by Indians. Under the Act as it stands at present, if the Superintendent disapproves of any part of the will he must reject the whole of it. Under this bill he may disapprove of any portion of the will providing it is not in accord with the provisions of the Indian Act. In dealing with Indians of course we are dealing with minors in the eye of the law, and such laws as would be applicable to adults in civilized life would not apply to them.

The clause was adopted.

On subsection 2,

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does not the Minister think that, having provided that, if an Indian makes a will, his property, which is not in a reserve and which he does not hold in his character as an Indian, may be devised or bequeathed as the property of another person, that the same property, in case of his dying intestate, should devolve in the same manner as that of another person?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Under the old law it was doubtful whether the Indian had such power, but the amendment is to place that beyond a doubt, so that he can dispose of his property outside of the reserve as a white man could, except that there is a reservation as to the widow. The object that the hon. gentleman has in view is really provided for in this clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My suggestion is that in the case of an Indian who dies intestate you should make the law the same as you do with respect to the Indian who makes a will—that the property which he owns otherwise than as an Indian and which is not on the reserve, should devolve in the same way as if he were not an Indian.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Those who have been working the Act governing the Indians inform me that the great difficulty in administering the estate of the Indian who dies without will is to trace the relationship. They tell me it is almost impossible to go beyond the brothers and sisters and parents, that so far as cousins are concerned they are scarcely known, for that reason it would be impossible to apply the ordinary law governing civilized people.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I quite understand, and I withdraw the suggestion.

The clause was adopted.

On subsection 8,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The only difference between this bill and the old Act is that the Superintendent General's approval is made necessary for the disposition of the children's part of the estate when they have passed from under the guardianship of the mother.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I would like to ask the Minister if it is the intention to divide the land. The lands are held in common by the Indians and of course they have nothing to divide. If they hold the land in severalty of course they could devise, but they do not do so. I would ask whether it is the intention to parcel out the reserves in severalty to the different Indians? The 2nd clause reads as if the Indians had power to devise the land in the reserves.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It is the Indian's interest in the land.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—They live upon the reserve under what is termed a location ticket, and that is to the Indian the same, as far as his own life is concerned, as if it were a freehold. This clause gives him the power to devise whatever right he may have in that land under a location ticket.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Then he could devise the improvements?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think it is a wise provision that Indians who cultivate their lands should be able to have property in the real land and convey that and look upon it as their own farm and their own homestead. If Indians were capable of holding land in that way it would be an improvement.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This clause gives them the power the hon. gentleman suggests. That is, the right to devise the property and the land and the improvements of the estate, subject to the approval of the Superintendent General.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—What is the difference between this section and the one that is to be repealed?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It imposes a penalty upon trespassers on a reserve. Under the existing law a man could not be punished for trespass until he had been ordered off and returned again upon the land. The object of this amendment is to prevent trespass if possible.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—There are several people who reside in Caughnawaga who are not Indians. The members of the tribe want those people to be put off the reserve and punished, but they are still there. If you make this amendment these residents at Caughnawaga might be punished and turned off their property.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This amendment will not be retroactive: it only applies to the future.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It appears to me that this provision is harsh, although it may be necessary. I think a man should not be subject to arrest and punishment unless he has been given notice.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The object of the section is to prevent the white man imposing upon the Indian.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 11,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a new section to be added to the Indian Act. It provides:

The Governor in Council may make regulations, either general or affecting the Indians of any province or of any named band, to secure the compulsory attendance of children at school.

In the province from which I come there are some Indians living on Indian reserves, but there are a great many who are not, who are simply living in the same manner as white men, and they come under the provincial law, and the law of the province contains provisions for the compulsory attendance of children at school. There should be something in this clause to indicate that it does not cover the cases of Indians who are not on reserves or who are not in bands.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—That objection is well put; but neither the Superintendent General nor the Indian Department under this has any power to control in any way Indians living off reserves, as white men live. It has never been attempted, nor is any power given by this clause that would have that effect.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

MONTREAL AND OTTAWA RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington) moved the second reading of Bill (48) "An Act respecting the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company." He said: This line connects with the Canadian Pacific Railway at Vaudreuil, and it is intended to continue it to Ottawa; 27 miles of the railway have already been constructed, and the time has expired for the completion of the railway to Ottawa. Some opposition was made to the project, but an arrangement has been come to which is perfectly satisfactory and the opposition is now abandoned.

The motion was agreed to.

WINNIPEG AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND moved the second reading of Bill (22) "An Act respecting the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company and to change the name thereof to The Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—How many miles are required to complete the railway to the River Saskatchewan?

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—I could not say exactly; probably about 50 miles.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The time asked is very short, only two years, and if not completed then the bill lapses.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—I suppose that is the company's business.

The motion was agreed to.

ST. CLAIR AND ERIE SHIP CANAL COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL moved the second reading of Bill (21) "An Act to incorporate the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company." He said: This is a bill applied for by certain parties who ask to become incorporated for the purpose of making a canal to connect Lake St. Clair with Lake Erie by a short cut through the peninsula, in the county of Essex. When the canal is constructed it will save an immense distance of navigation, and consequently a great deal of time, which is very important now for all parties engaged in western trade. The company reside mostly in the western states. The Act asks for nothing at all unusual. After defining the place where they wish to construct the canal, the bill provides that the work shall come under all the regulations and restrictions which the public require; that the company shall become responsible for all damage done by their agents; that they must have the approval of every municipality through which the canal is to pass; that private rights shall be saved, and the plans of the work approved by the Governor in Council before they are entered upon. These are the main features of restrictions. It is also provided, in the event of its being completed and found to be of great benefit to the navigation of the Great Lakes, as is expected, that it may be taken possession of by the country at any time the Parliament of Canada may see fit to take it over as a public work. The depth is to be 18 feet, the same as the Welland Canal.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Is it all in Canada?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Yes, it is entirely in Canadian territory.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESERVATION OF GAME IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (Z) "An Act for the preservation of game in certain parts of the North-west Territories of Canada."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The only clause with which we have to deal is the 27th, the time for bringing the Act into operation. I move that the blank be filled up with "1st January, 1896."

Hon. Mr. POWER—Why put it off as far as that?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Because before this bill received the royal assent the present season will be too far advanced to enable the department to send notices into this far distant country: it takes six months or a year before that can be done, and it is only at a certain period of the year that convoys proceed into our northern country. That is the reason why it is put off so long.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill with an amendment, which was concurred in.

EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES ON OATH BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (90) "An Act to provide for the examination of witnesses on oath by the Senate and House of Commons."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the bill, which I think is a very desirable one, but for the purpose of calling attention to some inaccuracies in the language of the bill, which I presume the Minister will have set right when the House goes into committee. If hon. gentlemen will look at the second clause of this bill they will see that it reads as follows:—

> The Senate and House of Commons may administer an oath to the witnesses examined at the bar of the Senate or of the said House respectively.

Now if we take that language in its grammatical construction, it presents a scene which we can hardly fancy. We should have the Senate and the House of Commons together administering one oath to a number of witnesses; clearly the intention is that the Senate and the House of Commons may administer oaths to the witnesses at the bars of the said House respectively. Then in the second clause there is a statement of a somewhat similar character.

> Any committee of the Senate or of the House of Commons may administer an oath to the witnesses.

The witnesses are supposed to be sworn separately and instead of saying "witnesses" I think we should say "to any witness examined before such committee." I just call attention to these things which strike me as being blemishes on the bill, so that when it goes before committee the Minister may be prepared to consider these suggestions on their merits.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the said bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The House does not go into committee on the bill the same day that it is read the second time, and I gave notice at the second reading of certain defects in the bill, so that before the House went into committee the Minister would be able to consider the matter.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The amendments are very trifling, and as I am ready to accept them I thought the hon. member would be anxious to see them carried out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no objection. The motion was agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think the bill should be passed as soon as possible and I do not see the necessity of taking a day's delay. I think the amendments proposed by the hon. member from Halifax, referring to the first clause, should be accepted. It should read "The Senate or the House of Commons" instead of "The Senate and the House of Commons."

Hon. Mr. POWER—The amendment which I should suggest would be to administer oaths, because it would not be one oath.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—"Administer an oath to any witness;" that will serve the purpose.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Sarnia is best. It should read "administer an oath to any witness," but for my part I think the clause is all right as it stands.

The clause was amended and adopted.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I made inquiry in reference to the report of the Prohibition Commission, which the hon. gentleman from Hopewell has asked for. They have promised it for some time, and as soon as it is received, it will be printed at the earliest possible moment, and laid on the Table.

ST. CLAIR AND ERIE SHIP CANAL COMPANY INCORPORATION BILL.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (21) "An Act to incorporate the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company" with amendments. He said: I may explain that this bill asks for power to construct branch railways to several points to run in connection with this ship canal, if it is ever built, and the effect of this amendment is to declare that the provisions of the Railway Act shall apply to those branches, which would not be the case were that amendment not moved. I see no objection to the amendment and I think the House might concur in the amendment.

THE DILLON DIVORCE BILL.

REPORTS OF DIVORCE COMMITTEE.

The Orders of the Day being called:

Consideration of the fourteenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Dillon relief bill, and consideration of the minority report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Dillon relief bill.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN said: I do not propose to enter upon the painful details of this case. They appear upon the printed evidence supplied to members. I will only say the committee have deliberately found, and determined, so far as in them lies, that the preamble to the bill was proved, and have recommended that the bill should be passed, and I must trust that the appeal the petitioner makes to the Parliament of Canada for relief will not be in vain, for the facts brought out in evidence were on all fours with many previous cases before Parliament in which bills were passed. There are circumstances, however, connected with this inquiry to which it seems proper to advert lest they might by any possibility in any way delay or prejudice a decision on the merits of this case, though the petitioner's claim for relief cannot and ought not to be prejudiced by action over which he had no control. For this reason, and because also important principles are involved, I think it but right to refer to the action of the committee, and show that its course was strictly in the line of duty and justice. In a matter so important as divorce, affecting, as it does, the interests of the family and the best interests of society at large, the rule of action for a subordinate body in the machinery of legislature, such as the special Committee on Divorce, should be clear, its powers and duties given and defined, and such a body must be held strictly to observe and follow them; otherwise there would be neither safety nor confidence in their action in the several cases committed to them for inquiry and report. I maintain the powers and duties of the committee are clear, and that they have been observed in this case to the letter and in the spirit in which they were conceived. I have condensed as much as the subject would admit what I believe to be the legal and proper views, and I would respectfully submit them to the House. The Special Committee on Divorce, like other committees, is a pure creature of the Senate; its powers are expressed and limited; it is not intrusted with general powers, but confined to the limits assigned by the reference and the general rules. The committee exercises certain judicial functions; it inquires into and determines as to alleged facts referred to it for consideration, and in examining witnesses is governed by the rules of evidence in respect to indictable offences. There is what answers to a record before the committee (the bill). They cannot go outside it, they cannot construct new issues, so to speak, or assume the office of public prosecutor by exploring for new facts upon which to construct new issues, not on the record, and so not committed to them or raised as an answer or defence. The committee is a fact-finding body, a jury, if you will, of the Senate; it is to find if the facts set forth in the preamble to a bill are proved; and such is to be determined upon proper evidence. The committee is called upon also to inquire as to whether there has been condonation, collusion, or connivance, and to report their conclusions upon the evidence. All this the committee whose report is now before the House did, and accompanied it with the evidence upon which the conclusions were arrived at. One member of the committee dissented from this report, at least and made a minority report, giving his reasons for dissenting. The reasons he specified are substantially that certain questions he put were improperly ruled out and excluded. Should the House undertake to review the decision of their committee, their reasons for so ruling out and excluding questions they deem improper should be had in regard. I therefore read them as they appear on the minutes of the committee:

This bill has been referred to us by the Senate and I take it the committee has the powers delegated by the House, under its own order and rules, and none other. For what is not comprehended in the reference, leave to report must be had. What are our duties on this reference is prescribed by rule 112. They are:

1. To inquire into the allegations set forth in the preamble of the bill, and take evidence touching the same and the right of the petitioner to the relief prayed therein.

2. After the hearing and inquiry they are to report to the Senate, accompanying their report by the testimony of the witnesses examined and all papers and instruments before them.

Rule 115 provides: If adultery be proved the party from whom the divorce is sought, may nevertheless be admitted to prove condonation, collusion, connivance or adultery on the part of the petitioner.

Any of these the respondent may offer evidence upon, which the committee would be bound to receive and consider. The latter part of the rule declares expressly that condonation, collusion or connivance is always a defence, and as respects these imposes a duty on the committee of inquiring into them.

The matter of adultery on the part of the petitioner is not so provided for and is left to be dealt with as a counter charge. I think it would be a usurpation of authority for a committee to inquire into matters not committed to them, and we should moreover be occupying a somewhat anomalous position in undertaking the double function of accusers and at the same time judges. I can quite see that suspicious circumstances might present themselves in any case, which would demand a searching inquiry in the interest of morals; and this contingency is provided for by the rules. A report of the committee with their reasons for desiring intervention by the Minister of Justice might be made. Should the Senate adopt such a report, and the Minister of Justice be of opinion that the public interests call for his intervention, then a further inquiry would follow. Such a proceeding would be analogous to the practice in England of intervention in divorce cases by the Queen's Proctor; but this case does not suggest such a course. I think, therefore, the committee rules rightly in declining to pursue a question not submitted properly to them, and not advanced as a counter charge or growing out of the evidence before them.

They had to determine if the preamble to the bill was proved; there was nothing even to suggest any condonation, collusion or connivance, moreover of these the petitioner purged himself on oath.

This résumé of what had been before brought out by members of the committee entered by order on the minutes briefly enunciated the views and principles on which the committee acted. The first question asked by the hon. member for Lunenburg "Are you an Irish Roman Catholic," was so obviously objectionable, so entirely irrelevant and uncalled for, one is surprised it could enter into any one's mind to put it. The day has not come in Canada, thank God, when the creed of a suppliant (a matter between him and his Maker) can affect his remedy, or debar him from just relief before any tribunal in the land. The second, third and fourth questions, put by the same member and ruled out, were of a similar character. The fifth question was of a singularly unique character: "Do you believe in the validity of a divorce a vinculo granted by this Parliament." A strange query to a suppliant to Parliament for its action: of course it was ruled out. The subsequent questions—exploring questions which were not relevant to any issue before us—were also ruled out. There was no counter charge, and no court or tribunal could lay hold of any matter not properly before them even on the ground of public policy. As to the minority report itself, why made I know not, when the final resolution to report the bill was passed, there was not a dissent as the minutes show. The report does not ask or recommend anything, it simply narrates a difference of opinion, that is all: it presents no ground upon which action could be had. The motive of making it is not easy to understand, it certainly does not make for peace, and in any possible view the refusal of the petitioner to answer a question after hearing the decision of the committee that it was not a proper question to be put should not in justice prejudice his case in any way or raise any implication against him. One word more—if the members of the Special Committee on Divorce are expected to occupy the position of inquisitors, to exercise functions analogous to those of a judge of the tribunal of first instance as in France in criminal cases, if the committee is expected to search out evidence and formulate charges in addition to those before them—in a word to conduct the inquiry referred to them after the manner and by the methods of a system well designated "atrocious," I feel convinced that no honourable gentleman would consent to occupy a position at once undignified and inconsistent with their proper functions as a fact-finding and semi-judicial body, and manifestly contrary to the principles and benevolent spirit of our laws and out of harmony with British institutions and Canadian sentiment.

Hon. gentlemen, a suppliant is before us asking relief under a plain provision of the British North America Act. It is true that it is but an individual case and affects only an individual, but the principle underlying it is capable of contemplation in a wider and larger field. In respect to the Government of this country and the conduct of public affairs, if the question were put to any honourable man, to any true and patriotic Canadian whether a man's creed, whatever it might be,should debar him from a position of trust or honour or emolument, from taking part in the affairs of the country, what would the reply be? A thousand times no —such a feeling and such a principle is abhorrent to any one who loves the spirit of justice and believes in free government. The principle and the true principle of action is this—just and equal rights to all citizens, without prejudice and without distinction, all to stand on an equal position, without unjust discrimination of any kind—to stand on the broad footing of equality. That is the true principle, and any other would lead to endless disturbance and would be unworthy of a free and enlightened people. It is the principle that is consistent with justice. It is a British principle, it is a Catholic principle, it is a Christian principle, and I hope that it will be written in indelible characters on the heart of every true Canadian. If the time should come when such principles are set at nought and evil counsels prevail, it will be a sad day for Canada —a sad day for the future of our young country. The principle involved in this case is a pervading principle. If by any chance the feeling should exist that because of a man's creed he is to be excluded from receiving the same consideration that any other man would receive, it will arm the hands of others not animated by true and patriotic sentiments to say "the principle has been propounded in the Senate of Canada and may we not follow their lead?"

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I presume it will be understood in this discussion that both the minority report and the majority report are to be considered at the same time?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, they are both before the House.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I quite agree with my hon. friend in his peroration and the aphorism which I could not exactly hear, but I think in effect was that we should give equal justice to all creeds and denominations; they should stand on the same footing. I would not combat that principle in this discussion; but my hon. friend will excuse me if I am not able to answer his argument. If he intended to read his remarks in a low tone of voice he might have had the courtesy to hand them over to me so that I could see what they were. I am at a loss to know what he said, or to do that justice to him to which no doubt he is entitled, because my hon. friend generally talks with the presumption of profound wisdom. On account of the long experience in the legal profession and in his county court, whatever he says is deserving of consideration, at least he thinks so; and if I do not give that consideration to his remarks, it is simply because with all my efforts to hear him I was unable to do so. Now my hon. friend has said, and truly said, that every British subject in this country stands on an equal footing; but there are questions which arise in this matter that are of vital importance as regards the public interest concerned, as well as the conscience of the churches, morals and society, and we must take all those matters into consideration. Since this bill came before us, I have heard the question asked, "What have we to do with church, religion or belief? Everybody has a right to apply for a divorce." True! everybody has that right, and Parliament has an equal right to refuse the prayer of such petitions, and is bound to do so in all cases, when to grant the prayer of petitioner would tend to injuriously affect what is expressly given us in charge on this subject, and that is to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, the main bulwark to which is the power and influence of the churches. Ignore that influence, legislate regardless of these sacred rights and the consciency of the church, take from it what it values as dear as life itself, then on what would our social system rest were the safeguards against anarchy and its concomitant evils and dangers, which would threaten our home and sacred altars, swept away, weakened and destroyed. Are we Christians? Then we believe that He planted a church and among its sacred ordinances was marriage on which whoever enters, vows and covenants in the presence of God and the congregation to be faithful each to the other, to love, cherish and cleave the one to the other until death parts them, they two being one flesh. That holy ordinance, the obligation of it, is indissoluble or irrevocable, by the vow and covenant is binding on every Christian man and woman who has taken that covenant. And so the English and the Roman Churches and society have maintained looking upon divorce with the right to marry again, except in extreme cases, as an abomination. This Christian principle and obligation, this influence of the churches predominated in the way which would most tend to the public good. The discussions preceding the union clearly show that the Roman Catholic rights, civil and religious, were to be continued, and the framers of our constitution in their judgment deemed it right and proper that the subject of marriage and divorce should be kept solely within the bounds and control of Parliament, which cannot compromise with impunity the well-being of society. If marriage and divorce were to be treated merely as a question of civil rights, it would have been placed in the British North America Act on the list of subjects over which each and all the provinces would have separate and independent and exclusive jurisdiction, and alone could legislate. I do not know of any church in Canada that believes that matrimony is merely a civil right, or whose adherents, when they marry, do not vow that they will live together according to God's ordinances until death does them part. It is not a civil undertaking or a civil contract. The Church of England does not look at it in that light. The Roman Catholic Church believes it to be a sacred ordinance, a sacrament of the church ; and we should be careful how far we infringe upon the rights and religious belief of so large an element of our population, and offend the religious sensibility of two millions or more of our fellow subjects. I have been here 27 years and I have never known an application for divorce where both parties were Catholics. If I can be shown such a case anywhere, then I may be called upon to say why those questions were not asked in that case; but I say this is a new departure and we should be careful how we run against the strong feeling of the Church of England and the Church of Rome in this matter. We should guard their rights and what they believe to be their sacred duties and obligations together with the question of public policy and the well-being of society. I am glad that we are going to meet this question fairly and squarely now. I hope we will all discuss it with the propriety which is becoming to members of this Parliament. I have been on a large number of divorce committees since I first became a member of this Parliament, and the difference between myself and some of my friends was that we took different views as to how we should be guided upon this question. My hon. friend from Amherst and others with myself, members of the profession, thought that it was our duty to be governed by precedents—by the judgments of courts in England, by the decisions of the House of Lords and by the decisions of the courts of Canada, and in accordance with the comity of nations, the decisions and judgments in courts in foreign countries and by rules and precedents. We contended for that strongly, but we found that hon. gentlemen in this House, including the hon. leader of the Opposition, the hon. gentleman from Barrie, and, I may say, the hon. leader of the House in 1887 and 1888, took a different position, the extreme opposite view. They claimed that every case should stand upon its own merits—that we should judge each case apart from every other case and apart from every other precedent that should be governed by what we consider right and just in our own eyes and in the interest of society. I remember well in the Ash case—I was chairman of the committee at that time—the principle was laid down by, I think, the leader of the Opposition. He said:

> In Canada we have no law on the subject, each individual case has to be dealt with by itself. Susan Ash may, or may not, according to the vote of this House, be entitled to a bill of divorce. Such cases are governed on no principle other than the individual opinions and judgments of the gentlemen who give their time and attention to the consideration of each particular case. There is no arbitrary rule laid down by which this House is compelled, under any circumstances, to grant a bill of divorce. Parliament may see fit to refuse every bill of divorce--may refuse to pass a single one. We are absolute masters of the situation. We have not delegated our prerogative to any other tribunal.

Then the hon. member from Barrie took the same position in the House on the same question. I admired the skill and adroitness with which he could turn a corner and appearing on either side about the same time. His remarks on the very subject are here:

> My hon. friend from Ottawa took, in a great measure, the ground from under my feet in the remarks which I intended to offer. The power exercised by the Parliament of this country entirely rests upon a single clause of the British North America Act, and that clause delegates to Parliament the power of dealing with marriage and divorce. That is the sole foundation upon which this inquiry is based.

He took the same ground, that we were not bound by any decision of any court, or by any rule or precedent, but that we were a law unto ourselves : that in every case we should exercise our own judgment in accordance with what might seem to be right, in the interests of justice, in our own eyes. And he said again :

The decision of the courts may be right under the circumstances of the particular case, but I go this length and say that we are not bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court in matters of divorce, and I quite agree with my hon. friend from Ottawa when he says that Parliament is supreme in dealing with cases of this kind.

I do not know that I need trouble the House with more quotations. We have the Tudor case, in which the hon. member from Amherst and the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Power) with myself, took the same line as we had taken before, that we should have something to govern us and that we must follow precedents. We find that the hon. leader of the Opposition opposed that principle, and he was supported in his contention by Sir John Abbott, who was then leader of this House. He held that we were not bound by any precedent at all. He said that we had the British North America Act without rules and regulations, simply placed in our own hands, and we were the custodians of marriage and divorce, and it was intrusted to us solely to legislate thereon, as we deemed in the interest of peace, order and good government of Canada, and could, in every case, do as we thought proper. He took such a strong position in that instance, that we were obliged to yield to his opinion. The hon. gentleman from Barrie quoted in that celebrated case the remarks of Lord Thurlow. The quotation is as follows :—

The House passed divorce bills in a variety of circumstances. In all such cases their lordships governed their conduct by the particular circumstances of each particular case under consideration. Indeed, he knew not how they could do otherwise; because, with respect to divorce, he knew of no rule to direct their conduct or to limit the wisdom and discretion of the House.

The hon. member from Barrie endorsed that and made it a part of his speech.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who is opposing that view now?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not know that any one is. I think we are all coming to hold that view now. I want to show that the consensus (at least the judgment of the majority of the Senate) in the above cases was against my then contention, and that we are not bound by any precedent or rule so that we may do what we think right in our own eyes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In what year did that debate take place?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—In 1888. The remarks of the hon. member from Barrie were as follows :—

To sever the sacred tie of marriage is a serious act, and the most careful consideration of each case is incumbent upon us all. Not merely because of the operation upon the marriage status of the parties concerned, but because parliament unlike a court of justice, is not tied by fixed limits, but may bring in view considerations of expediency or public advantage when making a law ; may, and I think should, have in regard the effect in relation to morals and the well-being of society.

It cannot be contended, however, that the judgment could bind parliament, whether for or against the petitioner or in any way control its action in finding upon the facts or granting relief. The court below had no power touching divorce ; that belongs under the constitution to parliament.

The case between the parties to the bill was before a court a with specially limited jurisdiction—séparation de corps—and limited in respect to matrimonial offences specified. A court limited as to relief and otherwise.

It is not so in respect to bills of divorce before parliament. In all such cases, parliament, to use the words of Lord Brougham, "is engaged in making a law," and as Lord Thurlow said in the Addison case, "governing ourselves by the exercise of our own wisdom and discretion."

The hon. Senator from Ottawa in 1887 strongly expressed himself to the like effect, namely, that parliament in such matters is governed only by individual judgment and opinion of members in each particular case.

The Senate, as constituent of parliament, is possessed of this case, and parliament, I maintain in passing a law touching the status of the parties, is not limited or restrained—any law it may deem in the interests of morals, and the good order of society. In this, therefore, it differs from the ordinary tribunals.

He repeated this over and over again in that debate. I ask you whether you do not consider this to be one of the cases affecting a large class of this community—if it is not one of serious and vital importance. It affects not only the Roman Catholic Church but also the Anglo-Catholic Church. They take strong grounds on this matter. We know very well that divorced people are generally considered outside of the pale of society. The Church of England will not grant them the sacrament of the church and will not give them the right to marry again, whatever this Parliament may do, and society generally frowns down upon all who seek for and obtain divorces. That is the position I take in this matter. I wish to submit several propositions to the House. They are as follows :—

1. To grant this application for divorce would not be in the public interest salus populi suprema est lex.

2. It would not tend to "the peace and order and good government of Canada" which in this matter of marriage and divorce is exclusively within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada as provided by the 91st section of the British North America Act.

3. Petitioner having separated and continued separated from his wife without lawful cause is not now entitled to divorce.

4. Petitioner having since then committed adultery is not entitled to divorce.

5. Petitioner having contributed to his wife's adultery by desertion is not entitled to divorce.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Does the hon. gentleman give that as a notice of motion?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No, I am simply stating these propositions and I hope before I am done to establish them all. I think I have already established the first and second. I contend that in the province of Quebec, where three-fourths of the people belong to the Church of Rome and respect their sacred relations and obligations, we should not now endeavour to do violence to the conscience of that great body of Christians, who by precept and example inculcate pure and virtuous living, and to break down the obligations and rights and ordinances as is attempted to be done in this case for the first time in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—In the province of Nova Scotia, where there are divorce laws, are they forbidden to grant divorces to Catholics?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I have had but little to do with divorce cases, and I have never heard of Roman Catholics going to a divorce court for a separation. I do not know what might happen in a case that has never occurred. A good Roman Catholic, who believes in his church and the sacraments and obligations of his church, will not venture to go to a court for a divorce.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What I ask the hon. gentleman is whether there is anything in the laws of Nova Scotia which prohibits it?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I know of nothing in the law. We have nothing to do with Nova Scotia and Nova Scotia laws. We relegated certain powers to them long before confederation was thought of, and they are governed by law. We are governed here in Parliament by quite a different principle. We are governed by no laws except what we believe to be the best interests of the public. We have simply the words "marriage and divorce."

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Does the hon. gentleman say that we are not governed by anything but our own consciences when we vote?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I have not said anything to the contrary. When we delegate powers to a court, the court is bound by the powers that we give to them. They are only the administrators of the law as given to them. We stand in quite a different position. The principle is laid down in the following words :—

> Parliament will be making a law, and the supreme power of the state (within constitutional limits of course) it would have to consider what would most tend to the public good. The courts but expound and administer law which Parliament enacts.

The courts only administer the law which Parliament enacts. They have no power but that of administering what is given to them by Parliament. We have not relegated this power—we have kept it to ourselves, simply because we consider this to be a question too sacred to be given to a court.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Have we the power to alter the laws of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No, we have not touched them. Wherever there is a divorce court it continues to exist. Whatever powers we give them by statute they have got and nothing more. What I contend is we have the power here to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada under the 91st section of the British North America Act, and in that is specially delegated to us the subject of marriage and divorce. That is my position, and we have nothing to govern us except what we consider right and just under the circumstances for the good order and good government of Canada and for the peace and welfare of society. I contend that Parliament has not delegated that power by statute and has made no rule to abrogate or curtail the power. My hon. friend has quoted the 115th rule of this House and has used it in his argument. That rule is as follows :—

If adultery be proved, the party from whom the divorce is sought may nevertheless be admitted to prove condonation, collusion, connivance or adultery on the part of the petitioner.

I contend that we cannot curtail the power of Parliament by any rule that we make here. The other co-ordinate branch of Parliament must be considered, and we could not make a rule which would curtail the powers of Parliament as a whole in asking any question that a member may think proper to put. Another clause says that the rules of evidence in the courts of Canada in respect of indictable offences shall apply. Now what is the rule of evidence in criminal cases? That no man can refuse to answer a question which will elicit the facts of the case. The 5th clause of the Act of 1893 respecting witnesses and evidence says, "No person can be excused from answering any question on the ground that the answer to such question may tend to criminate him or tend to establish his liability, &c." There is the plain law laid down. We are governed by the principles of evidence in criminal cases. I take this ground that we in the committee all stood as peers. It is a quasi-judicial committee and we all stand alike. I may be put down by the power of numbers, but that force would not take away my rights. I contend, and I will contend as long as I have the confidence of the House to place me on that committee, that I have the right to ask such question as I think right and proper, subject to nothing but Parliament itself and my own conscience and what the public may think of my conduct. No power in the committee, no majority will curtail my rights on that committee in a quasi-judicial inquiry. Even a practitioner, had the committee been a regular court and we were sitting as judges, would have been allowed to ask the questions which I put. Fancy a judge saying that a witness shall not answer a question and ordering the question to be struck out! The hon. member for Barrie may have fancied that he was practising in a county court in the interior of the country, forgetting for the time that he had been pensioned off long ago. But before this court of Parliament we must all be treated alike and I have as much right as any other member of the committee to ask such questions as I think proper, and I will not be curtailed of my rights by any member of the committee or by all of them put together. If it were a common court of law and the counsel asked any of these questions, would he be told that the question should not be asked and that it should not go in the minutes and that he should not have the advantage of having it recorded and ruled upon so that in the event of the suit being appealed to a higher court it could be decided whether it should be eliminated or not? All the privileges of a solicitor and his client were denied me in the committee. The reason why I was prompted to ask some of these questions was by reason of what had occurred in this House. On the 1st May last this bill came up for the second reading. The hon. member from DeLanaudière rose in his place to move the six months' hoist, and stated that his reason for doing so was that these parties were Roman Catholics and he thought it was not in the public interest that they should get a divorce.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Is Dillon the only Roman Catholic that has ever appeared before this House for a divorce? If the hon. gentleman thinks so, I can find him a case here.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I object to being interrupted and interfered with in this way. I do not know of any Roman Catholic that appeared here for a divorce. I do not believe there ever was such a case.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—The hon. gentleman may not know it, but other members of the House do know it.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I never knew of one coming here for a divorce. If I had known it, I would have asked the questions that I put to the petitioner in this case. I say this question was raised on the second reading of the Bill, and my hon. friend from DeLanaudière only withdrew it because of the remarks which came from the hon. member from Calgary. He had with him in his contention the Hon. Mr. Almon, who said:

It appears to me we are usurping the power of the church. I think the matter as to whether the parties should live together or not, should be left to their clergy to decide.

What does the hon. gentleman from Calgary say? He says:

I would suggest that the hon. member allow this matter to stand until the evidence is taken. It is a dangerous precedent to introduce in the House to disapprove of the prayer of the bill upon mere hearsay as the hon. gentleman now proposes. There should be some evidence before the House, on oath or otherwise, that my hon. friend's contention may be proved correct in fact.

Then the hon. gentleman from DeLanaudière said that he thought the objection was well taken, and he withdrew his opposition to the second reading of the bill until such time as the House was vested with the fact. Hearing this question raised here in the Senate on discussing the principle of the bill as to whether it was advisable that these people should have a divorce, the principle of the bill being challenged, could I suppress evidence of that kind or permit it to be suppressed? Could I go on that committee and sit there silently when I saw that it was evidently the intention that that evidence should not come out—that Parliament should not get the fact of their both being Roman Catholics?

Hon. Mr. McKAY—What about the certificate of marriage?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The intention was that the evidence should not come out as to whether they were still Roman Catholics and believed in the validity of a divorce granted by this Parliament. I am not questioning the motives of the committee. They may have thought that it was in the interest of the peace and good government of Canada that those questions should not be asked, but I thought it proper that they should be, and I would have stultified my position, had I not insisted upon the questions being asked. I did what I conceived to be right and proper, and it would not have been fair to this House and to the hon. gentleman who made that objection at the second reading if I had not put the question. Every member has a right to have the facts brought out and I thought it my bounden duty to ask those questions. Every one of them was ruled out. I will return to the evidence that was suppressed in consequence of my not being allowed to ask certain questions, and I contend that on that evidence alone this man is not entitled to divorce. In 1883 he was married; he had two children, the issue of that marriage with this woman. We have it that without warning, within five years of his marriage, without giving any reason, he takes his wife to Paris and leaves her there. I contend that he left her without any legal cause, as the evidence shows. He was asked this question by me:

Q. Was the intention of separating thought of by you before you went to Paris?—A. I suppose it was contemplated on my part. I had not formed any definite plans.

Q. You say you had no definite plans formed when you went to Paris?—A. No.

Q. You went with her to Paris?—A. I went with her to Paris.

Q. As man and wife?—A. Yes.

Q. And up to the time of your arrival in Paris you lived as man and wife?—A. Yes.

Q. You say you had contemplated leaving her?—A. I suppose I had thought of it.

Q. Was she aware before you left this country that you had any such contemplation?—A. I am not aware whether she was.

Q. Had you cause at that time that you considered warranted a separation?—A. Our life had been a very unpleasant one for two or three years before.

Q. What was the cause of that?—A. I have stated the cause.

Q. Want of affinity—discord was it?—A. Incompatibility and extravagance.

Q. When had you first cause to impugn her fidelity to you as your wife?—A. Last September.

For six years he was separated from her without any legal cause, bereft of home, husband and children, an unprotected wife and mother cast off as a worn out garment and follows his own sensual appetite, and it was only last September that he thought anything was wrong, although his wife was in Montreal, and if there were any improprieties on her part he could have detected them.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Was that separation by mutual agreement or not?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes, but I say that when a man abandons his wife without sufficient cause in law, and does not give her the protection, the love and the respectful attention which she has a right to expect from him, when he leaves her in that way for six years, he contributes to the offence she has committed. The law says he contributes to the offence by abandoning her, gives her license, encourages her, and contributes to her offence. No lawyer will contradict that position.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—When it was said there was a mutual separation agreed upon, is it not a fair inference and deduction that under the circumstances there could not be any particular desertion?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I will show my hon. friend that a written document agreeing to the separation would be no use, but here the man deceived her. He took her over to Paris without any reason; he took her on false pretenses and left her in Paris, and admits himself that he had then no grounds for divorce.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—He left her there with her father.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not care where he left her or with whom he left her. He abandoned her. I say where a man deserts his wife without sufficient cause in law, if she commits adultery he contributes to it, and cannot afterwards ask for a divorce. But there is more than that. This question was asked:

Did you offer to take her back to your house when she returned to Montreal?—A. No.

Now there was a married woman, probably a good woman, a chaste woman, bringing up a family to her husband, living with him as she should, cast aside in a foreign country, having no person to lean upon, her children taken from her, her heart's yearnings taken from her, her heart turned to gall, she probably would seek some solace and after six years she commits an indiscreet and imprudent act, I say, therefore, that the petitioner cannot ask for a divorce. He must come before us with clean hands and if he in any way contributes to her offence, as he has done in this case, he cannot ask for a divorce. I asked him "Were you faithful to your marriage vows from the time you separated in Paris up to the time you sought this divorce here?" He would not answer that. Now I contend that when a question like that is put, if the man has the power to answer it and does not, it is clear presumption of guilt—in fact, conclusive evidence of guilt. He would not answer that, and the members of the committee unanimously said he should not answer that question, was not that act by the committee a travesty of justice?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Suppose he had answered "no," what would be the difference?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Why he could not come in here for a divorce, because he not only deserts his wife and contributes to her offence, but he is guilty himself. Can a man be a profligate and come here for a divorce?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (C.B.)—But suppose he had not been a profligate—that he had been faithful? Supposing he had answered the question "yes."

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—If he had done that it would have been all right, but even then he would not be entitled to a divorce because he contributed to her offence by abandonment. If he had answered that question you would not have to consider the other point. We must take the evidence and judge of it as we think proper. I would not give credence to a man who would violate the sacraments of his church and come here asking for a divorce. I say that I would not believe that man who was not true to his religion and to his sacred and moral obligations. He would have a stigma on him, as far as I am concerned and I should doubt his veracity.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—Then there would be no use asking the question if you would not believe him.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Well, that is another matter for this House to consider, but he refused to answer and he did more than that: he protected himself under the plea of counsel—that counsel instructed him not to answer. It is easy to get the protection of counsel in that way. I say counsel had no right to instruct him not to answer. He was bound to answer, is liable to be imprisond and liable to have all the penalties of Parliament upon him for not answering. He is bound to answer the questions of the committee of the Senate who are quasi judges. But how did he answer the next question? I asked him then :

Were you faithful to your marriage vows up to the time you deserted your wife in Paris ?—A. Yes.

He was under no restraint then. He tells us that instantly; that he can answer freely. He answered quickly and promptly because his conscience was clear. He spoke honestly and truly, but the hon. members of this committee with their power of numbers stopped me from having the other questions answered. Now those are the facts of the case and I contend from my view that the proposition I have advanced has been established by the evidence: having contributed to his wife's adultery and he having since committed adultery is not entitled to divorce. Petitioner separated and continued separated from his wife without lawful cause, and therefore is not entitled to divorce. He is bound to show that he had a lawful cause, and I will show the House by the cases which I have before me what are lawful causes. I read from this book of Mr. Gemmill's on Divorce :

But the House of Lords refused to pass divorce bills where there were deeds and agreements of separation, unless peculiar circumstances were shown to warrant them.

In Lord Lismore's case Lady Lismore's violence of manner and language towards her husband were held to justify the separation agreed upon, his conduct having been exemplary. In Sullivan's case representations of his wife's misconduct were considered to account for a deed of separation. In two other cases the grounds of separation were considered altogether frivolous and the bills refused.

"The principle seems to have been that that agreement to live separate almost amounted to leave and license," that is, she can go out upon her own hook and do as she pleases. It is contributory to the offence; a connivance at her act. The law says that it is giving her leave and license to go outside and do what any mad woman might do and not be called to account.

Leave and license on the part of the petitioner who had to show a correct reason for such separation in the previous misconduct of the other party. The mere whim of both parties is not sufficient.

He must show that he had proper grounds and legal grounds to base it upon. That is the first position and the next is that having himself committed adultery he is not entitled to divorce. He has not answered that question as he ought to have done, and in all cases where a man has the knowledge and will not answer, it is presumed that his answer, if given, would be against him. Then having contributed to his wife's offence by desertion he is not entitled to divorce. That is my next position, and I think I have plainly shown that this man alienated her affections, turned her heart to gall, separated her from her children, left her six or seven years, never gave her the slightest attention ; and, having alienated her affections, if she has committed this wrong, he is responsible for it and cannot come here seeking redress. Now we will assume that the wife of this petitioner is a good Catholic ; we have no evidence what he has done, because if she is true to her church she dare not come and ask for a divorce ; he may revel in iniquity and sin, and she, as a good member of her church—although she may have failed in this one regard—believes her church is as dear to her as her life, and she dare not come into this or any other court and ask for a divorce.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—She could oppose it.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH--She could do anything, but her conscience would not allow her to recognize divorce proceedings in any way at all. I do not know that she could even come into court and oppose it, because she and her mother church disclaim any regard for divorce; her church says it amounts to nothing; they do not want divorces and have no respect for them. Even if she could have come here, according to the ruling of the hon. member for Barrie which no other lawyer would venture to make, she would not have been allowed to say anything at all, because his contention and the contention of the committee is that if she came here defending the suit the question could have been asked; but because she did not employ counsel to defend the suit therefore we cannot ask the question. How monstrously absurd such a statement as that is ! I say that when a respondent is not defended by counsel in an application for a divorce, we should look with more suspicion upon the case and treat it as a case requiring the most searching inquiry. We must give it more consideration than if the opposite party were here with counsel. We are bound to ferret out everything and before we give a divorce we must see that the man is entitled to it, and I repeat it is monstrous to say that if this woman came here the questions could be asked, but because she did not come here the committee would not allow the questions to be put. The chairman of the committee disregarded all precedents. I do not believe you will find another lawyer in the Senate of Canada to-day who will endorse his judgment in this matter before the committee in ruling out that evidence and deciding as he did. I do not believe the hon. member from Calgary would have said that those questions should be ruled out; but after my hon. friend the chairman pronounced his dictum and ruled as he did, there was nothing said. It was taken for granted.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Mr. Lougheed told me the ruling was perfectly right.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not want to take hearsay evidence from my hon. friend; I have done so before and have found it could not be corroborated afterwards, and my hon. friend had better not tell us what he heard. I know that the hon. gentleman takes a deep interest in divorce cases, and if he cannot get correct evidence of the fact, he should not mention it. I asked Mr. Lougheed if he considered that the judgment of the Hon. Mr. Gowan was correct, and he would not answer.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—He voted that way.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—He voted that way; but the next morning, with the dictum of the chairman laid down in the most emphatic manner, with his long experience and wisdom, there was not a word to say by any of you and the bill was passed. Rule 50 reads:

> If adultery be proved, the party from whom the divorce is sought may nevertheless be admitted to prove condonation, connivance or adultery on the part of the petitioner.

I contended then, and contend yet, that if the respondent could ask these questions and prove those facts from the witness, that we had a right to do it, and the evidence could not be excluded. My hon. friend talks about counter claims and counter actions in this connection. We hardly know such matters in our courts or such proceedings in criminal cases. I cannot imagine what he meant. The counter case in divorce we never heard of, and he said we should appeal to the Minister of Justice in this matter. I will tell you when you can appeal to the Minister of Justice; it is when we have exhausted every means of getting the evidence before the court; when we feel that notwithstanding all the evidence we could elicit from the witnesses who came there, there is something wrong in the case that requires more power—when the intervention of the Minister of Justice to obtain more evidence is required—then we should appeal to him. Then and only then could you ask the intervention of the Minister of Justice, but as long as we get the material and the evidence before us which we had in this case, we cannot ask for the intervention of the Minister of Justice, because every question should be asked and answered, and there is no power to exclude evidence. If we had not the power to ask these questions, and asked the intervention of the Minister of Justice to get these questions answered, we would not possess the power that we ought to have, and which I contend we possess. I contend that we are not curtailed; the power of Parliament is supreme and we had a right to ask every question which was put there by me and many more cognate questions; and under the law of evidence in a criminal case, the man having put himself in the box, not being compelled to do so, and being a competent witness he is bound to answer the questions. Hon. gentlemen will see that, as far as I myself am concerned, it makes very little difference what indignity might be cast upon me by the members of the committee; I believe none of them meant to do this; but it was simply with one object, and that object was plain and palpable, that the evidence should not come before the House. They wanted to suppress certain facts. They had their motives for it no doubt and acted according to their own light and understanding of what was best for peace and harmony with all creeds and all religions, but I consider I was bound to ask the questions which I put; and I was precluded from asking more questions when

I found such a determined stand taken against me. I felt humiliated and almost debased, with the witnesses and counsel and everybody there, that my mouth should be shut, but I kept very pleasant and agreeable. I had many more pertinent questions to ask; I knew nothing of the case till I went into the committee room, but no matter what I asked of a cognate nature, it was ruled out.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—You asked quite a lot.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I would have asked more, but I felt that questions cognate to the one I asked would be excluded, and I was told so. Now, I do not want you to visit upon the unfortunate man coming here the consequences of any dereliction on the part of the committee. Do not judge him harshly on account of anything improperly done by the committee; but I say that I believe you have sufficient reason, first, because he has dishonoured the church and his religion, abandoned his wife for six years and now asks us to sever his sacred bonds with leave to marry again, and then on the ground of public policy, and also on the ground of respect for society and proper regard for the churches, which are the bulwarks of our peace and comfort in this world, and our safety. What would be the good of Parliament if we had not the churches of all Christian denominations? Besides the Church of England and the Church of Rome, there are other denominations, I believe, that look down with disfavour upon divorce. Outside of that altogether there is ample evidence that this man has not fulfilled his marriage vows; he cannot cast his wife away without proper cause; he contributed to her offence, and the law says that he gave her license to do wrong by abandoning her six years, so that he has been guilty both ways. When he is asked plainly have you committed adultery after your separation from your wife, he won't answer that question; you must put that against him. I hope that this discussion will not cause any bad feeling of race and creed; I have simply endeavoured to lay the case before you, and I think on one or other of the objections you must say that the man is not entitled to a divorce on public grounds, in the interests of society and in the interest of all the churches, because he must come before you with clean hands when he seeks relief. He cannot separate from his wife, sin himself, and contribute to her sin, as he did, and then seek redress here. Heaven forbid such an outrage on church and morals.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It appears to me that the question which is really before us is an exceedingly simple one, requiring very little time to discuss it in order to arrive at a satisfactory decision. We have before us a minority report as well as the report by which the committee announce to us that after careful examination they have ascertained the truth of the allegations made by the petitioner seeking the divorce entitling him to have his petition granted, and recommending that the bill shall be passed. With regard to this minority report, it is difficult to know what object is sought to be gained by it. I can understand its being brought in to afford an opportunity to deliver the speech which the hon. gentleman has just made, but it recommends no specific action to be taken by the Senate. What is the House to do with it? There is nothing in it; no asking us to condemn the action taken by the majority of the committee. It contains a few items of fact, a brief history of certain occurrences which took place in the committee; but I cannot see that it is a report upon which any action can be taken. The question really before us is, whether there is any ground for refusing to acquiesce in the decision of the committee when it says that sufficient cause has been shown to justify the petitioner and recommends that the prayer be granted; and that the bill be passed. The grand underlying difficulty we can clearly see. Although there has been a vast amount of verbiage, the real, essential difficulty is that the petitioner and the person from whom he seeks divorce are said to be members of the Roman Catholic Church, and if I understand the ground taken by the hon. member from Lunenburg, in opposition to the bill, it is the claim that the petitioner has no right to get the relief which the law grants to Protestants under similar circumstances. It has been clearly shown that the man is entitled to relief; the question is raised, can it be granted to him, he being a Roman Catholic?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—To my mind it is a most outrageous thing to say that we cannot grant to Catholics the same relief and privileges which Protestants enjoy. Surely they should be on the same footing. We have no right whatever to take any cognizance of any man's religious belief. He may have no belief or any kind of belief, and with this we have nothing to do; what we have to deal with is the man's civil rights, and what we have to attend to is the impartial application of the law of the land to every case which comes before us. I do not agree with my hon. friend from Lunenburg as to the unlimited range of power granted to us when deciding cases, as though we were entirely above all law, as if in taking evidence we were not under any obligation to be guided by the usual process in courts of law. In cases of this kind especially, where we are acting as judges, it is a great advantage to us that we have on the Divorce Committee senators who are accustomed to taking evidence in the law courts, who know the rules of evidence and what kind of testimony may properly be brought out, and consequently I have great faith in the finding of the committee. It consists of nine members, and when we find that committee unanimous in this matter, with the exception of the hon. member from Lunenburg, to me it is very strong evidence that their recommendation must be right. They have examined very carefully into the facts, and I am under the impression, from glancing at the evidence, that from the beginning they pursued the correct and proper course, acting in conformity with the rules of the House, dealing with that which had been specially committed to them to investigate and report upon and not going beyond that. If the point upon which the hon. gentleman has dealt very largely, the alleged improper conduct of the petitioner had been a matter properly brought before them, it would have justified the question put to him as to his own personal behaviour, but it seems to me that the only proper way to bring that before the committee would be for the respondent to plead that the petitioner had committed adultery. Then I could understand that it was the duty of the committee to investigate the charge. As a matter of fact, there was nothing of the kind in the plea before the committee. To my mind the question which the hon. gentleman wished to put to the witness had the appearance of fishing,—which is sometimes practised in courts—trying to get evidence where there was no ground before the court to justify any such questions at all.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That is just what we are there for, to fish for all the facts bearing on the case.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I know that the hon. gentleman is a very eminent lawyer and has had a great deal of experience in courts. I wish him to tell me if he ever knew of a case in which a man before a court was asked to what religion he belonged when he sought for justice? The hon. gentleman certainly cannot find any precedent for it, and the course that has been followed in the committee is the practice which is universal throughout the British dominions. We never think of asking a man what his faith is before granting him his rights as a citizen of the British Empire, irrespective of what his religion may be. What I object to is trying to introduce here a principle which is entirely new and subversive of individual right. It is something unheard of to claim that because a man may have peculiar religious views, therefore he is not to be entitled to the protection of the law and to the relief which by law can be properly given him, on certain facts being established. It is amazing to me that any one can raise an objection to a statement so perfectly plain and in harmony with the British constitution and the manner in which British justice is administered. I do not know anything about the religious faith of those parties, but it appears to me that it is not so important a matter to know whether they were adherents of a certain church or not. If that church repudiates very strongly the action they take, they are violating one of its fundamental laws, and in my judgment cease to be members of that church. I know that would be the case in the church to which I belong, if they were to violate a fundamental law of the church. Consequently, by that very act of coming here for a divorce, such persons forfeit all their rights as members of that particular church. That is the view I take of the matter. The simple question before us to decide is as to whether the report of our committee has been sufficiently well considered. If the evidence submitted to us proves sufficient to justify the committee in saying that the preamble has been proved, is their recommendation that the bill should be passed a proper one? Are we prepared to say because one member of that committee differs in opinion from all the others, that the decision of the committee is wrong and that the course recommended by the one dissentient is more in harmony with British law and practice than the recommendation of all the other members of the committee? I think not, and I think the religious question should not have been brought up in connection with this matter by the hon. member from Lunenburg. While a great many of his arguments would have had considerable weight with me if we were enacting a clause of the British North America Act giving this Parliament control of divorce, it is a totally different thing to be discussing the propriety of Parliament granting a divorce under an existing law. My feelings with reference to this affair are very much in harmony with those of my Roman Catholic fellow members. I have an exceedingly strong dislike to separations of this kind, but I find divorce sanctioned by the law of the land. That law is supreme, and whatever may be my personal feelings, when a person taking advantage of that law establishes a case that he is entitled to the relief which it would give him, it would be a very shameful thing for us to say that because he is a Roman Catholic he shall not have the benefit of that relief—that he must suffer the injustice, simply because of his religious faith. I do not think such a thing should be done, and in my judgment the report ought to be adopted.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I much regret that I have to oppose the recommendation of the majority of the committee, but believing as I do that this question is of the greatest importance, indeed of greater importance than some hon. gentlemen seem to think, I could not let it pass the other day when the bill was read the second time. and I cannot let pass to-day the report of the committee recommending the passing of this bill without expressing my opinion and opposing those arguments which have been made in support of the bill. To answer the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kaulbach), the hon. gentleman from Sarnia (Hon. Mr. Vidal) had to change one of his expressions. The hon. member from Lunenburg never claimed that because the petitioner was a Catholic, therefore he should not be heard. What he did say was that when a man belonging to the Roman Catholic Church comes before the Senate for a divorce, the question ought to be looked at and the House should see whether they could in the interest of morality grant the prayer of the petitioner. That is quite a different thing from denying the constitutional right of a Roman Catholic to seek relief under the general law of the land. Then the hon. gentleman from Sarnia said that this question was a very simple one. It does not seem so, because the hon. gentleman does not himself appear to understand it, and knowing his intelligence, it must be that the question is a complicated one, since he did not grasp the principle involved. Then the hon. gentleman says that he could not vote for such a proposition as that put before the House—that a Roman Catholic coming here and asking for a divorce should not be granted one because he is a Roman Catholic. As I have said, this shows that the hon. senator does not understand what our pretensions are. They are that should Catholics ask divorces a vinculo, Parliament should not grant them, though they might give divorce from bed and board. I propose to show that such is the bounden duty of Parliament. I agree with the hon. member from Barrie that this Parliament is almost omnipotent. I agree with the English writer who says that Parliament can do anything that is possible, but there are circumstances under which the powers of Parliament come to an end, and that end is reached when they propose to take a step which would be an immoral act or in contravention with the law of God. What I wish to prove to-day is that Parliament, in its supremacy, cannot allow this bill of divorce. Let us begin at the very beginning. What is the evidence before us? That Dillon married in 1883—eleven years ago. That five years after his marriage, some time in 1888, he went to Paris with his wife and that they lived together as man and wife. He swears that he had no reason to suspect her fidelity or to complain of any immoral conduct on her part up to last September, 1893. I am surprised that the members of the committee did not look further into that question of the separation in Paris. The petitioner swears that he agreed with his wife in Paris, to separate and live apart one from the other, so that he left her there returning to Montreal and has lived six years apart from his wife, granting her an allowance of $50 per month. With such a flighty and eccentric character as this woman had, according to the evidence given by the petitioner, her husband, was it right for him to separate from and abandon her in Paris, her mother living in Montreal? Did not common honesty, much more charity, require the presence of her husband to keep a close watch on her? Certainly, and no doubt this separation greatly contributed to, if it was not altogether, the cause of the immoral conduct of his wife, and yet this man is allowed to come here and ask for divorce on the ground of the adultery of his wife, and the committee recommends this House to grant him relief. Is there a member of the committee, or of this House, who having put his hand on his heart, will deny that under the circumstances there is a great presumption that Dillon did so separate from his wife expecting such results as those proven against his wife, and which are the grounds upon which he bases his demand? If that cannot be denied, then I ask this House should they grant a divorce to a man who contributes to his own dishonour? Even if I were a Protestant, I could not vote for this bill, because I hold that the man was more guilty than his wife. He himself states that it was not until last fall that he discovered that his wife had done wrong, although he has been six years living apart from her. And where did he separate from her?—in Paris. Had he possessed any charity, had he desired to do what was right, he would have brought her back to Montreal and given her over to her mother and explained the arrangement under which they were to live apart. But no, he left her in Paris, and there she went astray. In my opinion, not only should we refuse to grant this man a divorce, but much more refuse to let him marry again. He knew his wife's character; he swears that she was of a flighty disposition. Was not then Paris the last place in the world where he should have left her? Under the circumstances, was it not on his part collusion and connivance. Collusion according to Lord Stowell is:

> The agreement between the parties for one to commit or appear to commit the fact of adultery in order that the other may obtain a remedy at law as for real injury. Real injury there is none, where there is a common agreement between the parties to effect their object by fraud in a court of justice, it is also connivance—connivance is the corrupt consenting of a married party to the conduct of the other of which he afterwards complains.

Has not collusion then and connivance been proved here? Has it not been proved that there was an understanding by which, on payment of $50, she was to live apart from him?

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—No.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I say yes—the agreement is here. Read the evidence of which I have already given a synopsis. Now, under the English Divorce Act:

> If the petitioner is proved to have been guilty of unreasonable delay, cruelty, desertion or wilful separation without excuse, or of misconduct conducing to the adultery complained of, the court is not bound to pronounce a decree dissolving the marriage, but will exercise its discretion as to whether it shall, according to the circumstances of the case, grant the relief prayed or dismiss the petition.

The question of connivance as a bar to divorce by reason of adultery was considered by Dr. Lushington in Phillipps vs Phillipps.

> After a review of the decided cases, he concluded the principle to be that the husband is barred when he has contributed to his own dishonour..... Volenti non fit injuria, but it must be more than indifference, inattention, over-confidence, it must be intentional concurrence in order to amount to a bar, though there need not be active steps taken by the husband to corrupt the wife.

An English judge (Lord Penzance) said:

> Society has an interest in the maintenance of marriage ties, which the collusion or negligence of the parties cannot impair.

That is the English law, and common sense shows that it is right. Parliament is not a court for encouraging immorality. If you adopt the recommendation of the committee in this case, you certainly encourage immorality. The committee did not inquire into the question of connivance, and can any one doubt that when Dillon separated from his wife, he did so in the expectation that she would, from her light character, ultimately do something which would be regarded as a justification for bringing this divorce suit? Is it not extraordinary that the committee persistently refused to allow any evidence as to the moral conduct of the petitioner to be taken? As the report says, the defendant did not appear before the committee, but does not this fact show connivance? Parliament has a duty to fulfil, and, before granting a divorce, should be satisfied that the petitioner deserves it. The hon. member from Barrie may say that the committee was not bound to look into that question, but the 112th rule provides that it shall be the duty of the committee to inquire into the right of the petitioner to the relief prayed for. It is well known that a man who has been the cause of his wife's going astray, has no right to a divorce. The quotations I have already made show that such is the practice. Therefore the committee, when they refused to take evidence on this point, failed to do their duty under the rules as well as under the law. They have left the House in darkness, and yet we are asked by the hon. member from Barrie to grant this divorce without hesitation. The report says: "The matter of adultery on the part of the petitioner is to be dealt with as a counter charge." That is so, but as the hon. member from Barrie said—not in this case however but in another case.

Parliament may and ought always to have in regard, not merely the question as it affects the parties, but the effect in relation to morals and good order—the effect which the passing of a particular law might have upon the well-being of the community. Parliament, as the supreme power, has its duties and responsibilities and cannot compromise the well-being of society, but is bound to consider what would most tend to the public good.

Those words are far from being in accord with the utterances of the hon. gentleman to-day. I am surprised at the great zeal shown by the hon. senator in this case, a zeal so great that he loses his memory and forgets all his utterances in the past. The following quotation from an English authority shows that it was the duty of the committee to take evidence as to the moral conduct of the petitioner, even if adultery is not brought as a counter charge by the respondent against the petitioner. I take it from Gemmill on Divorce:

The rule expressly indicates four defences, condonation, collusion, connivance or adultery on the part of the petitioner. Whether any defence be urged or not, it is made, for obvious reasons, the duty of the committee to inquire into the three first mentioned, and into the fourth, if alleged by respondent against the bill. It may be assumed that if any one of the four be established it is a sufficient ground for rejecting the bill, the chief difference seems to be that the committee only inquires into the allegation of the petitioner's adultery when invoked to do so by the respondent. But it is submitted that Parliament and consequently the committee is not limited to the grounds referred to in refusing to report a bill for relief, but may look at all the circumstances of a case and refuse to confer an advantageous privilege upon an unworthy suppliant, when for example, the condition upon which claim is made has grown out of the individual's own iniquity.

I also find in Mr. Gemmill's book on Bills of Divorce:

The husband aggrieved only by adultery, could demand, as it were, ex debito justitiæ, a divorce a vinculo, unless his own conduct has been censurable.

I may be told that supposing he is a Catholic (I will prove that he admits it himself), the very fact of this man making an application for a divorce shows that he is no longer a Catholic. Not at all. There has been more than one Catholic, who, forgetting his duty, has gone over to the United States to get married, but they have all, in the end, returned to the fold penitent and professing a desire to lead a better life. What evidence have we that it will not be the same in Dillon's case? A man cannot change his faith to suit circumstances. Dillon is a Roman Catholic still. Presumption makes him so until evidence to the contrary is given, and he, in his heart, believes that the tie which binds him to his wife can only be severed by the death of either of them. The committee refused by a vote of 6 to 1 to allow questions to be put which would show what Dillon's religious views are. The committee did wrong, but that cannot be helped now. The course followed by the committee was not in accordance with the views enunciated by the Chairman of the Committee (Hon. Senator Gowan) in 1888, when the question of the necessity of removing from Parliament the power of granting divorces was under discussion. The hon. senator, after having expressed his opinion against creating a divorce court, because it would tend to increase the number of applications, spoke of the advantages of leaving to Parliament to deal with such cases. He added:

Parliament can properly bring in view considerations of expediency or public advantage. A court of justice is necessarily restrained within fixed limits—Parliament decides whether the charges are proved, whether they constitute such a case as should entitle the party to a special act for relief and what relief, if any, should be granted to the party, in view of all the circumstances: and Parliament may and ought always, to have in regard, not merely the question as it affects the parties, but the effect in relation to morals and good order: Parliament as the supreme power has its duties and responsibilities—and cannot compromise the well-being of society.

I am surprised at the great change which has taken place in the mind of the hon. chairman of the committee. Some few years ago, in his opinion, Parliament could bring in view considerations of expediency, a court would not. Parliament ought to have regard not merely to the question as it affects the parties but the effect in relation to morals and good order. To-day, the hon. gentleman is quite of a different opinion as far as this case is concerned.

I agree with the hon. gentleman that Parliament has its duties and responsibilities and cannot compromise the well-being of society. But would not Parliament greatly compromise the well-being of society if it should grant a divorce to the petitioner and allow him to marry another woman? His wife, to whom he must believe he is united for life, is still living. While they both live she must continue to be his wife according to his own conscience and to the teachings of the church he was born in and in which he has lived and to the formula which he heard read to him at the foot of the altar when he took the oath that he would be true for life to that woman. Will not Dillon be living knowingly in adultery if he believes that this Parliament has no power to sever that tie? Will he not be living in adultery according to his own conscience? Parliament having granted him full power to marry another woman, no doubt it would be legal, and if legal you cannot punish him for what his own conscience must tell him is grossly immoral conduct. Will not the whole population of Montreal and of the province of Quebec, nay, probably the whole Dominion, look at him as a man living with another woman while his wife is still living? Is that what the hon. gentleman from Barrie meant when he said that Parliament should not compromise the well-being of society? If Parliament should grant this divorce, would it not then fulfil those important duties referred to by the hon. senator? Would it relieve them of the responsibility attached thereto? Certainly not; Parliament would only be creating a public scandal. Would it not be an inducement to others to so separate from their wives in order to achieve the same end? Would this be exercising that strict vigilance and circumspection so often recommended by various authorities. Again I heard the objection the other day, and I have heard it repeated to-day, that Parliament has not to consider the creed of the party. And why not? Have you not every day to take into consideration the creed of the different classes of our community. Did not Sir John Macdonald do so in 1872, when he withdrew a bill concerning a case of divorce on the third reading when I rose in my place and told him he should not pass the bill because the Catholics objected on religious grounds? You will find it in the Journals of the Commons. I waited till the third reading because I thought others would raise the objection, but on the third reading, nobody having taken exception to the measure, I said "I cannot allow this bill to pass, the Catholics cannot vote for it," and Sir John withdrew the bill. Why should we not exercise as full discretion in this matter? The hon. member from Barrie, in his remarks which I have quoted, says that Parliament has all this discretion; that there is no law to bind them on this question of divorce. Very well, why then would not Parliament take into consideration the fact of a man whose conscience tells him that he is not at liberty to marry and does not allow him to live legally in adultery? Parliament has full discretion in the matter, and it is one of its bounden duties in its supreme authority, to have regard to the question, as it affects morality and good order. Not very long ago we passed a bill concerning oaths. In that bill we considered the faith of the different persons who had to take an oath; and did we not say that those who did not consider it right to take the oath and lay their hands on the holy book could raise up their hands, which for them would be an oath? Is it not taking into consideration the faith of the different parties with whom we have to deal? Would it not be well, in dealing with a question of the greatest importance, that Parliament should exercise its supreme power and discretion when evil results would follow? Is it not expedient and to the advantage of the public, that such a case should be treated with great severity? Please consider, hon. gentlemen, that the petitioner told the committee and he now tells this House by the documents he filed and which are on the table, that he is a Catholic, that he was married by a priest of the Church of Rome, in Montreal at Notre Dame church, according to the rites of the Catholic Church. Is not this telling the committee, telling this House, that he believes in the sacrament of marriage, in the indissolubility of the tie which binds him for life to the woman of his choice? Is not this telling Parliament that he never believed Parliament had such a power as "to put asunder that which God hath united," according to those words of St. Matthew :

He who made man in the beginning made them male and female. For this cause shall a man leave father and mother and shall cleave unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh. Wherefore they are no more two but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.

The question has been asked whether any cases of Catholics applying for divorce have come before us? I do not know whether they have or not, because we do not always learn whether people coming from other provinces are Catholics or not Catholics, but this I say, that in the province of Quebec, when the union took place, we had never seen Catholics divorced. It was understood at the time of confederation that divorce would not be granted to Catholics. Sir George Cartier, in explaining the matter, said that at the time of confederation the question of divorce had been left purposely to be decided by the Federal Parliament, and taken away from Quebec, where the majority were Catholics. This was done in order that Protestants might have that which they considered justice.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—We have had divorces of Catholics during the last seven years, and French Canadians too.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I have no opposition to the granting of a divorce of that kind in this case—divorce from bed and board. They have had that already in the courts of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—That is separation.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—It is divorce, and so-called in the laws of England. In England it is called divorce from bed and board, which is different from divorce a vinculo, which is asked for in this case. I would have no objection to divorce as we have it in Quebec, but I deny that any divorce a vinculo was ever granted in Quebec before confederation, and since confederation none have been granted to Catholics in the province of Quebec. But hon. gentlemen must remember that even with Catholics it may happen, that some few may have received relief, when they were not known to Catholic members of this House. In the present case it is only by accident we know of this case. It might have passed without our knowing anything about it; but I was told "those parties are Catholics, the woman is a French woman." I rose then and said, "I take objection." I am not responsible for those parties whom I do not know, but I am responsible for parties whom I know, and I cannot remain silent but must defend such immoral legislation when it is possible for me to do so. If you refer to the civil code of Quebec you will find that it states positively that the tie of marriage is a tie which no man can sever. I refer your honours to article 185 which reads thus :

Marriage can only be dissolved by the natural death of one of the parties, while both live it is indissoluble.

That is the law of Quebec, and is this Parliament ready to vote that down? Is Parliament prepared to say that those people, though they are Catholics, though they know that they are not free to marry and in violation of the laws of their province, shall be given full liberty to marry and so live in adultery under the protection of a federal Act of Divorce? I am sure with all those considerations there will be a pause before this House takes the responsibility of proclaiming to the world that we in Canada have granted the right under the sanction of law to a man to live in adultery for life.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the adjournment of the debate.

The Senate adjourned at 6 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, May 16th, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the Orders of the Day are taken up, I wish to call attention to what I take to be an error in making up the Orders. It will be observed by hon. gentlemen that the resuming the debate on the motion of Mr. Gowan for the adoption of the fourteenth report of the Committee on Divorce is placed at the end of the Orders. Now the committee appointed to revise the rules of the House, struck by the inconvenience of the practice of putting the unfinished business of one day at the foot of the Orders of the next day, amended the rule with respect to unfinished business, and it was adopted by the House in the following shape :

12. The Orders of the Day, which at the adjournment have not been proceeded with, are considered as postponed until the next sitting day, to take precedence of the Orders of the Day, unless otherwise ordered.

12*a*. An Order of the Day which at the adjournment is under consideration shall stand first on the order of the following day, next after orders to which precedence has been assigned under this rule unless the Senate shall order otherwise.

There were no other orders on yesterday's paper which had not been proceeded with, and consequently the matter of the consideration of this report should stand first on the Orders of the Day next after the third readings. A subsequent rule provides that the third readings of bills shall, notwithstanding anything in rule number 12, take precedence of all other business, unless there is a special order made about it. The third readings therefore come first, and then comes this discussion on the report of the Divorce Committee. Consequently the item which is number 19 on the Order paper should be number 9 and come in after the third reading of Bill 43. I think the Clerk should be instructed to make that correction so that when we come to read the order it will be number 9.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I hope the suggestion of the hon. member from Halifax will take effect to-day. We are all anxious that this matter should be settled. It is the most unpleasant matter that has been before the House for many a long day, and when we consider this question as one that will divide many of us on race and creed lines it is to be deplored. It has been said that because a man is born in a stable he is not necessarily a horse, but there is something in the accident of one's parentage. If my parents had been Roman Catholics, I should likely be a Roman Catholic also. I think this matter should be settled as soon as possible and I trust that this will be the last question of the kind which will divide us by race or creed, for the present session at all events.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I presume the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax is approved by the House and that the correct position of the order is the ninth on the paper.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There can be no question about it.

THE DILLON DIVORCE BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE'S REPORTS.

The Order of the Day being called,

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Gowan for the adoption of the fourteenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Dillon relief Bill.—(Hon. Mr. Scott); —and

Consideration of the Minority Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Dillon relief Bill.—(Hon. Mr. Kaulbach.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said : Except when some important constitutional question had to be discussed in connection with bills of divorce before this chamber, it has not been the practice of the Catholic minority here to enter on a debate on the merits of such bills. They as a rule—and I am not aware that there had been a departure from that rule—have affected only those belonging to the several denominations of Christians who believe in divorce, and who consider that the marriage bond is only a contract which can be dissolved by the Parliament of Canada. So long as divorces were limited to those who differ from us in religious belief, it was proper and right that we should, as far as practicable, abstain from interfering in the passage of those bills, except to mark our silent dissent. They were usually allowed to go on a division, but when a new departure takes place and the fathers and mothers of 2,000,000 of the people of this country are told that the Parliament of Canada is superior in spiritual matters to the ecclesiastical laws of their church, and that for cause shown and on compliance with the conditions that are required by a Divorce committee that is deputed to inquire into the question, they can obtain divorces, it becomes then a very grave question whether the attention of this Parliament ought not to be called to a departure that is new and one that is not warranted under our constitution. During the years that elapsed between 1841 and 1866 under the union between Upper and Lower Canada there is no instance where a divorce bill was passed in favour of Catholics, nor since confederation down to the present time am I aware that a bill affecting Catholics has been before Parliament. It is just possible that one or other of the parties may have belonged to the Roman Catholic Church. If either of them did, the attention of Parliament was not called to it, and I was not myself aware of the fact; otherwise it would have been challenged on the very first occasion that a bill of that nature was presented for our consideration. At the time of confederation this question of divorce entered largely into the debates that preceded the acceptance of the terms of union and the Catholics of this country were especially anxious that what might be called the rights and privileges which they enjoyed, and more particularly those belonging to the province of Quebec, should not be disturbed or interfered with. During the time of the union of Upper and Lower Canada there were no fears on that ground, because the representatives of Lower Canada were equal in number with those from Upper Canada, and many of those representatives, though they belonged to other denominations and were Protestants in faith, yet they invariably voted in the House to preserve the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholics of the province of Quebec. They were always loyal to those terms upon which the union was really based, and at the time of confederation when it was suggested that there should be divorce courts, the majority in Parliament were opposed to that, and I am very glad to say that a considerable number outside of the Catholic Church, more particularly in the Church of England and especially that portion of it that is known as High Church, are quite as much opposed to divorce as members of the Catholic Church. However, when the question came up, as it did on several occasions, during the debates on confederation, those who were expounding the terms upon which confederation was being accomplished invariably laid down the principle that the rights of the minority, in reference to this question of divorce, would be religiously observed and protected. Sir Etienne Taché was then Premier, and in the very first speech that he made he referred to this subject. He first discusses the question of representation according to population and the effects of it, and he adds :

> If a federal union were obtained it would be tantamount to a separation of the provinces, and Lower Canada would thereby preserve its autonomy together with all the institutions it held so dear, and over which they could exercise the watchfulness and surveillance necessary to preserve them unimpaired. (The hon. member repeated this portion of his speech in French, for the express purpose of conveying his meaning in the clearest and most forcible manner to his fellow-members for Lower Canada, who would not have apprehended so well the English.)

I might say that the law at that time—not only the ecclesiastical law which was guaranteed to the people of Lower Canada nearly 150 years ago but also the civil law—regarded marriage as indissoluble. The law was then the same as it is to-day. I read now from the latest edition of the Code of Lower Canada, the edition of 1890, chapter 7, on the dissolution of marriage. It is clause 185, and is as follows :

> Marriage can only be dissolved by the natural death of one of the parties. While both live it is indissoluble.

Now this Senate proposes to repeal the Civil Code of Lower Canada by passing this bill. It is proposed to set aside the ecclesiastical authority, which has prevailed in Lower Canada since it was guaranteed by the Crown up to the present time, and also to set aside and repeal the Civil Code of Lower Canada which has been guaranteed over and over again. Continuing the references to the confederation debates, in confirmation of what I have stated that up to the time of confederation and between the union of the two provinces there had been no divorce granted to a Catholic, I quote from a speech made by the late Sir A. A. Dorion, in which he says:

It is said that at present (that is as things existed just before the union) no Catholic could obtain a divorce either in the present House or in the local legislature under confederation.

Then Sir Hector Langevin, who was Solicitor General for Lower Canada in the Government, follows. The Government were charged by the Opposition, led largely by Mr. Geoffrion, now a member of the other House, and by the late Sir A. A. Dorion, that the effect of the clause as introduced in the British North America Act might be to lead to the conclusion that Parliament would grant divorces to Catholics. They were assured that the divorce law would be more strict in the future—that it was not contemplated to establish divorce courts and that Parliament would not enact any law on the subject but would reserve to itself the privilege and right of saying when a divorce should be granted. Hon. gentlemen are aware that we have never legislated on the subject of divorce. The whole authority for the proceedings which controls and regulates our divorce cases is in the two words in the British North America Act, "marriage and divorce," which belong to the Federal Parliament. We have never acted on that power by formulating any law directing or controlling how divorces should be granted. I have abundance of testimony from leading lawyers in this House who at various times have acknowledged and conceded that there is no guide or regulation with reference to divorce—that we are not guided by precedents in the past, that each case is one for special consideration, that it is purely a question of public policy. I am sorry to say that we have long since departed from those lines and that this House is drifting into the position of being a very easy divorce court for the granting of divorces which probably the courts would not even grant—that everything is made smooth and pleasant, and that divorces now in the last few years go through without question. The condition is simply that of adultery—a very easy one to have fulfilled when man and wife agree to sever the marriage tie. Each finds somebody else, wife or husband, who is better suited to give matrimonial bliss and the performance of the condition required by the Senate is not very difficult—it is a secondary and easy one to accomplish, and so both parties are made free, although on the face of our Act we say that the party that is the least guilty only shall be permitted to marry. But we know that the effect of that is perfectly nugatory, that the one is as much relieved as the other. This Madame Dillon, I see by a report of the proceedings in a letter produced from her, says that she is looking anxiously for the passage of this divorce Bill in order that she may be able to drop the name of Dillon and assume the name of the Count deVilleneuve. She goes to Paris where she finds a great many more in a position similar to hers. Paris probably has more divorced people than any other centre in the world. There was a time—I forget the particular year, but I have it in my notes—when the number of divorces in Paris was greater than the number of marriages. Since that time they have called a halt to some extent. Even in France they were somewhat shocked at the result, but what has it led to? Do we not know that Paris in 100 years would lose its population if it were not renewed from the country districts? They do not have children. There is a scientific way, apparently, now of gratifying the lusts of the flesh and God's ordinances are set aside and man is contributing his share in order to enable that to be more easily accomplished. But I am diverging from my argument.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Do the French courts grant a separation or a divorce?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A divorce. They commenced in 1796 and the first six months there were 6,000 divorces granted. It was found that the divorces were exceeding the marriages and a change was made, but the result has been where divorces are granted that the number has depended entirely on the facilities granted. The figures are conclusive in every country. They are doubling up in Canada. In confirmation of this statement I have a list of the divorces granted since confederation. I have not taken the trouble to go into it before confederation because divorce was then so very rare. It was not a prerogative that the Parliament of old Canada cared to exercise. Difficulties were thrown in the way. The Governor General was not permitted to grant his assent—each case had to go before Her Majesty the Queen and be passed upon, and so parties rarely applied. The record of divorces since confederation is as follows:—

1867	None.	1881	None.
1868	1	1882	do
1869	1	1883	do
1870	None.	1884	do
1871	do	1885	5
1872	do	1886	1
1873	1	1887	5
1874	None.	1888	3
1875	1	1889	4
1876	None.	1890	2
1877	do	1891	4
1878	3	1892	5
1879	1	1893	7
1880	None.	1894	6

In 1876 and 1877, we had the Campbell divorce case. We discussed that bill for two years, and finally threw it out. There was a desire on the part of some gentlemen to have a restricted separation, and finally the bill was thrown out.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—We passed a bill, and fixed the amount of alimony.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the first eleven years of confederation, we had just four divorce cases. Last year we had seven. That shows precisely what we are coming to. I think there is a sermon in that. It does not require any comments upon it—it must strike every hon. gentleman as a very grave and serious matter. In the first eighteen years of confederation, we had only nine divorces, but the publicity given to divorce cases—their being commented on in the press and read in every house in the land—naturally prompted the suggestion that divorces may be obtained, and then, as I said before, apparently of recent years this has proved a very cheap and easy way of obtaining divorces. In the last ten years, there have been forty-two cases. In the early years of our history, there was no divorce committee. It was not struck as the ordinary committees are. Now it is one of our regular committees. A few years ago it was an unusual committee—it was only struck when a case arose; now we expect divorces, and we invite them, in fact, by the policy that we have adopted. We have desired that the question of reservation for the sanction of the home authorities should be removed in order that the Governor General might more promptly relieve the parties here by giving his signature to each bill, and so it has been conceded, and a divorce in Canada is an easy matter. Sir Hector Langevin discussing this question, said :

It means that a marriage contracted in no matter what part of the confederacy, will be valid in Lower Canada, if contracted according to the laws of the country in which it takes places; but also, when a marriage is contracted in any province contrary to its laws, although in conformity with the laws of another province, it will not be considered valid. Let us now examine the question of divorce. We do not intend either to establish or to recognize a new right; we do not mean to admit a thing to which we have constantly refused to assent, but at the conference the question arose, which legislature should exercise the different powers which already exist in the constitutions of the different provinces. Now among these powers which have been already and frequently exercised de facto, is this of divorce. As a member of the conference, without admitting or creating any new right in this behalf, and while declaring, as I now do, that as Catholics we acknowledge no power of divorce, I found that we were to decide in what legislative body the authority should be lodged which we found in our constitutions. After mature consideration, we resolved to leave it in the central legislature, thinking thereby to increase the difficulty of a procedure which is at present so easy. We thought then, as we think still, that in this we took the most prudent course. Just so in a question of divorce; the case is exactly analogous. We found this power existing in the constitution of the different provinces, and not being able to get rid of it, we wished to banish it as far from us as possible. One thing it would be vain to deny, namely, that although we, as Catholics, do not admit the liberty of divorce, although we hold the marriage bond to be indissoluble, yet there are cases in which we both admit and require the annulling of the marriage tie—in cases, for instance, where a marriage has been contracted within the prohibited degree without the necessary dispensation. An instance of this occurred very recently. A few months since, an individual belonging to my county, who had married a young girl of a neighbouring parish, without being aware at the time of his marriage of the relationship which existed between him and his wife, found out several months afterwards that they were related in such a degree that they required a dispensation from the bishop. That dispensation had not been obtained. He spoke of it to his wife, who refused to apply for a dispensation, as a step towards the legal celebration of their marriage. It became necessary, therefore, to have the marriage annulled. The affair was brought before the ecclesiastical court, and after a minute investigation, the diocesan bishop gave judgment, declaring the marriage null in a canonical sense. Regarding it in a civil point of view, the marriage was still valid until it should have been declared null by a civil tribunal. It became necessary, therefore, to carry the case before the Superior Court, and my hon. friend, the member for Bruce, who took the case in hand with his usual zeal and legal address, obtained from the court, after a suitable inquiry, a judgment declaring the marriage null in a civil sense, and ordering that it should be registered as such in all places where it should be needed. If this affair had occurred in Upper Canada, what recourse would the parties have had? The parties being Catholics, the case would have been brought before the bishop, who would also have declared the marriage null after suitable inquiry; but the case would not have had the same conclusion in the civil court, particularly had it depended on certain impediments which have force in Lower Canada, but none in Upper Canada. It would have been necessary to go to Parliament to pray for an Act which in a Catholic point of view, would be a mere decree of separation, but which the Parliament would have termed an act of divorce. This power to grant a separation is therefore necessarily vested in the parliament, by whatever name such a separation may be designated, and we are not to be reproached for the interpretation which others may give to such name, different from that which we assign to it. I thought it right to make myself understood on this point, because I do not choose that people should be able to say we are afraid of explaining our position with regard to the question of divorce and marriage, and I believe that I have shown that our position is consistent with our religious laws and our principles as Catholics.

If they considered divorce easy in those days, what would they think of it now. Mr. Geoffrion in his speech quotes from Sir Etienne Taché in which the latter lays it down that if we obtain a federal union it would be equivalent to a disunion of the provinces and continues:

If it be true that a Catholic cannot adopt the principle of divorce, and if we are in conscience bound to oppose it in our capacity as legislators, by voting against every measure tending to sanction it, I ask how we can vote for a resolution purporting to vest in the federal legislature the power of legislating on the subject.

Some hon. gentlemen seem to think that we are governed by some principle which has been laid down in the past in reference to this question of divorce. What I maintain is this, that every case which comes before us is one to be considered purely in the light of public policy—is it in the best interests of the whole community that this divorce should be granted? That is really the important question. We have to-day, in the consideration of this case, to say whether we are going to shock the sensibilities of 2,000,000 people of this country —whether we are going to say to the people of the province of Quebec that we are going to set aside the Civil Code of Lower Canada in this case, and for what and for whom? For a worthless woman who has gone across the Atlantic to live with a divorced man—for I understand that this man is also divorced.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—He wants a divorce.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He has a wife; I do not think that that improves the situation. He probably will get a divorce when he goes to Paris. This divorce will help Mrs. Dillon. Whether the petitioner will avail himself of this divorce to marry again I cannot say, but I think not. I asked his father why the petitioner sought permission to marry again. I said: "Do you think that is proper and right?" He very frankly said: "No, and he has no intention of marrying again." "Then," I said, "why introduce a clause of that kind when he believes himself that he ought not to be permitted to marry?" Here I am reminded that the committee declined to ask that very question, which I think was exceedingly wrong. This House is entitled to know every possible incident and fact.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—What question do you refer to?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The question whether the granting of a divorce would justify his marrying again.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—That question was not asked.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I never heard any such question asked in the committee.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Not in those words, but to that effect.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought I had seen it somewhere. However, I was going to observe that this House was rather drifting away from the true policy which ought to govern it when these questions of divorce came up. Some hon. gentlemen who have not been long in this House seem to think that there are some guiding precedents which ought to prevail in all those cases. I say each case is dependent entirely on the circumstances surrounding itself, and it becomes purely a matter of public policy whether it is best in the interest of the community, having regard to all the far-reaching consequences of a divorce, that it should be granted. Recollect, as I said before, that granting one divorce means a multiplication of applications for divorces. It means the prompting of men and women, who are now bearing with each other's frailties and who are endeavouring to live together in God's holy ordinance of matrimony, to seek opportunities of getting more suitable mates outside. I am sorry that the hon. senator from Barrie is not in his place, as he in former years gave a good deal of study to this subject and had laid down some very sensible principles to govern the conduct of those cases. In the discussion of the Susan Ash case, this question arose—how far it was a matter of purely public policy, one entirely independent of courts both in England and in other lands, and whether the Parliament of Canada had for its guide anything but its own mere judgment of the case. It was conceded by several gentlemen who took part in that debate that Parliament was supreme and was governed by no rules or precedents. I had laid down that principle very strongly and Mr. Gowan quoting from me said :

My hon. friend from Ottawa took, in a great measure, the ground from under my feet in the remarks which I intended to offer. The power exercised by the Parliament of this country entirely rests upon a single clause of the British North America Act, and that clause delegates to Parliament the power of dealing with marriage and divorce. That is the sole foundation upon which this inquiry is based.

* * * *

The decision of the courts may be right under the circumstances of the particular case, but I go this length and say that we are not bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court in matters of divorce and I quite agree with my hon. friend from Ottawa when he says that Parliament is supreme in dealing with cases of this kind.

Then in the Tudor case, Mr. Gowan said :

To sever the sacred tie of marriage is a serious act, and the most careful consideration of each case is incumbent upon us all. Not merely because of the operation upon the marriage status of the parties concerned, but because Parliament, unlike a court of justice, is not tied by fixed limits, but may bring in view considerations of expediency or public advantage when making a law ; may, and I think should, have in regard the effect in relation to morals and the well-being of society.

It cannot be contended, however, that the judgment could bind Parliament, whether for or against the petitioner, or in any way control its action in finding up the facts or granting relief. The court below had no power touching divorce ; that belongs under the constitution to Parliament.

The case between the parties to the bill was before a court with a specially limited jurisdiction—séparation de corps—and limited in respect to matrimonial offences specified. A court limited as to relief and otherwise.

It is not so in respect to bills of divorce before Parliament. In all such cases, Parliament, to use the words of Lord Brougham, "is engaged in making a law," and as Lord Thurlow said in the Addison case, "governing ourselves by the exercise of our own wisdom and discretion."

The Senate, as constituent of Parliament, is possessed of this case, and Parliament, I maintain in passing a law touching the status of the parties, is not limited or restrained—any law it may deem in the interests of morals, and the good order of society. In this, therefore, it differs from the ordinary tribunals.

Those views have been shared, on many occasions, by many leading members of this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The leader of this House took the same view.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, Sir John Abbott's opinion is to be found in "Gemmill on Divorce." Coming to this particular case, it would appear from the evidence that the petitioner and his wife were, I presume, born in the city of Montreal, that they were Catholics, that the banns of marriage were duly proclaimed in one of the Catholic churches in Montreal, and that they were married with a good deal of ceremony, apparently, from the number of witnesses, by a Catholic priest in the year 1883.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—There was not a word said about them being Catholics —only that they were married in Notre Dame Cathedral.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The question was asked by me.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it ought to be necessary for me to go into that question. It is a matter of notoriety and I am sorry indeed that such tender sensibility was exhibited by members of the committee to blind this House as to incidents which were most important and on which many members of this House feel very keenly. Did the committee suppose that they were going to throw a paladium of protection over the guilty pair, or this guilty woman—that this House was to be kept in ignorance of important facts? It was too shallow to attempt to base an argument upon, and I am surprised that any hon. gentleman should challenge the fact of their being Catholics. I was certainly entertained by the line taken by some hon. gentlemen in defending the proposition that they should be treated so gingerly that even the rules laid down in the law of evidence were not to be observed. This gentleman who appeared before the committee was told not to answer certain questions which I consider most important. Surely Parliament is entitled to the fullest inquiry in matters of this kind. Is it not important to the peace and happiness of the people of this country? Are the feelings of 2,000,000 of the people of this country to be shocked by an exhibition of that kind on the part of a committee of members of this House who attempt to shield guilty parties? I say, and I say it unchallenged, that they were Catholics born, Catholics brought up, and that they profess to be Catholics to-day; that they were married in a Catholic church, and apparently with a good deal of ceremony from exhibit No. 1 that I see before me. They were married in 1883, and it appears they lived together for some years and had two children. Then the petitioner took his wife to Paris. The following questions and answers I take from the report:

Q. Was the intention of separating thought of by you before you went to Paris?—A. I suppose it was contemplated on my part. I had not formed any definite plans.

Q. You say you had no definite plans formed when you went to Paris?—A. No.

Q. You went with her to Paris?—A. I went with her to Paris.

Q. As man and wife?—Yes.

Q. And up to the time of your arrival in Paris you lived as man and wife?—A. Yes.

Q. You say you had contemplated leaving her? —A. I suppose I had thought of it.

Q. Was she aware before you left this country that you had any such contemplation?—A. I am not aware whether she was.

Q. Had you cause at that time that you considered warranted a separation?—A. Our life had been a very unpleasant one for two or three years before.

Q. What was the cause of that?—A. I have stated the cause.

Q. Want of affinity—discord was it?—A. Incompatibility and extravagance.

Q. When had you first cause to impugn her fidelity to you as your wife?—A. Last September.

They went to Paris seven years ago; that would be about six years after he had deserted this woman in Paris. Six years after the separation she is charged with having committed adultery, and it is on that charge of adultery that he comes to this House and asks Parliament for a divorce. Now I maintain that there is evidence from the petitioner's own mouth that he took this woman to probably the worst place in the world, the city of Paris, where he left her. There had been no quarrel between them that would in any way warrant a separation before this.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—He left her with her father.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but her place was in her own home looking after her children. When a husband chooses to take his wife off to a distant place and set her down in a society that is not very well suited for a light woman who might be tempted to commit frivolities, or something worse, he leaves her in the way of temptation. I say Paris was the very last place to which he ought to have taken her. It was his duty to make his home more pleasant and agreeable to her and not to lead her away to the most dissolute capital in the world.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Would Chicago have been better?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that it could be worse than Paris. In this connection I would refer hon. gentlemen to the case of Yateman vs. Yateman which is reported in 2 Probate and Matrimonial Cases, page 187. It depends entirely on whether he was justified in leaving her in Paris. That becomes really the pertinent question. This case I have cited is in some particulars not dissimilar to the one we are now considering. The parties were married in 1852 and lived together until 1856, about the same length of time that Dillon and his wife did, and in 1856 the petitioner took the respondent to Germany and there separated from her under circumstances which, in the opinion of the court, constituted desertion. He left her there and five or six years after applied for a divorce on the ground that at some time long after the desertion she had committed adultery. The adultery was admitted—there was no question about that—and the judgment of the court was that he had contributed to her adultery and was not entitled to a divorce.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—In that case did he leave her penniless in Germany?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not really know whether he did or not. I do not think it is an important element at all.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—In the case before us the wife was left with her father, and in addition to that Dillon allowed her $50 a month, besides a private income she had.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think that that is important at all. If we were governed in this case by precedent and by the laws of England, presumably this would be a pretty strong case against the petitioner. But the question for us to consider is whether we think it is politic, whether it is in the best interests of this country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The husband did support his wife in the case to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not know whether he had or not. It only makes the cases even more parallel than I supposed they were. I presume this Parliament will have some regard for the views and feelings of 2,000,000 people who live in this country, and they will, at least, not strain a point in interpreting the rule that ought to be followed in cases of this kind.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Do you believe that those people are Catholics?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly they are.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—A man who makes an application here for divorce!

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—He cannot be.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can send the matter back to the committee, and I pledge my honour here that they will both answer that they are Catholics. And what do you propose to do? To create a crisis in our history by granting a divorce of this kind. Assuming that you grant this divorce, and the petitioner marries again under this bill, and that he is excommunicated by the Archbishop of Montreal, what follows? An action in the court. He pleads that the Parliament of Canada is superior to the ecclesiastical law that prevails in Lower Canada, and that the Parliament of Canada granted a divorce. Do you think that is a happy condition of things?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I think it is a correct thing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am very sorry that we have that condition of things; that we have an hon. gentleman who is willing to offend the sensitiveness of a large portion of the people of Canada by taking the part of a miserable wretched woman who is now on her way across the Atlantic to live with a man who is not her husband. The hon. gentleman would carry that principle so far as to have no regard at all for the tender sensibilities of the larger number of his fellow-beings. Does the hon. gentleman consider that a wise thing to do? Apart from any other question, supposing I were to rest it entirely on that single point, would you think it proper, or reasonable, or just, that you should, for the sake of granting a divorce in this particular case, offend the whole of the Catholic population of Canada and of the province of Quebec, more particularly, who are so sensitive on this subject? I do not believe you would. Although my hon. friend says so now, I do not believe in his better judgment or reasoning he would maintain any such view.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How many Catholics would care about it? Not more than half a dozen.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I can assure my hon. friend that they will all feel very keenly about it, and very many leading Episcopalians will feel keenly about the facility with which divorces are granted. They recognize that there is no greater evil prevailing than this multiplication of divorces, and they regret that divorces are increasing every day. I have given figures that are most conclusive, so far as Canada is concerned. Do you think it is wise and prudent and in the best interest of the country to go on multiplying divorces? If they increase in the same ratio that we have seen in the last few years, we will have 50 cases very soon. Would hon. gentlemen say that that was a proper state of society, that so many homes should be broken up, that so many children should be illegitimate, that the foundations upon which society is based should be wrecked? Surely hon. gentlemen who give any attention or thought to the subject must recognize that that is a condition which we would all deplore.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Separation would produce the same effect.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, because there would be no right to re-marry.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They have separation now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The parties have already separated. In the first instance they sought the law of the country, and obtained a separation, a regular decree, dated 31st October, 1892. The court having heard the plaintiff by his advocate, and considered the proof, adjudged that the wife had been guilty of adultery on the date set forth, the judgment is that the plaintiff shall remain separate from his wife and shall be given the control of the children. It practically annuls the marriage, as far as separation, but neither party has the right to marry again.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It continues the immorality just the same.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it does not; if this woman were to marry she could be punished for bigamy, but she could not be punished for bigamy if you grant the bill in the shape it is to-day.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There would be no marriage, but there would be immorality just the same.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Now, I hold in my hand what is called the minority report. The following question being put to the witness by the Hon. Mr. Kaulbach: "Are you an Irish Roman Catholic?" was objected to by the Hon. Mr. Lougheed. He moved that the question be struck out of the evidence as irrelevant to the issue, and it was struck out. Then the witness was further asked: "Were you married according to the rites of the religious denomination to which you and your wife belonged?" "Or according to the rites of the church to which you and your wife still belong?" "Have you the same religious faith that you had then?" That is the question that some hon. gentleman said was not asked. Then the petitioner was asked: "Do you believe in the validity of a divorce a vinculo granted by this Parliament?" All these questions were submitted and not answered. Now, will it be maintained that it is treating the House fairly to suppress important inquiries of that kind?" I say no. In any court of justice those would be proper questions to be asked. Under the criminal law, as it passed last session, those were proper questions. All parties now, in civil and criminal proceedings, can be put on the stand and sworn and are obliged to answer. They can be cross-examined to any degree that may be necessary. Those were certainly most important questions, whether the petitioner believed that the marriage was a sacrament or only a contract. If the marriage was only a contract, it could be broken by an Act of Parliament. Was it not important that the House should know it? If, on the contrary, he regarded it as a sacrament of the church, and thought it wrong to violate the oath he had taken at the marriage ceremony, ought not the House to be aware of the facts? Surely we ought to be possessed of all those facts, and I say it is very unfair to this House to attempt to suppress evidence of that kind which must of course come out. You cannot suppress things of that sort; it is impossible to do it.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—And questions put by a member of the committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, by a member of the committee who certainly should be privileged to ask any question he thinks proper. I never heard of anything so inconsistent and arbitrary. In a court of justice those questions would have been perfectly proper. When a man comes up to swear on the Book have you not the right to ask him whether he is a Jew or Gentile? Now is this not a pertinent question?

Have you been faithful to your marriage vows, as far as adultery is concerned, up to the time you instituted proceedings for this divorce?

The question was objected to by the Hon. Mr. McKay. The following answer was made by the witness:

I decline to answer on the advice of counsel.

Ought not the petitioner to come into this court of Parliament with clean hands? Do we propose to grant a divorce to a man who might be already an adulterer? I think it was very unfortunate that this question was not answered. I should hope that it could be answered that he had not committed adultery; and I think it is only fair to the petitioner that he should have been requested to give an answer. We are now left in doubt; everybody who reads the proceedings is left in doubt. Naturally many persons formed an opinion that was not just or correct about so important a fact as coming to Parliament and asking for divorce when the petitioner may or may not have committed adultery himself. Certainly if he did we ought not to grant a divorce. From the standpoint even of those who favour divorce, the petition should not be granted. Yet the committee, for some reason or other, suppressed all those questions. I think it is exceedingly improper and is not fulfilling the duties of the committee or the conditions on which those papers were referred to them. Hon. gentlemen, I suppose, know what the Catholic doctrine is. It is as old as the days of Adam, when God formed Eve out of Adam, and when one became flesh of the other: and it is mentioned in the Christian dispensation in a variety of texts. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, and smile, and sneer at it, but I presume we all profess the Christian religion, and all have belief in the New Testament. I have under my hands what is known as King James's Testament, which I believe is the accepted authority, published by the British and Foreign Bible Society, in which the views of Catholics and the views of a very considerable number of persons not Catholics, are very clearly enunciated; I presume hon. gentlemen are familiar with the verses as they appear in a variety of places in the New Testament, in which the law is distinctly and emphatically laid down. "For this shall a man leave his father and mother and cleave to his wife and they twain shall be one flesh." And then "they are no more twain but one flesh." "What therefore God hath joined together let no man put asunder." And it is laid down in a variety of places that whosoever putteth away his wife and marrieth another, committeth adultery, and who marries her who is put away commits adultery. Those passages occur in various places in Scripture, and there is no place where there is authority for a person to re-marry. There is authority to put away the wife, or husband, where either has committed adultery, but there is no power to re-marry. Now, as one of the evidences showing the enormous increase of divorces where facilities are afforded, I quoted France a few moments ago, where it appeared that in seven months, in 1792, six thousand persons in Paris alone obtained divorce, and in the five years afterwards there were more divorces than marriages. In the United States in the year 1867, there were 9,637 divorces, and in 1886, 25,505. I have not the figures of the present day, but they are in a very largely increasing ratio. While the population only increased 60 per cent, the divorces increased 167 per cent. One of the consequences which appear to flow where divorce laws are loose is that the number of illegitimate children largely increases. In France they number seventy-four for each thousand of those born. In the United States they number seventy; they seem to keep pace one with the other. In conclusion, I would make this remark. I trust if this House is disposed to pass this bill—which I hope it is not—that then the clause allowing the petitioner to marry again should be struck out. If hon. gentlemen have any doubt on any facts that I have brought under their notice in reference to the views of the petitioner respecting the power of Parliament to allow him to re-marry after divorce has been obtained, it would be proper that this bill should be sent back to the committee with instructions to take evidence on that point. I think it is an important matter, because if the petitioner were to state that he does not propose to avail himself of that provision of this bill, then it either should not be passed, or a clause should be inserted that this unfortunate woman should not be permitted to re-marry. The effect of granting a bill of that kind is to permit the guilty party to marry just as readily as the person who is assumed to be innocent. That is the effect of the law, and practically we are, probably, relieving her rather than relieving him.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Some statements have been made in the course of the debate that I could not possibly allow to pass unchallenged. The hon. gentleman from Lunenburg yesterday made the extraordinary assertion that the petitioner in this case was as much to blame, even more to blame than the person from whom the divorce was asked, stating that he had taken his wife over to Paris and deserted her there. He did not mention that Mr. Dillon had taken his wife over to her father, who is a man of good position and wealth in Paris, and left her there with him. I do not know what better he could have done, if they could not get along together, than to leave her with her father. Part of the truth being told sometimes has a much worse effect than a statement which is untrue altogether. The hon. member also stated, and the hon. member from Ottawa reiterated it, that they never knew of any Catholic getting a divorce before. Their memories must be very short indeed, because we had one in 1887. The father of the woman was from Richmond, she was married in Sherbrooke, and she came here and obtained a divorce. Then, last year we had Heward, of Montreal or St. Johns, who was married to Miss Coursolle.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, to an English lady.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Well, to a Roman Catholic.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, you are mistaken. One of the co-respondents was a Catholic, but he was not the petitioner.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I must be mistaken then, but there is no mistake in the Sherbrooke case; and I think there are others as well, if I could recollect them. I was rather more amused than anything else at the hon. gentleman from Ottawa talking about the ease, cheapness and facility with which divorces are obtained here, comparing this with other countries. It is the law of the Dominion that under certain circumstances people can obtain a divorce, but if any one tries it he will find that it is exceedingly dear. I do not know anything that would deter any person from coming to ask for a divorce so much as having to come before two bodies like the Senate and the House of Commons, and the best proof we have that it has so deterred them is, that while in other countries divorces are granted by the thousand or by the twenty-five thousands—as the hon. gentleman from Ottawa stated, and I presume it is correct—in our country we grant one, two, three, five, six, or perhaps seven each session, in a population of between five and six millions. I do not think that that can be considered a large number, and I do not think the divorces are obtained with facility, but the contrary. I do not know of any way in which you could grant divorces which would be less objectionable than this. Then referring to Lower Canada, evidence was taken in the courts there some year or two ago, and the court granted a séparation de corps to this Mr. Dillon, and that is next door to a divorce. It proves that the Divorce Committee is right, and I do not like to hear the criticisms that have been passed upon that committee. There are able, experienced men upon that committee, as good men as we have in this House, conscientious men doing their duty rightly, and it is a very severe criticism to pass upon them, but I suppose their reputation will quite bear anything that has been said about them. I do not think in this House we would have any right to ask whether a man is a Jew or Gentile, Catholic or Protestant, if he is a citizen of Canada, and comes here asking to be relieved or protected under the laws of the Dominion, if he has done everything that is legal and brought the matter properly before the committee. If it is the law that the divorce should be granted, I do not see how you can refuse it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no law that it should be done; we have simply the power if we choose to exercise it.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Well, that power is law, and I do not see how it can be refused to one and granted to another. A senator in this House, who is as good a Roman Catholic as any one, and a conscientious man, stated that he could not be a good Catholic and ask for divorce. I say we have nothing to do with that, but I think it a pity that so much has been said about the committee, and that when remarks are made about Mr. Dillon leaving his wife in Paris, as if he had deserted her there, the whole truth is not told, that she was left there with her father who is in a first class position, and I fail to see what better the petitioner could have done.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I am exceedingly sorry that this question has come before the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It must come here. It could not be kept out.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I shall endeavour to enlighten the hon. member as to how it could be kept down and suppressed before I sit down. The hon. member from Ottawa started with the statement that it was unfair, unjust and unreasonable that the Divorce Committee and this Parliament should offend the sensibilities of two millions of the population of this country who believe, from what I understood him to say, that the Church of Rome is superior to the State.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those were not my words.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I may say plainly and unmistakably that I for one will not submit to any church being superior to the state or to the Parliament of Canada. I am as tolerant as any hon. gentleman in this House. I would refrain from hurting the feelings or sensibilities of any religious denomination, be it small or great, but I demand equal justice and fair-play to all. That is why I expressed my dissent when the hon. gentleman from Ottawa placed the church ahead of Parliament, or of the state. Thank goodness we are living in a country where the people are free, where Parliament is supreme, where the civil rights are enjoyed by all alike, and as long as I live and have a voice I will uphold those rights. The hon. gentleman then stated that if the Parliament of Canada passed this bill they would be annulling to a certain extent the civil code of the province of Quebec. If so I shall be very much surprised, inasmuch as we have had a great number of cases from that province before us, and in every instance, as far as my memory serves me at present, the petition was granted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The petitioners were not Catholics.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It does not make one scintilla of difference whether they are Roman Catholics or Protestants.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—In Lower Canada it has been decided that the ecclesiastical authority shall be the law of the land, for the Catholics at any rate. The Protestants are not under the control of the ecclesiastical authorities in Lower Canada.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Am I to understand that you have two laws in the province of Quebec—one for the Catholic majority and another for the Protestant minority?

Hon. Mr. MASSON—I know we have one for the Catholic majority.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—You are not sure about the other, but has it ever occurred to the hon. gentleman that it is possible to change people's religion as well as their politics?

Hon. Mr. MASSON—They must, by the law, give six months' notice of the change.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Of their intention to change their religion?

Hon. Mr. MASSON—That is, as to the legal authority.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The point I wish to make in this connection is this: that although Dillon and his wife were undoubtedly Roman Catholics when they were married, and were married by a Catholic priest and under the rites of the Roman Catholic church, they cannot be very good members of the church, if they are Roman Catholics at all, at the present time. As I understand it, a person who comes to the Parliament of Canada for a divorce cannot be considered a member of the Roman Catholic Church. Does the doctrine prevail, once a Roman Catholic a Roman Catholic for ever? The doctrine prevailed at one time in Britain that once a British subject always a British subject. I think it is just possible that Roman Catholics, like Protestants, sometimes change their religion, and I do not believe that there is any law in the province of Quebec to prevent them doing so. I hope there is not and it is presumptive evidence, on the very face of it, that the petitioner coming here for a divorce is not a member of the Roman Catholic Church to-day.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Or of any other church.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Probably not a member of any church.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Why was not the question answered?

Hon. Mr. McINNES(B.C.)—I will inform the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg why the question was not answered, and why he was requested not to answer. In the first place it was an irrelevant question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it was not.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B C.)—The hon. gentleman from Ottawa appears to understand the proceedings in the Divorce Committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand what the law of the land is.

Hon. Mr. McINNES(B.C.)—I bow to that; but I have been a member of that Divorce Committee for the last thirteen years, with the exception of three years, and never yet have I heard those questions asked a petitioner in that committee; and I challenge the hon. member from Lunenburg, or any other member of the present committee, or any hon. gentleman who has been a member of a divorce committee during those thirteen years, to point to a single case where those irrelevant questions were asked. As I have always understood the business of that committee since I have been a member of it, it is a select committee to ascertain facts—to see that the facts alleged in the petition were proven, and if they were proven to report the facts to the House and let this House pass judgment upon the case. I claim that the question of religion should never enter into the consideration of that committee. I care not whether the petitioners be Protestants or Roman Catholics, Confucians or Mohammedans, whether they were married by a Roman Catholic clergyman or by a captain of the Salvation Army, as long as the marriage was acknowledged to be legal in this land, and there was a violation of that marriage vow, the petitioner should have the relief that this Parliament can grant, if his case were proven satisfactorily to the committee and to this House. I regret very much indeed that a man must waive his judgment and suppress his feelings to pander to this, that and the other influence, or to avoid irritating the sensibilities of some hon. gentlemen. I have never done it, and I never shall do it. As long as I am a member of the committee I shall endeavour to ascertain all the facts essential to a thorough investigation of each case, and as far as religion is concerned, I claim that the issue ought never to have been raised.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—How is it that even since this case was before the Committee, in the Piper case, these questions were put: "In which church were you married? Under what church rites?" Why in one case is it proper to put such questions and in the other case it is improper?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—What better evidence could the committee have than the certified copy of the priest that married the parties? That was before the committee and what was the necessity of taking up time in eliciting a fact which was already before it in the certified copy of the marriage certificate? That is my answer to the hon. gentleman. The marriage must be proved—By whom were you married—was it by a Protestant or a Roman Catholic clergyman—that is admissible, but when a man's rights were to depend on his faith, whether he was a Protestant or a Roman Catholic, an atheist or anything you please, I claim that it should never be taken into consideration, and it has not been, so far as I am aware, in any committee that I have been on.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—This is the first case of the kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The first case under our constitution that I have ever discovered. I have never known of a case and never heard of a case, nor has anybody else that I have conversed with, in which Catholics were concerned. I gave the evidence that it never had been in old Canada and was not contemplated even in the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada. I think I have given pretty positive evidence on that point.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman from Ottawa also referred to the fact that during the first 18 years of confederation only some nine or ten divorces were granted in this Parliament. I was under the impression that there were more, but I take the figures he has given. The question may be asked, and very properly put—why were there not more applications for divorce in this House? I will answer it—and I think there is only one answer that can be given. The applications were few because of the very great expense of coming to this Parliament. In fact the unwritten law of this Parliament at the present time is that divorce is only for rich men and rich women, those who have means and can afford to come here and get relief. I venture to say if the number of divorces granted to Canadians during those first eighteen years of confederation could all be got at, you would find that they mount up into the hundreds. Where did they get their divorces? They simply slipped across the line to New York, Illinois, Michigan or some of the adjoining states and there they got divorced. In the very case that we have before us, I venture to say if this Parliament will deny the prayer of the petition, it will not be six months until the petitioner gets a divorce on the other side of the line and he will be a divorced man. Hon. gentlemen say no, but I am of that opinion.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—That is not recognized here.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—The hon. gentleman from Halifax knows better than that. The committee was also charged with trying to deceive the House and suppress evidence.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Hear! hear!

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—As a member of that committee I emphatically deny the statement. Every thing essential to elicit the facts in connection with this case was brought out as well as it was possible to bring it out before that committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Was it a proper question to ask him whether he had committed adultery before applying for a divorce?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—I say it was an improper question, and for this reason—that I know of no case that has ever come before a divorce committee in the last thirteen years in which that question was put. I challenge any man in this House to show a case of this kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then they neglected their duty.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There was no occasion to put the question, perhaps.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I understand that even in a court of justice a witness is not asked to criminate himself.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Look at the criminal law of last year.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I am not a lawyer, but I am speaking now from my knowledge of questions which have been put in the committee, and I think every member, even the hon. member from Lunenburg himself, must acknowledge that it is the first time that such a question has ever been put.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I will not say that.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman cannot contradict it.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I have not looked it up. I do not think it is important to know.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—In Gemmill on Divorce, page 118, I find the following:

> In Major Campbell's case on the other hand Mrs. Campbell's adultery being fully proved, her counsel proposed to open matter of recrimination against the petitioner, alleging that he had been living in a state of incontinence, although not prior to the date of the adultery charged against Mrs. Campbell—they were informed that they could not be permitted to enter into such matter.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—By whom?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The law has been changed since them.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—This was in the Divorce Committee.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes, but we have adopted the rules of criminal evidence and the law of evidence in criminal cases, and that law provides that a witness is bound to answer such a question.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—That may be in a court of law, but I say it is the first time in the history of a divorce committee for the last thirteen years—and I believe before then—that such a question was ever asked a petitioner.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I shall always ask it when I think proper.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Several hon. gentlemen try to make capital out of the fact that the respondent had been living apart from her husband for no less than six years. In my recollection of other cases before our committee, the average would be four or five years that the parties had been separated, and in some cases the separation had been for eighteen or nineteen years before application was made for a divorce and under circumstances a great deal more trying than the one now before us. When the question would be asked why did the petitioner not apply sooner for a divorce almost invariably the reply would be "We were not in a position to come and ask Parliament to grant us relief." In this case, as the hon. gentleman from Montreal very properly said, Mrs. Dillon was taken by her husband to the city of Paris where her father, a wealthy gentleman, was living and was left there with her father. He did not leave her without money—he settled an allowance of $50 a month on her, and not only that, but I believe she had a considerable private income of her own besides. If he had taken her there and left her in that great city, the wickedness of which has been so graphically described here to-day, then I would consider that he had contributed very largely towards her downfall. While I am on that point I may say I am one of those who believe that the man who separates from his wife is guilty to a considerable extent of contributing towards her downfall. I am free to admit that but in this case it appears that the husband made every provision that he could to keep her out of harm's way.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—For a living.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Yes, and she was placed under the guardianship of her father. I do not know whether her mother was living there at the time or not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—She is living in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—If there ever was a plain case before a Divorce Committee it is the one under consideration. The respondent became utterly abandoned, as was shown by every witness that was examined there, the father and the brother of the plaintiff, the detective and one or two others, all very intelligent men and, as I understand it, all members of the Roman Catholic Church, too. The evidence given, especially by the detective, was so revolting that no man could for a moment condone the offence of the respondent, as described to the committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no doubt at all about that.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—This discussion proves more strongly than anything that has come before this House for a long time the necessity, the absolute necessity, of taking all divorces out of the hands of Parliament and constituting courts of divorce, attaching them to some of the superior courts of the three provinces that are without divorce courts. By coming to Parliament and publishing the evidence and publishing the facts in the Gazette and in the local newspapers and disseminating the evidence taken before the committee, more injury is done than half a dozen divorce courts in each province could do. We have a divorce court in British Columbia—we had it before confederation. They have one in Prince Edward Island, one in New Brunswick and one in Nova Scotia. I can speak particularly for the province of British Columbia, and I know that we have a case on an average not oftener than once in three or four years.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—About that, and nothing is heard of it.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—You never hear a breath about it. The case is conducted with closed doors, and none of the abominable and demoralizing evidence which this House scatters broadcast through the country ever goes out from the divorce court in our province. I believe that the establishment of divorce courts would have a tendency to lessen the number of applications for divorce, and it certainly would not demoralize and degrade the youth of our country as the present system is doing.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—As one of the committee responsible for this report, and possibly a little responsible for the minority report, I think I may be allowed to say a few words upon our action. The committee is charged with certain duties. The committee is not omnipotent—it is governed by certain rules of the House—and in my opinion cannot exceed its powers. Now rule 115 defines the position that I take and the course that I have taken on that committee :

If adultery be proved the party from whom the divorce is sought may nevertheless be admitted to prove condonation, collusion, connivance or adultery on the part of petitioner.

Now it says that the party from whom the divorce is sought may do that. It does not say that the committee have got to be the accusers, that they are to fish for evidence. It goes further and says :

Condonation, collusion or connivance between the parties is always a sufficient ground for rejecting a bill of divorce, and shall be inquired into by the committee.

Then a little further it says :

And should the committee have reason to suspect collusion or connivance, and deem it desirable that fuller inquiry should be made, the same shall be communicated to the Minister of Justice, that he may intervene and oppose the bill should the interests of public justice in his opinion call for such intervention.

Now, my contention is that it is not the duty of the committee to be accusers. The party from whom the divorce is sought is the one to bring the evidence of adultery, and not the committee to find it if possible. That is one of my reasons for objecting to that question being asked—that it was irrelevant and not dealing with the matter referred to us under the rules of the House. We were not given that privilege, and therefore I objected to the question being put. Before confederation I acted as a member of a Divorce Committee, and I must say I was amazed the first time a divorce bill came before us at the action taken by some members of the House. I did not understand those matters then as I understand them now. I saw the report of that committee on the Benning case, voted against by every member holding certain views. I was green at the business, I suppose, and did not understand it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They voted against it on principle.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Of course they did, but I did not understand it then and I was amazed at their action. It seemed that in their judgment the evidence did not amount to anything.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—I was under the impression that when any one assumed the position of a senator, he came to the Upper House to discharge his duties as a representative of the people and to do justice to all who came before him. In the case to which I have referred, Mr. Benning asked for a divorce from his wife. He had set apart six hundred dollars a year for her maintenance for life. It was proven that she had occupied the same stateroom on a steamer down the St. Lawrence with a man, and remained with him for some days. It was also proved that she was seen in a house of assignation with the same man. Everything pointed to criminality on her part, and when I saw every member of the House of a particular faith voting against that bill I was amazed. I have seen the same action taken ever since when a vote has been recorded on a divorce case.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—They opposed it on principle.

Hon Mr. READ (Quinté)—Yes, I understand that now, but I was green then, and the action of those gentlemen made a very strong impression on my mind. We all know the religious difficulties we had to fight before confederation. We know how touchy we were with one another under the old union of Upper and Lower Canada, when it used to be a subject of complaint on the part of the Liberals that the Conservatives always supported the Roman Catholics in maintaining their religious privileges. In England it was the same Conservative element that supported the Catholics in obtaining the Emancipation Bill. I remember it well. I was quite a boy then. I remember how we were criticised in this country for the stand we took—we were told by our Liberal friends that we were priest-ridden and that we were greenbacked Orangemen, or something of that sort. I know that several Conservatives lost their elections through voting for Catholic Bills. When confederation was brought about, representatives of all the original four provinces met in solemn conclave. There were no reporters present to take down their remarks. They met to enact a law that would settle these difficulties, and what did they put in the British North America Act on the subject of divorce? That the Dominion Parliament was to have control of marriage and divorce. Why did they not say that divorce should not be granted to Roman Catholics if it was so intended? If it was not intended that all Her Majesty's subjects in this country, irrespective of creed, should have the same right to apply for a divorce here, why was it not put in the British North America Act that Catholics should not be granted divorces? I have in my hand a book which shows there are seventy-seven religions represented on this continent. Are we to inquire into the dogmas of all petitioners who profess those various religions? I contend that the committee is not bound to do anything of the kind. Only a few years ago we had a Jewess applying for a divorce, and she received that consideration at our hands to which she was entitled, and the bill was passed by Parliament to relieve her from the marriage. I am told by her father that she is married now, and happy, in New York. This is the reason why I objected to the question being asked about the petitioner's religion in this case. I considered it was none of our duty to inquire into that question, and nothing I have heard to-day has convinced me that it was our duty to act otherwise than as we did. As I understand, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, Roman Catholics are not excluded from the divorce courts, and I do not think they should be excluded here. Again, it seems to be assumed that a man that is brought up in any religious faith must not have an opportunity when he becomes of age to change it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He has a perfect right to do so.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—He has a perfect right and we are not to know that these people have not changed their religion. It is for the church to deal with them; it is not a matter for Parliament. How are they doing with General Breckenridge in the United States to-day? Is he not to be tried by the Presbyterian Church for his misconduct? It is for the church to deal with Dillon's religion, not for Parliament to do so. If he was a Hindoo he could claim his rights to come before this Parliament and if the evidence was sufficient to grant him relief it would be our duty to report the preamble proved. Now it has been said that divorce in this Parliament is cheap and easy. I pity anybody who has to go through the ordeal. I think there is every protection given and that no injustice will be done to any party. The notice to be given and the careful scrutiny all through the proceedings will protect the interest of the parties and of the public, and no case can go by default merely. I once had a bill here and the party did not get his divorce. I saw he was going to be beaten before the case was half through. He told me the lawyers were drawing upon him every ,other day and if it lasted a little longer he would be bankrupt. I pity anybody who is unfortunate enough to have to come here; the process is far from cheap and easy. Now are we to establish the precedent that no Catholic need apply? If that is what we are to do, when they passed the British North America Act they ought to have put a clause in to that effect and saved us all this trouble. There is nothing more disagreeable to me than to have to take this firm stand, but I must hold to my opinions, and those who are adverse to divorce must take an equally firm stand against it. They do not judge the case on its merits. There can be no doubt that the proof of the woman's guilt is conclusive in this case. Then, if the merits of the case warrant the relief, should we not grant it? We have been told that the committee showed a desire to suppress evidence. I dissent from that entirely. I admit at once that I disapproved of the questions which were ruled out, because the issue that they raised was not submitted to us. We were not to deal with the religion of any persons coming before the committee. All the members of the committee but one thought that the question was irrelevant and had no bearing upon the case. The other question read by the hon. gentleman, with the answer to it, showed that that at least was not evi lence and should not have been put. Then again it is assumed that these people are Roman Catholics. We know that they were married in a Roman Catholic church; it is assumed that their fathers and mothers possibly brought them up in the Catholic Church, but I have heard of proselytism and people changing their religion. It is no uncommon thing for a good strict high church clergyman to go over to the Catholic faith, but you very seldom hear of a Methodist doin; so. There seems to be a frail partition between the High Church and Roman Catholic Church, and they go over very easily. I find in a book here that the number of reverend gentlemen who have left the Established Church and joined the Roman Catholic Church is very large. Supposing any of these gentlemen came for a divorce, they would not get it, I suppose, since they joined the Church of Rome.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Supposing Father Chiniquy came here for a divorce.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If he had left the Catholic Church he would be entitled to it. We do not interfere with others.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—We have got to settle this question whether a Roman Catholic or a Protestant has a right to have justice administered to him by the Parliament of this country. I believe this man has proven the preamble of the bill, and I for one am prepared to vote for it. Of course I have done so already, and I hope the majority of this House will do so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is to be regretted that the question of the religious creed of the parties to this divorce bill has taken up so much of the time and attention of the Senate as it has: but that I suppose is what was naturally to be expected. With respect to what has fallen from the hon. gentleman beside me, who has just spoken on the subject, I try to put myself in the place of some one else. I put this case: If these parties, instead of being Roman Cotholics, happened to be Presbyterians; if it were part of the Westminster confession of faith that marriage was indissoluble; if these parties resided in Ontario instead of in Quebec, and if the provincial law of Ontario, existing before confederation, and still in force, declared that these parties could not be divorced; as a member of this House I should feel that the question whether the House should give a divorce to these parties under the circumstances, no matter whether adultery was shown or not, would be one of considerable importance. Certainly it is a question that I should be disposed to give a great deal of consideration to. I do not say that the House should be precluded from granting the divorce or passing the bill in that case, but I submit to hon. gentlemen that there would be at least some reason to consider the position of things; that the feelings of the great majority of the people of Ontario, supposing them all to be of that faith, would deserve to be considered and that consideration should be shown to the law of that province. The Senate would not be bound by the doctrines of the Presbyterian Church, nor by the law of Ontario, but they would deserve consideration. That is my point. Now, different members of this House form different views on the subject. Some hon. gentlemen think that this question of religion and of the laws of the province from which the parties come deserves no consideration whatever. Others think that that question of religion alone settles and disposes of the whole matter. Then there are others who occupy a position between the two, who think that some weight should be given to those circumstances; and I may say that for myself I rather occupy that position. Having said that much, hon. gentlemen, I do not propose to deal with this question of religion or province any further. Inasmuch as they is a difference of opinion in the House, and as the views with respect of the religious aspects of the case have been put very strongly by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, it is not necessary to add anything further upon that topic. What has been said by the hon. gentlemen from Lunenburg, DeLanaudière and Ottawa on that subject is perfectly true, but as a member of this House, I think it is on the whole better to deal with this question rather as I should be called upon to deal with it if I were sitting as a judge in a divorce court and I had the circumstances of the case before me as we have them here. Even professing the faith which I do, if I sat as a judge in a divorce court it would be my duty, I presume, to decide according to the evidence and the law, and I think that is the better way to look at the case. Before I undertake to deal with the case in that way, there is just one observation which I should like to make, because two or three hon. gentlemen have animadverted on the fact that the Roman Catholic members of the Senate as a rule oppose divorces. Now, hon. gentlemen, that is true in one sense, and in another sense it is not true. I generally vote against a divorce bill, because I am not quite clear whether I should be justified in voting for it, and I do it in order to save my conscience; on the other hand, perhaps I should be justified in voting for it if the evidence warranted me as a judge in doing so. That is a question which I do not care to pronounce upon; but as regards the practical working of the thing, every hon. gentleman knows that, as a rule, where there are two parties before the Senate, neither of whom belongs to the Roman Catholic Church, the Catholic members of this body do not interpose difficulties in the way of the passing of the measure. This is the point, that there is no practical difficulty interposed. If a clear case, sufficient to satisfy a judge, has been made out, the Catholic members of this body interpose no difficulties in the way of granting a divorce, where the parties, as members of their own denominations, are entitled to relief; but when people come here who are precluded by the doctrines of their church from getting a divorce, it is a different matter. What are the circumstances of this case? I am free to admit that when I heard about this Dillon case—I think before all the evidence was in—I was under the impression that the petitioner in this case was one of the most foully wronged men who had ever lived, and that his wife was one of the most utterly depraved and incurably vicious women of whom I had ever heard. Having read the evidence with a reasonable amount of care, the impression made upon my mind by the perusal of that evidence has been of a totally different character. I am not going to read the evidence, but I may state it generally. These people were married in 1883: they lived together for five years, apparently in about the same way in which many married couples live together; there were three children born of the marriage. It would appear that the dispositions of Dillon and his wife did not altogether harmonize, but it does not appear whose fault it was. The fact that they did not quite suit one another is apparent, or at any rate it is apparent that Mrs. Dillon did not suit Mr. Dillon after the lapse of some years, but it does not appear whose fault that was. After a lapse of five years Mr. Dillon causes a separation in Paris; I think it may be gathered from the evidence that the separation was at his instance. He does not allege that there was any substantial cause at all—simply that their dispositions were incompatible, and that his wife was rather extravagant and did not give as much time to her children as he thought she should. It may be that Mr. Dillon was too exacting. His wife may have been rather fond of society and fond of amusement in an innocent way, and he may have been too severe and too exacting, as husbands sometimes are; but he admits that there was no ground for this separation based upon her immorality, and that is the essential point. When people get married they are supposed, in the words that are used in our church, to take one another for better or for worse. A man does not marry an angel, and as a rule the woman does not get an angel either; and they have to accept one another with their human imperfections. If the woman does not turn out to be quite as angelic as the man fancied when he married her, the man, if he is a man at all, accepts the position and makes the best he can of it. Mr. Dillon did not take that view, instead of bearing with his wife's little frivolities or imperfections, he chose to put her away, and that happened seven years ago. This young woman was left with her father in Paris. I do not animadvert on that fact. I do not think there is anything to be said about that. The evidence seems to show that he left her with her father in Paris, and after a little while she came back to live with her mother in Montreal. The husband came to Montreal and lived there, being absent occasionally for some time in New York and other places, and this couple lived altogether separate and apart for the period of six years; and in the evidence the petitioner states most distinctly that during all those six years he had no ground of complaint against his wife; that there was nothing to be said against her conduct, looked at from a moral point of view, during all those six years. Now, hon. gentlemen, I am not talking of this case as a matter of law. I propose to say something about the law later on; but as a matter of common sense, if a woman, still young and rather fond of society, is deprived of the society of her husband and of her children, is exiled from society and left to shift for herself in a comparatively gay city like Montreal, what is the result that one might expect to follow? I do not say one would naturally expect it, but what is the result that is not at all unnatural to follow? This man stood by. For six years he allowed this woman, whom he had promised to protect and cherish, to be exposed to temptation, as though he had no care for her, and the very moment he heard that the thing which one might not unnaturally have expected had happened, he took proceedings. Does it not look, not only as though his negligence had conduced to the result which did ultimately occur, but as though he had deliberately thrown that woman in the way of temptation and had done it probably with a view of marrying somebody else to whom he had taken a fancy? That is the way it strikes me, hon. gentlemen. It is not necessary to deal with the evidence; I think I have honestly stated the facts just about as they exist. If any hon. gentleman can tell me where I have misstated the facts, I shall be glad to be corrected. Under these circumstances, supposing these people were Confucians or Mahommedans, would this House be justified in giving a divorce?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—As far as the religion went, they would.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not talking about religion; I put that aside. Supposing these people had been Mahommedans or Confucians would this House have been justified, as a matter of law and common sense, in granting a divorce to this man?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—They have always done it on much less evidence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman says they have always done it. I do not pursue those divorce cases with any care, but I am not aware of any case in which they have done it. I cannot recall a case where a man has separated from his wife without any reasonable cause and remained separated from her for a number of years, and where he has got a divorce afterdswar on the ground of her adultery, subsequent to that desertion on his part.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The hon. gentleman asked, if he were ignoring anything in the evidence placed before the committee, that it might be brought to his attention. He told us the fault was entirely upon Mr. Dillon. Would he kindly look at the question asked by Mr. Kaulbach on the second page: "Had you cause at that time that you considered warranted a separation?"—that is, before the arrival in Paris—and the answer was: "Our life had been a very unpleasant one for two or three years before." Q. "By reason of what?"—A. "Continued absences from home, neglect of her children and other duties." Should not that modify the statement of the hon. member?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman had nothing stronger than that to say, I do not think it was worth while interrupting me. If it is necessary, or if there is any doubt about it, I shall substantiate what I have said by a reference to the evidence. I said something with respect to the intention. The impression left upon my mind, from reading this evidence, is that this man had deliberately formed the intention of getting rid of his wife at some comparatively early stage during their married life. He is asked with reference to what took place in Paris—"Was the intention of separating thought of before you went to Paris?" He replies: "I suppose it was contemplated on my part; I had not formed any definite plans or decided upon any." But he was thinking of the separation and looking forward to it, and his wife knew nothing about it. Their life had been an unpleasant one. If all the husbands and wives whose lives are more or less unpleasant were to be divorced, there would be a very general opening of doors and scattering of families all over the country. And when he was asked what the cause was, he said incompatibility and extravagance. That was his opinion. Now, here are a couple of questions and the answers by the petitioner:

> Had you any cause to suspect that she was unfaithful to you previous to your mutual separation?—A. I had no cause; I had ideas on the subject, but I could not form an opinion; I simply had an impression.
>
> Q. Had you any reason to suppose that she was unfaithful to you during the six years that you were separated?—A. No reason whatsoever. As far as I knew she was living a perfectly proper life with her mother up to the time that I instituted those proceedings for a legal separation.

There is the position, and I do not think any hon. gentleman can point to a case which has come before Parliament where the circumstances have been the same as the circumstances here.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—May I ask the hon. gentleman if he thinks the mother was a very proper woman ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are not trying Mrs. Dillon's mother at present. We have enough characters in the case without bringing in any more. We should deal with the evidence. I think the evidence clearly bears out the view that I have expressed, that this man had no substantial cause for separating from his wife, and that he placed her in the way of temptation, and when the result has followed that might not unnaturally have been expected to follow, he has to take the consequences. I think he cannot expect Parliament to do what a divorce court would not do for him and dissolve his marriage with this woman. If we were to do that it would simply encourage similar lines of conduct on the part of other husbands who wanted to get rid of their wives. All a man who got tired of his wife and wanted to marry some other woman would have to do would be to separate from her, pay her alimony and throw her in the way of temptation, in the hope that she might fall and he might be free to marry somebody else, and I do not think hon. gentlemen of this House ought to encourage anything of that sort. There is another point that I do not propose to dwell on at any length, but it is worth while calling attention to it before I go to speak of the law. I think this point really deserves a good deal of attention. He was asked :

Have you been faithful to your marriage vows as far as adultery is concerned up to the time you instituted proceedings for this divorce ?

That is the date which is always set in these cases, the time when proceedings begin. This question was objected to and the following answer was made by the witness:

I decline to answer on the advice of counsel.

Hon. gentlemen will notice that the petitioner declined to answer that question on the advice of counsel. What is the natural presumption? The natural presumption is that if the answer to that question would have been favourable to himself the witness would have answered it. Now every lawyer knows that when a man declines to answer a question like that, the natural presumption is that he could not answer it in a way which would be satisfactory to himself. That he must answer it in a way which is calculated to injure him.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I think our Criminal Act provides against that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am quite aware it would not expose him to criminal proceedings. But if the witness had been able to say he had been faithful to his marriage vows, does any hon. gentleman say he would not have replied " Yes. "

Hon Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—He said he was.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He did not; he declined to answer on the advice of counsel. That was when he was asked if he had been faithful to his marriage vows up to the beginning of these proceedings? And then he was asked,

Up to the time you went Paris had you during your married life criminal conversation with anybody else? " Most certainly not "

Now should he not have declined to answer that question as well as the other, if he was acting on any principle? Then he adds: "During the whole time of my married life, up to the time I separated from my wife in Paris." If the petitioner was able to continue, why did he not continue, and say " and ever since ? " Then he would have put himself before the committee with a clean record, but he does not do that. Is not the natural presumption that he has been unfaithful to his wife since the separation in Paris?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It is the natural presumption perhaps, but it is not proof.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I know, but I am putting it to you as men of common sense and men of the world—is not the natural presumption that that man has not been faithful to his marriage vows, and does not that place him in this position, that he comes before the court with a clouded record. According to his own evidence, his wife's record was clear up to a few months ago, and the presumption is that his own record was not clear, and then because she has fallen, as he previously had fallen, we are asked to pass this bill to relieve him and to discredit her.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 6 o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, May 17th, 1894.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

FREIGHT RATES ON THE C. P. & I. C. RAILWAYS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a schedule of the passenger and freight rates of the Intercolonial Railway ; and the revenue derived by the Canadian Pacific Company on its western division, between Port Arthur and Calgary, for the financial years ending 1892 and 1893.

He said : The object of my preferring this request is in pursuance of the position that I took before this honourable House in asking that the freight rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway might be laid upon the table in order to ascertain to what extent discrimination was exercised against the people of the western country in consequence of the absence of competition, and how far it was oppressing the industry of the great western country. The Intercolonial Railway being a Government work and carried on by the Government I wish to have the opportunity of comparing the freight rates prevailing upon that line with the freight rates which prevail on the Canadian Pacific Railway on which we reside, and to which we are subjected, although far away from water communication for the transport of our produce. With regard to the other portion of my motion, as to the revenue derived by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, I think it is a matter of importance that this honourable House should know what proportion of revenue is derived from the country west of Port Arthur. The Canadian Pacific Railway is divided into several divisions : the Atlantic Division, the Central Division and Western Division and the Pacific Division. The Western Division extends from Port Arthur, at the head of Lake Superior, as far as Calgary, at the foot of the Rocky Mountains. The contention has been made that the depreciation in the traffic returns of the Canadian Pacific, which we all regret to see has taken place in the last three or four months, has come from the country west of Lake Superior. I think it is important, especially in connection with the discussion that may further arise with regard to the freight rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the discrimination which is exercised against the western country, that we should know exactly what revenue is derived from the carrying trade of the prairies between Port Arthur and Calgary, because it affects the questions that people there are discussing with a great deal of heat and a great deal of anxiety.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There will be no objection to the motion passing, but whether the hon. gentleman can obtain the information he seeks, is a question that can only be solved on the application to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Whether they keep their books in such a manner as to be enabled to comply with the Order of the House, I am not in a position to say ; whether they keep a distinct account of the receipts of each division, of the earnings from the traffic of the road and the receipts derived therefrom, this information can only be ascertained after application is made to the company for an answer to the Order of the House. Of course the information asked for concerning the Intercolonial Railway can be very easily obtained, but I may point out to the House and to the hon. gentleman that I think it would be scarcely fair to make a comparison based on a return of the rates charged upon the Intercolonial Railway, run in the interests more particularly of the country, and not for the purpose of profit, being a Government railway exclusively, with the rates charged by a company run in the interests of stockholders. I merely point out this fact to my hon. friend in order that he may not come to a conclusion on the comparison, for instance, of coal rates upon the Intercolonial Railway and upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, and considering also the peculiar circumstances under which they were built and also the country through which they run and the principles upon which both these roads are run, it would be scarcely fair to point out to the people of this country that because the Government is running a railway in the interests solely of the whole community, without any hope or expectation of obtaining dividends therefrom, that they would expect private enterprises to be carried on in the same manner.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DELAY IN PRINTING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The House will remember that the hon. member from Barrie complained a few days ago of delay in the printing of the evidence in the Dillon Divorce case which has been under consideration for a couple of days in this House. I was asked to make inquiry, and in justice to the Printing Department, the Secretary of State has placed in my hands an answer which I will read, and the House will see that it is not the fault of the printing office. The statement sent from the Printing Bureau is as follows:

> The evidence came down to the Bureau on Friday, May 4th at 5.30 p.m. The proof was sent to the Senate on the morning of the next day at 1 o'clock p.m., Saturday, May 5th. The proof was returned to the Bureau on Monday, May 7th, at 1 o'clock p.m. and with it came four pages in manuscript of new matter in the shape of exhibits added. Of the whole 350 copies were printed off and delivered at the distribution room of Parliament on Tuesday, the 8th May, at 6 o'clock p.m. and receipted for. On the night of the 7th May four pages more of matter in connection with this case but additional to and separate from, above were received and 100 copies were ordered. These 100 copies were delivered on the morning of Tuesday, the 8th of May at the distribution room of Parliament and receipted for. The whole of the documents were in the distribution room on the 8th May, at 6 o'clock p.m., and the Bureau had nothing more to do in the matter.

I believe the copies of the evidence were not distributed until the 10th or 11th of the month. I place the House in possession of these facts in order that they may see that the fault lies either with our own officers or with the Distribution Office. I trust that the Clerk will take the trouble to see where these delays occur in order that the members may be put in possession of documents and avoid complaints in the future.

THE ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I presume there will be no objection to proceeding with the second readings of Bills on the Orders before resuming the debate on the Dillon Divorce Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think there is no objection to doing so.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. member from Halifax called attention to this matter yesterday and on looking at the rules I find that he was strictly correct. I should like to know why the unfinished debate on the Dillon Divorce Bill is made the 10th order to-day. I call attention to this, because it should be the first order according to the rules.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think I said yesterday that the intention of the committee who framed the rules was that the business under consideration at the adjournment should take precedence of all business except third readings, but I had some doubt as to whether the intention was carried out by the rule. All the Orders of the Day on this paper were Orders of the Day yesterday and were not proceeded with. Under the rule they should take precedence therefore unless otherwise ordered. Under the wording of the rule it is questionable whether the order is not correctly made up to-day, and I do not intend to raise any question about it myself. I am disposed to think that the clerk is right.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If this order had precedence yesterday after third readings and was then not completed, does it lose its position because it stands over for another day? The House adjourned while it was considering that question, and that being the case it should occupy precisely the same position on the Orders of to-day as it did on the day on which it was discussed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think it ought to lose its position on the Orders. I do not think it was the intention of the committee that it should, but I am not clear as to the wording of the rule.

EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES ON OATH BILL.

The Order of the Day being called,

Consideration of amendments made in Committee of the Whole House to Bill (90) "An Act to provide for the examination of witnesses on oath by the Senate and House of Commons."

Hon. Mr. POWER said: I wish to call the attention of the Government to the fact that this bill conflicts with an existing statute with respect to the examination of witnesses. If hon. gentlemen turn to chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes they will find provision there as to the manner in which witnesses are to be examined. Section 20 says that witnesses may be examined on oath at the bar of the Senate and that the oaths shall be administered by the clerk. Then any select committee of the Senate or House of Commons may examine witnesses on oath or affirmation, such oath to be administered by any member of the committee. The bill now before us provides that the oath shall be administered only by the chairman. In the other case it provides that the oath shall be administered by the Speaker or by some other person appointed by the House. I think the bill should be amended so as to make the practice uniform.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I would ask the indulgence of the House to let the bill stand for a few minutes. The bill was introduced by the Minister of Justice in the House of Commons and taken charge of by the Minister of Agriculture in this House and may therefore be regarded as a Government measure.

SEAMEN'S ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of the Bill (13) "An Act to amend the Seamen's Act." He said: This is the same bill, with some slight changes, that was introduced by myself and passed through the Senate last session but which was delayed for some reason in the other House. This year it was introduced by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in the Commons, and this House is now asked to give its assent to the measure. The principle of the bill is the same as the principle of last year's measure, to give certain liens on vessels for the recovery of wages and disbursements properly made by the master on account of the ship. The second subsection repeals section 69 of the old Act and adopts a new clause, which provides for the relief of seamen found abroad in distress. The words "domiciled in Canada" mean residence in Canada for six months. These are the only changes in the present law.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Can the hon. gentleman tell us if there is reciprocity on the part of foreign nations? Do foreign nations give the same aid to our seamen?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am not aware that I can give the hon. member a distinct and positive answer, but the same thing is done in England and most of the British possessions. My impression is that the same practice prevails throughout the whole of Europe and also in America.

The motion was agreed to.

EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES ON OATH BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved that the amendments made in Committee of the Whole House to Bill (90) "An Act to provide for the examination of witnesses on oath by the Senate and House of Commons," be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I called the attention of the House to the fact that there was some discrepancy between this bill and the existing law, with a view to the Minister's securing uniformity if he so desired. With the permission of the House I shall venture to repeat the observations which I made then. The seventh clause of the bill is as follows :—

> Any oath or affirmation under this Act may be administered by the Speaker of the Senate or of the House of Commons, or by the chairman of any committee of the Senate or House of Commons, or by such person or persons as may from time to time be appointed for that purpose, either by the Speaker of the Senate or by the Speaker of the House of Commons or by any standing order or other order of the said Senate or House of Commons respectively.

That differs from the existing provision. I do not undertake to say which is the wiser provision. Section 20 of chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows :

Witnesses may be examined upon oath or affirmation when allowed by law at the bar of the Senate and for that purpose the clerk of the Senate may administer such oaths to any such witness.

The clerk is the official there. Section 21 says :

Any select committee of the Senate or House of Commons to which any private bill has been referred by either House, respectively, may examine witnesses on oath or affirmation if affirmation is allowed by law, upon matters relating to such bill, and for that purpose the chairman or any member of such committee may administer such oath or affirmation to any such witness.

You see there any member of the committee may administer the oath, whereas in the bill before us the power is confined to the chairman. I do not undertake to say which is the better provision, but I think it would be well to have them harmonize.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not think the two provisions conflict at all. Both may be used. In one case it refers to a select committee of the Senate to which any private bill has been referred. In that case the witness is to be sworn by the chairman, or by any member of the said committee. In the bill now before the House it does not apply to select committees specially, because if it did there would be no necessity for the present law. It applies to all committees whether they are special or not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Every committee, except the Committee of the Whole, is a select committee.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They are not called so in the law. Some of them are called special committees and we know what they are, committees charged with a special investigation, and we know what standing committees are : they are formed under the rules of the House also. They differ from what is called a special committee. In the case of a standing committee, this bill provides that witnesses may be examined under oath, which power the standing committees had not before, and it is regulated in which way the witnesses appearing before them may be sworn. They do not conflict with one another, and I see no necessity of making any further amendment in this. There is no contradiction ; one provision is as good as the other.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The bill does not confine the examination to standing committees. The bill says any committee of the Senate or the House of Commons may administer the oath to any witness examined before such committee and then provides that the oath shall be administered by the chairman. Section 21 of chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes provides that the oath may be administered by the chairman or any other member of the committee. However, it is not a matter of very much consequence.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

THE DILLON DIVORCE BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being read

Resuming the further adjourned Debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Gowan for the adoption of the Fourteenth Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Dillon relief Bill.—(Honourable Mr. Power) ;—and consideration of the Minority Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Dillon relief Bill.—(Honourable Mr. Kaulbach).

Hon. Mr. POWER said : I may be allowed perhaps, before saying anything further, to express my regret that yesterday I was betrayed on one or two occasions into using language towards hon. gentlemen who interrupted me which was perhaps rather too direct or pronounced. I should perhaps have been more careful in the language I used. It will be in the remembrance of this House that yesterday I expressed the opinion that the Senate should decline to pass this bill chiefly on two grounds. One ground was that the petitioner, by separating himself from his wife and depriving her of his protection, had conduced to the offence which she undoubtedly committed, and therefore was not entitled to the relief which he seeks; and the other ground was that in taking a view of the evidence which we were entitled to take, it appeared that there was a presumption that the petitioner himself did not come before the House with a perfectly clean record and that for that reason he was not entitled to relief. I put that to the House merely as a matter of common sense and ordinary practical reasoning. I shall now try to show hon. gentlemen that we reach the same conclusion if we look at the thing from the point of view of our rules and practice in this House, and the decisions of the courts of law in England. I may say that it has been shown by I think the three hon. gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to this bill that, taking as authority the deceased leader of the House—the late Sir John Abbott—and the hon. gentleman from Barrie, the House is not bound by any strict rules; that each case has to be governed by its own circumstances, and that the House has a perfectly free hand in dealing with each case and may pass the bill or refuse to pass it just as the House thinks best in the interests not only of the parties to the bill but of the public. Even though that ground be not assumed, I propose to direct the attention of the House briefly to some of our rules which appear to bear out the views which I advocate. Rule 107 has been relied upon by hon. gentlemen who have spoken in favour of this bill. It is alleged that this rule says that the petition must negative condonation, collusion and connivance, that there is nothing said about misconduct on the part of the petitioner and that therefore that does not come before the House. Now I respectfully submit that the rule does not bear any such construction as that. It is provided that the petitioner in his petition must negative condonation, collusion and connivance. It is not stated that there is no other defence to the bill, because there may be several other reasons why a bill should not pass. The petitioner is obliged, in order to get himself before parliament, to negative condonation, collusion and connivance; but that does not close the door to other reasons why he should not get the bill. His evidence may not prove sufficient. There may be several reasons besides those which are mentioned here why he should not get his bill, but these are the only ones which he is obliged before proceeding to trial to negative. Then I direct the attention of the House to rule 113 which says.

> When a bill is read the second time it shall be referred to the Standing Committee on Divorce who shall proceed with all reasonable despatch to hear and inquire into the allegations set forth in the preamble of the bill, and take evidence touching the same and the right of the petitioner to the relief prayed.

Clearly the committee have to ascertain whether the petitioner has a right to the relief prayed for or not. Rule 115 shows certain grounds upon which the petitioner may be held not to have the right to the relief which he prays for. One of these is adultery on the part of the petitioner; so that it is a perfectly good ground. There is nothing in our rule which shuts out that ground; and it is a ground which is allowed by the law of England. Further, rule 117 says that the "rules of evidence in force in Canada in respect of indictable offences shall, subject to the provisions of these rules, apply to proceedings before the said committee and shall be observed in all questions of fact." Now what is the rule with respect to indictable offences? It is this—I quote section 5 of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893:

> No person shall be excused from answering any question upon the ground that the answer to such question may tend to criminate him, or may tend to establish his liability to a civil proceeding at the instance of the Crown or of any other person; provided, however, that no evidence so given shall be used or receivable in evidence against such person in any criminal proceeding thereafter instituted against him other than a prosecution for perjury in giving such evidence.

So that it is perfectly clear that the witness in this case, who was the petitioner, having tendered himself as a witness before the committee was bound to answer any question which was asked him by the committee if it was relevant to the petition. In fact, I think a question might be asked which was not relevant, but certainly if the question was relevant to the matter before the committee he was bound to answer. Now the questions which were put by the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg with respect to the conduct of the petitioner himself previous to and subsequent to the separation from his wife were relevant questions, because the law is clear that misconduct on the part of the petitioner would be sufficient reason why he should not get the bill. The question as to whether he had himself been guilty of such misconduct as to deprive him of a right to a bill was a question which was peculiarly in point and relevant to the inquiry, and consequently under this statute the petitioner was bound to answer that question. In the judgment of a majority of the committee it was decided otherwise. I do not find fault with the committee—I have no doubt but that they acted in accordance with their honest views, but they were mistaken. I presume the committee were were more or less influenced by the authority of the chairman, who has had a long experience in court; but who, it is perhaps not uncharitable to say, has not the vigour of intellect at the present time that he formerly had. This view is borne out by the fact that the chairman of the committee has expressed views in connection with this bill totally at variance with views which he expressed in connection with other bills, notably in the Tudor-Hart case. In that instance he took the ground that we were not bound by strict rules of evidence and practically that the Senate was a law unto itself. I have no doubt the majority of the committee were influenced by the authority of the hon. chairman and justifiably and reasonably so.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—According to your opinion could the committee shut out any question put by a member of the committee?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is another question. I noticed that the hon. chairman of the committee and other hon. gentlemen in discussing this question have treated it as though it were a case of a question put by counsel for the respondent. Now, that was not the case. In this instance the respondent did not appear. From the evidence of the language which she used when the notice of this bill was served on her it is clear that she was just as anxious that the bill should pass as the petitioner was. She did not appear before the committee; and consequently, there being a sort of material collusion, the duty of the committee was to look after the interests of public morality and to see that all the evidence which bore upon the matter was brought before the committee. The members of the committee sat, as I take it, not in the position of counsel or witnesses or anything of that sort, but in the capacity of judges; and I think it is an unheard of thing that one judge should say that a question put by another judge should not be answered, or that the question or answer should not be taken down, if the evidence is recorded.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is undoubted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the conduct of the committee in that respect—conduct no doubt in which they were perfectly honest and in which they thought they were justified—was really not justified but was arbitrary in the extreme. Rule 115 is the one which says that, if adultery be proved, the party from whom the divorce is sought may nevertheless be admitted to prove connivance, collusion or adultery on the part of the petitioner. I am not going on the ground assumed by the hon. gentleman from Barrie on previous occasions and by other leading members of the House, that the Senate can do as it pleases, but I suppose that we are governed to a certain extent by rule and precedent. I turn to Gemmill's book on Divorce, page 106, and I find that he speaks of the four matters which are mentioned in this rule. He says:

> It may be assumed that if any one of the four be established it is a sufficient ground for rejecting the bill; the chief difference seems to be that the committee only inquires into the allegation of the petitioner's adultery when invoked to do so by the respondent. But it is submitted that Parliament, and consequently the committee, is not limited to the grounds referred to in refusing to report a bill for relief, but may look at all the circumstances of a case and refuse to confer an advantageous privilege upon an unworthy suppliant when, for example, the condition upon which claim is made has grown out of the individual's own iniquity. Nay, more, as urged by Senator Gowan, Parliament may and ought always to have in regard, not merely the question, as it affects the parties, but the effect in relation to morals and good order—the effect which the passing of a particular law might have upon the well-being of the community. Parliament, as the supreme power, has its duties and responsibilities, and cannot compromise the well-being of society, but is bound to consider what would most tend to the public good.

Now I think it is clear that it would not tend to the public good to have it understood that whenever a man gets tired of his wife, all he has to do is to separate from her with the hope or expectation that she may fall, and then come and ask for a divorce. It would be a very unfortunate thing if that should get to be understood throughout the country. One hon. gentleman yesterday, I think the hon. member from Victoria (Mr. McInnes), said that the evidence of guilt on the part of the petitioner was not admissible—that it was not admitted by the House of Lords; but I think the hon. gentleman is slightly in error. I turn to the page of Gemmill which the hon. gentleman cited, page 118, and I find this language:

That House (the House of Lords) seems to have recognized a distinction between the adultery committed by a petitioner prior to that complained of, and adultery committed subsequent; and to have rejected evidence of the petitioner's adultery, if it had been committed subsequent to that complained of. But if the recriminated adultery took place prior to that complained of by the petitioner, the House always rejected the bill.

If we are to presume guilt on the part of the petitioner in this case, his offence took place prior to that of which he complains in his petition, which took place only last September, and in such cases the House of Lords rejected the bill, so that the page from which the hon. gentleman quoted seems to contain the antidote to his subtle poison.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The guilt is only presumptive in this case though.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The very next passage is as follows:—

In Major Bland's case, Mrs. Bland's witnesses proved that Major Bland's conduct had been extremely culpable; it appearing among other scandalous improprieties that he had a woman in keeping, whom he passed off as Mrs. Bland, and the Lords rejected the bill.

In Major Campbell's case, on the other hand, Mrs. Campbell's adultery being fully proved, her counsel proposed to open matter of recrimination against the petitioner, alleging that he had been living in a state of incontinence, although not prior to the date of the adultery charged against Mrs. Campbell—they were informed that they could not be permitted to enter into such matters.

That was because it was not prior to the wife's offence.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Those were contested cases.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, but I do not think that alters the case. If a bill is uncontested, it is the duty of the committee to see that as clear a case is made out as if it were contested. The most substantial ground of objection in this case is the separation from the wife. At page 119 of Gemmill, I find the following laid down:

Under the English Divorce Act if the petitioner is proved to have been guilty of unreasonable delay, cruelty, desertion or wilful separation without excuse, or of misconduct conducing to the adultery complained of, the court is not bound to pronounce a decree dissolving the marriage, but will exercise its discretion as to whether it shall, according to the circumstances of the case, grant the relief prayed or dismiss the petition.

It is shown that the House of Lords had followed that practice on previous occasions. At page 121 of Gemmill I find this:

But the House of Lords refused to pass divorce bills where there were deeds and agreements of separation, unless peculiar circumstances were shown to warrant them. A standing order on bills of divorce (A.D. 1798) required the attendance of the petitioner in order to be examined whether at the time of the adultery, of which such petitioner complained, his wife was, by deed or otherwise by his consent, living separate and apart from him, and released by him, as far as in him lay, from her conjugal duty, or whether she was at the time of such adultery cohabiting with him and under the authority and protection of him as her husband.

In Lord Lismore's case Lady Lismore's violence of manner and language towards her husband were held to justify the separation agreed upon, his conduct having been exemplary. In Sullivan's case representations of his wife's misconduct were considered altogether frivolous and the bill refused. The principle seems to have been that an agreement to live separate almost amounted to leave and license, on the part of the petitioner, who had to show an adequate reason for such separation in the previous misconduct of the other party. The mere whim of both parties to live separate was no sufficient cause.

You will find in the cases to which I propose to refer that those causes must be substantial causes, not mere incompatibility of temperament or anything of that sort. I propose now to quote two or three English cases. The first case to which I shall refer is that of Baylis and Baylis. This is on the question of separation and the petitioner conducing to the offence of the respondent. It is to be found in Law Reports, I. Probate and Divorce, page 396. I shall read the decision of the judge, because he gives the principles on which the court acted:

In this case a young man married a woman of loose character, with whom he had lived for nine months previously. After a short time they disagreed about money. He accused her of extravagance, and she him of parsimony. At last he broke up the house, sold the furniture, and told his wife she must go and live by herself in the chambers he had occupied when a bachelor, in Regent Street. As soon as she went there he set a watch over her, and was successful in a very short time in detecting her in adultery. In truth, she made little concealment of it, saying she must have a protector, and would not live alone. The result is this suit. But the court cannot grant the petitioner a divorce.

It has been sometimes supposed that if a man chooses to marry an immodest woman, he cannot afterwards free himself from her by reason of her unchastity. But there is no such law. Whatever the previous life of a woman may have been, she binds herself by marriage to chastity, and if she break the conditions of marriage, her husband is entitled to claim its dissolution. But, on the other hand a husband is at all times bound to accord to his wife the protection of his name, his home, and his society, and is certainly not the less so in cases where the previous life of his wife renders her peculiarly accessible to temptation. No man is justified in turning his wife from his house without reasonable cause, and then claiming a divorce on account of the misconduct to which he has by so doing conduced. And this I am of opinion the petitioner did.

The reasonable cause he alleges is her violence. But there was at the trial no proof of it. The only witness on that head was a man whom he had hired from a private inquiry office to come and live with him and his wife under the disguise of being his friend. He was there a week, and spoke of her violence of manner, but proved no personal violence to the petitioner; and yet he sent his wife away from him, and, much against her will, removed her, without friend or society, to a place in which of all others she would be accessible to temptation, and further, though she had given him no reason to suspect her of infidelity, immediately set a watch upon her actions.

It is hardly to be doubted that he both expected and hoped that she might commit hereself. What is this but, in the words of the statute, "conduct conducing to the adultery?" The petition must be dismissed.

Then there is the case of Yateman vs. Yateman, page 491 of the same volume, which was quoted at a subsequent stage of the same case by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa yesterday. I shall read part of what the judge says on the general subject, because I think it is very instructive:

Now, it must be borne in mind that, according to the matrimonial law of this country, which, the Divorce Acts have not affected to touch under this head, nothing will justify a man in refusing to receive his wife, except the commission of some distinct matrimonial offence, such as adultery or cruelty upon which the court could found a decree of judicial separation, and that in all other cases, no matter what her conduct, she can always claim a decree enforcing cohabitation, save, then, in cases where some such a matrimonial offence has been committed the law does not justify and support the husband in deserting and living apart from his wife.

Sir J. P. Wilde said:

Mere frailty of temper and habits which are distasteful to a husband, are not reasonable ground for depriving a wife of the protection of his home and society,

The conduct of the wife in this case was very much worse than in the case that is now before the Senate, and still the judge took the view that the respondent was not justified in separating from her. The next case to which I refer is the case of Dagg vs. Dagg. It is reported in Law Reports, 7th Probate Division at page 17, and was decided in 1882. The substance of the decision is as follows:

. Where the husband obtained an agreement from his wife that they should live separate, and, this being carried out the wife committed adultery, the court held that there being no reasonable ground for the agreement the husband had deserted his wife, and refused to grant him a divorce. In giving the decision Sir James Hannen said: "It was his duty when he became her husband, not to have left her to those chances of falling, to which abandoned as she was by him, she must have been exposed.

Again there is the case of Williamson vs. Williamson, 51 Law Journal, Probate, Divorce and Admiralty, page 54, decided in 1882:

The conviction of wife for a crime will not justify her husband in refusing to cohabit with her; and if by declining to do so he conduces to her adultery, he will be unable to obtain relief.

There is also the case of Hayes against Hayes, 13 Probate Division, which is very strong and direct on the same point. I have not the volume here, but it is very direct on that point and the language of the judge is very clear. Then there is the case of Hawkins against Hawkins, 10 Probate Division, page 177. I shall read the circumstances of the case so as to put the House in possession of the character of the precedent:

The parties were married on the 13th of July, 1868, at St. James's Cathedral, Piccadilly. The petitioner had become acquainted with the respondent (who was a shop girl) some short time previously, and had been improperly intimate with her, and compelled by her father to marry her. At the time of the marriage the petitioner was entirely dependent upon his uncle and aunt, and it was arranged between him and the respondent that the marriage should be kept secret. A few days after the marriage the parties separated and never cohabited again, the petitioner allowing his wife from £2 to £4 a month, which he remitted to her by letter, They met once at Charing Cross, about sixteen years after the marriage, when something was said about living together, but neither party seemed desirous of doing so. With that exception they had not seen each other until shortly before the institution of this suit, when the petitioner discovered that the respondent had for some years been living in adultery. The petitioner's uncle died in 1870, leaving all his property to the aunt, and she died in 1881, bequeathing a considerable fortune to the petitioner.

The respondent's adultery was proved, and she was called as a witness in support of her case.

Now that is a much stronger case than the one before us. What did the president of Probate Division, the late Lord Hannen say?

Every husband is bound to give his wife that protection which the society of a husband affords, and the fact that the respondent had been familiar with him before marriage made that duty more incumbent upon him, she being a person who might be more likely to yield to temptation. Having regard therefore to the petitioner's conduct in leaving his wife without a husband's protection and being of opinion that that conduct conduced to her adultery, I consider that he is not entitled to a dissolution of marriage.

That is a case decided in 1885 by the late Lord Hannen. I think you cannot have anything straighter or more direct than that.

I wish now to call attention to a couple of cases on the point of the husband's own misconduct. It appears from the report in the case of Conradi vs. Conradi and others, that the husband had applied for a divorce before and established the fact of his wife's guilt, but was refused a divorce on the ground that he had himself been guilty of adultery; so that the law on that point is perfectly clear. Then after a lapse of some time the husband brought another suit for divorce on the ground of his wife's further misconduct, and the question was whether the evidence taken in the previous suit was material, and it was held that it was material, and judgment was given for the Queen's proctor, on the demurrer, the Queen's proctor having intervened. Then I quote from I. Probate and Divorce, page 572, the case of Barnes vs. Barnes and another. In that case Sir J. P. Wilde, who was afterwards Lord Penzance, held that the evidence of the adultery of the petitioner hindered him from getting the relief sought. He admitted that the evidence had satisfied him of the guilt of the petitioner, and he said:

I come then to the question whether, assuming the adultery to have been committed, I shall exercise my discretion. The court is not bound to grant a divorce. It is suggested that the cases in which the court will not make a decree are the exceptions to the rule. In putting a construction upon the words of the statute the court will consider what was the practice of the House of Lords before the passing of the Divorce Act, and of Sir C. Cresswell and of others who acted with him. I am satisfied that under such circumstances to withhold a decree was the rule, to grant it the exception.

That was the rule of the old ecclesiastical court and of the House of Lords.

I do not feel inclined to depart from that practice. It will be only in rare cases the court will overlook the adultery of a petitioner and I reject the motion.

The case of Story vs. Story, and another, was decided in 1887 by the late Lord Hannen. The jury found that the wife and the co-respondent had committed adultery. The wife made a counter charge of adultery committed by her husband. The husband admitted the charge, but proved that his wife had condoned the offence. Notwithstanding the latter fact, the Judge decided against him and closed his judgment with the following words:

In the present case I come to the conclusion that the husband is not entitled to come into this court and claim release from the bond of marriage, he having shown himself regardless of the obligations of that state.

This case will be found in 12 Probate Division, page 196.

There is only one other case to which I propose to refer, that of Boardman vs. Boardman, in which it was held that the establishing of the fact that the petitioner had been himself guilty was a bar to his getting a divorce. There are scores of other cases which I might have cited, but I think the cases which I have cited, which are recent cases, given by practically the highest court upon this subject in England, show what the policy of the English law is, and show also that the policy of the House of Lords was the same as that of the courts of the present time. I think that, looking at the interests of public morality, we should be doing an unwise thing in granting a divorce under circumstances such as we have in this case; and what a proper regard for the public interests dictates is also dictated by the law as laid down in our Canadian author, and is certainly dictated in the most emphatic manner by the decisions of the best courts in the Empire.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman one question before he concludes. He has shown a good deal of industry in searching out the records from the courts in Great Britain, and I would like to ask him now if he has found any precedent where, on an application being made by a member of a certain church, a decision has been given on that ground?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not see that the question is relevant. I do not ask to have this bill thrown out on that ground at all. As I said at the beginning, I think the wiser plan is for the Senate to deal with this matter as though the parties were of any religion you please.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—My reason for asking the hon. gentleman the question was simply this, that in the early part of his speech on this question he supposed a case from Ontario, the petitioner being a Presbyterian, that under certain circumstances he would feel justified in acting in a certain way, and as the case was reversed and the parties happened to be Roman Catholics he thought they ought to be dealt with in the same way. The question I asked the hon. gentleman was this: in searching up precedents and the record of the courts in Great Britain has he found any precedent to show that because the applicants were Roman Catholics it would place them out of court? He has failed to mention such a precedent, and I am very sure of this, hon. gentlemen, that if he could have found one he would have been only too glad to give it to us. It appears to me unfortunate that a question of this kind should be brought before the Senate for discussion. We have the report of the Committee on Divorce presented in the usual way.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—I thought the hon. gentleman wished to ask me a question, because if he did not, the hon. gentleman from Amherst has the floor, and only gave way to permit him to ask me a question.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I think I have the floor and I do not think it is the hon. gentleman's place to dispute that question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman asked me a question and I think he should give me an opportunity to answer it. With respect to the person coming from Ontario, I did not say that the Senate would be bound to refuse a divorce in that case; but I said that the circumstances in such a case should weigh somewhat with the committee, and I say further that, in looking for the law on this matter, I did not look for law under the head which he speaks of; I simply looked at the question as a matter of matrimonial and divorce law, and did not look for the authorities on the other point; and even if I had looked for them, I should not have found them, because it is a unique case, a Catholic applying for divorce from another Catholic, and the province of Quebec is situated differently from England.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I am satisfied that the answer I have received does not change the position at all. I merely say that if the hon. gentleman could have found a precedent for the question that I raised he would have given it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not look for it at all.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Then I was going on to say that this committee having been unanimous in their report, with the exception of one member of the committee, we ought to deal with that report just as we find it, and to discuss it upon its merits. But unfortunately another burning question has been introduced into the debate for settlement, and although it is a question which hon. gentlemen may be sorry to see brought in here, yet it is one of those subjects that public men cannot avoid discussing when it is brought up. In reference to the question that has been raised, whether members of the Roman Catholic Church have a right to apply here for divorce, I think it is easily answered. We rejoice, hon. gentlemen, that we live in a land of civil and religious liberty; we do not recognize any one church as supreme over parliament, and so long as we recognize that, we have the law to guide us in reference to this question. We are told that we have no law on the question which the Parliament of Canada has not the power to repeal. We have the British North America Act, and by that Act the subject of marriage and divorce is relegated to the Dominion Parliament, and before that law can be altered we must have an Act passed in Great Britain amending the same. Consequently, everybody occupies the same position in the eyes of the law, whether he be a Roman Catholic, an Episcopalian, a Methodist, a Mahommedan, or anything else. There must be the one general principle applied to every man living in this Dominion, so that equal justice may be extended to all. It would certainly be an unreasonable thing, a hardship, if persons who happen to be brought up and educated within the pale of a certain church, cannot depart from that church when they come to the years of maturity, and if they feel disposed to do so. It has been done repeatedly. Eminent men have gone from the Episcopalian Church and other Protestant churches and joined the Roman Catholic Church. The late Cardinal Newman was one. He had been an Episcopalian Minister, but later in life became an eminent divine in the Roman Catholic Church. That gentleman was never persecuted; he was never condemned publicly by court or by church, as far as I know, for the course that he pursued. He was an eminent minister and priest during his lifetime, and died very much regretted and respected by everybody of all denominations. Then I remember another who left the Roman Catholic Church and joined, I think, the Presbyterian Church. I refer to Father Chiniquy. Now, these gentlemen have exercised their just rights and privileges in taking the course that their own conscience dictated to them. Whether they were right or wrong is not for us to say, and I think it is time we recognized that principle in dealing with public questions in this Dominion. If I understood correctly the remark made by the hon. member from Ottawa, he intimated that Parliament proposed to repeal the law of Lower Canada I say that that is not so. If the Lower Canada law conflicts with the Dominion law, it is the law of the Dominion that must prevail over and above that of the province. I do not think there can be any doubt about that; at any rate, when confederation was inaugurated, if it was not desirable that the question of marriage and divorce should be dealt with by the Dominion Parliament, that was the time to bring the question to the front and have it decided, and this is not the proper occasion to bring the question up. If it is to be raised as a question of law, the hon. gentleman should propose a measure to send over to Great Britain to have the law amended. It appeared to me—and I am sorry to have to say it—that the speeches of one or two hon. gentlemen on this occasion have been more those of the advocate and lawyer than the statesman. They tell us that the alimony allowed this woman, $50 a month, while she was in receipt at the same time of an independent income in her own name, was given by the husband as an inducement for her to commit this crime. I am surprised, hon. gentlemen, at such a statement as that; I am surprised that any hon. gentleman would use such an argument in this connection. I hold that it is a reflection upon every unmarried woman throughout the Dominion to say, because she is allowed a sufficient sum of money to maintain her in comfort, with all the necessaries of life and many of the luxuries of life, that that is an inducement for her to become an abandoned woman. I say it is quite the reverse; there was nothing to induce her to do wrong. That was not given as the price for the commission of crime, but as an allowance which would enable her to live and to be independent in every respect, and she knew when she committed this crime that she was forfeiting that money and paying a very high price for parting with her virtue, and in place of it being used as an argument against the petitioner, it is a very strong argument against the woman, and in his favour. And then the hon. gentleman has also told us that Dillon took his wife away to Paris, the worst city in the world, and abandoned her there. It has come out since, and been shown that she was given in charge of her father in Paris. We must assume that she went there willingly, because there is no evidence to the contrary. Who was better able to take charge of that woman than her own father, even if he did live in Paris? To use that sort of argument against the petitioner, is, I think, very unfair and very unjust. Yet the hon. gentleman says deliberately that he threw this woman in the way of temptation by placing her in the hands of her father, where, I may add, she does not appear to have remained very long. She came out again to Canada to her mother. A good deal of capital has been made against this man, because, unfortunately, he refused to answer one question. I think the argument made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax has largely, if not entirely, depended on the assumption that this man was himself guilty of adultery after the separation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, it depended chiefly on the separation.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I think the report will show that the argument was almost altogether based on the assumption that he was as guilty as his wife.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think I ought to know what I said.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The question was asked the petitioner, and on the advice of counsel he refused to answer. That shows that lawyers' advice may sometimes be very bad advice. I think we have had very bad advice from some of them on this question. He took the advice of his lawyer and refused to answer the question. His refusal to answer was approved by all of the members of the committee, who were present, excepting one. Is that to be taken as an assumption that the man was guilty, when he acted on advice of counsel and was sustained in his action by all the members of the committee but one? Are we to say that because of that fact he is to be refused a divorce? I do not wish to dwell any longer on the subject. It is not a pleasant question to discuss. The arguments which have been advanced have been directed to anything but the real point at issue. I look upon the report as a fair and reasonable one, and for my part I shall vote for it. We have what is called a minority report: I think it would have been just as well for the hon. gentleman had he made his statement to the House without bringing in a minority report. I cannot see that it is a report at all. It reports nothing. It merely gives the ground on which one member of the committee disagreed with the report of the committee, but it recommends nothing and if we were to adopt it we would decide nothing at all. The great question for the House to decide is whether this man shall get a divorce or whether he shall not, and from the evidence it appears to me that his wife has been proved guilty of the charge laid against her and he is entitled to a divorce.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I am reluctant to intrude on the House on a question of this kind, especially at the fag end of the debate, but I hope in speaking I shall not wound the susceptibilities of any person here, and still less shall I enter upon the odium theologicum to any extent. My reason for speaking, though most reluctantly, on the question, is because I am unwilling that my silence should be misconstrued. There seems to be a doubt in the mind of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken as to the reasonableness of the points made by the hon. member from Halifax. On two of the points raised I am entirely in accord with my hon. friend from Halifax—one is that where a person who is an applicant for relief comes before this House, or any other tribunal in the British Dominion in a matter of divorce he cannot have a locus standi if he has conduced to the offence for which he asks that divorce. The other position on which I am entirely in accord with the hon. member from Halifax is where the suppliant for relief has been himself guilty of the same offence that he charges his wife with, he is not in a position to ask any court for relief. Those two points I consider to be well taken and well established, and it is only because I am unwilling that there should be any doubt or hesitation as to the stand which I propose to take in this matter that I think it necessary to speak at all. On this question which has been so much debated—and I am sorry the necessity has arisen that it should be even mentioned in this House, this question of the religion of the petitioner—I am not prepared by any means to admit the extreme contention of those hon. gentlemen who say here that relief should be withheld from the petitioner on the ground of his religious belief. If that were so, when a person came to us for relief against another, you would be deciding his rights on the ground of his being a Protestant or Catholic, Jew or Gentile. That is not a ground on which a case should be argued. It is a very wide question and I do not propose to discuss it at all, because from the view I take of this matter, it is not necessary to argue it. If we could find a way of treating this matter without disturbing the susceptibilities of parties it would be far better. I agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax that it would be far better for us to look at this question upon its merits, and it is from that point of view that I wish, as simply and briefly as possible, to state the grounds on which I act. It is due to the hon. member from De Lanaudière that I should say I have very great sympathy with him in the position he has been forced into by the manner in which this question has come before the House. When this bill was at the second reading, the hon. gentleman, in the exercise of his constitutional rights, objected to the second reading on principle, but the moment it was pointed out by the hon. member from Calgary that we had only hearsay as to the religious faith of the parties and suggested to the hon. member that it would be undesirable to consider that question until we had the evidence taken before the committee on that point, the hon. member from De Lanaudière acting, as he usually does, courteously in order that he might not disturb the harmony of the House, said "I will not interrupt the proceedings; I withdraw my motion on that understanding." Strange to say, the committee took a different view and decided that the religious belief of the parties was not a matter to be inquired into at all. I am not going to argue that question, as no doubt, the committee acted honestly according to their view of the case, but it is most unfortunate, because we are not in a position now to try that question in the absence of evidence. The question was asked what is your religious belief? and it was refused. Therefore, we are in no better position than when this bill was up for the second reading. We are not trying, we ought not to try, and I am not disposed to argue, that question of the religious belief of the petitioner at all, and I refer to it merely to put myself right before the House and the country, and to explain that I have no sympathy with the contention of those gentlemen who take that view. As regards this question of law, I have consulted the very latest text books as an authority. I have not hunted up cases. It is a weary work, as no doubt the hon. gentleman from Halifax has found it to be, but when we get hold of a principle it is not very difficult to understand it. I quote from Bishop's Law of Marriage and Divorce, the edition of 1891, which is later than any of the books that have been cited. That book, although an American work, is of English authority and is recognized on both sides of the Atlantic. I will read the principle which is laid down and which is all we require to know. In that work, section 78, I find this statement:

According at least to views which will be maintained in this chapter, recriminations may be defined as being the defence which consists in showing that the complainant in a divorce case has himself broken, either completely or in part broken the same matrimonial chain of which a breach by the other party whether the same or any of its link he complains. (Citing a long list of authorities.)

In the midst of the juridical differences on this subject we find one point on which the common law authorities, English and American, are agreed; it is wherever the plaintiff and defendant are guilty of adultery, whichever adultery was first committed, even though the recriminatory act followed on separation which took place on the discovery of the offence relied on for the divorce, the suit is barred. It has also been held, and it is little questioned, that a single act of adultery is sufficient in bar, whatever the extent of guilt on the other side. (3 Eng. Ec. C. 303, 307).

These principles are so plain that I have no hesitation in saying, as I have always believed, that the principle laid down by the hon. member from Halifax is the correct one. And why is it so? It is founded on another principle which is this, that when a party comes for a divorce he must come with clean hands or not at all. He is not in a position to ask this House to help him to get rid of an inconvenient partner while he himself is indulging in the same class of crime with which he charges her.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is there evidence of that in this case?

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I should like to put this question on the ground taken by those who oppose this case on the ground of public policy. I ask them whether it is in the interest of public policy, or public morality, or in the interest of this House that we should pass a bill for an adulterer against an adulterer, to break up the marriage contract and allow him to marry again? Yet that is what we are asked to do if we adopt this report. The suppliant is just as guilty as the wife if he acts in such a manner as to conduce to that adultery by separation or otherwise. Here we are dealing with parties who separated nearly seven years ago. The petitioner has acted in a certain way so that his wife has yielded to temptation, yet he himself thinks it quite right that he should yield to the same temptation and then come before this tribunal and ask you to whitewash him and enable him to go into partnership with another woman, to treat her, perhaps, in the same way.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—There is no evidence of that.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The question was ruled out. These are the strong points I cannot get over. I have, in justice to the hon. member from Lunenburg, to say that I think it was a mistake on the part of the committee to strike out the questions which he put. I am quite sure that on reflection a great many of them will admit that it was a mistake, and for this reason—the law says that the applicant for divorce, and the person from whom the divorce is sought, shall both be examined under oath before the committee. Why? In order to give an opportunity to get at the facts and know whether the person is entitled to relief or not. In my experience of divorce cases, time and time again, nay, almost every time, witnesses who came before the committee were cross-examined, especially the parties to the suit, to find out whether they had ever been guilty of the offence charged against the respondent. They have been tested without any objection. I never heard an objection to such a question being asked. It would be a failure of justice to rule out such questions, because when a bill is sent to the committee with a view to inquire into the right of the petitioner for relief, it is a commission to them to inquire into all the circumstances and see whether the petitioner is in a position to demand relief. The legal authorities here, which are not questioned, and cannot be questioned, show that if this man has committed adultery he is not entitled to release. Surely that is a pertinent inquiry.

Hon Mr. McCALLUM—There is no proof that he has done so. The hon. gentleman lays it down as a ground for refusing him relief.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I am not saying whether it is so or not, but I say you deprived the party of an opportunity of giving proof. The committee would not allow him to be asked whether he had or had not done so, he of all others who ought to know.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—He refused to answer.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I am quite sure that the committee acted from honest motives, and with their best judgment, but we cannot shirk the fact that they required a very elaborate opinion from the chairman of the committee to justify them in the course they took. I am not going to stand on that altogother, and I will not discuss that opinion in the absence of the chairman. I am just putting it on the broad grounds of common sense, public policy and public morality. Is it in the interests of those great questions that we should pass this bill and allow a man, steeped, for ought we know, in immorality, to obtain a divorce while you shut out the evidence of his guilt? It is vain to say there is no proof. When he refused to answer that question, the inference is, not as it was put yesterday a natural inference, but I say as a lawyer an inevitable inference that he was guilty.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—The committee requested him not to answer before he had an opportunity to reply.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—He says "I decline to answer that question, on the advice of counsel."

Hon. Mr. McINNES—And on the instruction of the committee also.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He said, just before, that he had not been guilty before the separation.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—He was safe in answering that question. I suppose he could do so unhesitatingly, but when it came to the next question he says, "I decline to answer on advice of counsel." Any one who has been in a court of justice and heard an unwilling witness examined does not need to be told what such an answer means. I am quite sure that my hon. colleagues are too intelligent not to have had the same opportunities I have had in listening to evasions of questions of that kind. I do not think because the petitioner was allowed to escape the question that therefore we should be allowed to escape the inference which is inevitable that he was guilty, and if so, upon what ground are you going to justify the passing of this bill?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I should like to have the hon. gentleman's views as regards the propriety of asking the questions that were ruled out, and the right of a member of the committee, on a quasi-judicial proceeding to be shut out from questioning the petitioner.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I have stated already that I have had some experience on divorce committees, and it was a constant practice not merely for the chairman, but for each and every member of the committee to put questions to probe the witness and to try and find out, with a view of arriving at an honest conclusion, whether he had or had not been as guilty as his wife where his adultery was in question. I have seen a woman under that fierce fire of cross-examination for that very purpose, and it is the only way you can extract information. Our rules require that they shall be examined on oath, and when they are so examined and such a question is put, the inference to be drawn from a refusal to answer is inevitable, that the question which he refused to answer he could only answer in the affirmative.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I cannot let this debate close without presenting my views to the House on this subject. This divorce case has been brought into the Senate by a report from the committee and there has been a minority report from one of its members presented to us. The hon. gentleman who presented that minority report in the course of his remarks said :

> I have been here 27 years and I have never known an application for divorce where both parties were Catholics. If I can be shown such a case anywhere, then I may be called upon to say why those questions were not asked ; but I say this is a new departure and we should be careful how we run against the strong feeling of the Church of England and the Church of Rome in this matter. We should guard their rights and what they believe to be their sacred duties and obligations. I am glad that we are going to meet this question fairly and squarely now. I hope we will all discuss it with the propriety which is becoming a member of this Parliament.

That is the position the hon. gentleman took.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Not the only position. I took five or six positions.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am quite aware that the hon. gentleman laid down several propositions. The first was the question of public policy contained in the remarks I have just read. Of course they present to this honourable House two views of the case that we are now called upon to discuss. The question of public policy, of permitting a divorce to be granted where both parties are Roman Catholics or, as the hon. gentleman perhaps would have it said, both parties belong to the Church of England. It is contended because it is against the tenets of the church, that therefore we, as members of Parliament, should withhold from the suppliant that justice which he asks at our hands. In view of that position, the question of whether it is wise or right for us to grant a divorce to the suppliant sinks into insignificance. In deciding whether the petitioner is entitled to a divorce, on the evidence, I have to rely more upon the finding of the committee than upon a debate on the evidence in this honourable House. The committee probed the evidence much more deeply. They had better opportunities to judge whether it is right that a divorce should be granted in this case or not, than we are able to judge in the course of a debate upon the evidence as presented to us. For that reason, I am much more inclined to vote upon the merits of the question as the committee have found for us, than upon anything that has been presented to me in the ourse of this debate. What I do know is that we have a divorce law. The right to divorce is limited, certainly, to one offence and that is adultery.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have no divorce law. We have simply jurisdiction over divorce.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We have a divorce law to this extent, that whenever adultery can be proved, a petitioner can ask for a divorce.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have passed no law on the subject.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We are a law unto ourselves, as the hon. member from Lunenburg has shown. If we go on year after year pursuing a certain policy, that very fact makes it law, and therefore I say we have established by precedent and by our acts year after year, that we have a divorce law and that that divorce law is administered by the Senate of Canada. There are certain rules which we have laid down, and the Divorce Committee is one of the methods by which we get at the evidence. We are here acting as judges, while the committee finds the facts for the Senate. They have presented the case to us for adjudication and for settlement, and so far as the evidence is concerned I quite agree with what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, that the committee have had a better opportunity of judging whether that divorce should be granted than we have here in discussing the evidence. Therefore, so far as that is concerned, I should vote for the bill. But there has been imported into this discussion a principle that I think should not be allowed to go without discussion, and that is, that we should withhold from a portion of the population the liberty which our people generally enjoy, because the tenets of the church to which they belong prohibit them from taking advantage of that law. The hon. member from Ottawa went even further than that and said "it is a matter of public policy when you consider that there are 2,000,000 of Catholics in Canada, and it would be absurd for us to say that the laws of Parliament shall exceed the ecclesiastical laws which govern these 2,000,000 of people." That is a departure that I certainly cannot agree with. I hold it quite as much a matter of conscience with me that no act or vote of mine on the floor of Parliament shall be such that I will help to withhold from any section or any portion of the people of Canada, the liberties that I enjoy myself. That is the constitution that has been handed down to us generation after generation, the constitution that has been fought for manfully and won under many difficulties and great odds in the past. Our constitution is the machinery we adopt for the management of our national family, and as we maintain and enforce its principles so will the national character be strengthened or retarded. It is our duty to hold on to all the liberties that we possess and advance with the enlightenment of the time and secure for our people greater liberty from day to day. So far as my hon. friend from DeLanaudière is concerned, I willingly acknowledge that as a French Canadian he occupies a somewhat different position from those of us who belong to the rest of the population, in so far that certain rights were accorded to the French Canadians a century and a half ago. But so far as those ancient rights are concerned, they have been replaced now by the British North America Act. The rights of our French Canadian population, the rights of every man in this country, do not date from 150 years ago or 50 years ago, they date from the passing of the British North America Act, and that Act is the foundation of the constitution of Canada, and the guarantee of the liberties of its population. That Act contains the information that must guide us in our legislation, and we have to consider what will be the effect of our legislation on the future government of this country and on the moral welfare and the physical well-being of our people. If we want our country to prosper and progress from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with all its diverse interests, with all its religious divergences, with its racial difficulties, if we are to build up Canada to be a happy progressive community, we have to stand by that constitution and not depart from it one jot or iota, except in a spirit of progression certainly not in a reactionary one.

It was this feeling that brought me into discussion of a case such as this, and presenting my views to this honourable House. I would refer back in order to show how far the difficulties of the past have assisted in moulding the constitution under which we live to-day, and how those rights were fought for, won, and handed down to us from generation to generation. I would refer back as far as the time of Henry the Second.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Divorces did not exist at that time.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am quite aware of that, but several centuries after that there was a very celebrated divorce case which turned upon much the same principle. I am discussing the ecclesiastical laws referred to by the hon. member from Ottawa. I refer to the divorce of Catherine of Arragon from Henry the Eighth. I would refer you to what Froude says in his digest of that celebrated case:

> The legislation of Henry VIII., his Privy Council and his Parliaments is the magna charta of the modern world. The Act of Appeal and the Act of Supremacy asserted the national independence, and repudiated the interference of foreign bishops, prince or potentate within the limits of the English Empire.

He goes on to tell:

> On the 10th of May, Cranmer, with three bishops as assessors, sat at Dunstable under the Royal license to hear the cause which had so long been the talk of Europe, and Catherine, who was at Ampthill, was cited to appear. She consulted Chapnys on the answer which she was to make. Chapnys advised her not to notice the summons. "Nothing done by such a court could prejudice her," he said, "Unless she renounced her appeal to Rome." As she made no plea, judgment was promptly given. The divorce was complete so far as English law could decide it, and it was doubtful to the last whether the Pope was not at heart a consenting party.

However such was the political pressure brought to bear upon the Pope.

Froude goes on to say again that:

On March 23rd with an outburst of general enthusiasm, the Bull was issued which declared valid the marriage of Henry and Catherine, the king to be excommunicated if he disobeyed and to have forfeited the allegiance of his subjects.

In England the news of the decision had not been waited for. Two days after the issue of the Bull, the Act abolishing the Pope's authority was read the last time in the House of Lords.

Such were the facts and results flowing from that celebrated divorce case.

In referring back to the time of Henry the Second hon. gentlemen may think I am dipping pretty far into ancient history, but I wished to refer to the Council of Clarendon which limited the power of the ecclesiastical laws upon which stress was laid by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, and which preceded by a very few years the Magna Charta which limited the power of the crown in assuring the liberties of the people. Magna Charta is to this day embodied in the statutes of Great Britain, as an emblem of civil and religious liberty, as the British North America Act is printed in the statutes of Canada the emblem of civil and religious liberty in Canada, whose constitution is founded upon the same principles and handed down from the same ancient source I have found it necessary to refer to.

The Council of Clarendon was the result of a disagreement between the ecclesiastical authority and the king, and he appealed to the old customs of the country. A council met at Clarendon for the purpose of stating what these customs were, and a code was drawn up simply re-enacting William I.'s laws with this in addition:

1. A case between clerk and layman whether belonging to church courts or to the king's, was to be decided by the king's court.

2. A royal officer was to be present at all proceedings of the church to see that the bishop's court kept within its own bounds, and a clerk convicted by it passed at once under civil jurisdiction.

3. An appeal might be made from the archbishop's court to the king's. None to the papal courts with royal leave.

4. The rights of sanctuary were taken away as regarded property alone.

These were only one among many enactments which were found necessary to resist the encroachments of ecclesiastical authority, for after all our priests, clergy and ministers are only human, and human nature in the present day differs nothing from the human nature of centuries ago.

Now, hon. gentlemen, shortly after came the Magna Charta; and what is one of the clauses of the Magna Charta? "To no man shall justice be sold, denied or delayed." That was one of the clauses embodied in the Magna Charta upon which our constitution was based and framed. I refer to that in consequence of the remark made by the hon. member from Ottawa, that ecclesiastical laws are superior to the laws of Parliament when they affect the religious belief of the people.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was speaking of Lower Canada at the time.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman was speaking of the two millions of Roman Catholics in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My reference to the ecclesiastical law and the civil law applied only to the province of Quebec. I did not pretend anything else, and I mentioned it because other gentlemen took it up and spoke of the ecclesiastical law in Quebec. I referred only to Quebec.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I accept the hon. gentleman's explanation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I withdraw any statement to the contrary.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The words I took down were that there were two millions of Roman Catholics in Canada, and that the ecclesiastical laws affecting those two millions were superior to the laws of the province.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Only as far as Quebec is concerned.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—For that reason I felt it was incumbent upon me, at least, to enter a protest against a claim of that kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Quite right.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Anything that will tend to restrict the liberties of the subject in any shape or form, be he Roman Catholic or Protestant, is against public policy. I thoroughly appreciate the position that has been taken by some hon. gentlemen in this debate, public policy should govern us, but the public policy which the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg would have us regard is that which he laid down in his remarks.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—"For the peace, order and good government of Canada."

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And because the laws of the Roman Catholic Church prohibit divorce, therefore, for that reason, we should withhold divorce from members of the Roman Catholic Church, when they come here as petitioners for divorce. Public policy would be much better served by pursuing a more liberal course and holding the principles of the country which are so dear to us, and which have been so intelligently fought for century after century. We have inherited them from the British crown; they have been handed to us in the shape of the British North America Act, and each province has under its constitution perfect liberty to pursue and conduct its Government as it sees fit, within the specified bounds laid down in that Act, and under that constitution we hope to govern the vast territory under our control. We should preserve and maintain the constitution, not only in the principles that are imprinted in the statutes, but in the ideas which brought it into existence. The hon. member from Ottawa spoke of the increasing number of divorces. Certainly it is a very sad thing to see matrimonial disagreements, especially when divorces, which are only granted in this Parliament for one offence, are doubling up, as the hon. gentleman says, year after year. I am not going to discuss the question of public policy, as to whether we should have divorces or not. The law is on the Statute-book that a man can come here and ask for a divorce, and I certainly think that where we live alongside of a large country like the United States, which grants divorces, and whose divorce laws are so exceedingly lax, and when a divorce can be so easily obtained by our own people crossing the boundary line where they can get a divorce and come back and enjoy all the benefits of it, I say it is a great deal better that we should increase the facilities for divorce, keeping the control of the divorce of our own people, rather than have our people taking advantage of the United States laws in order to obtain divorce which we ourselves believe they should not obtain. For that reason, I do not think that the argument of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa was a particularly sound one. He spoke of divorce breaking up homes, and he spoke of the evils resulting from it. If we had not the United States so near us, with the opportunities for divorce that exist in the United States, we might take a different course. I do not know what the divorce laws of the maritime provinces are like—whether they are lax enough to permit a man from Ontario or Quebec to go down there and get a divorce, but in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and the United States, all round us, they have divorce courts and divorce laws which our people are able to take advantage of, I think it is a more intelligent method of granting divorces within the restrictions that we think should be put upon them, than have the people of Canada taking advantage of the laws of another country on account of the difficulties we place in their way. It would, I believe, be more in accord with the spirit of the times and the spirit of the people. In making these remarks I hope I have said nothing to offend my Roman Catholic or French-Canadian countrymen. Guided by their conscientious convictions they may feel themselves obliged to take a certain stand upon this matter; I have my conscientious convictions also and they require that I should, at any rate, state what stand I take upon this matter, in order that I may not be a party to restricting the liberties of the people of Canada by any vote which I may give on the floor of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question? Does he know that his own church is opposed to divorce and to allowing those who have been divorced to marry over again?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not come here as the representative of any church at all. The laws of the country are put before me and my duty is to help to carry them out. I look at it only from that standpoint. If the matter were to come before me as a member of the synod of the church to which I belong, on a petition to Ottawa to abolish divorce, I do not say what position I would take, but I stand as one of those who are here to administer the laws of the country for the people as I find them on the Statute-book, to the best of my ability and judgment.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I find in this book, the Canons of the Church of England, a section which prohibits divorce, and which imposes a fine on any judge who would allow divorced persons to marry over again.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Does the hon. gentleman want to show that this Senate is not entitled to grant divorces at all?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is a question of public policy.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Canon 108 is as follows:

In all sentences pronounced only for divorce and separation a toro et mensa, there shall be a caution and restraint inserted in the act of the said sentence, that the parties so separated shall live chastely and continently, neither shall they during each other's life contract matrimony with any other person, and for the better observation of this last clause the said sentence of divorce shall not be pronounced until the party or parties requiring the same have given good and sufficient security into the court that they will not in any way break or transgress the said restraint or prohibition.

Section 108: And if any judge giving any sentence of divorce or separation shall not fully keep and observe the premises he shall be by the archbishop of the province or by the bishop of the diocese, suspended from the exercise of his office for the space of a whole year and the sentence of separation so given contrary to the form aforesaid shall be held void to all intents and purposes of the law as if it had not at all been given or pronounced.

And this has been authorized by Parliament so that it is not only a religious question, but it is also a political question.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I desire to say a few words before this discussion closes in defence of the majority of the committee rather than to take part in the general debate, and more particularly on account of a remark made by the hon. member from Amherst, whose opinions I highly respect. He has acted on divorce committees I presume a great many years more than I have, and he stated that the question whether the petitioner himself had committed adultery was always asked. I have been on the committee for a number of years, and I never knew that question to be asked before. I challenge any man in this House to point to a single case before us this session, or last session, where that question was asked. Even in the divorces already granted, you will search in vain to find such a question.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Does that shut it out?

Hon. Mr. McKAY—The question was asked by the hon. member who brought in the minority report, and it only occurred to him to ask it in the Dillon case. We have had three cases since, and in none of them was the question asked. With reference to the man's religion, the certificate of marriage, showing that he was married in the Catholic Church by a bishop under the rites of the Roman Catholic Church, was offered in evidence, and every member on the committee knew that that was sufficient evidence that the man was a Roman Catholic. The committee, as I understood, did not believe it was necessary that we should know whether he was a Catholic or not. I do not believe it was necessary to know his religion. But it is charged that the hon. gentleman from Calgary had promised that the committee would obtain proof on that point. I maintain they have done so sufficiently by the marriage certificate. I simply desire to make these remarks in defence of the committee who appear to have been told to-day that they did not know their business. As I said before, I challenge any hon. gentleman to show where the question that was ruled out has been asked this year, or for many years past.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There was no occasion to ask it.

Hon Mr. O'DONOHOE—This question is one of very great importance. I think the committee had no authority and no right to rule out the questions that were put by one of its members. It is important that the opinion of this House should be obtained upon that point as bearing upon questions of this nature that may come up from time to time. The committee is only delegated to do certain work for this House, not for the purpose of keeping out evidence, but to report evidence to this House and to allow this House to take such action upon that evidence as they deemed proper. If you lay down the rule that the majority of a committee can rule out evidence, where will you stop? What have you in this House to go upon? They are not appointed by this House as judges of the acts of one another. They are sent to take the evidence and report it to the House; that is their duty. They failed to perform that duty, and in my opinion there will be a failure of proper practice in this House unless the report is re-committed to that committee with instructions to report the evidence and every question that is put. It is an outrage to say that a question cannot be put by a member of the committee, particularly in the absence of one of the parties. The committee are simply a delegation from this House to take the evidence and report it here, and this House can take such action upon that as they think proper. There will be a failure of good practice if this report is not recommitted to that committee with instructions from the House to take down the questions and answers as they were put before them, and I am prepared to make such a motion myself. Short of that, would be leading to a practice of which no man can tell the end. Many questions seem to have been brought up in this discussion, as I think unnecessarily. With the question of the petitioner's religion, we have here nothing whatever to do. No Catholic can vote for a divorce. That is settled beyond all dispute, but we have a right to take the law as it is presented to us and pass our opinion upon it. This House need not search for precedents; there is no occasion for it; we are not an organized court, and we have no need of precedents. All we have to do is for each man to conscientiously ask himself the question, is this a proper course to take for us to separate man and wife? It is well understood that when a man comes into court to look for relief he must,in every court of the land, come in with clean hands. Did this man do all that he undertook to do according to the laws of God and man when he married her? Did he perform his duty in taking her to a foreign city, leaving her there and coming away, taking her children from her? The law imposes upon him a duty; but it gives him the power of correcting his wife; it even gives him the power of chastising his wife if she goes down.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Where is that?

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—And that was his duty, and if he had taken her home with him and cherished her as he should have done and promised to do, would the act of which he complains now ever have been committed? The question was put to him as to whether his hands were clean or not, whether he was not derelict himself and guilty of the very same act of which he complains of his wife, and how does he answer? He refuses to answer; but when the other question is put to him as to his conduct up to the time of their separation, he answers glibly, and at once that he never committed the crime during that time. When the other question is put he holds his tongue. If he could with equal freedom from guilt, have replied in the affirmative, would he not have answered at once? It is not necessary to call the attention of this House to the deduction to be drawn from his reply. His silence establishes his guilt, and if guilty then he has no right to come to this House to look for relief. With the religion of the petitioner I have nothing to do, and therefore nothing to say, on this occasion. We can deal with this question apart from all religion; these parties come before us as citizens asking for relief which the law enables them to claim, and on that question alone should we give our opinion. There is no court by whose decisions we are bound. We are an original court on matters of this sort. We are the judges of our consciences, and the judges of whether we are doing right or wrong in the act that we are asked to perform here. We are not bound by the precepts or precedents of courts; and even if we were, they would be all against the prayer of this petitioner. Therefore, the question of religion, in my opinion, should not interfere with the performance of our duties; we are simply called upon to say, upon the case made out before us, whether this application should be received or not. That, I think, is the sole question, and we are not concerned with any precedents or the practice of other courts. Our jurisdiction on this point is primary and original; it lies within ourselves, a law of the Parliament of Canada. It appears to me that the most serious point is the conduct of our committee in refusing to allow a proper question to be put and answered. I take it that if the committee are allowed such latitude as that, we are not to receive the evidence in this House that should come before us, but simply to receive the evidence that a certain number of the committee may choose to submit to us. That is a very serious point, and I ask hon. gentlemen in their judicial capacity to weigh that point and consider whether a committee should be allowed to keep from this House the evidence that we ought to have, and simply give us the evidence that certain members choose to take. If the House is of the opinion that we are entitled to the whole of the evidence they will send this report back to the committee with instructions to take the questions which were refused and the answers thereto.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—And all cognate questions.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—Of course. I move that the report be recommitted to the committee with instructions to take the questions and answers which have been refused by the committee, and also all cognate questions.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved that the debate be adjourned until Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from Toronto, it might perhaps be understood that he can submit it to the House when the House takes the matter up again.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The motion now before the Chair is by the member from Toronto that the report be recommitted for certain purposes. As soon as this is put to the House, my hon. friend from Ottawa moves the adjournment of the debate until Tuesday.

The motion to adjourn the debate was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at six o'clock.

Bill (DD) "An Act respecting the Canada Southern Railway."—(Mr. MacInnes, Burlington.)

SEAMEN'S ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (13) "An Act to amend the Seamen's Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I may explain that this is the bill that was passed by the Senate at its last session after a good deal of discussion, but with many others in the House of Commons was not passed there. The only change in the old law would be by adding these words after "wages" in the third line "and for the recovery of disbursements properly made by him" (that is the master of the ship) "incurred on account of the ship," and in the 14th line, instead of using the words "Vice Admiralty Court," the words are used "in any court possessing admiralty jurisdiction."

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I would like to ask the hon. Minister whether in the United States they extend to us the same reciprocal privileges that are given by this bill?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am unable to answer that question, but I will endeavour to obtain the information for the House before I move the third reading of the bill.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté) from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

THOMPSON DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—In the absence of the chairman of the committee, I move the adoption of the sixteenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce re Thompson Relief Bill. He said: This was a very clear case; there was no defence and, I may add, no minority report.

The motion was agreed to on a division, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

PIPER DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté) moved the adoption of the seventeenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce re Piper Relief Bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed on a division.

The Senate adjourned at 4 p.m.

INCORPORATION OF BOARDS OF TRADE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL introduced Bill (FF) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the Incorporation of Boards of Trade." He said: This bill is simply to define what constitutes a district in the North-west Territories. Under the Act as it exists in the Statute-book of to-day, the boards of trade in that section of the country are unable to define their proper limits, and this is to correct an error that exists in the law.

The bill was read the first time.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES' BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL introduced Bill (EE) "An Act respecting the Incorporation and Regulation of Joint Stock Companies." He said: I will ask the indulgence of the House in reference to this bill, and will make the explanation upon its second reading. I might simply say that it is a consolidation of the acts as they now stand upon the Statute-book, and to adopt, as far as practicable and applicable to this country, the provisions of the English Act in reference to Joint Stock Companies, by which the procedure in reference to obtaining corporative powers will be more simple than in the past.

The bill was read the first time.

SEAMEN'S ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the third reading of Bill (13) "An Act to amend the Seamen's Act." He said: The hon. member from Halifax called my attention to what he thought was an incongruity in the language of the latter portion of the first clause of this bill. I consulted the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on the subject and, after showing him the point to which my hon. friend had called my attention, he gave his opinion that the latter portion of it did not interfere with or restrict in any way the operation of the first part of the clause. I asked him to make a memorandum on the bill and he did so as follows: "The latter part of the clause in no way restricts the first part of the clause. The claim for disbursements would be interpreted by any lawyer as not being interfered with by the last four lines." I do not know that I have given his exact words, but that is the purport of them. I pointed out to him that, reading it as a layman, I thought it would bear the interpretation given it by the hon. member from Halifax. He answered that it did not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When it is a question of plain English, there is no difference between a lawyer and a layman in the interpreting of a statute. The lawyer gives the language its ordinary natural meaning, and that is what a layman does; and I venture to say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this instance was a better lawyer than the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. When I made this suggestion to the hon. Minister I had not looked at the English law of which this bill is a copy, but I have since done so, and I find that the view of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is correct. The latest authority on the subject is McLachlan on Shipping, published in 1892. He sets out the doctrine in the text that the master or any other person lawfully acting as master, has the same lien for disbursements as the master has for his wages. The Act which he cites is the Merchants' Shipping Act of 1889, and I find that the first clause of the bill before us is an imperfect copy of the first section of that Act. I direct the attention of the House to the language of the two enactments. The first clause of this bill is as follows:—

> Every master of a ship registered in any of the said provinces shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens and remedies for the recovery of his wages, and for the recovery of disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship, and for liabilities properly incurred by him on account of the ship, which by this Act or by any law or custom any seaman, not being a master, has for the recovery of his wages; and if, in any proceeding in any court possessing admiralty jurisdiction in any of the said provinces touching the claim of a master to wages, any right of set-off or counter-claim is set up, such court may enter into and adjudicate upon all questions and settle all accounts then arising or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding, and may direct payment of any balance which is found to be due.

Hon. gentlemen will notice that the right of set-off or counter-claim is given only in the case of a suit by the master for wages and not where the suit touches the master's disbursements or liabilities properly incurred on account of the ship. Now, how does the section of the English Act read? The first part is substantially the same as the first part of the clause of this bill. The second part reads:

> If in any proceeding in any Court of Admiralty or vice Admiralty, or in any county court having admiralty jurisdiction, touching the claim of a master or of any person acting as master to wages or such disbursements or liabilities as aforesaid, any right of set off or counter claim is set up, it shall be lawful for the court to enter into and adjudicate, &c.

Now, in order to prevent any doubt about the construction of this clause in future, we should insert here the words which appear in the English Act. I am not going to say that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is wrong, but he may be wrong, and it will not do any harm to insert these words. They remove any doubt; and I therefore move that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended by inserting after the word "wages" in the 16th line the words "or such disbursements or liabilities as aforesaid." Those are the words used in the English Act.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I agree with the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman. The Minister from whose department this bill came gave me the opinion which I have quoted, and I suggested the adding of the words so as to make it beyond a peradventure?

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Lawyers are not in the habit of doing that.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I thought that was the common sense view to take of it, so as to prevent any misconseption of the meaning of the clause. I therefore accept his amendment.

The motion was agreed to on a division, and the bill as amended was read the third time and passed.

THE COMBINES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (AA) "An Act to amend the law relating to conspiracies and combinations formed in restraint of Trade."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté) moved the following amendment:—

Page 1, line 6.—Leave out "paragraphs (c) and (d)" and insert "paragraphs (a), (c) and (d)."

"(a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce; or."

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the committee, reported the bill with an amendment, which was concurred in.

JOHNSON RELIEF BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the Eighteenth Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Johnson Relief Bill.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed on a division.

DILLON DIVORCE BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Resuming the further adjourned Debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Gowan for the adoption of the Fourteenth Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Dillon Relief Bill.—(Mr. Clemow.)

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW said: This subject has been before the House upon two or three occasions, and it is with some hesitancy that I rise to say a few words with reference to a matter which has been already considered. I think there has been a great deal of irrelevant discussion in reference to this bill. The fact seems to have been ignored that we were considering a matter that had already become law, over which we have no jurisdiction, simp'y having power to carry out the provisions of the law itself. Under the British North America Act the power of dealing with divorce rests altogether with this Parliament and therefore we are in the same position as judges and juries are in other cases. The law is then without limitation and does not discriminate in favour of or against any class, but its provisions can be enforced by any and every subject so desiring it on the well known British principle of one law for all. The Senate is merely empowered to administer the law as it now stands upon the Statute-book. If the law is oppressive in any degree, there is a way of having it amended. We know that laws have been considered oppressive in the past, and by constitutional means they have been remedied. At one time there was a very oppressive law interfering very seriously with the rights and privileges of a certain class of intelligent and loyal people, but as long as that law was upon the Statute-book it had to be enforced and was enforced until by proper process it was removed from the Statute-book and now those people enjoy the same rights and privileges as other people. The same thing can be done with this law if it is considered injurious to any section of the community. But I hold, as long as the law and its provisions remain on the Statute-book, we are powerless to interfere with it in any respect. Under the constitution the Senate takes the first preliminary steps for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the statute. They delegate that power to a committee, but that committee's action must be sustained by a majority of the votes of the Senate before it becomes operative. Supposing the judges of the land were to take upon themselves to say that they would not carry out the conditions of any statute because they interfered with their preconceived ideas of right and wrong, what state of affairs would there be with reference to the judiciary of the country? I contend we are in the same position with reference to this Act so far as the Senate is concerned. Senators have certain responsibilities placed upon their shoulders, and this is one of them. They have to inquire into all cases of this nature brought before them and they must decide upon the evidence adduced before them the same as jurors and courts of law. They are to hear the evidence, and are to declare whether they consider that evidence is sufficient to warrant them in recommending that the relief asked for be granted. That is the extent of their power. To say that the relief provided for by this Act is restricted in any sense, or that it cannot be applied for by any class or section of the people is to assert a great fallacy. There is nothing in the Act to show that such was the intention, or ever was the intention; but in a country where free institutions exist, every man is entitled to the benefit of the law when it is passed, and therefore I think the Senate are justified in giving a decision according to the evidence and the evidence alone in this matter. Now, supposing the Senate should resolve by a majority of their votes that they would not entertain this or any bill the effect would be that the law would be a dead letter and the statute would be nugatory. Would that be constitutionally correct and right to the parties who desire to have the benefit of a law on our Statute-books? The only safe way is for the Senate to inquire carefully into every case which comes before them and to render a true verdict according to the evidence adduced. The proposition was laid down by the leader of the Opposition that the ecclesiastical law was superior to the civil law. It did not meet with a ready response in this House, because we know that upon another occasion when the legislature of the province of Quebec passed an Act containing that unique long preamble which caused a very great agitation throughout the whole country, there was an expression of opinion antagonistic to its enactment which I think ought to be sufficient to prevent any honourable gentleman from bringing up the subject again and thus continuing to excite a feeling of unrest and dissatisfaction throughout a large section of the country. As far as this law is concerned, we are bound to do our duty and I do not see how we can shirk it and evade our responsibility. The statutes are placed in the hands of senators, as other acts are placed in the hands of judges and juries, and they are bound to administer the same in their respective capacities, and the responsibility rests upon us of deciding this case. Now, what are the facts in reference to this matter? Evidence has been taken of a very conclusive nature that this party is entitled to the relief that he seeks, and I do not see upon what ground it can be refused. It is true it is said by one party that the committee did not do their duty in respect to a certain question which the petitioner, on the advice of his counsel and by the direction of the committee, declined to answer. Now I have had a considerable number of divorce bills placed in my hands, and I have attended the committee pretty generally, and I have always found the committee particularly desirous of ascertaining by every means in their power what was delegated to them. They were instructed to inquire whether there was connivance or collusion between the parties to procure the divorce, and that, if established, has always been considered a sufficient bar to the granting of the relief; but the precedents all go to show that they were never called upon to inquire into the conduct of the petitioner in an undefended case, and I suppose the parties who framed rule 115 considered that if there was any ground for bringing this charge against the party requiring the relief, the respondent would not be slow in taking advantage of it, and then the committee would take the necessary means of inquiring into it, as they have done in some cases, and if the fact was proved it would be a block to the proceedings. I remember one or two cases, at any rate, where the charge was made by the opposite party and sustained by evidence sufficiently to induce the committee to reject the bill. As far as the committee are concerned, therefore, I think they have followed the rules and precedents in the performance of their duties, and I do not think it would be fair or reasonable to send back this report to them for further inquiry. I believe the committee acted to the best of their ability, and until some change is made in the rules requiring the committee to investigate this particular matter, I do not believe they would be justified in putting such questions as those which were ruled out. They have never been supposed to act as prosecutors in these cases, but have confined themselves to carrying out the rules as laid down, and therefore I think they are quite exonerated from blame in the course they have taken. I trust that the majority of this Senate will perceive that they are in duty bound to vote for the report of the majority. Some hon. gentlemen say that they have conscientious scruples against voting on questions of this kind, and as a rule they do not vote at all. From my point of view every senator is bound to obey the law of the land. One of those laws compels him to perform the duty of dealing with those divorce cases, and I do not see how any member can absolve himself from discharging his duty. He would not be justified in refusing to accept the report of the committee unless he considered that the evidence was not sufficient to satisfy him that the petitioner was entitled to relief. This matter has been fully discussed and I hope we will not have such a question again in the Senate. I hope it will be settled to-day once and for all, and that we shall understand the position that the Senate occupies in dealing with those important questions; so long as the rules remain unchanged we have no alternative but to comply with the law and govern ourselves by the evidence alone in forming our judgment. That is the only course we can pursue. Every member of the House can attend the committee meetings and judge for himself from the bearing of the witnesses whether the petitioner is entitled to the relief he seeks. If hon. gentlemen think the evidence is not sufficient they are perfectly justified in refusing to assent to the bill, but on no other grounds would any member be justified in opposing the report of the committee while the present law stands. Some hon. gentlemen treat this question as if we were now dealing with a bill to establish a tribunal for trying divorce cases. A good many of the arguments to which we have listened would be appropriate to a debate on such a measure, but we are now only dealing with the law as we find it. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa took the ground that every man should exercise his own judgment and be influenced in any way that he thought proper in dealing with a case of this kind. I differ from him totally. It was never intended that we should disregard the plain language of the law. We have to deal with these matters as a judge would in administering the law. Very often a judge has to administer a law which is repugnant to his feelings. We know that some judges are opposed to capital punishment, but while the law imposes the death penalty every judge is obliged to carry out the law as he finds it. As far as this case is concerned, it is so clearly proved that I do not know how there can be a dissentient voice upon it. A good deal has been said about the petitioner taking his wife to Paris and leaving her there with her father. I do not think he could have done anything better than that when they decided to separate. Whether he made ample provision for her sustenance or not she was not justified in the course that she afterwards pursued. I cannot assent to the allegation which has been made here that most women, left under such circumstances to themselves, would fall. I have a higher opinion of women generally. How many cases do we know of women being left by their husbands, very often in poverty and distress, and liable to many temptations, and how rarely does it happen that any of them fall? Such cases as this are few, I am happy to say, and the moral character of our Canadian women is far too high to justify such remarks. I intend to vote for the report of the committee, because I think it is based on a fair and just investigation, and the committee have followed precedent and carried out the rules laid down by the House. I do not think that the House would be justified in saying that they have not performed their duty in a way consistent with their former course, and it would be most unjust to cast a reflection upon gentlemen who have been influenced by the highest motives in dealing with the case.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I rise to a question of order. We are now discussing the main motion, but I see in the report of the last debate on this subject before the recess that the hon. member from Toronto moved an amendment, to recommit the report with instructions to take the questions and answers refused by the committee and also all cognate questions. I see that it has not been entered in the Orders of the Day, but it is here in the Senate Debates.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I moved an amendment, and at the moment I was called away before saying all that I had intended to say on the subject. I am not differing from my hon. friend from Rideau in all that he has said. The point I raise chiefly is this, that the committee have not performed their duty to the Senate and that the matter is not before the Senate with all the evidence that was offered. If the committee are permitted to exclude evidence, the Senate cannot have the case before it. There is no case before the Senate as it stands now, because we have a report brought in, and it is not contradicted that evidence was offered and refused. How can the Senate decide on a case if any part of the evidence is withheld? We have not the evidence before us. The committee are not the judges of how much evidence to take and how much evidence to reject. Their duty is to report to this House what they have done, and I therefore moved an amendment that the report be recommitted with a view that the whole of the evidence be submitted. What the House may decide with the evidence before us I cannot say, but in the meantime, while the evidence offered is not before the House, we are not in a position to form a judgment. There is no parity of reasoning between the cases of which my hon. friend from Rideau speaks as between this House and a court of justice. The court takes all the evidence and pronounces upon it, if it be a fit case to adjudicate upon, but it would be manifestly absurd that a committee appointed by this House to investigate a matter of this kind and take evidence, should say how much evidence to take and how much to reject. It is for the House to say what evidence is sufficient for a case of this sort. In my absence I find that this amendment to recommit was seconded by the hon. member from Amherst, and I think he will agree with me that the report must be recommitted to the committee in order to report the evidence in full. That is the position I take and it does not contradict my hon. friend from Rideau. He goes into other matters that are not cognate at all to this case. I move:

That the said report of the majority be not concurred in, and that the same with the report of the minority be recommitted to the Standing Committee on Divorce, with instructions to the said committee to put to the petitioner, James St. George Dillon, of the city of Montreal, merchant, the question mentioned in the report of the minority, to wit:—

"Have you been faithful to your marriage vows as far as adultery is concerned up to the time you instituted proceedings for divorce?" and further questions on the subject which may be necessary to get at the truth, and also all further questions on the subject which may be pertinent in the premises.

That is a question proper to be put. If a man comes before this House who himself is guilty of the charge he makes against his wife, surely he does not appear before us with clean hands!

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I understand it is a question of order that is before the House and the hon. gentleman is making a second speech on the report of the committee. Now I submit, with all due respect to the House, that he is entirely out of order. If he has anything to say on the point of order that has been raised by the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière, very well, but he cannot go on making a second speech on the main motion before the House. In the second place, the hon. gentleman must be aware that he cannot move an amendment now.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I am not moving the amendment now.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—If that amendment had been on the Order paper we could discuss it.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The amendment was made three weeks ago. Here it is in the report of the debate.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Where do you find that?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—In the Senate Debates.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I asked how is it that the Orders of the Day do not contain the amendment? I want to ascertain how it was omitted when it was made in a full House and reported officially. It is before the House now; the only incident is that it is not on the Orders of the Day. The Speaker will order what he thinks right, and the amendment must be moved.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—It is quite evident that there is some irregularity. If the motion of the hon. gentleman from Toronto had been written out or handed to the clerk, or placed in the Speaker's hands, it certainly would have appeared on the Orders before us to-day.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—It was declared out of order as no notice had been given of it.

Some hon. SENATORS—No, no.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I was in the chamber at the time and, speaking from memory, I do not remember it being declared out of order, but the hon. gentleman had not that amendment written out, as my recollection goes, and it was merely a verbal notice to the House. We are all aware that a notice of any amendment has to be handed in to his Honour the Speaker in writing. It was not done.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—It was handed in.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—If such is the case it is the first time that I have known such an amendment to be omitted from the Minutes since I have been a member of the House, and if such is the case there was certainly great neglect on the part of some of the officials of the House.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—It is not the fault even of the officials of the House.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—I am not blaming them.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I will give him evidence of it. The hon. leader of the House rose in his place and said: "The motion now before the chair is that of the member from Toronto, that the report be recommitted. As soon as it is put before the House my hon. friend from Ottawa can move the adjournment of the debate." So the difficulty arose from those two expressions of opinion. The hon. leader claimed that the motion then before the House was the motion of the hon. member from Toronto, so it is evident that the short discussion produced the difficulty; but it may be remedied now to-day, only there must be some liberality. The motion is on the paper and it is sufficient.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I would ask the Speaker if that motion was placed in his hands the day before we adjourned?

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—That motion was read by the hon. gentleman from Toronto. It was considered out of order because there was no notice. Then the hon. gentleman from Toronto said he would give that resolution as a notice, and that is how it stands now.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—No notice was necessary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think there is any basis for the point of order, because there is nothing to hinder any member of the House moving the same resolution at once in amendment to the motion before the House. My remembrance of the matter is that the hon. gentleman from Toronto verbally moved the amendment. I think he had it in writing and handed it in and then, at the suggestion of some hon. member, it was allowed to stand and be put in a somewhat different shape. That is a courtesy that is always extended to members and I am rather surprised that an attempt should now be made to take advantage of the very trifling irregularity which apparently has taken place. Instead of discussing the question of order, we had better admit that the point of order is well taken, and let some hon. member move the amendment which the hon. gentleman from Toronto is supposed to be unable to move.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think I saw the hon. gentleman from Toronto making his motion in writing.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman from Halifax is quite right.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I would ask the Speaker if the motion was placed in his hands?

The SPEAKER—The motion was not placed in my hands. I may say such amendments never come to my hands. They are generally sent to the officials who put them in the Orders of the Day. On this occasion I remember distinctly what passed at the last meeting of the House. The hon. gentleman from Toronto made his amendment verbally and it was agreed, on his asking the favour, that time should be given him to write his motion, which motion should have been put into the hands of the officials afterwards. I do not know whether that was done. I only know that it did not come into my hands.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Was that a motion or an amendment?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—An amendment. The main motion is to adopt the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move the amendment which has been read by the hon. member from Toronto.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté.) It is somewhat of an innovation that a committee shall be required to produce evidence themselves which they have never heretofore, to my knowledge, been in the habit of doing or been authorized to do. What does this resolution ask the committee to do? To inquire into whether there has been any violation of the marriage vow on the part of the petitioner. Now that is the duty of the respondent. No case can be cited in which such evidence has been brought out by the committee, and since this unfortunate matter has come up, three cases have been before the committee in none of which have such questions been asked. One case was very similar to this—the Johnson case—The petitioner was living apart from his wife and had been making her an allowance for a number of years, just as in this Dillon case, yet when the case was before the committee no such matter was brought up, although the Dillon case was then under discussion—no member of the committee felt it his duty to put such a question to the petitioner, and the reason was that the committee had no such authority. The 115th rule of the House deals with this matter :

> If adultery be proved, the party from whom the divorce is sought may nevertheless be admitted to prove condonation, collusion, connivance, or adultery on the part of the petitioner.

It is not the duty of the committee to search for evidence ; that is for the parties in the case. Suppose the witness chooses to perjure himself and the committee are aware of it, are they to go and hunt for evidence to show that he has perjured himself? Is that the duty of any committee? The rule does not say so. We will go further to show that it is not intended:—

> Condonation, collusion or connivance between the parties is always a sufficient ground for rejecting a bill of divorce, and shall be inquired into by the committee.

How does it say they are to inquire into the question whether adultery has been committed? Why does it not say so? If it was so intended the rule would say so.

> And should the committee have reason to suspect collusion or connivance.

Now, it does not say if they suspect adultery, it only says if they have reason to suspect collusion or connivance.

> And should the committee have reason to suspect collusion or connivance, and deem it desirable that fuller inquiry should be made, the same shall be communicated to the Minister of Justice, that he may intervene and oppose the bill should the interest of public justice, in his opinion, call for such intervention.

I say the committee would have stepped outside of their duties had they acted as some hon. gentlemen would have had them act. I have been on these committees more or less for 32 years and I have never heard such a question put by a member of the committee. Three cases have been tried, after this matter was brought before the attention of the House, and the question was not asked; and why not? No doubt the hon. gentleman who presented the minority report was satisfied in his own mind that he was doing wrong, although he is not going to admit it. At any rate, no member of the committee chose to ask the question, and I think there could not be any better evidence that a wrong had been done in putting such questions to Dillon. Before adopting the amendment, the House must change it rules. At the present time I do not consider the amendment is in order or that the House has a right to instruct the committee to make the inquiries which were ruled out when proposed in the committee.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I had not intended to speak in this debate because so much time has already been consumed over it, but the subject has now assumed so many different phases that I am impelled to say a few words before the debate closes. I will promise, however, to be as brief as possible. I regret particularly the absence of our venerable chairman whose vast experience and legal knowledge would do much to set many vexed points at rest, and whom I trust we shall soon see able to take his accustomed place. I feel that I am but a young member of this House and I hesitate to set my opinions against those of old and trusted and honoured senators whose abilities and extensive experience would naturally entitle their words to great weight, but I see that not only are we debating the Dillon case from its legal, its moral and religious standpoint, but that an important committee of the House is also on trial. Practically, a vote of want of confidence has been moved in it, and certain points have been raised which had better be set at rest, and decided once for all by this debate, because if the points now raised are supported by the House, the proceedings of that committee will have to be materially changed.

The general subject matter has already been adjudicated upon before the Superior Court of Lower Canada. The wife was represented by counsel before that tribunal and had full opportunity for defence. She did not then complain of anything in her husband's conduct. She did not recriminate or make any charge against him as she had a right to do. She even declined to cross-examine the witnesses. With all the rights of defence before that tribunal which she could have before Parliament, she offered none. Adultery was proved. The husband was held entitled to relief, and all the relief that court could grant it gave him in its decree. The husband then asked Parliament on the same evidence for what Parliament alone could grant, dissolution of the marriage.

The chairman's memorandum placed upon the table formulates the views of the committee (unanimous save one) as to their proper functions and duties, and his speech in moving its adoption somewhat elaborates the report. We consider that the committee fully acted up to the limit of its duty, as laid down in rules 113, 114 and 115. They "inquired into the allegations set forth in the bill, taking evidence 'touching the same,' and the rights of the petitioner to the relief prayed on the allegations set forth." Rule 115 declares what may be offered in answer by the party against whom the adultery has been proved. Had any evidence in answer been given, the committee of course would have heard it, but the respondent having offered none, either before the Superior Court or before the committee, one may reasonably conclude that she had none to offer. Now this House has formulated certain rules for our guidance. We have either got to abide by them or not. If not, what is the object of having them? Presumably every senator is supposed to know these rules, but many of us do not look up these matters until occasion requires. I hope I shall not be considered presumptuous if I consider the particular rules bearing on this case for a few minutes.

The latter part of the rule requires the committee to inquire into certain matters, the points being those which would amount to a fraud on the committee, as will at once be seen when we look at the legal definition of the term.

Collusion—Is a conspiracy to impose upon the tribunal, in other words to make up a case.

Connivance—Is where the applicant has himself consented to the particular act of which he himself complains, consented to his wife's adultery.

Condonation—Is the actual forgiveness of the matrimonial offence after knowledge of the fact.

There was not a particle of evidence in support of or to suggest the existence of any of these.

As regards adultery on the part of the applicant that is a countercharge which the rule expressly leaves to the party from whom the divorce is sought, and so it always was, and now is, in the English Divorce Court. But even then such a countercharge does not amount to a bar for relief, but only as an appeal to the discretionary power of the court. It was clearly not within the scope of the committee to undertake such an inquiry upon its own mere motion, it was not at any time suggested in any way by the party most interested. It was no part of the record, so to speak, before the committee. And yet the monstrous doctrine is now propounded that a subordinate body, with specific and limited powers, should act as public accusers against the party seeking relief; should undertake to do that which the party most interested did not even suggest. I do not think that any honourable man would consent to occupy so degrading a position, one so incompatible with the functions of an impartial inquiry. The hon. member from Halifax has delivered an able and exhaustive speech on this question. He has brought to his subjects as he generally does, careful consideration, as his remarks show great pains and research in getting up his case. But I could not help seeing, and I am sure my feelings were shared by many members, that though he professes to deal with the question from the standpoint of a judge in a divorce court, and to decide according to the evidence, his attitude was more that of a clever lawyer, counsel for the defence, determined to built up a case against the petitioner. I do not say that this was done disingenuously, or with intent to mislead, but the hon. gentleman evidently had his heart in the case from his own point of view, and not having facts to go upon he is obliged to proceed inferentially or by insinuation. This manner of reasoning by inference and insinuation, adopted also by the member for Amherst, reminds one of a famous character quoted by Swift who could

> "Convey a libel in a frown
> And wink a reputation down."

I take the hon. gentleman's own words in support of what I say, and will leave the House to decide if I am putting the case too strongly. On page 20 of Senate Debates I find him reported as follows:—

> It may be that Dillon was too exacting. His wife may have been rather too fond of society and amusement in an innocent way. He may have been too severe and exacting as husbands sometimes are. Instead of bearing with his wife's little imperfections and frivolities he chooses to put her away.

That is language which one would expect to see applied to a woman about whose character there might be some doubt. I may say I admire and applaud a man who strongly advocates the cause of a woman who has been wronged and ill treated, but how any one can read the evidence in this case, one of the most flagrant and revolting that has come before the committee, in my limited experience, and then seek to exculpate her by speaking of her conduct as "little frivolities and imperfections," makes me wonder if these remarks manifest to others, they certainly do not to me, the spirit in which a judge on the bench would approach the case.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That language of mine applied to the wife's conduct before the separation.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Farther on he says "A woman still young is deprived of the society of her husband and of her children—exiled from society and left to shift for herself with the result one may easily expect to follow." Now I ask you if "exiled from society and left to shift for herself" is a judicial way of stating that she had been placed in her father's care with an allowance $50 a month for her support? What the hon. gentleman contends is, I assume, that having had a separation from his wife and having lived apart from her for a cetain period he had thrown temptation in her way and so contributed to her downfall. I hardly think that the hon. gentleman intended us to treat this view seriously, but if he does a very wide vista is opened. I assume that few women fall unless exposed to temptation. The question then arises what is the amount of temptation to which a woman may be exposed, which will excuse her fall, or what the measure of neglect which in my hon. friend's opinion would entitle a husband to be considered as contributory to her disgrace. Many husbands have a habit of spending most of their evenings away from home. Others by their business or professions are obliged to pass long periods absent from the family fireside. In some cases there may even be studied neglect, and yet it would be very subversive to our ideas of morality, if such conduct on the part of a husband were to be accepted generally, in exculpation of a wife's offence, or as an excuse for her violating her own vows, while at the same time preventing the husband from obtaining his remedy from the House. Again he says:

> This man stood by. Does it not look as if he had deliberately thrown that woman in the way of temptation and had done it probably with a view of marrying some one to whom he had taken a ancy?

Where is the ground for this? Certainly not in the evidence. It is the merest insinuation. Does this language appear to be inspired by the judicial spirit?

He is down also on the petitioner for declining to answer a question, which, mind you, he had heard the committee rule out of order, and he would fain have you accept that as evidence of the petitioner's immorality. Now, if a witness in a court were to hear a judge rule a question out of order, and if in spite of that ruling, counsel should insist on putting it, what more natural than that the witness could accept the judge's dictum and refuse to answer? Would there then be an inference that witness was unable to do so? But, further, I would remind the hon. gentleman and this House that inference is not evidence. No divorce is granted by this House without the clearest proof of adultery. You would not think of granting a divorce upon such a flimsy inference. Why, then, should you refuse it? To carry out the principle supported by my hon. friend it would be the petitioner who would be on trial, not the respondent. The petitioner, who as a rule appears in person, would be subject to an examination as to his or her conduct, while there would be no means of similarly examining the respondent, who seldom appears. Proceedings according to our friends would have to be commenced by ascertaining, first, the religion of the parties, and if no disability appeared on those grounds, the next step would be to prove the chastity of the petitioner. Now, I confess that I was struck with the very strong remarks made on this point by the hon. member from Amherst. On page 14 he is reported as follows:

> The petitioner has acted in a certain way so that his wife has yielded to temptation, yet he himself thinks it quite right that he should yield to the same temptation and then come before this tribunal and ask you to whitewash him and enable him to go into partnership with another woman, to treat her, perhaps, in the same way.

I may say en passant that there was not a word of evidence in support of such a statement. Further on he says:

> I have, in justice to the hon. member from Lunenburg, to say that I think it was a mistake on the part of the committee to strike out the questions which he put. I am quite sure that on reflection a great many of them will admit that it was a mistake, and for this reason—the law says that the applicant for divorce, and the person from whom the divorce is sought, shall both be examined. In my experience of divorce cases, time and time again, nay, almost every time, witnesses who came before the committee were cross-examined, especially the parties to the suit, to find out whether they had ever been guilty of the offence charged against the respondent. They have been tested without any objection. I never heard an objection to such a question being asked. I have stated already that I have had some experience on divorce committees, and it was a constant practice not merely for the chairman, but for each and every member of the committee to pu questions to probe the witness and to try and find out, with a view of arriving at an honest conclusion, whether he had or had not been as guilty as his wife.

I was quite struck with this entirely new definition of what I had understood my duties as a member of the Divorce Committee to be. Of course I knew that the present was the first instance of its having been done in my time, but I accepted the statement without hesitation as having been done during the hon. gentleman's experience. On searching, however, to see in what shape the questions had been put, I am unable to find one single instance. I do not of course question the hon. gentleman's statement that it has been done. He would not have said so, unless he recollected it, but I am satisfied that he is mistaken in thinking that it has been done in the general way he has stated, or I could not have persistently overlooked it. Under these circumstances I will ask the hon. gentleman, if I am wrong in my facts, to correct me, but, if otherwise, to correct the very erroneous impression which his words must have conveyed, and which I have no doubt caused as strong an impression upon other hon. gentlemen's minds as they did upon my own. The hon. member for Amherst goes on to say: The legal authorities here, i. e., those quoted by the hon. member for Halifax, which are not questioned, and which cannot be questioned, show that if this man has committed adultery he is not entitled to release. With the profoundest respect for the hon. gentleman who cited the authorities, and for the one who in turn cited him, I would say that at all events, the authorities are questioned: whether they can be so successfully I will leave this House to decide. The statement that if this man has committed adultery he is not entitled to relief is certainly wrong, because the question is one that is entirely discretionary with the court. Coming, then, to the view of the law quoted by the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Power) as bearing upon the case, I find at page 7 of the report that he says:

I suppose that we are governed to a certain extent by rule and precedent.

And yet with the rule before him expressly stating the parties who alone can raise this question, he assumes the committee to be wrong in not entering upon a matter not before them, a matter which the respondent could have urged before the court in Quebec or before the committee, but did not. Why, sir, no court would take such a matter up upon its own mere motion, a matter which is not in itself pleadable as a bar to relief, but at most a discretionary appeal. Now, are hon. gentlemen serious in assuming that your committee sitting as judges with certain assigned powers should go outside of them or introduce new questions not submitted to them or raised in the proper way. What would be thought of a judge in court who after a case had been brought before him, undefended, and the plaintiff had proved his case, should cross-examine him and his witness on points which had not been suggested by defendant until he had elicited some damaging testimony and then pronounce a verdict for the undefended defendant? Would not that be the greatest usurpation of authority? Why, sir, we should very quickly hear an outcry for the impeachment of such a judge. The hon. gentleman is singularly unhappy in quoting the Tudor-Hart case. There the principle contended for was the equal responsibility of man and woman. In England the woman could not have obtained relief on proof only of adultery, the man could, and the Parliament of Canada very wisely, as I consider, affirmed the doctrine of equal responsibility, notwithstanding that the House of Lords in their legislative capacity on more than one occasion acted in the opposite direction. And the Act of the Parliament of Canada has evoked the eulogium of one of the greatest if not the greatest of England's statesmen, who said "the Parliament of Canada has done itself honour in founding its measure on the equal responsibility of man and woman." But though as I said before I am satisfied it is done without any misleading intentions; it is strange to find a lawyer quoting case after case, many of which to my mind are clearly distinguishable from the one before the House, on the evidence. We know that Shakespeare says, "The Devil can cite Scripture for his purpose," and while not imputing any such Satanic attributes to the hon. gentleman, I have had enough experience of lawyers to know that two very different meanings can be put upon the same case. In all the cases submitted by my hon. friend I cannot find one which, clearly considered, has a distinct bearing on this case. In every one of them that I have investigated the cases have been contested, and the points have been raised by the respondent or the counsel for the parties, not by the court. Recrimination and counter-charges have been made and on examination or cross-examination by counsel the facts have been elicited. I have not been able to find a single instance, and I think I can safely challenge the hon. gentleman to produce one, where the court took upon itself, where defence had not been raised, to put such a question as we have been asked to do. If it was a proper question to have been put, why did not the court below do it? In discussing this point with the hon. gentleman not later than this forenoon, he informed me that he had disposed of that argument. I turn to page 7 of the debates of that date and I find that when certain cases had been cited by him, the hon. member from Colchester (Mr. McKay) said that those were contested cases, and the hon. member from Halifax replied, "Yes, but I do not think that alters the case."

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was more than that.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—That style of disposing of an argument reminds me of a story of a man who had a serious discussion with his wife, and put an end to it by saying, "I will not argue with you any more." She replied, "I am not arguing with you. I'm telling you." The hon. gentleman did not argue—he told us that the fact mentioned did not alter the case. Now, I do not consider that he in any way disposed of the objections that were raised. At the same time I do not suppose that, even if the question objected to had been allowed to be put, and had been satisfactorily answered, that we should have the support of any single member who is now making the refusal to put the question the ground of his opposition to the bill. In the quotation he makes on page 7 I read:

But if the recriminated adultery took place prior to that complained of by the petitioner the House always rejected the bill.

Of course the point here is that there has been recrimination on the part of the respondent. Immediately following he quotes the Bland case. In the case he quotes, Baylis vs. Baylis, L. R. 1 P. and D., p. 395, I find the following:

Dissolution—20 and 21 Vic., c. 85, s. 43—Examination of petitioner by the court—Opposed suit—Conduct conducing adultery.

In answer to a husband's petition for dissolution of marriage, the wife pleaded that the petitioner had separated from her without reasonable cause, and thereby conduced to her adultery. The court refused to examine the petitioner under the 43rd section of the 20 and 21 Vic., c. 85, as to the circumstances leading to the separation, having no power to examine the respondent as to the circumstances.

A husband having married a woman of loose character, with whom he had previously cohabited, separated from her against her will shortly after the marriage, and sent her to live by herself in a place where she would be accessible to temptation, and where she was guilty of adultery. There was no evidence that there was any reasonable cause for the separation. The court was of opinion that this was conduct conducing to her adultery, and dismissed the petition.

Surely we cannot look upon this as on all fours with the one now under discussion. Here a man actually sends his wife alone into his bachelor chambers, she warning him that she must have a protector as she had no other means of support. Surely we cannot fairly compare this case with one, where a man having agreed to live apart from his wife takes her to her father's home and leaves her with him, by mutual consent, and makes her a liberal allowance for her support. Surely we cannot compare this with the case of a man leaving his wife under her father's own roof tree.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that the hon. gentleman has stated that case fairly. In the Baylis case the husband did make her an allowance and the language was used, not to him, but to some one else. There was an allowance of £2 per week made to the wife in that case.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—If so, that would be some exculpation, no doubt. Now, the English Divorce Act, 20-21 Vic., cap. 85, sec. 43, provides that:

The court may, if it shall think fit, order the attendance of the petitioner and may examine him or her, or permit him or her to be examined or cross-examined on oath, on the hearing of any petition, but no such petitioner shall be bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery.

See also Brown on Divorce, edition of 1884 (in Parliament Library) for remarks upon examination and cross-examination of petitioner, which are too long for me to read here. The intention of the Act no doubt is that the foundation for cross-examination of petitioner as to his adultery should be laid by the respondent.

Babbage vs. Babbage and Manning, L.R. 2 P. and D. Evidence—Cross-examination as to adultery—32 and 33 Vict., c. 68, s. 3.

A witness cannot be cross-examined as to any act of adultery respecting which he or she has not been examined in chief, although such adultery may not be a question in the cause.

Conradi vs. Conradi, L.R. 1 P. and D. 514. The hon. gentleman did not correctly state the point of this case. There had been a previous trial in which petitioner was found guilty of adultery. He presented a fresh petition and in this second suit, the court in the exercise of its discretion granted him a decree nisi notwithstanding the judgment against petitioner in former suit, the act of adultery if committed being an isolated one and unconnected with the respondent's adultery and finding of the jury in the second suit, acquitting the petitioner, having thrown doubt on his guilt.

Boardman vs. Boardman L. R. 1 P. & D. page 233, is not applicable, because the respondent was present and gave evidence. It was held in this case that the petitioner and respondent who were examined, may be cross-examined upon issues of their own adultery and of each other's adultery.

Barnes vs. Barnes, L. R. 1 P. & D. 572, was not quite correctly commented upon by the hon. member from Halifax, The jury found petitioner and respondent guilty of adultery. Co-respondent applied for a new trial. The court directed that a new trial be allowed the co-respondent and if petitioner should apply to the judge ordinary to set aside the issue found against him, then a new trial to be had on all issues. Petitioner's counsel moved the court to grant a decree nisi and said petitioner was not in position to have a second trial as he had not the means, etc. Sir J. P. Wilde found against him because he did not move against the verdict. It will be noted that the character of the evidence against petitioner is not repeated in this case.

Hawkins & Hawkins L. R. 10 Probate Division 177, cited by the hon. member from Halifax, is not in point, as in that case petitioner had seduced his wife before her marriage to him, and he afterwards practically abandoned her.

In Dillon's case there was no abandonment there was a separation for which there was cause, and the wife was left with her father, and she subsequently lived with her mother, and had an allowance of $50 a month. Story & Story, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 196, was also cited by the hon. member from Halifax. The adultery of petitioner was committed prior to that of his wife, and of which he complained. The decision in this case is in line with the ruling of the House of Lords in cases before the Divorce Act went in force. Heyes vs. Heyes, 13 Prob. Div. 11, was also cited by him. It is not in point, because the petitioner had practically abandoned his wife, broke up his home, allowed her nothing, and never saw her until after eight years' separation. Five years later he filed the petition—thirteen years from separation. Collins vs. Collins, L. R. 9 Prob. Div. 231. In this case a husband obtained a decree nisi by reason of his wife's adultery, but his petition was dismissed by reason of his cruelty and adultery. The parties lived together again, and he committed other acts of cruelty and was also guilty of rape, when the wife filed a petition for dissolution of the marriage. The court, under the circumstances, granted the wife a decree nisi.

Butt, J., in giving judgment, said:

> * * * the petitioner now prays for a divorce. To that one certainly would be entitled, but for the adultery proven against her in the original suit. The question is ought I to allow that adultery to defeat her present petition? The court has a discretionary power to give or refuse to give that effect to the wife's former misconduct, and I find there are cases in which the court has granted relief to one of the parties to a suit for divorce, notwithstanding previous misconduct of the kind in question.

So far as the action of the committee is concerned the grounds of their refusal to enter on any question not properly before them was formulated and entered on the minutes, and also stated by the chairman in moving the adoption of the report. I consider that the committee could not properly have acted other than they did. In England, and wherever English laws are in force the rule is that every man is presumed to be innocent until proved to be guilty. Under the French system he is obliged to prove his innocence. If this House wants the Divorce Committee to occupy the position of inquisitors, to do as the French tribunals do, expose a man's whole life, and test him on his moral and religious standing, let the House so decree (and they can do it by accepting the motion of the hon. member from Toronto). But in such a case, and under such conditions I know of one member who would decline to serve, and I venture to think that you would be unable to obtain the services of any man possessed of a particle of British instinct.

Now, with reference to the question of a person's religion, I would ask hon. gentlemen how they propose to define what constitutes a man's belonging to any particular church?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—When he breaks the sacraments of that church.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The hon. gentleman probably alludes to some particular church.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I say this man does not belong to the Roman Catholic Church, and this question of his creed should not come up at all.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—In the Church of England and in the Methodist Church I know they have a test of church membership and I presume there are conditions that attach to other bodies. But we all know instances of people reputedly belonging to certain denominations who never attend its places of worship, who conform to none of its regulations, who neither in public nor in private live up to its professions. How are you going to define when such a person ceases to belong to any denomination? As my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Prowse) has pointed out, there are many instances of distinguished men and even priests leaving the Roman Catholic Church and of others leaving Protestant denominations, but there appears to be no ceremony about it. Nor is it necessary that they should be formally received into any other congregation. They break certain laws, and tenets of an order and they simply cease to belong to it. Now, as I understand it, one of the canons of the Roman Catholic Church is against divorce and certainly one is against adultery. I take it that when people distinctly and openly commit breaches of their ecclesiastical canons, they aver and declare as openly as if they advertised it that they dissever and disassociate themselves from that church, and I ask hon. gentlemen what process has the Roman Catholic Church for retaining control over either of these persons, or by what right they ask this House to put the pains and penalties of the church in force against them? I think that this matter resolves itself into a simple question of principle. The House is given jurisdiction in questions of divorce without reference to any nationality or religion. I say that neither potentate, nor church, nor prelate has any authority to dictate to this House, or to interfere with the prerogative given to it by the Act which created it. I do not care to enter into the broad question opened by the hon. senators from DeLanaudière and Ottawa. I know what religious convictions are, and there would be little use in reasoning upon matters, which some hon. gentlemen regard as being settled by supreme authority; one cannot but respect their sincere and honest convictions even though unable to agree with them. But the power of Parliament is supreme, and it is our duty not to contend for any individual or for any denomination but to consider what would best tend to the public good. The facts proved in the Dillon case have been deemed in all the cases I can find before the House sufficient to entitle a supplicant to relief. Has any tangible reason been given for refusing this one? The petitioner has proved the adultery of his wife, proved it before a court of this province, proved it before a committee of the House; and I ask you now, independent of all other consideration, to deal with the case under the constitution according to your convictions of right and justice.
