Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I congratulate the Divorce Committee on having ruled out the question, "Are you a Roman Catholic"? I do not see that the committee, or this House, is in anyway, as a judicial body, concerned in the religious convictions of applicants for divorce. Roman Catholics may have their own feeling about it, but we are not here acting in a sectional or religious capacity, but in a judicial capacity and according to prerogatives that we have not chosen, prerogatives that were given to us. I also congratulate the committee on having refused to allow this question to be put "Were you married according to the rites of the religious denomination to which you and your wife belong"? What weight would that have with us, whether they were married according to that rite or not? I will perhaps surprise some people in saying that for us Roman Catholics the Protestant marriage is as valid as the Roman Catholic marriage, and that such a marriage according to our honest conviction cannot be annulled any more than a Roman Catholic marriage; therefore, the one marriage being as valid as the other, this question as to the creed of the parties ought not to have been put. A Protestant marriage with us is equal in validity to a Roman Catholic marriage; and in my estimation this is altogether an irrelevant question and the committee were perfectly right in ruling it out. Then the question was proposed "Were you married according to the rites of the church to which you and your wife still belong"? That is the same question, and it was rejected with the same justification as the other. Then the further question was put, "Have you the same religious faith that you had then?" What has that to do with the case? We are not a body of theologians here; we have nothing to do with ascertaining whether a man has faltered in his faith. The question as to his fidelity to his wife might interest us more, but we are not concerned with the other question. We have enough of religious questions raised in this country without going out of our way to raise others of that character. It strikes me that that sort of zeal is not altogether for the glory of religion and of God; there may be some personal view or motive in raising such an issue. At all events, I do not believe it was our province to go into this question, and the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, in saying that "it is the church that we should have to take care of," certainly displayed commendable zeal and good-will, but I think we can dispense with his paternal care of the Roman Catholic Church or any other church. No doubt the sentiments are good and laudable. We are all Christians here and admire Christianity, but in this instance the zeal might be bordering on imprudence so far as the peace of the country at large and the good understanding of this House is concerned. In his speech he gave us the reason why he put all these questions, which were, as he said, improperly rejected; in his speech he said that "no good Catholic could apply for a divorce." No one contended that these parties were good Catholics or good Protestants. In my estimation, the man who fails to answer the pertinent question as to whether he was faithful to his marriage vows leaves the door open to suspicion that he was not absolutely a good member of any church; and the woman who has, as far as the evidence shows, committed adultery, is neither a very good Roman Catholic or a very good Protestant nor a very good religious woman of any kind. I therefore congratulate the committee on having rejected those questions, and if the motion were what I understood it to be on the 18th of May, when it was put by the hon. member from Toronto, without restrictions, I should, as I had then intended, have moved an amendment to that amendment striking out the part relating to the creed of the parties. But the other question that was put: "Have you been faithful to your marriage vows as far as adultery is concerned, up to the time you instituted these proceedings for divorce?" is, according to my mind, a proper question to be put. If we take the legal view of the procedure adopted by the hon. gentleman from Brandon, that might not be admitted in evidence. In his very elaborate speech he shows that the question should not have been put because it is an undefended case. The hon. gentleman would be strictly right were the committee an ordinary court of justice, but I think you will agree with me that these divorce petitions are not ordinary cases, and that we are not an ordinary court of justice. When a case is undefended, it should be defended by this House, because it is not a matter which interests simply the parties, but is a matter in which public policy comes in. It is the tradition of England, and it is the tradition here that divorce should only be given on certain grounds, adultery, for example, and that the offence should be well proven. It is also, according to British precedents, the rule that divorce cannot be granted to a man who is equally guilty with the person against whom he invokes divorce.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I would ask the hon. gentleman if he is not satisfied that that is discretionary with the court? It is not a legal bar to the rule, but it is discretionary. He will find that that is so, if he looks at the authorities.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I believe in our case we are not barred by precedents; we should act with the same latitude and be given the same latitude as if the case were defended, because, as I say, it is not simply a case that concerns the two parties, it is a question of public policy; it is the policy of the law to put obstacles in the way of divorce, following the example of England, and recognizing the evil that is caused generally in the United States by the easy way in which divorces are granted. Our rule 115 provides that—

> If adultery be proved, the party from whom the divorce is sought may, nevertheless, be admitted to prove condonation, collusion, connivance or adultery, on the part of the petitioner.

If the other party does not contest the divorce we have the right to step into her place and to see if the applicant for the divorce is himself guilty of adultery, although it might not be absolutely according to the ordinary rules of evidence.

Rule 120 goes further and sustains the higher view I take. It reads as follows:—

> In cases not provided for by the rules the general principles upon which the Imperial Parliament proceeds in dissolving marriage, and the general principles of the rules, usages and forms of the House of Lords, in respect of Bills of Divorce may be applied to Divorce Bills before the Senate, and before the Standing Committee on Divorce.

Now, hon. gentlemen, what do we find? It has been shown, I believe, beyond dispute that were this a defended case before a British tribunal, as we have a right to assume it was defended, that man Dillon would never have got his divorce, because it would have been proven that the man himself was guilty of adultery, and having been guilty of adultery he could not have obtained his divorce. Now what is the object of this motion? It is simply to ascertain whether the man is guilty of adultery or not. We have a right to ascertain that. If the man is not guilty of adultery, by my religious principles I am bound to vote against the bill, because I do not believe in divorce, but acting otherwise I would vote to grant him the divorce. If Dillon is not guilty of adultery, I would grant him a divorce.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Would you vote for the divorce?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—No, but I believe that under the usage of this House, he should be granted a divorce if he were not guilty as I have said.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Not in England. The hon. member from Halifax cited a case which was tried in England similar to this one; they refused the divorce on account of the man having put away his wife. The court determined that he was responsible for the adultery of his wife.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I will admit that; but it is a matter of controversy, whether his exposing his wife to fall was a sufficient bar and it is not very well proven. It is a matter that might be a subject of debate, but the other case is clear and I am just dealing with clear cases. If Dillon had been true to his marriage vows, according to the usages of the British courts and according to the precedents of the Senate here, he is entitled to his divorce, but if he has not been faithful he is not. We should ascertain that point before we go further. Let us ignore the religious question altogether. I do not care to know whether the parties are Catholics or not. It is not on record, and should not be put on record.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to quote a few words taken from an English authority:

When the husband obtains an agreement from his wife that they should live separate and this being carried out the wife commits adultery (precisely the same case) the court held that there being no reasonable ground for the agreement the husband had deserted his wife, and refused to grant him a divorce.

In giving the decision Sir James Hannen said it was the petitioner's duty when he became the husband of the respondent not to have left her without protection and being abandoned as she was by him, she must have been exposed to temptation.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I just took the one point on which there was no possible difference of opinion; but this makes the case stronger. However, that is not the question now. That question is not raised in the amendment; if it were I might discuss it; I think we might stick to the question before us without seeking for arguments which are not in issue just now. The hon. member from Brandon said that the case was absolutely similar to the one before an ordinary court in which, on matters of evidence, the judge had rendered his decision. It is to a certain extent, with this peculiarity, the committee is not a tribunal of final resort, and in ordinary cases it is a daily occurrence that the decision of a judge is questioned, reviewed, appealed from and either sustained or reversed. What is our position? It is not humiliating the committee in any way. It is simply reviewing their decision on matters of evidence, just as is done on an appeal from an inferior court to a higher court, and I believe we have a right to review that decision, and that it would not be derogatory to their dignity, and it would in no way hurt their feelings. It would be simply a court en banc reviewing the decision on matters of evidence of a judge sitting alone in court. For those reasons, hon. gentlemen, I shall vote for the amendment as it is put now, and I believe that we should all, if possible, sustain it, because then the religious question, which has been in my estimation indiscreetly raised, would be set aside, and we would be simply dealing with facts and trying the case on its merits. This matter of Dillon's, besides creating the religious issue which has been discussed, has also brought into the debate here, assertions of a very strange nature and character indeed. If we were to take stock in all the arguments that were given on this question, some strange conclusions would be arrived at. One of the strongest grounds that was brought to bear against Dillon, condemning him without redemption, was the fact that he had abandoned his wife in Paris, and on that an assault was made against that modern Babylon. It was shown beyond controversy that it is sufficient for a man to go to Paris with his wife in order to put himself in such a position that he should not again come before a body of honourable people or to a Senate to ask for justice or anything else; that the petitioner is to be condemned because he went with his wife to Paris. That sort of argument will not involve international complications, I am sure. I believe we are on good terms with France now, in spite of what the papers say. We all know that the Parisians are a dissolute people and an abominable race; we all know that Paris is the worst place in the world. Read the report of any clergyman who goes to Paris and he will tell you that it is the worst place in the world to take a woman to. I have my own ideas about Parisian matters. I have lived there and I have seen people there. I spoke the other day of this matter to some English people who had been in Paris, because French people might be prejudiced and one of them, a high official here who had been in Paris during the last exhibition, related this anecdote: He said that he had made a close acquaintance with a high official in France and that the official told him that one of the main difficulties of the Parisian police is to get English clergymen out of trouble without giving the matter publicity by exposing them. It was not a Frenchman who told me that; it was a high official, an Englishman. He went on further and said:

> During the time I was in Paris at the exhibition, I went to a public concert, at a place called a café-chantant.

Do not bring down the vail before your faces; if you are scandalized it cannot be helped. The subject itself is scandalous—Paris.

> I was there at a café concert—an immense hall resplendent with provoking pictures hanging round, and large statutes moving before me, and not over dressed. The hall was well filled with people, gentlemen and ladies, and upon my word of honour, said he to me, I hardly heard anything spoken in the audience but English. He moreover told me that on Regent Street in broad daylight he was accosted a number of times, and that in Paris he was never accosted at all.

I might give my own experience. I spent almost a year in Paris; if I were to make a public confession and I can say this much, I was never publicly accosted in Paris, because it is against the police laws, and that on the Strand in London, from the Gaiety Theatre to the Alhambra, about three-quarters of a mile, at eight o'clock, when the Strand was crowded, I was not only accosted, but even taken hold of by the arm on the street. Now, hon. gentlemen, after this what is the use of unnecessarily condemning Paris as a place to which no man should take his wife, or should go, or if he shall go with his wife, then he shall not apply here for a divorce? I believe those arguments are quite out of place. The hon. gentleman went further and said "There are more divorced couples in Paris than in any other part of the world." This is a historical error. No doubt the statement was made with the best intention. We are full of good intentions, but that is a statistical error. I could not obtain all the statistics, but I have some statistics, and this is what I find; in the 20 years previous to 1886 in the United Kingdom there were 6,587 divorces; in Russia 21,000; in the whole of France 57,000; in Germany 93,000, and in the United States 328,000. The hon. gentleman was asserting that France was the worst—that there were more divorces in Paris than in any other place in the world, and I must make this remark that at that date these cases which were referred to as divorces were not actual divorces; they were divorces a mensâ et tora—separation from bed and board. These are simple separations; divorce did not exist then. Paris, therefore, is not quite so bad as represented, and by deduction, neither are we Frenchmen as bad as we are painted. I believe hon. gentlemen will give us a fair chance, having been attacked unduly and provokingly here, to set ourselves right and also poor city of Paris which needs so much to be defended by me. Here is what I read in an English review about the wicked Babylon, Paris:

> Paris is world-renowned for the number and excellence of its charitable institutions. These are not exclusively the work of the religious portion of the people, but common to all, from the imperial court down to the humblest class. There is a natural basis for charity in the French character. France is the most completely, highly and universally civilized nation in the world.

I do not mean to be unpleasant to London or New York by reading this, but I simply try to make a comparison.

> English and American Protestants exaggerate too much the good of their own civilization, and blow their own trumpet in a fearfully sonorous manner. They think too much of long faces, measured gravity of demeanour, drawdling tones, long prayer set, evangelical phrases, and the tithing, in a metaphorical sense, of mint, anise and cummin. They are blind to the gross social defects and evils marring their civilization; and to the corruptions and immoralities which are poisoning their national life-blood. We do not deny the evils which exist in Paris; nevertheless, we maintain that it is in a far sounder moral state, and far superior in general social well-being, to London and New York.

Since it was given out to be the most depraved country in the world, I thought I was justified in bringing the testimony of an Englishman to show that it was not so. Of course, hon. gentlemen, bad places exist in Paris; but if any of us wish to go to Paris I can tell you that there are some churches there. There are about 50 Roman Catholic churches; there are, moreover,

Anglican, Lutheran, Wesleyan, Swiss and Jewish churches, and therefore if you should be lost at any time, there are resorts you might go to with your wife without exposing yourself to being branded in the Senate as an irredeemable soul. I will not add anything more to this argument, and will conclude with the statement with which I began, that we should leave aside all religious questions in this matter. We are not by the constitution authorized to deal with these questions, and if we wish to pose here as a religious body, let us first amend the British North America Act. Had it been the desire of the Roman Catholic Episcopate that we should make those distinctions, I believe they would have embodied a restriction to that effect in our Federal Act, but as they are all liberal-minded gentlemen, they foresaw that possibly there was no occasion to make that difference, and that, at all events, if any Catholic should apply to us for a divorce he could not, as the hon. member for Lunenburg said, be a very good Catholic. At all events, we have nothing to do with the religious status of these applicants. Let us take simply the legal view, and I hold that as a judge in that capacity, supposing I were not bound by my religious belief, I could not vote for or against the petition before ascertaining whether that man was not equally guilty with his wife—whether he was not an adulterer five or six years before his wife became unfaithful, and, added to that, the argument brought to my mind by the hon. member from DeLanaudière, that if having compelled his wife to live by herself, and having abandoned her, he has not been guilty of collusion, or at least contributed to her downfall.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—As I understand the motion of the hon. member from Toronto, it is to refer back the report of the Committee on Divorce for further evidence. As the hon. member who preceded me is making strong appeals to us not to introduce religious feeling into this question, I should like to ask the hon. members of this House what evidence we could obtain from that committee to induce the hon. gentleman, or any other hon. gentleman of his creed, to vote for the granting of the divorce? Do they ever vote in this House for a bill of divorce? I never knew any of them to do so yet. I have known some of them to walk out when a bill of divorce was before the Senate; but I do not want to live in this country if we are going to put the Church above the State. I do not want to live in this country if Roman Catholics cannot come here and get relief on the same conditions as Protestants. I am satisfied with the evidence before this House now to vote for the report granting this man the relief he prays for, without bringing religious matters into it. But these hon. gentlemen want further evidence. What further evidence can we get to satisfy them? Not one of them will vote for it; some of them will walk out; but if they believe no man should have divorce at all, why come here and plead in this way? I admire the Roman Catholics whose belief is against the granting of divorces, who walk out of the House saying "we will have nothing to do with it," but when they get up here and say they want further evidence to satisfy them, they cannot be earnest, because they will not grant relief, no matter what evidence you give them. I only wish to say a few words to show the position I take. I do not say I want further evidence, because if I meant to vote against the man getting relief, I would not want further evidence, but would be satisfied now. I am going to sustain the report of the committee to give this man relief. If there was ever a case before Parliament in which the man ought to get relief, this is the case."

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I do not intend to occupy your attention more than a few minutes. It strikes me we have wandered far from the question before us, which is, shall this report be sent back to the committee for the special object of obtaining additional evidence? Has it occurred to those who wish to send it back what would be the probable result of so doing? Supposing it went back, and the petitioner were summoned before the committee and asked the question which some hon. gentlemen desire to have put to him, and he refused to answer, on the ground that his counsel advises him that it is a question which ought not to be put and which he should decline to answer; in the minds of some it might be strong presumptive evidence that he is guilty. But presumption is not proof of guilt. I can easily understand that a man of high principle and integrity might take such a stand as that and refuse to answer an improper question irrespective of whether he was guilty or not. I do not consider that it at all necessarily follows that the petitioner is guilty of adultery simply because he refuses to answer a question, on the advice of his lawyer and on the ruling of the chairman of the committee that it was an improper question and one which he was not obliged to answer. Because he follows his counsel's advice and the ruling of the chairman of the committee, he is not to be set down as guilty without the least scintilla or shadow of proof of his being guilty of the crime. I should like to know why his character has been assailed by that hon. gentleman when there is not a shadow of evidence, nor even a charge of guilt, against him. What would be the position of the House if he still declined to answer that question? Is the House prepared to pronounce him guilty?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The law interprets his silence.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Well, I do not know what the law may do, but I know this much, that as a matter of right I would refuse to answer such a question regardless of what interpretation might be put upon my silence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentleman answer a question as to his conduct up to a certain date and then decline to answer the same question as to his conduct after that?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I do not recognize any obligation to answer such a question as that. The man's position is so entirely different from mine that I cannot conceive a question could be asked me which could be applicable in this case. By taking this step the House will not obtain one single item of information more than it has at present. The man has refused to answer and you can make what you will of it. If it is a proof of his guilt, you have it, and where is the use of sending it back to the committee? You will get no more evidence. The committee is not going to hunt up individuals with whom this man may be supposed to have had improper relations. They know nothing about it, and have no evidence even suggesting it. By sending it back you will get no more information than you have now in the report before the House, so that I do not see any possible reason for sending it back to the committee, and when we remember that the committee consists of members of this House who are chosen because of their special qualifications for it, several being eminent lawyers, and that they have decided, with one exception, that the man is entitled to the relief asked for, I cannot see any reason for not accepting their decision. I can easily believe that some will differ as to the weight they will attach to the evidence taken, but for my part I am quite content to take the decision arrived at after a full investigation of the case, and to accept the report presented by the committee, and consequently I can see nothing to be gained by recommitting the report, and must vote against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I am quite surprised at the stand taken by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He seems to be astonished because it was stated to-day and stated before to-day that the petitioner could be suspected of wrong-doing, because of his refusal to answer to several questions put to him in the committee. Does he not know that in his own province or elsewhere men have been hanged or sent to the penitentiary on circumstantial evidence, and what does circumstantial evidence mean but presumption? And if this is done in criminal cases, why should it not be done in a case like this? The committee were bound to find out whether Dillon deserved to be divorced. Let me quote from the book written by Mr. Gemmill (the very gentleman who told him not to answer), on the question of the adultery of a petitioner—whether the committee can consider that matter when it is not brought as a counter charge. He says:

> But it is submitted that Parliament, and consequently the committee, is not limited to the grounds referred to in refusing to report a bill for relief, but may look at all the circumstances of a case and refuse to confer an advantageous privilege upon an unworthy suppliant when, for example, the condition upon which claim is made has grown out of the individual's own iniquity. Nay, more, as urged by Senator Gowan, Parliament may and ought always to have in regard, not merely the question, as it affects the parties, but the effect in relation to morals and good order—the effect which the passing of a particular law might have upon the well-being of the community. Parliament, as the supreme power, has its duties and responsibilities, and cannot compromise the well-being of society, but is bound to consider what would most tend to the public good.

Now these are the very words of the lawyer that advised Mr. Dillon not to answer, and yet this House, sitting as a judge here in this case is told that it has nothing to do with this matter. Is that the respect the House is entitled to? Will this House submit to be so treated by outsiders who come before its committees. Then the hon. gentleman thinks it extraordinary that we wish to send that back to the committee. Are there not more than one reason for so doing? Why! The report on its face shows the reason why the bill should not be granted before it be referred.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—What is the object of sending it back?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The preamble of the bill is not proven, although the report says it is proven. What does it say? The evidence is that Mr. Dillon swears that he has been always satisfied as to the chastity of his wife up to last September, that he had no reason to doubt her fidelity until last September, and that the only complaint he could make was to her continued absence from home, neglect of her children and other duties of this kind, and what does the preamble say? "When in consequence of her conduct six years ago they voluntarily separated"—What conduct was it? The oath of the petitioner himself acknowledged that his wife's conduct was right, since it is well known that such complaints are not sufficient to justify even a separation from bed and board according to the law of precedents. I refer your Honour to the case of Yateman vs. Yateman, which I shall have to quote further on, and while it is so the committee say that the preamble is proven. Now I submit to this House that this error alone is quite sufficient to show that the amendment should be accepted.

Hon Mr. VIDAL—No reason of that kind.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—No sufficient reason of any kind; let the hon. gentleman take the words as they are written, we do not want any interpretation.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE resumed his speech. He said: At six o'clock I was calling the attention of the senators to the objection made by the hon. member from Sarnia as to the presumption spoken of by some hon. gentlemen in the course of the debate, and I was showing that even in criminal cases the court has very often before it nothing else but legal presumption of crimes or offences committed, and that consequently it was ridiculous to say that in this case, we should not oppose the bill merely because we found there was a presumption of misconduct on the part of the petitioner. The hon. member from Brandon (Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer) thought he made out a good case in stating that the hon. member from Halifax had dealt leniently with the conduct of the respondent. I suppose the hon. member did not understand the position taken by the hon. member from Halifax. What that hon. gentleman did say was the conduct of Mrs. Dillon before last September had been pretty good, since her husband swore that up to that time she had been all right, except that she did not pay proper attention to her children and was frequently absent from home. That was no criminal offence, not even as I have already shown, sufficient reason to separate from her, so that the conduct of Mrs. Dillon, on the sworn statement of her husband, was good before September last. But the honourable member from Halifax, in referring to the conduct of Mrs. Dillon later on, mentioned her adultery, because the evidence established it. But there is nothing surprising in the fact that hon. members look at the conduct of the woman prior to the separation and after the separation, since both have to be argued. The hon. member from Brandon was simply taking up the time of the House with arguments that had no weight. Then the hon. gentleman quoted the 115th rule, and thought that he had made a good point, but had he read over all the rules which applied to this case, he would have found that the 113th rule provides positively that the committee shall inquire into the right of the petitioner to have the divorce. To ascertain whether he has the right to a divorce, you must inquire into all the facts, and if it should be established that the petitioner was guilty of adultery, surely he could not claim a divorce. All the legal authorities are in favour of that view. But the committee refused to admit questions which would elicit that fact, and it is only reasonable now that the report should be referred back to the committee with the request that they should get at all the facts bearing on the case. When that is done, this Senate will have something more than presumption on which to base their judgment. If I were to give my own opinion on the subject, from my knowledge of Mr. Dillon's family, I should think he would be able to answer those questions without hesitation, knowing as I know the respectability of the family, but we are here to legislate on ascertained facts; let these then be inquired into. This House should base its decision on the facts brought out in evidence, and that is why I wish to have the report referred back to the committee to ascertain whether the conduct of the petitioner has been such as would entitle him to the relief he seeks. I have already cited one authority. Let me now refer to Judge Hannen's decision in a somewhat similar case. It has already been quoted, but I wish to refresh the memory of every hon. member who has to cast his vote upon this matter. Judge Hannen says:

Every husband is bound to give his wife that protection which the society of a husband affords. Having regard therefore to the petitioner's conduct in leaving his wife without a husband's protection and being of opinion that that conduct conduced to her adultery, I consider that he is not entitled to a dissolution of marriage.

Dillon has sworn that he did not keep any watch on his wife. The quotation which I have just read says that a man who does not keep watch over his wife does not deserve relief if she commits adultery. The quotation is one which clearly bears upon this case. It is often said, and even during this discussion, we have heard it asserted that Parliament could do anything, that Parliament was supreme, that no church had anything to do here. Now that is absurd. The only law which is supreme is the law of God, and to that law Parliament as well as individuals must constantly submit. We must ask ourselves whether we can conscientiously take a certain course. I ask the House to say whether they can conscientiously grant a divorce under circumstances which I have mentioned above or in my previous remarks at the beginning of this debate? I come now to another quotation:

But the House of Lords refused to pass divorce bills where there were deeds and agreements of separation, unless peculiar circumstances were shown to warrant them. A standing order on bills of divorce (A.D. 1798) required the attendance of the petitioner in order to be examined whether at the time of the adultery, of which such petitioner complained, his wife was, by deed or otherwise by his consent, living separate and apart from him, and released by him, as far as in him lay, from her conjugal duty, or whether she was at the time of such adultery cohabiting with him and under the authority and protection of him as her husband.

Now, in this case Dillon admits that he separated from his wife and paid her to do so, and that they were living apart for years. Can we, with the authority which I have just quoted before us, grant a divorce under such circumstances? I say no. We are following British precedents, and here we have an English authority which would forbid us from granting a divorce on the evidence before us. Again

In Sullivan's case representations of his wife's misconduct were considered altogether frivolous and the bill refused. The principle seems to have been that an agreement to live separate almost amounted to leave and license, on the part of the petitioner, who had to show an adequate reason for such separation in the previous misconduct of the other party. The mere whim of both parties to live separate was no sufficient cause.

That has been the practice of the House of Lords, and if we follow the precedents of that body we will refuse to pass this bill. There are other authorities, which I need not cite, to show that the practice in England would justify us in refusing this petition. Even the preamble of the bill is not proven. The preamble of the bill states that about six years ago, in consequence of the respondent's misconduct, they voluntarily separated. Now, what was her conduct prior to the separation? The petitioner swears that it was good; that he could not complain, except that she was frequently absent. He swears that he had no cause to doubt her fidelity. How can you say, therefore, that the preamble is proven? There are authorities to prove that even violence on the part of the woman is not a sufficient reason for separation. The hon. member from Brandon referred to the fact that the respondent was not present either at the trial in Quebec or before the committee of this House. That would be a fact going against his contention. It will show that there was collusion or connivance to obtain a divorce. It proves simply that the woman is as anxious to have the divorce as the man himself. It leads to the presumption that this was the end aimed at when they separated in Paris some six or seven years ago.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear; there is no doubt of that.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The argument of the hon. member from Brandon only shows how poor the case must be which demands such support. The House should refer back the report to the committee for the purpose of having the inquiry completed. Otherwise there will always be a suspicion that there is something wrong in the affair. The hon. member from Sarnia asked what will be the effect of referring back the report to the committee? I see a good many effects it will have. In the first place, after hearing all the arguments for and against the petition, the members of the committee will be in a better position to complete their inquiry. Another effect will be this, we will be avoiding the mistake of putting on record the statement that the preamble has been proven when a reference to the evidence will show that it has not been proven. If we pass the bill as it stands before us, we will present this spectacle to the public—that we are putting on the Statute book an Act which contains in its preamble a wrong statement. It will establish a precedent which will be quoted hereafter, and these difficulties will crop up again and again. If we refer back the report to the committee and the evidence warrants us in passing the bill, then it will be all right as far as those who believe in divorce are concerned, and the public will understand that Parliament has acted prudently and wisely. But if we pass the bill with the present incomplete evidence before us, the public will lose confidence in this House. Let us make the Senate a court in which the people have confidence. As the matter now stands before this House, there is no case made out to warrant the passing of this billl. I defy any of the members of this Senate who are conversant with the subject to show that a case has been made in the premises. The hon. gentleman from Brandon referred to the question of religion, as did others. Now, what was said on the subject was simply this, that the petitioner, believing that the tie which binds him to his wife is indissoluble, we ought to pause before passing a bill giving him the right to marry again, when he must, in his heart, believe that such a marriage would be simply legalized adultery. In dealing with this point I did so merely for the purpose of showing that should this House pass this bill, it would be a most immoral legislation even for those who believe in divorce, since it would give legal power to a man to marry a second woman during the lifetime of his first wife, he believing in the tie which binds him for life to his wife. In giving him the right to marry again, though he may possibly not do so, we throw temptation in his way to which he may at some future time yield. I may say that should the majority of this House decide to pass this bill it is my intention to move that the second clause of the bill be struck out, but I hope the House will agree with me that the best course is to re-commit the report for the purpose of completing the inquiry. When all the facts have been elicited in accordance with the laws of England on divorce, and the 113th rule of this House, the majority of the Senate will then be in a position to pass or reject this measure and the public will recognize the prudence and care that we exercise in dealing with questions of this sort.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria)—An element has been introduced into this discussion which should not be countenanced by this House—an element which seeks to deprive the subject of his freedom of action, of the operation of the law of the land, and of justice at the bar of the high court of Parliament. That element is the religious one, which gives this discussion additional importance. It is not my intention to say anything which may offend the religious convictions of any of my hon. colleagues, and I feel sure no member of this House will willingly do so. Although in this case creed has no bearing, or foothold, yet that element has been intruded and made part of an irrelevant argument, appealing to sentiment more than to the rational common sense of the House. Religious contentions, which stir up some of the worst feelings in mankind, should not be used in this, or in any case where the question at issue is not a purely religious one. Now, in the case discussed a short time ago, of the Manitoba and North-west schools, it was purely a religious one, and therefore justifiable, and in that instance the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface, and the hon. gentleman from Ottawa had my full sympathy in their contention—that religion should be taught in our schools. The hon. gentleman from Lunenburg who raised this discussion in his minority report had very firm ground to stand on and to argue from, viz., the abandoning of the wife by the husband, without appealing to the religious sentiment of the House. It is therefore surprising that he, with his experience, and knowledge of the law, should have assumed the tone of argument that he did, and appeal more to the sentiment, than to the reason of hon. gentlemen. I had no idea that the hon. gentleman was so consummate an actor. With tears in his eyes, large tears—not crocodile tears I hope—he pictured the outraged feelings of two millions of our subjects and how grieved they would be if this divorce was granted. He told us that the Church of England, as well as that of Rome, was strongly opposed to divorce, and yet the question was never raised in behalf of the religious scruples of the Church of England. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa has followed the same argument as the hon gentleman from Lunenburg, and introduced religious controversy. He attempted to work on the feelings or the passions of hon. gentlemen, as the case may be. He has appealed to the credulity of the House by using totally irrelevant and delusive argument. The hon. gentleman asked two questions. The first is to this effect—Are we to override the ecclesiastical law? The answer to that is—the ecclesiastical law is only parochial and local, and has not the force of law and no bearing in this case. The second question is—Are we to override the law of Quebec?—The answer to that question is that the law of Quebec is simply provincial and domestic, and does not, and cannot bar an appeal to a higher court, or to the high court of Parliament. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman from Ottawa that the questions he has asked have no bearing in this case, and should not weigh in coming to a decision upon it. The question may fairly be asked—are the domestic laws of Quebec, the canons of any one church to override the authority of Parliament sitting as a court and adjudicating on a class of cases specially left to it under the constitution? The answer to these questions, as is obvious, must be in the negative, and destroys the force of the argument advanced by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa. I am very glad, however, to find that two hon. gentlemen—both Catholics—have a proper idea of the fitness of things. The hon. gentleman from Halifax, and the hon. gentleman from Toronto, addressed this House in a manner which appeals to its common sense, intelligence and judgment. The hon. gentleman from Halifax presented the case very clearly, free from irrelevancy or religious sentiment, giving us its legal bearings, supported by precedent, for our information and guidance. With regard to the minority report, my opinion is that the Divorce Committee, sitting as judges, were not justified in sitting in judgment on one of its own members. They were not justified in refusing to allow a question to be put by one of its members having co-ordinate jurisdiction. I am also of opinion that the long abandonment of the young wife by the husband was conducive to her immoral conduct, and for that reason I will have to vote against the report.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I beg, before giving my vote, to say a few words on this question as I have heretofore been a member of divorce committees. I served for three sessions in succession on divorce cases. I have taken some little pains to look up the law of divorce, and I have taken care in every case that came from the Divorce Committee this session and last session—in fact generally when such cases have come up — to acquaint myself as far as possible with the facts in order that I should give an intelligent vote. Since the late adjournment of the Senate, I have taken the pains to read over all the evidence in this particular case a second time, and I am forced to the conclusion that the Superior Court in Lower Canada was perfectly justified in granting a separation.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—No, perfectly civil.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—That court did not put the question to the petitioner as to whether the petitioner had been guilty of adultery. They would have a perfect right to put the question to him and insist upon an answer, if the charge were brought against him by the respondent, the law provides for that. Our committee would have a perfect right, if a charge of adultery had been brought by the petitioner's wife against him, to put the question which was proposed by the hon. member from Lunenburg and ruled out, but unless that question was fairly put before the committee in accordance with our usage and the rules of the House, I do not think they had any legal right to put the question to ignore those rules and drag it into the investigation in an incidental way, unless indeed something had occurred that showed there was a great deal of other evidence to corroborate the statement. When the question was put to him, a member of the committee said: "You have no right to answer that question; we have no right to ask it of you." That will be found in the evidence. I was not present at the sitting of the committee, but members who were there know whether it is true or not. Then his solicitor spoke to him and told him he had no right to answer.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—In fact he was advised by the committee not to answer.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Yes. His answer under the circumstances is not evidence of guilt, nor is it alleged that there is anything to corroborate such an assumption. Now, what do you propose to do? Do you propose, in consequence of the report of one member of the committee against the opinion of all the other members, to have the petitioner brought up and re-examined and base further proceedings upon what you can pick out of him by cross-examination? If you do that you take a step that is contrary to British practice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, no.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—If the respondent appeared there as the prosecutor and knowing there was such a charge against him and the prosecution depended on his evidence, then I admit they had a perfect right to ask him these questions, but he did not appear with any notice that there was to be any cross action. Again a good many of the members of this House claim that the courts of Lower Canada should decide the question—that they would be more likely to do what is right. Perhaps they do not go so far as to say they would deal out justice any more fairly than this House, but they would act more in harmony with the feelings and wishes of the people of Lower Canada and the people of the particular church to which the petitioner belongs. Well, supposing we inquire into what they did there; supposing we look at what the court in Lower Canada did. If that is a better tribunal, and one that is likely to do greater justice, let us see what they did. I will read a few clauses and give the substance of the ruling of the court and their decision:

DAME MARIE ANTOINETTE CATHERINE ADRIENNE DILLON, of the city and district of Montteal, wife, separate as to property by ante-nuptial contract of James St. George Dillon, of Montreal aforesaid, merchant, Defendant.

The court, after having heard the plaintiff, by his advocate, upon the demand of separation de corps from the defendant, his wife, who has made default to plead; having examined the proceeding, the exhibits produced and the proof and having deliberated;

Consider that it is in proof that the defendant, wife of the plaintiff has been guilty of the adultery mentioned on the dates set forth in the declaration, and that there is cause for pronouncing a separation de corps between the said consorts;

Considering articles 211 and 214 of the Civil Code;

Doth adjudge and order that the plaintiff be and remain separate as to body and residence from the defendant, expressly forbidding the latter to visit, trouble or seek him out in any manner whatsoever;

Doth declare the said defendant deprived of all the advantages which the plaintiff has made her by the contract of marriage passed between the said parties on the twenty-fifth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, before Mtre. J. E. O. Labadie, Notary;

Doth grant to the plaintiff the guardianship and care of the minor children, Raphael Barron Dillon and Bligh St. George Dillon, issue of the marriage of the plaintiff with the defendant, reserving to the latter the right to visit her said children at such days, hours and places as the plaintiff shall agree with her.

Now, in the face of this, when a separation has been granted as fully as any law in Lower Canada can grant a divorce, and when they deprive the wife of alimony in consequence of her disreputable conduct, and do all that without even raising the question as to whether the plaintiff was guilty of adultery, are we to ignore what the court did? We are told that that court was the proper tribunal to try the case, and one by which the plaintiff could be compelled to abide, without coming to any higher court in the Dominion as a citizen of Canada; yet that court has done what this committee propose to do, with this addition—her adultery was acknowleged in that court, and she lived in adultery, not only from day to day, but from week to week and from month to month. The case was so notorious that it is probably rare, with persons of the class to which she belonged, that there is such striking instance. I am one of those who believe that it is for the good of society in a case so strong as this, that we should have a court possessing power not only to separate the parties as they were separated by the Quebec court, but also to allow at least the plaintiff to marry again. It is far better than to place him in a position of temptation to live as men sometimes do, keeping a mistress, or in any other way that would tend to lower his moral status or mitigate against the happiness or benefit of his children. What should follow a case of this kind is an absolute divorce by which the plaintiff could marry again. Of course such a privilege as that the Lower Canada court cannot grant; but this court can grant it, and after looking over the report before us I can come to no other conclusion but that we should grant the relief prayed for. Take, again, what has been the practice of the Senate and of that committee all the rest of the session. As long as I can remember for some years, unless the defendant brought a counter-action against the plaintiff in order to prevent his getting a divorce, they never made it a point to hunt up evidence to see whether he was guilty of adultery or not—not in a single case, so far as I can understand. In the cases that we have this session—and we have had several—they never put that question to one single party petitioning for a divorce: and why is this case singled out? It is singled out, it appears (because we have the statement of my hon. friend from Lunenburg) simply because he is a member of the Roman Catholic Church, and according to the rites and rulings of that church they do not grant divorces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, no.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Well, at all events, all the relief that the court in Lower Canada is able to grant is a separation; but the courts, I believe, in all the other provinces, excepting Ontario and perhaps Manitoba which I do not know about, the courts in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia can grant an absolute divorce and the Senate through their committee and the House of Commons can also grant an absolute divorce. Now, is this a case upon which they may justly and properly act? I think it is; it has to come to that in the end. We might have many detectives, we might call upon the Solicitor General of Canada to have detectives go out, or go down to New York and watch the petitioner to see if he has been doing anything wrong, and then prevent him getting a divorce here at a future time, and in the meantime let this matter be in abeyance. It would be a very improper thing to do, and it would result in far more harm, and be more demoralizing than to act at once upon the merit of the case. I believe the case is just as strong as all the other cases that have been before the House this session.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—The hon. gentleman who has just spoken stated that he thought Mr. Dillon held a very good reputation in Montreal. I have known Mr. Dillon, sen., for a great many years, and the two brothers, the two young men, for some years back, since they have been going about the city, and they have borne an extra good reputation—the reputation of never going out with fast young men. I can say conscientiously that Mr. Dillon and his two sons bear an exceptionally high reputation in Montreal and move in the best society.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I regret that the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat had not given that evidence before the committee. It would have been more appropriate, perhaps, than to give it at this stage of the proceedings.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I do not wish to be instructed by the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not say the hon. gentleman is asking for the instruction, but it may be useful.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to make one or two observations on the speech of the hon. gentleman from Kings Division. He did not seem to think that any weight at all should be attached to the fact that this husband had left his wife to her own resources for five or six years, but he put in as a strong plea for granting the divorce that if the husband was deprived of the society of his wife he might go astray, and that we should not put him in the way of temptation. Why did not the husband think about his wife that way? Why did he not extend to the wife the same consideration that the hon. gentleman from Kings wishes us to extend to the husband?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is reversing the argument.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes. The hon. gentleman from Kings thinks the House should not put the petitioner in the way of the same temptation, but should allow him to marry again. Why should the petitioner deprive his own wife of the society he was bound to give her?

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—It is all given in the evidence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I know, but this is evidence coming out of the mouths of the enemy, when they speak their own true feelings. Then the hon. gentleman seems to think it would be a very degrading thing on the part of this House to refer this report back in order that additional evidence might be obtained, and he talked about the Senate placing themselves in the position of employing detectives to inquire into the private history of this petitioner. Now that is not what is proposed at all.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—That is the natural conclusion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, not at all. This resolution asks that the report shall be referred back in order that the committee may secure from the petitioner himself, who presented himself as a witness before the committee, an answer to a question which is pertinent to the issue. That is not a suggestion that the committee should employ detectives or anything of that kind. Now, hon. gentlemen, I do not propose to repeat what I said on a previous occasion. There are two grounds on which I object to the granting of this divorce: first, that the husband, by separating from his wife without any substantial cause, has conduced to her adultery. According to the practice of the House of Lords—as given by Mr. Gemmill and as given in other authorities—in the days when the House of Lords dealt with divorce cases, that would have been a sufficient bar to his obtaining the divorce; and inasmuch as our 120th rule says that in cases not provided for, we shall be governed by the rules of the House of Lords with respect to divorce, we would be governed by that rule. The House of Lords never granted a divorce where there was a separation without sufficient cause; and as it is put in one of the cases cited in Mr. Gemmill's book, the House of Lords looked upon a separation as a sort of leave or license to the wife to commit adultery. That is one ground—the separation. The other ground is that, as far as we can judge, the husband's own record is not such as it should be coming before the House. The cases which I cited to the House the other day established both these poiuts, and on either of these grounds the House should refuse this divorce. It has been stated that there have been cases where this objection was not taken. Well, hon. gentlemen, we cannot draw any conclusion or argument from cases which have not been argued. It does not follow, because in a dozen cases the committee neglected to ask questions which should properly be asked, and the question has not been raised in the House, and the divorces are granted, that therefore when the attention of this House is called to the fact that the divorce should not be granted according to the practice of the House of Lords, which we are supposed to follow, and according to the practice of the divorce court in England, that we should go against the law simply because we have neglected in former cases to carry out the provisions of the law. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Victoria in saying that he would, on the whole perhaps, have been just as well satisfied if there had been no amendment in the direction of a reference back to the committee. I think myself that the single ground of separation is a sufficient reason for refusing to grant the prayer of the petitioner; but after considering the matter, I think it is better on on the whole that this amendment has been moved, for this reason, that we are now establishing a precedent for future action, and I think that every hon. gentleman cannot help recognizing the fact that it would be a most unfortunate precedent to establish if this report is not referred back. It would just mean that in future whenever a majority of a committee —not only the Committee on Divorce, but a committee on any private bill—did not wish to admit evidence pertinent to the question before the committee they could exclude it and in that way shut out the truth from the House. As has been pointed out on several occasions during this debate, we are not counsel, we are not witnesses, we are not jurymen; we are judges to a certain extent, but we are legislators in the long run. We are asked to pass a bill, and we should not pass that bill unless satisfied that our action in passing it, is calculated to be in the interests of society. To grant a divorce under the circumstances of this case would clearly not be in the best interests of society, and it would be a most unfortunate thing to establish such a precedent as that which I have spoken of. Supposing that instead of this being a bill of divorce it was a bill to incorporate a railway company. In both cases the petitioners come and ask to have something done by this Parliament for them, and in either case the petitioner is liable to lose his bill if he is not able to satisfy the committee that it is a bill which should be passed. I think it would be a very unfortunate precedent to establish, and for that reason it is desirable, no matter what the result in this particular case may be, that the House should refer the report back in order that this evidence which is pertinent to the issue, as relevant as any evidence could possibly be, may be either got or refused; and that the Senate shall not have established a precedent which shall do any mischief in the future.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—The more this question is discussed the more I am surprised at the position taken by my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Power), the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), the hon. member from Ottawa (Mr. Scott), and all others who have spoken on this question against the measure. What surprises me is that many of them have sat quietly in their seats for the last 25 or 27 years when divorce bills have been brought before this House and never discovered, until the present moment, that it was wrong and improper that questions such as were refused before our committee the other day were not allowed to be put to the petitioner. Do these hon. gentlemen suppose that the entire population of this country that are of a different creed to theirs are not responsible for the moral condition of our people? Do they consider they were unworthy and not proper subjects to come before Parliament with clean hands? And simply because the petitioner and his wife happen to be of a different faith, this bill is opposed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We do not know what faith they belong to.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—It has been stated time and again in this House that they were born of Roman Catholic parents and educated in the Roman Catholic faith and married by a dignitary of that church. It is in the minority report. What I mean to say is this, hon. gentlemen, that if they look upon it that it was an improper thing to have allowed all the previous cases for the last 26 or 27 years to go without challenging the propriety of opposing the bill on that ground, it is surpassingly strange to me that all at once it should dawn upon them that it was an improper thing to adopt the bill without asking the question. Now the hon. gentleman from DeLanaudière—whom we all honour and respect for his outspoken and honest character—asked the House to send the report back to the committee and put that question to the petitioner "Have you been guilty of infidelity yourself?" Now, I would ask that hon. gentleman, and all his colleagues who have spoken, if the matter is referred back to the committee and Dillon should say in answer to that question, "No, I have not," will he or any of his colleagues, when the report comes back again, support it?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—We will abstain from voting.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—You will have all the objections on which you ask to send it back removed, and I ask those hon. gentlemen will they vote for it then?

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—Then if that answer be given in the affirmative, the petitioner gets all he asks for.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—Will the hon. gentleman from Toronto vote for it?

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—It is none of your business. I do that which is just tantamount to voting for it.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—I will not reply to any man who will so far forget himself as to make an answer like that.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will answer it. If the hon. gentleman had been in the House, he would have found that there was something a great deal worse than that answer given by the petitioner, because I argued the case on a point of law. I showed that it was clearly established that there was no case made out, and does the hon. gentleman believe I will vote for a divorce when there is no case made out? If he shows me there is a case made out I will give him an answer on the other point.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—All I have to say is that it is exceedingly difficult to satisfy the hon. gentleman. He has evidently not read the evidence in the case, and if that is not one of the strongest cases that has ever come before this House, then I must confess I am no judge of evidence.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—No case has been made out in point of law.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—The hon. gentleman also stated that from his own personal knowledge the petitioner did not believe in divorce, yet he applied to this Parliament for a divorce. A little further on he stated that he was going to move that the clause in the bill allowing him to marry should be eliminated. Now if the hon. gentleman is satisfied, from his own personal knowledge, that Dillon never intends to get married, and that if he did marry, even if he obtained a divorce, he would be living in legalized adultery, why does he say that he will move that that clause in the bill be eliminated? I cannot understand it, and I do not think many hon. gentlemen in this House can understand it. I regret that it is religion that has created all this unnecessary discussion, and what is religion? Why the hon. gentleman from DeLanaudière and the hon. gentleman from Ottawa and the hon. gentleman on my right and others who have taken part in this discussion have been born of Roman Catholic parents and educated in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church, and consequently they are Roman Catholics, but I venture to say that if these hon. gentlemen had been born of Presbyterian or Methodist or Episcopalian parents, some of them in all probability would be grand masters of the Orange Order instead of being on the other side. The individual who is now addressing you, had he been born of Roman Catholic parents and educated in that church, might possibly have been a bishop.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—He would have been excommunicated by this time.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—Very good men have been excommunicated and yet taken back into the arms of the church. I regret exceedingly that this unnecessary discussion has taken place on the report. This amendment is a censure on the committee; put any construction the hon. gentleman may endeavour to put on it, the amendment is simply a vote of censure, a declaration that the members of the committee did not understand the duties imposed upon them, and it has been insinuated time and again that they did not act honestly—tha tthey were biassed in favour of the plaintiff. I only hope that if this House has not sufficient confidence in the committee, it will strike a new committee composed of members who are opposing this bill.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I wish to say that I have not the slightest sympathy with the religious feature of the debate, which I think should be settled in the ecclesiastical court. It should not have been introduced into this civil court at all. I believe in marriage for life, whilst I hold that doctrine for the regulation of my own life, I feel that I have no right to cross the path of those who look upon marriage in a different light. I consider it very ungenerous on the part of some of my colleagues in the House to say that a certain portion of the members of this Senate are always hostile to the passing of divorces in this chamber. It is true there are numbers of members of this House who believe that no divorces should be granted, but whilst they believe in the doctrine for themselves, I have always observed for the last twenty years that they never interfered with the passing of a divorce bill when the proper evidence was produced before this House. I always found that they were passive and allowed the bill to be carried on a division, showing clearly that whilst they held themselves the private doctrine that marriage was indissoluble, nevertheless they were willing that the civil rights of our citizens should be respected in this House. Whilst saying this much I must go a little further and oppose the arguments of two hon. gentlemen who sit convenient to me at present. I oppose them both on the moral ground and on the legal grounds. You are all aware of the case where a woman was once taken in the very act of adultery and brought before one of the highest legislators that we have been educated to know. What was the view taken by that legislator? It was that he that was not guilty should throw at the adulteress the first stone. Now, apply this doctrine to the applicant for divorce in this case, have we not a right to expect that he also, before accusing his wife and asking for a bill of divorce from her should be catechised as to whether he had himself been guilty? On that ground, I claim there was a deficiency of evidence on his part to sustain his petition for a divorce. I also claim further from a legal basis that he did not acquit himself properly. We know that when the oath is tendered to a witness in the witness box before the courts of justice, it specifies that he shall tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. Now was this man questioned as to the whole truth? I contend that he was not questioned, and that a large portion, possibly, of the truth had been shut out by the action of the committee that when certain questions were asked he was told he must not answer them. Why should this be so, unless there was something wrong? Viewing the matter from this standpoint, whilst I repudiate the introduction of any ecclesiastical question into this House, I feel at the same time that we have a right to send this report back to the committee and ask them for the whole truth, and then when we hear the whole truth it will be time enough for my friends about me to say "we will oppose this bill any way."

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I rise to make a word of explanation. My hon. friend from New Westminster took me a little short for making use of some term that he deemed not sufficiently silky, although I intended no offence. At the same time, I do not know of any right that he would have to put the question to me whether I should vote or not, and what I said in reply to that was that it was not his business. Now there is nothing out of the way in that. In reference to referring the report back, no intention has been expressed by anybody in the House of casting the slightest humiliation on the committee. What is there in it? To enable the petitioner to come here with clean hands if he can. Then, in that case, while a number of hon. gentlemen may not vote for the bill, they refrain from voting—and that has the same effect—and he gets the prayer of his petition granted whether they vote or not. There is no slur in sending the report back, and perhaps if the matter were examined a little closer it would be much better for the petitioner that the report should go back in order that he may have an opportunity of declaring, as it has been asserted here he can, his fidelity to his marriage vows during this separation from his wife. In that event, the case ends here as the usual vote will go in his favour, while others refrain from voting. I do not see any reason why hon. gentlemen would shut their mouths in any discussion in this House, or why they should not give full scope to their opinions.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—And their votes too.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—Yes, if they like. I see nothing hateful or unpleasant in discussing any matters which come before this House. Our rule is, I think, very specific—the 11th rule states this, "the applicant for divorce as well as the party from whom the divorce is sought and other witnesses produced before the committee shall be examined." It is not "may be examined," but "shall be examined," and the petitioner here was a witness before the court and was called upon to answer and he refused. Our rule is as strong as it can be—"shall be examined." Let such a word occur in any of our law books or statutes and immediately there is an end of the matter, because it decides that it is not a mere privilege to a witness but that he shall be examined. That is the law of this House, and upon what grounds is the witness exempted from this examination? Where is the privilege to him to be exempt from examination? If we follow our rule, there is no alternative but to have the report go back. It is not a large labour, nor will it take much time. There is also a provision that in case of difficulty or intricacy the case may go to the head of the government and be reported on by him to this House. Surely if it can be relegated to him to be reported to this House, much more should we be in a position to relegate it to the committee. As far as I can read the decisions and judgments of divorce courts that have been read, they have little bearing on this subject. The decisions which we are to follow in cases not provided for are those of the House of Lords. That, I take it, means the House of Lords before divorce courts were instituted. The opinions and decisions of divorce courts cannot help us, we must look for the decisions of the House of Lords when it stood as we do without any divorce court. I rose for the purpose of giving this view to the leader of the Government. The field that we have to look to for our precedents is the House of Lords, to which I have referred, and our own rule lays that down, that in uprovided cases that is where we shall look for the purpose of finding out what the law is in cases of this sort. As to condonation, collusion or connivance, the connivance may not be expressed in what has occurred here, but any one who reads the letters of the respondent expressing her wish that this matter would end, and that she would get rid of a name that has given her a great deal of trouble in the past, can judge for himself whether both parties are not eager to have this divorce. How does it come that she expresses this opinion, and how is he so eager? If you cannot from that infer collusion and connivance, where will you find it? To me it is written as plainly as if it where in black and white that there is an understanding between them, and they are both in a hurry to part. If there is an agreeing mind between them to part, there is collusion, and that is the very thing which the Senate makes a cause for refusing a divorce. The agreeing mind between the parties is as clearly proved as if the words were expressed. I say that under our rules the case should go back. If the petitioner had the misfortune of being prevented from answering, he may, in the discretion of the committee find a means of getting over that difficulty and improve his position thereby.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—This question has caused a great deal of feeling among hon. members. In answer to hon. gentlemen who have spoken on behalf of the committee, I have no feeling of distrust or want of confidence in the judgment of the committee. I believe they thoroughly did their duty and had the advantage of hearing the evidence and they made their report accordingly. I think they acted honestly, and for that reason and for other reasons I do not intend to vote to recommit the report. It would not be justice. I understand that the man is out of the country, and it would be a mean, contemptible sort of way of getting rid of the question. There is sufficient evidence to warrant any man in deciding how to vote on the question. Having heard, before the question came up, that there was likely to be some more than ordinary feeling on this matter I read the evidence carefully to see what was the proper course to take. After doing so I arrived at a conclusion prior to the report of the committee, or before the matter was under discussion in this House. It is my intention to vote against the amendment because I believe that there is sufficient evidence (for myself at least) to come to the conclusion how I should vote on the question. It seems to be a law of evidence to withhold parties from giving evidence in a case—that you shall ask certain questions and not always get all the facts of the case. I think before applying for a divorce a man should be pure himself. I do not believe in granting a divorce when both parties are guilty. In this case, however, the evidence has come out, as I think it should in every case of the kind, because if there is an important matter it is this of separating man and wife. Whether it is according to the law of evidence or not, I hold that no man or woman should be granted a divorce if the petitioner is guilty of the crime for which the divorce is sought. For that reason I shall vote against the bill; because I do not believe in granting this man a divorce. I do not think he was a proper and reasonable husband to treat that woman as he did. His own evidence is that he had no suspicion of anything being wrong with her for ten or twelve years. He took her in the first place to Paris and left her with her father. Up to that time he had no suspicion of anything being wrong with the woman. She was not aware, he says, that he intended to leave her in Paris. That is in the evidence, that she had no idea what he was taking her to Paris for. Now I contend that on so trivial a complaint as he had against her then, it was a very hard thing for him to do to take that woman to Paris and leave her there. He left her with her own father, it is true, but he was not living with his wife, who was at that time in Montreal. I do not think it was right for him to take her to her father when he had no suspicion of infidelity on her part. He states most positively that he had not violated his marriage vow prior to the separation in Paris, but he does not reply to the question touching his conduct after the separation. Why did he not answer the question? I believe that man had his purposes in view when he took that woman to Paris and left her there. I am going to vote against the bill because I do not think the petitioner should have a divorce. In my opinion, he is equally guilty, although it has not been proven. It has been asked why did not the respondent appear? I have attended meetings of the Divorce Committee two or three times and my feelings have been outraged at the questions that have been asked women on their examination there. I do not think any woman can be blamed for refusing to subject herself to such an ordeal. Therefore, I do not believe any woman is to be blamed for keeping away from the committee if she can do so. All the evidence given, even by the man himself, shows that he treated that woman unfairly. That is no justification for her wrong-doing, I admit, but when you take a high-spirited woman who is treated in that way it is enough to make any person of any ordinary feeling insane. It is enough to drive any woman to desperation. I blame the woman for her conduct, but I have every excuse for her wrong-doing, because she was driven to desperation by her husband's conduct. A woman taken from her home and children, and left in a foreign country by a man who up to that time did not suspect her of doing wrong, might yield to temptation. His wife might have had a wrong disposition, compared to his, to make a happy home, but that does not justify him in taking his wife away from her home and children. Certainly such a man has no right to ask for a divorce. He cannot say that he has been faithful to his marriage vows since the separation. I do not speak from a religious feeling, but from what I consider fair and honest dealing. I would not record my vote on any occasion to grant that man a divorce, because I do not think he is entitled to it, and I do not think his conduct was such as a woman should expect from her husband. As I have said, I shall vote against recommitting the report, because I believe the committee did their duty fully, and with all due respect to my hon. friend from Montreal who spoke so highly of the petitioner, I do not think if he had an opportunity of answering that question again that he would give any more satisfaction than he did before, so there is no use in sending the report back to obtain any further answer from him.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH.—We have nothing to do with hearsay evidence, talk, gossip or scandals as regards the character, saying or doings of parties not before us in evidence. This case is fraught with serious consequences in the future. Are we to grant a divorce to a man whether he is himself guilty of adultery or not? That is the question which the House will decide by its vote to-day. If the House decides that the question of his own adultery, put by me to petitioner which he refused to answer—the question as to the man's conduct subsequent to the separation from his wife—is one which should not be put, it will be baneful in its immoral effect upon society, and flood Parliament with petitions for divorce, not by the innocent and aggrieved parties, but by those who themselves are steeped in immorality, who need not fear that their own guilt can be exposed, or that their own adultery can debar them from obtaining a divorce—it will be a very unsatisfactory decision to the country. It has been stated that such a question has never been asked before. The hon. member for Amherst, who has been on as many committees as any of us, states that it has always been regarded as an essential question and that he has himself asked it. I can say the same for myself. In some instances it has not been asked, and why? Because the case itself may not have suggested such a question. In this instance it was naturally suggested. As the hon. member from Alberta has said, a man who took his wife under false pretenses to a foreign country separating her from her children—

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Where is the proof of that?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—He took her there and abandoned her; that is in the evidence. I say it was not a proper place or with a proper person to leave her, that he was bound to take care of her. The law is clear that a man who separates from his wife without sufficient cause gives her leave and license to do wrong, and he cannot afterwards, when he has contributed to her offence, come here and claim re lief at our hands, and also refuses to answer the questions as to whether he is not guilty of the like offence of which he accuses her. The whole case rests on this: Are you going to grant a divorce to a man who refuses to explain his own conduct and prove that he comes with clean hands? Under the rules of evidence in criminal cases, which apply to these divorce bills, a man is a competent witness in his own case, and when he comes forward as a witness in his own behalf, he is bound to answer all such questions.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is that question to be put by the judge or by the prosecuting attorney?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am surprised that such a question should be asked. There is the rule of evidence, and the petitioner put himself in the box. He took an oath to answer all questions put to him, and that question, which was a pertinent one, he should have been compelled to answer. He could not be relieved from answering it. There is no limit to the powers of Parliament or of a member of the committee to ask such questions. We are only one part of the Parliament of Canada. If this bill passes here it must go before a co-ordinate branch of Parliament, and are we to say that we shall exclude certain evidence which bears upon the case? But we are told that if we refer back this report to the committee it will be a reflection upon them. Well, let it be a reflection on the committee. That is no reason why justice should not be done. But some members of the committee say they will retire from it; let them do so. There are men in this House as competent as any members of the existing committee to perform their duties. I say the question whether he was guilty of adultery after he separated from his wife, which the witness refused to answer, is important and a necessary question to fully determine this case, and it is one which must be answered before the Senate can decide the issue. We are asked, is the committee to be an inquisitorial body? I say yes. When a suspicion is aroused, as it was in this case, that there has been collusion or connivance between the parties we have to be more cautious than under ordinary circumstances —more careful even than if the other party were present. The case being undefended we are obliged to take every means to elicit the facts. Rule 115 says we must find upon the question of adultery. It is only when we have not the evidence before us that we must get the intervention of the Minister of Justice, but when the witnesses are before us and under the rules of the House are compelled to answer all questions, I ask how could we possibly get over that and say that the petitioner in this case shall not answer certain questions put to him? If this amendment is rejected and the bill passes, we will establish a precedent, as far as this House is concerned, that no party to a divorce suit shall be asked such a question however apparent his guilt may be. In this instance Dillon refused to answer the question put to him. The presumption is that he was guilty of the same offence that he charged against his wife. Men are hanged on evidence no stronger than that. Circumstantial evidence is presumptive evidence; it is not direct evidence. If ever there was a case in which a man showed his guilt, it was in this case of Dillon's. He did not ask for the intervention of the committee, but when I put the question, before the committee objected, he said that he declined to answer on the advice of counsel. Why? Because he must have felt that he could not answer it without criminating himself. But when I asked him if he had been faithful to his marriage vows up to the time of the separation in Paris, he wanted no protection from the committee—he answered readily "yes." The other question he would not answer because he could not. My hon. friend from Sarnia says that if we send the report back to the committee, Dillon would still refuse to answer the question. In that he would set himself in defiance of the law and would have to take the consequences of his conduct. If the question is a proper one and he refused to answer it that is no reason why the question should not be put again. If he is not guilty he will gladly avail himself of the opportunity to answer. It is a presumption of law when a man can answer a question and does answer it, that he refuses to answer because he cannot conscientiously answer it in his own favour. That is the only conclusion that can be drawn from Dillon's refusal to answer the question put to him. Dillon cast off his wife—for what? He says himself for no cause whatever—that he had never suspected her fidelity, and that no suspicion was aroused until last September when he sent a detective to find out what her conduct was. The presumption is that he was tired of his wife and wanted to form other ties. I put the question for that reason, and I regret that the committee did not at the time see fit to allow it to be answered. The committee erred—we all may err and I hope no man will vote contrary to what he thinks is right because it is asserted here that the adoption of the amendment would be a censure on the committee. I do not look upon it in that light and I do not see why the committee should regard it as a censure. But there is a more important question before us. It is this—shall an adulterer be released from his marriage vows? There is nothing inquisitorial about the question that was put to Dillon. It was a question which the rules of evidence recognize as a proper one and a question which he is obliged to answer. Rule 117 plainly declares that the rules of evidence in force in Canada in respect to indictable offences shall apply to proceedings before the Divorce Committee. Now the fifth section of chapter 31 of the Acts of 1893 says:

No person shall be excused from answering any question upon the ground that the answer to such question may tend to criminate him, or may tend to establish his liability to a civil proceeding at the instance of the Crown or of any other person. Provided, however, that no evidence so given shall be used or receivable in evidence against such person in any criminal proceeding thereafter instituted against him other than a prosecution for perjury in giving such evidence.

The rule and the law as I have cited are clear and indisputable, that petitioner having made himself a witness was bound to answer the question I asked him, whether he had not been guilty of adultery. Nobody here has ventured to contradict this position. How can we ignore the law that we have passed and which is clearly applicable to this case? If this House decides that the petitioner can refuse to answer such a qnestion, it will have disastrous effects in the future upon the morals and good government of our people. I hope the House will feel bound in conscience and by their sense of justice to give this petitioner the opportunity, if he is innocent of the offence which he is presumed to have committed, to clear himself and if he does not do so that he shall bear the consequence of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Any hon. gentleman who reflects will remember that in the past a very considerable number of cases have been sent back to committees, and with no reflection on the committees, when further information was desired by the House. We are called upon to judge in this matter, and there is not only the question of the guilt of the party himself, the petitioner, but there are cognate questions that have come to my knowledge and the knowledge of other hon. gentlemen in this House. I have heard, on very good authority, that at the time this woman was brought to Paris her father was living in adultery with a woman there. That is a matter of public notoriety. When Mr. Dillon brought his wife there, with the intention of laying a case against her, how could he be justified in that act? I simply state that fact. That is a fact which has come to my knowledge, and if it were proven the House could not for one instant think of granting the petition.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—How, I might ask, if the case is referred back, is the committee to get the knowledge of that fact?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There will be no difficulty.

The House divided on the amendment, which was rejected by the following vote:—

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 8th June, 1894.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (50) "An Act to authorize the purchase of the Yarmouth and Annapolis Railway by the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, Limited, and to change the name of the latter company to the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company."—(Mr. Power.)

Bill (63) "An Act respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company."—(Mr. MacInnes, Burlington.")

Billl (64) "An Act respecting the Medicine Hat Railway and Coal Company."—(Mr. Kirchhoffer.)

CONSPIRACIES AND COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté) moved the third reading of Bill (AA) "An Act to amend the law relating to conspiracies and combinations formed in restraint of trade."

Hon. Mr. ALMON—A number of people have been speaking to me about that bill, and it is said that it passed this House without being properly discussed. I was very much alarmed myself at what my hon. friend said about the high price of coffins, which he attributed to the combines. When a man gets to my time of life he begins to think about coffins. I thought it was a sort of burlesque, but I have been told it is a serious bill now. It affects not only combines, but associations of different kinds. For instance, if medical men arrange a tariff and adhere to it, they could be fined under this bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I have been told so, and I think it is not asking too much to request that the consideration of this bill be put off until some time next week in order to afford opportunity for discussion. I know there is a great deal of feeling about this bill, and it is a very dangerous bill, and has not, in my opinion, been sufficiently discussed in this House.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I move that the bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read the third time six months hence.

Some hon. MEMBERS—It has been already read a third time.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Then I move that it do not pass. I objected to the third reading, and so did the hon. member from Montreal, and when we demand a division I think it should be taken.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the hon. gentleman's point is well taken. The names should be asked for by two members when a division is called for, and the names were only asked for by one member.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—No, my hon. friend from Montreal asked for them, too.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He did not make himself heard.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—I will be satisfied without putting the House to the trouble of having the division taken, to have it declared that the motion was carried on a division.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The hon. member failed to go a step further, which is indispensable—he should have called for the yeas and nays.

The bill then passed.

INCORPORATION OF BOARDS OF TRADE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (FF) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the incorporation of boards of trade." He said: The provisions of this bill are more explanatory than the granting of any additional powers to the boards of trade. In the North-west Territories special district means each county, town, village or judicial district within and for which a board is established under this Act, and with regard to the North-west Territories that includes also electoral districts as constituted for elections to the legislature of the North-west Territories within and for which a board is established. As the law now reads, a board of trade at Calgary—it was that town that brought it under the notice of the department—has no jurisdiction or power beyond its immediate limit and it is desirable in order to give the power and authority to the boards of trade of the North-west Territories, that the word district should be defined as it is in this clause. That is really the only amendment to the Act as it now stands upon the Statute-book. The second section is merely to carry out the provisions of the Act.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (5) "An Act further to amend the North-west Territories Representation Act." He said: The object of the bill is to give to the North-west Territories the advantage of election by ballot. The bill provides for the same organization as is in use in the different provinces for the election of members of the House of Commons. It provides for the making of the lists and the mode in which an elector can be put on the list if his name has been omitted. It provides for the testing of an election by a recount by application before a judge, and as much as possible brings the working of the ballot in the North-west Territories in harmony with the system in force for the election of members to the House of Commons from the different provinces.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am opposed to that bill being read the second time. Introducing vote by ballot into the North-west Territories is a very bad thing. I was in hopes that there was one part of this Dominion of Canada where the old English system would remain, and I think that forcing these people to vote by ballot is an infringement on their rights. I never feel more degraded than when I go to vote in Halifax, when I am shown into a room that is dark, and then shown into a darker room where I am required to mark my ballot. I have to vote as if I were doing a cowardly, dastardly thing. Vote by ballot is not only degrading to the person who votes, but it is a humbug. I appeal to the hon. gentleman from Halifax whether we do not there acknowledge that the vote by ballot is a fraud. The Liberal Legislature of Nova Scotia has decided that persons holding offices under the Dominion Government are not allowed to vote. If vote by ballot amounts to anything, would there be any necessity for doing that? The Liberals of Halifax——

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The what?

Hon. Mr. ALMON—The Grits, if that pleases you better—they have decided that vote by ballot is a fraud and that therefore persons who hold situations under the Dominion Government, when they put in their ballots, are known and spotted for doing so. Is there any election which takes place, even in Ontario, in which you do not hear the statement made that bribery was used? Vote by ballot does not prevent persons being bribed. In my opinion vote by ballot encourages bribery. Supposing my hon. friend from Alberta under this bill were to vote against the party to which he belongs—I do not know what the party is—if the vote were open his course would be known. I was a member of the House of Commons when the bill adopting the ballot was introduced there and I said a few words against it. It did not extend to the North-west Territories and I had a feeling of pride that there was some little portion of this Canada of ours where vote by ballot had not been introduced. I am surprised to see a Conservative Government introducing such a bill and if I stand alone I shall vote against it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I sympathize deeply with the afflictions of my colleague. I do not concur in the reflection made on the hon. gentleman from Wolseley. My hon. friend said if that hon. gentleman went up to vote he would know he was not voting according to his conscience.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I did not say that. I said I did not know his politics.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. colleague said if he voted in a different way from the way in which he had been speaking, and voted against the party with which he had been associated, it would not be known under the ballot. I do not think as badly as that of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley. It happens, singular as it may appear, that my hon. colleague from Halifax and I agree on the question of vote by ballot. I was opposed to the introduction of the ballot in Nova Scotia in 1870 and I have never changed my mind on the subject. However, I do not agree with my hon. friend in his opposition to this particular bill. The hon. gentleman has thought proper to refer to the fact that in the province of Nova Scotia certain Dominion officials were disqualified.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—All of them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No; not all of them.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Pretty nearly all of them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all. We are not going into fractions, but they are not all disqualified. The hon. gentleman did not think proper to inform this House as to the reason why those officials had been disqualified. The reason was this, that at an election in the autumn of 1870 the Dominion officials were practically brought up in a brigade to vote against the Liberal party; and as long as those electors were not allowed to exercise their franchise freely it was thought better that they should not be allowed to vote at all, because voting as they did they represented not their own honest individual opinions, but the wishes of the Dominion Government, which at that time were very hostile to the then local Government.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I hope the hon. gentleman is speaking only with reference to Halifax.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, the election to which I refer was a by-election, and I only speak of the county with which I am familiar.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman inform us what was done in the fall of 1878?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was nothing of that sort done in Halifax at any rate. As a matter of fact, I believe in Halifax the great bulk of the officials voted against the Liberal candidates in the election of 1878. I was going to say with respect to this bill, that I rejoice at the fact that the Government have introduced this measure even though it comes so late. The reason usually given for the introduction of the system of voting by ballot is that it enables persons who are subject to the influence of other persons or corporations to vote according to their consciences and to their political convictions without the fear of any bad results to themselves. That is about the only reason which could be given in favour of the system of voting by ballot. Now, if there is any portion of the whole broad Dominion where such a system of voting is necessary, it is in the North-west Territories, because there the influence of the Government and of the great corporations is almost supreme. Any one who is familiar with that country knows that the number of voters in the North-west Territories who are completely independent of Government influence and independent of the influence of the great corporations is very small indeed; and I rejoice that at last the change which I advocated on a great many former occasions, when measures with respect to the elections in the North-west Territories were going through this House, is about to become law, and that hereafter the result of the elections in the North-west Territories will be in a very great measure the indication of the honest, independent convictions of the electors.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Being from that section of the country which this bill more particularly interests, I may say that this bill is introduced, I presume, largely owing to the expressed wish of a large number of the people of that country. Now I have had to do with elections nearly all my life, long before I was of age; I have been interested in electioneering and canvassing for members of Parliament. We had the first election in Alberta in 1887. We had one in 1888, and we have had two since in the riding that I have the honour to reside in, and I must say that I never saw more independent voting in my life than was exercised there upon open franchise. No man was ever approached and I have never seen a man intimidated in any shape or form. I believe the people have voted as freely and independently without the ballot as they will with it. A large number of people, perhaps, have clamoured for the ballot because they were influenced in some way—homesteaders who have not got their patents and who were in some way under a compliment to the Government. I have never known the Government to, in any way, try to favour a man that supported them in preference to a man who was against them. I have in my own capacity, as a representative of that country, received favours as freely for those who oppose the Government as those who vote for the Government. There is nothing which would so damn a man in the estimation of the Minister of the Interior—I do not say the present Minister of the Interior—but the last Minister of the Interior, or any Minister of the Interior whom I have been associated with in any way—as to say that a man was a Tory and for that reason was entitled to some consideration. His claim would be suspected from that very moment. I am going to support the bill. I think it right and fair that the same principle should be adopted in all parts of the Dominion of Canada, and for that reason I favour the bill, although I do not think it will in the least degree serve the purpose that the Opposition fancy it will—that is, in weakening the influence of the Government in elections. I believe the result will be just the same in the future under the ballot as it has been by open voting.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I have never been a very strong admirer of the ballot myself. In Prince Edward Island we have had open voting. We introduced the ballot and had a trial of it for some years and it was repealed, mainly I may say on account of the expense of the revision of votes and the printing of the lists; but if it were merely a question upon which I could express an opinion apart from other surroundings, then I would vote against this bill. However, as all the rest of Canada has the ballot, I do not think it would be wise to throw any difficulty in the way of extending the same principle to the North-west Territories, especially as there has been somewhat of a demand from that quarter that the ballot should be introduced. I was rather amused at the observations made a moment ago by the hon. member from Halifax with regard to the disfranchisement of so many officials in the province of Nova Scotia, and the kind of excuse which he gave us for that most extraordinary conduct on the part of the Provincial Government. My hon. friend says it was found that Dominion officials were not independent and that they had been driven to the polls in batches to vote in support of the Government of the day at that time in elections, and consequently the Provincial Legislature of Nova Scotia disfranchised them. The same thing has been done in the province of Prince Edward Island, but not avowedly for a similar reason. I may remark that we had the same Liberal influence at work. It was by the so-called Liberal party in Prince Edward Island that the act was done, and in that case the Premier gave as his reason that it was out of kindness to these officials because they were really placed in very difficult positions and were forced to exercise the franchise against their conscience in many cases and desired disfranchisement. On that account, in order to relieve them of a disagreeable and difficult duty, the franchise was taken away. This was the statement made in the legislature, but as soon as that statement was made the men proposed to be disfranchised, to the number of two or three hundred, placed a petition on the table of the House next day protesting against the franchise being taken away from them, and then the same argument was used that we have heard to-day from the hon. gentleman from Halifax—that they were not independent and that the very fact that they presented a petition against their rights being taken away, showed that they were not independent—that they were under the influence of the Government at Ottawa and ought to be disfranchised. I have regarded the disfranchising of men as a very high-handed act, a dangerous thing to do. It has been done in many provinces. Nearly every man enjoying or holding any office under the government or any emolument, down even to a permanent day labourer, has been disfranchised in Prince Edward Island. It is a very dangerous and high-handed act, and as the matter was referred to here, I felt it my duty to make these observations upon it. I cannot speak, of course, for Halifax, but I can speak for the Dominion officials in Prince Edward Island, that they have never been coerced or influenced by the Government to vote in any way, and that as a fact a very considerable number of them had been appointed under the Mackenzie administration and have remained outspoken, consistent supporters of that party, from that day until the present time, and that many of the officials in that position who were supporters of the Mackenzie administration and have continued to oppose the present Government, have not only been retained in office but have been promoted from time to time and their salaries increased. That is the fact regarding Prince Edward Island, which is notorious in the province in which I live, and I am sorry that such a course has been pursued, and I almost think that it is in the power of the Federal Parliament to remedy it in some way or another in order that all the citizens of the different provinces of the Dominion should have the freedom of voting at all the elections where their property and their civil rights and everything that is dear to them are being actively legislated upon.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—After the speech of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, in which it is pointed out that the Government were losing all their friends in the North-west Territories, I think the hon. gentleman had better withdraw the bill or else lose their support in that country. Apart from that, I think the ballot is a most corrupt system. It induces the bribery of men who accept money for their votes and then vote the other way. I think men should honestly come forward and give their votes. However, I suppose this bill is demanded by that part of the country and will carry, and therefore I will not oppose it, but I think it is a pernicious system.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—If this bill has no other effect than to frighten parties from giving bribes to voters because they cannot tell whom they will vote for, that will be one good result from the bill. There is no greater evil in any country where we have elective institutions than the evil of bribing voters, directly or indirectly, by the promise of favour or giving of money, or the dread of being persecuted in some way by a man who may have the voter in his power. I do not now speak of that as being limited to one party, either in this country or in the United States, or in England, but I think it is something that should not be done, and any measure that the legislature can pass which will tend to lessen the effects of it, ought to get the consent and support of the House.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (125) "An Act to amend the General Inspection Act." He said: As will be seen on reference to the bill it provides that there shall be added to the law already regulating the inspection of grain, &c., a provision applying to the inspection of hay also. It has been found in the large trade that has lately grown up between Canada and England that it is necessary, for the protection of the farmer and of the exporter as well as the importer, that there shall be some system by which the different qualities of hay shall be designated when it arrives in that country, and it has been deemed advisable to add to the provisions of the Inspection Act one to deal with hay. It makes three classes of hay and also three classes of clover, with a provision for a fee of twenty cents. I think that those who have paid attention to this growing trade of the Dominion will recognize the necessity of the passage of an Act of this kind.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

INSPECTION OF SHIPS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (113) "An Act to amend the Inspection of Ships Act." He said: The provisions of this bill are to do away with an apparent contradiction in the Act as it now stands on the Statute-book. Section 3 of the Act for the Inspection of Ships gives power to inspect all ships except those of Her Majesty and ships classed in Lloyds's Register of British and Foreign ships. Then, on reference to the 8th section of the Act, special power is given to the inspector to visit any ship without any exception whatever. The provisions of the present bill are to do away with that contradiction and to prevent conflicts which have arisen, I believe, in the past and which are likely to arise in the future. If an inspector should, under the authority of the 8th section, go on a vessel that had been registered in Lloyds, he might be prevented from making the necessary inspection as to the quality and strength of the tackle and other articles which are used principally in loading vessels. The captain of the vessel might resist that inspection under the authority of the 3rd section which exempts vessels of Her Majesty and also vessels classed in Lloyds's Register under the British and Foreign Shipping Act. The intention in the clause is to do away with that contradiction and it reads as follows:

8. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in section three of this Act, every inspector may, at any time, visit any ship, whether registered in Canada or elsewhere, and whether propelled wholly or in part by steam, except ships belonging to Her Majesty.

It exempts from inspection Her Majesty's ships by the inspectors in Canada, but extends the right to all other vessels.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What is the cost of inspection? So much per ton I suppose?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is not provided in this bill. This is merely an amendment to the Inspection of Ships Act. When we go into the committee I will take up that point.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Foreign men-of-war are not to be inspected, are they?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Foreign men-of war would not be registered by Lloyds, and consequently they would not come within the meaning of the Act.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Would British men-of-war be registered in Lloyds?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—They are specially exempt from the operations of the Act.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (14) "An Act to amend the Railway Act." He said: This is a very short bill, and simply makes provision for the protection of motormen on electric cars by adding the following words to the first paragraph:

And may also make regulations requiring proper shelter to be provided for motormen and other employees operating electric and other railway cars.

On reference to the Railway Act, chapter 29, section 3, you will observe that among the powers which are given, one is:

To make regulations with respect to the men that are passing from one car to another either inside or outside of, and for the safety of the railway employees for passing from one car to another, and for the coupling of cars.

Then the words are added which I have quoted. The necessity for an amendment of that kind has been brought under the notice of the department from the many accidents which have occurred from exposure on the street cars of the country.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

PRESERVATION OF GAME IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

The Order of the Day being read,

Consideration of the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (Z) "An Act for the Preservation of Game in certain parts of the North-west of Canada."

Hon. Mr. BOWELL said: In moving concurrence in the amendment made to the bill for the Preservation of Game in the North-west Territories, I have to ask the Senate to dissent from the first amendment. It is a very small matter it is true, but it is a proposal to change the name of the district of Keewatin. The proposition of the House of Commons is to strike out in the second clause the word "Keewatin" and to spell it "Keewayden." Now it may be, and I think it is a fact, that you will find the latter spelling is adopted in "Hiawatha," and it may in all probability be the correct mode of spelling the word if they were spelling it in Indian, but as the Consolidated Statutes of Canada in the Act respecting the district of Keewatin, and all Acts on the Statute-book referring to that portion of the Dominion spell the word "Keewatin," I think it is just as well that we should retain it. I therefore move that this amendment be not concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

The other amendments made to the bill in the House of Commons were concurred in.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved the second reading of Bill (CC) "An Act to enable the Government of the North-west Territories to unite with the government of the province of Manitoba in the construction of the railway to Hudson Bay as a public work." He said: Hon. gentlemen will recollect that I introduced a bill of the same character some time ago, and that that was ruled out of order in consequence of my having embodied in the bill a responsibility on the part of the Dominion Government to co-operate in the construction of the railway which is now the subject of my remarks. The rules of the House prohibit the Senate from introducing any measure that will entail any financial responsibility upon the Federal Government. The bill that is now presented for your consideration does not impose any such responsibility on this or any other government. It is a bill for the purpose of bringing before the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories a simple mode by which they can effect the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway. Hon. gentlemen will understand that this question is a far more burning one to the people of the North-west than it is to the people of Eastern Canada, who look rather coldly upon a public work that may have the effect of diverting a portion of the trade and traffic of the North-west from Eastern Canada. The people of the North-west Territories are moved to promote their prosperity by seeking to secure a cheaper outlet for their produce, if it is possible to do so, and also competition in freight rates which they have to pay in order to transport their produce from the North-west to foreign markets. The produce that they raise is all of a heavy character, consisting of grain, cattle, &c., and the heavier the produce the greater the burden upon the labour which is engaged in producing it. The bill that I am asking this honourable House to allow me to present to them for their consideration is one to enable the Territorial Government in the North-west Territories to unite with the Government of the province of Manitoba in order that they may jointly pool their interests in promoting the construction of the railway. The North-west Territories, hon. gentlemen will understand, do not occupy the same position as any province of the Dominion. They are still in their infancy, we may say, as a portion of this Dominion. Full powers have not been conferred upon them such as have been conferred upon the province of Manitoba, and therefore it is necessary to come to the Dominion Parliament to ask for power to unite with the province of Manitoba in order to pool their interests. Hon. gentlemen may think that it is a bill of a rather unusual character in so far as a member of this House is asking for legislation that the Government of Manitoba and the Government of the Territories have not sought, but it has always been supposed that there is a charter in existence to build a railway to the Hudson Bay. We live in that broad country in a very scattered condition. We have very small facilities for communicating with one another, and it is only by some such means as I am now proposing to adopt that you can disseminate information and put people on the track of projects by which they can improve their circumstances and better their interests. It is, therefore, not out of place for me, as a private member coming from the North-west Territories, representing in this honourable House the interests of the people who reside there—it is not an improper thing for me to propose this measure and ask the House to assist me in perfecting it in order that it may provide facilities which they may take advantage of or not just as they like. It imposes no obligation on them to do so, but we provide the facilities and if the Government and the people of that western country think that it is an easy method by which they can acquire what they so long have been desiring to acquire, an outlet to Hudson Bay, the facilities will be provided by Parliament to enable them to do so. Many people think there is a charter in existence, as I have said, for the construction of a railway to Hudson Bay, but on looking through the statutes I find that so far as a charter for a railway to the bay is concerned, it is not in existence. That is to say it is not alive in consequence of the efflux of time, the period having passed over within which they should have constructed that railway between the Saskatchewan and the bay, and in order to show exactly how it stands, I will read to you the various clauses which affect the charter. In 1883 the two railways which were then promoted, one the Nelson Valley Railway, the other the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway were amalgamated. An Act was passed giving the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway a charter to go to the bay. Clause 29 of that Act says:

> The railway shall be commenced within three years and completed within ten years after the passing of this Act.

That would bring it to 1893. Then in 1884 there was an amendment to that Act which provides so far as the completion is concerned:

> So that the said railway shall be commenced within two years and completed within six years after the passing of this Act, and the said company shall each year after the commencement of construction complete at least fifty miles of the railway hereby authorized to be constructed.

That was in 1884 and it provided that the railway should be completed by 1890. In 1887 there was an Act passed to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway and Steamship Company. In that Act it said, section 33:

> The said main line of railway shall be completed within four years from the 21st day of June, 1887.

So that the Act of 1887 required that the railway should be completed by 1891. Then in 1890 there was an Act passed, an amendment with regard to the completion. Section 33, the section I have just read, was repealed and the following substituted therefor:

> The said main line of railway shall be completed to the Saskatchewan River within four years from the 21st day of June, 1890.

So that the Act of 1890 does not provide for the completion of the railway to Hudson Bay, but only for the completion of it to the Saskatchewan River. Then we had a bill before us the other day which passed and became law in consequence of that Act which was passed in 1890 having lapsed by the efflux of time. A bill was brought in this session extending the time for the completion of the railway for two years from the present date but only for the portion to the Saskatchewan River. That would indicate to me that the present company have abandoned any intention of constructing the line to the bay. They have twice applied to Parliament for an extension of time and in neither of the applications have they decided to extend the time beyond the section of the railway to the Saskatchewan River, and, therefore, it is self evident to any one that they do not desire to go to the bay, and that they apparently have, so far as their charter is concerned, abandoned that part of the project. I have not a sufficient legal knowledge to express a decided opinion upon it, but that the charter is dead so far as that portion of the line beyond the Saskatchewan is concerned, there seems to be no doubt at all so far as the statutes indicate it; and as section 89 of the general Railway Act provides for completion within seven years, or powers granted by special Act shall cease, and be null and void as respects so much of the railway as then remains uncompleted, and as two amendments have been before Parliament providing only for an extension of the time between the Saskatchewan and the city of Winnipeg, I am led to the conclusion that the extension to the bay was a matter for future consideration. In bringing this bill before the House for your consideration, I am not, therefore, interfering with the welfare or progress of any existing railway or any private charter between the Saskatchewan and the bay, and, therefore, it stands alone as an application to Parliament for legislation that will enable the people of that western country to find an outlet by Hudson Bay. Consequently, we may fairly and properly consider the bill upon its merits, whether it is a reasonable and proper one, and whether it is a bill that will be a workable one if passed by Parliament. The bill that I have brought before the House is, perhaps, deficient in many respects, because I might say that I am the author of it myself. I have had to draw the bill up myself without any assistance excepting the aid that I obtained from the statutes relating to the Intercolonial Railway, and it is based on the system which was utilized in order to build the Intercolonial Railway in 1867. I may say that the Intercolonial Railway stands a credit to the country so far as its construction is concerned. It is looked upon by railway men as being one of the best constructed roads on the continent—perfect in every way, its permanent way and everything else being of the most substantial character, and the same principle of construction applied to the Hudson Bay Railway I believe would be productive of the same good results. One of my objects is to have this bill embodied in the Debates so that those who receive the "Hansard" may see the provisions of it. Our "Hansard" goes to all the papers, as it is distributed around the country, and goes to individuals, and it is for the purpose of giving the information that it contains in it that I desire to read the bill, in order that it may go on the Debates, and if hon gentlemen would dispense with the reading of it, it would save time.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The whole bill?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes. The hon. gentlemen having thus dispensed with the reading of the bill before them to enable it to go on the "Hansard," I will not detain the hon. gentlemen by reading the bill. As I stated before, it is a bill whose provisions are principally taken from the statutes of 1867, if they adopt similar legislation with regard to the construction of this railway as a public work. If this bill should receive the sanction of this House and Parliament, it will stand by itself as one bill in existence for the construction of a railway to the Hudson Bay, and by passing it this session even without the application of the Governments who are opposed to be more interested than an individual can be, we will save one year's delay and give the people of the North-west Territory an opportunity of discussing the merits of the scheme between now and the time the Provincial Legislature and the Territorial Legislature meet, in order to consider the scheme whether it is advisable or practicable. We do not by passing the bill impose any obligation on them; we offer them something for their consideration; it is not anything that costs any money to the country, except the printing of the bill in its present form.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—If the hon. gentleman gets his bill passed and it is in the statutes will not that be sufficient without publishing it in the Debates?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It may not get into the statutes.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Will you have the names of the provisional directors in, or have you them in already?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There are no provisional directors. It is a public bill to be taken advantage of by the Government of the province of Manitoba and the Government of the North-west Territories. It is not a private bill at all, it is purely a public measure for a public work, but it requires legislation on the part of the Dominion Government to enable the North-west Territorial Government to unite with the Government of Manitoba, and to enable either or both to extend beyond their boundaries to the Hudson Bay.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Do you want the bill as part of the speech to go into the Debates?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—You cannot read it as part of your speech.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I can read the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, we object to your reading it.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—According to the practice of the House of Commons nothing goes into the Debates unless it is read, and spoken to before the House.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It has been already taken as read and if there is any doubt I will claim my right to read the bill which I refrain from doing only for the convenience of the hon. gentlemen. However, this is a great public work, and although I am apparently creating a little amusement in the minds of some hon. gentlemen at the novelty of the bill that I am bringing before the House, still it is a work that is considered of very great importance in the west and I have no doubt that if Parliament were to pass it, it would commend itself and commend the action that Parliament had seen fit to take very much to the people of the North-west Territories as I think those hon. gentlemen who come from there would bear me out in The bill is as follows:—

SENATE BILL.

An Act to enable the Government of the North-west Territories to unite with the Province of Manitoba in the construction of a railway to Hudson Bay as a public work.

WHEREAS it is desirable to open up the Hudson Bay to Canadian commerce, and to further utilize the traffic of its waters for the cheapening of the transport of the Western Territories of Canada;

And whereas it is desirable that the utmost economy should be exercised in the construction of a railway that must of necessity for many years be limited in its local traffic, and mainly dependent upon its traffic with the Hudson Bay itself;

And whereas the opening up of the Hudson Bay waters is of national importance and will add to the national welfare of Canada, it is desirable to secure the construction of a railway to a port on Hudson Bay;

And whereas the chief benefit to be derived by the construction of a railway to connect our western prairies with the Hudson Bay will accrue to the people occupying those territories;

And whereas for the better carrying out of the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway as a public work, it is desirable to institute such legislation as will enable the North-west Territories of Canada to combine with the province of Manitoba in providing the means whereby the said railway may be constructed, upon such terms and conditions as may hereafter be decided upon;

And whereas the North-west Territorial Government of Canada has not the legislative power that will enable it to unite with the Government of the province of Manitoba for the purpose aforesaid, and it is desirable such powers shall be conferred upon it upon such terms and conditions as are hereinafter specified in this Act;

And whereas for the better carrying out of the aforesaid intention, it is desirable that the construction of the said railway shall be carried on by a body of four commissioners in whom shall be vested the powers necessary to hold the assets, to carry on the work of construction, to levy rates upon the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, to provide the interest, to provide a sinking fund to meet the principal sum of money necessary to raise for the construction of the said railway, not provided for by the earnings of the railway, that these commissioners shall be appointed in such manner, and upon such terms as may hereafter be agreed upon;

Therefore in fulfilment of the duty contained in the foregoing preamble and in order to carry out the intention therein expressed, namely to enable the governments of our Western Territory to combine for the aforesaid purpose, should they determine to do so; Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. It shall be lawful for the Government of the North-west Territories of Canada to combine with the province of Manitoba to construct a railway connecting both Winnipeg and Edmonton with a port on the western shore of Hudson Bay either at the mouth of the Nelson River or the Churchill River, and such railway shall be known as the Hudson Bay Railway of Canada.

2. The said railway shall be a public work under the joint control of the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories; and shall be made with a gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches and on such grades, in such places, in such manner, with such materials and on such specifications as the Lieutenant-Governors in Council shall jointly determine and appoint as best adapted to the general interests of the Dominion of Canada.

3. The construction of the railway and its management until completed shall be under the charge of four commissioners, to be appointed in such manner as may hereafter be determined upon by the respective governments interested, who shall hold office during pleasure. And said commissioners shall have the powers conferred upon railway corporations by and shall be subject to all the provisions of The Railway Act.

4. There shall be a treasurer appointed by the aforesaid government who shall be accountable to the joint governments for the expenditure of all moneys expended in the prosecution of the work, and for that purpose the accounts of the commissioners shall be kept in duplicate.

5. The commissioners shall and may appoint a chief engineer subject to the approval of the aforesaid governments, to hold office during pleasure, who under the instructions he may receive from the commissioners, shall have the general superintendence of the works to be constructed under this Act.

6. The commissioners shall build such railway by tender and contract after the plans and specifications therefor shall have been duly advertised, and they shall accept the tenders of such contractors as shall appear to them to be possessed of sufficient skill, experience and resources, to carry on the work or such portions thereof as they may contract for; provided always that the commissioners shall not be obliged to accept the lowest tender, in case they should deem it for the public interest not to do so; provided also that no contract under this section involving an expense of ten thousand dollars or upwards shall be concluded by the commissioners until sanctioned by the Lieutenant-Governors in Council of the aforesaid Governments.

7. The contracts to be so entered into, shall be guarded by such securities, and contain such provisions for retaining a proportion of the contract moneys, to be held as a reserve fund, for such periods of time, and on such conditions, as may appear to be necessary for the protection of the public, and for securing the due performance of the contract.

8. No money shall be paid to any contractor until the chief engineer shall have certified that the work, for or on account of which the same shall be claimed, has been duly executed, nor until such certificate shall have been approved of by the commissioners.

9. No member of the Provincial Legislature of the province of Manitoba or of the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories shall hold, or be appointed to any office of emolument under the commissioners, or be a contractor or party to any contract with the commissioners for the construction of the railway or any part thereof.

10. The Lieutenant-Governors in Council of the aforesaid province and territories or any person or persons jointly appointed by them, shall have power to inspect all contracts and proceedings of the commissioners and to examine their accounts at all times.

11. The Lieutenant-Governors in Council of the aforesaid Governments shall, in the first instance, fix the rate of salary or compensation for the commissioners and the chief engineer, and shall approve of all other salaries to be awarded by the commissioners, subject in all cases to the revision and confirmation of their respective legislatures at their first session thereafter.

12. The Lieutenant-Governors in Council shall jointly have the power, at any time, to suspend the progress of the work until the then next session of their respective legislatures.

13. The commissioners shall from time to time be paid, on their requisition, by the treasurer, all moneys that may be required for the purposes of this Act, in such manner at such times and in such sums as may, from time to time, be ordered by the Lieutenant-Governors in Council.

14. The commissioners shall furnish quarterly accounts (or oftener if required by the Lieutenant-Governors in Council) to the treasurer of all expenditures and liabilities under this Act.

15. Whenever any portion of the railway shall be completed, it shall be lawful for the commissioners to make suitable arrangements for the working of the same, except that when the railway is completed such arrangements shall not be for any longer period than the end of the session of the legislatures of the aforesaid province and territories next after the making of the same. Provided always that it shall be in the power of Lieutenant-Governors in Council jointly to cancel the same when they may desire to change the management.

16. It shall be lawful for the Government of the North-west Territories to combine with the Government of the province of Manitoba to raise a loan for the construction and completion of the said railway.

17. For the purpose of effecting the said loan it shall be lawful for the Lieutenant-Governors in Council aforesaid to authorize the issue of debentures either in currency or sterling money in such form, bearing such rate of interest not exceeding three per cent per annum, in such sums, and payable at such periods not exceeding fifty years as may be most convenient, said debentures to be signed by the representatives of the respective governments.

18. A sinking fund shall be provided for the payment by the united governments aforesaid of an annual sum at the rate of one per centum per annum on the entire amount of the principal money in annual payments in such manner as they may from time to time direct, and shall be invested and accumulated under their direction in the name of four trustees, nominated from time to time by the Lieutenant Governors in Council aforesaid, and such sinking fund and its accumulations shall be invested in securities in the Dominion of Canada or in securities of the province of Manitoba or the North-west Territories or at the option of the Lieutenant-Governors in Council aforesaid, in such other securities as may be proposed, and shall be applied under the direction of the Lieutenant-Governors in Council in discharge of the principal money whereon interest is guaranteed.

19. The commissioners are to be empowered to levy upon all the ratable property in the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, to provide for the payment of that portion of the interest and sinking fund on the bonds not provided by the earnings in such manner as shall be provided for by Acts of the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Provided that no levy shall be made as aforesaid for interest or sinking fund until the completion of the railway to the Hudson Bay. The interest on the aforesaid loan to be added to the cost of construction and provided for out of the proceeds of the loan until the railway is completed to the bay.

20. The commissioners shall manage all land grants or other public aid as a trust to be held for the collateral security of the bonds they are empowered to issue and the proceeds of the sales of the lands or other assets shall be applied towards the payment of the interest and principal of the said bonds.

21. The material for construction shall be admitted through the custom-house free of duty.

The Hudson Bay itself I need not speak about at all, because it has been spoken of in this House in a very intelligent manner by many men who have set forth its advantages. There is one thing I would like to draw public attention to and that is the fact that Mr. Tyrrell, of the Geological Department, made a trip last year and came out at Chesterfield Inlet which is the northern part of Hudson Bay, and in two Peterboro' canoes he paddled all the way with his party of eight men from Chesterfield Inlet and all the way down the western shore of the bay until he reached within thirty miles of Fort Churchill where he was stopped by the ice forming on the shore on the 16th October. Now if our geological officers can paddle down in two Peterboro' canoes well loaded down in the month of October, 400 miles from Chesterfield Inlet, after traversing Chesterfield inlet for 200 miles—that is 600 miles—and reach Fort Churchill on the 16th October, it is sufficient evidence to anybody's mind that there must be some value in the bay as a navigable water for powerful vessels.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—The only trouble is that it is shut up in August.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, this was in October.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—But it is shut up in August.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, it is not; you have never been there.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Well, we have reports.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You should believe nothing that you hear, sir, and only half of what you see. And again we read of another of our geological party who visited the Hudson Straits on his geological tour, and he wanted to change his quarters from Ungava Bay to Hamilton Inlet, and he got a steamer which took him round; he had to change his quarters in consequence of the scarcity of food at Ungava Bay, and he took a steamer and went round to Hamilton Inlet. Now, if there is a steamer plying on those straits at that time of the year it must be an evidence that there is navigation not only in the bay, as I have shown you by canoes paddled down, but there are steamers there available for some reason or other, possibly fishing or something of that kind, and if in the fall they can transport their men from one portion of the straits to another portion of the straits some 200 miles by steamer; I do not think it is advisable to allow our minds to be warped by the fact that there are any practical difficulties in the navigation of the bay. I do not take such a hopeful view as many do that it is available for six months, but I certainly believe that it is available for four months, and four months' navigation to that great territory and its wonderfully productive power, if only proper facilities are offered it, is of immense advantage. The bill asks for power to construct the Hudson Bay Railway to connect Winnipeg with a port on the bay, and also to connect Edmonton; Winnipeg is in the south and Edmonton in the west, so that the two lines can meet at a common point where the main line comes north to Hudson's Bay, and the further west we go the more valuable the outlet to Hudson Bay is. Winnipeg is nearer to Port Arthur and therefore it is not of so much importance, but as you go 500 miles or 800 miles or 1,000 miles inland then the value of the Hudson Bay as an outlet becomes more manifest to the people who reside there and to anybody who knows anything about the geography of that country, the connection with Edmonton to the bay would be of immense advantage to the splendid tract of country all along the Saskatchewan River to the north and to the south, and would develop the resources of the country immensely. Canada is interested in increasing the population of that country because every man who settles there becomes a contributor to the revenue of the country. The revenue of Canada is about $7 or $8 a day upon every man, woman and child in the country, and if we add 100,000 people, men and women and children in the North-west Territories in consequence of its development by means of such a railway as I am speaking of they immediately contribute to the revenue $700,000 a year to say nothing about the wealth they distribute in the labour of producing the wheat or other produce for their livelihood, all of which is distributed widely all over the country in providing for their necessities, so that people in the east country are just as much interested in the development of that country as the people who reside there have been, and in fact they have had larger pecuniary interests in that country up to the present time than we ourselves have had, because the biggest share of the profits of that country have come here and very little of them have remained west. So that the advantages of such a railroad as I am advocating from a Dominion standpoint are very great indeed. There is a necessity for the railroad, Everybody who is at all acquainted with our western country must know and does know that we are suffering from severe depression, that the people are discouraged because they have not made that progress which they felt that they were justified in making, which they felt the resources of the country would enable them to make. The heavy freight rates they have to contend with in addition to the protective taxation they are subjected to in all that they purchase has reduced their profits to such an extent that they do not see how to make both ends meet, and anything we can do to improve that condition of affairs is of advantage to the whole country. Many hon. gentlemen I dare say, will have seen that the hon. Minister of the Interior read out the other day in the House of Commons, that in 1892 there were 1,276 entries for homesteads in that western country, and that there were 483 cancellations. Now, why are these cancellations? Because the people have come there and they have found that the facilities that were offered them for prosperous farming did not exist in consequence of the disabilities that I have told you existed and they have gone to other occupations. In 1893, 1,022 entries for homesteads were made (so the Hon. Minister of the Interior told us in Parliament) and 695 cancellations the same year; a great many more than half the entries that were made in 1893 were cancelled by people abandoning their holdings and moving somewhere else. Now, that is not a condition which is at all favourable for the whole country, and anything that will improve and change the condition is going to be a benefit to the whole of Canada as well as to that territory on whose behalf I am now addressing this honourable House. The Manitoba exemptions are also another evidence; the Government of the province of Manitoba have had to put on exemptions in favour of the farmers who resided there, and even prohibited them mortgaging their 160 acres of land. Under the present law no farmer can mortgage his 160 acres of land. He has no power to give a chattel mortgage or to mortgage it to a loan company or any one else. It is held there as a sacred right for him to occupy, and nobody can disturb him. It was found that the liabilities and loans were increasing so rapidly that it was necessary to put an exemption law in force in order that the farmers might be protected in their holdings, and that these cancellations and abandonments would not continue to such an extent as was represented to us by the Honourable Minister of the Interior, in the House of Commons, and the reason for that, as I have already mentioned, is the protective duties and the freight rates. Providence has been bountiful in its gifts to the country. The country is productive; it produces a magnificent sample of wheat and magnificent cattle, and horses and sheep; it will produce an immense number of things that we have not been able to produce yet for want of the experience and the labour. The country is bountifully supplied with all the gifts necessary for a rich agricultural country; but if the conditions existing in the past continue, such a condition that some of my neighbours sold a first class sample of wheat for 35 cents a bushel last summer, and in providing for their necessities they had to turn round and with the product of that 35 cents a bushel had to pay 45 cents a gallon for coal oil to light them through the winter. That condition of things is bound to bring distress upon them. Now, hon. gentlemen, some people tell us that we want the earth, that our forefathers here in Ontario chopped down the forest and that they had none of the facilities I am asking for; but our forefathers had Lake Ontario, canals and other advantages. We are in an inland country and are powerless to export without these facilities. The late Hon. Mr. White on a memorable occasion, told us we wanted to be spoon-fed and the remark has been lately repeated to me, since bringing in this bill, that Mr. White was not very far astray. Now, hon. gentlemen, I would like to correct that impression to show that because we come down here and let the people know exactly the difficulties we labour under, that it does not necessarily follow that we are seeking to be spoon-fed, and when anybody speaks about being spoon-fed I would like to show that it is not we in the North-west who are in that infant condition; but that we are in a different political condition there from the other provinces. Every province in the Dominion of Canada owns its own land, owns its minerals, its timber and all the resources within its boundaries. We own none of them. Our lands are the property of the Dominion Government. The Dominion Government have assumed the responsibility of managing our lands, and they should rise to that responsibility and husband them for the benefit of the people there. The Dominion Government have constructed the Canadian Pacific Railway and I am frequently met with the observation "We built a railway for you, we have spent our millions in building a railway for you." Now, I take exception to the statement and say that is not the case. It is the reverse of that. In the province of Ontario, a thousand miles of railway were built from Callendar Station to Keewatin through the province of Ontario, to which the province of Ontario never contributed one single solitary acre of land; and the province of Manitoba and the North-west have contributed 30 millions acres of land towards the construction of that portion of the railway from Callendar Station to the Rocky Mountains. The province of British Columbia contributed a block of land on each side of the railway west of that; but we contributed throughout 30,000,000 acres of land where construction is cheaply carried on. A thousand miles of very expensive railway was built in Ontario, towards which the province of Ontario did not contribute an acre. Now, hon. gentlemen, who is spoon-fed in that respect? Is it the province of Manitoba or the province of Ontario? Then, again, we have the Intercolonial Railway. It was built for the convenience and benefit of Eastern Canada and a large amount of money has been expended in the construction of that railroad, I, as an individual, the hon. member from Wolseley as an individual, and every man in the North-west Territories to-day as individuals, are personally liable with the rest of the people of Canada in providing for the cost of that railroad in proportion to their individual contribution to the revenue of the country. Not only has the interest to be provided for annually to meet it, but further than that, the railway was run at a considerable loss, a loss of $500,000 or $600,000 a year until the present Minister of Railways took hold of it. Now, hon. gentlemen, who is spoon-fed in that particular—the Eastern or Maritime provinces or the province of Manitoba? I say it is exactly the reverse, and that the spoon-feeding, if such a term could be applied to any province or district, would be more properly applicable to the Eastern provinces or to the province of Ontario, which provinces have received these advantages and benefits for which the lands of the North-west Territories and the province of Manitoba have been appropriated in order to assist in the promotion of the construction of the great Pacific Railway. Then, again, hon. gentlemen, the other day, when I was at my father's home in Cobourg he had occasion to buy 10,000 shingles to reshingle one of his buildings and he purchased shingles that came from Vancouver, the cedar shingle which is manufactured so well there, he bought them at retail prices for $3.15 a thousand. We have to pay where I reside $4.50 a thousand for the same shingles, with 1,600 miles less haul.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I would ask the hon. gentleman to what part of his bill that statement refers?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—To the necessity of passing the whole bill.

Hon Mr. REESOR—The reason of the difficulty in regard to the shingles is that you have no competition where you live and we have competition here.

Hon Mr. BOULTON—The reason is that we have not competition. The freight on carloads of shingles from Vancouver to Cobourg was $180, and the freight from Vancouver to Russell was $250, and it is a shorter haul by 1,600 miles.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Do you expect the shingles from Hudson Bay after the railway is built?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, but we might get the tin which the hon. member for Glengarry speaks of. What we want is competition to place us exactly in the same position as our friends in Cobourg.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That is showing who are spoon-fed.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, I ask who were spoon-fed—we in Manitoba or those who purchased the shingles at $3.15 a thousand in Cobourg? I say if the term spoon-feeding is fit to be applied to any portion of Canada, it is these people who are so well spoon-fed, not only by the freight rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway but by the industries which exist here. Now we are paying to the city of Toronto a bonus of $20 for every binder we purchase in the North-west—$20 for every binder we purchase from the Massey Manufacturing Company; and I ask who is spoon-fed, the province of Manitoba or the city of Toronto. Then again, take nails manufactured in Montreal, twine in Halifax, bonuses to both cities on our purchases from them in these articles through the duties. Where is the spoon-feeding? Is it in Manitoba? No, these infant industries still require spoon-feeding and they draw on us for the milk of human kindness which is now nearly exhausted.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Massey says they have not been paid for their binders in the North-west.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is exactly what I am putting before this House, that with freight rates and protection we cannot meet our liabilities, give us free trade and justice in freight rates and we will not continue to rest under that dishonour. I believe Massey Manufacturing Company has a million dollars of liabilities to collect there, and our farmers have to work to pay for a dead horse in wiping it out.

The Massey Company have been able to put up some very handsome structures and these bonuses do exist and the bonuses that the people of the North-west and Manitoba are paying at the present moment through monopoly are beyond any body's comprehension. I made a motion in this honourable House for papers relating to the revenues derived by the Canadian Pacific Railway in their western division from Port Arthur to Calgary at the foot of the Rocky Mountains in order to show exactly how far the spoon-feeding existed there. I have always been under the impression that seven millions of the twenty millions of dollars revenue of the Canadian Pacific Railway was contributed by the western division—that two hundred and seventy thousand people in that part of the country contributed that proportion of the revenue of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, if that is the case where is the spoon-feeding? We are contributing with our produce and our labour, and with the means that we take out of the soil if those figures are correct a much larger proportion than we should. I must assume that those figures are correct until the Canadian Pacific Railway is able to come forward and show by their accounts that what I am stating is wrong. They have refused to produce that evidence saying that their accounts are not kept in such a way that they can produce that evidence before you. Well, until they are able to produce that evidence I will assume that the statement which I have made and which I think came from Sir Wm. Van Horne himself that seven millions of dollars is the proportion of the twenty million dollars revenue of the Canadian Pacific Railway contributed by the North-west country. Why is it that we contribute so large an amount? Because we pay two and in some instances three times as much mileage rates as people here. On sixteen articles of our annual imports from the east, such as canned goods, 55,000 cases, salt 500 cars, apples 350 cars, bar iron 150 cars, rails 100 cars, whisky 150 cars, beer 120 cars, tobacco 30 cars, binding twine 250 cars, grain bags 150 cars, window glass 100 cars, fence wire 150 cars, hardware 150 cars, groceries 150 cars, sugar 625 cars, with 24,000 tons of coal. It has been computed by the "Nor-Wester." The freight on those sixteen items of consumption alone is $714,900, and hon. gentlemen can see how easy it is to reach seven million dollars a year, when grain, flour, lumber, passengers, mails and the multitudinous items are added that make up the revenue of the Canada Pacific Railway Grain alone must be a million and a half. The lumber carried from Keewatin to Winnipeg 135 miles pays 15c. per hundred while lumber of the same character carried from Ottawa to Montreal pays five cents per hundred. Who are the spoon-fed people? Those who pay five cents a hundred for carrying lumber from Ottawa to Montreal, or those who pay fifteen cents a hundred for carrying lumber from Keewatin to Winnipeg. The time has come when hon. gentleman should look at his question of spoon-feeding as not being applicable to the North-west. It is exactly the reverse, and the condition of things is such to-day with us that if we do not utilize our intelligence in the promotion of some such work as this we are likely to go to the wall, and I do not propose, hon. gentlemen, to stand and look idly on while there are remedies at hand, the condition that we have been brought to in consequence of the imposition of these heavy bonuses and the spoon-feeding that we have been obliged to fill some of the eastern paunches with, until their digestion is being ruined by it, as is evident more and more in existing commercial conditions, deserves the serious attention of this House.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—The power of receiving expands with time.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman states the fact correctly, but indigestion ensues. I will not inflict the details of this bill on you because it is there for everybody to read, but I think I have given you sufficient reasons to ask this honourable House to let the bill go to its second reading that I may take advantage of the legislative experience of hon. members in this House in helping me to perfect the measure in order that we may offer the government in the North-west Territories and the government of the province of Manitoba machinery whereby they can undertake the construction of this railway themselves. We are not asking in this bill assistance of any kind or description. It is of course to be presumed that the aid which was offered to private enterprises will be available for a public work of this kind—that is for the governments of Manitoba and the North-west Territories to consider for themselves. This is offered as machinery by means of which they can undertake and prosecute the construction of this work. Money and material never were so cheap for the promotion of undertakings that serve as great arteries for all time for the healthy flow of the commerce of the country, and while it may not be available for a private corporation even though backed by heavy subsidies, as a useful public work undertaken by the public, it will commend itself both to capital abroad and to the people of the country at home.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I have been some thirty years or more in public life and during all that time have never heard of such a bill as this being introduced. It is evident that my hon. friend has brought it up for the purpose of making a speech and putting the country to expense over what he calls a public bill, but which is in effect a private bill.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Where is the expense?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—In printing it and in the Debates on useless subjects.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I can assure the hon. member from Lunenburg that since I have been in this House he has taxed the country by a lot of useless speeches. Whether he understood the subject or not made little difference to him so long as he filled the "Hansard," and if he has been talking at the same rate for the past thirty years that he refers to, if he puts it on the score of expense, he is by this time responsible for half the national debt.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I never got up to speak just for the sake of hearing myself talk. I have never made speeches for the purpose of letting them go widespread through the country at the public expense. When I speak it is because I consider it my duty to do so in the public interest, and not merely for effect, as my hon. friend has always done. It is known that he simply gets up to hear himself talk and to promulgate his speeches all over the country. But he has failed to succeed and he is failing in this instance. No man has done more than himself to belittle his country and prevented immigration by talking as he has been doing of high taxation and oppression in the North-west. He has deterred people from settling there by tales of people abandoning the country. Now some people have gone into that country—there are some in my presence —who are utterly unfit to settle there. The Icelanders gone into the North-west have succeeded, but to send soldiers at the public expense and men of that character to settle there is a mistake. They are unfit to endure the hardships incidental to pioneer life. They go there and instead of benefiting the country they find that it is a hopeless and unprofitable task that they have undertaken and they hound down the country and prevent others going there. The hon. member is an evidence of the fact that you find disappointed men always, no matter what pursuit in life they may engage in, and they do not attribute their failure to their own lack of industry or intelligence but to other circumstances. I am as much in favour of that Hudson Bay Railway as the hon. gentleman, and whenever the question has come up I have advocated it strongly. It is in the public interest that the route should be opened up and it is of Imperial importance as well, but my hon. friend has done more to-day to retard the project than anything that has yet been said. My hon. friend from Welland brought up the matter this session and his speech was one that commended itself to every one who heard or read it, but my hon. friend is destroying or attempting to destroy by his conduct to-day any good effect that that speech might have. I believe that this bill ought not to go any further but should be crushed at once. My hon. friend never intended that it should go further. He himself anticipated that it would not serve any other purpose than to enable him to make a speech which would appear in the Debates and go to the country. I never heard of such a thing in my life, as this House attempting to legislate for two local governments, dictating to them what they should do. It is manifestly absurd and unreasonable, and the only object the hon. gentleman could have had in view was to get an opportunity to make a speech, and to send his emanations at the public expense over the country. When he says I have talked so much in this House I think I have spoken more in the public interest and more to the purpose than my hon. friend has done to-day. The hon. gentleman has presumed to dictate to two local governments unnecessarily. Those provinces possess representatives who are quite able to look after their interests, and it is unseemly and ridiculously absurd to introduce such a bill here, and dictate to them what they should do. I can hardly find parliamentary language appropriate to express my sense of the unfitness of the measure. I therefore move that the bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read this day six months.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I hardly agree with the remark which has fallen from the hon. member from Lunenburg with reference to my hon. friend from Shell River. That hon. gentleman represents a very important section of the country and he has from the very start of his membership in the Senate been endeavouring to bring before us certain difficulties under which the people in that part of the Dominion labour. His object is not so much to get notoriety as to promote the interests of the people that he represents. We have very few representatives from that country in this Parliament. and his object, I think, is to lay before the public facts which are of importance to our people, and therefore the reference which the hon. member from Lunenburg has made to him is hardly fair. It is well known all over this country that the Parliament of Canada gave very large subsidies in land and money toward the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That land was taken from the public territory in Manitoba and the North-west to such an extent that we have no lands of our own to be devoted to public purposes. The road has been built, and while I have always been a strong advocate of that road and have said and done what I could to advance the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and given the company credit for their enterprise, I do not hesitate to say that the rates which they have been charging are in excess of what is right and fair and prevent the advancement of that great country. This matter is brought up here because the Dominion Parliament has helped to construct the road, and the people of that country who have no power themselves to deal with the subject, think that the Dominion Parliament should exercise its influence to procure more favourable freight rates in that country. In proportion as the rates are reduced will our success in that country be assured.

My hon. friend has told you the price that his father could buy shingles for in his particular district, paying freight on 1,600 miles more of a haul on them than he had to at Shell River in Manitoba, and yet could get them 70c. or 80c. less than he had to pay. That is one-third the price of 1,000 shingles in New Brunswick where I used to live. In the North-west we have to pay whatever freight rates the company charge. For my part, I am thankful that they are no more, because they could charge more if they liked. I am a supporter of the Government and always have been, but I say some action should be taken by the power which created the company to regulate their rates so that they will not be excessive. That country can never be what it should be so long as those excessive freight rates are charged on our products and the supplies going into that country. My hon. friend took exception to-day to the word "spoon-fed." I hear every now and again, when you ask anything for that country, that we are a spoon-fed lot. That is not pleasant to hear, when you know it is not the case. The Hon. Thomas White made the remark, I suppose, because people were making demands upon him to get certain grievances redressed, but what was the remark made by the First Minister here the other day when my hon. friend asked for the rates on the Intercolonial Railway? He said that whilst he did not know what the system of book-keeping was on the Canadian Pacific Railway, he could give him the information on the Intercolonial Railway but he must remind him of this fact, that the one was a Government road run at the public expense in the interests of the people, while the other was run by a private company. I do not think that that was a proper answer. We of the North-west are a part of the people of Canada and are helping to pay the expense of running the Intercolonial Railway at a loss in the eastern provinces while we have to pay excessive rates for the transportation of our own products and no one comes to our assistance. I am not in favour of my hon. friend's bill, because I think that one railroad in the country is enough. I am not voicing the feelings of a great many of the people in the country when I say so, but I look at it fairly. I do not wish to see another railway built because one is enough if the rate was right. The people of that country do, because they feel that they do not get fair treatment from the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why do they feel that way? Because where there is competition the rates are much lower, less than half what they are where there is no competition. I was down in New Brunswick the other day and inquired the freight rates there, and there is a vast difference between the rates on a government road which I am helping to support myself, and the rates which we have to pay in the North-west Territories. Now, that is unfair to the people of the North-west. I do not wish to be unfair, but the people do feel that when the company has been subsidized to a large extent the rates should he such as to permit them to export their produce without paying excessive freights. There is common sense in that, and I think it is in the interest of the Government to make a thorough inquiry into those freight rates and if the Canadian Pacific Railway has not subsidy enough to enable them to build and run the road, give them more subsidy. I do not want them to run it at a loss, but it is hardly fair to make a man in one part of Canada pay 10 cents while in another part of Canada he has only to pay 2 or 3 cents for the same service. While my hon. friend has moved at different times on these matters, I think it has been more for the benefit of the country than to aggrandise himself. That is why I have made these remarks to-day on the second reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to reply to one remark made by the hon. member from Lunenburg. He said that it was a ridiculous thing on the part of an individual coming here to take the place of Government and ask for such legislation. Now I can tell the hon. gentleman that they think a good deal more of a Senator in the North-west than they do, perhaps, in Lunenburg, and, when he made that remark, he is grading me by his self appreciation of his own standing. I can assure him that the people of the North-west appreciate the efforts that I put forth in bringing the difficulties they have to contend with before the country and in trying to have them remedied. So far as the question of expense is concerned, what has the hon. gentleman been doing for some days past? He has been taking up the time of the House for two or three days over a wretched divorce bill. That is about the substance of his oratory in this House, that is about all he gives the House the benefit of his information upon, a subject upon which he appears to concentrate his talents. He has occupied the time of the House two or three days and kept up a semi-religious fight in order to gain a little petty reputation for himself. I should like to know which is the more honourable position to occupy on the floor of this House—to come here and discuss a wretched divorce bill for two or three days, or to discuss a question of great public importance for half an hour on the floor of this House, such as the question now before it. The hon. gentleman need not think because the members of this House sit with patient dignity as they watch the hour glass run its daily course in the inevitable performance of its duty, when the hon. gentleman gets up to speak, that the members of this House appreciate his debating power. It is merely an appearance of resignation to their fate which an experience of thirty years has taught them is unavoidable where the hon. member for Lunenburg is concerned.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I should not have contributed anything to this debate had it not been for the remarks made by the hon. member from Wolseley which are directly contrary, as he knows, to the rule of Parliament which provides that reference shall not be made to a former debate ; but as he took it upon himseif to put an interpretation on a statement of mine which I do not think was warranted, I must be excused if I make an explanation. What I said on the occasion to which he refers was that while the Intercolonial Railway books were kept in such a manner as to be able to comply with that portion of the motion asking for the freight rates, I was not aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway kept its books in any way by which they could show the amount of earnings for any particular portion of their road. Those are the remarks that I made, and not that there was a distinction between the keeping of books on the two roads so far as it affected the whole line. The supposition which I then ventured as to the keeping of the books has been verified by the returns laid upon the table of this House in which the Canadian Pacific Railway has given all the information that they have in reference to that matter, but they say precisely what I indicated might be the case, that they did not keep the earnings of the road in separate sections or particular portions of it, but as a whole, and consequently were not enabled to comply with the request made by the hon. gentleman in his motion. Now, that is what I stated at the time, and certainly no such inference could be drawn from my remarks as the hon. gentleman takes. While I commend my hon. friend from Shell River, for whom I have very great respect, for his assiduity and his ability in the delivery of speeches such as we have heard to-day, I think that the position that he has taken in this matter—I do not wish to say it offensively—is absurd. He knows as well as any member of this House, that this Parliament has no power to dictate to the province of Manitoba and the Territorial Government as to the manner in which they should tax themselves. The constitution gives the right to Manitoba to levy just as much taxes as they please for the carrying on of public enterprises in that country, in addition to the sums they receive by way of subsidy, but the North-west Territories have only a limited power and their expenditure is almost entirely confined to the sum which is paid to them by the Dominion Government. When they are erected into independent provinces and have a constitution under which they are governed, then they might have the power, but I scarcely think that these two portions of the Dominion would thank this Parliament if they were to kindly and considerately allow them to enter into arrangements by which they could tax themselves head over heels, because it would be necessary to do so in order to accomplish the great work indicated in the bill now before the House.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They would avoid the heavy taxation that now exists.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—As soon as the representatives of those two sections of the Dominion come to the conclusion that it is advisable, in the interest of the people who live there, to tax themselves to construct a railway running from some point east of the Rocky Mountains to the Hudson Bay, then we will wish them success, but that is a matter for them to consider and decide for themselves. I might take other objections to this bill. It is more of the character of a private bill, and if I were to appeal to the Speaker to rule on the matter, I think he would declare it out of order. It cannot be considered in any way a public bill. It contains provisions which to say the least, I do not think should be accepted by this House or by the country. The North-west people, I am inclined to think, know about as well what their interests are, in the matter of taxation at least, as any other portion of the country and when they ask for legislation of this kind it will be quite time enough for the Senate and House of Commons to pass a bill of the character of the one now before us. I do not pretend to give an opinion on that matter further than this as to the railway rates. I do not think there can be by any possibility an analogy drawn between the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is quite true that large bonuses have been given in aid of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am not going to discuss this question.

I think I could make a tolerably fair defence, if it were necessary at this day, of the action of the Government in aiding in the construction of that road, and expose the fallacy of the statements made by my hon. friend from Marquette as to what has been suffered by the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. One would suppose, to hear these gentlemen talk, that they were born generations past in that great country, that they out of their own pockets built up this whole Dominion, that it was from them alone that the revenues were derived out of which the bonuses were given for the construction of the road. It reminds me very much of an anecdote I heard a number of years ago in reference to the North-west Territories or Manitoba, I do not know which it was—my hon. friend from Wolseley will remember the anecdote. A man had been there for about three months, living under a tent, and he saw one of the "prairie schooners" coming along with another settler looking for land. He looked at the new comer with a great deal of disgust and at last exclaimed: "Here they come. We are to be overrun by those infernal eastern fellows going to take our land." Now that is just about the spirit that actuates my hon. friend here. He is a Cobourg boy, and I am old enough to remember him when he went to school. I think he has forgotten the fact that there is a place called Ontario, which has contributed a large portion of the funds that have been expended in opening up this country, in addition to what has been paid by other provinces. I would not like to attribute motives, because that would be unparliamentary, but there are certain rumours in the air that this bill is presented to this House mainly for the purpose of blocking another enterprise which has been in existence for a long time. The hon. gentleman says that that project has been abandoned. If it has been abandoned it is not for the reasons which he has advanced, but simply because the enterprising men who have been actively engaged in trying to construct that road have not been able to raise the money. If they had got the money, there would have been no delay in the construction of the road. I rose to make this explanation in reference to what I thought a misconception on the part of my hon. friend from Wolsely. I was in hopes, when the hon. gentleman at the close of his speech indicated his intention of having the bill placed not only on the Statute-books but also in the Debates so that there would be an official record of it, that he would have withdrawn it and saved my hon. friend from Lunenburg the disagreeable task of moving its rejection. I trust the House will carry the amendment by a large majority.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I wish to say in explanation that I did not misunderstand the First Minister, and I think he has hardly been fair to me. I did not take exception to the point he made with reference to the returns of the Intercolonial Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I did make the remark that there was no analogy between the two, that whilst one was run by the country for the country's benefit, the other was run by a private company on a commercial basis. I did not complain of the part where the hon. member endeavoured to correct me, at all. It is on the other point I make the complaint and I think my complaint stands good. I might say that I was not aware that there was any intention to block another enterprise. This is the first time I have heard hinted and I merely seconded the motion for the second reading of the bill in order to give my hon. friend a chance to lay before the country the true condition of things in the North-west, and I would not have spoken at all had it not been that I thought the remarks of the hon. memer from Lunenburg, as regards the hon. gentleman from Shell River, were entirely uncalled for.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I readily accept the hon. gentleman's explanation. I certainly misunderstood him.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am afraid that this measure of the hon. gentleman from Shell River will hardly become law this session, and I am not at all sure that, if I thought it was going to become law, I should support it, although I favour the principle of the measure, which I take to be this, that the people of the North-west Territories and Manitoba shall be given facilities to unite their resources for the purpose of constructing a public work intended for their benefit or what they believe to be their benefit. That is a better principle than the one which has been advocated by the hon. member from Lunenburg on previous occasions, that the people of the whole of this eastern country should be heavily taxed for the purpose of supplying facilities for the people of the North-west to carry out their products through Hudson Bay, and to deprive the public works, which this country has built almost altogether at its own expenses, of the profitable business of transporting those products. These heavy freight rates on goods going to and from the North-west are a grievance, and it is desirable, in the interests of the North-west, that these rates should be reduced. If the people of the North-west can get lower rates by the construction of the road contemplated by this bill of the hon. gentleman from Shell River, that is a desirable thing, and there is no reason on earth, that I know of, why the people of that country if they are prepared to pay for this accommodation should no have it. I shall always vote against measures which ask the Dominion to pay for such accommodation, but I see no reason at all why the people of the North-west and Manitoba should not have the power to provide those facilities if they are prepared to pay for them.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—They can get it if they want it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then two hon. gentlemen referred to the idea which lay at the basis of this measure as being absurd. I do not think it is absurd. Probably the bill, if it went to committee, would need to be considerably amended before it would be a practical measure, but I do not think the principle of the bill is absurd at all, because, to my mind, at the present time the province of Manitoba and the North-west cannot combine; their legislatures have not the power to combine and they have to get that authority from this Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And the province of Manitoba by itself has no power to go to the bay without legislation from this Parliament.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Let them ask Parliament for it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Shell River has simply taken time by the forelock; he simply proposes to afford those facilities to the North-west legislatures, even though they have not asked for the legislation, and even though the honourable member has on all questions connected with the North-west Territories been rather in advance of the people there, it is not at all impossible that we shall find before long that in this idea he is simply anticipating, perhaps by some years, the future wishes of the people of that country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I accede to the wishes of the honourable leader of the House and ask leave to withdraw the motion. (Cries of no, no.)

The amendment was agreed to on a division.

He said: This is to confirm an agreement of amalgamation between the old horse railway and the electric railway of this city. Every arrangement has been made with the city council authorities, and it is satisfactory to the citizens generally. There may be some amendments required in committee; power is granted to authorize the transport of Her Majesty's mail.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (74) "An Act to incorporate the Ottawa Electric Company." He said: This is a bill to incorporate certain gentlemen under the name of the Ottawa Electric Company and also to give them power to amalgamate with other companies now in existence. The arrangement has been made with the city council and received their full concurrence and it is with the avowed object of reducing expense that this bill is introduced, and there can be no objection to its passage. The citizens are very well satisfied with the arrangement made.

CANADIAN RAILWAY FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (42) "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Railway Fire Insurance Company." THE DILLON DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER POSTPONED.

The Notice of Motion being called—

That the Fourteenth Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce on Bill (T) intituled: "An Act for the relief of James St. George Dillon," be taken in consideration by the Senate on Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW said: This notice was intended for Wednesday next, and I understand that some objection is made to bringing it up to-day.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I was under the impression when the motion was read at the table that it was not regular, but on reading it over I cannot see any objection whatever to it. As I understood it, the intention was to reconsider the report on Wednesday next without first putting it on the Orders of the Day, but that is not the motion—the motion is to put it on the Orders of the Day for consideration on Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I am prepared to raise a question of order upon this motion when it comes up. It was suggested that this motion was to come up on Wednesday next, and when I read it on the Order paper as being fixed for to-day I was surprised to find that we were to be asked to consider to-day whether the motion should be placed on the Orders of the Day for Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Perhaps it would be better to let this notice drop and put another notice on the paper.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Either way will be quite in order.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I believe the usual rule is, when you do not proceed with a notice, you drop it and substitute another for it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—You can either do that or let it stand as was done by the hon. member from Queen's to-day with the notices which appear on the paper above this one. It is perfectly regular.

The motion was allowed to stand until Wednesday next.

CUSTODY OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS IN NEW BRUNSWICK BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL introduced Bill (GG) "An Act to amend the Act relating to the custody of Juvenile Offenders in the Province of New Brunswick." He said: This bill is very much in the line of the measure introduced by the hon. member from York dealing with juvenile offenders. Lady Tilley has taken a very great interest in the reformation of juvenile offenders, and has, by means of private subscriptions, succeeded in obtaining a sufficient sum of money to establish a reformatory in that province; and the Dominion Government, having at its disposal the old penitentiary buildings which were vacated at the time of the completion of the Dorchester penitentiary, have placed them at the disposal of the province for this purpose. The New Brunswick Government have asked for the passage of this bill in order to enable them to deal with that class of offenders, and after establishment, the reformatory will be maintained at the expense of that province. I am quite sure that the House will concur in what has been done in this respect, and that the effect of the measure will be beneficial. Good results are anticipated from the passage of the bill that we have already adopted with reference to juvenile offenders in Ontario.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (66) "An Act to empower the Niagara Falls Suspension Bridge Company to issue debentures, and for other purposes." (Mr. McKindsey.)

Bill (49) "An Act to incorporate the Welland Power and Supply Canal Company (Limited)."—(Mr. McKindsey.)

CONSUMERS' CORDAGE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE moved the second reading of Bill (31) "An Act respecting the Consumers' Cordage Company."

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a bill of so much consequence that I think it requires some explanation from the hon. gentleman who moves it, and he has not given any.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—The bill gives the explanation itself if any one reads it. The object is to change $1,000,000 of their shares into a certain amount of preference shares and a certain amount of common shares, and that $1,000,000 stock when surrendered shall be destroyed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The title of this bill to a certain extent indicates its object, only we have to read it in a peculiar way. The ordinary reader would suppose that this Consumers' Cordage Company was a company which had been created in the interest of the consumers, but on the contrary the consumption is to be all on the part of the stockholders and the promoters of the bill, and the public at large are to be consumed by its operation. I really do not see how this House can consistently read this bill a second time. It was only on last Friday that the House, with only one dissenting voice, as far as I remember, or possibly two dissenting voices, passed a bill to amend the law relating to conspiracies and combinations formed in restraint of trade, and the things which were forbidden by that bill which this House passed almost unanimously were :

> (c.) To prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to enhance the price thereof ; or—> (d.) To prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity, or in the price of insurance upon person or property.

The company whose bill is now before the House was established for the very purpose of doing those things which the Senate on last Friday resolved should not be done. The operations of the company in the past show what they are likely to do in the future, and this bill is intended to facilitate their operations. If the House is to be logical it should not pass the bill. Previous to the incorporation of this Consumers' Cordage Company there were half a dozen establishments for the manufacture of cordage in operation in Canada. Those factories competed with one another, consequently the price of the article was kept down to a reasonable figure. Although there was a duty on cordage, still the competition between the different factories neutralized to a very great extent the effect of the duty, and the consumers had their cordage not quite as cheaply, but at a not very much higher figure than if there had been no duty, but as has happened in the case of almost every manufacturing industry, the competitive stage was soon passed and this Consumers' Cordage Company represents the last condition of things, where all those factories which were before independent have fallen into the hands of a combination who fix the prices at any figures that the tariff will allow them to name. Under the operation of this corporation, a rope factory, which existed in the city of St. John, N. B., and employed a considerable number of men, has been closed up, and the men who were employed in it discharged, and Mr. Connor, the principal proprietor, is drawing a salary, I think, of about $12,000, for doing nothing. He is paid by the Consumers' Cordage Company that amount in consideration of his factory being out of competition with the company. Another cordage factory in the province of Quebec has also been closed and the workmen dismissed, and this bill is intended to enable this company to make a little more money than it is making now, and to facilitate their operations. In the first place, the present capital stock must represent a very large proportion of water, because there were no $3,000,000 put into it at all. Now, there is no reason why any particular number of the gentlemen who put their money into this thing should be selected for the purpose of being put in a better position than their fellows. The third clause reads :

3. Holders of preference shares shall be entitled to receive out of the divisible profits. of the company, as a first charge, cumulative preferential dividends at the rate of seven per cent per annum ; and the holders of the said preference shares shall have the right to resort to the profits of any succeeding year to make up any deficiency in the dividends of any previous year.

So hon. gentlemen will see that the position of the preference shareholders will be a very enviable one ; they are safe to get 7 per cent for their money under almost any conceivable circumstances. No reason has been shown by the hon. gentleman who introduced the bill, or by anybody else, why these gentlemen should be singled out for such remarkably favourable treatment. Then, provision is made that the residue shall be divided amongst the holders of the ordinary shares of the company. There is no protection for the interests of the public —those are not thought of—and there does not seem to be any protection for the shareholders who are not fortunate enough to be allowed preference shares. This company has done well enough under its existing powers, and I think it is not the duty of this House to pass this bill—on the contrary, it is the duty of this House to reject it.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—The hon. gentleman from Halifax has been treating us to a speech about something that is not before us. This company is not seeking incorporation at the present time—it is simply asking for an amendment to its charter. The hon. gentleman says that the company is making a great deal of money. If so, it is not in Montreal. Two hard-working young men came to grief in this business and have made this arrangement. The hon. gentleman seems to be particularly anxious about the shareholders. I do not know that we need give ourselves much concern about the stockholders. He seems to be under the impression that certain gentlemen are to get these preference shares and that they are singled out for remarkably favourable treatment. Those who hold preference stock will get it in proportion to the shares that they hold, and as that is the course that is usually followed in such cases, I do not see what ground there is for his opposition. When the bill goes to the committee the details can be discussed there. So far as the price of cordage is concerned, those who are acquainted with the condition of the market knows that it is no higher here than it is in the United States.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are combines there too.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Binder twine is exceedingly cheap. They have stocks of binder twine on hand which they cannot sell at all. I trust there will be no opposition to the second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—As a consistent free trader, I could not let this bill go through without endorsing the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, although I do not wish to obstruct the second reading of the bill. We should never lose the opportunity however, of pointing out the evils of protection and one of the evils is that in consequence of the increased cost of manufacture in Canada, the market is limited to the 5,000,000 in the Dominion. In consequence of the increased cost, they cannot go beyond the confines of Canada to sell their productions, and therefore in self-defence they have to resort to combines to restrict the production. Only a few days ago the House passed a bill to prevent combines in restraint of trade. Now, every manufacturing industry in Canada, is subject to exactly the same evil. The very moment the power of production is equal to the consuming power of the 5,000,000 people, the production has to be limited and combines are effected to restrict the production, throwing men out of employment and increasing the cost to consumers to provide the capital necessary to secure the closing of what the combine considers as surplus factories. Then the prices are raised for the purpose of making an enlarged profit out of the people of the country. No one who has studied the question can shut his eyes to that fact, not only in the case of this Consumers' Cordage Company but of every combine in Canada. What was the first combine that brought distress on the United States a year ago? Was it not the Consumers' Cordage Company, of which this is a branch? Their failure brought distress on the whole of the United States, simply because they were working inside a ring fence as we are. In order to maintain their credit they issued more stock to pay dividends out of the proceeds of the sale of it. This created alarm in financial circles and brought down the whole financial structure of the United States erected on the flimsy basis of protection, throwing hundreds of thousands out of employment and bringing distress and ruin everywhere. What has been the effect on the cordage combine itself? A property that was rated by its stock and bond issue at thirty-four million dollars, was sold the other day for five or seven millions, I forget which. I do not oppose this bill as it is simply an amendment of an existing charter, but it is well that we should think of the effect that those combines are having upon the industries of the country, and I congratulate the hon. member for Quinté on the stand he has taken in making the law against them more perfect.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I consider that the combination of these cordage companies was essential to the preservation of the industry in Canada, because up to the time they did combine, that industry was in a perilous condition. I shall not enter into a discussion of the question of free trade and protection now. I merely wish to say that I hope the Cordage Company will produce a superior article, especially in the line of large hawsers used by vessels on the banks. The people in the county from which I come have to use those hawsers, and they are obliged to purchase cables manufactured in the United States, in consequence of the inferior quality of the article produced in Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman should not run down our own productions.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I do not agree with the hon. gentleman from Marquette that it is necessary or desirable that we should on every occasion bring up this great question of free trade and protection. If we were dealing with the general principle his remarks would have been in place, but the bill before us is simply to amend the the charter of a company already incorporated. We are not asked to give them additional power but simply to enable them to carry out a matter which is entirely domestic—a matter in which other people who are not connected with the company have no interest whatever. As to the rights of the shareholders that the hon. gentleman from Halifax desires to protect, does he not notice that the clause must have the concurrence of the shareholders before it can have any effect? When we find that the shareholders themselves desire this legislation, I cannot conceive why we should be asked to interfere with their arrangements. The final clause of the bill shows that the rights of the creditors are to be protected. If it were a bill to incorporate this company, then I could understand how these remarks, to which we have been listening, might be made against it.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time on a division.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (38) "An Act respecting the Ontario Loan and Debenture Company."—(Mr. McKindsey.)

Bill (6) "An Act to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes."—(Mr. Dickey.)

INCORPORATION OF BOARDS OF TRADE BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (FF) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the incorporation of Boards of Trade."

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION BILL.

IN THE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (5) " An Act further to amend the North-west Territories Representation Act."

Hon. Mr. BERNIER (In French)—I have no intention to oppose the passage of this bill. Nevertheless, as this is the first time that I have had the opportunity of expressing my views on the subject of the ballot, I wish to put on record the fact that I am opposed to the system of secret voting. It is degrading to public life. When the ballot was introduced in this country it was supposed that it would have the effect of securing absolute secrecy in recording votes and preventing corruption and intimidation. It has not succeeded in doing anything of the kind. It is contrary to the genius of the Government under which we live and for this reason I am opposed to the bill and I wish to put on record my opposition to secret voting.

The motion was agreed to.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have looked through this bill and I do not find that it is anywhere stated that elections shall be by ballot. I do not mean to say it is absolutely necessary, but I think there should be some declaration in the bill to that effect. We only get it inferentially. There is some reference to the ballot in the amended schedule "L" of the bill, but I think there should be a declaration in the body of the bill that hereafter elections in the North-west Territories are to be by ballot.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This provision is in the bill by enacting a section in the Dominion Act as forming part of the bill.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6,

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Have any petitions come from the North-west asking for vote by ballot?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—That is the only constitutional way in which it can be done. The Government of Nova Scotia have pointed out to the world that the ballot is no safeguard. I have been told by persons coming from there that they all wish it. In Nova Scotia almost every person I speak to deprecates the ballot and says it is no use at all and that it tends to bribery and corruption.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman will understand it is the wish of the people in the North-west to have elections by ballot. Moreover, this bill has relation to Dominion elections and is a matter altogether within the discretion of the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My reason for asking the question is this: The clause which is now under consideration is clause 6. We go from section 20 to section 29. I notice that the section of the Dominion Elections Act which provides for vote by ballot is section 28, and that section is not among those sections which are made applicable to the North-west.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—But section 29 enacts it sufficiently.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The other should be included.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 7,

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Section 7 should read in this way:

> Any application for a recount or final addition provided for by section 64 of the Dominion Act, shall in the North-west Territories be made to any judge of the Supreme Court of the said territory.

There is also another application which can be made which is the revision of this decision of the judge of the Supreme Court before the whole court, and the bill as now submitted to us has not provided for this, and at the end of the section I wish to have the following amendment:

> And the application provided for the subsection added to the subsection by section 11 of chap. 19 of the Statutes of 1891 shall be made to the court en banco.

That is before the whole court.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DEVER, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (125) "An Act further to amend the General Inspection Act."

(In the Committee.)

On the second clause,

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I should like to have some explanation from the Government as to the intent and scope of this clause. It affects a large interest in the Maritime Province, that of hay which is being exported, and I should like to know whether it is intended to be obligatory on the exporters of hay; if so, this classification will be eminently deceptive. The market for hay chiefly is England, and in the English market anyone can see by looking at the prices current, that the hay which contains the greatest quantity of clover is thought to be the best hay, and in the bill this position is just reversed. The hay with the most timothy and the least clover is number 1, and that, with a percentage only of one-third of clover is number 2, and half timothy and half clover is number 3: that is to say, the grade decreases as the quantity of clover increases and then I suppose it may be intended that this discrepancy shall be described by the shipping grade of hay which is one of the items in this, on page 30: "regular shipping pressed hay, sound and well cured." I should like to know whether that is simply intended to be applicable to the hay that is to be shipped abroad, and whether these other subsections would interfere with it, because if it does, it will do great injury to those who ship the best class of hay in this country; that is to say, the hay that has the most clover in it, and which has been so accepted in England by actual use. Therefore, if we make this rule, of grading the hay, it appears to me it will do a great injury, and it will be inconsistent with the laws of trade which regulate the price; so in point of fact, if you are to look at this as the test of the quality of the hay, the inspection is of no service at all. Then the No. 1 hay will be the least valuable, and the other, which has a great quantity of clover, which commands the greatest price in the British market, will be the lowest grade. I should like to have some explanation of that, otherwise I fear it may lead to confusion. If it is intended that the only part that affects shipping hay is that which is classed under shipping hay, it should be made clear; it does not state what the quality of it will be, whether it shall be timothy or clover or any other hay. Of course, that might meet the difficulty, but I should like to call the attention of the Minister to it. I hope I have made myself understood that the rule in England is that the hay which contains the most clover is the most valuable, and thought to be most nutritive, but in this country we consider that the hay which has the most timothy and which has the least proportion of clover, is the most valuable. Perhaps this is not intended to apply to hay sent abroad. I have only just seen the bill and my attention has been called to it.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I might mention that this bill, simple in its character though it appears to be, was discussed for two or three hours in the other branch of the legislature by all the agriculturists, farmers and shippers who were interested in trade generally, and that the general consensus of opinion was that hay for the foreign market should be graded in this way. I see that last year when hay rose to a very high price in England great difficulty arose on the kinds and qualities of hay and the manner in which it was shipped from this country; so much so indeed that it almost brought the Canadian product into disrepute in the hay market, and it was then suggested not only by the Canadian exporters and shippers, but by dealers in England as well as in Canada, that hay should be added to the items provided for inspection in the General Inspection Act, and it was after a good deal of consideration and consultation with those who are interested as purchasers and others that these grades were adopted. I do not know or think that the interpretation placed upon these clauses by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken would be borne out in the selection of hay; that is, that the quality of hay which in this country we would consider to be the best for feeding purposes, mostly timothy, would be A No. 1—that is as to quality —in the English market. Now the three grades are 1, 2 and 3; and the first grade is timothy with a certain proportion of clover, and the second grade is timothy with a larger proportion of clover, and the third grade is a certain proportion of timothy with a still larger proportion of clover. Now if grade No. 3 be the article which is required, or which would be preferred and which would bring the highest price in the market in England, surely those who wanted to purchase would not buy No. 1 ; they would take No. 3, and this classification is only for the purpose of grading the hay, giving it a grade by which you could know its qualities. If No. 3 is better for the purpose for which it is purchased than No. 1, then the purchaser in England or Europe would purchase No. 3 and not No. 1, and the same argument applies precisely to the clover, which is also graded ; and at line 30 the provision is that hay which has been badly cured, stained and otherwise out of condition, shall not have any grade at all, so that parties going into the market for the purpose of purchasing hay finding a lot for sale without any grade would take it for granted that it was of the character indicated in this Bill. The second paragraph, provides that all shipping grades, 1, 2, 3, of either timothy or clover, shall of necessity be of good condition, pressed, sound and well-cured ; so that the merchant who wishes to purchase either hay or clover, finding the bales marked knows its character. These are the provisions of the bill, and I know from a good deal of correspondence that I had in the Department of Trade and Commerce, particularly from Bristol, which seems to be one of the best markets for Canadian hay, that these difficulties to which I have called attention were pointed out, and there were other causes which perhaps are not incident to this bill to which I may refer, the shipping of bundles of pressed hay without being properly marked. For instance a shipper would place on board a vessel 100 bales of hay of a certain weight, another shipper would put 200 or 300 bales upon the very same vessel ; it would be all dumped in together and when it reached the English market there was nothing to indicate which bundle belonged to either one shipment or the other; and the result was that in many cases the purchaser in buying bundles of hay would find he had a couple of tons too little and the other man who purchased other bundles would find he had a ton or two too much. That led to complication and difficulty, and the department at once issued circulars to hay dealers and sent them all over the country calling their attention to this and asking them to be more particular in this new branch of trade.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They are marking all their bales now?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The question of the grading was discussed for a long time in the other branch of parliament by those who are better acquainted with the qualities of hay than I am, and I speak more from the facts arising out of the difficulties that presented themselves to me in trying to advance and extend the trade in this particular. I might say also that this is not compulsory ; it is a question in my mind whether it ought not to be.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—It ought to be.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Those most interested thought it was best to leave it optional. I should be glad to have suggestions from those who have a practical knowledge of the business.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—How is this inspection to be proceeded with? Does the inspector examine the hay before the pressing or after it is baled?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is no provision on that subject. If the hay is not inspected before it is baled and wired, I do not see very well how they are going to get at the true quality.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—The great trouble with the hay is that the inside of the bales may not be of the same quality as the outside of the bales. There may be something wrongly put in, and it would be impossible to detect it on looking at the outside of the bales. They can see how it looks there, but they cannot tell whether there is anything wrong with the hay inside. The Minister says that circulars have been sent to numbers of hay dealers all over the country. I have never heard of any circulars being sent to the Maritime Provinces, although that is a part of this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—A very important part.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—They are very considerable areas of fine hay land in the Maritime Provinces and we produce a kind of hay which, while it may be the very best kind of feed for horses and is so recognized by the lumbermen of the Maritime Provinces would not come under any of these classifications of prime timothy or No. 1 clover. The question is whether by passing this amendment to the Inspection Act and putting that hay down as shipping hay, it would be fair to the farmers of the Maritime Provinces. So far as curing is concerned, the inspector could certify to that, but if it is calculated to prevent that description of hay from being graded as of first class character by this amendment, it would be against the interests of those sections where this particular kind of hay is produced. That seems to be an objectionable feature of the bill. However, the General Inspection Act only applies to such portions of the country as the Governor in Council may choose to appoint inspectors in, and therefore inspection under the General Act might not be made to apply to the Lower Provinces at all.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—What do you term that hay?

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—It is generally called couch grass mixed with timothy.

Hon. Mr. READ—I think the defect in the bill is in these words, "of good colour," speaking of timothy. It should define what good colour means.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Everybody who knows anything about hay knows that.

Hon. Mr. READ—The colour is in accordance with the time it is cut. Many say that the best timothy is when it has lost its green colour. The question is what is a good colour.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE—Green.

Hon. Mr. READ—Then say so. I think it is myself.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—If hay gets so ripe as to lose its colour it is not good.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—One would suppose that in another place where there are so many agriculturists, the bill would be put in the best possible shape, and that it would be presumption on our part to try to amend it. However, there are two or three defects to which I should like to call attention. The first is in regard to the classification of hay. It is all put under two heads, timothy and clover. The day has gone by, even in Ontario, when we confine ourselves to timothy and clover. One of the most beneficial results conferred by the Experimental Farm on this country has been in showing that there are a great many pasture and meadow grasses that are worth a good deal more than even timothy and clover, and I do not see why the classification should be confined to these two varieties. Then, again, in regard to the mode of inspection, I quite agree that it is an important point. I am sorry to say I have seen myself, in Ontario, bales of hay opened which proved to be of a very different quality from what they appeared to be on the outside, and I do not know anything that ought to be the subject of careful inspection more than this very article of baled hay. How it is to be carried out, I am not at this moment sufficiently informed to state, but if it is to be inspected after it is baled, I think the grading would be a farce. There is no doubt about it, that the exportation of hay opens up a large field for the farmers of this country, and one that ought to be profitable if the character of the hay is kept up to a high standard. Therefore, I should be glad to see the inspection made obligatory, and not a voluntary affair. If hay can be sent without its being inspected, we are always liable to have the character of our hay damaged by rubbish being sent to the English market.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I have had a good deal of experience in the handling and feeding of hay, and in my opinion the best is clover and timothy, mixed. Those two grasses contain more saccharine matter than any other varieties. Clover is better suited for cows and sheep than for horses. Timothy is the best hay for horses that are travelling and working. It is of course a very strong grass and full of saccharine matter which, is beneficial for food even to human beings. We must have saccharine matter in our food. Hay that has not lost its natural juices or its green colour is known to be the best hay. Either clover or timothy hay is the best for export. Therefore, the more simply it is described the better. In that way the customer in England would know what he was buying either in clover or timothy.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I have been engaged considerably in this hay business and know something about it. The character of Canadian hay has suffered a great deal in England by people being careless in shipping and carelessness in transportation. A great deal of our hay has suffered in transportation—it has been left out in the rain before being put on the vessel, and the Canadian farmer has suffered in consequence. It is very desirable to have an inspection, and I am glad to see that hay is to be inspected before it is shipped, but how is that to be done? The question is, how can you inspect hay after it is baled up? There must be two inspections. The inspector must see the hay while it is in the barn to ascertain its general character, and after it is baled, he must see that it is baled properly. No man in his senses would put anything inside of a bale of hay except the hay itself.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I have known hay to be of very fine quality on the outside, while on the inside it was quite musty.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I know that. If you bale hay and leave it exposed to the weather and the rain gets into it, when it dries it dries on the outside, and you find it is poor hay in the middle.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It was not that—it was stored in a damp warehouse.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I know that and that is what I am speaking of–the damage done in transportation. A great deal of our hay is shipped by way of New York. It is put on lighters before it is transferred to the steamship, and I have known it to be kept under the rain for forty-eight hours before being put on the vessel, and when it was unloaded in England it was damaged and the fault was attributed to the Canadian grower. But if you have an inspection a man knows what he buys. It costs twice as much to cure hay properly as it costs to cure inferior hay. You must cut timothy before it is ripe to make good hay. You must do the same with clover. You must cut clover while there is no dew on it to make first class hay.

Hon. Mr. POWER—How will the most careful inspection of hay in Canada prevent the destruction of hay on board of the lighter in New York afterwards?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Certainly it will not. At the same time, if it is inspected here by Canadians, the reputation of the man who sells it is affected, and if he sends out good hay and it is damaged in transit, he can look to the carriers to make good the damage. I shipped 275 tons of hay last year myself. I never sold or put up as good hay in my life as that hay. The weather was fine when it was cut and saved. It was all put under cover and never went out of the barn until it was pressed to be put on the cars. I was told when it got to England that some of it was damaged. It came in the way that I have spoken of. If this hay had been inspected, it would have been a great satisfaction to me because I had taken particular pains to see that it was well cured. It had never had a drop of rain on it. I even took the care to have three wires on every bale in order that my hay should get to the British market in good order, and the result was as I have told you. I am very glad that we are to have hay inspected, but in order to get a thorough inspection you must see the hay before it is baled and see it afterwards.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—How do you propose to indicate the classification? How is it to be certified by the inspector? You say that the loose hay should be inspected first—how is the mark to be put on it?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You cannot put the mark on at all until after it is baled.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—How do you do after it is baled?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—With a label. You put on a tag. That is the way they mark it now. Every man who purchases from me puts a tag with the weight of the bale on it.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—An examination is made when the hay is loose in the mow. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the inspector should remain and see it pressed?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—No, I do not expect anything of the kind. I expect if a man has a quantity of hay to sell and is negotiating with a purchaser that he will get an expert to see his hay, and state what quality it is. He can get a certificate of that if he likes. He can, when it is baled, call the inspector and have him examine it. He can call him in the first place. He must have the hay inspected first by some one who is competent to judge of its character, and get a certificate from him. It does not take much time to examine three or four hundred tons of hay and tell you the character of it. You cannot have the inspector there while you are packing the hay, because the machine will only pack about fifteen tons a day.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—For twenty-two years I lived on a farm in New Brunswick, and I have had a great deal of experience in shipping and handling hay. It is utterly impossible to tell what quality the hay is when it is in the mow. The only way to overcome the difficulty, to my mind, would be to make the man who presses the hay the inspector, so that he could mark every bundle as it comes out of the press according to quality. On intervale land, marsh land and all kinds of land, in fact, unless a man is very careful, he cannot have an even quality of hay. You will find different qualities in the same meadow. You will have in the same mow a few hundreds of hay here and there not of the same quality as the most of the hay in the mow, and the only way to have the matter finally determined would be to have the man who is pressing the hay keep track of it and inspect and mark each bale.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—You will find that eventually this bill will cure itself. It is not a compulsory measure. The shipper is not compelled to have the hay inspected and therefore you will find it will come down to this—it will be impossible to have an inspector where the hay was baled in different parts of the country. Then if it was inspected at the ship's side, the inspector might condemn it and make it a very great hardship on the man who brought it there. You will find that it will all come to this, inasmuch as the shipper is not bound to have the hay inspected, he may try it once or twice but he will not continue it—he will buy the hay according to his own judgment and will ship that hay and let it take its chances in the old country. You cannot have an inspector at every place where the hay is baled, and as for the different grades of hay for feed purposes in England, as I have heard it they will call clover the best hay. I say it is for some purposes, but it is not the best for horses on the road. It will do for horses that have no work, but for roadsters it will not do at all. For cattle, clover is the best feed in the world, and I can easily understand why they appreciate our clover in England, and prefer it to timothy. Inasmuch as this is not an Act that will compel a man to have his hay inspected, you will find it will do very little harm. The dealer will ship his hay and take the chances in preference to taking chances of inspection here, and the risk of his hay being condemned.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think instead of doing harm it will do good. It will be in the interests of the man who has a large quantity of hay to get it inspected. If there is an inspection of hay any man who has hay to sell will want to get it inspected in order to get the biggest price for it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are dealing now with the second clause of this bill, which refers to the grades of hay, and perhaps we had better confine our discussion to that and deal with the other questions afterwards. The provision for grading, as far as it goes, seems to be right enough. Prime timothy, No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3. No. 3 has a great deal of clover in it, but inasmuch as it is marked timothy it is No. 3, because it is not so largely timothy as it should be. If you are going the other way and want to send clover, you have No. 1 and No. 2 and so on. I do not think this provision for grading is carried far enough. It is perfectly right that you should mark no grade as hay which has been badly cured and which is stained or out of condition, but there ought to be some brand which would cover the hay spoken of by the hon. gentleman from Amherst and the hon. gentleman from Hopewell, because the marshes in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia grow immense quantities of hay, and that hay could hardly be classed either as timothy or as clover—there is some timothy and a very little clover, and a great deal of couch grass in it. There should be some provision for the grading of that kind of hay. Then this clause is defective with respect to the shipping grade. It does not tell the ordinary wayfarer exactly what sort of hay shipping grade is to be. Timothy is shipped, clover is shipped, and mixtures of timothy and clover are shipped—what is meant by "regular shipping pressed hay"? I think the bill should define that. Then, if I might be allowed to go a little apart from the clause which is directly before us, this bill, which is a step in the right direction, is defective inasmuch as it contains no provision for the manner in which the inspector's certificate is to be affixed to the hay, and does not provide any penalty for fraud or for marking the hay with an improper brand. If the hon. gentleman looks at the provisions with respect to flour, he will find several provisions there something like which would be required in a measure for the inspection of hay. Fortunately we have the two Ministers most interested in the bill in this House, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I would suggest that when we get through as much of the bill as we have here, we should let the committee report progress, and they will be able to add some further clauses to the bill which would make its provisions more beneficial.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—There is one point that none of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken upon the subject have mentioned, and to which a large proportion of the hay that has been called bad hay when it gets into England is to be attributed—that is, that after the hay is cut and put into the barn in a sufficiently well-cured condition to come out again in the winter or spring, if they pack that hay too early in the fall there is danger of it being nearly ruined, although it may be in a perfectly good condition to keep in the barn. It will not always bear packing.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—You mean baling.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Yes, in packages. If you bale that hay early there is danger of it being all spoiled.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It will heat.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—There is danger of its heating. There is a bare possibility of your getting some cured so dry that it will bear early packing, but there is very little that will do that ; and unless that is attended to there will be continual failures and disappointments. In our part of the country a great deal was sold last year, but they found that the hay that was packed early failed to be good, and much of that kind of hay was shipped to the Toronto market and has been for years. You will find the parties who buy hay largely in Toronto for consumption will not give as much for the baled hay as they will give for hay off the load where the farmers bring it directly from the barn, because it is almost impossible to tell, unless they cut the bales open, whether they have been packed in the right condition, and if they are not packed in the right condition, very many bales will turn out badly. It was just as has been in shipping butter to the old country: for the last 30 or 40 years the Canadians have been shipping butter, and for the last five or six years they have got up a cry that there is a great demand there and they will get good prices; but almost invariably they are careless about sending it across the Atlantic. It will be piled on the vessel in a position where it will be subject to a good deal of heat, or left in the warehouse at the railway five or six days before it is shipped on the cars, and in going on the cars if it got very hot it would suffer great damage. Well, by the time it reaches England tons and tons had been sold just at the prices of grease—butter that was good when shipped and that would have brought the best price in this country for consumption at the time; but it deteriorated in quality through the carelessness and ignorance of dealers, as well as of those who produce it. Of late years they ship much less butter. They are shipping a little, and they are trying to get things arranged so that they can send by cold storage, but unless it is sent by cold storage it will be very little use. With the hay it is not so much the fault of the weather when it is in transit to market as it is of its condition at the time it is baled. There is more danger then than at any other time. In regard to the inspection, I agree with Sir Frank Smith that it is a matter that will have to regulate itself, and the man who buys and ships to the old country must make it a point to know that the article he ships has been packed at the right time as well as being of the right quality when it was made and cured. In that way they may secure a good market that will last; but if carelessness is shown upon this point they will never get a good market for their hay.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—On a question of this kind, where every person is interested, there is always great difficulty in placing on the Statute-book any bill which will meet the approval of interested people in the country. Many suggestions and questions which have been asked can only be answered in general terms, unless the gentlemen who make objections would specify from their experience what amendment they think ought to be made. This is a bill supposed to be in the interests of trade generally, and more particularly in the interest of growers of hay. Take as an illustration the question asked by the hon. senator from Quinté. The Bill says the hay shall be of good colour; then he asks the question what colour it should be to come within that designation? Now, I know of no man in my acquaintance who has had longer and greater experience than my hon. friend has had in growing hay. I do not know whether he has shipped any, but he has had an extensive experience in growing hay and almost every other product of the farm. He is the very gentleman from whom I would ask the description of the colour of the hay, if I were to set out to ascertain that fact, and if he can tell me what it is I should be glad to have it embodied in the bill. The hon. member from Albert asks how it is to be inspected. If he will examine chap. 99 of the General Inspection Act, which this small bill amends, he will see that it says, "wheat and other grains." The whole addition to the Act is the words, "and hay." Now, all the provisions of the Inspection Act will apply to the word "hay," just as forcibly as to any of the other articles which have to be inspected, and consequently there would be no necessity for encumbering this bill with a number of definitions and explanations as to the mode and manner of inspection that are contained in the Act. I am very sorry to hear the remark made by the hon. gentleman from Albert, that these circulars never reached the Maritime Provinces. All I can tell him is that there are many circulars printed affecting every branch of trade, and the instructions are to send them to every part of the Dominion, and I recognize the fact that the provinces by the sea, particularly as far as the shipping is concerned, are a very important part of the Dominion. It may be that these circulars did not reach every hay-grower. They are sent in numbers to the parties interested in the purchase of hay and to the boards of trade, and it is to be supposed that those gentlemen would instruct the parties from whom they purchase. I would be very glad to act on any suggestion that could be given me, and increase the circulation of any of those circulars. The remarks I have made in reference to the quality of hay apply with equal force to the objection or semi-objection made by the hon. gentleman from Albert and those who spoke of the hay in the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman says there should be something done to designate that quality of hay, because if I understand him the marsh hay is composed—and I am only speaking from what I have heard from the gentlemen who are not only interested but have experience—is composed of timothy, but very little if any clover. Then the question would suggest itself, whether there should not be a clause designating that hay, meaning timothy, and whatever kind of hay is grown in these sections of the country.

Hon. Mr. READ—Mixed grass.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Marsh grass would be a better description.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am afraid if you say marsh hay and apply it to the hay that grows in my county, it would be considered a very inferior hay and very little of it used except when everything else failed in that section of the country, unless they mix it with grain and other food for cattle. I will say, before I proceed further, that my intention is, after we have had a full discussion upon this matter, to ask the committee to rise, report progress, and sit again. For this reason I have taken a note of all suggestions, and will bring them under the notice of the department and also the Inland Revenue Department, where the Inspection Act is put in force. The remarks of my hon. friend from Monck will apply to everything that we ship to the old country. There is this advantage, however, if you place upon a vessel an article with a brand No. 1, or whatever quality it may be, and it spoils on board the ship, from any neglect on the part of the carrier, I take it for granted that the carrier, under the common law, would be responsible for the damages, and the shipper in that case would have certainly a better case with which to go into court, by being able to establish the fact that the hay was branded and was of a certain quality, and being of a certain quality it was worth a certain amount of money on the day on which it was injured.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I have done a great deal of business where branding and trade marks are used, and I always found that to make a shipper safe it was essential that the brand should be known immediately before the shipment took place. You may brand an article to-day and it may lie in the warehouse until it becomes sour or musty or damaged in any way. It still retains the brand, and under the argument of the Minister it appears that that would be a guarantee for the shipment. You would have to prove that the article on going on the ship and at the time the bills of landing were signed was in good order, and you will see at once that it would be almost impossible to accomplish that with goods that are packed up and cannot be loosened out before being shipped.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—If they sign bills of lading for it in good order that is all you require.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What does good order mean? It means apparently in good order, and when it comes into court you must prove that that article was in good order in the centre of the package.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—We will let the courts decide that when the cases arise. If you ship an article by railway or steamer and they accept it in good order and condition, they are held responsible if it can be shown it has been injured or destroyed through their carelessness on board either the vessel or by whatever conveyance it is carried. As to the objection made by the senior member from Halifax to the certificate as to the quality of the hay, I have already called attention to the fact that that is provided for in the General Inspection Act. Flour and wheat are branded just the same as any other article, and if it is found there is not provision in this Act to meet the case it will be time enough to add a provision in the General Inspection Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was just with that view that I called attention to it.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The general discussion as to how hay and other articles will spoil applies to every other article of trade, and what my hon. friend from King's has said in reference to the purchase of hay is quite true. Most of us who have been buying hay on the market know that we sometimes buy a load of timothy which looks all right on the outside, but when you come to put it in your barn you will find the middle of the load is all musty. Parties selling hay know how to do a little cheating as well as those who pack apples or anything else. Those are difficulties which will arise in dealing with dishonest people. I do not know that there are any other points to which I can draw the attention of the committee. I quite agree with the remarks made by the hon. member from King's, particularly in reference to butter when it has been shipped from this country to England in the past. We are in hopes by the establishment of lines of vessels that will provide, not frozen compartments, but cold or chilled storage, so that meat and such articles can be sent to European markets in as good condition as when they leave the dairy in Canada, that we shall have accomplished something which will answer the hon. gentleman's purpose, and we shall have no more first-class butter sold in the English market for grease.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—As far as the province I represent is concerned, the grades of hay seem to be quite suitable. I have looked into this very carefully and have heard the observations of hon. gentlemen all around. These grades have been fairly well considered, and I would not have very much objection to them. There is only one suggestion that I would make. I find that No. 1 and No. 2 timothy, as well as No. 1 clover, require to be of good colour, sound and well cured. No. 3 timothy and No. 2 clover are of fair colour. Now the colour of either clover or timothy, I might say, is the supreme test of quality, and it would be better if these brands and numbers would refer entirely to the variety. If good colour were required in all cases, it would be more consistent because when you call for good colour, sound and well-cured, everything is consistent; but when you call for only fair colour, sound and well-cured, it is not consistent, because fairly coloured hay is not sound and well-cured. The only way that that could happen would be when the hay was cut late. The right colour, as far as my experience of hay goes, is obtained by its being cut at the right time, and properly dried and stored, and the right colour for hay is the nearest approach you can get to the colour of timothy and clover when it is cut at the right time.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—You have seen hay a good colour when it was cut and when it got into the barn was not a good colour?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—Then it ceases to be sound and well-cured hay. I hope I have made myself understood. My suggestion is this—that good colour should be required in all these different brands and the words "fair colour" should be dropped in all cases.

Hon. Mr. READ—The law does not designate what good colour is.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Experts would know how to find the right colour. My suggestion is that these brands should refer wholly to the variety and the proportion of the varieties that should be found in the hay, but that good colour should be required in all the varieties.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Might I ask whether good colour would apply to all qualities and kinds of hay? Would the hay grown on the marshes in the Maritime Provinces, were it really good and first class as the timothy hay with a slight mixture of clover grown in Ontario, be of the same colour?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I have no experience in marsh hay, but marsh hay of good colour would be just like timothy of good colour. It would approach as nearly as possibly to the right colour at the time of cutting.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You might say No. 1 shall have superior colour and the other grades good. I hope the Minister will bear in mind that as far as one could judge from the expression of the hon. gentlemen from the Lower Provinces, it is desirable that there should be another denomination put in to cover the hay which they have spoken of, and further the Minister did not answer the question which I asked with respect to shipping grades. There is nothing in this bill which defines what regular shipping pressed hay shall be, and I think that ought to be made clear. I presume the expression has some meaning, but I do not know what it is and I do not know whether any of my friends do.

Hon Mr. KAULBACH—I presume it means any kind of hay other than clover and timothy.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman will look at the bill he will see that it is amply provided for. Section 44 of the said Act is hereby amended by adding thereto the following words: "the grades shall be as follows"—that is the grades of hay for shipping and the grades of hay to be inspected; and then it says the grades shall be in good condition. That must include the different grades designated here both of timothy and clover.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am still in the dark. Does shipping grade mean No. 1 timothy or No. 2 timothy, or No. 1 clover, or what?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—It means the whole.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The clause provides that the grades of hay shall be as follows: The shipping grade may be No. 1, or No. 2, or No. 3.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—But it must be timothy or clover?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Hon. gentlemen in eastern provinces ought to know whether there is any demand in England for their marsh hay. If there is no demand for it abroad, there is no use sending it. I apprehend the principal demand is for the timothy and clover. We can only judge according to the demand in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces can answer that question better than I could, whether they ship their hay to England, or whether, as has been intimated to me by the Chairman, most of the hay shipped from Nova Scotia goes to the West Indies, and if that be the case then there would be no necessity for it. Still if the hay grown in the Maritime Provinces should find a market there, it is better that it should be included in a grade of its own.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I should think so. They want some experience in shipping to England before they can establish a grade.

Hon. Mr. McKAY, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I wanted to ask the hon. member from Monck whether the hay he packed was baled in the fall of the year or in the winter?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I pack it in winter.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Then it ought to be baled in good condition.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There is a reason for that; we pack it when we get through our other work.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—If it is packed early then it may be the fault of packing it too early.

Hon. Mr. READ—I suggest there should be a grade of hay other than clover or timothy.

INSPECTION OF SHIPS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (113) "An Act to amend the Inspection of Ships Act."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That provision is not confined to British and Canadian ships, I understand; it refers to foreign ships as well.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes, all ships except Her Majesty's ships. The committee will remember that when I introduced the bill, I explained there was a contradiction between the third and the eighth sections, and this is to remove that contradiction as to the inspection of all ships except Her Majesty's ships.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (14) "An Act to amend the Railway Act."

(In the Committee.)

On the first clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—That covers a great deal more ground than is apparent. It is desirable that the motorman should be protected, and if we had cable cars it would be desirable that the gripman should be protected; but the language of this provision is wide enough to oblige railway companies to provide shelter for all their employees. I do not suppose there is any objection to that. It is only right that they should.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, 12th June, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceeding.

REPORT OF STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.), from the Committee on Standing Orders, presented their nineteeth report.

Hon. Mr. MILLER moved that the rules of the House be dispensed with in so far as they relate to the bill referred to in the report.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Would it not be better to move the adoption of the report also?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—This is the course which is being pursued in this House recently. My own preference would be a motion for the adoption of the report as it simply refers to this petition. I do not consider that any motion for the adoption of the report is necessary when I make a motion which expresses the same thing.

THE SPEAKER—Either will do, but generally we propose the adoption of the report in a case of this kind.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Then I move that the report be adopted.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The adoption of the report is tantamount to the adoption of my motion and supersedes my motion. The adoption of the report does the very thing that we are asked to do by my motion. If we adopt the report, an independent motion is not necessary. The practice of moving a motion such as the one submitted has arisen in this way—very often a report contains two or three matters some of which may not be acceptable to the House or may not interest members generally. The House may not be willing to accept the whole of the report but may be willing to accept one of the recommendations. In that case the motion to suspend the rule is necessary. But when, as in this case, there is simply one item and the committee recommends the suspension of the rule, when that report is adopted no further motion is necessary.

The motion was agreed to.

CHINESE RESIDENTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.), rose to inquire,

Whether the Government intends to give effect to the petition of Chinese residents of British Columbia, praying for an extension of the time in which they can return from China to the Dominion, on the same certificate?

He said: About two months ago a petition was sent in by the Chinese residents of British colonies, praying for an extension of the time to return to China. At present they have only six months to go and return, they paying $50, and if they are beyond the six months they have to pay $50 more on landing in Canada and the petition prays for an extension of the term to eighteen months. I think, perhaps that is too long a period and probably a year would be a fair term. Six months of course is too short; it would give them a very short time with their friends in China, and the duty of $50 is a heavy one. I wish to ask the Government if they intend giving effect to the petition or not.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is not the intention of the Government to interfere with the Act affecting Chinese during the present session.

STRAITS OF NORTHUMBERLAND BORINGS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to ask,

Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the approaching summer to complete the borings under the Straits of Northumberland, which were commenced in the year 1892, and if so, whether it is the intention to put a sufficient sum in the Supplementary Estimates for that purpose during the present Session?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is the intention of the Government to proceed during the present summer with borings under the Northumberland Straits which were commenced in 1892, and a sufficient sum will be placed in the estimates for that purpose.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (5) "An Act further to amend the North-west Territories Representation Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—An amendment to this bill may be required. Under chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes it is said that no member of a local legislature shall be eligible, while holding such position, to become a candidate for the House of Commons. The section only speaks of the provinces. At first blush one would think that it does not include the North-west Territories and in the past an instance occurred whereit escaped everybody's attention; a member of the North-west Assembly became a candidate without resigning. He was defeated, and without any inconvenience he went back and sat in the legislature where he had sat before. By referring to the Interpretation Act the section which says that the word "province" shall also mean and include the North-west Territories covers such a case. I would like to be confirmed in my impression by the Minister of Justice. I am of the opinion that the disqualification now exists, but still if there is a doubt I want to have the opportunity, with the sanction of this House, to make it quite clear and I will move that the chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. DEVER, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

DISFRANCHISEMENT OF VOTERS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY moved the second reading of Bill (6) "An Act to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes." He said: I suppose the title of this bill sufficiently indicates its object, but at the same time I might give a word of explanation with respect to it. It is a bill providing that after 40 days and within 60 days after an election a petition may be presented to a judge showing that in a certain district there has been bribery and that the bribery has been of such a character as to affect the general vote, and it also provides that the petition shall be verified by an affidavit of the truth of the statements made by one of the five parties who are required to sign it. It is also provided in the bill that the matter shall be heard before the judge and that he shall summon witnesses and examine them and come to a decision upon the point, which shall be communicated to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State is called upon to lay that decision upon the Table of the House at its next sitting, within 14 days after the opening of the session. The pith of the bill is contained in the 15th clause, which provides that no voters whom the judge reports to have taken bribes shall be placed upon the voters' list, or shall be capable of voting at any election of the members of the House of Commons for the next seven years after the receipt of the report of the judge by the Secretary of State. This bill has been very much canvassed in the House it specially affects, and is a very different measure from what it was as introduced. There are some safeguards to which I shall call attention. In the first place, it requires a deposit of $1,000 to show the bona fides of the party, and to provide a fund for the expenses of this inquiry, before any step can be taken. It provides also that no petition of this character can be presented where the election that has given rise to it is opposed under the Controverted Elections Act, in other words where there has been a petition against the return. It also provides that notice of the petition shall be sent to the party affected, and after all this has been gone through and all these safeguards have been exercised, when the decision is made, the party has an appeal from that decision. This bill affects the House of Commons, and I presume we will not be very much in doubt about the propriety of passing it.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Before the bill is read the second time, I want to point out to this House how this corroborates the opinions which I expressed the other day as to the inefficacy of the vote by ballot. How are you to ascertain that a man has been bribed unless you ascertain how he voted? You have a suspicion that the man was paid, and that is only made clear by the person confessing. If you saw a man who always supported and voted for one party voting the other way you would suspect the cause. This bill has been mutilated by the party who preached purity of election and talked about putting down bribery, and all that kind of thing. They have cut the teeth and drawn the nails out of that bill so as to render it of no use whatever.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Pretty hard on the Conservative party.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I have not had time to read this bill all through, but I have come to the conclusion, from what I have read of it, that it is a grand bill for a number of hungry lawyers that are to be found in all the towns of the country. I do not wish to say anything disrespectful of lawyers generally, but I presume in other communities, as well as in the one where I live, there are several such people who are unable to get enough business to keep body and soul together.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—They have no souls to keep.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I presume this bill will afford them a business. They will turn themselves into a searching party to hunt up business. The election courts are troublesome enough to a member after he is elected and under the existing law people who have taken bribes can be punished without passing this measure. I am opposed to this bill and shall vote against it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know that I should have said anything on the second reading of this bill if it had not been for the remarkable statement of my hon. colleague. This bill was introduced by a Conservative member in the other chamber, the member for Albert. My hon. colleague stated that it had been mutilated by the Liberal members. He is altogether mistaken. The bill was supported pretty generally by the Liberal members, and the most determined opposition it received was from the Conservative member from Montreal who talked against time on two or three separate days when the bill was up for discussion. With respect to the observations made by the hon. gentleman from Truro, I do not think that there is very much weight in them, because if the gentlemen of the House of Commons who have to run elections are satisfied that this measure shall become law and are willing to risk any additional inconvenience or expense that it may put them to, I do not think that in this Chamber we should undertake to be more careful of their interests than they are themselves. As it is a matter which peculiarly affects the elections to the House of Commons, I do not think that this House has really—looking at the rules of Parliamentary etiquette which are generally observed—any right to meddle with it at all.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—There is one feature of the bill which I cannot exactly reconcile with my ideas of sound legislation. It provides for disfranchising a man who accepts a bribe, but does not provide any punishment for the man who gives it. What is sauce for the goose, should be sauce for the gander, and, inasmuch as the voter might be a very ignorant man, comparatively speaking, and not know the value of a moral life as well as a well educated man, he is less to be blamed than the person who offers the bribe. The man who has wealth and is well educated and gives a bribe, should be held quite as responsible for wrong-doing as the man who accepts it, and is really more deserving of punishment, because he knows better, but the poor man, who is glad to get a dollar in any direction, sometimes may be tempted to do wrong. It seems to be a sort of jug-handled legislation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is all provided for in the statute.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—If so, I have no further objection to the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THE INSOLVENCY BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (E) "An Act respecting Insolvency."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2, subsection a,

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Before subsection a is passed, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this clause includes almost every person who owes a debt of $250. The original bill, as it was introduced, separated the parties entitled to obtain relief under this measure. In the first place there were traders, and several clauses defined what traders meant. Another part of it gave farmers, graziers and others a right to relief. Subsequent to that, in the committee, the words "trader, farmer and grazier" were eliminated from the bill and the word "debtor" was put in. I submit to this House that the word "debtor" is too wide. It includes classes of persons who have not made an application to Parliament to be relieved from their liabilities by this measure. I was opposed, in the first instance, to farmers being included, simply because the farmers of this country do not require and have not solicited this Parliament by petition or by deputation, to be included in the provisions of the Insolvency Act at all. Thereis no class of persons in this country who have better opportunities for appearing before Parliament by petition than the farmers. They have their village, town, county township and city councils composed largely of the farming community, and if they desire to have any Acts passed in their interest or to oppose any legislation which they deem will injuriously affect them, they have the very best opportunity to appear before the municipal councils and have their views presented to Parliament. In no single instance, so far as I know, have the farmers of the country, through these avenues which are open to them, petitioned Parliament to be included in the classes to be affected by this bill. Neither have they opposed it. Other persons who are affected by the changes made in this bill, any man, in fact, who owes $250 can be forced into insolvency. None of them have applied for relief. Therefore, I do not see why Parliament should try to force upon people who do not ask for relief a bill which gives them relief of this kind. The farmers of this country, to my mind, are a hopeful class of people; they live on their farms and labour hard. If in consequence of a failure of crops, or reduced prices for the products which they raise, they are unable to meet their liabilities at the end of the year, they are willing and anxious to remain on their farms, and by labouring hard and economizing, live in the hope that the next year Providence will give them a good crop that will enable them to clear off their debts. They are honest and willing to pay up if they realize their expectations. In the original bill the farming class were placed in the position that they could, of their own voluntary motion, take advantage of this bill, but as it stands now, it is compulsory. If a merchant, or a neighbour who has a feeling against a farmer who is unable to pay his indebtedness to the amount of $250, wished to gratify that feeling against his neighbour, he can get a receiving order against him and put him into insolvency. The bill as it was first presented was not so objectionable, and unless the farmers and graziers came and opposed it, I would not object, because it was a voluntary thing on their part whether they took advantage of the bill or not, but as it is now, it is compulsory and it is too general. The door has been opened until, to my mind, the Act is so general that the foundations on which it was based have been entirely destroyed. It is quite right that traders should have some relief. Persons who trade, if they are unsuccessful, are probably honestly so; something may have come upon them which they had not anticipated, and there should be some provision made whereby such people could get relief if they were honest in their dealings and were unsuccessful; but I want it limited to those people, and you may, in defining what a trader is, include a large number of persons who are possibly outside what some people might consider trade; and in that way this measure might be entirely confined to what may be called traders. I intend to move that the word "debtor," which I think is fatal to this bill, be eliminated, and that the word "trader" be substituted therefor, and after that is done, if it is thought proper in the interests of the country, farmers and others can be restored as in the old bill. In the meantime, while this part of the bill is under discussion, I move that the word "debtor" be eliminated, and the word "trader" substituted therefor, after which we can consider the other matters.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I would suggest that it would be better to put it this way: "insolvent means a debtor engaged in trade and commerce," &c. That would embrace all the classes suggested by the hon. gentleman and perhaps be more definite and confine it more to persons engaged in trade and commerce than by adopting the amendment which he proposes. I should say "a debtor engaged in trade and commerce, &c."

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—That would not do. If this is passed, I want the definition of traders to be enlarged so as to take in other classes. For instance, there is a class of persons who have been dealing and trading in real estate and have come to grief in consequence of such trading. These people want to be relieved, and it may be possible to include in the trading class a person who has been dealing in real estate. What I want is to make it, in the first place, apply to traders and afterwards define what a trader means.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The motion, which may be a very desirable one, comes in the wrong place. We are simply defining what is an insolvent. An insolvent is defined to be "a debtor in reference to whom or whose estate a receiving order has been made under this Act." Now that is quite clear. It does not matter what class the bill may apply to, or to how many classes, an insolvent means a debtor as to whom a receiving order has been made. I think the hon. gentleman's amendment should come into clause 3 of the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think so, too.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That deals with the application or non-application of the Act. Clause 3 says that this Act applies to all debtors. When we come to that it may be right to propose the amendment, but now it is not in the right place.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—As far as I am concerned, I am opposed to any Insolvency Bill, and if anybody will move a six months' hoist before the matter is concluded I will second the motion. I would like to ask the House who is it that wants the bill? Who asks for it? Have the farmers of this country petitioned for it? All the people of this country have a chance of appealing to the foot of the throne if they wish. Who have asked for it? Some of the boards of trade have petitioned for it. About 5 per cent of the population of Canada want an Insolvency Bill; and what for? To obtain an advantage over the other 95 per cent. There is a crisis all over the world, yet Canada stands second to none in its financial position. If we had an insolvency law in this country would we stand so well to-day? Are you going to put a man into insolvency because he owes $250? What is going to pay the expenses? My hon. friend speaks about legislation for the lawyers. Of course it would be food for the lawyers of this country. I do not speak with any disrespect to the profession, but we do not want this legislation. I am satisfied that if a vote of the people of Canada were polled on this insolvency question, nine-tenths of them would say that they do not want it, and yet we are going to force it on them. They have not asked it. If they had any grievances they would petition this House, but they have not done so. I am totally opposed to the bill. We had experience under the old insolvency law in this country. I can remember when any one who owed me money became insolvent, I got notice and attended meetings, but the only result was to throw good money after bad. At one time a man might get his pay, but under the insolvency law the assignee generally took it all. Are we going to have that state of affairs again? Supposing a man goes into insolvency and pays 66 cents on the dollar where do the expenses come in? If a man pays 66 cents on the dollar, certainly he is solvent, because the difference would not pay the expenses or the shrinkage. Therefore you are not going to give any relief by passing this bill. What is this Insolvency Bill for? The wholesale men of this country want this bill and for what? Let them keep their drummers at home and not send them through the country forcing goods on the people against their will and then trying to get a chance to close them up. Under such a bill what chance is there for an honest man? Take the honest trader in any part of Canada to-day who wishes to deal honestly and pay 20 shillings on the pound or 100 cents on the dollar and you will find that he does not want an Insolvency Act. It is the dishonest man who wishes to go through the insolvency court—he compromises with his creditors, and some traders do it three or four times, and what has been the result? The insolvent has made money and the honest man, unable to sell his goods at a reasonable price, has had to go out of business, because he could not sell his goods as cheaply as the man who compromised with his creditors. The former Act offered a premium for rascality. Before this bill is through, if I stand alone in this House, I shall take the opportunity of moving that it be rejected.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am inclined to agree with the hon. member from Halifax that this question should be tested in the manner he has suggested. The clause under consideration is one defining who shall be declared insolvent, and it declares that an insolvent means a debtor. Now the trader would be a debtor as well as any other person who had contracted debts. The third clause defines to whom the word "debtor" shall apply, and certainly if it is to be tested it would be better that it should come under that clause 3. I am rather inclined to think that the course pursued in committee on this question would be the best, that is, to leave the interpretation clause until the last, so that if any material change should be made in the principle or body of the biil, then the interpretation clause might be so worded as to be in accord with those amendments. However, this is a vexed question, I admit, and I agree with the hon. gentleman from Milton that the principles of the bill as introduced have been materially changed. The word "debtor" as it is used in the present bill applies to every one, no matter in what position in life he may be, whether it be a trader, a clerk, or a civil servant. All would come within the meaning of this clause as it stands now before the House, and if indebted to a certain amount, could be forced into bankruptcy. The original proposition was that a trader could be forced into insolvency or bankruptcy by those to whom he was indebted, but that the second class, who are designated debtors, such as graziers, farmers and other people of that character, could only go into insolvency of their own volition—that is, if they should become indebted to such an extent that they found they could not pay their debts, and would lose all their property, they could elect to go into bankruptcy and take advantage of the law. That was the principle of the bill when it was first introduced. My hon. friend who has made the motion now desires to substitute the word "traders," and then define what a trader is. Now it is just as easy to define what a debtor is as to define what a trader is.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Oh yes. You can define by a clause in this Act, which it would be necessary to place within it, what a debtor is. You can say a debtor is a man engaged is such and such an occupation in life, and none other, and that principle would be what I would suggest to those who hold that view upon the question; otherwise, in every single clause we should have to change the word "debtor." I think it would be just as well if we allowed the word "debtor" to remain, and I would suggest that the question be left open until the gentlemen who hold that view could prepare a clause and define what a debtor is, which would be just as applicable and meet the same ends precisely as to define what a trader is.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Is not any man who owes another a small amount a debtor?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes, the hon. gentleman is right. If I owe ten cents to a man I am a debtor to that extent. If the law says that any indebtedness has been incurred through trade of a certain kind, and entitles me to be placed in insolvency, then it defines what a debtor is. But, on the contrary, if it says a farmer owes £10,000, but shall not take advantage of this Act, then he is not a debtor within the meaning of the Act. The law can declare, as I take it, the meaning of language no matter what it may be, no matter whether it is apparently absurd or not. The present law is based upon the principle of the English Bankruptcy Act as it stands on the Statute-book. It applies to all classes of debtors, no matter who or what they may be. My desire was that we should have two classes, one should be defined as a trader, and that was fully defined in the original bill. That clause can be adopted if it is necessary to declare what shall constitute a debtor, and it also defines what a debtor should be. The latter class could take advantage of the Act but could not be forced into bankruptcy; and that is the class to which the hon. gentleman referred when he spoke of the sanguine temperament and character of the farming community of the country. In that respect I am in accord with him. I should like to call the attention of the committee to the rule which I think it should be well for us to adhere to in the discussion of the clauses of this bill, and that is that the principle of the bill having been affirmed, it cannot be debated or discussed while we are in committee discussing clauses of the bill, and I shall ask the chairman in future to rule that the discussion must be pertinent to the clause under consideration. I do not mean to refer to the remarks of my hon. friend from Monck. I want to call attention to it for fear we might go on discussing the principle of the bill and be here until next December. My hon. friend says he is opposed to the bill. I know that: he has told me that before, and I believe he is honest in his opposition. He has the right to move when the committee report that the bill be read that day three months or six months, or he may content himself by affirming his principles by voting against it and calling for the yeas and nays. That is a matter which concerns himself.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I wish to put myself right before the House. The hon. gentleman will remember that when the bill was read the second time, I objected and said I reserved the right to myself at any time to discuss the principle of the measure in committee or at any other stage, and it was only on that understanding that I consented to the bill being read the second time. Otherwise I should have divided the House on it then. If the hon. gentleman wishes to shut me off, I tell him candidly that he will never hear from me again until the bill is through the committee stage, when I will move the six months' hoist if some one else does not do so.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I would ask the hon. Minister whether it was not understood, when this bill was before us for its second reading, that in allowing it to pass that stage the principle of the bill might be discussed at any future period?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We will discuss it before long.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have no objection to the principle of the bill being discussed to the fullest extent, but I suggest that it be discussed at the proper time. The hon. gentleman from Toronto may be correct. I do not say that he is not, but I would like my hon. friend from Monck to understand that I was only speaking of the rules which govern the House, and it does not follow that because any member may reserve to himself a right at any time to discuss the question that he can do so even if it is contrary to the rules of the House. When we are discussing an important bill like this, we had better confine ourselves to the details and then when the time arrives my hon. friend can move the six months' hoist and speak as long as he pleases. I do not mean him to understand that I make any such suggestion, but he has that right under the rules of the House.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not say that I have any rights under the rules of the House, but I say I have the hon. gentleman's permission. He said it could be fully discussed at any time. I do not want it to go down that I am acting contrary to the rules of the House, I had the hon. gentleman's own word and relied upon it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We are departing from the point at issue before the House, and that is as to the relevancy of the amendment moved by the hon. member from Milton. I am quite in accord with the view taken by the senior member from Halifax, that the amendment of the hon. member from Milton would come in more appropriately in the third clause of the bill. My hon. friend seems, however, to have given the matter some study and attention and is of a different opinion. It seems to me, however, that the 3rd clause of the bill would be the proper place at which to test the sense of the House with regard to the classes which it would be desirable to include within the scope of the Insolvency Bill. I must say I consider the proposition made by the leader of the House is a very good one, and perhaps it would meet with the concurrence of the committee and save a good deal of discussion at the present time. It may be that the defining clauses would have to be altered in many places after the bill has gone through, and perhaps it would be as well to let the explaining clauses stand over until we get through the bill and then alter them as they require alteration to accord with the bill as it was leaving the committee. That would be the most expeditious course to adopt and it would give my hon.

friend an opportunity hereafter, if he considers it necessary in connection with this clause to move any amendment. While I am on my feet I want to express in a few words my own opinion in relation to this bill. I am not one of those who believe that there is any very urgent necessity for an insolvency law in this country at the present moment, and I do not believe that because boards of trade and directors of banks may consider it in their interest to have such a bill upon our Statute-book, that it is in the interest of the great masses of the people of this country, whether artizans or farmers or any other class who contribute to produce the industrial wealth of this country. The bill having been introduced in this House and the House having affirmed the principle of the necessity for an Insolvency Act—that is the length to which the House has gone, simply affirmed the necessity of an Insolvency Act—we are free to make any amendments to any clause of the bill. The committee is fully at liberty to strike out or amend any of the important features of the bill which may be even considered as embodying the principles on which the bill is based. The only principle that the House affirmed by the second reading is the principle that an Insolvency Act of some sort is necessary. I think the House is committed to that principle, and I do not agree with the position taken by an hon. member, even if coincided in by the leader of the House, that when a public bill has reached its second reading any individual in this House, or any number of individuals, can reserve the right to discuss the foundation principle of it in committee. I do not think any number of individuals can reserve to themselves that right because such reservation would be contrary to the rules which govern our deliberations as a legislative body. This being my opinion I wish to state how far I am willing to go in placing an Insolvency Act on our Statute-book. I desire to refer to traders and trading corporations only. When the bill was before the committee a motion was made to strike the word "farmers" out of the category of the persons to come under its operation, and to place them upon the same footing as traders. I voted for that amendment, as I told the committee at the time, not because I desired to see the farmers placed upon the same footing as traders in regard to insolvency and the laws relating thereto, but because I disapproved of having farmers in the bill at all. I do not think the farmers of this country want an Insolvency Act. I do not think it is in the interests of the farmers that we should pass an Insolvency Act applicable to them, and I voted to place them in the same category with traders, as I stated in the committee, because I believed it would meet with the more general and unanimous condemnation both from the committee and the House. I agree with my hon. friend behind me that if the farmers of this country desire an Insolvency Act they have ample machinery and means of getting their wishes before Parliament. They are, perhaps, at the present time the best organized body, for economical and political purposes, in the country, and therefore may almost be said to be omnipotent, and as they have not asked us for any Insolvency Act applicable to them, I do not think it is wise for us to give it to them. But if we are to give them an Insolvency Act, I would give them just the same medicine that I would give the traders, and no other; I would place them all on the same footing. There is a tendency at the present day to go out of our way to flatter, I might say to court and coquette with the farming classes. True they are very powerful at elections, but I do not think that should influence us in yielding to them any privileges to which they are not entitled, beyond the privileges granted to other industrial classes of this country. I voted, therefore, to place farmers on the same category as traders, because I was opposed to having them in the bill at all, and I believe in that category it would be more easy to have them excluded from the bill either by motion in the special committee or by motion in committee of the whole House. There are other portions of the bill to which I am opposed, and which I may refer to if we get as far as them, but I do not wish to detain the House just now and I would suggest that the proposition of the hon. leader of the Senate be accepted, and we pass over the explanatory clauses and go on to clause 3 and take the sense of the House at once on the classes of debtors that the House wishes to include under the Insolvency Act, if we are to have an Insolvency Act at all, which, in my opinion, would not be necessary but for the bad laws in some of the provinces regarding preferential assignments.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—With reference to the principle of the bill——

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—We do not want to talk about the principle of the bill: that was decided at the second reading.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I should like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to what has taken place with regard to this bill. I do not know if the hon. gentleman from Richmond was present at the second reading, but I was, and if any one is responsible for the peculiar position in which we are placed now I am that person. The position was first taken by myself, and suggested to the House on the second reading of the bill, that we should not debate the principle of the bill at all, but that, as this was a bill to be referred to a committee of the House to prepare a measure to be submitted afterwards to the Senate, we should let it be read and sent to the committee and that we should be at liberty at any time to discuss the principle and the details of this bill after it was reported. That was distinctly understood, and by no one better than by my hon. friend the leader of this House, who approved of it. I suggested that with a view to getting the bill on a stage, not that I approved of the bill, because I made no secret of my opinion, which I declared on previous occasions, that I am against the principle of the bill altogether. In order that the Government might have a fair chance for their bill, I suggested that hon. gentlemen should not be committed to the principle of the bill on the second reading. I said so in the presence of the leader of this House and it was assented to on all hands. If I am incorrect in that statement, I should like to have any one say so. The hon. gentleman from Richmond knows very well that we can make a motion, and carry it if we have a sufficient number to support us, that the committee rise and thus kill the bill altogether. Therefore, it was with extreme surprise that I heard the leader of the House object to any discussion on the principle of the bill, when the principle has never been discussed yet, for the reason which I have given. We have this bill for the first time submitted to us to-day, and my hon. friend has candidly stated that it is an entirely different measure in principle from the bill that he introduced here. I quite agree that this question of the persons to whom this bill should be made applicable is one that arises properly and I think only under the subsection which deals with that subject. I do not at all disagree with the suggestion made by the leader that this definition clause should be left until we see what should be included in it. My hon. friend (Mr. McCallum) who was interrupted when he was discussing the principle of the bill, asked who wants this bill. If my hon. friend had been a member of the committee and had been there the first two or three days, he would have seen who wanted it. He would have seen an array of people behind the benches, an array such as I have never seen before at a committee, representing banks and wholesale dealers and merchants from Ontario and Quebec who wanted this legislation.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I was not a member of that committee. I declared myself opposed to the bill on principle, and I would not have gone on that committee if I had been asked to go.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—My hon. friend fails to see the point. I am stating that it was in consequence of his not being a member of the committee that he could not get that information, but as I was there and he was not, I can tell him who wanted the bill. If he had come there a month afterwards, he would have seen the paid legal representatives of those bodies advocating their views before the committee. I made no objection to it, and no member of the committee made any objection to it, because we were only too happy to get all the information we could, and we gave them a fair hearing, but they were the people who wanted the bill. The people whom this bill affects were not there and have not been heard yet. They are getting a hearing now, and I think that hearing will not be stopped by the objection that has been made that we cannot discuss the principle of the bill in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am very sorry that any remarks I made should have been misunderstood, or that I should have forgotten any arrangement in this matter, for I had no intention whatever of departing from any understanding agreed upon at the time of the second reading of the bill. But I do still contend that, while all the rights were reserved to the discussion of this bill, the better time under the rules of the House would have been to have discussed the principle of the bill pure and simple when the motion was made to go into committee. That was the time when this whole question should have been fully discussed.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I remember very well the discussion that took place to which my hon. friend refers, and that is really what I meant at the time; whether I was sufficiently explicit in making that explanation or not, I am not prepared to say. After what has taken place, I can assure the hon. gentleman from Amherst that I shall not take objection even if it is discussed in its broadest and widest sense in committee.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I only rise for the purpose of putting myself right with the committee in having moved this amendment to subsection a of clause 2. My opinion was, when I made the motion, that the opportunity for making my amendment arose when we came to the definition of insolvency. It was the first opportunity I had in considering this bill. I want to have it defined that "insolvent" means a trader, and I think this is the proper place to make my motion. Clause 3 is an application of this bill. It says it applies to all debtors. If I succeed in carrying my amendment to subsection a of clause 2, then clause 3 would have to be amended. I cannot see that I was compelled to wait until the House affirmed the principle that an insolvent meant a debtor before moving my amendment to the third clause to say that it should not be applied to debtors generally. I think the proper place for the amendment which I have moved is subsection a of clause 2. With respect to this question of discussing the principle of a bill in committee, I have no hesitation in saying that when the bill was read the second time there was a reservation that the principle of the bill might be discussed subsequently, but after the second reading and the reference of the bill to a select committee, when that committee reports the bill back to the House it is too late to discuss the principle. While the details of the bill may be discussed in Committee of the Whole, the principle of the bill should not be debated on every clause that we take up. The details of the bill are still before this House as they were before the select committee, and after the chairman has risen and reported the bill, then those who reserved the right to attack the principle of the bill can do it on the third reading, but it would be absurd and would show that we were not business men to say that any one who rises to speak in discussing the details of the bill in Committee of the Whole may bring up the principle of the bill on every clause. The right was reserved to attack the principle before the final passing of the measure, and that was done with a view to allowing the details in the Select Committee and in the Committee of the Whole to pass without the principle of the bill being introduced and embarassing the proceedings. I think the hon. gentleman who asked that the principle of the bill should not be disposed of at the second reading understood that he reserved the right to oppose the principle at the third reading.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—At the second reading of the bill a committee was appointed, and it was understood that we could then consider the principle of the bill. When we reach the third clause we should define what class of people this bill is to apply to, because many of the details of this bill will depend on the classes who are to be affected by it. Therefore, as early as possible we should determine that point.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It is not my intention to discuss the principle of this bill at this stage, but I remember very distinctly the understanding that the members of the Senate were not to be debarred from discussing the principle of the bill when they allowed the second reading to pass without debate. I quite agree with those who say that it is not convenient that the principle of the bill should be discussed at every clause. A more convenient way would be, after a fair discussion and consideration of the matter, if any member of the Senate wishes to defeat the measure, to move that the committee rise without reporting. That will bring the whole question up before the committee, or it can be done at the third reading of the bill if it ever goes that far. For my own part, I feel inclined to oppose the bill. At the same time, I should like to hear it discussed further before making up my mind. If there is the same diversity of opinion in the Senate that there was in the committee, it will not be long before we become convinced that there are not two members of the Senate who agree upon the details of the bill. I attended several meetings of the committee and I have yet to learn that any two gentlemen were agreed upon the details of the measure, and the more fully we discuss the question here the more decidedly will it be made apparent that no insolvent law is needed in this country.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I understood that the House gave authority to the committee to deal with the Insolvency Bill. That very fact shows that this House was in favour of an Insolvency Bill, otherwise they would not have authorized the committee to spend three weeks discussing it and bring before them representatives from all the commercial bodies in Canada—they would not have gone to so much trouble if they intended to destroy the labour put on this very valuable bill. However, if a number of gentlemen wish to defeat the bill, I have no objection, though I feel that it is a great loss of labour after the long time that has been spent in perfecting this bill and the expense that gentlemen have been put to in coming to Ottawa to give their opinions with respect to the measure.

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—I was very greatly surprised at the remark made by the hon. gentleman from Amherst. He asks who is interested in securing this Insolvency Bill, and he refers to those who occupied the back benches in the committee room. Well, who are interested in this Insolvency Bill? Are the lawyers alone interested? No, the business men of the country require it, and it is in response to an urgent appeal on behalf of those business men that you are called upon to deal with this measure. It is a crying necessity from one end of the Dominion to the other to-day. The business men of the country say "let us have an Insolvency Law" and they very kindly, and I think very considerately too, have sent representatives before the committee to give any information that might be asked for —they simply volunteered that information. Our position to-day, as business men, is this, that in almost every section of this Dominion the laws bearing on insolvency differ from the laws of other sections. If a case of insolvency occurs, you cannot tell how you are to be dealt with. In the part of the country from which the hon. gentleman comes, it is almost an accepted conclusion in a case of insolvency, you get literally nothing. We want a law that will govern this question from ocean to ocean. The business men of Canada ask for this legislation and they deserve at our hands the most careful consideration.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Milton appears to labour under a delusion with respect to this paragraph a. The hon. gentleman said it was objectionable because this paragraph says "insolvent" means a "debtor," and the hon. gentleman says: "I do not want the bill to apply to debtors, I want it to apply only to traders," but a few words further on there is a definition of what an insolvent means. It is a "person in reference to whom or to whose estate a receiving order has been made under this Act." Now, on whose estate can a receiving order be made? We have to go to clause three to see, and the hon. gentleman from Milton must see that the proper place for his amendment is clause three which says: "This Act applies to all debtors, &c." As I understand, the hon. gentleman from Milton wishes it to apply to a limited class of debtors, and that is the place to make the amendment. With respect to the principle of the bill, I wish to say one word. While it may be open to members to discuss the principle of the bill in committee, it would be a highly objectionable proceeding that the principle should be discussed several times in committee; but I put this to the hon. leader of the House—suppose that when we come to clause three the bill is given an application which is distasteful to the majority of the members of this House, it is in the power then of any hon. member to move that the committee rise, and that puts an end to the bill. Those who are opposed to going further with the bill can have their way if they are in the majority. Their opinions may be as wide as the poles apart. There are some hon. gentlemen who seem to think that the main object of the bill is to provide that the farmer may have an opportunity of going into insolvency of his own accord, without being put into it. There are others who think farmers should not go into insolvency at all. If clause three is objectionable to the majority of the House, it is just as well that the committee should rise and waste no more time over the bill.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—While I am opposed to the bill I am decidedly averse to killing a measure in committee. It is an unmanly way of killing a bill. When it comes to the third reading I shall vote against it, but I am opposed to moving that the committee rise.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It seems strange that after some 30 hon. gentlemen have been sitting on this bill for the last month to come now and say that the general principle of the measure is incorrect. I cannot understand a position of that kind, for the principle of the bill was affirmed at its second reading. I could understand the diversity of opinion on the details, but I cannot understand how a member of that committee can say now that the principle of the measure is not correct. I have taken strong ground from the beginning that the Act should not apply to farmers, and I stick to it yet. I do not think that farmers will take advantage of it, or that they require it. We pride ourselves on the position that our farmers occupy, and I do not think it is in their interest that this bill should be made applicable to them at all. If you say that this bill shall apply to traders and exclude farmers, will it not do all that you require, unless you want to go further and carry out the view of some hon. gentlemen that farmers should have the privilege (if privilege it be considered) of going into the bankruptcy court themselves? That is the debatable point. I took strong grounds against that at the beginning, and I take strong grounds against it now. I do not want farmers to be included under the provisions of this bill. I am not opposed to the general principle of the bill. If I were I would not have sat upon the committee or assisted in my humble way to make the bill as perfect as possible. I believe the bill is required in the interest of the commercial community, and if you do not pass it now you will find a hue and cry throughout the length and breadth of the country, as far as its commercial interests are concerned, which will be injurious to the prosperity of the Dominion. That is my opinion, and I speak by the book. I know there is a strong feeling on the part of the mercantile community in England that an Act of this kind should be passed, in order that they may know where they stand. At present there are different laws in different sections of the country, and the mercantile community of England do not know where they are. I do not want to deal with the general principle of the bill at the present time, I want to speak of details, and this is a detail on which we may differ, I want the bill to apply to traders only. What I want you to eliminate from it in every possible way, is the farmer. If the farmer leaves his occupation, of farming and becomes a trader, he comes under the Act, but not otherwise; the legitimate farmer does not require the Act. He should not give credit, and he will be the happiest man in the world if you exclude him from the operation of the bankruptcy law. I have had some experience of it, and I know what the circumstances are; I have talked with a great many farmers in this part of the country and they unanimously agree that they do not want such an Act at all. If we can agree on the question mooted by the hon. gentleman from Milton, let us do it and say that farmers shall not be included among those who are to be affected by the bill; then let us see if we can make it in the interest of all who are to be affected by it. That is a simple matter and I see no necessity of wasting time over it. We have made up our minds as to what is right and wrong. The bill is improved compared with the condition in which it was when introduced. I believe the country at large will consider it a good bill and will give the Senate credit for having passed it.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Probably it will be as well to let clause 2 stand for a time and discuss a great many other matters which will make the bill effective. In the meantime, to supplement what I said before, I will just make this motion which I think would have a tendency to test the question that has arisen. I move:

That the provisions of this Act shall apply to traders only, and that the bill shall be so amended.

That leaves the question open for the committee to define what a trader is, and in that definition we shall take in all those who are to be entitled to come under the provisions of the measure. To my mind that will settle this whole question.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That might be moved in amendment to a clause.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—While we are in committee we can define what the term "trader" shall include.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—If we exclude the farmers now, I do not see how we are going to take them in again. I would move, as far as I am concerned, that the Act shall not apply to anybody.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I said before that I was not in favour of farmers being included in this bill. I take that ground from a personal knowledge of the fact that the farmers do not want it, but if it is considered in the discussion before the committee that they are traders to a certain extent, you can define the word "trader" and draw in the farmer if you please.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I see a difficulty in the motion. The hon. gentleman wishes to move that the operation of the bill be confined to traders only, and to test the sense of the committee by such a motion. I am afraid that motion will not test the sense of the committee. For instance, I do not know how my hon. friend will vote on that motion. He is opposed to an Insolvency Bill altogether. He would like to vote to strike out the farmers, but if he votes for that he will approve of the principle of an Insolvency Bill. There may be many others who are in the same position—who may not wish to commit themselves to the principle of insolvency as applicable to any class whatever. I think the leader of the House had better suggest some means by which the sense of the committee could be taken upon the classes to whom the bill should refer.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—That will come afterwards on the definition of the word "trader." Take the whole bill, "this Act refers to traders as hereinafter defined, and traders including the several classes mentioned." Now, what I say is that in the definition of the word "trader" you can include these just the same as afterwards, and, as in the first bill, you can include the farmer in the resolution I have proposed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he proposes to be bound by the full effect of his motion? If so I shall support it. If he limits this bill to traders only I am with him, but if afterwards we are to allow the farmer to come in, making it optional with him to become insolvent, I am opposed to the principle altogether. That is the stand I took at the second reading of the bill. I said if you wish to avoid the difficulties take the English Act, which applies to all persons. If the House agrees to limit it to traders altogether, I am with the bill.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I do not like to see the word "trader" applied, inasmuch as there are a great many who have gone into speculations and have become deeply involved to whom the Act would not apply. If the bankruptcy law applies only to traders, such people are not traders, and will not be considered traders before the court. These people must either live under the hardship of their indebtedness or leave the country altogether. Now I consider the use of that word will not do what we expect this bill to accomplish; it will not be a relief to our people generally. There are many syndicates composed of people whose names are not mentioned at all who are heavily in debt. Those men will not be relieved by this bill. The word "trader" will keep those men out of the bankruptcy court, and they must eventually either make up their minds to remain under that hardship or go to some other country to live. I think the word "trader" ought not to be used. Although I have great respect for the hon. gentleman from Milton, I cannot agree with him on that. I think "debtor" will give much more relief and will be a better word to apply in the bill.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I should like to say that I think my hon. friend has perhaps not looked into the previous legislation on insolvency when he expresses so strong a dislike to the word "trader." It is the word that is used in almost all the Insolvency Acts. For example, the first Act we had in this country was in 1869, and the first clause of it was: "This Act shall apply to traders only." In 1875 it was found that the word "trader" would only include individuals, and therefore it was extended in this way: "This Act shall only apply to traders, trading corporations and companies," so as to include the individuals who went into companies and thought to escape liability in that way, but that was all. Both bills excluded farmers, graziers and all these other people, and this bill for the first time includes everybody from the highest to the lowest.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Debtors, yes, and so it should include all kinds.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I would suggest in the first place to my hon. friend that both these clauses stand until we go into committee again, and that he could then consider the proper wording of any amendment which it is proposed to make to this portion of the bill. I do not exactly agree with my hon. friend from Richmond. I have often seen this occur, that members of Parliament or members of the Senate may be opposed to the general principle of a measure, but still amend it as far as they can to make it as innocuous and harmless as possible in its details, without being at all inconsistent with their attitude towards the Act. That is the view I take of the position of a member who is opposed to the general principles of any measure which may come before Parliament. The amended motion by the hon. member from Milton simply means this, that the operation of the bill shall be confined to traders only. If that carries, then it will be necessary to define what traders are, and that clause must be drafted in the plainest possible language, and if farmers are not included in that intrepretation, then it will not apply. If, however, we should declare by a vote of the House that a farmer is a trader within the meaning of the Insolvency Act, then he will be included in it as a trader. In the Act to which the hon. gentleman from Amherst referred there was a plain definition of what should be considered a trader within the Insolvency Act, and then there was another clause declaring who should not be considered traders, and among that class was the farmer. I make this suggestion in order to have it clearly before the House that the motion of the hon. gentleman from Milton should be that the operations of the Act should be confined to traders, and who traders shall be understood to be. Then go on and adopt the clause if you please that was in the original Act, defining what a trader was, or without changing the word trader, leave the bill as it is and declare that it should be confined to debtors, but that the debtors shall be, as was explained in the clause originally in the bill. That seems to me to be the practical way of arriving at a solution of this question. I need not say to the gentlemen with whom I discussed this matter individually before, that I am in favour of the original bill, so far as the two clauses are concerned. My hon. friend from Toronto is in favour of the bill, as originally introduced, that is, that it shall apply to all classes, adopting the principle which we find in the English Act, including all classes, farmers, traders or whoever they may be. We can do that, or we can go back to the principle of the Insolvency Acts of 1869 and 1875, and confine its operations to traders, define what traders are, and declare that any one else outside of that definition shall not take advantage of the Insolvency Act or be put into insolvency. That I take to be the opinion of my hon. friend from Milton, and I regret to have to believe it is the opinion of the majority of this Senate. I think it would be better if he would accept my suggestion, and, after this discussion, and a night's sleep, arrange a clause that would not interfere with the wording of the bill to any very great extent, but affirm the principle, if it be the wish of the Senate, and in making the motion that it be confined to traders, at the same time define what traders are. If he would do that, I think the next time we go into committee we could approach the subject much more intelligently and arrive at a conclusion much more quickly.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The difficulty I have in this matter is this : If the course recommended by the leader of the House be adopted and the motion which he has suggested to the hon. member from Milton be placed before the committee, those gentlemen who are opposed to any Act of Insolvency will be placed in a false position and will not have an opportunity of expressing their views, and cannot vote one way or the other. The same difficulty will exist with regard to any affirmative motion in connection with the clause. I think you can only get at the clear opinion of the committee by a negative motion, and a simple negative motion, would very easily decide the sense of the committee in regard to farmers. I would leave it to my hon. friend to propose that this bill shall not apply to farmers and we will get that point settled at once and know where we are with regard to a very important part of the discussion. An affirmative motion compels those who are opposed to any Insolvency Act not to vote at all, because neither side of the question will be in accordance with their views; but a negative proposition, to say that any class shall not be included in the bill, will enable every one to vote according to his conviction.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—As we have spent a considerable portion of this afternoon in discussing this matter, and as I think all have their minds made up, it would be just as well before six o'clock to take the sense of the committee on this question as to whether the bill shall apply to classes other than traders. I know it is not regular to refer to what takes place in a committee, but I may be excused if I do refer to what happened there. The committee by a vote of nearly two to one decided that the bill should not apply to classes other than traders; and then it was thought, in order to get the bill before the House in the way most pleasing to certain hon. gentlemen, we should let the vote be taken in the House. Everybody understands the question and we might as well have that matter settled to-day. The hon. member for Milton will excuse me for saying it, but I think if he had not interposed with his amendment to the 2nd clause we should by this time have had a division on the 3rd clause and have had the question settled.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I shall move that this bill shall not apply to farmers.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Either making insolvency voluntary or otherwise?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—In any way.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Why should you do that? The farmers were excluded heretofore but we are bringing in a general bill now. We know there is hardship in our country owing to the speculations of our past years, and why should you not bring in the farmers? There are hundreds of farmers who have gone into speculations, for the sake of their sons perhaps, and they owe a certain amount on their farms. They might be able to stay here and make Canada their home if they were relieved in some way by this bill, which is intended to relieve the majority of our people. If you do not bring the farmer in, and if he is so in debt that he must sell his farm, he may have nothing left and go away to some other country to make a home for himself again.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Our farmers are not in that state.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Why not leave it "debtor?" I tell you, hon. gentlemen, a great hardship will be inflicted upon a large portion of our people if you confine it to the trader; I am satisfied of that. I am satisfied as to the broker and the speculator, but others that we know nothing about are heavily in debt, and will not be included in this bill; and if you limit this Act to certain classes and exclude the majority of our people who have unfortunately got into debt, you are going to stultify everything that you have intended heretofore, and you leave a large portion of the people who will never be relieved. The intention was otherwise when you commenced this bankruptcy law. The intention was to say "debtor," but you have so many minds working on it that you have mixed up matters, and now you want to strike out the farmers and confine it to traders. As far as I am concerned—and I know a good deal of the hardships of our country at the present day—I shall never vote for the bill in that shape.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am sorry my hon. friend has stated that our farmers are in this depressed condition. I do not believe that my hon. friend believes that any class in this country is in that bankrupt condition which he represents the farmers to be in. What we require is legislation providing against preferential assignments, and providing for the equitable distribution of the estates of traders. I do not believe that the farmers are in the condition which the hon. gentleman has pictured. I know that in Nova Scotia the farmers do not understand why this bill should come into operation at all. They do not want to come under it; it is destroying their credit and ruining their credit all through the country, and they are declaring by letters that I have had from many of them, and by meetings called to discuss the question that they do not want the bill.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not agree with the hon. member from Toronto. He tells us that the farmers in many parts of the country have gone into debt to help their sons, and if we do not pass this Insolvency Act to allow them to take advantage of the bankruptcy law they will leave the country. If they pay 66 cents on the dollar—which they must do before they can get any release —and pay all the expenses, what will the farmer have left.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—We will change that when it gets that far; we will alter that 66 cents provision.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I take the bill as it is before the House.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—We will try and reduce it to 50 cents.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Then if the farmer pays 50 cents on the dollar and the expenses, he is able to pay in full.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—He can pay 50 cents better than 66⅔ cents.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—My hon. friend altered the motion to exclude the farmers. I am opposed to insolvency altogether, knowing as I do that it is against the interests of the people of this country; and what am I going to do? If I vote to exclude the farmers, I suppose I am going as far as I can. I will vote to exclude the farmers and afterwards vote to exclude the others.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—In view of the difference of opinion existing between the members of the Senate on the motion which I made, and being assured, as I am, that every hon. gentleman in this House is desirous of having this bill a perfect one irrespective of any feeling in this matter, and as it is almost six o'clock, I feel disposed to withdraw my motion in order to bring in to-morrow probably a more comprehensive amendment to this bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I will withdraw my motion also.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The effect of that policy will be that, after having spent about an hour and a half to-day discussing the question, we will probably spend the same amount of time on it to-morrow. We had better settle this one point this afternoon. At any rate, I shall move this resolution to be submitted to the committee:

This Act shall not apply to any persons other than traders as hereinafter defined.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before a vote is taken on this question, I want to say two or three words with regard to including farmers under the provisions of the bill. I have listened very attentively to the remarks made by hon. gentlemen (and there have been many of them), on the subject of excluding farmers from the operation of this bill. If I am any judge at all, my conclusion is that the arguments which they have been using against including farmers in the operation of an Insolvency Act are very strong arguments against an Insolvency Act at all, because they have drawn no distinction or difference between farmers and traders that I can see. Why should not a farmer, who has suffered from bad crops, and losses through endorsing for his friends perhaps, or in buying or selling cattle as farmers in this country are obliged to do in the methods of farming which now prevail, and which must prevail in the future, be allowed to come under the Act? Why should farmers who, in the legitimate pursuit of their business as farmers, have got into debt through losses they cannot avoid, not be allowed to come in and get relief just the same as traders? If a farmer who suffers in this way from loss in the management of his business is to have no relief, while it is a gain to others, I must say there is very poor hope and encouragement to hold out for the farming classes. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the hopeful nature of farmers. Well, if we do not give farmers the relief which we are going to extend to coffee-house keepers, to keepers of saloons, and to a great many others, even to wharfingers, to a class comprising a very large number of callings, I must say we are going to pass a very one-sided measure indeed. I would not perhaps oppose that view so very strongly if there were some way of holding the bill down so that it would apply to some narrow class of traders. If that were possible I would not want farmers to come in more than others; such as coffee-house keepers, saloon keepers and keepers of livery stables; but if we are going to make the bill so comprehensive that it will include all these people, and if you are going, as the hon. gentleman from Richmond proposes, just to leave farmers out, I think a very great mistake will be made. Hon. gentlemen laid stress on the fact that the farmers have not asked for this measure. I do not think traders generally have asked for either. The request for the bill has come largely from wholesale men and from the banking institutions of the country. A request has come from these people, and not so much from traders generally, and I dare say that the greatest anxiety to pass the bill is in the interest of this larger class of traders who will have the power under it of putting the smaller traders who deal with them into insolvency. But with regard to farmers, they are a class who are not able to come before Parliament or a committee of Parliament, as bankers have been able to do with their organization. The bankers have their president, and the president of the banking association of Canada came before us to represent their views. We had also solicitors representing these institutions. We had representatives of the boards of trade, and very properly—I find no fault at all with them for coming—but farmers do not possess any organization of that nature which would enable them to come before us and press their views.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—What about the Patrons of Industry ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.—I dare say it will be found that the Patrons of Industry is an organization which is more political than agricultural or commercial in its aims and objects. The ground I take is this, that farmers have not been able to come to Parliament and present their special views in relation to this matter as the wholesale merchants, and bankers, and boards of trade, and such interests have. The only way in which their voices can be heard is through their representatives in this House and the House of Commons ; and their voices may not be heard a bit too powerfully in either branch of Parliament, for it is observed that commercial men and professional men through the means of their education and their influence and their intercourse with people, are much abler to find their way into Parliament than farmers, and consequently in representing farming constituencies it will be found that a great many of the representatives are commercial and professional men. I would venture the opinion with regard to these gentlemen representing farmers, although they may be excellent representatives, that when questions come up affecting the farmer and the commercial man, in the words of the old song, it will be found that their "Heart 's in the highland wherever they go"

And it will be found that if the interests of farmers clash with the interests of commercial men, they will lean a little more strongly to the commercial side of the question. I wish to put my views on record on this subject. I am not very strongly in favour of an Insolvency Act. My only reason for supporting a bill at all would be that I think it is a pity that in this great Dominion of ours we cannot have a uniform law relating to trade and commerce. I think it is desirable, other things being equal, that we should get uniformity in our commercial law, so that merchants trading with their customers in any part of Canada would find that the same laws would govern transactions between them. It would simply make freer and safer trade. I am so far in favour of having uniformity in our commercial laws in relation to insolvency, but if that uniformity cannot be got unless by what looks somewhat like class legislation, by putting in some classes and leaving others out who are entitled to the same relief, I would be inclined to go against it altogether.

Hon. Mr. REESOR moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. READ, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

DILLON DIVORCE BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved :

That the Fourteenth Report of the Standing Committtee on Divorce on Bill (T) intituled: "An Act for the relief of James St. George Dillon," be taken in consideration by the Senate to-day.

He said : This motion was put on the Order paper on Monday and allowed to stand till to-day. It is merely to restore this bill to the Order paper. If it is restored to-day it will go to the foot of the list and be considered when it is reached. It cannot be considered until that is done.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that perhaps this notice is not quite sufficient. You will all recollect that there were two reports made upon this subject, one by the majority and one by the minority of the Divorce Committee, and that it was also agreed that in dealing with the one we should deal at the same time with the other. It is impossible to properly consider this majority report without it being accompanied by the minority report, and I think the hon. member for Rideau Division in moving to restore the matter to the Order paper, should have brought the whole of it back and not merely one portion. Consequently, I think the House might consider that the motion is not exactly what it should have been, to do justice to the case ; and, this present motion being irregular in so far as it is impossible for the House to deal fairly with the case, the question might be dropped and notice of a new motion, dealing with the question as it came before the House on a previous occasion might be given.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I cannot agree with my hon. friend in the position which he has assumed, which I say, with all deference to him, is a most extraordinary one. What are the circumstances in connection with this matter? A report was made by the majority of the committee recommending the granting of a bill of divorce in the case. A minority report, signed by one member of the committee, was also made to the House. Both reports were before the House, and both were discussed, it is true, at the same time. There was, with regard to the minority report, a definite decision rejecting the report. I was not present at the vote. I have never yet voted on any of these divorce bills, but according to the minutes there was a vote on the minority report tantamount to its rejection. There was also a vote for the rejection of the majority report. It is true the discussion of both these reports was entertained at the same time, but it was impossible to decide them both by one vote. There were two distinct propositions before the House and they were dealt with as such when we came to the vote. That appears to me to be so clear that I do not understand how there is a possibility of any argument on the other side. Now, it is quite competent for any hon. gentleman interested in the minority report to make a motion similar to that which has been submitted by my hon. friend from Rideau, and have the reconsideration of that report also ; that is, if the motion were of the same character as the motion made in connection with the majority report. Now, with regard to the regularity of this motion—and I am speaking on this question solely with the view to see that the proceedings of this House are regular, because, as I said just now, I do not vote on these questions and do not intend to vote on the merits of the bill, but my sole interest is that the proceedings of the House may be regular, and that we may not have upon our minutes anything that would bring us into ridicule with regard to our knowledge of parliamentary practice. The hon. member from Barrie, as is shown at page 296 of the minutes of proceedings of this House, moved, on a certain occasion, that the majority report be now adopted ; that was negatived by a vote of 23 to 24. The question now is, can the matter be brought again before the House for consideration this session ? There is no doubt it can, because the vote on Mr. Gowan's motion was precisely similar to a vote on a motion that a bill be now read the first, second, or third time, which, if negatived, merely means that the bill shall not be then read at the time of the motion the first, second or third time. Therefore, the only decision which this House has come to with regard to this majority report is that it should not be read upon the occasion upon which it was presented to the House. It is open now to my hon. friend to make the motion, which he has done, and place it upon the orders for a subsequent reading. I must say that the other day, when I heard his motion read, I was under the impression that it was his intention to move on this day for the further consideration of the report without first getting it on the orders, and I conceived then that he was pursuing a course which was not regular, but when I came to look more closely into his motion I found it was to place the report upon the orders and the consequence is, if you pass this motion, it will go at the foot of the orders of to-day. I think he might have taken some subsequent day, and had he done so the object of the motion would have been more clear to the House generally, because I have heard it said that because he has not moved to put the report on the orders for a certain day, his motion is not sufficient, if not altogether irregular. It would be as absurd to make such a motion as that, as it would be, in the case of a bill which had been rejected on a similar motion on the second reading, to say that it should be read a second time on such and such a day, and that it should be placed upon the Orders of the Day. Hon. gentlemen will see how unnecessary that would be. It is quite sufficient to move that it shall be read the second time, without adding to the motion that it be put on the Orders of the Day for that reading. There is nothing whatever irregular, that I can see, in its adoption. I certainly do not agree with my hon. friend on my left (Mr. Angers) that there is any irregularity in the motion which the hon. member for Rideau has put on the paper.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How often can a report of this kind be recommitted? If once, why not any number of times and continue the discussion for many days.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It can be brought up in this House as often as it is presented to the House under similar terms and conditions. If it was the desire of the majority of the House—and that is what those interested in the motion should have done but neglected to do—if it was the desire of the majority who were opposed to the report to get clear of it for the session, their simple course was to move that it be not considered then but that it be considered that day six months. That would have put an end to it for the session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in the illustration he has given. But that word "now" is not in this report.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is in the motion made at page 296.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the motion for the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is the motion that it is desired to get on the minutes again. The motion was that the report be now adopted. That was passed in the negative and if there is a majority desirous of placing it on the minutes it can be placed on the minutes again.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I agree with the doctrine laid down by the hon. gentleman from Richmond, that this report can be considered again, from the very fact that when the hon. gentleman from Barrie moved he did not move the right motion but moved in a manner that allows the case to be brought up again. The proper and usual motion should be that the report be concurred in. Instead of that, unfortunately it was made verbally, and the minutes read that, "the report of the majority be adopted now."

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There are the minutes to show it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The minutes are in that sense. The motion should have been that the report be concurred in. Then, if being voted down, it could never have come up again during the same session. It could only be dealt with on a future occasion when another bill would be brought in. The hon. gentleman stated that the minority report had been rejected. No such proceeding was adopted by the House. The minority report was never rejected. There was never a motion made to have it accepted. There was an amendment proposed to this House which indirectly referred to this minority report. The amendment was to the effect that the majority report be not concurred in but that the said report be sent back to the Committee on Divorce with the minority report and that the question recited in that amendment be put and all further questions pertinent to the premises. That was not rejecting the minority report. The House was never called on to accept or reject the minority report.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Did not the motion refer to the report, and virtually defeat it?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No. You cannot infer from the fact that the motion was not accepted that the minority report was accepted or rejected. The House never dealt with it at all. That is my point. I do not dispute the right to bring up the question again. It is according to all the rules laid down that when the House decides that a question shall not be disposed of now, it can be brought up at any further day during that very same session, but what I dispute as to the correctness of the present notice is that, after the House had given the order that the majority report and the minority report be consolidated for the purpose of consideration, this notice does not include the two reports.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The minutes show nothing of consolidation.

Hon. Mr ANGERS—There was not an order on the paper, but there was an agreement in the House which nobody disputed that when we considered the majority report we should also consider the minority report, and at the request of the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudiére it was agreed that both reports should be considered together. My objection is not a technical one, but it is one that goes to show that the hon. member for Rideau division, in moving to consider the majority report, has not put the House in a position to deal fully and clearly with the question which is to be considered—that he should have also when moving to bring up the majority report, moved to bring up its incident, the minority report, because the House cannot be properly informed about the case which it is to decide upon without having both reports before it. I know that the hon. member for Rideau division does not wish to place the question improperly before the House. I am satisfied that it is an omission, and that is why I ask his consent and approval in the matter, and I say perhaps it would be better that he should drop this notice now and give a notice on some other day which will bring the case before the Senate in a fair and square manner. Let us drop it for to-day. There is lots of time before us yet, because it is insinuated on many occasions that we are to be here until September, and if so we shall have ample time to consider the question.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I did not think, until I heard the hon. Minister of Agriculture, that his case was really so weak as it is. Now what are the facts? The friends of the minority report have dropped it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is dropped from the minutes. They made no attempt to take a vote in the House upon it and the dropping of the report is worse even than a vote of the House against it. Under any circumstances I consider the case is weaker from the fact that the minority report had been completely dropped by its friends and no attempt has been made to continue it on the Orders of the Day. There were two distinct reports on the same subject coming from the same committee at the same time, and while an understanding to discuss them together may have been quite in accordance with the parliamentary rules, I don't see how they could have been consolidated—How you could vote yea or nay at the same time, is a thing I cannot understand. One is a direct affirmative proposition, the other is a direct negative proposition. That you can unite those two, the negative proposition and the affirmative proposition, and vote upon them as one proposition as something which transcends my powers of comprehension. Besides, if any agreement made to consider the two reports together were regular, it could only refer to the motions when before the House. The present motion is a new departure and cannot be clogged by any agreement on the previous motions. I think the motion is quite sufficient and regular, and we had better get rid of the question as it is now before us, and be done with it. It has occupied more time than it should already, and even if we stay here until Christmas, it is unnecessary to throw away so much time on a question which is not deserving of our attention, to the exclusion of our more important legislative duties.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—It was not only understood between the members of the House that the two questions were to be considered as one to all intents and purposes, but if you will refer to page 334 of the Minutes of Proceedings you will find an exception made to the usual rule. The second order is to resume the further adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Gowan, and the phrase finishes " and the consideration of the minority report, etc." It is put in our own minutes. It was not merely a tacit understanding, but an order given to the Clerk, with the authority of the House, that the two motions were to be considered as one—not as a question of courtesy to anybody, but as a question of right, and the proof of it is that an exception is made in the form of giving the notice. It proves clearly that the two are to be considered as one, and I am surprised at the hon. gentleman from Richmond finding fault with the Minister of Agriculture for the views he has expressed on this question. I should consider the question was not fairly put before the House if both reports were not restored to the orders. There is no reason why we should not consider the two together when it was understood that we should from the first.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—This is first time since I entered the House that I have had anything to say on matters of this kind. It is not my intention to vote for this bill of divorce, but from the efforts that I see in this House to shut the gates of this court against certain subjects of Her Majesty, I think it is my duty to enable them if it is in my power to have their bill disposed of on the present occasion. As a member of a church that does not approve of divorce I have no right to take any part whatever in the settlement of such affairs. When people come to this court to ask for a divorce no question should be put to them to ascertain to what persuasion they belong. It is a court for the general benefit of the subjects of Her Majesty, and I for one, while not approving of divorce, will not sit here and deprive a man who is seeking for this relief of any fair-play that he is entitled to in this House. I intend to vote that the matter be restored to the orders. The case of the hon. gentleman from Quebec cannot be so strong as he thought when he had to admit that there was some difference of opinion, and that the proper motion was not made. If that be the case, then allow the motion to be amended and let us have the bill disposed of now.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—It was I who raised the question as to the minority report, and it is I who asked that the two be made one item on the Orders of the Day. What was the reason? It was because if the report of the minority were not discussed along with the other, it would preclude members in the course of the debate from referring to what had passed in the committee. Every member of this House knows that you cannot refer to what has passed in a committee, and that is why I asked that the minority report be taken up with the other. Now, if it was right that the House should order the two reports to be made one, is there not the same reason to-day, when you have to discuss the same question over again, to have the report of the minority accompany the majority report? The argument of the hon. member from Mille Isles is very good, because the Minutes show that the House ordered the two reports to be considered together; but even if they did not, it is only necessary to show that the minority report must be put before the House in order to properly discuss the whole matter that arose in the committee, a portion of which is narrated in the report of the majority and a portion in the report of the minority. I submit that the Minister of Agriculture was perfectly right, although I might say I did not think of raising the question myself, but since it has been raised we have to discuss the question as it stands. If we decide against his contention we will decide contrary to what we have been doing heretofore.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Technically and strictly the hon. member from Richmond is correct, but we do not rely very strongly on technicalities in this House, and the hon. member for Rideau would be certainly doing nothing but an act of ordinary courtesy in complying with the request of the hon. Minister of Agriculture so that the whole subject might come up before the House at the same time.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That is the ground of my request.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman did not claim this as a right, but asked it as a courtesy from the hon. member for Rideau, and I shall be surprised if the hon. gentleman declines to comply with the request of the Minister, because it does not materially alter the position of the report of the majority. There is one thing I should like to refer to, which fell from the hon. gentleman from Richmond. He said that the report of the minority was completely out of the hands of the House. Now, I cannot quite understand how that may be. Those two reports were before the House on a certain occasion. The report of the minority was not dealt with by the House at all. The report of the majority was rejected. I cannot understand how any one can claim that a report which was rejected is in a better position than one which has not been rejected. Of course the mistake that was made is that some hon. gentleman who was in favour of adopting the minority report did not put a notice on the paper, and the hon. Minister of Agriculture simply asks the hon. gentleman for Rideau division to be good enough to remedy that neglect. If the hon. gentleman should decline, then there is nothing at all to hinder the hon. Minister of Agriculture from moving an amendment to the effect that the minority report be reinstated on the Order paper also.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—A great deal of time has been lost quite unnecessarily. I happen to know that the hon. member from Rideau division has before him an amended motion actually doing the very thing that all this discussion has arisen about, and that it was not his intention or design to exclude the discussion of the minority report. He thought a reconsideration of the matter would bring up the whole question again. There was no intention or thought whatever of keeping anything out, and it is merely a question whether it is worth while insisting upon what really is technically correct, that the resolution should mention both reports.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I quite understood that that was the case, that the hon member from Rideau intended by the motion that both the majority report and the minority report should be taken into consideration. From my conversation with him I understood that that was his intention, and that it was the wish of the House. Further than that, when the debate came up on these motions and the hon. member from Barrie had made his speech, the very first remark I made was this—"I presume it will be understood in this discussion that both the minority and the majority reports are to be considered at the same time" The reply to that was, "yes, they are both before the House." I thought it was understood throughout that they were to be taken as one and considered together. I am sure the hon. member from Rideau division will do as he intended to do and put his motion so that we will have it all before the House together, and allow no one to be able to have undue advantage by a quibble.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I intended it to be taken up as one report. If you will refer to the discussion, page 340, you will find that they are referred to as one report, and I would have put in my motion more fully the other day if it had not been considered quite sufficient as it stood. If it is not sufficient, I am quite prepared to put in another notice covering the whole ground.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—The House will consent, I am sure, unanimously, to consider both reports.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—I wish to call attention to two or three paragraphs on page 340. They are as follows:—

The Order of the Day being read for resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Gowan for the adoption of the fourteenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce on the Bill (T) intituled: "An Act for the relief of James St. George Dillon"—and also on the minority report of the same committee on the said bill:

The Hon. Mr. Landry moved, in amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Dickey,

That the said report of the majority be not concurred in, and that the same with the report of the minority be recommitted to the Standing Committee on Divorce, with instructions to the said committee to put to the petitioner James St. George Dillon, of the city of Montreal, merchant, the question mentioned in the report of the minority, to wit:—

"Have you been faithful to your marriage vows as far as adultery is concerned up to the time you instituted proceedings for divorce?" and further questions on the subject which may be necessary to get at the truth, and also all further questions which may be pertinent in the premises."

Now, hon. gentlemen will observe that that was the motion of the Hon. Mr. Landry, and that motion was to refer back the report to the committee again. That is, with instructions to carry out the substance of the minority report. The House in its wisdom rejected that by a vote of 22 to 25. If that does not dispose of the minority report, I must confess I fail to understand ordinary plain English language. It is plain as possible that the report of the minority was disposed of then and there. The next question came on the majority report, and the majority report was rejected, the yeas being 23 and the nays 24, so that I claim there is nothing before the House but the majority report.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I think it better that we should dispose of this matter at once, and with the consent of the House the hon. gentleman might perhaps be permitted to amend his motion, so as to avoid the difficulties which have arisen, by putting in these words "and the minority report thereon." That would meet the objection taken by my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Angers) and others who have spoken. The motion would then read in this way :

> That the 14th report of the Standing Committee on Divorce on Bill (T) "An Act for the relief of James St. George Dillon," and the minority report thereon, be taken into consideration by the Senate to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I think the House would concur in that unanimously if the debate were brought on to-day. A great many members have attended for the purpose of being present at the debate to-day and they may not be here to-morrow. I think it would be a fair compromise to bring on the debate to-day.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—If it carries to-day it would be put at the bottom of the list and would hardly be reached to-day.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Take it in its order now.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It must go to the bottom of the orders. I ask leave of the House to amend my motion in that way, including the minority report.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I shall certainly object to that and I think the House will not be disposed to vote in favour of that motion.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I thought you recommended that ?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I decidedly object to the motion to bring it on the Order paper. I have a right to make my objection to the whole motion. I contend that although technically we could place it on the Order paper, yet it is a question for the House whether they will put it on the Order paper to be discussed. I agree to amend the motion, but do not agree to the effect of the motion. While I agree that we would be technically right in putting it on the Order paper with the vote of the majority, yet I ask this House if it is reasonable and right, after 3 or 4 days and a night attending here discussing the merits of this motion, under the two reports from the committee, that we should stultify ourselves by having it reconsidered. There never, probably, was a question in this House, certainly none of that character, which was so fully discussed and debated. It was no snap voting, as some might say, but a deliberate voting by as large a number present as usual at a vote in this House. This motion now brings up the same matter again, with the same scope and in a same manner, for what else, but that more strenuous lobbying may change the vote. I hope this House will not, by any motion, allow themselves to be placed in the position of having recorded contradictory decisions upon the same subject. On principle it should not be done. If that rule is adopted we could bring up any question time and again. I consider it would be unseemly and not in the interest of proper legislation. I believe the matter has been so thoroughly ventilated and decided by the majority of the House that it should not be brought up again, because it is a similar motion to the one we decided by a majority of this House. If that be allowed, when will we have an end of decisions on the same matter ? I hope the House will stand by the vote given here on the occasion when it was brought up before, and not stultify itself by contradicting the decision on that motion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think we all feel that it is desirable to dispose of this matter, and acting on the express opinion of several hon. gentlemen, in order that it may not come up on another day, I shall move that the fourteenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce be taken into consideration this day three months. Under the ruling, supposing this original motion were negatived to-day, it could be brought up at any future time.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are all interested in disposing of it.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Then you can negative it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If it is simply negatived now, another notice may be given and so we may be perpetually voting on it.

Hon Mr. BOWELL—You must know that you cannot move a three months' hoist to a motion which is not before the House. If that motion is carried then you might move the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—As I understand it, without going into the past at all, the hon. gentleman who has charge of the bill proposed to amend his motion and give this as a notice of motion for to-morrow, so that we must all acknowledge that the gentleman in charge of the bill was disposed to act with courtesy to the House and give them the opportunity of considering it, because, after all, the motion is only that we shall reconsider this question. I think it would be very inconvenient, upon a mere notice of motion, to anticipate a matter which is to be considered on a future day—that we should have a discussion now upon the very principle of the motion itself. I give my hon. friend credit for having taken the right course, but it seems that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who are anxious to have this bill pass, insist that it should be considered to-day. If the motion is passed, I take it for granted that the order will go to the foot of the list and cannot be considered until the whole business of to-day is disposed of. Therefore, I think it would have been better if we had allowed the hon. gentleman who has charge of this bill to have his own way and do the correct thing, which was to give the notice that the amended motion be considered to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—I think the hon. member from Ottawa will not be justified in moving that the report be considered six months hence, because the question is simply on this motion. The only motion he could make to-day would be to insert "this day three months," and that would throw the whole thing over.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The motion is premature.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I certainly do not see any objection to my motion, which says that the report of the committee shall be put on the order paper three months hence.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—What I understood the hon. gentleman to propose was that the report be considered this day six months. You are right as to that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I therefore move an amendment to strike out the word "to-day" and substitute the words "three months hence"; that would dispose of it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to move an amendment to that amendment—that the report be not considered this day three months, but that it be considered on Tuesday next. I would like to say a word in support of the motion. On Friday we hope to have a rifle match between the Commons and the Senate, and, therefore, I would not be able to be present on Friday, and many members leave for Montreal and do not return until Monday evening, and, therefore, if it were put on the Order paper to-day at the bottom of the list it might come up on Friday, when many of us would not be able to be present.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I think the motion made by the last speaker is out of order, because it has reference to the report of the committee and not to the motion before the House, which is to have the matter put on Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I will withdraw the motion.

The House divided on the amendment which was lost on the following vote:

The Order of the Day being read,

Consideration of amendments made by the Committee to (Bill D) "An Act to incorporate The Trust Corporation of Canada."

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I see that this bill stands in my name, although, as I explained the other day, I have nothing to do with it except that I was chairman of the committee to whom it was referred. Although some of the amendments which were made, if I may say so without impropriety, seem to be of the most trifling character, yet there are one or two which I do not like to take the responsibility of assenting to without knowing whether those interested in the bill desire to have them passed. I will, therefore, take what I think is the best course, and move that the Order of the Day be discharged and the amendment be taken into consideration on Thursday of next week.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved the adoption of the second report of the joint committee of both Houses on the library of Parliament. He said: As this report is printed in full in the minutes, I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen are fully acquainted with its contents. It recommends the erection of some memorial to record the fact that the "Royal William," a Canadian steamer, sent from the port of Quebec, was the first steam vessel that ever crossed the Atlantic. Such an event should not be allowed to become totally forgotten, and the proposal contained in the report of the committee is one which should be adopted. A similar report has been presented to the House of Commons, and I am given to understand that it will be adopted there without any opposition whatever.

The motion was agreed to.

INCORPORATION AND REGULATION OF JOINT STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (EE) "An Act respecting the Incorporation and Regulation of Joint Stock Companies." He said: I wish to explain wherein this bill differs from the Acts on the Statute-book. The bill as framed, does not affect companies already incorporated, but is intended to apply to companies hereafter incorporated. It does not in any way affect those which are now in existence. The general plan of the bill is the same as that of the English Companies Act, 1862, and subsequent amendments thereto. I may state that it provides a much more simple mode than the present one of obtaining a charter under our Act. There is one important difference, however, that, while the English Act deals with three classes of companies, viz.: 1. Companies limited by shares; 2. Companies limited by guarantee; 3. Unlimited liability companies; the present bill deals with companies limited by shares only, companies limited by guarantee and unlimited liability companies are not dealt with in the present bill. Many of the provisions of the existing Act have been retained. Following the plan of the English Act, a registration office is established, the Deputy Minister of Finance to be ex officio registrar of joint stock companies, and proceedings for incorporation are taken and carried on through the office of the registrar with right of appeal to the Treasury Board, in all cases where the persons interested are dissatisfied with the rulings of the registrar. A memorandum of association stating the object of a company and articles of association containing regulations or by-laws for the management of the companies' affairs take the place of the petition to the Governor in Council in use under the existing Act, and a certificate of incorporation issued by the registrar takes the place of the letters patent now issued. Proceedings will thus be considerably simplified. The number of applicants necessary to obtain incorporation has been increased from 5 to 7, and provisions have been introduced limiting the purposes for which incorporation may be granted. Omnibus charters, such as were at one time issued under the present Act are prohibited, and provisions have been introduced with the object of preventing, as far as possible, the formation of fraudulent companies.

Annual statements of the condition, assets and liabilities of companies are to be sent under oath to the registrar, and to be there open to the inspection of the public. There is no similar provision in the present Act. The bill also provides under certain conditions for the appointment by the Treasury Board, of inspectors to examine and report upon the affairs of companies incorporated under this Act, should it be deemed necessary. When further powers are desired, or when a company desires to decrease its capital, more stringent provisions than at present exist have been introduced in order that the rights of creditors and others whose interests might be affected may be duly protected. The bill also contains provisions prohibiting the watering of stock, and other like practices which it is hoped may prove effectual for the purposes intended. At present no means exists by which a company may be wound up voluntarily, as cases arise from time to time where solvent companies desire to go into liquidation, provision has been made in the Act for the winding up of companies incorporated thereunder without the necessity of applying under the winding up Act as must now be done. The provisions as to loan companies are in substance the same as now in force under the Companies Act, chapter 119, Revised Statutes of Canada, and amending Acts. The schedule of the Act contains regulations for the management of a company, and intended to apply to all companies, where no other regulations are provided for. The points referred to constitute the principal differences between the existing law and the proposed new law. The provisions of the existing law have been retained as far as possible, and where the provisions of the English Act have been adopted, the phraseology has been followed as nearly as circumstances would permit. By way of illustrating the simplicity of the procedure under this bill, as compared with that under the existing Act, I may point out that parties desiring to obtain a charter under the present law must, 1st. Petition to be sent to Secretary of State. 2nd. Secretary of State sends it to Justice Department. 3rd. Justice Department examines petition and returns to Secretary of State. 4th. Secretary of State enters it in a book and sends to Finance Department. 5th. Finance Department examines papers and returns to Secretary of State with report. 6th. If approved by Justice and Finance Departments, Secretary of State prepares a report to Council. 7th. If Council approves, reports returned to Secretary of State. 8th. Secretary of State sends to Justice to prepare draft of Letters Patent. 9th. Justice prepares draft of Letters Patent and sends to Secretary of State. 10th. Secretary of State engrosses draft, signs it and publishes in Official Gazette. After all that has been done, the parties desiring incorporation, can go to work. The bill before the House simply requires the following:—1. Incorporators prepare statement showing objects of incoporation, names of incorporators, capital, etc. 2. Send it to Finance Department, where papers are examined by the registrar, and if found in accordance with law, a certificate of incorporation is issued, and notice sent to Official Gazette, and the work is completed. The present law facilitates the formation of bogus companies, whose object is to sell their charters. This bill is framed upon the lines of the English Act, which is more workable than ours, being less cumbersome in its details, and provides effectual checks against chartering of bogus companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume it is 50 per cent of the whole capital that has to to be subscribed. What amount has to be paid in on that?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am not prepared at this moment to say; that will depend upon circumstances. I was merely giving the provisions of the bill, showing how it differed from the old Act and the advantages which it is believed will accrue not only to the incorporators but to the company in so amending the Act. The point asked by my hon. friend from Ottawa I am not just now prepared to answer, but that can be considered when we reach to the clause. I would say that the detention which very often takes place in the securing of letters patent to carry on any business is very embarrasing to those who are interested. Any one who knows anything of our system of government can easily understand that there might not be a meeting of the council for some little time, and it might also happen during the summer season that some of the Ministers, who have special charge of the work, would be away from the capital, and I have known months to elapse going through all this red tapism before letters patent for an Act of incorporation could be obtained. Now, under this bill it can be done very simply and the parties seeking the incorporation, if dissatisfied with the ruling or opinions given by the registrar, can appeal to the Treasury Board, a sub-committee of council which is composed, as many members know, of the Finance Minister, the Minister of Justice, the Postmaster General, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Public Works, and the Minister of Inland Revenue; so that that would be a board of appeal. I think the bill will be of advantage to the country, particularly as we propose to increase the fees materially.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Less work to be done but more money to be charged.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Less work to be done, with more money to the treasury of the country. It costs in England to obtain letters patent, such as you can obtain in Canada, sometimes £500 and £600 and £1,000. I could give an illustration of the large amount of money it cost some gentlemen in Nova Scotia. They had to apply to England for Acts of incorporation to carry on their business through the Empire generally, because this Parliament refused them an Act, and they took the opportunity of going to England to obtain it. The gentleman told me it cost £600 sterling. We do not propose, however, to put it as high as that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand the bill does not affect existing companies.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No, not in any way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It only applies to companies hereafter incorporated. I have not had the opportunity of looking into it, but from the remarks of the hon. leader of the House, I notice that there are some good features in it. I think the proposal to limit companies to the legitimate business they propose undertaking is a good one, and the propriety of making returns is a very proper one. These public companies ought to be obliged to make returns so that we should know exactly what they are doing. When the bill goes before a committee of the whole House, there may be clauses to which it will be necessary to call attention.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I endorse the observations of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, and I would ask the Minister to consider the propriety of extending the provisions of this bill—that is, the provisions which do not relate to the incorporation of companies, to companies which are now in operation, the provisions with respect to the liquidation of companies and so on. I cannot see that there is any special objection to applying those provisions to existing companies. The Minister will readily understand that it is objectionable that there shall be two laws applying to joint stock companies, and that if one wishes to know which law applies to a given company, he has to ascertain whether that company was incorporated before or after the passing of this Act. Of course the provisions with respect to incorporation could not apply to companies already incorporated, but I really do not see why the other provisions should not apply to such companies.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It would be a difficult thing if all the provisions applied to incorporated companies, which enjoy certain privileges under their charters. If this bill materially alters those rights it would cause some difficulty. I hope the returns will be made in a satisfactory manner. I know that some returns made by companies are perfectly useless. I hope they will conform with what is generally required of joint stock companies.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to ask why the companies who have been in operation and are not making satisfactory returns, should not be obliged to do so.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I suppose they are. A great many companies do not make any returns at all, and the information obtained in the reports from joint stock companies in Ontario is of no benefit at all. I have not read the bill yet, but I hope they are making an improvement in the right direction.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Are not the forms of returns of companies now in existence made to conform with those laid down in this bill? I think they ought to.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This bill does not affect, and will not affect if passed as it is introduced, any company now in existence by any of its provisions. The suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax is worthy of consideration. As I understand his suggestion, he does not propose to interfere with any of the powers given under their own acts, and power should be given them to wind up their business under this bill which does not exist now. For instance, a solvent company desiring to end its business can enter into liquidation, make a disposition of all its property and wind up its business. At present I will retain the bill as it stands, but the provision as to the bill affecting only companies organized is worthy of consideration. The forms in this bill would not apply to old companies. That, however, is worthy of consideration as to whether these forms are more perfect and give more information, and it may be desirable to make it apply to existing companies.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (125) "An Act further to amend the General Inspection Act."

(In the Committee.)

On the second clause,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am of opinion that on reading this bill carefully the House will find that it is not subject to so many objections as were raised when it was last under consideration. By looking at the Act it will be observed that the grades of hay are defined. I am going to suggest that the word "hay" be struck out. Then the grade prime timothy shall be "pure timothy, perfect colour, sound and well cured," so that if a bundle of hay when it goes into the market be branded or ticketed "prime timothy," it would be understood what is meant by this interpretation, because that brand will have to be pure timothy, perfect in colour, sound and well cured. I have not been able, I confess, to suggest anything to meet the views of the hon. member for Quinté as to what constitutes colour. Then, if you look at No. 2, or the second clause, No. 1 timothy shall be timothy, if not more than one-third of clover or other tame grasses, and so on all through.

Hon. Mr. POWER—One-eighth.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Then you come to a grade which will be marked "no grade." That says it shall include all kinds of hay badly cured, stained, or out of condition. Now I come to the grade which is termed "shipping grade," to which the hon. member from Halifax called special attention, and it is worded in such a way that it would be very difficult to really understand it unless you read it very critically, but I think it can be amended so as to be understood better in this way: "Shipping grade" shall be hay in good condition, pressed, sound and well-cured." That is striking out "regular shipping," and the word "hay." So that any hay that is branded "shipping grade" would be hay in good condition, pressed, sound and well-cured. To meet the suggestions made by our Maritime Province friends, I have another grade which may or may not be adopted. If it does not cover the class of hay to which they refer, which is grown upon the marsh or dyke lands, I shall be very glad to change it in order to meet their views. It reads in this way: "dyke hay shall be sound and well-cured hay grown upon dyke lands subject to overflow by the sea."

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Dyke lands are never overflowed by the sea.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have been told that when the sluice ways or gates are open it allows the tide to flow in. I shall be glad to accept any wording which shall meet their views if they are of the opinion that the clauses, which provide for different grades composed of timothy, clover, or other tame grasses, do not cover that particular grade. But the marsh hay would not be a tame grass. Before we discuss the different grades seriatim, I will call the attention of the House to the provisions of the General Inspection Act. Clause 14 gives the Governor in Council power from time to time to make any regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of the Act, and it goes further; it enables them to change the different grades either of wheat or any other grain and also of hay in the future should it be found that the interpretation given to these grades is not correct and should be changed, the Governor in Council have the full power to change it, and they also have the power to declare the manner and mode in which the inspection shall take place. I now move the adoption of the second section by striking out the word "hay" in the 12th line.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—There is an added clause "dyke hay shall be sound and well-cured hay grown upon the dyke lands subject to overflow from the sea." That gives an entirely incorrect idea. It is not subject to overflow because it is dyked, but it is reclaimed from the sea, and therefore it should read in this way "dyke hay shall be sound and well-cured hay grown upon dyke land reclaimed from the sea."

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—In order that it may be made intelligible to hon. gentlemen who are not familiar with the country where the dyke lands exist, I might say that outside of this dyke there is a large portion of land which produces another inferior class of hay which is only used for feeding young stock, and which is subject to overflow by the sea at the spring tide. That is a different kind of thing, and it is not a merchantable article at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with this hay told us when this bill was before the committee that the hay on the marshes was generally mixed in its character. There was some timothy, very little clover as a rule, and some grass which an hon. gentleman called couch grass. At one time timothy and clover were almost the only kinds of hay which were grown, but, with the progress of the farmers in the way of knowledge, other kinds of hay have been introduced, and it occurs to me that it would be better to establish a grade of hay which would include hay other than that grown on marshes, and I would suggest some definition such as this:

Mixed hay shall be hay which does not come under the description of timothy or clover, and which is in good condition, sound and well cured.

I wish to insert that under No. 2 clover.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—There is a vast quantity of hay on the river marshes in New Brunswick, and it would not come under the description of dyke hay. It is a very valuable hay, and I think it should come under some particular heading, so that it should not be confounded with the hay grown on lands reclaimed from the sea. It might be called mixed marsh hay. Perhaps the hon. gentleman from Albert can describe it better than I can.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I think the suggestion is a very good one. It was my idea when we discussed this before to have a classification called mixed grasses or mixed hay, and without reference to that grown upon the dykes at all. Locally this hay is called marsh hay. That is a misnomer. The land is no way like marsh. It is really land reclaimed from the sea, made up of deposits from salt water, and is hard and solid, and does not answer the description of marsh in any sense or form. To call it marsh would be a mistake, although it is locally called that, and to call it dyke land overflowed with water would create a misconception, because it is not overflowed with water unless by some tidal wave, or unless done for irrigation; but it is land reclaimed from the sea, and there are other grasses or descriptions of hay very much like that of course which are not grown upon dyke lands at all, so that perhaps that would be the best definition. I think perhaps my hon. friend from Amherst would agree to simply call it mixed hay, sound and in good condition, other than clover or timothy.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Would that include the hay I have reference to?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is first suggested that dyke hay shall be sound and well-cured hay grown upon lands reclaimed from the sea. The motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax is to take the place of this and instead of calling it dyke hay to call it mixed hay.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I think that is a better definition because it will meet the views of hon. gentlemen better—hay which does not come under the description of timothy or clover, and which is in good condition, sound and well-cured. It has been suggested that the words "good colour" should be added to it as well as the other.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not see much objection to that, but my hon. friends from King's and that country know that the dyke hay is considered the most valuable we have in the market. In generally brings $1 or $2 per ton more than the upland hay in the country. You are placing it as rather an inferior grade of hay by putting it after No. 2 timothy.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—After all, every hay will bring its price according to its quality, after you come to know it.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On subsection,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the question whether that fee is too large or not depends upon the time the inspection takes place, and if hay which has been baled is opened, 20 cents is a small fee for inspecting; but if a large quantity of hay is looked at by an inspector before it is baled, then 20 cents might amount to a very considerable fee. However, I do not know enough about the matter to make a suggestion.

Hon. Mr. McKAY, from the committee, reported the bill with with amendments which were concurred in.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (GG) "An Act to amend an Act relating to the custody of juvenile offenders in the province of New Brunswick."—(Mr. Bowell.)

Bill (58) "An Act to incorporate the Lake Megantic Railway Company."—(Mr. Ogilvie.)

Bill (80) "An Act to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Rocky Mountain Railway and Coal Company."—(Mr. Perley.)

DISFRANCHISEMENT OF VOTERS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (6) "An Act to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Some clause might have been included to punish not only the person accepting a bribe but also the person who offers a bribe. I know there is a provision already in the Act which relates to the subject, but I am not certain whether it has the same scope as the provision of this bill for the punishment of a person who takes a bribe.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

REFORMED BAPTIST CHURCH OF CANADA BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (84) "An Act to incorporate the Alliance of the Reformed Baptist Church of Canada, and the several churches connected therewith."

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I should like to call attention to the provisions of the first section of this bill. You will see that the power given to this corporation is very large—they are not limited in any way. The first paragraph reads, "And the said alliance shall have the direction and management of the general interests of the said denomination." There might be no objection to that. The only point is whether, as in other bills of a similar character, these powers should not be defined. If you look at the Evangelical Lutheran Synod Act, and the Reformed Episcopal Synod Act, you will find that they have in their charters clauses defining their powers. Would it not be in the interests of this denomination to have their powers clearly defined, as in these other Acts to which I have called the attention of the House? The clause in the Evangelical Lutheran Synod Act of 1885, and also in the Reformed Episcopal Synod Act of 1886 reads as follows:

> The said synod may meet and adopt, or repeal constitutions and make regulations for enforcing discipline in the said Evangelican Lutheran Church of Canada and for the appointment, deposition, deprivation or removal of any person or persons bearing office therein and for the convenience and orderly management of the property, affairs and interests of the said church in matters relating to and affecting only the rights, privileges or interests of other religious communities, or of any person who is not a member of the said church.

These are powers which I think are quite broad in their character, and this bill should be considered carefully when it is brought before the committee to which it is to be referred.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN.—I have no doubt the suggestion is a good one for the committee to consider.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is another point to which I should like to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman who has charge of the bill. The second clause provides that the first meeting of the Alliance shall be held on the first Wednesday after the 4th Sunday in June in the present year.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—That may be before the bill becomes law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, and another point to which I wish to call attention is the following:—

> "At a time and place to be designated by a notice published in the paper styled 'The King's Highway,' such notice to be signed by James E. Drysdale, Benjamin N. Goodspeed and D. B. Bowers and published four weeks previous to the said meeting."

This clause will all have to be recast. It is possible that these three gentlemen whose names are given may not be able to sign the notice as required by the clause. I would suggest that it would be better to say with respect to these gentlemen who are to sign the notice, that they or a majority of them may sign it, because there is nothing unreasonable in the supposition that some one of them might not be in a position to sign the notice.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read a second time.

SABBATH OBSERVANCE BILL.

FIRST READING.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (2) "An Act to secure the better observance of the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday."

The bill was read a first time.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved that the bill be read the second time to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I intend to move to-morrow that it be not read the second time, but that it be read the second time six months hence.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 5.30 p.m.

WINTER COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

MOTIONS.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.) moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, a statement giving in detail, the days, during the months of January, February, March and April last, on which the steamer "Stanley" crossed between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, such statement to show separately the days on which the said steamer made single and return trips; and also, the ports of departure from either side.

Also, for a statement covering the same period giving in detail the days on which the Government ice-boats crossed between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine, such statement to show separately the days on which single and return trips were made.

Also, for a statement giving in detail the days during the same period on which no mails were conveyed from the mainland to Prince Edward Island, and from Prince Edward Island to the mainland.

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of Prince Edward Island, from the first day of January, 1891, to the present time, in reference to the financial claims of the said province against the Dominion, in the matter of public works and steam communication in accordance with the terms of Confederation.

And also, regarding the proposed tunnel under the Straits of Northumberland.

He said: These two motions which I have on the Order paper, I think with the consent of the House, might be discussed together. They are very relevant to each other and as was done in the case of the Manitoba and North-west school question they might be discussed together and, with the consent of the House, I will take that course. The subjects embraced in these motions have been presented to this House in former years at very great length and with great ability by the Hon. Senator Howlan, now Lieutenant-Governor of Prince Edward Island, and by other gentlemen representing that province in this honourable House. My apology for obtruding myself upon the attention of the House at this time is, that there remains a great deal to be done on this question yet, that new light has been thrown upon it since former discussions have taken place and that I have had some opportunities of being conversant with certain phases, at least, of the question that I am proposing to submit to the House. In taking this course and in the remarks I am about to make, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not speak in a sectional spirit or feeling. I have the honour of having been one of the earliest advocates of the union of these provinces in Prince Edward Island, nearly thirty years ago when there were not very many advocates of confederation there, and, I remember very well that I then took the ground that if Prince Edward Island would throw in her lot with her sister provinces, small as she was in extent and limited in population, she would always, when she had a good case, get fair play and justice from the larger provinces of Canada, and I have never despaired or gone back on that opinion up to this day. Although I think I will be able to show this honourable House that much is yet due to Prince Edward Island, I still cling to the belief that I will never have to change my opinion that because a province is small and has a very small vote in the representative bodies of the Dominion it will on that account receive any the less justice than will be accorded to the larger provinces. When Prince Edward Island was invited to form a part of the great Dominion of Canada the people of that province took very strong objection to the Quebec scheme of union, in fact to union entirely as it was then presented to them, and the principal ground and the strongest ground that was taken in these years from 1865 to 1873 was that Prince Edward Island being entirely isolated from the other provinces, would be called upon under confederation to contribute her full share to the great public works that were then in progress on the mainland and that were in contemplation and that she could not derive any benefit or advantage directly or indirectly from the construction of these public works. The works then referred to were the Intercolonial Railway, the enlargement and improvement of the canals and the Canadian Pacific Railway. The people of Prince Edward Island, even those who were favourable to the union with Canada, united with those who were not, in contending that these great public works could not be, under any possible circumstances, of advantage to Prince Edward Island; while under the scheme of confederation that was submitted up to that time she would be taxed just the same as the larger provinces which would be directly benefited, and very largely, by the construction of these great public works. And this was the way the matter stood up to 1873 when the final conference, on confederation took place, and when the late lamented Premier of Canada, Sir John Macdonald who was always equal to any great occasion and who was always ready to do justice on occasions of this kind, no matter whether the provinces were large or small, finally took the matter into his consideration and admitted, as did his Government of that day, by the terms of union that were framed and adopted, in regard to Prince Edward Island, that the contention of the islanders was right, that Prince Edward Island could not receive the same advantages from these great public works as the other provinces. And Sir John Macdonald and his Government agreed at that time to put a clause in the terms with regard to Prince Edward Island which entirely met and covered the case. I will just read it to hon. gentlemen because it forms the keynote of the remarks that I am going to make :

That in consideration of the large expenditure authorized by the Parliament of Canada for the construction of railways and canals,and in view of the possibility of a readjustment of the financial arrangements between Canada and the several provinces now embraced in the Dominion, as well as the isolated and exceptional condition of Prince Edward Island, that colony shall, on entering the union, be entitled to incur a debt equal to $50 per head of the population as shown by the census returns of 1871, that is to say $4,701,050.

It will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that the British North America Act called for immediate steps with regard to the Intercolonial Railway within six months of confederation, and in the year 1867 an Act was passed authorizing the construction of that road. I now quote from 31st Vic., cap. 13, sections 27 and 32. They read this way :

27. For the purpose of constructing the said railway there shall be raised by loan and appropriated a sum not exceeding three millions pounds sterling bearing interest at a rate not exceeding four per cent per annum upon a guarantee of a payment of the interest of such loan by the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury under the provisions of the Canada Railway Loan Act, 1867.

That is, there should be an imperial guarantee for the loan of three millions of pounds sterling for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway; and section 32 of the same Act says :

32. The Government of Canada is hereby empowered to raise by loan for the completion of the railway, a further sum not exceeding one million pounds sterling (without guarantee by the commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury) and the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada shall be and the same is hereby charged with the money so raised and interest immediately after the charges made thereon in pursuance of the five next preceding sections of this Act.

Therefore $20,000,000, or £5,000,000 of sterling, was the amount that was authorized by the Parliament of Canada to be expended on the Intercolonial Railway at the time Prince Edward Island went into Confederation with Canada. At that time the sum of about $15,500,000 had been expended on the Intercolonial Railway and there remained about $4,500,000, which latter sum was the amount which the Parliament of Canada was authorized to expend for the construction of that work, and which was referred to in the terms of union to which I have just quoted. I may say that the debt of Canada on the 30th June, 1873, the last day before Prince Edward Island entered into confederation was $129,743,432.19. That was the first item that had to be taken into consideration and then came the $4,552-148.57, the amount unexpended and which was authorized by Parliament for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. If any doubt is still entertained on that point I may refer to the report of Mr. Brydges, the Superintendent of the Intercolonial, dated 24th December, 1874, a year and a half after Prince Edward Island entered the confederation, in which he says :

I think this will give you all the information that you require upon the subject of the works upon the Intercolonial Railway, and I think you may be satisfied that the amounts which I have estimated for the completion of the work will not be exceeded and that the sum of $21,250,000 will be the ultimate cost of the whole of the railway between Rivière du Loup and Truro.

This was a year and a half afterwards, but at the time Prince Edward Island went into confederation there was no estimate before the country except $20,000,000 and that was to be the full amount required for the Intercolonial Railway. Sir John Macdonald in the terms of union with Prince Edward Island spoke of the amounts authorized by Parliament, and we are limited to the consideration of those amounts. Now we come to the Canadian Pacific Railway and we find that by an Act passed in 1872, 35 Vic., cap. 71, sec. 4, the following provision was enacted :

The subsidy or aid in money to be granted to the said company shall be such sum not exceeding thirty million dollars on the whole, as may be agreed on between the Government and the company, such subsidy to be granted from time to time by instalments as any portion of the railway is proceeded with in proportion to the length, difficulty of construction and cost of such portion ; And the Governor in Council is hereby authorized to raise by loan in the manner by law provided such sum not exceeding thirty million dollars as may be required to pay the said subsidy.

Here we have it clearly provided by statute one year before Prince Edward Island entered into confederation, that the sum authorized by law, always keeping to the words of the terms of union, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and which was settled in the terms with Prince Edward Island, was $30,000,000. Now we come to the great canals and we find that in the year 1873, three weeks after Prince Edward Island entered the Confederation, that Her Majesty the Queen assented to an Act of the Imperial Parliament authorizing a loan, with the Imperial guarantee, of three million six hundred thousand pounds sterling, which Canada was authorized to raise on conditions that she raised a further sum of four million four hundred pounds sterling by loan on her own credit, and applied all that money to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway and in the improvement and enlargement of the canals and to no other purpose whatever. That was at the very time that the terms were negotiated and agreed upon with Prince Edward Island. The arrangement was going forward—in fact the bill to which I refer, must at that time have passed the House of Commons, for it was assented to by the Queen on the 23rd of July, authorizing a loan of £8,000,000 sterling for the Canadian Pacific Railway and for the enlargement of the canals. The Parliament of Canada probably had not time before the prorogation of 1873 to pass the Act that it was called upon to pass by the Imperial Act, and which it did pass immediately after it met in 1874, authorizing the negotiation of this loan of £8,000,000 in the terms provided in the Act of the Imperial Parliament known as the Canada Public Works Loan Act of 1873. I will here quote from the Imperial Act, 36-37 Vic. :

Whereas the Government of Canada propose to raise by way of a loan for the purpose of the construction of the Pacific Railway, and also for the improvement and the enlargement of the Canadian canals, a sum of money not exceeding eight million pounds.

Sec. 2. The treasury may guarantee in such manner and form and on such conditions as they think fit, the payment of the principal and interest (at a rate not exceeding 4 per cent per annum) on all or any part of any loan raised by the Government of Canada for the purpose of the construction of the Pacific Railway and the improvement and enlargement of the Canadian canals, so that the total amount so guaranteed from time to time does not exceed three millions six hundred thousand pounds.

Sec. 3. The treasury shall not give any guarantee under this Act unless and until provision is made by an Act of Parliament or otherwise to the satisfaction of the treasury.

Subsec. 1. For raising and appropriating the said proposed loan of eight million pounds.

In this way there was $30,000,000 provided by law for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and $8,933,333 for the canals. Then follows the provisions of the Canadian Act, 37 Vic., cap., sec. 1, as follows :

The Governor in Council may from time to time authorize the raising by way of loan for the purpose of the construction of the Pacific Railway and of the improvements and enlargement of the Canadian canals, such sum or sums of money as it may from time to time be found expedient to raise for such purposes, not exceeding in the whole eight million pounds sterling, and the money so raised shall be appropriated and applied strictly to the purposes aforesaid and to no other purpose whatsoever.

Now, my contention is that these were the sums and these were the works which formed the basis of the terms of union with Prince Edward Island that the debt of Canada on the 13th June, 1873, and the $30,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway, was to be taken, and that this $8,933,000 for the canals was to be taken and the unexpended portion of the $20,000,000 on the Intercolonial Railway and putting them altogether we have a sum of $173,238,914.09.

Debt of Canada in 1873.....$	129,743,432 19
Authorized for Canadian Pacific Railway (unexpended)..	30,000,000 00
Authorized for Intercolonial Railway (unexpended)....	4,552,148 57
Authorized for Canals (unexpended)................	8,933,333 33
	$173,228,914 09

If anything was necessary to prove the stand that I have taken, anything stronger than the statutes of Canada, and the terms of confederation, with the description of the works therein contained, namely, those large public works authorized by the Parliament of Canada, if I say anything further is necessary to prove the position I take, I think hon. gentlemen will find it in that amount of $173,228,914. Taking the census of 1871 as the basis, and making some allowance for the population of Manitoba and British Columbia which were not enumerated with the rest of the provinces, and putting the population of Canada at about 3,500,000, it will make $49.40 per head as the burden estimated in this way on the taxpayers of Canada by the debt then incurred and by the great public works that the Parliament of Canada was authorized to proceed with at that time when we went into the union. There was the basis—$49.40 per head, being the debt which was incurred or authorized under the sections I have referred to and Sir John Macdonald said : We will give Prince Edward Island a fair start. He gave the terms of union which fixed the debt at $50 per head and Prince Edward Island was admitted with an assumed debt of $4,701,050, or $50 per head on the population as ascertained by the census of 1871 being 94,021. This was a perfectly fair start. In the terms of union to which I have directed your attention the fullest and fairest admission was made that these burdens which Canada had undertaken and which were resting upon her by the debt which she had created and the laws which she had passed authorizing these large further expenditures were such that Prince Edward Island should not be called upon to bear them. And Prince Edward Island was allowed $4,701,050 as her assumed debt. Now we have always said and still say that that was perfectly right and fair and we never complained of it. I know there is some misconception in the minds of gentlemen outside of our own province in connection with how the Prince Edward Island Railway was built, and I will remove it before I go any further. Perhaps no hon. gentleman in this House entertains that view now, but in years gone by I have often met the opinion expressed that Prince Edward Island had a railway built its entire length by the Dominion of Canada. Now if any hon. gentleman has any such impression as that in his mind I assure him that it is entirely erroneous. Prince Edward Island had entered upon the construction of a system of railway before going into confederation just the same as Nova Scotia had entered upon a system of railway construction, or the same as New Brunswick and the same as the old province of Canada had expended very large sums of money in subsidies and loans to the Grand Trunk Railway and other companies, and Prince Edward Island completed her railway at her own cost. This sum of $4,701,050 was as I have just said the amount of $50 per head allowed to Prince Edward Island. The actual debt of Prince Edward Island on June 30th, 1873, not including any railway expenditure, was $754,559.56. The railway expenditure of Prince Edward Island was $3,153,672.39. The amount withdrawn by Provincial Government in 1888 from this sum was $200,000, and the balance of the assumed debt at confederation now remaining is $582,818.05, being in the whole, $4,701,050.

Actual debt of Prince Edward Island, June 30th, 1873, not including railway expenditure..................$	754,559 56
Railway expenditure...............	3,153,672 39
Amount withdrawn by Provincial Government in 1888..................	200,000 00
Balance remaining..................	582,818 05
	$4,701,050 00

So that out of that debt of fifty dollars per head that was allowed to Prince Edward Island when she entered confederation in order to put her in the same position as the other provinces, she was charged every dollar expended in the construction of her own railway. Now in regard to that matter I have some complaint to make. I find that in the report of the Minister of Railways for the past year a tabulated statement showing the capital expended on all the railways of Canada, and in that statement I find Dominion aid to Prince Edward Island Railway is charged at $3,750,565.38. That is under the head of Dominion Government aid, and Provincial Government aid is blank. I have a complaint to make of that statement. I do not know that this table is exactly fair to other provinces as well as Prince Edward Island, but I suppose the errors arose from inadvertence. They are, however, calculated to create a wrong impression, because the entire amount expended on the Prince Edward Island Railway in construction in the first instance and charged to capital since that time up to the present time is entered in that tabulated statement by the hon. Minister of Railways as being aid by the Government of Canada on the Prince Edward Island Railway. Now I think I have made myself clear to hon. gentlemen that there were only three large expenditures of public works provided for when Prince Edward Island entered into confederation, and that these three were the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Intercolonial Railway, and the widening and improving of the canals; and the amounts to be expended on these works was fixed by the terms of confederation, and Prince Edward Island was allowed for them. At that time the Government of Canada had not adopted the policy of subsidizing branch railways or constructing any other railways than those great public works, but I find that a system has been adopted as hon. gentlemen know very well by which very large bonuses and grants have been made to railways and canals in all the provinces of Canada, with the exception of Prince Edward Island. I have here a list of them which includes as well the Government aid to the Canadian Pacific Railway, Intercolonial Railway, and the canals since 1873, which I have made up carefully from the public accounts. Some of these items which this account contains have not yet been paid, they are voted, they are in the form of subsidies for a number of years.

I have taken the whole amount of the first item there as $41,609,901, which may be found in the report of the Hon. the Finance Minister, subsidies granted to railways under contracts, and that includes the twenty-five million subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and then there is another amount—$3,442,600—that has been voted to railways that are not up to the present time under contract, and then there are a large number of items, some of which are, as I said before, in the form of bonuses and grants over a period of years, and others of which have been paid. This statement that I have in my hand includes the whole expense of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the whole expense of the Intercolonial Railway since 1873 which latter amount is $29,079,364. I may say I do not include in this statement at all the expenditure by the Dominion on the Intercolonial Railway before Prince Edward Island went in. That matter was settled with us, as I have said, and was settled with us fairly. I do not include in it the amount spent by the old provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia on the Intercolonial Railway. That was also settled and covered at that time, but I take the expenditure upon the Intercolonial Railway since Prince Edward Island went into confederation, and I find that total is $29,079,364.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Is that over the 20 millions?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Is that the whole amount expended on the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, since 1873. There were only $4,552,148 of the 20 millions unexpended when we went into confederation. What was previously expended was included in the debt of Canada and that was settled with us and we have no claim on it and we have no claim on the $4,553,148, which is part of this $29,079,364, but which I will deduct hereafter. Then the total expense of the Canadian Pacific Railway is also included. All the Canadian Pacific Railway has cost the country since 1873 is put in there, and that is very nearly the whole of it. There was one million, or something like it spent in surveys before that, but the great expense has been since that. Thirty millions was settled with us and we have no complaint to make with regard to the expenditure of that thirty millions on the Canadian Pacific Railway. In the same way we will take the canals. The total expenditure on canals including the contracts on the Soulanges and the Sault Ste. Marie is $45,218,221. That does not include what was spent on the canals before 1873 and was settled with us before we entered into confederation, but it does include $8,933,000, which was authorized by Parliament as the expenditure on canals when we went into confederation, but I will show you how I take it off. The total amount was $174,595,526, which had been expended or authorized by Parliament to be expended on public works from 1873 up to the present time. As I have already explained, this has not all been paid. A very considerable part of it is in bonuses which will cover a number of years. I will explain my reason for including the total amount. I know very well that if the government of this country, sustained by this House and by the representatives of the people in the House of Commons, does undertake to build some great public work for Prince Edward Island, such as a tunnel under the Straits of Northumberland; we will not expect them to rush into it headlong. We know that there is a great deal to be considered. Great care must be shown in undertaking a work of that kind. I know it would be a considerable time before a great deal of money could be expended upon it, and it would take a long time in its construction. It would be many years before a sum of money which a tunnel would ultimately cost the Government of Canada would be expended, and putting that on the other side of the account, would fully justify me in including in this statement that I have made the entire amount voted to be paid to railways and canals and those great public works, and not simply the amounts already paid. I will just proceed one step further with this part of my subject. Deducting the $30,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway that was guaranteed when we went into confederation, the $8,933,333 for canals, $4,552,148 (the unexpended portion of the $20,000,000 for the Intercolonial Railway), deducting these amounts from this gross amount of what has been paid or what is now authorized, and it leaves a difference of $131,110,045.08.

Total amount expended or authorized for railways and canals since 1873:

For railways		$129,370,305 15
For canals (including Soulanges and Sault Ste. Marie)		45,218,221 93
Total for railways and canals		$174,595,526 08

Estimated expenditure on railways and canals in 1873:—

Canadian Pacific Railway	$30,000,000 00
Enlargement of canals	8,933,333 00
Estimated cost of I.C.R.Ry. $20,000,000, unexpended	4,552,148 57
		43,485,481 00
Being in excess of estimate		$131,110,045 08

There is a further deduction to be made from that. The island share of the $131,- 110,045.08 would have been $3,277,511. That is taking Prince Edward Island as a one-fortieth part of confederation. There has been expended for us in the same line as was done for the other provinces, a capital expenditure on the Prince Edward Island Railway of $596,633. That item in the Minister's report is put down rather differently because some payments that were made since 1873 and charged to our capital account are put down by the Minister of Railways and Canals as expenditure on the railway since 1873. I do not find any fault with it. It is right enough, because these payments were not matured and were not made till later years and have a perfect right to be put down in that way. Nevertheless,in the comparison I am making, they are somewhat misleading, as they have been charged against the province of Prince Edward Island. The actual amount charged to the Dominion for railways in Prince Edward Island is $596,693.09. The Government of Canada on representations which were made to them took this matter into consideration and agreed to give Prince Edward Island a subsidy of $20,000 a year in perpetuity which admitted the principle of the contention which I am making now to this honourable House, and the contention which the island has put forward for many years. I will farther on read the minute of council on which this $20,000 a year was voted, and I put this $20,000 down on the other side of the account, representing at 4 per cent one-half a million dollars. Then there is a subsidy voted but not yet paid to a branch railway of three miles near Summerside in Prince Edward Island which will amount to $9,600. Adding up these items it makes $1,106, 293.09, and deducting that amount from the island's share, $3,277, 511 leaves $2,171,318 as due to Prince Edward Island in regard to public works, as shown by the following statement.

Expended or authorized on railways and canals by the Dominion, in excess of amount estimated in 1873, $131,110,045.08:

Prince Edward Island being one-fortieth of Canada, should have received such proportion of this expenditure, viz.		$3,277,511 27
The proportion actually received or authorized for Prince Edward Island is as follows:—
Expended on capital account P. E. I. railway.	$596,693 09
Under 50-51 Vic., cap. 8, $20,000 per annum, capitalized at 4 per cent	$500,000 00
Subsidy Summerside and Richmond Bay Railway	9,600 00
Due P.E.I.		$2,171,318 18

I hope I have made myself plain. I have tried to do so. The ground I take, hon. gentlemen, is that there was an amount authorized to be expended on public works in the Dominion in addition to the actual debt of Canada at that time, and that Prince Edward Island was allowed for that amount, but the large public expenditures which were not then contemplated, which it was not then the policy of the Dominion to incur, were incurred after that, and that the island should be compensated for these amounts. I dare say, perhaps, I will be met in this discussion, as the representatives of Prince Edward Island have sometimes been met before by the statement, "Oh, though you have not great public works in Prince Edward Island, the Dominion Government has run for you a railway for 19 years and at a very heavy loss. I have found in my intercourse with representatives of the other provinces that a good many of them seem to think that such was a good and sufficient answer to all that we have said. If they will look at the matter carefully with me for a very few minutes they will see that it is no answer at all. Let us make a comparison. Take the Intercolonial railway, and I hope I am understood in the remarks I am making as not finding any fault with the policy which has built the Intercolonial railway, which has built the Canadian Pacific railway, and enlarged the great canals of Canada. I have never raised my voice in the way of fault-finding with this, because I believe it to be in the interest of Canada; but the ground I take is the ground I have always taken, that Prince Edward Island should be treated in precisely the same manner as the other provinces are treated. Look at the Intercolonial Railway. There has been expended on the construction of the road since 1873, $29,079,364, and I have calculated interest on this amount at 4 per cent compounded and find that that would make $19,689,000 more. I find that the working expenses of the Intercolonial railway have been since 1873 $48,908,244, or a total expenditure of $97,677,000. Deducting from this the earnings of the road, $42,389,541, we find a loss to Canada since 1873 of over $55,000,000. Or to put it exactly:

Cost of construction......	$29,079,364 34
Interest on above at 4 p.c.	19,689,695 81
Working expenses........	48,908,244 09
	$97,677,304 24
Receipts.................	42,389,541 86
Loss to Canada.......	$55,287,762 38

I am not now including any expenditure prior to 1873—nothing that was expended before Prince Edward Island entered into the union. I am dealing with the question since the 30th June, 1873, and I there find that by computing the interest at 4 per cent on the cost of the construction, and adding the difference between the working expenses and receipts the country has lost $55,287,762: 38. Then take the canals. The capital expenditure since 1873 on the canals has been $37,988,041. That does not include the unexpended votes on the Sault Ste. Marie Canal and the other canals now in course of construction and enlargement, nor does it include the expenditure on canals before Prince Edward Island entered the confederation.

LOSS ON CANALS SINCE 1873.

Capital expenditure since 1873.	$37,988,041 11

Receipts...........	7,189,929 49
Loss to the Dominion.......	$66,488,620 59

So that the loss on the canals has been $66,489,620 since 1873. Now take the Canadian Pacific Railway and I find that the cost of construction of that road since 1873 has been $61,376,600. The interest at 4 per cent compounded was $38,838,465 taking in all $100,215,055.

Putting these three public works together and dealing with them since 1873 the loss to Canada has been what I have stated. Of course it is not all loss; we know that every dollar has been well expended as far as the advantages to the country are concerned in building it up and unifying it and giving it a standing, I believe we have a return for the whole of it, but I am looking at the debit side and I find that on the Canadian Pacific Railway the country has lost over a hundred millions dollars; on the Intercolonial Railway over $55,000,000 and on the canals $66,488,620.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—How do you arrive at $100,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—The cost of construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway since 1873 has been $61,376,600. Interest at 4 per cent compounded added to that makes $100,215,055.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I think interest ought to be left off in order to make a clear statement. If you compute compound interest we will never get a fair statement.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—The general statement that I submitted to the House at the beginning of my remarks did not include interest. I am now refuting the argument that I meet so often, and hon. gentlemen will excuse me for taking this very formal means of meeting and rebutting the statement that the Prince Edward Island Railway is a heavy drain on Canada. I have gone over the other public works, and I am going to apply the same principle to the Prince Edward Island Railway. I am not doing it for the purpose of magnifying the cost of these works. In the general statement which I first submitted to the House and which answers the purpose I then intended, I have not included one cent for interest at all, but in the statement that I am now making I am dealing with the Prince Edward Island Railway and the other great public works in the same manner, to show that the Prince Edward Island Railway is not unduly burdensome to the tax bearers of Canada. I will now take the Prince Edward Island Railway, and before doing so I will say that there has been $19,691,967 voted or paid for subsidy to other roads besides those I have named, and that an approximation of the amount of interest would be about $12,000,000. The other calculations regarding the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Intercolonial Railway, and the canals, which I have submitted, have been carefully worked out, and that is the result. Coming to the Prince Edward Island Railway, the Dominion of Canada has contributed $596,892 to its cost. Interest on the above at 4 per cent, compounded, is $480,132, and the working expenses of the road have been $4,178,785.52. Being a total on the debit side of $5,255,811.29. The receipts on the other side have been $2,662,-471.91, so that the loss to Canada on the Prince Edward Island Railway has been $2,593,339.48.

It will thus be seen that the pro rata burden on the people of Prince Edward Island for the construction and maintenance of the great public works from which they derive no benefit is nearly three times as great as the burden which the Dominion taxpayer on the mainland is called on to bear for the Prince Edward Island Railway. In these latter calculations I include the entire cost to Canada since 1873.

My object in making up this calculation was to show that there is no ground whatever for the statement that is so often made that Prince Edward Island should abandon her pretensions to the expenditure on public works for her benefit and to consideration from the Dominion of Canada on the ground that there is a small deficit or loss in the working of the Prince Edward Island Railway. That road from the fact that the original cost was not charged to the Dominion of Canada is not by any means so large a loser relatively to the population of the island as the other public works throughout the Dominion. I would say further in regard to this matter that there is another consideration which hon. gentlemen should bear in mind when they are considering the matter of the Prince Edward Island Railway not fully meeting its working expenses, and it is this—I would be sorry to say, indeed I do not believe that any such arrangement is intentional or with a view to discriminating against the Prince Edward Island road, but I have no hesitation in saying that I know from my own business that the tariffs on the Government railways are so arranged as to divert the natural business that belongs to the Prince Edward Island Railway to the Intercolonial Railway. I make this statement that under the tariff at present in existence $15 more per carload is charged for material shipped from the west for Charlottetown if it goes over the Intercolonial Railway to Pointe du Chêne and over the Prince Edward Island Railway to Charlottetown than if it goes to Charlottetown via Pictou some 80 miles further on Government roads. That statement will show that owing to the tariffs at present in existence the traffic which legitimately belongs to the Prince Edward Island Railroad is sent over the Intercolonial Railroad to Pictou and the Prince Edward Island Railroad does not get the advantage of it in its earnings. This may be right from a railway point of view—I am not taking that ground but deal with the fact as it exists, and I have not the slightest doubt that just such arrangements have a great deal to do with the deficit on the Prince Edward Island Railway. I take another ground in dealing with the Prince Edward Island Railway. The expenditure is nearly all charged to working expenses. During the last six years there has been only one entry in the Minister of Railways report for capital account on the Prince Edward Island Railway—an item of $8,300. For six years there has been but that one item, while we find on the Intercolonial Railway in the same period there was an expenditure of $2,339,-693, and it seems to me that the Prince Edward Island Railway must have been an extremely well built road when it calls for little or no capital expenditure of any kind for six years, and it seems strange that there should be this great difference as shown by the report of the Minister of Railways. Before leaving this branch of my subject I want to make another statement. I had the honour in the winter of 1886 of visiting London, in conjunction with the present chief justice of the province of Prince Edward Island, the Hon. Mr. Sullivan, and presenting on that occasion some of the claims of Prince Edward Island. We had the honour of meeting the High Commissioner of Canada, Sir Charles Tupper, before Earl Granville. We had several discussions on this subject, and in one of those discussions I remember distinctly in answer to a question of mine, Sir Charles Tupper made this statement, in fact I took the words down at the time.

I have no hesitation in saying, from my knowledge of the province of Prince Edward Island extending over all my life, and from my experience as Minister of Railways in Canada, that if the Prince Edward Island Railway was connected with the Intercolonial Railway, that the Prince Edward Island Railway would be a paying road.

I quote Sir Charles Tupper's opinion because sometimes our province is apparently belittled by statements made about the Prince Edward Island Railway not meeting its working expenses. The island railway owing to its isolation, not being connected with the railway system of the Dominion, has not a chance to get a through traffic as it would if that opportunity were given to it, while on the other hand the accounts are made up so as to show for six years past that only $8,000 has been charged to the capital account, and the arrangement of tariffs is such as to draw traffic to the Intercolonial Railway, at the expense of the Prince Edward Island road. In 1886 I was sent by my colleagues in conjunction with the present Chief Justice, the Hon. Mr. Sullivan, to confer with the government of Canada with regard to the matters to which I have now been referring. We presented a memorandum on the 27th of September, 1886, which covers the ground that I have been presenting to the Senate. I will read it because the matter is concisely put and perhaps hon. gentlemen will get the information on this point that I desire to supply better from this than from anything I have said :

The undersigned having been deputed by the Government of Prince Edward Island to confer with the Federal Ministry relative to the financial arrangement existing between that province and the Dominion, and referring to their interview of to-day with the Prime Minister of Canada on the subject, desire to bring under the consideration of the Privy Council, the justice and propriety of augmenting the subsidy payable by Canada to Prince Edward Island. These are the principal grounds upon which this application is based :—

1. The expenditure by the Dominion upon great public works, in the advantage of which Prince Edward Island, owing to its situation, cannot participate, has been greatly in excess of what at the time the island joined the confederation, it was estimated such outlay would reach.

2. The policy adopted by the Canadian Parliament, subsidizing lines of railway, of a local as well as of a general character, has been extended to every province of the confederation except Prince Edward Island. The construction of eleven miles of railway at Cape Traverse in the island, cannot be regarded as embraced in this policy, such work having been done in pursuance of that part of the terms of union which provides for the maintenance of continuous steam service between the island and the mainland.

3. The island has been debited with the entire cost of the construction of its railway under contract when the union took place in 1873. The undersigned therefore submit that the amount of the expenditure for constructing the Prince Edward Island Railway should be transferred to the credit of that province in its account with the Dominion.

An hon. MEMBER—What about the Cape Traverse Railway?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—In the calculation I have submitted to this House I charge every dollar of the expenditure on the Traverse extension, and it is included in that $596,000 to which I have referred and charged to Prince Edward Island for railway construction since confederation. In that memorandum reference is made to the interviews we had with Sir John Macdonald, then Premier of Canada. We had several interviews on that occasion and subsequently when we returned to Ottawa to discuss the question and the result of our discussion on the question was the adoption by the Government of Canada of an order in council dated 22nd March, 1887, which I will read to this House :

1st. From the insular position of the province, they (the Governor in Council) are of opinion that the construction of the Pacific Railway and of the Intercolonial Railway has not effected to the same extent that it has the other provinces, and the island has not had the benefit of the advantages which accrue to the other provinces from these lines, and on this ground it is entitled to some consideration.

2nd. The sub-committee think also that consideration should be shown on account of expenditure for the construction of the above-named railway having been greater than was anticipated at the time these works were taken into consideration and the terms upon which Prince Edward Island entered the union, having been in a great measure based upon the estimates thus formed for the completion of these roads.

3rd. The subsidies granted to the other provinces up to the present time, in carrying out the railway policy of the Government in the way of assistance to local railways, have not as yet been made applicable in any way to Prince Edward Island, and that province has not received any benefit from the carrying out of this policy, whereas on the contrary the other provinces forming the union, have in this manner largely benefited.

Hon. members will bear in mind that I am now reading the order of council of the Government of Canada. This is from the Canadian point of view—from the point of view of Sir John Macdonald, the hon. leader of this House, and other gentlemen associated with him in the Government of the country. This was the order in council adopted by the Government of Canada. I may in passing that the representatives people of Prince Edward Island did not agree at that time—they were not asked to agree to accept that $20,000 per year, as a complete and final settlement of the matter which they were pressing on the Government and we knew the Government had great difficulties to contend with, that there would be jealous eyes and petty critical tongues directed against them from other parts of the Dominion, by parties who did not fully understand the matter and we fully appreciated the spirit of fairness which induced Sir John Macdonald to put that minute on record as an instalment of justice to Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Have you the condition on which the $20,000 a year was given.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I have just read it in the Order of Council. Immediately afterwards there was an Act passed. The Act does not contain the grounds on which it was granted, but simply enacts that $20,000 per annum should be given. I have read the order of council on which the Act was based. I was very much pleased, as we all were in Prince Edward Island, when this matter came before Parliament, that the greatest spirit of fairness and justice seemed to pervade hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. In presenting the bill to the House Sir Charles Tupper, who was Finance Minister at the time, made a short speech which I will take the opportunity of reading, because it throws great light on the attitude of the Government at that day towards Prince Edward Island, and it may also be taken as showing the views of Sir Charles Tupper, who, as we all know, is a statesman taking the broadest views on questions affecting all parts of the Dominion. I will quote from the speech of Sir Charles Tupper which appeared in the "Hansard of 1887," Vol. 2, p. 814:

The attention of the Government was called to the fact that, in the arrangements for the admission of Prince Edward Island in the union, they were not in a position to derive the same amount of advantage from the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, as the other portions of the Dominion, which were on the mainland, and which were in immediate railway communication with those roads. The question was raised that, as the expenditures on both these railways was so greatly in excess of what was estimated at the time the island was brought into the union, they ought to receive some corresponding consideration on that account. Then there was the further question that Parliament had adopted the policy of subsidizing lines of railway in the other provinces—that in Ontario and Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick there had been considerable expenditures in connection with the construction of railways, and the island had not received any corresponding advantage. No subsidies had been granted for the construction of railways in Prince Edward Island, and on those two grounds it was claimed that there should be additional consideration given to the island. That matter having been carefully considered, the Government felt warranted in undertaking to propose to Parliament a grant of $20,000 a year to meet the claims founded upon these two causes. That is set forth in the Order in Council, and the resolution is for the purpose of carrying it into effect.

Sir Richard Cartwright spoke also on the subject, and it was not certainly to be expected that Sir Richard would be warm and genial in supporting a Government measure of that sort. It was not to be expected that he would rise in his place and commend the Government for what they had done, but Sir Richard appeared to be in an unusually good humour on that occasion and he is on record as saying:

I have no intention of opposing the grant to Prince Edward Island on the principles I lay down. Very likely the demand made by that province is quite justifiable and that it may be that this vote is quite justifiable.

Mr. Davies, as might be expected being a representative of the island, said:

I need not say that I am thoroughly in sympathy with the spirit of the hon. gentleman's resolution.

And the vote passed unanimously in the House of Commons, with this difference, however, the representatives of the island claimed that the amount was not large enough, and I may add that my friend Mr. Davies and some other gentlemen on his side in politics censured myself and my friends very strongly indeed because we accepted $20,000 a year at that time. Mr. Davies took that view of it in the House when the discussion took place. I must say this for Mr. Davies, that although he very generally complained of the treatment that the island was receiving from the Dominion, yet up to that time I never knew him, or heard him put on record a claim for the province of Prince Edward Island, on the ground on which it was then put forward, and which was acceded to by the Government, and while he was silent up to that time, yet as soon as he found what we were doing, and how far we had succeeded, he took the other side and denounced us for not having done more, and the Government for not having done more. The ground we took was that we had the principle acknowledged, and had received a very substantial amount for the province. We claimed, and it was generally admitted that we had done good substantial service for the province, and Mr. Davies's criticism was only because he had not the honour of inaugurating the claim or carrying it so far towards a successful termination.

While I am dealing with this branch of the subject hon. gentlemen will excuse me if I say that while there was such perfect unanimity and harmony in the House of Commons, when this amount was being voted there, I have reason to know in other places where some hon. gentlemen found it to suit their purpose to act differently the same harmony and unanimity and cordiality in regard to this matter was not expressed, and I am now going to read to the House an extract from a speech made by Sir Richard Cartwright at Ingersoll some seven or eight months after he made the speech which I have just read to the House a few moments ago, in which he said it was all right and quite justifiable and that he would support it, as he did. He addressed his constituents at Ingersoll not in the presence of the representatives of Prince Edward Island, not in the presence of the "Hansard" reporters who would put his speech on record, but in the presence of Ontario people where the facts were not understood by the very fair-minded people of that province. His speech is reported in the "Globe," 14th October, 1887:

Further the Government had opened the door wide to all sorts of demands on the part of the provinces by granting half a million dollars to the province of Prince Edward Island in utter defiance of the terms of the compact entered into between the several provinces at the time of confederation. If the people of Canada, or a majority of them, choose to condone these deliberate violations of all sound constitutional principles and of the formal agreement entered into by the provinces, it will be idle to expect that confederation would prove a success or could even be worked on any terms, except those of gross and continuous bribery.

I refer to this because it is just such speeches as this—I might almost call them incendiary speeches—made unfairly for the purpose of attacking the Government without the full facts before the people—which do harm and prevent the people of Canada from understanding one another, not only on this question but other questions which vitally affect their best interests. Now, in the discussion of this and other questions similar to this we have been met, in years gone by, with a statement "Oh, but Prince Edward Island is a heavy drain on the Dominion of Canada." Take up the Trade Returns they say and it will be found that Prince Edward Island only contributed a very small share of the customs and excise revenue of the country as compared with the other provinces, and it has been our misfortune particularly to have this argument, and this very unfair argument, pressed against us on a great many occasions. As far back as the year 1880 in the House of Commons of Canada the Hon. Mr. Blake made a speech which was not only unfair to Prince Edward Island but was also unfair to many other provinces. I think hon. gentlemen in this House need not be told to-day that the Trade and Navigation Returns afford no indication in the world how the provinces are contributing to the customs revenue. All hon. gentlemen know very well that day by day and year by year the great wholesale trade of Canada is becoming centralized in some of our larger cities and larger ports. We know that the goods that are consumed in Prince Edward Island to a very large extent, and also the goods that are consumed in the North-west Territories, are entered in the ports of other provinces and the customs duties are paid and appear in the custom-house returns to the credit of the other provinces of Canada. Take the Trade and Navigation Returns for the last year and you will find in the whole North-west Territories outside of Manitoba, that there has been only something like $80,000 worth of goods entered there, and that is simply in two places—Fort McLeod and Lethbridge. I suppose that is because there is connection with a railway in the United States at those points, and it was convenient to receive the goods there, but there is not a single entry in all the other parts of the Territories, who probably spend more money per head than the older provinces. Goods are imported at Montreal or some other large city and sent from there to the other provinces. In the old days before confederation we built in Prince Edward Island a great many wooden vessels, which kept up a direct trade between our ports and the old country, and we had a direct importing business at that time. Since that time and the adoption of the present tariff, the tendency has been to buy a great deal more within the province of Canada, both of goods manufactured in Canada and of goods imported by the large wholesale houses in the great centres of trade, and in consequence of this, hon. gentlemen, I think need not be told to-day that the Trade and Navigation Returns afford no indication whatever of the contributions of each province to the federal treasury; but in 1880 Mr. Blake made a speech in which he calculated the contributions of the provinces to the Dominion Treasury by these returns. I will not take up the time of the House by reading it. I am told in a speech which has been published, which he made in one of the western provinces before he left the political arena, he corrected and took back what he said in 1880 and admitted, as every intelligent gentleman in the country admits to-day, that the Trade and Navigation Returns afford no indication whatever of what any particular province has been contributing to the revenue of the country. In the year 1886, when Chief Justice Sullivan and myself were in England, we had a discussion over this very subject with Sir Charles Tupper and Lord Granville, and on that occasion we went into a very elaborate statement of what the contributions of Prince Edward Island were to the federal treasury. I think as the several reasons which are perhaps almost local to Prince Edward Island, are contained in this document that I will crave the indulgence of the House while I read this extract:

The difficulty of arriving at an absolutely correct calculation of the amount of dutiable goods which the people of Prince Edward Island consume cannot fail to be appreciated, yet the undersigned submit that there are several methods by which it may fairly be estimated. It must be premised that the people of the island are very large consumers of dutiable goods for the reason that, being chiefly engaged in agriculture and fishing, their manufactures are very small as compared with the rest of Canada, valuing, according to the last census returns, only $31.33 per head to $72.63 per head of the other provinces.

In proof of the assertion that the people of the island are principally engaged in agriculture and fishing, the undersigned would again advert to the census returns of 1881, which show that (the North-west Territories not being included):

One-half the area of Prince Edward Island is cultivated.

Only one-twenty-fifth of the other provinces is cultivated.

Prince Edward Island has a population of 51 to the square mille.

The other provinces only 4·72.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the hon. gentleman include Manitoba and British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—Yes, only excepting the North-west Territories. Of course British Columbia pulls down the average of the other provinces very materially, but not to an extent to make the difference so great. Prince Edward Island is more thickly populated than the other provinces.

Prince Edward Island owns 55 live stock for every 100 acres of improved land—the other provinces only 38.

In field products Prince Edward Island raises to the acre of improved land 108¾ bushels—the other provinces 61¼ bushels.

From the fisheries Prince Edward Island produces $17.08 per head value—the other provinces $3.55.

The people of the island are generally in comfortable circumstances, in proof of which may be adduced the amount of deposits per head in the savings banks, which average $16.59 for the island against $7.66 for the rest of the Dominion.

These figures clearly prove that the people of Prince Edward Island, from the fact of their not being extensive manufacturers, are under the necessity of using imported goods to a large extent, while the fertility of their soil, the value of their fisheries, and their general independence, demonstrate their ability to purchase. This being understood, the undersigned submits the following calculations, designed to show that the import of dutiable goods into the island are very much larger than suggested by the committee of council, and consequently the contributions to the revenue proportionately greater.

We take three methods of ascertaining what the contribution of Prince Edward Island was to the revenue of Canada.

METHOD 1.

The average revenue of the Dominion, from customs and excise, for the three years ended 30th

June, 1884, was $27,603,479. The population of Prince Edward Island to that of the whole Dominion is in the proportion of 1 to 39·7. Upon this ratio, the island's share of the customs and excise revenue would amount to $595,301.

METHOD 2.

In 1882, the year before its admission into the union, Prince Edward Island imported direct from the countries beyond Canada, goods valued at $1,372,581.

The duty on which amounted to $184,227.

And from Canada, goods the growth and manufacture of other countries, valued approximately at $429,354.

The duty on which amounted to $89,168.

This was from other countries outside of what is now embraced in the Dominion of Canada and the duties collected were upon a revenue of 12½ per cent.

In 1861 the imports of the island amounted to $1,021,669; in 1872 they had increased to $2,439,064, or at the rate of 138·9 per cent. At the same rate its imports from countries beyond the Dominion should have increased from $1,801,935 in 1872 to $4,304,824 in 1884, which at the present average tariff (free and dutiable combined) of 18·64 per cent, would give a customs revenue of $802,419.

METHOD 3.

It is a well-established principle that the imports and exports of a country bear a reasonable relation to each other. The imports of the island for the ten years preceding confederation aggregated in value £3,543,147 sterling. The exports in the same period £2,559,091 sterling, showing that the imports exceeded the exports by about £100,000 sterling, or $500,000 annually. The imports of the Dominion for the last seventeen years aggregated in value $1,732,983,486; the exports in the same period, $1,390,946,803, showing that the imports exceeded the exports by about $20,000,000 annually or in the same proportion, according to the population, as the imports of Prince Edward Island exceeded the exports in the years already quoted.

The exports of the island have steadily increased during the last 25 years. In 1861 it exported to all countries goods valued at $793,810, which had increased in 1872 to $1,497,058, or at the rate of 88¾ per cent.

In 1872 the island exported to countries beyond the Dominion goods valued at £722,333, which had increared in 1884 to $1,310,039, or at the rate of 81⅛ per cent. Apply this rate increased to the Island's imports from countries beyond the Dominion in 1872, and we have as a result for 1884, imports valued at $3,267,509.

But the figures, contained in the Dominion Trade and Navigation Returns, do not represent the total exports of the island to countries beyond the Dominion, inasmuch as a considerable proportion, being shipped through Nova Scotia and New Brunswick territory, is credited to the exports of those provinces. The annual export of horses from the island to the United States is not less than 1,500, valued at $150,000. The Dominion returns for 1883-84 credit the island with only 256, valued at $27,486. This is but one instance of many. A considerable part of the large trade which the island does in eggs with the United Stares, is credited to New Brunswick, while fish and potatoes, which are largely exported to Newfoundland, St. Pierre, and the West Indies, are much of them credited to Nova Scotia, being shipped by way of Halifax. In view of these facts, it would be within the mark to estimate, as indeed the committee of council admit, that the island's foreign export trade has doubled since 1872. Apply the same rate of interest to its imports from countries beyond the Dominion, as they stood in 1872, and we have as a result, for 1884, imports valued at $,603,371, yielding under an $18\frac{84}{100}$ per cent tariff, an annual revenue of $671,668.

The exports of Prince Edward Island, since confederation, have increased in a much larger ratio than have those of the Dominion, as the following figures will show.

The total exports of the Dominion for 1871-72 were $82,939,683, for 1883-84, exclusive of the island, $90,066,437, or an increase of only $9\frac{1}{12}$ per cent as against 100 per cent, by which the island's exports have increased in the same time.

To recapitulate the results of the various methods:

Method 1....................	$695,301
Method 2....................	802,419
Method 3....................	671,668

Average annual contribution by the island from customs and excise, $713,129, to which add interest on the sum claimed as island's share of fishery award (less amount expended for fishing bounties, $8,569) $41,430. This sum of $764,559, the undersigned submit, should be accepted as closely approximating the annual contributions of Prince Edward Island to the Dominion exchequer, and is much more likely to be within than in excss of the amount.

Now, hon. gentlemen, these figures were prepared with the very greatest possible care. I prepared them myself and can vouch for their strict accuracy. Whatever deduction may be drawn from them, the figures in themselves are right, and they go to prove that Prince Edward Island contributed to the federal treasury in each of these years, as I know it does in every year, an amount equal, if not more, than what it receives in the way of ordinary public expenditure, to say nothing at all about the great public works to which we have been referring.

There is a second branch of this subject which has been presented to this honourable House by hon. gentlemen representing our province in years gone by. I refer to the terms of union which provide for the efficient steam communication winter and summer between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada, and I want to say a few words upon the present aspect of that question, and in doing so it will be necessary for me to be somewhat historical and trace the history of the subject. It is to us a matter of very great and vital importance, and the arguments I have been presenting to the House and the facts which I have been producing so far are laying, as I might say, the groundwork for what I am going to say with regard to communication between the island and the mainland and also with regard to the public works in the province of Prince Edward Island. The terms of union say the Dominion Government shall:

> Establish and maintain efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers between the Island and the Dominion winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion.

I may say, as hon. gentlemen know very well, that one of the strongest arguments that were urged in Prince Edward Island against that province going into confederation, was that we were isolated for four or five or six months of the year, practically isolated as far as trade and commerce were concerned and almost isolated as far as social intercourse was concerned, and that under these circumstances it was impossible for the people of Prince Edward Island to compete on even terms with the people of the Dominion of Canada in manufactures and other things, that we would always be handicapped, and that on that account it was not in our interest ever to become a part of confederation. But at the time of the first offer of confederation, just as in regard to the matter of public works, there was not that knowledge possessed by Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues of the wants and the particular circumstances of Prince Edward Island which they did arrive at, at a later stage. They did not understand the question as well as they did later, and there was no provision in the Quebec resolutions for efficient steam communication between the island and the mainland in the winter season; in the original terms of confederation there was no offer of this kind, and no provision that Prince Edward Island should be indemnified for the great public works being carried on in other parts of Canada; but both these points were embraced and contained in the terms of confederation in 1873. Now in the early part of confederation Canada did not appear to understand the difficulties. The old steamer called the "Albert" was placed on that route; she was unfit for it—fit only for carrying wood and totally unfit for passenger service. She was on this service for years to the extreme disgust of the people of the province. But later on in 1875 or 1876, the Mackenzie Government then in power made an honest contribution to the solution of this question by putting the steamer "Northern Light" on, which was an experiment, an honest experiment, but she did not prove at all suitable for that purpose. She was not the construction or design of a very great genius, and the result was that although she did more than many people believed to be possible under some circumstances, she failed completely to furnish that communication which the people of the province had a right to expect. Years passed on, and a change of government took place and still the "Northern Light" ran for some time on that service and it was not till the year 1886 that the Provincial Government made very strong representations, both in Ottawa and London on the subject, and the Dominion Government took the matter up in earnest and built the steamer "Stanley" which has since been carrying on this communication. I feel it is only right and proper that I should say in this place that the steamer "Stanley" is a wonderful boat. She is well constructed and designed, and she has accomplished a good deal and great credit is due to the Government who put that steamer "Stanley" on the route as a fair and valuable contribution to the solution of this great question. And I will say in this place that the captain of that boat is as good a man as ever stood on a deck anywhere—Captain Finlayson. He is a man in whom the people there have the most unbounded confidence, and he has shown during his long service that he is possessed of prudence, coolness, care and an ability to conduct that service which very few men are possessed of, and I think I would be doing wrong if I allowed this occasion to pass without saying these words in favour of Capt. Finlayson of the steamer "Stanley" and I hope the hon. leader of the House will bear what I am saying in mind, which will be corroborated by the people of Prince Edward Island and the thousands of people who have availed themselves of that means of communication with Prince Edward Island and who have learned the value of Capt. Finlayson's services, and that ere long some recognition of his services will be given in the way of an increase of his very small salary, in consideration of his long and valuable services.

But notwithstanding the capacity of that steamer "Stanley" and the fact that she was well-manned and that she has done all that could reasonably be expected of her, it is not a satisfactory service. There are circumstances attending that service which will come up almost regularly, difficulties crop up and the communication is interrupted in so many ways and in so many I might say annoying ways that the people of Prince Edward Island are very far from being satisfied with the service. I will read a short extract from the report of the deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries for 1892, pages 50 and 51, speaking of the service of the "Stanley" which shows how far the service is from being continuous and efficient:

The continuity of the "Stanley" trips was broken at various periods during the season by heavy drift ice in the Straits of Northumberland. On the 5th of January, 1891, the vessel left Georgetown, but did not arrive at Pictou till the 7th. On the 8th she left Pictou, but did not arrive at Georgetown till the 10th. She left Pictou on the 16th February, but did not arrive at Georgetown till the 28th, being 12 days fast in the ice, which was the heaviest known for years. Arriving at Georgetown on the 28th February the steamer was laid up till the 13th of March, for the purpose of cleaning her boilers. From the 30th of March to the 3rd of April, the "Stanley" was prevented by heavy ice from reaching Pictou. On the return trip heavy ice again interfered, and the steamer was two days reaching Georgetown. From the 6th to the 8th of April she was at port in Georgetown, unable to proceed to Pictou owing to heavy drift ice. The total number of days lost during the season from heavy packed ice and gales was 29; while 14 days were occupied in cleaning the boilers at a season when it is almost impossible to keep up continuous communication unless the winter be very mild.

In the year 1891 the Government of the province of Prince Edward Island brought this matter to the attention of the Government of Canada in another form, by the Hon. Judge McLeod and myself, and a memorial was presented in that year setting forth the claims of the province to some extent as I have tried to present them this afternoon, and the result of that was that an Order in Council was passed on January 21st, 1891, which I will take the opportunity of reading to this House. I might say that during this time the matter had been carried to England and that a despatch from Earl Granville had been received, an extract from which I will read before I proceed any further. Lord Granville after having received the deputation sent from the provinces in the year 1886, and after having received communications from the High Commissioner on the subject and having had many interviews and conferences with the the delegates and Sir Charles Tupper sent a despatch to the Marquis of Lansdowne on the 30th March, 1886, winding up with the words:

The establishment of constant and speedy communication by rail would be a great advantage both to the province and to the Dominion, and I should suppose that the development of the traffic on the island railroads and of the capabilities of the province generally, would produce a large direct and indirect return on the expenditure.

It would reflect great credit on the Dominion Government if after connecting British Columbia with the eastern provinces by the Canadian Pacific Railway it should now be able to complete its system of railway communication by an extension to Prince Edward Island,

And it was after this despatch from Earl Granville was received that the "Stanley" was put on, and after the long discussions which had taken place upon the subject that the Government of Sir John Macdonald, in the year 1891, passed an Order in Council from which I will read an extract. By this time the tunnel question was brought to the attention of the Government, and it was in relation to the tunnel question and such arguments as I have advanced that this order was passed:

The sub-committee without going at this time into the question as to whether the Dominion has or has not fully carried out its obligations towards Prince Edward Island in regard to maintaining continuous communication between it and the mainland * * * * * recommend that the memorialists be informed that the Government will assume the cost of procuring the required data and obtaining an estimate of cost of construction from Sir Douglas Fox, the whole not to exceed $1,650 and that a sum be placed in the supplementary estimates for the current year to cover that amount and that when that report is received the memorialists should be invited to revisit Ottawa and confer with the Government further on the subject.

As a result of this Order in Council the matter was referred to Sir Douglas Fox, an eminent engineer in England, and a very careful examination was made by an engineer in his employment, also aided by a local geologist, Mr. Baine, a man of great information in regard to the geology of the Maritime Provinces. The result of this inquiry will be found in the report of Sir Douglas Fox. That report is based as regards the location of the tunnel, and as regards the strata and the possibility of the tunnel penetrating ground under the Straits of Northumberland, to a very great extent on Mr. Baine's reports, and these reports have the endorsation of Sir William Dawson, than whom we have not a greater authority in Canada on subjects of this kind. In this report, which I have said was the result of a very careful examination of the straits by an engineer in the employment of Sir Douglas Fox, by a very careful examination by Mr. Baine, corroborated and sustained in his conclusion by Sir William Dawson we have estimates made of the cost of this tunnel, and the result of these inquiries as far as they go is that there is under the Straits of Northumberland a kind of material which is admirably adapted for the purpose of tunnelling and the tunnel need not go so far down as to touch the great carboniferous deposit at the bottom of the red sandstone formation at all which was understood to be dangerous if it should require to go so far down. This tunnel can penetrate the Straits of Northumberland passing through beds of shale and nothing is understood to be better by scientific men for purposes of tunnelling than these beds of shale because they are impervious to water and it is easy to bore through them and with the exception of small leads of red sandstone through these beds there is nothing but shale from side to side. I will here quote Sir William Dawson's words:

I beg to say that I have read and examined the report and section prepared by Mr. Baine with reference to the proposed tunnel from Carleton Head to Cape Tourimain which you were kind enough to show me, and that, from my knowledge of the geological structure of the locality, I have no hesitation in stating that I believe the report and section fairly represent the character of the beds to be penetrated by the proposed tunnel and that these will not present any serious difficulty, the ground being in fact as favourable as could be desired for such a work.

The opinion of Mr. Baine corroborated by Sir William Dawson is that there will be no difficulty of a serious nature in constructing a tunnel under the straits, and Sir Douglas Fox is of the same opinion. Sir Douglas Fox is the engineer who achieved the Mersey tunnel in England, and he received the honour of knighthood on account of the great service he had rendered in building that Mersey tunnel. Sir Douglas Fox has also had very great experience in other works of a similar nature, and the result of his examination is that he estimates (allowing for contingencies) that a tunnel of a limited gauge of 11 feet—suitable, however, for the purpose of admitting cars of a 3 feet 6 inch gauge railway such as the Prince Edward Island Railway is, but with rolling stock of a somewhat different form from that now in use can be constructed at a cost of $5,376,000. This tunnel would not of course put the island railway in communication with the railways of the Dominion without transferring freight, as the island railway has a 3 feet 6 gauge and the capacity of this tunnel would be such as to allow only cars of that gauge to pass through it. There would of course have to be a transfer at Cape Tormentine which would be a considerable disadvantage. I think a tunnel of that gauge would fairly meet the requirements of Prince Edward Island. Sir Douglas Fox estimated that a 16 foot tunnel which would be sufficient to accommodate the rolling stock of the continental gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches would cost $8,895,000, and he made a further estimate that a tunnel of 18 foot diameter would cost $11,262,500. I will admit fairly and candidly that all of these amounts are considerable ones. Even the smallest is a very considerable one and it cannot be expected that the Government would enter upon this work without having taken very great care and precautions to ascertain what they were doing, the full cost of the work and the prospect of its ultimate success. But I think the information that has been obtained on this question up to the present time is of such a nature as would warrant the Government in going further and carrying out some of the other suggestions of Sir Douglas Fox. One suggestion has indeed already been acted upon. Mr. Baine and Sir Douglas in their reports say that borings should be had in order to test the accuracy of the calculations as to the nature of the strata and the absence of danger from percolation of water from these seams of red sandstone that are found to run through the shale beds of the Straits of Northumberland. The Government very fairly have undertaken these borings. They have not been successful in completing them as we had hoped they would by this time but we have the answer of the leader of the House that the borings will be completed and the additional sum of money will be voted this session that will carry out those borings and when that is accomplished it will be fairly known whether Mr. Baine's opinion as regards the strata will be fully sustained or not. When that is ascertained as will be observed by perusal of Sir Douglas Fox's report he recommends another step—the sinking of a ventilating shaft for this tunnel. He proposes to place it on the island side near Carleton Head and his proposition was that after the borings were effected a shaft should be sunk at that place which would secure a face for the tunnel and test some scientific questions necessary to be solved in the construction of this work. The Government have fairly carried out their promise with regard to the borings. They will have the result of these borings at their disposal this present summer and the people of Prince Edward Island will then expect if these results are found to be entirely satisfactory and corroborative of Sir Wm. Dawson's, Mr. Baine's and Sir Douglas Fox's opinions that it will be in order to take one step further and sink this trial shaft at Cape Carleton as suggested in Sir Douglas Fox's report. Before taking my leave of the subject, perhaps hon. gentlemen will permit me to say that I have noticed with some concern that Sir Douglas Fox's report was not ordered to be printed by the Committee on Printing of Parliament. It was laid before the House of Commons. I think it must have been an oversight or perhaps a difficulty arose from the fact that there were plans and maps connected with it that it would be almost impossible to put on the sessional papers of the House. No doubt the difficulty of placing these on record influenced the committee against publishing the report, but I feel that it is a great pity and places every gentleman who takes an interest in this subject at a very great disadvantage that this report cannot be used for reference. In order to get this report—and it is not very long and the plans connected with it are not at all important to the ordinary student of the question, while the body of the report itself is a matter of the greatest importance to the House—I will read it to the House, or let it be accepted as read, and let it appear in the debates. The subject is of very great importance to the people of Prince Edward Island, and to the people of the Dominion as a whole. They have been carefully looking into and considering it and for the purpose of facilitating future discussions and assisting the Government and members of Parliament and the people generally to correct conclusions upon it it is desirable that this report of Sir Douglas Fox, which has cost the Government of Canada $1,660, should appear in our debates and be on record for the purpose of reference.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I should think the Printing Committee would order it to be printed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I)—This report has never been presented to the Senate, but it has been presented to the House of Commons. I suppose I could ask the hon. leader to present it to the House and for that purpose put a notice on the paper and it should be brought up regularly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This document having been laid on the Table of the House of Commons has probably been referred to the Printing Committee and dealt with by them or will be dealt with by them before the end of the session.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—If the printing of it has not been sanctioned very likely it is on account of the expensive character of the maps, but if the hon. gentleman thinks the report without the maps would be sufficient I have no doubt as a member of the Printing Committee that they would recommend it to be printed.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If it were laid before the House of Commons it was referred to the Printing Committee and they declined to print it. If the hon. gentleman will put a notice on the paper asking to have it laid on the Table then it can be produced and referred to the Printing Committee to be printed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I will take the hon. leader's suggestion. We will be perfectly satisfied to have it printed without the maps. I wish now to say a few words on the advantages which the tunnel would confer on the people of Prince Edward Island and also on the neighbouring provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In fact a work of such magnitude could not help being of some interest at least to the people of Canada whether they live on the Pacific Coast, in the central part of the country or down in the Maritime Provinces. The tunnel, if carried out, would vastly stimulate the commerce and material prosperity of Prince Edward Island. I would just take one article which we export in very considerable quantities—to illustrate the advantages which this tunnel would be to us. I find, by referring to the custom-house returns covering a period of seven years, that the farmers of Nova Scotia, by the sworn valuations that are made at the customs, received over 58 cents per bushel for their potatoes and the farmers of New Brunswick, taking the customs valuations as my guide, received 42 cents per bushel for their potatoes while during the same seven years the average price in Prince Edward Island during the same period was less than 25 cents per bushel. It will be found that the farmers of Prince Edward Island received less than half for their potatoes that the farmers of Nova Scotia received for theirs and very much less than the farmers of New Brunswick received for theirs.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It may be that the potatoes are not quite so good.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I think as a native of the Maritime Provinces my hon. friend knows very well that the potatoes of Prince Edward Island are famous for their good quality. Prince Edward Island possesses a soil in which they can be grown in very great abundance and at a cheaper cost than in any other portion of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Why do they not ship them to Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Because they would be frozen at that time of the year.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—We do ship them to Nova Scotia. The state of matters is this—the western counties of Nova Scotia ship their potatoes abroad and we supply the eastern part of Nova Scotia with potatoes and I believe we supply a great deal more potatoes to Nova Scotia than Nova Scotia exports to other countries. But owing to the geographical situation and other circumstances, we are naturally the suppliers of the eastern part of Nova Scotia including Cape Breton and Halifax, while the western counties of Nova Scotia from their proximity to Boston and the West Indies send their potatoes there. But whatever country the potatoes find their way to ultimately, whether the West Indies or the United States, the average price in Nova Scotia has been over 58 cents a bushel while the average price in Prince Edward Island was 25 cents a bushel. I am free to admit that the difference is not all to be accounted for by difficulty of winter communication. The western ports of Nova Scotia are nearer to Boston and the West Indies and have better facilities to reach those markets, but the great difficulty that arises is that we have to put our products all on the market within three or four weeks. Our season of harvesting potatoes extended from the 1st to the 15th October, and from that to the period of severe frost and frozen harbours is a very short one indeed and our potatoes have to be sent to the market very often in an immature condition, and the only markets available to us are glutted at that season of the year mainly owing to the fact that we have to send all our potatoes at that time. Another reason is that potatoes having to be sent mostly by sailing vessels freight is very high in the fall and we have to pay sometimes 20 cents a bushel on freight to American ports. The fact that we have to ship all our potatoes in a hurry at one time of the year and in a state not suitable for marketing at all, that insurance and freight run very high at that time of the year, the net price which we get for our potatoes is very small compared with what the other provinces receive. The census returns show that Prince Edward Island raised in 1881 over six millions of bushels of potatoes. The figures for 1891 are not yet available. I may say further that the quantity that is sent abroad for market depends entirely on the price. When the price falls much below 20 cents a bushel these potatoes are consumed at home. They are not a very profitable article for food on the farm but as a matter of necessity they are consumed at home and it is only when the price rises high enough to send them abroad that a large portion of our crop goes abroad at all. In 1883 it was found that nearly two millions of bushels of potatoes were sent from the island to the United States and to Nova Scotia. Even by the Trade and Navigation Returns it will be found that in many years the exportation of potatoes from the island to the United States was from one million five hundred thousand to one million seven hundred thousand bushels, and from the fact that in 1881 no less than six millions of bushels of potatoes were produced in the island if the price were equal to the prices in other provinces, the production of potatoes in the province would very largely increase and the necessity of shipping potatoes in the fall of the year under unfavourable circumstances would pass away and our potatoes would go to market as the potatoes of the other provinces do gradually as the market calls for them. I would not take up the time of hon. gentlemen in arguing the advantages of a tunnel to the business of the country. Those advantages are so self-evident that there can be only one opinion on that point. I will pass for a few minutes to another point—what would it cost the Dominion of Canada to undertake the construction of this tunnel? What would be the cost to the Dominion in the end? My contention, as I have already put it forward, is, supported as I am by the opinion of Sir Charles Tupper and other eminent men who have information on this subject—if the tunnel were built the loss on the operation of the Prince Edward Island Railway would be wiped out, and material gain would be made in the earnings of the Intercolonial Railway as well, because a vast amount of the trade of Prince Edward Island that now goes by vessels to the United States and St. John and Halifax and a number of other places would then go by this tunnel. An enhanced trade would result and the wiping out of the loss on the Prince Edward Island Railway might be considered as one of the advantages to the tax-payers of the whole Dominion. The average loss on the operation of the Prince Edward Island Railway has been $79,896 per annum. There is another item we might consider in connection with that—the expense to the Government of Canada in maintaining the present ice boat service and the steamer "Stanley." That would be saved. It is not easy to get very exact figures on this subject, because the "Stanley" is used in the summer season for the fisheries protection service, and the accounts are not kept separate to show what portion of the expense can be charged to maintaining communication with the mainland. This information may be in the Public Accounts, but I have not been able to get it. I have made a liberal allowance, and I think $15,000 would represent the correct amount which would be saved to the revenue of Canada. This steamer, which was bought for the service, and which, in all the discussions which have taken place, is fairly charged to this service could be used for other purposes, and the interest on the cost would represent a saving of $5,438. We lose through depreciation, which I have put down at 10 per cent, about $14,359 a year. Of course, the Government does not insure the steamer at all, but that does not make any difference—they are carrying the risk, and any business man will tell you that if you are carrying a risk, you have a right to put down an item for insurance, because you do not know how soon you will be overtaken by a loss. I put down 10 per cent for insurance, which is not too much, as the vessel has to undertake a particularly hazardous service, that represents another amount of $14,359. Calculations which were made by the Hon. Judge McLeod and myself some three years ago on the subject show that the net earnings of the tunnel would be probably not less than $100,000 yearly. I made an inquiry in the year 1883 in order to throw light on a subject which at that time we were discussing between the Government of Canada and the Local Government of the province to ascertain what the actual trade of the island with all the world was that year and found that without including goods that came in small craft from the other provinces, in boats of dimensions that did not call for an entry at the custom-house at all (and there is considerable trade of this kind on all the south side of the island) we found that $3,470,000 worth of goods of all kinds were imported to Prince Edward Island that year. I estimate that an equal quantity would be exported. Now that was 10 or 11 years ago and the trade of the province has increased greatly since then. With the progress made in the interval and we may set down that under the influence of this tunnel there would be a very large increase in the exports of Prince Edward Island and I think it is not too much to say that the earnings of this tunnel would be at least $100,000 a year.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Net earnings?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—Yes, because the working expenses of the tunnel would not be much at all. It was proposed by Sir Douglas Fox that communication through the tunnel should be made by electricity and it was thought that the working expenses would not be very great, but after making a liberal allowance for the working expenses it was estimated that $100,000 a year which the people of the island would willingly pay in tolls would represent the earnings of this tunnel and would go towards the expense of its construction. We place interest on the amount of $2,171,318.18, which I have shown hon. gentlemen is due Prince Edward Island, in a matter ofpublic works without including allowance for interest. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the conclusion I arrived at in the early part of my speech was that in order to put Prince Edward Island on an equality with other provinces $2,171,318.18 might properly be expended on public works in Prince Edward Island. Interest on that at 4 per cent would be over $86,000 a year, so that all these items added together amount to $315,814.

Loss on Prince Edward Island railway, average since 1873	$ 79,806
Excess of expense over income in winter service....	15,000
Interest on cost of tunnel...	5,438
For depreciation, 10 p.c....	14,459
For insurance, 10 p.c.......	14,359
Net earnings of "Stanley"..	100,000
Interest on $1,796,826.22 at 4 p.c....................	86,852
	$315,814

This at $3\frac{1}{6}$ per cent would represent a capital of $10,000,000. These figures may be open to criticism, but I think they are accurate and the result of those calculations is that Canada might construct a tunnel even at a cost of $10,000,000, and in doing so, there would be no loss to the people of Canada beyond putting Prince Edward Island in a matter of public works in a position of equality with that which the other provinces of Canada occupy from the Atlantic to the Pacific at the present time. In connection with this and before taking my leave of it I might say this: I am not sanguine enough nor am I unreasonable enough to say that that tunnel should spring into existence like Aladdin's palace, and that the people of the island should wake up one of these fine mornings and find it completed from one side to the other, as if by magic. We do not expect anything of the kind. We expect the work shall be approached as it has been approached in a reasonable manner by the Government, that the best information available shall be got on it, and that step by step it should be advanced just as it is found to be practical and no further. But I would take this ground in connection with that position that all this will necessarily involve considerable time. Time has already been spent in the discussion of it, not lost I will say nor thrown away. There will be more time taken and that time will not be lost or thrown away, but while that is going on I would ask my hon. friend the leader of the House, and my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture to remember Prince Edward Island during those years we may reasonably expect to pass before this tunnel is completed, seeing it will take five or six years to build it from the time the machinery starts. During these years I trust the hon. gentlemen will remember Prince Edward Island (because eight or ten or twelve years is a considerable period in the life of a country as it is in the life of an individual) that during that time they will do something for Prince Edward Island in regard to putting her in an even position with the other provinces in regard to public works.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—What about the subway?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—Why the tunnel is only a child of larger growth. It is only an evolution of the subway. To my friend, Governor Howlan great credit is due for the long assiduous labours he devoted to the discussion and elaboration of this question. At first he could only see men as trees walking as was natural with a man beginning the consideration of so great a question as that. He could not be expected to have the end entirely in view from the start. At the outset he proposed a subway which was then engaging a great deal of the attention of engineers all over the world, but after the matter was reported to Sir Douglas Fox and Sir John Code, another very eminent engineer in England, with whom I had the honour of interviews, further light was thrown upon it, and afterwards the shield system of tunnelling, or what is called sub-aqueous tunnelling, was found to be almost as cheap as the plan Senator Howlan proposed in the first place, which was a cast iron or metallic subway laying upon the foundation of the straits.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—They are now proposing to carry a subway between England and France.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—It may be, notwithstanding all these eminent authorities, as my hon. friend says, they are proposing now to adopt the subway principle between England and France, but this is a little misleading, because these terms subway and tunnel are sometimes interchangeable terms. They are called subways where they are built of iron, although they are entirely under the earth. My hon. friend says that in the proposed tunnel between England and France they are going on the plan where the metallic tube rests on the bottom of the sea, and where the earth is not pene trated at all. However, that may be, these are questions for engineers and Governments to deal with, and we are not wedded to one plan or another. All we want is that something practical should be done, and that the right way to solve the question be arrived at whether it is by means of a subway or tunnel, but I was just saying when I was asked, and very pertinently, by my hon. friend here (Mr. Poirier), to explain about the subway, I was pointing out to my hon. friends, the members of the Government in this House the importance of considering in the meantime the claims of Prince Edward Island in the matter of public works. There is a very large section of Prince Edward Island extending from Charlottetown southward through what is known as the Belfast and Murray Harbour Districts, about 55 miles of an extent of country that is not benefited or penetrated in any way by the Prince Edward Island Railway. I think I am within the bounds of truth when I say that there is not a better tract of country in the whole Dominion than that district. Every inch of land is occupied by a thrifty, hardy industrious class of settlers and they have very poor harbours on the greater part of their coast, and it would be a comparatively small matter in the years that will necessarily elapse before the Government takes up this matter (as I hope it will take it up) will be called upon for any large expenditure in connection with it, and hon. gentlemen know that in those many years that table of expenditure in other parts of Canada as presented to the House will go on increasing year to year. We know to-day there is a very extensive proposition to connect Ottawa with Georgian Bay. We know there are many canal improvements which are desired to be carried out. I have no fault to find with them, but during the years that must necessarily elapse before this tunnel question could be finally dealt with the Government should consider the claim of Prince Edward Island to the construction of a railway in that province, inasmuch as Prince Edward Island has not received any benefit or advantage from the railway policy of the Government. I find no fault with the Government in building a railway in Cape Breton. I have never had an opportunity of setting my foot in the Island of Cape Breton, although I have been all over the rest of Canada and very much through the other provinces, but I was proud and pleased when the Dominion Government took the responsibility of building that Cape Breton Railway and putting our sister island in the position which she ought to be placed in. I know that Cape Breton had not received railway benefits and justly complained, and although the railway policy of the Dominion had benefited Nova Scotia, as a whole Cape Breton had not received fair consideration. But you can take down this fact that in Prince Edward Island which is at least equal in fertility to Cape Breton although not possessed of the same mining resources (but take it all round we compare favourably with them) that we have a railway which has been paid for by our own money while Cape Breton has a railway built by the Government its entire length of equal cost with our railway. I am not finding fault. Cape Breton has received nothing but what is right and fair and I only ask that Prince Edward Island should be treated in the same fair and liberal manner. With regard to the moral and political advantages of a tunnel I might say that although I have been myself strongly favourable to keeping up the political autonomy of our province as a member of this confederation, I am always proud that Prince Edward Island is a part of the great confederation of Canada. I have always taken that view but I will go further and say that if a tunnel were built Prince Edward Island would cease to be an island at once. It would become practically a part of the main land of the Dominion—there would then be no object in keeping up political distinctions and it would pave the way to the union of the Maritime Provinces and also would be very advantageous to the good government of Canada as a whole. I have to thank you, hon.

gentlemen, for the attention you have given me. I know I have spoken at too great length but you will excuse me. I feel warmly, and I know the people I represent feel warmly on this question and I would not have done my duty if I had not gone over the ground and presented these views to you on this occasion.

The motion was agreed to.

INSOLVENCY BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The Order of the Day being called,

The House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill (C) "An Act respecting Insolvency."

Hon. Mr. BOWLLL said: In moving that the Speaker do now leave the Chair and the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Insolvency Bill, I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to set myself right on a matter which occurred the other day, I have felt somewhat keenly about the very idea that any hon. gentleman of the Senate should have supposed for a moment that I would have insisted upon violating any arrangement into which we had mutually entered in connection with the discussion of this bill. When I called the attention of the House to the rule in reference to the discussion of the principle of the bill in committee, I had not the slightest intention of attempting to prevent any hon. senator discussing the principle of the bill at the proper time, which would be in going into committee on the reception of a report, or on the third reading, or at any other stage of the measure. My only object was, while we were discussing a particular clause of the bill then before the House in Committee of the Whole, that we should confine ourselves to the clause and whatever principle might be involved in it. That was the only intention I had, and my remark was not made with any view of preventing the fullest and widest discussion that could possibly take place upon the great principle involved in the Insolvency Act. If you read the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Albert and note the position that he took, while reserving to himself the right hereafter to take such course as he might think best in accord with his own individual opinion as to the effect of the bill upon the community, that it will bear out exactly the position I have held. The hon. gentleman said:

> I take it to be understood, after the expression of my hon. friend from Amherst, which has not been dissented from, that we may go on and pass the second reading, and after that discuss the details of the measure without being absolutely committed to its principle. The importance of a Bankruptcy Act seems to be acknowledged.

In reference to that point the same course was indicated by my hon. friend from Monck in his remark, where he said:

> I hope the leader of the Government will not push the bill through the House too rapidly.

And then he went on to indicate what he thought ought to be done and what course he himself would pursue hereafter. Then again in reference to a remark made by my hon. friend from Alberta:

> I see nothing in the rule to which my hon. friend refers that binds any member of the Senate to the principle of the bill. He does not say that in passing the second reading you even affirm the principle. The rule says the principle of the bill is usually adopted on the second reading. That is what you have done to-day and many of you have expressed strong opinions against the principle of the bill, but I hope when we come into committee that the House will accept it and will let it become law.

Taking the whole debate together, I think the House will come to the conclusion that I did not interpose—and I assure the House I had no intention of interposing—any obstacle in the way of discussing the bill upon its merits, whenever it reached the stage at which that could be properly done within the meaning of the rules of the House. I noticed, that some hon. gentlemen were under the impression that an understanding had been come to and that the remark that I made in reference to the rules of the House applied to the hon. member from Monck and was an attempt to prevent further discussion on the question, and I think it only right that I should make this explanation in justice to myself and in the hope that no member of the House should think that I would take advantage of a technicality in order to prevent a full discussion of the measure.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I am disposed to accept the explanation which has been made by the hon. leader of the House that he had not intended to violate any understanding that was arrived at, but what struck me was the position which he laid down when the hon. member proposed to discuss the principle of the bill. The hon. member had gone so far as to say that he was willing to reject it, when he was brought up with a round turn by the leader of the House who said that this was not the proper time to discuss the principle of the bill. Then it became necessary for us to refer back to what had been agreed upon at the second reading. If the intention of my hon. friend, in the course that he took then, was merely to say that we were at liberty to discuss the principle of the bill at any future stage and not in committee, he was making no concession at all, because the rules of the House permit us, without any consent on the part of the person in charge of the bill, to discuss the bill at any stage whatever. At the second reading, in order to carry out the views of the promoters of the bill and to get it advanced a stage, I took the responsibility of suggesting, and I induced others who were opposed to the principle of the bill, not to take any steps against it at that stage, and on what ground? That the bill was to be referred to a special committee in order to report an amended bill. We have been told repeatedly, and I need not go into detail to show it, that we have got a very different bill now from the one that went to that committee, and therefore I could have arrived at no other conclusion than that we were at liberty at any stage of that bill which was reported from the committee to discuss it, and if we were not so at liberty, the understanding arrived at when the bill was read the second time simply amounted to nothing at all. The measure as it stands now was not subject to the second reading, but was brought into committee of the whole with a view to a full discussion, and on that occasion, when the bill was before the committee, my hon. friend, as I understand him, objected to any question being raised as to the principle of the bill. I was surprised at that, because we had postponed that discussion on the principle of the bill in order to get the bill advanced a stage. When I say we, I mean those who are opposed to the principle of the bill. Although opposed to the principle of the bill, I was willing to give my very best assistance, humble as it is, to make it as perfect as possible. Under those circumstances, I felt that I was placed in a very awkward position, because I had induced my friends and some gentlemen who certainly were not political allies of mine, to take a course entirely the reverse to that they intended to take. I allude now to the hon. member from Albert. He was as much astonished as I was, because immediately after I asked the House to agree with that course, the House consented. He said that, in consequence of that suggestion of mine and in accordance with the understanding that he was to be at liberty to discuss the principle of the bill at any stage he felt himself brought up. He was in an awkward position, because if he was not at liberty to discuss the principle of the bill it was hardly worth while to talk about it; but besides that, I should like to call the attention of my hon. friend to this, that even in committee we are at liberty to discuss the principle of a bill, and the very best and most crucial proof of that is that any member of the committee, when the bill is before them, can move that the committee rise without reporting and the bill would be rejected. That is done often and it can be done on this occasion, and if so why was any hon. gentleman prevented from discussing the principle of any part of the bill? But besides all that, I must say that I was very much gratified the other day at the admission which the hon. leader of the House made, when in his usual courteous manner he said: "I am sorry this misunderstanding has taken place. There was no intention on my part to violate it, and I am now willing that the principle of the bill shall be discussed in committee." That is the position the hon. gentleman took the other day, and I do not know why it was necessary that we should get up a discussion on that point at the present occasion. At the same time, I freely say that I hope nothing that ever fell from me would induce any person to think that my hon. friend knowingly violated the understanding as he understood the arrangement on that occasion. I am quite sure he is incapable of doing anything of that kind, and I for one was incapable of believing he would do so. At the same time, I was surprised at the course that was taken, for I thought possibly my hon. friend had forgotten the arrangement. It is quite evident that he had, because he said immediately after: "I am sorry for this misunderstanding, and I am now perfectly willing that the principle of the bill should be discussed." I hope this little incident will create no further trouble, and that every hon. gentleman will have the opportunity of discussing the bill. The sooner we get at it, the better, because if the sense of the committee requires the principle of the bill to be changed, it is better the Government should know it. I do not know that I should say anything further except that the arrangement was made in perfect good faith. It was well understood all round the House, and the action that I took the other day in speaking on the spur of the moment was not suggested by any idea that the hon. gentleman would violate openly any understanding on such a subject.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (C) "An Act respecting Insolvency."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—When I moved the first amendment to subsection a of clause 2, I was actuated by a desire not to have the farmers included in the bill as it then stood. It was suggested by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, and I think by the hon. gentleman from Richmond as well, that my motion would more properly apply to clause 3. I have considered the matter since, and with the consent of the House I beg to withdraw my motion with a view to submitting a more comprehensive clause when clause 3 is considered. In doing so I assume that the hon. gentlemen from Richmond and Halifax will also withdraw their motions and let us commence on clause 3 as suggested.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should be very glad to do so.

The amendments were all withdrawn and the clause was adopted.

On the 3rd clause,

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I wish to make some explanation as to the position I assumed when I made my former motion. At that time I stated distinctly that I was not in harmony with the view that farmers should be included in the Insolvency law at all, and therefore when the bill was changed in the committee from traders and farmers and graziers to simply "debtors," I thought it was my duty then to try and make a change. Under this clause every debtor comes under the Insolvency law in a compulsory way. I felt it my duty as far as I could, to correct what I considered a bad feature of the bill. After considering the matter more fully, I have come to the conclusion, in order to meet the views of hon. gentlemen of this House who have expressed themselves on that subject that farmers should be included provided it was a voluntary act on their part. As far as the compulsion is concerned, I was then and now opposed to it, but if the farming community can be brought in so that insolvency on their part shall be voluntary, I have no objection, and for this reason, that 99 out of every 100 farmers in the country will not require this legislation at all. I feel sure that the 99 will not oppose a bill of this kind which is intended to give relief to the one. A very honest farmer may possibly, by having his farm buildings burnt with all his crops, as has occurred in Ontario many a time to my knowledge, or through sickness of himself or members of his family, become so embarrassed that it might be important that he should get relief and every one says that a farmer in such a case should have the benefit of the Insolvency Act in order to relieve him. Under the circumstances, I have come to the conclusion that the few farmers in the country who may be compelled to take advantage of this bill should have the opportunity of doing so if they think proper. Another view of this matter is that the insolvency law is made, not for the prosperous, but to relieve those who have become embarrassed. They may have had losses under peculiar circumstances and become insolvent, while perfectly honest in all their transactions. It would be a pity to keep those people out, especially as it is intended for such people and not for the prosperous members of the community. I am satisfied that we all want this bill to be made law and our object should be to try and make it as satisfactory to the people of the country as possible. I therefore move that section 3 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor :

For the purposes of this Act debtors are divided into two classes as hereinafter defined, namely, classes A and B, and the receiving order under this Act shall not be made in respect of the estate of a debtor included in class A on the application of such debtor, and the receiving order shall not be made in respect of the estate of a debtor included in class B on the application of a creditor of such debtor.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is as the bill was introduced.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—That is an amendment to clause 3. I intend to follow that up with a classification of who shall constitute classes A and B. It will be clause four of the bill. Class A is defined to include persons engaged in trade, and class B such persons as farmers, graziers, etc. Persons included in class A, if in debt, may be put into insolvency, but persons included in class B shall only go into insolvency by their own voluntary action.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—This is a very important motion indeed. It completely undoes the work of the committee to which the bill was referred, and I think it is too important to take a vote upon it until it is printed and members are allowed an opportunity to consider it. For my own part, I am not prepared to vote upon it.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not think the Government would accept an amendment like this without an opportunity to consider it carefully.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—This resolution is very well as an expression of opinion, a sort of abstract resolution intended to be put in a concrete form, but it would be better to take up this clause with a view to practically decide whom you will make this bill applicable to. This clause says that the Act shall apply to all debtors. The bill as originally introduced was applicable to traders—that is the obligatory part. That was an intelligible classification, and is followed by provisions to carry out substantially the same view that has been expressed by my hon. friend who has moved this amendment. That is to say certain classes should not be put into insolvency except upon their own application. Therefore, this is a return to the principle of the original bill as introduced, and so far as that goes, I am entirely with my hon. friend. The bill as originally introduced in that particular, in regard to the persons to whom it was to apply, was a very much better bill than the bill as reported by the committee. I will therefore take the liberty of referring to what that bill was, and ask if it will not be more practical and convenient to take it up in its original words. The original bill was "This Act applies to traders as hereinafter defined." That is the first principle of it, and if we are going to make a clause, would it not be better to follow that and state that it shall be made applicable to "traders as hereinafter defined," and then define what those traders are, because the term traders will include exactly what we choose to say by a definition clause it shall be. That definition clause is given in clause five of the bill as introduced. The advantage of taking it up in that way will be this: there is a certain portion of this House, I do not say a majority who think this bill should be confined to traders only. Let us take a vote on that principle first, and then on the part "as hereinafter defined," and then we can make a definition which will include all that my hon. friend proposes to include, and if there are any persons left out of that definition they can be added by other hon. gentlemen or the persons who are opposed can be struck out. Then, with regard to the farming class and others of that character, they are provided for in this way :

But no receiving order under this Act shall be made on the petition of a creditor in respect of the estate of a farmer, grazier or rancher, or of a debtor not being a trader.

That would test the question whether the committee is disposed to include the farmer at all. If that point is settled, then you can settle the other point whether that shall be compulsory or only voluntary. I think we ought to learn something from the lesson of history, and as regards this Dominion I venture there never has been an insolvency law which included a farmer who was not a trader. The Act of 1864, which I am told was the only Insolvency Act in Old Canada, did not include the farmers but applied only to traders. The Act of 1869 did not only not include the farmers but excluded them expressly, because as it said, "this Act shall apply to traders only." The Act of 1875, which followed that, only went a step further and included trade corporations and partnerships, which was all right, because they could not escape the consequences of an Insolvency Act by simply turning themselves into a limited company, and therefore they were included, but this is a new principle altogether which has been imported into the bill, which includes everybody. For convenience sake, instead of voting on an abstract resolution, we should take the bill as it is and amend it and make it applicable, if we choose, to traders only as hereinafter defined, and then take the fifth clause of the original bill as a basis of that definition and modify it as you like, and then you can get the question settled, but if we get differing about "A" and "B" and who shall be included in each class we will make no progress. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has not yet stated what course he is prepared to take, or what he would advise the committee to do with regard to it. I should like to hear whether there is any objection to my view of the case.

Hon Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—I am not quite clear what we are considering, whether it is the resolution that has been placed in the hands of the chairman or the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Amherst, but I take it that the question we are considering now is the resolution which has been handed to the chairman by the hon. member from Milton. My own opinion, after giving the matter a good deal of consideration, is decidedly that we should have no class legislation whatever—that the classification should be debtors—everybody that owes a debt. I do not see any reason why the farmers should be excluded, and I have not heard any good reason yet why they should be. They are an intelligent class of people and understand their own affairs as well as anybody, and no class legislation is required for them. If you are going to give the farmer an option of availing himself of this bill or not, that is class legislation, pure and simple, which we should never countenance in this House. In Ontario there is an Insolvency Act which has been in operation since 1877 and there is not a word in it about farmers. They are not excluded, and I have yet to know that a single farmer has suffered hardship in consequence of the operation of that Ontario Act. On the contrary, I believe that it has worked very satisfactorily. I do not think it would be treating the farmers fairly to exclude them. They are entitled to the same privileges as all other classes of the community. I have been a long time in business and I have yet to learn of a debtor being oppressed by his creditors. On the contrary, they carry the debtor along and help him, and it is futile to say that the farmer is going to be ruined because he is brought under the operation of this bill. I do not think anything of the kind need be feared. In the province of Quebec there is an Insolvency Act, the operations of which are very satisfactory to the community. I do not know what the provisions of that Act are.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Does that include the farmers?

Hon. Mr. MacINNES—I do not know about the Quebec Act, but in Ontario the farmer is included. In the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island they are without insolvency legislation.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—There is no insolvency law in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—It is under the common law.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES—In the province of Manitoba, they have no Insolvency Act, but they have a great many exemptions, such as are needed in a new country like that. If this bill passes, I do not see any reason why these exemptions should not remain untouched. Any which were unreasonable could be modified, but that is a matter of detail. I am decidedly opposed to any class legislation whatever, and the farmer has as much right to be brought under the operation of this bill as any other class of the community. They know perfectly well if they get into debt to a larger extent than they are able to pay, they must suffer the consequences. We have been told that the farmer will be ruined by the operation of this Act, that his farm will be taken away from him. That is not an easy thing to do.

It is much more difficult to take a man's farm away from him than to sell his dry goods or groceries. There are some members of the committee who are entirely opposed to an Insolvency Act of any kind. My hon. friend from Monck, in his usual frank and straightforward manner, has stated his opinion that there should be no Insolvency Act. I am sorry to differ from my hon, friend, but my opinion is entirely opposed to his. It is very desirable that the laws of this country should be uniform from one end of the Dominion to the other and that everybody should be treated alike.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend who makes this motion makes two classes of persons, traders, and another class which includes all debtors, and the latter class cannot be put into insolvency—with them insolvency is to be optional. That is contrary to the principle of any law that has ever been in existence in this or any other country. Insolvent law was slowly evolved out of the criminal code and was directed against fraudulent debtors. Former bankruptcy laws applied to traders only, because the circumstances of their business were totally different from the circumstances of others. Creditors of traders were regarded as partners in their speculations; all others, non-traders, were considered wholly responsible for their debts. To bring in the others it was thought would only encourage fraud and extravagance. I do not see why you should give to people who are not traders a preference over those who are traders. Traders are subject to contingencies which do not affect other classes of the community, and to say that more stringent rules should apply to them than to other debtors is contrary to the principles on which other insolvent laws have been passed. In England up to 1861, insolvency applied only to traders.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—What does it apply to now?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—To every debtor, but it gives no preferences as you would give here to other classes over the traders. You propose to give a preference to the farmer over the man to whom the bankruptcy law was originally intended to apply. I cannot see why an ordinary debtor should be given a preference over a trader. My hon. friend says that the farmer may lose his buildings and crops, or sickness in his family may cause him embarrassment, but he is not more subject to those contingencies than other members of the community. The farmer's occupation is more healthy than others, and his buildings are not more liable to destruction by fire. My opinion is that this bill should be confined strictly to traders only, then hereafter, if the farmers desire to come in, let them say so, but if they come they should be included on the same terms as traders. Do not give a common debtor a preference over the trader, who is subject to vicissitudes in his business. He may be industrious, honest and frugal in his habits, and yet become insolvent through the failure of others who owe him. When you are giving the farmer a preference over the trader, you are giving it to the wrong person. If any preference is to be given it should be given to the trader. One of the many imperfections in our last Act was the want of an impartial and independent examination into the causes of each bankruptcy. Everything of that character was thrown on the creditors, who did not take the trouble to investigate matters.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I thought I had made myself understood when I moved my resolution and stated that after the resolution was passed I intended to submit the supplementary clauses which contained all the persons who were entitled to take advantage of this Act, and on submitting that the committee might strike out any persons or class of persons that they thought should not be entitled to it, or to add to the list. If the committee would allow the resolution to be read over and each item confirmed or struck out, it would shorten the matter very much. It is quite clear that my hon. friend from Amherst did not comprehend the object of this motion, because he refers to the bill as originally introduced, and when as a matter of fact the bill which is before us today is the bill that came from the committee, and that simply includes all debtors. What my hon. friend from Burlington says about the laws in Ontario and Quebec, it does not apply at all. In Ontario they have a law for the equitable distribution of an estate under an execution, and farmers and all others have to come under the law alike. The same proceeding has to be taken in all cases. The execution is put in the sheriff's hands, and after it remains there a certain time he seizes the goods of the debtor and gives a notice to the creditors to prove their claims, and he makes an equitable distribution of the estate just as under the present bill. The difficulty of the law in Ontario is that there is no power to relieve a man after you take every dollar he has got, and there is where the necessity of this law comes in. I would prefer if the different provinces would adopt legislation similar to Mowat's Act, and then we would only have to pass a law here for the purpose of giving a discharge to these people after the distribution of their estates under the provincial laws. That would simplify our duties very much, but that has not been done, and you cannot get the provinces to do it. If it were done it would relieve this House from having a cumbrous bill like this, because it has all the machinery that they have to-day in Ontario up to a certain limit. As far as the farmers are concerned I am not distressed about them. Notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg says, they are quite capable of taking care of themselves, but the difficulty with former insolvency laws was simply this—that they did not go far enough—they did not secure to the debtor a winding up process which was in his interest, and the law became obnoxious to people not only on that ground but on other grounds as well. The hon. member from Lunenburg says that the bill of 1874 did not include the farmers. I know it did not, but there was a feeling among the farmers and small dealers throughout the country that they should have been included in that Act. Now, when you are making a new Act, more stringent, for the winding up of insolvent estates in an economical way, I do not see any reason why you should not include everybody, but it is only proper and right that a class of men like the farmers should only be brought under the operation of that law by their own free will.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That applies to all debtors though.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Notwithstanding I have made this motion, if that is changed so as to compel the farmers to go into insolvency, I would oppose it to the bitter end, because I know it would be unsatisfactory to that class of people. I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that through disaster the farmer may be brought into difficulty, and he should be allowed to take advantage of the Act as well as other classes of the community. If the hon. gentleman would place the matter in such a shape that I could put my second clause so that the House might deal with it, we would get at the matter in a business-like way.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I have been spoken of as opposing this legislation altogether. My hon. friend from Burlington says this is class legislation. I agree with him entirely, and when my hon. friend is so anxious to protect the farmers by allowing them voluntarily to become insolvent, I say it is class legislation, and they do not want it. When this bill was first introduced, I said time would show whether I was right or wrong that the farmer was put in as a make-weight in order to make the bill popular in the country.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—When?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM — When the leader of the House introduced the bill. When my hon. friend tells us about the poor farmer, that he should be allowed to go into insolvency but not forced in, I say it is class legislation. He says the poor farmer's buildings may be burnt. Well, we have insurance companies in this country and the farmer's insure their farm buildings. If the people of this country wanted such legislation as this they would ask for it, but they have not asked for it, and we are forcing it on them and putting in the farmers as a make-weight to make the bill popular. You say it will be a great blessing to the people of this country if you give them an insolvency law—give them a chance to pay 66⅔ cents on the dollar and all expenses. Who is going to be relieved under this bill?

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—The lawyers.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Yes, but it is not our duty to come here to legislate in the interest of lawyers. I shall vote against every amendment and then vote against the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—The members of this House may be divided into four classes with respect to their views on this measure. Some, represented by the hon gentleman from Monck, think that we should not have an insolvency law at all. I do not propose to say whether I belong to that class or not just now, because I feel, to a certain extent, that by going into committee on this bill we have committed ourselves to the principle, and that an opportunity will be afforded later on, at another stage of the bill, for hon. gentlemen who are opposed to an insolvency law altogether to bring their views before the House. That is one class —those who are opposed to any insolvent law at all. There is another class who think that if we are to have an insolvency law it should be limited strictly to the class who have asked for it, that is, traders. There are a great many farmers in this country, and a great many others besides farmers, who are not traders, and I have not heard that there has been any one who can be supposed to represent any of those who has asked for this legislation. We have had requests from the boards of trade of certain cities asking, on behalf of the commercial men, that there should be an insolvency law. There is another class, and of that class the majority of the committee which had this bill under consideration was apparently composed, who think that all classes should come under the insolvency law, but that they should be all dealt with in the same manner. This bill contained a provision such as the hon. gentleman from Milton, now wishes to insert in it. When the bill came before the committee they considered that question fully and by a very large majority decided that they should follow the example of England and make the law apply to all classes in the same way. Then there is the fourth class, hon. gentlemen like the hon. member from Milton, who think that the people who have asked for this bill should be put in a worse position than any other section of the community. The hon. gentleman proposes that the traders, the business men of this country, shall be put in a worse position than any other class. Some hon. gentlemen have talked a great deal about farmers, but the hon. gentleman from Milton himself and other hon. gentlemen know perfectly well, and will not deny, that the number of farmers who will in any case come under the operation of this law will be almost infinitesimal. Now, what class of people will come under it? Speculators and persons who have been engaged in promoting land booms and things of that sort will come in by scores, and you propose to place those men, who have undertaken to do business without any capital, and business not of a legitimate character, in a better position than the regular mercantile people of the country who are doing legitimate business. That is the practical working out of the hon. gentleman's proposition. As I said before, I feel that we are committed to the principle, for the time being at any rate, of having an insolvency law. We had better ascertain what the feeling of the committee is with respect to the distance that law shall go, and I propose to move an amendment to test the sense of the House, to see whether the House feels that if we have the bill it shall apply only to those who ask for it; and I shall move in amendment to the resolution moved by the hon. gentleman from Milton:

That this Act shall not apply to any persons other than traders as hereinafter defined.

At a later stage, if we do not want the bill at all we can vote it out.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I heard the hon. member from Amherst state that the Act of 1864 was confined to traders only, and that several measures afterwards passed confined it in a like manner; but is that any reason, when we come now to legislate, that we should follow those Acts? We are legislating here, I may say, out of whole cloth—original legislation, and it seems to me fit and proper that we should not follow the precedent of legislation long since repealed by the common consent of the representatives of Canada. I can see no reason why we should legislate for a class. Class legislation is pernicious. I believe in legislating for the whole community, and that you should permit every man, no matter what his calling, to take advantage of the Insolvency Act, if his circumstances are such as to justify it. Why should the farmer be excluded? What is the difference between dealing in a thousand dollars worth of land and a thousand dollars worth of goods, a thousand dollars worth of cattle or a thousand dollars worth of sugar? What is the difference in a man's labour or in anything else that represents money? Is not one as good as the other? Is not the thousand dollars worth of real estate which is transferred from hand to hand just as good as a thousand dollars worth of merchandise, and if so why should the trader in land be excluded from the right? I see no reason, hon. gentlemen, why this Act should not be made broad and full and for the benefit of all. I would make the Act to suit all, and none can come under it excepting those who qualify themselves under its provision. There should be a limitation as to the amount that would allow any person to come in under it. Saving that limitation, as far as I am concerned, my vote would go in favour of a bill that would enable any man whose circumstances would warrant it, under its provisions, to come in and take advantage of it,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Before the question is put, let us understand exactly how the matter stands before the House. The proposition made by the hon. member from Milton was exactly in accord with the speech made by the hon. member from Amherst. The hon. member from Halifax shakes his head. The proposition of the hon. member from Milton was to divide the classes who could take advantage of this Act into two, first, the traders, second, the non-traders, or without using the word traders, defining a debtor to be as in classes A and B. Then the hon. gentleman read a definition of the first class—that was traders, who came under class A, and the second class B, others than traders. Then in order to make the measure consistent, he read certain clauses which it would be necessary to embody in the Act to carry it out. That is the position in which it stands before the House under the motion made by the hon. member from Milton.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—What I said was that we should go step by step and define what was necessary, and we should begin by defining whether it should apply to traders, and I recommended that it should be applied to traders only as hereinafter defined, and then afterwards we might follow the other bill and take up that clause which made the application of the Act to farmers a voluntary act on their part if they choose to do it.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I understood that.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I did not wish to be understood as going with him in that.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes, and that is precisely what the hon. gentleman has done. The only difference in this, instead of first defining what class should be considered traders, he first asked the House to affirm the principle that there should be two classes, and just as soon as you affirm that principle, then the subsequent clauses to which my hon. friend referred would carry out the idea and the views advocated by the hon. member from Amherst; so that if you pass this motion of the hon. member from Milton you declare that there shall be two classes, one who can be put into insolvency by the creditor but cannot take advantage of the law voluntarily; and a second class, not included in the first, who could not be put into bankruptcy, but could voluntarily go into bankruptcy of their own mere motion. Then my hon. friend from Halifax moved to amend the Act so that it shall apply to traders only. That would change the bill as presented to the House from the committee in this respect; the bill before the committee now applies to all classes, no matter who they may be. They may be wholesale merchants or they may be chimney-sweeps or any one else. It takes in all classes of debtors owing above a certain amount. The bill as it stands before us includes every one. The hon. gentleman's motion would include only traders hereinafter to be defined, and I presume he would take, if this be affirmed, the definition given in the original bill.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Yes, substantially.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Now these are the three propositions, as I understand them, before the House.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I have been a witness to all the disasters that came under the late bankruptcy law which we had in this Dominion, and I think we are bound to be very careful in what we are doing. For my part I feel bound to express my views against applying this law to the farmers. I quite understand that the traders come in and ask for a bankruptcy law. They are dealing from one end of the confederation to the other, and although some of the provinces have the requisite laws, perhaps, to deal with insolvents, other provinces have not, and I quite understand the desire of traders to have a uniform law throughout the whole Dominion. Hence I am in favour of an Insolvency Bill, provided the farmers are excluded. I say the farmers should not be included. They are in a very different position from traders. A trader has to deal with a number of persons, some living near him and others at a distance, and the wholesale trade have to deal, not only with those around them, but also with all the provinces of the Dominion, and then they are not able to follow their debtors as the farmer can. The farmer is dealing with very few people and can take care of his own business. In fact, he does not want an insolvency law. The farmers have not petitioned this Parliament for an insolvency law. Not only have they not petitioned for such a law, but I have had an opportunity of talking over the matter with almost every class of the community during the last few weeks, and I have not met one person who wished the insolvency law to apply to the farmers. The representatives of the boards of trade and the bankers who were here in very large numbers made suggestions to us, and what did they say? I asked them whether they would like the insolvency bill to apply to the farmers. They were very reluctant to answer, in fact they did not answer plainly, but from their words we can imply that they were against the application of the insolvent law to the farmers. So we have in fact expressions of opinion, one which is negative, in this sense, that the farmers have not petitioned for an insolvent law, and we have the expressed opinion of the boards of trade and bankers that it would be better that the insolvent law should not apply to the farmers. I think these expressions of opinion are plain enough to be considered by this House. I look to the farming community as the basis of the public credit. I say that in applying this insolvency law to the farming community you will ruin the public credit, not of one class only, but you will expose the public credit of the whole Dominion to ruin. I explain myself in this way: if you make the insolvency law apply to the farmers, it will encourage them to go in debt and extravagance and once they enter on that path they will go to extremes knowing that there is an insolvency law protecting them. And what is the position at present in some of the provinces? In my own province there are exemptions which go to such an extent that the farmer is practically beyond the reach of his creditors, and if you add to that this insolvency law giving him the power of going into insolvency, what will be the result? The result will be a general crisis. The farmers, already exempted, will take advantage of this bill and go into bankruptcy, and them the retailers will not be able to collect their money. If the retailers of the community are ruined, what will be the result? The result will be that the wholesale community will also be paralyzed, and if the wholesale men cannot carry on business, the blow will fall on the bankers who will put the brakes on all their customers and then you will ruin the whole trade of the country. If you have a law which will produce such bad effects on the whole community, what will be the result? Even the credit of the Dominion—I am not speaking of the Government, but of the trade of the country—will be ruined, and I think you should be very careful not to do such a thing. In exempting farmers we are not denying them a privilege; on the contrary we are paying them a high compliment. We say to them "we rely upon you as the basis of the public credit and of the trade of the Dominion." I think that all legislation should go to keep up the farmer and to give him courage and let him know that we rely upon him more than upon any other class. The insolvency law is a legislation of an exceptional character, and in my mind it should apply only to cases of necessity. In most cases it is not necessary that the farmer should go into bankruptcy. If a farmer is unfortunate, his misfortune will be considered by his creditors and he will find a way to get out of the difficulty. He does not require such relief as an insolvent law to settle his business. On the whole, we should not make this law apply to farmers. This is my first position. I shall vote to exclude the farming community entirely from the operation of this law. Then, if I cannot get that, I will vote to exclude them from the compulsory operation of the law so that they cannot be put into insolvency, because if the farmer can be put into insolvency by any creditor, some day an unfair creditor will go and put into insolvency a farmer who in fact is not an insolvent and would otherwise be able to get out of his temporary embarrassment. Sometimes the farmer cannot realize on his crops and has to wait for months; he cannot reap the benefit of his sowing at once—he has to wait until the fall, and a harsh creditor would perhaps use his power as a creditor in an unfair way.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I could not give a silent vote on this question. I quite agree with a good deal of what has been said by the hon. member from Milton and the hon. member from Manitoba in reference to the farmers being the backbone of our country, and the importance of having an honest farming community, and that they should not be encouraged to do anything which would tend to lessen the confidence and respect the whole community has for them. It is equally important that our trading community should be a respectable class, should be an honest class, should be relieved as much as possible from the speculator or the adventurer, the swindler and the blackmailer. It is a degradation, coming down the grade, and if this bill becomes law it is calculated to encourage a dishonest class of traders as well as a dishonest farming community. I quite agree with the hon. gentlemen when they say that some legislation is required, but we might have legislation of a much simpler kind. We might have an Act to prevent preferential assignments, previous to assignments for the benefit of creditors, and then have a clause embodying the principle that where four-fifths or five-sixths or seven-eighths of the creditors are willing and anxious to relieve a debtor, the creditors representing a very small percentage of his indebtedness should not have the power to keep him under the harrow for all time. A provision of that kind is all the bankruptcy law that we require in this community. It appears to me from what I have learned of law—and some of it came out before the committee on this bill—that the great danger and trouble with our trading community really commences with the banks. They are men possessed of a large amount of money, their officials are trained from boyhood up to the practice of banking, and they, like lawyers, as many of them are, are sure to secure the bank ; they are not disposed to take a private individual's paper unless it is well endorsed. They must have good security, and I was surprised a short time ago to learn that some of these banks actually take assignments of debts that are not yet contracted. I take it, that is a wrong principle in trade, it is encouraging a dishonest transaction, and such a transaction, in my mind, should be made illegal. A law should be passed preventing any bank taking, or any man from giving an assignment of debts which he has not yet contracted. I do not think that is in the bill ; however it may come out. The banks taking that step hamper to too great an extent the trading community. The tendency of the age just now is for monied men to withdraw their capital from business and place it in banks, and they allow the business of the country to be carried on by kite-flyers, speculators who have no means of their own, who are prepared to carry on business in a flighty way. They go into heavy speculations and run them for all it is worth ; if they succeed they make a fortune, if there is any loss they have nothing to lose. The bank will give them money as long as they furnish security, upon their own credit or the credit of their friends or neighbours, and in that way an undesirable and doubtful class of the community is led into large speculations. These large speculators drawing upon the moneys advanced are competing with the hard-working, plodding, honest merchants and business men, and the result is that the honest man in many cases is forced out of business by dishonest competition, I look upon it that this bankruptcy law will only encourage that sort of thing. If we include the farmers, a host of men will rush into the bankruptcy court to take advantage of it. Will not the same principle apply to doctors and traders as well ? Just as soon as we have the law passed there will be men springing up with any amount of cheek and impudence and characteristics of that kind, who will go in a plausible way and get credit in the country and go into bankruptcy.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The bankrupt must pay 66 cents on the dollar to get through.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—No, he need not pay one cent on the dollar and he can get through all right if his creditors allow him to go through, but he cannot get a discharge under an offer of composition unless he pays 66 cents on the dollar. The creditors can relieve him and will relieve him if they are sure that everything is all right. I feel like voting against the proposition of the hon. gentleman from Milton, and the proposition made by the hon. member from Halifax. If this bill becomes law every man should be served alike. We want no class legislation. The farmers and everybody else must have the same race to run, and the Act will cure itself in a very short time ; it will not be long before the people will ask to have it repealed. I do not think it would be fair or wise to say that one class of the community should go into bankruptcy whenever they please, when they have made all the arrangements and made all their preferences three months beforehand in order to go into bankruptcy with a clean sheet. The trader can be put into bankruptcy under this bill by his creditors at any time. For my part, I am disposed to oppose the bill all through, but if it is to become law, I would say that every man should stand upon the same footing.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—After the remarks of the hon. member from St. Boniface, I thought it right to say a word or two. As far as I am concerned, I would vote against the bill entirely. I do not believe it is in the interest of the country at the present time. I believe it will do more harm, and injure the credit of the country more than any bill we have passed or are likely to pass this session, but if we are to have an insolvency law, I am in favour of applying it to every man who is in an embarrassed condition. I believe the farmer has just as good a right and claim to have the benefit of this law as any other man, and I shall fight for that. My hon. friends are very anxious about the honest farmer, but I say it is the truth that the farmer is the backbone of Canada. He is of all men the man whom the credit of the country is depending upon. He is the man whom the business of the country is largely depending upon, and there is no part of Canada that that applies to more than the North-west Territories and Manitoba. My hon. friend desires to keep the farmer under the hatch. He is very well aware that owing to the bad crops which the farmers of Manitoba have had, and from want of experience, men who have gone in there have had to suffer under very sad and grievous misfortunes in respect to losing their crops and getting badly in debt. The farmers in that country have a law passed to exempt them from paying the debts which he claims are honest debts. There is no place to-day where there is an exemption law to the extent of the one that exists in Manitoba. And why? Because these men have gone in there, not dishonest men, but not understanding the climate and the soil. They went on in the best way to till the soil and make a success of it, and the result is they have failed, through no cause of theirs; but the hon. gentleman wishes to keep these men under the hatch—these men whose crops are mortgaged for two years ahead. He would give them no chance to get out. If we make an insolvent law I say we should apply it to the farmers of the country as well as to others and give these men, who have been trying to make it a success and who have been unfortunate and got themselves in debt, the benefit of the law. They have got so much in debt that they have lost their credit; their creditors will not give them any opportunity to market their grain for two years to come. These men are justified in trying to get out of that condition if there is a law to relieve them. It would be unfair to the pioneer farmers of that country, who have got into debt in that way, to hamper them and say that they must remain serfs to the banks and traders in that country. To-day there is only one class adding to the wealth of the country in the North-west, and that class is the farmers. The success of every man in that country depends on the success of the farmer. The farmer is tilling the soil and out of the raw material is making the grain and corn and beef and all the other articles which the country is making money on.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Have not the farmers an exemption amounting to $2,000?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The very fact that they have an exemption of two thousand dollars means that they require this law. You have clinched the argument. The Manitoba legislature felt that it was in the interests of the farmers to exempt them. It shows the necessity of giving them the advantage of this law if they desire to take it. I am a farmer, and I am not in debt, but if I were a farmer in Manitoba and had my farm and crop and implements mortgaged what could I do? Stop and work on there and be a slave for all time to come? I say no. These men have been unfortunate and their misfortunes consist in the large prices they have been charged by traders who have not a cent at stake in the country and can pack up and go across the line at any time; but the farmer who has his farm and buildings cannot pack up and leave the country. He is there a permanent fixture, and I say this law should apply to the farmers of Manitoba more than to any class in the country. If so he could make terms with his creditors. As it is now he has to remain in the embarrassed condition or leave the country. If the bill is made to apply to the farmers, I shall vote for it, but if not I shall oppose it.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—It seems to me there is a good argument that has not yet been put before the House. It has been said that the word "debtor" is the word that should be used and the reason given is that all debtors are the same. Now, I recognize a great difference between debtors. There are two classes of debtors—the man who is in trade and the farmer. Now, why is exceptional legislation required at all? It is for business men. As a general rule, business men have no real estate but only ordinary assets, movables, so it is only right that the wholesale merchant, who sells to the retail merchant, should keep an eye on him and if necessary seize the stock of the business before the whole of the assets disappear. I believe that is only right, so that the creditor can have a portion of his claim paid, but supposing the farmer owes a merchant, I should think the best thing for him is to have nothing to do with the bankruptcy law, but give a mortgage and wait until his property can be sold to advantage. The House should consider that there is a great difference between the two classes of debtors and recognize the necessity of an insolvency law for traders which does not exist in the case of the farmer. If you give the farmers the right to go into insolvency many of them will exercise the option to their own disadvantage, but most of them would prefer to give a mortgage to secure their creditors, while it would give the farmer an opportunity to improve his position and pay his debt. That is a consideration which I think should influence this House to exclude farmers from the operation of this bill. I am against any insolvency law, if we could have uniform legislation. If we could have a law such as there is in the province of Quebec in each of the provinces, there would be no necessity for it. While I am opposed to any insolvency law for the Dominion, I am willing, for the sake of uniformity, to support this measure, but I do not believe in allowing the legislation to go further than any legislation on the subject that we have had before. I believe it should be made applicable to the trading classes only.

The committee divided on the amendment to the amendment which was adopted.

Contents, 23; Non-contents, 16.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—As that amendment is carried, I wish to ask the committee to allow clause 3 to stand in order that we can prepare clauses to carry out the wishes and intentions to the Senate, and proceed at once with part II.—Proceedings in case of Insolvency.

The 3rd clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 6, subsection a,

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—A person who became insolvent after the expiration of the law of 1875 cannot possibly pass through the insolvency court now, because the insolvency had arisen more than three months previous to the passing of this bill. Provision is made for any person who, since the repeal of the Act of 1875 has made an assignment on his estate for the benefit of his creditors. He may get his discharge, but unless he has made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors between the date of the repeal of the Act of 1875 and three months before the passing of this bill, he cannot.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—You mean a debtor who has not made an assignment cannot take advantage of it?

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Is that not covered by subsection d of clause 4? If he has made an assignment under the 53rd clause, there is provision for obtaining his discharge, but supposing he has made no assignment he can take advantage of subsection d of clause 4, call his creditors together and say "I am insolvent" and take advantage of it.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I think it is far-fetched and it is better to have it clear. I am not satisfied at all that such a case is covered.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is no objection to consider the matter fully and if it is found necessary to change either of these sections to meet the view of the hon. member from Milton, it can be done.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Clause 4 covers the case exactly.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 35,

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—That is the most important clause in the bill and one that I take exception to. I will move that 66⅔ cents be changed to 33⅓ cents.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I move that it be 60.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I think we had better let it stand, but I protest against delaying motions because senators have gone away.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—I object to proceeding further with this bill until the amount to be paid by the insolvent is fixed. I shall oppose the bill proceeding any further until that is fixed. I think it would be very much better to leave the bill without stating any particular percentage that the creditor is required to pay.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity first thing to-morrow, or just as soon as we reach that clause, to move his amendment, and if he will allow us to go on until we reach the clauses relating to the discharge of insolvents without the consent of creditors, we might adjourn.

Clause 35 was allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that the committee rise and report progress, and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. READ, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

The Senate adjourned at 10.10 p. m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 15th June, 1894.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE LATE SENATOR FLINT.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, the very painful duty devolves upon me to announce to the House the death of one of our brother senators. The Hon. Mr. Flint, who has been connected with this chamber since confederation, at the ripe old age of 89 years 4 months and 6 days, has departed this life. I need scarcely say that the death of one with whom I have been so long acquainted, is a most painful event to me. Nearly 60 years ago he was superintendent of the Sabbath school which my departed wife and I attended as children. He taught, also, in the same capacity and exercised Sunday school supervision over my own children. I cannot but express my deep sorrow at the loss of a valued friend. In times past he was, perhaps, one of my most bitter opponents,—I am speaking now in a political sense —but for the last 25 years he has been one of the most devoted and earnest supporters that I have had during the period in which I have been in public life. The hon. gentleman was what was known in the old times as a Baldwin Reformer. He was devoted to that great man, an earnest supporter of him when he sat in Parliament with him in the old days, and I do not think till the day of his death that he ever departed from the principles he then held. It is true, when a division took place in the party, when the old party lines were broken down he associated himself with that section of the Liberal party known in Ontario as the Baldwin Reformers, but his views were and have been since that period in accord with what is now known as the Liberal-Conservative party, although he always delighted to call himself a Liberal in politics. He occupied a very prominent position in all that was in the interests of religion, and was connected with every enterprise in the section of the country in which he lived. He was the first president of the old board of police (which would be well understood by senators from Ontario) of the town of Belleville, and was mayor of that town. He was reeve of the town, and reeve of the township, in which he had mills, and in which he carried on various enterprises for no less than twenty-one years consecutively. He was elected to the old Parliament of Canada, in 1847, and to the Legislative Council in 1863, when they were elected, and he remained a member of that body until confederation, and, as those who have been his confrères, and associated with him since that period know, he held his seat in this House since Confederation. He was a man of great energy, and strong feeling, no matter which side he took, whether in politics, social life, or religious questions. He was a man of strong will and strong convictions, but a very warm and consistent friend of those to whom he once became attached. I do not know that I can say more than that he was in every sense of the word one of the most enterprising men we had in our part of the county. He has been a benefit to his fellow men in religious circles, as a public man and as a merchant. He has been a public benefactor to every one, except himself. In his latter days I know he has felt deeply and keenly the interests of Canada, the place of his birth, and I can only add, that with all his faults he was a good man in every sense of the word, and it will be a long time before the Senate of Canada has a more devoted member.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sure that I voice the opinions of every member of this chamber when I say that we warmly sympathize with the emotion shown by the hon. leader of this House in bringing this subject to our notice. It is the severance, as he tells us, of a tie of over half a century and we all must realize that it must be a very keen blow to him who has been so long associated with so excellent a man as the late Senator Flint. It has been my good fortune to know him for a great many years, and I can only confirm all that my hon. friend has said in reference to those excellent qualities that the late deceased senator possessed. He was a man that always regarded everything from the standpoint of morality and religion. He always endeavoured on our committees and in giving votes in this House to voice the promptings of his own conscience. He was a man of the strictest honour and integrity, as we all know, and although he lived to a good old age yet we were all glad to notice he was able up to a very recent period to take part in the deliberations in this chamber, I can only add that the judgments that he expressed on all occasions were those prompted by a desire to serve his fellow-men and to do the greatest good to the largest number. We all greatly grieve at this death, although in the ordinary course of nature few of us may hope to attain to such a ripe age and to be in the full possession of the faculties that God has given us.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—I cannot allow this occasion to pass without a word. I have known the late Senator Flint since 1836. I was with him most of the time, and while not all my lifetime agreeing with him in all matters, still I regarded him as a model man, one who set an example to his fellowmen, a most consistent temperance worker, and a devoted man to his church in support of which he never spared himself or his money. His example was one that we all might emulate and be proud to see others follow. I cannot add anything to what has been said by the hon. leader of this House. I fully endorse his remarks. The late Senator Flint was at all times pronounced in his opinions. In anything that he said he was sincere, and he never failed to express himself in a manner that could not be misunderstood. I saw him yesterday, and am glad to say that he seemed to be conscious of all that was passing about him. I never saw him look better, and his cheerfulness of spirit was remarkable.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—We must all feel that a gloom has been cast over the proceedings of this day by the melancholy intelligence that we have just received. You have listened with deep interest, no doubt, as I did, to the tribute which has been paid to our deceased friend by one who knew him much better than, and valued him equally with, myself. Personally I have been associated with Senator Flint since the early days of confederation and the more I knew and saw of the man, the more I valued him for his strong common sense and integrity. He was eminently a fair man and, as I happen to know, looked on all occasions at questions on their merits without regard to the quarter from where they sprung. I am quite sure that we shall all miss his cheerful countenance and the cordial greeting with which he was wont to meet us when he was attending to his duties in his place in this House. We shall miss him, and we shall never forget the characteristics which we all saw in him and we all, I hope, admire and will endeavour to imitate.

SECOND READING.

Bill (78) "An Act to incorporate the Metis, Matane and Gaspé Railway Company."—(Mr. Pelletier.)

MONTREAL ISLAND BELT LINE RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ moved the second reading of Bill (59) "An Act respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I understand there has been a great deal of opposition to this bill. Would it not be better to put it off until we have a fuller House?

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—I think it would be better to fight it out in committee if any one is opposed to it.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Those who are opposed to the bill said they had no intention of opposing the second reading. They would make their objections in committee.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

CUSTODY OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS IN N.B. BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole on Bill (GG) "An Act to amend the Act relating to the custody of juvenile offenders in New Brunswick."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does the hon. Minister in charge of the bill think that it would be wise to increase the age from 15 to 17 years? Lads of 17 are just at the age to learn a trade and be taken in hand and redeemed if they have been guilty of any offence.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—What was the age in the bill introduced by the hon. member from York?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—At the suggestion of the Government I made the age 17 years, but I would rather have had it 16.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The bill was introduced in its entirety, as it was given to me by the Minister of Justice. When you come to consider a boy of 17 years of age is approaching manhood and he ought to be able to realize the enormity of any offence he may have committed. The intention of this bill is to try and rescue, as far as possible, children while of a tender age, and take them from those who are hardened criminals, and with whom they would have to associate if they were put in jail. I hope my hon. friend will allow the bill to pass as it is. I will call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the suggestion and if he approves of it the change can be made in the Commons.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The hon. gentleman will remember that the age of seventeen was fixed in the bill which I had here as regards the separate confinement of juvenile offenders, but there was a clause in that bill which fixed the particular age at which children, instead of being sent for trial, should be sent to a foster home or to the children's aid society or an industrial home, and as I presume that is partly the object of the bill before the House now, of course I think that makes all the difference in the world. The earliest age at which you can deal with children with that object in view, the better.

Hon. Mr. DEVER, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved the second reading of Bill (2) "An Act to secure the better observance of the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday." He said: This is a bill which, as all hon, gentlemen are aware, has been before the other House of Parliament, I think, for more than two sessions. It has been very thoroughly discussed there and has been amended and altered to a very great extent, so that it comes to us with most of its original provisions cut out, and, indeed, I may say, in such an emásculated condition that I do not think it can provoke much opposition from any one. At the same time, I may say that all who desire the preservation of the seventh day as a day of rest as an essential part of Christian civilization, will be thankful for even this small measure of protection that the bill affords. There are only two clauses to which I may call attention, one which enacts that the sale of papers shall not take place on Sunday, and the other which provides that canals shall be closed on Sunday, except between the hours of midnight on Saturday and 6 o'clock on the morning of Sunday, and from and after the hour of nine o'clock at night on Sunday, making provision for urgent necessity arising from the state of traffic or business caused by the interruption of traffic or by the approach of the close of navigation to have these enactments suspended by order of the Governor in Council. These are really the only two things which the bill provides for, as far as regards the observance of the Lord's day. I do not think I need say very much more about it than that. I shall be prepared to answer any objections or give any further explanations as the discussion goes on.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—When this bill was introduced into this House and I noticed the way in which the hon. gentleman from York took it up and immediately moved that it be read the second time the following day, I thought there must be something terrible about it, that the laws of Moses which directed that the people who violated the Sabbath Day should be stoned to death, or the blue laws of Massachusetts which punished a man for kissing his wife on Sunday, were to be enacted, and I gave notice that I would move the six months hoist. Since then I have examined the bill and what do I find? Instead of a bill it is a burlesque. The only thing about it that calls for comment is a clause prohibiting the sale of newspapers on Sunday. Now that is not done in any of the Maritime Provinces and I am told it is not done in Quebec, nor in Ottawa, nor in Montreal. It must be in that wicked city of Toronto, where my hon. friend from York has been scandalized by little boys running about and selling papers on Sunday. Now, I do not believe even in Toronto, bad as it is, they do that and this bill is a burlesque and a humbug, introduced here for the purpose of making the Senate a laughing-stock. What is the punishment to be inflicted on the little bare-footed boy who is guilty of the offence of selling a newspaper on Sunday? His entire stock in trade consists, perhaps, of six pence, with which he buys seven newspapers and makes a profit of an odd cent or two on the transaction. He is brought before the judge, who, with this law before him, says "What have you done? You have broken the law introduced by Mr. Charlton, who is a great observer of the Sabbath, and I fine you $50." "Good God," the boy says, "$50. I never heard of such a sum of money in my life." Then the judge adds, "What is more, if I find you running about and selling papers on Sunday again I shall fine you $100." Now is that a thing to be introduced in this House? Instead of calling this a bill for the better observance of the Sabbath, I call it a fraud. I do not know if Toronto is as well governed as Halifax. In Halifax, where we are supposed to be very slow, the post office is open a couple of hours on Sunday, so that people can get their letters and papers, and I do not think we are any worse for it. Moses was supposed to know something more about the Sabbath than the hon. member from North Oxford in another place knows, and Moses said that the Sabbath should be 24 hours, but Mr. Charlton says that it shall be 15 hours, taking away from the Sabbath of Moses 9 hours. Is this a bill for the better observance of the Sabbath? No, only for the observance of a portion of it. What I want to know is this—are the laws of God to be altered in this House, and by whom they are to be altered? As this is a religious bill I will quote Scripture—"the tree is known by its fruits: Do men gather figs from thorns or grapes from brambles?" Now, who is the man who introduced this bill—look at the fruit which the tree bears. If a man comes into this country and takes an oath of allegiance and then writes to his friend Carlisle at Washington asking him to put heavy duties on Canadian goods and disguises the fact, and it is only brought to the notice of the Canadian people through Mr. Carlisle publishing his letter. What do you think of him? I think it was Philip of Macedon who said "The treason I like, but the traitor I hate," and Mr. Carlisle, after getting out of Mr. Charlton all he could, has published his letters to the world. Does that tree bear figs? Let us look again and see what the bramble produces. In this Canada of ours we have two forms of religion, Catholic and Protestant, and we have two races, French and English speaking. It has been our hope and our prayer that these two races shall be blended into one, what says the author of this Bill for the better observance of the Lord's day? He writes that the reason the Liberals have not got into power again is because they have chosen a Catholic and a Frenchman as their leader. Does this vine bear grapes? Does that tend to blend the two races into one? In my opinion Mr. Laurier is a gentleman and, for a Liberal politician, an honest man, and the reason his party has not got into power is because his lieutenants, of whom the hon. member for North Oxford claims to be one, are so inferior to their leader. I should not be surprised if they treated him as they did their former leader, Mr. Mackenzie. You do not get grapes from that bramble, and as the tree is rotten I do not like to have anything to do with the bill now before us. Now, consistency is a virtue. The author of this bill, which has been introduced here by the hon. member from York, is the owner of a steam tug, and that tug leaves the wharf on Sunday, and its screeching sounds in the ears of the people going to church. If this tug were a passenger boat, there might be an excuse for it, or if it were going out on an errand of mercy to save human life, one might tolerate the Sunday work, but to go out on Sunday to tow rafts and lumber on the American side is an unnecessary violation of the Sabbath. Some hon. members speak of our bills being distributed. I do not believe they are. We send some to our friends and there is an end of most of them, but suppose by chance a copy of this bill, that has been introduced here by the hon. member from York, fell into the hands of one of the men employed on Mr. Charlton's tug boat, after looking it through he would say: "There was a clause left out here which I wish to God had been put in—a clause to prevent tugs going out on Sunday." He looks from the deck of the tug as he passes by the village where his family lives, and the church bells ringing bring to his mind the fact that his little children, who have been in the habit of going to church with him, must miss their father. It is not likely our debates would get on board Mr. Charlton's tug, but stranger things have happened. Our late assistant clerk, Mr. Adamson, used to tell about one time he went fishing with an official of this House, and stopped at a neighbouring village. He was awakened in the morning by his companion rushing into his room with a hair brush in his hand marked "the Senate" and exclaiming: "The Lord be magnified, has it got down here?" The like chance may have happened to our Debates. I move that this bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I am certainly not against such legislation as this. If there is one thing we ought to sanction by law it certainly is the proper observance of the Lord's day. But it seems to me that this legislation ought to come from the Provincial Legislatures. Let every province do what they think best on this subject. I do not see why the legislation should be the same in every province. Each province thinks for itself, and if in New Brunswick they wish certain provisions as to Sunday observance, let them enact them; and if the province of Quebec feel that they may do a certain thing on Sunday, why should the province of British Columbia come and say: "We don't believe in it, you must not do it." Certainly such legislation should be left to the provinces. This bill makes it an offence to sell one newspaper on Sunday. We know that the hon. gentleman who has charge of the bill here is not the author of it, and it seems to me it is not in accordance with our legislation. A fine of $50 or $30, or even $20, is considered a heavy fine, but in this case, for selling one newspaper on Sunday, a boy can be fined $50, and double that for a second offence. I do not think this is such a legislation as we ought to have on our Statute-book. Now, in a case of assault and battery, which may be a grave assault, but with no intention to do bodily harm, the law says that at the utmost the costs and fine shall not be over $20. I should think that, considering the consequences that both may have as to public peace and order, an assault is a more serious offence than selling a newspaper on Sunday morning. Look at the difference between the two. That is the reason why I say that this bill was never intended to become law, because it could not be expected that such meagre provisions would be accepted by Parliament. I am surprised that the Commons have passed this bill. I know they have amended it, but they ought to have looked into all our legislation of the past and sent us something better than this bill. It seems to me they have shut their eyes and paid no attention to the matter. For all those reasons I decided that I could not support such legislation, and, consequently, I shall vote in favour of the amendment, ready as I was to vote against the bill if no amendment had been made.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In reference to the constitutional question, there can be no doubt whatever as to the prerogative of this House to enact a bill of this kind. We have control of the criminal law, and it is very desirable that if we are to make the sale of newspapers on Sunday an offence in any part of the Dominion, it should be an offence in all.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I did not say anything as to the constitutional part. I only said that we should leave it to the provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The bill as first introduced was, in my judgment, a very good measure. It aimed at the observance of a day that all Christian bodies recognize should be devoted to religious exercises and at all events not spent in amusement. We cannot but have noticed that in countries where religious observance on Sundays is not prescribed in some way by statute, the great tendency is to serious abuses. hon. gentlemen have talked about the enormity of providing a penalty of $50 for a little boy in his bare feet selling a paper on Sunday. The bill is really pointed at the practice of selling newspapers on Sundays; that is what it proposes to stop, and certainly any of us who have been in the city of New York, on our way to church on a Sunday morning, must have been shocked to hear boys crying on the streets, "Herald," "Times," and "Tribune," and mentioning some murder or suicide, an account of which was to be found in the columns of the papers. It certainly was rather shocking to me. It was not alone the sale of the newspapers, but it was accompanied with the sale of other things, cigars and in many instances liquor, and so moved on until you had Sunday absolutely broken as it is in very many parts of the United States. I do not think any hon. gentleman is desirous that that condition of things should prevail in Canada. As a rule Sunday is observed in Canada as well, probably, as in any country in the world, but at the same time I can quite recognize that it may be desirable that we should even place upon our statutes our approval of having Sunday observed in the quiet way it has been in the past. The bill as introduced, made it a punishable offence that newspapers should be printed or published in addition to the delivery on Sunday. It was pointed out that that would probably affect the morning issue of the Monday paper, that the printers were in the habit of going to work at 10 or 11 o'clock and that technically that they would be breaking the Sunday by working an hour or two before midnight, and therefore the clause was changed to suit circumstances, but the selling of the newspapers on Sunday was intended to do away with what it professes to abolish, and not the case of a single newspaper.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Do you know any province in the Dominion that has not already provided for that, making the selling on Sunday punishable by law?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that it is punishable.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Certainly in Nova Scotia it is.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am very glad that the province of Nova Scotia is a banner province, and rather ahead of any province in the Dominion. There are some provinces where newspapers are sold on Sunday. I think the province washed by the waters of the other ocean sells newspapers on Sunday. Then another clause provided that there should be no loading of trains on Sunday. That clause was struck out.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is not in this bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Reference was made to the skeleton that this bill is, and I am explaining why it is a skeleton, because those clauses were struck out in order that the bill could get through the Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The bill meant something when it was introduced, but not now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Government consented that if certain clauses, essentially these relating to canals, were struck out and modified, the bill should go through. I do not think we should take this bill in an alarming spirit. There is no hon. gentleman in the chamber who would say he would like to see a news stand on Sparks or Wellington street, on Sunday. It is not the selling of one paper on Sunday that was the objection, but it is what it leads to. It is the commencement of Sunday traffic, and it is with a view of showing our disapproval of that at the outset that this bill is introduced. I therefore hope that it will receive the approval of the members of this House.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It appears to me that a very severe penalty is imposed for selling a newspaper on Sunday. If the people of Canada keep the Sabbath—and I believe they do—as well in this country as in any other country in the world—why the necessity of this bill? What a crime it is to get a newspaper and read it on Sunday. Are you to punish a man for that? And then, hon. gentlemen speak of the canals of this country. Why this is the law now as far as the Welland Canal is concerned. They do not run there on Sunday at all, but I question myself whether that is beneficial, as far as keeping the Sabbath is concerned, because formerly when vessels were lying up in the canal the sailers congregated together and what did they do? Did they go to church?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They drank.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Yes, and boxed and wrestled and ran foot races and jumped. Perhaps it is good exercise, but I think it would be just as well for them if they were taking the vessels through the canals. I believe that no man should work on what is called the Lord's day, and we would get along better if people did not work on the Lord's day. It would be better for a man if he did not work on the Lord's day, and I am sure it would be better for him when he comes to his last day, I do not want to vote for any such bill as this before the House now. I consider it is nothing at all; it is a blank. A gentleman in the other House has been working on it for years, and he wants to show the country that he has been doing something to keep the newsboys from selling papers on Sunday. As to the canals, the regulation now prohibits Sunday traffic. By this bill you are going to punish a youngster if he sells a paper on Sunday—fine him $50, and if he has not the money to pay it send him to jail. Away with such a bill.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—In the first place, I beg to say that I am not responsible for the shape in which this bill comes before this House. I do not think I am in the habit of introducing measures which are of such a nature as to be treated with the apparent contempt and sneers with which this House has greeted this bill to-day, and I do not know how far it is in order for any hon. gentleman to take the course which the hon. member from Halifax has pursued when speaking of this bill in referring to the gentleman who had charge of it in the other House. I do not suppose I shall be accused of any particular sympathy with that gentleman in politics, or in any other way, and I cannot, of course, shut my eyes to the fact—because it is a fact and in that respect I may be even then going beyond what is the proper rule of order in saying it—that there is no question about it that the bill and its treatment for the last two years in the House of Commons has been very materially affected by the unpopularity of the gentleman who had charge of the bill there; but when the bill came up to this House it was impossible for me to decline to take charge of it and to urge that this House should treat it on its merits looking to the objects at all events which it seeks to secure, and for which it was originally introduced in the Commons, and not treat the bill as hon. gentlemen now seem disposed to treat it by moving the six months' hoist. The bill was initiated in the Commons in consequence of the very strong representations made by almost every religious body throughout the country, almost every synod of the Church of England, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and the General Conference of the great Methodist Church, had all united time and again in the last two or three years in pressing on the legislature of this country by their petitions that some steps should be taken to minimize as far as possible labour on the Sabbath, and especially to minimize as far as possible the amount of labour performed on any public works over which this Parliament might be supposed to have control. This was the object which was had in view, and it has been very strongly urged upon this House, even within the last year by innumerable petitions which have been presented to them for the better observance of the Lord's day. The feeling, I think, is general amongst all classes. We had no division, as has been hinted at by my hon. friend from behind, as between the different races or the different religions. I know of no one who was a more eloquent and pressing advocate of observance in every way and the cutting down of all possible work on the one day in the week than a man whose name is held in reverence by all who belong to his church, the late Cardinal Manning, and it is very striking that steps should be taken now all over the continent of Europe to carry out this very object. I have before me in a book familiar to all, "The Review of Reviews," a short memorandum on the subject, part of which I shall take the opportunity of reading to the House. It is headed the "Struggles for Sunday rest," and it goes on to show what progress this movement has made on the continent of Europe. That in Austria a law now prohibits women and minors from Sunday work. Postal deliveries are limited to one. Sunday evening and Sunday morning newspapers are prohibited.

In Belgium work on all the state railways has been greatly reduced. Even in France the closing of shops is becoming more and more common, and railway goods and parcel offices have been closed at 10 a.m. instead of later hours. In Germany a labour law protecting the Lord's day has been passed. The second delivery of letters has been suppressed through the whole Empire. In Holland goods trains do not run any longer, and one of the most influential newspapers has closed its offices on Sunday in agreement with the general movement for Sunday rest. And in Switzerland a very remarkable instance of the progress of the movement is shown by the fact that a railway in course of construction which connects Yverdun and Ste. Croix, Canton de Vaud, is by the provisions of the charter to be free from all Sunday traffic for at least 25 years.

I merely mention these particulars to show you how, in all countries, and without distinction of religion, the feeling is growing stronger and stronger that for the social and moral good of the citizens every effort should be made to preserve the weekly day of rest.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—How far does this bill do that ?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—As I have already reminded the House I am not responsible for the shape in which this bill comes down to us. I regret very much that it has been cut down to such proportions as it stands now before the House. There is much which has been left out which it was originally proposed should be introduced and which I would have been very glad to have seen in this bill, but, as I said before, I feel it is my bounden duty, having taken an active part in this question on various occasions, having presented petitions without end on the subject of the better observance of the Lord's day, however I might regret that this bill was not what I would wish it to be, to present it to the Senate, and I earnestly hope that the House will show, at all events, its sympathy with the movement and the objects which the bill seeks to obtain, by refusing the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. It would be very unfortunate I think if it should go forth that, slight as was the reform that was sought, the Senate refused to give it, and rather proposed to reject the bill in toto. I know perfectly well that there is already legislation upon this subject in the different provinces. There are Acts standing on their Statute-books which provide specially for the observance ofthe Lord's day, but we all know that, in the case of the railways and the canals, the subject comes within the jurisdiction of this Parliament only, and cannot be legislated upon by the legislatures of the provinces. With regard to this bill now before the House, I must confess when I read its provisions, although they did not give me the same subject for hilarity as they seem to have afforded the hon. gentleman behind me (Mr. Almon), I was rather surprised at their ever having been passed by the Commons, and if the House in its wisdom thinks it is desirable to alter them in any way I shall be prepared to accept any reasonable amendments, but I take it for granted that the fine about which so much has been said was directed, not at the unfortunate barefooted boys, but intended to be levied against the publishers of the newspapers. That is the object of the clause, I take it, and I do not suppose if it contemplated any other object that the House of Commons would ever have passed it. With regard to that particular thing, the sale of Sunday newspapers, I am very sorry that I have to confess in answer to what was said by the hon. gentleman behind me, that in Toronto newspapers were for a short time attempted to be sold on Sunday, but I am glad to say it was speedily discontinued. I think every body will agree with what the hon. gentleman from Ottawa said, that it would be very undesirable if we had that state of affairs in all our cities, and papers were sold on the streets, on Sunday. Of course that is a matter which every gentleman can settle with his own conscience. I do not put this bill before the Senate in any degree on a religious ground. I have myself strong convictions on that subject, but I do not desire to put them before the House because the question of Sunday observance on religious grounds is a matter which every hon. gentleman must decide according to his own conscience. I am putting it on the ground alone of the desirableness of keeping the one day of rest every week, so that no man, be he who he may, down to the humblest labourer, may ever be compelled to make his choice either to give up his Sunday's rest or to lose his situation. That is the one cardinal point which I desire to put before the House. While I have no objection to my hon. friend making himself merry over the bill, still on my part, I am very much in earnest about it and I ask the House, if the general feeling is that even the bill is not all it should be, that they will not refuse to let it go its second reading and be afterwards put in proper shape in committee.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I have looked for some reasons for presenting this bill, and none have been shown why it should pass. I am glad to find, as I know it is the case, that the Lord's day is observed with greater propriety and reverence in Canada than in any other country I have been in, not merely bodily rest, but mental and spiritual rest; not in close, stuffy tenements, but rest in the pure and open air. This bill seems an attempt to revive the blue laws of Connecticut, and, therefore, is repugnant to the spirit of our free institutions. My hon. friend referred to the observance of Sunday on the continent of Europe, and the great change that there has been in that respect. In most of the cities in Europe that I have travelled in—and I have been in most of them—you can hardly tell the difference between the Lord's day and any other day of the week. In Paris, a stranger going there not knowing the day of the week could not detect any difference. It is the same in almost every other city in Europe. If this bill is intended to make a change in the management of the canals of the country, I am told that the regulations are such as to prevent any unnecessary use of the canals on the Lord's day. Then, so far as that goes, there is no necessity for the bill. It proves to me that the author of the bill is not guided by principles of Christianity, but wishes to get some notoriety by professing to be a great Christian Endeavour man, whereas his conduct, as has been shown by the hon. member from Halifax, is inconsistent with his professions. However, I do not care to deal with that. I ask what will this bill do? It sanctions or suggests the desecration of the Lord's day by postal delivery. Any one may have a person deliver his papers to his house—the postmaster can do that, but a poor boy cannot sell a newspaper to anybody on the street. A traveller, or a man who is not accustomed to have his paper delivered at his house, cannot buy a paper of any kind, whether religious or secular, on the street on a Sunday. I cannot understand why such a clause should be enacted. Even if the object of the bill is to strike at the publishers of the papers, it is better to mention them directly and not deprive the poor boys on the street of the right of selling a newspaper. The bill provides that the proceedings shall be by indictment. The expense in nine cases out of ten would only be a tax on the municipality where the trial is held.

Where is the fine to go? Half to the informer? Any person who brings up a poor boy for selling newspapers on the street is to get half of the fine inflicted. If some society were to undertake to do this for the purpose of putting a stop to the sale of newspapers on the Lord's day, there might be something in it, but to authorize a detective to catch a poor newsboy on the street and have him fined and get half the fine, is something which should not be tolerated. The bill is unworkable in its present shape and can have no result but to create expense without any solitary beneficial effect in the way of preventing the sale of Sunday newspapers.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—It means the imprisonment of the boy, because no newsboy could pay any such fine.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes, to degrade a poor boy who wishes to earn an honest penny. It proves to me that the Lord's day is so well observed that there is no possibility of finding any reason to interfere with it. There is no necessity for the bill, because it is futile—there is nothing to operate upon. There is nothing objectionable in the way the Sabbath day is observed in Canada—nothing which requires legislation. The bill is puerile in every respect and is not one which should receive the consideration of Parliament, and there is too much Pharisaism about it.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I am sorry to see a bill of this nature come before the Senate, even though it be as harmless as a number of its supporters say it is. Harmless though it be, it may lead to the introduction of other measures which would be a hardship on the people in some parts of this Dominion where they are not accustomed to such rigid observance of the Sabbath as we are in this province. In no place in this country do I know of a newspaper being sold on Sunday. I do not know if newspapers are sold in Montreal on Sunday, but there is no such thing done in Toronto. Why should we bring in a bill to prevent people selling newspapers on Sunday when there is no such thing in the city to which I belong?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I have seen it with my own eyes. I saw it one year.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I am speaking of the present time.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It is not done now because the thing was frowned down.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I say no newspaper is sold in Toronto on Sunday. "The World" is not sold on Sunday—it is delivered Saturday night before 12 o'clock. I read it every Saturday night before I go to bed. Why should such a bill as this come before us, leading the world to suppose we are immoral and encouraging the sale of newspapers on Sunday, when no such thing is done? It is our duty to set a good example in every locality for the proper observance of the Lord's day, but there is no reason, because I believe a little differently from my neighbour, why I should compel him to take a certain book and sit down in a corner and read it and nothing else on Sunday. That would be too much hardship to inflict upon Her Majesty's subjects in a free country like ours, and I hope the day will never come when a small portion of the people will bring hardship on the great mass of the population by refusing to let them pursue little innocent amusements and hold meetings that they have been in the habit of attending in many portions of this Dominion. I am not speaking of Ontario alone, but the whole Dominion and I am prepared for one, to vote for the amendment of my hon. friend from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I did not expect that the humorous remarks of my hon. friend from Halifax would have provoked such a very serious discussion on this bill. I am half inclined to think that the hon. gentleman was justified to a very large extent in the remarks which he made when he moved the amendment. At the same time, I do not feel warranted in supporting it. I consider this an unnecessary bill to be brought before Parliament in the present condition of the Dominion. I agree with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman that perhaps in no part of the world is the day of rest more strictly observed than in Canada. However, it looks to me as if this bill had been introduced with the object of drawing a red herring across the track to divert public attention from some very important acts which have lately transpired. If the resolution is carried, as proposed by the hon. member from Halifax, it will obliterate to some extent the impression, as no doubt it was intended to do. We should look at this bill as emanating, not from one individual member of the House of Commons, but from a majority of that body, and as an expression of public sentiment of the majority of the Dominion. If we at this stage of the proceedings throw out this bill it will have a serious effect on the public mind in regard to the morality of the Senate of Canada. If the bill had never been introduced we should never have been called upon to pass an opinion upon it. We are asked now to throw out this bill, and it will be practically declaring to the public that we are in favour of the sale of newspapers on Sunday.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I think that is a fair inference to be drawn—it is a declaration that we do not agree with the House of Commons that it is wrong to sell newspapers on Sunday. I think, under the circumstances, we ought to pass the bill and show that not only the House of Commons, but the Senate as well, is in favour of maintaining a day of rest as we have been doing up to the present time.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Do it by example, but do not force it upon the people.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am very sorry that I cannot agree altogether with my hon. friend be ide me (Sir Frank Smith) not upon the merits of the bill, but upon the general question, and I am very glad to hear the hon. mover of the bill disavow the intentions of the author, if he had any, in placing it on record. While I intend to vote against the amendment, very much for the reasons given by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island, I look upon the bill as unnecessary. If it were in order, I should be inclined to express my disapproval of the bill in even stronger terms than the hon. member from Halifax has used, but that has nothing to do with the merits of the question before the House. If the bill receives a second reading, I am quite sure that its promoter in this House will see that its provisions are changed. To my mind, reading it critically, it is about as strange a conglomeration of the English language as I have ever read in the shape of a statute.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It was so amended in order that it might be rejected by the House, I presume.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If that is the hon. gentleman's interpretation of my language, it is not my meaning. In reading the first clause it seems, in addition to the objection of making such a heavy penalty for selling a single newspaper, it actually authorizes and legalizes the performance of certain duties by public officials on the Sabbath which they do not discharge now, and which, under the statutes of Ontario, they could not do without violating the law. The first clause makes the publication or sale of a newspaper on Sunday an indictable offence. That is the only means by which the provisions of this bill are brought within the purview of the Dominion Parliament, but among the exceptions are the following :—

> But nothing in this section shall affect the distribution of newspapers and letters on the said Lord's Day by any postmaster in the ordinary way.

What does that mean? It must mean the giving of authority and power to any postmaster on the Lord's day to send out all the mail carriers from one end of the Dominion to the other, which they do not do now, and which under the statute which I have in my hand would be contrary to law to-day. Then there is this extraordinary exception:

> Or shall prevent the gratuitous distribution of religious publications in churches, Sunday schools or religious meetings.

It is to prevent the distribution of literature of this kind in the streets, as many of those who are engaged in religious work do on Sunday, circulating religious papers of this kind. Take the Salvation Army for instance—I do not say that I am in accord with their views and actions, but I do not hesitate to say that they have done a great deal of good in this country among many of the worst portions of our population, and they not only send out, but do themselves circulate—I do know that they sell these newspapers, if they can be called such, all through the country. The only exception in this clause is the distribution of such literature in Sunday schools, churches or religious meetings. Another idea which suggests itself to one is why, in a clause of this kind, so absurd a provision should be made as to say you exempt gratuitous circulation of religious literature. Then another question would arise, I am quite sure, in the common law as to what constitutes a newspaper. Take the dictionary for it, and you will see this bill provides a penalty of $50—for selling a newspaper containing a record of the events of the day. There is a penalty provided under this Act for a person who sells anything in the shape of a newspaper, but he could circulate in the shape of a newspaper Paul de Koch's choice literature and spread it all over the country. There is nothing to prevent that. Now, that is the kind of literature that it is desirable to suppress rather than the ordinary newspaper. I do not know that there is any further comment needed to show that this must be the work of some half dozen heads, each trying to amend it for the purpose either, as the hon. member from Richmond says, of killing it or of turning it into ridicule in order that it should really mean nothing. It is contrary to the rule in either House to refer to a member of the other, but if it were in order, I would say that the latter clause contains a principle which the author of this bill has condemned in the most violent manner possible—that is, the granting of moieties for giving information on which certain people could be punished. He has laid it down as a very heinous crime, to give the informer a moiety of the penalty imposed for a violation of the Customs Act, but in this case he actually holds out an inducement to any ruffian in any city or town to inform upon a poor boy, or a newspaper vendor, in order to get a part of the $50 or $100 fine, as the case may be. It is only another evidence of what one might designate—if it were at all in order—arrant hypocrisy. I shall not vote for the six months' hoist, and for this reason: if it goes into committee I shall do my best to assist the hon. gentleman who has moved the second reading to amend it in such a way that it will not be an absurdity. However, before I sit down, let me read the law of Ontario on Sabbath observance, to show how unnecessary any measure of this kind is, so far as the province in which I live is concerned. It seems to me that the introduction of this bill is a hypocritical attempt to gain popularity. I will read you one of the clauses of the law which provides for the observance of the Sabbath in the province of Ontario. I cannot speak for other provinces, because I have not their laws under my hands. The Ontario Statute reads this way:

> It is not lawful for any merchant, tradesman, artificer, mechanic, workman, labourer or other person whatsoever, on the Lord's day to sell or publicly show forth or expose or offer for sale or purchase any goods, chattels or other personal property or any real estate whatsoever or to do or exercise any worldly labour, business or work of any ordinary calling, conveying travellers for Her Majesty's mails by land or water, selling drugs and medicines or other works of necessity and works of charity only excepted.

The next clause prevents the holding of public meetings, public tippling, games and amusements, hunting and shooting, fishing, bathing in exposed places, etc., and provides penalties for all these offences. So far as my province is concerned, there is ample provision to prevent the profanation of the Sabbath day. Viewing this, as my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island does, I shall record my vote against the six months' hoist, for the reasons I have given. Before the people, the author of this bill, and those who take his view of it, will never explain to the people what its provisions are. They will simply hold the Senate up to contempt by saying that you voted against a bill for the better observance of the Lord's day. That is all they will say. Then explanations will have to be made, or a wrong impression will have been produced. My hon. friend laughs. It is not long ago since I had to go to the people, and I know thoroughly well how these clap-trap notions which are made in the House of Commons are used when you go to the people. My desire in rising was to endorse the views expressed by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island, and at the same time to point out what I considered to be the ridiculously absurd wording of the measure itself. There can be no doubt the object of the gentleman promoting the bill must have been to show to the world how good a man he was. My hon. friend from Monck has stated the actual truth. The provision in the third clause is the principle upon which the canals have been managed for years and years. While I had the honour, for a few months, of acting in the capacity of Minister Railways and Canals, application was made to me to allow the locks to be opened on Sundays in the afternoon, sometimes in the fall of the year, when large fleets loaded with grain and other products of the North-west were seeking an outlet to the sea, when perhaps if the locks were closed the canals would have been frozen up in a day or two and the whole trade of the country would have been at a standstill. That being the case, what did they ask? The necessity was shown, for the reasons I have already indicated, for placing the existing law upon the Statute-book. I have a very great contempt for hypocrisy I admit, but I am equally strong in the conviction that everything should be done that is possible to prevent work and desecration of the Lord's day. My hon. friend talked about Paris. I did not know, when I got up in the morning in Paris, that it was Sunday. There was stone-cutting going on, buildings being erected, horse racing, banjo playing, and everything else. I have been in a number of countries in Europe, and I have been through a good part of America, and I do not hesitate to say that, from my experience, the Sabbath is better observed in Canada, as a whole, than in any othe r part of the world.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—The hon. gentleman expressed the hope that this bill would be amended before it passed the House. Any one who followed the course of the bill in the Commons will know how it got kicked about in the Commons from pillar to post. I have seconded the motion for the second reading of the bill, as it is a step in the right direction, although I am very much surprised that the promoter should have accepted it in its present shape; he should have withdrawn it. There is nothing in the bill that is worth anything except the title. The clause of the bill which tries to prevent Sunday work does not prevent it at all. It does not prevent the carrying of papers or letters on Sunday, nor the printing of papers on Sunday, and why the bill should be aimed at the poor, helpless little boy who carries round the paper, and leave others untouched I cannot say. A man may go into his shop and do all he likes on Sunday and cannot be prosecuted, but this bill attacks a poor little boy who carries round the paper. I shall give my vote for the bill, but I consider it a perfectly useless measure. It is a mere skeleton of a bill. The hon. gentleman takes charge of it with the best motives and I second it also with the best motives. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa said he did not know what was done in the Pacific province. I will tell him. The papers are printed in Victoria on Saturday night and carried round by carriers Monday morning. On Sunday there is no paper printed, and if this bill had a clause preventing the printing of papers on Sunday it would be more effective than the present clause. I think the bill should have been withdrawn, because it will not accomplish any of the objects for which it is intended, but I would say to any one opposed to the bill that it will be harmless if passed.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I hope the House will indulge me while I say a few words in reply, because hon. gentlemen who desire fair play will feel that I am placed in a very unpleasant position, to say the least of it, in presenting this bill to the House, and at the same time I think that hon. gentlemen will also appreciate the fact that, for the reasons which I have mentioned, I should be a very great coward, and derelict in my duty as one who had always advocated every measure tending to the better observance of the Lord's day if I hesitated to take charge of the bill, bad as it is. I have told the House frankly the reasons which make it imperative upon me, no matter how the bill is drawn up, to present it. I did hope, however, that the spirit in which the House would deal with this bill would be this: that they would say, "here is a bill with reference to a subject on which this House has been petitioned time and again by large bodies of citizens, whose opinions are entitled to some weight and respect. We think the bill is a very badly drawn up one, but we desire to show, at all events, that we are not indifferent to the wishes and views of large bodies of the community, and if in any way this bill can be put in such a shape as really to conduce to the ends for which the bill was nominally framed, we are willing to give it a second reading, and cut it up as much as we please in committee, and if we find we cannot make a practicable bill at the third reading, to throw it out." At all events do not treat the bill as if the matter involved in it was of no consequence. In moving the second reading of the bill, hoping it might be thoroughly criticized in committee, I did not think it would be my duty to point out at this stage all its faults, but I would again earnestly protest against our treating it with any reference to the merits or demerits of the member who had charge of it in the other House. All I ask is that we should show some regard for the opinions of our fellow-citizens as they have been expressed by the petitions addressed to this House for such legislation as might conduce to the better observance of the Lord's day, by at all events allowing the bill to go to a second reading, and then amending it in whatever direction may be thought proper in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not desire to prolong the discussion and I have nothing new to offer regarding the bill. The objections to it have been clearly stated by several gentlemen who have spoken to-day. I have no doubt the House fully sympathizes in the position occupied by the hon. member from York whom we all know to be in favour of the principle of the bill and friendly to any legislation tending towards the object which the measure ought to have in view, but which it certainly would not accomplish. We all understand the position the hon. gentleman occupies of having to assume responsibility for a bill of which he certainly cannot approve. It is not a bill for the better observance of the Sabbath, but rather a bill for the desecration of the Sabbath, because it would make legal Sabbath work in the mail service now unknown in most of the provinces. It must be admitted by gentlemen well competent to speak, who have travelled in Europe and through Canada, as I think it is admitted everywhere, that there is no country in the world where the Lord's day is more properly observed than it is in the Dominion of Canada. I have travelled from Berlin in the north to Naples in the south of Europe, and I have spent many Sundays in various countries, and I have never been in any country where there was more strict observance of the Sabbath, where there was a greater absence of anything like servile labour of any kind than in Canada. Now an objection to a bill of this kind, especially when it accomplishes no good purpose even if we put it on our Statute-book, is that it proclaims to the world that there is a necessity for legislation of this character, and that there must be unusual desecration of the Sabbath in order to justify such a measure being submitted to Parliament. I do not want to make any personal reference to the introducer of this bill or to his motives, for every one can form his own opinions upon that score. What I contend is that the bill legalizes the practice of the distribution of the papers and letters from the mails on Sunday, which is not the case in any part of the country now, and if that clause would have any affect at all, it would be ten times worse than the selling of a few newspapers by the small boy on Sunday. This bill would give a greater chance to desecrate the Sabbath than it will restrict improper conduct upon that day, and therefore it is not such a bill as should be sent to this House. If there was a gentleman in the House who would stand up and say he approved of the bill, or thought the passage of it might be a benefit, then we should consent to the second reading. But the sending of such a bill to the Senate is simply an insult which we can only resent properly by adopting the motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, which I intend to vote for. It may be said if we take that course it will go broadcast over the country that we are against the proper observance of the Sabbath, and against legislation to produce that effect. I am not afraid of anything of that kind, and if such a result were likely to occur, it should not deter us from doing our duty. Those who are agitating for legislation of this kind are an intelligent class. They are amongst the most intelligent people of our country, and know as well as anybody else that this bill is a miserable abortion as it comes up to us, and that if placed on the Statute-book, it might stand in the way of something better in the future. I am not at all afraid that the slightest misapprehension as to the action of the Senate will get abroad in this country by our giving the bill the six months' hoist. There is too much intelligence in this country for us to have any such fear, but whether we have or not, our duty is to act upon our convictions and reject the bill, which has not one single claim upon the attention of the House, and which would make the law upon the subject of Sabbath observance worse than it is at the present time. This country does not require this legislation. The opinion that has been expressed by every hon. member of the House regarding the subject will be appreciated by the people and prevent any misunderstanding. No member who has addressed the House on this question has said a word in opposition to the proper observance of the Sabbath. The tone of the debate has been of the most suitable and proper kind, and the intelligent electors of this country reading it will see that we have no animus against Sabbath observance in rejecting this wretched travesty of a bill. I shall cheerfully support the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—It is pretty well understood in our part of the country that a publisher in Toronto is very anxious to start a Sunday paper. This bill is opposed to the printing of papers on Sunday, but Sunday papers are usually printed on Saturday night and distributed on Sunday morning. The provision of this bill, as I read them, allow a Sunday paper to be published and distributed in the ordinary way through the post office and through the deliveries of the mail. That is something which we have not allowed heretofore, something which has not been recognized on the statutes of Ontario or the statutes of the Dominion, and it seems to me that it has been overlooked by the hon. gentleman who has had charge of the bill in the other House, and possibly by the hon. gentleman who introduced it here. I am satisfied the members of this House desire a proper observance of the Lord's day, but certainly it seems to me if this bill is passed, matters are put in a worse shape than before, as far as the observance of the Lord's day is concerned, and it would be a strange thing if further investigation shows that to be the case. I have just read it hastily, and I have heard the opinion of my hon. friend opposite, and the opinion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I quite agree with them that it would make matters worse than now, so far as the observance of the Lord's day is concerned, and it would be a strange thing if this Senate has not enough strength of mind to throw out this bill, lest its action should be misconstrued.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—It is my intention to vote for the motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, because I do not believe the bill is necessary. I agree with the hon. gentlemen who have already already addressed this House, that Canada stands equal, at least, to any country in the observance of the Lord's day. That being so, I do not see any necessity for legislation on the subject, and certainly not for such legislation as this bill proposes. Much stress has been laid by the hon. introducer of this bill on the fact that a measure of this kind has been called for by the different religious bodies in the country. While I have the greatest possible respect for the representatives of the different religious bodies, and for their views upon a great moral or religious question such as this, yet I fear that in some instances they are induced by parties, who perhaps have not altogether the same objects in view as they have to lend their countenance or support to legislation, which they have not very well, and properly considered, I am quite certain that this has been done in this instance, because the first clause of the bill reads in this way:—

1. Whoever shall on the Lord's day, either as proprietor, publisher or manager, engage in the printing, publication or delivery of a newspaper, journal or periodical, and whoever shall on the Lord's day engage in the sale, distribution or circulation of any newspaper, journal or periodical, shall be deemed to be guilty of an indictable offence.

In many churches in the province from which I come missionary publications and religious literature are received by the clergyman and distributed through the pews on Sunday to the subscribers to these publications. If I know anything at all about it, this section in the bill would render the people in the churches who distribute the denominational literature subject to a fine. The only exception to the rule is the gratuitous distribution on the Lord's day, and this distribution to which I refer is certainly not gratuitous. It would be an extraordinary thing if we legislated to make these people guilty of an indictable offence. I take objection to the bill on that ground, which has not been presented to the House, as well as on many others which have been presented by other hon. gentlemen. With regard to the canals, I must say I do not think the legislation is proper at all. I have passed through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal on the Lord's day on a steamer belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railway. It might have been at a season of the year when an order in council would under this bill permit it. There were thirteen steamers ahead of us waiting to go through and I think about twenty behind us before we got through. I am speaking of a canal which this bill would not affect, but the principle is the same. We are having a canal built on our own side. The Almighty put the lakes there to be used, and we recognize the propriety of all this, and do not propose to prohibit navigation on the Lord's day, and yet by this bill we are asked to say that what the Almighty says is right we enact is wrong. I cannot agree with any such legislation, and for these reasons will vote for the amendment.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I yield to no gentleman in this honourable House in my respect for the Sabbath and would be willing to go as far as any man here to insure its correct observance, but I do not think the object of the bill will be at all attained by the provision of this measure. In fact, as has been said already, it actually defeats the objects set forth in the title. It has been said here that petitions have come in repeatedly from the religious bodies in our Dominion asking for a law of this character. I question very much if any one of those religious denominations would be disposed, had they the option at the present moment, to accept that emasculated skeleton of a thing presented to us to-day for consideration, as in any wise exponent of their views on this subject. Holding these opinions I wish to say I shall support the amendment of the hon. member from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It appears to me we are wasting a great deal of time in discussing details at this stage of this bill. The errors and wrong expressions in the bill would all come under consideration in committee and would be either changed or struck out. We are simply now considering the principle of the bill. Is it right that we should have such a bill? I admit the force of the criticisms made by hon. members and I have some additional ones to make myself, but I attach a great deal of importance to the action that we may take with regard to the second reading. I do not like the idea of the Senate throwing out the bill in this brusque way and saying we will have nothing to do with it. There have been petitions to this House by a large number of the best people of this country asking for Sabbath observance legislation, and those petitions should have some weight with us. If we adopt the amendment what will go forth to the world? That a bill for the better observance of the Lord's day was passed by the Commons, and the Senate threw it out without looking at it. The community generally will not take the trouble of ascertaining the contents of the bill. They do not wait to investigate and see that a bill will actually secure what it proposes to secure; they will deal with the title of the bill simply.. They will say that the Commons passed a bill for the better observance of the Lord's day in compliance with a request from the wisest and best people of our land, and that the Senate would not give it a second reading. By such a course we would lower ourselves in the estimation of the country and occasion a very unjust judgment to be formed against us. It would be done because they were not present to hear this discussion, and do not know the points of objection; they would only deal with the general question that such a bill was passed by the Commons and sent to us and rejected here. The least we can do is to let the bill have its second reading and then in committee, if we cannot get it in proper shape, there are ways of rejecting it, but it would be wrong for us to throw it out in this brusque way. It is not an unimportant question, now coming up for the first time. For years and years this question has been before, not only Canada, but other countries in the world, and any of you who have taken note of what is going on in other countries must have observed this fact, that for the last few years there has been a tendency in all civilized countries to have legislation of this kind—countries which heretofore have paid no regard to the protection of the rights of people to a day of rest, but have waked up to the importance of it. Their eyes have been opened to the fact that they are violating a law of that great Being who gave to man that day of rest and taking away from the people a privilege which has been given to them from on high. All legislation should be for the protection of the rights of the people and especially a right of that kind. The necessity of it and the importance of it are thoroughly established by recognizing what has been taking place for some years past—especially the facts which have been noted by people whose attention has been directed to the advantages of keeping of a day of rest and the result of it in countries where it is observed and countries where it is disregarded. Investigation has established the infinite wisdom which gave to man a seventh day of rest. Even those who pay no attention whatever to the divine authority for it, which to my mind is the strongest and highest consideration—I am quite aware that it is not an argument to be advanced here—regard the necessity of a seventh day of rest. In guarding the civil rights of the people it is right to point to the fact that there is connected with our bodily constitution a necessity for that seventh day of rest. It was attempted to be set aside at the time of the French revolution when, in the anxiety to remove every vestige of Christianity, every tenth day was made the day of rest, but it resulted only in evil, and they returned to the seventh day of rest. The experience of the whole civilized world is to the effect that it is a great privilege and right which belongs to the people and especially the working classes to enjoy that day of rest.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—We all agree to that; no one objects to it.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I am quite aware that you agree with the general theory, but I contend that this is a step in the right direction, although a very small one. By dealing with it in the way that the hon. gentleman from Halifax proposes, we are, as it were, setting our faces against the principle—we are declaring that the principle of the bill is not worth the consideration of this House. I hope that the amendment will be rejected and the bill will be allowed to go to the second reading.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The great objection to this bill is its weakness—that it is not sweeping enough—but in my opinion it is in the right direction and I shall vote for the second reading.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was adopted by the following vote:—

INSOLVENCY BILL.

HOUSE AGAIN IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (C) "An Act respecting Insolvency."

At six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (C) "An Act respecting Insolvency."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—In moving that the chairman rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the clauses and the subjects to which they refer, and propose to have these different clauses printed, as it is proposed to insert them in the bill, and circulate them on Monday morning, so that each member can have a copy and be better able to judge as to their merits, and thus be able to make suggestions after a little thought and consideration. The third clause stands, which deals with the definition of traders as affirmed by the vote in the House the other day. The 12th clause, which also stands, has reference to the annulling of the order, which is somewhat in its present shape, a little confused. The 35th has reference to the amount, 66⅔ cents on the dollar before any insolvent can obtain his discharge.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I may say that I intend to move the motion I made in committee on that, to reduce it to 50 cents.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—And the 61st clause also stands, which has reference to the dispute, you will remember, between the banks and the boards of trade. I am merely pointing out the reasons for allowing these clauses to stand, and the subjects to which they refer. My hon. friend on my right gives notice that he intends to make a motion with regard to the 35th clause. I know that the senator from Milton also intends to deal with that. The opinions on that point are as varied, perhaps, as there are clauses. Some are in favour of striking it out altogether upon the ground that if a man is insolvent, and has become insolvent honestly, there is no reason why he should not have his discharge because he cannot pay 66⅔ cents on the dollar. Others, again, think there should be a stated sum of 33⅓, while the majority of the select committee decided it should be 66. These are the changes in the first two. There is no necessity for changing the other, because that involves a principle as to the ranking of banks for voting at meetings of insolvents, but the other two, which are the most important, we will have printed for your consideration.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I should like to call the attention of the Minister to another point of some importance connected with this. I observe in this bill there is no scale of fees whatever. I have a very strong letter from the clerk of the county court in one of the counties of Nova Scotia, who is in a situation to know, because he was a clerk of the court under the former dispensation, and therefore he knows whether it is convenient or not. He presses strongly that there should be a scale of fees passed by this Parliament and annexed to the bill, so that every one on looking at the bill could tell how much it would cost, and so on, and that there should be no question about taxation, as there would be by leaving it to the scale of fees in the supreme court or any other court. He also presses it strongly on my notice that one of the great objections to the operation of the old Act was the enormous expense incurred in carrying it out, and as in this as in the other Act the court is called upon to act in almost every case at one stage or another of the proceedings, and then comes in the court expenses, the fees of the attorneys and the prothonotary and clerks and witnesses. As to the witness fees, there can be no difficulty, but with regard to the functionaries it is necessary and expedient, I think, that there should be some scale of fees attached to the bill. I do not know whether it would be necessary to do it now, because we shall probably hear more of this bill hereafter. We might do it hereafter, but I thought it my duty, as the matter was so strongly pressed upon me by one of the functionaries of the court who has to deal with it, to bring it to the attention of the Minister so that he might consider it and bring it to the attention of the House.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Does not the hon. member from Amherst think that the 116th clause, which provides for the very point to which he refers, meets his case much better than we can do it by attempting to set down fees. The first part of the clause refers to the province of Quebec and the subsections two and three to the other provinces. That gives the court the power to regulate the fees. It seems to me it would be somewhat difficult for us to attempt to lay down a scale of fees for all cases. However, it is a matter worth considering, if the hon. gentleman comes to a conclusion, after reading the clauses carefully, that it does not cover it.

Hon. Mr. READ, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit again on Tuesday next.

The Senate adjourned at 9.15 p. m.

SECOND READING.

Bill (101) "An Act to incorporate the Alberta Southern Railway Company."—(Mr. Perley.)

PUBLIC HARBOURS BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved concurrence in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (U) "An Act respecting public harbours." He said: The change is not very great, although it is somewhat important. The third clause of the bill is struck out and instead of the word "all" they have substituted "any." It takes from the Government, in the case of the ports of Quebec, Montreal, Three Rivers, Toronto, Halifax, Pictou and St. John, N.B., the power to make any rules or regulations affecting these harbours, which are managed under special Acts of incorporation, except they are asked for, or with the approval of the harbour commissioners, or, in as in the case of St. John, with the consent of the harbour board of that city.

The motion was agreed to.

CALGARY IRRIGATION COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Private Bills to Bill (55) "An Act respecting the Calgary Irrigation Company." He said: I have consulted the promoters of this bill, and they are quite willing to accept the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY'S BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (EE) "An Act respecting the incorporation and regulation of Joint Stock Companies."

(In the Committee,)

On section 1,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Sections 1 to 5, inclusive, are taken from the corresponding clauses of the present Canadian Act, and there are no changes.

On subsection 1,

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph 1 provides that "the expression company, means a company incorporated under this Act." The Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, at the second reading, said that, if possible, the Government would decide to have this Act, as far as regards liquidation, apply to companies already in existence—companies incorporated under chapter 119 of the Revised Statutes—and I wish to suggest that if the Government have not yet made up their minds not to do that, it would be well to keep paragraph 1 open, so that we can insert something like this: "As to purposes of liquidation, any company which may be put into liquidation under this Act"—just to keep it open.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have no objection. We desire however, as far as possible in any amendments we may make, not to interfere with existing corporations. The suggestion made by the hon. member from Halifax, only applies to companies that are solvent and may desire to go into liquidation under the provisions of this Act. I see no particular objection to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman nor does the department whom I have consulted on this point, but in order that we may have further time to consider this particular point, it may be left open. We may leave the whole interpretation clause open until we finish the bill. Then, if there should be any change which would affect the interpretation clause, we could change it accordingly.

The clause was allowed to stand-

On clause three,

Hon. Mr. POWER—A change is made in the number. The existing law provides that "any five persons, etc.," and unless some evil consequences have arisen from that interpretation, I do not see why we should increase the number. If you can get five persons who bona fide go into an undertaking, I think that is sufficient.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It has been deemed by the Finance Department better to increase it to seven. It is greater evidence of the bona fides of the company. It is more difficult to get seven than five. I think it is in the way of protection rather than otherwise, and I should like to see it remain.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5,

Hon. Mr. POWER—Speaking as a member from a comparatively small province, I think the provision as to the capital stock in the latter part of paragraph b, of subclause 4, is rather objectionable. The effect of that is practically that you cannot have a loan company with a less capital than about two million dollars. It may be easy enough to get a sum of that sort in Ontario or Quebec, but in the lower provinces it would be very difficult to do that, and if a company can pay in $100,000 they should be allowed to go into operation.. I do not think there is a loan company in Nova Scotia now—that is one recently established—which has more than $100,000 paid in. It would practically put an end to the establishing of further loan companies in the lower provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can form companies under the provincial law.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—That is the minimum capital under the present law and it is not deemed advisable to make it any less.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 50,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Is not this somewhat different from the existing Act?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes, it is copied from the English Act; it differs from ours in this respect: in our law there is no such liability, in the event of winding up a company, as this bill provides. A shareholder who receives information from a director that a company is about to fail can dispose of his stock, thereby relieving himself of his liability. This provision of the bill holds a past member of the company liable if the transfer has been made at any time within twelve months of the winding up of the company. This provision of the bill is considered much safer.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 81,

Hon. Mr. POWER—There should be some provision for serving process in the several provinces. Under this clause, any summons, notice or other such document to be served upon the company, must be left at the registered office of the company. There should be a provision for serving such documents upon any officer or agent of the company.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—In the province of Quebec there is a provision for serving notice under such circumstances.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There should be some means of serving the process without having to go out of the province. Supposing a company is legally domiciled in Toronto and does business in Nova Scotia, and a liability is incurred in that province, under the clause of this bill relating to the subject the process must be served in Toronto. There should be a clause to provide that the process can be served on any recognized agent of the company resident in the province.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is provided for already by the local legislatures.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The joint stock companies to be formed under this legislation will come under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and clause 81 of this bill makes provision as to the service of legal documents. No local legislature can make a provision other than this in clause 81.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are foreign companies and federal companies that have offices in the different provinces, and the services on any of those offices is held by the court to be good.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That may be true as to foreign companies, but not in the case of companies incorporated by the federal Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am assured that a clause such as the hon. gentleman wishes to have added to this bill is wholly unnecessary, because each province has its own regulations on the subject. However, I will call attention to it and, if necessary, we can make the amendment suggested.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a matter of very great consequence and it would be well to have the opinion of the Justice Department on that point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Even in the Division Court there is a provision made for service on the agents of any corporation whose head office is in another province.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 93,

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is there no provision in the present Companies Act for an inspection or this kind.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does not the Minister think these provisions 88-93 might very well be made applicable to existing companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me when a company is incorporated it takes its charter subject to any subsequent amendments of the law with respect to companies. These provisions are in the public interest and I do not think there would be any difficulty whatever in making them applicable to existing companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are a great many family companies, the Massey-Harris Company and so on, and it would be absurd that they should be subject to this system which they never contemplated. It would be a foolish policy to adopt and could not be done with fairness.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Massey-Harris Company is incorporated by an Act of Parliament and the provisions of this bill would not apply to it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It would be unfair, I think, to make companies at present existing, come under a process which was never contemplated at the time they received their charter. I agree, however, with the provision in its entirety, and think it a pity that it was not in operation long ago.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 160,

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a provision in the beginning of the bill that a loan company shall not go into operation until $200,000 of the capital stock is paid in, and in clause 160, it is provided that companies shall not borrow money unless at least $100,000 of the capital stock has been paid up. I find the Minister was mistaken as to the provision in the existing law, which corresponds with clause 5 of the bill. In section 5 of the Act, the amount is $100,000, and not $200,000, as in the present bill. Why should we double the present amount? The Minister said the present law requires $200,000, but I find it only requires $100,000.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have no recollection of giving any explanation of clause 5. Clause 5 of the bill is founded on section 4 of the Canadian Act. The underlined words are new.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Minister said he was under the impression that the present Act required $200,000.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Supposing we change each of the clauses and make it $100,000 all through.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the best way.

The suggestion was adopted.

On clause 195,

Hon. Mr. POWER—If it is intended to bring existing corporations under the operation of this bill, this clause should be amended.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I doubt the propriety of doing so. The existing companies know exactly the extent of their powers and while there may be some reasons for adopting the suggestion, as a matter of principle it would be much better not to make the bill have a retroactive effect. It would be better to leave the companies already incorporated to the operation of the existing law, and let new ones come under this measure. If we were to act on the hon. gentleman's suggestion we would have to consider the propriety not only of including companies formed under the Joint Stock Companies Act, but also those incorporated under special charters. If it is an advantage to existing companies, formed under the Joint Stock Companies Act, it would be equally advantageous to those that possess special charters. It would be as well to leave matters as they are and let the existing companies come in if they like.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The position of companies incorporated by special Acts is altogether different from that of companies incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act. It is proposed to repeal all the provisions of the existing Act with respect to the formation of companies, and as we are making provision for the liquidation of companies, we could not be accused of passing retroactive legislation, because the liquidation has not taken place. One would not undertake to deal with liquidation which had actually begun, but if we can find a cheaper process of liquidating companies than is furnished by the existing law, I do not see why every company should not have the advantage of it.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Is the proposition that liquidation only shall apply to existing companies? For instance, would not the provisions with regard to watering apply to existing companies?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I think they should.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If it was understood that hereafter every joint stock company going into liquidation should come under the provisions of this Act, there could be no confusion whatever—any voluntary liquidation must be under the provisions of this bill. If we leave the law as it is now, companies incorporated under this bill must be liquidated in one way while companies incorporated before the passage of this bill must be liquidated in another way, and there is danger of confusion and doubt. The subject is worthy of consideration and I would suggest that the clause be allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is no necessity to let it stand. If it is advisable to adopt the policy that the hon. gentleman suggests, a new clause would be required to provide that companies now in existence might take advantage of it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—They could do that anyway, could they not?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—With regard to this question, it appears pretty clear that the framers of this Act contemplated that the winding up of companies already formed should be left to the operation of this measure, because he said:

The Companies Act, chapter one hundred and nineteen of the Revised Statutes of Canada is hereby repealed so far as regards the formation or incorporation hereafter of any company by virtue of any of the provisions thereof, but every company incorporated by virtue of the said Act shall so remain and no provision of the said Act shall, as touching any such company be in any wise affected by this Act.

This is as to the incorporation of the company. Therefore, it is an apparent contradiction. If you intend that the winding-up part of the bill shall not apply, you must alter that repealing clause, and make it applicable to the winding-np as well as the formation or incorporation of every company.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman reads that carefully he will see that this does not go so far as he says it does.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Does the hon. gentleman not think it worth while to consider whether it may be advisable to give the companies at present established the advantage of the present provisions for winding up?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I will bring the matter under the notice of my colleagues and see if they concur in the views taken by hon. gentlemen; if they do, a special clause will be drafted for that purpose.

The clause was adopted.

On table "B,"

Hon. Mr. POWER—What were the fees formerly for registration of a company whose capital does not exceed $20,000?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The old fees were $40, and they are increased to $200. These fees are not heavy, in proportion to what is charged in England. It was thought that the formation of these companies might be made a source of revenue, and it would be more likely to result in good solvent companies being organized.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Forty dollars is a very small fee, but $200 seems to me to be too much, and if the fees are made too large, the Government really defeat their own object, because it would be cheaper to go to the Local Legislature, and about as cheap to come to this Parliament. I think if the fees were $100, the Government would get more revenue.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If they come before Parliament and employ a lawyer to draft their Bill, I think by the time they get through the committee, it would cost them just as much. $200 is little enough for a company with a capital of $100,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am speaking of the fee for the smallest company, where the capital does not exceed $20,000. It may be only $5,000.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This is the interpretation clause, and it will not in any way affect the suggestions made by the hon. member from Halifax and the hon. member from York. A provision can be made by special clause, that notwithstanding anything in this Act, etc., etc.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 81,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I am going to make a suggestion in reference to this clause, that we should pass it and if it be found that it does not carry out the suggestions made by the hon. member from Halifax, I will move, upon its third reading, that it be referred back to the committee for the purpose of making such amendments as will accomplish the same object, and we will gain a day in passing the bill should it be found unnecessary to make the changes. With regard to the other changes, I can adopt the same course.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the commiteee, reported the bill with amendmeuts, which were concurred in.

The Senate adjourned at 5 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, 19th June, 1894.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

WINTER COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Queen's, P.E.I.) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General: praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of the report made on the 5th May, 1891, by Sir Douglas Fox, regarding the proposed tunnel under the Straits of Northumberland.

Also, copies of reports on the same subject by Mr. Francis Baine, dated the 9th and 18th of December, 1890, and the 14th of March, 1891.

He said: I make this motion in accordance with the understanding arrived at on Thursday last at the suggestion of the hon. leader of the House, with the object of having the report brought down and printed in the sessional papers. The understanding was that the report alone should be brought down, without the plans and maps which are attached to it. If necessary, I will have the motion amended so as to have only the report brought down, as the publication of the plans and maps would be expensive.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I would ask the hon. gentleman to modify the motion by stating that the report should be brought down without the plans, because if the order of the House is transmitted in this shape, the officers will think that the plans are included and they could not take it upon themselves to leave them out.

The motion was amended accordingly and agreed to.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES INCORPORATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the third reading of Bill (EE) "An Act respecting the incorporation and regulation of Joint Stock Companies." He said: The House will remember that when we were in committee yesterday upon this bill I intimated I would call the attention of the Justice Department to the suggestions thrown out by the hon. gentleman from Halifax in reference to the clause which provides for the serving of processes in certain cases. The law officers of the Crown are under the impression that that is not necessary. In reference to that provision of the bill which refers to solvent companies going into liquidation, I had a conference with the Minister of Justice and he said that he could see no serious objection to adopting the suggestion, but thought it inadvisable, without further consideration, to make any of the provisions of the bill applicable to companies already in existence and working under another law, but that he would give the matter further consideration and if he deemed it necessary or advisable to make those clauses applicable to companies now working under the Joint Stock Companies Act, he would attend to it when it reached the House of Commons.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

THIRD READING.

Bill (53) "An Act respecting the Calgary Irrigation Co."—(Mr. Perley).

INSOLVENCY BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that the House resolve intself into a committee of the whole on Bill (C) "An Act respecting Insolvency."

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Before the Speaker leaves the chair, I should like to make a remark or two in reference to the bill before the House, and in doing so I may say, for the comfort of the House, that I do not intend to discuss the bill at large. It will be remembered at a former stage of the bill, on the second reading, it was suggested, and the suggestion was acted upon, that means should be taken to ascertain the views of persons, as far as they could, in the country upon the bill as then proposed, and in accordance with that I placed myself in communication with certain persons in my own county by sending them copies of the bill, expressing the wish that they should return to me their opinions thereon, and I perhaps may be excused for again reminding the House that it was the bill as originally introduced that was thus distributed. In response to that, I received several communications from the mayor and the ex-mayor of the shiretown of my own county, and from several leading merchants and manufacturers of that district, and from one who for a long time represented the county in the local legislature. I will trouble the House by reading extracts from these replies unaccompanied by any remarks of my own, but I think it is due to the writers to give their opinions and due to myself, when I took the trouble to send for those opinions, that I should at all events extend to them the courtesy of having their opinions made known to the House and the country. The first communication, after stating several leading objections to the bill with which I shall not trouble the House, goes on to say :—

I have known large Upper Canadian firms give credit to a class in our country villages that I would certainly hesitate before granting. It increases the number of insolvents, the creditors being removed from the neighbourhood, and not being in sympathy with the debtor, conduct his affairs on "business principles," become suspicious of renewals, lighten his accounts, if possible and force insolvency. It lessens the debtor's credit at home, while temporarily improving it abroad. When the time of difficulty comes he is unable to obtain the necessary assistance and failure follows. During the recent hard times I believe there are many persons in this province, who, by judicious renewals and assistance of creditors have tided over their difficulties, and are now solvent, where, under an insolvency law, they would have been forced into bankruptcy. Under the present law the debtor is not subject to imprisonment for debt, nor can he be unduly harassed by the creditor, and I have never known a case where the honest but unfortunate debtor failed by mutual agreement to obtain a fair compromise or settlement with his creditors.

I may say that is entirely in accord with my own experience.

The present method is inexpensive. Under it I have compromised debts for fifty cents on the dollar, when, under the proposed law I do not think an estate could be made to pay ten cents. I do not see any reason why it should embrace any but legitimate dealers for the larger estates.

I need not read further because that is a consideration outside of the question—whether it should be confined to traders. Then he said finally :

I think no great disaster would happen to the country at large if this matter were given another year for further ventilation.

The next opinion is that of the gentleman who, as I have already stated, represented my own county for many years, and I suppose it will hardly alter the opinion of hon. gentlemen on the subject to add that certainly his politics are not in accordance with mine. He says :

It does not seem to be the opinion of our business men that such an Act is needed. The majority of those with whom I have spoken on the subject were of the opinion that the effect of the Act would be to increase the foreign credit of traders, and decrease their local credit. I am using the word "foreign" here to include the credit which our traders receive from Montreal and Toronto houses.

The next is from a practical man, being an officer of the court who is familiar with the working of the law, and he says that—

The Act looks too cumbersome to be of general utility.

As I understand it, a receiver is appointed who takes charge of the estate until the creditors appoint an assignee. All these people have to be paid, and in some estates the whole will be used up in expenses.

He is a man who speaks from long practice, and he adds :

On general principles I think the trouble lies with the wholesale men, who are so anxious to do business that they credit any one and induce people to buy their goods before they are needed.

He thinks that is the source of the trouble. Now there is another also from a cautious man, who says :

I cannot reply intelligently to your request. I notice many of the commercial papers, reviews and boards of trade are unfavourable to the bill. Personally, I am of the opinion a good Insolvency Act would be of advantage or beneficial, and, as far as I can judge from a hasty perusal of the bill, the main features are good, but I agree with you that it is best to make haste slowly, and by allowing the bill to stand until next session would give ample time to get the views of business men in all sections of the Dominion.

There is only another, which comes from one of the most reliable authorities that we have in my own part of the Dominion :

After your committee get through with it, if Parliament would have a large number of copies printed, as amended in committee, have them sent to boards of trade, county and town councils, and leading commercial men, requesting them to study and debate on the Act and report to next session, I believe a much better Act would be the result.

In that respect he follows out the suggestion of the ex-mayor of the town.

I do not think the Act is needed at present and believe the request for it comes from about one or two hundred leading wholesale merchants, mostly in Montreal and Toronto. My experience is that more than half the traders are liable to be short of money at some time in every year, and have to be accommodated with renewals on notes or postpone payments, and if these people were forced to assign, the number of failures would be ever increasing. One failure brings on another by the slaughter of bankrupt stocks, as well as by destroying confidence. Very few, however successful, but what can look back to some period when they might have been forced into insolvency under such an Act as this. I say that no one should assign or be allowed to assign so long as there is a possibility of getting on, and not then unless he is incompetent or dishonest. If the party is competent and only lacks capital it is much cheaper and better for creditors to compromise for a percentage of amounts due. Referring to section 50, it seems to me that any creditor who is opposed to the debtor being placed in insolvency, and does not sign off or accept any dividend should be allowed to take judgment for the amount of debts. There are many people with little or no means and of the same amount of brains, who would gladly become traders if they knew they could pay their debts.

Further on he says :

I am afraid it will be an injury to the Maritime Provinces. I believe also it will be unpopular.

I need offer no apology to the House for reading these opinions. I have several other communications, but it would only weary the House to attempt to read them. The general tenor of public opinion I found to be this: very few approve of the bill ; a somewhat larger percentage thought that the bill might be improved by amendments so as to work ; but the overwhelming opinion was against having the bill at all until at least it was sent to the different parts of the country so that the people might know exactly what sort of a measure they would have. I do not wish to take up time making observations of my own ; I am merely communicating the information which I have received from persons in my own province more competent to judge than I am. Before resuming my seat I ought to say in justice and fairness to the Government that they have treated the House and the committee very fairly in regard to this bill. They adhered to their bill as long as they could, and when they found it necessary, in deference to the opinion of the committee, they yielded, particularly of late, on this question as to what class of persons the bill shall apply to. They have yielded not only to the opinion of the committee but also, as it seems by these letters, to the overwhelming opinion of people in the country, that this bill in the first instance should be, as the last bill was, confined to traders, or persons whom you may define as traders, and in regard to that I think the Government have made a very much better definition than it had in the first bill. That was entirely too wide and made it absurdly extensive, so that it included persons that really it was not necessary to legislate about, and I think that the amended bill is a very great improvement. The circular which has been submitted as to the amendments to be made to the bill is entirely in accordance with my own feeling, and I think they would be a very great improvement.

The motion was agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The House will remember that the motion which was carried at the sitting of the Senate, confined the operation of the bill to traders, and the third clause was consequently left for the consideration of the committee to-day. I therefore move that the 3rd clause of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

3. This Act applies only to traders as hereinafter defined to incorporated companies, carrying on a business which if carried on by a person would make the person so carrying it on a trader within the meaning of this Act, and the word "debtor" in this Act means a trader or incorporated company subject to its provisions.

2. The following are traders within the meaning of this Act:—

(a.) Persons who as a means of livelihood buy or otherwise acquire goods, wares, merchandise, or commodities, ordinarily the subject of trade and commerce, and who sell or otherwise dispose of the same to others;

(b.) Commission merchants, whether they sell by auction or otherwise;

(c.) Manufacturers of goods, wares, merchandise, or commodities, ordinarily the subject of trade and commerce;

(d.) Millers of all kinds;

(e.) Builders and contractors for buildings or other works;

(f.) Common carriers and persons engaged in the business of shippers, trans-shippers or forwarders of goods;

(g.) Underwriters or persons insuring vessels or their freights against the perils of the seas.

3. If a debtor within the meaning of this Act ceases to carry on the business which makes him subject to the provisions of this Act, he shall nevertheless continue to be subject to the provisions of this Act so long as he has outstanding debts and liabilities contracted or incurred in the course of such business, which would under this Act be provable against his estate and which are not barred or prescribed by any Statute of Limitations or otherwise, but no proceedings shall be instituted against such debtor by a creditor under this Act unless founded upon a debt or liability contracted or incurred in the course of such business.

4. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to make any of the provisions of this Act apply to the following companies, societies or corporations, or any of them, that is to say, incorporated banks, savings banks, insurance companies, loan companies, building societies, railway companies (including electric and street railway companies), telegraph or telephone companies, or municipal, school, or other corporations of a public nature.

There may be some diversity of opinion as to the definition of what is to be considered a trader, and I should be glad to receive suggestions from hon. gentlemen with reference to this particular clause so as to extend its operations, or restrict them if it be deemed advisable to do so.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—As I understand it, all classes of the community are included excepting farmers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, it is confined to persons in trade.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES—What are you going to do with farmers who carry on ranching operations?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Leave them out.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES—In these days a farmer may be a trader. He may run a ranche, buy and sell cattle, etc.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the court considered that that was his means of livelihood, I presume the court might include him.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I think if the hon. gentleman reads clause a he will see that it covers the case to which he refers. If a man is a merchant and carries on a farm he is included.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I presume my hon. friend has satisfied himself that millers of all kinds do not come under the classification of traders. They manufacture goods, wares, merchandise and commodities. I am not objecting particularly to the presence of this paragraph, but I do not think it is necessary.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—They will come under the classification of manufacturers. Some men have small portable mills which would not bring them under the operation of this bill.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—My attention was called to this before and I came to the conclusion that they came within the meaning of the clause, but in order to prevent any mistake or difficulty in the future I think it would be as well to allow it to remain. It can do no possible harm and makes it more clear in its explanation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But unless a miller is actually in the buying and selling business he should not come under this bill. Take the case of a miller who collects tolls for grinding grain.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM.—What does he do with the tolls—does he not sell them?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—In our province we have several small millers who are merely customs millers, who grind grain at a toll or a certain rate. I think subsection a would allow them and farmers to come in—that is, farmers who buy and sell cattle. I think it would be better that they should come in, but I am only pointing it out.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—As to the definition of what a farmer is, the exemption granted under this bill applies only to a farmer who sells the produce of his farm. If a farmer buys cattle from other farmers, for the purpose of selling them, and not merely for the purpose of stocking his own farm, he becomes a trader. That is the definition the courts have always held. If a man claims the advantage of calling himself a farmer, you have to distinguish whether he sells more than the produce of his own farm. If he goes into business beyond that, he becomes an ordinary trader.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When I made the suggestion which I did, it was not on the ground taken by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, or the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, but it was that paragraph d was unnecessary because the millers were included under c but if those millers who simply take tolls are not included under c I think it is better that they should be omitted. A miller who comes under the class of manufacturers would come under clause c, and if he is not a manufacturer I do not think he should come in.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There are very few millers of that kind in the province of Ontario. If they do grind grain for a toll, they sell the flour and with the proceeds buy wheat to grind. I think it is better to leave the miller in. If it is better to go into insolvency, why not give them all the benefit, if it is going to make them rich.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—During the last 20 or 30 years nearly 90 per cent of all the millers in the country have had to go out of business or into bankruptcy. Very few of them but have made some sort of private settlement with their creditors. They have bought wheat when they thought flour was going to sell at a good price and have lost money. Almost invariably the miller, who had been successful as a farmer and thought he would do a good deal better if he had a mill in addition, and, if he had a water privilege, built a mill and had a store and carried on a fine business apparently that promised great success, and in 10 or 15 years lost his mill his store and his farm. That has been the case to such an extent that in the old counties of York and Ontario, where there were a great many millers, they have nearly all gone out of business. They have dwindled down to doing a little grist for the neighbouring farmers or chopping up stuff for stock. The milling is done by the large establishments such as the Ogilvie mills and others, and the St. Catharines mills, where they have a very large power at a small cost, and the products of those mills are shipped to such places as the county of York. All the little villages there are supplied with flour from those large mills. The manufacturing millers have given up the business in the main. A few still do what you may call a gristing business and a few perhaps supply the bakers, but the greater part of the work is being done by the large mills and a great deal of the flour is shipped from Manitoba to the neighbourhood of Toronto where formerly a great deal of milling was done. I think the fewer men in the country that venture upon running a moderately large mill the better, because they are almost sure to fail. Many of our shrewdest men have failed in the business. Not one in ten has succeeded and in some sections of the country not that many. Where they fail they ought to have the advantage of the Act. Many of these men are good, honest, pushing men, and if they happen to get into bankruptcy they should not be left hopelessly in debt and it would be a pity if they were obliged to leave the country in order to start a new business. There are even farmers in that condition. We had supposed until recently that in the counties of York and Ontario, in the vicinity of a large growing manufacturing and commercial city, there was no danger of our farms going down in price, but we found that we were mistaken. In a few cases, where property was forced into the market, we found that farms had gone down 50 per cent in price, and parties who were supposed up to four or five years ago to be worth $25,000 or $30,000, owning three or four large farms, energetic men, whose forefathers had settled in that part of the country as far back as the year 1800, are hopelessly involved to-day. Some of them had ventured, perhaps, a little too far in taking up lands in Manitoba in the interest of their families, and they invested so much that the fall in value of the real estate at home has utterly ruined them, leaving them ten or fifteen thousand dollars worse than nothing, not through any dissipation or wild trading, but through the decrease in values; and now, according to this bill, there is no remedy for these men but to leave the country. It is hardly to be expected, if a man has had a farm with two or three mortgages upon it and he comes to sell the farm and it pays the first mortgage only, leaving a second mortgage of ten or twelve thousand dollars, that the mortgagee would be satisfied to lose all. Yet such a case has occurred in the township of Markham, within twenty miles of the city of Toronto.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No one should take a second mortgage. It is no security.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—It is a very serious matter to force a family of that kind to leave the country in order to get free from debt so that they can work again. They were thoroughly good farmers, good stock-raisers and good dealers, but the price of the land went down, some of it about 60 per cent, but most of it 50 per cent. Of course these are exceptional cases.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The class of millers to which my hon. friend refers would certainly come under clause a or clause c.

The amendment was adopted.

On the 12th clause,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that the 12th clause be struck out and the following substituted therefor :—

12. If on an application for a receiving order, or on an application to annul a receiving order, the court is satisfied that the debtor has not committed the alleged act or acts of insolvency, or that he is not indebted to the creditor making the application, or that he is not indebted in an amount sufficient to entitle such creditor to make application for a receiving order under this Act, or that the claim of the creditor was procured in whole or in part to enable him to take proceedings under this Act, or if the act of insolvency or any one of the acts of insolvency upon which the application is based is an act of insolvency under subheadings (a) or (g) in section four to this Act, that the debtor is able to pay his debts and his ceasing to meet his liabilities or failing to satisfy the execution was only temporary and was not done by the debtor with any fraudulent intent or caused by any fraud or by the insufficiency of the assets of the debtor to meet his liabilities, the court may refuse the application or may annul the receiving order, and may make such order as to the costs of the proceedings as it thinks just.

2. If it appears to the court on an application for a receiving order that the proceedings were taken by the creditor without reasonable grounds and merely as a means of enforcing payment of the debt due to him under colour of proceeding under this Act, the court may refuse the application and may order the creditor, in addition to the payment of the costs of the proceedings, to pay to the debtor such sum in the nature of damages as to the court seems just and reasonable.

3. The court may at any time annul a receiving order if it is satisfied that the debts of the insolvent are paid in full, and a debt which is disputed by the insolvent is to be considered as paid in full if the insolvent gives security to the satisfaction of the court to pay the amount to be recovered in any proceeding for the recovery of or concerning such debt, with costs, and any debt due to a creditor who cannot be found or cannot be identified is to be considered as paid in full if paid into court.

The amendment was adopted.

On clause 35,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—This clause was allowed to stand. A number of hon. gentlemen think that 66⅔ cents in the dollar is too high, because very few could receive advantage from it, and notices of amendments were given with reference to the clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There was a good deal of diversity of opinion with regard to this clause, in the select committee. The bill, as it originally stood, contained the words "one-third," and in the committee I made a motion to have the amount made one-half, which was met by a motion of the hon. gentleman from Truro that the words "two-thirds" be substituted for the one-third, which motion was carried. I now renew my motion, and my reasons are that I consider an estate which is able to pay 66⅔ cents on the dollar after all expenses, and after the shrinkage in values and losses which must occur in consequence of an act of insolvency, is an estate that should not go into insolvency at all—that it must be perfectly solvent, and under proper arrangements would doubtless realize 100 cents on the dollar. The select committee thought differently, however. A fair view to take of a trader in embarrassed circumstances would be that until he conceives his estate is unable to pay, including costs, to his creditors, in all 66⅔ cents on the dollar, any honourable, courageous man desiring to retain his reputation in business, may continue his business and struggle against difficulties with the reasonable hope of paying his creditors in full, and that he should have the opportunity of doing so; but I consider that to pay fifty cents on the dollar on the estate would require at the time of the act of insolvency that that estate should be worth at least 66⅔ cents on the dollar and that 16⅔ cents would be little enough to pay the costs and losses which would accrue on a trader going into insolvency. Under those circumstances I think it would be hard to prevent a man obtaining a discharge who could pay over 50 cents on the dollar and all expenses. I know there are many gentlemen in this House who differ from me and think that the bill as it originally stood was really fairer and juster than 50 cents on the dollar, and I am informed that there are some gentlemen who even believe it would be better to have no sum at all, and let any honest debtor have the benefit of composition and discharge without the loss and expense of complete liquidation proceedings, no matter how much his estate could pay, who could show a satisfactory account to the court, and be allowed under the law to go free from the responsibilities of his debts contracted through misfortune in trade. The subject is one which the committee and every hon. gentleman who listens to me understands as well as I do, and therefore it is not necessary for me to occupy the attention of the committee at any length upon it. I may say if my motion fails I shall be prepared to vote for any motion not below the sum fixed in the original bill. I shall, if I am forced to a choice between 66⅔ and 33⅓, vote for the smaller sum, but I think I strike a juster medium in moving this amendment of 50 cents on the dollar, which has the advantage of being in accordance with the English law on the subject. I therefore move, that "two-thirds" in the said clause be stricken out and "one-half" substituted therefor.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I am thoroughly in accordance with the expressions which have fallen from the last speaker, and I do not think it worth while to recapitulate what he has said on this section of the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think we ought to be perfectly clear as to the effect of the amendment before we adopt it. The hon. gentleman from Richmond spoke as though no insolvent had a chance to get a discharge under this bill if it should become law, unless he paid 66⅔ cents on the dollar. If any hon. gentleman will turn to section 43 he will find that at or after the expiration of one year from the date of insolvency, the insolvent may make an application, and he may be discharged.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am dealing with clause 35 and the subject of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Under clause 43, at the expiration of a year, the debtor who may have paid only 30 cents on the dollar, can apply for a discharge without the consent of his creditors. What does clause 35 mean? It means this, that at the first meeting of his creditors, before any considerable expense has been incurred, if the insolvent submits a proposition to pay 66⅔ cents, and his creditors execute a deed of composition and discharge, he goes on with his business, having been relieved from one-third of his debts. That is not too bad. It is desirable that we should be a little strict. The bill now applies to traders only, and a man who is engaged in business should be made to keep his books in such a condition that he can tell when he is going behindhand, and that as soon as he finds he has gone appreciably behindhand and is not able to pay more than two-thirds of his liabilities, he should take the benefit of this Act and put himself in the hands of his creditors. Why should he wait until his estate has been frittered away to 50 cents on the dollar? Why should the creditors be obliged to take 50 cents on the dollar if by winding up his affairs at the proper time, he could have paid them 66⅔ cents? In England there is a provision that in the end the judge may refuse the discharge to the debtor if he does not pay 50 cents on the dollar. We have no such provision in the latter part of this bill, but clause 35 deals with the case of debtor who practically gets a discharge from his creditors without going through the various processes of insolvency; he does not go into liquidation at all, practically; and with all deference to the opinion of the hon. gentleman from Richmond and those who agree with him, I think the majority of the committee were wise in fixing that limit. Some of the boards of trade—and the boards of trade represented the classes who were anxious for this measure—suggested 75 cents. We have not gone as far as that, but any man who is conducting his business in a businesslike way ought to know when he has got into that position that he cannot pay more than two-thirds of his liabilities, and he ought to let his creditors know the position he is in, and put himself into their hands and allow them to give him the discharge which they almost invariably will do. It is a mistaken mercy or consideration for the debtor to allow him to go on from bad to worse. Hon. gentlemen know how it is. A man gets into difficulties, and he hopes against hope, may be year after year, that he will be able to improve his condition, and in 19 cases of 20 he is going from bad to worse all the time. Is it not better for himself and his creditors that as soon as he gets seriously into difficulties he should put himself in his creditors' hands and let them have what he has?

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I think the hon. gentleman from Halifax does not quite understand the application of section 35. Section 34 explains it, because he must become an insolvent first, and then if he comes to the conclusion that he can pay 66⅔ cents on the dollar, he has the short way of getting his discharge by filing a deed of composition. However, hon. gentlemen, I am opposed in the first place to the whole of these clauses. The bill itself, in the first place, simply provides the machinery whereby, if a man become insolvent, the assets of his estate can be taken from him legally and placed in the hands of his creditors. As far as that part of the law is concerned, I am perfectly satisfied, but this bill does not apply when the estate is handed over to the creditors. The creditors then take charge of it. They appoint a liquidator, appoint their trustee, dispose of the estate and wind it up. This provision intervenes, as I understand it, when the application is made, and the receiver, who is the proper officer to transfer the estate from the insolvent to the creditors, hands them the assets. Then they belong entirely to the creditors, and if the creditors find, at the first meeting after the estate has been estimated, that the whole estate after it is wound up can only pay 30 cents, is there any reason why they, who own the estate, should not accept the 30 cents without forcing the estate to a sale and perhaps, after it is wound up, find that it will only pay 20 cents?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Of course the creditor will accept it if it is all he can get.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—When the estate is handed over to the creditors it has to be divided amongst them, so much on the dollar. This is to enable the debtor to come in and say "I will give you 50 cents on the dollar for that estate because that is all there is in it," but this clause says you cannot do that; you have to let the liquidator wind this up and declare the dividend, notwithstanding the debtor had offered all it was worth. What I mean to say is this, that when the receiver has handed the estate over to the creditors, that the creditors should be possessed of the whole estate to deal with it as they think best in their own interests and if the estate is only worth 20 or 30 cents let them accept the 20 or 30 cents and give him the discharge. There is no reason why this law should step in and say you cannot do that.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—But if they agree to that it is all right.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—My argument was that these clauses might be eliminated from the bill and when the estate was handed over to the creditors they would in their own interest make such a composition as the estate would bear, and we have no right to say whether it shall be 66⅔ or 75 or 50. The property belongs to the creditors and they should have the disposition of it, and after all, when the creditors accept the deed of composition, the unfortunate debtor has not got his discharge, but must go to the court for it. In my opinion the whole clauses should be struck out. When it was 33⅓ I thought most of them would come within that range, but when they got beyond that, I think there is not an estate in 500 that could take advantage of this law. It will be an encumbrance on the statutes. I hope hon. gentlemen will consider these clauses, because they are very embarrassing. I do not think they can be utilized by the debtor, and it appears to me to be that kind of legislation which will enable parties who can evade the statute to come in and do so. Assuming that an estate could only pay 40 cents on the dollar, there is no reason why he could not say to the party who is going his security "John, buy that in at 40 cents and we can carry on the business in my wife's name or the name of somebody else." He can evade that law as it stands to-day. I say this is improper legislation. Our duty should be to make the law so perfect that you could not do that. Under these clauses as they stand now, there is no trouble in three or four ways to evade the law which makes it an absolute nullity, and there is no penalty attached to it. I am opposed to the 50 cents and I propose now to move that section 35 be amended by striking out the word "two-thirds" and substituting therefor "one-third."

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is a very strange doctrine to me to say that if there are half a dozen persons here and somebody is indebted to us that we cannot give him a discharge. If the creditors clear him he should be clear certainly, but here in the Senate there appears to be a great deal of sympathy for the poor debtor. The debtor did not ask you to pass this legislation. It is the creditors of the country and not the debtors. Before the bill is through I may speak of these creditors, who they are and by what authority they ask Parliament to pass a bill of this nature and why Parliament is doing it. I shall vote to keep the 66⅔ cents in the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I want to make a suggestion to the hon. mover of the amendment. His purpose would be more likely to be obtained by allowing my motion to be put without amendment, and if it fails, then he can put his motion as a first amendment to the clause. I stated myself that if my amendment failed I would vote for the 33⅓ cents. There may be others in the same position as myself who would prefer 50 cents but if defeated on that, would vote for 33⅓ cents. He would certainly lose my vote on the amendment and perhaps the vote of others, and not get the sense of the committee so well.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, and I think the bill will be much better if it is allowed to stand as it is now at 66⅔ cents. There seems to be a misapprehension in the minds of some hon. gentlemen in regard to this matter. Some appear to think that no man can get the benefit of this measure at all unless his estate will pay 66⅔ per cent.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not think any one thinks that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I know my hon. friend from Richmond does not think so, but from remarks that I have heard from other hon. gentlemen, they are really under the impression that no man can get the benefit of this bill unless his estate can pay that percentage. That is not the case. It only provides that he can get his discharge with the consent of the creditors, without going into liquidation, if his estate paid 66⅔ per cent, but if his estate goes into liquidation there is nothing to prevent his getting a discharge at whatever his estate will turn out, that is, if he has conducted his business honestly and properly. Hon. gentlemen will remember there was no point put before the committee more strongly by the bankers and boards of trade than that we should fix the amount high, and they gave a reason that was entirely convincing to me—that under the old Act men went into insolvency and forced their creditors to accept a very low composition rather than have the estate melted away in liquidation. It was pointed out to us by the representatives of the boards of trade that if we allowed that amount to be too low the effect of it would be that we would have a great many disreputable compositions. A man would get some creditor to put himself into insolvency, and his creditors when they met would reason this way—the minimum is 33⅓ per cent, and he offers that per cent; we know the estate is worth a great deal more than that, but it is better for us to accept that amount than to allow the estate to go into liquidation and be eaten up with costs and expenses. It was clearly pointed out to us that if we fixed the amount too low there would be a great many of these disreputable insolvencies and low compositions, and if it was fixed at 66⅔ per cent as being the amount for which an insolvent can have a settlement with the consent of his creditors, then if the insolvent were at all doing a proper business, he would be able to make that settlement, and if he were not, then the estate would go into liquidation, and it would pay what it could after costs were taken out of it. I made up my mind very clearly in the committee that it was better to fix this amount high in order to prevent these low compositions and this intimidation that insolvents could practise against their creditors by threatening to go into liquidation. If you fix the amount low in the bill, you will have a great majority of the compositions very near that fixed rate. If you put it at 25 per cent the majority of the compositions will be about 25 per cent. If you make it 33⅓ per cent, the majority will be that, but if you make it high you will get respectable compositions.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Why not make it 100 cents on the dollar then?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P. E. I.)—My hon. friend used that argument before. I almost thought, when I heard him make that statement, that he was under the impression that no insolvency could be had at all without 66⅔ per cent was paid. My hon. friend will remember that the part of the bill in which this provision is, applies only to insolvents who are obtaining their discharge with the consent of the creditors before any considerable expense is incurred. As the hon. member from Halifax has said, and said very well, I think the creditor who gets one-third of his obligation wiped out fares extremely well, and it does not follow because a man is able to pay 66⅔ per cent that he is able to pay in full. It is a very considerable reduction indeed, and it is a reasonable percentage to pay.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island has forgotten that under the present law the insolvent has to be put into insolvency by a receiving order. An inventory of the estate must be taken and handed over to the creditors, and an estimate of what the insolvent is possessed of made before he can apply for a deed of composition. Under the old law there was no such provision as that. The insolvent hawked around his deed of composition and told his creditors that he could not pay more than a certain percentage, and on that representation he obtained his discharge. But under this bill the estate is in the hands of the creditors before he makes his application, and they know what it is worth and no imposition can be practised on them.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—So it was under the old Act.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—This is different altogether from the old Act. By placing the percentage too high you will be placing it beyond the creditors of the country to carry out what would be a fair and reasonable composition and discharge.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I quite agree with what my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island and my hon. friend from Halifax have said, and I would not repeat anything they have already stated. In the select committee my mind was made up, from the discussion there, that the higher the composition the better for the creditors generally, and for the trade of the country also. I came to the conclusion that I have not heard anything since then to change my mind. Supposing you make it 50 per cent, under this law a debtor can easily present the position he is in and go into bankruptcy. He gets his discharge and he then has his stock at a low price in competition with the honest trader who is going on with his business and trying to pay 100 cents on the dollar. The lower you make the amount the greater will be the disadvantage to those who are doing a legitimate business and paying their honest debts. There is the trouble. The lower you make it the greater the injury it will have on the honest trader who pays his debts. That is the most important reason—the lower you make it the longer a man will hold on and make representations that his estate is not worth so much, and his creditors, rather than fight it through, will accept almost every offer that is made. If you put 50 per cent you will find nine times out of ten they will accept the offer, and the goods will be sold in competition with the goods of the honest trader. Therefore, I hold that it should be the highest possible amount and 66⅔ per cent is a fair percentage. This law should be to guard and protect the honest trader against the dishonest one. It is only on account of dishonest traders that we require this law. Any trader that knows his business is aware of his position before he feels that he can only pay two-thirds of his debts.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—From the first I have held that the amount named in the bill was altogether too high. I have been in business for over 40 years on my own responsibility, and have seldom seen any estate wound up that would bring more than 50 cents on the dollar—50 cents with all preferential claims, such as rents, clerks' wages and all those claims that have to be paid first. Then after that, a certain percentage of the estate is taken to wind it up and it is not one estate out of ten that will pay more than 50 cents on the dollar. If it does pay more, there is scarcely any necessity for that estate going into bankruptcy. I have known a man to take stock and show his creditors that he was worth only 80 cents on the dollar and their advice was asked, and they told him to go on, and I have known that estate to come out worth money. Had the creditors advised that man to make an assignment, the estate would not have paid more than 50 cents on the dollar, if that much. I say there is no necessity whatever for a man going into bankruptcy when he has an estate, over and above all expenses, worth 66⅔ cents on the dollar. It has been said here by many hon. gentlemen who perhaps have not been in business, that the rate should be high. No man knows more about that subject than those who have passed through the mill. I have had experience of a great number of failures and I have always tried to get them to settle. Frequently in my time men have come to me and asked my advice. I have advised them to go home and look after their business, and their creditors would help them through, and frequently they have come out all right and have paid 100 per cent on the dollar. I say there is no necessity of keeping it at 66⅔ per cent. It has been said that the banks want it. I have done some banking myself, and I, as one of them, say it is too high altogether, and I told the representative of the bankers here that it was a mistake. I say that it is a mistake now, and that 50 cents on the dollar is a fair amount to place there. Of course, if the creditors are willing a man that does not pay 50 cents on the dollar can get relief, but it is hard to get all the creditors to agree, and it is better to place a moderate sum in the bill than to make it too high. Moreover, supposing a man has an estate and has worked all his life and fails through bad times, fire or some misfortune, you surely do not want to take the last five cents from that man if you do make a settlement with him. If he wants to go on, leave him 5 or 10 cents on the dollar to make a foundation for his business and give him a chance to support his family. That is the course I have always advised when I was in business, and that is the course I would like to see every man now follow. My first advice would be not to go into bankruptcy at all if it is in your power to keep out, unless somebody drives you there. I said 50 cents at the beginning and I would have much pleasure in supporting my honourable friend from Richmond that it be 50 cents on the dollar.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I have been at as many meeting of creditors as almost any man of my age. I waded through the old Insolvency Act and I never knew a case where the creditors were not disposed to be friendly to the debtor. It is a great libel to assert that creditors, as a general thing, are disposed to be very severe on the debtor. There may be one or two at a meeting, but I have always found that a great majority of the creditors were disposed to be liberal and kind to the debtor. It is a false argument to state that the poor debtor is at the mercy of his creditors and is going to be wiped out of existence and left without anything in the future. I feel that this bill is intended to operate upon two classes of people, apparently one section of the House thinks the bill is intended wholly for the regulation of the unfortunate debtors. It is well to bear in mind that there is such a thing as an unfortunate creditor, a creditor who gives out his goods, possibly gives his note and lends his money without even having the promise of interest, in many cases, for his money. I have known such cases, and very shortly afterwards he is notified to attend a meeting of creditors and he is compelled to take whatever his debtors choose to give him, which may be from 5 to 15 cents on the dollar. In many cases I have known traders, forty or sixty hours after getting all they could from their friends and creditors and neighbours in the way of borrowing, take advantage of the insolvency law. Some of those debtors may owe their creditors from $500 to $6000. I would ask any hon. gentleman, is it not quite enough for the debtor to propose to such a creditor where he owed $6,000 that he give him $2,000 of a discount? That amount off a debt of $6,000 would be quite enough for a creditor to lose. Viewing the bill from this standpoint, I hold it is wiser and better, in fact it is in consonance with the experience of the best business men of the country who took the trouble to meet us at the committeeand give us their opinion in framing this bill, that where a man wanted to take advantage of the Act himself, not where he has been forced into insolvency, and is prepared to pay 66⅔ cents on the dollar that he should get the benefit of the Act. I do not think any creditor would resist it, and it would be quite enough for any creditor to loose one-third of his claim. We know that it is better for us to have business men in this conntry that are disposed to pay their debts and act honestly and honourably and meet their creditors like men. We should educate a class of men in this country who would look upon business in this light, instead of another class of men that go into business with a full intention of having a good time, getting all the goods they can from everybody, borrowing money and immediately afterwards taking advantage of the bankruptcy law. Then they snap their fingers at their creditors, and very shortly afterwards (I have known it to occur) they start business again and drive their pair of horses and become the biggest men in the community. Not long ago a party asked me to lend him my note for $400. I said I was not in business and did not care to lend a note, but he said "it is all right; you will never see it again." I gave him the note for $400. Shortly afterwards I got a notice to attend a meeting of creditors. I went and found that they were prepared to give 20 cents on the dollar. I said, "that is pretty hard," but they said they could do no better, and if I would sign off they would make it all right. I said, "if I sign off that will be the end of it." They settled for 20 cents on the dollar, and when I went home I expected to get my 20 per cent, but the fact is I never have seen a cent of it from that day to this. Now, are we going to have a law to sanction a transaction like that? I think it is the worst thing we can do for the people of this country, and therefore I shall vote for the bill as it came from the committee, a bill which was framed under the advice of the most experienced men in the country. Their opinion was that this percentage should be made as high as possible, but at the same time it should be left in the hands of the creditors to be fairly liberal.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—The class of people who have been referred to are not those likely to be affected by the insolvency law. I do not know that we have heard any representatives from the different provinces of the small traders, the persons who will be most affected by this bill, but we have heard at great length from bankers, money-lenders, manufacturers and lawyers in their own interest. I do not agree with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield or the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg with respect to the clause under consideration, that we should confine the amount of composition to 66⅔ cents on the dollar. We know very well that a debtor cannot obtain the benefit of the provisions of the law unless he has traded in a proper and honest way and conducted his business in an economical manner, and even if his estate could pay 66⅔ cents on the dollar, if there was any fraud connected with his business, he could not get the benefit of the Act. We must bear in mind that it is not the debtor himself that is fixing the amount; he hands over the whole of the estate to the receiver and the creditors obtain the amount that the estate realizes. It is in their hands and even if the estate realizes 80 cents on the dollar, the debtor is entitled to his discharge, and it is in their power to say whether he has conducted his business properly and to realize as much as they can from the estate for their own benefit. If they realize only 50 cents on the dollar, that man is entitled to a discharge if he has conducted his business properly. My opinion was in the first place that we should not fix any particular amount, but that it should be left to the court to say whether the man had conducted his business properly and if he had not squandered his property but had lost it by means over which he had no control, that he should be entitled to his discharge whatever amount his estate paid. There was another point with respect to the question, that he should be entitled to his discharge under any circumstances, even if he did not pay the 66⅔ cents or 50 cents on the dollar, if it should be fixed at that, under the clause referred to he would be 12 months without doing anything; he could not apply for a discharge from the time his estate went into insolvency until twelve months elapsed, and during that time he could do nothing to support his family. I consider, under all the circumstances, if we fix the amount at 50 cents, we are putting it at a fair and proper medium between the debtor and creditor.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—I wish to point out a misapprehension which has arisen. It has been stated by a number of members that the expenses have to be paid first. A debtor goes to his creditors and says "here is a statement of my affairs. I think I can pay 66⅔ cents on the dollar." If the creditors agree to relieve him of one-third of his liabilities, it appears to me, if he has conducted his business fairly, they leave him a good margin for carrying on his business afterwards. Therefore, I am in favour of leaving it at 66⅔ cents, but it has been lost sight of by a number of speakers that the preferred claims and expenses will not have been incurred at all under a deed of composition and discharge and there will be no preferential claim. He gets his estate back for 66⅔—one-third of his liabilities are thrown off.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Deducting the preferred claims.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—They have to be paid of course. They are generally very trifling. It appears to me if you allow a debtor to continue his business and throw off one-third of his indebtedness, you are leaving him a fair margin for carrying on his business.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Welland)—The impression I have gathered through this discussion is that there is too much solicitude for what is known as the debtor. As a rule, the debtor is not that honest man that wants the sole attention and benefit of this bill. The object of this legislation ought to be to protect the honest trader, and the lower you make this composition the more failures there will be, the more goods thrown upon the market to the disadvantage of the competing merchant next door, who will be obliged to go into insolvency in order to buy his goods at the same price as the insolvent. If you reduce this to 33⅓ cents on the dollar, you will have any number of insolvents in this country within a few years. The only way is to keep composition in the first place high. That does not prevent the honest debtor from getting a discharge ultimately. Make his composition high in order to protect the honest trader who lives alongside of him, but if you let B buy his goods at 50 cents on the dollar while A has to pay 100 cents on the dollar, you will force A into insolvency in order to be able to compete with his neighbour. Therefore you must make the rate of composition high in order to protect the honest man, who is generally dealing alongside the dishonest trader. The honest trader, as a rule, does not have to go into insolvency, but can carry through his business. The class of men who fail in the majority of cases are men who spend their evenings in saloons, who spend their days at horse races and in idleness. I do not mean to say that all insolvents are dishonest, but I mean to say that they are careless and indifferent traders. You must not devote the whole of this bill to protecting that class of people. Protect the man who is doing an honest business alongside of him. That should be the object of this House, and in order to do that you must prevent low composition. You must prevent the man buying his goods at 33⅓ cents or 50 cents on the dollar. If not, you will have reckless and dishonest traders all over the land, because they must do that in order to get their goods at the same rate as the dishonest traders who are selling alongside of them. I entirely agree with the opinions of the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg. I have had a good deal of experience and knowledge of such matter, and I have noticed widely what the effect of an insolvency law is. I have known men—and I could name them—not one but a dozen, who made a business of compounding with their creditors, buying their goods at 50 cents on the dollar every three or four years, and then slaughtering them on the market. I have known honest traders alongside who have had to pull up stakes and leave the place. What you want to do is to protect the honest man. The object of this House ought to be—and I am sure it is—to encourage honesty and not dishonesty in trade; therefore you must make the first composition as high as possible. It does not prevent the honest man from getting his discharge. Creditors as a rule are magnanimous; creditors as a rule deal generously and munificently with honest debtors. Even if they do not, one year afterwards, under clause 44, as the hon. gentleman from Halifax pointed out, a debtor can go to the court, and if not opposed, the court will, upon a fair showing of his integrity, give him a discharge. Even if it is opposed, the court, if satisfied that he has been an honest dealer, can give him his discharge; but I say that the first settlement upon the inception of the man's going into insolvency, ought to be kept high, and ultimately he can get his discharge.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It does not prevent a man being put into insolvency whether he pays ten cents or seventy-five cents.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Welland)—I am referring to the deed of composition. As a rule the creditors are too fond of entering into a deed of composition, and what is the effect of that if it is done largely? The effect is that if creditors lose 50 cents on the dollar with A they must make it up with B and C, and the country ultimately loses. Make the first composition high. I wish to impress my own view on the House, that the object of this legislation from beginning to end should be to encourage honest trade and punish dishonest trade.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have listened with a great deal of interest to the statements and arguments of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I would be led to the conclusion, if his arguments were correct, that this bill was solely for the purpose of compelling a man to pay 66⅔ per cent of all debts before he could be put into insolvency or get a discharge from his debts.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Welland)—Composition I refer to.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—And if the arguments of my hon. friend from Burlington be correct, the inference to be drawn is that if a man becomes indebted to such an extent that it is impossible for him to pay his debts and he is placed in bankruptcy, and is given one-third of that which he owes, it ought to be sufficient to enable him to go on with his business afterwards. That would imply that this debtor had 100 cents with which to pay his debts, and that his creditors, in the magnanimity of their souls, gave him 33⅓ per cent of what he owed, to allow him to go on and do business.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—That is what he agrees to do.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No, I differ from that statement; he makes no such agreement. The man is put into insolvency and the creditors are permitted under this Act to give him a discharge of all his debts if he can afford, or will secure, the payment of 66⅔ per cent of his indebtedness. Now, if he has 100 cents he ought not to be given anything at all. If he could show that his estate is worth only 66 per cent then he cannot obtain a discharge under this clause, because his estate will not pay 66⅔; hence he is put through the whole bankruptcy law, and if I did not desire not to be personal or apply motives, I would say that the clause as it stands was a clause specially for the benefit of the lawyers, who put the balance of the money into their own pockets. Let us suppose a case; a man becomes indebted to a certain extent, he cannot or he does not pay his debts or bring himself within the meaning of the clause which declares what bankruptcy shall be. He then says to his creditors, "I do not care about my estate being frittered away in courts of law, or in costs which would be incurred in going through the bankruptcy court and obtaining a discharge," whether that discharge be obtained immediately after the examination of his accounts and the distribution of all his assets, or whether it be at the end of twelve months during which time the hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island very properly said, he is unable to go on with business, he has no discharge, and therefore his creditors can come upon him or enter an action against him for any goods he might have earned in the meantime. The creditors investigate this whole case—I am speaking of an honest man now, I do not presume to argue in favour of the rogue who goes into bankruptcy prepared to commit jury in order to get rid of his debts, because that occurs and will occur I suppose to the end of time—the creditors investigate the whole case and if the debtor can show that his estate will pay 66 cents on the dollar by his giving up everything, they say we are willing to accept that, but the law will not permit us, we must only obtain what we can get out of your estate by the process of law as provided in this Insolvency Act." That is the position they are in, and then you argue the higher that is put the better for the creditor and the better for the honest debtor. If a discharge under the Act cannot be obtained by the debtor unless he pays that amount, then he must go into bankruptcy or the creditors must allow him to go on with the risk of losing a still larger amount. Now that is the view I take of it. I may be wrong. My hon. friend on my left (Sir Frank Smith) as we all know, has carried on as large a business as any man in the province of Ontario. There is not a man in the whole province who has had more experience in the official position which he held during the existence of the last Insolvency Act than my hon. friend from Milton, and hence he speaks from a practical knowledge of the law. My own view would be that the provision should not be there at all. I am speaking my own individual opinion; I know that is not in accord with the views of the boards of trade and those who asked for the bill. The hon. member from Welland argued with a great deal of force, and he argues from facts which are presenting themselves to every man in the country who is at all observant, every day, but I should like to ask whether the cases to which he has referred, of dishonest men carrying on business alongside honest men and failing, have not been occurring all the time without a bankruptcy law? Has not the dishonest trader been making compositions with his creditors without a Bankruptcy Act and buying his goods back at 75, 50 and even 30 cents on the dollar, as the case may be, and throwing them upon the market? There is no Insolvency Act to prevent that, and whether an Insolvency Act is upon the Statute-book or not, that kind of dealing will be carried on just so long as there are men who will trust others with their goods. There are plenty of men who go to work deliberately to obtain goods for the purpose of making compositions and swindling their creditors as much as they can. These are men who are brought within the meaning of the clause of this Act and prevented from getting a discharge if dishonesty can be established. We deal with this law with two primary objects in view. The first is — and that is the sole object of the bill in the first place—to protect the creditor against the fraudulent assignments in different provinces where there is no law providing for an equitable distribution of property. If the laws in the different provinces were all the same as they are in Ontario and Quebec I dare say there would be no necessity for this Act; then we might carry out the very simple suggestion made by the hon. member from Milton the other day, that where a man had made an honest settlement with his creditors he could apply to the superior court of the province in which he resided, and obtain a discharge, provided there had been an equitable distribution of his property in the province in which he lived; but as this mode of distributing the estates of insolvents does not exist, it is necessary that there should be some law by which the wholesaler, whether he be in England or in Germany, or whether he be in the western, the central or the eastern section of the provinces, should in all cases have a fair and equitable share of a man's estate when he becomes insolvent. That was forcibly impressed upon my mind when the hon. member from Amherst read one of his letters. He did not tell us by whom it was written, but any one reading between the lines could see that is was from some one who was selling goods in that particular section of the country and was jealous of what might be termed outsiders coming from other parts of the world and selling goods to them by means of his drummers. I agree with my hon. friend on my left on that point, that a good deal of the trouble has arisen from departing from the old system of selling—that is, people going to buy from the merchants instead of the merchants forcing the goods upon the retailers. As long as credit is given, surely there can be no reason why, if a man becomes insolvent, there should not be an equitable distribution of his property among those whom he owes, and that is the sole object of this bill. This clause enables the creditors to meet together and say, "If you can pay us so much we will give you a discharge. There is nothing to prevent the creditors under this Act, any more than there is without an Act, meeting together, and if they find the man is honest, dealing leniently and fairly with him. There is nothing in this law to prevent that, but it does not meet the case of a man who becomes insolvent and one creditor gobbles up the whole estate at the expense of the others. I should judge probably the majority of those who have spoken are in favour of $66\frac{2}{3}$ per cent; some would like to go higher. My hon. friend on my right says that if you adopt that principle you had better say 100 cents at once, and say that the creditor shall not under any circumstances give a man a discharge under this Act; that two-thirds or three-fourths of the creditors shall not have the power to bind the others, but let them go at once into the bankruptcy court, swallow as much of the estate as you possibly can in lawcosts and receiver's and auctioneer's and various other fees. To prevent that we should allow the clause to remain precisely as it is the present moment, that is the creditors to meet and give a discharge for thirty or forty or fifty cents as they please. That they can do now. The only difficulty I see in this is that which I have pointed out. The clause prevents creditors from doing that which in their judgment they believe to be in their interest. If the man cannot pay 66⅔ cents but can pay 50, surely it would be better for them to accept that than to put him in bankruptcy and have the balance absorbed in law costs, the creditor getting but 30 cents on the dollar. That is not in the interest of the creditor or the honest debtor, I have no sympathy with the dishonest debtor, but we will have him as long as human nature is what it is. I shall vote for the motion of my hon. friend from Richmond.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the reason is an obvious one why, in the opinion of a good many gentlemen, the composition ought to be fixed at a sum above 50 cents. It is this, that it is the duty of every trader, if he is falling behind, to at once take stock and consider his position and see whether he can go on with his business. If he cannot go on with his business and pay 100 cents, it is his duty to stop and call a meeting of his creditors, and if Parliament in its wisdom says that a man ought to get a discharge if he can pay 50 cents on the dollar, and he should be satisfied with that, do you not think that human nature will not prompt him to go on until he gets down to 50 cents and then call a meeting, and the creditors have lost one-third of the estate. It is perfectly clear why the principle should be adopted of keeping the figure at a higher level. It must be remembered that the trader is getting a year in which to pay this amount. He continues his business and has a year to pay 66⅔. One hon. gentleman said he could not go on with the business in the interval, but the clause says that the deed of composition and discharge shall be confined to the 66⅔ cents and he has a year from the date on which the composition takes place. One reason why it should be kept high is that it is an intimation to commercial men and the courts of this country that if a man can only pay 50 cents he is entitled to a discharge. He ought to wind up his estate before its gets lower than 66⅔, and I think there is strong reason in that more particularly where he gets a year within which to pay that amount.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I will withdraw my motion.

The Committee divided on the amendment, which was carried by the following vote: yeas 19, nays 18.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 61,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The point in reference to that clause is that the holder of negotiable paper, after he ranks, has to fix the value of the security that he holds. It more particularly applies in the case of a bank where a trader has an endorser and a line of credit with the bank, and the bank discounts the paper. The banks consider that they have the maker for a dollar and the endorser for a dollar, whereas under the law as it now stands, the bank gets less than 100 cents in the dollar, not being allowed to rank for the full amount of the note against both parties. The objection I see to that is this: the contrary proposal, as contained in the clause as it stood originally, is in favour of the banks. I do not look at it from that standpoint. It seems to me that it will embarrass the trader because the banks will say "in the event of the endorser, the person who is negotiating the paper, going into insolvency, the bank feel that they cannot rank on his estate, and the maker's estate for the full amount." The bank therefore say "You must give us another name or you must lodge other security with us, otherwise you cannot discount the paper." I think practically that clause will be found to embarrass the trader more than it will benefit the bank. The committee came to the conclusion to strike out the clause as it stood, which was copied from the old law In 1877 it was re-enacted and stood until the Act was repealed, but it will be found that it will hit the trader much more than it will hit the bank, because the banks are masters of the situation. The bank must negotiate the customers' paper and it will place the bank in a position to say to the trader "You must transfer a certain amount of your accounts to the bank as security for the line of discount we are giving you. We are giving you a line of credit and you ought to deposit with us the customers' paper." Presumably when you put a note in a bank the bank has a right against the endorser and the maker for 100 cents on the dollar, and this clause steps in and says "If 50 cents is paid by the endorser, then the bank can only rank for the balance due on the note, and if the maker only pays 50 cents then the bank have only got 75 cents out of it," and then the bank will take this position: "As we cannot be protected for 100 cents on the dollar, the customer must place with us additional security, either a portion of his accounts as standing security, or give us customers paper.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—You are arguing in the event of both parties becoming insolvent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes; the bank is not allowed to rank after customer has gone into insolvency and paid 50 cents on the dollar; the bank would lose the difference.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Does not the last line make some provision for that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I wish you would put your objection in the shape of a motion, because I think it is well-founded. There is no doubt that on a note for $100 with two names you could not get the full amount. A man would have to deposit $125 or $150 in notes in order to get $100. The banks are in a very different position from traders. There has been an impression that a bank should set off one against another, that it may collect 100 cents from each to make up the amount. I think that would be highly improper, but the getting of 100 cents on the dollar is a thing which is in the interests of trade itself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the bankers are objects of very serious commiseration at the present time. I have noticed from the reports in newspapers that nearly all the banks of the country have been paying very large dividends at a time when every one else in business finds it hard to make the two ends meet. This matter was discussed fully before the committee by able counsel for both parties. The committee considered it fully and decided by a large majority to report the clause as it stands, and since that time the matter has been discussed again. Every member of the House has been furnished with additional arguments on both sides and it seems to me the last word on the subject spoken on behalf of the Boards of Trade overthrows the arguments set up on behalf of the banks. At any rate, I think we had better take a vote upon it.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I said before that I differ very much on this clause as regards banks from any hon. gentleman who has spoken. It has been said by the hon. gentleman from Halifax that the banks should not be considered, because they are paying such dividends. Is it not very much better for the wealth of our country to have institutions that can loan money to go on with the enterprises of this country—is it not better to have that money invested in the country than to take it away to another part of the world to earn interest? I look on the banks in this way: they are institutions simply to do business on collateral security. When a note is taken to a bank for discount they do not buy that paper. All they ask is for you to give them collateral security and they lend you a certain sum of money and you endorse that note and you are bound to take it up again.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—If you do not fail.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Of course, but if you do fail the bank should be allowed to rank on the estate for the full amount. That would be no preference, because once they get all they agree to get, then the balance goes to the estate. They have no claim for anything more than they agree to. If you put them in a false position, those banks will not lend a man that money on those notes without collateral security—additional security, which will come out of the estate, and you will be doing harm to the estate instead of benefiting it. I say that the banker is merely there like a broker to take collateral security with the understanding that the person who discounts it will lift that paper. The bank takes the paper to oblige the merchant, the merchant uses the money to carry on his business and it does good to the merchant.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And to the banker too.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Of course, to the banker too. The banks do not work for love, any more than my hon. friend does. A banker stands in a different position from others. He does not buy the paper, but simply makes an agreement to lend the money, with the understanding that the endorser lifts the paper. All that is done for the benefit of the estate, and why should the banker lose on that? If you put the banks in this false position, it will cripple trade. It will be very much harder for the merchant to get security that will satisfy the banks. They will not lend unless they have good security, and if you do not let them have this advantage, they will lend their money elsewhere. The best thing you could do would be to give the bankers the right to rank in full for the amount of their money.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not see why we should favour the banks more than any one else, because, when you sell goods to anybody, the man agrees to pay for them just the same as he agrees to repay to the bank the money advanced on his note. I do not see that the banks of this country have been suffering very much. My hon. friend says it will have the effect of requiring additional security. That is what the wholesale merchants prefer, and I do not think we are here to favour the banks more than any other people. They are the last people in the country that need assistance. When I look at the returns, I do not see that they require aid. They can take care of themselves. They take good care to have the interest before they give you the money, and if you do not pay your note to the day, they are sure to protest it. As long as you are prosperous in business, they will assist you all right, but the moment you get in a tight place, there is no sympathy for you. It is their business; they have no sympathy for anybody, and this Senate should not legislate in favour of the bankers, and against the interest of the people generally.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The hon. gentleman from Toronto is very anxious to secure the banks, but he voted for an amendment a short time ago to rob the honest creditor of 50 cents on the dollar. Why should we protect the bankers any more than we protect the ordinary creditors? Surely merchandise is as good as the money of the banks. I do not mean to say that the banks should not be paid, but I say the merchants should be sustained also, and no law should be placed on the statute book that encourages the retail merchants to pay 50 cents on the dollar. This is going to give us a bad reputation abroad, and will curtail the business of the country. With such a law on the Statute-book, business men, when they give out their merchandise or advance their money as the case may be, may be forced the next morning by legal process to accept half of what they advanced in settlement of their claims. Such a state of affairs is calculated to do more injury to this country than anything that I know of.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not see why any preference should be given to the banks over other creditors. My experience is that banks generally take care of themselves. The trouble in the country is that they generally give too much credit. There is too much money borrowed in an easy way in the banks and they float paper too long by renewals. You generally find if there is a failure the bank comes in and gobbles the biggest part of the estate. They seem always to have a better knowledge of their customers and get a preference without us going out of the way to give it to them. All creditors should be treated alike.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The 61st section should be restored to its original form as it was in the original bill introduced by the Government (in which it was numbered 62) and for the following reasons. In the first place, legislation in Canada shows that the 61st clause as it stood in the original bill is equitable.

The Act of 1877 was of about the same nature as clause 62 of the original bill, and which I propose to substitute for the present clause 61. In the second place, a creditor under our present law may sue every party to a note for the full amount thereof, simultaneously, only deducting such sums as may have been paid on account. Is it not right and equitable that he should retain the benefit of all his remedies so that he may obtain the whole amount due to him? In the third place, I ask should the rights of any holder at any time be curtailed or rendered uncertain? Would it not greatly injure the negotiability of the note itself since it becomes of less value in his hands?

Who knows when the drawer or endorser may fail, leaving quite uncertain the value of the note and at the moment when the value ought to be preserved. In the fourth place, I find that the law of England is substantially the same in this respect as the clause of the bill as introduced by the Government. I therefore move that clause 61 be struck out and that clause 62 of the original bill be substituted therfor. It is as follows:

61. If a creditor holds a claim based upon a negotiable instrument upon which the insolvent is only indirectly or secondarily liable and which has not matured at the time of proving the claim, such creditor in his proof of claim shall set a value upon the liability of the person primarily liable thereon, and the difference between such value and the amount of the claim shall until the instrument matures be the amount at which the claim shall be calculated for the purpose of voting at meetings and other purposes, except the payment of dividends thereon or collocation in the dividend sheet, but after the maturity of such instrument the claim shall be calculated for all purposes at the full amount, less any sum paid on account thereof by the person primarily liable on such negotiable instrument.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is practically saying that the claim of a bank on an estate shall be a preferential claim.

The committee divided on the amendment, which was rejected, Contents, 11; Non-contents, 19.

Hon. Mr. READ, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that the amendments be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Those amendments are vital in their character, and unless it is distinctly understood that every opportunity shall be given to-morrow at the third reading to take the sense of the House on those amendments, I am not disposed to let concurrence take place now.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There has been some complaint that this bill has not been sent to the House of Commons sooner, but I do not think any bill has been watched with so much care nor have the members given more consideration or displayed greater assiduity than they have in dealing with this Bill. It can be forwarded to the lower House to-morrow if we concur in the amendments to-day. The hon. gentleman can move his amendments at the third reading to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

MONTREAL ISLAND BELT LINE RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY, from the Select Committee on Railways, Telegraph and Harbours, presented Bill (59) "An Act respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway." He said: The three amendments to this bill, as reported by the committee, are of importance and no doubt will be duly considered at a future date when the report is taken into consideration. The first of them occurs in subsection 6 of section 3 of the Act, the compensation clause, which relates to the elevated railway extending through the city of Montreal east and west and also though the adjacent towns of Ste. Cunégonde and St. Henri. The amendment is in the compensation clause for injury done to property in consequence of the running through the city and these two towns of the elevated railway and it is therefore properly added at the end of the clause. The next amendment is made in section 26 of the Act, which applies to the different lines of railway with which this incorporated company may enter into an agreement. Another is added to those that are already named in the section, the Montreal street railway and the Montreal Island and Park Railway Company. The 27th clause is the one which fixes the time for the construction and completion of the railway, and in order to make it, as it is intended, more extensive, in the 4th line of that clause, the 35th line of the page after the word "the" it is proposed to insert "whole of the." The clause reads "but if the railway is not finished and put into operation, etc.," and it is proposed to make it read

"if the whole of the railway is not finished, etc." These amendments are important and I presume will be considered hereafter.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved that the amendments to be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE INSOLVENCY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the third reading of Bill (C) "An Act respecting Insolvency."

Hon. Mr. POWER moved in amendment:

That the said bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by substituting two-thirds for one-half in the 15th line of the 35th section.

He said: I should not have moved a resolution of that sort at the third reading of the bill if the division in the committee on this same question had been of a decisive character, but hon. gentlemen who were present at the committee yesterday will remember that the provision of the bill as reported by the select committee to which it was referred was altered from two-thirds to one-half by a vote the majority in favour of which was only one, and it is clearly desirable that the sense of the House should be taken when a larger number are present than there were in the committee, so that it will be understood distinctly what the feeling of the Senate is. The opinion of the select committee was decidedly in favour of the provision as originally reported. I do not propose to trouble the House for any length of time, but I wish to state very briefly the arguments which strike me as urging us to make the amendment which I propose. In the first place, it will compel a debtor to place his estate in his creditors' hands as soon as he becomes insolvent. This is a most desirable thing, instead of waiting until his estate is dissipated which will be the case, if you make the limit at one-half. Certain hon. gentlemen have referred to the fact that there is no such provision as this in the previous Insolvent Act. That is just one of the reasons why the previous Insolvent Act became so unpopular. If we do not make this amendment, if we leave the limitation as it is now at 50 cents it is safe to say that in 99 cases out of 100 not more than 50 cents will be paid. Who is benefited by the loss of the $16\frac{2}{3}$ cents? Certainly not the creditors of the insolvent. They lose that much more of their money; and the insolvent himself is not benefited, because he is induced to continue in business until his estate has dwindled down to a lower figure. It does him no good and it injures his creditors. Another collateral benefit which will arise from the adoption of this amendment is that it will tend to prevent the throwing of insolvent stocks upon the market. Every one knows that during the operation of the previous Insolvency Act one of the things which made the law unpopular was that the goods of insolvents were continually being thrown on the market and sold at figures lower than those at which such goods could be sold by the solvent trader. I think we should discourage that, and if we retain the limit fixed by the select committee, there will be very little of that mischief done. That is a third reason in favour of the amendment. The only objection to the amendment which I heard urged, and which struck me as having on the face of it any weight, was that this provision would hinder the unfortunate debtor who had without any dishonesty on his own part got into such a position that he could not pay two-thirds, from getting a discharge. As was pointed out in the course of the discussion yesterday, that is not a correct presentation of the fact, because that unfortunate debtor can get a discharge under clause 43 of the bill after a lapse of twelve months. If he does not find out in good time that his estate is dwindling, having to wait for a year is not too heavy a penalty to pay for his neglect.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not intend to occupy the time of the House in repeating arguments which have already been urged at this stage of the bill. The question which is now under consideration, the amendment to the bill moved by the hon. member from Halifax, I think was so thoroughly discussed in the select committee, and also yesterday when the bill was before the committee of the whole, that it would be almost trying the patience of the House too far to repeat what was said on this side of the House in support of the change that was yesterday made in the bill. I do not agree in anything that the hon.

gentlemen said in opposition to the bill as it stands now and as presented to the House. The assumption that by putting the figure for composition and discharge at anything lower than 66⅔ cents—at 50 cents, for example, as it is in the bill—would result in having any composition and discharge when estates would pay more than 50 cents on the dollar, is an assumption which, I think, hon. gentlemen are not warranted in making. There is no reason for supposing, if you put the figure at one-half, as the 35th clause now stands, that the honest trader, when he finds he is hopelessly insolvent, and is unable to meet his creditors and pay 100 cents on the dollar, will hesitate, no matter what the sum may be, in placing himself in the hands of his creditors and asking for a composition and discharge. If the argument were good in regard to 50 cents, it would be equally good with regard to 100 cents, and it may be urged with some force that the debtor could go into insolvency if he found affairs in an embarrassing condition at the stage when 100 cents on the dollar might be paid instead of 50 cents. The question we have got to consider is whether, under all the circumstances in which the ordinary honest creditor seeks composition and discharge, 50 cents would be a smaller payment than he should be obliged to make. Now it is admitted by business men that a debtor would be perfectly justified in continuing his business while the assets of his estate really showed 66⅔ upon the debts. It is admitted also that the expenses consequent upon the proceedings in insolvency up to this composition and discharge would be considerable, and it is not denied that the loss in values, the shrinkage of assets, and other causes would very likely reduce them 16⅔ per cent, leaving no more than a clear dividend of 50 cents on the dollar. Now that being the opinion of business men of the highest standing in this country, I am fully disposed to follow it, especially as it agrees with my own convictions in the matter. The hon. gentleman seems disposed to leave the impression on the House that those who argued for this figure in connection with composition and discharge winked out of sight the fact that the honest debtor could, under the 43rd section of the Act, get a release from his creditors, no matter what sum he might be able to pay. We did not desire to wink it out of sight. Those circumstances would have no reference to this clause at all, and if I did not allude to it yesterday it was because I considered it unnecessary to do so, and because I know every gentleman in the House understands the distinction as well as I do. The object in placing the figure for composition and discharge at a reasonable sum is this, that creditors may see the wisdom of taking a fair composition instead of casting the estate into all the expenses incident to liquidation when double as much may be lost in expenses, double as much in shrinkage of value, double as much in losses otherwise in connection with a long process of insolvency in the hands of the liquidator. These are reasons which induce me to desire a fair and reasonable amount to be fixed in the 35th clause of the bill, and I consider that one-half of all liabilities as fixed by the clause is a reasonable sum. I am not in love with an Insolvency Act at all, if it could be avoided, and I would not support this measure were it not for the worse than imperfect legislation, the bad legislation of the province to which I belong in regard to preferential assignments. It is only for this reason that I support the bill, for I think until we get uniformity in all of the provinces in reference to that question, that the Dominion requires an Insolvency Act. I support this compromise too, between the original figure in the bill and the figure fixed by the Select Committee, because I fear the larger figure will have the effect of inducing some persons on the third reading, or on a motion for the six months' hoist, to throw out the bill altogether, and jeopardize the whole bill in that event. I think nothing can be added, no information can be given or light thrown upon the subject which has not been given and thrown upon it, and I do not, for my own part, feel disposed to continue the discussion or weary the House with any further remarks.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend predicates his remarks entirely upon the position of the honest trader. If we require an insolvency law at all it will be to meet the dishonest trader. The necessity of this bill has arisen from the dishonest trader who makes preferential assignments and disposes of his property so as not to pay his debts. It is to guard against the dishonest trader, because the honest trader gives no trouble at all, and he always gets his discharge. If he conducts his business properly there will never be a necessity of having his estate dwindle down to 50 cents on the dollar before he gets into insolvency, he will apply earlier than that. There is no necessity under this bill that a man should pay 50 cents on the dollar. There is a provision here that a man who has conducted his business in a proper way can get his discharge by paying a much less rate. We must look at this matter entirely from the point of view of the dishonest trader—the man who fritters away his estate and covers it up in such a way that the creditors cannot get at it, and who thinks that he can pay his debts with 50 cents on the dollar. The result of that is to paralyze the trade of the country. In small transactions in the country a man can cover up his business so that it is difficult to find any fraud in his transactions, and he thinks he can pay his debts with 50 cents on the dollar instead of 100 cents. The result is that bankrupt stock is thrown on the market and ruins the honest trader who pays 100 cents on the dollar for his stock. I know from practical experience of the insolvency law—and I probably have had as much to do with it in my province as anybody—that the consequence of bankrupt stock being thrown on the market is to ruin every man in the trade who is trying to pay 100 cents on the dollar. Therefore, we should guard well against fraudulent debtors. Those are the parties who oblige us to bring this bill before the House and not the honest trader, because if traders were honest there would be no necessity for an insolvency law at all. It is a suggestion to the unscrupulous trader that if he pays 50 cents on the dollar he is all right.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Welland)—Exactly the same argument applies to 50 cents on the dollar as applies to 62⅔ cents. The hon. gentleman from Richmond asks us to fix a reasonable amount and he says that 50 cents on the dollar is recommended by the highest authorities. The highest commercial authorities in this country, the boards of trade and the bankers, say that 66⅔ cents is a reasonable amount. I would not have made this statement if the hon. gentleman had not quoted authority for what he said, and I maintain that the boards of trade in Ontario, and the bankers, say that two-thirds is reasonable. My own opinion is that there ought to be no composition whatever. When a man is unable to pay his debts his goods ought to be put up to public auction and let the honest trader alongside of him have an opportunity of buying them in and continuing his business. But if there is to be a composition, I say it should be kept at 66⅔ cents on the dollar, and I repeat that the highest authorities in this country say that is a reasonable amount.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—I voted yesterday in favour of the 66⅔ cents being fixed, and my reasons for doing so are these: In old times we had a good many people in business who succeeded in making money out of their creditors instead of out of their customers. I voted for the two-thirds out of consideration for the honest trader who bought his goods and intended to pay for them at 100 cents on the dollar. If the man alongside of him in the same business calls his creditors together under a deed of composition and gets his goods back for 66⅔ on the dollar, he demoralizes the man alongside of him who is struggling to pay his debts. These were my reasons for voting for 66⅔c.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have always considered, from the beginning of this discussion, that it was in the interest of both debtor and creditor that the rate of composition should be put at 66⅔ cts. Whenever a man knows that he is unable to meet his liabilities, in full, he should let the fact be known to his creditors and get a settlement. It is far easier to get a settlement when his estate will bring 66⅔ cents than when it has dwindled down to 50 cents on the dollar. When a man is aware of the provisions of this Act, he should keep proper accounts and if he finds that he cannot pay 100 cents on the dollar, he ought to make that fact known to his creditors and say to them, "I find that I am behind hand and I ask your commiseration in order that I may get a discharge and follow my business." What is the effect of that? He gets relieved of this loss that is honestly made, and he can continue his business as if nothing had happened. It is in the interest of the debtor that that should take place. You may say the same argument applies to 50 per cent. That is true. Supposing a man's estate is $10,000, the deficiency would be $1,600 at the rate of 66⅔ c., while it would be $2,500 as the bill now stands. It is far easier to make up the deficiency of $1,600 than $2,500.

No man will care to make an assignment or ask indulgence of his creditors until he finds by actual observation that he is unable to comply with the terms of the Act, and therefore it will not be, as it was in the past, when men went down to Montreal to find the current rate of composition, and they generally stuck to that and offered no more and no less. Let men know beforehand that they must keep proper books and have a balance sheet and take stock and do everything to satisfy themselves at any rate that they are able to pay in full, and if they cannot let them ask indulgence of their creditors. Then the composition is accomplished with little expense, business continues and nobody is hurt. He does not interfere with the business community generally—the insolvent prosecutes his business as if nothing had appended. That is in all instances the interest of the creditor as well as of the debtor and a majority of the creditors prefer that to having the old system. I have taken this stand, because I know from personal experience that that was the case in the past men who were in business and kept no books and did not know how they stood until writs were served upon them. Very often they were in a deplorable state of insolvency and did not give satisfaction to anybody, and the result was ruin all round. By taking the course that has been proposed, we are going to serve a good object and the country will be perfectly well satisfied. The same argument applies to any percentage, I admit. My experience teaches me that no one will come to a conclusion that he has become insolvent until the fact is forced upon them. Unfortunately, men are too fond of grasping at straws, trusting to chances in the future and that has been the cause of a great deal of trouble in the past. The sooner a man knows that he cannot meet his liabilities, the better, and if he will state his condition to his creditors, they will give him his discharge with little expense, without disturbing the trade and putting bankrupt stock on the market.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—The only argument adduced by those who believe in continuing the 66⅔ per cent, that has any weight is that a lower rate will be the means of throwing a quantity of bankrupt stock on the market. If they would just consider for a moment they would find that the fact of placing composition at 66⅔ per cent would have the effect of throwing much more bankrupt stock on the market than if it was placed at a lower rate, so that there is nothing in that argument. The hon. member from Lunenburg considered that this bill should be made in the interests of the dishonest bebtor—that honest debtors do not require it. It has been my experience that a great many honest people get into difficulties as well as dishonest people, and when the honest man gets into difficulty he is disposed to do the very best he can for his creditors. If he can pay 66⅔ or 50 cents on the dollar he is willing to pay it. But you must remember, if this bill becomes law, there will be a very great amount of expense connected with winding up any estate. I have the opinion of a legal gentleman on this matter: he said the expense of winding up an ordinary estate would be about $1,500. Putting it at $1,000 even, that amount taken out of an ordinary estate, would leave very little for the creditors. It must reduce the composition that he could pay to a very small amount. I believe that 50 cents is in the interest of both debtor and creditor. The hon. gentlemen who are opposed to a lower amount, are mainly the representatives of the money lenders. These are the gentlemen who are asking for a higher percentage. If the composition is fixed at 66⅔ cents, it will be no advantage whatever to the poor but honest trader who gets into difficulties. He could make a much better arrangement with his creditors without that at all, and if the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Halifax should be carried, so far as I am concerned, I shall oppose the passage of the bill altogether. In the province from which I come there is no request for such a law, and I presume if there is any desire for it I should have heard of it from the people in trade. I know from people, not only in our own province but in the neighbouring provinces where there are manufacturing establishments, that even there they have not requested legislation of this kind. If we are going to make the provisions of this bill to be of no advantage to the honest debtor who gets into difficulties, I do not see any reason for having such legislation on the statute-books. I shall support the clause as it stands.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—The evil that some hon. gentlemen see in allowing the bill to remain as it now is at 50 cents instead if 66⅔ is greatly exaggerated. Thay say that goods will be sold at a low rate and speculators buying bankrupt stock at 50 cents on the dollar, will throw it on the market, doing an injury to the honest trader. It must be remembered that in nine cases out of ten the man who fails has a good deal of old stock that is not worth more than 50 cents on the dollar, and sometimes is worth much less than that. I think that that argument is worth very little. To leave it at 50 cents as the bill now stands before us, I think is about the best thing we can do under the circumstances. If it were put back to the other figure, my preference would be to throw out the bill altogether.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost by the following vote:

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have an amendment which I venture to propose. I should not have offered it if that amendment had not been lost. The motion is as follows:

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be Resolved, That such legislation should be adopted by this Parliament as to provide for the granting of discharges to insolvents whose assets are equitably divided amongst their creditors or otherwise administered for the general benefit of their creditors in accordance with the laws of the provinces in which such insolvents reside.

The reason I move this amendment is that I think the defeat of the last amendment makes the bill much more objectionable than it would otherwise have been. We have this fact, the boards of trade and the banks who represented the parties who asked for this Insolvency Bill, stated before the Select Committee in unequivocal terms that they were satisfied with the law in existence in the province of Quebec, that they were also satisfied with the law in existence in the province of Ontario, and that their principal reason for asking for the passing of this bill was that in certain of the outlying provinces, there was no such provision as exists in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec for the equitable distribution of the assets of insolvent traders. Since that date my hon. friend from Albert has learned that the government of New Brunswick, will probably be prepared to introduce a measure similar to the Ontario Act at the next sitting of the legislature of New Brunswick. I myself, during the late recess, talked over the matter with the leader of the Government of Nova Scotia, who intimated that in all probability the legislature of that province would also be prepared to deal with the matter next year. I am not undertaking to say that the legislatures of these provinces have not been rather negligent in the performance of their duty heretofore, but we may be pretty well satisfied that when we meet again next year the necessary legislation will have taken place in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Now the question is whether, under these circumstances, it is worth while for this parliament to pass this bill which, with the exception of this 35th clause, I think is nearly as good an insolvency bill as we could get through this parliament, but is it worth our while to pass this bill which, with all its good qualities, involves very considerable expense, and which is necessarily somewhat complicated in its provisions, when resort can be had to the comparatively simple legislation of the provinces? I do not think it is, and the general line indicated by the amendment which I am about moving is the proper one to adopt. I have been very much struck by a short bill introduced in the autumn of 1893 in the House of Representatives at Washington by Mr. Bailey. The position of affairs in the United States with respect to insolvency in something like our own, and I think that the principle of this bill of Mr. Bailey's is a very good one. It provides as follows:

If any debtor owing $200 or more shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the state, territory, or district of Columbia, in which he may reside or be domiciled, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property, valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the requirements of this Act, it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for.

Sec. 2. That such assignment shall be made in accordance with the laws of the state where the debtor resides, and shall convey all of the estate of the debtor except such as is exempt by the law of his domicile from execution and liability for his debts, and shall be for the equal benefit of all his creditors, subject to all valid liens, except with the preference hereinafter allowed. It shall contain a list of the names and residences of all his creditors and the schedule of his property exempt and unexempt from execution, and the amount due to each creditor. It shall also contain a statement of the liens or other encumbrances upon his property, all of which shall be verified by the oath of the debtor to be correct, the property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the state where the debtor resides, subject to the provisions of this Act.

Sec. 3. That such assignment may contain all or any of the following preferences, namely: Debts due the United States or any state in which any of the property of the debtor is situated, or to the servants or labourers of the debtor.

Sec. 4. That any such debtor, after the expiration of four months from the date of the execution of the deed of assignment and the acceptance of the trust by the trustees, may file his petition in the district court of United States for the district in which he resides; or, if he be a resident of the district of Columbia, then in the Supreme court of the said district or if he be a resident of a territory then in the district court of such territory of the district in which he resides, asking for a discharge from said debts. The petitions shall contain a true copy of the deed of assignment, and shall be verified by the oath of the petitioner.

Sec. 5. That the creditors of the debtor shall be made parties defendant.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is that an Act of Congress?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, it is not passed but it has been introduced. It is just such an Act as we need.

Upon hearing of the petition if it shall appear that the debtor did make an assignment as authorized by this Act, and that the same contained a full and complete conveyance of all his unexempt property, and that within three months before the passage of this Act no creditor of such debtor had been preferred in any manner except as authorized by this Act, and during said time no other act was done or suffered to be done by such debtor respecting his business or estate to prevent an equal distribution of his estate among his creditors or to give one creditor an advantage over another or to defraud his creditors, and that no attachment has been levied upon the property of such debtor within three months before the passage of this bill: Provided however, That if, within four months after the levy of an attachment, the debtor shall execute an assignment or cession and file a petition for discharge as herein provided for, the execution of such assignment and the filing of said petition shall vacate the levy of such attachment, and such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this Act, the court shall order and adjudge that such debtor be for ever discharged from the payment of the debts mentioned and set forth in the petition, and such order and adjudication shall be a full, complete, and final discharge of such debtor from the payment of the said debts: Provided, That no person shall be discharged from any debt or obligation which shall have been created in consequence of a defalcation as a public officer, or as executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, or while acting in any other judiciary capacity.

Sec. 6. That this Act shall continue in force two years and no longer: Provided, That all actions commenced within that time shall not be affected by its expiration, but the same shall be conducted to a conclusion as if said Act were in full force and effect.

Now, there is a bill which includes only six sections, and it is my humble opinion that if we adopted legislation similar to that it would be preferable to this bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Did it ever become law?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No. There are 155 sections in the bill before the House. A bill something like that, providing that the debtor having made an assignment of his estate for the general benefit of his creditors under the provisions of the provincial law, could apply to a judge and get a discharge under the Dominion law, is really all we want. I may say that my attention was called to this measure by the hon. gentleman from Hopewell who, I presume, has no objection to seconding this motion.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I do not trouble the House with speeches, but I trust I shall be pardoned on this occasion. I had the honour of voting with the hon. member from Halifax yesterday and to-day. I share his objection to the clause which has just been passed by the House, but I consider it would be an altogether ignominious position for this House to be placed in if it assented to the proposition which he has just placed before us, and throw out the bill on which we have bestowed so much labour. I hold that the objections often made to the functions and duties of the Senate would be well founded, if at the end of a three months' debate upon a measure originating in our own House, we were to dismiss it as if we were unable or incompetent to pass a measure which would bear examination. It would be confessing ourselves unequal to the task of legislating on our own hook.

The confession which the hon. gentleman has just made, that, with the exception of the clause to which he makes objection and on which we have taken a vote this afternoon, the bill is on the whole, in his opinion, a good one, shows that it is his duty to support it. The hon. gentleman was an active and hard working member of the committee on that bill, and no doubt a large portion of the credit for the work that has been done was due to himself. That we should at the last moment reject the bill, we have done our very best to make a proper and sufficient measure, and confess that we are unable or incompetent to produce any legislation of our own, is to stultify the very existence of this body. The reproach has been addressed to us again and again that we are not fit to originate measures but only to polish them up. Here is a measure which originated in the Senate, and I desire and trust that we will see more work introduced and passed in this House. I trust that only a very small fraction of this body will vote for the motion of the hon. gentleman. There are more clauses than that one to which he objects that I object to also, but my duty is, I apprehend, to accept with all the grace I can the decision of the majority of this House and say that they may be wiser than I am. I must earnestly beseech the House not to carry such a motion, but to pass the bill and let it go before the country and prove to the world that we are capable of originating and completing legislation in this House.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I would prefer not voting for the three months' hoist. I do not think that we should vote in anticipation of what the provinces may do. Had the provinces taken the line which my hon. friend suggests now that they will take, there probably would have been no necessity for this bill. I have always regarded an insolvent law as a necessary evil. It is an innovation on the common law of our country, which requires every man to pay his lawful debts. This sort of legislation gradually evolved from the criminal law, and was mainly directed to apply against dishonest men, fraudulent traders. I was reluctant to take any part on this committee, preferring to reserve to myself the right to support a motion for the three months' hoist if it was not such a bill as I believe would conduce to the general benefit of Canada, but I do not feel disposed now to vote against this bill. Probably no measure has received so much attention in this House as the bill which is before us. The members of that select committee which was appointed, even those who were not in favour of an insolvent law, did their utmost to make this bill as perfect as possible. The hon. gentleman from Halifax was most industrious on that committee, and notwithstanding his objection to an insolvent law, did what he could to make it a perfect measure. I do not believe that this bill can pass this session.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Or next session either.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not think the other House would have the time to give the proper attention to this bill. It can go to the country and we will have representations from those interested in the measure as to whether they consider it a good one or not. Then when we come again we will be in a better position to judge whether it is in the interest of the country. Since this bill came before us I have been in harmony with the hon. gentleman from Halifax until now, but I cannot support his motion. We should pass this bill and send it to the other House, and if it does not pass there this year, the country will have time to consider it and we will know next session what public opinion is on the subject. Then, if it is thought that such legislation would not be in the interest of the country, we can reject the measure, or amend it in such a way as will meet the approval of those mainly interested in sustaining honest trading.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I have scarcely taken any part in the measure on this bill now before the House. There were so many other gentlemen here who were so much better qualified to express their opinions from their connection with the business affairs and trade of the country, that I thought it would be out of place on my part to take any prominent part in the debate, but I having been placed on the special committee I endeavoured to do my duty there, attending the meetings of the committee regularly and acting to the best of my judgment on the statements made to us by the gentlemen who appeared before the committee representing the various banking and commercial interests throughout the country. In regard to the motion of the hon. member for Halifax, I thoroughly agree with all that has been said by the hon. gentleman from Montreal as to the miserable position that this House would put itself in if, after having appointed a special committee, composed of some of the leading members of the House to consider the bill, that committee having most carefully and patiently considered the measure, for many weeks, and having brought representative men from all parts of the Dominion to consult with them and have an expression of their views on the bill—if after having done all that we should at the last moment vote to throw the bill out, it seems to me that we would merit the many hard things that have been said from time to time of the Senate. There would be a good deal said and with great justice about the absurdity of one having devoted nearly two months to discussing an important measure of this kind and then at the last moment, because certain enactments in it do not happen to meet the views of all hon. gentlemen, the bill should be rejected and the labour of the greater part of the session should be thrown away. I do earnestly hope that my hon. friend will not persevere in his motion, because it would place the Senate in a very false position.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I ask leave, with consent of the seconder and the House, to withdraw my motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have a proposition, which I think may possibly meet the views of the majority of this chamber. It would be exceedingly unfortunate if Parliament should intimate to the trade of this country and to all parties affected by this bill, and the courts of this country, that in the judgment of Parliament a composition of 50 cents on the dollar is a reasonable and proper one to be arrived at, because that is practically what we have decided to-day. We intimate to the courts, to creditors and debtors throughout this country that in our judgment 50 cents on the dollar is a reasonable composition. Now that is very much to be regretted because, as we all know from our experience, no two estates, are exactly alike. One trader who offers 75 cents may be shown to be guilty of very great recklessness and entirely responsible for the depreciation of his property, while another who offers 25 cents may be able to show that it was due to causes which he could not control. It would be infinitely better, and I think would meet the views of the hon. gentleman, if we were to leave the amount to be fixed by the parties directly interested—that is, the creditors themselves. If when they meet together and examine into all the circumstances, after hearing a statement of the causes that led to his embarrassment, mutual propositions are made, why should we not leave it to them to decide the amount that shall be accepted by the creditors.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Can they not do that without this bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think not.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think the creditors can give them a clearance if they like.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, if they all agree, but this bill provides that a certain proportion in number and value may agree upon the composition and discharge. Without that proportion, the proposal cannot be carried out. My suggestion is to leave it to the creditors to fix the amount. You cannot lay down any hard and fast rule as to what would be a just and honest sum. Each case must depend entirely on its merits. Our experience must have told us that. I therefore move:

That the words in the 42nd and 43rd lines of section 35, or at least one-half of the amount of the claims provable against the estate, be struck out and the following words substituted in lieu thereof, in such a proportion or amount of such claim provable against the estate as has been fixed and agreed upon in the said deed of composition and discharge.

Then you leave it entirely for the creditors to say what the debtor ought to pay.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I am opposed to that proposition. I feel that if such a clause as that were placed in this bill a debtor would invariably prepare himself for a meeting of his creditors and have himself surrounded by confederates in such a manner that it would be utterly impossible to get any sort of a reasonable settlement. I had some hopes that we were going to have an honest bill that would be a credit to Canada, that we were going to have a bill for the protection of the banking institutions and the merchants of this country, who are at the mercy of men who appeal to them for credit and capital. Instead of that, I find there seems to be a large opinion here in favour of a measure, not for the protection of the bankers or merchants, but for the protection of men who have no standing in the community and whose whole aim is to get as much credit as possible and immediately afterwards settle with their creditors for the least amount they can. Now that is a bad state of affairs to exhibit to the world. We are a new country here and I feel that instead of passing such wild cat laws as this, we should put laws on our statute-books that would give protection to capital and to the merchants who are willing to send their goods to this country. What compliment is it for a trader to pay 100 cents on the dollar? The hon. gentleman from Richmond seemed to think it was a wonderful thing. Who ever expects to get less than 100 cents on the dollar from his debtors? It is no compliment at all to get that amount. It should be an extreme case where you get less than that. How are the men who pay 100 cents on the dollar to get on at all? I cannot conceive for the life of me that men who must have experience in commercial affairs should support such a proposition. Our object should be, if possible, to make this bill in the interest of the merchants and bankers of this country instead of placing it on a par with the Scott Act. That is another law under which a debtor who gets merchandise can snap his fingers at you, and, remember, the goods affected by the Scott Act pay the government 900 per cent duty. The government have no compunction in taking 900 per cent, yet they consent to a law going on the statute-book to rob the merchant so that he has no chance of getting anything for the goods he advances. Such a law as this does no credit to us as a people, and I hope the Senate will reconsider the matter, and if we are going to put a law on the statute-book for the protection of commerce, it will be such a one as hon. gentlemen will take some pride in maintaining. I have done the best I could to assist in making this bill a good one. Several members of the committee have done likewise, and with the information and assistance we received from representative people from different parts of the Dominion, we reported a bill which would have been a good one if it had been passed as reported, but it has been mutilated. I consider we have lost the fruits of four or five weeks of the best work I have seen done in this country in twenty-seven years. I shall not vote for this amendment.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think that the amendment is wrong. The hon. gentleman should move that the bill be referred back to a committee of the whole to make the amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am following the practice of the House. When the bill was reported from the committee of the whole yesterday, it was agreed that the amendments might be proposed at the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I said on the second reading of the bill that I was opposed to it, not that I am opposed to an insolvent law altogether, but because the people of this country do not want it. They did not ask for it. Ninety-five per cent of the people of this country do not want such a law. The other 5 per cent want it for what? Do you suppose for a minute that if the people of this country wanted to have such a law as this they would not petition for it? Speaking of this on a former occasion I said who asked for it? My hon. friend from Amherst said "if you had been with me you would have known who asked for it." I knew that the bankers and wholesale traders of this country were looking for it. A great deal has been said here about the poor debtor. Who wants this law—the debtor or the creditor? The creditors of the country want this law in order to further control the retail dealers of the country and enslave them. If they want to carry on business in an honest way, let them keep their drummers at home. Go anywhere in this country now, and you will find commercial travellers at every railway station and hotel, on every concession line and every cross road, trying to force goods on the people. These drummers work on a commission. The more they sell the more money they make. The wholesale dealers want this law, the speculators and gamblers want it, not the people who earn an honest living, not the people who are producing the wealth of this country. All the honest labourers of the country want is to be let alone. Honest men will pay their debts. While the whole world is passing through a commercial crisis, Canada's credit stands second to none. We are told that the boards of trade of this country want this bill. Who compose the boards of trade? No doubt they are able gentlemen, but some boards of trade have petitioned against this bill, and some for it. Now, how are the boards of trade constituted? Are they people who can speak for the public? In some towns of this country if you pay $1 you are a member of the board of trade, and you can speak with authority for the people. Down at the seaside you pay $25 and then you can speak for the people of this country. If you pass this bill you let a man pay 50 cents on the dollar in settlement of his debts. If you pass this bill a man who owes $250 can be forced into bankruptcy. Three creditors can join together and put a man into bankruptcy. Now, who wants this legislation? The people do not—you are forcing it on them. The hon. gentleman from Montreal said it would be too bad to stop now—that our labour would be lost. In my opinion it is lost labour as far as we have gone. It may do to show the handiwork of the Senate of Canada, but what will be the fate of this bill? Supposing it goes to the House of Commons, do you suppose they will pass it? I know the House of Commons pretty well, and I can say that they would not pass that bill, because if they did, when they came before the people afterwards they would put a club in the people's hands that would knock their brains out. Take the honest dealer who wants to pay 100 cents on the dollar; how can he do it when his neighbours around him buy goods at 50 cents on the dollar, and he has got to pay 100 cents? He is compelled to go out of business. For that reason, the people of this country do not want it. It is offering a premium for rascality and wrong-doing, and the people will not have it. We have two or three petitions from the creditors of this country asking for legislation to enslave the debtors. If the people of the country want anything they have their municipal council and farmers institutes and they can address this House through them. It is truly said that the honest industry of the country is the wealth of the country, and what are you going to do by this bill? Are the people that are asking for this legislation among those who are producing the wealth of this country? No, they are not—they are schemers endeavouring to enrich themselves. For these and other reasons I am opposed to this iniquitous law. A man may have enemies in the country who will put him into bankruptcy. Therefore, I move that this bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read the third time this day six months.

The House divided on the amendment which was lost on the following division:—

Bill (78) "An Act to incorporate the Métis, Matane and Gaspé Railway Company."—(Mr. Dickey.)

DILLON DIVORCE BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day having been called,

Consideration of the Fourteenth Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce on Bill (T) intituled: "An Act for the relief of James St. George Dillon," together with the minority Report thereon.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW said: This matter has been before the House a considerable time, and we might as well dispose of it now. I therefore move the adoption of the report of the majority.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—This has been delayed from day to day, and I asked my hon. friend the mover, when the House was meeting whether it would be brought up today, and I inferred from what he said that he had no instructions on the matter and that it would not come up. I think my hon. friend might name some day on which this matter would be brought up, and then those who take an interest in it could be present.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The gentleman in charge of the bill told me that if there was time he would like it to go on.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—You might make it the first Order of the Day tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have no objections.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I shall move that the division be taken on it now, if it is in my power. It has been standing long enough.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—This is not a new subject. It has been up for weeks, and the quicker we dispose of it the better, and I do not see why the hon. gentleman asks to postpone it till to-morrow or any other day. We should dispose of it now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There happens to be a thin House at the present time, and it is just as well that the matter should be disposed of when the House is full. It is quite unprecedented, when a gentleman in charge of a bill consents to a postponement, that other members should insist on proceeding with it. I undertake not to say a word upon it, and I suppose hon. gentlemen who take the same view that I do will do the same thing.

The consideration of the report was postponed until to-morrow.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION ACT.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on bill (5), "An Act further to amend the North-west Representation Act."

(In the Committee)

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have an amendment to propose, the subject of which I have already referred to on a previous occasion. It is to make the law quite clear that a member of the legislative Assembly of the Territories cannot be a candidate at a Dominion election without resigning his seat in that Legislature. Under the statutes now, by a strict interpretation of the law, he is disqualified from being a candidate, but it has occurred on two occasions notwithstanding that he offered himself as a candidate and his nomination was received by the returning officer. I want to improve the law so that returning officers will be able to read it without referring to one or two sections, as you have now to do, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and therefore I propose the following amendment:

Section 18 of the said Act is hereby amended by adding thereto the following subsection: "The returning officer shall not receive the nomination paper of any member of the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that amendment is a desirable and proper one, but I would call the attention of the Minister to the fact that it may perhaps need something further to make it clear. Suppose, for instance, that a member of the North-west Territory Legislative Assembly has resigned, how is the returning officer to know that he has resigned?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There is a mode prescribed for a member to withdraw from the Legislative Assembly; he would just have to produce evidence or a certificate to that effect that he has handed in a proper resignation signed as required by the law of the Legislative Assembly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You cannot dispose of the subject in that summary way by saying that he shall furnish evidence. I think the evidence should be prescribed, because there have been cases of the kind before. I am not sure but that the hon. gentleman was in the House of Commons at the time—at any rate he had been there shortly before. A case came up from Prince Edward Island about which there was a long discussion, and the whole question was just how the fact that a member had resigned his seat in the Local Legislature was to be established. The returning officer in that case did accept the statement, but there was a great deal of discussion in the House as to whether the resignation had been put in in the proper way, and duly authenticated.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Of course difficulties will always arise, but I have followed the practice indicated by chapter 13 respecting the House of Commons, which does not provide what shall be the nature of the evidence. Section 1 says:

No person who, on the day of the nomination at any election of the House of Commons, is a member of any legislative council or any legislative assembly of any province now included, or which is hereafter included, within the Dominion of Canada, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, or shall be capable of being nominated or voted for at such elections, or of being elected or of sitting or voting in the House of Commons, and if any one so declared inelligible, is nevertheless elected and returned as a member of the House of Commons, his election shall be null and avoid.

Now, there is no prescription in the Statute as to the other provinces indicating what evidence shall be given that you are no more a member of a legislative body, but I take it that such evidence can be easily procured by handing in your resignation at the proper time to the proper officer and getting from him a proper acknowledgment of it, because it can only be properly handed in to the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly, the presiding officer, and a receipt under his hand and seal should and would be sufficient evidence to certify to the returning officer that such person is no more a member of the Legislative Assembly of the province. I think that the amendment will meet the case and do away with the difficulty for the future.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Would it be sufficient if there was proof of his having mailed his resignation?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not know that that would be sufficient evidence.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There might be delay or some uncertainty of the mail.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Let him resign in good time.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DEVER, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (106) "An Act to further amend the law relating to holidays."—(Mr. Bowell.)

Bill (104) "An Act to repeal the Homestead Exemption Act."—(Mr. Angers.)

REFORMED BAPTIST CHURCH ALLIANCE BILL.

REPORT FROM THE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. DEVER, from the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, presented Bill (84) "An Act to incorporate the Alliance of the Reformed Baptist Church of Canada and the several churches connected therewith," with certain amendments.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—This bill, which I have been asked to look after, comes from the committee with the amendments which are totally u important; that is to say, they are not conflicting in any way with the bill, nor introducing any new principle. The principal amendment is an additional section in the lines of the suggestion made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce when the bill had the second reading.

The other amendments are simply altering the time for the first meeting and reducing the number from absolutely being three to two at any time in case of the death of one. The promoters were agreeable to these amendments, and I beg leave to move that the amendments be concurred in to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 5.30 p. m.

DILLON DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the adoption of the Fourteenth Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce on Bill (T) "An Act for the relief of James St. George Dillon." He said: The subject of this resolution has been already before the Senate for a considerable time, and in deference to the opinion of several hon. gentlemen yesterday, I consented to dispose of it to-day. I hope that we have come to a conclusion now to allow the report to be adopted. A great deal of discussion has taken place and I do not know that anything more can be said for or against it. The desire should be to get rid of the question as soon as possible. The petitioner is anxious to secure his divorce. He has been to great expense and is endeavouring to get the bill through this session, if possible. He is unable to bear the expenses of an application another year, and that is the primary reason why I wish to dispose of it at the present time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That the said report of the majority be not concurred in now, but that the same be referred to the Standing Committee on Divorce, with instructions to the said committee to put to the petitioner, James St. George Dillon, of the city of Montreal, merchant, the question mentioned in the report of the minority, to wit, "have you been faithful to your marriage vow, as far as adultery is concerned, up to the time of your instituting proceeding for divorce," and further questions on the subject which may be necessary to get at the truth, and also all further questions which may be pertinent in the premises.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division:

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved

That the report be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the Committee on Divorce with instructions to strike out the second clause of the bill and replace it by the following clause:—

"Nothing in this Act shall be construed as giving in any way power or authority to any of the parties herein mentioned to marry again during the lifetime of one or the other."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Has the petitioner agreed to that, or has any one in his behalf agreed to it?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—No. The father told me himself he was ready to give up the second clause. I do not wish to be told to-morrow that I said so and so. What I say is that Mr. Dillon told me, in the presence of Mr. Gemmill, that he was ready to give up the second clause, but I said I would not give it up unless I could add the second clause which I have done, as to adultery.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Do you mean the petitioner or his father?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The petitioner is in France; I mean the brother. There is a letter from the lawyer of Mr. Dillon in Montreal, Mr. McGibbon, agreeing to that. I mentioned this because I have been asked.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The father did not have any hesitation in stating that he was quite prepared to take the bill on those terms that his son did not wish to marry again, and of course we would not propose to authorize the woman to marry again.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The evidence submitted to the Senate is scarcely that which would be accepted in any court of law, and if we are to pass a bill in the Senate on the evidence we have just had from the hon, gentleman from Ottawa, I think it would be something extraordinary. I do not think a parallel to this discussion can be found in our records anywhere.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is usual to accept the statements made by senators. The statements were made openly and repeatedly, and the petitioner's lawyer was quite aware of it. There was no secret about it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may say I have seen the same statements in writing from Mr. Dillon, senior.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I scarcely think that ought to be accepted. No one doubts the statement made by the hon. leader of the Opposition and others with whom the petitioner's brother or father had conversation, but it strikes me as a most singular procedure, on the report of a committee on so serious a subject as the one now before us, to be asked to give a vote upon what some persons other than those who are directly interested may have said to some senator, as to their wish or desire either one way or the other. What we have to deal with is the question before the House, and not what Mr. Dillon, the petitioner's father, or brother, may have said in connection with this matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Is it in the interest of public morality that this Parliament should grant to this woman, who is now living in adultery with a man who has been extradited, the power to marry again? That is practically what we are doing by passing this bill.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The whole question resolves itself into what constitutes a question of public morality. The hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Scott) and my colleague on my right (Mr. Angers) think it is improper and immoral, from their early teaching and early religious convictions. While I respect their convictions, it does not follow that I may think it is a question of public morality or public immorality, in granting a divorce to allow people to marry again. I do not propose to enter into a discussion upon the question which has been brought before the Senate on other occasions, as to the state in which it is said this woman's father is living in Paris, nor have we anything to do with what we have heard about her other parent. That is not a question which would actuate me in the vote I should give, and more than that, we have no positive evidence of the truth of the statement made in reference to either of these parents, except what has been told us by individuals. There was nothing of the kind stated before the committee. If evidence had been given that the father was living in a state of immorality, and that the mother is not what she should have been, had the committee reported that, then we might perhaps be prejudiced against Mr. Dillon on account of his taking the daughter to the father—the best protector, as I supposed until my attention was called to these rumours—that she could have had.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman did not catch the point that I took. It was in reference to Mrs. Dillon, who is now living in adultery. The fact is shown in the report before us. She is living in adultery with a man who has now been extradited to France. What I said was this: that I did not think it was in the interests of public morality that Parliament should declare (because that is the effect of the bill as it stands) that this woman should be permitted to marry again, because we all know that although the bill is silent in reference to the one supposed to be the guilty party, yet the effect in law is to allow that woman to marry again.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It may be quite true, but that is not before the House.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Is it not better, in the interest of morality, that the woman should marry and lead a correct life than to continue living in adultery?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No, certainly not. I believe it is offering a premium to people to say that, simply because of want of affinity between people, they can apply to Parliament and obtain power to marry again. That provision should not be in any bill. It is an inducement held out to people to get divorced and marry again. My hon. friend, the leader of the House, must know that from the beginning, this case has been prejudiced by remarks made regarding the character of the respondent, which were not in evidence. The whole debate here was conducted to show the character of the respondent, and therefore the leader of the House might have refrained from making a remark with reference to what has been stated by another member of the House on the present occasion.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—If there is one thing more than another that shows the necessity of having a divorce court instead of compelling the Senate to deal with these cases, it is the question before us now. We are asked here now to accept the dictum of an ordinary street report, which would never be accepted by any court in which such an action would be brought, and now, to-day, although I do not mean to question the statements that certain hon. gentlemen have made as to the intention of the promoter of this bill, it is a curious thing that all the remarks as to the provision which the promoter is said to be willing to accept here have been made to those opposed to the bill. I do not think that any such statements have been made to any member of the committee; certainly none have been made to me, and I have not heard it from any other member of the committee. It is said now that the lawyer for the petitioner is prepared to accept this bill with the second clause struck out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not make that statement.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER— It was stated in the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it was said the petitioner's counsel was cognizant that such statements were made. On the contrary, I think he refused.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—No statements have been made, so far as I know, to any member of the committee, or those who have been assisting to carry the bill through the House, to that effect.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I am surprised that the hon. gentleman did not understand me, but I will try to make it plain. I never mentioned the fact that the hon. gentleman has alluded to.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I rise to the point of order. The hon. gentleman cannot speak the second time.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—He is explaining.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I hope the hon. gentleman who leads the Government in this House, from the small experience he has had in divorce matters in this Senate, will suggest to his colleagues the advisability of having a court of divorce. We have these illogical discussions brought up in this House, and things of this kind done, and whether this divorce carries or not, is a matter of pure chance, and not a matter of justice or right. There is no fair play or justice in it, and this will always continue until a court of divorce is established to try these cases. We have had most disagreeable scenes going on in this House in divorce matters, and they still go on, and to say that we cannot have a court of divorce on account of the religious views of members of Parliament in both Houses, I think is a mistake. I am of the opinion that if the Government express the wish for a court of this kind, it could be established, and it is really very necessary.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think my hon. friend might take some other time to bring up that matter. It is foreign to the subject before us.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I cannot see why we should be asked to eliminate the second clause in the bill. If it is omitted the petitioner will be in no better position than he is at the present time. A few months ago he applied to the courts of his native province and got a judicial separation from his wife. Unless it is his intention at some time to get married, I must confess I am at a loss to know why he has applied for this bill of divorce at all, because, as I said before, I understand the court of his native province gave him all the rights and privileges of a separation, and that she is not now recognized by law, either in that province or in any other part of the Dominion, as his wife. He cannot marry again, and if the second clause is eliminated from this bill he cannot marry. It is quite evident to me, therefore, that he must have had some idea of marrying when he had that second clause placed in the bill. I ask, hon. gentlemen, why we should place any restriction on this man other than all other applicants who have applied to this Parliament for relief under similar circumstances? I cannot understand why an exception should be made in this case. What has been stated by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa is undoubtedly correct, that the father said that such was not his son's intention, but I submit that the father is not in a position to speak for the son. If the son had made any such representation, I do not think that I, for one, would oppose the amendment of the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière. I would very much prefer to see the bill rejected altogether than to see it mutilated as proposed by this amendment. I certainly shall vote against the amendment, and I think the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière ought to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The Order of the Day is consideration of the 14th report of the Standing Committee on Divorce on Bill (T). As I understand the amendment, it is to strike out a clause of the bill.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—My motion is to refer back the report with instruction to strike out the 2nd clause of the bill, and to substitute for it one in the negative form.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved that the report be not now concurred in, but that it be concurred in this day six months.

The Senate divided on the motion which was rejected by the following vote:

THIRD READING.

Bill (101) "An Act to incorporate the Alberta Southern Ry. Co."—(Mr. MacInnes, Burlington.)

MONTREAL ISLAND RY. CO'S. BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (59) "An Act respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company."

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND moved:

After the word "the," in section 27, line 35, the word "railway" be struck out and the following words inserted: "whole of the undertaking."

Also, that the word "railway," in the same section, in line 39, be struck out, and the word "undertaking" inserted in lieu thereof.

He said: The object of this amendment is to make sure that clause 27, which fixes the dates at which the railway shall be commenced and completed, shall apply to the whole undertaking. It has been accepted practically by the promoters of the bill, and the object is to make the meaning clear.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—I accept the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

REFORMED BAPTIST CHURCH OF CANADA BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Committee on Private Bills to Bill (84) "An Act to incorporate the Alliance of the Reformed Baptist Church of Canada, and the several churches connected therewith." He said: As I explained yesterday, the amendments do not change any principle of the bill whatever. Some amendments have been made, which the promoters of the bill accept.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was then read the third time and passed.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORY REPRESENTATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved concurrence in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole to Bill (5) "An Act further to amend the North-west Representation Act."

The motion was agreed to and the bill was then read the third time and passed.

HOLIDAYS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (106) "An Act further to amend the law relating to Holidays." He said: This bill requires very little explanation. It is simply setting apart as Labour day the first Monday of September. This day is set apart as a holiday at the suggestion and upon the petition of the labour organizations of the Dominion. The holiday has been established in other countries, and it is deemed advisable that the same concession should be made in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—I cannot concur in this. Lately it has been found that so many legal holidays existed that they had to be dispensed with, and now we are getting back to the old grievance and setting apart Labour day, which really we do not want, because Sunday is the day for labourers' rest. Of course it has been asked for, but I do not see the necessity for it.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that the bill be read at length at the table.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, under a suspension of the rules, and passed.

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION REPEAL BILL.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (104) "An Act to repeal the Homestead Exemption Act."

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is rather an important change in the law. I simply ask for some explanation in order to inform the House as to the reasons for the bill. We had a great many warm discussions a good many years ago, when Sir David Macpherson was Minister of the Interior, over the provisions of the Homestead Exemption Act, which then became law.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The object of this bill is to repeal the Dominion law on the subject, the Assembly of the North-west Territories having passed this Act, which is chapter 45 of the Revised Ordinances of the Territories, exempting certain property from seizure and sale under execution. The Act passed by the North-west Territories differs from the Dominion Act in so far as real estate is concerned. Under the ordinance, the homestead of the defendant is exempted, provided the same be not more than 160 acres; in case it be more, the surplus may be sold, subject to any lien or incumbrance thereon. Previous to that, it was only 80 acres. Now they have increased it to 160 acres, which is the ordinary lot possessed by farmers in the North-west Territories. It does away also with the dower, and reserves to the wife what is called her life estate, and it also provides that the husband cannot dispose of the real estate of the homestead without the consent of the wife. As to the other provisions of the ordinance, it is exactly what the Dominion statute was.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—As the Orders of the Day are finished, I desire to do something which is very unusual on my part, to correct an error which has appeared in regard to our division of yesterday on the Insolvency Bill in the Montreal Gazette of this morning. I do it, not so much on my own account as on account of an hon. gentleman who is absent, and who, I know, will be very much annoyed when he is deprived of what he considers the honour of having moved the six months' hoist to the Insolvency Bill yesterday, the Hon. Mr. McCallum. The report of the Gazette reads as follows:—

> Senator Miller then made a final effort to kill the bill by moving a six months' hoist, but he only got eight supporters, and the vote stood nine for the six months' hoist and forty-three against it.

I know that the hon. member from Stromness stayed here in order to move the six months' hoist which he told me he was pledged to some of his constituents to do and which he did in pursuance of that pledge, I know he will be displeased when he receives this report to-day. I may say the Gazette is generally correct in its reports of this House, and I am surprised that such an error should occur in its reports.

The Senate adjourned at 5.40 p.m.

MONTREAL BELT LINE COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ moved the third reading of Bill (59) "An Act respecting the Montreal Belt Line Railway," with amendments.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to move the amendment of which I gave notice and I just wish to make the nature of the amendment clear. If hon. gentlemen will look at the Bill and turn to the 2nd sub-clause of clause 3, they will find that it is as follows :—

> 2. In the city of Montreal, and in order to traverse the said city from the east to the west, the company may lay out, construct and operate an elevated railway,—the route of the said railway on the line of any street or streets, or river front, to be subject to the approval of the city council.

It will be apparent, from the reading of this clause, that it would be in the power of the company to construct an elevated railway through any of the streets in Montreal which were approved of by the City Council, and to run not only passenger trains such as are run on the elevated railway in New York, but freight trains of all kinds, freight trains, for instance, carrying cattle, and I think every one must see that it would be highly objectionable for such trains to run through the centre of a city like Montreal. I do not think there is any other large city in North America where freight trains of all kinds are allowed to go through all parts of the city, and particularly on an elevated railway. One can see that, for instance, cattle trains would be highly objectionable on an elevated railway. The amendment which I propose is that after the word "railway" on the third line, the House shall insert "for the carriage of passenger trains." Now, passenger trains habitually carry light freight; they are not confined to the carriage of passengers, but I may say if it is thought that the amendment could possibly interfere with the carriage of market-garden produce and other things of that sort over the elevated railway, I shall be quite prepared to withdraw my amendment, if the promoters of the bill will submit an amendment, which will guarantee that heavy freight shall not be carried on this elevated railway. I think that, for instance, the clause might be allowed to stand as it is with this addition:

> Provided that if the said elevated railway is located elsewhere than on the river front it shall be used only for the transportation of passengers and mails and of market produce and other light freight.

I am not at all wedded to the language of my amendment, but I think the interests of the citizens of Montreal, who in very large numbers petitioned against this measure, should be protected. It might be said that it is a matter which concerns the city of Montreal exclusively, but, hon. gentlemen, I do not think that that can be contended. The Government of this country have this session undertaken to guarantee a loan of, I think, $4,000,000, for the purpose of improving the port of Montreal. It is recognized as the leading city of the Dominion, and I do not think that we should allow anything to be done there which would be calculated to inflict serious injury on the city. As far as I am aware, there is no city in North America where an elevated railway is operated for the purpose of carrying freight through the city. I am quite satisfied that if the proposition were submitted to the citizens of Montreal, that this company or any other company should be allowed to carry freight of all kinds through the city on an elevated railway, they would not consent. In addition to the objections on the ground of cleanliness and on the ground of the obstruction of the streets and the interference with other traffic, it must be borne in mind that freight trains as a rule do their business largely at night, and the consequence of permitting such traffic would be that people along the line of this railway would have no chance of getting to sleep at all. They would be annoyed by the whistling and puffing of the locomotives all through the night. At any rate, hon. gentlemen, I feel that I am only doing my duty in submitting this amendment which was defeated by a small majority in the committee. I therefore move :

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by inserting after the word "railway," in the third line of the second subsection of section 3, the words "for the carriage of passenger trains."

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—I appeal to hon. members living in large cities, namely, Toronto, Hamilton, St. John, N.B., Quebec, Halifax, etc., and ask would they submit to have an elevated railway pass through their streets carrying freight? Think of the nuisance inseparable from carrying stock overhead, and the inconvenience in the streets, arising from the additional strength required for the superstructure on which the road would be built. It would be a very serious matter. It is not permitted in New York, or any other cities having elevated railways, that I ever heard of. Freight, if at all carried on the line, should be left outside the city limits.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It may appear presumptuous on my part to make comments on this bill, not being a citizen of Montreal. However, I know about as much about the city and islands of Montreal as anybody who is not a resident there. I know the requirements of the island, and it strikes me as a strange thing, that all the northern and eastern parts of it have no means of access to the city of Montreal except the ordinary country roads. The fertility of the island is great and it is strange that the people have laboured so long under the disadvantage of being without railway facilities for disposing of the products of the land, of dairy farms and kitchen gardens. I need not dwell upon that point, it must be obvious to all of us who have looked at the plans. It will be a benefit, not merely to the city of Montreal, but to the whole of the surrounding country. This belt railway, I believe, is to be about 70 miles in length around the island, and it will be a great advantage to the people to have such communication with the city. We know that this bill has passed the legislature of the province of Quebec, that it has had the sanction of the municipal council of the city of Montreal, and has passed the House of Commons here. We know that it is impossible for them to create any nuisance of the character described by the hon. gentleman from Montreal. The municipal council of the city can at once intervene to prevent any nuisance. If this were a city railway altogether and not a belt line with branches crossing navigable waters and railways having Dominion charters, the hon. gentleman's objection might apply, but it is a railway for the benefit of the larger portion of the island of Montreal and therefore the objection which has been raised has very little weight. My hon. friend should withdraw his motion. The people of Montreal themselves are the best judges of their own interests. They have the whole thing under their own control. The railway cannot pass through the city, or in front of the city, without the consent of the municipal council of the city of Montreal. It would be unwise of us to attempt now to amend this bill; any amendment of the character proposed, to make it only a passenger railway, would have the effect of destroying it altogether. The main advantage of it is to give the people of the island of Montreal the benefit of the market of the city of Montreal. It is not likely that there will be any heavy freight trains passing over the road; the line is simply for the benefit of the island and is not like a general railway for carrying the heavy traffic of the country. It is in the interest of the people of the island that they should have it, and as the whole thing is to be under the control of the local authorities, who could prevent any nuisance being created, or even prevent the railway being constructed in any part of the city, the matter rests in their own hands. I hope, therefore, that the motion will be withdrawn, or if not withdrawn, that it will be disposed of in a summary manner.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I hope the hon. gentleman will not withdraw his motion. It is a very important and necessary amendment to the bill. With reference to the remarks that have been made by the hon.

member from Lunenburg, does he forget that the only part of the railway to which this restriction would apply is the part going through the city of Montreal—that all the sixty or seventy miles outside of the city can bring the freight to the very limit of the city? The objection is that this traffic should be carried on through the streets of the city and over people's heads, a thing that is not permitted in any city where elevated railways exist. Even if the adoption of the amendment had the effect of destroying the bill, I for one should not regret it. It is a bill which should not pass this House. Very little attention has been paid to the remonstrance sent to this House by the council of the board of trade, a very influential body in the city of Montreal, composed of people who are known to be greatly interested in the city, men who have shown from their business ability their fitness to judge of the propriety of anything of this kind, or of the effect it might have upon their city. That petition was presented and read to the committee, but in my judgment the weight that that petition should have had was not properly appreciated. Was there not in the petition from that council a very plain and direct statement that the whole thing was simply a speculation—that there is no bona fides in it? Was not that enough to arouse attention and make it the duty of the committee and of this House to ascertain whether it is a bona fide transaction which should receive the sanction of this House?

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Has the hon. gentleman any evidence to that effect?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The hon. gentleman may remember that in the committee I made mention of that statement, and that I required evidence of the bona fides of that company, and asked those present if they were prepared to give us a list of the stockholders showing the amount they had subscribed, to give evidence that any money had been paid in, and it was very plainly stated to the committee, even by those who sought this legislation, that under the charter of the Provincial Legislature they were not able to float bonds and obtain money, that they wanted the sanction of the Dominion parliament in order that that sanction should give them a standing in the British market and by the endorsement of the Dominion Parliament they would be able to negotiate their bonds. Is not that asking us to assume a responsibility, as the protectors of those who invest their money in this country and look to this parliament to guarantee that any corporation procuring a charter here shall be a bona fide corporation enjoying our confidence and under our protection and guidance? We should be extremely cautious in a matter of this kind. It will please me very much if any gentleman will move that this bill be not read a third time now but that it be read a third time this day six months. I do not feel that I can make a motion of that kind, not being a resident of the city of Montreal, but I should give it my support if it were introduced. In the provincial charter under which that company exists, there is this provision made, that the directors may issue as paid up stock shares in the company, whether subscribed for or not, and without any payment being made thereon and may allot or hand over such stock as paid up stock for certain purposes, and also for services of employees and contractors of the company. We know what has been done under a clause of this kind before. We have had experience of it in cases brought before this House. Under a clause of that kind, people have shared a large amount of stock among themselves without paying a single dollar upon it. They then have gone into the market and sold their charter and these individuals, after making their two or three hundred thousand dollars out of their shares, have ceased their connection with the company.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That is not an unusual course.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I do not know whether it is unusual or not, but it is very improper, and we should do everything in our power to prevent such transactions. British investors are looking to this Parliament, and if we give the imprimatur of the Dominion Parliament to this bill, it gives the company an opportunity of going to the British market, saying that it is a bona fide undertaking, one which the Dominion Parliament approves of, and it is like an endorsement of their claim.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Is the hon. gentleman reading from the local statute or the federal statute?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I am reading from the statute of Quebec incorporating the company, and the present bill provides that all rights that have been exercised under it are confirmed and guaranteed. The clause in the present bill is:

Provided that nothing in this section shall affect anything done, any right or privilege acquired, or any liability incurred under the said Acts of the province of Quebec at the time of the passing of this Act,—to all of which rights and privileges the company shall be entitled, and to all of which liabilities the company shall be subject.

What does that accomplish? If these incorporators, not having paid a single dollar on their stock, choose to appropriate to themselves one million or two million dollars of stock, they get their certificate of paid up stock. They do not require even to subscribe for it and then they go into the market and when they sell this charter they make a large sum out of it, without having invested a single dollar. That is not a bona fide transaction, and my impression is that it is legislation that this House ought not to sanction, more especially when we have had a protest against the bill, numerously signed, sent here from most responsible parties in Montreal, men whose names no one will question as representing largely its intelligence and wealth, who understand the interests and requirements of the city, and who are deeply interested in its well-being and its having a good character and reputation. I am very glad that my views will go on record if the bill carries. I cordially support the amendment of my hon. friend from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The last remarks made by the hon. gentleman introduce a new principle into our legislation. A great deal of what he said one might be inclined to agree with so far as the power is granted to pay contracts for construction with the stock, but that is not the question before us at the present time. There was no amendment on that question, as far as I understand when the bill was before the committee. The question at present is whether freights shall be carried on this railway or not. Now the way it presents itself to my mind is this—the city of Montreal has perfect control over that, they have to go to the city of Montreal and ask them whether they may go on such and such a street, or whether they will have to go round by the back of the mountain, or whether they can take the river front. The city of Montreal has perfect control over it, and if they choose to say that they shall not carry freight through the streets or any portion of them, they have the right to do so. It was distinctly mentioned in committee that that was the position in which it stood. We had a telephone bill here last session, and the question arose whether they should put into that bill that the telephone company should put all their wires under ground. The answer made to that was, that the town or municipality in which the bill was to be put into operation had perfect power to dictate terms with regard to that, and this is something very similar. I do not think that we should take that parental position over Montreal or any other city to whom we have delegated powers to control these matters. For that reason I support the bill in its present shape.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—As a citizen of Montreal I am very thankful to the hon. senator who takes so much interest in anything that may relate to the prosperity and well-being of that city, but I cannot fail to mark that the amendment made by my hon. friend from Halifax has for its object, if I understand the words plainly, the defeat of the bill and nothing else. That seems to be the desire of my hon. friend. I do not think the city of Montreal would be thankful to him for that. The hon. member from Victoria has stated that the great objection he had was to the transportation of cattle through the streets in railway trains. It is strange that he has not discovered that we are much more inconvenienced now than we would be if the cattle, instead of being driven through the streets to the great inconvenience of passers-by, should be carried in closed cars. We know very well now that to reach the cattle market the cattle have to be driven through the dense parts of the city every year. Does it not strike every one that it would be better if, instead of being driven that way they were carried by railway? I think this is a good answer to the objection which has been made by my hon. friend from Montreal, who fears that the droppings on the street from the cattle cars may be a nuisance. Well there is more of that when the cattle are driven through the street. Now as regards the hon. member from Sarnia, I think he has forgotten the main point made by those who represent the Belt Line Railway. It was never mentioned by them that their main object in coming here was to enable the company to go to the London market by them. That has been suggested by those who are accusing them without any proof of trying to secure a speculative charter, The syndicate or company has never mentioned that it was for that object. It was mentioned in fact that they had to come here in order to meet the requirements of the federal statute which says that any line of railway which has to cross other railways under federal jurisdiction must come under federal laws, and it was for that reason and no other, and I am surprised that the hon. member from Sarnia should have attributed to the promoters of the bill anything which was only raised by the enemies of the bill as an objection to it.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—If my memory serves me that was the argument advanced by the solicitor who was there advocating the bill and distinctly stating it.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—Now as regards the board of trade, of which mention has been made several times, I repeat what I have said, that never at any moment have the board of trade been called to pronounce on the merits or demerits of this question.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I was careful to say "the council."

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—A few members of the board of trade who do not represent the one thousand members who form the trade and commerce of Montreal, but against that we have the resolution from the Chambre de Commerce composed of 600 members and not a hole and corner meeting, but a meeting called of the members of the Chambre de Commerce, who were called together and pronounced in favour of that railway. Of course, hon. gentlemen, we are not surprised at any opposition which may be directed against public enterprise in Montreal. Some of those members are very like those who opposed another public undertaking, who protested against the action of the late Sir George Etienne Cartier, when his government decided to build the Victoria bridge. We saw them opposing the building of the Victoria bridge on the ground that it would destroy the business of Montreal. Men of another age have been opposing anything that would promote the interests of the city Fortunately for Montreal we have always had public men opposed to those who were against any progress, because they fear their slumbers might be disturbed by night trains, even at the expense of experiencing some difficulty in crossing after a certain number of cattle had passed through the streets.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman does not live on the line of the proposed railway.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—I have enough interest in Montreal to be willing to hear the cars passing by for the sake of the progress of the city, and I do not object to have my sleep disturbed if the interests of Montreal are dependent on that. My hon. friend from De Salaberry (Mr. Tassé) tells me that at a public meeting in Montreal about this bill only thirteen were found to oppose that bill. It is very well for some millionaires, or supposed representatives of millionaires, to come here and say that it is a mere speculative scheme. I should like if we had millions to carry out those schemes for the benefit of Montreal. We have had one or two who had perhaps some competence when they began, and risked it in the enterprise of building railways ; but we had the sorrow lately to learn of the death of one who had become a millionaire, but who was not a millionaire when he was entering on big enterprises for the benefit of the country by the building of railways. I think it is not paying a just tribute to those who are willing to give anything they possess, their intelligence, their money, even if it is only a few hundred dollars, to give their time and sacrifice everything to promote public interests. I say that we want that railway not for millionaires but for the thousands of people who want to be accommodated by it. The island of Montreal has too long been considered far remote from the city and not as easy of access as other places fifty or sixty miles away which have been served by railway. The farmers of the island of Montreal want to come freely to the market, and if we can secure a line passing from one end of the city to the other, which can serve the different markets, we shall have done very much not only for the population of Montreal but for the farming community around Montreal. Now that we see that the object of this amendment is admitted by its promoter to be merely to defeat the bill, we should do justice by voting against it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not say, and do not mean, and do not believe that the passing of this amendment would in any sense result in defeating the bill. The promoters of this bill have said that they hardly expect to build this elevated road at all, that they simply intend to use the power to build this road to coerce certain other interests into allowing them to build a surface road. That has been stated to me by gentlemen who are supporting the measure.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—Would it not have been better to have stated that in committee?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rather think it was stated. I am not sure, but one cannot state everything in the committee. There were a good many statements made. Hon. gentlemen will see that this amendment does not at all affect the belt line of railway, it simply refers to the elevated railway through the streets of Montreal. It would not apply to the railway on the river front.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I question very much if the promoters of this bill would undertake the building of a road through the city that would be capable of carrying heavy freight. When the horse railway was first constructed in Ottawa, it was intended that it should be used for carrying freight during certain portions of the day—a couple of hours in the morning and a couple of hours in the evening—and power to do this was incorporated in the charter. But it was found to be impracticable, because of the curves and the heavy superstructure required. The carrying of freight was abandoned, and the line was used only for the transportation of passengers. I think, therefore, that there is no great danger of this Montreal railway company constructing an elevated railway for the carrying of heavy freight. The cost would be so enormous that they could not afford to do so. On the other hand, if the projectors of the road think it would be, and the authorities of the city of Montreal do not object, they ought to have the management of it themselves. You may depend upon it that the extraordinary provisions of the bill respecting indemnity to be paid to the owners of property will prevent anything of the kind. The company will have to buy every inch of property through which their line would pass, not simply for the line of railway, but any property that they might damage, and we know what the damages would be likely to be in a city like Montreal. We know what the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway had to pay for access to Montreal, and the cost would be still greater in the case of this railway. If this road is built it will give the people outside the city of Montreal an opportunity to dispose of their produce in the city. I think an elevated road along the wharfs would be a great advantage to the city. It would not interfere with traffic on the street, and it would benefit all parties concerned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The chief difficulty that I see in supporting the amendment is, that while the hon. gentleman's argument may be very good as far as certain streets of Montreal are concerned, the amendment applies to all streets, and we do not possess sufficient information to be able to designate the streets on which it would be reasonable to run freight cars, and those on which it would not be reasonable. At the present time I presume there are freight trains carrying heavy freight and cattle, running through the city of Montreal, both on the Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway, and if my memory serves me, I saw some time ago a proposition at the instance of the city of Montreal that the lines of railway, east and west of the city, should be connected in order to avoid the cost and difficulty of transferring freight. This bill has received the sanction of the Local Legislature and has been very carefully examined by the committee in the other chamber. It comes to us now for the third reading, and we should feel a great of hesitation in adopting any amendment of this character without having sufficient information before us on which to form a correct judgment. The city council ought to be the guardians of the interests of the city, and I cannot conceive that the council of Montreal would consent to the use of this line for heavy traffic through the city unless it was felt, after the closest investigation, to be in the public interest.

TRUST CORPORATION OF CANADA BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF COMMONS AMENDMENTS POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved concurrence in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (D) " An Act to incorporate the Trust Corporation of Canada."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the hon. gentleman from Calgary can have scrutinized these amendments with the care which he generally bestows upon matters which are under his charge. I have not had time to look over the whole of the changes carefully, but I wish to call the attention of the House to some of these amendments. Some of them are frivolous, some are erroneous, and the rest, perhaps, may be allowed to pass. The first amendment is on page 1, line 16, after the second "the" insert "general." The title will be "The General Trust Corporation of Canada." We thought the title was rather too broad in this House, and that it might be called " The Trust Corporation of Alberta ", but the House of Commons wished to make it more extensive and have made it " The General Trust Corporation of Canada." However, that is a matter for the hon. gentleman from Calgary. If he thinks it is not too extensive it can pass. The next amendment is on page 3, line 6, leave out from "States" to the first "or" in line 7. Now turning to page 3, line 6, I find the change there is this: "the company are authorized to make investment in the stocks, funds and government securities of Canada, or of any province or of the United States of America." The amendment is striking out the word "of America." There are other United States besides the United States adjoining us, and the proper title of the neighbouring country is the United States of America. I think the amendment is clearly a mistake. Then the next amendment is where the company were authorized to invest any funds in Government securities in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The Commons have amended that provision by striking out " of Great Britain and Ireland." That may pass, because everybody knows what the United Kingdom means; but in line 19 there is a manifest error, and I must ask the hon. gentleman not to have the House concur in it, what is clearly a mistake. Page 3, line 19, leave out "two" and insert "four." It is a part of the subsection in section 5; and whoever undertook to amend this bill in the Commons was misled. He mistook paragraphs for subsections. The first part of the clause says, " The corporation shall invest trust moneys as follows, and may manage, sell and dispose of such investments as the terms of the trust require." Then it goes on (1) upon first mortgages." Then (2) in government securities, and so on. These are all paragraphs of the first subsection, and very properly the next subsection is No. 2. "Nothing in this section shall prevent the corporation," etc. My hon. friend must see that the amendment is clearly a mistake on the part of the Commons. I shall not follow out the subject any further, but I think these amendments should not be agreed to. I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he should go over these amendments carefully. There are others of the same character, and my hon. friend might bring the matter up to-morrow. I inquired of the law clerk of the Commons if these amendments were made at his suggestion and he said they were not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have to thank my hon. friend for directing his attention to this matter; but I felt confident in leaving the matter with the promoter of the bill—the one who would be most concerned in it,—a lawyer of good standing in the city of Toronto, and just before I left my home he informed me that he had gone carefully over the amendments, and was thoroughly satisfied with the bill as it came from the Commons. However, I will accept the suggestion made by my hon. friend and permit the matter to stand until to-morrow, with the consent of the House. A further investigation can be made in the meantime, as to whether these amendments are really errors.

The Order of the Day was discharged and fixed for to-morrow.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved concurrence in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (S) "An Act to amend and consolidate the Act relating to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal." He said: The amendments are not many, but they are somewhat important in their character. In subsection 3 of clause 6 in the 6th and 7th lines the word "high" is struck out and the word "low" substituted therefor; so it will read "the intersection with the low water mark" instead of "high water mark." in paragraph 2 of the same clause the word "other" is struck out and in the 2nd line after the words St. Helen's Island these words are inserted "Nor over any part of Ile Ronde or Mouton," so that the paragraph will read as follows:

> The corporation shall have no right in or jurisdiction over any part of St. Helen's island nor over any part of Ile Ronde or Mouton except such as is specially given it by the Governor in Council.

A subsection is added to clause 21 after the word "amended" at the end of subsection 2:

> All lands not being within the limits of the harbour as defined by this Act but being within the limits of the harbour as defined by the Acts previous to this Act, shall be deemed to have reverted to and to be vested in Her Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada.

It will be noticed that subsection 2 says "all the lands lying within the limits" and this subsection says "all lands not lying within the limits." In subsection "R" paragraph 12 of clause 26 the following words are struck out after the word "Montreal" in the third line:

> Such by-laws may extend to any matter of procedure, or otherwise, not provided for by this Act; but for which it is found necessary to provide for the proper exercise of such power, and the better attainment of the object of this Act.

After consideration it was thought this was giving altogether too wide a power to the Harbour Commissioners. These are the amendments which have been made by the House of Commons and which I beg leave to move concurrence in.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—In winter when the river is frozen over, who has the right to control the river—the municipality or the commissioners?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—That is a question that has never been suggested to me, but I should think the commissioners.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is under the municipal code of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—That is in the corporation.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—I think it is under the municipality, because there is the road across the river, and it is always an agreement between the city of Montreal and the municipality of Longueuil.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—If they were to come into conflict, the municipal law, which is a local law, would have to give way to the federal law. There are some cases in which the Harbour Commissioners might interfere.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I cannot answer that question positively, but I should think in a matter of that kind that the local law would have to give way in the interest of the Dominion. It is simply a utilization of the ice bridge for the time or during its existence, and the river would come under this Act again.

The motion was agreed to.

SAFETY OF SHIPS BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved concurrence in amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (G) " An Act further to amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 77, respecting she safety of ships." He said: The amendment is to sub section "f" of the 1st clause, giving an interpretation to the expression "South America." It is carrying out the suggestion made by the hon. member from Lunenburg at the time the bill was under discussion here. It is after the words "French Guiana" in subsection "f":

> The expression "South America" means any part or place on the main land or islands adjacent to the south-eastern extremity of French Guiana and the Straits of Magellan.

In clause 23, line 17, these words are added after the words landing place "who has reason to expect the arrival of any ships carrying passengers." The way it reads in the original bill makes it imperative on certain owners or occupiers of wharfs to do or perform certain acts, and this leaves it a little less restrictive.

The motion was agreed to.

MANITOBA AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved concurrence in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (X) " An Act respecting the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company."

The motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN THE TERRITORIES AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS introduced Bill (HH) " An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting land in the Territories."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has this bill been printed?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, but it will be printed at once. Copies of the bill have been sent to all the judges in the North-west Territories, and they have made comments upon and suggested amendments to the measure. It is not new to the members of this House. I shall not press the second reading until the bill has been distributed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I objected to the second reading at this early stage, because the judges of the North-west Territories did not approve of the first bill introduced in this House. It was afterwards referred to them, and they recommended the passage of a bill materially different in its provisions, but their suggestion was departed from so widely that the bill was not recognized by them. I believe that this bill contains largely the suggestions made by the judges of the Supreme Court of the Territories. I have not had an opportunity, and I very much doubt if the judges in the Territories have had an opportunity, to inspect it since the suggestions of the judges were acted upon, and it is only a desire to see a proper bill passed that I suggest that time be given for the proper examination of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that when this House adjourns on Wednesday next, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 3rd July at 8 p.m. He said: Saturday and Sunday are not meeting days, nor is Monday, which is Dominion Day and therefore a holiday. It has been suggested to me that it would be almost useless, considering the small number of bills or the business that there is to do, to meet on Friday, as the notice on the paper calls for. I do not think the adjournment will at all hinder the business, unless we have more bills sent from the Commons. With the understanding that hon. gentlemen are prepared to sit till 12 o'clock if necessary and with the consent of the House, I have changed the motion to extend the adjournment until Tuesday next, at 8 p.m.

The motion was agreed to.

TRUST CORPORATION OF CANADA INCORPORATION BILL.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day having been called,

Consideration of amendments made by House of Commons to Bill (D) "An Act to incorporate the Trust Corporation of Canada."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED said: I move concurrence in the amendments with the exception of the second and fourth amendments. These are clerical errors which have been introduced in the bill in the process of passing through the Commons. I shall afterwards place my reasons in writing and leave them with the Clerk, so as to apprise the Commons of the reasons why we do not concur in these amendments. The second amendment referred to strikes out the words "of America" in the phrase "United States of America" it will be easily seen that this might possibly conflict with other United States, such as the United States of Colombia or the United States of Mexico. Therefore the bill should remain as it passed this House, leaving in its integrity the designation used "United States of America." The fourth amendment made by the Commons appears to have arisen from a misapprehension as to what constituted a subsection to section 5 of the bill. They appear to have construed the enumeration of a certain classification of securities or investments as being subsections to the bill instead of subdivisions of subsection one, and they appear to have accordingly treated the classification by numbers as subsections. This is evidently an error arising from what was, apparently, simply a casual observation of the bill. Therefore I move concurrence in the amendments with the exception of those two.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—You have to make two distinct motions, a motion to accept some of the amendments and a motion to reject the others.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With the liberty of the House I put it in that shape, that we concur in all the amendments except the second and the fourth.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The way would be for the hon. gentleman to move the amendments that he wishes the House to concur in separately, and let the House concur in them, and then to move that the House do not concur in those amendments, and then send a message to the other House with the reason.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not enumerate the amendments owing to the fact that there are over a dozen and I thought to embody those to be concurred in in one resolution, and adding "except two and four."

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is perfectly regular. I do not see any objection to the motion of the hon. gentleman. He moves that the House concur in all the Commons amendments except two and four. Then he goes on and moves the resolution about two and four.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I thought there were only one or two amendments, and they might be taken separately.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I find there are twenty. It will be quite manifest that the more intelligent way of doing it will be to concur in all the amendments with the exception of two and four, and reject two and four.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The proper course would be to make a distinct motion as to what amendments were accepted and then a motion rejecting the others, stating the reasons.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I think the better way would be to refer it to committee, and the committee could accept certain amendments and reject the others. They could report the bill to the House with the proper amendments.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the course suggested by the hon. gentleman were adopted, we should have the House going into committee and what would the report of the committee be? It would be exactly what the hon. gentleman moves now; the committee would recommend that the House concur in all the amendments except the second and fourth, and then there would have to be a motion that the report of the committee on that be adopted, and then we would have to move again that the second and fourth amendments be not concurred in.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I think the difficulty would be got over if the member would put the motion in writing to the House, and then they would know what they would have to deal with. The simplest way to reach it is to move that the House concur in the amendments made to such and such a bill, naming it, with the exception of these other amendments, for certain reasons, stating them, and then that a message be sent to the House of Commons to that effect.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—As we are not very much pushed for time, I may suggest what I would do under similar circumstances. I would move that the House do concur in certain amendments, mentioning them in their order, without reference to the amendments that are not to be concurred in, and then I would make a separate motion as to the other amendments in which the House was asked not to concur, and move that the House do not concur in these, and that a message be sent to the Commons to that effect. Strictly speaking, each of the amendments should be concurred in on separate motion and not in block.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed upon the Order paper for to-morrow, and then I shall have the resolution prepared in accordance with the suggestions made. It must be quite evident that had I prepared the motion, it would have been a superfluous task, inasmuch as I would have had to depart from it, owing to the suggestions that have been made.

The Order of the Day was discharged, and placed on the Order paper for to-morrow.

REFUGE FOR FEMALES IN ONTARIO BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS introduced Bill (II) "An Act respecting Houses of Refuge for Females, in Ontario." He said: The bill is similar to the Ontario Act relative to offences against Acts passed by the Legislature of that province. The object is to enact the same legislation in relation to offences committed against the Dominion laws. It provides that the magistrate may withdraw from the common jail any female prisoner confined there and send her for imprisonment to a house of refuge for females, Protestants being sent to Protestant institutions and Catholics to Catholic instutions.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Is that regardless of age or the character of the crime?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Regardless of age. It deals with female offenders generally.

The bill was read the first time.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE FORCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (121) "An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the North-west Mounted Police Force." He said: This is not a new bill, although it has been sent up from the House of Commons. The changes are not very great. It is more for the purpose of consolidating the different Acts which are now upon the Statute-book, and to make certain amendments to enable them to manage and govern the force better than they have in the past. It has not been printed and laid before us, but with the consent of the House, I shall move the second reading, and give a short explanation of its provisions. The present Police Act limits the salary of veterinary surgeons to $700 per annum. This rate was fixed when the force numbered only 300 men and horses. There are now about 800 horses, with two veterinary surgeons, but it is impossible to retain the services of competent men at that figure, authority is therefore asked to pay them not exceeding $1,000 per annum.

Authority is asked to pay not exceeding four staff-sergeants $2 per day, the limit under the existing Act being $1.50. It frequently happens that non-commissioned officers are intrusted with onerous or very responsible duties, and it is proposed to provide for an extra allowance, while so employed, of not exceeding 50 cents per day. Eighteen is the minimum age of engagement for service in the force. The authority of Parliament is asked to engage not exceeding twelve boys, between the ages of 14 and 18, as buglers, at 40 cents per day. It is expected that under this authority the duty of buglers, at present performed by constables at 75 cents per day, can be transferred to boys at 40 cents per day, thus promoting economy. Authority is also asked by section 19 of the amended Act to apply any pay which may be due deserters at the time of desertion to what is known as the fine fund of the force. This fund is applicable to the payment of rewards for good conduct or meritorious services. for the establishment of libraries and recreation rooms, &c. The amount forfeited by deserters during the fiscal year 1892-93 was $194.09, and in the past it has been customary to deposit such forfeited pay to the credit of the Receiver-General. The expenditure of this fund is made upon the recommendation of the commissioner of the force. The average expenditure during the past five years has been about $2,000 per annum, as follows:—

	Per annum.
Books, illustrated papers, periodicals and newspapers for the reading of the force, about	$1,000
Cricket and football material, games for recreation rooms and billiard tables, pianos, &c., about	500
An annual allowance to each of the 10 divisions of the force towards the expenses of their Christmas festivities	500
Rewards for meritorious service, &c., about	25
	$2,025

All fines are deposited in the Dominion Savings Bank. The amount now at the credit of the fund is $5,724.85. The fund has been allowed to accumulate with the object of establishing a library for the whole force, with headquarters at Regina, and a system of exchange between there and the several divisional headquarters. It is proposed to have cases constructed which will contain between 50 and 100 volumes, and which, by removing the doors, can be used as book shelves. The amendments to the bill are of the character I have indicated, with this addition: it gives certain powers to the officers and to non-commissioned officers, when their services are required in the suppression of riots or the arrest of criminals. One important amendment to the bill also is to define precisely what the duty of the police is. Among other things it is to be understood that they are not to perform ordinary city and town police duty, and they are Dominion in character. In the past the police have been used in a very great extent in the place of local police officers in the different towns and villages that have grown up in the North-west. In order to define that point clearly, so that there will be no misunderstanding upon it, this bill makes provision that their duties are to be general rather than of a local character. These are the most most important amendments; there are a few amendments that are verbal in their character, and which, I think, if adopted will tend in a great measure to make the force more effective and place it upon a sounder basis, by which it can be controlled and managed better in the future than it has been in the past.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to ask two questions in connection with this bill, with a view to having an answer to them when the bill comes before committee. In the first place, is it the intention of the Government to fix the salary of veterinary surgeons arbitrarily at $1,000 a year, or to give power to graduate the salaries of veterinary surgeons according to the merits of their services between $750 and $1,000? And in the second place, have any representations been made to the Government as to the desirability of having a graduated scale of salaries for inspectors? I might say that under the present statutory provisions regarding the North-west Mounted Police, the salary of an inspector is arbitrarily fixed at $1,000; so that outside men who are appointed, for instance, graduates of any military school or those who may receive their appointments through political channels, receive $1,000 and are placed in quite as good a position as inspectors who may have served in the force for 10 or 15 years and who have not yet received promotion. It has been represented by those who are competent to judge of the system, that it would be very much more desirable that new inspectors should be appointed at a lesser salary than is now paid and that the salary should be increased from time to time as their services would warrant. It should appeal, I think, to the reason of every hon. gentleman present that an inspector being appointed to-day from the outside, not having any knowledge of the duties appertaining to such an office, cannot be as efficient an officer as one who may have spent 10 or 20 years in the service of the North-west Mounted Police, and it is unfair to the men at present serving, who have spent long periods of service in the performance of arduous duties, that they should be placed in no better position than those who have just received their appointments.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—To the first question, I might say there is no arbitrary sum to be paid to the veterinary surgeon; this fixes the maximum. There is nothing to prevent their employing them at $400 if they think proper, but it gives power to the Government, or the head of the department, to pay a veterinary surgeon as high as $1,000, but no higher. As to the other point raised in question asked by the hon. gentleman, I do not think there is any provision made for what you might term graduated salaries for either long or short service. It will be seen when the bill is printed and in the hands of members, that the 14th clause provides what the salaries shall be. The commissioner is to have $2,600; the assistant-commissioner, $1,600; each superintendent, per annum, $1,400; the inspectors, per annum, $1,000 each; surgeon or assistant-surgeon, per annum, $1,400; the veterinary surgeon, as high as $1,000; the staff surgeon, $2 per day; other surgeons, $1.50; the non-commissioners, $1; constables, 75 cents; buglers, 40 cents, and the working pay to artizans, 50 cents a day. There is no graduated scale in the bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Except as to veterinary surgeons.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Except as to veterinary surgeons, that portion of the bill is not changed in any way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And I ask an extension of that principle to the officers.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The question asked by the hon. gentleman was as to whether it was arbitrary. I say no, that is the maximum sum. There is an increase to the staff surgeon: those are the only changes. Whether the principle suggested by my hon. friend, that there should be a graduated scale for inspectors who occupy a similar position to that of majors in the army, is a question which I think could scarcely be considered favourably by any one connected with the force. There is no such graduated scale of pay to lieutenants, captains, majors, colonels, or generals in the army, and the payment to these officers is based upon the Queen's Regulations as to payment. The man who occupies the position of commissioner should be in the position, as my hon. friend knows, of the commander of the force, and he gets a higher salary; the other occupy positions analogous to captains, majors and officers. I will bring the suggestion under the notice of the head of the department, but I do not promise him acquiescence in the suggestion made, because it would be subversive to all military discipline and contrary altogether to the regulations which govern forces of this kind.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

TRUST CORPORATION OF CANADA BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the House concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (D) "An Act to incorporate the Trust Corporation of Canada," from 1 to 20, excepting 2 and 4.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The regular way would have been to move these amendments one by one. This resolution may answer the purpose at the present time, because no one may take exception to any of the various amendments included in this motion, but should any member object to any of the amendments, he would have to move against the whole of them, or move an amendment to the motion, whereas if the hon. gentleman had put his various amendments one by one, as is done in the House of Commons always, each one of them could be dealt with separately. The truth is, we have got into a way of doing business here that does not enable us to give proper consideration to these amendments. The hon. gentleman will find it difficult to furnish a precedent in any work of authority for moving concurrence in amendments, as he has done. The one class of amendments should be accepted without any exception, and then non-concurrence should be moved to two amendments which are objected to, without any reference to the others, with a message to the other House stating our reasons therefor.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I must have misunderstood my hon. friend from Richmond. I laboured under the impression that what he wanted was that I should mention the number of amendments made by the House of Commons, which I have accordingly done. I should say that a statute would be as strictly drawn as it is desirable that any motion should be drawn, and in framing a statute where several clauses are to be mentioned, you do not enumerate each clause separately, but say from such a clause to such a clause. Surely the motion that I have submitted answers all statutory requirements.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There is no analogy between the two cases. It would be as regular, when a bill comes before a Committee of this House, to move the adoption of the clauses en bloc as to move concurrence in the amendments as the hon. gentleman proposes to do. It is a habit that we have fallen into in this House which is not justified by any authority; it is done for convenience, and no exception has been taken to it. What I suggested yesterday was to make a motion specifically mentioning the amendments which the hon. gentleman desires us to accept, and then another motion specifically mentioning the amendments which he desires should not receive the concurrence of the House. However, strictly speaking, the proper way would be to take up these amendments one by one and put them to the House and have them concurred or not concurred in, and in that way disposed of.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no doubt, strictly speaking, my hon. friend is correct. The object is to save language in writing out a motion, although we are profuse in speaking it.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved:

Resolved, That this House do not concur in amendments numbers two and four to Bill (D) "An Act to incorporate the Trust Corporation of Canada," on the following grounds:—

That the second amendment purports to change the name "United States of America" to "United States," thus creating uncertainty in the bill as to the meaning of the name thus adopted, there being other "United States" than the "United States of America."

That the fourth amendment appears to have been made in error, inasmuch as there are only two subsections to section 5. The bracket numbers (1) (2) (3) are not numbers of subsections to section 5, but are only subdivisions of subsection one.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LATE PRESIDENT OF FRANCE.

The SPEAKER announced to the Senate that he had received a telegram inviting the members of the Senate to attend the funeral of the late President Carnot. He said: I had to answer that the Senate being adjourned, I could not put myself in communication with the members, and that I regretted very much that I was not able personally to leave the Capital and attend the funeral.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I might add, for the information of hon. gentlemen, that a similar invitation was sent to the Cabinet, and the Premier replied that, owing to the pressure of business,it was utterly impossible for them to leave the Capital but that they expressed their deep sympathy with the French Administration in the loss of their President.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired,—

Whether the Government know if it is the intention of the Great North-west Central Railway Company to undertake the further construction of their road during the present summer, and if so, how many miles? And also, whether the company are in a position, and whether they intend to operate the road this season, and if they do not further construct the road, will the land grant lapse?

He said: I do not wish to make any remarks respecting the matter now, because the answer might materially affect the remarks which I would make, and therefore I wait for the answer.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I made inquiry of the department and find that they have no knowledge as to whether this company intends to proceed during the present session with the further construction of this road, and the question as to whether the land grant will lapse is now before the Department of Justice for their opinion.

Bill (124) "An Act further to amend the Cullers' Act."—(Mr. Angers.)

Bill (HH) "An Act to consolidate and amend the Act respecting land in the Territories."—(Mr. Angers.)

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (129) "An Act further to amend the Revised Statutes respecting Interest." He said: The object of this bill is simply to set at rest differences of opinion that exist as to the law in the province of British Columbia. Some judgments have been given in that province by which the rate of interest in one case might be only 4 per cent and in others higher rates, and in order to set the question at rest, it was thought better to introduce this bill making all judgments draw the one rate of interest the same as in the other provinces of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman is not quite correct as to the rate of interest in Nova Scotia. It is 6 per cent unless there is a writing establishing a different rate. If the judgment is by confession, it may be any rate of interest that you wish. It is only when judgments are not by confession but by the order of the court that the rate is fixed by statute.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—While this Parliament has the legal right to fix the rate of interest it seems to me that we have no power to make the provision contained in this bill. I do not see how we can interfere with the procedure of the provinces. They have their own statutes and very often it is a matter entirely for the court or the judge to decide whether interest shall be allowed or not. Very often it is left to the jury. In this bill we are asked to peremptorily declare that in the province of British Columbia interest shall run absolutely after the rendering of the verdict. It seems to me we are disturbing the rule which exists in the provinces and that the legislation would therefore be ultra vires.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If this were an interference with the rules of the court or anything affecting the court other than the fixing of the rate of interest, the hon. gentleman would be right in his contention. I speak of course with all due deference, being a layman, and speaking to a lawyer, but the British North America Act gives full power to this Parliament to legislate upon questions of interest, and no local legislature has any such authority or power given it under the statute. So long as we confine the bill, as this does, simply to declaring what rate of interest shall be calculated upon judgments, we are not exceeding the powers of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not think it is interfering with the rights of the provinces. The only object of the bill is to fix the rate of interest when interest is due. Of course, if a contract stipulates that a certain rate of interest shall be paid, whenever there is a judgment that rate of interest cannot be changed. The parties have made the law for themselves, and if they have stipulated that the interest shall be at a certain rate, it must be that rate, but whenever it is an obligation which only bears interest after it has accrued, the legal interest is 6 per cent, and it is for this Parliament to determine that rate.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—In my province—New Brunswick—when a debt is due, the law fixes 6 per cent as the rate, but any other rate can be fixed by a written contract. Therefore this bill would not interfere with my province further than this—at present the Dominion statute regulates the rate of interest where there is not a contract made fixing a different rate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It appears to me these questions of detail can be better dealt with in committee than here.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

A REPRESENTATIVE FROM VICTORIA.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Sir Henry Wrixon, a member of the Victoria Government, is in the Chamber, and I should esteem it a pleasure if he be invited to take a seat on the floor of the House.

Sir Henry Wrixon was then introduced to the Speaker by Mr. Bowell, and took a seat near the Throne.

LAND GRANTS TO MEMBERS OF MILITIA FORCE IN NORTH-WEST BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (54) "An Act to make further provision respecting grants of land to members of the Militia Force on active service in the North-west." He said: This is simply providing for extending until 1896 the period during which scrip for lands can be issued to those who served in the late troubles in the North-west. It has been found that some of them, from inadvertency or some other cause, have failed to take advantage of the provisions of this law, and some cases have been brought under the notice of the Minister of the Interior which induce him to ask Parliament to extend the time until January, 1896.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I suggest to the leader of the House that before this bill goes into Committee of the Whole, information should be given to the House as to the disposition of various applications made by parties in the North-west for scrip in pursuance of the Act relating to scrip. I am fully aware that a great number of applications are on file which are not yet dealt with—at least so I am informed by the applicants, and for several sessions I have made a similar request for information on this point, and I should like if the hon. leader of the House would bring down information to show what applications have not been dealt with. I know there were a number of corps organized during the rebellion, and the matter still appears to have been pending as to whether those corps shall be recognized as entitled to scrip. It would be desirable that this matter should be finally disposed of at this session if possible.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to require the number of names of the applicants for scrip or for land under the scrip?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No; those who have applied for scrip as considering themselves entitled to scrip in pursuance of the statute in that behalf, but whose rights have not yet been recognized to the issue of scrip.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes; I will endeavour to get that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think before the bill is passed by this House that the Minister should give an undertaking that this is the last time he will ask the House to pass such a bill. We have passed such bills six times, I think, and the Government might endeavour to get the unpleasantness wound up before the lapse of ten years from the time of the occurrence.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The suggestion is a good one, but I think it is never too late to do what is right, and if there has been an error on the part of those who have applied we should not take advantage of it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should not want my hon. friend to think that I am taking objection to the extension of this legislation. It is very desirable that it should be extended as long as it is necessary.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE AND AUDIT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (127) "An Act to amend the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act." He said: There is a clause to be added to the present Audit Act, and it is in the interests of the officials of the country against whom actions may have been brought. It provides a limitation of time in which actions against revenue officers can be brought, and provides for a notice to the defendant; and also where there is a defence, tender of payment into court may be made. It provides also, in case of a verdict, for the recovery of costs, &c., as well as in cases of seizure. The last clause is for the protection of officers against vexatious actions.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What is the present limitation? One year?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—In the Customs Act it is one month. This is a new clause to be added to the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (137) "An Act further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act." He said: This is the bill we passed last year, but owing to the early prorogation of Parliament it did not pass the lower House and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries introduced it this year in the Commons.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Have not some of the clauses been passed in the previous Act this session?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes, slight amendments which will be explained.

The motion was agreed to and the bill read the second time.

SEIGNIORY OF SAULT ST. LOUIS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (97) "An Act respecting the seigniory of Sault St. Louis." He said: The object of this bill is to authorize those charged with the management of the Indian lands and properties to accept a rebate in the settlement of claims against the holders of property in that seigniory. They have been in litigation for many years without any beneficial result for the Indians who are interested as incumbents of this land, and an agreement has been made that they should pay promptly if rebate was granted. It is thought advisable to accept this, and accordingly we come to Parliament to be authorized to do so.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

OTTAWA AND GATINEAU VALLEY RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (72) "An Act to consolidate and amend certain Acts relating to the Ottawa and Gatineau Valley Railway Company, and to change the name of the Company to the Ottawa and Gatineau Railway Company." He said: This is a bill to consolidate and amend certain Acts passed some years ago relating to this railway. I may say that this road has been of great advantage to the country: it has developed a large trade and extensive business is now being prosecuted successfully. I believe in the future it will be the high road to James Bay. It is reported now that anthracite coal in large quantities has been found at James Bay, and if such is the case, it will enable the coal to be brought to Canada by a shorter route than the Pennsylvania route which will enure to the benefit of the Dominion. I believe also that a great many people have taken advantage of this route as a summer resort, for which it is admirably situated, possessing as it does all the elements required to render it attractive to the pleasure seekers, and before long it will be studded with habitations by those parties who formerly resorted to the sea shore. A company is now being formed for the exploration of the territory north of this city and if it is found, as suggested by Professor Bell of the Geological Survey, to contain coal, it will be of immense value to Canada. which will make the route second only to the Canadian Pacific Railway in general commercial importance. Power is also asked to construct a bridge over the Ottawa river in the event of the Pontiac Pacific Railway Company not proceeding with the work. I hope the Government will also subsidize the road and also assist in the construction of a bridge between the two provinces. I hope the Government will subsidize this work, and that they will also, in conjunction with Ontario and Quebec, supplement the liberal bonus of $150,000 granted by the city of Ottawa towards the construction of the interprovincial bridge to connect the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES OF SHIPS AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (130) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting Certificates to Masters and Mates of Ships."

He said: The principal object of this bill is to give the same rights to British sailors who are not Canadians, and who have not served in Canadian ships for three years, as are given to foreigners. Under the present Act a sailor who has served three years in the merchant service is entitled to his certificate on passing the examination, but a British sailor is not entitled to the same privilege unless he has served three years in a Canadian vessel.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Is it to extend the limits for coasting vessels?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No, the coasting trade is governed altogether by another Act, and the coasting trade is not given to foreigners unless they have given the same rights and privileges to Canada. The provision of the law as it stands upon the Statute-book to-day is that we have power by Order in Council to grant the privilege of coasting to any country which extends it to us.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

A REPRESENTATIVE FROM VICTORIA.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL.—I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Hon. Mr. Fitzgerald, from Melbourne, Victoria, is in the Chamber and I trust the same courtesy which we extended to Sir Henry Wrixon will be accorded him.

The Hon. Nicholas Fitzgerald was then introduced to the Speaker, and took a seat by the Throne.

THE MUSQUODOBOIT VALLEY RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POWER rose to Inquire of the Government, whether or not they propose to ask Parliament to aid, by subsidy or otherwise the construction of the line of railway in the province of Nova Scotia, commonly known as the Musquodoboit Valley Railway?

He said: Perhaps before saying anything further I had better briefly explain to the House what the proposed railway is. It is a line which would start from the waters of Halifax Harbour, or from Windsor Junction, which is a point about thirteen miles from Halifax, and run eastwardly through the county of Halifax on the southern side of the height of land which constitutes what may be called the back-bone of the province, and the road would be from fifty to sixty miles long. If the views as to help to provincial railways which prevailed in Parliament up to the year 1882 were still in the ascendant, I should expect a negative answer to the question which I propose to ask the Government, but a new policy was introduced in the session of 1882; an Act was passed that year giving subsidies to a number of railways which did not extend beyond the provinces in which they originated. Up to that time it had been held that the Dominion Parliament was not supposed to assist any railway which was purely provincial in its character. It had to be shown, up to that time, that the railway connected two provinces together or passed through two or more provinces in order to enable the promoters to receive subsidies from the Dominion Parliament. By the Act to which I have referred, that policy was changed, and a new policy adopted of helping from the Dominion treasury, by way of subsidies and otherwise, railways which were purely provincial and local in their character; and that policy has been continuously followed since that time. Nearly every session we pass bills intended to provide subsidies for local railways. It is now only necessary to show that the railway is calculated to benefit a considerable population, and sometimes even that requisite has not been insisted upon, and also that it cannot be constructed without help from the Dominion Parliament. If one looks at the railway map of the province of Nova Scotia, he will see that while railway facilities have been afforded to the centre of the province—that is to the region running north from Halifax city to the boundary of New Brunswick, and also to the region lying along the Basin of Minas and the Bay of Fundy and Chignecto basin—these are all to the west of the centre of the province—he will also see that railway facilities have been extended to the Gulf Shore or that part of the province which is bounded by the Strait of Northumberland and the Strait of Canso, and also to the Island of Cape Breton. Including the railways to which subsidies have been recently given and which are now under course of construction, the island of Cape Breton will in a very short time, be fully supplied with railways. Practically all the country north of the height of land is now supplied or in the course of being supplied with railway facilities, but south of the height of land the condition is altogether different. There is hardly a mile of railway constructed in all this region between the Bay of Fundy at the one end—the Bay of Fundy shore of Shelburne county and the eastern shore of Guysborough county which is bounded by the Strait of Canso. The population which inhabits the country extending from the Bay of Fundy to the Strait of Canso are almost altogether without the blessings of railway communication. It is true that the Nova Scotia Central Railway extends from the town of Lunenburg north to Middleton, in the county of Annapolis, and gives railway communication of a certain kind to a portion of the fine county of Lunenburg. That railway, while no doubt it is a great blessing to Lunenburg, does not give the county the railway facilities which it ought to have. The line runs across the county instead of through its length. The Intercolonial Railway also runs north from Halifax and gives to the city of Halifax communication with the continental railway system, but the great bulk of Halifax county and of Lunenburg county and the whole of Shelburne county, Queen's county, and practically the whole of Guysboro' county are to-day without railway facilities. I am rejoiced to know that as a result of a subsidy granted by this Parliament some years since and renewed last session in an amended form, a railway is now in course of construction from the town of Shelburne eastwardly to the Nova Scotia Central Railway. If the contractor who has the work in hand completes that road to the Nova Scotia Central, I have no doubt that before very long it will be extended from the Nova Scotia Central through Lunenburg and Halifax counties to Windsor Junction, or Halifax city, and when the road is completed, as I hope it will be before long, the Intercolonial Railway will practically extend to Shelburne town and give all the western portion of the Atlantic shore of the province direct communication with the railway system of North America, and then the Dominion Parliament will have done pretty nearly all for western Nova Scotia that that part of the country has a right to expect. Now as to the eastern portion of the Atlantic slope of Nova Scotia, it will have no railway facilities unless a road is constructed either from Halifax Harbour or from Windsor Junction to Upper Musquodoboit. That is the road to which my question refers. About the claim of the people of eastern Halifax and of the St. Mary's district of Guysboro' county to railway facilities, I think there can be no doubt. In East Halifax there is a population of 20,000 and in St. Mary's, district of Guysboro', a population of something over 5,000; and ever since the union of the colonies—and of course for a long time before that—the people of this region have been paying their share of the customs and other taxes; and at the present time if it were not for the small steamer which makes weekly trips eastward and calls at one place in East Halifax and one place in St. Mary's district, those people would have no better communication with the outside world than they had 50 years ago. Now, while that is true of this region, which is comparatively near the centre and capital of the province, Sydney, in the eastern part of Cape Breton, and Yarmouth at the western extremity of the province, are, for the purposes of passenger traffic, very much better off and nearer to Halifax city than the eastern part of Halifax county. As to freight traffic, there is no comparison whatever; all the advantages are on the side of the remote eastern and western points, while the disadvantages are with the nearer region. This condition of things is clearly unfair to the travelling public and to the producers of eastern Halifax and western Guysboro'. These districts have great resources in the way of agricultural products, timber, minerals and fish, but their development is hindered by the want of means of access to markets where their produce can be sold to the best advantage, and where the supplies which they need can be most advantageously procured. I beg to call the attention of the House to one very melancholy consequence of this condition of things. The farmers of the Musquodoboit Valley, who are some of the most intelligent, enterprising and industrious people in the lower provinces, have been for years deserting that beautiful and fertile country and carrying their enterprise and energy and intelligence away out of the provinces, chiefly, I regret to say, to the western states; and the population of this country, which has been very much blessed by nature, has not appreciably increased during the past 20 years. Hon. gentlemen, I do not think that this condition of things should be allowed to continue. The farmers and other residents of Eastern Halifax and Western Guysboro' should be furnished with such means of communication as will enable them to transport and dispose of their products to advantage. The construction of the Musquodoboit Valley Railway would bring the farming population within a very few hours' ride of the capital. It would give them ready access to market and would enable any point on the coast of East Halifax or St. Mary's District to be reached by a traveller on the day on which he left the city. In addition to serving the rural districts, this railway would give Halifax and Dartmouth the back country from the want of which they both suffer at the present time. I may mention casually here that there has not been a mile of railway built in the county of which Halifax is the capital since the year 1864. That cannot be said of any other large city of the Dominion and I may be allowed to remark, by way of parenthesis, that the Intercolonial Railway, for which Halifax is very often called upon to be grateful, is really, in a business sense, of greater advantage to Montreal, Toronto and other business centres in Ontario and Quebec, than it is to the city of Halifax. The freights on that road are very moderate, and the through rates are lower than the local rates. The consequence is that the business men of the upper provinces are enabled to put down their goods in the province of Nova Scotia just as cheaply, or even at lower rates of freight than are those of the city of Halifax and other towns in Nova Scotia. I believe it is a matter of fact that hay can be brought from other provinces to Halifax and other places in Nova Scotia, where hay is largely used, at lower rates than it can be brought from their own farming and grazing districts. I have presented the facts in favour of a subsidy in a rather imperfect way. I turn now to the prospect of getting the road constructed in case the Government decide to give a subsidy for this undertaking. Under a general Act which was passed by the Legislature of Nova Scotia in 1886, the Provincial Government would be obliged to give a subsidy of $3,200 a mile to any company which satisfied the Local Government of its ability to construct the railway in question, and there is hardly any doubt that a grant of a like subsidy of $3,200 a mile, by this Parliament, would secure the construction of the road whose claims I am now advocating. The line has been surveyed, and it is apparent from the reports of the engineers that the work of building would be neither difficult nor expensive The length of the line would be between 50 and 60 miles. If we assume the higher figure to be correct, then this Parliament at the utmost would be called upon to aid this undertaking to the extent of $192,000. Now I do not think, hon. gentlemen, that this is too large a sum. Nobody can reasonably say that that contribution to this work would be too great to secure its construction. I do not care to trouble the House by citing precedents for such grants. There are scores of them to be found in the report of the Minister of Railway and Canals for the past year. I find from that report that altogether there had been paid out of the Dominion Treasury up to the 31st December last by way of subsidies to railways $10,871,573. By railways here I mean local railways. That does not include the subsidies given to the Canadian Pacific Railway and other roads of that character. I may mention three or four of the roads to which subsidies have been granted. There is a road in the province of Quebec known as the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. To that subsidies have been granted to an amount something less than $600,000. There is a road known as the Montreal and Western road, running out of Montreal, which has already received subsidies to the amount of $348,000. Then there is in the province of Nova Scotia the Nova Scotia Central Railway, which has received subsidies to the amount of $240,000. The road now in course of construction from Shelburne to the Nova Scotia Central is to receive subsidies to the amount of $240,000. The Ottawa and Gatineau Valley Railway, of whose claims and prospects the hon. gentleman from Rideau division spoke so eloquently yesterday, had received, up to the date mentioned, subsidies to the amount of $284,000. At page 207 of the appendices to the Railway report will be found a long list of railways which have received help from the Dominion treasury. Several of them are much smaller and much more local in their character than the Musquodoboit Valley Railway. Hon. gentlemen know that any subsidy granted in aid of this line would not be paid to the railway company unless for work actually done, and the benefit conferred on that section of the country by the expenditure of $192,000 would be great and lasting. An expenditure of that amount would not be like other expenditures of which nowadays we hear a good deal. For instance, there has been a very considerable expenditure on a bridge across a canal in the city of Montreal. I am not going to discuss the expenditure upon that bridge now further than to say this, that from the evidence in that case it appears that the bridge has cost at least $240,000 more than it should have cost. The excess of the cost of that purely local and comparatively unimportant work, over what it should have been, is $50,000 more than the amount the Government would be called upon to pay to aid in the construction of this important railway. There is another matter of which a good deal has been said during the present session of Parliament—what are known as the hard pan cases in connection with the railway through Cape Breton. There has been paid out in that case about $250,000 in addition to the amount to which the contractors were strictly entitled—that is, about $60,000 more than the Government would be asked to contribute towards the construction of this railway. Then there is another public work—I have no doubt a very valuable and meritorious one, but still one which does not benefit a large population—commonly known as the Tay canal, which has cost something over $476,000, according to the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals. Looking at these expenditures which I have just mentioned, there can at any rate be no scruple on the part of the Government or Parliament in giving the comparatively trifling assistance which may be necessary to secure the construction of the important public work whose claims I am advocating. And the claims of that railway are not set up by myself alone. Previous to the election of 1887, the gentleman who is now High Commissioner of Canada in England was a member of the Government, and he was waited upon by a deputation of gentlemen interested in the construction of this railway. He does not appear to have given them any pledge because he denied subsequently in Parliament that he had given them any pledge ; but I know from conversation with some of the gentlemen who waited upon him—and they were not Liberals either—that he certainly left them under the impression that if the Conservative candidates were successful in Halifax county a subsidy would be almost certain to be granted to this railway ; and the present members for the county have urged as one of the reasons for their election by the voters of Halifax, that if they were elected this road would be constructed, and if they were not elected, it would not. As an opponent of the Government, and an opponent of the members for Halifax county, it would perhaps be my best policy to say nothing about the construction of this road, but to be silent, so that when another election came around we could point to the fact that the promises made by these gentlemen and the hopes which they had raised had not been fulfilled. I do not look upon my duty in that light. I am anxious that the county in which I was born and where I hope to live and die, may prosper, and whether the Government secure political strength from the construction of this road or not, I am anxious to see the road constructed. The project is a feasible one. It will serve a large population. It will do the work of two or three immigration agents in the way of keeping our own people at home, instead of having them go to a foreign country, and it will help to complete the railway system of the province and of the Dominion. I do not speak with the utmost confidence, but I hope the Government will inform the House that they propose, when appropriating subsidies for other railways, to provide a subsidy for the Musquodoboit Valley Railway, and I now ask the question which I placed on the paper.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It is not usual for me to make any remark on a simple question asked of the Government, and I would not do it in this instance were it not that the question put by my hon. friend affects the county of Lunenburg. A railway to connect Shelburne with New Germany and across the most fertile part of the county of Lunenburg from New Germany to New Ross and from that on to Windsor Junction and thence to the valley of the Musquodoboit, would be very beneficial to the larger part of Guysboro' as well as to Halifax and Lunenburg counties, and that part of the province of Nova Scotia is certainly deficient in railroads. It has not received from either the Local or the Dominion Government the consideration to which its importance would entitle it. But the first step necessary is a charter and a grant of money from the Provincial Government. I have always contended for the construction of railways through the country. I believe that money judiciously expended on lines established in proper localities is a permanent advantage to the country. It is a benefit for all time and raises the whole status of the country, the agricultural interests and the people themselves. It makes the people more active, industrious and prosperous in the localities in which they dwell, developes industries, keeping the people at home and attracting settlers, thus populating the country. I perfectly agree with my hon. friend in all that he has said with regard to this railway, and the advisability of its construction, but I cannot overlook the fact that I think the position of this railway now is different from that of any other railway to which the Dominion Government has given a subsidy. I do not know where there is a company in existence in Nova Scotia called the Musquodoboit Valley Railway Company. No survey has been made, no prospectus issued and no route determined on, but it has been an election hobby, I have never known of a subsidy being asked from the Dominion Government for a local enterprise until such time as there was a company in existence and it had the sanction and assistance of the Local Government. That is essential before the Dominion Government can be asked to subsidize a local railway. My hon. friend also takes a different view of these matters from that which his financial leader does. That gentleman has often talked about the Maritime provinces as being mere shreds and patches, and said that the money expended there for railway purposes had been used for corrupting the constituences. That we have had from him over and over again —that the lower provinces, especially Nova Scotia, had been corrupted by these subsidies to the railways. I am glad that my hon. friend does not believe in the statement or that the people of Nova Scotia can be corrupted by such base means. They have not been in the past, and I do not think they will be in the future. My hon. friend is correct in saying that at every election, for the last ten years or more, whether local or Dominion, in the county of Halifax the Musquodoboit Valley railway has been an issue in the election. Both parties have tried to make capital out of it, and both blamed each other for not having done something to further its construction. But common sense must dictate to the people that they must first demand a charter and money aid from the Provincial Government. I hope that in the future that may be obviated by the railway being built as all other railways of a provincial character have been built. The people ought to have it. But we must have a company in existence and that company must have the support of the Local Government first. It must have the earnest approval of the Local Government in the shape of a subsidy. The general Act to which my hon. friend refers would not of necessity compel the Government to grant any assistance to that railway, and therefore I think that my hon. friend should use the great influence that he possesses over the local administration of Nova Scotia to have a company formed and a line of railway marked out that will extend by way of Musquodoboit to Windsor Junction and across the country through the fertile lands of New Ross and New Germany. When that is done, and the Local Government grant the subsidy which I believe they ought to grant, and would grant if they were properly approached, then I am prepared to co-operate with my hon. friend in pressing upon this Government the necessity and importance of this line and the advantages which would arise if it were constructed. I am sorry that my hon. friend introduced the question of excessive or improper expenditure elsewhere. It is foreign to the question before us, and it might have been just as well if he had not referred to it. Such hits at the Government and odious comparisons do not help to promote the object desired, but my hon. friend will always find in me on a question of this kind, a zealous co-operator with him in impressing on the Dominion Government the necessity of that railway, but I repeat there must first be a railway company in existence, we must know where it is to run, and it must have the sanction and approval of the Local Government. When that is done, which ever party is in power the Government should come to the assistance of that road. In spite of the declaration of his financial leader, that the maritine provinces are the shreds and patches of this great Dominion, and that they have been corrupted in consequence of subsidies being granted in aid of railways of little or no importance, I believe that a railway should be built from the junction at New Germany to Musquodoboit, that no public money could be better expended in Nova Scotia, and that this subsidy should and would be granted to the railway in question.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The Government are considering their railway policy, in relation to roads already begun as well as in relation to new railways. The House will get full information when the Government has decided, with the sanction of the Governor General, to bring down the resolutions to be submitted for the consideration of the House. The strong plea made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax for assistance for this road will receive due consideration. I hope that the objection which has been made, that there is no incorporated company to build this road, does not exist, and that if there is such a company they have filed a claim with the Government setting forth the advantages to be derived from the building of this road, and praying for Government assistance.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Lunenburg seemed to think the existence of a company incorporated for the purpose of building this road was a necessary pre-requisite to the granting of the subsidy. I think the hon. gentleman is not correct in that view, and I regret that the Minister seems to a certain extent to share the views of the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg. There was a company incorporated some years ago for the purpose of constructing the road, and that company made an application to the Government for a subsidy, which it did not get. I am disposed to think it is not at all improbable that the charter of that company has expired ; but, leaving the company out of the question altogether, if the road is a work which deserves Government assistance, then if a grant is put in the Subsidy Act to be given to any company which constructs the road, that is just as good as if the company was in existence. There will be no difficulty in having a company organized, if there is not one now in existence, to undertake the work, and I may say, with respect to an objection raised by the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, that the local Act in Nova Scotia provides that the Government shall give the assistance to any company which can satisfy the Government of their ability to construct the road.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—To any company ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, any company, and the company will be formed if it is not now in existence. With regard to the road now in course of construction from Shelburne to the Nova Scotia Central Railway, the Local Government made a contract with that company for its subsidy under the General Act to which I have referred. There is no necessity for a special Act, because the General Act authorizes and directs the Local Government to give this assistance of $3,200 a mile to any railway which is of provincial utility, and there is not the slightest doubt that if the Dominion Government decide to give the subsidy, the Local Government will make a contract with any company prepared to go on with the work.

TRUST CORPORATION OF CANADA BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I beg to move that the resolution adopted by this House on Wednesday, 23rd June last, with respect to the amendments made by the House of Commons to the Bill intituled " An Act to incorporate the Trust Corporation of Canada," be rescinded in so far as Nos. 2 and 4 of the said amendments were disagreed to, and that the said amendments 2 and 4 be now agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Strictly speaking I do not think that motion is quite in order. The motion of which the hon. gentleman gave notice was one to rescind the resolution of the previous day, and this is a different motion : it provides not only for rescinding the resolution of the former meeting of this House, but to go further and agree to amendments made by the Commons. I am not going to raise any question of order about the matter. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman in the exercise of his own right to do what he pleases in regard to the amendment, has thought fit to agree to an amendment which was clearly an error.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSES OF REFUGE FOR FEMALES IN ONTARIO BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (II) " An act respecting houses of refuge for females in Ontario."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is the same as the Ontario Act, I suppose?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This is word for word the same as the Ontario statute. The only alteration in it is to have the same advantage for females sent to jail embodied in the laws of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE FORCE AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (121) "An Act to amend and consolidate the Act respecting the North-west Mounted Police Force."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There is very little in this bill which is new except that the salary of the veterinary surgeon is increased to $1,000. It was found impossible to procure the right class of men at the lower salary formerly paid. A certain number of inspectors have been also added, and power is given to employ a certain number of boys as buglers at a reduced rate of wages, being a saving on the former system, as the work is done just as efficiently by them as by men. As we go on with the bill I shall indicate the other clauses which are new and what explanations may apply to them.

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice that one of the differences between this clause and the section in the existing law, the place of which it takes, is an increase in the staff. The old law runs this way—that the Governor General may from time to time appoint a commissioner of police, assistant commissioner, etc. This clause provides that the Governor General may appoint an officer who shall be called a comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police—that is an officer not mentioned in the old Act—and in addition to that a commissioner of police and an assistant commissioner, etc., so that we are to have at the head of the force now an officer who was not in existence originally. If we are to have a comptroller, we might dispense with one of the officers. It may be said in reply that the force is larger now than it was when this Act was passed in 1886. Still the force has been organized and it does not require very much ability to keep it going. When the police force was first constituted, everything was new and probably called for a good deal of skill to manage and control it, but the force would, I fancy, almost run itself now, and I cannot see why the staff is to be increased.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I should be very much more pleased with this bill if it increased the pay of the common policeman. I understand that the pay, when this force was first originated, for a private was $1 per day and a grant of land after a certain term of service. The grant has since been taken away, and instead of receiving $1 he receives half a dollar a day. That is small pay. The policeman has to go through all the drill of a soldier, has to groom his horse, and has to expose his life keeping off the whisky smugglers from the border and suppressing rows among the Indians. Instead of going to the expense of sending troops to the North-west to suppress any possible rebellion, it would be better that the Mounted Police should attend to that and put down any disturbance at once. It is all very well to say that the British soldier receives lower pay than half a dollar a day.

That is a fact, but if a war breaks out the British Government will find it a disadvantage. When the civil war of the United States broke out, it was found necessary to increase the pay of the soldiers. One of the things that Englishmen will learn when a war breaks out is that they will have to increase the pay of the soldiers and sailors. I think the pay of the men in the North-west Mounted Police should be increased, and also, as we have great areas of public lands, that each man should have a grant of land after his term of service is over. You may say that the land would not be worth much, but certainly with such an inducement held out to him, a young fellow would be more likely to enter the service.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I agree with the remarks made by the junior member of Halifax, that the police are rendering valuable services in the North-west. They do customs duty, magistrates duty, and also look after cattle in quarantine, but as to the rate of their wages being raised it must be considered that there are very few men who are in a position to save as much money as these policemen can. Take the case of ordinary labourers in the city of Ottawa. Are there many who can save fifty cents a day after providing for their clothing, lodging and sustenance? The men in the North-west Mounted Police force are provided with lodgings, clothing and board, and they can save all their wages. Coming back to the main objection, that although this force has increased the officers are increasing out of proportion to the number of men, I may explain that this is not really the creation of a new officer. It is giving him the proper name under the law. The present occupant of the office of comptroller has held the position since January, 1880—that is Mr. White in Ottawa. He has also had the rank and pay of a deputy head since July, 1883, under an Order in Council. This bill is only confirming by statute what has been the practice for the last fourteen years. The object of it is to give him an acknowledgment under the law and to give him socially the rank of deputy head, but so far as creating a new office is concerned this bill does not do so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My objection is not to the appointment of comptroller, but to the number of the staff under him. The commissioner must have acted heretofore as comptroller.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, there has been a comptroller since 1880 when the police force was formed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In sub-clause 3 it is provided that the commissioner of police shall perform such duties as are assigned to him and shall be subject to the control of such persons as may be named for that purpose by the Governor in Council. This force has been in existence so long, that the duties of the commissioner ought to be known and set forth in the Act and not left to the discretion of the Governor in Council. There is nothing like defining the duties of officers. You can define all the duties and you can then say "and perform such other duties as may be assigned to him."

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This force is of a semi-military nature. Is it possible to define in an Act all the duties and powers of the commissioner of such a force? It is to give the Governor in Council or the Minister, authority over him. An occasion may occur to-morrow where the commissioner would receive instructions from here to do and fulfil such and such a duty. If we undertook to define in the law what are his duties we would find that perhaps we would be limiting our power and making the force useless.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. Minister again misapprehends the point of my observation. The point that I took was this. We know that after so many years we ought to have a general idea of what the duties of the commissioner are. I have never been in the North-west, and I do not know what his duties are. What I suggest is that we should define some of his duties, and then add "to do and perform such other duties as may be assigned to him." That does not limit the power of the Government to provide for any emergency. What are the duties of a commissioner? I think the House ought to know.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The duties of a commissioner would correspond, I suppose, with the duties of a colonel or the major of a regiment. He is the head of the force. With him rests all the authority for maintaining discipline and directing the force.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—He would be like the chief of police of a police force.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, but these officers do more, they fulfil the duties of magistrates over all the territory. Parties charged with offences against the customs or the license laws are tried by them, and they discharge such duties besides being at the head and in command of the whole force.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Can the Minister tell me how many veterinary surgeons there are in the force?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I am not positive, I do not think they exceed four, Formerly, I think there were two, but it has been found necessary to have more, because we are using them also to attend upon the cattle quarantined, and some of them have to leave their stations to visit cattle in response to requests from different districts.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—What is the strength of the Mounted Police force now?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not think it is in excess of 800 men.

The clause was adopted.

On the 6th clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—Could the Minister give the House any idea as to the probability of an early reduction of this force? It is a large and expensive force and it does not seem to me that we should keep on paying these men for ever. The Indians are becoming less numerous and dangerous and a regular civilized government is taking the place of the rule of the police force over large tracts of the North-west. It seems to me that the time has come when the Government ought to be thinking of reducing the number of the force.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not think the time has come to reduce the number of the force. Every day those men are becoming more useful and we are using them for various services. Last year my own department used the Mounted Police for the purpose of looking after cattle in quarantine. If I had not had the men, it would have cost the country over $30,000 for the service that I had them perform there. The whole of that service was performed for about $5,000, which will go from my department into the department of the President of the Privy Council, who is in charge of the force. It has been said that the Indians are diminishing in number. I do not think that they are decreasing. We are doing the best we can to improve them, and perhaps as they improve they become more exacting and require more attention and more vigilance on the part of the police. The Mounted Police are doing a very great service and at present the number is not in excess of what it should be.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—The hon. gentleman from Halifax said he had not been in the North-west and did not know much about that force. I have been a great many years intimately acquainted with the movements of that force in the North-west and have known a great many of their officers and have been about with them while they were discharging their duties. I have seen them doing all kinds of work, acting as collectors, of customs, as policemen, quelling disturbances, keeping riots down while the railway was being built—in fact I can say without the slightest hesitation (and I speak with connaissance de cause) I doubt if there is any force in the world of the same number that has ever done as much good as our North-west Mounted Police. The reason is this while there may be some wild fellows among them, there is more intelligence in that force than you will find in any regiment anywhere else. When they turn out they make a splendid appearance. They have the respect of the white people of the North-west and of the Indians also. It is a rare exception when you hear a bad word about any single man in the Mounted Police Force. I have very little interest in the North-west, but for the sake of our own country I hope the Government will think about a great many other things before they think of reducing the force. Instead of reducing it, I think the force should have been raised to 1,000 men as was spoken of a few years ago. There is plenty of work for them to do and they save sometimes in one year more than they cost the country in ten years.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 9,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice a little inconsistency in the language of the latter part of this clause beginning at line 45 :

And every such commissioner, assistant commissioner, superintendent, or other officer, is hereby further empowered to exercise in any province of Canada adjacent to the said Territories.

That is, I presume, Manitoba and British Columbia. One can understand that they should exercise such power, but the clause goes on :

And every constable is hereby empowered to exercise in every province of Canada, &c.

That would mean, literally interpreted, that a member of the North-west Mounted Police Force who happened to be taking his holidays in Quebec or Nova Scotia might undertake to exercise in those provinces the extensive powers given him in the North-west Territory. I fancy the word "such" must have been omitted before the word "province" in the last line, and I suggest that the word "such" should be introduced there to harmonize the language.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The object is that constables should have the right to act—that is constables—in every province of Canada, but the power of the commissioner and other officers is limited to the provinces adjoining the North-west Territories. The right does not extend to the commissioned officers to act outside of those provinces.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But why should that be so?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It may be very desirable to have those constables carry out any of the duties assigned to them in any part of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—To follow criminals into other provinces?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If it is held that there are duties to be performed by those constables in British Columbia and Manitoba, those duties are no so exceptional that they should not be exercised in other provinces as well.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Some of those constables are now being used and sent up to the Yukon District for the purpose of enforcing the customs laws. Before they reach there they will have to travel through British Columbia. I mention this only as an illustration which occurs to me at the moment. It might happen that this constable would require to exercise his full powers on his way there. Other instances may occur going through the province of Quebec to reach the Labrador coast. Why should a constable not have that power extended to him wherever he goes when he acts under Dominion laws?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is highly objectionable that he should.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps the Minister would state to the House the number of veterinary surgeons to be employed and the number of stations before the bill is read the third time. There must be at least 12 or 15 stations, and it is not proposed to furnish a veterinary for each station. The force happened to be under my administration for some years and when an application was made for an assistant, or an extra veterinary, I called for the return of the disabled horses and I found that at a considerable number of points where there were no veterinary surgeons the horses were in good condition, and it was only where there was a veterinary surgeon that the horses were in the hospital.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Very likely all the horses that wanted treatment were sent to the very place where there was a veterinary surgeon. However, I will give the House the information. My impression is that the number is four, but there may be more. There are many stations which consist of five or six men, and sometimes less, where it is not necessary to have such an officer.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.), from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

NEW YORK, NEW ENGLAND AND CANADA COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved second reading of Bill (7) "An Act to incorporate the New York, New England and Canada Company." He said : This is a bill to incorporate certain gentlemen to enable them to carry on the business of carrying passengers and forwarding them.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not much like the title of the bill I think it might be changed.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

CONSIDERATION OF THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

The Order of the Day having been called,

Consideration of the third Report of the Standing Committee on the Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. McKAY said: Before moving this report I desire to make a few explanations regarding it. The first three clauses of it have reference to the auditing of the clerk's accounts and are in the usual phraseology which I need not make any reference to. The next clause of the report is the result of the work of a sub-committee that was appointed to deal with the organization of the staff, and clauses 4, 5, 6 and 7 are largely declaratory as to the duties and responsibilities of the clerk. It is perhaps not giving him any more powers than he had before, but it is specifying them more definitely. Then as to clause 8—in examining into the duties of the different clerks it was found that some clerks had more to do than was thought proper. They therefore relieve the clerk's assistant of the care of the periodicals and newspapers, assigning the duty to the clerk in charge of the stationery. Then clause 9 recommends:

With a view to relieving the clerk assistant of a part of his onerous work, and to provide for the prompt and satisfactory translation of bills and departmental reports, your committee recommend that an additional French translator qualified to do this work, be appointed, at a salary not exceeding $1,200 a year. But that he be not permanently appointed until his qualifications for the position have been tested by the chief translator and of the first French translator and certified by them.

It will be remembered that during the present session we had to give authority to employ assistant French translators, and it is a very expensive matter to employ translators temporarily. The committee also found that the two gentlemen who did this work, the Clerk's assistant, and the first French translator, had more work than they could do, and in addition to all that, the committee found that in the case of illness of either one of these gentlemen, or anything worse than that, the Senate would be without any French translator and it would be a drawback to the work of the session. They came to the conclusion that it would be in the interests of the Senate that some person should be employed who would be coming forward to fill a gap in case of an accident of that kind, and perform the duties that were discharged this year by extra men who had to be employed. Then we come to Nos. 10 and 11:

The clerk of private bills shall perform also the duties of clerk of the committee on the restaurant, and render the necessary assistance in the supervision of the restaurant and in taking care of the furnishings thereof.

Your committee recommend that the salary of Mr. Alexander Soutter, clerk of private bills, be increased from $1,500 to $1,650 a year, such increase to take effect on and from 1st July, 1894.

For a number of years past we have been in the habit of giving authority to pay $100 to the committee on the restaurant for the purpose of caretaking of the furnishings, and it was thought better by the committee that this should become the duty of the clerk of private bills, so that we could abolish that former way of doing it. We here recommend that he shall perform those duties, which he has been doing for a number of years past, and that he shall receive an increase of salary of $150, but I may explain to the House that this, although it appears like an increase of $150 is only an increase of $50 because in future there will not be a vote set aside for this purpose. Previous to the last five or six years there was a great loss of the material that belonged to the restaurant, and every session it was found that a lot of articles were stolen or lost. Since this system has been originated we have had very little lost at all—in fact, I do not think we have lost anything, and the actual payment that has been made in this way is a saving of public money. Now we come to Nos. 12 and 13 and 14:

Having regard to the long service of Messrs. Alfred Garneau and Charles T. Gibbs, respectively first French translator and accountant, and the important character of their duties, your committee are of opinion that these gentlemen have equitable claims to an increase of salary, and your committee accordingly recommend :

That the salary of Mr. Alfred Garneau, first French translator, be increased from $1,900 to $2,000 a year, such increase to take effect on and from the 1st July, 1894.

That the salary of Mr. Charles T. Gibbs, assistant accountant, be increased by $100, such increase to take effect on and from the 1st of July 1894, and the annual increase of $50 to which he is now entitled, to continue until $1,500 is reached.

That is that each of them receive $100. Alfred Garneau has been in the service 33 years and is a very efficient officer and it was thought by the committee that it was nothing but fair that he should receive an additional $100. The accountant, Mr. Gibbs, is performing a very important duty, a duty that requires continued attention, and he has performed it I believe to the satisfaction of everybody. His accounts from year to year are found in excellent condition, well kept, and the committee were of opinion that he should have a slight increase of salary. It is proposed to give him an extra $100, and with the natural increase which comes to him, he will reach the total amount of $1,500. We next come to paragraphs 15, 16 and 17 :

With a view to improving the discipline in that branch of the Senate service, your committee recommend that the door-keepers, messengers and pages be placed under the supervision of the Serjeant-at-Arms, who shall have power to suspend any member of that portion of the staff for a fortnight, any longer suspension to be by the Clerk.

The housekeeper or chief messenger to continue to direct the staff of messengers, subject to the supervision and control of the Serjeant-at-Arms.

The staff of permanent messengers is decidedly larger than is necessary for the performance of the work to be done out of session. Your committee recommend that no further appointments of permanent messengers be made until the number of such messengers is reduced below five (including the keeper of the wardrobe, the bank messenger and the Speaker's messenger), and that thereafter the number of such messengers shall not exceed five.

The committee investigated the duties of messengers and that sort of thing and learned that they were in the habit of disobeying, to a certain extent, the housekeeper who had control over them, and that out of session there was very little control or management at all. They appear to have come and gone just to suit themselves, and with that knowledge before them the committee were of opinion that it would be better to place the direct management under the supervision of the Serjeant-at-Arms, and that the housekeeper should continue to direct the other messengers subject to the supervision and control of the Sergeant-at-Arms. This will be an experiment which will, I think, be an improvement over the past system.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Is the Serjeant-at-Arms supposed to be here always?

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I believe he is supposed to be present all the year. They also discovered that the staff of permanent messengers was much larger than there was any necessity for, and that there was nothing for them to do out of the session. They recommend here that there shall be no more permanent messengers employed until the staff is reduced below five, and that in the future they shall not exceed five.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—What is the number of permanent messengers ?

Hon. Mr. McKAY—We have eight now.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—How many sessional ?

Hon. Mr. McKAY—We have five, but in the case of a vacancy in the permanent staff this does not prevent our appointing a sessional messenger if the Senate thinks it is necessary for their accommodation while they are here. It simply reduces the permanent staff when death occurs. Then we come to eighteen:

In consequence of the proposed reduction of the staff of permanent messengers, it is recommended that Moïse Gagnon, appointed provisionally at the close of last session, be not placed upon the permanent list, but that he be paid at the rate of $600 a year up to the 13th of June, 1894, and be thereafter a sessional messenger.

Finding that there were too many permanent messengers, we thought it was out of place for us to ratify the appointment that was made during the recess, and this messenger will continue after the 30th June as a sessional messenger. Then we have No. 19 :

It shall be the duty of every officer and employee to obey and show respect to all his superiors; and it shall also be his duty to report any negligence or wrong-doing on the part of any other officer or employee, so that the same may be dealt with as the case may be.

We have heard objections already to the first part of it. It has been said that the second part of that clause was objectionable, but I want to point out the meaning of it, and it is this, that we have junior clerks in this House, one of whom is an assistant to the Clerk of French Journals. We have a junior clerk who is general assistant to everybody. If one of those men should neglect his duties, we believe that one of those officers should report him to the clerk who has charge of the whole staff. It has been objected that this is a system of espionage, but I maintain that it is not. It is simply a request of the officer to report to the clerk if any officer is not doing his duty.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—As you read it there it is just putting them as spies on each other.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—No, I maintain it is not. Then No. 20 is as follows :

Your committee recommend that the expenditure of a sum not exceeding one hundred and fifty dollars ($150) be authorized for the purpose of completing, as far as possible, the sets of Provincial Statutes passed before Confederation, required for use in the Law Clerk's office.

The last clause will be the winding up of that old state of things, the item of $100 to the committee. This is the last time it will appear if this report is adopted, but we had to make this provision in order to settle up this last year.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I should like to ask the chairman of the committee the reasons for that clause giving charge of the supervision of the messengers, etc., to the Serjeant-at-Arms? I have no doubt whatever that that gentleman would discharge any duty of the kind very well indeed. It is not on that ground that I object, but it seems to me that it is passing over the Usher of the Black Rod who, I understand, ranks before the Serjeant-at-Arms as an officer of this House. Not only that but the Usher of the Black Rod is charged with the direction of the arrangement of the chamber, issuing tickets and everything of that kind both at the prorogation and at the opening of Parliament and it seems to me that it would be very inconvenient, in view of the duties committed to him, that there should be a divided authority of that kind. Moreover, the Usher of the Black Rod is a resident in the building—he is therefore on the spot. With regard to the Serjeant-at-Arms, I assume that he is not here generally during the greater part of the summer, when the House is not in session, and therefore would not be in a position to carry out those duties during the vacation. I desire it to be distinctly understood that in bringing this matter up I have no doubt whatever that the Serjeant-at-Arms would discharge any such duties thoroughly and efficiently, but it is due to the officer—I think I am correct in that respect—who ranks before him that some reason should be given for passing him over and assigning a duty to the Serjeant-at-Arms which should be discharged by the Usher of the Black Rod.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I am not in a position to go into the matter fully, but I may mention that both the sub-committee and the general committee consented to this unanimously. There was no dissenting voice.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Toronto with regard to the Serjeant-at-Arms having supervision over the messengers and other employees, was a suggestion that I made to the chairman myself. The Serjeant-at-Arms is not supposed to be here during the recess, and those duties more properly devolve on the Usher of the Black Rod, whose functions renders it necessary that he should have control of the messengers in this House. If he would take upon himself the duty, I think it would be more consistent with his office that he should have it than the Serjeant-at-Arms. Although the committee seem to have been unanimous in the matter, that may not have occurred to them, otherwise there might have been a difference of opinion upon it. I am glad to see the general staff of messengers is not to be increased. It is important that the committee should always with regard to the sessional messengers and also the permanent staff, consider the young men who come in here as pages. Many of them are too ambitious to remain, but those who wish to stay in the service are so thoroughly trained to know the members of the House and the duties and requirements of the position that they are certainly the best men to make sessional messengers and later, when we can further advance them, make permanent messengers. Very often we get men here who are not properly trained for sessional messengers. They are no doubt desirous of doing all they can, but their training is not such as would adapt them to the duties they have to discharge. Hereafter I think any page who becomes too large for the duties of a page should be appointed first, as they are better adapted for the position of sessional messengers.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—Although I am a member of the Committee on Contingencies, I was not a member of the sub-committee where those changes alluded to here were made and I think that the remarks which have been made by the hon. member from Toronto are very much to the point. I am not aware that the Usher of the Black Rod has neglected any of the duties which have been assigned to him in the past. I have not heard any complaint against him—he may have been guilty of indiscretions which I am not aware of, but I think it is hardly fair, it is not in fact in accordance with our general course, to place an inferior officer over one who is in a higher position.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The report does not recommend anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—You assign duties to the Serjeant-at-Arms which it appears to me should be assigned to the Usher of the Black Rod.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a different thing altogether. We assign to him duties which have been largely performed by the housekeeper.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—The Usher of the Black Rod lives in the House and is always here on the spot. I am not aware that the Serjeant-at-Arms does live here. Therefore it appears to me that he would not have the same opportunity in maintaining discipline. I am therefore sorry that the duty has not been assigned to the Usher of the Black Rod instead of the Serjeant-at-Arms.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—As a member of that committee, I wish to state what I believe to have been the intention of the committee in this matter. It was not intended in any way to slight the Usher of the Black Rod nor to override his powers or ignore him in any way in this matter. He was looked upon as an officer, appointed by His Excellency by Order in Council, and not an officer over whom this House had full authority, and as it was necessary that we should give some person authority over the servants of the House, we took one of our own servants for that purpose. That is the reason that determined the committee in giving Mr. LeMoine charge over the messengers in this House. There was nobody before of his standing and position and authority who had charge over the messengers and pages in this House, and this change was thought advisable. There is another paragraph in the report to which I do not wish to make objection, but I must confess that when it was adopted I did not give it sufficient attention. It is giving the officers direction to report one another.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Hear, hear ; I object to that very much.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The officer who has charge of a branch should report to the Clerk of the House and the clerk to the chairman of the committee any breaches of duty on the part of those under him, but it was not the intention that an officer belonging to one branch should be a spy or have supervision over an officer of another branch to see whether he was doing his duty or not. I believe it was not the intention of the committee to do that. We did not intend to excite jealousy or ill-feeling, but we intended that the superior officer in charge of a branch should report those under him who might neglect their duty. As a member of that committee, and as I concurred in the report, it would perhaps be unbecoming on my part to withdraw my consent to it, but if it is possible to improve the language of it, I as a member of the committee, shall accept the amendment very gracefully.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—The direction in the report would have a tendency to destroy the esprit de corps which should exist in every service. It would be a pity if a system of espionage were established which that clause would have a tendency to do. It is desirable that the language of that clause should be changed.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Before the report is adopted, I wish to call the attention of the House to paragraph 18 which recommends the dismissal of Moïse Gagnon. I suppose the committee has not decided to make a reduction in the number of permanent messengers without being advised by the head officer of the House. I have no objection to the reduction of the number of messengers if it is found to be advisable, but one thing to which I object, is that a man should be dismissed without any warning whatever. If I am correctly informed, that man Gagnon was appointed on the 2nd day of April last year by his honour the Speaker on the death of Archambault. The appointment had to be ratified by the committee. I am informed that this man Gagnon has been employed during the whole year as a permanent messenger, and now, if he is dismissed without any warning at all, I believe it is not fair to the man. Gagnon, before being employed by the Speaker, was a sessional messenger and there is a great difference between the pay of a sessional messenger and that of a permanent messenger. Moreover, this man Gagnon, I am informed, was paid a salary of $600 a year during the time he has worked as a permanent messenger, and out of this he has had to pay $26.19 to the superannuation fund, which sum he would not have been obliged to pay had it not been for his appointment as a permanent messenger. Now, if instead of being paid as a permanent messenger, Gagnon had been paid as a sessional messenger, he would have received $100.13 more than he is receiving. If the House decide that the number of permanent messengers must be reduced I have no objection, but I think it would be only fair to Gagnon that he should be employed for some months longer. If he had known that he was to be dismissed, he might have been able to look about for employment elsewhere. It is too late to do that now. Gagnon might have been employed until the 15th day of March last as a permanent messenger, and during the present session of parliament as a sessional messenger; I believe that would be only just. If you are going to dismiss him at the end of the session, he should be entitled at least to the pay of a sessional messenger during this session instead of being paid at the rate of a permanent messenger.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—He has not been dismissed. He was never properly appointed.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—All the appointments made by the Speaker were ratified by the committee.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I do not rise to find fault with anything the report contains, but to find some little fault because it does not contain more. Several recommendations have been made by the sub-committee and endorsed by the committee. The first recommendation is to increase the salary of Mr. Garneau, a gentleman who has been in the service some 32 years, a very good and efficient officer. The recommendation to increase his salary by $100 was unanimously accepted by the general committee. Then it was proposed to increase the salary of Mr. Soutter by $150, or more properly speaking by $50, because he had been receiving for several years $100 for taking care of the silverware of the restaurant and other articles, but it was thought advisable by the sub-committee, and the general committee endorsed their view, that his salary should be fixed at an increased rate of $150 a year. Then came Mr. Gibbs, the accountant, another worthy and very estimable employee of the Senate. The recommendation is that his salary should be increased by $100. I am only sorry that the recommendation was not to increase it by $200, and even if it had been so increased his valuable and important services would be underpaid. But there was another employee of this House whose merits and interests are entirely overlooked, a gentleman who has been in the public service of Canada for over 35 years. That gentleman is our postmaster. He, I believe, was engaged in the old parliament of Canada some eight or nine years before Confederation, and I am credibly informed that ever since Confederation he has acted in a very trustworthy and proper manner. He is obliging and ready to give such assistance and information to Senators as he possesses. I felt so strongly on the matter that I took the liberty of moving in the committee that his salary be increased by $100, and my motion was defeated by only two votes. I inferred from the close division that the feeling was largely in favour of an increase of his salary, and that is why I propose today to move that his salary be increased by at least by $100. In order to show the reasons why I think it is only just and fair that his salary should be increased, I will draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that in the House of Commons the postmaster receives a salary of $1,700. Now I see no good reason why this difference should exist.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The matter now before the House is the report of the Committee on Contingent Accounts and Internal Economy. The hon. gentleman has announced that he proposes to move that an addition be made to the salary of the postmaster. That would not be an amendment to the report. The report does not deal with the postmaster's salary at all, and therefore the resolution which the hon. gentleman proposes to move cannot be an amendment to the report. His Honour the Speaker must know that it is not an amendment, because it does not in any way change the report. The report stands entire even if this resolution does pass. The proper way for the hon. gentleman, if he wishes to secure an increase for the postmaster, is to move a separate motion.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The reason why I have taken this position is this: I was rather suspicious that my hon. friend from Halifax would raise the question of order, and I think I can establish to the satisfaction of the Speaker that I am in order. I would refer hon. gentlemen to the Debates of last year, when a report of a similar character was made by the Contingent Accounts Committee, recommending that the sessional messengers of the Senate be paid $250, the amount they generally receive. I find on page 454 of the Debates of last year the following:

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Before adopting that report I beg to call the attention of the Senate to the 6th paragraph. Your committee recommend that these sessional messengers be paid the sum of $250 for their services during the present session. That is equal to paying messengers $125 per month.

And the hon.gentleman concluded by moving that the 6th paragraph of the report be struck out. That amendment was discussed and a division was taken on it, and the motion of the leader of the House was sustained. Consequently I claim that if an hon. gentleman, whether he be the leader of the House or a private member, can move that a certain portion of a report be eliminated or expunged, it is just as competent for a member of the House to move that an addition be made to the report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all: that was an alteration of the report.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It was eliminating an entire clause from the report. I want to add a clause, and with the permission of the House I will read it, and then speak to the motion. It is as follows:—

That the report be not now adopted, but that it be amended by adding the following clause: That the salary of John B. Myrand, postmaster of the Senate, be increased by $100, such increase to take effect on and from the 1st July, 1894.

When I was interrupted I was proceeding to show the great disparity between the salary of the postmaster of the House of Commons and the postmaster of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman can only speak to the question of order until it is disposed of.

The SPEAKER—My opinion is that the motion would be in a better form if it proposed that the report be referred back to the committee with instructions to make the increase referred to. I do not see any great objection to the amendment as it is, but the form that I recommend is the better one.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It is within my recollection and it must be within the recollection of hon. gentlemen in this House—that on several occasions reports coming from the Contingent Accounts Committee here have been dealt with in precisely the same manner as I propose to deal with this one.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Is my hon. friend objecting to the decision of the Chair?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—No.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Then it is not the question before the House.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I do not see how my hon. friend's motion can be considered in order. It is referring to a matter which is not in any way in the report; and if he wishes to bring that forward it seems to me the only correct way of doing it would be to take the suggestion of his honour the Speaker, and move that the report be referred back.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I intend doing so; but I was merely mentioning the fact, before accepting the decision of his honour the Speaker, that I recollect several occasions in this House when the same course was pursued. However, I will accept the suggestion made, and amend my motion in that way. When interrupted I was calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the Commons the postmaster has a salary of $1,700; he has an assistant who receives $900, and during the session he has six extra clerks who receive no less than $4 per day each. The sessions, as we are all aware, generally average about four months, and at 30 days in the month, it would amount to $480 that each of these extra clerks would receive. The Senate pays its postmaster $1,300. It may be stated—in fact I have heard it suggested by some hon. gentlemen—that the duties of the postmaster here are certainly very limited compared with those of the postmaster in the Commons. I want to disabuse the minds of those hon. gentlemen of that idea. The postmaster of the Senate is here precisely the same number of hours that the postmaster in the House of Commons is.

Some Hon. MEMBERS—No, no.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—During the time that this House is in session, the postmaster remains at his post until the House adjourns. In the House of Commons after 10 o'clock there is only one man left in charge; all the others leave. They are free from duty at 10 o'clock; and I think it is taxing the energy and the patience of our postmaster too much to require him to be here from 6 in the morning until 10 oclock at night, or later than that if we are in session. Those are the principal reasons why I think in all fairness that his salary should be increased at least by $100. There are other officials of the Senate who are paid precisely the same amount that is paid to corresponding officers in the other Chamber; why should we make this great difference between the postmaster of the Commons and the postmaster of the Senate, when I venture to say, without making any reflection whatever on the postmaster of the Commons, that our official does twice or three times as much work, the postmaster of the Commons has the responsibility, but his labour is performed by his assistant and by the extra clerks. I therefore move that the report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to increase the postmaster's salary by $100 from the 1st July, 1894.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of questioning in any way the efficiency of the Senate postmaster. I do not think any one has questioned that. This sub-committee was appointed for the purpose of considering the organization of the Senate staff; it was not appointed for the purpose of dealing with the salaries of the officers of the House generally. There were several officers whose salaries we thought might be increased if we were dealing specially with that subject; but in the course of our investigations we came across one or two cases—the case of Mr. Garneau for instance—where it was quite clear that an officer had been under-paid for a long time, and we recommended a trifling increase in his pay. The increase in Mr. Soutter's pay is only $50, and it is hardly worth speaking of. Then, with respect to Mr. Gibbs, the committee were satisfied that he was doing a great deal more work than was indicated by his title. I believe that, with the exception of, perhaps, the Clerk's assistant, Mr. Gibbs is the hardest worked officer in the service of the Senate, and his health has suffered from his application to his duty. There were several other officers who thought they had claims to increase of salary, but neither the sub-committee nor the committee thought this was the time to deal with the question of salaries generally. The feeling was that that question could stand over until next session, and every case would then be considered on its merits. I regret that the hon. gentleman from British Columbia has not thought well to allow the matter to remain until then, when it could be dealt with. My own impression is that if the matter had been allowed to stand, the claims of the postmaster would receive generous consideration in the House. I do not think we need trouble our heads much with these comparisons with the officers of the Commons. We do not know just what the duties of the officers in the other House are, and at any rate we are dealing with our own officers, and we generally deal with them independently of the practice of the Commons. Our postmaster received an increase of $200 in 1891. That is three years ago. Up to that time he had not proposed to resign because his salary was insufficient. It was never understood that his pay was insufficient previous to that time. We gave him an increase then and he was satisfied. Now in order to enable hon. gentlemen to form some idea as to the onerous nature of the duties of our postmaster, allow me to call the attention of the House to this fact, that up to a few months ago our postmaster lived in the city of Quebec. He came here shortly before the opening of each session, and he left two or three days after the close of the session. He was practically here about as long as we ourselves were here.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—And paid a substitute during the recess.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am very glad the hon. gentleman has made the suggestion. I do not think it is right to talk of things of that sort, but as the hon. gentleman has suggested it, I may say our postmaster paid another officer to discharge his duties during the whole of the recess. What did he pay him? He paid him $40 for the work during the recess, and that gives us some indication of the onerous character of the duties of our postmaster during the recess. It would have been much better for my hon. friend and for the postmaster of the Senate to have let this matter rest and let the Committee deal with it next year.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Why did you deal with the other matters?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is perfectly absurd to compare our postmaster with Mr. Gibbs, who is here all the year round discharging duties of an onerous character, requiring great skill and knowledge, and discharging them in the most admirable way. You can take any man off the street who can read and write and he is able to discharge the duties of postmaster; but it is not so with the duties of accountant. The hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Gibbs discharges a great many other duties than those in connection with the accounts, and it is absurd to institute a comparison between those two officers. There is hardly an instance where the Committee of Internal Economy, having considered a matter fully and reported it to this House, and any member has moved for an increase beyond what was proposed in the report. The case to which the hon. gentleman from British Columbia referred, which occurred last year, is not analogous. In that instance the leader of the Government in this House moved to reduce the amount recommended by the committee. Where the committee have given the matter their consideration, and particularly where they have not rejected the proposal but have decided to allow the matter to stand over till next session, which will not be more than six months hence, it is a mistake to bring it up.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I should say, in order to recognize the difference between these two officers, that we had better increase Mr. Gibbs's salary.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I did not compare Mr. Gibbs with our postmaster. My comparison as with the postmaster of the Commons. It is said that our postmaster lived in Quebec continuously until a few years ago; I would ask where is the postmaster of the Commons or his assistant during the six or eight months when Parliament is not in session?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I did not complain of the motion to increase the postmaster's salary, but if there is a discrepancy between his and Mr. Gibbs's salary. I think Mr. Gibbs's should be increased to $1,500.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is a great pity that the committee did not deal generously in the matter of salaries. I was a member of that committee but was not present. If I had been there, I should have endeavoured to have this vexed question of salaries of employees settled once and for ever.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have settled it once and for ever about fifty times, and further, the Committee on Contingencies passed a resolution, which was adopted by the House, to the effect that any application for an increase of salary would be regarded as a resignation.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That may be true enough, but the hon. gentleman admits that next year he is willing to enter into the matter and consider it. That shows that he believes there is some inequality or some difference which should be recognized, and remedied, and the sooner it is done the better. We should go to work as commercial men and establish a basis and let the officers know what they may expect, and there will be no difficulty. It is a very unpleasant matter, and we do not wish to cast a slur on one man or another. Some men may receive more than you think they are worth, but that is part of the system. It is also true that you might get men at the present time to perform the duties for a much less sum, but that is not the way to look at the matter. You should say the limit shall be $1,400 or $1,500 or whatever it may be, and keep it there. With respect to this increase of $100, the committee should be able to judge whether this man is worth $100 additional salary or not, and when they arrive at a certain limit it should rest there, and there should be no further increase of any kind whatever. That would be the businesslike way of doing it, and you would save yourselves trouble and relieve yourselves of this difficult task of contrasting one man's duties with those of others each year. With reference to the question raised by the hon. gentleman from Toronto, there is a good deal of force in it. I do not wish to say one disparaging word of the Serjeant-at-Arms. He is worthy of the position and able to carry out the duties imposed on him, but there is no question that the Usher of the Black Rod is constantly on the premises.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have to rise to a question of order. The question is the amendment of the hon. gentleman from British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—You say eight messengers are employed now, but we are going to reduce it to five. There is no business about that. You should fix the number. I may say that I propose to move an amendment after the present one is voted on.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It would be quite impossible to fix a salary which would stand. We could not name a fixed salary which would not be open to alteration or amendment at any session of the House. That has been tried and been violated. We know that sometimes we cannot resist the importunities of our employees. With regard to our postmaster, I shall have to support this motion, because I believe we have not a better or more efficient officer or one more desirous of doing all he can for the accommodation of members. Still, it might be as well to leave it over for another session. I do not approve of comparisons between officers of this House and officers of the other Chamber. The hon. gentleman from Victoria says the postmaster comes here at 6 o'clock in the morning and remains till 8 at night. The hon. gentleman is in error in that statement, because I know the postmaster is not here at six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not rise to oppose any recommendation in this report. I have no enemies about this House nor have I any favourites; but I cannot help saying, from my observation of the results of the actions of the Contingency Committee for many years that I have been here, that it is not satisfactory to me. I find that a large percentage of the business done on that committee has been the result of favouritism. I do not refer to the present committee, but I have known of favouritism in the past. Those who carried the most influence in that committee invariably got such salaries and advantages for their friends as caused dissatisfaction to others. I know of one case where an application was made for a junior clerk. The father of the clerk was satisfied and arranged to take $1.50 a day during the session. I happened to be attending that committee at the time, and was aware that both the father and the clerk were well pleased with the salary, and it was said it was a very handsome thing. The boy was only here on his vacation, but when the session came to be wound up and it was a very long one—I was present in the committee and by some means or other, instead of paying that lad $1.50 it was ordered that he should get $3 a day, which was paid to him. That appeared to me a very bad system of doing business, and although I do not oppose any recommendation in this report, I think that we should have some uniform system by which justice should be done to everybody and no favouritism should be shown to some at the expense of others. I shall support the amendment because I think the case of our postmaster should be considered as well as the cases of others if salaries are to be dealt with, and I do not think the argument of the hon. gentleman from Halifax is a good one that this is only a partial and temporary revision of salaries. If there is to be any revision at all, it is the duty of the committee to make it general. I would like to ask who was the party who controlled and directed the messengers about this Senate since I came here? I am not aware that there was ever any fault found with the man who controlled them, and do I understand that there is a division of the power of controlling them now.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The head messenger was supposed to have control, but it was found necessary to give him more authority.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Is he going to have more authority?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman is quite out of order in referring to this.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I never found any fault with the housekeeper and always found him obliging. I always found him a well-disposed and honest man and I do not think we should appoint any one over him without just cause. I have no fault to find with the recommendation, because our Serjeant-at-Arms is a very proper person and entitled to due respect in the matter, but I do not like the idea of giving any preference. I know from my observation of the way these matters have been conducted that these alterations were not on a uniform basis, but through the power and influence of influential members, and it would give me the most complete satisfaction if a uniform system, such as was suggested by the late lamented Mr. Abbott, could be carried out.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I am a member of the committee who dealt with these salaries, and I must say that I concur in the report. Hon. gentlemen speak about having these appointments made on business principles, with some fixed rule. I do not hesitate to say that in my opinion, if the Bank of England did their business on the principles we follow here, they would break in six months. I am willing to pay these men good salaries, but nearly every one of them gets more than he would in any other business. That is the great fault of the country to-day. We are complaining of hard times and yet we pay our officials twice the amount they could earn at anything else. I am here to do the business of the country as I think it should be done, regardless of fear and favour. Since that report was made the postmaster has not smiled at me, and I want to tell the postmaster or any other official of the House that I shall vote regardless of him or any other person. I voted against that salary being increased. I think it quite enough. It is as much as any Senator in this House gets. He can go home when the session is over the same as I do.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—He cannot do that.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—He has the door-keeper who can do the work for him for $40 for the recess, as he did before.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I did not say he hired him for that.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Well he did. He has been in the habit of going to Quebec to reside and returning here in time to perform his duties during the session. I have no fault to find with the way he performs his duties, but we are the custodians of the public money. It is not our duty to increase salaries because men want to have them increased. The other increases are proper to be made. The officials are competent men; it took years of study and scholarship to qualify them for the duties they performed, and they do their work in a manner that is creditable to the country. It is nothing but right that those men should have an increased salary; they could earn the same money if they were pursuing their calling outside. But what special qualification is required for the postmaster? Any common man can fill that position. He has not had to go through college; he does not require a superior education, and you are giving him for three or four months as much salary as you would give a man who has a college education. I want to do what is right, and I want to do it above board, but I think when we are paying this man $1,300 for the duties he performs we are paying him enough, and I think that we could get half the men to do the work as well as it is done for half the pay they are getting to-day. These messengers are getting $2.50 a day, and it is too much, more than they can earn at any other business. Public money should be dealt with as honestly and fairly as any other money, and I have no hesitation in saying that if any commercial institution in this country would undertake to do business as we do it, they would undoubtedly fail. The salaries we are paying are too much.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY resumed his speech. He said: When the House rose I was speaking about the proposed increases of salary. I might say that whilst the duty, to some extent, is a disagreeable one to me of finding fault with, or opposing an increase of salary to any official, I nevertheless feel that it is my duty, and I have always made it a point, ever since I have been made a member of Parliament, to give such votes as I believe to be in the interest of the country and do that which I thought was just and right. That is the principle which actuates me on this occasion. I could not justify myself in going back to the people if I voted for an increase of salary to this officer. In fact if the question of salaries came up again, I would not feel myself justified in voting for the salaries that some others get, because I think it is out of proportion to what they should receive. I could take you down to the post office in this city and find you competent and well trained men, who have passed the civil service examination, who work the whole year round for $800. Yet we give a man $1,300 for working three or four months in the year; there is no equality in the business. This Senate is no place to give exorbitant prices for anything that is to be performed for us. Everything should be conducted on business principles here as well as elsewhere. In my own town, and on all the line of railway from the eastern border of Manitoba to the western boundary of the territories, every postmaster gets only $400 or $500 per year, and he has to keep his office from morning to night the year round. Take a case in my own district. The postmaster in my own town, who does nothing else but attend to the post office and furnishes the post office himself, gets $400 per year. He is not only postmaster, but he has the management of the post office savings bank and money order office.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Has he any other occupation?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Does he keep store?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No. I have had the greatest difficulty in inducing the Minister of Agriculture to get a young man at $40 a month to work all day long all the year round. I find it is with great difficulty that I can get any man's salary raised higher than $40 or $50 per month for doing a whole year's work. I say there is no equality in it, and I do not think hon. gentlemen who vote for this increase would do it if they had to pay the bill out of their own pockets. The amount is exorbitant—it is beyond what is right and what hon. members would do themselves in the management of their own affairs. I do not think it is right for us to handle the public money in any different spirit from the way we would handle our own money. I have no fault to find with the officers for the manner in which they discharge their duties, but however well they may discharge them the ratas which we are paying are in excess of what they are entitled to receive, and I do not think the country would justify us in making the increase that is proposed. Therefore, I shall be justified in voting against the amendment. I believe the report is a fair and just one. The committee have taken a great deal of trouble and exercised a great deal of care in making these recommendations. It would be improper to send back the report to them. On another occasion, when a report was presented recommending that a certain bill pass, I voted against the bill, but I also voted against sending the report back to the committee. I believe that after a committee exercises proper care in making a report, it is not right to send that report back to them. Therefore I feel justified in voting against the amendment, in the first place, because I do not want the report to go back to the committee, and in the next place because it is proposed to increase the salary of an official who already receives sufficient remuneration. If I voted for an increase of salary in that case I would fail in discharging my duty to the public.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was adopted by the following vote :

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (139) " An Act further to amend the Revised Statutes respecting Interest."

(In the Committee.)

On the 4th clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have some doubt as to whether we have the right to pass this clause. We have a right to say that a judgment shall bear interest, but I do not think we have a right to say that " every judgment, decree, rule or order of any court whatsoever in any civil proceeding, etc." shall have the effect of a judgment under this Act. That is a matter for the court. I have grave doubts as to our right to prescribe that. It is for the court to say whether the rule, order or decree, shall have the effect of a judgment.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think this clause is within our power and is a consequence of the second clause. It simply enacts that every judgment, decree, rule or order shall mean a judgment under the sense of the second clause, which says that every judgment shall bear interest at the rate of six per cent per annum. It means no more than this—to define what a judgment is. Of course if it is in a criminal court, if it is a punishment it can only apply to a sum of money and it stipulates that if it is a sum of money interest shall bear the date of the decree.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN, from the committee, reported the bill without amendments.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE AND AUDIT ACT AMENDENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (127) "An Act to amend the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act."

(In the Committee.)

On the first clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the time is too short. It might be that a plaintiff would not get the information on which to base his case until after six months from the time the offence was committed. It would be a denial of justice in many cases to make the time so short. I think a year ought to be the shortest.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—As the new law now stands, with regard to the customs, the time may be even shorter than that. I think six months is ample. How can a man receive such a serious injury and not know it for six months? I think six months is a reasonable limitation.

The clause was adopted.

On subsection 6 clause 1,

Hon. Mr. POWER—The subsection which we have just adopted provides that if a defendant succeed in his defence he shall get all his costs. That is reasonable, and it provides that although a verdict is given for the plaintiff in any such action, such plaintiff shall not be entitled to more than 20 cents damages. I think that is going quite far enough in favour of the defendant, but this sub-clause says :

If on any information or suit on account of any seizure made by any such officer or person judgment is given for the claimant and the court or judge certifies that there was a probable cause for the seizure the claimant shall not be entitled to costs and the person who made the seizure shall not be liable to any indictment, prosecution or suit on account thereof.

It seems rather hard, if he gets a verdict of the jury, that he cannot get costs.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think it is in the public interest that an officer, who does not exceed his duties should not be punished. If a person acts in a way to draw suspicion on him he should not recover and should not be allowed any advantage. The clause is framed in the public interest. It is for the execution of laws which a great number of people try to evade with a view to defrauding the public treasury. When a man deals openly and fairly, in the ordinary course of trade and business, he is not liable to suspicion. But if a man, on the contrary, departs from the ordinary rule of business and acts in such a way as to draw suspicion on him, he should not get any protection.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Remember we are not dealing with the Customs Act now. We have all sorts of provisions in the Customs Act to protect officers of the customs in the discharge of their duty. This is a general provision with respect to all officers who may be connected with the revenue. Everybody knows that in connection with the collection of the revenue the officer who informs is entitled to a share of the fine imposed upon a person who transgresses the law. These officers have already quite sufficient inducement to be suspicious of people and inform on them and have men accused of violating the revenue law, without promising them, in addition to that, immunity from any penalty whatever if they happen to be mistaken. If it turns out on the trial that the merchant whose goods have been seized was perfectly innocent, and if he succeeds in his action against the revenue officer, why should you provide that if a judge certifies there was probable cause —and the officer would make it appear that there was some probable cause—the officer shall not even pay the costs. It is known by every one who has had anything to do with our revenue laws, that the law is more like something we might expect in Russia than in a free country, and I do not think we should extend the provisions of that law any further than they extend at the present time. The hon. gentleman may say that it is in the public interest, but I do not think it is. As it is now, men who are carrying on the honest business of the country, the importers, are dealt with as though they were one and all men who were doing their best to defraud the revenue in every way, and these officers who are on the qui vive to make seizures are not deserving of such very tender consideration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is much to be said in favour of what the hon. gentleman from Halifax has said in reference to the imposition of penalties under the customs laws. I am thoroughly in accord with what he says with regard to the undesirability of this particular section. It appears to me the court is ousted from exercising the usual discretion which it can exercise in regard to costs, and arbitrary limits are drawn in this particular case by which the claimant is absolutely prohibited from obtaining costs in the event of his success, provided the court expresses itself that there was probable cause. The difficulty I see in the way is that there is no definition as to what constitutes probable cause.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That is left to the court.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend may submit to the House that it is not so much a question of a law as what the court itself may determine to be probable cause. Let me, in order to demonstrate my point, cite an illustration; for instance, a customs officer is informed by a third party that the claimant has been responsible for some contravention of the Customs Act. Now, the claimant would be in no way responsible for what the third party might have informed the customs officer, and yet the court might be bound to come to the conclusion that the customs officer was justified in acting upon the information given by a third party, although he made no investigation into the alleged contravention of the Act, except obtaining the information from the third party. Under such circumstances as these, is the claiment to be damnified to the extent of conducting a very expensive class of litigation against a servant of the Crown by reason of the information given to the customs officer by the third party and not recover his costs in the case? Why should the servant of the Crown be placed in a better position, under such circumstances as these than any private individual in the community? My observation and experience is this, in regard to the phraseology of most of those Customs Acts and the imposition of penalties, that they are usually drawn out from a departmental standpoint. The interests of the public are seldom considered, but they having been drawn from a departmental standpoint, and are made to operate as severely as they possibly can upon the general public. I therefore think that, in reference to this particular clause, that there should be some qualification inserted, and I would suggest to my hon. friend who is leading the House on this occasion, that in the second line on page 1, that the probable cause should be one emanating from or for which the claimant himself is responsible. I can very well appreciate the desirability of putting this provision in, should the claimant himself be responsible for the probable cause which has arisen which has led to the seizure. But if the claimant himself is not responsible in the matter, if he has nothing to do with the probable cause which has arisen in the mind of the customs officer, then why should the claimant be damnified to the extent I have mentioned? I therefore suggest to the hon. member that he should limit it to that, by inserting after "probable cause" the words "for which the claimant is responsible."

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I believe the answer to the objection made by the hon. gentleman from Calgary is easily found. He assumes that the judge would hold there was probable cause when a customs officer would be informed by a third party, and thereupon make a seizure. I do not know any judge who would hold that to be probable cause, and it is always held that if you take for granted the information given to you by a third party to be correct, and it turns out to be untrue and unreliable, that it is not probable cause. The courts have always held that you are bound to verify for yourself, just in the same way that the hon. gentleman wishes to have it defined in the law; and every decision upon what is a probable cause goes that far, that you have to verify, and if you fail in proving the truth of an allegation received from a third party that you cannot invoke the advantage of probable cause. Now, the hon. gentleman cited one instance of information being received by a third party. He would like the law to say that that is not probable cause, but there are many other instances that no one can foresee to-day which may be looked upon as probable cause by the court, and it is left to the discretion and the judgment of the court in every instance. There are many cases where the law provides that when a party acts with probable cause he shall not be held responsible, and that under such circumstances he is not liable to damages or to costs. I think it is safer, and it has a larger scope, to leave it to the discretion of the court, to men trained in appreciating the circumstances and the facts and the law of such a case, than to try and define it in the Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to ask why has there been omitted from this bill the phraseology common to all such bills, namely, "reasonable and probable cause." That is a term which is understood in law, but my hon. friend apparently has omitted the first part of that term, on which there are many authorities, and has inserted here a term entirely new.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Probable cause is not a term which is new; it is not accompanied by the word "reasonable," but the omission of one does not lessen the other a bit. When a thing is reasonable it gives you a probable cause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—When there is a probable cause you are relieved from responsibility to a certain extent in cases like the present, when the public interest requires that you should be freed from responsibility in damages. Now, it is said that the customs laws deal with traders in an unjust way. Well, I cannot admit that. True they are rigorous laws, but they are the same all over the world. They are not more lenient in England, or France, or Germany, or anywhere else.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They are not as rigorous in England.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Two wrongs do not make a right.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There is no difference between the rigour of the Canadian Statute of Customs and the English Statute.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The presumptions are just the same as they are in England.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You borrow from the United States.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman should not reproach us with that; his party give us so many examples to copy from the States.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I never do.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—His friends in the country propose that we should copy more from the States and especially as to tariff and customs.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Your tariff is copied from the United States much more than from England.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, because the United States have been enabled to make a tariff so far. We are three months ahead of them. Will they have a tariff this year? I doubt it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the success of the hon. gentleman's own Government tariff revision this session would justify him in throwing stones at any other Government.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I appreciate the thing very differently, and the members of the House appreciate it differently, and I suppose before two years the public will appreciate it still more. The tariff has been framed on very good, sound principles, to meet the exigencies of the present, according to the wish and opinion of the public. It will bring relief in many cases, and it will create no injustice anywhere. As to the delay, it has taken a few months to do it, but it was not the Government that took all the time; it was the Opposition who occupied the time, before they could take in the tariff. However, I think this bill might remain as it is. I think the words "probable cause" include reasonable cause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In order to make assurance doubly sure, would it not be better to put in the other?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman has been complaining of a frivolous amendment made by the House of Commons, and this would be an amendment of the same nature.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not often agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax in his views, but I do agree with him now wholly with reference to the customs laws in existence in the Dominion of Canada at the present time. I do not think there can be any more unjust and arbitrary law in the world. I will mention an instance that will satisfy you I am right in my assertion. A short time ago an acquaintance of mine commenced to conduct the business of a merchant who had died; he succeeded to that business, and he had a credit advanced to him of from $10,000 to $15,000. The goods he was dealing in were in a warehouse. He was in the habit of paying from $100 to $500 of duties per day into the Customs Department. He had ceased to be well; he was his checker and bank clerk himself, and if he happened to be away or unwell, goods had to be borrowed out of the warehouse for that day. There is a warehouse heeper or locker who stands at the warehouse doors. It is his business to see that no goods shall go out until the duty is paid. I think the merchant has to contribute to that man's salary some $40 a year; consequently he is partly that man's servant or officer just as well as he is the servant of the Government. At all events, this merchant was absent for two days. Some goods had been taken out of the warehouse, with the knowledge of the locker, on which there would be $500 duties. Certain of the customs house officers are very vigilant at present because they get a share of the seizure, and it would appear that a certain officer had gone to the warehouse and found the deficiency of goods. He reported the circumstances to his superior officer, and got orders to have the duties paid or a seizure would be made. At the time there were some $10,000 or $15,000 worth of goods in the warehouse. All the officer had to do was to intimate to the gentleman that the duties must be paid before 10 o'clock on the following morning or else no goods could come out, and there was no danger of loss, because there were $10,000 or $12,000 worth of goods in the warehouse, and everything would go on well, because there was nothing to be done but to pay the duty.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria)—But the locker was wrong.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I think the man who said we were living under laws as bad as Russia was perfectly right. That man was commencing business in the world; his credit was ruined. Though the man paid the duties next day, $500, it went round town that he was robbing the warehouse, and his creditors came down on him and made a bankrupt of him and he was fined $600. I am here at Ottawa for the purpose of getting it back, and I have wasted my time for two months, and have got none of it back yet. They got $600 fine and $500 duties, and he is a ruined man to-day. That is a bad state of affairs in this country. In order that a customs officer may get a portion of a fine, a merchant must be ruined without redress. It is costing him more than the fine to look for redress, but from principle he is most anxious to justify himself, to get back at any rate what he conceives he did not owe, and that is the fine. I have not got it back yet.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria)—What became of the locker ?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—He was dismissed, or removed. There is an incentive given to an official to get a share of that $600, or perhaps the whole of it; and there was no injustice could be done to the country or the Government. No duty could be lost.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, because they were found out.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—But there was the warehouse. There is the position, and I ask if that is not enough to make men curse their country. No man who has been treated so unjustly could love his country.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There is no man in that position that would try it again; that is evident. The whole case lies here; if the hon. member's friend had not infringed the law, he would not have been fined, and if he had paid on the day he should have paid, he would not have been called to pay the next day, and there would have been no seizure upon him. It is not the fault of the law, but it is the fault of the party who infringed the law.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not think we can be too stringent in our customs laws. There is an effort to evade the law in our country, and unless you are stringent the law will be a dead letter. It is not a question of law; it is a question of fact for the judge who tries the case, whether there is probable cause for him making the seizure; and if the facts sustain the charge to the satisfaction of the court, I cannot see where the injustice comes in. Our customs officials are timid about doing their work, and there is a laxity in the district where I reside in having the laws executed in the proper way. I think we should make the law as rigorous as it can be.

The subclause was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté), from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

SEIGNIORY OF SAULT ST. LOUIS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (97) "An Act respecting the Seigniory of Sault St. Louis."

Hon. Mr. DEBLOIS, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

NOVA SCOTIA STEEL CO'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McKAY moved the second reading of Bill (131) "An Act to incorporate the Nova Scotia Steel Company, Limited." He said: The object of this bill is to amalgamate two corporations now working under letters patent in the province of Nova Scotia.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (99) "An Act respecting the St. Lawrence Insurance Company."—(Mr. Ogilvie.)

Bill (79) "An Act respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company."—(Mr. McCallum.)

OTTAWA AND GATINEAU RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (72) "An Act to consolidate and amend certain Acts relating to the Ottawa and Gatineau Valley Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to the Ottawa and Gatineau Railway Company," with an amendment. He said: The object of the amendment is this: by section 1, chap. 56 of the statutes of 1893, the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway Company was authorized to construct a bridge over the Ottawa River at or near the city of Ottawa. The work was to be commenced by the 9th July, 1894. That was the date in the bill as introduced, and it was supposed that the royal assent would be given before that date, but this bill cannot become law until after that date, and as the contract between the Ottawa and Gatineau Railway Company and the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway Company provides for the construction of a bridge, it is necessary to extend the time, as is done by this amendment, not only for that purpose, but also to prevent the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway's rights from lapsing.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

THE FRENCH TREATY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON rose to Call attention to the provisions of the treaty with France now before Parliament for ratification, and ask the Government whether in their opinion the ratification of the said treaty would not preclude the granting any advantages in respect of trade to any of our sister colonies unless the same advantages were granted to France and to all other countries with whom we have most favoured nation treatment?

He said: I gave notice of this question on Tuesday last, and it is worth while to draw public attention to the fact that the question has practically been answered from the British House of Commons as appears by a cable published in to-day's paper. It shows the intimate relations which already exists between the various parts of this Empire and which space cannot obliterate that the utterances which go forth from the Parliament of Canada can find a ready reply on the other side of the Atlantic, in the British House of Commons, within two days. The cable to which I refer is as follows:—

London, July 4.—Sir Wm. Vernon Harcourt made the statement, in the debate on the estate duties, that it had never been conceded, in connection with the "most-favoured nation" treatment in commercial treaties, that the colonies were included in the words "other nation or other country." If true this is most important, in view of the Ottawa Conference, as showing the power of all parts of the Empire to make what internal commercial plans they choose without reference to foreign nations.

That is a practical reply, or perhaps I might more correctly say, a partial reply to the question of which I have given notice to the Government, namely—whether, in their opinion, the ratification of the said treaty would not preclude the granting of any advantages in respect of trade to any of our sister colonies. Of course that does not answer the question fully, that has reference to the most-favoured nations clause in the treaties that Great Britain has with foreign nations in which Canada is associated, and the point that I wished to make was, whether the most-favoured nations clause as applied to all those countries would carry with it the most-favoured nations treatment that we were giving to France under the present treaty. If it does, of course it opens up a much larger question than the subject of the treaty itself. I will admit the subject of the treaty is not as yet before the House, but we know and presume that it is going to be brought before us in consequence of the bill that we find on our desks, which is a bill prepared for the ratification of the treaty.

Parliament is going to prorogue probably next week, and we will be called upon to discuss this treaty in all its bearing before then, and the object that I have in bringing forward this question is that we may ascertain exactly what are all the conditions and what is the basis upon which we are asked to give our votes in support of the passage of this treaty. We are one and all proud to say that there is sitting here in Ottawa, to-day a conference which has met for the purpose of devising ways and means by which the unity of all the colonies with Great Britain can be consummated in a manner that is satisfactory to one another and that is capable of extending that valuable and powerful influence which the British constitution has been enabled to extend to all parts of the world. There is a possibility that very great and valuable results may spring out from this conference, which is the commencement probably of a series of conferences, which may lead to more extended trade relations and more extended benefits which we as Canadians may enjoy as part of the great whole which extends over the whole world. Great Britain as a free trade country has always acted upon the principle —at least since 1846, when she abandoned protection—that all she required was a fair field and no favour. She did not ask for any favours from foreign nations ; she did not ask for any reciprocity treaty from foreign nations ; she merely wished to have it understood that in her trade relations with the rest of the world other foreign nations would not give discriminatory benefit to her commercial rivals as against her industrial population. In that spirit she has always sought to negotiate what is called most-favoured nation treaties, that is to say in consideration for certain concessions or advantages, or possibly merely for an interchange of that civility, she has merely asked that that nation will enter into no negotiations with other countries that will discriminate against her industrial population in their trade. In consideration of those most-favoured nation treaties she has allowed her markets to remain open without any fear or favour, to foreign nations, and further any country that came under a British protectorate or was annexed by Great Britain or was part of the British Empire she asked no advantages from which were not fully accorded other nations. The result of that policy has been remarkable as everybody knows in the growth of her trade, the accumulation of wealth in her centres and the advantage of all concerned. However, it is not the trade question that I wish to impose upon the attention of the House at the present moment. It is how far the treaty that we are now called upon to discuss affects most-favoured nation treaties and affects one of the questions that the conference that is now met in Ottawa is called upon to deal with, and that is trade relations among ourselves as component parts of the British Empire. Sir Vernon Harcourt has told us in those words that appear to have come over the cable that where most-favoured nation treaties are spoken of the word nation does not divide up Canada and the Colonies from one another, or from Great Britain, that it does not interfere with a perfect intercommunication between one another for trade relations so far as most-favoured nation clauses are concerned, but there are two clauses as honourable gentlemen know in the treaties of the Zollverein and Belgium which specify particularly the colonies and British possessions as separate from England ; that is to say, that any benefits that Canada or Australia may give to one another or give to Great Britain, shall accrue to Belgium and the Zollverein upon the same basis, and in consequence of those two treaties all the nations with whom we have most-favoured nation treaties enjoy whatever benefits accrue to Belgium and the Zollverein under those two treaties. In consequence of that it has been the policy of the Canadian Government to memorialize the British Government to denounce those two clauses, or those clauses in those two treaties that affect the power of the colonies and Great Britain to deal with one another, as the colonies and states of other nations and other empires in this world are permitted to deal with one another and by the denouncement of those two clauses in these treaties the most-favoured nation's treatment may be confined merely to the operation of the nations in which Great Britain and the colonies are treated as one nation. That, I think, is the position in which the matter stands.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—I think these favoured nation treaties would not affect any arrangement as between the colonies themselves. The colonies themselves under the law could make treaties as between themselves.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I will read the clauses in order that we may see whether you are right. It is quite possible that what you have said is correct. The treaty with Belgium says:

The produce or manufacture of Belgium shall not be subject in the British colonies to other or higher duties than those which are or may be imposed upon similar articles of British origin.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—That is not the point: the point is as between the colonies.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—This is the treaty with the Zollverein:

The stipulation of the preceding articles shall also be applied to the Zollverein and foreign possessions of Her Britannic Majesty in those colonies and possessions, the produce of the states of the Zollverein shall not be subject to any other or higher duties than the produce of Great Britain or Ireland or any other country of like kind, nor shall the exportation from those colonies or possessions to the Zollverein be subject to any higher or other duties than the exportation to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—That does not cover the case of the colonies.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I see the point you are desiring to make, but when the Canadian Parliament memorialized the British Government to denounce those two treaties, it was with the view I have just expressed. It was outside our power to make any commercial arrangement between Great Britain and Canada, and also, I suppose, between Canada and Australia.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Article 3 will explain the point.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—That is between Great Britain and the colonies, but not as between the colonies themselves.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is a nice point, and I am not able to discriminate but still it is a point well taken. The point I wish to make with regard to this treaty is that while it has been the policy of the Canadian Government to ask for the denouncing of the clauses in those two treaties which will produce as we imagine that effect, that we are now entering into a treaty with France which will perpetuate the same result and practically the same effect as the two treaties with the Zollverein and Belgium. The treaty with France which we are now negotiating gives certain preferential arrangements with France mentioned in the treaty. We have most-favoured nation treaties with the following nations negotiated by Great Britain in which we are included: Argentine Republic, Austria Corea, and Hungary, Belgium, Bolivia, Chili, Costa Rica, Denmark, Egypt, Germany, Madagascar, Mexico, Montenegro, Morocco, Persia, Russia, Sandwich Islands, Siam, Norway and Sweden, Tunis, Uruguay, Venezuela and Zanzibar. England has favoured-nations treaties with a large number of other nations, but Canada is only included in those I have mentioned, some 31 in number. We have entered into most-favoured nations treaties with the nations I have mentioned here and any concession that we give to France now in our markets carries also with it, of course, the imposition or benefit of most-favoured nation treatment with all those nations. We have to give most-favoured nations treatment to all those nations to the extent that we are now giving it to France. That is the condition that I think the treaty places us in, and that is the condition that we have to consider in discussing the treaty. Now, so far as our trade relations with Australia are concerned, or with other colonies of the British Empire, we are not affected I will admit, so far as most-favoured nation treatment is concerned. It still leaves us perfectly free to trade with Australia or the Cape of Good Hope or New Zealand or any other colony so far as this treaty is concerned, but we cannot offer to Australia or the rest of the colonies any better conditions than are contained in the treaty with France, unless we leave our markets absolutely free to them. The chief articles that France has obtained concessions in are light wines, champagne, and one or two articles of that kind. Now, one of the largest agricultural products of Australia is wine. The largest agricultural product of France is wine. Australia has a climate which produces exactly the same result as France. We cannot enter into any arrangement that will give better rates than we give to France, unless you lower the duties to almost nothing. And, if a revenue should be raised out of anything, it should be raised out of luxuries. I quite appreciate the value of providing light wines and bringing them within the reach of all, and encouraging the taste in preference to stronger liquors, but still they must be treated as luxuries, and duties imposed for the purpose of getting the largest revenue from them. It is no benefit to Australia to compete in Canada with France, and all the other nations who produce the same products and are admitted on the same terms under most-favoured nation treaties; it is no better for Australia. They would be in no better position when we negotiated with them than they are to-day. They have now the same opportunities and advantages as other nations in the Canadian market, and the fact of lowering our duties does not improve the position of Australia so far as competing in our market is concerned. That is one effect the treaty is having on our interests so far as they are affected by any intercolonial arrangement we might desire to make, that whatever benefit we give to France, under this treaty, we are extending to every one of these nations that I have mentioned here, and we can offer very little better advantages to Australia than contained in the treaty with France. Therefore, we are to a certain extent reversing our policy that we enunciated three years ago when we memorialized the British Government to denounce the treaty of Zollverein and Belgium in order that we might have the benefit of entering into whatever arrangement we choose with the colonies themselves in the British Empire—that is if we pass the French treaty. It is a study of the question that caused me to bring this matter up at the present moment in order that we might understand what the effect of the treaty might be on the interests of Canada before it is brought into this House, perhaps at the last stages of the session. I might say with regard to the most-favoured nation treatment that has been accorded to Belgium and Zollverein that no doubt Great Britain has a considerable amount of hesitancy in interfering with those treaties. England's policy is a free trade policy, a fair field and no favour asked from anybody. Her foreign trade amounts to $3,700,000,000 a year, the largest foreign trade of any nation in the world. That foreign trade has been fostered and grown into those dimensions under the most-favoured nation clauses of the various treaties she has negotiated. It is very hard for us to ask England against her will to denounce those treaties with Belgium and the Zollverein if it is going to interfere materially with that enormous trade. We must all realize that the value of Great Britain as a purchasing power for our produce is an exceedingly valuable one and anything that would interfere with the purchasing power of the British market interferes with the general prosperity of Canada, because we find in England the very largest power of a purchasing market in consequence of the enormous trade which is centred there under her policy of free trade. Therefore and for that reason I say we cannot complain too loudly if she hesitates and hesitates long before she interferes with two treaties that may in her eyes be of such vast importance to her foreign trade. If we were to imitate England under a free trade policy possibly we would view it in the same way, but we had memorialized Great Britain possibly with a view of our entering into arrangements with our sister colonies, and now to-day a treaty is being placed before this Parliament which will undo very much what we were asking Great Britain to do under those two treaties. We are now negotiating a treaty with France which extends the power to all these most-favoured nations. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that we had a most-favoured nation treaty which was negotiated by Great Britain in 1886 which gave Canada the freedom of the markets of Cuba and Porto Rico, very valuable markets, under the most-favoured nation clauses—that is to say, no foreign nation could trade with Cuba, and Porto Rico, and Spain, for that matter, under better terms than was granted to Great Britain and her colonies, but the United States under their McKinley law negotiated a reciprocity treaty, and it was held by Spain and the United States that that reciprocity treatment did not come under the head of the most-favoured nation treatment. Whether that was the case or not, and to put all doubt at an end, Spain denounced the treaty that was negotiated in 1886, and we now have no most-favoured nation treatment in Spain with regard to our commerce. The United States under their reciprocity treaty enjoys what is called a minimum tariff, and we have a tariff which is higher than that of the United States. I believe that some arrangement has been made by which something below the maximum tariff is accorded, but at any rate the United States are competitors for the sale of an extended list of articles which have better advantages in Cuba, and Porto Rico, and Spain, in consequence of the reciprocity treaty, than we in Canada have. I point this out in order to show the great benefit that does exist in the most-favoured nations treatment, but, of course, if by reciprocity treaties the United States or any other nation can undermine us, it looses a certain amount of its effect. The reciprocity treaties of the United States, however, are now being abrogated, at least so far as they interfere with the tariff which they have just passed. The reason I fancy that they are abrogating these treaties is because foreign nations found that by opening the markets of the United States under reciprocity for sugar and all those articles, they were competing with one another in a restricted market and developing an amount of competition in the United States, and in order to protect their own sugar producers, the United States granted a bounty of 2 cents a pound on sugar, and in order to get rid of that bounty, which is an oppressive tax, Congress is now abrogating their reciprocity treaties within the limits confined to the tariff. With regard to the treaty itself, we are introducing a new principle into the most-favoured nation system under the treaty. As the correspondence shows, the Government differs from Sir Charles Tupper, who negotiated and signed the treaty, so far as the most-favoured nation treatment was concerned. The treaty that has been negotiated and signed gives to France the benefit of the most-favoured nation treatment in Canada upon all commerce that may be developed by Canada ; but France only extends to Canada most-favoured nation treatment in the 20 articles mentioned in the treaty. That is introducing a new principle in the negotiating of treaties, which Canada has entered upon, which I think should be carefully considered and properly guarded before we make it law. If we are going to say to France that we accord them that as a principle on which we are willing to trade, can we refuse it to Spain or any other country with whom we may want to enter into a treaty? We cannot properly refuse it, we have acknowledged it as a principle and we should not refuse it to any other nation. Now, what is the principle which applies at least to the minds of the French Government? It is a principle which also applies itself to the minds of our neighbours in the United States, that a market of 5,000,000 of people is not nearly so valuable as a market of 38,000,000 of people, or a market of 65,000-000 of people. That is where I think they make a mistake, because, after all, the selling power of 5,000,000 of people is no greater than the purchasing power of 5,000,-000 of people. Our purchasing power and our selling power are co-equal and co-existant, and therefore there is an equality of markets, and the market of 65,000,000 of people next us or the 38,000,000 in France is of no greater value to us than our 5,000,-000 market is to our neighbours or our treaty friends, because our power to use the larger market is limited to our industrial power to take advantage of it, and any increase of our industrial power redounds to their benefit as a market under the treaty, while any increase in their industrial power only redounds to our benefit in the sale of the twenty articles mentioned in the treaty, that is why I say the purchasing and selling power of the population are about equal, as the trade returns of the world show, except in some cases, notably that of Great Britain which enjoys free trade, where her purchasing power is greater than her selling power. There is no doubt that the lower the taxation you impose at your own borders the greater your purchasing power is going to be, and the lower the taxation you impose on your borders the more economical is the power of production, and therefore, probably, the greater your selling power. But that is apart from the question. The question I am trying to come at at the present moment is the principle that is involved of considering that we must give to France most-favoured nation treatement in the whole of our commerce, because we are only 5,000,000 of people, while France only accords to us most-favoured nation treatment in the twenty articles included in the treaty because she has 38,000,000 of people. There is a difference apparently acknowledged which does not exist, namely, the inequality of the purchasing and selling power. From my standpoint it is exactly equal and therefore, it seems to me, that the treaty should be on equal terms. If we are going to enter into the negotiation of treaties with other nations on the same basis we are going to find ourselves very badly left in competing for commerce under any such conditions. Sir Charles Tupper has told us in his correspondence that the instruction from the Government to him was that there should be most-favoured nation treatment accorded to France in the articles mentioned in her treaty, and most-favoured nation treatment accorded to Canada in the articles mentioned in our treaty, but the conditions that have been imposed by Sir Charles Tupper, without the authority of the Government I will acknowledge, have created the reverse. The instructions I refer to are contained in the cable of January 12th, 1893, from Hon. Mr. Bowell to Sir Charles Tupper, as follows: "Re French negotiations, Government cannot accept conditions involved in clauses regarding steamship subvention and reduction duty French books, but agree to most-favoured nation treatment so far as articles named in treaty are concerned, France has the benefit of most-favoured nation treatment in all Canadian commerce, while we are limited to the 20 articles mentioned in the treaty. That is I think a condition that should not be put in the treaty. That is a condition that would justify parliament in refusing to sanction the treaty in view of the fact that the negotiations that were concluded were concluded in direct opposition to the instructions of the Government. That is contained in the correspondence here given to us by Sir Charles Tupper. He has said that he thought the difference in his correspondence did not amount to very much, and that as the treaty was so far advanced, he thought it was better to negotiate it on those terms. I wish to show exactly the difference between the diplomacy of the British Government which has conducted treaties upon a very large scale—the different ground they take in regard to matters of that kind. In 1886, negotiations were opened for a treaty between Spain and Great Britain. The policy of the British Government was that Spain should accord to the colonies and possessions of Great Britain the same advantages that were accorded to her under the treaty. The British plenipotentiary, Sir Francis Clare Ford, could not induce the Spanish Government to include the colonies in the trade with Cuba and Porto Rica and Sir Clare Ford wrote to the British Government and said:

We have negotiated a treaty which is the best that is possible to be done and therefore I have thought it better to conclude the treaty upon this basis in order that we may get a ratification.

He did not sign it because the treaty was sent to Great Britain before its signature, but this is the reply that the British Government sent in response to that:

The instructions which have been given to your predecessor and yourself have placed you in possession of the views which are held in this country with regard to the requirements of British commerce, and have shown the bases on which alone Her Majesty's Government would be enabled to negotiate for the conclusion of a commercial agreement with Spain.

In return for any concession which may be granted to Spain as regards the wine duties, it is necessary that Her Majesty's Government should obtain for British subjects in matters of trade and navigation a treatment in Spain and the Spanish colonies co-extensive both in amount of benefit and in duration with that accorded to France and Germany. * * * * *

These considerations, to which in the interests not merely of the revenue, but also of British trade much weight must be attached, deter Her Majesty's Government from granting your authority to sign the declaration which you have submitted for their sanction. They have, however, arrived at this conclusion with much regret, and they trust that the time is not distant when a more successful effort may be made to obtain the object which they have in view. It is, therefore, the wish of Her Majesty's Government that, in the event of the Spanish Government being willing to pursue them, the negotiations should be continued by you on the wider basis which the foregoing remarks indicate: but having regard to the opinion expressed in your despatch, that, owing to the necessity which would arise of a readjustment of valuations and of a reduction of duties in the Spanish tariff, the present moment is not opportune for negotiating a definite treaty such as the commercial classes of this country would desire, Her Majesty's Government leave to your discretion the particular action which it may be desirable now to take.

That is the position the British Government took when they could not get a treaty in accordance with their pronounced policy. The result was that they withdrew from any action in regard to the treaty and informed their plenipotentiary to that effect. Sir Clare Ford reopened negotiations and negotiated a treaty immediately afterwards with Spain in accordance with the policy of the British Government governing their treaties. When a treaty has been negotiated such as the one under discussion by the High Commissioner, but in opposition to the policy of the Canadian Government, that is, that a partial advantage should be given on one side as opposed to a full advantage on the other—I say for that reason alone it is desirable that the treaty should be referred back, not in any unfriendly spirit, not to say that we do not wish to increase our trade relations with France, but in order that a treaty may be negotiated upon a fairer and less one-sided basis than appears to have been negotiated in the present instance. There is another point in the treaty that is also worthy the consideration of this House, and that is the expectation on the part of the French Government that a subsidy of $500,000 a year shall be given to a steamship line in order that direct communications with France may be secured towards the development of this trade. The policy of the Government has been pronounced in the correspondence that they cannot accede to that, but there is in the minds of the French statesmen a feeling that it is a necessity to secure the trade, in fact Sir Charles Tupper assures them in his correspondence that in order to take advantage of the treaty it would be necessary to subsidize a steamer to establish that direct trade. In view of the possibility of that weighing in the minds of the French statesmen, it is not desirable that we should for the sake of the benefits that are likely to be derived from this treaty, commit ourselves in any way to the prospect of having to pay as much as $500,000 a year in order to secure the full benefits of the treaty. Sir Charles Tupper's words in regard to it are included in a letter addressed to Mr. Hanotaux, chief of the customs department of France, with whom he negotiated the treaty.

Since our meeting on the date mentioned, I had occasion to refer to this subject in replying to a very influential deputation which waited upon me to advance the interests of Milford Haven as a point of communication between Canada and England. I inclose a copy of my speech in reply to the deputation in which you will see that I explained to them that Canada attached a great deal of importance to that feature of the project which provided for direct communication with France.

You will also readily perceive that the concession of the minimum tariff on a number of articles which it is proposed to give Canada will be practically of no value unless direct communication between the two countries be provided, as the surtaxe d'entrepôt would make it impossible for Canada to derive any advantage therefrom.

In the hope that this explanation will be satisfactory to the French Government, and that we may be able to conclude our negotiations upon the basis concurred in by the Government of Canada.

Those are the words of Sir Charles Tupper who negotiated the treaty that it will be of no benefit in many articles to Canada unless the means are provided by Canada to give direct communication between Canada and France. In looking up this question I went to the Library and got the French tariff in order to see what effect the surtaxe d'entrepôt would have. The original products outside of Europe imported through a country of Europe are subjected to a specific surtaxe in table C annexed to the present law. Now I turn to the tables here in order to find out what the surtaxe is. There are a number of articles here. The surtaxe d'entrepôt is a tax imposed by France upon all the articles that pass through another country and find their market in France, which surtaxe is prohibitory in its nature, and therefore we can derive no benefit from a number of the articles mentioned in this treaty unless we provide direct communication. The only article in this specified list of articles which is mentioned specifically is furniture. The duty on that is 30 francs per hundred kilogrammes about 200 lbs., so there would be a surtaxe of 30 francs per two hundred pounds. All other merchandise we send to France under this treaty that does not go direct is subject to a tax of 3 francs and 60 centimes over and above the minimum or maximum tariff. Let us see what the effect of that would be under the tariff. On rough and hewn timber the duty is 1½ and 2½ francs per hundred kilogrammes, that would be reduced to ¾ of a franc and a franc and a quarter under the new treaty. Of course, timber is likely to go in by sailing vessels, and therefore, is not one of those articles that would be affected by the surtaxe. But, take an article not going in on sailing vessels—take dried apples, for instance, the maximum duty of which is 3 francs per 100 kilogrammes and the minimum duty on which is two francs per hundred kilogrammes. That would be subject to a surtaxe of 3 francs and 60 centimes. Take wood pulp—the minimum tax on that is ¾ franc, but if it did not go directly, it would be subject to an additional tax of 3 francs and 60 centimes. That is the effect of the surtaxe d'entrepôt. Sir Charles Tupper very properly says, a large number of articles, such as canned lobsters, canned fish, wood pulp, furniture, condensed milk, common paper and articles of that kind, are virtually and practically prohibited, unless we provide the means of communication between Canada and France, so that it takes away from the value of the treaty an immense amount if it does not absolutely make the treaty virtually worthless, because it imposes upon Canada the duty of subsidizing a steamer for a very small trade indeed. In 1891 we sent to France $239,000 worth of merchandise. We purchased from France, that year, $1,671,000 worth of merchandise, so that our purchasing power from France under existing circumstances has been far greater than our selling power to her. France asks Canada to subsidize a steamer which would cost $500,000, to develop direct trade. What for? To add a little to the $239,000 worth that we send to her, a quarter of a cargo every year, while we are purchasing from France $1,-671,000 worth of goods. But we have no surtaxe, and they can send their goods by any line, but we cannot sell them $239,000 or half a million dollars worth, as Sir Charles Tupper says it would be doubled, unless we provide means of communication to take that trade direct from Canada to France. You can see plainly that the treaty as it is presented to us is greatly reduced in value and may impose an obligation which would take away even such small advantage as does exist in the treaty, the granting of a very large subsidy, in order to provide that direct communication. We send to Great Britain 50 or 60 million dollars worth of goods every year, and import the same, and yet you see how very difficult it appears to be even with a subsidy of $750,000 to provide a fast line. With $12,000,000 trade and the enormous travel backward and forward, we cannot secure a line with a subsidy of three-quarters of a million dollars a year—is it likely for so small a trade as that with France we can afford to subsidize a vessel in order that that direct trade may be established? For these reasons I brought this point before you, not only to show the effect that this treaty may have upon the most-favoured nation clause, but also what it may have upon the obligations, honourably entered into, between France and Canada. There is resting in the minds of French statesmen the fact that we cannot take advantage of the treaty unless we provide direct communication, and although they are willing to forego putting it in the treaty, yet that rests in their mind that we will provide direct communication. Although the Government have protected themselves by saying that they have no intention to do so, is it worth while passing the treaty in its present form unless the French Government will release us from the surtaxe d'entrepôt and enable us to take advantage of the treaty without the imposition of any subsidy for such a small trade? The most-favoured nation treatment should be started on a fair basis in so far as regards any future treaties we may wish to negotiate, and not in a partial way as it has been laid down in this treaty.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Perhaps it would have been proper for me to have called to order the hon. gentleman who has addressed you with so much eloquence for the last hour, although at this late period of the session, when time is so precious, I might have been supported in calling him to order for discussing a bill, which is to be submitted to this House on a future day, but which is not yet before us: the ratification of the French treaty. Such a speech as the hon. gentleman has treated us to might have been well accepted the first week of the session when we were waiting for work from the House of Commons. The papers are not before us.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is laid on our table.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—When the bill comes down the hon. gentleman will have the opportunity of repeating his speech, if he should still be here, but I am afraid he has made his speech in the hope of returning home, perhaps before the close of the session, but I hope that is not his inteution.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, I will keep to my post.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—As to the other point which has been discussed here, it is the subject which the conference of distinguished gentlemen from all parts of the empire are discussing at present. When I could not prevent him from doing a thing which was discourteous, the House will understand I am not bound to follow him upon that point, and that I shall not give an answer upon that particular point. It would be unbecoming for me, a member of the Government, to dwell upon the very subject for which we have called those representative gentlemen thousands and thousands of miles away from their homes to discuss with us here. As to the anxiety of the hon. gentleman to know whether the most-favoured nation clause did prevent us from dealing with the colonies as he suggests, I would only refer him to the very wording of the article itself in the French treaty. It is in the following words:

> Any commercial advantage granted by Canadian to any third power, especially in tariff matters, shall be enjoyed fully by France, Algeria and the French colonies.

Now the hon. gentleman is too well informed not to know that the wording " any third power" could not mean Australia, New Zealand or the Cape of Good Hope, because that is part of one power—the British Empire. If the hon. gentleman had read the clause he would have seen that it does not affect us, because dealing between ourselves would not be an infringement of this clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the hon. Minister is scarcely fair in the strictures he has passed on the hon. gentleman who introduced the subject to the Senate. The Government mentioned it in the speech from the Throne, and it has been adverted to on several occasions. It is very well known that the measure is now before another branch of Parliament, although it is quite true it has not yet come before the Senate. The matter is one which has been publicly discussed by the newspapers of this country and the public men of this country, and I am not aware that it is at all contrary to the custom of Parliament for a member to put a question of this kind to the Government. Surely it cannot be called premature for a member to inquire the effect of the government's policy, if it is likely to disturb relations that are now being made with another part of the Empire. I can see no harm in the question, and it is quite proper, in my judgment, for the hon. gentleman to introduce it. It has been done in this Chamber frequently with reference to matters that were not really before Parliament —questions that were not likely to come up at all—but here is a question which is likely to come before us. I think the House is very much indebted to the hon. gentleman for the information he has furnished us; he has given the matter a great deal of thought and attention, and he has brought forward important points which will have their influence when the bill comes to the Senate. I do not think it is quite courteous to reflect upon him and state that his question was out of order. I do not think it was out of order; on the contrary, it is perfectly proper to put a question of that kind. Of course the Government need not answer the question; they may say it is under consideration, or they may give one of the many evasive answers so often given by officers of the Crown. The hon. gentleman did not address the House at all in a party spirit, but, on the contrary, he rather sheltered the Government in reference to many of the weak parts of that treaty, more particularly as to whether Sir Charles Tupper was premature in closing the treaty. It is well known in the country that last session the Government were divided upon it, some members contending that Sir Charles was not authorized to make such a treaty. The matter was discussed by the press in the country and admitted by the members of the Government themselves, and there was nothing confidential about it. The Government have thought proper, in their wisdom, to agree that the treaty shall be submitted this session. It was laid over last session; the Government did not agree, and they saw reasons for not accepting it, and they now see reasons for taking the opposite course. I have no doubt they will submit the reasons to us when it comes before the Senate. But to say it is improper for a member of Parliament to discuss a matter of that kind, when it is before the other branch of Parliament, would be suppressing that freedom of discussion and debate on all those questions which has prevailed in the past.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The leader of the Opposition is not correct in this matter. The reply of the leader of this House to the question or motion is most appropriate—the speech accompanying the question deserved rebuke. Had the hon. gentleman who brought this motion before the House confined himself to the question which he asked, it might have been worthy of consideration, but he travelled beyond that and discussed the merits of a measure which is not before the House at present. He went into the merits, and denounced it prematurely, and when we have not got the facts before us to justify us in coming to a conclusion upon the matter. Honourable members have too much regard for propriety to be provoked or drawn into a premature discussion of the merits of the treaty bill. My hon. friend may think in his wisdom that he is endeavouring to educate the meeting of delegates upon this matter. Article 2 of the treaty is plain to an ordinary mind, yet the hon. gentleman may have been prompted by a desire to enlighten us or the conference now sitting on a subject on which we have a right to suppose they are familiar. That may be his object, but my hon. friend might have taken another way to do it. He has endeavoured to do that through the press already; he has endeavoured to enunciate his views as to free trade through the press whenever he possibly can, and sometimes he does it out of his own personal vanity.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I call the hon. gentleman to order. He is reflecting upon the motives of another member of this House.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I disregard the call to order. I do not think it is any reflection on his motives at all. But my hon. friend is sensitive in the matter and I will not ask for a ruling from the Speaker. He had no right to go into the treaty the way he did, nor to question the terms of the treaty, or its effect, until the correspondence attached to it was before us. Therefore I say my hon. friend was decidedly out of order, and it is only through the indulgence of the House that he has been allowed on this occasion, as he has on many others, to ventilate his peculiar ideas on the trade question. He opened up the whole question of trade—tiresome to members—the same hobby he has introduced many times in this House.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I rise to make a personal explanation. I did not object to the question at all. The hon. leader of the Opposition misunderstood me if he thought I objected to that. The question may have been a proper one, but what I said was out of order was the speech he made upon his question.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think the hon. gentleman has given us a good deal of information and I had pleasure in listening to him. This matter of a treaty has been before the country for over a year now, and it has been a question in every man's mouth in my part of the country whether we are going to pass the treaty or not, and I was very glad to hear his remarks. He gave me information that I had not heard before.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I may be permitted to say that I found the treaty on my table here among the other bills. I did not know whether it was introduced in the House of Commons or how far it had gone, but what I do now is that there is a conference sitting here in the hope that some trade relations may be entered into between Australia and the component parts of the Empire. I sympathize with that a great deal, and I think we all sympathize with it, and what I wanted to know was whether in the future the remission of duties we were according to France would also be accorded to other countries with whom we had favored nation treaties. I understood the hon. minister to say that we were not a third party, that Great Britain and the Colonies were one party in which we were included. Great Britain was entering into a treaty with France and giving certain concessions to France, and I wanted to know whether those concessions extended to all the various nations with whom we had most-favoured nations treaties, and I felt myself perfectly justified, not in moving any resolution with regard to the treaty, but simply making the inquiry I did, and giving my reasons for it. So far as the hon. member for Lunenberg is concerned, I will not attempt to answer him until he is willing to accord to his colleagues in this House some higher motives for their action than mere personal ambition or vanity, the standard of value which he generally places his references to me at.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE FORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the third reading of Bill (121) "An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the North-west Mounted Police Force." He said: I was asked a question by the leader of the Opposition as to the number of veterinary surgeons in the force. There are two, and it is not proposed to augment their number. They have six assistants who get the ordinary pay of their rank; and at present the number is sufficient. It is only in case of some very extraordinray emergency, such as a great disease amongst cattle, or some accident in the territories, that the number should be augmented.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

LAND IN THE TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITEEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (HH) "An Act to consolidate and amend the Act respecting land in the Territories."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This bill has been circulated through the territories and sent to the judges who administer justice there. They have suggested additions and amendments which have been incorporated in the bill. This measure refers specially to the registration of deeds and mortages and judgments, prescribes what the duties of the registrar shall be, what books he shall keep for the public information, and what will be the record of his office. It is a long bill. I propose as we go on to draw the attention of the House to the clauses which may be new and to the suggestions which have been made by the judges who administer justice there.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph a of this section ; I notice that the term "land" is to include "mines, minerals and quarries." I wish to ask whether it is the settled policy of the Government in dealing with the North-west that grants of lands shall convey the mines and minerals in the lands. That has not been the usual policy in the provinces.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the better policy would be to exclude the mines, minerals and quarries; if in an exceptional case the Government proposed to grant the mines, minerals and quarries, it should be mentioned.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The Government have not changed their policy with regard to that, and when lands are granted, the grant does not include the mines and minerals unless they are specially stated.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The patents issued by the Government some years ago did not include mines, minerals and quarries, but afterwards the Government excluded them from the grant; in some cases they included the quarries and in some not, and therefore the certificate now issuing upon a patent would be governed under this Act, and it would not do to omit the language used in this section.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The word "land" is used in the bill; that is the general expression.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My point is, that under this paragraph wherever in letters patent lands are mentioned, then the letters patent convey the mines, minerals and quarries. I understand the Minister to say that it is not the policy of the Government in granting lands to grant the mines and minerals underneath the soil.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Now, those mines and minerals pass unless they are specially excepted. As the intention is that they shall not be granted unless specially mentioned, would it not be better to leave out mines, minerals and quarries and allow the grant to include them in the exceptional cases where they are granted?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend is in error for this reason—that any grant of land, unless there is an exception in that grant, includes all mines and minerals, except the precious metals, and if there is an exception the patent will show it, and it will come under this clause. There will be no other way of dealing with the patent.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 5,

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This is a repetition of clause 7.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not quite understand it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Since the introduction of the Real Property Act in the Territories, real estate in its devolution is much the same as personal estate. Where an executor is appointed under a will, the property does not vest in any of the legatees until there is a transfer made by the executor to the legatee or to the devisee, as the case may be, or by the administrator when letters of administration are taken out.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It seems that it cannot be considered as complete until that is done.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I only ask for information. It reads:

> No devise shall be valid or effectual as against the personal representative of the testator, until the land affected thereby is transferred to the devisee thereof, by the personal representative of the devisor.

That is, the devise shall not be valid until the executor has transferred it to the devisee. It just means that the executor, by keeping the land in his possession, can hinder the devise becoming valid against him for an unlimited time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the law now in Ontario. The executor for the time being is the owner practically; but he is a trustee, and a conveyance by him would be a fraud and would be estopped by the court.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I understand he is seized of the property.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—An executor might have to pay the debts of the testator, and he must hold the land until he properly winds up the estate, and then he transfers it to the devisee.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The executor could be forced to do it by the court.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 23,

Hon. Mr. POWER—As the whole question of land titles is purely legal in its aspect, the proper department to operate this bill, when it becomes law, would be the Justice Department. I cannot see how the Minister who happens to be at the head of the Department of the Interior, and who is not necessarily a professional man, should be expected to be qualified to deal with questions which would arise in construing this Act and carrying on business under it. I think it ought to be under the Department of Justice; perhaps the Solicitor General would find something to do if we gave him charge of this land titles business.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This Act is under the direction of the Minister of the Interior for the reason that the concession of lands belongs to his department. All the letters patent have to be issued there. Of course, when any question of law arises, he takes the opinion of the Solicitor General or of the Minister of Justice. It is under the direction of the Minister who has charge of the land.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 56, subsection d,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This subsection is objectionable. It provides that leases shorter than three years need not be registered. A purchaser might acquire a property without knowing that it was leased.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The reason for registering long leases is for the protection of creditors, but there is no necessity to register short leases.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would be no hardship to require the lessee or the lessor to register any lease for over a year. The registration fee is only $1.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There are other expenses besides the registration fee. Often it involves a long trip, and frequently leases are made verbally which would have to be reduced to writing if registered.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the bill and asked to sit again.

THIRD READING.

Bill (137) "An Act further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act."—(Mr. Angers.)

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES OF SHIPS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (130) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting certificates to Masters and Mates of Ships."

(In the Committee.)

On the 8th clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause increases the fees that are now payable under the Act for certificates to masters and mates of ships. Under section 6 of the Act the fee for a certificate of competency for a master is $10; that is increased by this bill to $15. The fee for a mate's certificate under the existing law is $5. That is increased by this bill to $8. Inasmuch as those who are applying for certificates as masters and mates are not generally blessed with much of this world's goods, the Minister should show some substantial reason for increasing the fees, particularly as these certificates are required now for masters and mates of vessels of over 100 tons burden. Formerly they were only required for vessels over 150 tons.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The increase is not very much, but it has become necessary. It was always anticipated that the fees should pay the service, and that rule had been laid down. The expenditure for last year was as follows:—

Chairman's salary	$ 1,800
Clerk's salary	480
Printing, travelling expenses and office expenses	1,836
	$4,116
The revenue was	2,484
Deficit	$1,632

Under the circumstances the small increase in fees is necessary, since it was always understood that this service should pay its own expenses.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—In the event of the revenue greatly increasing, the Governor in Council can reduce the fees.

The clause was adopted.

Hon Mr. BOLDUC, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

LANDS IN THE TERRITORIES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (HH) "An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting land in the Territories."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 89,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think this clause requires an adjunct to fairly carry it out. The clause vests in the executor the estate, both real and personal. There may be a will in which parts of the property have been specifically devised, and if the administrator is not diligent in his duty, or from any motive he may desire to keep the estate in his hands, it might be some considerable time before those entitled to the various devises could receive them. The law in Ontario limits the time to one year. If the executor requires a longer period to wind up the estate, he divests himself of those parts of the property which have been specifically devised; then he must file a paper in the registry office that he requires further time, and a year is given to him. In this bill there is no limitation and I fear it would be a temptation to an administrator to use the funds of the estate and not exercise proper despatch in winding it up.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think the suggestion a good one and I will let the clause stand.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 92,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not quite understand the effect of that subsection 3. It is new, I understand.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This Act has not been made obligatory in reference to all lands, and there are a great many lands for which certificates of title have not been issued, and they are not brought under the Act. It is inequitable that a person should be enabled thus to deal with those lands in view of the fact that a writ issued against such lands has no operation, and that persons who have not thus conformed to the Act are placed in a better position than those who have conformed. I think this clause should be reconsidered. Its effect is very doubtful.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 94,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Although the registrar shall be entitled to receive a transfer yet he shall not have authority until the expiration of four weeks to register the same. In line 14 this is rather a peculiar position. Is it understood that that instrument shall lie in the office for four weeks before being registered?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It may be to enable the party who opposes the sale to apply to the court to set it aside.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This corresponds to section 96 of the old Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Section 96 provides for immediate registration.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I see no reason except to offer sufficient delay to contest the sheriff's sale, if any irregularity has been committed, but I cannot say to the House that that is the motive of the clause, but it would have that effect. I shall ask that the clause stand and obtain the information.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—It is evident that that is the intention from the concluding words of the clause.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If that is the object it is a very good one.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I quite agree that sufficient time should be given for the redemption of the land.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is not so much for the redemption of the land as contesting the sale if it had been improperly carried on.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the transfer is not to be registered for four weeks after its presentation to the registrar, the book in which the registrations are entered will not show the dealings with the land. The principle is that the records in the Registry Office should show the whole of the dealings with the land so that a person examining those books may acquaint himself with the record. The public might be deceived by reason of this provision.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The book will show that there is an execution in the office; it will also appear that the property was in the sheriff's hand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This refers also to tax sales, and is a departure from the old law.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 99,

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—It will be observed that in subsection 8 of section 99 once a caveat is filed, the caveator has no right after that date to file another, even though he should withdraw the one he originally filed. One could very well conceive some error or mistake having arisen in filing a caveat, and surely the rights of the caveator should not be entirely wiped out by his having filed his first caveat. It appears to me that power should be given to the judge, where a case of mistake or error has arisen, on application to the judge to grant the caveator a right to file another caveat. A caveat is usually filed in a very great hurry. The reason of filing a caveat is to cover some contingency which unexpectedly happens; and they are invariably filed without very much attention being given to their preparation, and on information obtained hurriedly. Consequently, this remedy given to the caveator should not be entirely exhausted by his having filed a caveat. I suggest that that additional power should be given to the judge. If you were to add at the end of the clause "unless by leave of a judge" it would answer the purpose, I think.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I accept that amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In subsection 6 I desire to point out that there is a limitation of three months which may not be practicable. For instance, it makes it arbitrary that the proceedings shall be brought to a certain issue within three months—that is to say the caveator shall, by the expiration of three months, either secure an injunction restraining the registrar from granting a certificate of title or otherwise dealing with the land.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He has to bring the proceedings within three months.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, they may be pending.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It appears to me the construction would warrant the conclusion that he was bound to bring the proceedings to an issue, which issue shall be the obtaining of an injunction or order.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The court is seized with the case. He must proceed or the defendant obtains release.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He may have obtained his injunction.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The defendant can force him to go on, or if he does not he will get a release from the court.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The difficulty is where the courts sit at such long intervals as they do in the North-west. It is a question whether the order of the judge could be obtained in time. However I am not prepared to condemn it.

The clause as amended was agreed to.

On clause 100,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED called attention to the fact that under this clause an instrument executed by a corporation through its properly authorized officers and with the corporation seal, could not be accepted without an affidavit. This gave rise to a great deal of inconvenience at times, especially in the case of documents sent out from England.

After discussion, the clause was allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill (151) "An Act respecting the Common School Fund."—(Mr. Angers.)

Bill (150) "An Act respecting certain subsidies granted to the Government of the Province of Quebec by Chapter eight of the the Statutes of 1884.—(Mr. Angers.)

NORTH-WEST TERRITORY IRRIGATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (134) "An Act respecting the utilization of waters of the North-west Territories for irrigation and other purposes." He said: The object of this bill is to encourage and facilitate the formation of companies in the North-west Territories for the purpose of irrigation. It is impossible that a single farmer now can find the necessary funds or would be willing to invest the necessary amount to do such extensive works as are required in several localities in the North-west Territories. There is most valuable land which can be made fertile by irrigation. There are millions more of acres of land which will be rendered most productive by the joint action of the farmers there, or by capital brought in, and it is necessary that some legislation be made to authorize and regulate these works, to provide for expropriation and for the proper construction of dams where the water is to be kept back, and so on, in the interests of the public safety. This bill will provide for those exigencies, and as we go on in Committee of the Whole I shall explain each clause. I may say the legislation has been copied from Acts passed in Australasia, and in some of the neighbouring states of America.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 5.05 p.m.

THE LATE SENATOR GLAZIER.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Before proceeding to business, it is my painful duty to record the absence of one of the hon. members of this House, who has been removed by Providence in the eighty-fifth year of his life. The Hon. Mr. Glazier occupied in his own province a prominent position as a trader. He was the pioneer on the River St. John of the most extensive lumber trade that ever existed in New Brunswick, and was at the head of a very large business. His word, through the whole of his province, was as good as his bond and his note equal to the notes of a chartered bank. He also occupied a seat in the local legislature of his own province, and as far back as 1868 he was called to this honourable House, where he has been known as a most honourable and courteous member. It is with very great regret that we learn of his death, and we are consoled only by the thought that he has gone to a better world. I must also add the expression of regret of the whole House that we have been unable to attend his funeral, as we should have done in a body, by the fact that the death occurred when the Senate was adjourned and we had no opportunity of meeting before to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I join in the regrets of the hon. gentlemen who now leads this House. The late Senator Glazier for many years past, owing to feeble health, took apparently very little interest in the business of the Chamber, but those who recollect him as he was 20 years ago will remember him as a kind-hearted, genial man, with a good deal of force of character and sound sense, and very much liked by those who knew him intimately. Many of those, I am sorry to say, are gone before him. He lived to a fine old age, and I join in the very great regret that we are unable to pay that respect we should have liked to his memory by attending his funeral owing to the circumstances mentioned by the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. WARK—I was acquainted with Senator Glazier for a great many years. I can remember when he was a member of the New Brunswick Legislature. As has been observed by the hon. leader of the House, he at one time was doing a very extensive business in that province. At the time of the difficulties about the Trent affair, when a body of troops came out to St. John as the nearest point in Canada, Mr. Glazier, who was then doing a large business and employed a great many teams, undertook to send the troops through, and he did his duty most satisfactorily. He at one time carried on a very extensive business in what was called the disputed territory when it was open for operations. There was no man that I have met who had such a memory of the early history of the River St. John, as Mr. Glazier. He was born on the river, brought up on it, carried on business on it and knew the whole history of that section. Of late his health had been very much impaired. His death is very much to be regretted by all.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—After the warm tribute from the hon. Minister of Agriculture to the memory of the late Mr. Glazier, there is hardly anything further for me to say except that I come from the same province, and having known our late colleague for the last forty years, I desire to express my endorsation of every word uttered by the hon. Minister. The late Mr. Glazier was one leading lumberman of our country. He carried on a very extensive business at all times, and employed some 100 or 150 men in the woods. He, with his brother, ran steamers on the River St. John, and was everywhere known as a thoroughly honourable man. In his youth, and whilst his health was good, he commanded great respect in his native province. Since he came to Ottawa, some twenty-six years ago, on the 14th March, 1868, he has been known here as an upright, honest man, a man true to his country and true to his principles. Though he was not a very talkative man, his judgment was sound. I regret his death exceedingly. It occurred at a time when the Senate, as a body, could not be notified of the fact, or at what hour of the day the remains would be taken away. Consequently, we could not display the respect that we would like to have shown to his memory. At any rate, in his own country, his memory will be treated with that same respect that he always commanded there during his lifetime.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. READ, from the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate, presented their fourth report and moved that it be adopted presently. He said: As the House directed, the postmaster's salary is increased by $100. Another clause of the report has been amended by recommending that the amount paid by Gagnon into the superannuation fund be restored to him. There is also a recommendation that the waste paper of the Senate be disposed of in the same manner as is done in the House of Commons. There is also a slight change in the 19th clause.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The power of suspension recommended by the report is too arbitrary. It gives absolute power to suspend an official without cause.

Hon. Mr. READ—I think the officer then could be brought to account.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I observe that the recommendation of the committee in relation to the salary of the postmaster has not been embodied in the report. The object for which the report was referred back to the committee is stated, but the recommendation does not appear in the report itself.

Hon. Mr. READ—It was intended that it should, and the omission being simply a clerical error, I now move, with the permission of the House, that it be corrected at the Table.

The motion was agreed to and the report, as amended, was adopted.

LAND IN THE TERRITORIES BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (HH) "An Act to consolidate and amend the Act respecting land in the Territories."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 87,

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This clause was allowed to stand at the request of the hon. leader of the Opposition. The officers of the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice conclude that it would be better not to alter clause 89 as it now stands. During recess it is intended to communicate the effect of the discussion to the judges and the profession in the North-west Territories, and if it should be thought expedient to ask for additional legislation next year.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 92,

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. member from Calgary stated that the effect of the sub-clause would be to place settlers, who have brought their lands under the operation of the Act, in a less advantageous position than those who have not. It is true that all but a very trifling portion of the land in the North-west is under the operation of the Act, either as a consequence of the action on the part of the owners to bring it under its operation, or still more largely because such a considerable proportion of the land has been patented since the Torrens system came into force. Still, there is no doubt a great deal in the contention of the hon. member, and it has been resolved to strike out sub-clause 3 if it is approved by the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES IRRIGATION BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (124) "An Act respecting the utilization of the waters of the North-west Territories for irrigation and other purposes."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I may state to the House that the principle of this bill is set forth in four or five clauses of it, and after we have gone through them, hon. members will see that the principle laid down there is quite simple in its character, and will give the House no trouble at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a bill entirely new to members of this House, and has an important bearing on the future of the North-west. While it is desirable that every facility should be given for irrigation, still the principle is one that may be attended with very great danger to private rights. where large corporations obtain power to use the waters of that country for irrigation.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Their rights are preserved.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would ask the hon. minister to allow subsection (d) of this clause to stand. I think when read in connection with subsequent clauses of the measure, it will be noticed that it is hardly applicable. It may have to be enlarged somewhat.

The subclause was allowed to stand.

On the 4th clause,

Hon Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this clause, but I have some hesitation in voting to provide that the right to use any water which may be in a swamp, for instance, shall be vested in the Crown. If a man gets a grant of land in which there is a swamp, and he proceeds to drain the swamp and make the land tillable, he is doing good work and should not be interfered with by the Crown or any one else. One can see the point as to streams, water-courses, lakes and lagoons, but as to a swamp I have grave doubts.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is guarded.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I rise to support the observation of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. The rights of the owners of these farms in the North-west should be guarded.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I wish to make it quite clear to the House that this bill has no retroactive effect, that any concession already made of a swamp will not be affected by this bill at all; it is only in the future that the Crown, in making a grant of land, will make the necessary reservation. At present, under the grants made by the Crown, the riparian owner, if the water is not navigable, owns it to the middle of the stream; that is for the past. No legislation should affect that, nor does this bill intend to do so, but in the future the policy of the Government is to reserve such water for the general public, so that they may be in a position to deal with it and to grant the necessary license to corporations formed for the purpose of utilizing that water for the general good of all. It cannot affect any acquired rights.

Hon. Mr LOUGHEED—I would point out to my hon. friend from St. Boniface that there is a reservation made here expressly that it shall only affect those lands the title of which is vested in the Crown.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Even with those explanations, I am afraid this clause will have a bad effect Those who have experience in the North-west know what it means.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—When the hon. gentleman has gone through the bill I think he will be satisfied that all necessary precautions are being taken, and no detriment can arise to anybody under this legislation. As to the safety of the works, the plans have got to be submitted and approved. For expropriation the principles that are followed in building a railway are adopted in this bill, so that no possible injustice can be done if the bill is accepted.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No injustice can be done to an individual, but if that policy were adopted it might put into the hands of companies very important powers which will eventually be a drawback to colonization and injurious to the settlers generally.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, I wish the hon. gentleman to be satisfied upon that point. We have heard so much about the freight rates in the past that this bill has been framed to avoid any similar difficulty. There is a clause in this bill which provides that the tariff upon which the water shall be distributed to the public shall be regulated from time to time upon application to the Governor in Council, so that there will be no fixed and permanent tariff under those licenses; it shall be revised from time to time at the request of those interested, so that upon that point I hope there will be no trouble.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I may inform my hon. friend from St. Boniface that this bill, when in galley, was distributed largely throughout the North-west. Conventions were held of the settlers throughout the western portion of the Territories where the bill would be peculiarly applicable, and this bill was in whole adopted at those conventions. As far as I am aware not a dissenting voice had been raised to the principle of the bill or to the particulars of the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—From my reading of the bill I do not draw the inference that swamp or marsh land that would be capable of cultivation by drainage are in any way covered by this bill. The marsh or swamp land referred to in this bill are such lands as hold some very considerable body of water and which could not be utilized at all for farming purposes. "Use and diversion" would not cover the drainage of the land simply for the purpose of converting it into agricultural ground. It is the fear that lands that might ultimately become agricultural lands by drainage will be included in this bill, which apparently has created the fear that my hon. friend from St. Boniface expresses.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—As explained by the hon. leader of the Opposition the clause would be less objectionable if such lands were excluded. I want to point out that the marsh, as it is put generally there, may apply to some marshes where hay is made. In the North-west, as in the province of Manitoba, the natural hay, which is about the only hay we can get, is made generally on those marshes, and if those places are put in the hands of irrigation companies the settlers in the vicinity of them may be unable to cut hay.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the hon. gentleman object to the Crown dealing in marsh lands now vested in them, and would he prevent the Crown from disposing of them to any person?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I do not object to the Crown lands being used in that way, but I have certainly a right, if I think this bill will work injuriously against any class of people, to object to such a provision.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I am quite sure the hon. member from St. Boniface will be reconciled to this bill when he knows the object in view. If there are marsh lands used for meadows, they belong to the settler or they belong to the Crown. If they belong to the settler to-day, they will not be affected by this measure at all. If they belong to the Crown, they can be acquired by the settler if he chooses to pay the price for them, and if the land is of such a nature that it can be cultivated, the Crown would raise no difficulty in making a grant of it as agricultural land. If it is vested in the Crown and the Crown sees that it is submerged in such a way that it cannot be made available for agricultural purposes, then the Crown has a right, in making grants of the adjoining pieces of ground to reserve that portion, which portion shall then be utilized for irrigating the whole district.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I have not seen the bill; it is novel legislation to me, and does not affect us in our Lower Provinces, but I presume any damage done to land by damming up the water will be fully compensated for under the provisions of the bill.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Certainly; all principles which apply to public works constructed by corporations are applicable to this bill. The principles that govern the building of railways are applied to irrigation under this bill; and moreover, all the plans of work to be erected have to be approved of. It must be shown that they are safe and sufficient, and will not cause loss or any serious accident.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand it, the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface is not raising any objection to the plans, or the sufficiency of the works to be undertaken by any company. The hon. gentleman's objection, as I understand it, is this—he says after the passing of this Act it will be impossible for any settler to get, by grant from the Crown, swamp or marsh land. If a settler were to attempt to acquire, for instance, a tract of land a portion of which happens to be marsh, and on which marsh hay grows, the Crown will not be allowed to make him a grant of the marsh. That is rather a serious matter in a country like the North-west Territories. I wish to call attention to the 6th clause which I think would prevent the Crown from making a grant to any settler under those circumstances. It is as follows:—

> After the passing of this Act, no right to the permanent diversion or to the exclusive use of the water in any river, stream, watercourse, lake, creek, ravine, cañon, lagoon, swamp, marsh or other body of water, shall be acquired by any riparian owner or any other person by length of use or otherwise than as it may be acquired or conferred under the provisions of this Act.

"Diversion" would be diversion for drainage purposes, of course. I really do not see why the Government should want to take these swamp and marsh lands. There is no large stream of water to be got out of a swamp as a rule, and I think it would be better to strike out the words "swamp and marsh."

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Clause 6 provides that in future grants, the fact of a man being a riparian proprietor to a swamp, river, lake or lagoon, he will not acquire, as he did formerly, the right to the middle of the water. That is the meaning of it. You can only acquire it under the provisions of this bill; that is, by making a special application for it and obtaining a license if it is to be used for the purposes of irrigation, but the Crown will have, notwithstanding, the right to dispose of it, if it is not suitable for irrigation, as meadow lands for hay, etc.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out that it is very desirable for the proper operation of this bill that the Government should deal with swamp lands as indicated in the bill. Most of the swamp lands in the North-west Territories are to be found in large depressions of the prairie—they are basins which hold large quantities of water in the spring of the year. The retention of that water for the irrigation of the land in the vicinity is extremely desirable. It is of no use in those swamps whatever, and surely it is right that the settlers should have the opportunity of using the water that accumulates in those basins at the season of the year when it is most desirable that water should be used on the lands in question.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I wish to draw attention to another fact. As the hon. gentleman says, those swamps are overflowed in the spring. Within four or five weeks the whole of the water runs off. The intention is to keep back the water and to make reservoirs of those swamps, which are natural basins and any corporation incorporated for the purpose will build at the mouth of such a swamp or marsh or overflowed land a dyke to keep the water there for irrigation at a time of drought.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would make this suggestion: there are certain parts of the North-west Territories where undoubtedly it is very desirable that this measure should go into operation. There are other parts of the North-west Territories where this bill will never go into operation. It occurs to me that the difficulty would be got over if the Minister would insert somewhere in the bill a clause to the effect that the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, define the territory within which this bill is to operate. That would get over the whole of the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is really impracticable. Until the necessary surveys are made, surely it cannot be determined where this system should be in operation. My hon. friend may take it for granted that it is private capital that is to be invested in these works. Private capital is never solicitous to invest itself in irrigation undertakings where irrigation would be futile.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The objection of the hon. gentleman is met by the bill. Every company wishing to irrigate must obtain a license from the Government, so the Government in each case will be in a position to see whether irrigation is necessary or not. Nobody has any right to go of his own accord and undertake irrigation in any section. A company must first obtain a license to allow them to use the water of a lake or river for such a purpose. So, virtually, it will be put in force in every instance only after the Government has considered whether a license should be given or not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If this bill becomes law, will the Government have power to make a grant of land in any part of the North-west Territories which would convey to the grantee the same right that is now conveyed in grants to drain swamps and marshes? If this bill becomes law, can the Government make a grant which would give the grantee the right to drain a swamp or marsh, supposing it is a place where irrigation is not desirable?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not think clause 6 would debar the Crown from using for agricultural purposes a place which is called a swamp to-day, but which could be easily reclaimed for agricultural purposes.

The clause was adopted.

On section 8,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Clause 7 deals with undertakings that have already been assumed, or carried out, or partially carried out. Clause 8 contemplates undertakings which may hereafter be carried out and deals with the question of precedence. There should be a saving provision in the clause stating that it applies to all cases excepting those covered by clause 7. Clause 7 makes it obligatory that a license should be obtained within twelve months, and apparently does not provide for filing an application as in clause 8.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It deals with persons who already have licenses.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Clause 8 should make this exception, that an application should not take precedence, during the months ensuing from the time that this bill goes into operation, of one who has already started an undertaking.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The company that has already started work should use diligence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend will see that they have twelve months for coming in and asserting their rights. Having given them twelve months in the seventh clause it is inconsistent with that provision that the first applicant should have precedence, because some one may come in and make an application who has not started operations, and according to clause 8 that application will take precedence although twelve months is given to the party who has already started operations.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend from Calgary will see that clause 7 applies only to persons who now hold water rights. Clause 8 applies only to water, the property in which is vested in the Crown, so the two clauses do not clash at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend from Halifax may not understand the situation there. The application of clause 7, although it may not be drawn out exactly as it should to apply to the class to which I refer, intends to cover this class of cases: many persons, in anticipation of this bill being passed, have made ditches, and diverted the water from the streams on to their lands, and have expended large sums of money. It is intended that these people, who have carried out these undertakings, shall be preserved in the rights they already possess. The undertakings which they have already carried out are in contravention of the common law regarding riparian rights, because they have no right to tap those streams and affect the rights of riparian owners above or below them. Consequently, it is intended that clause 7 shall apply to that class of cases. Therefore, I say, it is inconsistent with clause 8.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think they should be given a delay to comply with the provisions of clause 7, but it is impossible to fix a delay in clause 8, becanse it deals with the future.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Section 7 deals with property vested in the Crown. You have already given twelve months in clause 7, and in clause 8 you provide that the applicant shall take precedence according to the date of application.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It appears to me the statement of the hon. gentleman from Halifax is quite clear. The two clauses relate to two distinct cases.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, there are persons in the North-west who, without authority, have already constructed works.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—That is mentioned in the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have twelve months under clause 7. What the hon. gentleman from Calgary means is this—clause 8 provides that future applications shall be dealt with in the order of priority. A person may apply for a territory covered by works which are not now authorized, and under clause 8 his application would have precedence. I do not think there is any possible fear of that, because notice must be given that a person is so applying.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—A person could easily show that he had commenced operations.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We might insert in clause 8 after "precedence" "except applications under section 7."

The amendment was accepted and the clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 12,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Should there not be some provision made that the plans in question should be certified by a competent engineer? The word "engineer" is used, but it should be in every case a competent engineer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would be an unwise provision to require that the engineer who makes the plan should always be a properly qualified civil engineer.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The plans have to be verified here.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This measure contemplates the existence of companies who propose selling water, and the question is whether this is applicable to companies that do not propose to sell water, but simply to use it for their own exclusive purposes.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think all companies should be bound to sell water; it is not an element that any company should have a monopoly over; it would be a great grievance if such a monopoly was established.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I perfectly agree with my hon. friend as to the desirability of that, but there may be a small stream in the vicinity of a company's or an individual's farm which it might be desirable to divert for the use of the property. The question is, does clause 12 contemplate that, and if it does not, what shall a private individual or a company requiring it for irrigation purposes do?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I will make a note of it and refer to the matter again.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 29,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why is power given to discriminate for four years?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It may be good policy both for the company and for the consumer to permit discrimination in the price of water for a reasonable time. By offering water at a low price, many will be persuaded to use it who otherwise might not. The experiment will teach them the value of it. The delegates from the North-west endorsed the principle of giving a discrimination for the first four years of the existence of a company's works, so as to teach the people the benefit of irrigation. To a certain extent, they might give them free water if they chose.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.), from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the bill and asked leave to sit again.

CULLERS' ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (124) "An Act further to amend the Cullers' Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This bill is for the purpose of striking out of the present law the words "or counted" which was left in by mistake.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is difficult to understand what the meaning of this is. I know what the change is, but the existing law is not as intelligible as it should be.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATORS FLINT AND GLAZIER.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL.—Before moving the adjournment of the House I should like to refer to a matter in connection with the death of two of our oldest senators during this session of parliament. I find that, looking at precedents, the funeral expenses of senators dying during the sitting of the House have been paid by the Contingent Accounts Committee of the Senate. It would only be a gracious act, when we consider that the two colleagues who have passed away this session were two of the oldest members of the House, and for other reasons which I do not think it at all necessary to refer to, if the House would concur in the suggestion that I have made. The Contingent Accounts Committee will act in accordance with its wishes. I have taken this means of bringing up the matter because it places it upon record and makes an additional precedent to two others to which I shall refer in a moment, and should the House concur in the suggestion which I have made it will be a matter on record, and it will place the Auditor General in a position not to object to the payment. I need scarcely say to you, who have watched the keenness with which the Auditor General investigates all accounts, that he keeps a close watch on all expenditures. I find no fault with him for doing so; on the contrary, he being a parliamentary officer and not a Government official, it is his duty to make thorough and rigid investigation into all expenditures made by either House or by the Government, and assure himself that there is authority for each expenditure. I find that in the case of the Hon. Mr. Burnham, the funeral expenses were paid by the Senate, and also the case of Mr. Churchill, as far back as 1874, both of whom I believe died while attending to their official duties. In the one case the bill was $83, and in the other $175. I felt that it is only right, under the circumstances, as a matter of courtesy and of respect to those departed, to bring this question under the notice of the Senate, and with the conviction that the members who have known the departed gentlemen will concur in the views which I have expressed.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—Should not a limit be fixed beyond which expenses should not go?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—My intention was simply to include the funeral expenses in Ottawa; that would be simply the undertaker's bill, and the cab-hire going to the station, and would not include any hotel bill.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—In the two accounts mentioned, one is double the other. If that be permitted in one case, why may it not be increased to any extent?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is quite correct in the statement he has made. I have no objection to limit it in any way the Senate thinks proper. The first item reads:

Amount paid undertaker for the funeral expenses of the Hon. Mr. Burnham, $83.

That would include, I think, the casket, and probably transportation from Ottawa to Cobourg, where he lived. The other is:

Amount of expenses of funeral of the late Hon. Mr. Churchill, cab hire, $42; messenger to Prescott with remains, $8.50.

I suppose he had no friends, and they had to send a messenger. The undertaker's bill was placed at $125.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think there is no difference of opinion in the House as to the desirability of adopting the suggestion of the hon. leader of the House; but I would suggest that it would be better to pass a resolution in the House rather than refer the matter to the committee, because there may be some difficulty in getting a quorum of the Contingent Accounts Committee, and if the matter were referred to the committee they would simply report back and the House would adopt the report. It is just as well that the House should move directly, because the committee will not have the details in time to submit to the House.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I thank the hon. gentleman for the suggestion he has made, and I therefore move:

That the expenses attending the funerals in Ottawa of the Hon. Messrs. Flint and Glazier, who died while in attendance upon their Parliamentary duties, be paid by the Clerk of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a statement showing in detail the several sums paid for public printing for the year ending 30th June, 1883, and 30th June, 1893, respectively.

He said: This motion is one which I presume will be concurred in without any hesitation. For a great many years the printing of this House was done by contractors. Some few years ago a change was made, and the printing of Parliament, and the public printing generally, was transferred to the Printing Bureau. I think it will be the unanimous feeling of the House that the work has not been done any more satisfactorily under the new state of things than it was under the old. I do not raise any question as to the quality of the work; there is no fault to be found with that, but we have had, during the present session, on various occasions, difficulty with respect to proceeding with our work promptly owing to the fact of delay in printing bills and other documents. The printing is not done now nearly as promptly as when the work was done by contractors, so that unless the country is saving something by the present method of doing the public printing, it will be desirable to return to the old system of doing the work. I have no doubt that if the plant which is in the hands of the government, were placed at the disposal of contractors, a contract could be entered into at a very reasonable figure for the public printing. It is desirable, therefore, to ascertain whether any saving has been effected by the present method of doing the printing, and the object of my resolution is to obtain information on that subject. The return, which I hope will be here at the beginning of next session, will enable the House to judge whether the printing is now being done more economically than before the introduction of the present system, and the House will then be in a position to decide whether it is desirable that Parliament should return to the former method of doing the public printing.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (71) "An Act to incorporate the New York, New England and Canada Company."—(Mr. Power.)

Bill (131) "An Act to incorporate the Nova Scotia Steel Company (Limited.")—(Mr. Power.)

PETROLEUM INSPECTION ACT.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (122) "An Act further to amend the Petroleum Inspection Act."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the Minister should have given us some reason for passing this bill. I find the first clause of the bill provides for the lowering of the oil tests. The first clause of the bill substitutes for paragraph a of section 3 of the Petroleum Inspection Act, chapter 102 of the Revised Statutes, the following :—

(a.) If, at a lower temperature than eighty-five degrees by Fahrenheit's thermometer, when tested by the pyrometer described in the schedule to this Act, it emits a vapour that will flash.

The existing limit is 90 degrees. We know that 85 degrees is a very common temperature and it seems to me that the lowering of the temperature will render the oil much less safe to use than it is under the present regulations. The Minister should have established, in such a way as to satisfy the House, that there will not be any increase of danger by the lowering of the standard.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It strikes me it is the very reverse.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No. The high test of 95, it is alleged, causes the escape of all the best properties of the oil, and makes it so heavy that it encrusts the wick with carbon and tends to heat the vapour from the oil while it prevents the escape of the heated vapour. Now it is said we are making too large a reduction by reducing it from 90 to 85. The test in New York State and Pennsylvania is 73 and it is thought there to be safe enough. We do not hear of accidents occurring from this low grade, consequently we made it 85, convinced that it will offer no great danger.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Has there been any fault found with the former test of the oil?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Just what I have mentioned, that the best burning qualities escape.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I wanted to know if there was any fault found with it, because I burn a great deal of oil in my house and I find the very best oil we get from New York is satisfactory. That is under the present law and the present test, and I should be very sorry to see it altered. I think it is most satisfactory and safe. I have been burning it for five or six years and have never had any fault to find. We had the same test and got the same quality of oil, and unless some great objection has been offered by competent experts, I think it a pity that the law should be changed.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The very oil that the hon. gentleman uses in his house is only tested at 73 in the state of New York.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What has that to do with us as long as our test is satisfactory?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If their oil is allowed and tested at 73, reducing it to 85 here will offer less danger.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—We have been using that oil for six or seven years under the existing test in this climate, and we have found it satisfactory. I do not think it should be altered now, without some specific cause that I have never heard of. The climate of New York has nothing to do with us. We have been using this quality of oil under this test, and I say again that we have never found any fault with it, but on the contrary found it safe and of good quality.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There has been no complaint from the consumer because the oil was unsafe, and we intend to keep it safe yet.

But the producer says: "You force me to extract the best burning qualities of the oil;" that is a sufficient reason, keeping in view the safety of the public, for reducing it to 85.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—But what have we to do with United States test or atmosphere?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We have no objections to the lower grade of United States oil. It is only our own oil.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am rather struck by the statement made by the Minister who says that the producers are afraid that, under the existing test, some of the most valuable qualities disappear and that the oil does not burn as long as it will under a lower test.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman said the illuminating properties of the oil were eliminated much more speedily under the high test than they will be under the new test. Then I understand his statement to be that the manufacturers of this oil wish to give us an oil which will burn longer than that which we have now. I have nothing to say against the patriotism of the gentlemen who produce oil in this country, but I shall be very slow to believe, if this bill is introduced at their instigation, that their motive is that we shall consume less oil than we have been consuming. That is one of those stories which might be told to a body known as the Horse Marines, but which would hardly be believed here. I have not a very distinct recollection, but I can remember that when the measure which is now on the statute-book was passing through this House, the gentleman in charge of the bill at that time contended that we should adopt this high standard because it was safe and because we would be making our oil so much safer than the oil used in the United States, and I cannot understand why, without any complaint from the consumers in this country, the Government now propose to retrace their steps and give us an oil which will not possess the quality of safety, which was spoken of, in nearly so high a degree as the oil which we are now using.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The explanations given by the hon. leader of the House are, to my mind, eminently satisfactory. I consider them the more so, because I have observed the very condition that he describes. He states that the wick of the lamp becomes converted into a solid mass of carbon, and thereby the valuable properties of the oil are not brought forth. The heat is concentrated on the oil, and thereby increases the danger of explosion. By lowering this test the high illuminating properties of the oil are retained and allowed to pass off in combustion. Consequently, the oil is better, and there is greater safety to those using it, because the heat will not pass to the lamp.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—We have not had an accident under the present test. No fault has been found. Those who use the oil are satisfied, and why should we have a law of this kind? I do not accuse the Minister of Agriculture of bringing in a measure which will be unsatisfactory to the country, but I have no confidence whatever in the men who run this Excise Department. They are perpetually annoying the country by bringing in useless bills. The people do not want this continual annoyance from these men, who do it more to show their importance than for any other reason. The oil that we have been using in this country for seven years has been perfectly satisfactory. We found great trouble in getting the standard of oil to where it is now, but having got it, we want to retain it. We import our oil from the United States; we have no regard for the Canadian oil, because it cannot be used as a first class illuminating oil. It is a waste of time for people behind the Minister's back to bring in bills here that nobody understands—I doubt if they understand them themselves. They come here simply to make alterations and amendments every year which are very annoying to the public, and which are of no possible use to the trade or benefit to the community.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I must thank the hon. gentleman for expressing his confidence in me personally, but I must at the same time ask him to extend that confidence to the people who stand at my back. Those who are in charge of this measure are not officers of the Customs, against whom he seems to have some grievance.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I said the Excise officers.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This is a bill which comes from the Inland Revenue Department.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—That is the department I mean.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The explanation, I think, is sufficient to induce the House to accept the bill : it only refers to oil used for domestic purposes and it has not been pressed on the government in any way by the oil producers. What I said was that representations might have come from that direction.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read second time.

PROVINCIAL JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (155) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Judges of Provincial Courts." He said: When the management of the administration of justice in the province of Quebec was under the control of the Hon. Mr. Mercier, he amended the law relating to the appointment of the acting Chief Justice, when that official happened to reside in Montreal or when he happened to reside in Quebec, by stating that the judge who should discharge those duties should be a judge appointed by the competent authorities. It has been found necessary, in consequence, to make the Dominion Statutes read in the same way as the local statutes, emanating from the power which has the sole right to constitute the court. The second paragraph is to provide the salary of an additional judge for British Columbia.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

MONTREAL PARK AND ISLAND RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (68) "An Act respecting the Montreal Park and Railway Company."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE moved that the 41st rule be suspended and that the bill be read the second time presently. He said: This bill met with considerable opposition in the other House, but that opposition is all over now, and as the Railway Committee will meet to-morrow, I should like to have the bill pass its second reading now and be referred to the committee without delay.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is true that the opposition is over in the House of Commons, but that is because the bill has left that House. One of the last things done with the bill there was to increase the company's possible capital from half a million to a million dollars. The bill originally provided that the capital should be $1,000,000, and after a long discussion in the Railway Committee the capital was fixed at $500,000, that being the limit in the original charter granted by the Provincial Legislature. At the third reading of the bill the capital was increased to a million dollars, notwithstanding the fact that a majority of the committee had been opposed to such an increase. Therefore I do not think the hon. gentleman is quite correct in saying that all parties are agreed about this bill. Giving the company power to double their capital is a very undesirable thing indeed. I do not know that I shall oppose the hon. gentleman's motion, because the committee of this House can deal with the bill.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Anything that the hon. gentleman has said does not controvert my statement. There is no opposition to the bill now. Within the last hour the solicitor of the company, Mr. Ferguson, told me himself that they had withdrawn all opposition. I can say from personal knowledge that it will take at least a million dollars to complete the works that they are carrying on at the present moment—constructing a line round the mountain to the park and to Lachine—if a million dollars will do it. I took pains to ascertain, both from Mr. Girouard and from the solicitor of the company, that everything was all right before I undertook to move the second reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

Bill (138) "An Act to incorporate the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (100) "An Act to incorporate the French River Boom Company, Limited."—(Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (82) "An Act respecting the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company and the London and Port Stanley Railway Company."—(Mr. MacInnes—Burlington.)

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday July 12th, 1894

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

MONTREAL PARK AND ISLAND RAILWAY CO'S. BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (68) "An Act respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company," with certain amendments. He said: The first amendment is in clause 3 relating to the capital stock, with the right to increase it to $1,000,000. It read originally "when a majority of shareholders shall so decide," and the committee made it, "when the majority in value of the shareholders shall so decide." Then in clause 6 the annual meeting of the shareholders was fixed for the 1st December; at the request of the promoters of the bill it was made 3rd December, and the shareholders were reduced from 75. In the 16th clause it originally read "The Montreal Park and Island Railway Company, and the Montreal City Passenger Railway Company may enter into an agreement." It was pointed out that we had no jurisdiction over the Montreal Street Passenger Railway, and therefore the clause was altered so as to read "The Montreal Park and Island Railway Company may enter into an agreement with the Montreal Street Passenger Railway." These are the only amendments.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was then read the third time and passed.

ATLANTIC AND LAKE SUPERIOR RAILWAY COMPANY.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (73) "An Act respecting the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company," with an amendment. He said: The amendment is in clause 4, where power is given to the company to issue one-fourth of its capital stock as preferred stock, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by the shareholders of the company at a general meeting called for the purpose, and the committee have thought fit to add "at which meeting at least two-thirds in value of the shareholders are present in person or represented by proxy."

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE moved concurrence in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to and the bill as amended was then read the third time and passed.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the government if it is their intention to ask Parliament to pass an address to Her Majesty the Queen, on the occasion of the birth of the son of the Duke of York?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have to inform the House that it is the intention of the government to ask Parliament to pass an address on the occasion of the birth of the son of the Duke of York. I may also state that the Government through His Excellency, have already expressed to the Queen and to the Duke of York, their congratulations upon the happy event.

INSPECTION OF ELECTRIC LIGHT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (118) "An Act respecting Inspection of Electric Light." He said: I do not intend to refer this bill to a Committee of the Whole before Monday, and I shall then be in a position to give to the House the necessary explanation.

Hon Mr. SCOTT—I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this bill, because I doubt whether any of us is capable of analysing and expressing any intelligent opinion upon the bill. It is one which is purely a matter for experts. I simply rise to call the attention of the House to the fact that so many important bills are being introduced at the end of the fourth month of the session. For the first three months this House devoted very considerable time to the Insolvency Bill, as we supposed perfecting that, and we find all our labour on that subject is practically lost so far as this session is concerned, because it is quite evident that the bill is not to go through the present year. No doubt it will be all discussed and probably a very considerable number of changes made in the coming year, but it is not treating Parliament fairly that the Government should wait until the very end of the session before introducing so many important measures. I was just running my eye over some of the bills that have been brought down at the very end of the session, which might just as well have been considered at an earlier period when we could have given them a thorough examination and perhaps considerably improved them. There is the Audit Act, the Act amending the Criminal Code, the Fisheries Act, the Post Office Act, the Act relating to Judges of Provincial Courts, the Civil Service Act, Petroleum Inspection Act, the Indian Act, Inspection of Electric Lights, which is now before us, Fraudulent Marking, the Irrigation Bill, which is exceedingly important. We pass the clauses in this House, just reading the marginal notes, and not giving the bill that consideration which a measure of its importance demands. Then there is the bill relating to Lands in the Territories, the bill relating to Masters and Mates, Refuge for Females in Ontario, North-west Mounted Police Act, Steamboat Inspection Act, and a variety of others, all introduced in the last week or two of the session—since the 1st of July at any rate. My hon. friend shakes his head, not as denying the fact, I am sure, but as pleading that it will not be done again. It has been repeated year after year. It seems to have been the policy of the Government that the important measures which we desire to push through Parliament were kept back until the House was wearied with legislation. The country has ceased to take any interest in what is going on in Parliament, and the debates are not now read, and the public take no interest in the proceedings of Parliament at the present time. We have present now, I suppose, not more than one-fourth of the ordinary number of Senators, only twenty odd members. We see that the majority of seats are vacant and yet we are called upon to dispose of this important legislation. There is really no excuse for it, because many of those bills are prepared, in fact all of them, in the departments, and the officers ought to be told that if they desire any changes in the laws affecting the various branches of the Government, the bills ought to be prepared before the session commences. Of course we have a perfect illustration of it in the Tariff Bill. That measure has not come to us yet. I suppose it will come to us about the time the guns are firing when His Excellency is coming to give his assent to the bills. I notice by the papers that changes are being made in the tariff still. Notice was given a day or two ago of considerable changes. We had hoped, and it was semi-officially announced, that Parliament would rise this week, but we are told now that it will not rise for some days—probably not before the end of the week. It is certainly an easy matter for the Government to adopt the principle that general measures that have to be brought before Parliament ought to be prepared in the recess, so that they can be introduced at an early period of the session when members are fresh and active and prepared to take a lively interest in legislation, and not at the very fag end of the session when everybody is tired and the great majority of members have left for their homes.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I am surprised at the remarks of the leader of the Opposition upon this point. He would give the House to understand that we have been kept idle until to-day. As to the work that has been done by the Senate in relation to the Insolvency Act, it is most useful, and if the bill is not passed this session in the House it will be useful for next session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—As to bringing all the legislation in the last few days of the session, the hon. gentleman has read a long list. To show how inaccurate that statement is, it is sufficient for me to point out a single instance among the bills that he has referred to as coming late in the session. There are bills in that list which were initiated and passed by the Senate, such as the Indian Act. That was a Senate bill, and it comes back to us now, amended very slightly from the Commons. As to the bill in relation to the post office, any member who has read it will see that it is legislation that might come at the very last hour. What is the object of it? To allow publishers of newspapers to circulate free, as they do to-day, their bills to subscribers, invitations to subscribe to the paper including an envelope with printed addresses. The bill referring to the provincial courts, it is simply a bill of two clauses, one of which is to amend the Dominion law, so as to make it coincide with the local law of the province of Quebec, and the other clause to provide for the salary of an additional judge in British Columbia. Surely those are not matters that will take the House by surprise, or which warrant the hon. gentleman in charging the Government with wishing to impose upon the House legislation at the very last moment so that they would not be able to consider it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I named 21, I think. I could name many more.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I did not refer to them all, but a number of those bills were initiated by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—There is no doubt that in the past we have had reason to complain of the action of the Government in bringing up important measures at the end of the session when it was almost impossible to give them due consideration. It is on record that this House on one occasion showed its sense of such treatment by refusing even to consider a very important bill which was brought up within the last few days of the session, but I really do not think my hon. friend from Ottawa is altogether fair in the criticism he has uttered with respect to the course of the Government in this particular session, because this year the Senate has reason to feel satisfied that several government measures were first introduced in this House and in ample time to consider them fully. With regard to this very bill to which my hon. friend has referred specially, the Irrigation Bill, I presume if any hon. gentleman had desired to have every one of these clauses read at length, it would have been done at once. There was no special hurry used in passing this bill through the chamber in any way, but I fancy that the majority of the members felt themselves in the same position that I was in, that it was a subject with which they were not very intimately acquainted, and as I noticed that several hon. gentlemen, like my hon. friend from Calgary, appeared to be keeping a watchful eye on the bill and suggested desirable alterations in various clauses, I for one did not consider it necessary to have all the clauses read at length, I do not think therefore that it can be said that this bill was hurried through because it happened to come to us towards the close of the session, and there are other measures which it is impossible to avoid bringing in at a late hour. However, on the whole, I feel that I can congratulate the Government on the fact that they have done better this year than formerly, and I would express the earnest hope that in future they will do the same and give us a fair share of the work by initiating Government bills in this House which may be considered here much more thoroughly (if they are introduced early,) than they are likely to be in the House of Commons. There is one other point which I may advert to and that is this: with reference to the sessions of Parliament. The late period of the year at which they are held is not only inconvenient but the length of time to which they are prolonged is becoming such a burden that by-and-by all, except gentlemen who make politics a profession, will find it so inconvenient that they will prefer to abandon parliamentary life altogether. If the session began not later than the middle of January, it would be at a time of year when almost every gentleman, no matter what his particular pursuit may be, whether lawyer, merchant or farmer, could attend here with much less inconvenience and, I venture to say, discharge his duties more efficiently, because undoubtedly when a man feels he is being kept here for a great length of time and at a period of the year extremely inconvenient to him, he would be very much disposed to hurry through the work instead of giving it careful and proper consideration.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is premature to introduce the bill that is now before us. As we all know, electricity is in its infancy, and no such bill has been introduced in England, Germany or the United States where we know electricity is far more advanced. The bill, I suppose, has been framed with the object of rendering some service, but it has come from the Inland Revenue Department —a department noted for bringing in experimental legislation—and I do not think it should be proceeded with. A number of the clauses of that bill require considerable amendment, and we need competent men to carry out the provisions of the Act. We have not those men in the country at the present time and I question whether there are men in the States who would undertake it. We have not arrived at the stage yet to deal with this matter. I think it would be far better to withdraw the bill this year and get the information at the next session of Parliament, and then we will be able to give the subject full and fair consideration. It would be advisable, under all the circumstances, that this bill should be dropped until next session.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—In answer to the hon. gentleman from Rideau Division, who advises the withdrawal of the bill on the ground that next year the Government will have more information, I may tell him that his advice is premature. He does not know what amount of information the Government have about it. I did not give any, but on Monday, if I move the House into Committee of the Whole on this bill, I shall give explanations, which I hope will satisfy the House. If they do not satisfy the House, then we can dispose of the measure accordingly. As to the principle involved in this bill, it is simply the inspection of meters that measure out electricity to consumers, the same way that there is inspection of meters that measure out gas to consumers. I trust the House will accept the second reading of the bill without any further explanation, with the understanding that in Committee of the Whole I shall give full explanations.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As the hon. Minister in charge of the bill has said that he will give the necessary explanations when he moves the House into Committee of the Whole, and also that the House will then be as perfectly at liberty to reject the measure as at the second reading, there is no object in voting against the second reading of the bill. I do not suppose that the hon. gentleman from Rideau division proposes to divide the House on the motion for the second reading to-day. As far as my own information goes, I am disposed to concur with the hon. gentlemen from Rideau, although I am not very strong on the point. If they have not reached a state in England, where a great deal of care is taken in dealing with matters of this kind, when they are prepared to introduce a measure similar to this, we might wait a little longer, unless the Government are able to show that abuses have arisen under the present system, and that there is a crying demand from consumers of electricity for inspection. If the public were suffering, then it would be the duty of the Government to introduce some measure to give them relief. With respect to the matter referred to by the hon. leader of the Opposition, I wish to say at the outset that I concur in what was said by the hon. gentleman from York, who expressed his regret at the fact that Parliament has been summoned so late in the year that the work of the session could not be done when it should be done, and members must remain here at a time of the year when business men wish to be at home. I cordially endorse what the hon. gentleman has said to the effect that if this system, which has been in operation now for some years, be continued, of summoning Parliament together at irregular and inconvenient dates, in a little while only two classes of men will be able to come to Parliament—gentlemen who are the possessors of large fortunes and who are not called upon to do any business in order to make a living, and the kind of men who expect to make a living out of politics. It would be most undesirable that the men who are really carrying on the business of the country and who are in touch with and whose interests are the same as those of business men of the Dominion, should be excluded from Parliament, but that result will follow from a continuation of the system which prevails now. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa, although he may have been in error as to one or two of the measures which he mentioned, was substantially correct as to the great bulk of them. When Parliament was summoned for the middle of March, about two months later than it met last year, the various departments should have had their measures ready to submit at the opening of the session; instead of that, these measure have been introduced in both Houses during the past few days. That is a highly objectionable condition of things and shows that the Government have been derelict in their duty to the public and to Parliament.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not know any session in which the work was so well prepared in advance of the meeting of the House as this session. The Government were ready with a large number of their bills, including the tariff bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not through yet.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That is not the fault of the Government. They submitted it early. It is an extensive bill, covering every branch of trade and industry, and it took a large amount of time, largely through the opposition in the Lower House. The Government brought down their bills more rapidly at the opening of the House this session than in any other session that I have known for a long time. As far as the Senate is concerned, we have had more than the usual share of work, and it is all due to the indefatigable industry of the two leaders of the House. I quite agree that this House should have even more work than we have had this session. We are prepared and able to do more work than we have had submitted to us and to do it well. I agree that it would be desirable to have Parliament assemble at an earlier period of the year. No doubt members representing various branches of trade and industry, though largely interested in legislation do not feel equal to being here at this season of the year when their presence is needed at home. It has not occurred often—only four or five times since I have been here—that we have had sessions so late in the summer. I hope it will not occur again. From the intimation given in another place, I think the next session will open early in the year.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—What is the date?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I heard it stated that it might meet within 6 months of this time. Certainly a late meeting of Parliament is injurious to all who are interested in the business of the country and should be denounced whenever it cannot be justified by the Government.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The session of 1893 began on the 27th of January, an earlier date than ever since Confederation, and it closed in April following. The present session was called late, but the House is fully informed of the circumstance under which Parliament had to be convened so late as the middle of March. The reason has been considered a good and sufficient one. As to the legislation in this House to which reference has been made, the Irrigation Bill was originally introduced in the House of Commons. We cannot control the date at which they send us their bills. They are the masters of their own legislation, and if there is delay in putting a Government bill through, it is not due to the Government as a rule, but to the Opposition, who perhaps prolong unduly the debate upon it. As to the tariff not being here yet, it is the Opposition that have absorbed four months of the time of the House in discussing it. I do not say that those speeches were useless, but upon every item of the tariff they had a very prolonged discussion, and therefore it has not reached this House as yet. We are told that the Irrigation Bill was pressed through this House too fast. It was a very simple bill. There were five clauses in it that involved the whole principle of the bill, to determine who should be in future the owner of the water, how it should be disposed of, and how companies could, for the general good of the country, erect works. After those five clauses had been accepted by the House, the remainder of the bill merely provided machinery for the operation of the Act. The details of it are known to every one here, and to the country at large. They are the principles on which railway companies are organized, and on which they expropriate property—the approval of the plans, the regulation of the tariff for the distribution of water, &c.—surely there can be no grievance that such a bill went through in three days. The bill was not hurried through the House unduly when we took three days to consider it.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The more this subject is discussed, the more convinced must every unbiassed member of this House —and I suppose they are all unbiassed—of the truthfulness of the statement made by the hon. members from Ottawa and Halifax. The hon. leader of the Government has endeavoured to explain why we are in session up to the present time. He did not tell the House why Parliament was not called together in January, as it should have been, but called on the 15th March. When we should have been about through with the work of the session, Parliament was convened. There is no justification for this act of the Government—the hon. gentleman may shake his head, he is at home here and does not feel the great loss and inconvenience and hardship entailed on members who live a long distance away from the seat of government. I say it was inexcusable, and no attempt has been made by the leader of this House, or the leader of the other House, as far as I am aware, to explain why the meeting of Parliament was postponed until the 15th of March. A few years ago it was stated that a certain political element in this country were always looking to Washington for their policy, but it can be more than insinuated that the present Government had been looking to Washington for their policy for two or three months before they convened Parliament.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I do not think that the Government have been doing anything wrong, but I say it was unfair for them to charge the Opposition, as they have time and again been doing, of looking to Washington for their policy when it was an undoubted fact, which every one here must know, that the reason the Government did not convene Parliament in January, as it did in former years, was simply because they were waiting to learn the result of the Wilson bill in Washington. It was generally understood, from one end of the country to the other, and I do not blame the Government for it, but I think they ought to be honest enough to acknowledge it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That was not the cause at all, and I cannot acknowledge it.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I suppose the hon. gentleman is not in the witness box and will not acknowledge it. But speaking of the tariff, did not the Finance Minister and the Minister of Customs or the Controller of Customs and other members of the Government, including the hon. gentleman who leads the Senate to-day go from one end of the country to the other finding out the changes that were necessary to be made in the tariff?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Certainly, and that was the cause.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I recollect hearing his melodious voice in the North-west and other portions of the Dominion going through the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific for months and months before convening Parliament and they surely ought to have had time enough to consider and prepare a tariff, and once it was introduced in the House of Commons, and the Finance Minister made his budget speech, surely it ought to have been fixed for that year at least. On the contrary, it was left over from week to week, and delegations came here from different portions of the Dominion, wanting changes in various parts of the tariff, and consequently the bill has been postponed until the present time, and they are not through with it yet in the House of Commons. It is unfair to the Senate and to the country and to traders generally.

Once the policy of the Government was announced, it should have been fixed for a year at least. I hope Parliament will not be called together here again for a summer session. I hope the hon. gentleman and his colleagues will have a little more consideration, at least for those who have to come a long distance and not keep them here during the sweltering heat of the summer.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—The hon. gentleman from Victoria has himself furnished very good reasons why the Government have taken time to consider so important a measure as the tariff. He has told us how the hon. leader of the House accompanied by another Minister, went through the country, ascertaining the views and opinions of the public. That surely is a proper proceeding and not one to be criticised adversely. On the contrary, it is a proceeding worthy of all praise. With reference to the House being called at a late period, I do not know what the reasons were, not being in the secrets of the Government, but if the true reason has been mentioned by the hon. gentleman, it was a very meritorious one. The hon. gentlemen opposite are very jealous of having any one else quote United States precedents, excepting themselves. If the reason why the Ministers did not call Parliament together sooner was that they wanted to watch legislation in the United States on so important a subject as the tariff, they are not to be blamed. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond of pointing to the United States, and what is being done there. I have no objection to that. With reference to the speed with which legislation is conducted in this country, I think it will bear very favourable comparison with the manner in which legislation is carried on, not only in the United States, but in England also. Across the border they have been discussing the tariff for nearly six months, and they have not reached a conclusion yet. I do not know how much longer they will be.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—They are killing each other now in consequence of it.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—I do not know whether that is the reason. It appears to me the criticisms made against the Government on this occasion are entirely uncalled for—entirely wrong. As far as the legislation in this House is concerned, I think we have done our duty nobly this session. We are always prepared to do our duty whenever we have anything to do, but we have had plenty of work to do this session, and we have done it to the best of our ability. If the reason for putting off the calling of the session until the 15th of March was owing to what has taken place to the south of us, I think it is a very proper reason for postponing the session beyond the usual time. As far as the tariff in the House of Commons is concerned, of course the discussion has been a long one. We could not expect anything else. In that House there are gentlemen who are free traders, there are revenue reformers and protectionists, and it is to be expected, under these circumstances, that the session would be a long and tedious one. I think the discussion has been very ably conducted. I do not mean to say that the Opposition were wrong in discussing the tariff. It was their duty to do so. I do not assert that the session has been needlessly prolonged through the discussion of that tariff. The work has been important, and I think thorough.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The criticisms which have fallen from the Opposition with regard to the Government have been most unfair and ungenerous. With regard to the bills which have been brought down recently, none of them have been of such a very grave character as to require special consideration, and that they have suffered at all by being brought in at so late a period in the session, I very much doubt. In regard to the Irrigation Bill, as has been already said, there were members present who were thoroughly conversant with the provisions of that measure who looked after it during its passing through the House at the various stages. So far as my experience goes, and from what I can gather from those who have been longer in this House than I have been, I infer that the work of this session will bear very favourable comparison with that of other sessions, of recent date at any rate. I think it comes with special ill grace from hon. gentlemen opposite to taunt the Government with looking to Washington. If they will turn their eyes to the other House, they will find at least some members of that House who have looked to Washington with a vengeance, with regard to timber matters especially. If they want a precedent of that kind they should go to the other House.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—That was a private individual—not a member of the Government.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—With regard to Washington, I do not see anything very reprehensible in the Government looking to Washington to see what Congress is doing in order to properly frame their own policy. With regard to the session having been called so late, I, as a business man, have felt that perhaps as much as any member of this House, and I know a great many in the other House who also have felt it, but still I am ready, and these gentlemen have expressed themselves willing, to sacrifice personal convenience for the benefit of the country, since it was scarcely possible for the Government to have called us together earlier. Some hon. gentlemen have spoken slightingly of the action of the Government in consulting the views and interests of the people before adopting the tariff.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No one found fault with that.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I think it was found fault with. There is nothing in the action of the Government in that regard that can call for the condemnation of any one in this House.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I know that the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me, but what I stated was that I did not find fault with the Government for getting all the information they possibly could in the recess, but once the Budget speech was made, they ought to have adhered to the policy laid down in that.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Had it not been for the action of the Opposition in the lower House, the business would have been much further advanced. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but that is a matter that is patent to the public and to any one who has followed the proceedings there. With regard to what fell from the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, I wish to endorse thoroughly the sentiments expressed by him. So far from finding fault with the action of the leaders in this House, we have every reason to congratulate the Government and the leaders of the Senate on the progress which has been made. Under the circumstances, that progress has been very creditable, and had it not been for the diligence, energy and ability with which this House has been led, such progress would not have been possible. I regret very much the expressions which have fallen from hon. gentlemen of the Opposition; they are unworthy, ungracious and unfair.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

UNITS OF ELECTRICAL MEASURE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (117) "An Act respecting Units of Electrical Measure." He said: With the same understanding, and in view of the great harmony that existed on the previous bill, I move the second reading of this bill, intimating to the House that I shall delay the committee stage until next Monday for explanations and information.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

FRAUDULENT SALE OR MARKING BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (123) "An Act in restraint of Fraudulent Sale or Marking." He said: One part of this bill refers to honey, as you will see by schedule B. When we go into Committee of the Whole, I shall move that this word be struck out, because there is at present before the Commons a bill the object of which is to prevent the making of artificial honey which is prepared in the following manner: glucose or molasses is spread before the bees in the hive, and they feed from that solely and they turn this into the cells so that really that kind of honey is not honey at all, but dressed molasses or glucose put into the cells by the bees.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Can you distinguish it from good honey?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, you can distinguish by analysis and by the flavour. If the other bill goes through the House of Commons, I will then move to strike out this word, because this does not go sufficiently far to prevent the fraudulent fabrication of the article which is sold as honey and which is really not honey.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

PETROLEUM INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (122) "An Act further to amend the Petroleum Inspection Act."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. POWER--Something was said about this clause yesterday and I propose to say a few words about it to-day. In 1893 an Act was passed reducing the temperature to 90 degrees, and now it is proposed to further reduce it to 85 degrees. The hon. Minister gave an explanation, which may have been satisfactory to some members, of the reason which had induced the Government to make this change. I referred to a discussion which had taken place some years ago when the law, as it appears in the Revised Statutes, was passing through this House; and I find that in the session of 1881 the Hon. Mr. Aikins, who had charge of that measure seemed to think that making the flash test high was a very important matter. He speaks of the flash test having been raised during the previous year, 1880, and then states that prior to that the flash test was lower, and that accidents were frequent and he says that since the change made in the previous year, which had raised the flash test to 95 degrees, he was not aware that any accident had occurred. He said:.

In consequence of the flash test having been raised not one accident that I am aware of has occurred in the Dominion during the past year.

And I commend this to the consideration of the hon. gentleman from Kingston. Prior to that, numerous accidents had occurred — that is, when the flash test was lower. He says:

I do not think it would be wise to lower the flash test of Canadian oil.

And that view was concurred in by the House. He also said:

The object of the Government is to protect the public.

Now the Government are simply going back upon their record. This high flash test was introduced at that time in the interest of the safety of the public. Now the Government propose to go back to the more dangerous condition of things which had prevailed, according to the then Secretary of State, under the lower test. I do not wish to be uncharitable, but if I were disposed to be uncharitable, I should take this view of the matter: The test was reduced from 95 to 90 last year; last year the Government under pressure from the Opposition decided to make some concessions to the consumers of petroleum, and it strikes me that in all probability the reduction in the flash test was made for the purpose of making things a little easier for the producers of petroleum. They were going to lose a little of their protection through the legislation of last year in the direction of affording facilities for importing oil in tanks and otherwise, and this reduction of the flash test was intended as a compensation for what they were giving up. During the present year, as the result of pressure throughout the country, voiced in Parliament by the Opposition and by supporters of the Government too, a further reduction has been made in the protection given to the producer of coal oil. As I say, if I were an uncharitable person I should be disposed to think that this reduction in the flash test is intended as a sort of compensation to the Canadian producers of oil for the reduction in their protection which has been adopted by Parliament this year—at least which is in the Tariff Bill, I cannot say adopted, because we do not know but that the Minister of Finance may yield, as he has done in other cases, to the pressure of the manufacturing elements and reinstate the duty which prevailed at the opening of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I exceedingly regret that the member for Halifax should entertain or give utterance to the sentiments which he has expressed in this House on the present occasion. That any Government should be so base, or cruel, as to sacrifice the interests of its whole people and endanger their lives for the purpose of any concession to the coal-oil men, is an idea which I did not think the hon. gentleman would entertain for a moment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not wish to have sentiments attributed to me which I did not utter. I said if I were uncharitable I might take that view.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—That is what it means. It is immaterial what Mr. Aikins said, or what the hon. gentleman thinks he said on the matter. It is a matter of pure science and chemistry, and if the Government take the opinion of the best experts on this matter it is quite sufficient to submit to their opinion, because we have no other data on which to form an opinion except the practical means which the hon. gentleman gave yesterday. Now, I have nothing further to say in the matter, but I presume the Government have given the chemical part of it due consideration, and I have had a conversation with a gentleman whom I met from Petrolia this morning at the hotel, in which he stated that this is the highest test established in any country in the world—that there is no country which requires a test as high as this. In Germany, Belgium and France and in the United States it is lower than this. I hope that will be satisfactory to the hon. gentleman and he will not entertain these cruel views any longer.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I hope that after the explanation of the hon. gentleman from Kingston, the hon. member from Halifax will become really as charitable as he wishes to appear. The test was originally 95; subsequently it was reduced to 90, and now it is proposed to bring it down to 85. The test required for England is 73; New York, Pennsylvania and many other states, 73; Germany, 73; Russia, 82. It is thought that 85, without any "cruelty to the consumers and without lack of charity," is sufficiently safe and involves no danger. It is thought that 85, while being quite safe, will permit of the production of a better oil from Canadian crude oil, which is heavier than United States crude; so that if the reduction is made it is justified by the special nature of the Canadian crude oil.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I called attention to the somewhat singular coincidence, that the increase made in 1880 in the flash test was 10 degrees, and that the Minister who had charge of the bill at that time said that prior to that change numerous accidents had occurred. Now we have just taken off the 10 degrees additional protection given by the Act of 1880.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I must mention to the House this fact, that from the time the hon. gentleman speaks of, considerable experience has been acquired as to the manufacture of the oil itself, and especially with reference to lamps. You can have the best coal oil possible at the highest degree, and if you do not put it in a proper lamp it will explode, whilst they have made such progress in the manufacture of lamps with lamp ventilators that they will burn, without any danger, coal oil of a lower degree.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5,

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the interests of the people in the Maritime Provinces who import their petroleum chiefly in vessels, I would ask why the Government have not thought proper to allow the importation of oil in tank steamers as well as in tank cars. We in the Lower Provinces, who are far away from the oil wells of Ontario, and have to pay a higher price for Canadian oil than consumers in this vicinity, have not the privilege of getting the oil in tank vessels as we should.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is for the protection of your schooners and vessels. That is the reason. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick occupy a special position as to this. If you allowed oil to be brought in tank steamers they would be running in opposition to your own schooners. Under the present system your vessels carry freight to Portland and Boston, and get a return freight in oil in barrels which they would not have if the mode advocated by the member for Halifax prevailed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that the explanation is fairly satisfactory. I am glad to find that the hon. Minister takes such an interest in the owners of sailing vessels in Nova Scotia, and I would ask him why, if those are his principles, he continues to be a member of a Government which pays large subsidies to steamers running to the West Indies which take the business away from our sailing vessels.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—For the purpose of creating a trade there ; and they are not the same class of vessels.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The people of Nova Scotia are desirous of extending their trade to the West Indies, which they cannot do in the ordinary schooners.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like the hon. gentleman to preach that down in Lunenburg.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (154) " An Act to amend the Acts respecting the Civil Service."

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (155) " An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Judges of Provincial Courts."

(In the Committee.)

On the 2nd clause,

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am one of those who believe in upholding the dignity and the high character of the Bench. The safety and happiness and peace of every community depend largely on the confidence that the people have in the judiciary. People should feel that their rights are safe under the law, and that the judiciary give wise and impartial judgments. Now this bill proposes to increase the salaries of certain judges.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is to provide for the salary of an additional judge who has not been appointed yet.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am drawing attention to the salaries given to judges in those remote districts, where there can be very little law and very little variety in law. The capacity of a judge in such a place may be as limited as the business he has to do. To my knowledge, judges have been appointed in some of those districts who lacked the legal knowledge and practice in the courts necessary in more populous localities. For the last 15 years I have brought before the Department of Justice the case of the county court judge of Halifax. Every Minister of Justice has admitted that the case is one which deserves consideration, and has promised, in any readjustment of salaries, that the injustice would be remedied. I refer to the inadequate salary of the judge for the metropolitan city and district of Halifax, as compared with the salaries given to county court judges elsewhere. The judge should be paid according to the amount and importance of the work he has to do and the expense of living. A more worthy judge, or one having such an extended business cannot be found in any court in Canada. His judgments have generally met with the approbation of the public. The questions that come before him generally are more varied and complicated and demand more legal research than in ordinary county courts. The principle of giving a larger salary to the judge of the metropolitan county in a province was recognized when the salary of the county court judge of St. John, N,B., was increased. Why the same principle was not applied to the Halifax judge I am at a loss to conceive. Time and again have I brought this matter to the notice of the Justice Department, and have been given reason to hope that in any bill for readjustment of salaries this gross injustice would be remedied. Judge Johnston by legal attainments and ability would not discredit the highest court in Canada. I doubt if any judge in Canada does more work or enjoys to a greater extent the confidence of the community, while his knowledge of law and his impartial decisions are universally recognized where he is known Certainly he should have more than the country judges receive, and a great deal more than is allowed in this bill to judges in remote portions of British Columbia, where they can have very little to do. I hope that my hon. friend, who knows the necessity of having the judiciary fairly remunerated for the proper administration of justice, will recognize the fairness of my demand, and I hope that he will take an early opportunity to bring the matter to the attention of his colleagues with a view to having the grievance removed, for, with this open and flagrant injustice to Judge Johnston, those who know his case cannot well relieve those most responsible from the censure which such a gross injustice of such long standing deserves.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—As by implication my late friend Mr. Watters of St. John has been brought into this debate——

Hon. Mr. POWER—How has he been brought in?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Reference was made to the County Court judge of St. John.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I made no reference to a judge. I referred to a court.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It was stated, or the language implied, that that gentleman received more salary than judges of the same grade, and especially the County Court judge at Halifax. I am not sure of that. I have heard the complaint made that the late Judge Watters was not raised to the Supreme Court. He had been a prominent member of the Cabinet of New Brunswick prior to Confederation, and it was always believed that the first appointment to the Supreme Court Bench should be offered to Judge Watters. That was not done, but he was appointed a County Court judge, and if he received more salary than other County Court judges, it is because he came to the conclusion that, owing to ill-health, he would not accept a seat on the Supreme Court Bench. In consideration of his public services, a second judgeship was offered him, which enhanced his salary, so that it brought it almost up to that of a Supreme Court judge. He was made Judge of Admiralty, but I am not aware that his salary as a County Court judge was larger than that given to other County Court judges. If the citizens of St. John could have accomplished what they wished, they would have had him raised to the Supreme Court Bench, but in his latter days, his health was not good, and he felt satisfied with the position that he held. I trust that no one will raise the issue that he received anything more than judges who filled equally important positions.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I knew Judge Watters very well, and I did not wish to make any invidious comparisons. I believe that he was all that my hon. friend says, and that his salary was not too large, but certainly the salary of the County Court judge of St. John is, in amount, out of proportion to what the judge of the City and County of Halifax receives.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This discussion is perhaps out of order, but I wish to express my entire concurrence in what has been said with regard to the qualifications of the County Court judge of Halifax by the hon. member from Lunenburg. That judge has now occupied his position for about 20 years. He is a sound lawyer. The hon. gentleman is probably quite correct in saying, with respect to his knowledge of law, that he is qualified for a seat on any bench in Canada. Halifax is an expensive place to live in, and Judge Johnston receives only the same salary that is given to judges in rural districts. The County Court judge of Toronto, which is looked upon as a metropolitan city, receives a larger sum than the County Court judge of Halifax. Judge Watters, to whom the hon. gentleman from St. John referred, received $1,200 a year more than the County Court judge of Halifax. No one is finding any fault with the salary paid to that judge; the fact was stated, and the hon. member from Lunenburg pointed out that other judges, whose positions are not more important than that of the County Court judge of Halifax, are receiving larger salaries. That is a fact. There is no metropolitan county judge who receives so small a salary as the judge for Halifax, and I think it would be only the merest justice that, after his 20 years' service, he should receive the same salary as the County Court judge of St. John who was appointed only a few months ago.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Will the leader of the Government be kind enough to tell us how much the County Court judge of St. John receives now?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I cannot say, but I know the gentleman who fills the position of judge of the Admiralty Court receives an additional sum.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Judge Watters received $600 more than Judge Johnston did, in addition to his salary as judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I agree with those who say that the judges of this country are not sufficiently paid in proportion to the services they render, and also in proportion to the salaries that men in other pursuits of life get. We have not one of our judges, even a Supreme Court judge, who gets the salary of the manager of one of our first banks. Yet the fortune of that very bank, and all the fortunes of the citizens, are subject to the proper administration of justice. It is not a matter that this House can much interfere in. It must be dealt with in the House of Commons, but I suppose remarks like those which have been made here are calculated to enlighten the people whom they will reach.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The late Sir John Macdonald told me he regretted exceedingly that he could not give Mr. Watters more pay, because he could not give him more than he gave the judge at Halifax, so there must be some misunderstanding.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There is no misunderstanding.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

PONTIAC AND OTTAWA RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (139) "An Act to incorporate the Pontiac and Ottawa Railway Company." He said: This bill is to incorporate a company to provide railway facilities for a part of the country that is yet without them. The people of Pontiac have been placed in a very unfavourable position, having contributed largely toward the construction of our railway system without deriving any advantage from this expenditure.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (145) "An Act further to amend the Fisheries Act."

Hon. Mr. POWER—This bill led to a considerable discussion in the House of Commons. It affects a large section of our population, and I hope the hon. member will be prepared to give explanations of every clause when the bill is referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

He said: There is only one amendment to the bill. As it originally stood the company took power to run from Winnipeg to Cape Breton and they thought they might make a little detour to a point on the Niagara River.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté) moved concurrence in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (145) "An Act further to amend the Fisheries Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The object of this bill is in the direction of protecting our fisheries and to better maintain the character of our fish in the markets, so far as the sale of lobster is concerned. It also provides that drifting for salmon shall not be allowed except under license and except in tidal waters of British Columbia and in the harbour of St. John, New Brunswick. The lobster fisheries are to be carried on in future under license. It also regulates the form and size of trap boxes used for the catching of lobster by prescribing that they shall be apart one and one-half inches, and that boats employed in this fishery shall bear the mark of the owner. It also regulates the canning of lobster. This is most important for the good reputation of the products of our fisheries, especially abroad. It has been the practice in some cases to can lobster unfit for use, and purchasers have been deceived. In the future canning shall be supervised. The owners and managers of lobster factories shall also be required to make a return to put the Fishery Department in a position to know exactly the revenue from those valuable fisheries and to keep track of them so as to prevent their destruction. Penalties are imposed for the infringement of any of the requirements mentioned in the measure. There is also a provision to require owners of factories to deliver to the minister, or a person appointed by him, the eggs collected in the packing, for the purpose of reproduction. There are penalties for defacing the marks and using cases that have not been properly branded, or old cases, and there is also a provision to prevent the pollution of waters and to provide for the proper connection between lakes by channels and canals and structures of fish guards, how these shall be kept in repair, and forbidding the catching of fish for manure, and penalties for infractions to the law. It also provides for the lifting of nets and opening of fisheries from Saturday to Monday morning so as to give the fish free access to the rivers.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The object of this bill, my hon. friend says, is to preserve food-fish and also to regulate the curing of fish. Everything in the bill in that direction is very good, but there is an amendment to the 6th section which is not in the existing Act. Why is it so amended so as to embrace all kinds of fish, sea monsters and animals? Are there not fish that it would be well to kill by explosives or otherwise? Even in the case of the whale, which I have some knowledge of, would it not be well, instead of endangering lives by the ordinary mode of capture, to kill it by explosives? Also porpoises. In the lower St. Lawrence they become such a nuisance in some places that they not only drive all fish off, but destroy the fishermen's nets. So it is with the dog-fish. Whenever the dog-fish comes on our coast the fishermen must take up their nets, and there is a poor catch from hand lines. Does the hon. gentleman want to preserve those fish? I think that they ought to be excluded from the operation of this clause. On our coasts we have a very dreadful monster known as the sea serpent. Some people say they have seen it, and that it rises head and shoulder out of the water 15 feet, that it has a head and mane like a horse, and that sometimes it even goes on shore. I can vouch for the veracity of those who say they have seen it, but if there be such monsters should there not be permission granted to destroy it by explosives or in any other way? It is the terror of those of our shore fishermen who have seen it. It can, however, scarcely be called a fish, but is more of an amphibious animal, and I would use explosives on him if I had the chance. This is not what is generally called a "fish story."

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is not thought advisable to permit the use of explosives on account of the great destruction of valuable fish that it causes, but I dare say that if the hon. gentleman ever meets the sea serpent and slaughters it with explosives, His Excellency, exercising the prerogative of mercy, will exempt him from the penalty which he would incur under this section. As to the porpoise, it should not be killed by explosives either. There is a proper way of killing the porpoise without the use of explosives. They are caught in the river St. Lawrence by a simple process in large numbers—planting poles in such a way that the fish are caught inside of them and remain when the tide goes out.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—What about the whale?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The whale which is very valuable and used to be very numerous in the St. Lawrence, but it has been driven from there completely through the use of those deadly weapons, the use of which is forbidden by the Act. The Danes used to kill with the harpoon, or spear, and not with projectiles or shells.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—But we are living in an advanced age.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I suppose the bill does not apply outside the 3-mile limit?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—We could not enforce the law against foreigners beyond the 3-mile limit, but a British subject, on a British vessel, infringing the law would be liable to it even if the act were done beyond the 3-mile limit, but that is a very serious question of law which I do not wish to express a decided opinion upon. A man under the protection of the flag should respect the laws of his country.

On the third clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause, it will be observed, is new and imposes conditions upon the prosecution of the lobster fishery which have not existed in the past, and consequently I think should be scrutinized by the House with very considerable care. I can understand that it is desirable that no one should be allowed to pack lobsters without license, because considerable injury has been done to persons who carry on the lobster packing business in a proper way by persons who pack contrary to law, and put up fish caught at improper times and consequently an inferior article which, when it goes into foreign markets, is calculated to injure the reputation of Canadian lobsters generally. That is all reasonable enough; and the fee of $10 which is asked for the license is, perhaps, not too great. The provision in the 3rd subsection is not an unreasonable one. It is intended to allow very small lobsters to escape out of the cages or cars; but with respect to the fourth paragraph, I think it needs some amendment:

All boats used in the lobster fishery and all cars used for holding lobsters shall have the name or other distinguishing mark of the owner legibly branded or stamped thereon.

I do not think there is any objection to that, because, in the first place, the owner of the car will have his name or mark stamped or branded on it, and it is necessary for the purpose of enabling the owner to be identified; but the last few words are objectionable:

Such name or mark shall be registered with the local fishery officer.

Now, hon. gentlemen, if there was a fishery officer always close at hand this might be reasonable enough, but I have in my mind's eye just now a settlement where there is a very extensive fishery carried on, and where there is no local fishery officer, and a man would have to travel about twenty miles before he reached the local fishery officer. I do not think there is any necessity for having the name or mark registered with the local fishery officer. If the owner's name, or mark, is marked or branded on the boat, or car, that is sufficient, and I do not see any object to be gained by having the name registered with the local fishery officer. I move that all the words in subsection 4, after "thereon," in line 53 be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think they should remain. The fact that they are required to register with the local fishery officer does not impose any trouble at all upon the persons who intend to carry on the fishery. The fisherman has to get a license from the fishery inspector or officer, and when he is getting his license it is easy for him to register his boats and car. It does not involve a special trip, because when taking out his license he can also register his boats and say "I am going to use ten boats in the carrying on of the fishery." That is all that is required. It is most important, for the statistics of the Marine and Fishery Department, that the Government should know how many boats are used in this enterprise, and consequently I see no hardship, and no necessity to amend the bill by striking out these words.

Hon. Mr. POWER—After the explanation made by the Minister I admit it does not involve as much trouble as I had supposed at first. The person seeking a license can give his name and mark when he gets his license. I shall not press the amendment.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5,

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one provision in that which is of questionable propriety. It is right enough that every case or package should be marked or stamped with the name of the packer and with the name of the article contained in it, but I do not see why this provision should be inserted that it shall be by such person as is designated by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It must be remembered that this business is at the present time perfectly untrammelled. Our lobster packers have to compete in the markets of the world with the lobster packers of other countries, and it is not desirable to impose any unnecessary restrictions upon them. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries might direct that the stamping should be done by some officer of the department. That would involve expense and trouble to the packer, and I do not see what is to be gained by it. As long as the case of lobsters is marked, labelled and stamped in such a manner as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries directs, that ought to be enough. There are provisions later on in this clause making the owners responsible if the fish do not come up to the brand in quality; and I do not think this provision with respect to the person who shall mark being nominated by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should be retained. Hon. gentlemen perhaps do not realize, on a long coast where there is a straggling population, as there is along the Atlantic coast of Nova Scotia for instance, how much inconvenience lobster packers might be put to if they had to go and look for the fishery officer to brand their lobster cans, and I do not see that there is any special object gained by this. I move that these words "and by such person" in line 39 after "manner" be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Who is to mark and label them?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Let the owner mark them. He is made responsible for the thing afterwards.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It would prevent fraud in any person else using the brand.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are provisions for that afterwards.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—These lobster packers have large industries and they only send out their canned fish once a month, or once a fortnight. No doubt, however, there is inconvenience attending it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In some of these factories there are a number of hands working and there are thousands of cans put up every week. Now, to require that each of these cans should be stamped by such person as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may nominate, means a very serious inconvenience.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is the cases containing the cans that are to be stamped.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The language applies to cans:

Every case or package containing lobsters canned, preserved or cured in Canada, shall be marked, labelled or stamped, etc.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is the package in which the cans are packed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If you would strike out the words "or package" there would be no doubt about it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That is the very word used in the Customs Act. It is always described as "package." That means the box in which the cans are packed.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—If you say "every package containing cans of lobsters," that would cover it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That is exactly what it is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move in amendment that these words be stricken out after "manner," in line 39, "and by such person." It will lead to serious inconvenience, and it is no good whatever. The man who packs the goods puts his own name on them and brands them himself, and a subsequent subsection renders him responsible if the goods are not up to the standard.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—So far from involving more trouble and difficulty to the packers, I think that it is a release to them, in a measure, if the person authorized by the Minister does the stamping; it saves the packer the trouble.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Would not my hon. friend accept the suggestion, and say, "Every case or package containing cans of lobsters" and thus avoid further discussion on which we all agree on.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not think the amendment is necessary at all.

The amendment was declared lost.

On subclause 5,

Hon. Mr. POWER—It must be remembered now that we are making regulations which are going to affect the fishermen all along our shores, and the hon. Minister, I presume, knows what that means, because in his own province there are a good many lobster packers as well as in the other provinces. These packers will look at the regulations from a very different standpoint to that from which the officer in the Marine and Fisheries Department does. The rule in every department is that the more machinery you can get, and the more you can tie up everything, the better it is, but the people throughout the country look at it in a different way. They wish to carry on their business with as little interference on the part of the government as possible, and a good government should help the people out and not the department. It is the duty of this House to try and see that the people are allowed to carry on their business without the least unnecessary interference. This subclause goes on to say:

And such mark, label or stamp, shall state that the lobsters packed in the case or package so marked, labeled or stamped, have been legally caught and packed.

What earthly object is there in that? The packer puts his name on the package—I think he might very properly state when they are packed, but there is no provision for that—but he puts his brand on and is made responsible for the quality of the fish by a subsequent provision. Why should he have to say that they have been legally caught and packed? The presumption is they have been legally caught and packed. A man who is capable of violating the law and packing lobsters which have been caught out of season is quite capable of putting on a false label.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—A man might be induced to catch fish against the law, but he would hesitate before telling a lie.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have a better opinion of the fishermen than that. This is necessary for the protection of the industry. Why should a man hesitate to say that they have been legally caught ?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—He cannot say so. How can he say so ? He would be stating as a fact what he can have no knowledge of.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—He can say so from the season in which they are caught. He can say so from the implements that have been used to catch them.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The man who catches the fish brings them to the factory. The person who puts them up does not know whether they have been caught in legal or illegal traps. He cannot speak as to the legality of the catch.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If you relieve him of this, you encourage people to catch lobsters illegally.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The only thing I object to is you ask a man to assert on a package what he cannot properly assert. He cannot state that the lobsters have been legally caught. It is inducing him to practise a lie.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—There is another phase of the matter which claims our attention. Unfortunately, I know experimentally that fish are illegally caught and packed—and when that expression is used I presume it has reference to the section of the Act which specifies what the quality of the fish shall be—and those fish have been sent to foreign markets through my house and have turned out, when opened, to be an altogether different description of fish from what was represented. Consequently, I think this clause is absolutely necessary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The putting on of this allegation that they have been legally caught and packed is no proof that they have been. There is no other product of the country that requires to be marked as we propose that lobster shall be marked.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It puts a responsibility on the packer.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Not the packer, but such person as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries from time to time directs.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As the hon. member from Lunenburg says, it is quite impossible that a conscientious packer could put on this stamp. A packer has an establishment and men come from 10, 15, it may be even 20 miles, on either side of his establishment to sell him their lobsters. He buys the lobsters—he does not know how they have been caught, and he has to certify that they have been legally caught and packed. Either he has to do that or somebody else has.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—How can the officer of the Government say that these traps in which the lobsters were caught are all right? The slats may not be of the proper dimensions, or have wrong spaces between them. If they are taken in such a trap, they are illegally caught. How can the packer, or the man who brands them, say that they have been properly caught ? You ask a man to verify what he cannot possibly verify.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The same argument will apply to many other articles.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not see why lobsters should be singled out for exceptional treatment. I do not see why lobsters should be treated differently from other fish. There is no reason why lobster fishermen should be treated differently from other fishermen. There is no such requirement for other fish. Mackerel are branded number 1 or number 2 and so on, and the name of the inspector is put on them, but there is no brand on them to show that they have been legally caught and packed. You do not require that in the case of mackerel or herring. This requirement is a perfect absurdity.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It is demoralizing in its tendency.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move that the last portion of that paragraph be struck out—all the words after "cured."

The amendment was declared lost.

On subclause 10,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause shows that the intention is that there should be some officer employed, independently of the packers, for the purposes of labelling and stamping these packages, because paragraph 3 says there is a penalty on any one who empties or partially empties any such case or package after being marked, labelled or stamped, etc. That would hinder a packer from taking some cans out—if the hon. Minister's construction of the word "package" is correct—of a package and putting in other cans. This interference and intermeddling of the department with the business of these people is highly objectionable. As long as the man takes out his license and properly labels and stamps every package of lobsters that he sends out, that should be sufficient, and he should not be obliged to go to an officer of the department for the purpose of doing work like that, because it either means that in every little hamlet along the shores there shall be appointed a fishery officer, or that the packer shall be put to delay and inconvenience in having this work done. The hon. Minister will probably tell me that this is absolutely necessary, but I can assure him that when the Government comes to en force these regulations over the shores of the lower provinces, they will probably find that there are many people who look at them very differently from what the Ministers do.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If the hon. gentleman had referred to subsection 13 he would have found out that there is a proviso there as to the re-packing when necessary. It is incorrect to say that after a man packs a case he can never alter it again, but he should not alter it without proper authority, because then there would be no supervision or no control over the packing. If a man is required to pack under supervision during the day, he should not be allowed during the night to remove that packing and substitute for it boxes of lobsters which are not, perhaps, merchantable. Section 13 provides, when repacking is necessary, how it shall be done.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The speech of the hon. Minister just shows, to my mind, that he has wonderful skill in not seeing the point of an objection ; at least he failed to see it. I said that paragraph (c) showed it was in contemplation that there should be an officer of the Government—some one, at any rate, altogether separate and apart from the man who packed the fish—to put these brands on, and subsection 13, to which the Minister refers, shows that apparently there must be an officer of the Government standing over the shoulder of the packer when he is packing his fish, and that this officer has to brand the fish. As I say, you must either have an officer for nearly every factory—and in some cases there are only half a dozen people employed in a factory—or, if you do not, you will put the packers to great inconvenience and delay and expense in having the branding done. That is a most pernicious requirement.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—What will be the object of the packer in changing the contents of the package?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Simply this: When the cans are put in the cases, it may sometimes happen that one of the cans goes bad, and it is desirable to remove that can and put another which is perfect in its place, and I think that this idea of the department going in and by its officers interfering in this manner in the business of the packers is quite indefensible. There is no excuse for it.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I should like to be better informed on this matter so as to know how to vote. There are, as I understand, just the fishery men who catch the lobsters, and there are certain clauses of the bill applicable to them. Then there are the canning establishments to pack the lobsters, and in order to ensure that those lobsters are being caught at the right season there is some person appointed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who stamps all these packages when the packer has put them up. After he has so put up those packages, the packer is not to be allowed to unpack them and put in other cases except under the provisions of clause 13.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That is the object.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend does not see the point of the objection. If you are going to have an officer of the Government employed to brand every package of lobsters which is put up, then I can understand it, but to require that you shall have a Government officer to stamp or brand every package of lobsters which is put up, is a perfect outrage. There is no necessity for it. It will interfere very seriously with a business that is not too profitable at the present day.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—If you give the packer the privilege of opening these cases and putting in and changing what he thinks proper, there is no necessity for an inspector at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no necessity for an inspector at all.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Yes, there is a necessity. The inspector goes to the factory before the cans are packed and sees them, and he is responsible to a certain extent, and will take good care that he will not mark that case, because he is responsible until he is satisfied that the fish are all good, and that the cans are all in proper order. Then supposing he does that and leaves the factory, and you allow the packer to go and open these cases and change them and put inferior goods in those cases, and ship them away, what protection is there in that? None at all. You might as well have no inspector. There is no hardship whatever in having it as it is, because the inspector can oversee the cans to a great extent before they go into the cases, and after that they should not be allowed to be opened by the packer.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—That would involve the absolute necessity of having an inspector on the spot at that particular canning factory all the time.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—No.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Just the same as you have officers in a distillery or brewery.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Otherwise the officers would not know the character of the cans put in. In British Columbia, where there are thousands and thousands of cans packed, the proprietors make it a specialty that those who do their work shall do it so perfectly that if any of the cans fail to be good, when they themselves have their own inspector to look over them, he is not paid for it, and may be turned out of the shop and not kept any more for his work. It requires an expert to examine every can, and the hands that are engaged, particularly the Chinamen, are found to be excellent men in that respect. They take the greatest possible care in testing the cans. It is after the fish is put up and before it is put in a case; that is the object of having it well done. Then the proprietor's name has to go on that case, and he is the man who is responsible and ought to be responsible for it, and if he had any doubt in regard to a case, he ought to be at liberty to open it and have it inspected a second time.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, that is provided.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—You would involve so much expense on a man that it would not pay to can lobsters or any other fish. There is a good deal of competition in these things. Supposing you adopted that principle in dealing with the miller and said: "Now you brand your flour with your own name, or some particular brand that you recognize as your own, as a certain quality." You would not have that man guarantee whether the wheat was of a particular kind that he had ground. You could not tell that. He depends upon his own reputation; his own reputation is the best guarantee that the flour shall turn out according to the brand, and if he sends out any that does not turn out according to the brand his reputation soon goes and he is out of the market. And the same with this matter. The responsible packer is more valuable and a better guarantee to the trade and to the consumer than half a dozen inspectors that come in afterwards and take a run round the country and go into packing establishments and say they want to stamp their packages. These packages are put up and they stamp them and perhaps get so much for stamping, but if they had to open and go through packages, it would turn out like the bill for examining and stamping barrels of apples.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—They have not to open them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—How can they certify?

Hon. Mr. REESOR—They did not know the value of the contents or go through every can as an expert. The proprietor is the man who would lose if it should not come up to the mark. Make the proprietor have his name upon it. I would go further, I would make the proprietor, the canner, have his name on every can.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE—And the date.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—You cannot do that.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Well, the year it was stamped.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That is done.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—That is easily done. That is the law now in British Columbia, and that is the only way you can have real safety instead of adding these outside inspectors that cannot possibly know as well as the proprietor. He has nothing to gain or lose personally, but the proprietor is the man who is to lose and the proprietor is to be put to all this expense without any good to the community or to himself.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—A man embarks in fishing and catching lobsters and curing them one season, and he is called a packer. There is an inspector appointed by the Government to go and inspect his fish, and to have the supervision over the whole of those until they are packed and ready for the lids to be put on. There are, say, 15 or 20 dozen of culls that this inspector says are not fit to go out on the market. If you give the packer the right to go and open the boxes again, if he is a dishonest man he will put the culls instead of the good lobsters and send them out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With his own name on them?

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—They are culls with his own name on them, they are not fit to go out but there they are, and the inspector goes away from the factory and if the packer is a dishonest man he will recan them and send them out to the public at large. Well, a man gets five cases, he will only have a few of the culls in them. He cannot go back on the merchant from whom he bought them, who is perhaps two hundred or three hundred miles off, and it is not worth while making a claim for them. I say the bill is right, and that you should allow no man to open his packages after the inspector puts his stamp on them. If you allow that you will inflict a hardship on the public.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—The proprietor of the cannery would by no means allow such a thing to be done. He would have no motive for it. It would simply mean the ruin of his business to send out bad cans, and the idea that he would have a lot of cull cans and open the boxes and put them in after the inspector was there, to destroy the character of his cannery, is simply absurd.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—The canneries are not permanent. There is one this year and one next year. The packers are not the same as merchants at all. If you allow a packer to put those culls on the public, you will not be able to find him the next year. You cannot follow him.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend is wrong in that. If a man sets up a business like that he has to provide himself with expensive caldrons, and he must stay there. I have known them to be there ten or twelve years.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The speech of the hon. gentleman from King's division puts the whole case clearly, and it is unnecessary to add anything further. There is this one point which the hon. gentleman brought out which should be insisted on: that it is perfectly clear now that if the certificate of the inspector is to be of any value whatever, he must be in the factory all the time.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Not a bit of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the hon. gentleman speaks with knowledge. If he is familiar with lobster packing, he knows that the covers must be put on the cans before the lobsters are cold, and how can an inspector, who comes along after the cans have been sealed, tell what is the quality of the fish inside the cans? Therefore the inspector must be present all the time. Now there are a number of those factories where there are not more than from five to a dozen hands employed. The canning establishments are scattered through the fishing hamlets all along our coast, and does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he proposes to appoint an inspector to go into every one of those factories and stand over the men, women and girls who are packing the fish? The thing is outrageous.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—It is not necessary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman knows his own business, and I am willing to defer him to him in matters connected with his own business, but when it comes to talking about packing lobsters he is out of his element. I have stood by and seen it done. I do not pretend to be familiar with it, although I know more than the hon. gentleman does, and if you have any one besides the packers brand these lobsters either one of two things must happen: either you must have an inspector present all the time and watch the process so as to be able to certify to the contents of every can, or the inspector must certify to what he does not know. You cannot leave the cans open.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—As to the necessity of having an inspector in every factory, the clause does not require it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is no answer. How can the inspector certify so that his certificate will be of any value if he is not there all the time?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This clause shows clearly that the Minister of Fisheries can employ a man who is a servant of the owner of the cannery, and he is responsible for the way the work is carried on, so it is not necessary that there should be an inspector for each factory, but some person under the owner of that factory may be authorized by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to be responsible for the manner in which the canning is carried on. After that is done this package should not be opened again except under the provision of section 13, which provides the way a case may be opened and other cans substituted.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The inspector may be a person resident in the immediate neighbourhood of the factory?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, or he may inspect 10 or 12 factories.

The SPEAKER—By whom was this law sought? I presume it was sought by the honest fishermen, or by the honest tradesmen, and if so they ought to know what is good and necessary for themselves and in what way the honest man can be protected against the dishonest man. If this has been asked for by those who are interested in this industry, they must surely have suggested what they wanted for their protection against fraud. I presume the Government are not doing this for the fun or pleasure of the thing; there is no advantage to be gained by taking this responsibility, and I am satisfied they must have been asked to do what they are doing now by people interested in the industry.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Then if my hon. friend is right we have no necessity to be h re at all. We should pass the bill without comment. We know the information received by the department at times is not in our judgment consistent with the interests of the country.

The SPEAKER—My hon. friend does not contend that the fishermen of the country make the laws themselves?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The representatives of the people here may have more practical information than that furnished to the department. The department may receive information from interested parties which is not in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the proportion of re-packing that takes place in one of those canning establishments? It appears to me if re-packing is an important part of the industry it should be dealt with.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It is not five per cent.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is an insignificant proportion of the industry. It may not occur at all, but since there is a supervision over the packing, after that supervision has been exercised it is necessary that it should not be infringed upon during the night. I do not suppose in the whole season there are ten packages in any factory that are opened, but once the packing is certified to, it becomes an incident thereto that no re-packing should take place except under the same supervision.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I quite agree with my hon. friend on that point.

The subclause was adopted.

On subclause 11,

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Minister gave us an interpretation just now which I think is very questionable. Does this mean that the fisheries inspector may employ any one he pleases to do the work under him?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That certainly is the meaning of it. The inspector may go into a cannery and there employ a person to assist him, and if that person violates any of the provisions of the Act, he is subject to a penalty of $40.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would be a great deal better to take the responsibility of the packer than to take the responsibility of a person employed by the inspector.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It may be the canner himself.

The subclause was adopted.

On subclause 12,

Hon. Mr. POWER—Suppose the inspector brands a package though he has not been present when the cans were filled he may render himself liable to a penalty of $100 if he certifies that the fish are of a certain character. You are going to get the department and the packers into an extraordinary mess in attempting to enforce such regulations as these. The hon. Speaker said that probably the men in the business must have asked for this legislation. It may be that the packers have expressed their desire that there should be some protection afforded to the honest packer, but they have not asked for such extraordinary regulations as these. It may be that some persons have packed lobsters out of season, and for the purpose of preventing that, which is a very objectionable practice, the department are now enacting a law which will interfere in a most objectionable way with the whole business of people who are trying to carry on the industry in a legitimate manner. It is better that some guilty ones should escape than that the trade should be hampered in that way.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—It would be far better to prevent any fraud by making each packer responsible for the quality of the fish that he puts up, have his name upon every package and let him certify to it and put his brand upon it. It would give rise to much less expense. It would be on the same principle that a miller brands his flour. He is responsible himself, and a good miller will soon get the whole of the trade of the country around him if he is surrounded by bad ones. You not only prevent this fraud, but you get a number of good canneries in operation and only good ones, because every man who cannot certify to the quality of his goods or who certifies improperly to them, must go out of the businesss. To hold the man himself responsible will be far better protection to the public than to have a lot of inspectors who are required to certify to things that they cannot possibly know.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Does not that come back to the question of having responsible merchants who put their own trade marks on their goods? It is the best system in the world. I know when I was in trade and imported from first-class houses in England, I had no trouble in getting first-class goods, but I always looked at the brands and trade marks of the house from which I imported. So with other merchants; but when you introduce this system and have to depend wholly on the mark of a petty inspector, there is not the slightest possible chance of depending on the goods. The inspection of goods is exceedingly difficult. It is not easy to find a proper inspector. If you want a reliable inspector you must look to the packer himself. How is it possible for any government, under any system, to get such inspection that every small package of goods will be examined? Why, it would cost more than the goods would come to. To have a sham inspector and have the country pay for it is simply, in my opinion, a foolish proposition. It is simply trying to make offices for men that we do not want in this country.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The remarks which fell from the hon. member from King's and the suggestion which he offers, if practicable, would be very well, but the trouble is the deficiency in quality of the fish is not ascertained until the goods reach foreign markets and are opened there. Would it not be better to have such an inspection of fish as would render it certain that the goods were in proper condition when they were inspected here? I do not yield to the hon. member from Halifax, or to any one else, in my desire not to place obstructions in the way of the packers, but my experience has led me to the conclusion that the provisions in this bill are almost absolutely necessary to the proper conduct of the business. Some hon. members suggest that you would require to have a man constantly on the premises; I think that objection has been removed by the explanation given by the Minister that it is quite practicable to have one of the employees of the establishment act as inspector, or some one resident in the neighbourhood. I have every wish to see the packers have every possible protection and facility; at the same time we require some regulations of this character.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I know so little about lobster-packing that I am afraid in this matter I must put my conscience in the keeping of the Government. How is this inspector, who is appointed by the Government or who acts for the Government, to certify that the lobsters are what they ought to be—are fresh and caught in the right season? Will not t e packer himself, the man who receives the lobsters and packs them, be the only man who can certify to that? How is this other man to obtain his information or knowledge except through the packer?

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Because he goes in there with authority and employs some one who oversees the packing as it is going on.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—It will turn out just as the inspection of apples has turned out. Two years ago we passed a law, at the request of the fruit growers, to let them have their apples inspected, because they would get better prices in the old country for their apples. It worked so badly that they do not get them inspected any longer. The only plan that has been successful, so far, is where the man himself has a character for packing good apples and puts his name on the barrels and certifies to their quality and variety, and he makes the shipping a success; whereas if they were sent without regard to the name of the firm or the character of the apples—if they were put up carelessly they would bring only three or four dollars a barrel—very often as little money as could have been got for them at home here. It is perfectly absurd to expect this inspection to work. It will not give satisfaction. The packers will kick against it. They are the persons interested in seeing that the goods are right. To say that a packer interested in packing would secretly reopen the boxes and put bad cans in packages carrying his own name, is absurd. His responsibility is worth far more to the public than the responsibility of a hireling.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—His employee may not be worth $200, and you might not be able to make anything out of him if you looked for damages against him. He can only certify to the best of his knowledge. The owner of the goods is the man who should be held responsible, and he is the man who is interested in sending out a good article.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—There is a fundamental difference between the lobster packer and the miller or manufacturer, as was mentioned by the senior member from St. John. A miller has a reason to have a good reputation, and to see that his goods are properly marked, because he can increase the business in which he is permanently engaged. In the case of the lobster factory, a person, however good his market may be, cannot increase his output, so he is tempted to do the most he can during the one season, knowing very well that although his reputation may be good, he cannot make much, if anything out of it. He sells out his stock at the ordinary price, and he may go out of the business the next season, or it may be a bad season. So I think it is better to be more stringent, as the bill proposes to be, than to apply an idea which prevails very generally and works very well with millers and manufacturers of staple articles but which would not apply to lobster packers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am sorry to hear that on the north shore of New Brunswick, the lobster packers are of the character described by the hon. gentleman from Acadie.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I wish it to be well understood that I am speaking of the minority, those who are violating the law, and not of the majority. I would not like my words to apply in a larger sense than I intended them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a matter of fact, the people that we want to get at are those who pack out of season, and they are not going to take out licenses at all. The mere requirement of taking out a license is probably enough to prevent those people going into the business. The remarks of the hon. gentleman from King's were particularly striking with respect to the inspection of apples. We thought when we passed that Act that we were doing a very good thing, and now it turns out to be perfectly useless; but there was this redeeming feature about the law—the inspection was optional. That is not the case with the measure before us. This law is compulsory, and I say it is going to be impracticable in working out. We export canned lobsters to the value of millions of dollars, and Parliament ought to be very careful how it interferes with a business of such dimensions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not profess to know very much about the lobster business, but it appears to me that many hon. gentlemen are overlooking entirely the principle involved in inspection. If I understand it, the principle is not to establish a reputation for the packers, but to protect the general health of the public. The argument that might be applicable with regard to apples, flour and other commodities of that character is not at all applicable to the inspection of fish and meat. I submit to this honourable House that there is nothing in commerce so prejudicial to the health of the community as careless packing of fish and meat.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is absolutely impossible to inspect every package of lobsters. There is not money enough in the country to carry out the system thoroughly. Every package would have to be inspected to see that its contents are healthful and sound and not of a nature to injuriously affect the health of the people.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Calgary apparently thought he was scoring a point when he spoke of the necessity of the inspection of fish and meat. I am perfectly satisfied that they shall be inspected provided that lobsters shall be inspected in the same way as other fish, and in the same way as meat. There are no such provisions in the General Inspection Act.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The same conditions do not apply at all. It would be desirable, certainly, that the packer should be made primarily responsible if it were practicable, but the fact is those who are disposed to be fraudulent send their goods to foreign markets through the hands of merchants, and the effect is they destroy the reputation of our lobsters.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What is the difference between the inspection of mackerel and of lobster?

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The one is simply caught and put in barrel, and the other has to go through the process of canning, of which I know something as well as the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is another clause which is going to have a very serious effect. It appears that this bill is like the laws of the Medes and Persians and we must take it as it is. The practice of fishermen at present is that there shall be one night of the week when their nets are not set. In some places the rule is that the nets shall be set Saturday night but not Sunday night, but the general practice is that the nets shall not be set Saturday night but shall be set Sunday night. This provision of the bill means that our fishermen along the Atlantic coast shall lose two nights fishing in the week, that their nets shall not be set Saturday night and shall not be set Sunday night. When you think that for the last number of years the fishermen on the Atlantic have met with bad season after bad season, that as a rule they find it very difficult indeed to make both ends meet, and that the fish which they get are generally those which pass along the coast when we say that they shall take their nets up for two nights in the week, it is unreasonable in the extreme. No reason has been shown why it should be so. I wish to call attention to a very important circumstance in connection with this clause. It is supposed to be almost a transcript of subsection 14 of section 14 of the Fisheries Act, but there is a most important distinction. The section in the Act applied only to salmon. The Government propose to extend this provision, which might be reasonable enough as applied to salmon, because it is desirable to let the salmon get into the rivers—the Government propose to extend that to mackerel and herring also. Probably there is hardly a member of this House who realizes the importance of this change. The Minister did not indicate in any way that it was the intention of the Government to make such a sweeping change.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—How far does this tide water extend? Is it water within the three mile limit? Because my hon. friend contends that these regulations extend, so far as British subjects are concerned, beyond the three-mile limit. Now many of our fishermen go out for about eight and nine miles from land and set their nets, and this clause would require them to go out and raise their nets. I cannot see the object of it. Our shore fishermen are hampered enough by reason of the licenses given to United States fishermen, who are at liberty to catch fish at all times outside the three-mile limit, and now you propose to enact legislation which will bring the law of the country into contempt and prohibiting our fishermen from catching fish even on the high seas, out side of the 3-mile limit, where the American fishermen resort. Let us first know what tidal water means. If it means all waters affected by the tide, then I protest against it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This applies only to tidal water, and that means by the shore.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all. Are not all the waters of the ocean tidal waters?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No; not in that sense. The expression applies only to a place where the tide comes in and recedes.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—In the Bay of Fundy the tidal waters extend 60 or 70 miles.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The waters do not recede 70 miles. There is the middle of the stream which does not recede altogether in the Bay of Fundy. But, if it did recede 70 miles, you could not expect to be fishing when the water is out, and therefore there is no disadvantage in taking up the nets where the tidal water recedes. It has been stated that the fish on the coasts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have not been profitable for the last few years, that times have been hard for fishermen. For what reason? From the very fact that we have been exhausting our fisheries.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The Americans have been doing so. We all want to take care of our fishing industry and protect it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Why is it the Americans have so few fish on their coast? Because they have exhausted their fisheries. Is it wise, is it desirable that we should do the same thing? And is it too long to allow the fish to ascend the rivers to the spawning places where they cannot be disturbed, by taking up the nets every Saturday night until Monday morning.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Before I made my last remarks I asked the hon. gentleman what was the limit of the tidal waters and whether they extend beyond the three-mile limit, and my hon. friend said yes, and therefore I predicated my remarks upon that. If my hon. friend means just simply in the harbours, then I might have a different view of the matter. Is it intended for any water that recedes and leaves a place dry?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Just those places where it is left dry by the receding of the tide? If that is it, I can understand it, but if it is beyond that to any material extent or to the three-mile limit, I say it is an injustice to our people, because they have to compete with the United States fishermen outside of that, and they are obliged to take up their nets, sometimes a string of nets half a mile long, and if the Americans are allowed to catch fish there I say it is a hardship upon our people.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—As I read this clause, it does not apply to deep-sea fishing, and beyond the three miles would be deep-sea fishing. The way I understand the clause is that it applies to the tidal waters where the water flows and recedes with the tide.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I think the hon. Minister is right in principle. It is well that the fish should be protected by law where we can do so, and I think in this instance it should be done and that we should not lose our fish, that we should protect them at the proper seasons in order to enable them to spawn on the several spawning grounds, but there are fish which cannot be protected in this way. I think the gaspereau and other fish do not come into the fresh water.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh yes.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I know that our salmon, and other fish of that class, do ascend the rivers for the purpose of breeding, and in that particular the Government is perfectly right in seeing that the laws are just as strict as possible to protect them. It is well too that there should be one or two days of the week. I would be most anxious to assist the Government in that, because, I am fully aware, from friends of my own who have written me from England and other places, that the non-protection of the fish at certain seasons will lead to their extermination.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I have no objection to rivers, but I would like to know what is covered by "tidal waters." Along our coast the tide is five miles out at sea. You can tell the tide five or six miles out. At the mouth of the bays you can tell whether the tide is coming in or going out, and if that is tidal water this law ought not to apply.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—While I approve of the general tenor of this Act, I must call the attention of the Government to the fact that this clause is ambiguous. If we cannot interpret it, how will the officers interpret it? There is not the slightest doubt that all the shores of the Atlantic Ocean are tidal waters. Do you mean to apply this Act to the shore fisheries?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I do not believe that this is the idea. I believe it applies to the openings of rivers, because if you apply it from the shore to the three-mile limit, there is no reason why you should not pass the three-mile limit. But as a matter of fact there is no reason to apply it at all. Will you apply this Act to the Strait of Northumberland which is seven miles wide at its narrowest part?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, you cannot.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It is tidal water. I think we could remedy it by saying "tidal rivers" instead of tidal waters.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, it would not be sufficient, because it would be destroying the salmon off the coast where the tide rises and falls. You would be destroying salmon off the coast and in the harbours also.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why not put in an interpretation clause?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Tidal waters approaching rivers.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Or revert to the former Act and specify salmon fishing. This law will be a source of misunderstanding, and I think we should not pass a bill which will give so much trouble.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is not the slightest doubt that this applies to the fisheries off the shore. Tidal waters are waters in which the tide rises and falls. The tide rises and falls all over the ocean, and this is intended to apply to the waters off our coasts. The hon. Minister gave his interpretation of the meaning of these words, but unfortunately for the fishermen, the hon. gentleman would not be a judge before whom those accused of violating the law would be tried, or the fishermen might get the benefit of his interpretation of the clause. The hon. gentleman spoke of the United States fisheries. It is true they have been destroyed. The river fisheries have been almost totally destroyed, and then, when the marine life in the rivers has disappeared, the sea fish cease to come in for the feed they get about these river mouths, and if the same restriction is put upon this clause which exists in subsection 4 of chapter 95 of the Revised Statutes, to provide that this subsection as affecting the deep-sea and coast fisheries in tidal waters, shall apply only to salmon, I am satisfied with it ; but if you are going to say that fishermen shall be precluded from catching fish like herring and mackerel, which simply pass by our coasts perhaps at a distance of a couple of miles from the shore, it is a most unreasonable thing and will lead to strong feelings of dissatisfaction amongst our fishermen. Why should our fishermen be precluded from catching mackerel when they pass by the shore, when the United States fishermen in the same neighbourhood are allowed to catch them ? It is most unreasonable and I cannot help feeling that in some way, in drafting the bill, through an oversight limitation as to salmon nets was omitted.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH--If we allow the United States fishermen to catch these fish and compel our own fishermen to haul up their nets, it would be a hardship which nothing could ameliorate.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The meaning I attach to the word "tidal waters" does not agree at all with the definition of the hon. gentleman on the other side. You must understand that I am not desirous of cutting out fishermen from all kinds of fishing from Saturday night till Monday morning. I am not desirous, either, of restricting the clause to salmon only, because there are valuable fish that come into tidal waters which also want protection. The hon. gentleman knows that in the harbour of St. John there is a very valuable fish which comes in there, the shad.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—And the sturgeon.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If the fishing is carried on without affording any chance to these fish to ascend the St. John or go up into fresh water to spawn as they do, undoubtedly that kind of fish will be destroyed. There are other species of fish which have the same habit also that will be destroyed. They also want protection, just as much as do salmon, although they are not so valuable. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax, when he states that the fisheries of the Atlantic coast of the United States have been destroyed from the fact that the fishing has been ruined in the rivers. That is not the cause at all, because most of these fish that come from the sea to spawn in fresh water hardly take any food at all when they are in the rivers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not say they did.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—But you said that the substance that fed them in the fresh water rivers having been destroyed, the fish turned away from the coast.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I said that the fish came in from the outside, mackerel and other fish of that sort, that they fed to a considerable extent upon the small fish of various kinds which came out of the rivers ; that when the river fisheries were destroyed, this food was not there for the deep-sea fish.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The little fish that come down the river are the bait which trap the fish at the mouth of the river.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then the hon. Minister undertook to say that the fisheries were completely destroyed on the United States coast. The hon. gentleman is in error if he speaks of the mackerel, because within the last few years they have had large catches of mackerel off the United States coast.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—My definition of the tidal water and the definition given on the other side of the House do not agree ; therefore I propose to reserve this clause until I ascertain from the Fishery Department what is the real meaning attached to the term "tidal water."

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I would like to make a remark, and I hope the hon. Minister will take it into consideration on behalf of the herring fishermen. If this clause be made applicable to herring fishermen, it will be a great hardship on them. They fish for herring at a certain time in the spring, say a week, or a fortnight, or so ; they set their nets from half a mile to three miles and sometimes four miles from the shore. The operation of setting the net is a difficult and sometimes dangerous one. If they are obliged to take up their nets on Saturday nights and set them on Monday again, it is certainly imposing upon them a hardship that is absolutely intolerable. It is a long process and they will not be able to do it, especially those men who do not make a living by those fish but simply amateur fishermen who set up their nets and catch enough herring and gaspereau for the year. There is no occasion for this provision, because the herring do not need any protection. I speak especially for those along the Straits of Northumberland, and I think I will be backed in what I say by my colleagues from the lower provinces.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have said that I did not think the clause applied to deep sea fishing.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I think the Minister is on the right path when he protects the fish that go up the rivers.

The clause was postponed.

On clause 6,

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I am in accord with this clause generally, but I was in hopes that this measure would rid us of a great nuisance which has been in existence for a great many years. It has been brought up in this House on many occasions, and during the time the late Sir John Abbott occupied the position of Premier and leader of the House, he gave us to understand that a law would be passed prohibiting the continuance of this nuisance, and I was in hopes when this bill was introduced in the other House that we had succeeded at last of ridding the country of a nuisance which is very injurious to the general interests of the whole country. It must be known to every hon. gentleman in this House that the immense quantity of sawdust discharged in the Ottawa river has done a great deal of damage. A great many years ago, when I first came to Ottawa, we had a river here in which fish were very abundant. It was a most valuable asset to the Dominion generally. Now we are deprived of this advantage, and we are losing the benefit of the navigation of this magnificent river. At the present time there is an accumulation of sawdust 72 feet in depth underlying the channel at the proposed route for the construction of the interprovincial bridge. That fact is quite sufficient to convince anyone that the time has arrived when measures should be taken to abate the nuisance. Therefore, I hope that the House will sustain me in moving, as I do, that this proviso be not concurred in but that the proviso shall be :—

Provided always that the provisions of this section shall not apply until, on and after the first day of May, 1895, to the saw-mill owners and employees of any saw-mill situated on any stream which was wholly or partially exempt from the operation of said subsection 2 of section 15 hereby repealed.

That gives the mill owners and parties interested a sufficient time to make the necessary arrangements for the purpose of stopping the depositing of saw-dust or other refuse in the river. Unfortunately, a very large mill has been destroyed at the Chaudière, and it is a very opportune time at present to let these gentlemen know that after this they will not be allowed to deposit refuse in this river. It is a most extraordinary thing that whilst the practice is prohibited on all small rivers and mill-owners are not allowed to throw a spoonful of sawdust in the water, no attempt is made to protect the Ottawa River, and this magnificent river is being ruined under the very eyes of the Ministers and of the representatives of the people. When the engineers from the United States were here they expressed their astonishment thas such a thing was allowed to be continued under the eyes of the Government. This proposition of mine has been assented to in many occasions. We had a committee appointed who examined many gentlemen connected with the business and presented a report to this House which was unanimously adopted. I thought then that this nuisance would be abated. I hope the hon. Minister will acquiesce in this proposition and will agree to give the mill-owners another twelve months to make the necessary preparation. This Ottawa canal will some day be constructed, because it is the only route suitable for the business of the country, and will save 350 miles between Chicago and Montreal. The advantages of the canal are undeniable. I think we should go to work now to make this river as suitable as possible for the requirements of the canal when constructed, and I hope there will be no opposition to this resolution and that the worthy Premier and the gentleman leading this House on occasion will give us some assurance which will be satisfactorily received by the whole country. Montreal has been urging it for many years and I believe that no measure that can be adopted by this country will be more acceptable than one abating this nuisance. I should like to hear the views of hon. gentlemen from other parts of the country where mill-owners are prohibited from depositing saw-dust in the streams. In Pembroke a saw mill-owner was fined heavily because he threw a small quantity of saw-dust in the river, and I think it was proper that he should be fined.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I hope the Government will accept this amendment. The Government did not intend to make this proviso that is now in the bill. I do not think it is fair to impose it on the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; the temptation may be too great. Local influence, in certain sections, may override the department and injustice may be done, to the public. I know that in Nova Scotia the law has been vigorously applied to a little steam where they do not cut more than half a thousand of lumber in a day. The mill-owners have been fined and the mill has been stopped. A large mill on the river, with immense quantities of logs lying in the river, has been stopped by a mandamus, to the great loss of those who have their logs there to be sawn as well as a general injury to the place. Here in Ottawa, in the presence of the Parliament of Canada, where legislation is being enacted, this nuisance is tolerated; and yet the law has been rigidly enforced in Nova Scotia. It is no wonder the people object and set the law at defiance when a nuisance like this is allowed within the sound of our voices. I hope the Government will see that it is a responsibility too great to throw upon the department. It may be used in a way which it is not in the interests of the country, or there may be pressure brought by certain parties upon the Government to which possibly they might yield. These mill-men have all got rich and hold a large amount of the assets of the country, the valuable timber tracts of Canada. This difficulty can be removed without much trouble, but they find it more convenient to let the saw-dust drop into the river than to take care of it. We find that a short distance below this city, at the Gatineau, the saw-dust is burnt. They cannot get a scow up there because of the amount of refuse in the water. I hope the Government will say, in the interests of the whole community, that they will not allow the huge monopoly which the mill-owners have here to override the law and set a bad example to the whole community. We should be cautious about the laws we make, but when made they should be carried out. Let no man defy the law, but let it apply alike to all classes and conditions of our people, regardless of wealth or influence.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I think it is simply ironical to take all the precautions the country is taking to preserve our fisheries, to enact so many laws, impose so many fines and penalties on the one hand, while, on the other hand, we allow this nuisance, which is complained of, to exist unchecked—a nuisance which is more dangerous to fisheries, perhaps, than all others put together. There is no doubt that not only is the saw-dust injurious to the river fisheries, but it is also injurious to the open fisheries, as many species of fish have to go to the rivers to spawn, and they do not ascend the rivers on account of the saw-dust. The salmon, for the protection of which so much is done, has to run up rivers to spawn. I know, myself, rivers where formerly salmon and trout were abundant, in which now no salmon or trout can be found, simply because the water has been spoiled by saw-dust and other mill refuse. If, therefore, the Government are sincere, and I believe they are, in trying to preserve our fisheries, they should go to the root of the evil and commence by preserving the rivers, the preservation of which, is more important, certainly, than preventing purse-seining or netting on Sunday. More than that, I have myself got petitions from parties in different counties where I come from, complaining of this matter. I wish the Government to give it some consideration. In certain counties, where lumbering operations are carried on, this state of things, I know, exists—that lumbermen who happen to belong to a certain political creed, throw saw-dust into the rivers unmolested.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I know that the Government know nothing about it, but I am talking of facts. They think they will be protected—that members of Parliament will not dare to do anything against them. At all events, the consequence is they violate the law, while others having different political convictions, under dread of punishment refrain from doing it. That is the fact, I know, in the county of Westmoreland where I live and also in the county of Kent. As I have said, the Government do not know of it, but it creates dissatisfaction and that should be put a stop to. The law should be rigidly enforced. We are very severe against the fishermen, why not against the lumbermen? They are not so poor that the laws which are applicable to other citizens of the community should not apply to them. We know the lumbermen of Ottawa River are poor men, but still they are not the only paupers in the Dominion, and supposing their income should be diminished by five or ten thousand dollars per year, that is no reason why this law should not be applied. The pollution of the water is not only injurious to the river but also to the ocean fisheries. The pollution is of a permanent character, while the lumber trade may diminish. When the waters are so polluted that the fish disappear from them, it takes centuries to restore abundance of fish in those rivers. It is a permanent loss which is inflicted for the purpose of benefiting some private individuals. I will not talk about the Ottawa River; I will speak of rivers in the east We have the St. John River in New Brunswick. Formerly we had abundance of fish in it; now they have diminished to such an extent that it is difficult to catch any considerable number. That may not be wholly due to this fact, but it is partially due to the pollution of the water. In the smaller rivers from the Gut of Canso to the Bay of Chaleurs there is no doubt that magnificent trout and salmon fisheries have been destroyed to an incalculable extent, merely by the privileges accorded to mill-owners, or most of them, to throw their mill refuse into the river. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the hon. gentleman of Ottawa will be accepted by the Government. The Government is bound to carry out the promise of the late Sir John Abbott when he was Premier. They are bound to carry out the suggestion of my hon. friend. Sir John Abbott, in 1891 when a similar question was raised, was in favour of it; he saw the propriety of it, but he said that we should not without warning fall upon these mill-owners and impose upon them such alterations in their manufacturing establishments as would be injurious to them. He almost pledged himself to bring in remedial legislation. That was three years ago and no legislation has been introduced yet. Sir John Abbott spoke as follows :—

It appears to be the general opinion of my colleagues in so far as I have gone into the question, that the exception which prevails in favour of the Ottawa River ought to be abrogated and I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw his bill for this year, in order that the mill-owners may not be too suddenly, by force, compelled to make changes which would be very expensive and inconvenient. My hon. friend has been good enough on that consideration to agree to withdraw his bill for this year, as far as I can say such an understanding can be arrived at before hand, that his measure will receive the assistance of this Government, if it should be in power in the year to come.

The hon. gentleman from Rideau division on that assurance withdrew his bill that year. Now, what my hon. friend asked, and what I join in asking and what I believe the majority of this House demands, is that these implied promises be carried out. It is certainly not harsh treatment because those gentlemen know that this has been hanging over their heads for years. Look at the different treatment accorded to lumbermen and to fishermen. The very same year when Sir John Abbott made that promise and wished to have another year granted to the lumbermen so that they would not be taken by surprise, the Government passed an Act further to amend the Fisheries Act the first section of which prohibited the use of purse-seines for the catching of fish under a penalty for each offence of not less than $50 and not exceeding $500, together with confiscation of the apparatus and boats used in such catching. I was not able to get six months' notice to those fishermen to be prepared to meet this law.. The Government insisted then, and they were right, as for as the necessity of protecting our fisheries, but if it is so important to protect the fisheries, let us protect them all through and not give undue privileges to a class of men who can afford to live without them, especially when we are so severe against the fishermen that we would not give them a day's warning when passing that Act subjecting them to a penalty of $500 and confiscation of their boats and apparatus should they use those purse-seines. I hope this amendment will be accepted by the leader of the House.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This question involves very large interests undoubtedly. An exception has been made of the Ottawa River. I know of very few others. I do not know of a single other case where the law has not been put in force.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I know of some.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I know of one in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The principle is that the water is not to be polluted and that the saw-dust is not to be thrown in the river because it destroys the fish. That is the principle of the law. There is a proviso here for dealing with exceptional cases.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That is the Ottawa River.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, the Ottawa if you wish, and cases where its enforcement is not requisite in the public interest. So far, the public interest has not been injured by the fact of saw-dust being thrown into the Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Oh yes it has.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Not as compared with interests that have been benefited by the fact of the establishment of all these large mills here. There is an immense trade in lumber done in this city.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The same argument applies to all other places.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—What saw-dust has been thrown into the river has left it navigable, so far, for the class of vessels navigating it. There are very few places that are so shallow that steamers cannot pass.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Does the hon. gentleman know that there are deposits of saw-dust 60 feet deep in some places in this Ottawa River?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I suppose there are, but if you have 20 feet of water over the saw-dust that is sufficient. I know there are pools where the saw-dust has collected and it may be 60 feet deep, but if there is 20 feet of water over that saw-dust there is sufficient for navigation.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—There are places where there are not 5 feet of water.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Perhaps in bays, but the navigation of the channel has not been interrupted. It may have been injured a little. I admit it has lost a certain amount of its value, but you cannot compare that diminution with the immense trade in lumber that has been established here.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That may be said of every other big gang mill throughout all Canada.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, if it did not affect the fisheries any more than it did here. The object in preventing saw-dust being thrown into the river is the protection of the fish.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not the fish alone. There is the navigation too.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This is not a bill to provide for navigation, but of course if it does destroy navigation you most protect the river for navigation also. But the main object in preventing the saw-dust being thrown into the river is the protection of the fish. There were no fish here to protect, and so far the saw-dust has been allowed to drop into the river, and it has impeded, I admit, in certain places the navigation but has not destroyed it. There is sufficient water at present for navigation. The attention of the Government has been recently drawn to this matter when Mr. Booth's mill was destroyed and it has been thought that before he rebuilds not to permit the saw-dust to escape into the river in the future.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Strike out this proviso and he has the warning.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I cannot agree with the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. It is too sweeping for the present.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Was this proviso omitted when the bill was introduced in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I am told that it was not in the bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then evidently the policy of the Government in introducing this bill was to enforce this regulation with regard to all rivers.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—We do, and that is the principle of the bill, with a few exceptions.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Those exceptions spoil the whole bill.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It may have caused some inconvenience in a few cases, but I point out the great advantages that have arisen also from not enforcing the regulations as to certain rivers. I propose to ask the House to allow this clause to stand, so that the Government may have an opportunity of considering it further.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have no objection to let it remain as a notice for the third reading.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—It is the desire of every member of the Government to meet the objection in this case. It is a hardship, and the subject is in their minds. They have been talking of it, within the last 24 hours—within a shorter time than that, but here, we are to-day at the end of the session with a very thin House and a thin House in the other Chamber also. The resolution would cause legislation in the House, and postpone the prorogation of Parliament perhaps a week, perhaps 10 days.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Not an hour.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I think it would, and it might postpone it perhaps longer, because it is a very important question and the Government should meet it as soon as possible, and although they have been delinquent, you can see the reason of it. It was ordered by a power that we have no control over, that the gentleman who made those promises which have been mentioned should be taken away from us. Others came in, and it was not brought to their knowledge, but here we are now within six or seven months of another session, and what I would say is this, that early next session—

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh no.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—You will be here three weeks if you undertake to make this amendment now. Early next session the Government's attention will be called to it, and no doubt a bill will be introduced in this House to meet the difficulty. I, for one, will prompt it if God spares me to be here, and if my hon. friend would meet us on this occasion and allow us to finish up the business, we will promise him—and he will be here I hope to help us next session—to try and put an end to the existing state of things.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—If the Government will really give any sort of pledge or assurance that they will be prepared next session to legislate on this matter, that is a different affair altogether. I was not aware that my hon. friend opposite was going to bring up the subject to-day, but when he did I was moved to send for this profile plan, which I have here, which was given to me by a gentleman known to be one of the best hydraulic engineers of the country, Mr. Keefer. It shows a very alarming state of things, not only this depth of saw-dust in certain bays and channels, but it shows by a comparative line that in many parts of the river this deposit is becoming so deep that there is not anything like the depth of water the hon. gentleman speaks of between the top of the saw-dust and the keels of the vessels which navigate the river. I must confess that it has always been a matter of profound astonishment to me, ever since we have been holding our sessions in Ottawa, that the pollution of the Ottawa River has been allowed to go on from year to year. No one can be blind to the importance of the interests involved, but when we know that in other places the saw-dust is not only burnt but turned to very valuable account, it does not seem that it would be impossible to do the same here. At Deseronto every particle of the saw-dust is utilized, and what can be done in one place can surely be done in another, but while it may be hard on mill-owners to make a change of that kind without due notice, it can hardly be said that they have not had warning given year after year. As far back as 1891, when the late Sir John Abbott was leader in this House, the subject was discussed in the Senate and since then it has been brought up again repeatedly. I cannot conceive it possible that the Government can allow one of the most magnificent streams we have in Canada to be filled up as it is probable the Ottawa will be filled up if the present state of things is allowed to continue. Apart altogether from the injury to the fish and to the navigation of the stream, we should consider the sanitary conditions also. We know that fermentation goes on in those deposits, and from time to time there have been some very violent explosions from gas supposed to be generated in these saw-dust heaps. Altogether I think the condition of the Ottawa River now calls for some remedial measure. I can understand that it is hardly apropos to this Fisheries Bill, but if the hon. gentleman opposite consents to postpone his amendment, I hope that we shall have some sort of pledge from the Government that measures will be taken very early next session to try and put an end to the existing state of things.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I did not get notice of this amendment; I did not know it was coming on. I am very glad to see that the hon. gentleman from Rideau accepts my proposal to let it stand. I may be in a position on Monday to deal with the question and state what the intention of the Government is, whether a bill shall be introduced this session or whether we shall wait until another session to take up this question. I would ask that the clause and the amendment of the hon. gentleman be allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I did not give notice of it because I did not know myself that I should have to move. I thought when the bill was introduced in the lower House that it met all the objections that I had, and it was only last night that I found this proviso had been introduced, it was the only intimation I had of it. I will tell the hon. gentleman now that I know of my own personal knowledge, that in some places in the Ottawa River there are only four or five feet of water where there used to be twenty-five or thirty feet, that all the bays between here and Grenville are filled up with sawdust, and that the water as far down as Montreal is being polluted and the people are suffering severely. It is high time that something should be done. I have been urging this matter four or five years and we had a large committee one year and brought people before us who understood the question, and dealt exhaustively with it, and the committee and this House all came to the conclusion that this nuisance should not be allowed to be continued. After the observations of the leader of the House, I am willing to allow this matter to stand. I have no intention to injuriously interfere with the operations of the Government in any way, but I want to get a decisive understanding that this important question is to be attended to and settled definitely next year if it is dropped this session.

Some hon. SENATORS—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—We must be reasonable.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We have been reasonable too long.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.), from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the bill, and asked leave to sit again.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (147) "An Act respecting a certain Treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the French Republic."—(Mr. Angers.)

The Senate adjourned at 6.15 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 16th July, 1894.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Before we proceed with the Orders of the Day, I rise with great pleasure to propose that an Address of congratulation be offered to Her Majesty the Queen upon the occasion of the birth of a son to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of York. The people of Canada have always shared in the griefs of the Royal Family whenever by the hand of Providence they have been visited. It is right, therefore, that when a joyful event occurs, as such events occur often, I may say, in the Royal family, we Canadians and the subjects of Her Majesty throughout the Empire join in thanking Providence, and in extending our congratulations to our beloved Queen. Composed as we Canadians are, of different nationalities and creeds, this is a fitting opportunity to offer to our beloved Queen a tribute of our devotion and our attachment to her crown and person. While other countries are scenes of violence and bloodshed, and when rulers and potentates are struck down by the assasin's dagger, it is right that we should acknowledge that our prayers to God to bless the Queen have been heard and answered and that the Almighty has been pleased to bless the Queen in her person and in her family and in her subjects. I therefore move :

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty :

Most gracious Sovereign :

We, Your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, most humbly beg to tender Your Majesty our cordial congratulations upon the birth of a son to His Royal Highness the Duke and Her Royal Highness the Duchess of York ; and we beg leave most respectfully to assure Your Majesty of the great joy and satisfaction which we derive from this auspicious event.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In seconding the proposal to present an address of congratulation to our sovereign lady the Queen on the auspicious occasion of the birth of a great grandson, I not only, I am sure, echo the sentiments of every hon. gentlemen of this Chamber, but of every member of the Canadian family irrespective of race or creed, or the country from which they come. I doubt if, in any part of Her Majesty's dominions, a more loyal and devoted people exist than in the Dominion of Canada. Englishmen in visiting Canada have often been struck with the presence of the Union Jack and the Royal Arms with the "God save the Queen" on the very many occasions on which Canadians are only too happy to express their loyalty to the head of our great Empire. Apart altogether from her personal qualifications, she is typically the centre of the first constitutional government in the world. She has happily reigned over her people now for a period of 57 years, and as has been observed by the hon. leader of the House, Providence has blessed her with the certainty that her race is to continue in possession of that throne for centuries to come. Her progeny have been numerous and there is almost a certainty that the race of which she may, to a certain extent, be said to be the founder, will continue to be the sovereigns of that realm. There was a time, not many years ago, when we had to import a sovereign from Germany. The race of the Stuarts, had run out and we obtained a sovereign from abroad. We know very well that it took a long time for the English people to be thoroughly reconciled to what was, apparently, somewhat of a foreign importation, but today happily there is at the head of this great Empire a Queen who has been, probably, par excellence, the greatest constitutional head of a government that modern times has seen. The greatest reforms have been granted during her reign. The democracy that overturned thrones in countries not far off—I might mention France and Spain and other countries of Europe—was met fairly and properly by the English sovereign and the rights of man were guaranteed under the constitution of the country, thus strengthening the ties which existed between the sovereign and her people. It is a long and important subject. We all must feel proud that we are in a position to-day to offer those congratulations to Her Majesty. I need only add that the proposal will meet with approval all over this land and we all hope that her Majesty may continue long to hold the position she does as Queen of this Realm.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have further pleasure to move that a message be sent from this House congratulating His Royal Highness the Duke of York and Her Royal Highness the Duchess of York on the joyful occasion of the birth of a son to Their Royal Highnesses.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have the honour to move that an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General in the following words :—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir John Campbell Hamilton-Gordon, Earl of Aberdeen, Viscount Formartime, Baron Haddo, Methlic, Tarves and Kellie in the Peerage of Scotland, Viscount Gordon of Aberdeen, County of Aberdeen, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, Baronet of Nova Scotia, Governor of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency :—

We, Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, have resolved to send a message of congratulation to Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of York upon the joyful occasion of the birth of a son to Their Royal Highnesses.

We beg leave to approach Your Excellency with our respectful request that you will be pleased to transmit the said message to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of York in such way as Your Excellency may see fit.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (145) "An Act further to amend the Fisheries Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—When the committee rose, we were considering clause 14 and had some discussion as to the meaning of "tidal waters." I gave it as my impression and opinion that the term "tidal waters" meant that portion of the sea where the water flows and recedes. By referring to Webster's International Dictionary I find that that interpretation is the true one—"water affected by the flow of the tide hence broadly the sea board" is the meaning given of tidal waters, or tide waters, but as it is better to make this perfectly plain, and as I am informed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that it is not the intention to prevent the drifting of nets at a certain distance from the sea shore, which is absolutely necessary during the Saturday night and Sunday all day so that fisherman may have bait for the next Monday morning, I have to offer to the House a new clause which will make it much plainer and will only necessitate the raising of nets and seines within a given limit. As to the time that those seines have to be lifted there is no change in the proposed clause from what the old law was.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I am glad my amendment gives my hon. friend pleasure. The clause I have to offer will be in the following words:

14. From the time of low water nearest six of the clock in the afternoon of every Saturday to the time of low water nearest six of the clock in the forenoon of every Monday in tidal waters, and from six of the clock in the afternoon of every Saturday to six of the clock in the forenoon of the following Monday in non-tidal waters, all sedentary fishing stations and weirs, and all pound and trap-nets, seines, gill-nets and other apparatus used for catching fish under license, shall be so raised, closed and adapted so as to admit of the free passage of fish through, by, or out of the same, and during such close time no one shall catch fish in such sedentary fishing stations, weirs, pounds or trap-nets, seines, gill-nets or other apparatus used for catching fish under license.

Therefore this restriction will only apply to nets and fishing apparatus for which a license must be obtained, which is not the case for nets set out from the shore for the purpose of catching herring or bait.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It is confined to what we call traps.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Traps, I suppose, would apply to the catching of lobsters.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. Minister congratulates me on the fact that I am pleased with this amendment. Naturally I am pleased, because if the contention of the hon. gentleman and some of his supporters in this House when dealing with this matter before had been adhered to, this very important concession would not have been made to the fishermen. By this amendment the law is fixed practically as it stands in the Revised Statutes, because no licenses are required to catch mackerel and herring, and licenses are required to catch salmon; so that substantially the law remains as it stands now. The hon. gentleman should have congratulated the Senate upon the fact that this body had been the instrument of making a very great improvement, indeed, in the bill as submitted by the Government. If the fishermen throughout this country could only become aware of this most important change and improvement, you would not get many of them to vote for abolishing the Senate, for some little time at any rate.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am sure the leader of the House is pleased to know that through the opposition given to his bill, the close criticism by my hon. friend from Halifax and myself, avoiding all doubts and uncertainties as to the meaning of the clause, an amendment has been made which is so much in the interest of the fishermen.

I am sure he did not view the opposition made on this side of the House as being offered in a captious spirit.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, I never do.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It was done in the interest of a large portion of the people in the Maritime Provinces. I am glad that the opposition of my hon. friend, supported by myself and others, had the effect of improving the bill in several essential particulars.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I never take a suggestion from anybody in this House as being made with the intention either of embarrassing me (although it often does I suppose) or of obstructing or injuring legislation, and in this instance, if I had not been a member of the Senate myself, I should have exalted the Senate in my congratulations on the great improvement made in the law, but my natural modesty prevented me doing that and I left it to the hon. member from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I might ask the hon. leader of the Government if the members representing St. John City were consulted in this matter, because we have a peculiar fishing privilege in the harbour which I think this word "sedentry" would apply to. We have stationary traps there. I do not think these fishermen could open the traps during the hours you describe, and it would greatly inconvenience them. We have an Imperial charter for the city of St. John, and under that charter I think the city of St. John sells the privilege of fishing.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, the charter of the harbour of St. John is for the purposes of the harbour, for the purposes of building wharfs and for putting out lights and buoys and reaping the benefits therefrom, but it does not apply to the fish coming from the high seas. If all the fish that went to St. John never came out perhaps we would allow them to kill every one of them, but as migrating fish will go beyond St. John, it is not right that the fishermen of that city should have an advantage which all the fishermen of the coast of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and on the St. Lawrence have not. As to those set traps, they have to be opened on the St. Lawrence and on the Baie des Chaleurs and in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as well. It is done by leaving the traps or the box open. You do not have to destroy the standing traps but you simply have to leave the box open.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I think there is a misapprehension about this matter. I know that since I was a boy, the city of St. John always sold privileges of fishing with traps in the harbour.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They would do that because of the fact that they own the soil, but they do not own the fish.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—And I believe they do it with proper authority and I have an objection to the Dominion taking that authority from them.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—We do not do that.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—You use the word "sedentary," I would call it stationary appliances. The stationary appliances are being used in the harbour of St. John and I know that those appliances are trap-nets. Fish get in there at high tide and cannot get out. I do not think it would be possible to come under the law as you describe it here, and unless those parties were consulted before such a law was passed, I would be disposed to oppose it.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Those traps are used in many parts of Nova Scotia and the same privilege is exercised there and whatever rights they get under the old law they will still have under this.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one suggestion of the hon. gentleman from St. John worth considering, and that is the addition of the word "stationary." The word "sedentary" is a word liable to be misapprehended by unlettered people. If you insert the word "stationary" it will remove all possible doubt.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—One is wider than the other; and the word "stationary" is limited. It would apply to the floating net from the shore whilst the other would not.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I think there is a misconception about that law. I do not refer to the law of Canada. I have reference to the law given by the British Government to the city of St. John which gives them the privilege of selling fishing privileges of the harbour, and unless the Government has ascertained whether I am right or not, I think it is dangerous to pass a law which possibly might come in conflict with the power which I know they have. It is not a law passed since confederation, but is one anterior to that—100 years back. I know, of my own knowledge, that they have had that privilege for 50 years. They always have sold the fishing privileges every year and still do it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—By this law we do not take from the harbour of St. John the privilege which they claim of giving licenses. You will have that in the same way, but we say all those nets and so on shall be raised from Saturday to Monday morning. You do not object to that?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a matter of fact, the clause before us does not materially alter the law as it stands at present.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It makes it more general. It was limited to salmon, but it is now made to apply to all fish.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not investigated the question as to the fisheries of St. John, but my impression is that the Minister of Agriculture is correct, that the corporation of St. John own the fish in their capacity of riparian proprietors, and that does not oust the right of the Dominion Government to make regulations as to the fisheries. The hon. gentleman from St. John should be pleased to find that the shad and other fish which come up there will have an opportunity of going up the river and to multiply as they will under this enactment.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I may state to the hon. gentleman that the case of St. John is not the only one of that character. In Quebec there are hundreds of miles of shore on the St. Lawrence exactly in the same position, the title being held under the King of France previous to the cession of the country giving to the seigneurs the right of fishing in the St. Lawrence or in the sea adjoining. Notwithstanding that they have had to submit, in the common interest of the nation, to the regulations calculated to protect fish.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not wish to be understood as opposing the protection of fish; on the contrary, I am in favour of it, but I thought it my duty to point out that the corporation of St. John had a special power or privilege given to them by the British Government perhaps one hundred years ago, and I felt it but right that I should make it known in order to avoid any conflict or misunderstanding. Of course, if the hon. Minister says that there is no interference with that privilege, I am perfectly satisfied.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The amendments proposed by the hon. member from Rideau is to strike the whole of the proviso out of that paragraph and substitute the following:

Provided always that the provisions of this section shall not apply until on and after the first of May, 1895, to the saw-mill-owners and employees of any saw-mill situated on any stream which was wholly or partially exempted from the operation of subsection 2 of section 15 hereby repealed.

Now the purpose of this amendment is to remove from the Minister of Marine or the Governor in Council the power to make a distinction in the public interests to allowing saw-dust to be thrown into the river. The exemption, so far, I believe, has only been applied to favour the lumbermen on the Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—One other.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Which other?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Mr. Gibson, of New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not know whether he has a permit. Will the chairman say whether he does that under the authority of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I think so.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It may be done in violation of the law, but the important exception refers specially to the immense lumber trade of Ottawa which is to be calculated by millions of dollars. Is it right that upon such short notice this amendment should prevail over what has been done in the past? What will it accomplish? It is not for the purpose of preserving the fish, because I do not suppose there are $500 worth of fish in the Ottawa River between here and Montreal. There never was much fish in the Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes, there was.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—We have always supplied them here chiefly from the east, and the fishing interest should not be made a ground for harassing the immense trade which has built up this place. There is another reason why it is asked for—the danger of making the navigation of the Ottawa less advantageous than it is now. That is a serious objection, and one which the Government has looked at earnestly quite recently. I hope on this point I am in a position to satisfy the hon. member who has moved this amendment and that he will be good enough not to insist upon it and to allow the clause to pass as it now stands, under the following undertaking: The Department of Public Works and the Department of Marine and Fisheries are arranging for a joint inquiry into the subject of exempting any stream from the operation of the Act relating to the deposit of saw-dust, with a view to such legislation as may be required this session.

We do not know when this House is going to close, but very soon after prorogation the House will be called again to meet, so that when we speak of next session we speak of a short period of time, and I hope therefore that the amendment will be withdrawn. There has already been an inquiry and there is a report from Mr. Fleming on the subject. Until this inquiry has been completed and until the Government is in a position to give those mill-owners sufficient notice not to throw their saw-dust into the river, and until steps are taken to restore the Ottawa to its normal depth, I hope the hon. gentleman will not insist upon the amendment but allow the proviso to stand as it is now.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I hope the hon. member from Rideau will not weaken in the position he has taken. Evidently the leader of the House has not his usual earnestness and force of conviction in the argument that he uses. He evidently does not feel strongly on the matter. Otherwise he would have treated this matter differently from what he has done. It is evident that this lumber industry has been terrorizing the legislature of this country. We had this question up three or four years ago and the assurance was given then this terrible nuisance would be abated. Fancy seventy feet in depth of saw-dust in the bed of this river under our eyes, and the explosions caused by the decomposition of such an enormous accumulation! It is a bad example to set to the whole country. If this river can be exempted in the public interest, I cannot see why any river in Nova Scotia cannot be exempted for the same reason. The same thing might be allowed to go there. It is impossible for us to enforce this law unless it is made general. We should not have partial legislation. If my hon. friend can show that longer time is required than until next May to make this change in the mills of Ottawa, there might be some reason in it, but my hon. friend will not say that it will take longer than until next May. Let the Senate do its duty now. Let us have no more vacillation. No such chance may soon again offer. Rather than lose the bill, the Government will accept the amendment.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It can be made in a short time. I have no sympathy with those lumbermen in their persistent defiance of the law. The public interest would be served and the lumber trade would go on just as well if the mill-owners were not so stubborn. They have made fortunes while depleting our forests. I believe our country would have been better off if those forests had been allowed to remain instead of being exposed to waste, havoc and destruction, with comparatively little benefit to any one else than the lessees of the timber limits and the mill-owners. These men have got rich, and I do not see why we should allow them to terrorize over us, because they are possessed of great power and influence. Their influence is very great even with members of Parliament and with the Government, and the Government should not be placed in such a position that they might yield to it. We should have an impartial law, which they shall be obliged to administer to all alike. It is a power which, in their own interest, should not be left in the hands of the Government. The proviso is not in the public interest. Where I have tried to have this law enforced rigidly in Nova Scotia, I have been told, "Look at Ottawa." If the Act can be violated in Ottawa by the sanction of the Government, why should we expect the small streams of Nova Scotia to come under the law?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those gentlemen who had the opportunity of looking at the map exhibited here the other day will have very little difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to the course they should pursue on this subject. We have a magnificent river. It used to be called the Grand River and it was looked upon as the highway from the St. Lawrence to the great lakes. It was the highway that the great navigators 200 years ago followed to go to the North-west, and it is the natural highway of the country. In any other country than Canada that highway would now be occupied by a fleet of vessels. There is no shorter route between the great west and tide water than by the Ottawa River. It is hundreds of miles shorter than any other route and vessels can navigate it more safely. The low rate of insurance as compared with the insurance on vessels passing through the great lakes would pay the interest annually on a very considerable amount of the cost of improving the navigation of the Ottawa River. But there are no votes in the Ottawa valley. It has nobody to represent it—there are no members of Parliament coming from along the banks of the Ottawa except a comparitively few, and the influence of the lumber trade on the saw-dust question has been very strong—too strong apparently for any government to resist. No government that I am aware of has for a moment attempted to justify the destruction of so noble a river. In front of this city, opposite Nepean Point, there are 30 or 40 feet of saw-dust and more or less at various points between this city and Montreal. This Senate appointed a very numerous body of its members to investigate this subject eight or ten years ago. They made a very strong report upon it. The evidence is uncontradicted. Captains of boats appeared before the committee and swore positively that the navigation of the Ottawa was becoming year and year more difficult, and all through the mill refuse deposited in the river. Forty years ago the lumber trade was in its infancy. As has been observed by an hon. gentleman, it has passed that stage. We passed a short time ago a bill for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Ottawa,—opening up the Ottawa River by a canal system to Lake Huron. I can remember myself, 30 or 40 years ago, when I took part in an agitation and when money was voted to commence canaling the Ottawa. Money was voted and work done at the Chats that went a considerable distance towards completing one section of the canal. Unfortunately at that time Canada's credit was not as good as it is to-day, and that work had to be abandoned. That was 35 or 40 years ago, when Mr. Egan represented the county of Ottawa. After that the Grand Trunk Railway and other railways on the front absorbed public attention and drew away the public funds to build up those enterprises, but it is quite certain if this river were in the possession of any other people, it would not remain in its present condition long. I look back at the utterances of hon. gentlemen and I am amazed that after 3 or 4 years their promises are still unfulfilled. Let us take up the House of Commons "Hansard" for 1890. I find that the Hon. Mr. Tupper, then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, was making some amendments to a bill entitled "An Act for the protection of navigable waters." He had to make an apology that he was not then repealing the particular clause to which the amendment now before us is directed. Mr. Tupper said:

> The second clause of the bill is of a more important character and I purpose to repeal the clause of the statute as it now stands, giving power to the Governor in Council to exempt any rivers or streams from the operation of the Act and to permit those mill-owners who now enjoy an exemption under the old statute to make preparations during the next year to dispose of the saw-dust and prevent its deposit in streams and waters; and after that the Act shall apply equally.

Those were the words of the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That is what he thought and what the Government thought and what they promised Parliament to do in 1890. The question had been brought up repeatedly before them. And what did Mr. Abbott say? Did he defend it? No, he apologizes just as Mr. Tupper did.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not do less than they do.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The time for apologies has gone by. The year has expired and another year and another year and another and a fifth year has been added to the list since that promise was made. If it were not possible to dispose of the sawdust otherwise, I would not press it, but any one who has travelled through the western country, who has seen the mills cutting millions and millions of feet of lumber, with their tall chimneys burning up that refuse and not spoiling their harbours and rivers will say that it can be done here. If it can be done there why cannot it be done here? It is a pure matter of dollars and cents. In 1891, Sir John Abbott made another apology for its being continued. He says:

> I have not had much opportunity myself to investigate this matter, but it appears to be the general opinion of my colleagues, in so far as I have gone into the question, that the exception which prevails in favour of the Ottawa River ought to be abrogated, and I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw his bill for this year, in order that the mill-owners may not be too suddenly, by force, compelled to make changes which would be very expensive and inconvenient. My hon. friend has been good enough on that consideration to agree to withdraw his bill for this year, with the understanding, as far as I can say such an understanding can be arrived at beforehand, that his measure will receive the assistance of this Government, if it should be in power, in the year to come.

Those are the utterances of gentlemen who spoke for the Government of this country, and I ask hon. gentlemen whether, at the present time, they are prepared to sacrifice the interests of the people of this country in order that a few gentlemen may be benefited to the amount of a few thousand dollars a year. During the debate in 1891 several hon. gentlemen from the lower provinces joined in it, and there was a good deal of indignation expressed that those favours should be extended to the wealthy mill-owners of the Ottawa, and not granted to the mill-owners on the various streams in the eastern provinces. An hon. gentleman says:

> Why should small one-horse saw-mills like ours be stopped when, if we go to Ottawa and look down upon the prettiest scene that can be found in the whole Dominion of Canada, you will see the river covered with saw-dust and no attempt is made to stop the practice of throwing it into the river? We bring strangers to the capital and show them the beautiful grounds, and the hills across the river. We show them the falls, but you can hardly find any part of the river below the falls that is not covered with saw-dust and mill refuse. It is a disgrace that right under the parliament buildings, right in the face of the Government, this evil has been allowed to exist to the present day.

The Hon. Mr. Snowball took strong ground on that occasion and maintained that the mill men down on streams not navigable except for canoes and boats were obliged to conform to the law, and yet this river is to be destroyed, not only its beauty but its utility also, in order that the mill-owners may be saved a few thousand dollars a year. If they were men commencing in the industry, if they were struggling—

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—It is not a question of saving money for them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Suppose it were put on the ground of expense, which was the ground on which Mr. Abbott asked for one year, that it was inconvenient and that it would put them to some trouble and expense, we have given them 10 years,—we have given them 30 years. It has been going on for over 30 years. Are we to go on for another generation? Will not our children hold us responsible when the river is absolutely destroyed? How are you going to remove the saw-dust? We had a sample of it here. A couple of years ago the river at the foot of the locks was blocked. You could not get a boat out. Common dredging will not do it. Then again there are constant explosions taking place. It is not safe to go out on the river. You may be thrown into the air at any moment. You take a body of saw-dust that is 25 or 30 feet deep; the cold water does not permeate to the bottom and heating goes on and fermentation takes place, gases form and the whole thing is blown up, often with such force that in the winter ice three or four feet thick has been broken as if it were only an inch thick. Nothing can resist so powerful an explosion. Under these conditions I think the Government, if there is any seriousness about it at all, should take action at once. If it is more important that two or three gentlemen should be permitted to make an extra $8,000 or $10,000 a year than that the navigation of the Ottawa River should be preserved, then give it to them gracefully, but do not let us go on making promises that we will do it in another year and so on, or else it will go into the next generation.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—There has never been a subject brought up in this House in which I have had such immediate and direct interest, or felt so strongly about, as this one. I gave my evidence before the committee which was appointed at the instance of the Hon. Mr. Clemow. I am not sure that I am correct, but I think I am. I told the committee that there was no trouble at all in burning the saw-dust, that I had been that summer up round the Georgian Bay, and that I had seen the mills all round there destroying their refuse in that way. One of the bugbears held up to us at that time by the late Mr. Perley was that if you built a big chimney to burn the saw-dust and refuse you would endanger the mills roundabout it. That is not the case at all, because the largest mill I know on Georgian Bay is at Waubusheue, owned by the Dodges, and they burned up every kind of refuse right in the middle of the lumber piles. If ever there was a time when this should be attended to it is now. Mr. Booth speaks of rebuilding his mill, so the papers say. He is the largest lumberman in the country, and if he is going to rebuild his mill it is quite as easy for him to construct it so that he can burn up the saw-dust and the refuse as to construct it in the old way. I do not agree with the hon. member from Ottawa (Mr. Scott) that it will cost so many thousands of dollars a year at all. All that it costs is simply the machinery and about one man to it—two men if they work night and day, and that will destroy the whole of what is now ruining the Ottawa River. It is a disgrace to our country to think that our river is being ruined from year to year, and for what? Not for any use. They can just as well burn their saw-dust and refuse as other saw-mills throughout the country. They burn it everywhere else and why not burn it here? If the present opportunity is not taken advantage of, Mr. Booth would have a good right to say next year if he rebuilds, "Well before I built why didn't you tell me, and I would have built so as to use up my saw-dust and refuse." It is not often that I have anything to say against what the Government proposes, but I think in the present case if ever there was a time when an evil practice should be put a stop to it is now. I do not often agree entirely with the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, but I certainly must agree with him now. This evil has been going on unchecked for the last 30 years. When is it going to stop? I think the time to stop it is now, and the quicker we stop it the better.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It has been stated that the Senators of the United States have been suspected of being under the influence of the sugar trust. Certainly it would not be stated here that the Senate of Canada is under the influence of the saw-dust men, because one article is much less palatable than the other. Referring to the amendment proposed I have begged for delay, but as the hon. gentleman will notice I did not put this forward as a pressing request or as an obligation that the House must comply with it. I am very willing always to rely upon the wisdom of the House. I cannot take upon myself the responsibility of amending this bill in the sense proposed, but certainly I do not propose to exercise any coercion; I never wish to exercise undue pressure upon the members of the House, and if it is their wish and desire that this remedy shall be applied now, I shall readily comply.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have taken a very lively interest in this matter for a number of years. The argument of the hon. leader of the House would be perfectly in order if this were the first time the question had been mooted in this House, but unfortunately four or five years have expired since I brought it up and nothing has been done. If these men had any feeling of delicacy at all, knowing the intense feeling from one end of the country to the other on the subject, they would have been the first to act, because the Government have been protecting them from year to year. The Government are the trustees of the country, and they have no right to allow our river to be destroyed, any more than any ordinary trustee would be justified in allowing property placed in his hands to be damaged. I think they have committed a great wrong on the people of the country. The river should be open to all and not monopolized by anybody I care not who he is. I know as much of this trade as any man in the Senate. I know what it was and what it is at present, and I know that these gentlemen who came here and made fortunes have made them out of the country. They came here poor men, many of them, and have made all their money out of this country. Had our Government taken care of the timber of the country, I believe the value of it would have been sufficient to pay a large portion of our national debt. Taking all this into consideration we are not much indebted to these lumbermen. They may be entitled to a great deal of praise for the way they have conducted their business, but when a great question of this kind comes up I think we are in duty bound to look at the general interest of the country irrespective of what interest it may affect private or otherwise. I am twitted every day and told that the Government will not interfere with those men. But I do not believe that. The Government have been following a wrong course but I believe they have been actuated by what they thought were proper motives. But the time has now arrived when the evil should be put a stop to. If we delay it, we will find the same objections urged next year. I want to give them a reasonable time. I want to give them to the first of May, 1895, and they can make all the necessary preparations to do away with the nuisance with advantage to themselves. In Deseronto they make that refuse into gas and burning material, and they can make money out of it. Why can they not do the same thing here? What does it amount to? A few hundred dollars. But irrespective of that, I think they should be the first men to assist the Government in getting rid of the nuisance. I do not think the Government, in their own interests, should ask to have this matter postponed for another year. They should place the responsibility on the representatives of the people. The Government would very often save themselves a great deal of trouble and difficulty by throwing the responsibility, in certain matters on the representatives of the people. If we adopt this amendment, we will hear nothing more of the great destruction of the river between here and Montreal. There is also danger to human life from these deposits of saw-dust. The year before last an explosion took place at New Edinburgh, which, had it taken place an hour later, would probably have resulted in the killing of 300 or 400 children. The hon. member from Toronto was there, and had it been one hour later he would probably have lost his life. I am acquainted with this business as well as any man in Ottawa, and I can say that it is doing no service to the people to allow this nuisance to exist, and the very moment you pass this enactment the mill-owners will find a remedy. The Government must give the people of the country the free use of the river. They are entitled to it. You are now arranging to build a canal. You cannot do it. It is going to cost a great deal of money to remove that refuse from the bed of the river and make the channel navigable. It will cost more than any one can imagine. There are seventy-two feet of saw-dust deposited on the line of the inter-provincial bridge between here and Hull, and it would cost some two or three thousand dollars to remove that, I do not know whether that some would do it. If we were to remove this refuse from the Ottawa River, it will involve an enormous expense which the people of the country will have to bear. I think there will be a complaint made against the Government if they do not take advantage of the present opportunity to say: "You shall stop this nuisance." It is high time this law was passed.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Does that amendment apply to the River St. John as well as to the Ottawa River?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Certainly, every river.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Because the River St. John is a more important river than the Ottawa. It is one of the greatest fish rivers in the world, and why the Goverment would take such trouble to preserve the fish in the River St. John and then allow the fish to be destroyed, I cannot understand.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh yes, it would apply to that river.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I had the privilege and pleasure of going through that mill of Mr. Booth's which was burnt recently, from the driving wheels to the upper story, under the conduct of one of the proprietors, and knowing something practically about mills, I have been a little amused I must say at the remarks of the hon. gentlemen of the legal profession, in minimizing the difficulties that exist in the way of preventing this nuisance, if nuisance it be, and from the remarks which I have heard I should say it is decidedly a nuisance here. As that mill was constructed it was almost impossible to have made the necessary arrangements. That I know; I speak practically. I went from the driving wheels to the top of the building and I was in conversation with one of the proprietors about this very matter, and I say it would have been almost impossible to have provided a method, as that mill was constructed, of burning the saw-dust. The conditions are altered and the mill is destroyed, and if at any time this reform is to be carried out, this is the time to do it. It can be done now without apparent difficulty or very heavy cost.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I wish to rely upon the experience of men who understand something about saw-mills. I know nothing about them myself, but I have the idea that has just been expressed by the hon. gentleman that in some mills it is not so easy as one would believe ; therefore I would rely also on the wisdom of the House to determine whether the time that is suggested is sufficiently long.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Respecting the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Primrose), I would say that Mr. Booth is more criminal than I thought. He rebuilt this mill last year and the notification was given him some four years ago. I was under the impression that as a wise and sensible man, he did make the necessary arrangements to put away the saw-dust, but now the hon. gentleman says that such is not the case. I say that he is not entitled to any consideration if the hon. gentleman's statement is correct. He has had ample notice, and he should have made the arrangements for it. The remarks of the hon. gentleman convince me more and more of the necessity of making this clause operative soon, so that these men will not have the opportunity of saying "Oh, I built my mill and you did not tell me." I am informed that Mr. Booth did make the necessary arrangements to keep the saw-dust out of the river, and I can get the evidence—I can get the men who superintended the building of that mill to establish the fact.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I suppose it is understood that this law will apply to ashes as well as to saw-dust.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Most certainly ; I am prepared to prevent any man in the land from polluting the waters of the river. You can apply the law to the fullest extent, and I will go with you. I believe in keeping the streams pure.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I wish to call the attention of the leader of the House to this fact, that as he is now Minister of Agriculture he should consider what will benefit agriculture not only in Canada generally, but particularly in this neighbourhood. The ashes from the burning of the saw-dust would be of value as a fertilizer. I know that pine ashes do not contain a great deal of potash, but still there is enough to make the ashes valuable as manure and they should pay the expense of burning the saw-dust. If you let the present practice go on, you will add continually to the expense of ultimately getting the river deepened. In an economical sense there will be a greater advantage in stopping now and not allowing any longer the saw-dust to go into the river.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Did you ever know of potash being made of pine ashes ?

Hon. Mr DEVER—I am aware that ashes made from mill refuse will sell for sixpence a barrel. I have paid that price for it myself, and I know we cannot get it now because it is sold off in large quantities for fertilizing.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I did not say that you should make potash out of the ashes, but that it was the potash in the ashes that made them valuable for manure.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—But my hon. friend suggested these large chimneys, it all goes off in smoke, leaving no ashes which is much like our immaterial talk to-day.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 8,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a clause which I think the Senate should not accept. It is proposed to strike out subsection 3 of section 18 and to substitute this for it. This is a more sweeping and arbitrary provision than the existing one. Some of the offences under this law are very trivial. The vessels used by fishermen are sometimes worth four or five thousand dollars. Their boats and nets are also exceedingly valuable. Under this proposed clause all that the fisherman owns may be taken from him and confiscated for a very trifling offence. There is no qualification—it does not provide that they shall be sold and the fine paid out of the proceeds of the sale, or anything of that kind, but simply that the vessel, boat, apparatus and everything shall be absolutely forfeited. What are the offences? It may be that the fisherman sets his net half an hour after the time it should be taken up under the Fisheries Act, or he may violate the close season in some trivial manner, but if he violates any of these provisions, some of the offences described being very trifling, for every offence under this Act a man forfeits his vessels, boats, nets, seines and everything. Everything is forfeited without any appeal. That is a most arbitrary and tyrannical enactment. We should leave the Act as it is—all implements used and fish caught shall be confiscated and in addition to that the party is liable to the penalties mentioned in the 7th clause. I move that this clause be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Why should we not make the laws apply to our own people exactly as we impose them on others? If a United States schooner comes into our waters and violates the law what do we do? We confiscate that vessel, which may be worth from ten to fifteen thousand dollars or more, and if our own fishermen do the very same thing should we be satisfied with merely confiscating their nets which would be worth from forty dollars to one hundred dollars? Is it right? I do not think it is. The law should be as stringent against our own people as against strangers, and why should not a man lose his vessels, his boats, his rafts, or vehicles when he is improperly carrying on the fishing industry? He knows quite well what he is doing. If he is fishing in the close season he is quite well informed of it. He runs his risk; he does so in the hope that he will not be caught. If he uses a canoe for spearing salmon in the river, why should he not lose that also, and his vehicles —why should he have the privilege of coming along the shore at night with horses and carts to do an illegal act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not mind the vehicles particularly.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Why not the vessels and boats?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The boats ought to be.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—A man has a boat and uses it illegally and you do not want to confiscate it, yet you would punish a United States citizen by confiscating his boat.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The United States citizen violates our territory as well as our laws.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—He might have a license and he would then be on the very same footing as a Canadian, and yet he would be treated differently under this statute, unless we keep this clause which provides for the seizure of boats, canoes and vehicles. I think the law should be the same for our own people as for foreigners.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not know where to draw the line between vessels and boats. The vessels used in this sort of fishing are not so valuable as my hon. friend thinks. They are generally small boats, probably not worth more than $100 or $150.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have made my protest against this legislation. I think it is legislation such as you will not find on the statute book of any country in the world.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. Minister cannot point to any precedent of this character. I should not mind if this penalty applied to every serious offence, but it applies to every offence under this Act, every violation of any regulation made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. It is a provision which is tyrannical in the extreme, and if the hon. Minister will consult his colleagues about this clause he will probably find that they will be disposed to reconsider their action as they did in the case of the one we dealt with in the beginning of this sitting.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The offences under this Act are so easily committed and so difficult of detection that the punishment must be great.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The idea appears to be that you are to treat the unfortunate fishermen as enemies of the human race and that if a fisherman happens to step over the boundary in any way you confiscate all his property. If a man, whose family may not have bread enough to eat, happens to set his net a little too late, or in any way infringes on these regulations, then his property is to be confiscated on sight. There is nothing like it anywhere in the world.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The custom laws are as severe.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 9,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a provision of the same character as that which we have just adopted. It is calculated for the latitude of St. Petersburg, and not for this latitude. Under the English law there are numerous decisions as to what constitutes an offence, and under the English law, as laid down by the courts, if a fisherman catches a barrel of fish, the catching of each fish is not a separate offence, but the whole act constitutes one offence. Having made provisions of the most stringent character in other parts of the bill for the punishment of these offences, imposing forfeitures and heavy fines, fines which when one considers the circumstances of our fishermen generally are very heavy indeed, the Department of Marine and Fisheries have gone further and set aside the principles of English law and laid down that the taking of each particular fish is an offence. Just fancy if a man caught a barrel of fish, which might contain 200 fish, what the fine would amount to. It would be a fortune.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—$2,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to realize the enormity of the character of this clause. The provisions which are in the existing law are quite stringent and severe enough. The House has already taken action with regard to this measure which is calculated to raise it in the esteem of the country, and if it wishes to raise itself still more, it will certainly strike out this clause, which is a most obnoxious and objectionable one.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—On the last objection made by my hon. friend, I did not feel strongly enough with him to make a protest, but in this matter I must. There is no class of men that deserve more encouragement, aid and sympathy than the fishermen along the shore. They have inherent pluck, indomitable will-power and endurance. Their business fluctuates. They may have one prosperous season and the next one may be the reverse, and they are entitled to our sympathy. In a bad year, they may be driven by necessity, in providing for their families, to infringe the Act. To make the catching of each fish a separate offence is, to my mind, tyrannical—tyranny is hardly the word for it; it would be oppression in the worst form. I hope the leader of the House will not press the clause. The object of this law is to preserve and regulate the fisheries and to check the improper catching of fish. An example is all that is required, and it is not necessary, for the purpose of making an example, to impose such a heavy penalty. I do not think our fishery officials are as a rule tyrannical or injudicious, and when a moderate fine is imposed you can enforce the law; but if you impose such a penalty as this clause provides for, nobody will attempt to enforce the law—certainly it will not be enforced in the county from which I come. The perpetrator will have the sympathy of the people and he cannot be convicted. If my hon. friend wishes to have this law go into operation and have the effect designed, then let him alter that clause, otherwise, I do not think, in the county of Lunenburg at any rate, that that law can be put into operation effectually unless modified as suggested, so that the public may see that it is reasonable and in the interest of fishermen and the preservation of the fisheries.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The House will bear in mind the following provision in the law:—

> Whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the justice of the peace or fishery overseer, that the offence was committed in ignorance of the law, or because of the poverty of the defendant, the penalty imposed would be oppressive, a discretionary power may be exercised.

I think you should rely upon the sense of justice of the local magistrate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Why not?

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is not a thing that should be left to the discretion of the magistrates.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Such a judgment could not be properly put in force against a poor man, but it might be necessary that it should be put in force against a strong firm like the Le Bouthillier—a firm which might carry on fishing with enormous nets contrary to law. They may be so powerful that they should be punished in proportion to their offence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They forfeit all the nets anyway.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They forfeit the nets and the penalty should be calculated in proportion to the quantity of the fish taken.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A little while ago we had none of those regulations and a man could catch fish as he pleased.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—But the hon. gentleman is not going back to that time. He has permitted the principle that Parliament is bound to protect the public wealth in our fisheries, and this legislation is calculated to do it. We are not going back to the time when a man was allowed to kill and slaughter fish any way he pleased, with spears and explosives and by all possible means. It is in the interest of the fishermen that this law is made. It is not intended to cripple them, but it is intended for their own protection.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—But the severity of it is so great that it cannot be put into operation.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I think we err probably in the excessive penalty which is provided in this clause. Subsection 8 is a very severe one, and subsection 9 is much less so. If the general exemption clause, which has been read by the hon. Minister, were framed a little differently and with a certainty that it applied to sections 8 and 9, it might do something to modify it, but I do not think it really does. It is intended to apply only to the fines provided in section 18. If so, then the forfeiture of boats, vessels, &c., and also the penalties attached to killing or having in possession each individual fish, may be absolute.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think my hon. friend is quite right.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—This clause which has just been read by the Minister, beginning with "but whenever" should be made a separate clause and appended to the end of this bill as clause 9*a* or 10, and provide that the poverty of the offender shall be a ground for mitigating the severity of the penalty. To forfeit the whole apparatus of a man because of a breach of a regulation provided under this Act, for a offence committed perhaps in absolute ignorance, is extremely tyrannical.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The right to remit forfeiture and penalty is already in chapter 95 of the Statutes of 1886: "Persons aggrieved may appeal to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who may remit forfeiture and restore penalty." I have no objection to put this clause so that it will apply to all forfeitures and penalties—at the end of the bill altogether, and I modify it in that way.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I am entirely in accord with the remarks that have fallen from previous speakers with regard to this clause. I think it is altogether too stringent that the catching of each fish should constitute a separate offence, and the subclause should be modified in some way to obviate that difficulty and make it so that when fish or animals are found in the possession of any person he shall be subject to a penalty as specified. As the clause stands it is too arbitrary—arbitrary is too mild a word for it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause before us is devoted simply to the purpose of making each fish and each day a separate offence, and I think the proper remedy is to strike it out altogether. I move that it be struck out.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Generally the fishery officers in Lunenburg are good men, but an officer may have some hostile feeling towards a poor man and avenge himself against him. As to the magistrates, I have no confidence in some of them; I attach no value to their justice or discretion. They are men that I had great respect for when I was a little boy. In these days, we have not much reverence for their judgment or their actions, or as a rule, their respectability. There are some exceptions, but as a rule they are appointed because they have been violent partisans of the worst order. I think that this clause should be struck out. There is ample provision without it to protect the fisheries and punish all offenders who knowingly and wilfully break the law. The clause might be struck out and the bill improved.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a feature about this which I was not informed of before. I am advised—and I presume rightly—that the fishery overseer, who is the prosecutor, is also the judge, and that he may be, and very often is, a very inferior man. Hon. gentlemen must recollect that this is a very powerful temptation to put in the hands of an individual unless he is a very superior man with very even temper, a man who would not allow his personal or political feelings to enter into any part of the execution of his duty, and I think our knowledge of human nature will scarcely warrant us in coming to the conclusion that so extraordinary a power should be given to an individual who is not only the prosecuting attorney but is the judge and jury himself, all in one. That alters the case very materially, and I do not think we can find anything in our criminal code at all on a parallel with that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is another point to which I think it well to call the attention of the House. It is contained in subsection 4 of section 18. What an inducement that offers to men to trump up charges against neighbours! Of course the fishery officer need not be the informer, but he can always make an arrangement with somebody else who is the informer and go shares with him in the penalties. I think when the House comes to consider all the circumstances of the case, that the people who bring about the conviction are to get half the penalty, they will see that the wisest course to take is to strike out the clause altogether.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I do not agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax, but I think that those gentlemen who go out to do the fishing should make themselves acquainted with the law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This law will apply to the comparatively poor fishermen along our shores.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—They are generally pretty well posted and know what is going on, and they know right from wrong and I do not see why the laws should not be carried out. A great deal of injury has been done by not having the law carried out properly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This law would not be carried out satisfactorily.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I think the law should be carried out most faithfully from beginning to end.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I do not think I should be in favour of altogether expunging subsection 7; if we could modify it we might make it acceptable.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have prepared a modification which will perhaps meet the views of the House: It reads in this way:

When the offence under this Act consists in the catching or killing, conveying, buying, selling, or having in possession fish or any other animal, the catching, or killing, conveying, buying, selling, or having in possession fish or animal, shall be deemed an offence, and the defendant shall be liable to a penalty, where not otherwise provided, not exceeding $20 and costs.

I would strike out the words "for each fish or animal so illegally killed, conveyed, bought, sold, or had possession," so that the quantity of fish or animals caught illegally would constitute only one offence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may be allowed to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that that alteration is simply equivalent to striking out this subclause. The subclause provides that the killing of each one shall be a separate offence. Clause 7 gives the penalties for each offence, and this will be simply reducing the penalty in this case from $60 to $20. The better way is to strike the clause out altogether, because if hon. gentleman will turn to clause 7 they will see that every offence is provided for there.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This is to inflict punishment wherever there is none specially provided for by the Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—All these subclauses we are dealing with now will be part of section 18 of the Fisheries Act and to put in this as subclause 7, with the modification that the hon. Minister suggests, would be really altering the penalty in the subsection 18.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—It does away with the difficulty of making the catching and holding of each fish an offence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, but there is no necessity for it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Supposing a man buys a fish, would that be an offence?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, not if he buys it in good faith; that is, if he buys it in a season when you are allowed to catch such fish; you cannot buy in good faith in the close season.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Very often fish will be caught under the regulation size, or during the time prohibited. Under the law if a man had a fish in his possession at that season he would be liable to a fine whether he caught it or not. I know I have often been liable to a fine in the town where I live. During the close season for lobsters the poor fishermen will catch them after the time allowed just for domestic use, and they generally come to my house and I find them on my table, and I can't prevent it, besides I am too fond of them to be very cross about it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I shall convey that information to the fishery inspector. However, I will leave that subsection out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think clause eight should go out.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh no, that should remain.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may be allowed to make just one observation in connection with this matter of the propagation of fish. I do not know what the experience in other places is, but my own experience is that the money which is spent in propagating salmon for instance is almost altogether wasted. If the money spent by the Government in Nova Scotia for fish hatcheries and for distributing fry had been paid for the purpose of providing efficient fish ways in the dams in the rivers, and paying the wages of men for policing the rivers, it would be evidently better. One fish which is allowed to go and deposit her spawn in the proper place will produce more young salmon than the spawn taken from several salmon. That has been the experience in Nova Scotia. This fish hatching has been going on for a long time under both Governments, and it would be a judicious thing for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to cause an inquiry to be made for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not it has been a success. The impression amongst those who know most about it in Nova Scotia, at any rate, is that the present system is not a judicious one.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I know many rivers that had been depleted and salmon which have been brought back to their former condition by putting the fresh fry into the river. They will not go up again after they have once been shut out for any long period.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Any river that has ever been frequented by salmon or trout, although they may be shut out for a time, if the waterways are opened again, they will go to the water that suits them. It is their nature to roam in these waters. Now, I do not think it is possible—and it is worth the Government's while to investigate the matter minutely—that these wardens or overseers can plant fish in waters which are not suited to the fish. Those who follow up the fish question will know that all over the world certain fish frequent certain waters and only certain waters. Therefore, I maintain that unless the Government is satisfied that there is something in this artificial planting of fish, it is hardly worth the expense they are going to. If certain fish had been in certain waters, and had been stopped in any way, there would be no harm in planting the spawn, but otherwise it is a waste of time and money.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I will move the third reading of the bill at the next sitting of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to move an amendment to modify the provisions with respect to the branding of the packages of lobsters.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Would it not be well to consider if those penalties are sufficient—$20 is a very small matter, and they would pay it over and over again and snap their fingers at you.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is a question whether we can deal with penalties.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh yes, we are not imposing a burden on the taxpayers.

The motion was agreed to.

INSPECTION OF ELECTRIC LIGHT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (118) "An Act respecting the inspection of Electric Lights."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—When the bill was read the second time, it was stated that it was in a new direction, that no such legislation had been had in any country in the world. I find, on the contrary, that we are exactly twelve years behind what has been done in England. On the 18th August, 1882, an Act to facilitate and regulate the supply of electricity for lighting and other purposes in Great Britain and Ireland, was passed, being chapter 56 of 45 and 46 Vic., exactly in the direction of the bill which is now submitted here.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As we go through the bill in the committee, will the Minister be able to tell us wherein the clauses differ from the English Act?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The English Act has a much larger scope than this bill, which is entirely limited to the supervision and inspection of meters, the inspection of electricity and the right of access for the purpose of verifying. I shall, as far as possible, state whether the provisions that we submit to the House are in the direction of the English Act. A similar bill has also been passed in the Congress. I have received the following telegram from Washington :

Electric Bill passed both Houses and now awaits President's approval. Legislation in relation to electrical standards all complete and in order in England, France and Germany. Do not know about France, but Chicago Congress units were adopted in Germany. Germany can have electrical establishments. German Government electrical testing establishment verifies meters. The same legislation prevails in Austria.

So that we are not going to be ahead of everybody in this direction. We have already inspection of meters for gas, and it is thought wise and advisable that the companies distributing electricity for lighting purposes should also be controlled in the same way, under the authority which is given this Parliament for regulating and making laws in relation to weights and measures.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With that intimation, I am sure the hon. member from Rideau will feel that we should keep up with the procession.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I am satisfied with what the Minister has stated. I was not aware of it. It appears that the bill has only passed the Congress this session. I contend this legislation is not necessary in the interests of the public. It may be in the interests of some employees and parties who desire office. I can understand that. We know the Inland Revenue Department has been very fond of initiating legislation for the purpose of creating offices. Gas had been a long time in existence in this country, and in the old country, before such an Act was passed, but we know that Governments have spent thousands and thousands of dollars in obtaining unnecessary machinery. We know there is lots of useless machinery round the building for gas. There are those required for the measurement of gas as also apparatus for electricity and storage battery which is perfectly useless, and cannot be applied in any practical way at the present time. Therefore it is well that we should wait until we find some other country proceeding in this matter. It will be an expensive operation and will require a great deal of apparatus. It is stated that the Inland Revenue Department can appoint any man they think proper without respect to qualifications or anything else.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That is certainly undesirable, and when we go into the details of this bill I shall show that some provisions are uncalled for, and it will cause a great deal of trouble and expense to the parties contracting for electricity. We want to make the thing as cheap as possible. We do not want to be troubled with any officious officers putting on expenses. There are two or three thousand meters in this city which will have to be inspected,and the consumer will have to pay the expenses because the gas fund now in operation will not do it. There must be a large deficiency which will have to be made up by the consumers at large. The country that does not require this standard of inspection should not be called upon to pay any part of these expenses, and this bill will require a great deal of amendment before it becomes law.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The objections of the hon. gentleman are not tenable. The use of electricity for lighting purposes is extending every day, and it is about the only thing that the purchaser has not the facilities of knowing anything about until he gets his quarterly bill. I do not know whether this bill will provide for the accurate measuring of that supply, but there is a necessity for the inspection of electric light just as much as there is for weights and measures.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Have the public been clamouring for this law at all? Has there been any demand for it? You can measure gas all right, but electric light depends on the time you use it. It will only make a certain amount of lighting power, and those who use it and the company which supplies it, could regulate the matter between themselves very much better than we could by an Act, unless the country demands it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I may say that the companies and those who have large stock in the electrical companies have not applied for this measure, but the consumers are more interested in it. I know from experience that you can have a very large bill for electric light in your house, and if you know and understand how to manage it you can have a very much smaller bill for the same number of hours. I was burning in my house lights No. 16. It cost me $15 a month—50 cents a day—and I had no extraordinary lighting, just the lights required for an ordinary family. I substituted No. 10 burners, and instead of $15 my bill, for the same time and the same number of hours, went down to $4. So that there is some advantage, undoubtedly, in having inspec tors for the benefit of consumers. It was only accidentally that I learned there was such a difference between the burners Nos. 16 and 10.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Did you not obtain the improvement without the inspector?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I did, but accidentally. There are many men in town who do not know the difference in the burners.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—He must be a pretty ignorant man who does not know the difference.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I was going to revert to coal-oil when I was accidentally informed by a friend that if I took No. 10 lamps it would make a very great difference and I am perfectly satisfied now.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—But 16 would give you more light than 10. You can buy an inferior article at a lower price.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No. I got from No. 10 just as good a light as I got from No. 16. Two burners No. 10 will light a large room of 20 feet, and two burners No. 16 will give you no more light than is necessary to read.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I have some little knowledge of electric light business and am interested in it a little. I am aware from experience that electrical lights cannot be given with any degree of profit by those who supply it unless they get 35 cents a light. I know they have been giving it at 15 cents and 20 cents in consequence of competition where there are two establishments for producing such lights. They have cut down the price so that they are not paying running expenses.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—They do not work for nothing.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is important to the consumer to know the quality and value of the light he gets. I do not think it is necessary there should be an inspector. He would necessarily be a competent man and a high-priced man. I know we have engines and machinery that cost thousands of dollars, and yet these inspectors never bother about gas inspection. They sit in their office and draw their salaries and do no good. Is not the cry of the country at present that we are too much governed? Instead of the Government creating more offices, I think it is their duty and the duty of the Senate to see if they can possibly stop this extravagant expenditure of public money and have no officers appointed or no offices made which are not really wanted. This Excise Department with its ramifications is not wanted at all. They are simply trying to make a display of great importance and the people know that their services are of very little value and I trust the Government will not create unnecessary offices.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would like to have a clear explanation of the exact meaning of a Watt hour and an Ampere hour ?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It means the burning of 17 lights during one hour.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What kind of lights ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Candle lights—equal to the burning of 17 candle lights for an hour, which is equivalent one to another.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Is one electric light equal to 17 candle lights ?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—For an hour.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The commercial unit is to be 17 candles for an hour ?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. POWER—What does this clause mean ?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The electricity supplied at a pressure just as water is, and they declare what it is going to be.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Can the hon. gentleman tell me what the general pressure is ?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—52 volts.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5,

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I think the variation of 4 per cent is too much.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I think it is too little. The variation in this city during the day time is between 3 and 4 per cent. It is almost impossible to keep the pressure uniformly the same, even using water power as we do here. There is a saving clause in this that the companies shall not be liable for any damages and so on.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—We are looking at it from two different standpoints. The hon. gentleman looks at it from supply, and I look at it from the other standpoint. I move that this be changed from 4 to 3 per cent.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I may say in England it is 3 per cent, and we are here giving a little more latitude and advantage to the company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is it not really 2 per cent more ?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—In England it is 3 per cent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me the companies are given 2 per cent advantage here, because there is a variation 4 above and 4 below—that is 8, and in England the variation is only 6.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It should be four for each way—making eight altogether. I move in amendment that it be changed to eight.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—How can any man give an intelligent vote on this when he knows nothing about it ? I suppose this bill has emanated from a department where they have investigated the matter, and I think it would be unfair for us to mutilate it.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—It is mutilated now. It was first 3 per cent and it was mutilated and made 4, and I move that it be changed to 3 as it was originally and as it is in the English Act. The English people have had experience and I think the variation of 3 per cent is abundant.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If you make it 8 you will get no light at all.

The amendment was agreed to and the clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

The Senate adjourned at six o'clock.

SECOND SESSION.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight p. m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE LATE SENATOR CHAFFERS.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is with deep regret that I have to announce the death of another member of this House, one who has been with us since Confederation. The late Mr. Chaffers was born in Quebec in 1830, and sat in the Legislative Assembly of old Canada in 1856. He represented Rougemont in the Legislative Council of Canada from 1864 until the union, when he was called to the Senate. He was personally an exceedingly popular man, very courteous and kindly in his manner and upright in his dealings with all. It is with very great regret that we lose his company and assistance here, and if it can be any consolation to his family I can assure them that we share their grief.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite sure that every member in this Chamber has heard with very great regret to-day of the death of our poor friend, although it must have been anticipated by most of us. In the weakly condition that he was in during the few days he attended recently it was quite evident his days on earth were numbered. Mr. Chaffers was a man very much beloved by those who knew him intimately. He was of a kind and genial disposition. Although adhering to the party to which he belonged I do not think he ever gave offence to any one by his political or other views. He was kind and gentle with everybody, and it was with very sincere regret that we saw that he was reduced to the condition he appeared in when we met him here early in the session. I myself felt that he would be very much better at home with his relatives and friends. I do not know that it would have prolonged his life, and he seemed to enjoy meeting his old friends that he had known years before. After all it was perhaps best. I saw him on Friday last when he was leaving for the train and bade him good-by, and felt confident that I should never see him again. His chief characteristics were that he was very lovable, kind and gentle, qualities rarely exceeded in any other individual. He was always the same, never capricious or hasty with any one. He had a cheerful greeting for everybody he came in contact with. I am sure that we all regret very deeply his loss.

THIRD READING.

Bill (100) "An Act to incorporate the French River Boom Company, Limited."—(Mr. Clemow.)

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the third reading of Bill (145) "An Act further to amend the Fisheries Act," as amended.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to call the attention of the House to the 5th subclause of clause 3 of the bill:

> Every case or package containing lobsters canned, preserved or cured in Canada shall be marked, labelled or stamped in such manner and by such person as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries from time to time directs before being removed from the factory or canning establishment where the same has been canned, preserved or cured; and such mark, label or stamp shall state that the lobsters packed in the case or package so marked, labelled or stamped, have been legally caught and packed.

It struck several members of the House, when the bill was before the committee, that this provision that the labels should state that the lobsters packed in the case had been legally caught and packed, was without precedent. It will be remembered also that there was a very considerable discussion as to the person who was to mark or brand the fish. It was made clear in the course of the discussion that, unless there was an inspector in each factory, who stood by and watched the operation of packing the lobsters, the certificate mentioned in the subclause could not be given, and the general feeling appeared to be that the proper person to brand or mark the packages was the proprietor of the factory. The amendment I am about to propose is in that direction. First, to get rid of this provision about the lobsters being packed according to law, and next to get rid of the doubts about the person by whom the stamping or branding is to be done. I move:

> That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by striking out subsection 5 of the section (10*a*) proposed to be added to the "Fisheries Act" by the third clause of the bill, and substituting the following subsection therefor:
> "5. Every case or package containing lobsters canned, preserved or cured in Canada, shall, before being removed from the factory or canning establishment where such lobsters have been canned, preserved or cured, be marked, labelled or stamped with the name and the address of the proprietor of such factory or establishment and the year in which such lobsters are canned, preserved or cured, and with such other particulars as may be prescribed by Order in Council."

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I hope the leader of the House will accept this amendment. I do not propose to enter again into a long discussion on the subject. I am sure that giving the Governor in Council power to add anything more that may be required will be enough. I do not think it is right to ask the person who is appointed to mark those cans to put on the case a description of what the contents in the package, and if they were caught according to law, which he cannot possibly do, because the man employed for that purpose cannot say that they are legally caught, as he does not catch them nor does he see them caught. If he says so he is writing down what he cannot possibly know anything about, and is making statements in writing which may or may not be true. It is demoralizing to ask an officer appointed by the Government to state what he cannot truthfully say and what is virtually a falsehood.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This clause varies in language but it includes the most important enactment of the clause as submitted to the House. It virtually only removes the obligation of stating that the lobsters are canned and packed and have been legally caught. I may say to this House that this bill has been in great part suggested by the owners of canneries themselves. It is their wish and desire that such a valuable fish be not destroyed and that restrictions be made as stringent as possible to prevent fishermen and packers from packing fish illegally caught. In practice, I may say that the owners of factories are the persons who supply the fishermen with traps, boats and other appliances for carrying on this business. As a rule it is so, but if the House is of opinion that the inspector should not be required to certify that the fish contained in the packages had been legally caught, I am willing to accept the amendment proposed. What is new in it has been already covered by the fact that the Minister of Marine could prescribe in what way the stamp should be put on and what it should state. It is in this clause giving power to the Governor in Council. Referring it to the Governor in Council is not quite so expedient, but if it meets with the more ready approval of the House, I have no objection to accept the amendment and to remove the obligation of certifying that the fish have been legally caught. On behalf of the Government I accept the amendment as proposed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by striking out clause 8.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I cannot accept that amendment.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

The bill as amended was then read the third time and passed.

INSPECTION OF ELECTRIC LIGHT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (118) "An Act respecting the inspection of electric lights."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—It appears to me that subclause 3 of clause 4 is a little too wide, but not being a lawyer I do not see how to overcome the difficulty. I think the clause is wide enough to relieve the contractor from the consequences of any variation of pressure. Unless the House sees its way to suggest some improvement on that, I must confess I cannot.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—What I understand by this clause is that the consumer would have no claim in case of a variation of pressure caused by unavoidable accidents to the generating plant or uncontrollable conditions of the element. A house is fitted up with gas, say, and through accident the gas house is blown up—would the consumer at the time have a claim for damages against the company because that night they could have no gas ?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—No, not for loss of light caused by those circumstances. If you put in the word for the cessation of supply due to those circumstances, I can see the reasonableness of it, but the variation of pressure, no.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It includes the less. It says they will not be responsible for a variation of pressure caused by unavoidable accident to the plant or by uncontrollable conditions of the elements—that is, a thunder storm or something of the kind. This does not mean that the company would not be responsible for damages caused by their plant or wires, but that they shall not be liable for damages for not furnishing light under the circumstances mentioned. What the consumer is to do under those circumstances is to abandon the use of electric light, and that would be a very great punishment to the company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why should this clause be inserted here at all? I submit that it is declaratory of the common law. Why should this provision be here when we find an absence of such provisions in other bills, such as railway bills, &c.?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Electricity, so far, is very uncontrollable and unseizable; that is why they put it there. It is a very capricious element and perhaps the clause is necessary in consequence. I do not see that it would hurt the bill to take it out or leave it in.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 7,

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The object of this clause is to protect the consumer. If such a connection existed with the earth the meter would be registering more electricity than was used by the consumer and it is to provide for such a case.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause apparently inflicts a penalty on the consumer for not having sufficient resistance on his premises.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—This is in the interest of the consumer, because if the supply were not discontinued the meter would be registering electricity against him which he did not use at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The explanation is satisfactory.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 12,

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I think there should be a qualified examination of these men before they are appointed.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is the intention to have a qualifying examination before they are allowed to act. We might insert in the second line after the word "may" the words "after qualifying examination."

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is an examination known as the qualifying examination in the Civil Service and to prevent this examination being confounded with the Civil Service examination, I would suggest an alteration in the words and make it read "after an examination as to their qualifications."

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have no objection to those words.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 15,

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I would suggest that there should be added to this clause the words "unless objected to by the purchaser."

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have no objection to the words. This is not made obligatory. There are companies which furnish electric lights for a given price per light per year, in which case no meter is wanted. Wherever a meter is required by the consumer, if the company does not wish to give light at so much per year per lamp, it may use the meter. In future it will have to procure the best kind of meter, I suppose, which is mentioned there. Until then other meters may be used at the option of the purchaser.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Then I would move to insert in line 35 the words "unless objected to by the purchaser."

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 16,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This bill appears to deal with the consumption of electricity according to the amount of electricity used irrespective of time. I should like to know for information how this bill will be applicable to cases where there are contracts?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I suppose those under a contract will not be bound by the bill at all.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is not measured by the hour, but according to the consumption, the meter registers the accumulated amount of electricity used. The meter will move according to consumption, and in one hour will register the accumulated quantity of four hours according to the number of lamps.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, but most of the contracts that have been entered into under the meter system, as I understand it, are entered into in this way, for the supply of say 16-candle power lamps at the rate of so much per hour, say a cent per hour—I think that is the current rate in the city of Ottawa, less the discount.

Hon. Mr. POWER—How can you have a meter under these circumstances?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The meter registers the time.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—No, they register the amount of electricity passed through and they estimate it at so much. For example, suppose the meter registered a certain amount equal to 72, then 64 would indicate four hours of a 16-candle power lamp. It is really the quantity indicated by the meter and not the time.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 19,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is there a provision here whereby a meter may be verified within that length of time, provided the purchaser or the contractor may be of opinion that that is not a correct meter, that it is inaccurate in its measurements?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I see no clause for the reinspection of a meter within that time, and I think there should be a clause of that character.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The purchaser should have the right to call for reinspection and reverification of the meter at his own expense at any time.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have no objection to that. I will move that the following words be added to this clause:

But the purchaser or the contractor may at any time at the cost of the party in fault require verification of the meter used by him.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The basis of the whole matter is the pressure of electricity supplied, which we settled in clause 4. We have nowhere provided for the testing of that very essential and fundamental fact. I move that the following be added as a subclause to clause 23:

The purchaser may at any time, on payment of a fee to be fixed by the Governor in Council, call on an inspector to test the pressure of the electricity supplied by the contractor and to furnish a certificate thereof.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Will not the meter measure the pressure?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—No, it measures the quantity, not the pressure.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The difficulty of that amendment lies in this point—at the time the demand is made for the test of the pressure it is an easy matter for the contractor to put on additional pressure to answer the contract.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—He will not know. I can call on the inspector at any time to test the pressure.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think it should be provided that it should be without notice to the contractor. The inspector may say "I require the contractor here."

The amendment was adopted and the clause as amended was agreed to.

On clause 37,

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This is altogether too vague. I want that to be defined by Act of Parliament. I do not want to leave it in the hands of the Government. I want to know how to arrive at a satisfactory basis of inspection. For instance, the electric standard for illuminating purposes, as far as the arc light is concerned is very indefinite and little known at present. Parties supplying this ought to know what the intention is with regard to inspection in the future. It should not be left to the Governor in Council but should be defined by Act of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The hon. gentleman is well aware what the test of the standard candle is. The standard is the same all over the world. It may be true that an electric lamp which is stamped as 16-candle power may be only half or less than half that amount. Very likely it is, but that would be well known to the Governor in Council, and the fixing of the amount would not interfere with the commercial manufacture of those lamps.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I referred specially to arc lights of 2,000 candle power.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I think that the Governor in Council can establish any standard they like.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This simply provides that the Governor in Council shall, after due consideration, make such regulations as they think best for the purpose of testing the electric light lamps and finding out how great their illuminating power is—how many candle power a lamp has, for instance. I do not see how you can make it much more definite. The Government may establish rules and regulations which of course would not be inconsistent with this Act. Beyond that we cannot go.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the hon. gentleman from Rideau Division submit to the House that there is more than one standard for the measurement?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In the United Kingdom there is only one system of measurement.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Tell me how you are going to measure a 2,000 candle arc lamp?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—In other words, the electric light companies exaggerate matters greatly. They tell you they give you 200 candle power, and they really give you 150 candle power.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (136) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892."

(In the Committee.)

On the schedule,

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me that the offences referred to in section 549 of the Code are as a rule offences committed in a city and are to be tried before a stipendiary magistrate who has the power of two justices of the peace. The amendment proposed is as follows:—

By adding the following section after section 549:—

"549*a*. Any person who is charged before two justices of the peace with any offence under section five hundred and twenty-three or section five hundred and twenty-five may, on appearing before the justice, declare that he objects to being tried by them; and thereupon such justices shall not proceed with the trial, but shall deal with the case in all respects as they would upon a charge made before them of an indictable offence, and the accused may be prosecuted on indictment accordingly."

This provides that these offences, which peculiarly require to be dealt with promptly and summarily, shall not be dealt with by a stipendiary magistrate or two justices, but by the much slower process of indictment before a grand jury, so that in cases of this sort, which I think in a special manner call for prompt treatment, you may have to wait for months before one of the offenders can be convicted. It must strike the House that this is a move in the wrong direction. The law as it stands is much better than the law as it will be when this amendment is made. In dealing with offences of the character described in sections 523 and 525, one of the great desiderata is that the punishment shall be prompt, so as to impress those who are perhaps then either working in concert with the offenders or sympathising with them; but if you have to wait until the grand jury meet to find an indictment and wait possibly for months before justice is done to the offenders, then mischief is likely to supervene. The House will make a great mistake if they pass this particular clause in the form in which it is.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I am glad to see the hon. gentleman from Halifax is coming round. We are not dealing here with fishermen, but ordinary rioters in a city. Of course if it had been to prevent any one from selling lobsters or fish, he would have found the law in the direction that is now proposed acceptable and satisfactory. This amendment proposes to make it more lenient than it is, but I must admit that he has given very strong reasons why the matter should be deferred. We have such occasions before our eyes every day. When we read what has lately taken place in Chicago, perhaps the amendment might be deferred, and if the hon. gentleman moves to strike it out I cannot offer any opposition to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move to strike out that amendment 549*a*.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman defers the consideration of the amendment, I understand.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, it is to be struck out.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think it is entitled to more consideration than striking it out. I do not see the matter in the same light that my hon. friend views it. I think he is defeating the very object that he is seeking to attain. These two sections deal with a very complicated class of crime which two justices of the peace, who may not be familiar with very important cases, may not be equal to trying. And the same thing applies to a stipendiary magistrate who, in many cases, is not a lawyer, and may not be able to deal with them, and furthermore, this class of cases may be of such a very important character as to demand greater punishment than two justices of the peace or a stipendiary magistrate may mete out to the offender. We know under the Criminal Code, they are limited in the punishment they can administer, but the cases may be sufficiently serious to be sent to a higher court.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The amendment proposes to give the option to the accused of going before a jury. Perhaps, accepting the views of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, it is better that an offender should not have the satisfaction of going before a jury and delaying the case three months.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the accused chooses to exercise the right of election, which he has, he incurs at the same time the additional risk which may follow, of going to a superior court.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend says that a higher penalty might be inflicted if the accused were to go before the judge and jury, but the penalty is the same. It cannot be more than $100, or three months' imprisonment, and I think in the interests of society we had better leave that as it is.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.

On section 662,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understand the grand jury panel in Ontario have been reduced to thirteen by a bill passed at the last session of the local legislature.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I am not aware of that, I think it is twenty-four in Ontario now.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not know as to that. Supposing there are only thirteen of them, why should you have the concurrence of twelve of them to find a true bill? I think a majority of those sitting, seven, should have the right to return a true bill.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE--So do I.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The law says you shall have a majority, but in our province we only put twenty-three on the grand jury and twelve are required to return a true bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the Government given up the idea of abolishing the grand jury? I understand the Government made inquiries with respect to the wisdom of abolishing it?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The intention of the Government has not been drawn to it lately. I do not know what the intention of the Government is. I am decidedly opposed to the doing away with the grand jury. It should be preserved, although it increases the cost of the administration of justice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend is so strong in his conviction of the protection the grand jury affords to the subject, perhaps the Government would consider the advisability of extending it to the North-west Territories where we have not that protection.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not think they have applied for it. I think they want no protection at all, they have the law in their own hands.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I wish to say a few words against the reduction of the grand jury from twelve to seven.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This does not provide for that.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Twelve has been necessary to find a true bill heretofore; now it is proposed to make it seven. In Ontario they had a system of drafting jurors where they had a half jury, two-thirds jury and a full jury panel. The half jury would be eighteen and the two-thirds jury twenty-four and the full jury forty-eight. I do not know any place where they selected a half jury, simply for this reason, the judges of the Superior Court, when they issued their precepts to the sheriff to summon the jury, invariably ordered him to summon twenty-four, irrespective of what the quarter sessions may have selected. In my opinion, the way this clause is drawn will conflict with the proceedings of the Local Parliament. The Local Parliament has the control and conduct of the jury system entirely, and in the jury system there is a provision made as to what number of grand jurors they shall select. Well, if they chose to select eighteen and the superior court judges would issue a precept for twenty-four, the sheriff could not return the panel of eighteen without being guilty of a contempt of court and where is he to get them? I am opposed to reducing the number. I think thirteen is too small a panel. The jury system in the country is an education to the people. The farmers come from all parts of the country to the county town and stay there two or three days to listen to the criminal and civil suits, and they go home with a very great respect for the laws of the country and became law-abiding people. They tell it to their neighbours and they bring up their children in awe and respect for that which they had seen in the law courts of the county in which they live. Some people oppose the panel of twenty-four jurors on account of the expense, but it is simply a matter of taking a dollar out of the pockets of the people and paying it back again. As far as the expense is concerned, I do not think there is anything in that argument. The money is taken from the people direct and paid back again. We had better leave the jury system as it has been for generations. The more we tamper with the administration of justice and the affairs connected with it the more we weaken that institution. We are undermining it all the time. Our people in this country claim that they are the most law-abiding people in the world. I do not know of any country where they are so law-abiding; and if the people know the law and abide by it, why not leave it alone. I do not believe in tampering with the administration of justice. It is better to have a law which is not perfect, if the people understand it thoroughly and abide by it, than to have a very perfect law which the people do not know anything at all about. I object to the changing of these laws from time to time—these laws that have stood the test of time and of which we are all proud. It is only a couple of years ago that we passed a law in this House, which I opposed, allowing a criminal to go into the box and give evidence on his own behalf. The compellable part of it was struck out, but as far as I can learn, from the operation of that provision in the courts of law, it has been a complete failure. A man who will commit a crime is allowed the opportunity of going into the box and swearing he did not do it, and he is certain to take advantage of that. I stated that that was my opinion on that occasion and I have inquired in several quarters what the result was and I am told that that is the fact. We had better leave this law as it is, and I move that this clause be struck out.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We do not attempt to interfere with the panels of the grand jury. The panels are arranged in the different provinces by legislation and we have nothing to do with it. As regards the question whether we should have a grand jury or not, that subject is not before us now. What we are proposing now is that when the panel shall not be more than thirteen, that seven shall be sufficient to find a true bill. I think that is a proper provision that there should be a majority of those empanelled and sworn. We require twelve to make a prima facie case. We are not now interfering with the grand jury system. It is a question which the public mind is not satisfied upon. Even the judges of different provinces differ very much on this question, some being strongly in favour of doing away with grand juries and others strongly sustaining them. I believe the Minister of Justice is decidedly in favour of maintaining the system. If the panel is thirteen, seven is a fair proportion to bring in a bill, but supposing the number of grand jurymen sworn be fourteen, under this enactment twelve would yet be required to present a true bill.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I do not think there is in any of the provinces a panel of thirteen. It would be absurd to have a panel of thirteen jurors for a court of assize and require the concurrence to bring in a bill, because there is no means of filling up the panel as far as I know I do not think there is in any of the provinces that sized panel. The difficulty I feel in this matter is that if the clause is passed, you will find all the provinces which have the right to name how many will be selected, will adopt the number mentioned in this bill, thirteen.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That will be no great harm.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—The selectors have to pass a resolution on the first day they meet to select jurors, and they say how many will be selected for the County Court and Quarter Session and for the Superior Court. As soon as this passes they will all adopt thirteen, and that will destroy the principle which has existed heretofore. This gives them authority as far as this Parliament can.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It lies now with the province to determine the qualification of the grand jurors, and I believe also the number of them. It is within the jurisdiction of this Parliament only to regulate what shall be the practice in criminal cases, and it is a portion of the practice in such cases to say how many jurors will return a verdict. There must be some sufficient reason here for speaking of a panel of 13. I have not that information now, and I would ask the House to pass the clause and I will give information to-morrow at the third reading. If the reason should not be considered sufficient by the House, the clause can be amended before the third reading.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Perhaps you would inquire also about the authority of the judges?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The judges have the limit of their authority fixed by the Local Legislature.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Not the Superior Court judges.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, the Superior Court judges in reference to the qualification and number of the grand jurors, and they have to limit their authority, in the matter of practice, to the law that we give them.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—They only administer the law.

The clause was adopted.

On the amendment to section 871,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED inquired why the constable's fee for making an arrest was increased from $1 to $1.50.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS said he thought $1.50 was reasonable enough.

Hon. Mr. POWER thought $1 was enough for the arrest of one individual.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS said he would explain at the third reading the reason for the increase.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON, from the committee, reported the bill with an amendment which was concurred in.

The Senate then adjourned.

THIRD READING.

Bill (113) "An Act respecting the inspection of electric light," as amended.—(Mr. Bowell.)

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the third reading of Bill (126) "An Act to further amend the Criminal Code of 1892," as amended. He said: I stated yesterday that I would give some information in relation to two clauses as to the number of jurors who can return a true bill in the case of the panel stating only thirteen jurors.

This amendment was introduced in the House below by Mr. Edgar. In Nova Scotia the whole panel is twenty-four, but sometimes the panel—that is the number of jurors acting—may be only thirteen, and it is to provide what proportion of those thirteen may bring in a true bill. In Ontario the same thing exists. In Nova Scotia the quorum of the jury is thirteen and in Ontario the quorum as constituted now is twelve; although they summon the full panel the quorum is twelve. It is to allow that quorum of twelve to return a true bill by seven of them agreeing. The other point refers to the fee of $1.50 for constables. Previous to the Code, the fee was $1.50. When the Code was enacted it was reduced to $1. Representations have been made since, accompanied by letters from magistrates and judges that the fee was not sufficient, and that it should be restored to what it was previously, $1.50.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Does the hon. gentleman say that the object of reducing this panel to thirteen, the majority to bring in a true bill, is because they could not get twelve out of a panel of twenty-four?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—That appears to be the line of argument the hon. gentleman has taken.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is because the quorum is thirteen; thirteen may sit and seven of them bring in a true bill.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Is that the law in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, the quorum is reduced to thirteen.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I understand the local Government had no right to say in criminal matters what the quorum may be.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—If, as a fact, you cannot get twelve persons to agree upon bringing in a bill if the panel is twenty-four I think the chances are that having reduced it to thirteen the result will be worse. At all events I am decidedly opposed to any change in the existing law with respect to juries. We had better leave these laws alone—these laws which have stood the test of time. I ought to test the House on that question, I feel so strongly upon it. I may also state that in looking over the bill last night I discovered another clause stricken out, which I think is a most important one, and which I think should be imported into the bill yet. That is where two magistrates constitute a bench and the party has the right to say he will be tried before these two persons. I was proposing to test the House on the question about the juries first.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—As regards the equity, where there are thirteen jurors sworn requiring seven to render a true bill, my hon. friend will see that if there are fourteen it will require twelve to bring in a true bill and I do not think that is reasonable or right. I think this matter requires more consideration than we have given it when we find such an inconsistency as that.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Supposing twenty grand jurors are sworn, how many does it require to return a true bill?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Twelve.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They have reduced the quorum to thirteen in Ontario and twelve in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me we had better allow this provision to remain as it is. In the interest of justice in Ontario and Nova Scotia for reasons that have seemed good to the legislatures of those provinces, the quorum of the grand jury is fixed at thirteen and the question is whether you shall require twelve of that thirteen to return a bill.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Not the quorum but the panel.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is the panel too that constitutes the quorum. The question is whether the majority of the grand jurors shall be allowed to find a true bill or not, and I think there should be no question at all about that. Look at the position. As a rule, when a man is accused of any offence against the Criminal Code he is brought before a magistrate. The magistrate has to find sufficient ground for committing him; then he is committed and goes before the grand jury, and the grand jury by a majority have to find a true bill, and our experiences in the lower provinces is that the grand juries are not as a rule too anxious to find a true bill, and if they find a true bill it simply puts the man on his trial before a jury of twelve, who have to be unanimous. To say that you shall have more than a majority of the panel to find a true bill is handicapping justice too much altogether. I know the hon. gentleman is exceedingly conservative in his ideas, but if the provinces of Nova Scotia and Ontario have thought fit, so far as they are concerned, to accept twelve and thirteen jurors as a quorum, I do not know why we should get excited about it here. We should not interfere with that. We do not make the change.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The panel must be thirteen at least. I should prefer to have the law that no matter how many were sworn, the majority could find a bill. At present if there are fourteen, twelve must agree, and if there are thirteen, seven is sufficient.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—When there are thirteen sitting on a special case there must be seven to return a bill. If there are fourteen, you will have to get twelve to concur in a true bill. That is the common law and you fall into the common law.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I cannot understand how you are going to make it uniform. The panel as originally selected by the county officer must state a certain number. The number heretofore has been twenty-four and at least twelve out of whatever number may appear can bring in a true bill or no bill. If we reduce the panel to thirteen, it requires seven to find a true bill, and if the panel is fourteen, twelve must agree. The panel must be fourteen.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, no; the hon. gentleman is confused as to the general panel. The hon. gentleman will recollect from the long experience he has had that grand juries do not always sit in every case, and they are not required to be present as rigorously as the petit jury, and although there are twenty-four summoned, only eighteen may sit on one case. The next day there may be twenty-two or twenty-three, or some days it may be reduced, according to circumstances, as low as thirteen, and in that case seven is sufficient to bring in a verdict. Now in Ontario, twelve may sit in a special case, although the panel has remained twenty-four, but the others may be away and may not wish to sit in that case, and the only change is that in such an event seven is sufficient to return a true bill.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Why not make it a majority? The panel must be 13 and let the majority return a true bill.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Supposing twenty are present, would it require twelve as before?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—If there are fourteen there requires to be twelve the same as before?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It is a great falling off.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a matter of practice, the jurors consist of twelve and thirteen. This is the lowest number that can form a quorum.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This was done to reduce the expenses of the grand jury, and that is altogether under the control of the Local Legislature. They pay for the cost of the administration of justice. It is not a burden upon the Dominion and I think when they take steps to lessen the cost of the administration of justice, we should not impede them or interfere with or embarrass them in any way. We should meet the case in the way the amendment proposes.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Do you embarrass them at all by making it the majority?

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—With reference to the expense connected with it, that is a matter entirely with the county. They assess the people for the fees and pay it back again to the people. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether these people have asked in any way at all, directly or indirectly, for this change on account of the expenditure? If they have, I would be very glad to accept the amendment.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The change has been made by the local authorities.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—But not by the counties. They have not been forced to do it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They represent the counties. The way the clause is drawn to-day you will find the panels will not be twenty-four nor eighteen as they were formerly, but simply thirteen and the difficulty be to get a grand jury at all. You will find the superior court judges when issuing their precepts will invariably command the sheriff to summon twenty-four grand jurors of that court and forty-eight petit jurors no matter what the selectors may choose to name as the number, and in that case if you bring it down to eighteen then in every county in Ontario, and probably Nova Scotia as well, you will find the sheriff in the position that he will have in some way to fill up the commands of the precept; otherwise he would be liable to punishment for contempt of court. If you only summon thirteen you will often find that you will not have seven to bring in a bill.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I understand each sheriff is responsible to the Local Government and not to us.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—And it is to the Local Government the sheriff can refer the matter.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—They have only the machinery.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The object here is to equalize the number in the provinces. It would appear that Nova Scotia and Ontario altered their system, and consequently I hold that you or any gentleman opposed to the alteration should make your appeal to the Local Government. There is where the alteration can be made and sustained and not here, as I understand the matter.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—There is a misapprehension about that. As a matter of fact this Parliament has power over the administration of justice.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

THE FRENCH TREATY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (147) "An Act respecting a certain Treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the French Republic. " He said: Hon. gentlemen will recollect that years ago the Parliament of Canada, or rather some of our leading men, moved that Canada should be allowed the privilege of making its own treaties. It was stated that we had acquired such strength and such importance in the Empire, that we had been given responsible government in its widest sphere, and that it should be further crowned by the advantage of making our own treaties. The Hon. Mr. Blake in 1882, then leader of the Opposition, moved some important resolutions in that direction. They are within the knowledge of the hon. members of this House, and they are to be found in "Lord Lorne's Administration in Canada," by Collins, at page 231. It is worth while to make a study of those resolutions. They were drafted with very great care and skill. However, a constitutional question arose. The hon. leader of the Government pointed out that it was impossible for Canada to have the privilege of dealing with foreign powers except through England, that diplomatic usages and the responsibilities of treaties required that the mother country should have the responsibility, and it was only through their agency that we could hope to have the advantages offered by the resolutions. I have no doubt that these resolutions of Mr. Blake's had a very large influence upon the Government in England. In 1891 we applied to England for the advantage of making through our own representative assisted by the diplomats of England, a treaty with France, and this was conceded to us. So that England has virtually made to us the concession, in effect, although she could not make it by statute. Under those circumstances, negotiations were opened, mainly through the instrumentality of Sir Charles Tupper, with the French authorities with a view of coming to an arrangement in relation to trade upon certain articles. The treaty was made and it was signed in February, 1893, subject to the approval of the Parliament of Canada, and subject to the ratification of the French Chambers. Hon. gentlemen will bear in mind that this treaty, although signed by the plenipotentiary of England, Lord Dufferin, is virtually made for Canada and Canada alone, that it does not affect in any way the trade relations between France and the British Isles, but only the trade between France and Canada. Last year the treaty came before the Government and Parliament. We did not press the ratification of it then. It was not that the Government hesitated or had doubts as to the great advantages that Canada would derive under this treaty, but it was mainly due to some misunderstanding which existed, rather on this side of the ocean, as to the meaning of certain words in the treaty. Questions arose as to what was meant by "fish preserved in their natural form." as to "savon de Castile" and other articles which we thought were restricted, and after information and unofficial communication with the French authorities as to the true meaning of some of the items mentioned in the treaty, it was then made very clear that it was in respect to those articles as wide and as broad as it possibly could be. I do not ignore that a certain amount of opposition outside has been raised to this treaty and upon different grounds. I wish, as briefly as possible, to run over those grounds in the hope of satisfying this House that none of them are really of any consequence. The first we met is raised by the prohibitionists, who claim that this treaty will operate as a bar against prohibition. They think that the admission of light French wine is not in the direction of temperance, and that would retard the coming into force of a prohibitory liquor law. Although an advocate of temperance I must confess that I do not think the people of the Dominion are at present ripe for the adoption of a prohibitory liquor law. If that fortunate event should occur and we should reap the benefit, which one class of our people think we would from prohibition, we must all understand that it is not a law that can fall on the people like a thunderbolt. It could be accepted only gradually and after the removal of some very serious obstacles. There are vested rights to be considered. Hundreds of thousands of dollars of capital invested in the industry would have to receive time and consideration to be invested in other industries, and as you know this treaty can be cancelled on twelve months' notice, the country would be in a position, before a prohibitory liquor law could be enacted by the Parliament of Canada, to give that notice so that it would not in any way interfere or act as a bar against prohibition. It is thought by some that the admission of light wines is not in the direction of temperance. If I may be allowed to differ from the opinions of prohibitionists, I think that the introduction of light wines is a step towards temperance and towards prohibition. Should light wines come largely into the country, is it not reasonable to believe that the use of whisky and other strong alcoholic drinks would be lessened in consequence? We have another interest in the country which, to a certain extent, has shown not a complete opposition but a semi-opposition to the French treaty. I refer to the grape growers and wine manufacturers of Canada. They think that the light French wines will be sold in competition with their own. Those wines are so very different that when one has acquired a taste for native wine he would not at the same time have a taste for French wine, and there is no doubt that a man who has a taste for French wine could not, in a very short time, acquire a taste for native wine. Your constitution has to be prepared for it, and if you take the native wine, you must be on your guard against a headache the next day. It is not everybody who is prepared to do that, while if you drink the genuine French wine it will only make you more fit for work on the Monday morning.

Hon Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is very unpatriotic in running down the productions of our own country.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—He is only telling the truth.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not wish to run down the products of the country at all. On the contrary, what wine I drink is native wine.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You risk the headache.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I am prepared against that. I said it was not every constitution that was prepared for the absorption of the Canadian wine and I do not wish to run it down at all. I think some brands of it are very good. I use them myself and have often recommended them, but the main objection to them is that the reduction of 30 per cent upon the ad valorem duty will leave them without a fair protection. I am quite convinced that the prohibitionists cannot oppose the treaty on that ground at any rate, since, if they are sincere in their wish to promote temperance and think that the drinking of light wine is not in the direction of temperance, they cannot come before us here and vote against the treaty on the same ground that the wine manufacturers would. I am in a position to say that after removing the ad valorem duty a large protection will still remain in favour of the native wine, a protection of 25 cents a gallon, which in most cases is equal to 40 and 50 per cent. I am informed that at wholesale you can buy very good native wine at 50 to 60 cents a gallon, so that you have an enormous protection even after removing the ad valorem duty. These gentlemen have presented to the Government a petition expressing their views in relation to this French treaty and their fears as to the competition that the French wine might raise to their own industry. But what is it they ask—that the French treaty should be rejected? No; they say that they fear the consequences of the French treaty, but their petition is alternative. They say "give us some little advantage on the alcohol that we use for the manufacture of our wines and it will be all right." In point of fact that is the prayer of the petition, a little reduction upon alcohol and, with that, they say they do not fear the competition of French wines.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—What is the difference in the percentage of alcohol between the two wines?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not know what percentage is in the native wine, but under the treaty with France it must not exceed 26 per cent, if it is to have the advantage of the treaty.

Hon. Mr. MacMILLAN—Our wines contain about 8 per cent.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—So you see that this reduction of alcohol which is the main prayer of the petition of the wine producers, is but a small request.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do the government propose to reduce the tax on alcohol used for the purpose of fortifying native wines?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman an answer to that question. It is a question of financial policy which could only be decided after conference with the Minister of Finance and a decision of Council. I am sorry I have not the information for the hon. gentleman, but I point out how little it is, and the smaller the income derived from it the easier it will be to remove it—that is the argument I submit to the House. There is another matter which we must consider about that ad valorem duty. It is well to recollect the circumstances under which it was imposed. It was not for revenue purposes, nor was it for the purpose of granting the wine manufacturers in Canada a protection. It was imposed in 1878 or 1879 as a lever to be used to get concessions from France. It was imposed for the purpose of enabling us to tell France that if they would allow our Canada built ships to enter their register at 2 francs a ton instead of $8 a ton, we would remove that ad valorem duty. Since then the interest that we had in ship-building and in the introduction of our ships into the French market has disappeared. We build fewer ships and I may say that over the world there has been a complete revolution in ship-building. Wooden ships are hardly used at all—sailing vessels are hardly used. We have come to iron vessels run by steam, and we build none of those. The ship-building interest mostly centred in the Maritime Provinces having disappeared, we have used the benefit accruing to France from the removal of the ad valorem duty on wines to secure greater and wider advantages, not only for the Maritime Provinces, but for all Canada. The removing of the ad valorem duty by the ratification of this treaty is not new. It has been on the Statute-book for years. It could at any time have been removed by Order in Council. Therefore I may say with propriety that the wine manufacturers will have no grievance when this is removed, since the intention of Parliament in putting it on the Statute-book was to use it as a lever to get concessions from France. Another argument which has been used against this treaty is that it is not advisable to lower the duty on articles of luxury. In principle that is right enough, but we have got to consider on the other hand, whether the advantages to be derived from this treaty outweigh the advantages to be derived from adhering to the principle. Moreover, we should not lose sight of the fact that those duties were put there for the purpose of securing concessions. Another objection is that the concessions which we are making are too great compared with the advantages that we are to derive from them, that the loss of revenue is too great in proportion to the trade that we expect to secure. It is difficult to estimate what will be the loss of revenue under the treaty, because the present French tariff was adopted in 1892, and we have only one year's experience to reckon from. During that year we have not had the advantages of the treaty, so that it is impossible to determine exactly what our trade will be under the treaty. However, we must recollect this, that whatever trade we have done with France before we have done at a disadvantage.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—We could do nothing.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—We paid the maximum duty upon everything. Our competitors in the United States dealt in the same class of breadstuffs and articles that are mentioned in this treaty—lumber, canned meats and canned fish. We went into the French market under a disadvantage, because they had the advantage of a minimum duty whilst we had to pay the maximum duty upon every article mentioned in this list. The House will see how difficult it is to make an estimate from that year's trade and to determine from it with any precision at all what advantage will be derived from this treaty in future. If you read the treaty you will see that the articles mentioned are few in number, and some people are disposed to say, Oh, but this French treaty amounts to a very little; it only covers about a dozen articles. Let me inform the House that France in those articles does a trade of $38,000,000. That is a sound basis to proceed upon, and who can say that this treaty does not involve an extensive trade when it opens to us the markets of a nation which buys $38,000,000 a year of those ten or twelve articles mentioned in the treaty? We could see the possibility of extending our trade under such circumstances. It is said also that the terms are not as favourable to Canada—that they are much more restrictive when applied to us, and that we should receive as much as we give. We should recollect that when we open our markets to France we open a market of 5,000,000 of people, and when France opens hers including Algeria, she gives us access to a consuming population of 40,000,000 of people. That should be borne in mind when we take into consideration the advantages to be derived from this treaty.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—France and her colonies have a larger population than 40,000,000.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I mean the population of 40,000,000 in France and Algeria alone. I put this 40,000,000 or more of consumers against the limited market of 5,000,000, that we open to France.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Can 5,000,000 of people sell more than they buy?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Undoubtedly they do. That is why we are getting rich, because if you bought as much as you sold receipts and expenditures would balance exactly, and we would not increase our wealth; but if we sell more than we buy we must have some money left in our pockets. There is another objection, and most people have considered it a very serious one, that we cannot take advantage of this treaty unless we have a direct line of communication with France. In principle that is true.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I hope the hon. gentleman will be as quick to come round to my side in a minute when he hears me further.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Give me good reason and I will.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I will. Unless you have a direct line, or if you break bulk between Canada and France, you are subjected to the surtaxe, which would deprive us, in a large measure, of the benefit of the treaty, but again you must refer to the articles of the treaty, and what are they composed of? Lumber of all kinds. Now how are those shipped? Is there any man that would conceive that such articles could be shipped from Canada to England and thence to France? How is that trade done? Always by direct vessels. We have Canadian, Norwegian and French vessels coming to our ports in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and the province of Quebec, loading deals for various parts of the world. Deals are an important item of the treaty. What is there after that? Canned meats, canned fish, dried fruits, boots and shoes. Now do you want a swift fast line of steamers to carry goods to France? Not at all, those articles fit in with the various classes of lumber, and the ship that takes lumber can take 50 or 100 tons of those other articles. Whether they reach the French market in 10 days or 20 days they have the same value—that is, they are not perishable, and therefore we have all the advantage that we would possess if a direct line existed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand it, lumber went into France free previous to 1892.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What proportion of lumber did we send previous to 1892?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There was no maximum or minimum tariff before 1892.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No. I have the information from a practical man, the Hon. Senator Price, that lumber was not free previous to 1892. There was previous to 1892 only a high tariff, but since then there is a double scale.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I find that last year when discussing this treaty in the House of Commons, the Minister of Finance submitted a statement showing the old tariff and the new tariff, and under that old tariff building lumber, rough or sawn, is set down as being free. Of course the Minister of Finance may have been mistaken.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—He may and I cannot be called to account for the discussion of last year when the tariff was hardly understood and the question had to be postponed for further information. I was referring to this surtaxe. Examining the treaty, I find but one article that is perishable and could not be shipped in the way I have mentioned, that is apples. With that exception, all the articles mentioned are not perishable and could be shipped in the way I have indicated in vessels which ply now between Canada and France every year during the season of navigation.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—What about fresh water fish?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Fresh water fish is not a very large article of trade in Canada. We have been charged, in relation to this direct line, with having obtained the treaty under false pretenses, that the Government had promised France, in order to get these concessions, which some hon. gentlemen think so little of and so valueless, to establish a direct line of steamships between Canada and France. No such promise ever was made. It was stated after the negotiations were completed, and the treaty was signed, that it was likely that such a thing might be accomplished, and I do not doubt that it will.

Hon. Mr. POWER—All through the negotiations.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They had no influence on it at all, because the treaty is there and France has a sufficient knowledge in diplomacy that they would not have taken for granted the word of any one whomsoever without having it expressed in the treaty. Has it ever happened before that any nation having a treaty, has invoked any verbal agreements outside of it? I may say that this is no ground of objection at all, because, I am informed, that in France they are desirous of having the treaty ratified, and that it was a disappointment last year that the Parliament of Canada was not in a position to do it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Has the French Parliament ratified it?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No; but the hon. gentleman will understand that when Canada is transacting business with France, we hold the second place, and that we are to ratify first, and that a nation of the first order, compared to a colony, having granted in this instance an extraordinary privilege, we should make the first step.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Was any condition to that effect put in the treaty?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Of ratification, do you mean?

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—I refer to the line of steamers.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No; not a word of it; but there were correspondence and conversations to the effect that it would likely exist, and I have no doubt that it will, if I foresee rightly the immense trade which we will do in the future under this treaty.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There will be communication by steam. Under the old treaty and when other nations had advantages over us we had direct lines of steamers between Montreal and Havre and between Montreal and Rouen. I myself visited vessels in Montreal last year that had come to Montreal and were going direct to France, and we granted a subsidy before to a line of steamships that sailed from Antwerp to Canada and called at a French port on the return trip before going to Belgium.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Is not that line still in existence?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, but not subsidized by Canada; of course it is in existence. There is such a trade between Canada and Belgium that they can afford a line of steamers, but we do not subsidize that line at present. A vessel from Antwerp loading in Montreal, with a mixed or general cargo,or a portion of it for France would avoid the surtaxe, provided she broke bulk in France before she broke bulk anywhere else. Now some excitement and a little Gulf fog has been brought over the atmosphere by the fact that the advantages of the trade at St. Pierre-Miquelon were common to all and not to us alone. The French Islands in the Gulf of St. Lawrence have been made virtually a free port, and this extends to our neighbours and competitors as well as to us. It has been said that we should have insisted that it should apply to us alone. Well, such an unreasonable pretension could not have been affirmed by men conferring for the purpose of making a treaty. The interests of France require that St. Pierre-Miquelon should be made a free port, not only for the products of Canada, but also for some products from abroad and the United States. This was done previous to the signing of the treaty, and consequently had no influence upon it at all. But what advantages have been given to others, have been given to us also. It has been contended that the minimum duties imposed in 1892 are not sufficiently low. In fact, they are in certain cases higher than those established by the general tariff previous to 1892, but that has no influence upon trade at all. What is to be looked at is the competition from abroad. I call upon business men, to state if there is any serious disadvantage to us from the fact that this minimum is still high, when we are on the same footing with Norway, Sweden and the United States.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There is a reduction of the purchasing power of your customers.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I cannot take in the objection of the hon. gentleman. I say that it does not matter whether that minimum is high or low when everybody is on the same footing.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman asked the question, and that is why I interposed the remark.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If one can ship to England without paying any duty, he will not ship to France and pay a high duty.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, but if you get a better price in France. We have a market in France buying $38,000,000 worth of the articles which we have for sale: that shows that they must buy them.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—They must buy them somewhere.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They must buy them somewhere, and when we are put in the position of being able to sell them to them upon an equal footing with others, certainly we have bettered our position. Norway and Sweden and the United States in sending lumber into France have an advantage over us.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Is not Russia on the same footing?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I believe Russia is and Germany also. I did not mention Germany because they are so close to France they must have some transit advantages, but

I want to deal with the question fairly and I am taking nations which are nearly as removed from France as we are. When I point to the United States it is to do full justice to the question which I submit to the House. I do not want to make a comparison which would be an unfair one. If I took Germany, for instance, it would not be fair, because Germany has some transit advantages over us, but when I go across the ocean and point out the disadvantages under which we labour, I think I am right in coming to the conclusions at which I have arrived. Now as to the extension of the treaty in the lumber business, we have fortunately here men who belong to that trade, men already engaged in it. I got information from Quebec also, from large lumbermen there, saying that they have had applications for contracts to ship to France spruce and other lumber. I have read also a letter from an hon. member of this House whom I am sorry to see absent from this House at the present, the Hon. Mr. Snowball. I have read consular reports. I have seen evidence furnished by the Hon. Mr. Chaffers in Quebec, Mr. Dobell and other leading merchants in Canada, which anticipate large—and I might say more than large—advantages to be gained by the lumber trade under the present arrangement if it is ratified. I know that in moving the second reading of this bill I am met with the opposition of an eloquent member of this House, who has made it his special duty for the past few sessions back to try to impress commercial views upon this House which are in opposition to the views of the majority of this country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Why, this is a part of a free trade nation.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—To a certain extent it is a free trade nation, as far as advantages go. I wish they would give us free trade and not exact a return. I know that in this matter I am to be met with opposition and there is on the paper of this House the following resolution :—

That when Bill (147) intituled : "An Act respecting a certain Treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the French Republic," is before the Senate for a second reading, he will move in amendment that the said bill be not now read a second time, but that the said Treaty be returned to the Imperial Government, with a request that negotiations may be reopened with a view of placing the trade relations between France and Canada upon a more equitable and extended basis than is afforded by the treaty.

Now that is the objection that I am met with, and I say to the prohibitionists, can they vote in favour of that resolution? Can they vote in favour of a resolution which says "Send the treaty back to France so that we may get a wider one."

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—France raises something else besides wine, does she not?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Wine does not comprise all the products of France.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Certainly not, but if we get more advantages from France, perhaps instead of meeting opposition from the wine manufacturers of Canada, there would be greater opposition, especially if they refer to articles which we can manufacture ourselves.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—I would ask the hon. gentleman if the Government here is not free to admit, on a lower scale, any of the other goods from France?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—It is for Canada to decide?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Certainly. We can modify our tariff if we please. It is not a treaty that we shall not reduce our tariff on other goods if we choose, and the hon. gentleman is quite right in his observation, but I say now to the prohibitionist, Can you vote in favour of that resolution which says "send the treaty back to France and get a better one." As to the wine-growers, can they vote for this resolution? I say no, because the prayer of that resolution is that the treaty be sent back and that we get better terms and a more extensive trade. This treaty may be cancelled after a notice of one year. Suppose we had a more advantageous treaty, a treaty that would grant us greater advantages than this—would the prohibitionists and wine maufacturers find it as easy to abrogate it as it is to get rid of this one? If it were more extensive, if it granted Canada greater advantages, no government which lives by the will of the people would be in a position to do away with it, and perhaps we would never be blessed with a prohibitory liquor law. Perhaps we would never be in a position to better the condition of the wine manufacturers of Canada. Therefore I say that this resolution should not be adopted by those who wish to have commercial relations with France under this present treaty and who see the great advantages of it. As I stated in the beginning of my remarks, we have acquired almost the full privileges of a treaty making power True we have not made this one directly and by ourselves, but we have made it with a man of our own, and we have made it through the Ministry of England. This is our first application ; this is our first trial in such a transaction, and should we give England the occasion of saying that we are not ripe for the conditions which she has given us? Should we put the English statesmen in a position to say on a future day when we ask for a treaty either with the United States or with Germany or some other country : " But recollect that in 1894 you had made a treaty with France, and you have by the voice of your Parliament acknowledged that you were not ripe to make a treaty. We cannot expose you again to a second experience of the kind." And therefore we would be refused the opportunity. This treaty was made of our own free will and even if it were bad—which I do not admit—I think we are in honour bound as a British colony to ratify it. Is there a British colony which has ever denied its obligations? When we have signed bonds to borrow money in England have we ever allowed those bonds to be forfeited, have we not met them honourably? And when we go before the council of a nation of the first order and put our signature to this bond or treaty should we not respect this bond and this signature? Should we take advantage of being able to say that " we are a minor, we have not the manhood and the franchise of a nation and that we withdraw from it? We confess that you have humbugged us"—because really and truly that would be the meaning of refusing to ratify this treaty. It would be plainly saying " we have been humbugged." I hope this House will give no chance for the statesmen of France or of England, to say that we have made such a confession. On the contrary, I think I have shown this House that we have made a good bargain and that we have the courage, even if it were bad—reserving to ourselves the right of giving notice after the expiration of a certain time and getting rid of it—that we have the courage to stand by the agreement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When I came into the chamber this afternoon the hon. Minister who has charge of this bill was congratulating this House on the advantages that have accrued to us from having practically the arrangement of our own treaties. I must admit that in past years, when we had our treaties made for us through the Imperial channels, that very many mistakes were made. I am sorry to observe also that, on this occasion, when it is said that our own plenipotentiary was mainly responsible for the details of this treaty, that he did not follow the advice and direction of the Government of Canada who were really the authors of the treaty. The hon. Minister in his concluding remarks dwelt very strongly on our obligation to accept this treaty. Now I do not recognize that there is any obligation. I think I can recall very many instances—perhaps not on the spur of the moment—in which the mother country declined to confirm a treaty entered into by its own plenipotentiary when the plenipotentiary exceeded his powers. If the plenipotentiary from France employed to carry out this treaty directly disobeyed the directions given by France, France would not hesitate for a moment to disavow this treaty. It is not very long since we made a treaty with the United States. That treaty was subject to the approval of the Parliament of Canada and the Senate of the United States. The Senate of the United States disapproved of it. It did not place that country at any serious disadvantage that I am aware of. It was one of the conditions of the treaty, and it is one of the conditions of this treaty that the Parliament of Canada must confirm it. Are we going to allow sentiment to control us in the exercise of our judgment as to whether the treaty is a sound one or not? I should hope not. I think we have had it pretty well rung into our ears during the visit of our Australian cousins that in matters of trade, people are not governed by sentiment. We are not acting on sentiment when we tax more highly the goods from Great Britain than we do the goods from the United States. We collect one-third more duties on English goods than we do on United States goods. Neither the mother country nor the Dominion of Canada seem to feel that this is a reflection on our proper relations with the mother country, although it has been often pointed out that in the judgment of very many of us the reverse should be the case. Great Britain admits all our exports into her markets absolutely free, and we should not discriminate against her as between the United States and her. This question of sentiment ought to be dropped because I do not think it should weigh one iota in the scale. I am one of those who are strongly in favour of larger trade relations and always have been, but in making our treaties I like to recognize that the gentlemen who have been delegated to perform trusts of that sort have not, at least, betrayed us and gone directly opposite to the instructions they received. When we come to analyse this treaty, we will see that it is not going to bring us that prosperity which the hon. gentleman has so eloquently prophesied.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Wherein have our representatives exceeded their powers?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will point out in a moment wherein they have exceeded their powers. The treaty was pushed rather by our commissioner and having concluded it I think that he very forcibly—perhaps that is too strong a word—very positively insisted that the treaty should be ratified. We have only to go back to the history of it last year when it was announced. The Senate and the House of Commons were in session at the time, and there was a pretty general dissent against the adoption of it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Protests went abroad. The protests were met by the Government in the other House by the statement that Sir Charles Tupper had exceeded his powers. One particular clause was pointed out—the second article of the treaty:

> Any commercial advantage granted by Canada to any third power, especially in tariff matters, shall be enjoyed fully by France, Algeria and the French Colonies.

That is, if we choose to make any trade arrangements with any other country in the world we have got to include France. Not in those particular articles merely but in everything. The question came up two or three times in the House of Commons and on all occasions there was that cold approval given of it even by its own author. It shows that the Government then did not consider that the treaty was in the interests of Canada. The Minister of Finance, speaking on the 13th March when he declined positively to ratify the treaty said:

> Parliament will not be asked to ratify the treaty this year. I think it is also well to state that one of the chief points which the Government have to keep in view, is with respect to the favoured nation's clause. Whatever may have been our understanding with respect to all the other clauses of the treaty, as to articles which were to be allowed to come in, it is perfectly true that by our telegram of the 12th January we assented to these clauses, whether we fully understand them here or not, and are responsible for them. But with respect to the extensions of the most-favoured nation treatment, that was never contemplated by the Government, that was not included in our instructions, and, so far as that is concerned, was entirely beyond the wish of the Government.

There is no authority that I can find for for it, and the Minister of Finance who was the exponent of the Government in the interpretation of this treaty says most positively that they never intended it, did not desire it and there was no authority whatever for it, and it was beyond their instructions. Hon. gentlemen who read the correspondence will find that I am borne out in saying that our commissioner unduly pressed the confirmation of this treaty. We know what follows the confirmation of a treaty, medals, clasps and honours, and it is to be expected the most substantial part of it will be the honours that follow from it. As far as the press of this country is concerned, hon. gentlemen must be aware that they are pretty correct exponents of public opinion. There has not only been no enthusiasm about the treaty, but it was considered not worth discussing, although we were giving up a considerable part of our revenue and for a very ignoble purpose. What was it? That a few gentlemen could get their champagne for $4 less per case. That is the upshot of it. If we were getting something which the people generally could use, that would be a consideration, but hon. gentlemen know that there will not be more champagne used because it is got for $24 per case than $28 and I hope we will not import any more champagne because, as the Minister of Agriculture says, sometimes headaches follow the use of wine and champagne.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Only those who take too much of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—France is a highly protective country ; even its minimum tariff is very high. Its policy has been to sell to other nations and buy as little as possible from them. The reduction of the duties by the minimum tariff is really not sufficient to stimulate the export of those articles from France. It might be assumed that in the past we should have sold something considerable to France, because we have bought largely from France. Last year we bought nearly $3,000,000 worth. How much did France buy from us? Only $264,000 worth.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—That was under the maximum tariff.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What I say is, the difference between the maximum and the minimum tariff is not sufficient to stimulate trade in the articles coming under this treaty. If there was a fair and legitimate demand for those articles, we would have sold more than that to France. Our wholesales last year amounted to $118,500,000 and of that France bought exactly one-quarter of 1 per cent and that is the trade that we are going to stimulate by this treaty. We are going to give France concessions as against the United States, with which we do a pretty large business, a business which aggregates considerably over $100,000,000—our second largest business in the world—we propose to discriminate against the United States, because in giving France this concession we are giving it to the continent of Europe. We are going to give it to Australia—I am very glad of that because I think the Australian wines are better than those of Europe. It was announced in the other House that we do not propose to discriminate against Australia and Europe.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Minister of Finance and the Premier said they would admit all wines of that character wherever they came from.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—He did not state that at all. As to Australian we can allow them in at a lower rate than we allow French wines and France cannot complain.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am right in stating that Australian wines were to be admitted. Am I right in saying that the United States wines are not to share in the benefits?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—To share what?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To receive any benefit from the minimum tariff under which we admit wines of Australia and France?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Mr. Foster said in the House of Commons—"The Government does not intend for the present to discriminate against any country." That includes the United States.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That does not prevent us giving Australia advantages that we would not give any others without interfering with the French Treaty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am very glad of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What the hon. gentleman from Ottawa said was that the advantage was given to all Europe. The Finance Minister and the Premier both said there would be no discrimination.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No. I shall have an opportunity of explaining that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Even if the Finance Minister did not say that, I state here as a matter of fact that under the treaties with Belgium and Germany we must admit their wines on the same terms.

Hon Mr. ANGERS—It is restricted by the grade of the wine.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are obliged to give them the advantage of the favoured nations clause.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If the wine is graded at 26 per cent, but it is not. But then I do not even admit that the German wines would have to get the same advantage as the French wines and when I have an opportunity of speaking again I shall explain that.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is not the same wine at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I undersand the most-favoured nations clause is if one country admits the products of another country at the lowest rate. There are the express stipulations in those treaties that the favoured nations clause shall be extended to Belgium and Germany to the same extent that they are extended to any other country, and I think it was admitted in the other House that German and French wines would come in on the same terms. But I drop that. I say France as a matter of fact imports its wines largely. Since the phylloxera destroyed the vines of France, the finer French wines do not exist but are manufactured from the inferior ones of other countries which are brought in and made up. That is the case with champagne in particular. The phylloxera destroyed the vines of the champagne district and how do they make up the deficiency of champagne? By importation of foreign wine. The new vines do not grow on the chalk grounds of the champagne districts of France and consequently they cannot grow them there and the wines from the champagne district now are sent out in larger quantities when there are no grapes to manufacture them from, than 25 years ago when the grape was in its vigour.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The treaty only applies to articles of French origin.

Hon. M. SCOTT—Do you mean to tell me then when the wines of other countries are mixed in France and sent out as French wines that we are going to have them stopped to prove where the original came from? It cannot be done. I take the returns of last year in order to show hon. gentlemen that my statement is strictly correct. I have the returns down to 1891. There was imported in that year 401,000,000 francs worth of wine, and the export of wine from France for that year amounted to 246,000,000 francs, so you can see that there was over 150,000,000 francs worth of wine imported more than was sold abroad. Is not my statement correct in view of these figures? I get my figures from the Statesman's Year Book, and any hon. gentleman can verify my figures.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—How much does France use herself?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—She imported a great deal more than she exported, showing that my statement is correct that since the phylloxera destroyed the vines of France, that country has had to depend on wines of foreign countries.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Where does that wine come from?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A good deal of it from the south of Europe—Sicily, Spain and other countries.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And Australia.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If any hon. gentleman will take the trouble of looking up the figures of the test of wine in Paris, where the tests are very rigorously applied, they will find that a large percentage of wine is rejected as adulterated—it cannot be otherwise when the demand for those classes of wine all over the world is very much greater than the supply, Every one knows that if you choose to look at the lists of exported wine, from French houses it is apparent that year by year they are adding to the sale of their choice wines. Everybody must recognize that they are manufactured wines. It could not be otherwise—they are made to suit particular palates. I can give any amount of authority on that subject. I will read a recent article which appeared in the Saturday Review :

A great deal of misapprehension exists with regard to French wines. These, as a rule are supposed to be pure. This is a very violent supposition indeed; for in the majority of instances they are plastered, fortified, coloured and flavoured, and the practice of blending them with "vin de remede" is very commonly adopted. Then, too, sugaring the must is frequently adopted.

The treatment of M. Petiot is frequently called in play in the "doctoring" of French wines. Champagnes are blended in order to produce the different varieties, with which we are so well acquainted before they leave the factory. It is an open secret that champagne makers are very often not growers at all. When the champagne is bottled and cleared of yeast, liquor is added—a large amount if sweet wine is required, and a small amount if dry wine is required—and this consists of old and good flavoured wine, with the addition of cane sugar, and the usual flavouring matter. At times, indeed, it is even made from fruits, and has actually been known to have been concocted from aerated fruit syrups, water and a common kind of spirit.

If hon. gentlemen choose to pursue that subject, there is plenty of information, and they will find that a very large proportion of wines exported now are made from grapes not grown in the country they profess to be produced in. They are to that extent adulterated at any rate. I was under the impression that we were excluding American wine. I consider the purest wines in the world are California wines. Although they have not learned yet to make the finest wines, they at all events make the purest wines, because there is no inducement to adulterate while the grape is so abundant. Considering that France only bought $264,000 worth from us last year, which was only one-quarter of 1 per cent of our trade, are we likely to stimulate that trade with France by reducing the duty on the small amount of trade that is done? Many of the articles in this list we do not send to France at all. Originally the list was considerably larger, one of the articles being cheese. That was excluded, and I am sorry for it, because it would have helped to overcome the objection to the treaty. I have shown already that Sir Charles Tupper exceeded his authority and had no jurisdiction whatever for including the favoured nation clause as he did. It was directly contrary to instructions given him. Take the first article in the treaty. We have never sold anything of that kind to France as far as I can learn. The maximum duty was 20 francs per 100 kilograms; it is reduced now to 15 francs. Is that reduction sufficient to create a trade?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—That is a reduction of 25 per cent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You must recollect that that includes a very large amount. Will that stimulate a trade that has not before existed?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The States did it, and they had that advantage over us.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Timber rough or hewn is reduced per 100 kilograms from $1.50 to 75 cents—that is one-half; and from $2.50 on one class to $1.25; wood pulp from $1.20 to 75 cents; lobsters from 30 to 25 cents; apples, dried, from 15 cents to 10 cents; fresh, from 3 to 2 cents; boots and shoes from $1.75 to $1.20. I doubt whether we will send many boots and shoes to France. Many of the articles mentioned in the list we have never sent to France at all. The amount of $264,000 is made up chiefly of lumber and lobsters.

Hon. Mr. PRICE—The difference in duty on timber alone is $1.25 to $1.50 per thousand feet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is a handsome reduction.

Hon. Mr. PRICE—Yes, it is equal to a handsome profit.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell me whether before 1891, when the tariff was changed, we sent lumber to France?

Hon. Mr. PRICE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Was it admitted free then?

Hon. Mr. PRICE—No, it was subject to a duty. It was admitted on the same tariff as the timber of Great Britain. It is now subject to the maximum duty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We sent about $110,000 worth in the last year that we have returns for.

Hon. Mr. PRICE—Practically it is excluded from the country altogether by the prohibitory tariff.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That and lobsters were the two principal items. In making this treaty with France, if we had agreed to admit certain articles used by the great masses of people of this country, there would be less objection to it, but it seems very extraordinary that practically we admit wine only, because nuts and soap are not worth discussing.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—We do not grow them here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The money value of nuts in a treaty does not amount to much. When we are agreeing to reduce the tariff on certain articles it should be in the direction of benefiting the principal consumers and not benefiting a few gentlemen. I think it is an offence against the public sentiment of this country. But the hon. gentleman has said that prohibition people have nothing to complain of. I think they have a good deal to complain of. It is setting them at defiance because we cannot keep from view the fact that the great majority of the people of Canada who take stimulants are not wine drinkers.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE—That is what we want to change.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a considerable element, certainly a majority outside of Quebec, and possibly a majority in Quebec, who are in favour of prohibition. There is no doubt about it in the province of Manitoba, if we are to be governed in our conclusions by the votes of the people. Ontario gave a majority of 80,000 odd in favour of prohibition.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—There was the same kind of vote under the Scott Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman's Government would not enforce it.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—No, nor would the hon. gentleman's own Government have enforced it had they remained in power.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Had they remained in power they would have enforced it.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Why is it there is so little intemperance in France?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Formerly there was not. Up to the time the phylloxera destroyed the vines the wines were generally pure, and the use of much wines did not produce intoxication. But it is the experience now that there is a good deal more intemperance in France than there ever was before.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reports of recent travellers state that there is a very great change of late years simply because wines are not as pure as they were formerly.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Still the people of France are the most temperate people in the world.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite prepared to admit that.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Hear, hear. France and Italy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose the habitant in his native province does drink the pure wine.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—The crop of last year was the greatest for many years, so that there is no danger of adulteration for that year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite aware that last year's crop was an unusual one. The Statesman's Year Book shows that France imports more wine than it exports. It is not quite proper, I think, to shock the public sentiment of this country by attaching such importance to the value of importing wines of the character used by the wealthier classes. It must offend the great mass of the people, and they look upon it as a check to the prohibition sentiment. The province of Prince Edward Island has practically adopted prohibition. What is called the Scott Act is in force throughout the island.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—And they drink more than they did before.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We will not discuss that—at all events, they have declared in favour of prohibition. Ontario and Manitoba have done the same and the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, by the returns, show that they are practically in favour of temperance. The consumption there per head is very much below what it was, and I am glad to know that the temperance sentiment is growing. The hon. Minister did not attach much importance to that branch of the subject and sought to excuse the position of the Government by saying that we can denounce the treaty. So we can, but it is not a courteous thing, after you have entered into a treaty with a country, to denounce it. Even if we are not receiving our quota of value from it, I would not like to see it denounced. France is in a position to refuse to confirm the treaty. It does not follow because her plenipotentiaries have made this treaty that the parliament of France will approve of it. Very likely they will. It was made on the spot, and their public men were present, but it was made 3,000 miles away from us. It should be looked at apart from sentiment, and should be judged on its merits, whether we are getting any substantial advantages from from it. The hon. gentleman from Chicoutimi says that it will make a difference of $1.25 per thousand on lumber. To that extent it will benefit us. Whether it will increase the export of lumber to France, I cannot say, but certainly the experience of the past has been that France is not very willing to trade with us, considering that we were buying nearly $3,000,000 worth from her and she was buying only $264,000 worth from us. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has put the amendment on the paper, that it is better to defer the treaty for another year. It has had a cold reception during the past year. The press of the country has not been jubilant over it, and I think we had better wait another year before giving it our confirmation.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Some days ago I put a notice on the paper that I would move that the treaty be returned to the Imperial Government with a request that negotiations might be reopened with a view to placing the trade relations between Canada and France on a better footing than is offered by the treaty. Some hon. gentlemen may think I took a rather forward step in giving such a long notice, but when an important question like this is before this House it is right that the Government should have fair warning as to what sort of attack might be made on it when it comes up for consideration. The hon. leader of the House has said that this is one of the first treaties that we have had the privilege of negotiating after striving for a great number of years to get that privilege, and that we have negotiated this treaty ourselves through our own officials with the assistance of an Imperial officer and an old friend, Lord Dufferin. The very fact that we have undertaken to negotiate our own treaties and that this is the first one that we have negotiated behooves us to consider very carefully how far it is wise for us to give our sanction to it, which sanction is one of the conditions attached to the making of the treaty. The hon. gentleman knows that in the House of Commons the Government have brought the treaty forward after a year's delay. The reason apparent to the public that there was that delay was because the treaty which was negotiated was not in accordance with the policy of the Government as laid down in the instructions given to the plenipotentiary who negotiated it, and it was quite apparent to the country that the plenipotentiary who negotiated the treaty, Sir Charles Tupper, in view of the refusal of the Government apparently to bring it up for ratification, exercised his influence and power over the Government.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I say so, as far as the public can judge of it it is so.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We understood it was telegraphed out that Sir Charles Tupper would resign if they did not do so.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We can only judge of these things as they are stated to us.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is gossip.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly it is gossip. But when you take the utterances of the Finance Minister last year, when you take the supposed utterances of the High Commissioner, and when you take the introduction of the treaty in the face of the correspondence that is put before us for the consideration of the treaty, I say there are very fair grounds for justification in saying that rather than have any trouble in the ranks of the Government they receded from their position and brought the treaty down for our ratification. I think possibly that as the Government negotiated the treaty through their plenipotentiary, and as it was signed, they probably were perfectly right. They felt to a certain extent in honour bound to bring it before Parliament. But while the Government may have been placed in that position through their plenipotentiary, it does not all follow that we, as canadian Senators, are bound to sanction it for the same reason. Now hon. gentlemen will see further that in the House of Commons all our French Canadian fellow-countrymen came together, irrespective of party, and voted for the treaty.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That, I consider, was a matter of sentiment with them.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly. When two parties unite in that way, it cannot be on a question of public policy; it is a matter of sentiment.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly, that is not the way parties usually act. There is nothing in this treaty that would cause two opposite parties to combine purely upon the question of the advantages in the bill itself. It is because it is a French Treaty. I respect the sentiment of those gentlemen. I am not finding fault with them for taking that ground. I am merely stating what appears to me to be a fact—that they have united in support of the treaty in the House of Commons out of respect to the sentiment with which they are imbued. It is an honourable sentiment, and one that I respect. But, at any rate, I draw the attention of the House to these facts which I consider are the reason why the merits of the treaty itself have been lost sight of to a very great extent. Quoting from a French Canadian journal I observe the exports to France are placed as follows:

Nouvelle-Ecosse	$ 316,995
Nouveau-Brunswick	78,956
Ile du Prince-Edouard	30,761
Ontario	19,845
Manitoba	500
Provinces-Anglaises	446,457
Quebec	63,054

These figures do not accord with our Trade and Navigation returns in amount, but they indicate the argument used to secure a united support to the treaty. I see by the French Trade and Navigation returns that the imports from Canada are not separated from the British colonies in America which include all in North and South America. Many of the members supporting the Government, while not prepared to eulogize the treaty, or to take it up and defend it, said: "We feel that the Government is in honour bound to ratify it because the treaty has been signed by our plenipotentiaries." They responded to the appeal which I have no doubt was made to them in the House of Commons, and which the hon. leader has made to this House, that because the treaty was negotiated by the Imperial Government we are in honour bound to carry it out. Now, I submit to this House that there are ample precedents to show that that is not a just or a necessary position for us to take. I will show you that when a treaty had been negotiated between the French Government and the Swiss Government, and had proceeded as far as our treaty has gone at the present moment, the French parliament felt that they were not bound to carry it out. Here are Lord Dufferin's own words. He says:

Lord Dufferin in the course of our interview called my attention to an article in to-day's Figaro, a copy of which I attach, on the proposed France-Swiss convention and its probable reception at the hands of the chambers. You will remember that in this measure the French Government have agreed to an arrangement revolving reductions on their minimum tariff, and the trade relations with Switzerland are of such consequence to have warranted this. But it now appears that there is a very stong feeling against any convention being conducted on such terms, and the article in question seems to indicate that the Government are seeking to detach themselves from the matter and to throw the responsibility on the shoulders of the Minister of Agriculture and of Commerce, upon whom the responsibility for defending the negotiation in the chamber will devolve.

A little further on, on page 41, Sir Charles Tupper again refers to the matter and says:

Switzerland, which sent France in 1891, over 36,000,000 lbs. of this cheese, is now under the maximum tariff, which imposes a duty of twenty-five francs per one hundred killos, against fifteen francs, the minimum tariff rate.

That shows the view that France took of a treaty of this kind, negotiated with Switzerland. Her government carried out the treaty with Switzerland, signed it, and completed it, but allowed Parliament to override the treaty which she had negotiated. There is a precedent established by the power with whom we have entered into this treaty: therefore it would not be considered by France a point of honour with the Canadian Parliament to carry it out on any such ground as the fact that the treaty had been signed. There was another precedent which I read to this House the other day, when speaking on the same question. England was negotiating a treaty with Spain in 1886, and her policy was that in any negotiation for opening the markets of Spain, in consideration of the raising of the alcoholic test of the Spanish wines to 30 per cent, we were to be admitted to the market of the Spanish colonies and Spain. Spain wished to confine it to Great Britain alone in her colonies of Cuba and Porto Rico. Great Britain's policy was: "No, whatever advantages you give to us you give to our colonies at the same time in Cuba and Porto Rico." Spain wanted to exclude Canada from Cuba and Porto Rico; England refused to do it. The treaty was negotiated by Sir Clare Forde and concluded, and he sent it to the British Government for their sanction before signing it. He said it was the best treaty that could be had, and he thought it was better to let Cuba and Porto Rico go under the circumstances. This is the reply of the then Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lord Rosebery:

These considerations, to which, in the interests not merely of the revenue, but also of the British trade, much weight must be attached, deter Her Majesty's Government from granting you authority to grant the declaration which you have submitted for their sanction. They have, however, arrived at this conclusion with much regret, and they trust that time is not distant when a successful effort may be made to obtain the object which they have in view. It is, therefore, the wish of Her Majesty's Government that, in the event of the Spanish Government being willing to pursue them, the negotiations should be continued by you on the wider basis which the foregoing remarks indicate: but having regard to the opinion expressed in your despatch, that, owing to a necessity which would arise of a readjustment of valuations and of a reduction of duties in the Spanish tariff, the present moment is not opportune for negotiating a definite treaty such as the commercial classes of this country would desire, Her Majesty's Government leave to your discretion the particular action which it may be desirable now to take.

MADRID, March 27th, 1886.

MY LORD,—In conformity with the instructions contained in your Lordship's despatch of the 22nd inst, I addressed a note to Senor Moret, the Spanish Minister of State, in the sense of the despatch which your lordship had addressed to me.

In the course of the afternoon I had an opportunity of seeing the Minister, who expressed to me the regret he felt on learning that Her Majesty's Government were unable to grant me authority to sign the declaration which I had submitted to them. * * * * *

He was prepared, he said, to frame a bill which he would present to the Cortes as soon as they met in the month of May, to grant to Great Britain the most-favoured nation treatment in Spain and in the Spanish colonies without any exception whatever, co-extensive both in amount of benefit and in duration with that accorded to France and Germany.

There was a treaty negotiated between England and Spain after a great deal of trouble and a great deal of communication between the Spanish Government and the British plenipotentiary. The British Government did not hesitate for one second when it was contrary to her recognized and acknowledged policy, to throw the treaty to one side, with a polite request that so soon as it was possible to make a better treaty she was open to do it.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Was it signed by the plenipotentiary?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No; but it was negotiated.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It was no treaty then.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to show you, as far as signing it is concerned, that our plenipotentiary signed it in direct opposition to the policy of the Government.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Spain would not acknowledge the right of British colonies to go into Cuba and Porto Rico.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—She did. There was a treaty negotiated which threw open Cuba and Porto Rico to Canada as well as to England.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What was the objection of Great Britain?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It was never signed.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—There must have been some objection.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—It was only in preparation.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It had been negotiated, and when it was negotiated it was then sent to the British Government for authority to sign. Our plenipotentiary negotiated a treaty with France, but he never sent the treaty to his Government to get the authority to sign it, and it is in consequence of the failure of the plenipotentiary, our High Commissioner, who was intrusted with the rights of Canada to send the treaty for the approval of Canada that I take a very strong objection to it. The treaty was contrary to the policy of the Canadian Government in regard to the most-favoured nation treatment, and I say that the policy that they instructed him to pursue is a sound one and a policy that they should not have departed from by bringing this treaty forward. We in this House are not bound, fortunately, by the exigencies that very often influence members of the House of Commons. We can exercise our independent views; we can take a broad and statesmanlike view of a treaty of this kind, as to how far it is going to affect the country, how far it is in accord with the policy that we should lay down in the negotiation of any future treaty. It is on those grounds we should consider this treaty and not from any narrow standpoint; and when I stand before this House to-day it is not for the purpose of kicking the treaty over; it is to have it negotiated upon a broad and equitable basis that it may expand our trade with France and make it a treaty of friendship as well as of commerce.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It is a new rule to send it back.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, I have shown you that France sent a treaty back. I have shown you the correspondence in which the Parliament of France sent back the treaty they had signed with Switzerland. One of the conditions of this treaty is that it shall be sanctioned by Parliament. We are a part of Parliament, and therefore if we do not sanction it there can be no ground of dishonour, no breach of faith of any kind or description.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Our Government does not want to send it back.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Now, hon. gentlemen, there is just a doubt in my mind as to whether the treaty will be ratified by France, whether they will not deal with this treaty exactly in the same manner that they dealt with the Swiss treaty, and I will give you my reason for saying so. Mr. Foster, in the House of Commons, has told us that under the most-favoured nations treatment all the nations in Europe with whom we have most-favoured nation treaties will be included; and notwithstanding a conference we held here the other day, for the purpose of negotiating with our sister colonies for better treatment, if that treaty were carried out, and no legislation enacted, France would be sending her wines in here at 50 per cent less tariff than our sister colonies would be allowed to send in from the Cape of Good Hope and Australia.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh, no, it does not affect them at all.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I beg pardon, at the present moment you have to make legislation which will enable Australia to send their wine in at the same rate as France now obtains in this treaty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Legislation will have to be put upon the statute-book to allow Australia to do so.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It will not affect this treaty.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It will affect Australia till a bill is enacted.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—She does not send us wine.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—She sends it to France, and France will send it to us under this treaty, and the statement I read you a few moments ago, that Mr. Foster made in the House of Commons, was that the policy of the Government is to show no discrimination, but to throw down the bars and admit these wines up to 26 per cent proof from Australia and the United States.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—United States is not mentioned.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, Sir Richard Cartwright asked the question :

Mr. McCARTHY—Will be put upon the same footing.

Mr. FOSTER—Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitation in answering my hon. friend's question, perhaps a little more widely than he has asked it. In the first place, then, the treaty does not oblige us, as is apparent on the face of it, to give to France preferential treatment in our market. It simply obliges us to take off the ad valorem duty. We are at perfect liberty to take off the ad valorem duty upon wines coming from any other country. We are at perfect liberty to reduce the specific duties below the present rate, but, in that case, of course we should be obliged to give France equal treatment with the other foreign country or power. We are not, however, obliged to withhold from our sister colonies the same treatment, or better treatment than we give to France in relation to her wines; nor is it the intention of the Government to withhold from the sister colonies at present equal treatment with respect to the same kind of wines as is given to French product.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—What does the hon. gentleman propose with respect to other wines—German, for instance, and Spanish?

Mr. FOSTER—With reference to the wines of countries which have most-favoured nation treaties the clauses of which bind us, then wine of the same quality would come in under the same conditions as French wines. With reference to other foreign countries, that may be a matter for consideration as to what is best to be done. The points I have answered take in all except the nations that have no favoured nation treaty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Germany has a favoured nation clause, and Spain also.

Mr. FOSTER—No; not Spain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It had at one time.

Mr. FOSTER—Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If French wines are admitted at this reduction; if German wines are admitted, if Australian and Cape wines are admitted on the same terms—and I presume

United States wines, if any such come in—how will United States wines be treated?

Mr. FOSTER—They need not be treated in the same way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, no. What I want to know is what the Government proposes to do. This is the proper time to have an explanation of the policy of the Government with respect to these countries.

Mr. FOSTER—The Government does not intend to discriminate for the present against any country.

If that is not going to admit Australian wines and United States wines, and wines from all parts of the world upon the same basis as we are now according to France, I do not know what it means.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Is that what you want?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, it is a free trade measure I want; but when we get a treaty negotiated with France I want to see that it is equitable so far as the industrial people of the country are concerned and not release the luxuries from duty while necessities are taxed. Now, hon. gentlemen, here is what Sir Charles Tupper said to the the French representatives who were negotiating this treaty with him, I quote from his correspondence:

The French representatives also add that any tariff remission given to France would be much more valuable if it were confined to France and not extended to any other country—that is to give them a monopoly. I replied that it was as impossible for us to entertain any such proposition as it would be for them to confine the minimum tariff to any one country, and that Canada must remain entirely free in that respect. I stated that Canada would certainly not give any other country any concession she might make to France without obtaining a sufficient equivalent in return.

Now the point I take there is that if Sir Charles Tupper, our plenipotentiary, has assured France that we would not give any concession to another country similar to that which we are giving to France, unless we got an equivalent, is not that impressing the Government of France with the idea we would not do so? Now in the face of the statement, our Finance Minister has made in the House of Commons which I have just read to you, it may be taken for granted that Sir Charles Tupper is wrong, and that we are going to throw open the country, and in the arrangement we are making with France, we do not propose to discriminate against anybody, what effect is that likely to have upon the French Parliament when they come to discuss this treaty? My idea is that, if they are still of the same mind as they were when negotiating with Switzerland, they may take the same ground and withdraw from the treaty in the same way as they did in the treaty with Switzerland. It is for these reasons that I say there is a reasonable doubt as to whether this treaty will be ratified by France.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—That would be very bad for us.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—As to whether it will go into operation or not. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to read you the instructions that were sent to Sir Charles Tupper, in order to show how far the departure has been made from the acknowledged settled policy of the Government in regard to the negotiation of treaties and of this principle in particular. This treaty was under negotiation for some six or eight months but on the 12th January, in reply to communication from Sir Charles Tupper, Mr. Bowell telegraphed to him the following:

Re French negotiations. Government cannot accept conditions involved in clauses regarding steamship subvention and reduction duty French books, but agree to most-favoured nation treatment so far as articles named in treaty are concerned.

Now that is on the 12th January. After that Sir Charles Tupper went to Paris in order to negotiate the treaty and he acknowledged the receipt of this and said it was all right and satisfactory. Then on the 4th February, two days before the treaty was signed, another telegram from Mr. Bowell to Sir Charles Tupper says:

Letter 21st received this morning. Impossible to decide until further information reaches us as to what are specified in the draft. Cable what proposition is as to cheese.

Then without any date at all Sir Charles Tupper answers:

Your telegram received in Paris, Sunday, is fully answered by my letters 24th and 25th January, which should have reached you yesterday.

Then a telegram on 6th February from Sir Charles Tupper says:

Treaty was duly signed at foreign office to-day at five. Only alteration in draft already sent you is the addition of wood pavement in the piece.

Then Sir John Thompson on same date telegraphs:

TUPPER, London,—No draft received; no steps shall be taken towards ratification until we cable approval. At present cannot understand what terms proposed either side.

THOMPSON.

Now that is the condition the Government was in while that treaty was being negotiated so far as information was concerned. I will read you Sir Charles Tupper's letter of January 31st. Sir Charles Tupper writes to Hon. Mr. Bowell :—

VICTORIA CHAMBERS,
17, VICTORIA ST., LONDON, S. W.,
31st January, 1893.

Hon. MACKENZIE BOWELL,
Minister of Trade and Commerce,
Ottawa.

DEAR MR. BOWELL,—I returned to London from Paris on the 27th instant and on the following day I left the text of the treaty at the foreign offices, as I had been requested to do by Lord Dufferin. I explained that it was of importance that Lord Dufferin and I should be authorized to sign at the earliest possible moment, as the Canadian Government were anxious to submit the treaty to the House, now in session, without delay. I am expecting at any moment to receive the necessary instructions.

I take the opportunity of submitting a short memorandum I have drawn up on the subject of the opening in France for hard cheese, provided Canada obtained the minimum tariff on that article which I commend to your perusal. I have also in this connection to make a correction in the statement I made in my last despatch, namely, that Switzerland exported 36,000,000 pounds of cheese to France. This amount, as you will see from the memorandum, represents the total importation of hard cheese into France.

I am, faithfully yours,

CHARLES TUPPER.

Now, you see, Sir Charles Tupper returned from Paris after concluding the treaty. He concluded the final negotiations with the French Government, and returned to London in order to submit the treaty to the Imperial Government, and between the 27th January and the 4th or 5th February he remained in London, when he returned to Paris. Now, between 27th January and 6th February there was ample time to cable out the full text of the treaty from London to Canada in accordance with the desire of Sir John Thompson, the leader of the Government, that they might know exactly what their plenipotentiaries were going to sign. They were completely in the dark as to what was going on, and, as results proved, they were perfectly justified in taking that position, because the treaty Sir Charles Tupper negotiated was not in accordance with the instruction he had received from our Government in regard to the treaty which Sir Charles Tupper was aware of. As in a letter dated January 25th to the Hon. Mr. Bowell appears this clause referring to the change in the terms authorized by the Government. "This at first sight may appear to exceed in a slight degree the instructions that you gave me, but practically I think it will be found to be entirely unobjectionable." The Government's instructions practically were :

We will not accede to the proposition of most-favoured nation treatment on the conditions that are in the treaty now, but we will concede it so far as the articles mentioned in the treaty itself are concerned.

There is a vast difference between the two, and there is a vital principle at stake in the change. At the present moment the treaty that has been negotiated has given to France most-favoured nation treatment in all Canadian commerce. Whatever arrangement we make with any country in the world with regard to our commerce France gets the benefit of most-favoured nation treatment, but in return we only get the benefit of most-favoured nation treatment in regard to the articles mentioned in the treaty. The Government would not accede to that. They had sense enough, and they had statesmanlike knowledge enough to realize it, and they were not in such a desperate haste and anxiety to negotiate a treaty as to take it upon any terms whatever. They said to Sir Charles Tupper, "Only negotiate your most-favoured nation treatment on those terms." But Sir Charles Tupper went and negotiated a treaty, and although he had eight or nine days between the final negotiating of it and the actual signing of it to transmit the information that was eagerly and anxiously sought for through the cable by Sir John Thompson and Mr. Bowell—he had all that time—yet the information was not forwarded, and the treaty has been negotiated and has been signed, and now we are called upon simply because the treaty has been signed, simply because the signatures of the plenipotentiaries have been put to it, we are called upon to make it law, and that is advanced as the only reason why this Parliament should give its sanction to the treaty. Now we, as the Senate, as an important part of the Parliament of Canada, have a perfect right to say that we do not think, in the negotiation of one of the first treaties that we have been called upon to negotiate, that we should admit the principle as a sound one, that most-favoured nation treatment with any other nation that we may negotiate a treaty with, shall be of that one-sided character as I contend this is. We should act with the dignity becoming a parliament, and the negotiation of this treaty shows the advisability of our High Commissioner having a seat in Parliament, where for a month or so annually he could take his seat; it would add strength and dignity in his official relations with the Imperial Government. We should recognize the value of the entry of the market into this great country of ours when we attempt to make a treaty—a country as large as Russia, so far as the territory is concerned, and may be, as I hope it will be one day, composed of ten, fifteen or twenty million people, and all the time expanding. The value of most-favoured nation treatment in Canada should be exactly upon the same terms as most-favoured nation treatment to France, upon the grounds which I stated here the other day, that while our purchasing power was limited to five million people our selling power, or power to take advantage of the larger market, was no greater, because if you look at the returns of nearly every nation on the face of the earth, you will find there is an approximation between their selling power and their purchasing power, and the freer their trade the greater their purchasing power, and therefore, if those two are equal, the most-favoured nation treatment that leads to the interchange of produce should also be equalled. For that reason, hon. gentlemen, I say it is not an equitable treaty. What I say is that we should ask the Imperial Government, in consequence of a misunderstanding that arose through the negotiation of the treaty, in consequence of the departure from the instructions that our Government gave to the plenipotentiaries with regard to it, that we request that they will reopen the negotiations, in order that the most-favoured nation clause and one or two other things in regard to the treaty should be brought before the French Government, in order that they may be rectified, the object of our French Canadian friends being to extend commerce with France.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is the object we all have, to extend commerce in every direction. We do not want to be restricted in any possible way, and if you make a one-sided treaty the chances are it will not be found to work equitably, and that before a year or two are over it will be found necessary to denounce it. If the French Government itself carries out this treaty in its present form and ratifies it, before two years are over I believe it will be found to be so inequitable in its arrangements that it will be denounced by our people, and I say it is most inequitable as far as the people of Canada are concerned.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What do we give away?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We give away most-favoured nations treatment in the ports in Canada, in exchange for most-favoured nation treatment in twenty articles, many of which, as Sir Charles Tupper pointed out to the French Government, we could not take advantage of unless we subsidized a direct line to escape the surtaxe d'entrepôt.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—For a little wine.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, sir, we are exchanging the duties on wine for the duties on twenty articles. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of replying to me after awhile. The treaty has been negotiated. The wine has been permitted to come in at a certain rate and we have twenty articles admitted at a certain rate. The most-favoured nation treatment is what I call a treaty of friendship; that is to say, we wish to extend to France whatever friendly relations we may extend to every nation and we ask the same. That is what I call a treaty of friendship. The other articles are an equitable distribution of the trade so far as it presented itself to the mind of the Government and the mind of our plenipotentiary. Great Britain is a country that has always said: "We throw open our markets and our policy is a free trade policy; we negotiate treaties not for the purpose of dickering and trading a few articles off against a few articles, but what we do ask is that we shall not be discriminated against in the markets of foreign nations in any shape or form whatever. All we ask is a fair field and no favours and upon that basis she has built up an enormous commerce." She has built up enormous wealth, and I say, hon. gentlemen, that the closer that we can adhere to that policy of Great Britain, so far as most-favoured nation treatment is concerned, the better for our industrial population, the better for our whole country. I say we should adhere to that policy, and the Imperial Government, in referring back the treaty to reopen negotiations, I believe, will feel themselves perfectly justified in doing so for the purpose of enabling Canada to closely follow her policy in regard to the most-favoured nation treatment that she has for so many years followed up. Now, hon. gentlemen, Sir Charles Tupper has signed the treaty and it has been sent out now for us to ratify. I have pointed out to this honourable House the conditions under which it has been ratified. I have pointed out to this House how it has been ratified and signed contrary to the policy of the Government, and I would dwell for a few moments upon the merits of the treaty itself. Of course there are some that are going to be benefited in regard to the treaty but benefited to such a small extent so far as the general trade of the country is concerned and so far as their own trade is concerned, that it is hardly worth while for anybody to consider the treaty from a personal standpoint as to what effect it is going to have upon his business in any of the articles that are now being dealt with in the treaty. Our leader has told us that we are going to be admitted to trade in that country in 20 articles upon the minimum tariff, and that the minimum tariff will open out to us a trade in articles that are imported by France to the value of $38,000,000. He made a mistake of $5,000,000.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, you will see that cheese is included in that $38,000,000, and that it is not included in the treaty. Six o'clock being called, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FRENCH TREATY BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Before the adjournment I had dealt with the method that had been adopted with regard to the negotiation of the treaty and I was about to commence to refer to the merits of the treaty itself so far as the imports and exports with which they deal are concerned. I will endeavour to show that the effect of the treaty so far as its effect on the country is concerned is that the maritime provinces will get a small benefit from the treaty and possibly one or two portions of the provinces of Quebec, but the main portion of the province of Quebec, the whole of Ontario and the North-west Territories are getting no benefit from it whatever. British Columbia may be able to sell some lumber. No one tells you in what way our western provinces can in any respect get any benefit from this treaty, but more than that, for the benefits that accrue to those portions of the country that can take advantage of it, the province of Ontario in their wine district is paying the bonus. In other words, the duties which are remitted by France in favour of the articles in the treaty is a bonus to those industries engaged in the production of those articles, and those who pay the bonus for it are the wine producers of the province of Ontario that are attacked through the importations in regard to the wine duties. It will be my object to show that that position is a correct one in order to criticise the merits of the treaty itself. The hon. leader of the House has said that the treaty put on the minimum list a certain number of articles, twenty altogether, and the gross importation into France of those twenty articles from all countries is $38,000,000. I corrected him with regard to the amount: it is only $33,000,000, because in the addition of it cheese is included which is not mentioned in the treaty. The importation of cheese into France is in the neighbourhood of $5,000,000. So there are $33,000,000 of the imports of France with which we have to deal in discussing the twenty articles which are benefited by the minimum tariff. Of that $33,000,000 the chief article is lumber, the amount being $20,000,000, including $3,750,000 for staves. Our exportation of lumber to France is exceedingly small and has never been large. Our export of staves is $560,000, all going to the United States. In 1892, as has already been stated here, the tariff was the same to all countries, up to which date I believe lumber was free, but since then there has been a maximum and a minimum tariff established. I have here the Trade and Navigation returns of France showing exactly what the importations of lumber have been and the countries from which they are imported. The chief countries they import lumber from are Russia, Sweden, Austria, Norway, the United States and Canada, and taking the last decade between 1882 and 1892, which is the date at which the maximum and minimum tariff was established, the average annual importations were as follows:

From Russia	$4,000,000
Sweden	8,600,000
Austria	8,000,000
Norway	1,800,000
United States	800,000
Canada (during seven years of that period)	400,000

In 1893 in consequence of the heavy duties the import of lumber has fallen to $16,000,000. One of the great arguments in favour of the treaty is that it is going to make a market for our lumber. In the 10 years during which we had equal opportunity to trade in the markets of France with other countries for which we have returns, France imported only $400,000 worth of lumber per annum from the British Colonies in America and recollect that $400,000 is not computed at the cost or price of the article as it leaves this country but is I presume the value of the lumber quoted at port of entry with all those heavy duties added to it so that in reality so far as the valuation is concerned where it leaves Canada it does not amount to $400,000 and for these reasons our export of lumber of $150,000 to France may be accepted as fairly correct.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It will be entered as at first cost of the country where it is imported from.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, it is valued with the duty and freight added by valuators and for revenue purposes they compute that valuation high, therefore the value of the importation according to the French Trade and Navigation returns is no indication of the value of the lumber that left Canada.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Or any other country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Or any other country for that matter. I am only pointing out that to show that $400,000 is not the Canadian value of the exports. For ten years before we were subject to any disability under the maximum or minimum tariff we were only able to export, according to French valuation, $400,000 a year, from all the British Colonies in America and the chief imports of lumber have come from Russia, Austria, Norway and Sweden, and a small amount from the United States, which shows that neither the United States nor Canada can compete with those countries in sending lumber to France, at least they have not shown any capacity to do so up to the present moment, although, apparently, trading on even terms up to 1892. It may be taken as an evidence that they have found better markets elsewhere. Therefore, if we are merely put on a par with Russia, Norway and Sweden under a minimum tariff we will be under no greater advantage than we were during the ten years to which I have referred.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—How long has Norway had that favoured nations treaty?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Of course, maximum and minimum tariff was passed in 1892 and therefore, I presume, Norway and Sweden have negotiated a treaty under the minimum tariff since 1892.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Had she not one before that?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Not that I am aware of. There was just the same tariff open to our country. Everybody knows that our export of lumber is about $25,000,000 every year. A very large portion of it goes to the United States and to the open market of Great Britain—$10,000,000, I think, to the United States and $12,000,000 to Great Britain. So that on the merits of the treaty itself is it wise to consider the ability to export $200,000 or $300,000 worth of lumber as shown by the Trade and Navigation returns, as compared with that twenty-five millions of dollars export of lumber that we already enjoy and can enjoy in the markets of the United States and Great Britain and other markets?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It will not prevent our sending it there still.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am merely comparing the ability of Canada to compete with Russia, Sweden and Norway during those years when we were all on equal terms with our ordinary and general exports of lumber which have amounted from twenty to twenty-five millions, and I am only drawing deductions from that, that while the minimum tariff may place us on a level with Norway, Sweden and Russia, the benefit will accrue to only two or three different lumber mills which will reap perhaps a benefit, as my hon. friend from Quebec who is acquainted with the lumber trade, says it will, to the amount of $1.25 per thousand on lumber exported. But when that maximum tariff is reduced, the question is whether the French market will be of more value than is already enjoyed by our lumbermen in the Argentine Republic, the United States, England and elsewhere. Sir Charles Tupper in his returns calculates upon an increase of exports of lumber to France of one-half, that will amount to $100,000 or $150,000 a year. I trust if the treaty goes into force it will be more than that. I am quite prepared to admit the advisability and advantage of getting under the minimum tariff, and I would point out that the treaty if confirmed from its merits should be confirmed upon its merits so far as it benefits or affects the whole country. What I am arguing for, and why I have brought up this motion, as I said before, is not to destroy the treaty but to endeavour through the means of this honourable House to improve the treaty, and if we do, instead of most-favoured nation treatment in those twenty articles that are put there for export to France we should get the benefit of any relaxation of the McKinleyism of France. France, like the United States, will soon realize that prohibitory duties check trade and commerce and a more liberal policy may be inaugurated; to secure that in exchange for a like treatment is what I am fighting for, so that if France opens her markets to cheese, butter, cattle, or anything else that the western provinces of Canada and the agricultural districts of Canada produce, they may benefit from it quite as much as the industries that are provided for in this treaty. It is that there may be an equitable treaty all over the country and every one of us may be able to stand up and say that the treaty is acceptable to Ontario, Quebec, and to Manitoba, or any part of the country, that we will have something on our statute-books which will be of permanent benefit to the country. If we pass a treaty to-day that is as partial as this one proves to be, is it likely to stand? If Ontario, the most populous province in the country, shows that little benefit can be obtained from the treaty, how long do you suppose that treaty will remain in force? Is it not better that we should take this measure as it stands and try and negotiate a better treaty before it becomes law, and we, as members of this Parliament shall not be obliged to say after two or three years, we denounce that treaty as not being an equitable or just one for Canada? It is to avoid that difficulty that I brought this matter before the House because we have the power to remedy it in our own hands. It is a perfectly justifiable position for us to take. I have shown precedents where they have overthrown or referred the treaties back in France, Great Britain and the United States before they became law. It is quite within our power, it is no dishonour to our Government or to the Imperial Government, or the French Government if we say we do not think this treaty has been negotiated in accordance with the terms and policy of the Canadian people and therefore we wish to refer it back to see if we cannot get a treaty negotiated in terms in accordance with the policy of the Canadian people. When I say the province of Ontario is called upon to pay the bonuses that are knocked off those twenty articles, I say it advisedly, because it is the importation of wines that is going to be the countervailing benefit given by us to France in these twenty articles. Take this question of wine.

France has heretofore been obliged to pay 30 per cent ad valorem and 25c. a gallon specific duty. By knocking off the ad valorem duty we reduced the duties by about 50 per cent and the wine duties are attacked in this way. The grape of France contains a great deal more saccharine matter than the grape of Canada. That has been arrived at by a process of selection and development. Very much in the same way that by a process of selection and development the sugar beet has had its saccharine matter increased. In that way by great experience and long production, the French grapes possess a very much larger proportion of saccharine matter than the Canadian grape possesses and therefore contains a great deal more alcohol. The difference between the French and the Canadian grape is 5 or 6 per cent—that is the natural alcohol in the grape in consequence of the saccharine matter. Some hon. gentleman stated here this afternoon that the alcohol in our grape is about 8 per cent. In the French grape it is, I believe, 14 or 15 per cent. The 26 per cent is arrived at by adding alcohol.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—No, that is the natural alcohol.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I know what I am talking about.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is the natural alcohol produced by fermentation.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The natural alcohol in the two grapes is produced simply by the greater saccharine matter in the grape. In order for Canada wine-growers to equal the saccharine matter of the French grape, they have either to put sugar into their wine or to put alcohol into it. One is about as expensive as the other. Probably sugar is the dearer, but at present they do not put alcohol in, they put in sugar. What they are asking us to do is for the Government to reduce the duty on alcohol in order that they may be put on a par with the French growers. France has the right to put alcohol into her wine by taking it out of bond free of duty. She pays no duty whatever, so that when she sends wine to this country she sends it with 5 or 6 per cent more of natural alcohol in the grape itself and the additional alcohol necessary to increase it to 26 per cent is free of duty. That will place our grape growers at a considerable disadvantage so far as that is concerned. I am one of those who thoroughly believe that competition is the life of trade and that any competition our wine-growers may be subjected to will stimulate them to produce an article which perhaps may be a different class of wine, but one from which they may still benefit. I believe that any increase in the consumption of light wines, as has been already stated this afternoon, creates a taste, and probably the wine grower will not, so far as the importation is concerned, suffer, but they will suffer under these conditions: if free alcohol is not given them in order to make it up to the strength that French wine contains. When we drink wine it is the alcohol we apparently want—at least as much of it as we can get. That is the truth. Spain negotiated a treaty with England in 1886 to allow their wines to be admitted into Great Britain with an alcoholic test of 30 per cent. She gave Great Britain most-favoured nation treatment in order that she might have the privilege of increasing the alcohol in her wines to 30 per cent. That shows the value to the wine producers of getting their alcohol free for their wines. You may take it for granted, if the wines are to be sold in competition with our own wines in order to get that percentage of alcohol, it will be necessary to supply our wine-growers with alcohol free of duty, the same as the French wine-growers get it in France. As the hon. leader of the Opposition stated this afternoon, he showed by the Trade and Navigation returns that France imports more wine than she exports. She buys wines abroad and fixes them up and exports them as French wine. That is one of their industries. One of the representatives at the Intercolonial Conference from Australia the other day told me that they send large quantities of wine to France as low as 15 and 20 cents per gallon, and there it is made up into French wines and exported to every part of the world. That is where the Canadian wine-grower is going to pay for it without any other agricultural industry receiving any benefit from it. However, I do not wish to continue my remarks, because it is late in the evening, and I do not wish to impose my views on the House any more. I have brought this question before the Senate as a member from the province of Manitoba, because I can see no benefit likely to accrue to the people of the North-west by the negotiation of this treaty under the present arrangement, and it is my duty to point this out to hon. gentlemen who are responsible for the passage of treaties of this kind. I have no doubt that there are gentlemen from the province of Ontario who can state the same thing for that province, but it is my duty, at any rate, to point it out from the standpoint of the North-west, but if it were put into the treaty that in consideration of our admitting wines on these conditions that we have most-favoured nations treatment for all the commerce going from this country to France, we might some day send our cheese, wheat and other agricultural produce, and when the treaty is in process of ratification is the time for us to secure an equality of benefits, any change in the treaty hereafter will require fresh legislation not easily obtainable. Whenever France gets tired of her McKinley Bill, and feels that in order to increase her trade she must diminish the duties on certain articles, then whatever privileges are accorded to other nations will be granted to Canada, but as this treaty stands it will be of no benefit to the North-west Territories, no matter what may be developed, unless it is under the most-favoured nations treatment in all commerce.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—If I could be surprised at any of the remarks of the hon. gentleman, I would be surprised at the speech he has made to-day. He has posed in this House and before the country as a free trader and argued that we should frame our tariff on those principles irrespective of every other consideration. He has said: cut down all our tariff barriers regardless of the protective policy of other countries. To get a large share of the products of other countries we should declare for free trade as England has done. Our tariff decreases and repulses the trade with other countries. That has been his theme on every possible occasion. I would ask the House whether his remarks to-day are consistent with that policy. The hon. gentleman interjected a remark to-day, when my hon. friend the leader of the House spoke to the effect that this is a free trade measure, and yet my hon. friend now would denounce this treaty although its object is to extend our trade with the highest protected country in the world, which, with her colonies, has a population of say sixty millions against our five millions, is not that alone of immense consideration? It is the first time Canada has had a free hand to exercise the treaty-making privilege. I do not by any means entirely approve of what our envoy has done. It is unfortunate that we should be handicapped by article 2 of the treaty, by which any advantage we give to any third power we must give to France, whilst that country limits such concessions to the twenty articles contained in the schedule to article 3. We can be thankful for this much at least, that it leaves us a free hand in trade with our empire and every colony thereof. Our representative made the best treaty he possibly could. We know the character of our High Commissioner and also of the British Minister to France. We know that our High Commissioner has indomitable energy and generally accomplishes all that he undertakes. What will be the effect of refusing this treaty? It will be a slap in the face to our representatives. Have we any chance at all of getting another treaty if we refuse this? My hon. friend gave us precedents for not confirming treaties made by other countries. They do not meet this case at all. He showed us a treaty made between Switzerland and France which was repudiated by the latter power. He ought to have gone further and shown us, if he could, that a better treaty was afterwards negotiated.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We never get anything without trying.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes, but trying to repudiate places us outside of the chance of getting better terms. Those people have tried and have failed. In regard to the treaty between England and Spain we know very well that there were only negotiations for a treaty—there was no treaty signed. When Canada wanted to get into the West Indies on equal terms with other countries and was refused, negotiations were broken off; no treaty was signed. You never find England repudiating a treaty after it has been signed by her plenipotentiary. If my hon. friend has failed to show by history, example or a solitary precedent that by repudiating this treaty we could get a better one, then, in harmony with his free trade proclivities, he might have had some show of reason for the position he has taken, but he has signally failed to do so. My conviction is strong that if we attempt to dishonour our representative in connection with this treaty and refuse to ratify it, we will be placing ourselves in a bad position. France has signed the treaty and we would be showing France that they could have no faith in us now and in all time to come, we might for ever knock in vain. Although our Minister technically stepped beyond the bounds of his instructions, France is not to blame for that. We are in honour bound to sustain the treaty, and if, after putting it into force, we find that it is not a treaty favourable to us, we can with good grace honourably ask France to extend the treaty, and if France fails to do so, we can with perfect propriety withdraw from it with honour to Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If this assent of the Parliament of Canada, which is stipulated for by the terms of the treaty itself, is a mere matter of form, as the hon. gentleman suggests—if Canada is in honour bound to assent to the treaty whether it is good or bad, why go through the empty formality of making Canada a party to it? Could not the Imperial Government, if they entertain the views of the hon. gentleman, have negotiated a treaty and said: "There is no object in referring it to the Canadian Parliament, because they are in honour bound to assent to it."

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—England for the first time has given us a free hand to make a treaty in our own interest.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend surely cannot say no to that. It is the first time that Canada has had the privilege of a free hand to make a treaty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What about the treaty of Washington?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend knows that there is a difference between this treaty and that. Having made a treaty and failing to endorse here what has been done by our representatives, it would for ever prevent us having such a right accorded to us again. My hon. friend talked about sentiment carrying this treaty. I am a great man for sentiment. I believe it is sentiment which distinguishes us from the lower animals. If sentiment has had any influence in this matter, it has been for good. My hon. friend says that the merits of the treaty were lost sight of. I would refer him to the debate in the other branch of Parliament. About the largest vote that has been taken this session in the other House was on this very treaty. The treaty was supported not only by the Government and its followers but also by the Opposition and his squad of followers in that House. My hon. friend should not talk as he did after such a vote as that headed by the leaders of both parties. No matter how distasteful this might be to me, I should to some extent yield my private opinion to the judgment of those parties. If the leader of the Opposition felt that he could make political capital out of this matter, if he felt that he had the people of Canada at his back in repudiating this treaty, where would he have been? Would he have supported the treaty? No; but he believed that it not only was in the interest of Canada, but that it had the support of the majority of the people. My hon. friend says he has no intention to destroy this treaty. He has taken the most effectual way to destroy it, from what he has shown us himself. A treaty with a large power like France, is no unimportant matter. We know that France is one of the highest protective countries of the world. No other country adheres so strongly to a protective policy as France, and the nation has grown and prospered under it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does groan under it.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Does the hon. member venture to say that that country is groaning under its protective policy? Look at France. Where can you show a country that has prospered to such an extent? A few years ago she was at the mercy of Germany, a portion of her territory had been taken from her, and an immense war debt was incurred. She has not only paid off that great debt, but is now lending to the world. France has grown to be a strong power in her armaments and in her finances. No other country can show such a record under like circumstances. When we can make a treaty, which is an entering wedge, with a country like that—a treaty such as no other country has yet made—when we can get the advantage of trading with 60,000,000 people, there surely must be some benefit to result from it to our country. Let us look at this matter in an impartial manner. We have not got everything that we expected in this treaty, or as much as we ought to have got. The only way to get more is by taking that treaty and trying it and if it turns out well it is to our benefit. If it turns out a failure then we can honourably give notice and have it cancelled. If this treaty were for all time to come to be confined to those few articles, I should support it with some hesitancy, but I believe it is only the commencement of a large trade between the two countries, a step in the direction of an extended trade with a great and mighty country highly protective and prosperous, and is an earnest of better things to come and even should our sponsors have promised to our loss—let us make their promise good—and I firmly believe that in the end we will profit by that course. I would rather have articles from France which would benefit the mass of the people: I would prefer it if France could give us articles which would be used by the labouring classes, but it was impossible for them to give us anything of the kind. They have given us the wines of their country, and I believe that will be a benefit to us and to the wine producers of Canada. It will show them the qualities of wine which are popular. It will give our people a taste for light wines and will have the effect of changing the people's tastes and instead of using strong alcoholic drinks they will take light wines. It is the case in France, Italy and other wine producing countries. I have travelled through those countries for months and have never seen a drunken man. I never knew what water was in travelling through those countries for months and months; I would never touch the water. I used what every one else used —light wines. I believe if we had those wines in this country it would be a benefit to every class of the community. Up to the present time only the wealthy could afford to drink them; now they will be within the reach of all classes, and in the end it will benefit the wine growers themselves, and reduce drunkenness and the craving for strong drinks. Notwithstanding the introduction of cheap French wines, I believe there is a sufficient inducement for our own wine growers to continue their industry. We cannot import wines from France as cheaply as we can produce them in this country. I get excellent wine from Pelee Island for about $1 per gallon. It is splendid wine—if properly heated and kept long enough for to refine and mature, I would not want any better from France. I am sure our country will profit by this treaty. More wine can be used and our people can produce wine just as cheaply as it can be imported from France and the duty still remaining on imported wines will be a sufficient protection for our own industry. I admit that we are not favoured under this treaty as much as we ought to be. We cannot get the benefit of the French market except by direct shipment. That is a drawback. France can send her products to us in any way they think proper, but we are handicapped to a large extent.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Everybody is.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes, I believe so. We are not in a worse position than any other country, but at the same time it is not fair that we should be limited in this way while if we make a treaty with another country we are obliged to give them the benefit of it while we are limited to the articles contained in the schedule before us. Apart from that, I believe that the treaty is a great deal in our favour. Take lumber, for instance. In our Maritime Provinces if we get $1 a thousand more for lumber, it is certainly so much more profit to our people and lumbering is an industry not confined to the lower provinces—the like may be said of staves. Last year, France put on a heavy tariff, and made a minimum tariff about as high as their highest tariff had been, and yet they have the privilege of raising their tariff, both minimum and maximum, if they think proper; but I think that notwithstanding the high tariff, we have the benefit of the minimum tariff, and when we could export to France last year, or the year previous, under the very high tariff, what will we not be able to do when we come under the minimum tariff? We sent last year $134,000 worth of lobsters; of deals and lumber, $110,000; canned meats, $1,362, and dried apples, $1,400 worth, which, with other of the 20 articles enumerated in article 3 amounted to $265,000. And now, when we come under the minimum tariff, I cannot say how far that trade will be extended, but it is quite sure to be increased. Canada is one of the best apple growing countries in the world. We can send apples to London and compete with any other country, and why cannot we do it in France under the inducements now hold out to us? Under this treaty apples and pears, dried or pressed, are admitted, and last year we sent them, under the high tariff, to the extent of $1,400 worth. Then we have lobsters. We know what an inexhaustible quantity of lobsters we have in the Maritime provinces if properly cared for and not indiscriminately slaughtered or destroyed and the limited market for them. But under this treaty where is the country that can compete with us? Not another country in the world. We have that market entirely for ourselves in the lobster business, and under this treaty the demand for them will exceed our power of production, although the fecundity of the lobster is very great if properly cared for. Then there is the condensed milk. I do not pretend to judge of that. No doubt we will be able to send some.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Live eels.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not know about eels. They may not be alive. I think my hon. friend has an eel creek in Manitoba. We do not know what productive power they have up there and I would not be surprised if my hon. friend would turn his attention to that industry, and as it appears they must be fresh water eels he may have a large share of the business and he might make more out of it than out of his farm. Then there is the wood pulp. We manufacture pulp, and in that line have advantages over other countries. I am surprised that the Government allows the export of our timber to the States to be made into pulp, while the States put a heavy duty on our pulp. We are simply helping them to supply their own market and England. We will have a market for this in France which the United States have not got, because I am informed that under their treaty with France pulp is not free. If so we will have a market not only in England where we now compete with the United States, but we will have France entirely to ourselves, because we are the only country that makes pulp to any extent. I think therefore we will have that market exclusively to ourselves. We exported $134,000 worth of lobsters to France last year under the maximum tariff, and if we can do that I cannot venture to say to what extent the trade can be increased under the minimum tariff proposed under this treaty. We will take this treaty with the hope of something better—as an earnest of better things to come. We are pledged to this treaty. If our plenipotentiaries have gone beyond their powers in any way, which I am not prepared to admit, we should not reject this treaty on that account. Let us visit our agents in some other way and not in consequence of their acts, violate a treaty which is pregnant, I believe, as an entering wedge with so much good in the future. Let us act reasonably in this matter; let us act towards France with honour and integrity, feeling that though we may not have got all that we might have under this treaty, we will take it in the belief that France will act honourably and fairly in this matter. If we show them that they have not opened up sufficient intercourse, or that the treaty is not fair and equitable, they will see the benefit of the trade and extend it. Should they fail to meet us in that spirit, we can then with honour and dignity retire from it and feel at the same time that we have not lost the honour which a Canadian ought to have.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I feel that this treaty is in the right direction and I am not one of those who would feel disposed to throw suspicion, or a feeling of doubt, on our plenipotentiary, Sir Charles Tupper. We all know that Sir Charles Tupper is one of the first of our statesmen, that he is a patriot and loves his country. He is not one of those who would be a party to a treaty that would do injustice to his country. That very fact alone carries such weight with me that I feel it should carry also conviction to the heart of every member of this House. He had the assistance of another statesman, a man who also loves Canada and spent some of the best of his days in this country, a man whom you all know and whom Britain trusts as her worthy representative in France, Lord Dufferin. These two gentlemen no doubt consulted with each other, and in the depth of their wisdom concluded a treaty with France as satisfactory to them as they could obtain, and those who have studied the trade of this country will be satisfied that the treaty is one of great importance to us. I have heard no argument against this treaty that would convince me that my opinion is wrong ; on the contrary, not only are we obtaining great advantage from it, but we are giving very little in my opinion in return. We know that the people of this country trade with France. They purchase wine and the several articles mentioned in this treaty, and heretofore they have had no particular advantage. Now matters will be changed. We will have the benefit of sending to France under this treaty goods that we produce extensively in this country, the trade in which will be very profitable to our citizens. I have no doubt we will have a large trade with France, because she is not the country she was ten years ago. She is one of the most prosperous and progressive nations in the world to-day. She is spreading her power and her trade and her influence through the colonies and in a very short time it will be a proud position that we will hold when we have an opportunity of trading with France on the advantageous terms offered in this treaty. Some honourable gentlemen seem to think that we should not accept this treaty because we manufacture a small quantity of native wine. Well, I am in favour of everything that is profitable and beneficial to our country. I believe we should manufacture wine if we can, but I believe also it is better we should allow certain things to remain in abeyance than to attempt to do that which is impossible. I hold that it is an impossibility to make this a wine producing country. Our grapes in this country are not of the right nature for producing wine. A grape to produce wine abundantly, and of such a nature as to have a native alcohol in it to enable it to be shipped to foreign countries, must be largely filled with grape sugar. Grape sugar is the basis of brandy and all other spirit is made from sugar, but especially brandy. Hence it is that brandy is the most pleasing spirit of any to those who use it. We also know that in consequence of France producing this rich grape, full of sugar, she produces a rich wine that developes alcohol by fermentation. It produces alcohol in the native wine that sustains it and keeps it from being unfit for storage. In consequence of that, the longer you keep French wines in stores and in cellars, the more valuable they become and hence it is that the world prefers French wine. It has been said by an hon. gentleman that France imports more wine than she exports. I have not examined the official returns of France, but I would infer from that statement that France being a vast country should naturally use other wine than her own. She uses the light Moselle wines of the Rhine ; these she must import, and consequently they appear in her importations. She would also import the rich sherries of Spain, the Montelardo, and import from Portugal the rich port wine, and these would swell the volume of the importations of France, but at the same time we know that France grows a larger quantity of wine than she is producing at present. It is only because she has not an extensive market that she does not supply the world with wine. But, hon. gentlemen, we have a treaty before us here, and the trade with France is, I suppose, the most important thing to us. I find that we can send them canned meats. Why cannot we manufacture canned meats as well as other people? We know that in the United States it is a great industry, and they supply Europe with canned meats. Why should not we also have the privilege of sending condensed milk? We might as well send milk as send butter or cheese. We also can send fish preserved in their natural form. I presume these are the small fish known as sardines, put up in the lower provinces. It is a very extensive industry : I do not know how much can be realized by putting up sardines in the Bay of Fundy. Then we all know that the canning of lobsters is an industry which can be carried on to any extent in this country. I do not know of any country that has the fishing privileges and advantages that Canada has for lobsters.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You have to send them in their natural form.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, that is not the meaning.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Then besides lobsters there is the item of crayfish preserved in their natural form. We can also send them apples. We know what a trade the United States do in apples. We know they send them green to foreign countries; we also know they preserve them and dry them in vast quantities. Why should we not do so? Then there are fruits preserved; building timber in rough or sawn. Everybody knows that we can send building timber and timber of every kind as no other country can. The only trouble is that we have not had a market in the past. Here is an offer given to us of a new market. Are we not to take advantage of it and get an extended footing in that country? I think it is our duty to do so, and I think we will do so. As to staves, everybody knows that we can send staves in ship loads and we have any number of ash trees in this country. All we require is to manufacture them into staves and ship them. That is a most excellent industry and there is no reason why we should not extend it. Wood paving: every member of the Senate knows that our wood paving and our cedar blocks are the finest in the world, and there is no limit at all to the quantity we can send. Then there is wood pulp; surely we can supply that and it ought to be considered a great advantage to have a new market for it. Then there is extract of chestnut and other tanning extracts. We know that we have thousands and thousands of acres of wood producing that, and a vast industry can be made of it. So it is with every item on that list. And it is one of the greatest offers that we have had in the 25 years that I have been here. For the last few years we have been talking about our extreme desire, but somehow we never came to arrange it before, to open a trade with France. It has been often discussed and anxiously put forward in this House, but until Sir Charles Tupper, our representative, developed it in the shape of a treaty, we never had an opportunity of opening up this new and vast trade. Another argument used against this treaty is that it would take the burden of taxation off the rich and place it on the poor. I pity the country governed by men who argue in that way. The poor to-day have to pay some 900 per cent duty on whisky, whereas they never can taste champagne, because it is above their ability to pay for it. But now they will get an opportunity to substitute wholesome wine of its own natural strength—not with alcohol infused into it. We have heard from gentlemen who speak on behalf of other wine-growers, that they cannot make their wines unless we permit them to put alcohol into them. Now, if they can only make wine by infusing alcohol into it, surely it is our duty to see that the people of this country are not poisoned by drinking alcohol in that form. If we can produce a wine with native alcohol, I have no objection to it. Before concluding my remarks, I wish to rebut another statement which an hon. gentleman made. He said that he assumed that French wines were fortified with alcohol. Now I deny that. It is true there is a native alcohol in them, but it is more the nature of brandy than alcohol, because brandy, you are aware, is spirit distilled from wine, and consequently it is a very different spirit from the alcohol made on this continent out of raw grain, and hence poisonous, because it is not made in a way to be wholesome. I regret that such false statements are made—statements that certainly will not bear the examination of experts, and sent abroad from this Chamber against the wines of France. I believe that the wines of France are made from the native grape, which is full of sugar, producing alcohol simply by fermentation, not by infusion.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Does it produce 20 per cent.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not think the hon. gentleman knows what he is talking about. Will the hon. gentleman tell me whether it is 26 per cent of alcohol or 26 per cent of proof spirit? The degree of alcohol is simply 26 per cent of proof spirit; that is only about 13 or less than 13 per cent of alcohol. So that you will see at once the native champagne of the champagne country, and the light wines of France, such as Hock and Sauterne, do not possess so much alcohol as that, but whatever is in them is native and wholesome. Therefore I vote for this treaty, believing it is one of the greatest opportunities given to the people of this country to extend their trade, instead of being restricted, as they have been in the past, with chain cables across our harbours preventing trade with other countries.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—This subject has been so fully treated by the leader of the House, and by subsequent speakers that no further speech is particularly required, and I shall not presume to occupy the time of the House with anything in the nature of a speech, but it appears to me that the subject has been treated by some speakers in such a way as to darken wisdom through much speaking. The simplicity of the bill has been objected to by the hon. gentleman whose motion we have now before us for consideration. I find myself in accord with him to this extent, that he substantially, in his motion, does not find fault with the treaty nor with what it contains, but objects more decidedly to its extent, expecting and claiming that something on a wider and larger scale should be aimed at and obtained. If you apply to this subject the ordinary rule of common sense, it will occur to every man that to reject this treaty on the ground that it is insufficient in extent would be a very false position for this country to assume. We would put ourselves very much in the position of a mercantile man who desired particularly to open business relations with a powerful neighbour. If he went to that man and by dint of pertinacity and assiduity in business obtained from him an order for a specific quantity of goods, what would you think of his discretion if he should "considering the size of your establishment, sir, the order you have given me is entirely insufficient and I will either not accept it or I will reject it unless you double or treble it right off?" I would say that his perspicacity and his business judgment were of the lowest order. If he were a wise man he would say "this is the opening, this is the entrance of the wedge, we will accept this and prove it to be a working arrangement, and then we can extend it." The treaty, as it is submitted to this House, is extremely simple. We have had the most affecting language used as to committing ourselves to this most-favoured nation clause, when all that is involved in it is simply this, that if it does not suit us we can nullify the whole thing on giving twelve months' notice. I do not like the favoured nation clause, but it takes two to make a bargain, and if I cannot get all I want I take all I can get and do my best to extend it. Now this favoured nation clause cannot hurt us. There are at present no favoured nation entanglements which this clause will stand in the way of, and if they should arise in the future we can terminate the whole favoured nation clause on twelve months, and how can we possibly suffer? The objection which our Government and which we all had to this favoured nation clause, and the reason, which no doubt was correct, for our Government urging the plenipotentiary against the acceptance of this particular clause, was this, that we had been assiduously denouncing the most-favoured nation clause because we found it, in the case of the mother country, an obstacle in the way of having closer relations with her. We have been in our communications with the mother country denouncing the favoured clause, and urging upon her to abolish it in the case of Germany and other European nations, and how could we in common sense commence our treaty-making relations with others by accepting it ourselves. No doubt the position was hard, but for my part I would say that that is not the slightest obstacle at all. It may be advantageous, or it may be the contrary. If it prove to be the contrary we can stop it. Now, with reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman of the Opposition in his introductory speech, nothing struck me more than is falsity—I have not the slightest intention of imputing falsity of motive, but I say there was an air of unreality running through the whole of his argument, for a considerable portion of the time he was speaking, he might as well have been arguing for the treaty as against it. One extraordinary perversion of the position which ran through the speeches of the hon. member from Ottawa and the hon. member from Marquette was a contrast between the articles which we admitted from France and the articles which France admitted from Canada. One expression which fell from the hon. member from Marquette struck me as amusing. He said there was only one article on the French side against 20 on the Canadian side, as if we were going to make a present of 10 articles in exchange for one, forgetting entirely that the admission of French wines is the purchase money which we pay to the French nation for the admission of 20 articles of ours.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That was my statement.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—It seemed to me most amusing that that should be permitted for one moment to enter into the argument of these hon. gentlemen. I had not previously attributed to the hon. member from Ottawa the faculty of an expert in wines and liquor more especially of the finer description, but I must concede that to him now. His argument on that point was so strong that I registered an inward resolution that I would be very chary about drinking French wine. If the influence of the hon. member from Ottawa goes to the extent of deterring any considerable part of the population of Canada from the consumption of French wine, who is going to suffer? Not ourselves but the French. They will find that they have got the worst of the bargain, that the importation of French wine into Canada is going to diminish, and let us hope that the exportation of Canadian products will not share that fate. But there was another point in which one would suppose that the hon. member from Ottawa was confident that the process of the exchange of products under this treaty was to be one of barter, that we were to send lumber, fish, canned meats and so on, and take payment in wine. That is not the process. Each man will ship, and will get payment in good hard cash, and if we do not take the wine so much the worse for France. Now, a gentleman with a good faculty for collecting statistics can prove anything. The hon. leader of the Opposition stated that only $264,000 of all Canadian products entered France in a certain year; the hon. member from Marquette showed that $400,000 of lumber alone appeared in the imports of France. He explained that by stating that that valuation included freight and duty. How can it be possible? I maintain that by statistics you can prove anything. All that you can hope to gather from statistics, unless you read them with the care and with the hesitancy of a business man, is to get an approximation to the truth, and if you choose to bear them out to the last fraction, and more especially deal with them in a partizan spirit, you can prove anything.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Do you refer to Canadian statistics?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—No, I was referring to the quotation made by the hon. member from Ottawa from Canadian statistics, and the quotation made by the hon. member from Marquette from French statistics—$264,000 as against $400,000.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—My average of $400,000 was the average for seven years prior to the adoption of the maximum and minimum tariff.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—That does not affect the argument.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, the figures that were quoted by the hon. member from Ottawa were the figures of 1893 after the maximum and minimum tariff.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—But it is reasonable to suppose they would not leap in such an extraordinary way as that.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, because the quotation he was making was under the maximum tariff and mine was before the maximum and minimum was established.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—That is not the point I wanted to make. I wanted to know whether the statistics were from France or Canada—because there is a vast difference.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The hon. gentleman from Ottawa quoted Canadian statistics and the hon. gentleman from Marquette quoted French statistics.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Our exports of lumber to France are reduced by more than one-half according to the statistics of France, which are acknowledged by Sir Charles Tupper as being most accurate.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—There was a suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa which I think was scarcely fair. To judge by what he said one would suppose that this treaty had been made for the benefit of champagne drinkers in this country to obtain a rebate of duty for their own benefit, and that they were willing to sacrifice the interest of the country for that purpose. Now I venture to think that the Government have not had representations from drinkers of champagne or fine French wines to that effect, and I, for my part, declare that such a motive, if it entered into the question at all, was beneath the contempt of any Government. The fact is that the entrance of French wine is the price which the French Government demand for the concession they are making, and they have a right of fixing their price as every seller has.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They have been demanding that for ten years.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Was it to get cheap champagne Sir Charles Tupper and Lord Dufferin made the treaty?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The member for Marquette went a little further than that and suggested that whatever advantages would follow to Canada from this treaty might accrue to the Maritime provinces and to the province of Quebec, but none of it could go to the province of Ontario. Now I deprecate in advance the creation, in such a question, of sectional interest at all, and I maintain that the attempt is not only a wrong one and should be frowned down, but in this particular instance it is not justified by fact. I look over the list of articles of Canadian origin which are to go into France, and I should say that quite a number of them are just as likely—in fact more likely, to come from the province of Ontario than anywhere else. I will quote for example condensed milk, apples, staves; I happen to know that nearly all the staves which are used in the Maritime provinces and in the province of Quebec at this moment come from Ontario, and I cannot see why furniture should not also. I know that nearly all the furniture which is imported and used in Montreal and in the province of Quebec is manufactured in the province of Ontario. I submit the suggestion with deference—because a man may go wrong in even saying things that he imagines to be perfectly true—judging by what I know of business matters, I should say a very large share indeed of the advantages of this treaty is likely to go to the province of Ontario, and if it did not, I hold that the province of Ontario has no legitimate right to object if it is for the general interest of the Dominion. I was struck particularly by one of the arguments advanced by the hon. leader of the House—it was that part relative to the weighing of the purchase money on either side of this bargain. He said we had purchased admission to the markets of forty millions of people who had only got in return the markets of five millions. It is impossible to overstate the importance of that argument. If that be so, I have the gravest possible doubt, whatever action this honourable House may take, whether the French Government will be prepared to ratify this treaty or not. The hon. member from Ottawa showed how simple it would be to say, now we do not want your treaty. To my mind for a small community, comparatively speaking—a small power if you choose to call it so—such as Canada, to apply to the Government of one of the greatest powers in the world for a treaty, to carry it on to the last point and then to say we do not want it, would be an intolerable insult and a piece of impertinence. While, on the other hand, there is in the treaty itself a clause which would make it easy for us to say at the end of any period we chose to elect, this business does not suit us for reasons which we will state to you if you want to know them, and we wish to terminate it. In the one case it would be an insult of the first magnitude which would for ever, so long as the memory of it lasted, put an end to any attempt to get a treaty of any kind. I cannot conceive of any process whereby a treaty with France could be more effectually put an end to, not only for the present time but for all the time of this generation at least, than to reject this treaty. I know perfectly well that when this treaty came out there was a natural amount of doubt about it, and expressions were used in the House of Commons which, I dare say, were far from wise. The treaty bears on the face of it objections which are patent to everybody, but I am glad that our Government has come to the decision to ratify it provided they can carry with them the assent of this hon. House. They would have stultified themselves and committed a fault of diplomacy which I should have considered fatal, if they had taken any other step. We heard to-night that the French Canadians in our deliberative bodies were united on this question. I am not surprised at it. Through the magnanimity of the mother country, one of the most magnanimous towards its colonies that the world has ever seen, we have been carried to the door of a successful entrance into the markets of France, one of the great nations of the world which I for one respect, and why should not the French Canadians wish to carry it to a termination? I think this House will do wisely to ratify the treaty which is now before us.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not wish to make a speech, but I wish to ask a question for information. We are told that certain gentlemen who are familiar with the lumber interests are present in the Senate, and as those gentlemen do not often favour us, it has occurred to me, as they have come for the special purpose of taking part in the debate, that we ought to hear from them. We should not have the question put until we have heard from them.

Hon. Mr. BURNS—As this is a challenge to me, I am not one of those to refuse to take it up. Whether or not I came here for the purpose of speaking on the subject is a question which I do not consider that I am bound to enter into.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My remark was not directed exclusively to the hon. gentleman. There is another member of this Senate who is connected with the lumber interest who is also present.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—We thought the reference to one was improper: there are two now.

Hon. Mr. BURNS—I said I was not one of those who was composed of such material that I would decline to accept a challenge, and I was going on to say that whether I came here or not for the purpose of taking any part in this debate is a subject which I do not feel called upon to enter into. I came here to discharge what I presume we have all come to discharge—a public duty. That is what we are here for. The lumber trade has been referred to in a particular manner, and as I happen to have some practical experience in that business, perhaps it would not be amiss in me to take up the time of the House for a few moments in order that I may state the bearing the operation of such a treaty as is now proposed would have upon that interest. I will not attempt to deal with the question too much, if to any greater extent than to present my views in relation to it in what I might be justified in saying in a practical way, but before doing so let me say this, that the opposition to the treaty, so far as I have been able to ascertain from the observations I have heard, have come first from those who view the question from a temperance standpoint. Next from those who view it from the standpoint of the wine-growers' interest in Canada, and next from those who view it from a sentimental standpoint, and also from those who view it from the standpoint that our plenipotentiary, Sir Charles Tupper, did more than he was authorized to do. As regards the temperance aspect of the question, the wine-growers' interest and the sentimental aspect of the question, these have been disposed of by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. I will simply add to what has fallen from the lips of some hon. gentlemen my statement as to the effect of the consumption of wine, I do not speak from the experience of a drinker of wine so much as I do from having observed the character of the people living in wine-producing countries. In France where wine is to the people a beverage as natural almost as water and milk are to the people of this country, it is very rarely that a drunken person can be seen. I have travelled through France many times, and I can say that never once in all the journeys that I have made through that country, have I seen one person under the influence of drink. The vin ordinaire, or other wines, are placed on the table for every guest in the restaurants, hotels and private houses, as a matter of course. I think that is one of the best proofs that could be adduced that the drinking of wine or placing it within the reach of the masses of people does not lead to anything that might be called drunkenness. With regard to the interest that the wine-growers of Canada have in this question I will only say this—they have an interest the same as those who are engaged in all other industries of the country. That interest, of course, is entitled to every consideration and to every proper treatment, but this question must be viewed, and I am glad to see it is being viewed, from the standpoint of the general interest of Canada, and not from the standpoint of any particular section of the country. If we were to view questions from a sectional standpoint, we would be found arrayed against each other on almost every question affecting the financial interests of Canada that might come before us. If we were to view the question from that standpoint, the Maritime provinces might say with great force, and certainly with great truth, that they as a body have discharged their duty to the country generally by accepting a policy which, as is maintained by very many, contributes more to the interests of the western sections of Canada than it does to the interests of the eastern sections of Canada; yet because we believe that the interests of Canada as a whole are benefited by that policy we give it our support. With regard to the interests in cultivating the vines and the making of wine, I ask them to consider whether the capital invested in that industry is as much or nearly as much as that invested in the industries which will be benefited by the operation of this treaty should it go into force. I have not looked into the statistics, but I venture to make this statement, that there is double the capital invested in the lumber industry in Canada than there is in the wine industry, and surely that interest is entitled to receive consideration, not only because it is a very large and important industry itself, but because the carrying on of that industry benefits every section of Canada, It is well known that in producing lumber the main cost of the operation is in the labour. We do not have to import raw material at all. We have it standing in our forests. It takes labour to convert it into a marketable article. In the production of that lumber, in the province of Quebec mainly, as distinguished from Ontario, in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia a very large number of people are engaged. They are consumers of what Western Canada produces. They have cheerfully borne, in the discharge of what they believe to be their duty, heavy imposts upon that industry for the special benefit of Western Canada. Take the article of pork, which enters very largely into the cost of producing lumber, and what do we find ? That it is taxed to the extent of something like $3 per barrel, and as it is with pork so it is with flour. Instead of our pork and flour coming from New England ports we get it from Ontario, and so I might enumerate article after article which Ontario supplies in order that this lumber may be produced. I am not speaking now of this impost with any hostile ideas regarding it, but simply to point to the western gentlemen who oppose this because of the wine-growing interest, that it is to their direct interest that this lumber industry should be fostered. The larger the market is the larger will be the market for western producers in the eastern market. As regards the next objection, the sentimental one, it is hardly worth while taking up the time of the House in dealing with it, and I will come to the last objection, that is that Sir Charles Tupper, our representative did what he had no authority to do—in other words, that he had exceeded his authority. I have heard more than one hon. gentleman make that statement, but I have failed to hear any proof adduced of the fact.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Did the hon. gentleman put wool in his ears at the time the proof was given ? I heard it read distinctly.

Hon. Mr. BURNS—No, the hon. gentleman did not put wool in his ear. He heard everything that was said, but he failed to gather from it that meaning which the hon. gentleman seems to have got from it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I find the following cable to Sir Charles Tupper in the Sessional Papers :

> Re French negotiations : Government cannot accept conditions regarding steamship subvention and reduction duty on French books, but agree to most-favoured nation treatment so far as articles named in treaty are concerned ; they agree to other conditions in return for minimum tariff on articles named as regards France and St. Pierre and Miquelon ; this subject to your view as to effect on proposed Spanish negotiations.

Hon. Mr. BURNS—I still fail to be convinced. The objections set forth in that despatch, so far as I can gather from hearing it read, are to the incorporation of something relative to books and fast steamers. I do not think that he or any one can find any allusion to those subjects in the treaty before the House. I take issue with those who say that Sir Charles Tupper exceeded his duty. I at all events believe that Sir Charles Tupper kept strictly within the line of his duty ; I believe that Sir Charles Tupper, who has been so well eulogized by an hon. gentleman opposite, discharged his duty not only well but wisely. I am one of those who believe that Sir Charles Tupper, with the courage of his convictions that he always has, and with the ability that he is well known to possess, was able to get for Canada this treaty on a good, sound, business basis. I believe Sir Charles Tupper kept the Government of Canada informed as to the progress of the negotiations, and that with the exception of what I believe was the last article decided on, full authority was given Sir Charles Tupper to conclude that treaty. The last section reads :

> Any commercial advantage granted by Canada to any other power, especially in tariff matters, shall be enjoyed by France, Algeria and the French Colonies.

That article was agreed to, as I understand, because it was considered the usual and proper article in connection with the negotiation of a treaty. The objection to that article, so far as I can understand, has arisen from the fact that many hon. gentlemen were under the impression that under its operation the idea of a preferential trade with Great Britain would be a great impossibility, that we would be unable to make with Great Britain or the colonies of the Empire anything in the nature of a preferential trade arrangement. Exception was taken to that article at the time the treaty was made, and it was only after consideration, and after information too, that it was held that the operation of this article would not preclude the making of any trade arrangement with Great Britain or between Great Britain and any of her colonies, for the reason that Great Britain or any of the colonies of the Empire could not be considered by any means as a third power in their relations with the rest of the world. The very best proof that I can bring forward to this House to show that Sir Charles Tupper did not exceed his powers, is by pointing out the bare fact that we are here to-night discussing the treaty, not one word or line of which has been altered from the time of making it up to the present day. If Sir Charles Tupper had not authority to negotiate that treaty, why was it not repudiated by the Government of which he was the accredited ambassador—why is it the Government did not seek to alter the terms of that treaty—why is it, in point of fact, that we are here to-night discussing it? We are discussing it because Sir Charles Tupper had full power and authority, as has been proved by the fact of the Government having accepted and brought before Parliament the treaty that he was instrumental in making with France. It is very fortunate that we had a man of Sir Charles Tupper's capacity and energy in France. It is well, too, that Canada has been able, through the instrumentality of Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper, to make this treaty with France, the first that Canada has ever made—a treaty which, using the words of the hon. Senator from Montreal, may be considered as an entering wedge and which will enable us later on to make treaties with other countries. With regard to the effect which this treaty will have upon the business interests of Canada, let me say a few words. In doing so I run the risk of repeating what has been said by others before me. Taking up the articles in the order in which they are named, we find first on the list canned meat. Is it not in the direct interest of Ontario that she should have a larger and freer market open to her for that great product of hers, more especially as it is feared that the restrictions which have been placed on the introduction of our cattle into Great Britain may be continued and that it may become necessary that our meats should be exported in a different shape from that in which they have been heretofore? The United States, as is well known, do an immense trade in canned meat. I take it that it is in the interest of Canada that she should enter into that industry and instead of sending her cattle abroad, thereby losing the benefit of their hides and other products incident, that those cattle should be kept in the country and the meat exported in a different form. Condensed milk is a product of Nova Scotia as well as of Ontario. I will not tire the House by going through the full list, but will take up the two most important items, that is lumber and fish. With respect to the first and most important of these, lumber, let me deal with the remark that notwithstanding that lumber prior to 1892 was admitted on equal terms with the lumber imported into France from other countries, Russia, Norway and Sweden, we did not build up a trade to any very considerable extent. Let me explain; it is only within the last ten years that attention has been given, to any great extent, to finding a market for our lumber in France. The fact is that the Norwegians, Swedes and Russians have monopolized that market. They have produced lumber of certain sizes and manufactured it in a certain way to suit that market. Our people were content, until a short time ago, to continue in the old rut and send the lumber to one or two markets, the United States and Britain, in other words, putting all their eggs in one basket, but within 10 years the attention of those engaged in the trade has been turned to the French market; as a matter of fact, they were forced to it, inasmuch as during the long period of depression in the United Kingdom the markets for their lumber became very bad, and more especially for certain sizes. I am speaking—and those engaged in the trade will understand me—more especially of the very large percentage of certain sizes of spruce put on the English market, the prices of which went down to a very low figure. Now, those were the sizes that the French market required and which they readily absorbed, and, therefore, the attention of the lumber trade was turned to France as a market for that. Agents, bookers and manufacturers went over there, and the consequence was a trade sprang up and continued to grow until this maximum impost of 1892 had to be contended against. Under that maximum duty, which meant about 7 francs per thousand superficial feet extra, we were denied the French market, so that just at the time when the trade was growing, this impost was levied and as a consequence, we had to withdraw our sellers from France. The Norwegians, Swedes and Russians had a complete monopoly of the market.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They always had.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They had the minimum tariff.

Hon. Mr. BURNS—They had not always; we were on equal terms with them up till 1892, but because as I have said the attention of the manufacturers of Canada was not directed to the French market, and because they had a market for their stuff in England, the Norwegians and the Russians had the French market to themselves. But when we discovered there was a large market in France for just the kind of stuff that we produce, and for the sizes which we found it extremely difficult, if not impossible at times to sell in England, then we went to France to sell them, and as I have said, a trade sprung up and was growing until we were met with an extra impost equal to $1.25 per thousand superficial feet on our lumber. That was practically prohibitory, and we lost the French market and have been out of it to this day. This $1.25 of an extra impost on Canadian lumber did not mean $1.25 a thousand profit to the exporter by any means, because I know enough of the trade to understand that $1.25 a thousand on lumber would be considered a very large profit. But it meant this in the trade, that they were excluded from the market. I could furnish to the House practical proof of what I have said. I remained in Ottawa up to some time in February in 1893, or until after the draft treaty came out. After ascertaining what the provisions of the treaty were, and having received the impression that that treaty would be ratified, I went to France and visited the different purchasing centres of that country around the coast. Without wishing to treat the House to any business experience of mine—I am simply stating it as a matter of information—let me say this, that in going among the French buyers and asking them to buy a cargo, or half a dozen cargoes, I, was met with this statement: "Yes, if your prices suit and if you will guarantee that the treaty with this country will be ratified by Canada we will purcha e; if not we will not." I have before me now my contract book, which contains the summary of several contracts which I made in France, with that provision giving the purchaser the right or the option to cancel the contract in the event of the non-ratification of the treaty by the Canadian Parliament, and it will be found that on those contracts the word "cancelled" has been written. In plain unvarnished language and putting it into figures I, as one of the trade, sold about $70,000 worth of stuff, the contracts for which had to be cancelled because this treaty was not ratified. That, I think, is putting the thing in the plainest possible way to hon. gentlemen, in a way that will appeal to the understanding of everybody. That was the practical result of the non-ratification of the French treaty last year. This year the company with which I am connected have been unable to sell one single cargo to France, and the experience of almost everybody else in the trade, I am sure, is the same. There may be, under exceptional circumstances, some cargoes sold, but as a general thing the lumber trade with France has been at a complete standstill owing to the non-ratification of this treaty. With regard then to the next item, the important item of fish, the United States and Germany have been sending New Brunswick and Nova Scotia canned lobsters into France as the production of the United States, because New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were unable to get them in on simpler terms. The practice grew up of those engaged in canning lobsters to export them to the United States unpainted and unlabelled. They were taken in hand there and painted and labelled as the product of the United States and sent into France. The lobster industry, not to speak of our fishing industry generally, which is enormous, is very important in the Maritime provinces, and it, too, gives employment to thousands of people who consume what they import from the province of Ontario. Now, I have tried to deal with the question in a practical way. I will just say this, that it is not, to use a common expression, an import business that we are after, it is an export business. France has asked us to make concessions on only two or three articles, wines and soap of a certain make, fruits, nuts, almonds and things of that kind. We are not bound to buy these things from France, but France offers us a market on terms of equality with countries with which we have to compete, for our lumber, our fish, our fruit and other things which form a very considerable portion of the whole exports of Canada. I say, hon. gentlemen, it is in the interest of every section of Canada that that market should be secured, that sectional considerations or minor considerations of any kind should not weigh, that we should by the acceptance of this treaty open a door which has been closed against us for some time and which no doubt will continue to be closed against us if we should refuse to accept the offer that has been made to us, which I regard as a fair and liberal offer when considered from a standpoint of a mercantile transaction.

Hon. Mr. READ—(Quinté)—If the treaty is a bad one, our representatives have made it and as such it is our duty I think to carry it out, it being the first one, and try and do better in the future if we are not satisfied.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to say a few words in reply.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—When you propose an amendment you have no reply.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not propose to say anything, but I have not spoken on the subject and as the hon. gentleman from Shell River has been shut off on a point of order, I may as well make a few remarks in his place. I do not propose to make a speech on the subject, but I wish to call attention to a very few points. It has been stated in the most positive way that the plenipotentiary, if we may so call him, who acted for Canada, or the active plenipotentiary—there were two plenipotentiaries—did not exceed his instructions, that he did not go beyond the powers given by the Government. Now, hon. gentlemen, I have a great deal of respect for the authority of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Burns), but I think on a question of this sort I should sooner take the authority of the member of the Government who deputed the plenipotentiary, than that of the hon. gentleman who has been interviewing the plenipotentiary quite recently. The remarks of the Finance Minister in the House of Commons on 13th March, 1893, will be found at page 2278 of the Commons "Hansard" of last year:

> On the other hand, as the treaty is signed, Canada agrees to give France "most-favoured nation" treatment, not only on articles that are mentioned, but on any articles of her tariff in which she gives better terms to any other country. That was not the intention of the Government, as will be seen by a telegram which was sent to our commissioner in January, in which it was expressly stated that we agree to the "most-favoured nation" treatment so far only as articles named in the treaty are concerned. Our commissioner, either through error or for reasons which he explains in his correspondence, signed the treaty with the clause in it as I have read, giving "most-favoured nation" treatment to France in all articles of our tariff.

I think that pretty effectually disposes of the point taken by the hon. gentleman, that the plenipotentiary had not exceeded his powers. The despatches read by the hon. gentleman from Shell River show that the plenipotentiary had exceeded his powers, and here we have one of the parties who delegated that plenipotentiary stating in the plainest words that he had exceeded his powers.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—They do not say so now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A change has come over the spirit of their dreams since. That matter was considered at some length in another place, and I do not think it is well to enter into a discussion of the reasons why the Government changed their mind. I have before me the speech of the Finance Minister, made last year, and that speech, as far as it goes, is rather a speech expressing dissatisfaction with the treaty and grave doubt as to whether the Government would ratify it in any case. Hon. gentlemen have told us here that the country has been in honour bound from the beginning to adopt this treaty. We have to give up our judgment. We are not to look at this treaty and consider it on its merits at all. We are not to consider whether this treaty, which is alleged to have been made for the benefit of Canada, is really for the benefit of Canada or not. We are not allowed to consider that; we are told that from the moment our plenipotentiary put his hand to that treaty Canada was bound in honour to accept it. Now, hon. gentlemen, that is very fine and sounds very well. Often when a man is trying to "put up a job" on another he is very likely to indulge in high flown sentiment. Good practical common sense is the best thing to use in parliamentary transactions and in treaties, as well as elsewhere. What do I find the Minister of Finance saying in this same speech? He made this explanation deliberately. He chose the occasion himself to make the explanation with respect to the French treaty. What did he say about the ratification of the treaty? Did he say that Parliament was bound in honour to ratify it? Not at all.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—That is a year ago.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—He has acquired more experience since.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rules of honour have not altered since last year. If this country is in honour bound by the signature of its plenipotentiary this year, was it not in honour bound last year? There has been no additional signature since. Knowing all that we know to-day, what did he say:

> The treaty is signed subject to the ratification of the Canadian Parliament, and I make this full and frank exposition of the treaty in order that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House may look into it and consider it, for it requires a little consideration to see just what the effect of the treaty is in these different particulars. And certainly until we receive more satisfactory assurances than we have as regards these items of which I have spoken I shall not ask the House to ratify the treaty.

The hon. gentleman does not see the point. If we were bound by the signature of the plenipotentiary, the Minister was bound to ask the House to ratify it. He says here that he would not ask them unless there were satisfactory answers given to certain questions.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—He has asked them and they have come.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The fact is we have to consider this treaty as a matter of business. It has been reserved for our approval. I do not say that if the benefits arising from it exceeds the drawback, but if we think that the advantages which Canada is to receive under this treaty are equal to the drawbacks, that on the whole it is a fair bargain, then we ought to approve of it. Let us look at the treaty as a matter of business. It admits, at a low rate of duty, in the first place, all wines, sparkling and non-sparkling, castile soap, nuts, almonds, prunes, plums, etc. The soap does not amount to very much, and the nuts, almonds, prunes and plums do not amount to very much. The wine amounts to a very considerable item indeed. The loss of revenue on this alone was admitted by the Finance Minister, in a discussion a few days ago in another place, to be about $150,000 a year.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—He does not understand the trade.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman thinks nobody understands the liquor trade except himself, I should suppose that the Finance Minister ought to know something as to the duty which is paid on wine.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—He is a blue ribbon man.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the first place, we have to remember that we lose $150,000 revenue.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—No, we use more wine.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I prefer the authority of the blue book to that of my hon. friend. We receive $150,000 now, and that revenue is lost, and we have to make that revenue up somewhere else, so that it is a considerable price to pay for this treaty. Then there is the unfairness in a protectionist country like this of exposing our comparatively infant wine-growing industry, which employs some five or six thousand men, to the competition of the product of the pauper labour of Europe. That is a serious matter, and I do not see why this industry is not entitled to the same consideration as other industries. I heard the leader of the House and two or three other hon. gentlemen inquiring why the wine industry was not able to stand on its own bottom, why the small specific duty and the cost of freight were not sufficient to protect it. I notice these gentlemen do not talk that way when they talk about iron and other things. The extra freight and the import duty were not enough, and you must put on 50 or 100 per cent duty; and I do not see why those unfortunate wine-growers should be singled out for this harsh treatment. The second article of the treaty is, to my mind, the most objectionable one. I should not be disposed to vote against the treaty, I should not be disposed to vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member from Shell River were it not for this second article:

Any commercial advantage granted by Canada to any third power especially in tariff matters shall be enjoyed fully by France, Algeria and the French colonies.

That is a provision inserted in the treaty without the authority of the Canadian Government or Parliament, and as far as I can judge from the correspondence. without any necessity whatever. There does not seem to have been any urgent claim made by France for that concession, and I cannot understand why the concession appears there. It is calculated to do immense harm in case of negotiations for trade which is much more important than that of France. Our export to France amounts to less than half a million a year, and that provision might probably hinder us at some future time from succeeding in reciprocity negotiations with the United States. In 1891, when our commissioners went to Washington, they found that the Washington authorities insisted that the privileges which they were to get should not be extended to other countries; and this provision might hinder Canada at some day from making a reciprocity treaty with a country with which she has a trade of 100 times that which she has with France. Now, hon. gentlemen, we come to the third article which speaks about articles of Canadian origin which are imported directly from this country, accompanied by certificates of origin, that they are to receive the advantage of the minimum tariff, and on this point I wish to make just one observation. The High Commissioner stated in his negotiations with the French commissioners, and in his correspondence with his principals, that unless there was a direct steam communication between Canada and France these provisions would be almost useless; and except in the case of lumber they would be. All the other articles if sent at all would be sent by steamer. We have the authority of the Canadian commissioner, which has been quoted time and again, and has been quoted I think by the hon. gentleman from Shell River. Now we take up this list and look at it. I have here the speech of the Minister of Finance made last year and I find the same statement in the report made by the Minister of Commerce since that, which is to be found in the blue book. I find the old French tariff previous to 1892 and the present French tariff—the minimum. The first article on this list is canned meats. I turn to the old French tariff and I find that the duty on canned meats under that old tariff was 8 francs a kilogramme. Now, we had that old tariff for some years. We had every opportunity to do business with France in canned meats, and we did not send any canned meats to France. But the hon. gentleman from Bathurst undertakes to tell us that under this new tariff we ought to send canned meats to France. That would leave the impression that the new tariff was much more favourable than the old one. What is the duty under the minimum tariff? 15 francs. So that the duty now is nearly double what it was, and the hon. gentleman thinks that although we could not send canned meats to France under the old tariff, we can send them under the new tariff which is twice as high.

Hon. Mr. BURNS—What is the maximum tariff?

Hon. Mr. POWER—20 francs. I leave the maximum tariff out of the questions altogether. I take the tariff in operation up to 1892, and I take our experience under that, and compare it with the new tariff. If we could not send canned meats to France, with a duty of 8 francs, surely we cannot send them with a duty of 15 francs. Hon. gentlemen are trying to create the impression that there will be an immense trade with France where there has not been and where there cannot be under this treaty. The next article is condensed milk. Now, hon. gentlemen, we do not make any pure condensed milk in Canada.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—We will start some.

Hon. Mr. POWER—For the tremendous quantity consumed in France we will start a new business here. Now sugar is used in making condensed milk in Canada, and this treaty will not admit that kind of milk at the minimum tariff. The minimum tariff is 1 franc less than the old tariff. Then fresh water fish, eels—I do not think we sent a great many eels to France under the old tariff and the old tariff was exactly the same as the minimum tariff we are to have under the treaty, 5 francs. Then fish preserved in their natural form. There has been some question as to what that means, but we will suppose that that means canned fish. Well, hon. gentlemen, under the tariff which prevailed up to 1892, the duty which was paid on fish preserved in their natural form was 10 francs a kilogramme. Under the minimum tariff, which we are to have under this beneficient treaty, it is 25 francs a kilogramme. We did not send the fish in any quantity under the old tariff; are we likely to send them when the tariff is 150 per cent more? I am only a theorist ; I am not a business man, but it strikes me that this looks like common sense and business. Then we come to lobsters and cray fish preserved in their natural form. The old tariff is 10 francs per kilogramme and the new tariff 25 cents a kilogramme. I think we shall not ship many more of lobsters. The excessive bounty upon French caught and manufactured fish of all kinds is calculated to hinder any large export from Canada to France. Apples and pears we did not send in when they were free, and we shall not send them in now when there is this duty on them. Apples and pears dried, the old duty was 6 and the new minimum duty is 10. Then other preserved fruit, the old duty was 8 and the new is 8. With reference to building timber, rough or sawn, I have to defer to the experience of the hon. gentleman in that respect, but I cannot understand exactly why it is that in the years preceding 1892—although we sent a considerable quantity of lumber there, we did not send an immense quantity—I cannot understand how we are likely to send an immense quantity in the future. No doubt we shall send more than we have been doing during the past two years. We did send an average of $400,000 a year, and under the new tariff I think we got down to about $250,000, and there will probably be an increase in the sale of lumber. On wood pavement, the duty was 1 franc and the present duty is 3½. Under the old tariff staves were free and under the minimum they will be 75 centimes. The extract of chestnut and other tanning extracts, which my hon. friend from St. John spoke about and described as a probable source of immense trade, were free under the old tariff and under the new the duty is 3 francs a kilogramme. Common paper was 11 under the old tariff and is 10 under the new. I do not think we are likely to send any of that. There is a reduction in prepared skins. Boots and shoes are just the same under the old as under the new tariff. There is the same tariff as before on furniture of common wood. We did not send any before, and we shall not send any now. That is pretty near the end of the list. There are also wood and sea-going ships—we used to send some, but we will not now because of the bounties given by France to ships manufactured in that country, both sailing and construction bounties. Other ships will not be used. I am not a business man, but I think I can read the English language, and I have a very moderate knowledge of figures, and I think that, looking at the proposed new tariff and the tariff under which we did a very small business with France, we are not likely to do a large business under this treaty—not likely to do any business which will justify us in losing $150,000 revenue. We are departing from the fiscal principles which have governed this country since 1879. I do not think there is anything to justify that, and I do not think there is anything to justify us in flying in the face of the wine growers and the temperance people all over the country. I am not going to deal with the speeches made by other hon. gentlemen, but there is just one observation I should like to make with respect to an illustration presented by the hon. gentleman from the Kennebec division. The hon. gentleman said that Canada was like a small dealer who was trying to open an account with a big concern, and the conclusion the hon. gentleman wished us to draw in this case was that whether the prices asked by the big concern were reasonable or not, whether the bargain offered to the small dealer was a fair and reasonable one or not, he was bound to accept it. That is the way I interpreted it. I say this is not a fair and equitable bargain, and I think that the small dealer who went to the big dealer and paid more for the articles he was getting than they were worth would be a long time before he made money or became a big dealer himself; and if the hon. gentleman had ever been a small dealer—I do not think he ever was—and began to do business in that way, he never would have got to where he is now. There is no use blinking the fact, I do not think there are half a dozen hon. gentlemen in this House who believe that, as a matter of business, it is a good thing for Canada to ratify this treaty, and we know that the leader of the Government in this House last year, who is not present now, who is probably consuming French wines instead of being here advocating the French treaty, did not approve of this arrangement. It was an open secret that the Government did not approve of the treaty; and what are the mysterious means which have been used to hypnotize or mesmerize the Government I do not know, but they have been so influenced, and I presume a sufficient number of their followers have been so influenced as to carry the measure in this House, and it is not worth while saying much against it. However, it is just as well to put one's views on record.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division:

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I desire to make a few remarks on the bill before it is read the third ti me, and as it is getting pretty late the leader of the Senate might allow me to make a few remarks tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of addressing the House when the bill is referred to a committee of the whole.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I can make my remarks now. This bill has been carried almost by force in the other House and here, and it will be denounced by force by the people in the country before very long. The leader of the Government congratulated us on having the great privilege of negotiating our own treaty, it is a great privilege no doubt. They say this is the first, I differ as to that. We had the Treaty of Washington; but supposing we get the power of negotiating our own treaties, and the treaty is violated, where is the army or navy to enforce it? Before hon. gentlemen talk about the great benefits to be derived from negotiating our own treaties they ought to consider all the responsibilities that the right carries with it. The hon. gentleman says that we did not refuse to ratify this treaty last year, and there was no dissatisfaction as to its terms. If there was not, why was it not put through last year? According to the remarks of the hon. member from Bathurst, he lost a great deal of money because it was not put through last year. He spoke of the importance of the lumber industry and told us of all the capital invested without industry, but he did not tell us of the crop he has been harvesting in this country for many years. The industry that is to be destroyed by this treaty is the grape and wine in dustry. One would think that the only object the Government of this country had was for the people to get a taste for French wine. The leader and the member for Lunenburg says they are very desirous that we should have a taste for French wine. What do the people of this country care for that? What interest does the workingman expect to have in wine? What do those people who are engaged in producing the wealth of this country expect of this treaty? You pass legislation in favour of the rich as against the poor. You give them wine.

Hon. gentlemen talk about a loss of $150,-000 in the revenue. You will find it to be $200,000 before you get through this that you are giving away to the wine-bibbers of this country and taxing the poor to make up the amount. What has been our policy? I stand before you here as one of those who fought for the National Policy for the last 17 years. Where is it now? Given away. I fought shoulder to shoulder with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I am sorry to-night that he is not here. I fought for 17 years with the Conservative party of this country, and for the National Policy. The National Policy now is scattered to the four winds of heaven in favour of the wine-bibbers.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I say, oh, yes. I know what I am talking about. You do it because you make a concession to the wine bibbers, and you have been saying here that you raised that duty in order to have a chance of taking it off. Just imagine the Government of this country that we have been supporting for years, saying, "see what we have done for you, see how we put the duty on wine for you," and now we are told that they did it for a certain object in order that it might be taken off again. This is the reason I oppose this treaty, because I have taken an interest in keeping the Canadian market for the Canadians. Now you are giving it away. The last plank of the National Policy is gone. We told the people that we should collect a revenue on the luxuries coming into this country, and allow the necessaries of life to come in as free as possible. What does the result now show? You take the duty off the luxuries, and you are going to destroy an important industry of this country. My hon. friend from Bathurst talks about the lumber trade. He says they use corn and pork, and they are harvesting the crop that has been growing for a thousand years, and which cannot be repeated. But take the grape industry in the province of Ontario; you can raise a crop every year. My hon. friend the leader here says the first petition comes from the grape growers, and they want to get something to fortify their wine, and then he talks in favour of temperance. That which goes to fortify the wine—is it in the interest of temperance? No, certainly not, and I am sorry to see that that great apostle of temperance, the hon. member from Sarnia, is not in his place to hear this. I regret exceedingly that the Government of this country should have thought right and proper to submit this treaty to Parliament for its ratification. How are they going to face the people of this country by giving away the National Policy? If they do not denounce that treaty and denounce it soon, the people of this country will denounce them. I have a statement here which I will read to show how important this industry is in the province of Ontario. Native wine is produced in this country, and I want to see it produced until it becomes the common drink of the people in place of strong spirituous liquors, and I know it can be produced in this country at about 60 cents per gallon:

It is estimated that four-fifths of the grape crop is made into wine, and if the grapes so consumed were thrown upon the market for fruit, it would cause a glut in the market, and they would not bring a price sufficient to cover the cost of growing, I venture to say that the greater quantity would rot on the vines as the reduction in the price would not pay the farmer to put them on the market.

It may not come amiss here to give you the quantity of grapes that enter into the manufacture of wine. The quantities I name below only represent the Pelee Island Wine and Vineyards Co., Ltd., (not taking into consideration the 14 dozens of other wine makers.)

Our yearly purchases from farmers (exclusive of vineyards under yearly contract, one of which contains fifty acres capable of producing 350,000 lbs. of grapes), and amounting to 802,000 lbs. of grapes for which we pay from $25 to $60 a ton of seventy farmers, bringing in an income to each of the seventy-one farmers, ranging from $87 to $617 each, or an average of $170 to each.

Now this is a very important industry which you are going to ruin. You are going to throw a lot of people out of employment and I know the treaty has already retarded improvement in this matter, I know it personally. I know many people who were going to plant vineyards this spring who have not done so and are very much alarmed already. Many of them had mortgaged their property in order to put out vineyards, and here you are going to destroy the industry in order that we should get a taste for French wine, as has been said by the hon. leader of the House and the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I have just heard you can make wine in Canada for 40c.

a gallon, and if you reduce the prices we will drink your wine.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The writer from whom I have been quoting continues:

This is a good example of the Hon. G. E. Foster's theory of practising mixed farming, as he tells us in his speeches, those having already taken up grape growing in addition to grain raising, find it much more profitable to grow grapes, but in this particular instance we find the Government proposing to unceremoniously ruin the owners of vineyards, by ratifying this treaty, for the privilege of selling a few eels, lobsters, crawfish, etc. I guarantee and venture to say that the profits to the shippers on the increased trade that would follow after the coming into force of the treaty, would not equal one-fiftieth part of the loss that the farmers would sustain, in addition to killing a native industry that gives promise of surpassing anything that farmers have undertaken in the way of profitable cultivation of the soil.

Now, sir, that is the industry you are going to destroy. You do it with your eyes open, and just as sure as the sun shines in the heavens to-day, they will retaliate. There is no doubt about that. You may look for that in the future. In conversation with one of the leading grape growers of Essex County, he expressed himself as follows:

If this treaty is ratified it will mean the ruination of all those farmers who have gone into grape growing in the last five years.

As the total cost of a vineyard is entailed in the first three years, the cost of vines, the planting of posts and the wire, this you will perceive is an outlay covering three years, and no returns are forthcoming until the end of the fourth season. I have fifty acres of land here I would not take $150 an acre for, but if the treaty is ratified I would sell for $40 an acre.

That is the result; sell for $40 an acre and then a man is expected to keep his family and keep a lot of men and here, he is going to be ruined by this treaty:—

"Why," he said, "in a good season I can grow 4 tons of Catawba grapes to the acre, and get $50 per ton, bringing me in $200 for every acre I have in grapes, but on the same soil it would not yield more than 25 bushels of wheat to the acre, and at 75 cents a bushel I would only receive about $20 an acre, or if sown with any other grain the revenue would amount to about the same."

Is it just that the Government should single out the farmers, interested in this class of agriculture for to propose adverse legislation.

What has this class of the farming community done to receive such unfair treatment at the hands of this Government?

This class has asked for no concessions in the tariff, not even to the extent of lowering the duty on the wire used in the vineyards to a very large extent, all they ask is justice.

A point which is worthy of notice, Canadian wines only contain from 12 to 18 degrees of spirit, this is obtained during the natural process of fermentation (see clause 10 of the circular) and the treaty proposes to admit wine free of 26 degrees of spirit, by this you will notice that wines from France containing from 8 to 12 degrees more spirit than Canadian wine are admitted, which has a very detrimental effect on the temperance cause.

The hon. gentleman and the Government of this country wish our people to get a taste for wine and make them wine-bibbers. Do they want to make us drunk?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Not on those wines.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Well, I have seen plenty of men full—well, if they were not full, they had just plenty. I do not like to name them.

This extra strength contained in the French wines is not natural, but produced by the addition of raw spirit to the natural strength of their wine, and this will come into competition with the light, pure, Canadian wine, and containing no addition of spirit.

I may state that the names of the wine manufacturers attached to the memorial enclosed do not comprise one-half the names of those engaged in the wine manufacture. And, as I stated, the figures herein given are only the Pelée Island Wine Co.'s output, manufacture, &c., and based on an average year.

An idea of the magnitude of the grape growing interest and wine manufacture in Canada can be had when the following facts are taken into consideration.

1st. There are at least five thousand acres of land planted in vines capable of producing one million and a half gallons of wine.

2nd. Ontario alone has an area suitable for grape culture at least equal to the present area of vineyards in France. See the report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization for 1891, pages 99, 100 and 103.

3rd. There are about 4,000 people directly or indirectly interested in grape growing and wine making.

From the foregoing facts it is evident that if the proposed treaty is ratified without certain restrictions, and also without equivalent advantages being granted to us from the Government, our grape growing and wine industries will be practically ruined.

That is only from one company. There are fourteen other companies engaged in this, and a large number of men employed, and you are going to destroy all that by this treaty.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We need not do it, because they are charging twice too much for their wine.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There are at least five thousand acres of land planted in vineyards, capable of producing one million five hundred thousand gallons of wine. There is an area in Ontario alone equal to the entire wine-growing area of France. That is the report of an expert brought before the Committee on Immigration and Colonization of the other House. If the Government of the country had even taken the trouble to look at that report, how could they negotiate a treaty if they considered the interests of the people of this country, a treaty which is going to destroy that industry, besides throwing away the whole National Policy?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We can produce wine in Canada at 40 cents a gallon, and you cannot sell French wine for that.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I say the National Policy is gone. The Government of this country may look out; the time is coming, we are losing a large amount of revenue by this treaty. Look at the obligations that we have undertaken in the interests of the country! We are going to give seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars for a fast line on the Atlantic. We have already given a large subsidy to a line on the Pacific. We are going to lose two hundred and fifty thousand dollars on this French treaty by the reduction of duties, and then if you are going to have the advantage of it, you must have a direct line to France, which will cost the country five hundred thousand dollars a year more. You are going to do that on a falling revenue. What will be the result? The result will be deficits. I do not profess to be a prophet or the son of a prophet, but I say the outlook is bad for Canada. We should husband our resources as far as possible. Let us do what we can in the interests of the prosperity of the country, but I cannot for a moment allow my judgment to be warped, not even under pressure, as I am sure some hon. gentlemen's judgment must be, to vote for a treaty of this kind which has a tendency to flood Canada with French wines which this country does not want, and to destroy an industry which is important in the interests of Canada. If I stand alone in this House, I shall oppose the treaty, because I know the vindication of the vote I am going to give will come, and come soon. It will come in less than two years. I say to the Government that I have been supporting all my life, and intend to support still—because I am not going to be driven out of the party like some people that I know of; I want to keep them from committing political suicide, which they are fast approaching by their policy. I am a better party man than half of their supporters, because I am not a partisan to make something out of it, but I am here to tell the Government of their faults, and I must say to-night, when I look at them and the way this question has been brought up, that I am against it, and the people of the Dominion are against it. I know I am not doing justice to this question, because I am tired, and the leader of the Government has refused to let the matter stand until to-morrow. I move that this bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was rejected by the following vote:—

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 18th July, 1894.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DOMINION LANDS BILL.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (160) "An Act respecting Dominion Lands." He said: I will move the second reading of the bill at the Table of the House. I will now give a short explanation. When settlers first went into the territories and Manitoba, some of them had settled before the surveys were made, and after the surveys were made it was found that a certain number of them were upon school lands. It is not right that they should be deprived of their improvements or evicted, and this bill is to authorize the Government to allow them to hold lands, not over 160 acres, which they have so settled upon, the Government asking for authority to choose in the same township other lands for school purposes to replace those given away or abandoned.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest to the hon. Minister the propriety of the Government taking more power than is contained in this bill, inasmuch as no provision appears to have been made for the granting to the settlers of pre-emptions under the old act, and in the class of cases which this bill is intended to govern, many settlers not only took up homesteads but took up a pre-emption on school lands as they would be entitled to under the Dominion Lands Act. This bill only deals with the homesteads and not the pre-emptions. If the principle is deemed to be right, of granting a patent to the settler for his homestead, the principle is equally right and strong in its application that the settler should be entitled to the pre-emption upon which he had settled. I think you will find a class of cases springing up which is not governed by this bill.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think the suggestion is a very good one and seems to be equitable, but at this late stage of the session it will be nearly impossible for me to enter into the question. I would have to enter into a conference with the Minister of the Interior and his officers, and I hope nobody will suffer between this time and next session. I shall draw the attention of the department to this point.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not feel very clear as to the point I am going to speak upon, but I think it is worth considering. The second clause of this bill provides that:

Notwithstanding anything contained in any such act, the omission to publish any order or regulation heretofore made by the Governor in Council under the provisions of any act relating to Dominion lands, or to publish such order or regulation in any prescribed manner, shall not be held to invalidate it or anything done thereunder.

I can imagine that lands may have got into the possession of some party which he would not have got if these orders or regulations had been duly published, and this clause does not contain any reservation of the right of the parties, or any provision that it shall not affect pending litigation, which I think ought to be contained in it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This is only doing away with the formality which would not deprive a third party from any acquired rights he would have. If his acquired right resulted from negligence on behalf of the Government, he would have that equitable claim for negligence, and if it were gross negligence he would have a claim in law.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

FRAUDULENT SALE OR MARKING BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (123) "An Act in restraint of Fraudulent Sale or Marking."

(In the Committee.)

On the schedule,

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I move an amendment to the schedule to strike out the word "honey," and the explanation following. If it is left there it will be more detrimental than useful, and there is another bill in the House which I hope will be passed to provide a remedy for the evil complained of.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Why is the penalty made the sum of $100? Why not a minimum or a maximum penalty? It may be an offence of a trifling nature. I think the merits of every case should be considered, and that it should not be an arbitrary fine of $100, but should be a penalty consistent with the circumstances in each case.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have no objection to that. I move to strike out the word "of," and insert "not exceeding."

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON, from the committee, reported the bill with an amendment, which was concurred in.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

OCEAN STEAMSHIP SUBSIDIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (161) "An Act further to amend an Act respecting ocean steamship subsidies."

Hon. Mr. POWER—The House will require some reason, I fancy, for this enormous subsidy.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS — Those reasons might have been given at a later stage just as well, but I shall state briefly now the object of this bill and why the Government has thought it wise to come to Parliament with a measure of this kind. Many years ago it was decided that Canada should have a fast line of steamships on the Atlantic. Many years back attempts were made in that direction, and Parliament authorized the Governor in Council to give a subsidy for that purpose of $500,000 a year to secure the advantages of such a line of steamships to Canada. So far, it has been found impossible to find any person to carry out this desirable enterprise for the subsidy offered. Some have accepted the subsidy, but failed. Tenders have been asked upon different occasions but without effect, either from the fact that a larger sum of money was asked or that an insufficient service was promised. The Anderson line undertook the service for $500,000, and found it impossible to carry it out under the conditions which were imposed. Negotiations then arose with several companies—with the Allan line, with several English lines, with a French line, and with a Belgian company as well. The result was that the demands have run up from $750,000 to $1,250,000, none of them offering, except one, I think, a 20 knot line. Provisional arrangements had been made with Mr. Bryce Douglas for $750,000, but they were not carried out for two reasons, the unfortunate death of the promoter, and the financial crash about the time the scheme was floated. At the present time we have an offer, for a subsidy of $750,000 a year, of a weekly service of vessels averaging from 9 to 11 thousand tons, with a steaming capacity of 20 knots at sea—that is the capacity for travelling in ordinary weather on the Atlantic at a speed of 20 knots, and also an undertaking to make connection between a port in England and a port off the cost of France in the channel. The steamers on this line are to be first class, equal to the best that are now sailing to and from the harbour of New York. The subsidy asked by this bill submitted to Parliament is for 10 years. The Government has also incurred the responsibility of submitting for the approval of the Parliament, the continuation of the con-contract after 10 years for a similar period for a reduced subsidy, to wit $300,000 a year. The Government is not coming now before Parliament for the purpose of getting that authority. We are now only coming for the first decade. It is unnecessary for me to enlarge upon the necessity for such a service. I do not think I could give any information to the hon. members of this House which is not already in their possession, I shall only refer very briefly to the conclusion to which the delegation that met in Ottawa have come. They have undertaken to recommend to their Governments the importance of assisting of a steamship company upon the Pacific Ocean to be a link in a line of communication over the territory of Canada with England. They have also drawn the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the great importance of assisting a fast line on the Atlantic for Imperial purposes, securing direct communication with the Australian Colonies exclusively on British territory except the ocean, which virtually we might call British territory. Many questions have been raised in relation to this enterprise. Will it be a successful one, will it be a paying one, and will the persons who intend to invest their money in it find it profitable? From what information we got from men who have made a special study of this matter, we think it will be successful and profitable. Sir William Van Horne recently stated in the public press that after having given mature consideration to this subject, he had no doubt that such a line would pay, that all the geographical advantages were on our side, that we should draw the passenger traffic from even the Western States through Canada, and that the voyage by sea being so short New York could not compete with us in that traffic. You are all familiar with the distances between our ports and the ports in England. You know also the distance from New York and these same ports in England.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us the exact distance frem Quebec to Liverpool?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—From Liverpool to Rimouski or Halifax it is about 2,500 miles. A steamer running twenty miles an hour will make that voyage in five days and three or four hours; allowing for delays in approaching land she will make the journey easy in five and a half days. Rimouski is eight hours from Quebec and Halifax 24 hours from Montreal. The time required for a 20-knot steamer from Liverpool to Montreal would be five days and 20 hours in summer, and six and one-half days in winter.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—You would have to go by St. John in winter. You could not go to Montreal or Halifax.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I shall not dispute any of these points, because they are open questions. If you went to St. John, as the vessels may and will go, the distance by sea would be greater, but then the travel by rail would be shorter, so that on the average, I suppose, either St. John or Halifax may be on the same footing. This is left for the company to decide with, of course, the supervision and approval of the Government in the interests of the enterprise. Now if we compare a trip of 5 days and twenty hours, and 6 days and a half with the time made by existing lines of fast steamers, we see what an advantage we can have over New York for the delivery of the mails. The United States Post Office Department show that the fastest steamers between Britain and New York last year required 7½ days, on an average, for the delivery of the mails between Liverpool and New York. They have now the fast line that we are endeavouring ourselves to have, but the position as to them is such that although they have those vessels running at 20 and 21 knots, they have been unable, on the average, to deliver the mails in any shorter period than 7½ days.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman will excuse me for interrupting him, that does not apply to the ocean greyhounds, because they never take more than six days to cross.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. It applies to these very hounds. I have given the average of the "Lucania" and the "Campania," and that is the average of those very hounds that the hon. gentleman is speaking of.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then they do not average 20 knots.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They do.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They cannot.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Why not? They have the same disadvantage in nearing the land that other steamers have, and in my calculation I allow for the reduction in speed of the vessel nearing the land on this side and nearing the land in England, and allowing 16 or 15 knots travelling instead of 20 or 21, I made out the average which I have given the House. I have the actual facts as to the "Campania," and the hon. gentleman says that they cannot have been travelling at 20 knots. They were, I suppose for three, four, five or six days, travelling at 20 knots. But the harbour of New York has certain disadvantages also. Passing along the New England coast, before reaching the city of New York, the steamships encounter fogs and other obstacles that have to be taken into account.

Hon. Mr. POWER—All steamers do not go near the New England coast.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Wherever they near the land they have to take the same precaution, and there are fogs in passing near the banks. There are fogs on that coast as well as on the coast of Canada near Halifax and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—That average time that the hon. Minister has mentioned was both for summer and winter?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The average differs for the two seasons. I gave both.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—There is a place in Canada where there are no fogs.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—In Canada we have no fast line. Still, in the summer of 1892–93, the "Parisian," which is only a 14-knot steamer, delivered the mails between Liverpool and Montreal in seven days, or within an hour of the time of the "Campania" on her last trip, when she was really running 22 knots an hour. That will indicate to the House the position of Canada in relation to this subject. We recollect that when the Allan line was first established on the St. Lawrence, the steamers going to New York were much slower than our Canadian boats, and that we used to carry a large percentage of the United States mails by the St. Lawrence route, and a number of United States travellers used to come this way also, but since then we have made no progress. We have remained with vessels of 10, 13 and 14 knots, whilst New York has improved its steamers in such a way that not only do they carry all the United States mails and passengers, but they have drawn to them from Canada a large number of passengers and also a large portion of the Canadian mails. It is unnecessary to go any further into details. When the House goes into committee I will be able to give any information that is required, even on geographical questions.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I think the hon. Minister has not been so well posted about geography as he should have been, because there is a point on our Canadian coast where there are no fogs. The fact has been pretty well established, but the death of Bryce Douglas prevented it from being brought out three years ago; there is a point in Nova Scotia where there are no fogs, that is the evidence that was given here, a place where a 20-knot boat can sail from Canada and reach England in four days.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Is it Louisburg?

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—No, Terminal City, I think in the county of Antigonish. I have been down there and have gone all round it, and any man that has ever come in there once can come in there at any time he likes. The evidence given here by two men, captains who have lived there for a lifetime, is that there is never any fog at that harbour, and that they could take the mails from Washington to England, or vice versa, by that route in twenty-six or thirty-six hours less time than they could be carried by any other route. I am prepared, if an opportunity is given me, to prove that now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The proposition to invite tenders for a fast line of steamers to Canada has been, for many years, before those who are interested in the oceanic trade, and the Government have been unable to obtain any proposals that would justify the people in thinking that the fast line now proposed could be realized. The amount has now been considerably increased, from $500,000 to $750,000, meaning $7,500,000 in the next ten years. It cannot be contended that Canada has been in any way slow in assisting enterprises for the development of the St. Lawrence River. Thirty years ago we subsidized pretty heavily the Allan line and the pioneer line. In 1860, the subsidy given that line by Parliament was $8,000, for each weekly trip. There is no doubt about it, the effect at that day was to give us a very substantial service, a line that has very materially contributed to the trade and commerce of this country. As years went on, other lines sprung into existence and to-day we have on the St. Lawrence as good a service as can be found in other part of the world for a similar number of people under similar conditions. The proposal of the Government now is to accept a tender from a rival company, if such a company can be formed, and it must necessarily exercise an injurious influence on those who have been the pioneers of that trade, and who have a large amount invested in existing lines.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They have had the preference for a long time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are keen business men, and must have realized whether it would pay them to do it or not. There could be no object in entering into it unless it was a paying project. They are in the best position of any one in the world to satisfy themselves and investors outside whether such a line could pay or not. It would be a very natural ambition to establish that fast line, because it is evident to every one that if a rival line, such as that contemplated now, were brought into existence it must destroy practically the value of millions of dollars now invested in lines running to the St. Lawrence; more particularly the Allan line and the Dominion line

There is no question about that. It means that the Government of this country propose to strike a blow which must destroy practically the value of those millions of dollars invested already. As a matter of self defence, it must be apparent to every one that if it were at all practicable to meet the proposal of the Government, those lines were in the best possible position and it is to their interest to perform the service. In the projects which have been spoken of, Anderson's and the other projects, and practically the Huddart project, I am not aware that any substantial company has been formed or money raised for the purpose of forming this line. It is all practically in the clouds. It has to be floated. The reason I presume, that those who are familiar with that trade have not been prompted to accept the offer of the Government, will probably be explained by their believing, in the first place, that it would not pay, and in the second place, that there are difficulties in the way that interfere with high speed over the route that lines must take between the St. Lawrence and Liverpool or any port in England. We know very well that those fast ocean steamers that are called "greyhounds," which run from New York, run four or five hundred miles further south than the steamers that come to Canada. They are obliged to do that in order to maintain their high speed. They do not feel that it would be safe to go south of the banks of Newfoundland except at a very considerable distance, or near the Canadian shore, unless in remarkably fine weather. There is scarcely a trip made, particularly in the months of May, June and July, where both fogs and icebergs have not been encountered. Only yesterday, in reading the Montreal Star, I noticed that no less than three vessels were detained. The Dominion Line steamer "Vancouver" was detained in a fog for 20 hours. She was also detained on another occasion by ice. The Allan Line steamer "Numidian" was detained by fog on the night of the 11th and had to wait over. The Allan Line steamer "Sarmatian" lost 70 hours in a fog, and had to slow down in certain places in the Gulf. Under similar conditions, can a vessel running 20 knots an hour recklessly sail at a rapid rate where icebergs are likely to be encountered? On the passage outward of one of the steamers, "Lake Superior," the vessel had a collision with an iceberg. She reported to-day with a hole in her bow, and had to go into dock in Liverpool. These are facts that come up every day. If you take the history of voyages during those months of the year, the universal complaint is that speed is impossible, owing to the fogs and icebergs. One does not want to decry the many advantages of the St. Lawrence. We have made it a safe route, provided there are no fogs. Every one must know that the fogs and icebergs are limited to certain ranges and the reason that fast steamers run at the speed they do and make New York their objective point is that they are outside of the line of fogs and icebergs.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I have gone out of the port of New York in the "Majestic" in the thickest fog I have ever experienced.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes; but it is not the rule.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, as much as on the St. Lawrence route.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I had the pleasure of being on the "Persia" when she ran into an iceberg.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I have seen fogs in the middle of the Atlantic.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I wonder anybody goes across at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite aware of the fact that vessels that do not take what is called a southern lane, do encounter fogs and icebergs. I particularly emphasized the fact that the fast vessels which run from the port of New York take a line 500 miles south of New York. Take all the fast vessels and they run so far south that practically they are beyond the range of both fogs and icebergs.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—It was precisely on those vessels that I have encountered fogs, on that route that they take.

Hon. Mr. PRICE—On one voyage from Queenstown the fog followed us until we were within half an hour of Sandy Hook.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Did the vessel take the regular southern route?

Hon. Mr. PRICE—The regular Cunard route?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The fast steamers go further south than that.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The hon. gentleman thinks the fog is confined to the Gulf route. The latest authority that I have read on that subject says that some of the densest fogs known are in the Red Sea in which, at the time, the temperature was 93 degrees in the cabin of the vessel.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The vessels that take the southern route across the Atlantic are not subject to collisions with icebergs in the same degree.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In view of the large sum of money proposed to be paid for this service, if it does go into effect, what are to be the compensating advantages to the country? Is the mere fact of our having the glory of a fast line to compensate us for an expenditure of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that it would add very much to the material wealth of this country to have that fact known. Nor do I believe that it would be the means of attracting a sufficient number of passengers to make it pay. If it did, surely those who are familiar with the traffic would have been prompted by this subsidy, those who are going to be injured by the establishment of the fast line. This line, I understand, is to be a weekly one. It is not to be supposed that our mails will lie over 6 days to go by the fast line. They will either go to New York, as they do now, or by another line on the St. Lawrence. We get now three, four and sometimes five mails a week. I suppose that condition of things will continue, and this one steamer a week will not take the whole of the Canadian mail. Then, in reference to the passenger travel, I should be very glad indeed to feel that it was going to attract passengers from the United States, but we know very well that people like variety, and that our own Canadian people perhaps go one way and return the other, and vice versa, and though we have such steamers as the "Vancouver" and "Parisian," Canadians go by New York and probably will continue to do so. The question for us to consider is whether the investment is one that will pay—whether the country will have an adequate return for the large outlay. Is it going to be a substantial benefit to the agricultural classes of this country? Because the mere passenger travel of the country will not compensate for the enormous outlay. It is like giving a premium to each individual who goes by that line. It is, perhaps, unnecessary to discuss this matter at any length, because up to the present time we have not seen any evidence that, even with this $750,000 a year, the English investor was willing to put money into it, because it was very well known for months before the meeting of Parliament that this offer was to be made. It was recognized that if the Government agreed to give this amount, Parliament would vote it, yet as far as I can learn from financial sources, investors have not been ready to come forward and put their money into the undertaking. I think it would have been very much better if we had given a less subsidy to the existing lines. As I understand, they were ready to give a 16 or 17 knot service for a considerably less sum.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been so reported from time to time, and I think it has been admitted that the Allan line, and possibly the Dominion line, were quite willing to give a service of 16 knots an hour for an amount considerably below this sum. It is worthy of consideration whether it would not have been wiser and more prudent to have favoured those who have already furnished us with that service than to have invited the formation of a rival company, which if it goes into operation must have the effect of considerably destroying the capital invested in the existing lines.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I cannot let this interesting subject pass, where $750,000 a year is concerned, without expressing my views upon the advisability of granting such a sum as a subsidy for a fast line between a Canadian port and a British port. It seems to me that there is going to be no commensurate advantage for the very large sum that is being voted. The advantage will accrue largely to cities, where the population is sufficiently wealthy to travel across the Atlantic, and it will benefit more especially Chicago and other western points. I have no doubt it will draw a certain amount of travel through Canada. Whether that travel is likely to be a compensating advantage for the expenditure of so large a sum is doubtful. There is another consideration worth while putting before this House. It is the question of developing a trade between Australia and Great Britain through Canada. Up to the present time the trade route for Australia has been by the Suez Canal. On that route there are two lines of steamers. One, the Orient, the other the Peninsula and Oriental. These two lines of steamers have been subsidized by the Australian Government and the British Government jointly to the extent of $900,000 per year, divided between the two companies. It is desirable that the competition on the trade route between Australia and Great Britain should be diverted from these two lines, to the proposed line making the Canadian Pacific Railway a portion of the through route.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I presume those steamships the hon. gentleman refers to go through the Suez Canal from England and Australia. There is no breaking of bulk.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There is no breaking of bulk on the Suez Canal route so far as freight is concerned. There is for passengers and mails at Brindisi and Naples. The mails and passengers are brought from India to Brindisi by one line and to Naples by the other, and from there go through to Great Britain. Now the passengers and freight go on to Malta and Gibraltar without breaking bulk. But what I wish to draw the attention of this House to is the fact that that has been, up to the present, the trade route for Australia for passengers and mails. Now I do not see that we can hope to divert through freight of a heavy character across Canada, but we certainly can divert the passenger travel of Australia and the mail accommodation to a very great extent by assistance such as this subsidy is intended to afford, and instead of taking power, as this bill is doing, to enter into a contract with a company merely for the purpose of establishing a fast line between Quebec or Halifax and Great Britain, that if it were made a part and parcel of a subsidy in which Great Britain and the Australian governments unite in order to ensure a fast service between Australia and Great Britain over the Canadian Pacific Railway, a very large portion of Canada would be benefited thereby. The route between Australia and Great Britain by the Canadian Pacific Railway is a shorter route than the route by the Suez Canal; that is to say, the steamers that leave Australia and deliver the mails in England take about thirty-one days to do so, and we can do it by an improved service between Australia and Great Britain in 28 or 29 days. They talk of 26 days, but that is an exaggeration. At any rate 29 days without any mishaps would be a fair allowance for the time on a route through Canada. If that is the case, there are many advantages in favour of our route on account of it being a quick route, and on account of the variation in the mode of travelling. It is not one continuous journey of 31 days on the steamer, but you cross Canada by rail, and for that reason it probably would become a favourite line for the Australian people, and any trade or travel of that population that we can divert across Canada, must redound much more to benefit of the country as a whole than merely drawing a portion of the travel from the west and entering into competition with the United States' lines. It is for the purpose of drawing the attention of the Government to this fact, that the subsidy could be very much better applied in conjunction with the Australian Government and the British Government, that I have made these remarks. It is quite possible that a subsidy of $750,000 would not be required with the joint assistance of these governments to carry it out. I think the country will feel the burden of $750,000 a year an excessive one if it is merely for the purpose of encouraging the passenger travel between Canada and Great Britain and speedier mail accommodation, and therefore I hope the Government will take into consideration the question which which I have raised. I bring it forward from a western standpoint, because if a subsidy of that kind will assist in giving us faster accommodation through the whole of Canada, I am sure it would commend itself very much more favourably to all those who are dependent upon the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway in order to get the best accommodation. The joint passenger travel, mail and express matter of Australia, Great Britain and Canada would justify a Flying Dutchman across the continent, on the Canadian Pacific Railway metals, and trade must follow it. There is one thing I feel sure of, to make a fast line pay we will have to let down the bars for trade to flow freely at both ends.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Before this motion is carried, I should like to say that I think the last speaker brought a question before us that deserves a great deal of consideration. It strikes me that if $750,000 is going to be spent, it should only be in aid of a line from Great Britain to the Maritime Provinces, thence across the continent to Vancouver, and thence to Japan and China and probably to the British possessions in the far east. It might be an after consideration whether the Australasians would consider it in their interest to avail themselves of a connection with that line. I think it is possible they might, but the great object at present is to see that such a line will pay the Dominion of Canada, and whether the Dominion of Canada, as a whole, will be satisfied to give so large a subsidy as $750,000, especially when we know there are two large portions of the country which are both anxious to secure the landing of this line of steamers at their respective ports. It is well known at present that there is a great diversity of opinion. Supporting the Government of Canada there is a very extensive influence in Nova Scotia in favour of Halifax. We know that our First Minister is a Nova Scotia gentleman. We also know that Sir Charles Tupper is an influential member of the cabinet, and that two influential members represent the city and county of Halifax. A large influence is brought to bear in favour of making Halifax the winter port of Canada. Well, if Halifax is the proper port, I suppose we will have to submit to it, but the people of St. John and the people of New Brunswick do not think that Halifax is the right port. We are all aware that St. John has been, and is, the greatest shipping port in the Dominion of Canada to-day, excepting Montreal, and Montreal is only a shipping port during the summer season. On the other hand, the port of St. John is open the year round, and the only objection which would be found to it is that periodically it is visited by fogs, but the same fog that is at the city of St. John it is well known envelopes Halifax and all the eastern shore of Canada up to the Baie des Chaleurs. To show you that this is not a statement dictated by any spirit of rivalry, or envy, or opposition to Halifax, with your permission I will give you the report of disinterested parties, showing clearly that this very season no less, an interference with the traffic and mails and passengers at Halifax than three or four days took place at one time, owing to a flow of ice from the north shore preventing the possibility of the mail steamers and others approaching the harbour; whereas at no time of the year is there any interference whatever with the port of St. John. There has never been a time when the port of St. John was not open summer and winter. We are all willing to admit that the port of Quebec and the port of Montreal are very superior ports, but only in the summer season. Both are closed for six months of the year, and steamers must repair to some open ports. There are only two such ports, Halifax and St. John, and the question arises which of these should get the preference, which is the superior port? We hold in New Brunswick that the port of St. John is, and we would be very much dissatisfied if the port of St. John, which is just as convenient as Halifax, were overlooked. Taking the land which intervenes between St. John and Halifax with the sea voyage, precisely the same time can be made to the one as to the other. I have here a statement made by proper authorities, showing that there is no difference between the port of St. John and the port of Halifax, taking into account the distance from Halifax to St. John that would have to be travelled on land. I might point out also—but I do not know that it applies to this matter—that the port of New York even is not as free from faults and obstructions as the port of St. John, and I hold in my hand a very short paragraph written and sent forth by authorities at the port of New York, not by enemies but by officials and friends, showing that even at New York there is a greater and often a more powerful obstruction to ships going into that harbour than even the port of St. John. This very spring at the port of New York such a fog prevailed from Eastport to Fire Island, the approach to the port of New York, that steamers had to lie outside many days before they could enter the harbour. That does not occur at the port of St. John. I wish that the people of Canada would get more familiar with the statement that I am making than they really are. There is a deplorable want of knowledge of the real value and the grand opportunities that St. John presents as a winter port at all events for this Canada of ours. It would have the advantage of being permanent, of being always open, of being nearer to Montreal by land than any other port. I have heard hon. gentlemen say that there are other ports on the coast of Nova Scotia nearer to Quebec and to Montreal than Halifax. Now I deny this, because the very same fault that applies to the port of Quebec and the port of Montreal would apply to any port from Halifax to Quebec; and the freezing up of the Straits of Northumberland and all those waters would naturally, in the winter time, obstruct the navigation there. Therefore I would humbly submit that every gentleman having an interest in this matter should study the geography and the natural drawbacks and natural advantages of the respective ports of this country before deciding to bring pressure to bear on the Government to make contracts that would not be beneficial to the whole of Canada. In New Brunswick we do not seek to obtain any advantage or bring any pressure to bear on the Government of Canada that we cannot sustain by the advantages arising out of our port. We have these advantages; and if I did not think I would trespass upon the patience of the members of this House, I would take the opportunity of reading extracts from reports made by men who have made a special study of the subject and have set the advantages forth mathematically in such a way that no contradiction is possible. But I will be satisfied if hon. gentlemen will accept the statements I make. If they wish to have them verified they can read these reports from the boards of trade and insurance companies which have set forth the advantages of St. John as being a cheaper port to insure in than any other. Now all these things are great considerations before the people of Canada; because, after all, I hold it is the people of Canada who should decide this important matter. If the Government decide it, as we believe they have a right to decide it, in favour of the most important port and the one that will give the greatest advantages, we will not have a word to say and will feel that it is right, but if it is decided through certain influence, and through the neglect of certain gentlemen who ought to have an interest in this matter, we will feel aggrieved. I thought it my duty to bring these statements before you, and I hope the Government will give them careful consideration before making a contract with any company that will not do justice to the whole of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—No port has been decided upon up to this time. I have no doubt the Government will take everything into consideration and decide the matter in the best interests of the country.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The company will.

Hon. Mr CLEMOW—I am glad the Government have introduced this bill. I was surprised at the leader of the Opposition decrying the navigation of our own waters. It has been said that the St. Lawrence is the safest route of any. There have been no accidents there. It is also stated that the Allan line and other companies should have tendered for this service. They had every opportunity of doing so, but they have been a long time engaged in the business; they are tired of it and want other men to take hold. They had ample opportunity and why did they not do it? This everlasting decrying everything connected with the country is most astonishing to me. There certainly could be no great danger in navigating the St. Lawrence; it has been navigated in safety for a great many years. At first the Allan line did meet with some difficulty, owing to the fact that they placed men on board their steamers from sailing vessels who were not acquainted with the route, and they did meet with misfortunes, but for a great many years we have had no accidents on that route. I think this fast line will do more to advance the general interests of Canada than anything that has been accomplished in the past, except the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We heard the same exceptions taken, and the same opinions expressed regarding the possibility of the Canadian Pacific Railway being a success, but we know that that road has been a very great success. We know that all sorts of difficulties were pointed out during its construction, but the promoters proved themselves equal to the occasion and the road has made Canada what it is to-day, and with this fast line of steamers, we will be able to say that this country has the longest railway, the largest canals, and the best line of steamers, and that will be a grand thing for Canada. I have no doubt it will be successful as a financial undertaking. It will be impossible to foresee what it will accomplish. These men know what they are about, and they want no assistance from this Government except $750,000 a year. We are paying some $400,000 for a trifling service, and it does not end there. The post office authorities pay a large amount of money to the Cunard line and other lines in New York, and I believe we are paying more than the $750,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, that is absurd.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—However, I think the country can well afford to pay the $750,000. When this line is completed, passengers will travel by this fast line, and travellers going through the country will sail on our vessels, and we will reap great advantages. It has been a dream of mine that we should have this line, and now we will have it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Behold the dreamer!

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—When the Allan Line was commenced we thought it would not produce a revenue, but what has been the result? They have made money and now they can turn their steamers over to some other profitable employment, and I believe they will find it equally advantageous, but if they thought proper they might have tendered for this service, and I believe had they tendered they would have been given the preference over comparative strangers, but they did not desire it, and the Government are justified in taking the offer that is before them. I hope they will lose no time in carrying it out and give the country the benefit of the fast line across the Atlantic. Then, in conjunction with Pacific steamers and the Canadian Pacific Railway, we will have the greatest highway from east to west and should feel proud of it. I have never decried the country and never will, but there are men who decry the country all the time; not satisfied with decrying the country they now decry the waterways of the country, which is just as bad. I hope this service will be carried out with as little delay as possible.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It is quite evident that notwithstanding the strides of material progress which Canada has made, the people are not satisfied with what they have accomplished. It rejoices that at length we are likely to have a steamboat service on our Atlantic equal to the best, which is, as I believe, destined to be the Imperial highway and the basis of the hoped for Imperial unity. Mr. Hubbart's enterprise, courage and success in initiating the Australian service justifies the belief that we will have a service specially fitted for the carriage in a chilled state of such of our natural products as meat, butter, cheese, eggs and such perishable dairy and other products as our farmers produce. I am not going to discuss the merits of the different routes. That is not a question for us at present. I believe Quebec will be the summer port, but the terminus in winter is not determined upon. Whether it be the port which the hon. member from Montreal spoke of, which I am familiar with, or whether it be Halifax or St. John is not for us to determine now. The question for us to determine is whether it is in the interests of Canada. Is it in our interests as a part of the Empire? Are we going to be equal to the grand position we hold in the empire, to assist in consolidating it in the way this line will do? We have the Canadian Pacific Railway and we have to a large extent the communication on the Pacific, but we must admit that on the Atlantic we have made no progress at all for the last ten years. We are a progressive people, and are proud of a progressive Government. We must keep up with the progress of the age. Cheapness is not all important. Time is becoming a greater consideration, and good-enough won't do; even our go-ahead fishermen will have the fastest and the best crafts. I will assume that the people who undertake these enterprises know more about this matter than myself or the leader of the Opposition. Those who invest their money in such ventures are best capable of determining whether it is an enterprise in which they should embark their money or not, and I am not with any man who will stand up in the House and decry Canada or her interests. The leader of the Opposition has always been a pessimist. He prophesies its failure as he has done every great public undertaking; there is no better way for him to show how pure he is than by his falsely stating the dangers of our coasts and its approaches being beset by fogs and icebergs. He was so when the Canadian Pacific Railway was proposed, and I believe his object was to embarrass the Government. He said the road could not be built in forty years, that all the money of the British Empire could not build it; and he has since then become one of the most zealous advocates of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The capabilities of the Canadian Pacific Railway will not be fully realized until we have the whole connection from England through this great highway of ours across the Pacific to Australia, Japan and China and probably round the whole world. It may be the ultimate connection—and I believe it will be by the Suez Canal. Our people do not believe in standing still. We want something more. Some people say, "Oh, well, this is good enough," but we want the best of everything in competition with other countries. The benefit to the farmers alone will be equal to the subsidy, and the cash disbursements for coal, provisions and many other things necessary to be purchased at the maritime ports will be equal to the subsidy. I do not believe there is anything which will tend more to help us in developing this country, to boom the growth of Canada and stimulate trade, to make us the centre of this great empire. It not only helps the defences of England throughout her vast Empire in her armament and navy, but it is a source of great protection to us because we, by our geographical position, being the centre of the great organization of the empire, are made stronger and we centralize in ourselves all the power of the empire. No man having the ambition of a Canadian and the enterprise which every Canadian should have would be disposed to belittle his country to be first, last and always opposed to Canadian enterprise and progress. We know that boards of trade in Halifax and St. John and the people everywhere have been looking for this fast service. Why, even the Daily Telegraph of St. John, one of the leading organs of the Opposition, was ready two years ago to give up the Intercolonial Railway to a company that would accomplish this great work of giving us a fast line of steamers on the Atlantic. In every way it is for our interest. In Canada we are at the apex of civilization. The great advantages of Canada are becoming known throughout the world. We can see the interests of the British Empire centred in Canada. On the horizon we can see the great and boundless possibilities of the future expanding before us. We can see it in the delegates who met here from all parts of the empire and who looked upon this enterprise as of more than colonial importance. We can see the great advantages that are to accrue to Canada and we will not be satisfied until we have accomplished all that we are destined to become in the Empire.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a very important question although some hon. gentlemen seem to think it a light matter. We are asked to take a leap in the dark. The hon. Minister has not given the House the information we should have. One of the most vital points is what will the Government require the company to do. The hon. Minister has not vouchsafed to us much information on that point. All he told us was that the ships of the company should have a steaming capacity at sea of 20 knots. He has not stated what speed the agreement provides for, or that the agreement provides for any average length of a trip. I should like to know if the agreement does contain such a provision, because otherwise the fact that the company owns steamers which could make 20 knots in mid-ocean would not guarantee a fast service at all.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The provision is that the vessels should travel on the long course at 20 knots. If reference is made to the letters published by Mr. Huddart in The Times and which contain the terms of the agreement with the Government, it is to be a fast line, and every one knows that a fast line is steaming at 20 knots an hour at sea.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman evades the question. He says the vessels are to have a steaming capacity of 20 knots at sea. That is not the information that I want. We have a right to have the documents before us to see what the company undertake to do. The Government have no right to ask us to assent to this proposition until we know what the arrangements are.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Are the arrangements complete?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The documents have not been laid on the table of this House.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They have been handed to the clerk.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We should have them on the table of the House.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They were laid on the Table. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that they were not.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—We are speaking to the bill which is now before us and the bill reads that the government may enter into a contract. I say if they have already entered into a contract which they could place on the Table of the House, they are deceiving us. I do not believe they have; this bill is to give them the power to do so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think I have a fair comprehension of the English language, and I do not think the hon. Minister or any one else can say that I have ever been intentionally rude to any member in this House. I said the papers were not on the Table of the House.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I say they have been placed there.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When the Minister said the Clerk probably had them, I said that that was not satisfactory to me. The information is not here. We are asked to assent to a vote of $750,000 a year towards an undertaking the nature of which we do not know. There has been no contract signed, I presume, but surely there must have been an offer made by the party who proposes to make the contract. I understand that in the other House the offer was submitted, and it should be laid before us here. It is a matter of vital importance whether the company is to average 20 knots an hour on the passage or not. The company, even if the vessel is capable of making a speed in mid-ocean of 20 knots, does not give us a guarantee of a much better service than we have now. I am satisfied that the present lines would be willing to guarantee an average of 17 knots in mid-ocean for a subsidy of $500,000, and if we are going to vote a quarter of a million dollars more, we should have a guarantee that we are going to get something for the additional sum. That is a perfectly reasonable thing. We ought to do business like business-like men, and no business man going into an undertaking of this sort, would be satisfied with language like this, that the steamers should be capable of making 20 knots. If we are to have a fast line we must have a guarantee that the vessels should make the average time from port to port of 20 knots.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—There is nothing in the bill about 20 knots.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I know there is not, but the thing is predicated on the line making 20 knots, and if we are not to have a 20 knot service, there is no foundation for the subsidy at all. What was the argument that my honourable friend from Rideau used to induce the House to assent to this proposition? He said let us do this, and we shall have not only the longest railway in the world, the biggest canals in the world, but the fastest steamships in the world. All these things are very fine, but they do not put a great deal of money into the average taxpayer's pocket. I was reminded by the hon. gentleman's remarks of something O'Connell once said which elicited tremendous cheers. At one of those open air meetings which O'Connell occasionally held a stranger was present to whom O'Connell said he would say something that would bring forth the greatest cheers that this stranger had ever heard. He stood upon the platform and spoke three sentences the last of which was, "Your hills and your people are the greenest in the world." The crowd shouted "Hear, hear! We are, we are." Although the hon. gentleman's colour is not green he wants us to cheer because our railways are the longest and our canals the largest in the world, but that is not business. We are talking about voting seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year subsidy to a fast line of steamers, and the height of our mountains and the length of our rivers and railways has very little to do with that. This transatlantic service has a long history in Canada. While the Intercolonial delegates were here we celebrated the fact that the first steamship which crossed the Atlantic propelled solely by steam, hailed from the port of Quebec. The first steamship company which established a regular service across the Atlantic, the Cunard line, was a Nova Scotian company. From about 1840, when the Cunard line was established, to the present day very large sums of Canadian capital have been invested in steam communication with the mother country. At the present day there are half a dozen Canadian lines. There are two or three very well known and important lines, particularly the Allan line and the Dominion line. It has been said that there was a great demand for this fast service. I am not aware that there was a great demand on the part of the country for it. When word went out that the Government proposed to increase the subsidy there were demands from certain places that those places should be made the terminal ports of the line when established, but I am not aware that there has been any demand from the people of this country for this fast service for which an immense subsidy is to be voted. No evidence has been furnished to this House that there has been any such demand. We are in this position, we have existing lines. The principal object, one would suppose, in establishing very superior steamship communication with the mother country, would be the carrying of our products to that market in the most satisfactory and the cheapest way, and bringing back goods from the mother country promptly and at reasonable rates of freight. Is this proposed line required for that purpose, or if we had it would it supply that want? Every one knows that although people talk about these greyhounds carrying an immense quantity of freight, the lines which run from New York, where there is the greatest inducement to carry freight and where there is a great quantity of freight to be found, do not carry over a thousand tons of freight each. They would do it, but you cannot combine speed with a capacity to carry a large amount of freight. The people engaged in the business, whose interest it is to combine speed and freight capacity, have never yet been able to do it. You cannot combine very great speed with very large freight accommodation. As a matter of fact, there has not been sufficient freight of the character required to enable the Allan and Dominion lines to do a profitable business for the last few years. Their business just now is not a profitable one. The hon. gentleman from Rideau division said that the members of the Allan company had become old men and that they felt like leaving the business to younger people. It is not improbable that the Allans would be willing to sell out if they got a good price, for the reason that their business does not pay as well as it did. If, with all their experience, they cannot make the business pay, it does not seem to me to be reasonable that Mr. Huddart, who knows nothing whatever about the business of Canada, is likely to make the business pay in the way of freight. As to the other question of mails and passengers I shall say something later. There has been a good deal said about cold storage. The owners of the existing lines say that they fitted up some of their ships for cold storage, and that they did not get sufficient freight to send over, so that there is very little in the talk about cold storage. There is this feeling, no doubt, that while our steamships of twenty or twenty-five years ago, were pretty nearly up to the proper standard, of late years the advance elsewhere has been considerable, and our lines have stood still, and we should have a quicker service for passengers and mails. With a view of securing that quicker service, we passed an Act in 1889 which this bill before the House is intended to amend. I think probably we acted wisely in offering an additional sum in order to secure a better service. I said when that subsidy measure was going through this House that we made a mistake in the terms of that offer, that we left it open to the Government, as it is left open in this case, to fix the rate of speed. There was an understanding then that the speed should be 20 knots, as there is now. At that time had it been understood that a service of 16 or 17 knots would have been sufficient, we should have had such a service between Montreal and Liverpool during the last three years. One of the conditions imposed by the Act of 1889, and which is continued in the measure before the House, is this, that there shall be a fast weekly steamship service between Canada and the United Kingdom, making connection with a French port I believe that that provision, which was objected to by some members of this House when the measure of 1889 was going through, is one of the things which helped to prevent any contract being made. I am not saying anything now as to the desirability of a connection with France. It is a very desirable thing that we should have steamship communication with France, but the misfortune with that measure and this measure is that both of them combine two things which are incompatible one with the other. If this steamship line is to call at a French port before going to an English port, then there cannot be a fast line—I mean you cannot get the quickest communication between England and Canada and you cannot compete with the New York service. On the other hand, if the steamships go to England first and then there is a cross-line from the English port to a French port, freight carried by that route would as has been stated by the Minister of Finance within the last two or three days, be subject to the surtaxe. So the conditions contained in this measure are incompatible with a satisfactory service. The result has been seen. The conditions imposed by the Government were such that during the five years which have elapsed since the passage of that measure, no Canadian company has been in a position to take advantage of its terms, and up to the present time no other company has taken it up. One would think that the reasonable thing for a country like Canada, with a population of 5,000,000 and not a very wealthy population, finding that its transatlantic mail service was not quite up to the proper standard, would have been to have secured a greater speed within a reasonable limit, but we have not been content to do that. If we had done so in 1889, this country for the last three or four years might have been enjoying a much better service than it has had. It has been stated positively time and again that the $500,000 per year would have secured a service of 16 or 17 knots from one of the existing Canadian steamship companies. I think to-day that that would be the wisest course to pursue. We could have had a guarantee of an average speed, something better than an undertaking that the vessels would be able to make 20 knots on the ocean.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—The suggestion of the hon. gentleman reminds one of the man who owns a horse that is just fast enough to lose all the races. That is the position we would be landed in.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not really see the point. We are not racing. We were not talking about horse racing, or about steamship racing. We want to get a thing which will suit us; a thing which suits New York will not necessarily suit us.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We want the fastest and the best to satisfy us.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This would have been a much better service for this country and carried more passengers and larger quantities of freight at reasonable rates. We might have had that service for the subsidy which we offered, and we have not got it, and now we are asked, without any guarantee that these steamers will make this average speed of 20-knots, to vote $750,000, which we know cannot go to any Canadian concern. I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen who have for years been advocating the National Policy on the ground that we ought to help our own people and do everything we can to further and improve our native industries, can come down to this Parliament with a measure which is intended to strike a deadly blow at one of the most important industries of Canada. Hon. gentlemen may laugh; is it not stated by the owners of these lines, that if this subsidy is granted to Mr. Huddart's line it will be a very serious, almost a deadly blow to their business, which at the present time is not a paying business?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We must consider the interests of the whole of Canada, and not of any one company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When it is a question of developing the interests of some cotton mill or sugar refinery, hon. gentlemen do not tell us that we must look to the interests of the whole people of Canada, If we looked at the interests of the whole people of Canada, the vast majority of whom are consumers, we would not have the high duties on the clothes that the people wear. The national policy is that you shall build up Canadian industries. I say that those steamship lines are one of the most important of all Canadian industries, and we are asked here to take money out of the treasury for the purpose of destroying those industries. If that is not an inconsistency on the part of hon. gentlemen who advocate the National Policy then I do not know an inconsistency when I see it.

Hon. Mr. PRICE—The Allan line is not owned in Canada.

Hon Mr. POWER—Some of the owners are not in Canada, but the head office is and some of the owners are here. Some of the owners are in Scotland.

Hon. Mr. PRICE—Largely.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, and I believe it is the case with the Dominion line, but the head offices are here and some of the partners are here. I imagine that a good many of the stockholders in the alleged Canadian industries that we have heard so much about, do not live in Canada. I happen to know with regard to the Cordage Company that a great many of the shareholders who control it live in the United States.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It shows what confidence they have in Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman may have confidence in them, but I do not think I am expected to show the same confidence in everything he says. I have been betrayed, perhaps, into just a little more warmth than I should have shown, but it is one of those things that are calculated to stir one's blood. The hon. Minister undertook to give us evidence that this would be a paying enterprise. He asks this question —will this be a paying enterprise? He answers the question in the affirmative. It is a very singular thing that although this offer of $500,000 has been before the world for five years, no one has attempted to take it up. It is understood that the offer of $750,000 has been before the steamship people for several months but none of them have as yet taken hold of it. All we know is this, Mr. Huddart, who I believe is not a man who controls a vast amount of capital, has been negotiating with parties in the old country, as the Government had negotiated fruitlessly before, and I think probable his negotiations will be in the end as fruitless as those of the Government were. He has been negotiating with steamship people and up to the present time has not succeeded in getting any one to undertake to carry out this enterprise. That is the best evidence that the enterprise is not a paying one. Money is not scarce in England at the present time, and has not been for some time. The only witness the hon. gentleman brought forward to prove that this would be a paying enterprise was the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. When it is a question of entering into an expenditure of several millions of dollars, and you have to rely on the evidence of outside parties to judge whether that step is to be a wise one or not, I think we ought to have disinterested witnesses. If there is a man in all Canada who is interested in having this line established it is the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Whatever effect the increase in the number of passengers may have, and even the speedier carriage of the mails, on the rest of the country, there is no doubt it will be a benefit to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Their through passenger traffic will be increased, and the quantity of mail matter carried will be increased, but I do not think there is a great deal for Canada in that, and for that reason we should not be governed very materially by Sir William Van Horne's opinion. Hon. gentlemen will remember that we are asked to make this vast increase to our expenditure just at a time when our revenue is falling. The revenue during the year which has just expired was about $2,000,000 less than the year before, and the revenue for the current year will be considerably less. When the country is threatened with a deficit is not a time to cheerfully undertake an enterprise of this kind, unless it is absolutely necessary. I have not said anything about the difficulties of the Canadian route, but I do not think there is any reason why, when one is talking of a business matter, he should not talk of it in a business way. Why should we ignore the difficulties which exist?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We will scare capitalists from going into it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Capitalists are not like my hon. friend. As a general thing, before capitalists undertake to invest money they inform themselves as to the investment. They do not take what my hon. friend says, or what I say, as evidence. They inquire for themselves and ascertain the facts. Is it not known in the first place that you cannot run steamships up the St. Lawrence during the winter months? Is not that admitted? Is it looked upon as running down the country to admit that well known fact?

Now, that is business, and it is a very important fact in this matter, because it means that the company, if one is found (and it is one thing which would make it more difficult to get a company) cannot have the same terminus all the year round—that is unless the people of the upper provinces are satisfied that the terminus during the whole year shall be in the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I knew the hon. gentleman would say no. There must be two termini. With respect to the difference between St. John, Halifax, Terminal City and Louisburg, that is a matter which can safely be left to the company that is to perform the service. They will naturally select the best port, and they should be allowed to do it. The passage through the Straits of Belle Isle is a very dangerous passage at certain periods of the year. The Gulf of St. Lawrence is well lighted now, as it was not some years ago; and shipwrecks do not occur in any considerable number. When steamers come through the Straits of Belle Isle and strike fogs or encounter ice, they have to slow down. They have to do so, and your ocean greyhound has to slow down like an ordinary steamer.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have taken that into account.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In going to St. John and Halifax, they will have difficulties to encounter. The greyhounds running to New York keep at least 150 miles south of the ordinary route of steamship travel, and in that way escape a great part of the fog and run little risk from icebergs. So we have to look at the facts as they are.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That is for the company to look at, not for us.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Certainly, but we have to consider the difficulties in the way. There is just one observation which I should like to make. I made an appeal here the other day for aid to a railway line which I stated would benefit a large part of the province of Nova Scotia, particularly the city and county of Halifax. All that was asked to secure the construction of that line was a total grant of something less than $200,000. The Government felt that the finances of the country were not in such a condition as to allow them to make that grant. I presume that is the ground taken. I have no hesitation in saying that the construction of that road would do infinitely more good to the city of Halifax than even becoming the terminus of this fast line during a portion of the year, if this fast line be established, because the thing which benefits a place most is not passengers and mails. A railway would bring freight into the city, and would bring people who wanted to buy and sell, and this fast line would bring neither freight nor people who wanted to buy and sell; it would simply bring mails and passengers who would pass through leaving very little money in Halifax, and to my mind it is a great deal better for the city of Halifax that the present steamers which call and bring considerable quantities of freight should continue to do so, than that the greyhounds should come there which bring almost no freight.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I wish to say one word of explanation in relation to an interruption which took place when the hon. member from Halifax was speaking. I said that I had laid on the Table of the House the papers in connection with this bill and in connection with the transactions that the Government have had with Mr. Huddart. I repeat the statement: several days ago I brought down the papers and put them on the Table of the House, and I see them now scattered there. The hon. gentleman could have obtained them at any time and not put himself in the position of contradicting the statement I made, which was true.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said they were not on the Table, and they are not visible on the Table.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—When a member says in this House that the papers have been brought down and put on the Table, does it mean that they have been put under his nose or communicated to the House? Hon. gentlemen, I refuse to accept such an excuse. Now, the plea which has been made before us here, is a plea of the Allan and the Dominion lines, and the other companies of the St. Lawrence. What we have read in the papers concerning this enterprise, that the people would lose their money, that there is no trade for them, and that the enterprise can not be successful, we have heard to-day from the mouth of the hon. gentleman opposite. Had the hon. member from Halifax been the solicitor for those opposing interests, he could not have made a plea more in keeping with what they have published in the papers. Is the Government doing an injustice to those companies? Did we not give them the opportunity of entering into this enterprise? More than five years ago the contract was open to them. They made proposals to give us a service of 16, 17 and 19 knots on one occasion, but what did they want? Not $500,000, not $750,000, but over a million dollars of a subsidy. It has been said that we neglected to give sufficient information. The papers have been laid on the Table of the House and everybody knows the facts. It is intended to build four steamships for the Atlantic service with a tonage of between 10 and 11,000 tons and with a sea speed of 20 knots. To men engaged in shipping matters, what is meant by that? Could anybody be justified in taking refuge, as was done a minute ago, in the excuse that the document is not on the Table of the House. When you say, "with a sea speed of 20 knots," and when you speak of a swift line, there is no intention of having that speed reduced. But it would mean that we desired to make the Canadian line the swiftest, and, I may say, the safest in the world. Now, it has been stated that we have not the safest route. I am not going into details; everybody has read the debate in the House of Commons, and everybody familiar with the St. Lawrence knows how it has been described as to its safety. More than ninety lights have been put in the St. Lawrence from the entrance to the Gulf to Quebec, and, as I said before, when you lose a light astern you have a light on the bow. This has had a result on the navigation of the St. Lawrence which is more eloquent than the denial of the hon. member from Halifax; it is that for the last twenty years not one mail steamer has been wrecked in the St. Lawrence. It was stated in the other House, everybody knew of it, but nobody pointed it out here until we were forced to do so as a rebuttal of the calumnies directed against the safety of the route.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman refers to me, I beg to call him to order. I never said it was dangerous. The hon. gentleman has no right to put words in my mouth which I did not utter. I said they would have to slow up going through the Straits of Belle Isle and other places where there were fogs and where there was ice. The hon. gentleman might answer my argument.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman has enough to be responsible for without putting anything in his mouth. It was stated that the St. Lawrence was dangerous and you had to slacken speed near shore, and when I gave the figures of the time which would be made on this route I deducted so many hours upon every day to allow for nearing the land on this side and nearing the land on the other side; so that the argument is of no value at all. Now it has been said that nobody will take up this offer. If every public man in this country were to cry down this enterprise and to say that no money could be profitably invested in the Atlantic service of Canada, if the legislation were opposed in such a way as to make it unsuccessful, undoubtedly, the gentlemen interested in promoting this scheme would not succeed. But so far, although the subsidy is not authorized yet by Parliament, Mr. Sexton White, the eminent Naval Architect, recently General Manager of the Fairfield Ship Building Company, who designed the "Lucania" and "Campania," the designer for the Cunard line, has undertaken to design and superintend the building of these steamships, and Mr. Sexton White has already prepared plans and specifications, and tenders have been received by us, for the four Atlantic steamships. That is evidence of some important step being taken. Now will anybody connected with business undertake to find the capital of two million pounds before being quite sure that the Parliament of Canada will vote the subsidy? Nobody would undertake it. The hon. gentleman who spoke of getting aid for a railway line a minute ago, has not even had the courage to spend $100 to incorporate a company so as to be in a position to come before Parliament and ask a subsidy. He would like us to give him a subsidy for the road, although there is no company formed.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No survey ever made.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Excuse me, there was a survey.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I do not look on this question as being so important as do the hon. gentlemen on the other side. The Government simply ask you to intrust them with an additional sum of $250,000 more than you have already granted for the purpose, to enable them to make a contract for a fast line of steamers between the old country and Canada. The Government has had the power for the last five years, and $500,000 has been offered to any individuals or company that would undertake the service, and no company has been found willing to undertake it for that amount of money. The Government do not ask this House to lay down hard and fast rules and bind this country to this extra $250,000 making in all $750,000 per annum, unless in their judgment they can have a good and sufficient bargain with a company or individual who can give them a service equal to what they desire. There is no use, in my opinion, in getting a medium speed. The hon. gentleman from Halifax says that sixteen knots an hour would be sufficient. That would never meet the requirements to compete with our neighbours across the line. If we want any service at all, we want a service that will be from nineteen to twenty knots an hour, and I am quite satisfied that that is what the Government have had in their minds for a number of years. Now all they ask you to do is simply to give them this additional power beyond what you have already granted them. It does not bind the country; unless they get a contract, and good security when they are going to sign a contract that they will have the service, they will be as they have been for the last five years and not complete any contract until they get sufficient security for the money we are about to grant here to-day.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—If they do not give you the service they do not get the money.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—If they do do not get the necessary security and the ships guaranteed to go a certain speed in mid-ocean, they will not get the money. We do not suppose any man living can expect a ship coming close to shore to run at as high a speed as she would in the middle of the Atlantic, but simply at a reasonable speed. The reasonable time for her passage, say 5½ days between the old world and Canada, would be satisfactory to most people. I do not look upon this at all as voting away the money. It may never be used, because unless the Government are enabled to accomplish what they desire they will not go into a contract at all. Everything has a beginning and Mr. Huddart is endeavouring to raise the capital before anything of this kind can be accomplished. He may accomplish that and he may not. If he does not succeed, the Canadian Government will not sign any contract whatever, but they are anxious, if they can, to put our country on a par with our neighbours across the line. The hon. gentleman from Halifax should be delighted to think that Canada would make an effort to run steamers during the winter into the port where he belongs. If I lived down there I would certainly be anxious to see it, if we had a reasonable bargain and would receive reasonable value for the money invested.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—But you cannot expect the hon. gentleman to approve of anything we propose here. It is not his nature to do so.

Hon. Mr POWER—I approve of numbers of things.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—He wants to oppose and hold down anything that we would suggest, and if we would retire and let him come over here, his party would do everything right. They told us the same story when we were discussing the Canadian Pacific Railroad—that gigantic road which is a credit to Canada. At every step they told us we were wrong. They told us we had no right to build the road all the way, that we should build sections of it and take advantage of the water courses, and in the winter we could cross on the ice. That was their scheme. The fact of it is, they did not know how to build that road, and when men undertook to complete it and put it through as one of the greatest enterprises the world has ever seen, they condemned it at every step, and now, when the Government of this country graciously and wisely has held off this matter waiting for better terms, waiting for more security, waiting for more capitalists to come forward and make these offers, the Opposition condemn us step by step. Can we propose anything that those hon. gentlemen will agree here to-day? We do not want you to agree to a hard and fast contract. We say leave it to the Government. That is all we ask and if we can arrange with a proper man and obtain the proper vessels and the proper security, then we ask you to give us power to grant $750,000 per annum for 10 years. That is the bargain. If the Government do not get that they will make no contract, and I question very much now, for some years to come, if capitalists will come forward and offer to do it for that money. So therefore the hon. gentleman from Halifax should not be so afraid of giving the power we ask for, simply to add $250,000 per annum, for 10 years, more than you have already been willing they should spend, and give them the power to start a fast line instead of a slow line half freight and half passengers. Let us have it one way or the other, and when a gentleman from this country wants to go home to England he may as well take our own route, and reach destination in good time. Our steamers are to have a speed of 20 knots an hour, and be equal to the best vessels that run from New York. We have drawbacks, but we are trying to meet those drawbacks and place it at a lower port in the winter and further up stream in the summer, and if all these things are taken into consideration, I do not think we should cry down the scheme. We ought to give it a fair trial, and I am sure the Government will not commit the country to that amount of money per annum unless they see that it will benefit Canada.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—The question is whether this is the shortest way between Chicago and Great Britain by rail and by steamer?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Then, it being the shortest route, it will command the traffic, if we provide the accommodation. We all know in the present age that it is the accommodation that induces people to travel; it is the convenience and the ease and comfort that you give them. Twenty-five years ago I was discussing the subject with a railway man in England, and he drew my attention to this matter. Now, he said, eventually, if your line is the shortest route between Chicago and Great Britain, you will take the traffic.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And the fastest?

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—No, it does not make so much difference whether the voyage by sea takes more time or not; the shortest route will command the traffic, the conveniences being the same. The next consideration is whether this line is in the interest of the producers of the country. After thinking this matter over, I say that this service is in their interest. Many perishable products will get to a good market if they can be got there expeditiously, and in connection with that it should be the duty of the Government to see that there is a fast refrigerator service to meet the steamers at every trip, so that the goods can be brought to the market in good condition. I have great pleasure in supporting this expenditure in the interests of the producers of this country.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—In the absence of the member for Rideau, the hon. member from Halifax took occasion to administer what I suppose he deemed a very severe rejoinder to the speech of that hon. gentleman, and he illustrated his remarks by an anecdote about O'Connell. I have simply to say that it were well for the hon. member from Halifax and the party with which he is associated, if they had a little more of the spirit of true Canadian enterprise and pluck which stood out in every word of my hon. friend's remarks. The hon. member from Ottawa at one time criticized the position that the Government took with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and yet despite all the opposition of those hon. gentlemen, that road has become a success, and the credit of it is due to this side of the House. It seems to me that there is a sort of missing link if we do not establish this fast line at the other end and have rapid transit between Canada and Europe. I will conclude by expressing a wish that comes from the heart: I hope, in the good providence of God, that the hon. member from Halifax may be spared to see the successful completion of this enterprise.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I generally agree with everything that falls from the hon. member from Toronto. I have had much pleasure in listening to him this evening, and I fully agree with most of his remarks. However, it is well in undertaking such a vast enterprise as this, involving the annual tax of three-quarter million on this country, to be cautious and to put on the brakes lightly, to warn the Government so that everything will be done properly. I think we are safe to leave the matter in their hands, with the assurance that they will see that every precaution is taken in regard to the interests of the country. I believe they would take extreme caution, but if we allowed the matter to go through without any opposition whatever, the Government would say, "All are in favour of it; the supporters of the Government and the opponents also are equally in favour of it." With reference to the suggested advantage to be derived by refrigerators for the perishable goods, I think there is nothing in that whatever. There may be something, however, in the argument as to the fast service between Australia and England, but if the saving of time between Australia and England is only two days over the Suez route, it is not adequate. I say more is required. Something, however, may be accomplished in that line. When you once freeze meats or eatables it makes very little difference whether they stay frozen one week or one month. All that is involved is the interest on the money for that extra forty-eight hours, which really amounts to nothing. And again, when you get a 20 knot service, you must consider that there is very little space in the steamer for anything besides coal and passengers, so that as a means of developing the resources of the country, there is little or nothing in it. Now, I wish to see what could be gained. If nothing is to be gained, or very little, we should take more time. There is another matter to be considered, that the developments of steam have been so great in the last few years that every company is cautious about making investments, because what is very good to-day may be of very little use five years hence. There was a great improvement when they put triple expansion engines in their boats, and these boats are capable of carrying only their passengers and their coal. Referring to the Cunards, I think they were the pioneers of this whole ocean service. Cunard was a Canadian and resided in Canada for a long time. Mr. William Cunard himself was a native of New Brunswick, and the Cunards know Canada just as well as you and I do. They have had the experience; they inaugurated their line with Halifax, for the reason that they had to carry so much coal in proportion to the size of their ships that they had to make the nearest possible point. Why did they leave Halifax and go to New York? Why have the Cunards not come forward and offered to re-establish their old route and run the fast steamers to Halifax? We have talked about it. I have mentioned it to them repeatedly. Now, would it not be natural to suppose that if there was a great deal of money in this enterprise they would embark in it? However, there is very little to be said about that, because we do not know that any people are going to embark in it. This line is intended to carry passengers quickly across the Atlantic. Is the farmer or the agriculturist of this country to be compelled to pay any portion of my passage to the old country? I think not. Then it is said we are going to make Canada the greatest country in the world. That is right enough, but you should be cautious. What else are you going to do? You are going to get a quick service. We have just as good a service as our neighbours across the line, because within a few hours after they get the mail it is delivered to us. It is not a 20 knot service they have; it is a 23 knot service and that service is not their own: they are all English lines except a few Inman boats. They are away behind, and the Cunard and the White Star Lines are in advance of them. So what are we competing with? We are competing with our own friends on the other side of the Atlantic, who really control the whole of the steamers on the Atlantic. I say we want nothing more. We have got a good service. The cables have superseded the mail service, and the mail service is a matter of secondary consideration to every business man in this country. Since I came into this House I have received two cables and I know what is going on on the other side of the Atlantic and what I have to prepare for. It is a matter of no importance to ordinary business men whether they open their letters in the morning or at night, because they generally know all about the matters before hand by cable. I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 6 p.m.

OCEAN STEAMSHIP SUBSIDIES BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL resumed his speech. He said: My only object in the remarks I have made is to advise extreme caution on this matter, and I am perfectly sure that the Government will use all due precaution. At the same time, I think it is well for those who think they are conversant with the subject to give the Government the benefit of their advice if they think they have any worth giving. In speaking of these steamers, they are referred to as vessels capable of making 20 knots. I suppose we all have an idea what that means. It means an immense consumption of coal, and it also means that those vessels will be able to make the voyage in about five days. Suppose this service is reduced to 18 knots and makes the trip in five and a-half days—I do not say it will be done—it would save at least $500 per day.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—More than that.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I am putting it very moderately. Suppose they reduce it to 16 knots and make the voyage in six days, then the saving will be from one to two thousand dollars a day. The inducement is very strong in the company to reduce the speed and save this large sum of money. Again, this means high prices for everything connected with the service. It means high rates for freight to all who use the steamers. Fast steamers can carry but a small amount of freight. In the pioneer days of steam, the boats were limited as to time, and it proved so disastrous that the Government very justly had to abandon it. The loss of life and property were enormous. Again, it is all very well to say that we should not deny our own country but you must remember that the world sees Canada just as we do. They know the rigours of the climate that we have to contend with, and they know our coast just as well as we do. All these facts are discounted in the markets of the world. On the first day of August the insurance on the whole of the Gulf and the River St. Lawrence doubles. I know it to my sorrow, and it is one of the things worrying me more than anything else that the first of August is so near and the insurance will be doubled on every cargo crossing the Atlantic. Ten days afterwards it increases again, and on the 30th August again. Every ten days from now to November there is an increase in the rates of insurance until they got up last fall to 18 per cent in October for cargoes going into our Gulf. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact. It is the result of the geographical position of our country, and to recognize the fact only denotes that we are careful in studying the position that we occupy. It does not injure the country, because the facts are well known. You cannot overlook the fact that in the winter season the passenger traffic will fall off. I am an old traveller. I crossed the Atlantic in thirty days, and I have coached it from Portland up to Aroostook, and had to get out on the hills and help to push the coach up the grades. When you take the route from New York, a few hours after leaving port you cross the Gulf Stream and you are in pleasant weather, as a rule. As people begin to get old they feel the advantage of that. To get aboard a steamer and in four or five hours to get into mild weather is an advantage which cannot be expected by those who take our route. Again, there is another advantage which the lines to the south of us have. These ocean greyhounds that sail from the port of New York have a fixed track, and the steamer which goes from Liverpool to New York does not go within a hundred miles of the one from New York to Liverpool. The one is that far south of the other. All they have to fear is vessels coming up from the south crossing their tracks, which can be guarded against at any time. I will not occupy the time of this House any further, but I think it is not the duty of any hon. gentleman here to shut his eyes to any drawback that our country possesses. By shutting our eyes we cannot make the world shut its eyes, and if we enter upon any large undertaking I believe it is the duty of every hon. gentleman to look at it fairly and squarely, to see exactly the position we are in, and give the best advice we can to the Government. I am satisfied to leave it in the hands of the Government, but at the same time I felt called upon to show that it is not all plain sailing—that it is anything but plain sailing. In the first place, it is not plain to make a contract with such a company with any idea that it will be carried out to the letter, and after the contract is made and all the preliminaries are arranged, there will be immense difficulties afterwards in seeing them carried to a successful issue.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I had no intention of troubling the House with anything but a few casual remarks on this question, but after listening to the eloquent speech that we have just heard it strikes me as a matter of special wonderment that this poor country, labouring under all the physical disabilities that have been set before us, has managed to exist to the present time. One would imagine that no steamboats could ever navigate the St. Lawrence, that no ship had ever reached the inhospitable shores of this country, and when I see, among others, the hon. member from Halifax looking on with a pleased expression when his own port was, I think I am entitled to say, vilified, it excites special wonder at the exigencies which party demands from its followers. The truth is that when one listens to the speeches from the hon. members from Ottawa and Halifax and the hon. gentleman from Chatham, one is sorry for them. The whole burden of their song is and must continue to be apparently a jeremiad from beginning to end. It was put very fairly to them by the hon. knight from Toronto when he said that they had to find fault with the Government whatever they did. Their conduct reminds me of a story of a man who demanded information of a native as to which of two roads he should take to reach a certain place. He got the following reply: "Well, stranger, you can take either road you like, but whichever road you take you will wish you had taken the other one." These gentlemen are bound, in their loyalty to their own party, to be constantly depreciating the efforts of the Government in whatever direction they go. To my mind we have a plain business proposition before us—here is an Act which has stood on our Statute-books for five years offering a subsidy of $500,000 for a certain service. The Government found that it would not work—that it is not sufficient. They are assured on every hand that it is not enough. The country has never, apparently, recorded a change of sentiment upon the propriety of offering $500,000, and now we are called upon to determine whether, failing to carry out our purpose with $500,000, we shall increase our efforts and try it again. That seems to be the natural business course to be pursued by any body of men. We have on the table of the Senate, and I have read them, representations from nearly all the commercial bodies in the country demanding a fast line. I think that the objections which have been raised to it and the attempts made to belittle the consequences of it, are entirely fallacious. It is a matter of fact, which will not be denied by anybody, that a very large proportion of those who travel and traverse the ocean to Europe at the present moment do choose to go to New York, because they can find a more expeditious service from that port than we can offer them. There is not the slightest question that the bulk of the ships which now navigate the St. Lawrence are old and under power. They occupy too much of the time of business men. The proof of the pudding is the eating thereof—it cannot be denied that the bulk of men who traverse the ocean for business purposes choose the New York route. Now, what are the chances for a line of suitable steamers coming from Quebec or Montreal? Granted, to start with, that in a big port like New York, which is always open to the ocean, there are always enormous physical advantages at its command, but the disadvantages which meet you and me when we approach the port of New York are not to be sneezed at. We are detained at quarantine all night. We are uncertain at what hour we will be allowed to land. We do not know when we will get a train to carry us to our destination. The chances are we will miss a train and have to lie over. At any rate, no man can land in New York and get to the car with his baggage without the expenditure of a good round sum. If this enterprise of a fast ocean line is carried to a successful consummation, and if the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway find it—as they certainly will—to their interest to vie with each other in offering facilities for the transit of passengers and luggage, without doubt on the landing at Quebec or Montreal or Halifax the transfer will be made quickly and cheaply, as far as the passengers going to the western ports of the United States are concerned, and without trouble about their baggage at all. I venture to say that if there be a fast line inaugurated, it will command an enormous traffic from that circumstance alone. Now what is to hinder these boats to be successful? It has been said, and said with a certain amount of truth, that these fast boats could only carry a limited amount of freight. Granted. That is in its essence perfectly true. The trend of modern business of late years has been to separate somewhat sharply the carrying of heavy freights and of passengers, and the White Star Company, which has been in the van in all matters concerning ocean traffic, for many a day now has changed considerably the type of vessel which carries freight, and has introduced vessels of a considerable tonnage, considerable speed and with enormous carrying capacity. The hon. member from Halifax said that the main object of this proposal of the Government, if it had any object at all, was to transfer from here to the markets the products of this country at a cheap rate. That is not it at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What I said was that I thought that should be the object in the interest of the country.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I differ sharply from the hon. gentleman on that point, for I say that that is not the point. The object is mainly to carry light freight, passengers and mails.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—And perishable goods.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—And perishable goods. With regard to perishable goods, a total misstatement of the facts has been made, unintentionally no doubt, by the hon. gentleman from Chatham. He said freeze those perishable goods, and it makes no difference if they are frozen for a week or a month: but they are not frozen. The object is not to freeze them, but to carry them in cold compartments rapidly to market, and fresh butter, eggs and fruit can be carried—a thousand things can be carried under those circumstances to market.

Hon. Mr. COCHRANE—Do not forget dressed beef.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—And dressed beef. The question is not keeping it five or ten days in a frozen condition, but to keep perishable articles without freezing, and to carry them to market without impairing their quality. These ships will carry a large quantity of such freight, and carry it cheaply, because they will really have their returns upon the passenger traffic and the subsidy for carrying the mails, and will be able to enter into competition with freight carriers on good terms for such freight.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is it not a fact that perishable goods are brought from South America and Australia to England?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Certainly in cold storage rooms, but I never heard that they were improved by the length of the passage from South America and Australia. I say they are impaired by the length of time they are kept, and the more rapid the transit the better. I do not, of course, attribute motives to anybody, but it did strike me, when I was listening to the hon. gentleman from Chatham, that he was arguing as much in the interest of companies that did not desire to take up the subsidy as anything else, and without pressing that point I would remark upon the speech of the hon. gentleman from Halifax to this extent—I had just been reading the Hansard of the House of Commons and, with all submission and respect, I think we have in his remarks an echo of the proceedings in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not read one of the speeches delivered in the House of Commons on this subject, and have not heard any of them.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Then it is another illustration of the fact that great wits jump together.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The facts are the same in the House of Commons as here.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—No doubt about it, but every one seemed to miss one point except the hon. gentleman himself. After dwelling, as was done elsewhere, on the dangers of fogs and rocks and all that sort of thing, which we have heard ad nauseam, the hon. gentleman endeavoured to elicit from the leader of the House an assurance upon the question of the speed of those vessels. There is a vast difference between specifying that the ships shall have a sea speed of 20 knots and making a contract whereby those ships shall keep up 20 knots throughout their voyage. If there be fogs in the Gulf—as who denies it—if there be a lee shore in the St. Lawrence on both sides, which nobody can deny, it would be little short of madness to make in any contract a condition as to the maintenance of speed. As a business man, if I were asked "what would you do under those circumstances," I would say I do not know until it came up, but I am obliged to say to the Government that the framing of such a contract as devolves upon them in the event of a favourable tender being made, is a matter which will require their most careful consideration, for this reason. If, on the one hand, you offer a premium for a short voyage, or you require an average speed, what do you entail upon the ship master? To crack on in season and out of season, in fogs, in darkness, in drifting rains, and everything of the kind, than which no more fatal error could be made by anybody, whatever position he occupies. On the other hand, if you fail to make conditions implying that when the circumstances are favourable you shall have a speed of 20 knots, then you offer a premium—and according to the swiftness of those boats it is multiplied ten-fold—which is to economize coal, to go at a jog across the Atlantic when they might be running fast. No one has crossed the ocean without realizing this fact, that while at times he could wish that the greatest caution and discretion and the slowest speed to be the order of the day, many and many a day occurs when he wishes he could go 100 knots an hour and might do it with perfect safety. The hon. gentleman and those who spoke against this line are probably aware of the fact that if you have a speed of 20 knots you can go at 10, but if 10 knots is your maximum speed, you cannot go faster. So the fast boat does not necessarily go 20 knots an hour all the time, and in fact it would be highly improper if it did. I do not wish to detain the House, because it seems to me, considering the fact that the country has been looking for five years for a fast line, considering the price which we have offered for it has been insufficient and we must increase it or do without, that the bill before us is in the line of the plainest and simplest common sense, and for my part, as a business man, I wonder whether $750,000 will fetch it. There is only one expression which fell from the Opposition that I have sympathy with at all. It is where the hon. member from Ottawa deplored the fact that our own people had not been more ready to avail themselves of the offer and fill the contract themselves. For my part, I think that the Allans have deserved well of this country. In a long series of years, under the most discouraging circumstances, they have kept up a service well and done their duty by the country. It is quite a mistake on the part of one of the speakers to say that they are old men and desirous of going out of business. The older men are certainly disappearing, but there are plenty of young men of enterprise and courage and business knowledge to carry on the service, and I deplore that the Allans have not been induced by the subsidy which has been offered to take up the work and do it themselves. I have not the acquaintance of Mr. Huddart. He is a stranger and I should prefer our own people to him, and the only thing that I regret is that this service is to fall into the hands of a comparative stranger and not into the hands of our own people. In that respect I am with the gentlemen of the Opposition. The hon. member from Marquette took a view with which I am cordially in sympathy. It was not novel, because it has been held out all along as one of the inducements for the line; it was that we might see the day when the direct course between Europe and Australia would be through Canadian territory. When that is done, it will bring an enormous accession of business to our own railway, as we may call the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it will do a great deal to enlighten the public outside as to what Canada is, and make her more familiar, more frequented and unquestionably will be to our benefit. For these reasons, I think the observations which have been tendered to you in opposition to this bill are insufficient and should not be regarded. I advocate the immediate assent to this bill on the part of this hon. House.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time at length at the Table.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If the House will allow me, I will move the suspension of the rule and that the bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If I were not a good Christian, I should object to the suspension of the rule, because I feel that I was treated with scant courtesy by the leader of the House during the debate on the second reading of this bill, and I wish now to make just two or three observations with respect to the little difference of opinion which took place. I have ascertained—I was not aware of it at the time—that the hon. gentleman, when he laid those papers with respect to the fast Atlantic service on the Table, made a slight error and said that he laid on the Table the papers with respect to the French treaty. I remember distincly the hon. gentleman stating that. I never heard, and I have been attending the House pretty regularly, the hon. gentleman say that he laid on the Table any papers with respect to the fast Atlantic service, until he stated, when I made some remarks to the effect that the papers had not been brought down, that he had laid them on the Table. My reply was that they were not on the Table. They were not at the time—I had never seen them. I might perhaps have said something else, but there was no discourtesy to the hon. gentleman or any one else. I simply said the papers were not on the Table. As a matter of fact, those papers had been laid on the Table as papers connected with the French Treaty, and they were removed at the close of the sitting to the clerk's office. I was not aware that they had been laid on the Table and other members to whom I spoke on the subject told me the same, and the hon. member from Ottawa told me that he only discovered by accident that they were on the Table. He went to look at the papers and found that they did not relate to the French Treaty, but to the Fast Atlantic Service. It is only due to myself to make that statement. As I said in the course of the discussion, I try not to be rude or discourteous to any member of the House.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—When I laid the papers on the Table, a mistake was made in stating that they were papers connected with the French Treaty, but I had that mistake immediately corrected. I mentioned it to the Hon. Mr. Scott, who drew my attention to the fact. I had the error corrected immediately, and there is no error in the Minutes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I never read the Minutes, and not having any communication with the hon. member from Ottawa on the subject, I never knew about it until the question was raised to-day.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed on a division.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons to return Bill (V) "An Act further to amend the Insurance Act," with certain amendments.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The last clause provides how the companies shall invest their surpluses. A long list of securities has been given. They are not allowed to invest in gas companies except upon bonds issued by them. There are companies whose standing is first class, and who have issued no bonds, and I want to add, in the interest of insurance companies, to increase the scope of their investments, the following words :—

And in the stocks of such companies of the above description which have issued no bonds.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—As a representative of an insurance company of some standing in Canada, I should like to add telephone stock or bonds, either of which is as good as the Bank of Montreal. I would not have moved an amendment had not the leader of the House proposed to amend the clause himself.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I propose to have the list still further extended.

THE FRENCH TREATY BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (147) "An Act respecting a certain treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the French Republic."

(In the Committee.)

On Schedule "A,"

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct attention to the difference between the language used in Article 2, and the language used at the close of Article 3. Article 2 is to this effect :

Any commercial advantage granted by Canada to any third power, especially in tariff matters shall be enjoyed fully by France, Algeria and the French colonies.

That article states in the most direct and explicit manner that whatever advantage is granted to any other power must be granted to France and the French colonies. I said something last night as to how that might affect negotiations for extended trade relations, with the United States for instance. Then the language in article 3, as to what Canada is to get from France, is as follows:

It is understood that the advantage of any reduction of duty granted to any other power on any of the articles enumerated above shall be extended fully to Canada.

It is not stated explicitly and directly that these advantages shall be extended to Canada, and further the advantages are not any commercial advantage, but simply the advantages with respect to the articles mentioned above. If a treaty of a more extensive character should be made by France with any other power admitting agricultural products, for instance, the advantages of the treaty would not be extended to Canada, while France gets all the advantages which Canada might grant to any other power.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—True, the language is wider in article 2, than in the section cited by the hon. gentleman at the foot of article 3, and it must be recollected that when we granted a market of five millions they opened to us a market in France of nearly forty millions, and if you include Algeria and the French colonies it would exceed fifty-seven millions.

The schedule was adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hon. gentlemen may have noticed that some of the Australian representatives have felt somewhat aggrieved that France should have those advantages. They do not consider them of very much value if given to the rest of the world, and when France hears we have given similar privileges to Australia and the rest of the world, she may not value the privilege much.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Perhaps not, and if the treaty is as bad as the hon. gentleman thinks it is, they will give us notice, but there is nothing in the treaty which would prevent us according a reduced tariff to Australia and the other British colonies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was drawing attention to the fact that the Australians had already noted, and that France may note that practically under the interpretation that is now given to it France will not be getting any exclusive privilege in regard to the wines of that country.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I would like the hon. Minister to tell us what amount of trade he expects to make with France, or whether he expects any large trade, in condensed milk?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I may say the statistics show hardly any trade now in that direction, but it is a trade that could be easily established from Ontario and the province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, especially Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Can the hon. gentleman tell us if there is any condensed milk manufactured or produced in Canada now?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, there is in Nova Scotia, and it is a profitable industry.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—At Truro, N.S.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think the parties who negotiated this treaty did not understand the timber grown in this country, because it speaks of the extract of chestnut and the other tanning extracts. I know something about the forests of this country, and I do not know to-day where we have any chestnut forests; in fact, there is very little chestnut grown in Canada, as far as I know. At one time we had some chestnut growing, but we have none now. I think that that word ought to be hemlock instead of chestnut.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It says other tanning extracts.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That clause includes hemlock.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—But they use the word "chestnut?"

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Because tannin from chestnut is used for the most expensive leather, what we generally call Russian leather, and I do not know as to whether there is any exported from here, but we have the tannin from hemlock and it includes both.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—And oak has also very good tanning properties.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It says "fresh water fish, eels." Would that include salt water eels?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, it would not include eels caught in the sea—simply eels caught in fresh water.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I am sorry it does not. I had hoped that it might allow us to take in eels of all kinds.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Not from the sea.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is hard to discover the difference. Many men could not tell the difference. I think in my younger days I could distinguish between them. The eels are six or seven feet long in the place I come from in Scotland. We would not eat them; we did not consider them fit for food, but it appears they are excluded by this treaty if we catch them in the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the adoption of the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (C) "An Act further to amend the Insurance Act." He said: I had proposed to submit to the House an amendment which relates to investments. I suggested that amendment in a conciliatory spirit, hoping to meet the objections of one of the companies to the bill. I find that this amendment is unsuccessful and as it does not produce the reconciliation that I had hoped for, it is useless for me to submit it, because at a future session the principle involved in that 27th section will have to be the subject of further legislation. I may state the purpose of the section as it stands. For the future, and the future only, the law provides that insurance companies shall invest the money in trust with them in given securities. I do not wish to enter into a discussion upon what has taken place in relation to the large investments made by such companies. There are some who have in hand over $13,000,000 and have some $67,000,000 of responsibilities with policy-holders. I do not wish to criticize the way a portion of that capital has been employed or invested. What is past is past, and let by-gones be by-gones, but I think it is the duty of Parliament to see that all this money which is held by certain parties in trust, the managers of the companies who have as shareholders very limited capital and who deal with such large sums of money—that it is the interest of Parliament and of the public that some safe-guard should be provided in relation to the future investments of those companies. It is not thought desirable that they should be at liberty to invest at random such a large sum of money; thousands of people might at a critical time have to suffer a bitter disappointment if such investments had not been wisely and properly made. The Government has dealt with that subject. Yesterday one hon. gentleman in this House mentioned the Bell Telephone Company's stock, which I believe is quoted at 140. I am quite sure that on a future occasion, as long as that stock stands as high as it does, the House would have no objection to deal with the matter again and include that and several other subjects of investment. It has been said that by this Parliament is arrogating to itself an excessive power and attacking acquired rights. It has been the subject of discussion elsewhere that we were going to deal with vested rights. The most complete and reliable answer to that has been made by the best authorities in the House where the discussion took place. When you only deal for the future you do not really deal with acquired rights. Up to this day companies holding charters have had the privilege of investing their money in many ways. With such investments it is not the intention of Parliament to interfere at all. None of these investments will have to be disturbed by the present law. Some of them might be removed with advantage, but others will stand as long as they have not lapsed, but with regard to future investments the clause says that when you shall have a surplus to invest it must be invested in certain classes of securities. In making that provision you do not in any way affect acquired rights. Acquired rights cannot apply to the future but can only apply to the past. Acquired rights can only apply to the capital which is accumulated and invested, but it cannot apply to the capital which the policy-holders are going to put into your hands for safe management in the future. I shall again repeat that I think it is sufficient for me to point out to the House that a large number of people in Canada to-day are insured, that for a large class of our people it is the only possible provision that they can make, after they are removed from this life, for their widows and children. It is becoming more popular and more extended every day, and it is the duty of Parliament to see that none of those people are deceived, that the investments are wisely made by men of small capital as shareholders, say $100,000, $125,000 or $150,000, who are dealing with responsibilities amounting to some sixty or sixty-five millions of dollars, dealing with an accumulated amount of some $13,000,000 or more. It is a very great responsibility to intrust with the managers of such companies. I do not wish to blame any management in the past or to criticise any company. I am the last man in this House who would utter one word which could be invoked against any company by a rival company, but I hope the House will receive with the same frankness and in the same spirit the principle which is set out in the amendment.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—The hon. leader of the House has stated that he wishes to withdraw some amendments which he proposed, and which are satisfactory, as far as they go, to parties interested in this bill. The amendments which he proposes are, as he has stated, in the right direction, but they do not go far enough. If the hon. Minister of Agriculture chooses to withdraw the amendments which he himself proposed, that is his affair and we cannot prevent him doing it, but I thought, in the remarks which he made, the logic was not very sound when he said that vested rights applied only to the future and not to the past. That appears to me a very extraordinary argument. I wish to place before the House a plain and straight forward statement of the case as well as I can do it, without intending, in any manner, to mislead, or to palliate, or to do anything that might be considered improper by any member of this House. I wish to state at the outset that I have no interest in the Canada Life Assurance Company, which is the company now under discussion. I am interested in it only as a policy-holder of $10,000. I insured in the company with a knowledge of the powers of investment which the company possessed. Now let me state to the House what these powers are. This amendment chiefly affects the Canada Life Assurance Company. The Act of incorporation was granted forty-seven years ago. That Act permits a liberal choice of securities on which investments or loans may be made, but which will be much restricted by the proposed amendment, and the company has made, from time to time, investments and loans in and on the classes of securities which will be excluded by the proposed amendment, amounting at the present time to about $5,000,000. The company on such an amount earn, on a moderate estimate, about $50,000 annually more than they would on securities of the limited class specified. The hon. gentleman alluded to the policy-holders and also to the smallness of the stock of this company. It is well known to hon. gentlemen, and to every business man of this community, that the stock of insurance companies is always of a very limited amount, and that the policy-holders are the parties most generally interested. The policy-holders will be the parties chiefly affected, as they are entitled to 90 per cent of the profits, and on the last division of profits they received 93⅓ per cent—the shareholders received only the remaining 6⅔. There are about 25,000 persons whose lives are assured by the company to the amount of upwards of 62 millions, these policy-holders are informed, by the annual report of the company sent to each, of the manner in which the funds are invested; and any one entitled will at all times be furnished with every information, concerning the company's investments; and it should be pointed out that none of the debentures, bonds, stocks or other securities of Canada or any province of Canada, being those prescribed by the amendment, yield over from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 per cent—and the insurance law requires that the reserve held be based on $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. So that if the company is wholly restricted to such securities it would not be able to realize $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent prescribed by the insurance law. The result must therefore be an increase in the rate of premiums. Let me also state to the House that other companies, United States, English, and Scotch insurance companies, doing business alongside of the Canadian companies, are not subject to such restrictions. They can invest their money according to the best of their judgment and abilities in any such securities as they may choose to select, and there are many other securities. The fact also that the hon. Minister himself was prepared to offer an amendment to extend the line of securities may be taken as evidence that this question has not received at the hands of the Government that consideration which its importance demands. I need not point out to the House the distinction between an investment and a loan. Investments are the purchase out and out of securities and should be made only when they may be considered beyond any doubt as to their soundness, but a loan on security which per se may not be of that character can be made so if backed with first-class collaterals, and industrial establishments may be safely assisted by loans in that way, and made perfectly sound, but this restriction will prevent that and is therefore striking at the industries of the country. What the company which I have the honour to speak for to-day—I have no interest in it beyond what I have told you, a policy of $10,000 on my life—say is that they have no objection, but think it perfectly proper that there should be restriction on the class of securities in which the funds of the company shall be invested, but it is not proper that the ipse dixit of any official of the Government should be allowed to fix the list of securities. In the conference between the companies and the Government the postponement of this clause was requested for the purpose of giving an opportunity for a conference to take place between the Government and the various insurance companies who may choose to take part in it. It is surely only a reasonable request to have this amendment postponed for that purpose. The official who inspired the proposed restriction has avowed defiantly that it was inspired by him. I have the highest possible respect for that gentleman. I have known him for a great many years and I am sure he is worthy of all confidence and I have no doubt he possesses the confidence of his Minister, but it appears to me that fixing the securities this way is very much like the shoemaker going beyond his last, ne sutor ultra crepidam. And it should be borne in mind that investments of an insurance company, as regards length of time, are quite different from those of banks or savings banks, whose investments should always be made in securities readily convertible, so as to be in a position to meet any sudden demands by depositors. On the other hand, a long dated security is much more desirable for an insurance company so long as it is a safe and sound security. I may state that the annual cash receipts of the company are over two and a half millions per annum and its assets now amount to fourteen millions of dollars, so that it has money always to invest or to lend. And the amount goes on increasing year by year. This is also the case with other Canadian companies. The amount of the loanable funds which these companies will have at their disposal will be very considerable. These loans can be made with perfect safety in the manner I have indicated and can be made a powerful factor in promoting the prosperity of our industrial establishments. I should allude to the adverse criticisms made in another place respecting the investments of this company, which were most unfair and incorrect, and must have been made in ignorance of the facts. A memorandum of these investments has been handed to me by Mr. Ramsay with a full statement concerning the character of the collaterals held against them. I beg to assure the House that I unhesitatingly give it as my opinion that they are first class sound securities—gilt edged in fact. The president of the company, Mr. Ramsay, has addressed a letter to me on the subject of the securities of the company which with the permission of the House I will read :

CANADA LIFE INSURANCE CO'S. OFFICE,
HAMILTON, Ont., 13th July, 1894.

DEAR SIR,—The House of Commons last night passed an amendment to the Insurance Act which will largely limit the powers of investment given to this company by its charter in 1847. It is not said that these powers during the past 45 years have been exceeded or improperly used, and the full knowledge of all the facts and details of each of the investments of the company (although these cannot of course be possessed by persons outside of its board and officers) warrants us in asserting that they are as absolutely safe and prudent as business transactions can be made. Assurers having joined the company during the past years in reliance upon the terms of the company's charter, and relying upon the favourable results which it has encouraged them to look for, an interference with the chartered rights and privileges at the present time is an injustice to them, such as we hope the Senate may feel warranted in opposing, at all events without greater time and opportunity being afforded to obtain the views of those assured who are pecuniarily interested, on the subject.

I may say that the amendment proposed would place this and other Canadian companies in an unfavourable position in competition with American and other outside companies, which have all the investment powers which it is proposed to withdraw from this company, and which such companies now use largely and with great advantage to their policy-holders and to the business community.

If you will kindly give this matter your best consideration, that would be much esteemed, and if you can concur in our desire that greater time should be given for more fully ascertaining the views of the company's twenty thousand policy-holders, who will be pecuniary sufferers by the proposed amendment, your aid in getting the measure deferred for another session will be a valuable safeguard to their interests.

Yours truly,
A. E. RAMSAY.

There is no question as to the soundness and the value of the securities held by the company for all the loans they have made during those 48 years.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—By the loans you mean the investments you have made?

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—Loans and investments, both. I have already pointed out the distinction between investments and loans. An investment should only be made on the soundest of security, but a loan may be made on securities which per se may not be of that character, but may be made so by first-class collaterals behind them. The power, to which I have already alluded, originally granted to the company is in the nature of vested rights. The policies issued to the insured may be found to constitute or be considered in the nature of a contract between the company and its policy-holders. If the list is restricted in the manner proposed, the question then arises whether a distinct line should be drawn between the old policy-holders and those who might elect to insure with the knowledge that the old powers possessed by the company are curtailed. I believe that some such arrangement is practicable but time is required, more time than we have at our disposal this session to carry it out. Meanwhile the public or any interest will not be prejudicially affected. Before concluding it is only due to the management of the company that I should state that no company anywhere in the world can point to a more splendid administration of its affairs than the Canada Life Company. It is a company of which Canadians may well feel proud, and it appears to me under the circumstances that Parliament should hesitate before it interferes with a company which had been so splendidly managed in the past. I therefore move that this 27th amendment, which proposes to insert clause d in the bill, be not concurred in for the reason I have already stated. No interest can suffer if the matter is postponed for another season.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The proposition made by the hon. gentleman from Hamilton that this important matter should be postponed for quite a consideration, seems all the more reasonable from the fact that it will be remembered by the hon. gentleman that this bill, when it was introduced in this chamber, met with some opposition from various insurance companies. They were invited, through the courtesy of the hon. Minister taking charge of it, to come to Ottawa and discuss the objectionable clauses. They had their meeting here, and the bill was discussed in this House from time to time until an agreement, as I understood it, had been come to between the various insurance companies and the Government and then the bill passed without any further opposition in this Chamber. That was the position in which it came to the Senate originally. It went down to the House of Commons and was referred there to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, made up of the leading business men of that Chamber. That committee made a number of changes and amendments in the bill. Some of them are before us, and those amendments are being accepted by the House, inasmuch as they are not affected by the amendment proposed. After the bill went to the House of Commons from the Banking Committee,and just before the amendments were being concurred in, further amendments were proposed, which is a very unusual thing after a bill has been referred to a special committee. Those additional amendments which I hold in my hand now, known as clause b, are very long and important amendments. As I am advised by many hon. members, they really were not understood inasmuch as they were not even printed. At the end of the session, the bill comes to us with these amendments now concurred in, in addition to the amendments made by the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and it is those amendments the hon. member from Hamilton refers to, when he asks that the discussion of them be postponed for another year. They affect other companies besides the Canada Life, but principally the Canada Life. I do not know that the other companies are aware to what extent they do affect them. I am inclined to think—although I speak subject to correction—that the Sun Life, and important company, incorporated as far back as 1864, must have investments affected by this bill. I am not certain of that, because I have not had time to look into it, but I do know, and the hon. gentleman has informed the House officially from the paper handed to him by the manager of the Canada Life, that it is going to affect this company in the future to the extent of $50,000 a year. This is a very important consideration. I venture to say that over 5,000 stockholders of the Canada Life are the principal business men, at least of Ontario. The operations of the Canada Life extend beyond Ontario, but I believe there are no leading business men in Ontario who do not hold a policy or two in the Canada Life. Now, I do not think they are the class of men that require the paternity of Parliament to say how they shall invest their money. We are going too far in this matter. Nearly 50 years ago, Parliament gave a charter to this company, authorized them to invest their money according to the prudence and discretion and judgment of those who were interested. It gradually drifted to be a mutual company. In its earlier history it had many difficulties to encounter, because it lacked the capital and it lacked the standing, and English companies had possession of the ground and also some United States companies. As the company got strong and vigorous, the Canadian people had faith in it, and the leading business men of Ontario hold policies in this company. They have been induced to add to their policies from the very fact that that company was enabled to return to them a larger proportion of profits than policy-holders in other companies receive. Why were the company able to do this? Because the investments in Canada were more paying than they had been in other countries. We know that English companies are limited practically to receipts of probably from 3½ to 4, not above 4, as a rule. Now we are going to say to the Canada Life, which heretofore has been paying back to its policy-holders very large sums of money, in the future "You cannot return that money to the policy-holders. You must put your money in particular bonds of the Government of Canada, bonds of the provinces and other stocks and interests referred to in this bill." I do not think that that is quite fair or proper, after Parliament has given them the power, unless you first establish a case against them. If you can show that by rash investments or by imprudence they have jeopardized the interests of those 25,000 people, then it may be for Parliament to interfere, but even then Parliament ought only to interfere at the instance of the parties interested. It is a business company; it is not a savings company or a poor man's company, as a rule it is the wealthy men of this country that are in the Canada Life. There are no doubt some small companies. The small policies are prompted to be taken because there are well known business men in the country who have faith in the company and hold large policies and for that reason it has a standing. The effect of the amendment will be to put the Canada Life on a level with English companies, in fact to reduce them below the level of English companies, because we know that as a matter of fact English companies to-day can invest their money in the United States, and foreign companies doing business in Canada have opportunities for investing their money in the United States. The Canada Life will be deprived of that privilege, unless you drive them to invest their money outside of Canada, I do not know how far the amendments would affect their powers to carry out that principle, but it would seem only reasonable and fair, if they have got to compete with the rest of the world—because that is what it means practically— that they should seek investments out of Canada if they cannot get paying investments in Canada. The Canada Life has gone into a new territory. It is now doing business in the United States and is regarded there as a company of undoubted standing and is securing a very large area in that country. I do not think it is in our interests to say to the Canada Life: "You shall take your money out of Canada and invest it in the United States," because it would be cnly reasonable and fair if their premiums are to be affected by this, if they are to be restricted in their opportunities to invest in Canada, that they should go outside of the Dominion. I do not think that you help the industrial enterprise of this country by doing that. I presume, from what was said, that it naturally prefers to make advances to industrial institutions in this country: but as we know when loans of that kind are made, large collateral securities are taken, and if any hon. gentleman could point to a loss by any injudicious investment, then there would be some justification for it, or if the policy-holders in the Canada Life applied to Parliament praying for this change, then we might properly interfere, but I understand the policy-holders are opposed to this change. There is not a policy-holder in the Canada Life who is in favour of this legislation. They have had these privileges for 50 years, and have not abused them in any way, and now it is proposed to take this right away from them. It is said Parliament is not giving this right to the companies applying for charters today. That is no reason for taking it away from old companies which have built up the insurance business of this country. The Canada Life, you might say, was the pioneer company of Canada and made their insurance business a success. Business men would not go into it until they saw it was a success. After a time they discovered that investments could be better made in Canada than in England, because we have the territory here. Money invested in England only paid 2½ or 3½ per cent and of course they could not compete with the Canadian company. The Canada Life were able to take advantage of the money market of this country to the great assistance of our people. I hope, therefore, the Government will not press this amendment under the circumstances, because it is very unusual that an important amendment of this kind should be brought in at the last moment, more particularly after a conference being held on this bill. The Canada Life seems to be the only company that is aware of the change, although I am quite sure it affects other companies. I have had a policy in the Canada Life for nearly fifty years, and I am receiving annually a very nice sum out of it. The mode of insurance that I followed was to have the profits apply in reduction of the premium and a great many other persons have done the same. What right has Parliament to step in and cut off the profits I get? Is it the proper thing to do? People invested in this company because, its investments being in Canada, it was a company that could pay more profits than any foreign company. In the face of that, is it right that Parliament should capriciously, at the very last moment, interject amendments which are going to disturb investments made by policy-holders twenty, thirty, or forty years ago. It is neither equitable nor just, and if it is properly understood I do not think it will be enforced. I hope, therefore, that the Government will withdraw the amendment and look into the matter. Of course if there is any justification for it, we could all agree to it, but if there is no justification we should allow the company to continue its business as in the past.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I shall vote for the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Hamilton. I believe this bill must have been in a very crude shape and not properly considered before it came to this House. Here is a bill which was brought to this House by the Government. We must assume that it received mature consideration and that the Government believed they had done everything to protect those who have invested their money in these companies. It passed this House. being considered perfect by the members of this House. Are we now to stultify ourselves and say that we were not capable of considering this matter? There are gentlemen here who have policies in that company, and business men, who feel quite satisfied with the manner in which the loans and investments of the company are made. I do not know of any person who has invested his money in any way in this company who has raised any suspicion with regard to the ability of this company to conduct the business in the manner which they have done for 50 years. This bill went to a committee of the other House competent to deal with a measure of this kind: they made certain amendments to the bill, which we are willing to accept, but when it came up from the committee to the House an amendment was made which was not approved of by the Committee on Banking and Commerce to whom it was referred. I think this matter requires more consideration. My hon. friend, the leader of the House, himself admitted that he was willing to modify that clause d and make some concession with respect to it, so that he must feel that it is not necessary in the interest of the public. who invested their money in this company, that this clause should pass. I think we should hasten slowly and consider the companies who may be interested in this. They will have to consult and have conferences with the department and perhaps then some legislation which may be in the interest of all the companies may result from this, but I must say, after the Government has brought down a bill, presumably after mature consideration and after the bill has gone through the ordeal of this House and through a competent committee of the other House, and is returned to this Chamber and we are asked to add a clause here which seems to be objectionable and which my hon. friend is willing to modify, it shows that this bill is imperfect and has not received the mature judgment of the Government. For the safety of the country, I think the hon. leader should withdraw clause d from the bill and then, after further consideration of this matter, if more legislation is required in the interest of the policy-holders the matter can be brought up next session.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Welland)—I do not wish to criticise the hon. leader of the House, but it appears to me that his course to-day with regard to the amendment which he was about to move is a most extraordinary one. The Government admitted by the amendment which he had in his hand that the range of securities in which investments could be made, was too small, and therefore they were disposed to enlarge it, but by his conduct to-day he virtually says, "if you do not take my amendment you get nothing at all. I will move the bill as it is before the House and ask you to vote against the amendment that has been moved by the hon. gentleman from Burlington." The Government ought to give us the amendment which they thought the insurance companies were entitled to, and the course of the hon. gentleman to-day is a very extraordinary one. There is no institution in this country that has done more by their surplus funds to advance the best interests and the public works of this country than the Canada Life. It has always been to the fore in making wise and prudent investments. I am a very large policy-holder and have examined the institution and its reports recently, I can say that so far as I know it has never yet met with a loss of any consequence. For 47 years they have been going on in that way. They have used their surplus to advance the best interests in the country. Now if these securities in which they can invest are limited, what will be the result? They will seek investments in other countries, and this $5,000,000 will go across the line to promote the industrial pursuits of the United States, either that, or if you restrict them you will disable them from carrying out the contract which I entered into 20 years ago with the Canada Life Company, under the representation that for a series of years they had been able to pay certain bonuses to policy-holders. You therefore injure me and every policy-holder in the Canada Life. Have the policy-holders, or the public, or the business men of this country asked for this legislation? Has anybody asked for it, or has it been brought about by the musings of somebody sitting behind a desk somewhere, perhaps a clerk in an office who never knew anything at all of life insurance business and knows very little about business transactions of any kind. I want to know where the bill comes from. If the Government say they brought this bill into the House on their own responsibility, then, so far as this bill is concerned, I vote want of confidence in the Government, because I do not think it is in the interest of anybody in this country. The Minister of Agriculture says it is not interfering with vested rights because it only applies to the future. That is a strange kind of logic, because these investments are constantly falling due and must be reinvested at once in order that interest may be had upon them, so that you interfere with every policy that has been taken in that company for the last 45 years except those that have been paid off. And it does interfere with vested rights and with the interest of policy-holders, an interference that I think is wholly unjustifiable. Everybody will agree with me that there are no securities in the country on which there have not been losses, even the classes mentioned in the list. If there is a class of securities in which there has been money lost it is mortgages. If we confine the companies to mortgages alone, after a while you will find they will become the owners of a large portion of the property of the country. Interest on mortgages is not paid regularly as a rule, and private lenders do not care to foreclose their mortgages and put people on the street, but companies are obliged to do that because they are holding the balance between two parties and they must carry out the law and foreclose the mortgages. I agree with the hon. member from Ottawa that the business men of this country are the men who are best able to judge of this matter. All over the province of Ontario, and in Montreal and elsewhere the men who hold policies in this company are perfectly satisfied with their investment, and there are no men in this country more capable of judging of investments of this character than the policy-holders themselves. I have examined the investments and securities that have been referred to, and if I had the money I would lend it as the Canada Life has done on those securities. There is no business man that would have not made the same loans on the same security. In lending on mortgages as a rule they can place about $1,500 or $2,000 on a farm. The expense of keeping track of those mortgages is very large. If the Canada Life had to see after those small investments throughout the country it would cost them nearly all the interest they get to secure the investments and to manage them. Therefore I think it is exceedingly unwise to confine them to these two kinds of investments. A radical change of this kind, affecting such wide and diversified interests, affecting perhaps a hundred thousand policy-holders in this country, ought not to be made without consulting as far as possible, the parties directly interested. I therefore think that the House ought to be careful. Let us grant a delay so that we will be able to consult the people interested before next session. If these amendments, after consultation, are considered right and just and in the best interests of the future of this country and of policy-holders and investers, let us pass it; but I think no radical change of this kind ought to be made without proper consideration and without consulting, so far as they can be consulted, the parties interested.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I entirely agree with all that fell from the Minister who introduced this bill, with regard to the necessity for taking every precaution to guarantee the safety of companies and institutions, such as those which this bill will affect. I do not think there can be a greater calamity than to allow life insurance companies to conduct their business on an unsound basis, or anything in fact short of the most absolute security that can be obtained. When we reflect on the frightful consequences to the comfort and welfare of individuals that might ensue by the failure of those companies, I think every precaution should be taken to ensure their stability. There is no subject therefore to which the Government should address themselves to with more care than this of life insurance, none which the very able officers, to whom they have to advise with in the department to which such matters are referred should give greater consideration, none which both this House and the country should more heartily and thoroughly desire to surround with every precaution when legislating upon it. I am disposed, therefore, to go as far in that direction as almost any one would do, in order to secure perfect safety for our life insurance companies; but here is a case in which we may very properly say that the House is hardly justified, at this period of the session, and after this bill has been so thoroughly and carefully criticised, when first introduced in this House, in proposing now to introduce a clause which so very seriously affects the business of some of our largest and most successful companies in the Dominion. If this clause was only intended to affect companies obtaining charters in the future, it might be all right; but here is a case in which we should surely act upon the axiom that it is not right or proper to interfere with vested rights, because when a company like the Canada Life, for instance, has, under its charter, been investing its funds for so many years in securities which are excluded by this clause, it would be unfair and unjust if we at once deprived them of that power.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Does it?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Assuredly. I cannot read it in any other way.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is a vast difference between ex post facto legislation and this. The leader of the Opposition stated, as I understood him, that it affects investments already made.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The distinction is very plain. If a company has a charter, under which charter it has had the right to make investments of a certain character, and in the exercise of that right has for many years been investing very largely in a particular way, and has made very large profits by so doing to the great satisfaction of their policy-holders, is it right to come now and say without any previous warning, that for the future it shall no longer make any such investments? I think it is taking a very strong step and one which I hardly think is right, because it is for the future abrogating the privileges they have hitherto enjoyed under their charter. If this clause applied only to companies that might hereafter be incorporated for doing the business of life insurance, there would not be the same objection. Indeed, I have no doubt that one consideration which may have been present to the mind of whoever framed this clause was this—some of these securities in which the Canada Life now invest their funds, which under the conduct of so able and experienced an officer as the manager of the Canada Life may be perfectly safe investments, might not be equally so in the case of other companies, where the same discretion and the same ability might not be shown, but the simple point for this House to consider is whether it is right that we should now consent to make this amendment under all the circumstances. The bill has come back to us from the Commons, having been previously thoroughly discussed and criticised in this House, (and the insurance companies fully heard on the subject) with this unexpected amendment. Their representatives left here under the impression that they and the Government were of one mind on the subject. Is it right now that they should suddenly find themselves with a clause sprung on them which interferes with their charters to such an extent that it restricts their right to make investments which up to now they have made, and from which they have reaped large profits thereby enabling them to give their policy-holders large bonuses and make money in a way which it will not be possible for them to do if they are confined to the investments mentioned in the Act? I feel, as a Canadian, very proud of the progress made in life insurance business in this country during the last few years. Many of us can remember when we had not a strong life insurance company in the country, and in my younger days when I wished to insure my life, I had to go to an English company for the purpose. No greater boon has been conferred on the country than the means which our Canadian life insurance companies furnish to young men both to insure their lives at reasonable rates, (far lower than they could have done in any English company); and to insure in companies which are beyond suspicion as to their stability and soundness. There is no company among our Canadian life assurance companies which will be hit so hard and at the same time ought, of all others, to be exempt from any sudden legislation of this kind, as the Canada Life. I am a policy-holder in it myself, and looking at it from that point of view, I should regret exceedingly if this clause were adopted without, at all events, some reasonable time being given for further and more mature consideration. I submit that it ought not to pass this session.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I am sorry to have to say a word on this subject. I am not personally interested in the Canada Life, and last night I thought that the temporary leader of the Government in this House believed he might do something to reconcile the parties interested in it. After yesterday, I found that they did not feel inclined to let that clause stand over for a year. Seeing that, I asked for an amendment to sanction loans on stock of companies that had no bonds issued. Until I came into this House I supposed that that amendment would be placed before us. That amendment, I am told by the hon. gentleman who has charge of the bill, he will not put. I am very sorry that he will not do so, because I am interested in the Toronto Gas Company, whose securities are as good as the securities of the Government of Canada to-day, I paid 83 premium a year ago for the stock, and it is now held at 90 premium.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman does not expect an insurance company would pay such a premium as that ?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What dividend does the stock pay ?

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—It pays a dividend of 10 per cent. On that stock according to this bill they could not lend anything. The object of this amendment was that the stock of any company that had issued no bonds should be included in the list. The hon. gentleman in charge of the bill says he will not make that amendment. I am very much surprised that he will not. If I were in another position I would vote against it. I am so situated that while I am here I am in duty bound to support my Government, but I say I think that the Government ought, as they have done in dealing with other bills this session, to have softened down somewhat; they should either allow the matter to stand over for one year, or accept that amendment which would give a considerable advantage to companies which have no bonds issued and whose stock is just as good as the debentures of the Dominion Government. That is the position I am in here to-day. I did not know until I came in here that that amendment was not going to be moved.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suppose I should not say anything about those amendments, because I am not interested in the subject myself. I can imagine that members have listened with a little surprise to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Toronto, but I do not think, if I may be allowed to interfere in a matter which does not concern me, that the language used by the hon. gentleman is remarkable at all, because he conferred with his colleague last night when he gave notice of this amendment, and I presume he has not been notified of the change. He was a faithful follower of the leader last night, but he has not kept up with him, and is in the same place to-day as he was in last night. That is not a very serious backsliding on the part of a member of the Government. I do not agree with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me. It does not follow because Canadian insurance companies have been wisely and prudently conducted in the past that they will be equally well conducted in the future. It may be that a company, after being conducted in a prudent, conservative way for years, under new management, enter upon a different course of proceeding. If there were any substantial evidence of that in connection with any of our Canadian insurance companies, I think it would be a good ground why the Government should, during the recess of Parliament, make inquiry. If allegations of that sort have been made, and there is apparent foundation for them, it is the duty of the Government to make inquiry and next session to bring such well considered amendments to the existing legislation as will meet any difficulty that they foresee, but to take the step which is taken in this amendment without notice to the shareholders and insurance companies, and without notice to the stockholders to amend the law in such a way as to sweep a vast field of investment from these companies is quite unjustifiable. That is the way I view the matter, and as neither the stockholders, or the shareholders have asked for such legislation as this, as neither stockholders nor policy-holders are aware of this proposed legislation except a very limited number, it would be a sort of breach of faith on the part of Parliament at this date to interfere in this way. I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman who leads the House and of the Conservative members of this House, to one feature of this amendment which has been adverted to but has not been dwelt upon as much as it ought to be. This Canada Life, the Sun Life, and one or two other companies have grown up as the result of Canadian enterprise and capital. If we pass this restricted amendment, these companies will be placed in a much worse position than foreign companies. An English or United States company can come into Canada and invest in these Canadian securities which our own insurance companys cannot invest in. Clearly that is not right. I say that this amendment has been proposed without sufficient consideration. The prudent and just course for the Government is not to ask the House to concur in this amendment, but to take steps during the recess of Parliament to devise a measure to meet the danger, if there be any danger which may exist in case the companies are to make these investments. That is the way it strikes me.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I wish to explain to the House that what I have done in relation to withdrawing the amendment, I have been authorized by the leader of the Government to do, and I have done nothing that anybody in this House or outside of it has a right to question. What I have done is within my right, and my authority and instructions. Coming back to another point, I wish to state to the House that this clause enacts nothing new. It is incorporating in the Insurance Act a clause and an enactment which is embodied in the charter of every company incorporated for the last ten years. The policy of this clause has been accepted by Parliament before, and I do not suppose there is a member in this House who has not voted for a similar clause whenever an insurance company came to us for an Act of incorporation. Hon. gentlemen know that for ten years past it has been the policy of this country, and why should we be asked to-day to reject this enactment. Now, who asked for this legislation? Did the policy-holders move in that regard? For ten years past they have been moving for this, and for ten years past Parliament has, upon every occasion that they incorporated an insurance company, agreed to this and limited the powers of investment and loan. Referring to the fact that foreign companies have a wider scope than Canadian companies, a company coming from abroad and doing business here, can invest money in any manner that its foreign charter allows. That is perfectly true, but that is beyond our power. We have no right to legislate for them. We are only legislating now for Canadian companies; the clause enacts nothing new, does not take the people and this House by surprise, nor the companies. They know that the general policy of the country for years back has been not to allow companies to invest or lend as they please, but to have a limited amount of stock in which they can invest. They are all informed of that, so that it is not quite correct to say that this clause has been sprung upon the country or the Canada Life Company. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that this bill was initiated in this House. We gave it the best attention we could, and we inserted a clause which was not in the same terms as this, but the object of which was to prevent any company, or the managers of a company, or any shareholders of a company, from wrecking the interests of the policy-holders, and it provided that in future there should be this limit, so as to prevent any shareholders, representing a small capital like $125,000, constituting the board as they chose and investing some thirteen millions of accumulated assets to suit their own interests or the interests of their friends.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—The capital of the Canada Life is one million.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman from Burlington must recollect that I do not speak of the Canada Life. I put a case for the House to consider so that I may be fully understood. I charge nobody at all. I said at the outset that I would not in any way follow the course which perhaps has been pursued elsewhere and point out any bad investment; it is not my duty to do that. What I state is that this House had put a clause to guard against this, limiting the number of votes according to the capital possessed by one man. This clause has been taken out, and to arrive at the same result the House of Commons has passed the clause which applies to all insurance companies incorporated during the last ten years. So that this House cannot complain that the clause has been sprung upon us or sprung upon the House below. It has received full consideration.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I cannot agree with everything the hon. Minister has stated. He seems to have taken the floor simply to prove that we were not interfering with vested rights, but he has failed to furnish any argument to show that he is correct. On the contrary, he admits that the clause which was in the bill before it went to the Commons, and the clause which is now there, interferes with companies incorporated 20, 30 or 40 years ago. How can those companies which were incorporated 40 years ago be dealt with? Generally speaking, I say, they ought not to be interfered with. There should be very good reasons before we interfer with those rights. Has the hon. Minister produced any such reasons? Has he given instances?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I could not do that without hurting a company.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—And we cannot do this without hurting somebody. We should not interfere with those rights unless we have good reason to do so, and unless we know what we are about. If we interfered with those rights we would not know what we were about. If we had any evidence that the policy-holders in any company complain that the company is doing wrong, and that some day or other they may lose their insurance, then I would say we ought to do something in the interests of the country at large. Such, however, is not the case, but the contrary. Those who have policies are willing to remain as they are now. They oppose any such amendment, and yet the Minister is surprised when we ask for delay, because he says we have for ten years past put such clauses in our incorporation acts. Still, we may be wiser to-morrow again, and that does not give us the power to interfere with what was done 20 or 30 years ago. If the hon. gentleman would add to the clause the words "except those companies which have been incorporated previous to this day," I would vote for it, because I believe the Government is right, and I believe it is their duty to see that the public at large are protected. We must proceed in the right way, and we cannot take acquired rights from those companies. I was happy to be the seconder of the motion, because I thought the prayer of the companies that the matter should be left over until next year, so that it could be fully discussed, was a very reasonable one, and that the Government would not hesitate to grant that request.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is quite apparent that the feeling of the House is in favour of the amendment being withdrawn at the present time, and I hope the Government will assent to it. The matter has been fully discussed and I think the point raised cannot be disputed. We have had no adverse vote taken this session, and therefore I ask the Government to withdraw the amendment.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Since I have been in politics I have never witnessed the sight which I have seen this afternoon—one of the Ministers standing up and condemning the action of the Government. I have never heard a Minister in the House state that he was authorized by the Prime Minister to do a certain act, implying that none of his colleagues had a right to object. Ministers cannot come before the chamber divided. They must be a unit. If they do not agree, let them disagree in private and not come to the House, and my advice is to adjourn this debate and allow the Ministers to talk it over among themselves.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I cannot withdraw the clause inserted by the House of Commons. The motion of the hon. member from Burlington is before the House, and it will decide upon it. My instructions are to press this clause, and I have only one leader.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I think it is exceedingly unfortunate that there should be any misapprehension upon so important a subject as this, and I confess that I concur to a very great extent in the remarks made by my hon. friend from Mille Iles, but I would like to make one or two remarks, not on the merits of the bill, for I have not given it that study which its importance demands. I was a little surprised at the remarks made by the hon. member from Burlington and another hon. gentleman who spoke in reference to the bill itself. The hon. member from Burlington informed the House that the deputy minister of the department had made the statement that he had drafted the clause and was responsible for it. Now if the deputy made any such remark—and I have no reason whatever to doubt the literal accuracy of the statement—he did what was decidedly wrong. It must be borne in mind that all deputy heads receive instructions from their Ministers to prepare such and such bills. It may be quite true that from their experience in the management and working of the departments they may know more, and would necessarily know more, of the actual working of a clause in any bill, and know how it affected the interests of those who were insured in the companies, than the head of the department, and for obvious reasons. The deputy head is permanent. It is his duty to constantly study the working of all acts which come under his immediate supervision, while the head of the department is political and if he is not too egotistical, he will find it to his advantage to take suggestions and receive information from those who must, as I have already said, of necessity know as much if not more than the political head himself. There are gentlemen in this House who have occupied similar positions to that which a Minister occupies to-day, and they will concur in the full force and correctness of what I have stated.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Therefore, I do not think it fair on the part of my hon. friend from Niagara—for whose opinion I have very high respect—or my hon. friend from Burlington—and no man holds him in higher esteem than I do—to say that a deputy arrogantly assumes the responsibility, and for another to declare the bill to be the emanation of a clerk of a department. The Government having introduced the bill, are responsible for its provisions. The hon. member from Niagara, not approving of this clause, suggested that it was equivalent to a vote of want of confidence in respect of that clause. It is the right of every independent member who sits upon the floor of this House, if he does not approve of a clause of a bill or the principle involved in that clause, it is his duty to himself and the constituency that he represents, to vote against it, no matter whether it comes from the Government or not. That is the principle I held when I was an independent member of the House. If, however, it came to a question of voting want of confidence in the Government, I might hesitate before doing so even though I might possibly not approve of the particular clause before Parliament, for the reason that it might bring to power men in whom I had still less confidence, and for that reason sometimes, under our system of Government—and we all know it—we surrender a little of that independence of thought which everybody should have. My object in rising was to protest against casting the responsibility upon any clerk or deputy head of any measure that comes before Parliament with the sanction of the Government. The Government itself is responsible for this bill, no matter where they got the idea. They may have received it from the deputies or from the insurance companies themselves, or from other sources. I say frankly that I have a very high opinion of the practical knowledge and ability of the Deputy Minister of Finance in all matters of this kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—But he may have strong views upon the question which are not in unison with those of hon. gentlemen who have to deal with the question here, and whenever interests are involved of the character dealt with in this bill, I cannot wonder at all that there may be very different opinions pro and con on the question. The question really resolves itself into a narrow compass. We have affirmed the principle for the last eight or ten years, as has been properly stated by my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, of preventing new companies, or companies which ask for incorporation, from investing their funds in what are considered doubtful securities. In this case we have a company that has been eminently successful in its working. It has had a management that has never called down upon it the slightest reproach since its first organization, and I remember well when it was first organized in Hamilton, because I was solicited at that time to insure my life. I did not do it, and I have been sorry many times since that I did not. That company has had certain rights and powers of investing in certain securities—in fact any securities they please. They have been in the past successful, and as I am informed have made no losses in these investments. The question now is as to the passage of a law which prevents the continuance of a system which ten years' experience has taught the Government should not be continued. The bill interferes in no way with investments already made, but it prevents in the future their taking similar risks to those which they have been taking. That is really the whole provision of the bill, and it is quite evident to me, from the remarks which have been made by hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and particularly the difference of opinion between two of my colleagues, that it is a grave question whether it would not be better to accept the suggestion of the House as expressed by those who have spoken. However, my hon. friend has the bill in charge. I have no desire whatever to interfere with him in the discharge of what he conceives to be his duty, and, further, I like pertinacity when one has anything to do. My hon. friend from Ottawa laughs. I suppose he thinks that is characteristic of the gentleman who is speaking at this moment. I confess I do not like to be frustrated when I take a thing in hand, and my hon. friend, who is a mixture of Celt and Anglo-Saxon, probably has the same feeling. He submits the clause, and if it is defeated the Government will take the consequences.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The question that is put before us in regard to the amendment is that this be postponed until next session.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We have been discussing the merits of the clause with which we are called upon to deal, whereas I think probably the debate should be confined to the advisability of postponing it till next session or dealing with it at once. There is a good deal in the position of the government that commends it to my mind, and I quite agree with the remarks that have fallen from the hon. Minister of Commerce. At the same time, I think it a reasonable request that the consideration of the amendment be postponed until next session. The Government bring in a general Bill of Insurance and they say for the safety of the public, not taking into consideration any one particular company, that it is desirable that they should limit the investment in certain securities that are offered. The plea has been put forward that those private companies who have their incorporations dating many years back, have the vested right to continue their investments and the privileges accorded to them under that incorporation without regard to this bill. If the Canada Life is allowed to continue to invest its funds at seven or eight per cent as the opportunity or good management may offer, and other companies limited to investments which only produce five or six per cent, or four per cent, as the case may be, it gives the Canada Life or other companies who have those vested interests a very great advantage over their sister corporations in the conduct of their business. It is a very great question to my mind whether it is not advisable to put all insurance companies upon the same basis, and not give companies which have this vested right that particular advantage. For that reason I would be disposed to support the Government, but I think it is a reasonable request that this matter should not be forced on the House at the present time, but that it should be delayed till next session.

The amendment was agreed to on a division.

The main motion as amended was then adopted.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—It has been remarked here that this is the first occasion on which members of the Cabinet have disagreed on a government measure in the Senate. I can say it is not the first occasion. When Sir David Macpherson was Minister of the Interior, he introduced a bill here—I think it was the Torrens system bill. Sir Alexander Campbell requested him not to move that bill, and added: "I cannot vote for it—if you move it, I will vote against you." I rose and said to Sir David Macpherson at the same time that I would vote against it, that I could not be a party to such legislation. There is a precedent if one is required.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Although there may be a precedent for it, I think it is one that it is not desirable to follow.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (164) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the suspension of the rule, and that the bill be read at length the second time at the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This practice, which was introduced for the first time about three years ago, of dispensing with a certain number of day's attendance, is a very objectionable one. Under this practice gentlemen who leave their legislative duties and go away to attend to their affairs, which they think more important than their legislative duties here, are enabled to be paid at the expense of this country for the time that they have been absent, just as though they had been present attending to their duties here. That is a highly objectionable proceeding. There is not much doubt but that there is a looseness in the other chamber with respect to the attendance of members. It has been stated that gentlemen who have been absent from the House of Commons for a very long time occasionally drew a surprisingly large proportion of their indemnities. That is only a rumour; but with respect to our own House, under the 26th section of this Act respecting the Senate and the House of Commons, a provision is made which is to the effect that every day after the first day upon which a member attends a sitting, upon which there is no sitting of this House, counts for the member as though he had been in attendance. It is provided that a member must attend at least thirty-one days. The meaning of that was that a member could not draw his thousand dollars less the deduction for absence unless he had been here thirty-one days. There are one or two words in section 26 which nullify the effect of that.

Each day during the session, after the first on which the member attends as aforesaid, on which there has been no sitting of such House in consequence of its having adjourned over such day, shall be reckoned as a day's attendance in such session.

The consequence of that is, as we have seen in several sessions, an hon. gentleman comes here and is present at one or two or three sittings, at the beginning of the session. He then goes home and attends to his own business during the remainder of the session, and then at prorogation he is entitled, under the construction put upon this Act, to draw nearly as much money as if he had remained a whole session, and when we give him twelve days, we increase the evil. Take the present session for an illustration. This has been an unusually long session. By Saturday we will have been sitting seventy-two days. An hon. member could come here the first day of the session and never come again—he could have gone home and attended to his own business and never appeared at the capital again during the session. He is allowed to deduct twelve days off the seventy-two by this measure before us. That leaves sixty sittings, which are to be deducted at the rate of $8 a day. That is $480 deducted from $1,000, leaving $520, paid to a member, besides his travelling allowance for coming here and attending one day. That is a clear violation of the intention of Parliament when this Act was passed. I look upon it as a serious scandal, and it is the duty of the Government, who are responsible for the public money, to see that the money of the country in the future is not paid away to gentlemen who do not come here to earn it. I have the greatest respect for a number of these gentlemen who do that; it has been the practice for a great many years, and it is a practice which should be put an end to. As a general thing gentlemen who do absent themselves are men to whom the money is no object. They are nearly all rich men. It is the duty of the Government to have this law so amended next session that this abuse cannot be perpetrated and put an end to this ignoble practice of bringing in a measure to pay members as though they had been serving the country when they were attending to their own business. If the indemnity is not large enough, the correct and respectable thing is to increase it, but if it is large enough, gentlemen have their choice, and if they leave their parliamentary duties and attend to their own private affairs, they should suffer the consequences. The country should not pay them for the time when they have not been attending to their parliamentary duties.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend has not spoken too strongly on this subject. I remember three or four years ago having brought the subject before the then leader of the Government in this House, who at first thought that the law was not correctly expounded by my hon. friend, and that it was too absurd to imagine that that was the consequence of the Act. The leader of the House was convinced of the correctness of my statement that actually the law offered a bonus to members to come here at the opening of the session and remain away the rest of the session. By coming they retain their seat. Those who are called to this House are presumed to be men qualified to come here for legislative purposes, and I believe they have no right to hold seats here unless they attend to their public duties. It is an invasion on the rights of the people to come here for a day or two and go away for the rest of the session. I agree with my hon. friend that to those who stay away the indemnity is of no importance—they do not care if the law is changed, but in addition to that to give those people actually a bonus of twelve days additional is simply a corrupt practice. This is only intended for one session it is true, but two years ago, when we had a long session, we had it before. It is now being perpetuated. In fact, we might as well put it permanently on our statute-book. I believe it is wrong and inducing members to neglect their public duties. I come here at the beginning of the session and remain here at any sacrifice to attend to my public duties. Men who are not prepared to do that should stay at home and submit to the reduction made, but to get this indemnity every year without earning it is unjust to the public and not fair to those members of the House who are regular in their attendance. If this thing is attempted again, I give notice that I shall oppose any such legislation. If the indemnity is not large enough let it be increased, but let those who stay away pay for it and I would increase the deduction to $10 and punish them for being away from their public duties, instead of offering them a bonus, as we do by this bill, for absenting themselves.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—As this is before the House I should like to point out how it affects those who live far from the capital. The reduction is practically of no value unless you leave and neglect your duties. We who live in Manitoba cannot take advantage of the 12 days. If we were to leave towards the end of the session and take the advantage of it we would leave, probably, at a time when some of the most important legislation is going on. I think some allowance should be made for those who live at a long distance from the capital, to whom a reduction of twelve days does not afford a chance of returning to their homes. It will be nearly five months before I get back, and it is certainly a greater sacrifice to us who cannot go home on a Friday and return on Monday as so many members are able to do, and to whom twelve days affords an extra advantage.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—You get a large mileage.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I get the same proportionate mileage as you do, no more. It costs me $100 to come here and $100 to return. If I make use of a free pass I would save the fare each way, which, including the pullman car, is $120, but I say and believe that the free passes as given at present are improperly given. If free passes are to be given they should be given in such a way as to preserve the independence of Parliament. They should come through the Government as a matter of right or not at all. It is an advantage if public men could have the opportunity of moving about the country freely: the country is so extensive, travel is beyond the means of many. We who stay here and attend to the legislation of the country, and live at such a long distance, are at a disadvantage so far as the allowance made by this bill is concerned.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed on a division.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (159) "An Act respecting land subsidies to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company."—(Mr. Bowell.)

Bill (165) "An Act to amend the Acts respecting Dominion notes."—(Mr. Angers.)

FRENCH TREATY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the third reading of Bill (147) "An Act respecting a certain treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the French Republic."

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Before the bill receives its third reading, I wish to put on record some of the reasons for which I support the treaty—reasons which I would have given the other night but for the lateness of the hour and the general desire to come to a conclusion on the second reading of the bill. I must say at the outset that I do not support the treaty, passed by our plenipotentiaries, Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper, because I feel, as several members of parliament, that we are in duty bound to ratify the same. The Government must stand or fall by the treaty, although they do not seem very much in peril. But Parliament is quite free to act as it pleases whilst admitting that the very gravest reasons alone should prevent us from endorsing the treaty. In a word I support the bill, because I believe the treaty is a fair one, not one-sided as it has been represented, a treaty based on mutual concessions, a treaty advantageous to France, but equally advantageous, if not more, to Canada. In a matter of this kind the Canadian interests should be for the moment our guiding star, and I would not hesitate to denounce the treaty were I convinced that our interests have been sacrificed instead of being advanced by this measure.

It has been said that we have been endeavouring for the last twenty years to negotiate a commercial convention with France, but without success. This is too true. Failures have been as many as our attempts. Three times we have tried and three times we have failed. And now that we have succeeded, after having claimed for so many years the right of making our own treaties, this is not the proper time to jeopardize or minimize the advantages which we have secured through the persistent ability of our diplomats. In the preceding overtures which we have made, what have we asked from France? In almost every case a reduction of her timber duties in exchange for a reduction of our wine duties. And still we were unable to secure even that limited commercial arrangement. Whilst now we have secured the tariff minimum on not less than eighteen articles. It suffices to look at the lists to ascertain that the lumber interest has been fully presented. Building timber in rough or sawn, wood pavement, staves, wood pulp, furniture of common wood, furniture other than chairs, of solid wood, common flooring in pine or soft wood, wooden sea-going ships will all receive the advantage of the minimum tariff. As France imports lumber to the extent of about 16 millions, the treaty opens up an immense market. The lumber interest is by far the greatest industry of Canada. Hundreds of millions are engaged in it. It is an industry in which the Maritime Provinces as well as Quebec and Ontario, not to speak of British Columbia, are deeply interested. The United States, Sweden, Norway and Russia are our strongest competitors in the European market. But this competition is an unequal one at the present moment, as they all enjoy the advantages of the minimum tariff, whilst we have to meet all the disadvantages of the maximum tariff. Mr. Dalton McCarthy holds the view that the difference between the minimum and the maximum tariff on lumber is not very great apparently, but that he would be willing to let that difference be appreciated by practical men. Well, let the practical men speak. I am quite willing to abide by their decision. We heard the other night the hon. gentleman from Gloucester, a leading lumberman, a good judge of lumber, and what he said would warrant us in endorsing the treaty. The hon. member for Northumberland, who sits next to him, is also a well known lumberman, and he has publicly acknowledged the importance of the trade in New Brunswick, from the Miramichi district in particular, and from the port of St. John with the ports of France. He has not hesitated to assert that the non-ratification of this treaty has done that interest a great injury during the past year, that lumbermen would have made a great deal more money if they had been able to prepare their exports on the favourable terms provided by this treaty; and that he and others in this business are anxious and waiting for the ratification to take place. Let us hear another practical man. Among the papers submitted to us in connection with the treaty, there is a letter from Mr. H. G. Goodday, a lumber merchant of Quebec, in which he states:

> The present difference to the prejudice of Canadian wood imported into France is about $1.50 per thousand feet.

I must state here that the hon. members for Gloucester and Northumberland put this figure at about $1.32. Mr. Goodday continues:

> And as shipper of such, I am desirous of speaking to my French buyers with some knowledge of the subject as regards their future position. If some hopes were held out of an early ratification of the treaty there is no doubt that a good and profitable business could be done with France this season. I am given to understand that lumber shipped from the United States to France pays the minimum tariff and I would learn with pleasure that Canada is shortly to avail herself of the same advantage.

In the face of such evidence I am more than surprised to find another prominent man, Hon. Mr. Laurier, stating publicly after having compared the difference between the minimum and the maximum tariff.

> The difference is so small when we consider that lumber is such a bulky article that it is impossible to suppose that we shall derive from it any serious advantage.

If Mr. Laurier does not realize the difference between the minimum and the maximum tariff, the lumbermen of Canada fully realize it, unable as they are, owing to that difference, to compete with Norway, Sweden and the United States, and knowing, at their own expense, that the number of vessels loaded with lumber was reduced from 38 in 1891, to 17 in 1892, the tonnage being reduced from 25,640 tons to 10,775 tons during the same years. Evidently, many of those, even among the cleverest, who denounce or underrate the treaty have made but a cursory examination of its contents and its probable consequences.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Was the minimum tariff in force then?

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Yes, in 1892.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Lumber was free in 1892.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—It was free before France established its maximum and minimum tariff in 1892, that is to say, when France had the conventional and the general tariff. But that is a matter of the past.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If my hon. friend will allow me to interrupt him, I will state that under the minimum tariff lumber is subject to a duty of $1, and under the maximum it was $1.50, so that we are not back to where we were.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Canada is not responsible for the legislation of France.

Hon. Mr. BURNS—Does the hon. gentleman say that lumber was free in 1891?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have the authority of the hon. Minister of Finance in the other House and the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. BURNS—In quoting the different rates a day or two ago, the hon. member from Ottawa mentioned the duty which prevailed in 1891.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not responsible for the statements of the hon. member from Ottawa, but I take it that the statement of the Minister of Finance is correct.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—I have no doubt that that statement is correct. Now let us pass to another item of the treaty. France is also a good market for our canned lobsters. We shall receive the advantage of the minimum tariff. Lobsters form a fourth of our exports to that country. Too much importance cannot be attached to this industry as it represents an annual value of $2,200,000 compared to $1,800,000 for the United States. It appears, however, that the quantity sold in France is much larger than the statistics would make it appear. It is sold under false marks probably by the same dealers who sell our cheese in England under the American stamp. A couple of years ago, the Hon. Mr. Fabre, a former member of this House, and our commissioner in France, drew the attention of the Government to that illicit trade in a letter dated the 25th February, 1892:

There is no doubt that the use of canned lobsters is much greater than appears in the statistics. In my report of the 20th March, 1892, I informed the hon. Secretary of State that one of the results of the Canadian steamship service, just opened with Halifax, was the direct importation of considerable quantities of canned lobsters which formerly came through the United States, where the original marks, as it was proved hereafter, were fraudulently destroyed. The same remark applies to the salmon of British Columbia, which are much in demand in France, as I have been able to ascertain personally in visiting the principal alimentary houses of Paris.

The minimum duty on lobster is $5 per one hundred kilos, and $6 is the maximum. There would be also a fair market for cattle, asbestus and agricultural implements, but I am sorry to say that these are not included in the tariff, the people of France being loath to facilitate the entrance of articles which are in any way connected with agriculture. As to cattle the minimum and maximum tariff is the same, $2 per one hundred kilos and $3.50 for sheep.

Now, let us see the other side of the question. Let us ask what we give to France in consideration of the advantages granted by her to Canada. We suppress the duty of thirty cents ad valorem on all wines containing twenty-six per cent or less of alcohol; we reduce by one-half the present duty on common soaps, savons de Marseille, and we reduce by one-third the duty on nuts, almonds, prunes and plumes. Undoubtedly the greatest concession which we extend to France, is the abolition of the 30 per cent duty ad valorem, but it is a concession that we have been prepared at all times to make. It has been incorporated in our statutes as a standing offer. That duty was even imposed with the object to compel France to come to better terms, and it has fulfilled its object, for the importation of French wines has been increasing slowly ever since, to the profit of Spanish wines, although the use of wine has been more general among the people. In 1878, we imported directly 91,771 gallons of French wine, and, fourteen years after, the amount did not exceed 127,697 gallons, an increase of 39 per cent, whereas the Spanish wines increased from 113,203 gallons in 1878 to 194,111 gallons in 1892, an increase of 71 per cent. The grape growers and the wine manufacturers of the Niagara Peninsula, who have found such a valiant champion in the person of the hon. member for Monck, complain that their present industry will be injured by the abolition of that duty. But they forget that they cannot supply the clarets, the burgundies and the champagnes, that our duties on wines are heavier than those of any country but Russia, and perhaps the United States, that the specific duty of 25 cents per gallon is still charged on all wines, and they have thereby a protection estimated by some, taking into account the purchase price, at 100 per cent.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Say 40 or 50 per cent.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—It is very difficult to estimate correctly the degree of protection, but it is quite sufficient to satisfy the views of a National Policy man, and I am proud to say that I am and have always been one of them. Far from being injurious to the home production, I believe that the introduction of French wines on a greater scale will have beneficial results. It will stimulate the use of wine, replacing I hope the stronger drinks, and thereby promoting the cause of temperance. The countries which consume the most wine are those who number the fewest drunkards. This is a recognized fact. Although France is the richest wine growing country, some have been surprised to learn that she imports more wine than she exports. In 1892, for instance, she exported only 246 millions of francs, whilst she imported 407 millions. France imports second class wines from other countries which, mixed with her own products, make a first-class article. There is no reason why she would not purchase a large quantity of our wine for that purpose. As our producers may require cheaper alcohol to fortify their wines, few will object probably if the Government, with a view to put them on a better footing, reduces the excise duty in a fair and reasonable manner.

It being Six o'clock, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 6 p.m.

THE FRENCH TREATY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ resumed his speech. He said: When we adjourned the debate I was discussing the effect of the import of French wines into this country. I was demonstrating that the import would not injure the growing wine industry in the vicinity of Niagara and the south-west part of Ontario, and I feel confident that unprejudiced minds are satisfied on that point. Moreover, we must not forget that the wine manufacturers of Ontario declare, in their petition to Parliament, that their supply of wines, whether dry or sweet, is equal to the demand, and that they are sold at a cheaper price than wines of the same quality are sold in Europe. If their assertion is correct, and I have no reason to dispute its correctness, our wine manufacturers should have no fear as to the effects of the treaty. It is said that an unfair advantage has been granted to France because she may at any time denounce the treaty if we increase the specific duty on her wines, whilst to put an end to the treaty Canada must give a notice of twelve months. In every other case France must give the same notice. But this clause is not so one-sided as it may look—suppose we become dissatisfied with the working of the treaty, we have only to increase the specific duty on wine, and France herself shall have to terminate the treaty. A great deal has been said about the surtaxe d'entrepôt, but I am afraid it has not been correctly interpreted by the Minister of Finance. What is the surtaxe d'entrepôt? It is a duty of 3 francs 50 centimes charged on every 100 kilos, or 200 pounds, of goods coming from a foreign country and not shipped directly but going through another country to France. But if those goods are not landed at a foreign port and if they are carried, on through a bill of lading to France, they are exempted from the surtaxe d'entrepôt—the law of France leaves no doubt on that point, as we shall see by the following quotation:

When the goods have been loaded at the point of departure upon the same vessel that brings them into France, the transport is considered as being direct, even in the case of cargoes afloat, that is to say, cargoes which at the port of departure had no fixed destination and were not sent to France until after the ship put in at a port where she took orders.

Under the same condition of loading at the place of departure upon the ship by which the importation is made, cargoes afloat cannot be required to arrive in France by the shortest route.

It is also admitted that direct transport by sea is not interrupted by putting into port on they way either in one or more foreign ports, in order to load or unload when the goods that have a right to a preferential treatment have not left the ship and when she has not loaded similar goods in the ports put into.

Sir Charles Tupper interpreted the law according to its true meaning, in a speech delivered on 29th November, 1892, in reply to a deputation from the county of Pembroke, which waited upon him to represent the advantages offered by the port of Milford Haven, in connection with a fast Atlantic service between Canada and Great Britain. Here is his interpretation of the law:

There was, however, one feature connected with the matter which had not been prominently adverted to. It was a feature to which Canada attached a deal of importance. That was they proposed to have not only a direct and rapid communication by going to an English port, but they proposed also to have a direct line of communication between Canada and the continent of Europe by requiring vessels to proceed on to a French port. Owing to a system adopted, and held with such tenacity by France, the trade between Canada and France was quietly obstructed by the want of direct steam communication between the two countries. Now a vessel coming to an English port in the first instance would not at all affect the regulations in France, provided the vessel went on under through bills of lading and delivered her cargo, if intended for France or any port of the continent of Europe, without having landed it in England first. He drew their attention to that because, while listening to the very great attractions that undoubtedly the harbour in which they took so deep an interest was able to present, it occurred to him that they had not fully contemplated the effect of going to a French port.

While referring to this matter, let me tell you that years ago France allowed Canadian lumber to be transported through Norway without paying the surtaxe d'entrepôt, so that France granted us practically a preferential arrangement. Of course, our lumber pays now no surtaxe d'entrepôt as it is shipped directly by vessels which carry at the same time our cattle, our pearlash and our lobsters. I would like to say a word in connection with the steamers——

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is not a part of the treaty.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—If the hon. gentleman will not be so impatient, he will see that the line of steamers has an immediate connection with the treaty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—There is no doubt on that point, and I do not see the object of the uncalled for interruption of the hon. gentleman. It has been stated, and repeatedly stated, that the Government acted with bad faith towards France, having promised to establish a direct line of steamers between that country and Canada, were the treaty to be ratified. No doubt, Sir Charles Tupper has intimated to the French negotiators that such was our intention, that a subsidy of $500,000 had been voted in 1889 by the Canadian Parliament—it was increased yesterday to $750,000—in order to secure a fast line which would connect us directly not only with Great Britain but also with the continent, through a French port. No doubt also Sir Charles Tupper has expressed the view, in his communications to our Government, that without a direct line of steamers, we could not take advantage of the tariff minimum as regards several articles which otherwise would have to pay the surtaxe d'entrepôt, a somewhat prohibitive tax, but there is not a line, not a word to that effect in the treaty. The matter, important as it may be, is not mentioned therein. But it is referred to in a letter, dated 22nd November, 1892, containing the proposals of the French commissioners;

The Canadian Government shall undertake to give a subsidy of £100,000 to a line of steamers having for terminus a French port.

Was that proposal assented to by the Canadian Government? No, on the 11th January, 1893, almost one month before the signing of the treaty, our Government telegraphed to Sir Charles Tupper that they could not accept the proposal anent a subsidy to a line of steamers.

Re French negotiations. Government cannot accept conditions involved in clauses concerning subsidy to steamers, etc.

The treaty was signed in Paris on the 6th February, 1893, and two days later, Sir Charles Tupper telegraphed from London that the notes exchanged between the plenipotentiaries, such as the one referred to, were not binding but optional. Notwithstanding that I have no doubt that such is the policy of the Government, that such is the policy of the Conservative party, and that ere long that policy will be an accomplished fact. We all know that during the years 1887, 1888, and 1889, the Parliament granted a subsidy of $50,000 a year towards a steamship service between France and Canada, at a time when even the smallest treaty did not exist, and that various attempts have been made since to establish such a service although they were unsuccessful, the promoters having neither the capital nor the experience requisite. I am glad to add that at this very moment there are forwarders who have already established a line between Antwerp and Montreal, two of their steamers plying between these two ports—who are negotiating with the view to enlarge their line and to communicate not only with Belgium but with France also. That enterprise I trust will be properly encouraged. I have noticed that there has been much ado over the fact that our exports to France in 1891 only reached $239,000 according to our returns, whilst we purchased from that country $1,671,000 worth of merchandise, so that our power to purchase from France would have been much greater than our selling power to her. Well, let us see the detailed statement of those exports.

Abestus	$29,679 00
Lobsters preserved in their natural form	59,946 00
Building timber, etc	127,225 00
Agricultural implements	13,651 00
Apples, dried	3,125 00
Clover seed	2,687 00
Books	2,000 00
Fruits presrved	1,014 00
	$239,427 00

In this connection I wish to put the public on their guard. Our system of statistics is yet in a very crude, incomplete, and sometimes delusive state. It needs a thorough reform, although much improvement has been effected in some branches.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—I have already established, in this very chamber, that our census was most incorrect, a permanent source of great injustice, in so far as the enumeration of English-speaking and French-speaking citizens of this country is concerned. And no satisfactory reply has been offered to the charge which I made and which is supported by uncontroverted evidence. Since, two eminent French economists, Mr. E. Rameau de Saint-Père and Mr. Onésime Reclus, who follow closely our national growth, have published elaborate criticisms on that subject, the first named gentleman in La Revue Française and the other in the Nouvelles Géographiques, of Paris, in which they fully endorse my contention. I need not add that this remark is not in any way directed against the hon. Minister of Agriculture, as we had not then the advantage of his presence in the councils of the nation. Well, our fiscal statistics, or many of them, I am sorry to say, do not seem to be more reliable in many respects. Such a matter is worth the attention of our indefatigable Minister of Trade. Our exports to France, for instance, have always been reduced by one-half if not more. By what process and for what object? I have not scrutinized the process, but the object may be fairly open to suspicion. This fact has been made quite clear in the course of the negotiations of Sir Charles Tupper with the representatives of France. Our High Commissioner contended, which no one will deny, that the balance of trade was much against Canada in her intercourse with France, that that balance of trade existed even under a tariff lower than the present one; but when he asserted that our imports from France were ten times larger than our exports to her, he was promptly interrupted by the French ministre plénipotentiaire, M. Gabriel Hanotaux, who told him that the figure of $239,000—the estimated amount of our exports to France—was absolutely false, and that the difference between our imports and our exports was not ten times greater, but six times, quite a material discrepancy. Sir Charles Tupper does not easily back down, we all know, but he had to do it. The returns of the various seaports of France were shown to him and he had to acknowledge that the French statistics, accurate as they generally are, were the only correct ones—according to the Canadian returns, the lumber exported to France in 1882 only reached $128,000 against $127,225 for the previous year, whilst the French statistics put the amount at $447,600, a difference of $219,600 in our favour, or a difference almost as large as the total amount of our exports to France, as estimated by our trade returns.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If the hon. gentleman will allow me to quote from the trade returns; I see an importation into France from English colonies in America. That of course includes Canada, Newfoundland, British West Indies, Honduras and all the colonies of Great Britain in America, and they are as follows: principal merchandise, cocoa, 5,500,000 francs; wood,—that is common wood, exotic, 3,100,000 francs; manufactured wood 900,000 francs. That is the total import from the British colonies in America and that is all the imports that are given there—no other of any kind or description. That is the official Trade and Navigation Returns of France.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—If my hon. friend will refer to page 21 of the papers laid upon the Table, the consumating of the negotiating re this very treaty, he will find the following note, dated November, 1892, from the French commissioner on this very point. In that note addressed to Sir Charles Tupper to be communicated to the Canadian Government it was said in connection with our exports from Canada to France:

If, as is customary, the returns at the point of arrival are taken, it is found that the imports of Canadian products into France exceed greatly the proportions given by Sir Charles Tupper, thus: wood in the returns of the exports of Canada stands at 640,000 francs, whereas the returns of the French Customs Department, based upon the rate of valuation adopted by the permanent commission of valuators, show that we have received from Canada, wood of the value of 2,238,000 francs, representing upwards of 20,000,000 kilogrammes. The permanent commission of valuators for the Customs Department value Canadian woods, rough or sawn, as follows: 55 francs if in the rough, and 95 francs if sawn.

If hon. gentlemen will look at the letter from Sir Charles Tupper just preceding this note of the French Minister's they will see the following admission—that our trade returns are not accurate compared with the trade returns from France.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—He does not say that.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—He does—Sir Charles Tupper says:

The French Commissioners showed me replies from the various outports of France as to the amount of wood imported from Canada, and submitted a statement in confirmation of the accuracy of their assertion as to the amount sent from Canada to France, and which I was obliged to admit furnished very strong evidence that our returns of the exports of woods had been under-estimated.

I think I have made my point.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We have here the Trade and Navigation Returns of France. The hon. gentleman has drawn attention to the inaccuracy, according to his statement, of our Trade and Navigation Returns. There must be some tremendous discrepancy somewhere, because I have here the official documents of France and the official documents of Canada, and the total importations from the British American colonies, which includes all the colonies of America, are, cocoa 5,500,000; wood 3,100,000 francs and manufactured wood 900,000 francs. That includes the hardwood of Honduras and West Indies, or wherever wood came from, including Canada and Newfoundland. The exportations from France to all the British North American colonies is put down in the Trade and Navigation Returns of France at 2,600,000 francs whereas our Trade and Navigation Returns show upwards in 1892 of 12,000,000 francs. Our Trade and Navigation Returns show imports of 12,000,000 francs, and Trade and Navigation Returns show exports from France of 2,600,000 francs. There is an extraordinary discrepancy between the two returns.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—There is no doubt of that and that is the point I am making.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That difference could not be the difference in value at the place of export and entry.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is utterly impossible to come to any accurate conclusion of the trade of either country owing to the fact that the statistics are kept altogether differently. I have tried for months through our agent, the Hon. Mr. Fabre, to ascertain the exact importation and the prices paid for the articles coming direct from Canada. In their Trade and Navigation Return, from which the hon. gentleman from Shell River quotes the figures, or from the British provinces or from the American British provinces, as the case may be, and there is no distinction drawn between one province and another in those returns. It is a question I admit you have got to guess at to a very great extent. Then I would point this out, without desiring to interrupt my hon. friend, the statistics of France are more correct, so far as importations from any one country are concerned, than the export return of the country from which they are sent. The hon. member from Halifax knows quite well the difficulties we have had in trying to get the exact quantity of goods shipped from Halifax to a foreign port. I have scores of invoices put in my hand from Newfoundland. The same applies in reference to what my hon. friend has told me in reference to lumber from France. They will put 250 barrels of flour in their export returns when it should be 2,000, and the way we have discovered that is by the export entries made in the port and comparing them with the import entry in the country which they were sent to, and I need not say to my hon. friend from Halifax that that was one of the great causes of complaint they had against me, because I imposed penalties for not acting in accordance with the law, and I give that explanation in order to account for a discrepancy which will always occur so long as the statistics are kept so differently in the different parts of the world.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—It is quite clear that the gentleman who is making a classification has never been engaged in the export trade of Canada, otherwise he would know that there are lots of ways of evading the laws, and I will tell you one of them. The deck-load law reads that a vessel shall not carry a deck-load of over 3 feet after the 1st day of October. If you give a vessel over 3 feet deck-load to a port in Europe you can get a little over freight, and by evading the law in this way it is sometimes profitable. I do not intend to evade the laws any more, but in the lumber trade we clear a vessel to a Mediterranean port, we clear it to Africa, with instruction to proceed to Marseilles. The cargo is sold and we clear to a foreign point to avoid the deck-load law. That is one of the reasons why France does not get credit for all that goes there, and a great many vessels going to French ports are sent in this way, because they have a lower rate of freight from the Baltic than they have to the Mediterranean. We cannot compete with ports north of Brest. When we get down to Bordeaux we can possibly get in there without disadvantage, but when we get into the Mediterranean the freights are pretty nearly equal and that is where the bulk of the eastern province timber trade is with the French Mediterranean ports, and a large number of vessels are cleared to Gibraltar and when they reach there they get their orders. So that for these two reasons we do not get the full value by your Trade and Navigation Returns, because we consign to Gibraltar and call there for orders, and because after the 1st October we consign to an African port to evade the deck-load law.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—I am very thankful to the hon. gentlemen who have so kindly interrupted me, but I must confess that I still stick to my contention that the statistics of France are more accurate than those of Canada in so far as the exports from Canada to France are concerned.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I say that is correct.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—I am not referring to the hon. gentleman. Not only has it been acknowledged by Sir Charles Tupper, our High Commissioner, that our statistics are less accurate in that respect, but the Hon. Minister of Finance has expressed the same opinion. In referring to France some hon. gentlemen, and the hon. member for Marquette is one of them, speak always of a people of 38,000,000, but they forget that the treaty applies not only to that country—and she is still a great country notwithstanding her misfortunes—but also to Algeria and other colonies of France. If my hon. friend had read carefully article 3, he would have found the following words:

> The following articles of Canadian origin imported direct from that country accompanied by certificates of origin shall receive the advantage of the minimum tariff on entering France, Algeria or the French colonies.

What is the population of Algeria, which is considered as a detached part of France, and of the French colonies, which are scattered in almost every part of the world, Asia, Africa, America and Oceania? About 20,000,000, of which Algeria alone counts nearly 4,000,000. These 20,000,000 added to the 38,000,000 of France, form a market of about 58,000,000, almost as large as that of the United States as far as population is concerned. Besides these 20,000,000 of colonists, France controls about 11,000,000 inhabitants of what are called protected countries, Tunis, Madagascar, Annam, Cambodia, Dahomey, Sahara, Soudan and Niger Region. The French colonies import about $52,000,000 and export $57,500,000; most of them are nearer to Canada than to France, or to any European port. They consume more foreign than French goods, and we have already a large trade with Saint Pierre-Miquelon, and some of the West Indies. Now, let me allude to another point. If we judge by the utterances of some newspapers and some public men, this treaty was not made in the interests of Canada as a whole, but made specially to please the province of Quebec. Such a statement is not only ill-advised, inspired by prejudices which should have ceased to exist, but absolutely contrary to the facts. As a province, Quebec is less interested in this treaty than Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, because she exports less to France, and her colonies, according to our returns, than either of these provinces. The whole exports of Quebec to France and her colonies during the year 1892, represent but one-tenth of the exports of Canada to those countries. If you have any doubts on that point let me tell you that during the year 1892, Nova Scotia exported to France and her colonies $470,151, that New Brunswick exported to France and her colonies $148,570, when the exports of the province of Quebec did not exceed $67,356, and in the exports of Quebec we may fairly attribute a considerable share to Ontario, Montreal being the great distributing part of the Dominion. The point will be better illustrated by the following statement:

Exports of the Dominion to France and her colonies during the year 1892.

	To France.	French Colonies.
Ontario	$ 20,489
Quebec	44,592	$ 22,764
Nova Scotia	160,228	309,923
New Brunswick	140,453	8,117
Manitoba	3,243
	$369,005	$340,804
	340,804
	$709,809

From this statement it will appear also that the market of the French colonies is not to be despised, as Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec exported to the colonies almost as much as to France herself.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Where do you take those figures from?

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—From our trade returns.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Was not the bulk of that to St. Pierre-Miquelon?

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—No doubt, but they are French colonies.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They are free ports.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Free ports do not prevent them from being French colonies. In 1890, our exports to St. Pierre-Miquelon reached $184,782: they will necessarily increase. I wanted to show the extent of our trade with France and with the French colonies, and now I am going to contend that the market of that trade is still larger than the figures show.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It really does not affect the trade of St. Pierre-Miquelon.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—I do not say that the treaty does, as they are free ports, but I take into account the trade of France with our provinces. I want to show that there are two provinces which will be more affected by the treaty with France than the province of Quebec. The figures that I have submitted certainly sustain my argument. Much ado has been made, as I said, about the fact that our exports to France are only set down at $329,000 according to the trade returns of Canada. I think it is my hon. friend from Marquette who undertook more especially to make that point.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You did not get those figures from the Trade and Navigation Returns.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—I got them from the hon. gentleman's speech which is supposed to come from a good source. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell me where he did get those figures.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—From the Trade and Navigation Returns of 1893 in the table of the value of exports to countries. The imports according to the Trade and Navigation Returns of 1893 were $2,832,000.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—I am not referring to 1893, but to the figures of 1891, which the hon. gentleman cited the other day. This treaty has been styled the little French treaty, but not, I am sure, with an offensive intent. It may be small as far as the number of articles affected thereby is concerned, twenty-four in all. It may be small if you compare the population of one of the contracting powers with that of the other. It may be small as far as the loss of revenue, if any, is involved. The loss of revenue on the present trade is estimated at $82,000, but we must take into account that our imports from France are bound to be larger, and that the remaining duties will produce larger receipts. But it is not a small treaty if you consider its probable consequences in the near future. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa has tried to minimize France as an importing country, but he is utterly astray. France is not the mistress of the seas nor the greatest centre of trade and commerce, but as a rich nation she comes immediately after Great Britain. She is the second purchasing power of the world, her imports numbering about one thousand millions, the imports of the 65,000,000 of the United State not exceeding $800,000,000. She imports—and this is a material point to us—about $38,000,000 of articles similar to those which are indicated in the treaty; she imports $137,000,000 of goods, ruled by the same tariff which Canada can produce, and she imports also, in merchandise, about $220,000,000 of goods which Canada can produce also. To better illustrate the import of about $38,000,000 of the articles referred to in the treaty, let me mention the following facts. France imported in 1892:—

Lumber	$16,000,000
Fresh water fish, fish and lobster preserved in their natural form	8,450,000
Canned meat	7,300,000
Prepared skins	5,180,000
Flavouring extracts	2,090,000
Staves	2,050,000
Boots and shoes	1,350,000

I referred this afternoon to the extent of the lumber industry—according to those figures, France buys about $16,000,000, which shows how large is her market. Canned meat is also mentioned in the treaty. France imports $8,450,000 of fresh water fish, fish and lobster preserved in their natural form—which I am sorry to see gave so much trouble in so far as translation is concerned.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The translation is not good.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—That may be: I do not think it was translated by the Government.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It was translated on the other side.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—The bill was drafted in Paris?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, in both languages.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Was it signed as prepared in both languages?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—I am sorry the interpretation of the treaty gave so much trouble in our higher circles, because that little incident, coupled with the controversy about soap, was given as the reason for delaying the treaty for a year.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—In putting the interpretation on the treaty, I took the English version, and giving it the same interpretation as we would in administering the Customs Act in this country it would not bear out the interpretation given to it by those who understand the French language, and consequently we were misled by the bad translation, if such it were.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—Well, I am not complaining; I am only asserting a fact which shows, besides, that perhaps the time is not ripe yet for the abolition of the French language, if we care to indulge a little more in diplomacy.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Unless we establish the English in France.

Hon. Mr. TASSÉ—The English language is an offspring of the French language. It is a noble language. But French is the language of the treaties. Let me continue my argument. Without a treaty the ports of France would be almost closed to our trade, as we could not compete with nations enjoying the minimum tariff whilst governed by a maximum tariff, which in many cases means prohibition. It is not a small treaty if you consider that it is but the forerunner of a greater treaty, a real treaty of commerce with France. Small as it is, that treaty is as important as the treaty which the United States secured from France two years ago. By that treaty we have obtained advantages which were denied to the United States; for instance, the admission of lobsters at the minimum tariff, notwithstanding the very strong pressure which they made. It is not a small treaty if you consider that it may be the predecessor of other treaties equally and perhaps more advantageous. Take the case of Spain for one. She exports a great deal of wine to this country, but she will draw no benefit from the present reduction of duty because the alcoholic power of her wines is above 26 per cent, and ere long she will apply probably for some concession for her wine in the fear that they will be superseded by the lighter wines of France. Sir Charles Tupper, I am bound to say, applied for a much larger treaty. Besides the eighteen articles mentioned in the treaty, he urged also the extension of the tariff minimum to asbestus, pearlash—pearlash is free—brooms, agricultural implements and machinery, sewing machines, clover seed, petroleum and coal oil, books, agricultural products, including hay and bran, cheese and butter, eggs, etc. But the High Commissioner had to be satisfied with what was attainable and no man could have done better than he did. In fact, he demanded the application of the whole minimum tariff. But after very serious consideration his proposal was declined, because, among other reasons, the French commissioners apprehended that the United States would direct the same classes of goods to France through the Canadian route. We must not forget also that, however protectionist France may be at present, her duties on Canadian articles will not exceed 10 and 14 per cent, compared to the Canadian duties of 38 and 40 per cent on French goods.

Some have been disappointed because cheese was not included in this arrangement, and I confess that I am one of them. Our cheese has become renowned throughout the world since it took the palm at the Columbian Exposition of Chicago. Cheese has become one of our best and most remunerative agricultural products: more that $13,000,000 is shipped to Great Britain alone, with increasing prospects, and we should lose no opportunity to open new markets to our farmers. A more opportune time could not be selected for that purpose, owing to the fact that the treaty with Switzerland has been rejected by the Chamber of Deputies. That country used to supply the 36,000,000 pounds of Gruyere cheese consumed in France. On that Switzerland will have to pay hereafter 25 francs, instead of '15 francs, the minimum duty, and Canada could produce that kind of cheese just as well as it produces the chedder for the British market. We could have secured the admission of cheese had we been willing to reduce the duties on paintings, engravings, designs and architectural plans, which would have implied a loss to the revenue of about $3,500. I do not know what are the reasons which warranted the refusal of that reduction of duty, but I hope that the matter will be reconsidered, and that new overtures will be made to secure that object at the earliest opportunity. Regarding butter we shall not lose much, France importing very little of the article and exporting a much larger quantity. In 1892, France imported $185,258 worth of salt butter, but she exported during the same year $13,571,125, of which over ten millions were sold to England. Hon. gentlemen, this is not a small treaty if you consider the other difficulties which were in the way of our negotiator. His predecessor, the late Sir A. T. Galt, made so many excessive and uncalled for demands, in the negotiations of 1882, that the French statesmen were led to believe that Canada was not in earnest. Our representative demanded, for instance, what has never been granted to any nation, the abolition of the surtaxe d'entrepôt on all Canadian articles, and of the duties on cutlery and razors, although we have not yet a single manufacture of that kind—I question if the Dominion has yet produced a single razor—and although France is an exporter of cutlery. He also made promises which have never been fulfilled. Sir Charles Tupper had to meet all these difficulties, and it required a man of his commanding ability, of his convincing power, and of his indomitable perseverance to overcome them. Our High Commissioner was, no doubt, ably assisted by Lord Dufferin, Sir Joseph Crowe, and the other members of the British Foreign Office in Paris, but let us give credit to whom credit is due, as he was, in fact, our sole negotiator, his name will remain attached to the treaty, and deservedly so. If you have any doubt you have only to read the letters of Lord Dufferin to Lord Roseberry, of Lord Grey, and of Lord Ripon to Lord Stanley, then Governor General of Canada, which speak in the highest manner of the ability displayed by Sir Charles Tupper and his able assistant, Sir Joseph Crowe. It has been repeatedly asserted by the hon. member for Ottawa that this question was a matter of business and not of sentiment. I agree with him to a certain extent. Still, sentiment is a great factor, a factor which you cannot eradicate from human affairs, even from commercial and political undertakings—there is a sentiment in the fact that trade follows the flag. I would rather deal with people I like, whose blood is mine, whose language I speak, whose laws and usages I know, than with people utterly foreign to me.

The distinguished gentlemen who assembled here lately at the request of the hon. Minister of Trade, from all parts of Australia, from New Zealand, and even frem the Cape, had no doubt a great business to transact. In their collective wisdom, they wanted to discuss the best means to open new avenues of trade between some of the most important colonies of Great Britain, to cement and enlarge their commercial relations, and if possible, to establish differential duties to their and to our own benefit. This was strictly business. But sentiment is not irreconcilable with dollars and cents. Apart from the material considerations, there was a sentiment which prompted them to travel so many thousand miles and to brave the perils of the sea with the view to accomplish such a purpose. Blood is thicker than water, even salt water. They came here also, to make the acquaintance of their elder and more powerful brothers of Canada. They came here to form a league union based on a community of origin and aspirations. They had heard a great deal of the vastness and richness of our domains, of the sterling qualities of their inhabitants, of our illimitable possibilities, and they wanted to see all that with their own eyes. They were proud of Canada before they came, but they tell us that they shall go home still prouder. They shall go home more determined than ever to benefit from what they saw, to make their own land greater, more prosperous and more closely united, and to co-operate in our efforts to throw additional lustre upon a flag which floats all over the world already covered with glory. Such a sentiment I respect and admire. Such a sentiment is most legitimate, most noble. It has made many a great man, it has built many a great nation. This is the very sentiment which, coupled with business considerations, induced the other day every French member of the House of Commons and the other night every French member of the Senate to vote for the treaty. It is true that one of us, and the most eminent on the Liberal side, spoke against the treaty, but, to atone for his offence he had to vote for it. The Mail had said that this treaty was a dream of the French Canadians, but it was likely to be effaced through English influence. Far from that, the treaty has been endorsed also by a great majority of the English speaking element.

Sir Charles Tupper knew the force of that moral power, and in his urgent representations to the French Government, in his efforts to present a case as strong as possible, he did not fail to remind them that there are still beyond the seas one million and a half of people of their blood who, although intensely loyal to Great Britain, still cherish the name of France, perpetuating her best traditions, speaking her noble language, and who would be immensely gratified if commercial relations were opened with her after more than one hundred years of political separation. Hon. gentlemen, in 1855 appeared the first ship, or rather the first sloop of war, la Capricieuse, which the waters of the St. Lawrence had floated since that separation. She was commanded by Mr. de Belvèze, special envoy of the Emperor of France. Almost a century had elapsed, and the rejoicings, the festivities were as general as enthusiastic, our English speaking brothers saluting her arrival with as much warmth as those of French origin. This was the year of the Universal Exposition of Paris. Canada represented by such men as Sir William Logan and Dr. Taché took a most successful part in it, her exhibits being a revelation to the world who had been led to believe that our country was but a few acres of snow. In that very year, under the auspices of Mr. de Belvèze, as the representative of France, and of Sir Edmund Head, as the representative of Great Britain, and in the presence of an immense multitude, was erected on the heights of Quebec a common monument to the heroes of the two nations who had fallen gloriously at the battle of the Plains of Abraham. The oration of the day was delivered by a former president of the Senate, the late lamented Hon. Mr. Chauveau, and it was a speech worthy of the occasion and of his eloquence. This monument teaches us that the days of the sword, of the rifle, of the gun are over, and that it remains to the descendants of those heroes to know but one struggle, the struggle in the arts of peace, in those arts which are calculated to increase the welfare and the grandeur of the nation. That visit of Mr. de Belvèze, was a message of peace and marked a new era; a French consulate was established at Quebec, at the request of the British Government (it is just being removed to Montreal), and the tariff of the countries was rearranged so as to facilitate the exchange of our lumber and other natural products, with the wines, spirits and fruits of France. Nothing but a powerful sentiment could have produced this great commercial transaction. That reciprocal tariff gave for a time quite a stimulus to our commerce, and our customs returns, undervalued as they have always been, fully demonstrate that during some years we exported to France nearly a million of dollars worth of our products. Unfortunately, misunderstandings occurred, the duties were raised on the products of the two countries, and of late years the trade between the two nations has been reduced to comparatively small proportions. To bring back a better understanding, a better trade and more prosperous days is the object of this treaty. Animated by those sentiments and convinced as I am that the treaty is still more advantageous to Canada than to France, that it will be beneficial not only to the province of Quebec, but to all the provinces of the Dominion, I shall not hesitate, acting with the imposing majority of this Parliament, to continue to support this treaty till it has become the law of the land and proclaimed to the world that the Dominion of Canada, in her onward march towards her destinies, is prepared to deal fairly and liberally with all men and all nations of good will.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (158) "An Act further to amend the Inland Revenue Act."

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The object of the first clause is to provide that all the expenses connected with the seizure shall be taken out of the proceeds, and the balance shall be distributed.

The clause was adopted.

On the second clause,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The object of this clause is to enable the Inland Revenue Department to allow spirit to be put under excise supervision in any manufacturing establishment where the article is made for exportation, and not to exact the excise duty upon it. It is really to encourage the manufacture of the article in this country.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Is it really any profit to manufacture a majority of the spirits manufactured here to-day? These spirits are not manufactured out of the native grain, but out of foreign grain, for which we have to pay gold, and worse than that, it is manufactured as raw grain spirit. We can make as good malt spirits here, as in any part of the world out of our native grain, but we have not attempted to do it to any great extent. I can show here, by the returns of the Inland Revenue Department for 1893, that the quantity of native grain used is insignificant as compared with the foreign grain imported and that we are supporting an establishment known as the Excise Department where the great bulk of the revenue which comes out of that department is on spirit, and that spirit is made out of foreign grain for which we are losing $1,649,321 per annum of revenue. We are giving a protection to-day, as against the same article manufactured any where else, of 62½ cents per proof gallon of spirit. In the returns of the Inland Revenue Department, I find that for the last two years an average of 2,638,915 gallons of proof spirit was duty paid and used in Canada. To make that spirit, 49,851,784 lbs. of foreign grain were used—Indian corn. I find that of rye we have used 9,893,545 lbs. That, I presume, is native. We have also used wheat, 702,247 lbs., oats 674,068, barley 104,000—only that quantity of barley, and that was converted into ale or lager beer, as I understand, and not into spirit. Consequently the whole of the spirit is made out of Indian corn and a little rye and wheat, but the quantity of Indian corn as against the rye and wheat is so great that the native grain is hardly worth while speaking of. We are really making spirit out of imported instead of native grain, and consequently it cannot do any good to the country when you take into account that we are losing $1,649,321 of customs by protection of this article. We are losing that much duty to enable these people to manufacture alcohol out of corn, and I hold that it is for the Government to consider whether this is a proper transaction or whether it is not a foolish one. We are encouraging an unwholesome, vicious liquor, an alcohol made out of grain, and compelling our people to infuse it into other liquors because the duty on it is less by $1,649,321 than on the same quantity of malt liquor imported from abroad. This is a point worth looking into. We are going on from year to year and, apparently, do not seem to understand the genius of this thing. It has got so now that it has compelled us not to import good liquor on which we would pay $2.12½ per proof gallon, because liquor brought through the customs-house of the same strength pays $2.12½, and we lose or give to the distiller $1,649,321 per annum for making this stuff. If this is a prosperous pursuit, I fail to see it. I think, perhaps, it is one of the most losing branches of business which we have in the country. It is losing this much revenue every year. If we imported from abroad we would certainly have that much more revenue, and certainly a better spirit because this is a raw grain we are getting. Now the quantity of malt liquor made in this country at present is insignificant, and somehow or other our men do not see the point. If they would only make malt liquor and charge on it duty or excise, there would be some consolation, and we would feel that we were making a good liquor and leading our people to drink good liquor, but instead of that, we are restricting them to a liquor, which nobody would drink if they knew what good liquor was, and we are charging them too 900 per cent duty on it. Everybody in this country who drinks this liquor is paying 900 per cent duty on it. If we want this raw grain spirit or alcohol for medicinal purposes we can import it from the United States, and there we get it for a great deal less than half the price at which we can make it here, and yet we are compelled to use it from year to year, because it is shutting out the same quantity of good liquor which would come through our customs-house and we are losing a million and a half of dollars every year from the manufacture of it, yet there seems to be nobody to take hold of the matter and it is multiplying officers until we are eaten up by them and other expenses attending this Excise Department.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. BOWELL — The principal change in this clause is to give power to refund the excise duty which has been paid upon spirits which have been used in the manufacture of malt extract when exported and the drawback also upon the malt.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no change in the duty?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice there are two or three words left out in paragraph "A" in the bill, "without any allowance for ."

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I think it appears in the last clause. It was brought under my notice during the consideration of the tariff that if they were given a drawback of the 2 cents per pound upon malt that they could carry on a general manufacturing business in Canada for export. Now as the principle of the excise law is not to exact duty upon liquor or beers in which malt is used if it does not go into consumption, it was thought advisable to extend the rebate to any manufacturing establishment that would manufacture any of these articles for exportation. It is to encourage the manufacture in this country and to give employment to our people.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Every article of that kind should be manufactured out of our native grain. Anything by which we could use our native grain should be encouraged, but alcohol is used for every kind of liquor in Canada. Whisky is virtually alcohol diluted with water.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think my hon. friend should run down our native whisky.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I am in favour of malt from our native grain.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—We are not dealing with the question of the manufacture of spirit at all, and in case we were, probably the remarks of the hon. gentleman might receive more attention than they have received at my hands just now.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL, from the committee, reported the bill with an amendment, which was concurred in.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LAND SUBSIDY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of the Bill (159) "An Act respecting the subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway." He said: The bill is important in one respect and simple in another. As the House is aware, under the Subsidy Act, lands were granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway in alternate blocks. A large portion of the land lying between Medicine Hat and Calgary on this side of Calgary is of a somewhat arid character from the fact that for two or three years out of five there is scarcely any rain. Consequently it is of a character which the Canadian Pacific Railway can refuse to take, not being arable or suitable for settlement. But there are about two million acres out of the twenty-five that have not been set apart for this company, and the company have agreed that if the Government will allot them their lands on this portion of country which is supposed not to be arable, though the soil is good provided it is watered, in blocks instead of alternate sections, they will accept that land, and through a system of irrigation bring it under cultivation. All it requires is water to make it probably one of the most fertile portions of the North-west. The House can readily understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any person owning that land, would not be willing to construct ditches to convey the water from the mountains or from the river and thereby irrigate the whole portion of the country if one half of the whole land thus benefited was to pass into the hands of other people. The Government believe, and I think the House will affirm the proposition that it is better, if that land by means of irrigation can be brought under cultivation, to give it to the company in block instead of in sections. Provision is also made in the law protecting the sections which were reserved for school purposes, and also those sections which belong to the Hudson Bay Company. Their rights will not be interfered with until arrangements can be made with the Hudson Bay Company, by which they will either sell to the company or receive other lands in other sections of the country equally good in lieu of the lands which would be affected by this irrigation. These are the whole of the provisions of the bill, and in the other House it was supported on a vote by the whole House less some 15 members.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Before the Orders of the Day are taken up, with the consent of the House I should like to say a few words on a question which the Catholic members of Manitoba have very much at heart. I quite understand that this is not the proper time to make long speeches, but I wish to say a few words. At the opening of this session, I had the honour of making a motion for the production of papers in connection with the Manitoba school question. I expected these papers would have been brought down early in the session, and would be printed and distributed amongst the members so that all the facts connected with that question would be before the House and discussed, and it was my intention then to make a motion founded on these documents. It is a disappointment to me not to have had those documents printed and distributed, but I have to deal with the circumstances as they exist, and, after all, as there is an appeal pending at present before the Privy Council, there may be no harm in suspending the consideration of the matter. I want, however, to inform the Government, the House and the country, that whatever may be the outcome of that appeal, we have no intention to recede from the position which we took at the outset, and it is the intention of the Catholic members of Manitoba to pursue their case as strongly as any constitutional means will allow. I wish also to put before the public a new incident in connection with this question. I want to refer to the legislation of the Manitoba Legislature during this last spring. These are public statutes to which I may refer. By the law of 1890 we contended that we had a right through the municipalities to levy school taxes to maintain our schools. We were deprived of our share of the public money, but we maintained our schools. After paying taxes for the other schools, we were still maintaining our schools out of our own money, and we imposed school taxes and the machinery of the law enabled us to collect those taxes, but in the legislation of the session of 1894, the Legislature of Manitoba has gone a great deal further. They have enacted that we shall not be able to collect any school taxes from the Catholic ratepayers by means of the municipality. That is the law now. It is an amendment to Chap. 127, sec. 151, of the Revised Statutes of Manitoba. That section provided that schools not conducted according to the regulations and the law of 1890 should not receive any share of the public money. The new enactment goes on :

Nor in the municipal grant under section 115 and 116 of this Act, nor shall any school assessment be levied or school taxes be collected for the benefit of such school.

Though it may be the logical outcome of the first law, the first law being unjust to us we contend that this is an aggravation of the injustice, but the law goes further. The Act of 1894 goes so far as to confiscate our real and personal estates. Under the law that existed before 1890, we bought land for school purposes, erected buildings and school-houses and furnished them. All this property by the law of 1894, is confiscated. That law defines the duties and the powers of the municipalities when the organization of a school district fails to be continued by reason of non-election of school trustees or abandonment or non-performance of duties by school trustees. One of the duties of school trustees is to maintain the schools according to that new law, and by non-performance of this duty, by not conforming themselves to the law, the school district comes under this clause :

The council of the municipality in which such school district lies shall have full power and authority and it shall be the duty of the said council to take charge of all the property of such school district, real and personal and to administer the same for the benefit of the creditors of such school district, if any.

Hon. gentlemen will see that all lands upon which schools are built, the school-house itself, the furniture, and even the money, if they could lay their hands upon it, would be confiscated. The municipality would have the right, and it is even their duty, to realize on this property, real and personal. What would be the result? First, they will have to pay the liabilities. I may mention that our school districts were generally without liabilities. What will they do with the residue? They will act with the residue according to subsection 2 of section 2 of chapter 28, 57 Victoria, 1894, which reads as follows :—

Any funds which shall arise from the administration of the said property shall, after payment of liabilities, be kept in a special account to the credit of such school district, and disposed of as nearly as may be in accordance with the provisions of section 89 of this Act.

Now, the provisions of this section 89 of Revised Statutes, says :

And the residue of such proceeds shall be applied to the erection of a new school-house in the old school district, or to other public school purposes of such old school district.

When it is said that it must be applied in that way, it means clearly that that money must be applied to school purposes according to the Public School Act. As the Catholics cannot conform themselves to that School Act, the consequence will be that the money realized from the sale of school property purchased by our own money will be used to build school-houses for other people who have never contributed any portion of it. That is regular spoliation. I merely want to state facts which may be of some importance to hon. gentlemen, and leave it to them to appreciate the high-handed policy of the Manitoba Government. As to the North-west schools, it has been stated many times that the Catholic institutions were not subject to the regulations of the North-west schools as established at present in the North-west. I will merely read here an official document coming from the North-west Territory, and here again I shall leave the facts to be appreciated by this honourable House. At the beginning of this year, 1894, a sister, who used to be a teacher in Battleford, applied for a certificate. It is recognized that she possessed the qualifications in this way :

It is hereby certified that the Rev. Sister Lucie (Herminie Vilandié) has passed the non-professional examination, held in Nicolet, June, 1893, for second standing (Model School Diploma, P.Q.)

(Sgd.) JAMES BROWN,
Sec. C.P. Instruction.
REGINA, 12th April, 1894.

No.—The holder of this may (on satisfactory proof of age and character) be admitted to a Normal School to be trained for a professional certificate.

Now, strange as it appears, it is recognized she has the proper qualifications for a second class non-professional certificate. Still she is given permission only to teach with a third class permit.

Rev. Sister Lucie is hereby given permission to teach in the Territories with a third class standing until the opening of the Normal school session for second class teachers for September 1894.

Now, here is the letter communicating the same :

MADAM,—Inclosed please find non-professional second class certificate in your favour on the strength of your standing in the province of Quebec. Permission is given you to teach with a third class certificate until the opening of the Normal session for second September next. The application of certificate in your favour was made by Mr. A. E. Forget, Assistant Indian Commissioner. Yours truly,

(Signed) JAMES BROWN,
Secretary C. P. I.

Rev. Sister Lucie,
Battleford, Sask.

This shows plainly, notwithstanding the statement that our religious orders were not subject to the regulations of the Normal school, that they are. Had this information been before the House, I am sure that the statement would not have been made. It has been stated also that we could not quote any book to which we objected. I have here a book which is on the list of text-books for Normal school teachers, and I could refer to one sentence in which the Jansenists are spoken of as the only people who understood education and tried to improve it, but neither their piety nor their zeal could save them. It says :

What a contrast between the direct attack on the mind and intelligence of the pupil made in these schools, and the ingenious waste of time practised by the Jesuits. The Jansenists were the best hope that French education ever had, and their success was too much for the jealousy of their rivals. Neither piety, nor wit, nor virtue could save them.

Here is another sentence :

The human mind revolted from the fetters in which the clergy had attempted to confine it.

There are many other sentences in this book of a similar character. This is not the proper time to discuss whether these opinions are right or not, but we contend that they are false, ridiculous, offensive, and in matters of religious feeling we have the right that our feelings should be respected everywhere. Here they are not, and consequently this book is an objectionable one to us. That is a book which is put on the list of text-books for Normal schools in the North-west Territories. I do not intend to make a speech. I simply want to call the attention of the Government to our position and to give the House certain facts in regard to the treatment we are receiving in Manitoba and it the North-west. I have to thank the House for the kind hearing that has been given me, and I hope that these new facts will lead this House and the public at large to think over this serious matter and ultimately to see that the Catholics of Manitoba and of the North-west should receive full justice.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—As the Government on a previous occasion congratulated the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface for the moderation he showed in dealing with the school question, it is my duty to repeat that compliment and congratulation to him to-day. At the beginning of his remarks he very properly referred to the fact that there was an appeal now pending in England upon this subject. He may also rely that the Government will give its earnest attention to the petitions that have been sent to the Privy Council relating to this question. He also referred to the Manitoba statute of 1894 by which, it is alleged, the minority in Manitoba have been deprived of the machinery necessary to collect taxes for the support of their schools, and also, as they allege, confiscating their school-houses if not used for the purpose of public schools within a given time. I may, upon this very point, also assure the hon. gentleman that it will be the duty of the Government to look closely into this matter and to report upon the effect and wisdom and validity of the legislation of which he complains.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Before proceeding with the business of the House I desire to call attention to the report of yesterday's proceedings in one of the newspapers of the city. I refer to the Ottawa Citizen. I have been now about twenty-seven years in parliament and it is the first time I have ever conceived it necessary to call attention to any remarks which may have been made, or any reports which may have appeared, in the newspapers in reference to anything that I may have said or done as a member of parliament, but the character of this report is such that I take the earliest opportunity of setting the matter right. It seems to me that newspapers which do not send reporters to the Senate to take notes of the proceedings should be careful how they pick up from the lobbies the remarks or statements which may have been made in this House. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen who have not read the report will be a little amused and surprised when I read to them a few lines from it. Speaking of the amendment which my hon. friend to my right had proposed in the Insurance Bill, and the fact that he subsequently withdrew it, this is reported to have occurred :—

That amendment, said Sir Frank, had been agreed upon between him and Mr. Angers as a compromise, and he fully expected it would have been moved.

Hon. Mr. Angers, replying to several senators, persisted in pressing the motion.

Thereupon Hon. Mr. Bowell remarked that if the Minister of Agriculture conceived it to be his duty to press this clause and the government were defeated then he would have to take the consequences.

"Fortunately, hon. gentlemen," was Mr. Angers's rejoinder, "I have but one leader."

In order that it may be fully understood what did take place I asked the official reporter of the Senate to give me his notes and I find that Mr. Angers's remarks were as follows :

I wish to explain to the House that what I have done in relation to withdrawing the amendment, I have been authorized by the leader of the Government to do and I have done nothing that anybody in this House or outside of it has a right to question. What I have done is within my right, and my authority and instructions.
The amendment of Senator McInnes was then carried "on division" and thus the incident ended.

There is nothing in that to imply that the hon. gentleman had any reference to myself when he used the word "leader." I find that my closing remarks were as follows :

The bill interferes in no way with investments already made, but it prevents in the future their taking similar risks to those which they have been taking. That is really the whole provision of the bill, and it is quite evident to me, from the remarks that have been made by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and particularly the difference of opinion between two of my colleagues, that it is a grave question whether it would not be better to accept the suggestion of the House as expressed by those who have spoken. However, my hon. friend has it in his charge. I have no desire to interfere with him in the discharge of what he conceives to be his duty, and further, I like pertinacity when you have anything to do. My hon. friend from Ottawa laughs, I suppose he thinks that is characteristic of the gentleman who is speaking at this moment. I confess I do not like to be frustrated when I take a thing in hand, and my hon. friend who is a mixture of Celt and Anglo-Saxon, probably had the same feelings, submits the clause, and if he is defeated the government will take the consequences.

Now those who read this official record, in which I have made no changes or amendendments whatever, will see that the report of the newspaper is altogether wrong. If there was any feeling existing between my hon. friend and myself there is not the slightest danger I can assure this country, of there being any duel between us.

EXTRA SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved :

That when this Senate adjourns to-day, at the second sitting thereof, it do stand adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock in the morning, such sitting to continue until one o'clock in the afternoon, unless the Senate be sooner adjourned, when the Senate shall stand adjourned until three o'clock in the afternoon, such sitting to continue until six o'clock in the afternoon, unless the Senate be sooner adjourned, when the Senate shall stand adjourned until eight o'clock in the evening; and that each of such sittings be considered a distinct sitting.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (140) "An Act further to amend the Acts respecting the North-west Territories."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. POWER—How many judges are there in the North-west Territories?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There are four. This is to provide for a kind of court of review, or appeal, composed of three judges, but the judge who rendered judgment in the first instance is not to sit in review on his own judgment. The law is similar to that which we have in the province of Quebec in our court of review.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is a matter on which there are differences of opinion amongst lawyers and judges, as to whether or not it is desirable that the judge who has given the decision in the court of first instance shall sit at the hearing of the appeal. What I wish to direct the attention of the Government to is the inconvenience that may possibly arise under the operation of this enactment if it becomes law. There are four judges of the Superior Court in the North-west Territories. The Court of Appeal is to be composed of three. We provide by this enactment that the judge who has given the decision appealed from, shall not sit in the Court of Appeal; that reduces the possible court of appeal to just three judges. Now, if one of those judges happens to be ill, or absent from the Territories on leave, the appeal cannot be heard. This amendment ought to be qualified, so as to provide that the judge shall not sit, unless his presence is necessary to constitute a quorum. Every professional man in Nova Scotia knows that where there are seven judges, and the court may be composed of only four, there is sometimes a difficulty in getting a quorum to hear an appeal under the same rule excluding the judge who has heard the case in the first instance. As a matter of prudence, the minister ought to add to that "except in cases where the presence of such judge is necessary for the purpose of constituting a quorum."

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—As to the propriety of a judge sitting in review on his own judgment, we have had the experience of it in the province of Quebec for many years, and it was found inadvisable that it should be permitted, and consequently the law has been for years past, in that respect, as this clause provides. There may be something in the second objection of the hon. member, that the judge might be sick and the court could not sit for want of a quorum. I may state that this clause has been fully weighed, and it has been offered by the judges themselves as it stands. This clause and the next preceding one have been both recommended by the judges. They being in the territory themselves have seen no disadvantage in proposing it as it is. However, I would have no very great objection to adding the words mentioned by the hon. member, although it is strange that the jurisdiction of a judge should be optional. It is perhaps better to let the clause stand as it is; the judges themselves, who must have weighed this objection, have offered it as it is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is unnecessary to call the attention of the House to the fact that although judges, as a rule, are very wise and judicious men, still it must be remembered that the position of a legislator is different from that of a judge—that these judges were looking at what they considered an abuse. They thought on the whole that it would be better that the judge who had given the decision in the first instance should not sit in the Court of Appeal, and they did not advert to the possibility of the ends of justice being defeated if one of the number happened to be ill or unavoidably absent.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That would not escape their attention.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not responsible for the conduct of business in the North-west Territories, but I think it would be decidedly wiser to prevent a delay of justice, perhaps in an important case. While I think the tendency of opinion just now is against having the trial judge sitting in the Court of Appeal, still there is no uniform rule on it. In some English speaking countries, and in some of our own provinces, the judge sits on appeal from his own judgment. There is this advantage about it, that he can give information about the demeanour of the witnesses and other circumstances which they could not get otherwise. I do not think there is any serious objection to it, and it would be a very much more serious misfortune that an appeal shall fail altogether for want of a quorum.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—In the province of Nova Scotia, as my hon. friend says, although the court is composed of seven judges, contingencies have arisen in more than one case in which it was impossible to get a quorum of four judges. In Nova Scotia a judge never sits on a case that was tried before him in the first instance. I have known of two instances in which appeals have been delayed in consequence of the difficulty of getting a quorum. It is a question to my mind whether a judge could sit in review on his own judgment.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have no objection to adding those words—"Unless his presence is necessary to constitute a quorum."

The amendment was adopted and the clause as amended was agreed to.

On clause 16,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause makes a change the propriety of which I doubt. Section 3, of the Act of 1891, fixes the term of the Assembly at three years, unless sooner dissolved. This section extends the term of the Legislative Assembly from three to four years, but it seems to me that this section should not go into operation until after the termination of the present Legislative Assembly, because the electors of the North-west Territories elected the present Legislative Assembly for three years, and the electors have the right to have these gentlemen return their mandates at the expiration of the three years.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Their parliament expires, I believe, this fall, and it is not the intention to give the present occupant a longer lease. I have no objection, however, in order to make it clearer, to add these words: "This shall not affect the duration of the present Legislative Assembly."

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 17,

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the first subsection, I wish to ask whether the Governor sits with his council, or apart from them?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—He sits with them. I have to offer an amendment to this section, which will be a third subsection, as follows:

That the Legislative Assembly may by ordinance make such provision as may be deemed necessary for the filling of any vacancy or vacancies that may at any time occur in the Executive Committee during the recess and between the sessions of the Assembly, whether such vacancy or vacancies are occasioned by death, resignation, or otherwise; provided that any action taken under the provisions of such ordinance shall be subject to confirmation by the Assembly at its first session held next after such action has been taken.

This is to provide for the filling of a vacancy in the council in case of one of them resigning or dying during the recess. One to replace him may be chosen, which choice is to be ratified by the House as soon as it meets. At present there is no provision for such an occurrence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not objecting to this, but one cannot help realizing that what they have in the North-west Territories is not a copy of the British form of government and of our own form of government here. The Executive Committee, according to the British practice, are appointed by the Executive, by the Governor or whoever represents the Queen, but in the North-west Territories they are appointed by the Legislative Assembly.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, they are advisers given to the Lieutenant-Governor by the House. They have no responsible government. I would rather class them as a crown colony.

The clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments.

The bill was then read the third time and passed, under a suspension of the rule.

DOMINION NOTES AMENDMENT BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (165) "An Act to amend the Act respecting Dominion Notes."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume what this means is that the Government can borrow five millions more without putting up any more security than they have.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—They get a loan by issuing notes and borrowing, but there is sufficient gold already as security for the issue.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I hope the issue will be made in small notes. There is a deficiency of small notes, which is a great inconvenience to the public. Perhaps it would be well to double the issue. The security, of course, is as good as gold, and is redeemable with gold, and why should not the country have the convenience and the profit as well? I consider that we could circulate a great deal more money than we do, and the country wants it. The Government has a right to some of the profits of currency. The sound policy and credit of a Government supply the place of gold so far as the public confidence is concerned. It is a legitimate Government operation, and a source of convenience and profit to our whole people. When a bank wishes to increase its own issue of notes, it has to deposit 40 per cent of the proposed issue with the Government, in gold, for which it gets the like quantity of Dominion notes, which it is obliged to hold in its vaults as a guarantee against its own note circulation. Dominion notes redeemable in gold are more convenient for circulation than gold.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This may not be an inopportune moment to call the attention of the Government to the fact that when we passed the Bank Act it was understood that when notes became old and filthy they should be returned and new ones issued. I am quite sure the Government are prepared to do that. In drawing money out of a bank you are often given a quantity of notes that have a frightful stench about them and carry and propagate disease, and yet the banks will not conform to the law that when notes become old they must be exchanged. The cost of the exchange would be trifling, and it would be a convenience to all. I cannot understand how it is that tellers in banks are not more frequently attacked by disease. Our currency is much more satisfactory where it is clean and there is no reason why we should have a dirty, filthy circulation as we have.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa is one which should be enforced. I shall call the attention of the Finance Department and the Minister of Justice to it. The suggestion of my hon. friend from Lunenburg, of course, requires a great deal of consideration and discussion. Personally, I confess I am strongly of his opinion, but the banks are very powerful and they object to any interference with currency out of which they make a good deal of profit, but I will not enter into any discussion of that kind. We have had experience of it in the United States and in other countries and after all, when we look at the stability of the banking and monetary institutions of Canada, and when we see the sad failures and disasters occurring all over the world, it makes us feel proud that we have a banking system so perfect in its character, that notwithstanding all the crashes throughout the world we have not had the loss of a bank, except a small one in Winnipeg, and that was through reckless management and not through losses.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN MANUFACTURES ALLOWANCE DRAWBACK BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (166) "An Act to amend the Act to provide for the allowance of the drawback on certain articles manufactured in Canada, for use in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that the rule be suspended and the bill be read the second time at length at the Table.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to make one observation with respect to this bill, the purpose of which is to carry into effect the provision in the original charter of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and, I think, the bill simply gives that particular provision of the charter to which it refers a fair and liberal construction. That naturally suggests to one how much Canada has done for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and suggests that the company ought to be willing to go as far as they can in the way of helping Canada. Now, hon. gentlemen know how the people in certain portions of the North-west suffer from the high rates which they have to pay for transportation. I am not saying that these rates are higher than are charged on other roads, but they are high enough to injure materially the settlers of the North-west, for whom we have built this road and for whom we have spent a great deal of money. There is another thing which we might consider when we look at the condition of things; for instance, in California, a state which has got to be almost completely, as far as its transportation is concerned, in the hands of the Southern Pacific Railway, a great corporation like our Canadian Pacific Railway, we find that all the people in the rural sections of that state are hostile to that railway company, and that they have broken out into almost what is civil war in consequence of the exactions of the company. It would be wisdom on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company here to make some concession to the people in the North-west to prevent things coming to such a crisis as they have come to in California. The Government have something to say with respect to the rates charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and when this matter is under consideration it would be well to look forward to the possibility of the people in the North-west breaking out as the people of California have broken out against the Southern Pacific. I am not finding fault with any one, but I am indicating that it would be the part of wisdom to avoid, perhaps, very serious difficulties in the future if the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company can, between them, secure some reasonable reduction in the transportation rates in the North-west.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It seems that the greatest trouble in the North-west is the low price of the products of that country. If those products were bringing anything like what you would suppose is their normal value, there would be no dissatisfaction nor, from what I can hear, would the rates be thought excessive. In fact, I understand that the main line of the Canada Pacific railway does not pay expenses. It must be in the interest of the company to do all in their power to promote the settlement of that country and the prosperity of those who go into it, and I do not think the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has taken any other view, or pursued any other course than that which would be in their interest and in the interest of the settlement of the country. Though we have done a great deal for the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway has done a great deal for Canada; in fact the existence of Canada as a confederation to-day is due largely to our putting through the railway at the time we did. But for that I am afraid there would have been far more dissatisfaction in Canada than there is in California. It is the pride of Canada and the wonder of the world that we have such a railway, and one built in such a manner and in such a short time. The Government gave liberal aid and encouragement to the company, and the company possessed indomitable pluck and perseverance to go on with the road at the time that they did, and we must be all thankful to them for what they have done. The allowance for a drawback for the duties charged on all articles used in the original construction of the road was only right. Having accepted all subsidies and land grants is proof of the completion of the original construction, but wooden works were considered merely temporary for public convenience and should not be considered original or permanent construction.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

SUBSIDIES OF LAND IN AID OF RAILWAY COMPANIES BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (158) "An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in land to certain Railway Companies."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the suspension of the rule and the second reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the Minister can tell us whether these are re-votes or new?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—They are most of them new, but some were promised aid before. This Rocky Mountain Railway subsidy is new. It is to aid the construction of a road from north of Calgary to the Rocky Mountains to where large deposits of anthracite and other coal have been discovered. It is believed to be in the interests, not only of the company itself, but of that section of the country. Considering the charges made for coal in different parts of the North-west, it is in the interest of every portion of the North-west that fuel, in so cold a country, should be made as cheap as possible, and by the construction of this road it will open up and develop a large coal field, and by that means furnish to the settlers of the country, as well as the residents in the towns of Calgary and Edmonton, and other places, cheaper coal. With regard to the proposed subsidy of land for the Pipestone branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I may say that on the 14th July, 1892, the secretary of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made an application for a land subsidy, at the usual rate of 6,400 acres per mile, for a line of about 32 miles forming the westerly extension of the Souris branch of that company's line. It was represented, and it is the fact, that the construction of this extension had the effect of affording railway and market facilities to an important section of country at that time without them, that is to say, the section of country laying between the Souris valley and the Pipestone valley, in which there was a large and flourishing settlement. It was a matter of very great consequence that the construction should have been proceeded with during that season, in order to enable the farmers to get out their crops, and the company accordingly, without waiting for the action of Parliament upon the application, proceeded with construction and completed it during that season. The Government did not ask the approval of Parliament, at its last session, of any subsidies in land to railways, and as business was very much hurried up at the close of the session, it was not thought expedient for a short line of thirty miles to then ask for the requisite parliamentary authority. This explanation is made in view of the objection that has been taken in the past to the authorization of subsidies for lines of railway already constructed. There can be no doubt that the Pipestone branch was undertaken and finished on the strength of an understanding between the Minister of the Interior at that time—Mr. Dewdney—and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that the subsidy now asked for would be granted. From my own personal knowledge, having travelled through that portion of the country two or three years ago, I know that it is very important that the road should be constructed from the Souris valley to the Pipestone valley. Some portions of the land are very good for settlement. The coal fields, also, are on the banks of the Souris River, which were not then developed, but which may be in the future, although not to a very great extent at present. The coal in that section of the country, so far as ascertained, is not supposed to be as good as that further west, particularly that to which I have just referred. Still, it burns, and while it is of a shaly character, it answers very well for domestic use, and in order to furnish cheap fuel in that country, it is important that this road should be constructed.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Is this district which my hon. friend is talking about south of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Yes. It is a long way from the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, one hundred miles nearer the United States border, and then it runs in a south-westerly direction until it strikes the Pipestone valley.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that this policy of giving away lands to the railway companies is a questionable one, but it has been adopted and there is no use protesting against it now. The policy would not be so objectionable if the companies did the work of peopling the North-west in the same way in which the United States railway companies, who got subsidies from the United States Government, have brought settlers into that country. But the work of peopling our North-west has been slow to such a degree as to cause very great disappointment. While I am not disposed to contradict what was said by the hon. member from Lunenburg with respect to the enterprise of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, I must say that I have been disappointed at their comparative failure in peopling the lands which have been granted to them. They have, as a rule, held on to their lands, and let the people who have come in increase the value of them while they derived the benefit. So far as I can learn, the company has not brought in many people to settle on the land. These subsidies, valuing these lands at a moderate figure, amount to about $10,000 a mile. The grant made to the Rocky Mountain Railway and Coal Company would be about $600,000, and I cannot understand why the Government and Parliament should be so very ready to make large grants out in a sparsely-settled country, and so unwilling to make comparatively small grants in some of the older provinces where there is a large population which has never had railway facilities.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend referred to the settlement of the north-western states by railways to the south of us and compared it with the tardiness shown by our own Canadian Pacific Railway Company. My hon. friend forgets that a great many of those who settled to the south of us are coming across the line by thousands with their families and are settling in our own country and prospering.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the hon. member from Halifax scarcely speaks with a full knowledge of the facts or he would not say that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are not making efforts to settle the North-west. They are spending more than the Canadian Government to accomplish that object. The hon. gentleman must see in the newspapers that they have agents all over Europe, and are exhibiting car-loads of products everywhere in the old country and that lectures are delivered from the cars to the people—they are making every effort in that way to bring settlers to this country. They are as much interested as the Government of this country in the settlement of the North-west because they have the lands there, which are utterly useless to them until they are peopled. The railway must have people there to furnish traffic. Until they people the North-west the road cannot get paying traffic in that country. They are straining every nerve, to my certain knowledge, to people that country and doing all they can, certainly not sparing any money to accomplish that object.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

UNITS OF ELECTRICAL MEASURE BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (117) "An Act respecting the Units of Electrical Measure."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This is a sequel to the bill passed by the House the other day relating to the regulation and inspection of electric meters. The principle adopted in it has been copied from legislation in England, Germany, France and the United States, and at the last congress of electricians in Washington, the principle of what is known of electricity now has been sanctioned and approved of by scientists. If I were to read the brief which I have in my hand I would be making a display of knowledge which is not my own, and as everybody in the House knows as much and probably more than I do about it I will not inflict it upon the House.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I suppose there is a necessity for this bill now, in consequence of our having passed the bill for inspection. This is a necessary adjunct to it. I do not think it will be of practical benefit, but having passed the other bill I suppose we must pass this. These units have been agreed upon by a body of experts in Chicago, and the principles laid down in the bill are what are considered necessary. Electricity is in its infancy, and there is no knowing what may take place in a short time, but I think the bill is premature now. The only possible advantage in this bill is that if any one should rob the power from your lines you will be able to arrive at what the value may be according to this expert determination. That is all the benefit there will be; but then there will be a great difficulty in establishing what the current may be at the source of supply. There are a great many technical objections to it, but I suppose it must pass, and hereafter I have no doubt we shall find it necessary to change it, because these things are undergoing changes every day, and what is suitable to-day may not be suitable a year hence. It is just as well to make the experiment at the present time.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—This is simply adopting certain names in the nature of a code between individuals, each term meaning some certain thing. At the conference in Chicago these terms were adopted and they have since been legalized by the United States and England.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not know anything about it, and I have to take the Bill on faith.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned at 8.40 p.m.

BOYNTON BICYCLE ELECTRIC COMPANY'S BILL.

A Message was received from the House of Commons returning Bill (85) "An Act to incorporate the Boynton Bicycle Electric Company" and stating that they disagree to the amendment of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. READ moved that the Senate do not insist upon its amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (128) "An Act further to amend the Dominion Elections Act"

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading under a suspension of the rules. He said: The object of the bill is to provide a ballot paper, the form of which is included in the bill, for the purpose of safer registration of votes by electors.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second and third times, and passed.

THE SUPPLY BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (171) "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service for the financial years ending respectively 30th June, 1894, and the 30th June, 1895, and for other purposes relating to the public service."

The bill passed through all its stages under a suspension of the rule.

SUBSIDIES IN AID OF RAILWAYS BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (169) "An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in aid of the construction of the lines of railway therein mentioned."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved that the rule be suspended and that the bill be read the second time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to discuss the general policy of this measure. That has been discussed in another place, where they have the right to dispose of financial questions, but I just wish to call attention to one or two items. It will be remembered that some days ago I made an inquiry with respect to a railway, the construction of which I thought ought to be helped—a railway in the province of Nova Scotia, in the county of Halifax, generally known as the Musquodoboit Valley Railway. Subsequently, I expressed my disappointment that in the resolutions with respect to the railway subsidies introduced in the House of Commons there was no provision for giving aid to this particular line of railway. Since that time I see that some change has been made in the wording of one of the paragraphs with respect to a subsidy which would, perhaps, let this railway come in for assistance. The paragraph now reads as follows :

For ninety miles of the railway from Newport or Windsor to Truro, or to a point between Truro and Stewiacke, and from a point on the said railway to a point at or near Eastville, and from Eastville through the valley of the Musquodoboit River towards a point on the proposed Dartmouth branch of the Intercolonial: in lieu of the subsidy granted by chapter 5 of 1892, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile ; and also for a railway bridge over the Shubenacadie River on the line of the said railway, a subsidy of 15 per cent on the value of the structure; the whole not exceeding $300,000.

The words "and from Eastville through the valley of the Musquodoboit River towards a point on the proposed Dartmouth branch of the Intercolonial" have been inserted : whether the fact that these words are inserted there is likely to do much in promoting the construction of the road or not, I cannot say. The road from Newport or Windsor to the Intercolonial Railway, and from that to Eastville, would be more than ninety miles, unless I am mistaken, and that would not leave anything for the Musquodoboit Valley road ; but it is possible that arrangements may be made, if the Government are favourable to the construction of this road, that might allow a portion of the subsidy to go for the construction of the road from Eastville through the valley of the Musquodoboit River, even though some other portion of the road were not constructed. I hope the Government may take that view of it. If responsible parties come forward who are prepared to construct that road, I hope the Government in their discretion, which I think they can exercise under this provision, will give a subsidy to the company undertaking to construct the Musquodoboit Valley Railway. I see one of the paragraphs proposes to subsidize a railway "from Port Hawkesbury towards Cheticamp, twenty-five miles, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 a mile, nor exceeding in the whole $80,000." I am pleased to see that little subsidy there as subsidies are being given ; but I think it is very much to be regretted that the Government had not taken this action several years ago, when a company was subsidized. That company apparently satisfied the Local Government that they had the ability to construct the road from Port Hawkesbury towards Cheticamp, and were to get a subsidy from the Local Government, and the municipal council of Inverness granted them a bonus and they could have constructed some forty miles or so of road if they had got a subsidy of $3,200 a mile from this Parliament. The company showed their bona fides by going to work and grading some fifteen or twenty miles of the road. For some reason or other the Dominion Government, instead of granting for this road the usual subsidy of $3,200, granted only $1,000 a mile and granted that with an understanding that it was intended to recoup the county of Inverness for the bonus which it proposed to grant. It was $50,000 which the county granted and the line was to be fifty miles long. The result of that was that the company which had undertaken to build this road were unable to do so. The subsidy from the Local Government and this $1,000 a mile subsidy from the Dominion Parliament were not sufficient to enable the company to go on, and that road has not been constructed. There are several miles of the road graded. I hope that the company is still in existence and in a position to resume the work now that this grant is secured to them. It is very much to be regretted that the Government, influenced by I know not what—at least I have some idea as to what the influence was but I cannot speak positively—the Government impelled by some malign influence refused to grant the usual subsidy for this railway at the time when the road might have been constructed. The people of the county might have been enjoying the benefits of their railway from Port Hawkesbury to Port Hood, a distance of fifty miles, in the last two or three years if the usual subsidy had been given instead of this absurd subsidy of $1,000 a mile which was granted. There is another item which calls for attention. I am not opposing any of these items, but they naturally attract attention. It is not very long since the Government constructed as a public work a railway from the Strait of Canso to Sydney, in the Island of Cape Breton. This railway was constructed at a very large cost—not less than $2,000,000— and here the Government in this bill grant subsidies for roads on both sides of this line—roads which to a certain extent enter into competition with the Government roads. I am not finding fault with the subsidies, because to my mind the Government's road was located in the wrong place. It was urged upon the Government, before they finally decided upon the location of the Cape Breton railway, that a better way would be to carry the line below the Bras d'Or Lake to Louisburg and to build another line running north of the lake to suit the wants of the people of Inverness and Victoria. The Government did not adopt that plan. They built the road by the central route, the most expensive route, and where it would do the least benefit on the way between the terminal points, and now they are helping to construct the roads which their friends told them before they should have built. This Cape Breton extension railway company is simply a company who are building a line which would be identical almost with the southern route, which was advocated for the Government railway, and if the Government had built their main line by this southern route, it would have cost not nearly as much as the central line has cost, and Parliament would not be called upon to give a subsidy to this southern route. I think that is very much to be regretted. I am not undertaking to find very much fault with the Government for the way the line was located, except that it strikes me that if they had exercised proper discretion before selecting the central route, they would not have made the very costly mistake which they did make.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not agree with my hon. friend with regard to the Cape Breton road. I have been through the island and I know where the line is located, through the centre of the island, and it was not done without mature consideration. It has now proved to be satisfactory to the whole island.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I have been through the island, and I doubt if my hon. friend was ever on the island.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, yes, I have been.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I was there last year, and I found from the people that it was perfectly satisfactory. Being a main line, the branch lines are needed to complete it. About the Musquodoboit Railway, I hope my hon. friend will not go back on me on that subject. He and I were pulling together to have that line run through the county of Lunenburg, where it should go, but my hon. friend wants to have it deflected to another route altogether.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes, it would leave Lunenburg hopelessly in the cold. I hope my hon. friend will stick to his first love and let us work together and get a railway by the Musquodoboit valley through the county of Lunenburg.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is in error. If the road provided for by this bill is constructed it says that it shall go to a point on the Dartmouth branch. As the hon. gentleman knows, it is proposed to build the Dartmouth Branch Railway from Windsor Junction to the town of Darmouth. The Musquodoboit Valley Railway might unite with it at Windsor Junction, and that is what probably would be done.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—If that were done it would not be carried into Lunenburg.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not intend to object to any of these railway subsidies. I think the country is interested in having as many railways as possible. I do not think the hon. member from Halifax has any reason to complain, because I find that a great many of these subsidies are given to roads in the province of Nova Scotia. What I have to complain of is that the Government did not think it advisable to give assistance towards the construction of a very important work in this section of the country—that is the interprovincial bridge connecting this city with Hull. We all know this work will be of great advantage to the whole country, as it will become part of the highway to Hudson Bay, from which point we yet expect to obtain our supply of anthracite coal, and I am disappointed that the Government did not consider it advisable to grant a subsidy, particularly in view of the fact that the city of Ottawa has granted a bonus of $150,000 in aid of the bridge, and seeing that Ottawa has never received one dollar towards the construction of any of its railways. We have certainly more reason to complain than the hon. member from Halifax has. As far as we are concerned in this section of the country, we would have been very well pleased had the Government found it advisable to appropriate the sum of $250,000 towards the construction of this bridge. I am afraid now that the bridge will not be constructed, as it is utterly impossible for the parties who have taken it in hand to construct it with the bonus of $150,000 granted by the city of Ottawa. Had the Government given $250,000 in aid of the bridge, I thinks the Governments of Ontario and Quebec would have followed suit and that would have ensured the construction of the bridge. The failure of the Government to assist the enterprise will retard the construction of the bridge for many years, and I am sorry for this section of the country because, as I have said, we have received no subsidies while we have contributed our share towards the construction of other works all over Canada.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second and third times and passed.

IRON AND STEEL BOUNTY BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (170) "An Act to provide for the payment of bounties on iron and steel manufactured from Canadian ore."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the suspension of the rule and that the bill be read the second time now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give us some reason why this bill is introduced. The Government do not bring in any measure to pay the farmers for the potatoes they dig, and I do not see why this bounty should be given.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Had this bill been brought down at an earlier period of the session it might have been profitable to enter into a discussion upon it, but I do not think hon. gentlemen will care to discuss the subject now. We have been giving those bounties for a number of years to the iron industries of this country and I do not think they have really developed to the extent that was contemplated eight or ten years ago when we commenced to give those bounties. As has been very forcibly expressed by my hon. friend from Halifax, we do not give bounties to the farmers, the wealth producers of this country. There is no other industry which has received this assistance. It was at one time proposed to give a bounty to the beet-root sugar industry. I do not know whether that has been continued or not. I do not know that we have lost very much by the experiment, because it has not been found to be a profitable industry.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have no objections to the remarks made by the hon. gentlemen, but I must demur to the statements made by them that nothing is done by the Dominion Government to aid the farmers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—If you look at the Supply Bill which we have just passed, you will see that there is no class in the community upon whom more money is expended and in whom greater interest is taken by the Government than the agriculturists and yeomanry of the country. Experimental farms have been established for their special benefit, dairies have been established in different parts of the country, and we have taken their product to the markets in England and given them a guarantee of a return for it. These facts furnish ample proof of the desire of the Government to look after the interest of those who, as my hon. friend says, are the wealth-producing class of the country. There is no branch of industry in the whole Dominion that has been looked after with greater interest or more keenness or assiduity on the part of the public men who rule the country at this time, than the farmers. This constant statement which is made that the interests of the agriculturists of Canada are not looked after, is not borne out by the facts. I will not enter into the minutiæ of this question at the present moment, but I ask any un biassed man in the country to look at the Supply Bill, and then cast his eye from one end of the Dominion to the other and say if I am not justified in the claim that I make on behalf of the Government. In reference to the general question of bonusing the iron industry, I shall not discuss it now. It has been the policy of the country for many years to grant bonuses in aid of the production of pig iron, which is the foundation of our iron industry. I freely admit with the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, it has not been as successful as every Canadian would have liked it to be, and I regret to say that even in the passing of this bill, by which we guarantee, as far as a guarantee can be given, to continue this bonus for ten years, its object will be frustrated to a certain extent by the announcement of the leaders of the Opposition that if they get into power they will not consider themselves bound to continue the bonus which Parliament at the present moment grants. What will be the result? It would be unfair for me to say that it is done with the object of preventing investments, but its tendency must be to frustrate the purpose in view in granting this bonus. Capitalists will not invest as we had hoped they would invest, in an enterprise of this kind, when they learn of the declaration of the leaders of one party, that if they obtain power they will not be bound by any division of parliament, to that extent they would destroy any investments that might be made. I have no right to complain of people taking different views from which Government hold on questions of this kind. Our policy has been protection to all our industries and if we can develop this enterprise to a greater extent than in the past by means of bounties, then our object will have been attained. My hon. friend to my left, (Mr. Masson) thinks that we should have gone further—that we should continue the bonus given in the past to encourage the beet-root sugar industry. That offer has been on the statute-book for the last fifteen or twenty years. Unfortunately, whether from mismanagement or from our climate—I give no opinion on the subject—we know that although large investments have been made in the beet-root sugar industry none of them have succeeded. In carrying out this policy of bonuses, I should like to have seen that experiment a success, but it has not been. If there is any probability of it succeeding in the future, I am inclined to think that the Government, carrying out their general policy, would be only too glad to aid it. I thought it my duty to make the few remarks in reference to the matter, more particularly in view of the course of the two hon. gentlemen opposite, when they are pursuing the policy which is followed by politicians generally, but which we in this House should not follow, that is, in raising that continual cry that the poor farmers are not looked after by the Government. The farmers are an intelligent class of people,and they know, as well as any others, where their interests lie, and who has looked after them in the prst.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—As far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, there is no industry in which Nova Scotia is so greatly interested as the iron industry. It is peculiarly a Nova Scotia industry and requires protection. It contributes more than any other to the material prosperity of the country. We have the ore and everything necessary to produce the iron and we should encourage the industry.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second and third times and passed.

The Senate adjourned at 1.10 p.m.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (128) "An Act further to amend the Dominion Elections Act."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice that the clause adds two or three electoral districts in which the Governor General does not fix the date of the election. It adds the electoral district of Gaspé and Chicoutimi and Saguenay in the province of Quebec, and Nipissing in Ontario. Of course it is better, where practicable, that the elections shall take place upon the same day. We have adopted the plan of simultaneous elections, and I wish to ask the Government why it has been thought desirable now to add Gaspé and Nipissing in particular to the districts where the returning officer fixes the date. I should have supposed that in the electoral district of Gaspé, at any rate, the elections might have been held upon the same date as in other counties.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The reason is first of all Nipissing is a new district, where the travelling is very difficult. There is no railway communication and no telegraphic communication, and the extent of the territory is immense. As to Gaspé, it is situated in the same way; that is, the difficulties are very great according to the season. There are no railways, there are telegraphic communications which may be interrupted; moreover, there is a portion of the county that for five months of the year is inaccessible, that is, the Magdalen Islands. It is true the law authorizes the using of telegraphs, but the rupture of a cable or some other accident, which occurs often enough, might be in the way and prevent them having the election on the same day that it is held throughout the Dominion generally. These are the reasons which have induced the Government to include those in the exceptions. Cariboo in British Columbia, I believe, is similarly situated on account of the great difficulty of communication.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Has not Gaspé always been an exception?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the new ballot, it possesses possibly some advantages over the present system, as rendering it less likely that a comparatively ignorant voter shall mark his ballot for the wrong candidate, but I think the great advantage in connection with the new form of ballot is the wide black border which separates the spaces in which the names of the candidates are placed, and as I understand the law, the elector may mark his ballot either in the white circular space, or in the division where the name of the candidate is to be found. Now, that being the case, I think it is to be regretted that so much ink has been unnecessarily used. The wide black border all round would have been enough, and then the elector would mark his ballot in the division either just very close to the name or a little further along, and the Government would not need to consume so much ink as they will under the present system, although it would not have made quite as pretty a picture.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (143) "An Act further to amend the Electoral Franchise Act."

The bill was passed through all its stages under a suspension of the rule.

DUTIES OF CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (135) "An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting the duties of Customs."

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the suspension of rule 41 for the purpose of allowing the second reading of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the Government will give the Opposition credit for saying that during this session they have not occupied much of the time of the House in discussing measures. At the opening of the House a few observations bearing on the subject of the tariff were made by an hon. member of the Opposition. I do not think there has been anything said since, and it does seem that, after all the time that has been devoted to this in the other House, it would show upon our part a certain want of respect if we did not give the bill at least a reasonable amount of consideration in the Senate. Now, hon. gentlemen, the bill is a very voluminous one, but perhaps its consequence is not to be measured by its length. The tariff question is one that vitally interests the people of Canada. The Government intimated through their leaders at the last session of Parliament, and in some instances, I think, previous to the last session of Parliament, that the system which had been in operation since 1889 needed very considerable amendment, and the Government declared last year their intention of reconstructing the tariff during the present session, and it was understood that very considerable modifications were to be made in it. The Government did not say that they were prepared to depart from the principle of the tariff, but they proposed to make very extensive modifications in the details of the measure, and they set to work in a way which some people have condemned, but which I did not, myself, feel disposed to disapprove of very strongly. They sent out four members of the Government, the two hon. Ministers who are present now, the Minister of Finance, and another Minister or one of the Controllers; and these gentlemen, like a certain individual mentioned in Scripture, went up and down all over the earth and held meetings at various central and important points in the different provinces throughout the Dominion, and the object of these meetings was that these gentlemen, who were charged with the duty of preparing for the Government an amended tariff, should ascertain what the sentiments of the people affected by the tariff in the various sections of the country were. I cannot speak as to what took place in every place except from what I saw in the newspapers, but I know that as regards Halifax, the hon. commissioners, or roving committee, or whatever you might choose to call them, did their work in a very business like, and as far as one could judge, satisfactory way. These hon. gentlemen communicated to the Board of Trade of Halifax their intention of visiting Halifax and hearing what persons in the various departments of business and in the various manufacturing interests had to say with respect to the tariff, and very careful arrangements were made to provide that everyone who had anything to say upon the tariff—that is, when I say every one I mean persons engaged in the different departments of manufacture—should have an opportunity to present their views to the commissioners, if I may call them so. The business men of Halifax and the manufacturers waited upon these commissioners, they were treated courteously and gave their evidence at as much length as they could reasonably expect, and as far as I could gather, the gentlemen who appeared before the commission were satisfied with the manner in which they had been treated. The commission spent three days in Halifax, taking evidence of that kind and then they closed their meeting there and went to other places. This same thing took place all over the country, even as far west as British Columbia, and these commissioners came back having ascertained, I should suppose, pretty accurately what the feelings of the mercantile and manufacturing portions of the country were with respect to the tariff. They were then, one would suppose, naturally prepared to make such a revision of the existing tariff as would meet the views of the mercantile and manufacturing classes, and also of the consumers at large, because I presume they took care to hear what the masses of consumers, who were neither mercantile men nor manufacturers, thought about the tariff. I am not sure if they did, but I presume they must in some way have informed themselves as to the wishes of the great body of consumers. They met here and devoted some months, I believe, to reconstructing the tariff. Parliament which, with a view to the convenience of the country and the members of Parliament, should meet about the end of January or the beginning of February, was not summoned until the middle of March; the reason given was that the tariff measure was not quite ready to be submitted to Parliament. However, on the 27th March the tariff measure, which one would suppose was pretty complete by that time, was submitted to Parliament and the Minister of Finance made a very long speech in the other branch setting out in detail the changes which were supposed to be made. Those changes were not of a very sweeping character. Take them as a rule, as far as they went they were in the right direction. There were certain changes which had been expected which did not appear, but taken altogether the changes were made in the right direction. Without going into detail, it may be said that the valuable changes in the tariff were the reduction of the duties upon agricultural implements from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, the abolition of specific duties upon woollen and cotton goods, and a number of minute details dealing with the different items in the tariff, making as a rule slight reductions. One would suppose after all the pains which the Government had taken to inform themselves of the views of the country, after the Government had taken a very considerable time, with the report of the commissioners before them, to form and perfect this measure, that it would have gone through nearly in the shape in which it was introduced into Parliament, and that the passing of the tariff should not have occupied a very long time, and that if the measure took longer to pass than might have been expected, this delay would have arisen altogether from the Opposition who found fault with the changes as not being sufficiently fundamental or radical. The experience has not been that way. The budget speech of the hon. Finance Minister had hardly been delivered when the beneficiaries under the protective principle of the old tariff began to come to Ottawa. They came day after day, in single files and whole battalions. Day after day after the lapse of a little time the result of those visitations became apparent in the action of the Finance Minister. One would suppose that the three or four principal members of the Cabinet, having heard all that was to be said by all classes, would not be willing to give to one class who had been heard an opportunity which was not given to all other classes, but such was the case, and if the tariff has taken well on to four months to be completed—because it was only yesterday the last of the changes were made in the tariff—it has not been on account of any factious opposition on the part of gentlemen who usually oppose the Government, but it has been because the Government themselves had not made up their minds what the tariff was finally to be. They have been changing that tariff, which they took such pains to construct, day after day and week after week since the 27th March last, and here we are on the 21st July, and it was only yesterday that the last of the changes were made. I presume if we had sat for a month longer there would have been a great many more changes. It is only right that the country should understand these facts. I do not think we can point to any instance where a Government have placed themselves in such a position. They brought down their measure, which they claim was a well and carefully-prepared measure, and then at the instance of interested parties they have mutilated that measure in almost every detail from beginning to end and with one or two exceptions, which I shall refer to presently, all the changes have been in one direction—in favour of the protected minority and against the interests of the great bulk of the population. The one exception—in fact the only important exception—is the matter of coal oil. The pressure from the general public, and from the Opposition in the other House of Parliament, was so strong that a concession—not a large concession, but still a moderate concession—was made to consumers of coal oil, and with that exception all the changes have been adverse to the consumer and in favour of the protected industries. I have not watched over the changes in the tariff, but I believe the Government have not reimposed the objectionable specific duties on cotton—I mean they do not now combine specific and ad valorem duties upon cotton goods—but they have, with respect to other classes of goods, renewed the old, hateful combination of specific with ad valorem duties, notably in the various classes of wooden goods. Any hon. gentleman who will take the trouble to take up the speech of the Finance Minister, delivered on the 27th March, and carefully compare the tariff changes which he proposed then to make with the changes which have actually been made, will find that in a vast number of details that tariff, which was pronounced at that time almost perfect, has been altered, and altered for the worse from the point of view of any one who looks at it from the consumer's standpoint. I repeat, because sufficient attention has not been called to the fact—I do not think there is any instance where a Finance Minister has come down and introduced a tariff measure, and has subsequently, at the instigation of classes who had been heard before that measure was introduced, altered his measure in almost innumerable details. If we have suffered this session, as we have suffered from remaining here so long at a time when it is almost too much for human nature to remain at work in a warm place like Ottawa, it is due almost altogether to the conduct of the Government with respect to this tariff measure. The various classes of the population of Canada, who did expect from the Government some reasonable concession to the wishes of the consumers, must be very much disappointed indeed by the result of the labours of the Government in connection with the tariff. I can imagine any man outside asking did ever so very great a mountain produce so very small a mouse? For all the work that has been bestowed upon it, all these changes might have been made in a week—the reduction of the duty on coal oil, the omission of the specific duties on cotton goods, and the reduction of the duties upon agricultural implements, which are, I think, all the substantial changes that have been made, might have been disposed of by the House of Commons in a week, if they had been proposed by themselves. In some respects the tariff has been aggravated, made more oppressive than it was before. I think there must be a general feeling of disappointment among the manufacturers throughout the country that their iron, which is raw material to most of them, has been left in practically the same position in which it stood before. The experiment to try and bolster up and bring into existence industries in connection with iron has been proved, by the experience of fifteen years, to be a substantial failure, and the general feeling amongst manufacturers, so many of whom use iron as raw material, is that there should be some reduction on the indefensible and, I might say, outrageous iron tariff introduced in the session of 1887 by the gentleman who is now High Commissioner. There will be a great dissatisfaction through the country at the general character of the tariff measure and particularly at the fact that there has has been no reduction made in the iron duties, and the duties on the necessaries of life, except in the case of cotton goods, and that we are going on substantially under the same old tariff. There is just one point that I may notice with respect to the reason given by the Government for delaying the summoning of Parliament, and to some extent, I believe, for the changes which have been made since the measure was introduced. It has been stated that one of the reasons why Parliament was not summoned earlier was, not that the Government has not prepared their tariff measure, or that their own views were not fixed and definite, but that they thought it was their duty to wait and see what was done with the tariff measure at Washington. I believe in cultivating friendly relations with the adjoining country, as well as with all other nations, but Canada should make her own laws, her tariff as well as other laws, to suit her own wants and should not be governed to any great degree by the actions of other countries, and it would have been, to my mind, a much more business like and wiser course for the Government to have framed their tariff in accordance with the wishes and the needs of the people of this country. They need not have troubled their heads very much as to what was being done in the neighbouring republic. They might have looked at the general fact, that the disposition there was to reduce the duties and make the tariff less protective than it was. The Government here might have reconstructed their tariff with the general object in view of making the burdens of our people somewhat lighter then they had been. Then they might have summoned Parliament at the usual time, passed their measure, and the following session, if it appeared as a consequence of the action taken by the Congress of the United States that it was desirable that certain other changes should be made in our tariff after some months' experience of the practical working of the tariff of the United States with respect to Canada, the Government could have at the next session introduced such amendments to the tariff as would have removed any inequalities in connection with its working. It is to be very much regretted that they did not do that. The Government have been in the habit of posing as an exceedingly loyal one which prefers the mother country and its methods to the United States and the methods of that country, and above all, they have prided themselves upon being a Canadian Government, a Government which looks solely or almost solely at the interests of Canada. I regret to say that in the matter of this Tariff Bill, as well as in a great many other matters, they have belied their professions. They have been looking to Washington for hints as to the course which they should adopt here, and I have heard it said—I do not know whether it is a fact or not, but certainly it looks a little suspicious, that from the time when it appeared that the United States Senate was not going to accept the House Tariff Bill, the Wilson Bill, but was going in the direction of protection, and when the impression had begun to get abroad that the electors of the United States were not as strongly in favour of tariff reform as had been supposed, that the hedging process began, and continued with respect to this measure. The popular chamber in the United States shows that in that country the tariff reform sentiment is as strong amongst the bulk of the people as it has ever been, and if the Democratic party there are in a worse position now than they were some months ago, it is because the people were disappointed at the fact that the Democratic party, which now controls both branches of Congress, has not carried out its pledges. So that I think even in respect to that matter the Government have made a mistake. As I said before, I think they should have made the best tariff they could, looking at the interests of Canada, and not looking to Washington at all, and then they could, at a subsequent session, have made any changes which practical experience showed to be desirable. I am glad to see the hon. gentleman from Ottawa here and also the hon. gentleman from Shell River. These two hon. gentlemen have made the tariff a special study—a thing which I have not done, and I have no doubt they will be able to give the House a great many more ideas and detain the House considerably longer than I have been able to do.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it is quite fair to inflict a speech on the House at the present time, and all I can say is that I think the title of the bill is not quite what it ought to be. It professes to be for the purpose of raising a revenue for the country. From my standpoint, it is just the opposite. It is for the purpose of taxing the people of Canada for the benefit of a few privileged individuals, because that is really what the result of it is to a very great extent. It is quite true that we do, incidentally, perhaps get $30,000,000 under it. I do not know exactly what the figures are. I have no recollection of them, but it must be admitted that in order to get them you tax the people of Canada considerably more than that, from my point of view. From the investigation I have been able to give this subject, you tax them a very much larger sum, which tax of course goes into the hands of those who are protected, and that is really the view of the case that ought to be considered, because the bill professes to be one in support of giving us a revenue. Now, I will just take one item which illustrates sufficiently the whole subject. Take the duty on sugar. I see the Government have reduced it this year. It was eight-tenths, and I think it is reduced to six-tenths of a cent. At all events it is reduced some fractional part. What was the object of reducing it? Surely it must have been to withdraw a part of the protection and to cheapen the article. That is the only answer I can arrive at. The duty has been so arranged that no part of that, or a very trifling sum, comes to the revenue of the country. I find by the returns that the duty paid on sugar at the end of 1893 was $900,000 odd, while the value of the imported sugar which came in free was $6,600,000 and the returns show we imported 252,000,000 pounds. Now that, of course, is not refined, and reducing that, I suppose our consumption of sugar would be 150,000,000 pounds.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It is nearly double that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At 30 pounds per head of the population it would be fully that. That is a rough calculation of my own. Well, if we get the eight-tenths of a cent on that it would mean over a million dollars. We would be able to pay the subsidy to the fast line without any trouble out of it, where as a matter of fact we only get the $900,000 odd. Supposing we reduce the duty, and import more sugar, we would get more revenue from the imported article. Supposing we brought it down to ¼ cent on the raw and ½ cent on the refined, that would give our refiners some considerable advantage. They would have ¼ cent at all events, and it would give a very considerable sum to the revenue of this country, but it is so adjusted that they get the raw material free, and the duty being just gauged at that particular point, we enable them to keep out the refined article. They had the opportunity of taxing the people of this country for the article, not up to the eight-tenths, but up to a certain proportion of it; otherwise why did the Government, during the present session, reduce the duty on sugar? It was, I suppose, to meet the clamour of the consumers who want to get their sugar cheaper, and you will find to the extent of that reduction you will get a cheaper sugar. I do not suppose it is reduced now to a point that will enable the foreign-made sugar to come in, but if it were brought down a little further the foreign article would come in, and it would help to pay part of the revenue of this country, contributing to the amount taken for duties. I think that is a very fair illustration of what I say, that the duties are so adjusted that the consumer is obliged to buy within Canada, products made in the country, not of course in all instances, but in a very considerable number of instances where the tariff is so arranged as to favour those who are its beneficiaries. You are practically taxing the great body of the people in order that a comparatively few industries may be able to live, and I think I may go a little further and say that a good many of them make a considerable amount of money out of it. At least that is the general belief. At all events, from my standpoint the duties ought to be so levied as to give at least the lion's share of the duties to the public revenue.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Those who represent the Government can have no fault to find with the tone which has characterized the remarks made by the hon. gentleman and his lieutenant upon this occasion. It is just what we might have expected, the general principle of complaint which has always prevailed, and I presume will prevail so long as the Opposition lasts—and I am under the impression that it will be for a very long time provided the people of this country remain in their ordinary senses. The Opposition have a certain amount of fault to find, and I do not know that the spirit which pervades them could be better illustrated than by a very old couplet:

> I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,
> The reason why I cannot tell,
> But this I do know full well,
> I do not like thee, Dr. Fell.

If you paraphrase that couplet and apply it to the Government, you will have a fair illustration of the principles—not principles, I will not say that, because I would scarcely dignify them by that name—but the policy that is pursued by those who oppose the Government. I give my hon. friend from Halifax credit for having made at least one or two very fair, and, I have no doubt, honest confessions. If he had been actuated by the same feeling and the same principle that the leader of the Opposition declared he was actuated by, of never talking to people outside, I should suppose he would not have said it. He says the members of the Government went to different parts of the country in this Dominion for the purpose of ascertaining the feelings generally of the manufacturers and importers and those who were interested in the trade and progress of the country; and he went further and said that he believed what they did they did honestly and fairly, that they heard the complaints, if any there were, in the different commercial centres of the Dominion, but he is not so sure that they acted upon the suggestions which were then made. I truly confess to him that upon some of the suggestions we have not acted; upon others we have. There were men who, like himself, have a very strong idea that the tariff should be completely revolutionized. How they proposed to raise the revenue to carry on the affairs of the country, they deigned not to tell us, and when we asked them whether they were desirous of resorting to direct taxation, they at once, particularly at at the period when they appealed to the people, repudiated any such idea. However, my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Boulton) is a little more honest in his convictions and expression of opinion upon this point. Parliament was called together at a period of the year when the Government thought it most advisable in the interest of the country. My hon. friend from Halifax laid down the principle that Canada should frame its tariff and its fiscal policy altogether in its own interest. In that respect I fully agree with him. He says that we should not look to Washington when we are dealing with questions of tariff or the imposition of taxation. To a certain extent I agree with him, but unfortunately for him he was scarcely logical in the conclusion at which he arrived in making that declaration. He told us that we should have gone on framing our tariff in such a direction as we believed would be in the interest of Canada, and then he immediately told us that if the Americans had changed their tariff in such a way as to interfere with or affect the Canadian tariff, then at the next session we should have come to Parliament and asked for changes. Now it is that very principle to which the manufacturing and importing classes object in toto. When a tariff can be framed upon any principle of permanency, so much the better for the country, and if the proposition laid down by the hon. gentleman is correct, that we should frame our tariff in order to meet conditions in the United States, then it was much better that we should do so after we knew the effect which it would have upon us than to adopt a tariff and then amend it in accordance with the tariff of the neighbouring country. This question of looking to Washington, as applied to the present Government and those who support them, is ill-timed and out of place. If the hon. gentleman had pointed to members of his own party—if he had pointed out that a member of his own party went to Washington and suggested to the Government there how they could frame items in their tariff so as to coerce us into a certain line of conduct, then he would have been not only telling facts as they occur, but he would have been conferring a benefit upon the country and doing credit to himself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—One member, of whose conduct I certainly do not approve.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I have not heard either his leader or the hon. gentleman himself repudiate the conduct of that member, is very prominent in his party, even in matters of trade. He is as fickle as the weather itself. There is no phase of political economy that he has not advocated.

Hon. Mr. POWER—His conduct was not defended by any member of the Opposition elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is an old adage that silence gives consent, and when it is proved that a leading member of a party so forgets himself and his duty to his country, and becomes so unpatriotic as to suggest to a foreign country a means by which they could injure his own country, if the leaders of that party which he supports, and by whose side he sits, and with whom he constantly consults, do not repudiate it, then the leaders of the party are just as guilty as he is himself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Instead of thinking of his country he was consulting his own interests.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has the same estimate of that politician's character that I have myself. I am sorry that there are so many like him in this country. It would be a waste of time at the present moment to dwell upon the different points that have been raised by the hon. gentleman, but he made a mistake, unintentionally I am sure, when he stated that the duties upon iron had not been reduced. There is not a single article in the iron duties, so far as partially manufactured articles are concerned, that has not been reduced. Whether they have been reduced to suit the views of the hon. gentleman, I am not prepared to say. I do not think they have, nor would it have been advisable in the interests of the country that they should be. In some respects, the hon. gentleman says, the tariff is higher than it was before. I should like him to point out in what respect it is so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That has been pointed out in another place.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It has been asserted, but it has not been pointed out, and it is quite true that a number of changes have been made. The principle upon which those who have had the administration of affairs, particularly the tariff, have acted, has been to consult those who are interested, and when they received suggestions to treat them respectfully, and if at all consistent with the principles upon which the tariff is based, to carry them out, and not to insolently tell peoople, who really know as much if not more about the operations of the tariff than the politicians themselves, that they know nothing at all about it, and that they might go home. That is not the principle upon which this country should be governed, and in that respect I can tell the hon. gentleman that we are more inclined to act upon the principle of concession and reform than those whom he has supported in the past. I do not propose to discuss the question raised by the leader of the Opposition. As to the title of the Bill with which he has found fault, he gave the best possible answer to his own objection. He says it is not for the purpose of raising a revenue, but for the purpose of taxing the people. I have been under the impression that the taxing of the people was for the purpose of raising a revenue. He admitted afterwards that we received about thirty millions of dollars, but he argued that we could receive more if the principle of taxation was different. Then we had the same old story—I do not say it disrespectfully—in reference to the sugar duties. He wanted to know why the sugar duties were reduced. They were reduced for the very reason which he himself has indicated, because it was found from experience that it was unnecessary to have as high a duty in order to protect the industries of the country. I deny, however, the deduction that he has drawn from the premises which he laid down. If what the hon. gentleman says be true that the imposition of eight-tenths or six-tenths of a cent, whichever it may be, goes into the pocket of the manufacturer and out of the pocket of the consumer and the revenue of the country, I should like him to explain to me how it is that sugars during the last 12 months, a good portion of the time, have been much cheaper in Canada than across the border, where they have not only free sugar but give a bounty of 2 cents per pound upon all the sugar raised in the country, which has enabled them to receive out of the revenue of the country a sufficient sum to remunerate them for the labour necessary to produce the article and by which means they could put it upon the market at a much cheaper rate. However, the present free trade party—the Democratic party and the Senate of the United States—have thought proper to change the sugar duties and impose a duty on sugar for revenue purposes. But if we impose the duty on sugar as suggested by the leader of the Opposition, that is on refined sugars, and also a duty upon raw sugar, the result would be no doubt what he says in that respect, that is, that you would have more revenue, but you would shut up all the refineries in the country. Would the people who consume sugar get it one fraction of a cent less? I say they would not, from the simple fact that if they paid it on the refined sugar it must come out of their pockets. If the raw sugar comes in free and a tax be put on the refined sugar to enable the industry to be carried on in the country, they do not pay any more than they would if the policy of the hon. gentleman were adopted. But in dealing with tariff matters, with what experience I have had, I have found that the free traders are, to a very great extent, of this calibre: they lay down a general principle as to the course that should be pursued in the raising of the revenue, but if there is anything in which they are themselves directly or indirectly interested, they are always the first to come to the Government and urge that they be protected. I will not particularize, but I could give you dozens of cases of that kind which suggest themselves to my mind, and they are industries which might be developed in this section of the country. Some of them have gone so far as to urge that a heavy duty be put on articles which you can take from the soil here, send across to the United States and have it manufactured there and brought back duty free. This policy is advocated by free traders—why? Because the raw product is an article obtained in Canada. I should be inclined to put a duty on the manufactured article to keep it out in order to create an industry by manufacturing the raw material in the country. But the idea of asking the Government to allow the raw material to be sent out of the country and have it manufactured elsewhere and brought back manufactured because the raw material is here, is a principle which I am sure the hon. gentleman from Halifax would not advocate or sustain if the proposal were made to himself. However, taking the tariff as a whole, it is a reduction so far as the principles upon which it is based would justify. Numerous changes were made during its progress through the House of Commons and those changes were made at the suggestion and from the reasoning advanced by those who know best how a change will affect the industries of the country. I am strongly of the view—I have never had any others since I knew anything of politics—that in all new countries, particularly one like ours, situated as we are alongside of a strongly protected country, we should protect all our industries to as great an extent as is necessary to develop them, and the moment you deviate from that, you must resort to some other system by which you can raise your revenue, and if you do not get it by the means of a protective duty it must be got by means of direct taxation and closing up the industries which have been built up in this country. If not to the extent that we should like to see, certainly they have been built built up, and they will continue to grow in proportion to the growth of the country. If they have not advanced as rapidly as we should like them to have done, I lay the charge straight to the policy of the Opposition—to their constant denunciation, either directly or indirectly, of their own country, pointing out that other countries were better than ours, advocating a policy by which we should become identified and closely allied with a country that has a tariff from 20 to 25 per cent higher than ours. We are closing this session, I hope, as we began it—parting on the very best of terms with each other, and I can only hope that the result of the legislation will prove, as I believe it will be, beneficial to the whole country. If the time should unfortunately ever come when the whole policy of the country is to be changed, we shall have to look with some dismay as to the result. However, one party cannot expect to be in power forever. People do run wild on certain theories now and again, and they may possibly do as they did once before—turn out men advocating one set of principles, and put others advocating another set in, but as soon as they get an opportunity, after having had a few years' experience, I am sure the people will do as they did once before, turn them out and put in men with principles more in accord with their own views and the general interest of the country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should not like the hon. gentleman to look with dismay at the past experience of Canada. The country got along fairly well with a revenue tariff under his old leader, Sir John Macdonald, between 1867 and 1873. It would probably do fairly well another time under a similar tariff.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—That is a very grave question. The country grew, I know, very slowly, but it did not develop as well under that system as it has developed since.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The population increased much faster.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I might give reasons why the population is not as great as it should be. However, we will look forward to the future with brighter hopes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Although these are the dying moments of the session, I can hardly resist the invitation from the hon. gentleman from Halifax to make some remarks on the bill before the House. I do not propose now to enter into a dissertation on free trade, or argument, but it is worth while to refer to what the hon. gentleman from Halifax said, that it did appear, in consequence of the session being put off so late, that the Government were desirous of moulding their tariff in accordance with American principles of protection—that is in a certain way looking to Washington. I think myself that it is most desirable that we should endeavour to establish on our part the most friendly relations with our neighbours. The little difference in language and customs and everything should teach us that Americans and Canadians should be one so far as friendship is concerned, not necessarily one so far as our Government or our constitution is concerned, because we can work them out on different principles, but one of the ways in which we can establish a lasting friendship with them, it is within our power to inaugurate without asking them or being attracted by their policy at all, and that is to throw down our barriers upon a free trade basis, a basis that the people of Great Britain have for the past fifty years adopted. A great many people in the country say and believe that if we throw down our barriers our country will be overrun with their goods and our industries destroyed. I can point to Europe for illustration—the small state of Holland is a free trade country, and Belgium is also a free trade country. These two are surrounded by Germany, France, Austria, Italy, all among the most highly protected and populous countries in Europe, yet Holland stands to-day one of the most wealthy countries in the world, only second to England in wealth. Belgium likewise, though their barriers are down, though every country in the world has free run so far as their industries are concerned, they are not over-powered. England is not over-powered, but the economic condition that free trade affords to manufactures is of such a powerful character that it enables them to enter into the world's markets, force their way through almost the strongest barriers and maintain the largest amount of industry in the world, larger under that policy than you can ever hope to maintain under protection, because under protection your manufacturing power is confined to the population that is within the protected area. Our manufacturing cannot go further than the power of manufacturing for 5,000,000 people in the country. That has been shown because, after 14 years of it, we are to-day exporting comparatively little as against the 115 millions of our natural products. Therefore we need not be a bit afraid of being overrun so far as the United States is concerned. There is one thing that is worth while drawing attention to at the present moment, and that is the fact that our exports are exceeding o ır imports. A great many people argue that that shows prosperity, that because we are selling more and importing less, we must be getting rich. That is, I believe, a fallacy pure and simple. The fact that our imports are falling off while our exports are being increased shows that our purchasing power is diminishing to pay for those imports.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That only applies to purchasers from abroad.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You send out $100,000,000 worth of exports and you get back only $90,000,000; it shows your purchasing power is $10,000,000 less.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Where does the $10,000,000 go?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It goes to pay your foreign indebtedness.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—You would have to pay that any way.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly, but if you held that $100,000,000 in your own country and had not to send it out, your purchasing power would be increased to that extent.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—How are you going to do it if you buy all that you consume?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You cannot get rid of that broad fact, that if you send out $100,000,000 of produce and get back only $90,000,000, there is a reduction in your purchasing power of $10,000,000.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—You have $10,000,000 in your pocket.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The United States to-day, are exporting far more than they buy, but in addition to that they have been out over a million dollars in gold a week, until they have been obliged to issue treasury bonds to return gold to the treasury.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is the result of protection.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the United States has deteriorated either in wealth or in strength during the last few years?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I mean to say that the financial condition of the United States is being year by year destroyed by its policy, and that is the very point that the hon. gentleman opposite was making, showing that the exports exceeding the imports is no criterion of prosperity. They are exporting gold, and the hon. gentleman knows they are in a quandary. It is thought to be extraordinary that although they sell more than they buy, yet they have to send gold abroad. It should be the other way.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Let the hon. gentleman just compare the condition of the United States to-day as far as its foreign trade is concerned: its foreign trade was $1,500,000,000 and it has been reduced the past year to $1,300,000,000, and while it is being reduced to $1,300,000,000 the exports exceed the imports by $150,000,000, while the imports into Great Britain are almost double the exports. It shows they are getting wealthy and their purchasing power is always on the increase. That is in consequent of the economic condition that free trade gives to their industry which enables them to make such a large profit. They import from abroad and manufacture, put their labour on to it, and send it abroad again, and the process is such that it gives them a purchasing power greatly in excess of their exporting power, and at the same time it must be remembered that most of the imports are raw material at the lowest grade of their price, while the exports are manufactured and represent the highest value of the raw material.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The hon. gentleman does not want us to believe that everything that is imported into England, not to be manufactured, is not sent out. There are hundreds of millions of dollars worth of goods imported into England and sent out just in the same state as they are brought in.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Three hundred millions of the foreign trade are imports of the manufactured or partially manufactured article; £65,000,000 is the importation of manufactured articles out of that $3,700,000,000 of foreign trade, and that is a very small amount out of the excessively large amount of imports that they may bring in, which is, I think over $2,000,000,000 a year. With regard to the revenue, it is not a question of raising a revenue by taxation and protection, because, of course, if you charge every single thing that comes into the country it is very easy to squeeze a revenue out of a population, but coupled with the revenue under the present mode of levying is the fact that you impose $2 of taxation which goes into manufacturers pockets for $1 that the Government requires. That can be proved, and has been proved over and over again.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It has been stated.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, and proved.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—How would you prove it?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Take coal oil which has been increased in price by 10 cents a gallon duty or has been increased until lately a slight reduction has been made. That 10 cents a gallon is a duty collected on 6,000,000 gallons that come from the United States but the 10,000,000 gallons that is produced in Canada is increased in price by the amount of duty at the port of entry. Now, there are 16,000,000 gallons of coal oil consumed. If you were to put a excise revenue of 10 cents on that you would collect $1,600,000, every penny of which would go into the treasury, but under the present system $1,000,000 of it goes into the pockets of the producers of coal oil and only $5,000,000 into the treasury. Now, that is one example very easily understood as to the difference between raising a revenue by taxation and protective taxation or raising it by ordinary purposes limited by the requirements of the Government and if the purchasing power of the great mass of the people, which is the industrial population, has been reduced by taxation in that way you must not only impair their purchasing power, you must impair their prosperity in the long run, and hold the country down to a very normal state. A country such at this, with a healthy climate, magnificient water powers, good and ample resources, should extend and increase in population far more than we have done in the past fourteen years. You put on a protective tax in order to produce iron in Nova Scotia. What for? To sell to us in the North-west. Now, hon. gentlemen you can convey the iron that you produce in Nova Scotia to Australia by a water carriage at a far less rate of freight than you can send the iron to the North-west. Therefore which is the best? To take advantage of the lower freights and find a market of 4,000,000 people in Australia, or put on your protective taxation in order to find a market for your own iron for 250,000 people in the North-west, and tax them heavily on all the iron they consume? That is the difference, but you can only reach the Australian market by having the most economic conditions applied to your industries. You cannot have a protective tax and find an outlet for your wares in Australia because there you have to enter into competition with all other countries, and countries like England that do work under the free trade economic condition. Therefore I say a free trade policy will enable you in Nova Scotia to quadruple and multiply your iron trade ten fold by seeking the market of Australia, if you only apply the economic conditions to enable you to do so. The hon. gentleman spoke of paper. He says our raw material should go into the United States and there be manufactured and brought again into this market free.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—I said that had been advocated by some free traders.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, and that is what I am advocating. If you apply our free trade to all our industries, paper included, instead of our raw material being sent to the United States and manufactured there, and supplying large amounts to newspaper publishers, one hundred tons a day, I believe, to one publisher, instead of that we would be manufacturing that one hundred tons a day for that paper and sending it direct from Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No publisher can consume one hundred tons a day.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, at any rate it is a large amount, but not an excessive estimate for an importing publisher. Some of those papers in Australia use fifteen tons a day, and inquiry will, I think, satisfy the hon. gentleman that I am not far astray. When the Australian and New Zealand delegates were here they asked Mr. Eddy, I believe, for estimates for large quantities. The United States manufacturers largely supply this trade, and no doubt the paper is largely manufactured from our own raw material. Why cannot we do it ourselves? I believe that we would increase our consumption, our manufacture of paper and everything else by a different policy. The hon. gentleman refers to a theory. This is no theory, but solid practical results which have been attained by free trade countries, Holland, Belgium and Great Britain, which may be pointed to with pride by anybody who desires to find a living example of what not the theory of free trade but the principle of free trade will do for a country. I do not wish to impose any free trade remarks on the House, but holding the views I do I cannot but express regret that the protective features have been maintained at a very high standard in the tariff whilst the changes have been slight, and I think are not calculated to work any advantage to the country. The Government announced in their speech from the Throne that they intended to maintain their protective policy and I think they have successfully done that so far as this tariff is concerned.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The views of the hon. gentlemen are in advance of the party's policy. He is a free trader pure and simple. I am a protectionist from the word go. It is all very well to talk of free trade, but what employment would we have in this country if we had free trade? What is it that has built up this country? We had a sample of free trade in 1877 and 1878 and we know the desolation and disaster which occurred during those five years.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Would the hon. gentleman inform me, in the city of Ottawa, with 50,000 population, what particular industry or individual would be injured by free trade or is benefited by protection?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—If we had not protection we could not have an operating establishment in Ottawa city or any part of Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—How about the lumber mills?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The Americans could manufacture every article required for our domestic use to supply the limited number of our population without feeling it in the least degree. The surplus stocks on hand could easily realize that double object, so far as the manufacturing interests of the United States are concerned. If we had free trade this country would be a slaughter market. The prices would be reduced it is true, but what would be the use of low prices when the people would not have the wherewithal to purchase? I think we had better abandon the idea of free trade in our day. A great deal has been said with reference to the action of the Government respecting the various gentlemen who made a tour of the country to ascertain the feelings of the people. I think it was a sensible course. They were anxious to take the people into their confidence and find out what they required. That was a different policy to the one followed by the members of the Mackenzie Government. They would not listen to representations from any source, friend or foe, and felt themselves above hearing anything. I suppose in many instances the present Government have met the views of those who made representations to them. I am not altogether satisfied that they have not made too great concessions in many instances. I would not have given in at all. I would have held out for a more protective tariff. I think the evidence of last year, showing the advantages to be gained under the McKinley tariff, demonstrates that if we would only wait patiently we would ultimately succeed far better than by submitting to any modification of it. I hope the McKinley tariff will continue and give us the opportunity of developing the trade of our country, and doing business in our own way. We have progressed in this country to an amazing extent. We have built the Canadian Pacific Railway and made other improvements which would have been impossible without the National Policy. We have heard of unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union. These are impossibilities; they could not be carried out. The only sensible thing proposed by some gentlemen of the Liberal party was annexation pure and simple. That is the only course that should be observed, so far as their policy was concerned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is the hon. gentleman in favour of that?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—No, most decidedly not. That was urged by members of the Liberal party, Cartwright and Farrar, who together with Wiman went round the country and advanced arguments tending in that direction, but they did not accomplish their purpose, and the people of this country know their own interests too well to abandon their own flag and the protective system by which they have benefited in every respect. If the Opposition were in power to-morrow they would not deviate from the present policy to any extent; we cannot carry on the affairs of the country without a revenue, and I do not believe the time has arrived yet to advocate direct taxation. I do not believe the radical party would attempt it for a moment, because they know the people would not submit to it. We ought to feel proud that we have succeeded so well in this policy which was initiated a few years ago. It is astonishing how beneficially it has been carried out. In every respect the people have been prosperous. Some of the manufacturers have not succeeded as well as might be desired, but that is an incident that must be expected, and no very great loss has resulted therefrom, but to talk of a nostrum of free trade, as the hon. gentleman on my left (Hon. Mr. Boulton), has been doing, is wasting time. I admit there have been some difficulties in the North-west, as he says, and he may have had to pay a high price for coal oil, but it amounts to nothing in comparison with other advantages derived from the National Policy. The tariff has been modified to a great extent now, and the people are satisfied. My hon. friend complains of the extravagant price of coal oil, but it has been shown that freight and the middlemen were to blame for that. We know that it is a difficult thing to handle, and they put on a large margin of profit. A dealer obtaining coal oil for 12½ cents would retail it at 25 cents. That is obviated by allowing the coal oil to be brought into the country in tanks, and we will hear no more of that difficulty in the future. We should feel satisfied to live in a prosperous country like this, where every man can obtain employment if he is able and willing to work, and can make money, and it is all the result of the National Policy. There is no place on the face of the globe so well situated as Canada. I hope the freight rates in the North-west will be reduced. Possibly they have been excessive, but I believe the Government are going to appoint a commission to inquire into the subject, and I believe the leader of the Opposition will agree with me that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are willing to do everything in their power to benefit the country—that is one of the principles of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on all occasions. Let us never forget that we live in a free country, and should be satisfied with our advantages, and the way in which we are governed. It will be a long time before the Opposition obtain power unless they change their tactics. I do not think they have shown a capacity to manage the affairs of the country satisfactorily: it is quite evident that the people feel that they can be best taken care of by the Conservative party.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman stated that we should be satisfied with the price of coal oil now, because arrangements have been made to use tank cars, but we passed a bill here the other day reducing the flash test by 10 per cent, so that now we will require to have two lamps burning where we only had one before. Instead of being benefited by the legislation relative to coal oil, we will have to pay double on account of the test. This reduction gives you a poor light, and you have to use double the quantity of oil to get the same light.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The United States has a lower test than ourselves.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It was proved the other day that 85 was a sufficient test, and the whole trouble was to get a proper chimney. With a proper chimney 85 will be safer than 95 with an improper chimney. I was of the other opinion myself until I heard the matter explained. In the United States the test is reduced to 73. I am satisfied the Government have done what is right in reducing the test.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL moved the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency the following bill :—

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the Public Service, for the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1894, and the 30th June, 1895, and for other purposes relating to the Public Service, to which bill I humbly request Your Excellency's assent.

To this bill the royal assent was signified in the following words :—

In Her Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General thanks his loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this bill.

After which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the Fourth Session of the Seventh Parliament of the Dominion with the following speech :

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commoms :

In bringing to a conclusion this laborious session of Parliament, I have to thank you for the assiduity and zeal with which you have attended to the various matters which have been brought before you.

I congratulate you upon the notable fact that the invitation which my Government extended to the Governments of the other Colonies to send representatives to Canada to confer on matters affecting their mutual interests was so promptly accepted ; and that Her Majesty's Government also enhanced the dignity and usefulness of the Conference by sending a representative to assist at its deliberations. It is confidently hoped that the results of the Conference will be found beneficial to the Colonies and to the Empire generally.

The ratification of the Treaty of Commerce with France will lead, I hope, to a large increase in our exports and an extension of friendly relations with that country.

I trust that the arduous work which has engaged you in readjusting the Duties of Customs will accomplish the desired result of adapting the tariff to the present conditions of the various classes of our popalation.

The Statutes of the session will show that the laws affecting many public interests have been revised and greatly improved by your efforts, and I observe that you have likewise made generous provision for public improvements which are designed to increase the facilities for travel and transportation throughout the country.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I thank you for the liberal provision which you have made for the services of the current year.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

In relieving you from your present duties I pray that your labours may be fruitful of benefit to the country and that on returning to your homes you will find that a generous harvest is about to reward the toil of our farmers and that the blessing of Providence has been likewise bestowed abundantly on all the other interests of the people whom yon represent.

The SPEAKER of the Senate then said :

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

It is HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S will and pleasure, that this Parliament be prorogued until Saturday, the first day of September next, to be here held, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued until the first day of September next.

ORDER and Procedure, questions of.

Adjournment over Statutory Holidays.—Discussion whether a M. is necessary for such adjts., Mr. Scott thinking that it is not, Mr. Power that it is ; Mr. Angers' M. for the adjt. (over Ascension day) was agreed to, 311.

Amendment not entered in Orders.—See "Orders."

Bill affecting Commons only.—Mr. Power commented on Parly. etiquette, as to Senate meddling with a B. solely affecting Commons (bribed Voters B.), 499.

Bill, Amt. interfering with municipal rights.—Mr. Boulton opposed Mr. Power's Amt. to Montreal Belt Line Ry. B., restricting elevated line, in city, to passenger traffic, on the ground that the city controls such restrictions, if deemed locally expedient, 624.

Bill, Commons Amts., partial concurrence.—Mr. Miller explained proper procedure : M. specifying Amts. to be concurred in, another the Amts. not concurred in ; the strictly proper way, a separate M. to be put on each separate Amt., 634.

Bill, discussing principle in Com.—Considerable discussion arose as to right of Senators to debate the principle of Insolvency B., it having been so understood by Mr. Dickey and others, but not by leader of the House. Mr. Bowell, on this ground, conceded the fullest discussion on the principle, in Com., though the inexpediency of such procedure, generally, was pointed out and admitted, 503-4-5-6.—Further explanations by Messrs. Bowell and Dickey, 551.

Also discussed, general principle of expediency of an Insolvency B. having been alone affirmed by 2nd R., which clause it would be best to select, to test classes to whom B. should apply, 505-6-7.

Mr. Power also pointed out, that if B. be given an application distasteful to majority, the Com. may rise, and thus end the B., 507 ; this suggestion was deprecated by other Senators, 508. Further discussion on effect of voting a certain way on Amts., 510.

Bill, division, demand for.—See "Division."

Bill, expense of.—Mr. Kaulbach commented on the expense caused by Mr. Boulton's introduction of B. for construction of Hudson Bay Ry., for the purpose of making a speech and circulating it ; Mr. Boulton, in answer, referred to useless speeches made by Mr. Kaulbach ; to which the latter replied, 475 ; further reply, 477 ; Mr. Perley also commented hereon, 479.

Bill, in extenso, in Debates.—Mr. Boulton desiring publication, in Debates, of his B. for construction of Hudson Bay Ry. as a public work, suggested that his reading it might be dispensed with ; but on some Hon. Senators objecting to its appearing in extenso in Hansard, he claimed his right, if necessary, to read it for the purpose, 468-9. The B. appears at length at p. 469.

Bill, nature of, questioned.—Mr. Boulton's B. for construction of Hudson Bay Ry. "as a public work," p. 266, was objected to by Mr. Angers, because :—

1. It is not a public, but a private B., and should have been preceded by a petition, &c.
2. If a public B., it could only be introduced with sanction of the Crown, and in Commons.

The Speaker ruled the B. out of Order, 272.

ORDER and Procedure—Continued.

Bill, premature discussion of.—Mr. Angers held that Mr. Boulton might have been called to order for his speech on effects of French Treaty, the ratification B. not being yet introduced, 672. Mr. Scott held that such strictures were hardly fair, the Govt. having mentioned the Treaty in Speech from the Throne; and that to preclude a member of Parlt. discussing a matter now before the other branch of Parlt. would be suppressing freedom of debate that has prevailed in the past, 673. Mr. Angers explained his views, and other comments were made, 674.

Bill, previous session, exhibits of.—Petition of Jas. Balfour, for return of certain exhibits in his Divorce B. of last Session; referred to Divorce Com., 285-6.

Bill, public, special Com. on.—Notice of M. was given by Mr. Bowell, for reference, after 2nd R., of Insolvency B. (C) to a Joint Com.; but after consultation with Senators and the Premier, he decided to refer it to a Special Com. of the Senate exclusively, 225; which was done in due course. On M. for a Com. of 25, objection to such a large Com. made; several Coms. on different sections suggested; but pointed out that Com. may appoint sub-Coms., 249.

Bill, public, 3rd R.—Mr. Bowell m. 3rd R. of Public Harbours B., on its being reported from Com.; Mr. Power held that suspension of rules should be m.; Mr. Bowell pointed out that the Rule only applied to Private Bs., not to Public Bs. where there is no Amt.; Mr. Power thought there were Amts.; Mr. Bowell said they could hardly be called Amts., being merely corrections of clerical errors; Mr. Power did not press the point, and the B. wass passed, 277-8.

Bill, 2nd R., discussion of details.—Mr. Vidal urged that, instead of various details being discussed, the principle of due observance of the Lord's day should be affirmed by a 2nd R. of the B., leaving details to be dealt with in Com., 578.

Bill, Senate.—See "Senate" (below).

Bill, tabling of papers connected with.—See "Papers" (below).

Bill, withdrawal, mode of.—Mr. Lougheed having m. discharge of Order for 2nd R. of Rocky Mountain Ry. Co.'s B., Mr. Miller pointed out that leave for withdrawal of B. should be asked, 226; an error in form was made in carrying this out, which was corrected by Mr. Miller's advice, 252.

Bill, withdrawal; similar one from Commons.—Mr. Miller pointed out that, before Commons B. was introduced, leave should have been asked for withdrawal of the Senate similar B. (Wood Mountain, &c., Ry. Co.'s B.), 229.

Bills, French translation of.—See "French translation (in General Index to Subjects).

Bills, private, extension of time.—Mr. Bowell, on 21st March, m. extension of time for Petitions till 5th April, and for presenting, till 12th, 68; M. agreed to*, 68.

2nd Report of Standing Orders Com. presented (Mr. Macdonald, B.C.) that time for Petitions has expired, 134.

Remarks (Mr. Bowell) Govt. has no objection to extension, 155; comments: Messrs. Power, Vidal, 155; not advisable, Commons having refused (Mr. Bowell), 155.

Petitions, Notice of advt. wanting.—13th Report of Standing Orders Com. presented (Mr. Macdonald, B.C.) Remarks: Messrs. Miller, Macdonald, Allan; object of Report to place it on Journals as a warning, 264. M. (Mr. Lougheed) to refer Report back, agreed to, 264.

Reporting: extension of time till end of session. —15th Report presented (Mr. Macdonald, B.C.), with remarks, 277; Mr. Miller, 277.

15th Report as above, adoption m. (Mr. Macdonald, B.C.) 282. Debate on Rules and practice in this matter: Mr. Kaulbach, 282; Messrs. Macdonald (B.C.), Kaulbach, Vidal, Bowell, McKay, 283; Messrs. Lougheed, Allan, Macdonald (B.C.), Bowell, 284; Messrs. Macdonald (B.C.), Bowell, Vidal, Power, 285; M. agreed to, 285.

Bills, private, Petition for.—Time having expired, Mr. Miller pointed out that, if B. is presented in Commons, and comes to Senate before 2nd R., after 1st R. and before 2nd R. it can be referred to Standing Orders Com. as a petition to be reported on, 225.

Bills, private, Petition for leave to petition.—It was discussed, and decided as the proper course, that such a Petition should be, on motion, referred to Standing Orders Com.; which was done in the case of W. Barwick's petition, Man. and N. W. Ry. Co.'s B., 224-5.

Bills, Private, 3rd R.—Same day that B. is reported from Com., objected to, as in direct violation of Rule 70. (Lindsay, &c., Ry. Co.'s B.); and 3rd R. postponed, 277.

Bills.—See also "Committee, Reports."

Cabinet Ministers, difference of opinion.—On Message from Commons, with their Amts. to Insurance Act Amt. B. (V), Mr. Angers gave notice of an Amt. to clause restricting investments authorized for Cos.; and Mr. MacInnes (Burlington) proposed to still further extend the list, 823. On m. adoption of the Commons Amts., Mr. Angers gave reasons for declining to amd. the cl., 825. Mr. MacInnes then m. that this Commons Amt. (cl. 27) be not concurred in (thus postponing the matter for another season), 826-8. After debate, in which Govt. was urged to withdraw the Amt. for this session, Sir F. Smith expressed his regret at Mr. Angers declining to m. his proposed Amt., 833. Mr. Angers explained his position in the matter, 835. Comments were made upon this incident by Mr. Masson, 836; Mr. Bowell, 837, and others. Sir F. Smith quoted a precedent for difference from colleagues, 838, which precedent Mr. Angers thought it not desirable to follow, 838.

Cablegrams, unreliable.—Impropriety of calling attention of Parlt. to cablegrams affecting important subjects, pointed out by Mr. Bowell, upon the Behring Sea question, a cablegram forming base of an Inqy. having proved false, 226.

Committee on new Rules, formation of, &c.—See "Rules" (below).

Committee Report, addition to.—Mr. McInnes (B.C.) m. Amt. to M. for adoption of Internal Economy Com. Report: to amd. Report by adding cl. increasing Postmaster's salary, 654. Ques. of Order (Mr. Power), that the Report does not deal with Postmaster's salary at all, 654. Point discussed; the Speaker decided that the M. should be for a reference back, with instructions to Com. to insert the increase, 654; and Mr. McInnes altered his M. accordingly, 655.

Com. Report, adoption, effect of.—Standing Orders Com. recommended suspension of Rule 52, on N. S. Steel Co.'s B. Mr. Miller m. suspension of Rule accordingly; but, on discussion, it was decided to m. adoption of Com. Report, which had the same practical effect, 497.

Committee Report and Minority Report.—Consideration simultaneously; also all the Minutes of Com., brought up, on motion, therewith. See "Dillon Divorce case" (in General Index to Subjects).

Committee Report, clerical errors.—Report on Trust Corporation of Canada's B. was adopted, the errors, being only clerical, in the printing, to be corrected by the Clerk at the Table, 265-6. Internal Economy Com. Report, omitting recommendation for which Report was re-committed, corrected at Table, 681.

Committee, Report inaccurate.—Pointed out that Report (Interior Economy Com.) does not embody recommendation intended by Com., as it restricts additional translators to Bill work. It was discussed whether, with unanimous consent, Report could be amd. at Table; Mr. Miller thought not. As the Report sufficed for present requirements, it was adopted as presented, 250. A separate Report, later, remedied the defect, 272-3.

Com., Report of, without a recommendation.—Standing Orders Com. having reported petition on a Ry. Co.'s B. not properly signed, but having made no recommendation thereon, it was found necessary, in view of Rule 17, to refer the Report back to Com., 197-8.

Com., Special, appt.—See "Bill, public, Com. on."

Committees, Standing, appointment of.—For the first time, under the new Rules, Mr. Bowell m. appointment of a Com. of Selection, 87: agreed to, 87. Their report was presented, and cls. respecting the various Standing Coms., were, on M. (Mr. Bowell), adopted, with some modifications, seriatim, 98. The Contingt. Accts. Com. was, on recommendation of Com. of Selection, changed to Internal Economy, &c., Com., 98.

Committees, Witnesses under Oath.—See "Parliamentary Witnesses Oaths Act," passed this session.

Constitutional questions.—See debates on the following Bills and Motions:—
- Criminal Code Amt. B. (question as to fixing Grand Jury panel by Provincial legislatures, and quorum for criminal cases by Dominion Parlt.)
- Death sentence, commutation of (prerogative of clemency).
- Dillon Divorce B. (force of ecclesiastical laws in Province of Quebec, &c.)
- France, Treaty with, ratification of.
- Harbours, public, B. (reference by Mr. Power to Foreshores jurisdiction ques.)
- Insolvency B. (question of prerogative of local legislatures, referred to Imperial Privy Council).
- Interest Act Amt. B. (held by Mr. Scott, improper to interfere with procedure of Provinces, as to interest on judgments, 636).
- Lord's day better observance B. (question whether such legislation should be left to the Provinces).
- Man. and N.W.T. Schools question.
- Montreal Harbour Commissrs. B. (question of Federal and Provincial laws clashing).
- Senate, Speaker, temporary, provision for, B.
- Voters, bribed, disfranchisement B. (Senate interference with a Bill solely affecting Commons).

Correspondence, tabling.—See "Papers" (below).

Debate, expressions in.—To a ques. of Mr. McInnes, whether Mr. O'Donohoe would vote for Dillon divorce, if petitioner answered the disputed question satisfactorily; Mr. O'Donohoe replied that it was none of Mr. McInnes's business, 453. Mr. McInnes objected to this expression, 454; and Mr. O'Donohoe offered an explanation, 455.

Mr. Power called Mr. Kaulbach to order for imputing motives (personal vanity) to Mr. Boulton, in his speeches on the French Treaty and free trade, 674; Mr. Kaulbach said he would disregard the call to order, 674. Mr. Boulton, in closing remarks, alluded to these remarks, 674.

On 2nd R. of the French Treaty ratification B., Mr. Power observed that question should not be put until House has heard from certain gentlemen, familiar with the lumber interests, "as they have come for the special purpose of taking part in the debate," 787. Mr. Burns, on rising, said he would not enter into the question whether he came for the purpose; Mr. Power observed that there is another Senator connected with the lumber interest, also present. Mr. Angers thought the reference to one was improper; there are two now, 787.

On 2nd R. Ocean Steamship subsidies (fast Atlantic line) B., Mr. Angers having referred to "calumnies directed against the safety of the route," he was called to order by Mr. Power, who stated he had never said it was dangerous, 815.

Debate, ques. of Order, precedence in.—Ques. of Order being before the House, Mr. O'Donohoe's Amt. to M. on Divorce case not having been placed on the Orders, Mr. McInnes (B.C.) objected to Mr. O'Donohoe speaking further on the motion, till point of order is decided, 431.

Similar objection taken by Mr. Power to Mr. McInnes speaking further on his M. for increase of Postmaster's salary, 654.

Debate, relevancy of.—Mr. Angers questioning the relevancy of Mr. Boulton's remarks on price of shingles in N.W.T. to his Hudson Bay Ry. B., he said this showed necessity of passing the B., 473.

Mr. McInnes's Amt. to re-commit Internal Economy Com. Report, to increase Postmaster's salary; Mr. Power objected to Hon. Senators discussing other points (of the Report) than the Amt., 657-8.

Debate, speaking twice to Amt.—Ques. of Order (Mr. Prowse) against Mr. Bellerose speaking twice to his Amt., on Dillon Divorce case, 618; pointed out by Mr. Bowell, that Mr. Bellerose is only explaining, 618.

Objection taken by Mr. Angers, to Mr. Boulton speaking a second time on his Amt. to 2nd R. of French Treaty ratification B., 791.

Debate, speech on 2nd R.—Mr. Boulton's Amt. to 2nd R. of French Treaty ratification B. (to return Treaty for further negotiations) having been lost, Mr. McCallum asked that B. might stand, for his remarks to-morrow; Mr. Angers said there would be an opportunity for speech when B. is referred to Com. of the W.; but Mr. McCallum proceeded to speak, and moved the 6 months' "hoist," 795-8.

Debate, termination of.—Mr. Bowell, while not suggesting anything that would look like curtailment of debate, especially as it has been carried on so dispassionately, asked that the Man. Schools question debate might terminate soon, 154.

Mr. Angers, rising to close debate, by giving Govt. consent to Mr. Bernier's M. for papers in Man. Schools question, Mr. Power said it did not follow that no one else intended to speak, 166; and, on rising to reply, Mr. Power explained that, while it might have been more courteous had he spoken before, he wished to alternate diverse views in the discussion, and was perfectly within his rights in speaking now, 167. Mr. Bowell, in rising to close the debate, referred to this incident, and Mr. Power replied, 188.

Debate, useless, expense of.—See "Bill, expense of."

Debates, B. in extenso.—See "Bill."

Debates, reports of.—Unrevised edition done away with; galleys for correction, to be returned within 24 hours, 264.

Debating subjects previously discussed.—Considerable discussion arose upon Mr. Power calling Mr. Ferguson's attention to the subject of his Inqy. and speech (feasibility of Hudson Bay route) having been previously debated in the Senate; and Mr. Power made an explanation thereon, 222-3.

Division, demand for.—Mr. Almon objected to 3rd R. of Trade Combine B. having been carried without the division called for by himself and by Mr. Murphy; it proved that the demand had not been heard; and Mr. Miller pointed out that the Hon. Senator had failed to take the indispensable step of calling for yeas and nays, 461.

Divorce procedure.—See the debates on "Divorce cases" (in General Index); especially the "Dillon" case, where constitutional points, such as divorces to R. Catholics, were discussed at great length; and Divorce Courts for Canada advocated. Withdrawal of exhibits of B. of previous session.—See "Balfour" (in General Index).

French translation of Bills.—See that heading (in General Index to Subjects).

Funerals of deceased Senators.—M. for payment (Messrs. Flint and Glasier), precedents for this course quoted, and M. agreed to, 687-8.

Government, condemning in advance of papers.—Mr. Kaulbach objected to denunciation of Govt. (for interposition in a death sentence), in advance of papers then being m. for, thus prejudging the case, 202.

Govt., differences in.—See "Cabinet" (above).

Government prerogatives.—See the debate on "Death sentence, commutation of," M. for papers.

Legislation, Govt., backward state, &c.—Opposition criticisms and Govt. replies, on 2nd R. of Electric Light Inspection B., 693-9. Further comments, on 2nd R. of Customs duties (new Tariff) B., 870 and following pages.

Members' absences not chargeable.—See debate on "Sessional Indemnity B.", 838-40.

Ministers differing in opinion.—See "Cabinet" (above).

Motion, Amt. to, not in Orders.—See "Orders."

Motion, effect of.—It was debated whether, the adoption of Dillon divorce Com. Report having been voted down, its further consideration could be m.; but it was pointed out, by Messrs. Miller and Angers, that the M. which had been voted down was only that the Report be adopted "now," thus leaving future consideration open, 515.

Motion, postponement.—Some Hon. Senators objecting to further postponement of M. for reconsideration of Dillon divorce Com. Report, Mr. Power pointed out that it is quite unprecedented, when a gentleman in charge of a B. consents to a postponement, that the other members should insist on proceeding with it. The consideration was postponed, 614.

Motion without Notice.—Mr. Kaulbach objected to Mr. Angers' M. for adjt. over Ascension Day, without two days' notice; but he afterwards withdrew his objection, 311.

Newspaper report, quoted.—Mr. Ferguson quoted Toronto Globe report, in support of his assertion as to Mr. Dalton McCarthy's speech at Toronto, 205.

Newspaper reports, erroneous.—Correction made (Mr. Bowell) of Ottawa Citizen's report upon difference of Ministers on Amt. to Insurance Act. Amt. B., 857.

Correction made (Mr. Miller) of Montreal Gazette's report of division on Insolvency B., the "hoist" having been m. by Mr. McCallum, not by Mr. Miller, as stated, 620.

Newspaper reports, unreliable.—Impropriety of calling attention of Parlt. to cablegrams affecting important subjects, pointed out by Mr. Bowell, upon the Behring Sea question, a cablegram forming base of an inqy. having proved false, 226.

Order, ques. of, precedence in debate.—See "Debate" (above).

Orders, mode of bringing M. upon.—On Monday, June 11, Mr. Clemow's Notice of M., for reconsideration of Dillon divorce Com. Report "on Wednesday next" was called. Discussion arose as to proper mode of bringing this M. upon the Order paper; finally the M. was allowed to stand until Wednesday, 482.

Orders, M. as defined, incomplete.—Mr. Clemow's M. for further consideration of Dillon divorce Com. Report did not include Minority Report. Ques. as to the sense of the Minutes was discussed; finally both reports were brought under simultaneous consideration, such having been the intention, 514-518.

Orders, omission of Amt. from.—Mr. O'Donohoe's Amt. (to M. for adoption of Divorce Com.'s Report) to re-commit the Report, although reported in the Debates, was not entered upon the Orders; consequently a question of Order was, in a resumed debate, raised by Mr. Bellerose, 431. The cause of the omission was discussed: whether through failure to reduce it to writing, &c.; Mr. Power pointed out that there was nothing to hinder any member from moving the same resolution at once, 432. Finally Mr. Landry m. the same Amt., 433; and the debate thereon proceeded.

Orders, precedence of resumed debate.—Pointed out by Mr. Power, that resumed debate on Dillon Divorce case should have place next after 3rd Rs., instead of at end of Orders, 383; remarks: Messrs. Almon, Kaulbach, Power, 384; and the suggested order of business was adopted.

Similar discussion took place, as to the proper position of this debate on Order paper, and on the effect of the new Rules of Senate: Messrs. Clemow, Bowell, Power, 406.

Papers, tabling of.—On 2nd R. of Ocean Steamship Subsidies B. (fast Atlantic line), Mr. Power said Govt. had no right to ask assent to proposal, till House knew what the arrangements are, the documents not having been tabled, 809-10. Mr. Angers said they had been handed to the Clerk, that they were laid on the Table, and Mr. Power had no right to say they were not; Mr. Power replied, 810. Mr. Angers re-affirmed that the papers were brought down several days ago, and are on the Table now; and further remarks passed thereon, 814. On Mr. Angers m. 3rd R., Mr. Power commented on this incident, disclaiming discourteous intent, 823. Mr. Angers explained that, when tabled, a mistake was made in calling them French Treaty papers, but the error was corrected, and Minutes are correct, 823.

Petition for leave to petition.—See "Bill."

Privilege, Questions.—See "Newspaper reports" (above).

Privy Council (Imperial) decisions.—See debate on "Man. and N.W.T. Schools question" (General Index to Subjects).

Rules, revision of the.—A draft of revised Rules having been prepared last session, but their consideration laid over, Mr. Bowell gave Notice of M. for reference of draft to Com. of the W., 25. He afterwards amd. this Notice, to a reference of the draft to a Special Com., 68. Finally, he m. the appt. of a Special Com. to consider, revise and report on the rules of the Senate, 68; M. agreed to, 68. Report of Special Com. was presented (Mr. Power), 86; and adopted immediately, under suspension of Rules, 87.

Senate Bill, empowering contract-making.—Mr. Kaulbach pointed out that Lighthouses, &c., B., empowered Minister of Marine to make contracts for and purchase supplies, and thus to create liabilities. Mr. Bowell showed that this was a re-enactment of an already existing law, containing such powers; and B. passed 2nd R., 89.

Senate Bill, salaried officials under.—Ques. raised by Mr. Masson, and discussed, whether B. could originate in Senate, giving power to Minister of Marine to appoint certain salaried officials; B. allowed to stand, 88. Mr. Bowell, on m. 2nd R., pointed out that B. simply changed mode of appointing officials, their appointments being already provided for by statute, 88.

Senators' absences not chargeable.—See debate on "Sessional Indemnity B.," 838-840.

Senators, deceased.—See "Funerals" (above).

Other constitutional points as to treaty-making powers, &c., were referred to in different parts of the same debate.
