Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Now, what is the next step is the transaction? The boats were on in July, 1889. The vote of money was at the disposal of the Government by Parliament on 1st July, 1889. In September and November of the previous year they had been carrying the mails. They had not only been carrying the mails, but they had been doing the full commercial service for which the subsidy was subsequently voted by Parliament. We ought in all fairness, if the money had been available to us, to have paid from the time they put those boats on the service. They were just as much entitled to it then as they are entitled to it now. There was no subsidy available for the period between September, 1888, and July, 1889, but from July, 1889, the subsidy was at our disposal, and, under these circumstances, the boats having been put on under the pledge of the Government that the subsidy would be given to the route, the boats having been on at the time Parliament voted money to the route, and from the 1st July the money was at our disposal. The firm had been doing the work, they had been more than doing the work, because for a year previously they had been carrying our mails, and what the Minister of Finance did was to pay them from the 1st July, the period when the money was voted by Parliament, and to pay them just the money that was voted by Parliament and no more, and for doing just the service that Parliament declared that money should be expended for. Now, then, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) states that there is a letter here which indicates that they never expected to be paid for these back services. His recollection of it is that Pickford & Black stated they wanted to be paid from November. Now that is not the correspondence. The correspondence does not ask them when they wanted to be paid from. There could be no doubt about that, because let me tell the hon. gentleman that Messrs. Pickford & Black gave the Government no peace, for a week even, of the period between the time when the money was voted by Parliament, their boats being on the route, to pay them from the time that the boats began to run. Everybody connected with the Government knew perfectly well they were going to claim that from the time the money was voted, and everybody expected, in addition to that, we might have to pay the carriage of the mails for the previous year. Under these circumstances there was not the slightest necessity for anybody to approach Pickford & Black and ask them when they expected to be paid from, and nobody ever did so, although the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) thinks they did, and that, therefore, the charges can be sustained. This is what Mr, Courtney wrote :

"We are now preparing the contract for 'A' and 'B' services, and I shall be obliged if you will kindly let me know what trips have been made by the Alpha and Beta since you received notice of the acceptance of the 'B' and 'A' services respectively."

The reading of that does not seem to take by surprise in the least degree the gentlemen opposite, who represented it to the House as a request to be informed from what date they expected to be paid. Then, Sir, this is the answer they wrote, referring of course to that letter :

"On the 16th November, Hon. Mr. Foster wrote us advising that our tender for 'B' service had been accepted, and on the 10th December we heard through Mr. Kenny that the Government had accepted our offer for 'A' service.

"We supposed the contracts for these services will date from and with the November voyage of the Alpha, which was begun 15th November; and for the Beta with the voyage on which she started from here to Cuba, 25th December.

"We shall be glad to receive the contracts at your convenience."

They could not do otherwise than date the contract from those dates, because these were the dates at which the tender was accepted, and under that contract nothing extra has been paid, but only the service rendered by the Alpha from 15th November, and by the Beta from 25th December. But under the other contract, and for the services which were rendered while that money was at our disposal, and under the promise of the Government it would be given to them if no lower tender came in, and for the carriage of the mails for nearly two years before, the Minister of Finance simply paid the money that Parliament voted should be paid and not a dollar more.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman understands the case, and when he presents it to the House for the fifth time I hope he will present it with a little more knowledge of the subject.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We would like to see that contract.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman I dare say would deny that he ever saw it, if he did see it. I have not touched the gravest matter connected with these charges. The real charge is one that everybody in this House must lament to see connected with a transaction of this kind. What is this transaction, as it appears to hon. gentlemen opposite? It would seem to be a transaction in respect to which the Government has paid more than the contract called for, has paid for services performed before the contract was signed, and under these circumstances, instead of fair criticism and interrogation, what was the accusation made? Three or four times to-night and three or four times another night, the insinuation was made that the Minister of Finance had taken this money himself from the treasury, and that perhaps he paid it to Pickford & Black and perhaps he did not, and when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was asked fairly by the Minister of Finance : Do you say that I did not pay it over? The House was told, it was for the Minister to prove that he did.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is the hon. gentleman's wretched position at the present moment when he cries "hear, hear." Now, Sir, we must always anticipate, and anybody with the feeling of a man in him would anticipate from gentlemen opposed to him in policy, active and fair criticism when any transaction with regard to the public money appears to them to be unwarranted ; but, public life is sinking to a lamentable depth if the men who are charged with a public trust, every time find criticism accompanied by insult and dishonest accusation. Let us reflect on this point first, and I make it with the utmost confidence and am able to prove every word that I utter, namely, that in this transaction, from beginning to end, the Minister of Finance did not put his hand to one motion in regard to it, in relation to which he had not the sanction of the Government after full consultation with his colleagues, and after a report, and after an Order in Council. It was not a question of shielding himself by a report to Council at all. The service was an experiment which we had pledged ourselves to the country to endeavour to carry out even at large cost. It was a very considerable undertaking for this country, and one of great importance as regards the trade of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but it was an experiment previously untried. It was in relation to new routes which we had never subsidized before, it was in opposition to some gentlemen of the Lower Provinces who were concerned in rival lines of business, and at every step in that transaction, the Minister of Finance had the full, and cordial, and unanimous approval of his colleagues in what he did. Therefore, this matter should have been treated as one in which the policy of the Government should have been assailed, in which they should be attacked as strongly as hon. gentlemen opposite could attack them if they thought necessary to do so ; but in respect to which it was unfair, I would almost say dishonourable, to single out the Minister of Finance and to say that for personal or political purposes he had carried on this transaction himself. But when the Committee remembers the charges to which I have just referred, and to which, when I recapitulated them, the hon. member for Bothwell said "hear, hear," namely, the charge that the Minister of Finance may have paid this money out after taking it with his own hands from the public treasury, and he may not- stating that that was not an honest transaction, and using these words to-night, that the Minister of Finance had paid or pretended to pay this $15,000 to Messrs. Pickford & Black after taking it out of the treasury himself—let me ask the House what its opinion will be of the fairness or political or other honesty of the man who made these statements when he knew that the Minister of Finance never took the money from the public treasury at all, that he could not take it from the treasury at all, that under an Order in Council that money was voted to Messrs. Pickford & Black, that it did not lie in the power of the whole Cabinet to take that money out of the treasury and pay it to Messrs. Pickford & Black, that it could only be paid on the cheque of the Auditor General, to the order of Messrs. Pickford & Black themselves and on their vouchers ; and when the hon. gentleman said that it was for the Minister of Finance to prove what he had done with the money after he took it out of the treasury, he knew that the Minister of Finance never took it out of the treasury, but that it was paid to Messrs. Pickford & Black. We feel, with regard to every step of this transaction, that we have been justified in all that we have done. We have been justified, as the correspondence proved on another occasion, in sanctioning the lessening of the rigid terms of the contract in order to secure this service, because it is very valuable to Canada, knowing that we should have had no service at all if the rigid terms of the contract had been adhered to. Having done that, we expect criticism and court criticism, but we do expect fair treatment in debate and otherwise, and not accusations against the Minister in charge of the matter, of dishonesty, or of putting his hands in the treasury, or of being suspected of having appropriated the public moneys to his own use.

Mr. FLINT. If any defence could have been made of the transaction which is the subject of discussion this evening, I would have expected that defence could have been made and would have been made by the hon. Minister of Justice ; and with regard to some of his observations there is no attempt on this side of the House to dispute them, because they lie entirely without the range of the criticism made by the hon. gentleman who brought this matter to the attention of the Committee. I would like to know where, either in the previous discussion or in the papers which have been laid before the House, there has been any allusion whatever to the contract with Messrs. Pickford & Black for carrying the mails or for any other service performed by them for the Dominion Government previous to the written contract which has been referred to in these papers.

Mr. TUPPER. You will see it at page 4673 of Hansard.

Mr. FLINT. The papers reveal nothing in regard to this implied contract besides a general observation made in a letter from Messrs. Pickford & Black when they first made this claim for extra payment. The extra payment of $15,000 is not claimed by Messrs. Pickford & Black as a sum due to them in consequence of any previous contract or understanding with the Government ; but whatever defence the Government may have for the payment of that $15,000 by allusion to a contract which is not before the House, and which is not alluded to in any of the papers brought down, we are not in a position either to dispute or deny anything with reference to a contract the existence of which I learn for the first time this evening. If there was any sum due to Messrs. Pickford & Black from September, 1888, for carrying the mails up to the time of their entering into this contract for the "A" and "B" service, then why was not Parliament asked to vote an appropriation for the purpose? But Parliament was never asked to vote one cent to carry out what we are now told was a bonâ fide contract with this firm. On what ground could the Government ask other persons to tender for a service, when at the same time they had a secret understanding, of which Parliament and the public knew nothing, with this firm for carrying the mails, and performing substantially the same service in connection therewith that they entered into in this contract to perform? While I am prepared to admit that there is no proof before the House of the suspicions that would naturally be engendered in the minds of a critical opposition looking into this case, yet the whole transaction, ably defended as it has been by the hon. Minister of Justice and by the eloquent Minister of Finance, certainly presents features of a suspicious character to critics on their guard in reference to the matter. What do we find ? We find in the first place an appropriation made by the Parliament for carrying on a certain service. We find that the whole transaction was of a most unbusiness-like character. A very short space of time was allowed for the presentation of tenders, and tenders were invited on terms that gave an enormous latitude to the Government and enabled them to select certain favourites if they thought fit to do so ; and we find that after long delay and a vast amount of correspondence between the Government and the tenderers, contracts were entered into, but it appears that they were only entered into by the Government for the purpose of being ignored or being administered to favour such parties as the Government saw fit to favour; and it does appear to me that the substantial features of these contracts should not have been entered into. And when gentlemen of the Opposition, looking over these papers, find that the contracts have been ignored from the first, that solemn agreements as to certain payments are, upon the representations of the parties, doubled ; when we find that the payments to these parties were not increased for future services or in order that the service might be sustained or improved as intimated by the Minister of Finance, but for services which had been performed, the Opposition would be derelict in their duty if they did not call attention to these matters. We find that Messrs. Van Wart & Baird did not provide the style of boats required by the contract, and then we find that they stated to the Government that they were losing money, and were unable to carry out their contracts. The Government would have done its duty had it taken the contract off their hands ; but instead of that we find the Minister of Finance dealing with these parties who were his political friends, paying them extravagant amounts for past services, and allowing them to throw up the contract when it suited themselves and not the Government. We find, furthermore, ground for reasonable suspicion of improper conduct on the part of the Government in the fact that other contractors, after lengthy correspondence, agreed to undertake a certain service beginning at a certain time, and subsequently claimed that they had been unfortunate and had lost money, and we find the Minister of Finance paying them $15,000 for services performed previous to the time fixed by the contract for their work to begin. The Minister of Finance explains this payment on the ground that they had been doing the service, which they had contracted to do beginning at a certain date, previous to that date. We answer you had no right to deal thus with public money. The Minister of Finance pleads the existence of a contract, of which Parliament never before had notice, for which, if it had been brought to the attention of Parliament, Parliament would willingly have voted the proper sum of money, for the Dominion does not desire that any parties should carry out public services without being adequately remunerated. Yet we find, without a word being mentioned respecting it in this House, that Messrs. Pickford & Black claim to have carried the mails for the space of a year without any other arrangement for compensation than some vague utterance of the Minister that at some future time they would be compensated. When we find that 50 per cent. more was paid than need have been paid under the agreement to gentlemen who are political friends of the Minister of Finance, and strong supporters of the Government, and when we find that $15,000 were paid without any warrant, either of contract or law, upon the mere generous whim of the Government, we have a right to charge that the Government have dealt improperly with the public money and have laid themselves open to censure. The Minister of Finance defends himself upon the ground that, in the first place, he is backed up in all these proceedings by his colleagues, and in the second place, that the House condoned his action by its vote, and that, therefore, the matter has passed out of the domain of criticism. But I believe this discussion cannot fail to be productive of good in contributing to check this hap-hazard way of dealing with public funds by which the Minister of Finance has signalized himself. If the Government enter into contracts for public services, let them hold the contractors to the terms of agreement throughout the whole public service. We find that the Government have for years persistently ignored the terms of Government contracts. We find that there is scarcely a public estimate for public works which has not been grossly and extravagantly exceeded, and every session the Opposition are compelled to ask the Government to explain these amounts paid in excess of contracts. There ought to be a fair understanding between the Government and contractors that the terms of a contract shall not be exceeded, and certainly the transactions which have been discussed in this connection are the most indefensible that have ever come before the House. I am not prepared to say that there is proof in these papers of any improper use having been made of the money, but the money has gone into the hands of favourites ; and although in the face of the strong representation on the part of the Ministers of Finance and Justice, I presume we are bound to assume that these payments did not go beyond the parties who are presumed to have received them, at the same time when moneys have been paid in violation and in excess of a contract, without any good reason, we have a right to suspect that they have been put to some improper use, and we would be wanting in our duty if we did not endeavour to have the transaction thoroughly sifted and discussed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to make a few observations in reply to what has been said concerning myself by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance seems to think that his conduct is not amenable to criticism, that legitimate criticisms of what we may regard as improper or unwarranted payments are not to be made unless some member will assume the responsibility of making a personal charge against the Minister who is accused of the irregularity and illegal conduct. As I understand the rule of Parliament it is this, that if an hon. gentleman has in his possession evidence of misconduct, it is open to him to make a charge against a member or a Minister of the Crown. But the matter under discussion is not a case of that sort. All we say here is that the hon. gentleman entered into a contract, that the negotiations which led up to that contract showed that some parties, at all events, were, in the estimation of hon. gentlemen on this side, unduly favoured. The Minister says they were not. That is a fair subject for discussion and a fair subject for criticism upon the papers that have been laid before the House. Then the hon. gentleman entered into a contract. He admits himself that the company with whom that contract was legally made in the end was a company that had no existence when these negotiations began, that the steamers undertook trips from St. John to certain stations in the West Indies, with the understanding that certain sums should be paid before the company to whom that money was paid and with whom the contract was to be made had any existence in fact or in law. That is a position which unquestionably is untenable. The hon. Minister could not know who would be the members of that company. He could not tell whether the company would ever come into existence or not, and there is no rule of law better settled by formal decision than this, that no party can make a bargain or contract that will bind a corporation or company that had no existence when the bargain was made. I am not going to discuss that point further. The hon. gentleman contracted to pay a certain sum of money, he paid 50 per cent. more than that, and he says, I had the sanction of my colleagues, and that is my defence. It is very bad for the colleagues. It does not improve the hon. gentleman's position at all, but it makes the position of his colleagues so much the worse. Then the hon. gentleman says: You do not know all the facts. There was a correspondence in regard to the $15,000 between myself and the firm of Pickford & Black, which shows that they asked for this payment before the time when the contract was made. Where is the correspondence ? The hon. gentleman is an old parliamentarian and he knows that he cannot properly refer to documents which are not before the House.

Mr. TUPPER. He did not refer to them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He referred to a claim which he said had been made by Messrs. Pickford & Black. Was it a verbal claim ? Was it a claim of which there is no official record, or minute, or note, which the hon. gentleman could bring before Parliament? He was asked to bring before Parliament all the papers relating to this matter. He said that these, which he has brought down, were all the papers. It is true that there are certain papers disclosed which are not amongst these, but there is nothing at all in reference to any correspondence making a claim for services before the 15th November and the 25th December. The Minister of Justice came to the rescue of the hon. gentleman and said: There are some facts which you do not take into consideration, some facts which are not disclosed in these papers; we had a contract with Pickford & Black for carrying the mails from September, 1888. If the hon. gentleman had a contract at that time, why is it not laid before Parliament? Has the hon. gentleman paid out money on a contract without the sanction of Parliament? If he will examine the Auditor General's Report or the Public Accounts, he will find that the Post Office Department is not charged with any portion of the subsidy under this contract. If Pickford & Black had a claim under that contract, they have it yet. No portion of this money was voted for this purpose. It was intended and claimed for another purpose altogether which was said to begin in July, 1889. We put some steamers on the route between this country and the West India Islands. We began in July, though the contract did not call for the steamers being put on until November; and we want you to pay us for that. They had no postal contract, no such contract is disclosed, no such claim is made, and I venture to say that no such thing appears in the Public Accounts. The Minister of Finance says: I give my word that such a negotiation has taken place. Does the hon. gentleman ask any member of this House to take his word if the papers have not been brought down and laid on the Table? That is not the way in which private business is conducted or the way in which public business should be conducted. The Minister of Finance told us the other evening that the trade from St. John to the West India Islands was a growing trade, and he quoted some figures. I had in my possession then a certain paper, which I have not now. The hon. gentleman quoted figures to show that the trade between St. John and the West Indies was growing, so long as the figures showed an increase in the amount of trade, but he stopped before the end. The last returns show a diminishing trade instead of an increasing trade. Why did not the hon. gentleman give the House all the facts, in ordinary fairness?

Mr. FOSTER. The returns which I brought down to the House and read were prepared by the officers of my department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman stopped short of the last return, and the last statement he read was a return of $24,000 for the last outgoing trip. The last trip, however, was less than $9,000, but the hon. gentleman did not give that or the one before. The Minister of Justice tells us that we were bound to pay Pickford & Black for this service, that this was an obligation which Parliament could not escape. If that be so, why did the Minister of Finance ask for tenders at all? If there was a contract with Pickford & Black in existence, there was no freedom to enter into a contract with any other party. That is the position taken by the Minister of Justice, but that was not the position taken when the hon. gentleman asked Parliament first for this appropriation. He did not say it was to pay an old score, to pay an amount of indebtedness which had been entered into without the sanction of Parliament. It was stated that this money was to meet the future, and was not being voted for the past. If the money is intended for any other purpose, then it was misapplied, but I am sure that the hon. gentleman will find that the returns will show that the money was not voted for the Post Office Department, and that the Minister of Justice was mistaken in saying it was. The Minister of Justice says I was violent and unfair to the Minister of Finance. He forgets a debate in which the Finance Minister brought charges of boodling against a Government which has not been in existence for many years, charging boodling against a former member of Parliament who has not been here for several years, and when I referred to this transaction, I pointed out that a very serious inference might be drawn from the conduct of the hon. gentleman. Now, I press this upon the attention of this Committee, that there was a payment of $6,150 instead of $4,100; that there was a payment of $15,000 without authority or warrant of law; and if you want to have an improper or corrupt transaction, that is the way to begin it. I do not say this was so, but I said this was dishonest, and I say so still, because if you pay money to men which they are not entitled to, if you put your hand into the treasury and pay it out to men who have not earned it, it is a dishonest and an improper payment. So I characterized it, and so I believe it to be; and there is nothing said by either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Justice which takes away that moral feature from the transaction. The hon. gentleman says that I have no right to indulge in a criticism of that sort. Sir, if he takes money out of the public treasury and pays it over to a party who has not earned it, if he contracts with a man for a certain sum and pays him 50 per cent more than he has agreed to pay him, I say that the burden of proof of showing that that money was, upon moral gronds, a proper payment, rests upon him from beginning to end. It does not rest upon anybody else, it does not rest upon me, or any one on this side of the House; it is not for us to show that the contract said four and that you said six; the burden is upon you to show that it was a proper transaction. Then with regard to the other transaction, the Minister of Justice has drawn a herring across the track, but he has not made the position any better before this Committee or before the country. $15,000 were paid to Pickford & Black which they had not earned, ostensibly under a service which did not exist at the time as a public service. Pickford & Black did precisely what anybody else would have done, what scores of others for aught I know have done—sent ships on to the service with a view of promoting their own interests, from the maritime ports of the Dominion to the West India Islands. In August the Government had entered into an engagement with them, not because there was any anticipation of payment from the public; if there were, then the Government would not have been free to contract with anybody else, and the demand for tenders on the part of the Minister of Finance would have been a delusion, it would have been a dishonest and misleading transaction to have asked for tenders when he was already tied hand and foot, bound under obligations to somebody else. Let me suppose for one moment that this contract of December and November had been made with somebody else than Pickford & Black. Could Pickford & Black have come forward and made a claim for services between July and November? Would the Government have listened to this claim? Would they have paid over $15,000 for those services under those circumstances? Why they would have said there was no claim existing, they would have said: You undertook to send steamers to the West Indies upon your own responsibility, for the promotion of your own interests, for making gain for yourselves. You did not consult us, we incurred no obligation. We were inviting the public at large, inviting others as well as you to enter into this contract, and it was because we did so that we were free to contract with any person else, and we too are free to contract with you, and we are bound to pay you the amount agreed upon for the time for which this contract was entered into. But, Sir, it is not for any such services as these that $15,000 was paid; it is for a service that was performed months before, not, as the Minister of Justice says, for services performed before the first of July, 1889, for mail service. Nothing of the sort. No such claim is made. It was for the service rendered between July and November, a service for which they put these boats on as a private speculation, for the promotion of their own interest. It was undertaken for a service with which the public had no more connection than it has with the service between Timbuctoo and Soudan, and there was no greater obligation to pay one than to pay the other. It is impossible for the Minister to say that he had any warrant to pay the $15,000; it is impossible for him to say that he was under any obligation to pay one dollar of that money. The Minister of Justice stood up here to-night and denied that one dollar of that $15,000 went to an election fund. I ask him: How does he know? When he says he does not know, I am ready to accept his statement; I do not doubt that; but when he tells me that no portion of that money went for political purposes, then I have a right to ask him the question: How does he know? What statement has Pickford & Black made to him that satisfies him that not a dollar of that money was paid for election purposes? I say that it is the natural outcome of a system, and the whole proceedings and disclosures of this session of Parliament show that it is so, and it is because it is so, that I have invited the attention of the House to this particular contract. I say if you pay a contractor a large sum of money for which they have neither a moral nor a legal claim, you are putting these men under obligation to you, and it is natural that they should deal generously with those who have dealt so liberally with them. And so you take the first step in that moral deterioration that ends in the corruption of the public service. I say that is the natural outcome. I do not care to consider whether one dollar of this money was so applied or not. That is not the question, the question is: Did the Minister of Finance pay this money out by legal authority and for a service that warranted the payment? I say he has not shown that to the House, he has not satisfied a single member, either on that side or this, that such is the case, and he will have to make a very different statement from that which he has made this evening before he will convince any one capable of exercising his rational faculties, that Pickford & Black had any claim whatever upon the public treasury, moral or legal, for the $15,000 which they received.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have only one observation to make with respect to the controversy which exists between this side of the House and the Government, as to the payment of the increased amount to Baird & Co. The Minister of Justice, for reasons of his own, did not see fit to defend that; but the hon. gentleman did rise in his place and attempt to lead this House—and I submit to himself whether he acted ingenuously or not—to believe that there was a valid consideration for the payment of that $15,000, and that that consideration consisted in the carriage of certain mails by Pickford & Black.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. And for the performance of the service for which the subsidy was voted.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has not read his brief up very well, if he had he would have seen that he was altogether wrong.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was not wrong.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He cannot deny the record that stands before him. I will hazard the assertion that if Pickford & Black carried any mails for Her Majesty in the year 1888, they were paid every dollar that it was worth.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not a cent. The member for Bothwell has just told you they were not paid a cent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I said nothing was paid out of this $15,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I declare that no part of the money has been charged against the Post Office Department, and therefore was not paid out of this money. But the hon. gentleman will agree with me that his defence has been peculiarly unfortunate, because he cannot establish the assertion in this House that Pickford & Black carried the mails for the Post Office in 1888 and got no pay for it. We will not, however, depend on memories. We will go to the records. I will take the hon. gentleman to the Minute of Council passed by himself; I will take the hon. gentleman to the application of Pickford & Black for the payment of $15,000. That Minute was before the hon. gentleman when he made his statement. Does the application bear out his statement? Is there a claim direct or indirect from Pickford & Black for $15,000 because they had carried Her Majesty's mails?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not say there was.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Their application is here and reads:

"In November, 1889, we completed arrangements with the Government to perform two of the services asked for, viz., Canada to Cuba, and Canada to Jamaica, by which we were to receive a subsidy.

"Whilst operating these lines previous to November, 1889, we did so at loss to ourselves. The routes were very expensive ones and no return cargoes could be got."

Therefore it was not because they had carried the mails, but because they were carrying out a private service of their own that they lost money.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They were very wise in their generation. That was the claim they put forward. We paid it. Then they had a claim behind. We paid this in lieu of everything.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will take the hon. gentleman a step forward and show him he is still more in fault. When he accepted the application based on the letter reciting the fact, the Minute of Council was passed because Pickford & Black performed those services at a loss. That is the reason the hon. gentleman put in the Minute of Council, and not that they had carried mails or anything of that kind. I venture to say to the hon. gentleman that if on examining the accounts of the Post Office he finds they did carry mails in previous years, he will find they were paid for every mail bag they carried. Whether they were or were not, it will be difficult to make me believe that if Pickford & Black had a claim on which they could base an application for money they would not have put it in their letter written on 23rd September, and it would not have been placed in the Minute of Council authorizing the payment.

Resolutions reported.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.55 a.m. (Tuesday).

Resolutions concurred in.

LAND SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed resolutions (page 3308) respecting the granting of the subsidies of land therein mentioned to railway companies, and towards the construction of the railways also thereinafter mentioned.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 1,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to know on what grounds this is proposed, where these lands are to be granted, and also full particulars about the whole line that is proposed to be constructed?

Mr. DEWDNEY. In presenting these resolutions to the House it will be necessary, as the hon. gentleman suggests, to give a slight historical review of the Manitoba and South-Western Railway. I have placed on the Table of the House a map which, if the hon. gentleman will place it before him, will serve as a guide to the remarks I am about to make. I will also hand to him the Order in Council, which will enable him to follow me. I will place on the Table of the House a map which the hon. gentleman asked for, showing the land grants already made to railways; also a statement showing the amount of lands granted to different railway companies that are now in operation, as well as the grants to companies for which we are liable. The Order in Council to which I refer is dated 2nd February, 1891. It will be seen that by Order in Council of 30th April, 1884, a tract of land was set apart within which the company should be permitted to acquire by purchase at $1 per acre the odd-numbered sections at the disposal of the Government, the tract being described as follows:—Bounded on the south by the international boundary, on the east by the road allowance between ranges numbers twelve and thirteen, on the north by the northern limit of the south halves of Townships numbered four of the Dominion Lands system of survey, and on the west by the range of hills known as the Grand Coteau, or Dirt Hills. That by Order in Council of the 4th October, 1884, the odd-numbered sections within this tract were made applicable, subject to the approval of Parliament, as a free grant in aid of the construction of the railway, but on payment of the cost of the survey at the rate of 10 cents per acre, to the extent of 6,400 acres per mile of the company's line for the whole distance from Winnipeg to the neighbourhood of Whitewater Lake. This grant was confirmed by the Act 48-49 Victoria, chapter 60, which authorized a subsidy of 6,400 acres per mile from Winnipeg to near Whitewater Lake, about 150 miles, or about 960,000 acres. Previous to this, however, the company had already constructed 52 miles south-westerly from Winnipeg, and by the Order in Council of the 6th April, 1885, the Order of the 4th of October, 1884, before mentioned, was amended by apportioning the 972,800 acres therein provided for equally over the line beyond the end of the 52 miles constructed, for which purpose the line was divided into three sections, as follows:—(a) From the southern end of the 52 miles already constructed to Manitou, 30 miles, as section 1; (b) From Manitou to Whitewater Lake, about 80 miles, as section 2; (c) From a point in township 8, range 4, to township 8, range 9, about 20 miles, as section 3. Manitou, I may state, is the junction of the Manitoba South-Western and the Canadian Pacific South-Western. Upon the report of the Chief Engineer of Government Railways that section 2, 80 miles in length, and section 3, 20 miles in length, were properly completed, the land grant appertaining thereto, 748,384 acres, was authorized to be conveyed to the company by Order in Council of the 5th of April, 1886. In presenting this order to the Government I reported that no work has ever been done on section 1, as described in the Order in Council of the 6th of April, 1885, that is to say, the 30 miles necessary to connect the terminal point of the 52 miles south-westerly from Winnipeg to Manitou; but in lieu of this the southern branch of the line, that is to say section 2, was extended to Deloraine, near Whitewater Lake, about 20 miles, and the northern branch was extended westward to Glenborough, about 60 miles, and the company asked that these extensions be subsidized in lieu of the 30 miles north of Manitou, for which they claim there was no immediate need. This was allowed, and on the 15th November, 1886, a land grant for these extensions, on the report of the Chief Engineer of Railways that the work was completed, was granted, representing 384,000 acres. This land was authorized by the Government to be conveyed to the company on 19th March, 1887 The total area, therefore, which has been authorized to be conveyed to the company by the Order in Council of the 5th April, 1886, and the 19th March, 1887, is 1,132,384 acres, that is to say, for 27 miles in excess of the distance for which the Act 48-49 Vic., chap. 60, provided a land subsidy, involving a land grant of 172,384 acres. I went to Council and reported that the company have, however, actually built and have had in operation for some years some 212 miles, including the 52 miles south-west from Winnipeg known and hereinbefore referred to as section 1, and this length of road, at the usual rate of 6,400 acres per mile, would entitle them to a total grant of 1,356,800 acres, being 224,416 acres more than has so far been provided for by His Excellency in Council, and 396,800 acres more than authorized by the Act 48-49 Vic., chap. 60. It will thus be seen that this is the condition of the mileage: There were 150 miles authorized by statute, and 177 miles authorized by Orders in Council. They had built, however, 212 miles, which left a balance of 27 and 35 miles; 27 miles was not authorized by statute but were built, and 35 miles were built but not covered by Orders in Council or by statute, which constitute the 62 miles in the first resolution I present to the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Minister of the Interior promised the House a statement showing the total amount of lands granted to railways in the North-West.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The statement is on the Table. It amounts to 22,716,000 acres, excluding the grant of 18,000,000 acres to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The entire total is 42,132,000 acres, representing every railway which up to this time has had a land grant from the Government.

Mr. CHARLTON. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that we have progressed very rapidly in this matter, and I imagine that it is time to go a little more slowly for the future. I see by the map on the Table that the North-West is pretty well checkered with the land grants, and although these railways may be necessary, yet there are many of these branch lines that would be built as fast as the wants of the country require by a powerful corporation such as the Canadian Pacific Railway is. This company has been endowed by the Government with immense bonuses in money and land, and probably no railway corporation in the world has a stronger position financially than the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Central Pacific commenced business with a capital of $12,800 in 1862, and the last statement of that company's assets that I saw, show that they amounted to $280,000,000 above its liabilities. The Canadian Pacific Railway certainly is in an infinitely better position than the Central Pacific was at the same age. A company such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, with its enormous resources and energy of management, with an energy of management which is certainly without a parallel, a company of that kind is able to build all the branch lines it may require, and I believe it will do it as fast as that country requires development. I think the Government ought to cry a halt in this matter of giving such an enormous grant of land to railways. There are cases no doubt where it is necessary to make grants in order to secure the construction of railways, but there is always the danger of speculators getting the influence of persons who have influence with the Government to secure large grants that are entirely unnecessary. My hon. friend who is administering one of the most important departments of this Government, if he looks over the history of railway land grants in the United States, will be convinced that the system of granting lands to railways is liable to very great abuse, and was very greatly abused in that country, and is liable to be abused here. As the administrator of that department I hope he will move cautiously in this matter. Those of us who are interested in the North-West and wish to see it developed, want to see the settlers procure their lands at a reasonable price in that country, and to see the settlement of the North-West progress much more rapidly than it has in the past. The locking up of vast areas of land in the hands of railway corporations who will sell them at the highest price to the settlers is certainly not the way to secure settlement. We have railways enough in that country now. We have land made accessible to railways to a sufficient extent now to accommodate ten times the population we have in the North-West, and we may very reasonably and properly go a little slower in this matter and preserve that great heritage of the people, the public domain of the North-West, a little more carefully?

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman say whether this Manitoba North-Western Colonization Railway is operated under its own charter, by its own officers, or has it any working arrangement with any other company?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I understand it has been operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway for some years.

Mr. MULOCK. Can the hon. gentleman say what are the terms between the Canadian Pacific Railway and this railway? Is it leased in perpetuity to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I am not quite sure, but I fancy it is a ninety-nine years lease.

Mr. MULOCK. That is about the same. It is only an independent railway on paper. Practically it is the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I do not know what its stock is. I fancy it is an independent company.

Mr. MULOCK. It must be a separate corporation, or the grant would not be made in this way. You are treating it in law as a separate corporation; but if the hon. Minister is right it is really the Canadian Pacific Railway under another name. I suppose that this second paragraph is to the same effect, and that the whole line is under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes, I believe so—the Manitoba South-Western and the Souris Branch. But they are distinct companies.

Mr. WATSON. Was it not claimed, in the case between the Northern Pacific and the Canadian Pacific in reference to the crossing of this South-Western Colonization Railway, that it was part and parcel of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that on that ground they had a right to prevent any crossing?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I presume so.

Mr. WATSON. Then there is no doubt that it is a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. DALY. The South-Western Colonization Railway Company has its own charter. It was chartered prior to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and it has its separate land grant; but it has been leased and is operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose the only asset it has is its charter?

Mr. DALY. No; it has the land grant.

Mr. MULOCK. But the land grant goes to build the road. I suppose the Canadian Pacific Railway Company pays nothing for the line. I suppose there was no money put into it.

Mr. DALY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MULOCK. There may have been promoters, but I do not think there was any money. I observe that part of this resolution speaks of a grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for a road already constructed. On what principle do you grant aid to a railway which is already constructed?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The Orders in Council are generally worded in this way: About so many miles. It is seldom that they are more exact.

Mr. MULOCK. But I am speaking now about a grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of so much a mile for a railway already constructed?

Mr. DEWDNEY. It is part of the general arrangement for granting the land subsidy to the Manitoba and South-Western Railway. There were three or four more negotiations with reference to the building of that railway. The first land grant was given for a railway from Winnipeg straight to Whitewater Lake, including this 52 miles, and this is only to carry out the arrangement made with the Manitoba South-Western Company when it took over the railway from the company which I think originally built that portion.

Mr. DALY. The railway as projected originally was to run to Manitou, and then across the country; and when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company took hold of it, they diverted the line, and continued it to Glenborough or Whitewater Lake, and it was on account of the diversion of the line that this question arose with reference to the land grant.

Mr. MULOCK. We have at present, then, an arrangement made between the two companies. But how can such an arrangement bind this Government to give this land grant? This is the first time this matter has come before Parliament.

Mr. DEWDNEY. No, no.

Mr. MULOCK. I am speaking of this additional grant. Parliament was never called on before to vote it, and I want to know how it is that we are making a land grant for the construction of a railway which is already constructed, and, I suppose, in operation?

Mr. DEWDNEY. We are closing up the whole matter, and it is found that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are entitled to a land grant covering 212 miles.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman say on what ground they are entitled to this additional grant? This resolution implies that the only obligation to make land grants heretofore has been to secure the construction of 150 miles. How comes it now that we are called upon to give an additional grant for 52 miles of railway which is already constructed? Is there any statutory obligation binding us, or what is the foundation of this resolution?

Mr. DEWDNEY. There is a statutory obligation in reference to the 150 miles, and there are Orders in Council in reference to 177 miles; and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in submitting the matter to the Government, state that they have completed the 212 miles, as a result of a distinct understanding and arrangement with the Government that they should receive the usual land subsidy therefor, that is, 6,400 acres per mile for the 212 miles.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is that understanding in writing?

Mr. DEWDNEY. There is an Order in Council covering the whole of it.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman assigns now as a reason for our granting this 6,400 acres a mile for this additional mileage, that there is an understanding between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government that this shall be granted. Will he give the exact nature of that understanding—when it began, what it culminated in, and what form it took?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The hon. gentleman will find it in the copy of the Order in Council which I handed to the hon. member for North Norfolk.

Mr. MULOCK. This is a very lengthy document, and it is impossible to read it through in time to discuss this resolution. I did not know but the Minister would be able to give the information on the points I am mentioning. If not, I think the resolution should stand over to give us time to read these documents. At present all we have before the Committee is this statement, that there is a road actually constructed and actually in operation. We are told that we are now to grant 6,400 acres a mile in aid of the construction of a road which is already built, and the Minister says the reason he asks for this aid is that there is an understanding on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway that we should make this grant. Well, I have a great respect for the Canadian Pacific Railway and its understanding, but I have more respect for the property of the country, and I want more reasons than mere understanding on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway before I shall be prepared to assent to a grant of the public domain to a completed road.

Mr. DEWDNEY. It is completed. Since 1884 52 miles have been completed of the first section.

The others have been completed from year to year, and the whole now is completed.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is now asking the House for the first time to make a grant of land to a railway which is built. Generally these grants are made to bring about the construction of a road and for no other purpose, but in this case the Minister says the road is constructed but we must all the same make this grant.

Mr. DEWDNEY. But this road was gone on with and completed on the distinct understanding that it was to have a land grant.

Mr. MULOCK. Give us the details of the understanding?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I did, as near as I could, when I read this description contained in an Order in Council. I have not all the Orders in Council, but can get them.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the whole history of the transaction should be laid upon the Table before the House can move. At present the hon. Minister has given the best reasons why we should not make a grant, namely, that it is not required to secure the construction of the railway.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Surely the hon. gentleman would not ask a company to build a road and promise them 6,400 acres a mile, and then refuse to carry out his promise.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to see what the pledge is. Promises that are made must be carried out, but it is only reasonable we should know the circumstances before we pronounce on this proposition. Supposing, without any understanding binding on the Crown, after a road is completed the company came down and asked to be presented with a grant of land per mile, would Parliament listen to the application? The only grant to which Parliament can assent is that which has been legally and constitutionally made. I do not desire Parliament to break faith with the road, but wish to see to what extent our faith is pledged.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that an Order in Council was passed in consequence of any action taken by Parliament, or was it merely the spontaneous action of the Governor in Council? And if so, what authority had they to make the Order in Council authorizing them to grant any railway company a part of our public lands?

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is the way it is always done.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Without the authority of Parliament?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Of course it depends on Parliament to carry out the Order in Council or not, but the Order in Council is passed granting a subsidy in land or money, and then the Bill is brought to Parliament.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman must be labouring under a misapprehension. It is true that the Crown may, by Order in Council, promise to grant lands to a railway company; but if the Crown makes such a pledge, it ought to inform Parliament at the very first opportunity, so as to give Parliament an opportunity of pronouncing upon it. But if Parliament declares that any railway company which will undertake the construction of a road over any unoccupied territory shall be, between any points the Government may choose to designate, entitled to a certain sum of money or grant of land, that will be the authority of Parliament for the Government to act. But I do not understand that there is any such Act. The hon. gentleman has not referred to any such Act, but simply to an Order in Council promising to grant to a railway company a large portion of the public domain if the company will undertake to construct a railway. That Order in Council should have been communicated to Parliament, and has no force or utility until Parliament sanctions it. The Government surely will not undertake to grant away hundreds of thousands of acres of the public domain without any authority whatever. The Crown is a trustee of the public lands.

Mr. DEWDNEY. With reference to this Manitoba and South-Western Railway, there have been several communications in regard to not building certain portions when it was found circumstances made it more in the interest of the country a change should be made, and certain portions should not be built and others built in their place. This led to a complication difficult to understand, but everything is perfectly clear; the Government agreed to give to the Manitoba and South-Western the usual grant and are bound to carry out their obligation.

Mr. LAURIER. When was the Order in Council passed?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The last one closing up the whole matter was passed 4th February, 1891. Orders in Council were passed at different times from the 30th July, 1884, and these brought about the construction of the road as laid down in this Order in Council passed 4th February, 1891. There were five, six or seven different Orders in Council passed.

Mr. LAURIER. Were they brought to Parliament from year to year?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I fancy they must have been, because there have been subsidy Bills granting portions to the road at different times.

Mr. CHARLTON. This grant of land was made at a time when additional postal subsidies were granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that time was coincident with the date of the dissolution of the last Parliament. This method of arranging all these important matters by Orders in Council, of changing the grants and conditions, varying lines, &c., is an irregular and improper way of doing business. The Government control the majority of the House, and as a rule, any action they may choose to take in a matter of this kind will be sanctioned by this House, but the Government at least ought to comply with the conditions of responsible government by consulting the House in a matter of this kind. We have had, it certainly appears, a very loose method of doing business with regard to making land grants in the North-West. We have given away an enormous quantity of land, 48,000,000 acres in round numbers, and these grants have been made apart from that to the Canadian Pacific Railway and without its being necessary to make them. The Manitoba and South-Western road is an important feeder of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is a line which it was in the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway to build, and which that company would have built under any circumstances. The Canadian Pacific Railway is a powerful corporation, its stock will probably go to a hundred within a short time, and this stock will have to be watered fifty to seventy-five per cent. to keep it down to the figure of one hundred within the next forty years. There is not a corporation on the continent which has the resources of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is not a pauper company, it does not need to come to the Government to beg for aid in building the branches necessary to develop the country and furnish business to the road, and this business of passing Orders in Council just on the eve of an election, and shortly before the time an appeal was made to the electors of the country by the magnates of that road in favour of the Government, looks very suspicious indeed. It is time that the policy of the Government with regard to the land grants in the North-West should be carefully considered, and that the Government, before committing itself to any scheme whatever, before pledging the grant of one acre of land, should, as a preliminary, consult this House and receive its sanction. We may be bound here, and probably we are, and if so we must carry out the obligation.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Every Order in Council is made subject to the approval of Parliament.

Mr. CHARLTON. These Orders in Council have been made and the companies have gone on to construct the road, relying upon the Orders in Council being carried out, and the faith of the Government is in a sense pledged, though it is true that Parliament may reverse that action. I urge that the preliminary steps should have the sanction of Parliament before any operations are undertaken with the consent of the Government.

Mr. DALY. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to object to the giving of land grants to railways?

Mr. CHARLTON. I have asserted that a powerful corporation like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is able to build the lines which are tributary to it. It is not necessary now for that company to come here and ask for contributions, as they had to do when they were building the main line. We have built their main line, and we give them the opportunity to build the branches. It is not necessary for us to give away our lands in the North-West in order to have this done. We should consult the interests of the people more than the interests of the railway corporation. While I am not opposed to making land grants in aid of railway construction, I am opposed to these wasteful and indiscriminate land grants, which I say are not necessary.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister has placed on the Table a copy of the Order in Council of the 4th February, 1891, and he said that the statements contained in that Order in Council were such as to warrant this motion being made, and that this document set forth the reason why Parliament was now asked to make this grant.

Mr. DEWDNEY. It referred to an Order in Council which brought about this one.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, but let us look at this document. After setting forth certain Orders in Council and certain legislation which has taken place, it is stated on the second page, in the second paragraph that, as to 27 miles of this road —part of the road, I presume, in respect of which a land grant is now asked—those 27 miles are in excess of the distance for which the land subsidy has been pledged. The Minister will understand that this paragraph puts him out of court as to the 27 miles, when he asks whether we will keep faith or not. You must point to some Act of Parliament or some formal obligation binding the Crown before you can talk about not keeping faith. As to 27 miles out of the 62 miles, therefore, the document which the hon. gentleman has placed on the Table states that there is no grant and no pledge on the part of the Crown, the Government, or the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. HAGGART. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. It states specifically that there are for the 27 miles, "172,384 acres already approved by Your Excellency, but not yet confirmed by Parliament."

Mr. MULOCK. The Order in Council states:

"The Minister further states that the company have, however, actually built and have had in operation for some years 212 miles, including the 52 miles south-west of Winnipeg known and hereinbefore referred to as section 1, and this length of road, at the usual rate of 6,400 acres per mile, would entitle them to a total grant of 1,356,800 acres, being 224,416 acres more than has so far been provided for by Your Excellency in Council, and 396,800 acres more than authorized by the Act."

Mr. HAGGART. Read the next section.

Mr. MULOCK. The next section says:

"The company submit that they have constructed the whole length of their railway now in operation as the result of a distinct understanding and arrangement with the Government that they would receive the usual land subsidy therefor."

There is no such thing as a "usual land subsidy," unless you can point to a pledge given by Parliament to that effect.—

"They are now fairly justified in asking the approval of Your Excellency of the subsidy of 224,416 acres appertaining to the twenty-seven miles hereinbefore mentioned, and that Your Excellency should submit to Parliament at its next session a measure confirming the grant of that area and the additional area of 172,374 acres already approved by Your Excellency but not yet confirmed by Parliament."

I would like to know whether we are simply called upon to endorse something which has been done by the Governor in Council, or whether we are doing something which has been already sanctioned by legislation. We have it stated on the face of this document that there is no legislation covering the whole of the requirements, and the Minister of the Interior evidently felt that there was no legislative sanction or authority for what he is asking, because he goes on to state—and this is the flimsy way in which the rights of the Crown are to be dealt with:

"The Minister further states that the records of the Department of the Interior leave no doubt whatever that the company's statement that both branches of the railway were constructed on the understanding that the usual subsidy of 6,400 acres of land per mile would be provided for the whole length of the road, is well founded."

There was some understanding in regard to this matter. Where is it in the records of the department? This road has been in operation for some years, and there must have been some understanding. Where are the records on which this understanding is based? Are the rights of the Crown to depend on the understandings which are contained in the archives of the department? Where are these archives? Had they the sanction of Parliament, or of the Government, or of the Governor in Council? The Order in Council goes on:

"Apart from this, however, and in view particularly of the incalculable benefit which Southern Manitoba has derived from the construction of the two branches of this railway, putting in direct communication with the world one of the richest agricultural regions of the North-West, he, the Minister, is of opinion that the company's claim is a reasonable one."

It is not based upon the contract. The Minister does not pretend that there is a contract entitling them to this land. I would be the last man to sanction in any way the violation of a contract or of any obligation of a legal character, but the Minister himself, in addressing Council, did not base his recommendation on a contract, but on what he calls reasonableness. He goes on, in his Order in Council, to say:

"And he recommends that, subject to the approval of Parliament, the difference between the area already authorized by Your Excellency to be conveyed to them, namely, 1,132,384 acres, and the total area of the 1,356,800 acres, represented by a grant at the rate of 640 acres per mile for a distance of 212 miles, that is to say, 224,416 acres, be granted to the company, subject to the following conditions."

On the face of this document the Minister himself declares that there is no statutory grant for over 200,000 acres of land which he is now asking us to grant to this railway, and he cannot point to any, and we are now asked to grant 6,400 acres per mile for a portion of this road which has been in construction for years. Unless the Minister can furnish better explanation than this, Parliament should not listen for a moment to the proposition. Before further observations, I think the Minister should produce all these documents on which he drew the conclusion that this request was reasonable, that there was such an understanding. Parliament is entitled to see his Order in Council, and see what these requests were on which the Minister based this report of his. I again come back to the question that I put in the beginning—would the Minister please produce the documents on which this understanding is based which he alleges to exist?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will bring everything down before the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me this is a very peculiar proposition, and it is a very strange suggestion on the part of the Minister of the Interior, that this Committee should adopt this resolution without first seeing all the information that has been asked for by the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock). This is the first time in my political experience, that a proposition of this kind has been brought before this House, a resolution to grant a subsidy to a road that is actually constructed and in running operation. So far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned I am sure we, as Canadians, all feel proud of the marvellous progress that road has made. We are glad to know it has done as well as it has; we rejoice to know that its financial standing and progress are so good as they are; at the same time we are here to legislate as between the interest of the people of this country and of that corporation, and while wishing it all success as a great national transcontinental highway, and while we rejoice to see it in the position it is, at the same time the people of this country have a very direct and deep interest in the North-West. It was stated to this House when the inception of this scheme for the final construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was presented to the House, and afterwards when we were asked to grant a $30,000,000 loan in order to enable the company to complete the road in advance of the time that had been agreed upon,—we were told then that by this year, the year 1891, we should have not less than from fifty million dollars to seventy million dollars out of lands in the North-West from the results of sales towards recouping this country for the construction of that line. Now, in place of having that, we have not one single farthing; in place of that we have enormous sums of money sunk there in many ways for which the people of this country have not received one dollar. I notice that whenever the question is brought before this House with regard to the development of any section of the North-West, the North-West members join unanimously in declaring that it is highly desirable that the lands of that section of country should be granted to any railway company, it does not matter whether it is a wild-cat scheme or any other kind of a scheme, so long as the lands are given away for the purpose of building any road in the North-West. They are willing and anxious that all such propositions should be carried through, and anxious that this House should give its assent at once. Why? Because the lands in the North-West belong to this Dominion, and are held and should be held, to recoup this Dominion for the enormous amount of money that has been spent in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and anything that will secure the giving away of this land in the North-West meets the views of hon. gentlemen opposite from Manitoba, and they are willing that the House should consent to grant that land at once. I have no desire to advocate that we should refuse to encourage, in a proper and careful way, the development of the North-West; I am quite willing to do so. At the same time I contend that this South-Western and Manitoba line is running through a section of country that could as well afford to grant aid towards the construction of that road from a provincial standpoint, as the municipalities throughout the Province of Ontario or any other province, that have granted aid towards railway construction. The North-West has municipal organizations, and they should be asked to grant their money towards building the road, if they want to do so, the same as the municipalities in the Province of Ontario that are labouring under burdens of debt, and paying from year to year very large sums towards the liquidation of the debts contracted for the construction of their roads. What right have the Government to ask the poor farmers of Ontario to consent that the money that it was promised should be recouped to them for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and should come into the coffers of this Dominion, should be spent in the construction and developments of roads in the North-West without those farmers receiving a single dollar in return? That is a fact, and hon. gentlemen opposite know it. Now, while I am quite willing to deal fairly and justly with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, or any other company, I contend that we should give no special concession to any company, and this is undoubtedly a special concession so far as the 6,400 acres per mile are concerned. When the Minister says that he made an Order in Council, it is rather remarkable that the date of that Order in Council was on the 4th of February, and the date of the general election was on the 5th of March; that is to say, thirty days afterwards. I wonder if that Order in Council has had anything to do with a remarkable manifesto that was issued by the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway in favour of hon. gentlemen opposite. It may have had something to do with it: we do not know. But I say that the hon. gentlemen opposite, when Parliament met, should have laid the whole facts of that question before the House, with all the information in their possession. They have not done that. They bring it out at the tail end of a long session, when this House is wearied out with the amount of scandals that have been unearthed, with all the abominations that have been discovered among the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Opposition have brought to light this session, scandals and iniquities that should bring the blush of shame to every honest Canadian; and I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite that we have not yet reached the end of the abominations; we are only at the beginning of them, as they will find out before this session is closed.

An hon. MEMBER. Trot them out.

Mr. McMULLEN. Now, I say that before this item is passed the Minister of the Interior should lay before the House the information that has been asked for by the hon. member for York. We are asked from time to time to pass items with the solemn pledge of hon. gentlemen opposite that the information asked for will be brought down and laid on the Table of the House. That is legislating in advance of information. I contend that Parliament is not here merely to register the will of hon. gentlemen opposite. We have certain rights and certain privileges, and we have a right to expect that our privileges shall be respected, and that information we are justly entitled to shall be laid before the Committee, before we are asked to go on in this way. Let the hon. gentleman reserve the item, and bring down the information; then we shall be legislating with our eyes open and not with our eyes shut.

Mr. DALY. It seems to me the hon. gentleman is making a great deal of fuss about nothing. I think the explanation contained in the memorandum of Council which has been read by the member for North York, is sufficient, and if he was willing to accept that explanation, there would be no need of discussion. Now, this resolution refers to the Manitoba and South-Western Colonization Railway Company. In the memorandum for Council reference is made to the statute of 48 and 49 Victoria, chapter 60, an Act to authorize the granting of certain subsidies in land for the construction of railways therein mentioned. Section 2 of the Act provides as follows:—

"The Governor in Council may grant to the Manitoba and South-Western Colonization Railway Company, Dominion lands to an extent not exceeding 6,400 acres for each mile of the company's railway, from its commencement at Winnipeg to its terminus at Whitewater Lake, about 150 miles."

It is in the recollection of hon. gentlemen from Manitoba that about the time of the passing of this Act, in 1885, there was a great deal of agitation in Manitoba, where the people were asking that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should extend its south-western branch. The Canadian Pacific Railway, in obedience to the demands of the public, went on and extended that branch, and as a matter of fact, they went on building to such an extent, that they got beyond the Order in Council that gave them their land grant. That is how the whole difficulty has arisen. It was not discovered until they had completed their whole line, and then they ascertained that they had not received the land grant to which they were entitled. It is plainly laid down by the Act of 1875, that the company were entitled to a land grant of 150 miles, and they built 212 miles, and the Government were pledged to give them the land grant for this additional mileage.

Mr. CHARLTON. Why?

Mr. DALY. By virtue of having agreed to give the company 6,400 acres per mile for the first 150 miles. They went on and constructed 62 miles additional on the clear understanding that they were to get the same subsidy. They would not have undertaken the building otherwise.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the understanding?

Mr. DALY. By the Act I have quoted, the company were given 6,400 acres per mile for 150 miles. They built 62 miles beyond that point on the clear and distinct understanding, if the hon. gentleman opposite will believe me, that they were to obtain the same land grant for the additional mileage. They got beyond the Order in Council, as they built faster than they supposed, and they thought the Order in Council gave them the land grant for the length of railway they built. They discovered the mistake. This Order in Council is as follows:—

"The company submit that they have constructed the whole length of their railway now in operation as the result of a distinct understanding and arrangement with the Government that they would receive the usual land subsidy therefor, that they are fairly justified in asking the approval of Your Excellency to the subsidy of 224,416 acres appertaining to the twenty-seven miles hereinbefore mentioned, and that Your Excellency should submit to Parliament at its next session a measure confirming the grant of that area and the additional area of 172,384 acres already approved by Your Excellency but not yet confirmed by Parliament.

"The Minister further states that the records of the Department of the Interior leave no doubt whatever that the company's statement that both branches of the railway were constructed on the understanding that the usual subsidy of 6,400 acres of land per mile would be provided for the whole length of the road, is well founded. Apart from this, however, and in view particularly of the incalculable benefit which Southern Manitoba has derived from the construction of the two branches of this railway putting in direct communication with the markets of the world one of the richest agricultural regions of the North-West, he, the Minister, is of opinion that the company's claim is a reasonable one, and he recommends that, subject to the approval of Parliament, the difference between the area already authorized by Your Excellency to be conveyed to them, namely, 1,132,384 acres, and the total area of 1,356,800 acres, represented by a grant at the rate of 6,400 acres per mile for a distance of 212 miles, that is to say 224,416 acres, be granted to the company subject to the following conditions."

The whole gist of the matter is contained in the last paragraph I have read: "The Minister is of the opinion that the company's claim is a reasonable one." Will hon. gentlemen opposite say that claim is not a reasonable one when by the Act of 1885 they were granted 6,400 acres per mile for 150 miles, and they proceeded and built 62 miles additional, for which a land grant at the same rate is now asked?

Mr. MULOCK. Then where is the limit?

Mr. DALY. The company reached the limit because there is no more of that line to be constructed.

Mr. MULOCK. They might build another 100 miles.

Mr. DALY. Looking at the question from a reasonable standpoint, hon. members cannot but conclude that if the company built 62 miles additional, they were entitled to the same land grant per mile as to the original 150 miles. The whole matter under discussion is one that we cannot expect to be fairly considered by hon. gentlemen opposite, because it appears to me that no matter what proposition is brought forward referring to Manitoba and the North-West, hon. gentlemen opposite take exception to everything the Government propose to do on behalf of the people of that country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I cannot congratulate the hon. gentleman on the speech he has delivered,—

Mr. DALY. I do not expect it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—nor on the petulant remarks with which he closed his observations. I do not think the Opposition are open to the charge he has made, nor are they going to remain silent under it. The Opposition have never in any case —I challenge the hon. gentleman to prove his assertion—offered improper or unreasonable opposition to any proposition made by the Government or by any hon. member, having for its object the proper promotion and development of the North-West. But I will take the hon. gentleman's own argument. What is the argument he has addressed to the House? That by the Act 48 and 49 Victoria, chapter 60, the land grant of 6,400 acres per mile is given for this road for an extension of 150 miles. That was given in addition to the Order in Council by which the company got a similar number of acres per mile for 23 miles beyond that. The hon. gentleman says that because the company have built a longer line of road, it necessarily follows that they must get a correspondingly increased land subsidy. I do not see the force of that logic. The Order in Council which the Minister submitted to the House, and on which he asked the House to assent to his proposition states that it was passed because the Minister found in the records of his department certain statements which left no doubt whatever that the company's statement was true, that both branches of the railway have been constructed and that the usual subsidy of 6,400 per mile should be granted. What has been asked by the Opposition? The Minister says: I came to this conclusion from certain documents in my department; that Council approved of my conclusion, and I asked the House to assent to it. The hon. gentleman says he will bring down the documents on which he arrived at that conclusion before the third reading of the Bill. Why should we not have now the documents which led the Minister to come to this conclusion and which led Council to approve of it? Why should they be withheld from us? Have we no right to see whether the conclusion was a sound one or not? Suppose his understanding is wrong, and that he made no legitimate deduction from the papers he referred to. What then? Is the House to be treated as a spoiled child? Such an idea is ridiculous. The hon. gentleman is asking this House for an area of land equal to a principality, and when we ask for the papers on which they decided to make this grant, the Minister says he is willing to bring them down after the Bill has passed to its third reading. Did the hon. gentleman intend that as an insult to the Opposition or the House? If not, it must have been done from the hon. gentleman's ignorance. He knows that when a Bill has passed its second reading and its principle assented to, it will be eventually carried. We want the reasons now. Why did not the hon. gentleman submit the papers when he asked the House to assent to the resolutions, in the first instance? Instead of doing so, the hon. gentleman turns round and says that the papers on which he acted and on which the recommendation was made are in the archives of his office; and, on the Opposition asking them to be produced, he replies he will not produce them until the third reading. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) says the hon. members of the Opposition are unreasonable in their demands. The hon. gentleman knows that what we ask is perfectly reasonable. As the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has stated, if it appears, when the documents come down, that the hon. gentleman has drawn a fair deduction, and that there was a clear and distinct understanding binding the country, legally and morally, to this land grant, there will be no difficulty in the House passing the Bill.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will get them for the second reading.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why should we not get them now, and why should not members of the House be treated as intelligent people representing the interests of their constituents, and acting as trustees of their constituents for the public domain in the North-West? We hear hon. gentlemen opposite in their calmer moments declaring that we have granted enough Dominion lands in the North-West, and that we must not go further. This great corporation, which has its grip on the throat of the country now and which can, beyond question, do what it likes has been granted enough. I think, whether this proposition to grant them a little more may be defensible or may be indefensible, and the hon. Minister says he has papers in his office to show that it is perfectly defensible, should be postponed until the papers are produced. If when they come down the facts are as stated, well and good; if not the proposition will have some opposition. Hon. gentlemen opposite must see that the Opposition are not factious, are not unreasonable, and that our demand is a fair and reasonable one.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I offered to bring down the information before the third reading of the Bill. If it is required sooner I will bring it down before the second reading. When I do bring it down, hon. gentlemen opposite will be no wiser than they are to-day, because everything is contained in the last Order in Council, and the only further information they will have will be the Order in Council itself.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says in this paper which he has placed upon the Table of the House, that the records of the department leave no doubt whatever that there was an understanding between the Government and the company that these lands should be received. Very well; that is the fact that we desire to have before us. We want to know how far the Government have pledged themselves, and if the Government have improperly pledged themselves then the Government is liable to the censure of this House. The hon. gentleman says that he will bring down these papers at the second reading. Well, Sir, I know that for many years past the House of Commons of Canada has been treated as a very subordinate body. The power that is supposed to be exercised by the House as the representative body of the country has been exercised in fact by the Government. We had an all-powerful Prime Minister in whom hon. gentlemen opposite had the most implicit confidence, and they gave their judgment a holiday and they gave their power to that hon. gentleman as their leader. This House is not to-day in exactly the same position that it was last year or the year before. There has been to some extent an emancipation of hon. gentlemen opposite, and they stand now in that respect upon a footing of equality with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. They are free to exercise their own judgment, and we ask them to exercise that judgment. We do not ask them that they should treat the Government which they follow unfairly, but we ask them that they should not abdicate their functions and pass over the authority which they were sent here to exercise, to hon. gentlemen who sit upon the Treasury benches. If they persist in abdicating their functions as popular representatives and to trust to the Ministers to think for them, and to decide for them what course should be pursued in the public interest, then the production of these papers at the second reading of these resolutions may be adequate. It is not so regarded in the United Kingdom, and it ought not to be so regarded here. The authority is with the House and not with the Ministers. They are a committee of this House trusted with the duty of conducting the public affairs of the country when the House is not in session, but we at all events are not disposed, while the House is in session, to abandon our functions and to permit the Government to act in our behalf.

Mr. DALY. In answer to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) in reference to my statement that the Opposition were unreasonable, the hon. gentleman will recollect that we are only dealing with the resolution now, that a Bill will be brought down to the House founded on the resolutions, and it is on the second reading of the Bill that my hon. friend says he will furnish the information. We will have every opportunity then of discussing the question. I do not see that it will interfere with the opportunity the hon. gentleman will have to discuss the matter by allowing these resolutions to be adopted now, and continuing the discussion on the Bill.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like my hon. friend to say what is the object of this Committee, what is the object of these resolutions, if it is not to put the House in possession of all the information necessary to come to a determination on the matter, and yet the hon. gentleman is not willing at this stage of the proceedings to give all the information which the House needs in order to come to a conclusion. The hon. gentleman must see himself how unjust he is when he says that the Opposition are always against Manitoba. As my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has just stated, we do not pronounce for or against these resolutions at the present time. The only thing we ask is that all the information which is necessary to come to an honest conclusion on the subject shall be placed on the Table of the House. What is the objection to that. The objection taken by the Government to-day is utterly untenable. It has been the policy in the past to subsidize by way of land grants railways in the North-West and Manitoba. Whether this policy has been carried too far or not is not the question at this moment. It has been the principle of this Parliament never to give any such grants except in the way of helping the construction of railways, and here we are asked, not to help the construction of a railway, but to help a railway which has already been built. The position is a unique one in the history of this country. It is stated that the Government is pledged to grant this subsidy, and that is exactly what we want to see. Is the Government pledged or not pledged; is the honour and credit of the country pledged to give that subsidy? If it is, well and good, the honour and credit of the country must be maintained; but if it is, let us have all the information necessary upon the matter. On the 7th of February last the Government were informed that:

"The Minister further states that the records of the Department of the Interior leave no doubt whatever that the company's statement, that both branches of the railway were constructed on the understanding that the usual subsidy of 6,400 acres of land per mile would be provided for the whole length of the road, is well founded."

It may be well founded or not, but before this Parliament is asked to vote a single acre of land, Parliament must be satisfied that the contention here set down, which would satisfy the Minister of Railways, ought also to satisfy Parliament. It is contrary to all principles of constitutional and responsible government to ask this Parliament to vote a single acre of land or a single cent of money until Parliament is satisfied by the evidence which the hon. gentleman says he has in his possession. If he has it in his possession, what is the objection that it should be brought down when he now asks Parliament to give the land, and not at some future stage? This is the time to bring down the evidence and the information which would satisfy Parliament on this matter, and it would be tantamount to abolishing our rules of procedure to allow these resolutions to pass until we have the information which the hon. gentleman has, and which he withholds. If there is any reason why the information should be withheld we want to know it, but if there is no reason, then the Committee should either rise until it has the evidence before it, or if the Committee is not to rise now, that we should have the evidence at this present moment and not later.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are other reasons, it appears to me, why the Committee should act with great caution in granting three-quarters of a million acres of land within Manitoba to these railways, which are virtually the Canadian Pacific Railway in both cases. I dare say the House will remember that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were treated with extreme indulgence in the matter of this grant in the first instance. When this grant was first made, it was made on condition of $1 an acre being paid to the Government. This was taken away, and it was made a free gift to the company, in common, I believe, with one or two other railways at the same time.

At that time, it will be in the recollection of the House, that I protested, and so did other gentlemen on this side of the House, against the placing of these lands in southern Manitoba in the hands of a company, without putting on such restrictions as would ensure them being sold at reasonable rates to the settler. It is within my personal knowledge, and it is within the personal knowledge of many members of this House, that owing to the neglect of that precaution these lands have been deliberately locked up by the Canadian Pacific Railway. These lands have been put at prohibitory rates, the settlement of Manitoba has been retarded to a very great extent, and tens of thousands of persons who would have been in southern Manitoba to-day have been practically expelled from that country or prevented from settling there by reason of the refusal of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to sell these lands at reasonable rates. Now, Sir, we are asked to give altogether some seven or eight hundred thousand acres to this company without any restrictions, without any provision being made to prevent a recurrence of that evil to which attention has been called so often; and we are asked to do that by virtue of an Order in Council passed on the 7th of February, 1891. Sir, it looks to me very much as if that was a part of the bribe by which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were induced to come to the assistance of these hon. gentlemen. We have seen in our postal subsidies a proof of part of their bribe; we have seen in the provisions made for the City of Quebec large sums of money granted virtually for their benefit; and now we are asked to give three-quarters of a million acres more. Sir, if there ever was a transaction in reference to which it was the duty of this House to insist on the fullest information being given, a transaction which bears suspicion on its face, it is this identical resolution now before us.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Some time ago, when a question similar to this was before the House, I asked the Minister of the Interior if he could give us an idea of the quantity of land granted to railways in Manitoba and the North-West Territories.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have it here.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is very desirable that, before granting away this land, we should carefully consider the matter, because it undoubtedly retards settlement. Some years ago some constituents of mine travelled through Manitoba in search of land, intending to settle there, and they found that much of the land was locked up, and, owing to the high prices asked for it, it was impossible for them to obtain satisfactory locations. Good settlers they were, having a considerable amount of capital, but they got tired of the search and went and settled in Dakota. They did not do so willingly, but simply because they could not get land in Manitoba. Now, it becomes the duty of this House to consider very carefully before making any further grants of land to railway companies. I understand that the United States will not grant any further land to corporations of any kind, but reserve it for settlers. I do not know but what it would be well to introduce such a policy into Canada, where this system of granting land to corporations has retarded the settlement of the country. I think we should scrutinize very closely any measure which proposes to lock up any more land in favour of any company, however great or deserving that company may be. All the land we have should be for the settler, and the settler alone.

Mr. CHARLTON. I see that the statute 48 and 49 Victoria, chapter 6, section 2, authorizes this land grant in the following terms:—

"The Governor in Council may grant to the Manitoba and South-Western Colonization Company, Dominion lands to an extent not exceeding 6,400 acres for each mile of the company's railway, from its commencement at Winnipeg to its terminus at Whitewater Lake, about 150 miles."

This, Sir, would seem to be all the statutory authority which the Government possesses in the premises. In the return laid on the Table of the House of grants to various railway companies, the first entry relates to the railway under discussion, the Manitoba and South-Western Colonization Railway. The Orders in Council are dated 30th April, 1884, 4th October, 1884, and 15th November, 1886, and authorize in accordance with the above provision, grants for 150 miles. The return gives the miles subsidized at 150, the miles built at 212, and the rate of the grant per mile 6,400 acres. Now, Sir, it seems, from the remarks in connection with this return, that the charter has expired. The land grant to which the company is stated to be entitled was 1,356,800 acres, at the rate of 6,400 acres per mile. Of this, 1,132,384 acres have been conveyed to the company by Orders in Council, leaving a balance due of 224,416 acres. Now, under the authority of the Act the company are entitled to 960,000 acres, covering the 150 miles, but the Government have already granted them by Order in Council 172,384 acres more than they are entitled to, and are now asking us to authorize them to grant 224,416 acres more. There is no question that this is a matter requiring investigation by the House; and if Parliament does not demand that this authority on which this is asked be laid before it at this stage, before we proceed any further with the measure, but permits the Government to go on in the manner in which it has been doing, it will be abdicating its proper functions as the custodian of the public interests.

Mr. DAVIN. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will pass these resolutions, because it seems to me that no good whatever can come from the contention which they are making here to-day. The hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Bothwell have both very properly described the inquisitorial character of this House. It is no doubt a very proper thing that this House should enquire into every demand made upon it by the Government on the part of a railway or any other corporation. But the hon. gentlemen knew very well, for their experience will bear out what I am saying, that whatever correspondence may be in the Department of the Interior cannot give them any information that they are not in possession of already. My hon. friend raises his eyebrows in incredulity; but what sort of correspondence would be there? The railway company would naturally point out that it had built a certain number of miles more than it was subsidized for; and instead of being condemned for that it ought to be rewarded. If the Government had come to this House for a subsidy for the length of railway thus built the subsidy would undoubtedly have been given.

Mr. LAURIER. Why was it not asked?

Mr. DAVIN. I suppose it was not; but suppose the railway company says: We have built these miles of railway in continuation of a scheme sanctioned by Parliament, and our moral claim to the same subsidy is undoubted. That is the sort of correspondence, I apprehend, that will be found underlying the sentence put by the Minister into the Order in Council, that the correspondence leaves no doubt whatever that the claim of the railway company is a reasonable one. This is no recondite matter, in which it would be difficult to divine what sort of demand the railway company would make. As business men they would naturally say that they had carried out a scheme sanctioned by Parliament, and in doing so had actually been carrying out the will of Parliament; after all, my hon. friends are fighting on a mere technicality. My hon. friend from Bothwell shakes his head; but in this case, at any rate, if I may borrow a joke of O'Connell's, there is nothing in it. In this case there is no real point in the objection, because we have already given a subsidy to this railway. They extended the line, and they asked us for a subsidy of land for each mile of the extension, for which they had not been given a subsidy. Is there anything unreasonable in their asking the Government to do this?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend says it is unreasonable. I do not think it is. He cannot point to a case of a railway which, in carrying out its original project, exceeded the number of miles originally subsidized, and in which Parliament was not ready to say: You have carried out the scheme we originally sanctioned, and of course we shall give you the same help for the extension which we gave you for the other part of the line. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) points out very properly that we shall have abundant opportunity to discuss this on the second reading, but I do not at all complain of the general proposition laid down by the hon. gentleman, namely, that in this Committee the fullest information should be given. I say, however, that it is morally certain that we have the fullest information already, and that the length and breadth, the height and depth of the claim of the railway for this subsidy can be no other than that they have done certain work in completion of the scheme sanctioned by Parliament, and that, therefore, they have a moral claim to this grant. This claim no doubt was represented to the Minister, he looked into it, and said what any rational man would say, looking at the claim, it seems to be a reasonable one, and on his representation the Order in Council was passed. That Order is before us, and what other information could hon. gentlemen have? Do they suppose there is some interesting correspondence of a curious and recondite character, such as cannot easily be imagined behind this. I will venture to say, although I have not seen the correspondence, that it is of a commonplace business character, pointing out that the work was done, and that there is a moral claim which any hon. gentleman looking at the matter merely on its merits would sanction.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken borrowed a joke of O'Connell's, and said, in reference to our contention, there is nothing in it. I could answer his argument by borrowing not a joke, but a very serious phrase, of a gentleman whose memory is dear to hon. gentlemen opposite, "there ain't nothing to it." I am shocked and horrified when I hear gentlemen who pretend to be Conservatives, who ought to be the guardians of the rules of the House, who ought to be the guardians of those rules which have come to us from the mother land and which should be the bulwark of the Government, saying that these rules ought to be maintained, but maintained only in theory and not in practice. They say we ought to be satisfied on this occasion without the correspondence, because there is nothing in the correspondence. That is the very reason, Sir, we want to see it. I agree with the hon. gentleman that there is nothing probably in this correspondence to justify the vote.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not say that.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps you did not, but you said it was of a very commonplace character.

Mr. DAVIN. It must be, as it is of a business character.

Mr. LAURIER. Simply that the work had been done. Very likely it is of the character described by the hon. gentleman, but that does not warrant this vote. Upon what ground can this vote be justified? Only on the ground that the honour of the country has been pledged to it. It has never been the policy of the country to subsidize railways that were built, but to subsidize them before they were built, so as to achieve their completion. Here, however, we are asked to help a railway which requires no help, and we are asked to do this on the ground that it has a moral claim on the country. That policy is a vicious one. It is not to be pretended, under any considerations, that a subsidy must be granted this company which has built this railway, unless you can show that they had the pledge and promise of the Government. If there was such a promise it must be carried out. But what evidence have we of it? The Minister, in introducing the resolution, said we had to do this because the honour and the credit of the country were pledge to it. Very well; if there has been such a pledge given, let us have it and see what it amounts to. But is the hon. member for Assiniboia prepared to say that on the mere ipse dixit of a Minister, without any chance being given to Parliament to canvass the conclusions arrived at by the Minister, Parliament is to be bound. There is but one safe rule to follow, and that is, that the same information which the Minister possesses and which guided him in coming to the conclusion he did ought to be laid on the Table. We have the same right as he. Our right is to pass judgment upon him, and unless we are given the information on which he based his decision a wise constitutional rule is violated.

Mr. WATSON. We ought to have some information from the Minister concerning the understanding which existed between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government, and in virtue of which this Order in Council was passed. I was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. member for Selkirk justify every act of the Government, when he knows that a large portion of his county has suffered for years on account of some understanding between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government—an understanding which was a mystery to most of us. Is that section of the country to be held as a preserve for the Canadian Pacific Railway, at the expense of the settlers, in which to build railways whenever they see fit? I am credibly informed that in 1888 or in 1889 the Northern Pacific Railway, which had secured an entrance into Manitoba, offered to build 300 miles in south-western Manitoba and in southern Assiniboia on condition the Government would give them the ordinary land grant of 6,400 acres per mile. The Government, however, said that by Order in Council they had extended the time to the Canadian Pacific Railway for beginning to build a line into that country, which line the Canadian Pacific Railway only attempted to build this year, and thus excused themselves from accepting the terms of the Northern Pacific. I am informed that the Northern Pacific offered, as a guarantee that they would construct the line inside of three years, to deposit with the Government $200,000, provided the Government would grant land to the extent of 6,400 acres per mile. The Government, however, would not listen to the proposal. They claimed that under an Order in Council the same arrangement existed then as exists now. It is greatly to be deplored that such an understanding should exist between a large corporation and the Government and that it should not have been known to this House. I would ask if there is any understanding between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway, in virtue of which Government candidates are able, during election times, to secure special trains to carry electors to the polls or for their own use. I do not know whether the candidates pay for them, but I presume they do not. If this is done by reason of some special understanding, we ought to have some information concerning it laid before this House. We ought to know what the understanding is now and what it has been in the past. The Minister said that the Canadian Pacific Railway saw fit at times to make changes and build roads here and there. Is this House prepared to grant 6,400 acres a mile to the Canadian Pacific Railway for any piece of road they may see fit to build in order to aid and feed their own line. I say that Parliament ought to sanction that before it is done, and we ought to know what the understanding is. We were told by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) that the Canadian Pacific Railway constructed 62 miles of road before they understood that they were entitled to a land grant for such construction. They constructed 212 miles before they knew that they were entitled to a land grant for 62 miles which they constructed. There must have been some understanding with the Government or they would not have constructed one mile over the 150 miles. In 1881 there was a railway company which proposed to build a road in Southern Manitoba, and the Government took such a part in fighting that road that Sir Charles Tupper went to Manitoba and opposed it, on the ground that it was an American corporation, and that it was not proper that this Government should allow a railway to run within 15 miles of the boundary to the south. On account of some understanding, I suppose, between the Government and the company—and I, as a Manitoban, desire to know what that understanding is—we are now asked to vote these land grants to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for roads which have already been built under some understanding which has not been explained to the House; and I hope we may have these explanations and may know what the understanding has been in the past between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government.

Mr. DALY. If the hon. gentleman will read the clause of the Act quoted by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) he will find that it was provided that 6,400 acres per mile should be given to this road for 150 miles. The company built 62 miles extra, and there can be no doubt that they would not have built the additional miles if they had not expected that they would receive the same amount per mile as they had for the other portion of the road. The hon. gentleman knows that there has not been a railway built in the North-West, except the beautiful Northern Pacific Railway, without receiving a subsidy of 6,400 acres per mile. This company constructed that 62 miles under the understanding and belief that the Order in Council had been passed giving them the usual land grant, and it was not until after the work had been done that they found no Orders in Council had been passed. All that is asked is that what the Government committed itself to should be carried out. It is clearly understood that the Manitoba and South-Western Railway has built 150 miles of railway with the usual subsidy of 6,400 acres a mile, and is it not reasonable that they should have a subsidy for the extra 62 miles?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is part of the February contract.

Mr. DALY. I do not doubt that, but I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the policy which his Government adopted between 1874 and 1878. I have here a speech delivered by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) on the 28th March, 1878, in which he said:

"He held that the only policy to open up and develop these large tracts of country was a liberal railway policy; and that, while it was proper to exercise due caution, it would not be good policy to postpone the building of lines for the sake of saving a few hundred acres to the mile. They could not induce capitalists to embark in a speculation of that kind unless they offered liberal terms."

I think that position was a reasonable one, and that is the position which is taken by the Government to-day, and these men have gone on under the expectation that they would receive this grant.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman has referred to a speech made by me in 1878, in which I avowed myself in favour of a liberal policy of granting aid to railways, with the exercise of due caution. That is what we are asking now. We have not avowed that we are opposed entirely to the granting of land subsidies in the North-West, but we say that these grants have been recklessly made. If a railway company can build a line without Government aid, it is not necessary for the Government to step in and give the company a subvention for the purpose of building a branch line. In 1878 the North-West was without a mile of railway, it was entirely undeveloped, but since that time the Government, by land grants and by giving a bonus of $60,000,000, has built a railway across the continent, and the contrast between the condition of that country now and its condition in 1878 is very marked. Now there are three times as many railways constructed in that country as are required by the inhabitants. Instead of confining ourselves to building railways there, as the population develops and in acccordance with the actual wants of the settlers, we have run lines through the various parts of the North-West, and have created scattered settlements from Winnipeg to Calgary with great stretches of uninhabited land between them. No one can doubt that 200 miles of railway would have given sufficient accommodation for all those settlers, but instead of exercising due caution we have been making those grants lavishly and extravagantly. I do not wish to see the North-West handed over to speculators and charter-brokers, and that is what we are criticizing. Here we find that the Government has subsidized a line 150 miles in length with 6,400 acres to the mile, and the company goes on and builds 212 miles of road, and my hon. friend tells us that, because the company has exceeded the 150 miles and has built 212 miles, it is right to subsidize the company for the extra 62 miles. If the hon. gentleman should give a contract to build a house, would he consider that he should pay for building two houses, if the contractor saw fit to go on with the work to that extent? The Government is bound to fulfil the contract with the company, nothing more and nothing less, and unless we have some reasons given to us for binding the Government we ought not to make this additional grant. I believe the company built that additional piece of road without expecting any grant; I believe they extended the road because they required it, because it was a good country, and it was in the interests of the company to build it. But whether or not, if the faith of the Government was pledged, and it was necessary on the eve of the last general election, just when the manifesto of the president of a great corporation was issued to the people, let us know it. If I stood in the position of the Minister of the Interior I should want to let the House know it; I should not want to be under the imputation that there was anything of this kind. I would move at once that the Committee rise and report progress, and I would lay these reasons before the House before I asked the House to consider these resolutions. There is just one other point that my hon. friend took notice of, in criticizing the speech of the member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly). He did not inform us whether there were actually extra trains run in the North-West by the Canadian Pacific Railway for the benefit of the Conservative candidates.

Mr. DALY. I had nothing whatever to do with any train. I do not suppose that the Canadian Pacific Railway would run any railway train during the election day, or at any other time, for which they were not paid. I had nothing whatever to do with the arrangements made for hiring those trains on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Whatever service the railway rendered to me I paid them for it out of my own pocket, and I have got a receipt for it. They do not do anything for nothing. Now, I will give some more of the hon. gentleman's speech which he made in 1878, which shows that he is quite inconsistent with the position he takes now:

"It was useless to think of opening up and settling this country without furnishing it with railway facilities. Now, it has been said that the American railways were subsidized to a greater extent than necessary; perhaps that had in some instances been the case. Reference has been made to the Illinois Central Railway. At the time that road was projected nearly the whole interior portion of the State was a wilderness; farmers living 50 miles from Chicago were in the habit of teaming wheat to the market often, when the roads were bad, at a cost one-half the value of the wheat. The country had a few struggling settlements in the interior, but there was no extent of population. The country would never have been opened and settled as it has been but for the construction of a system of railways of which the Central was the chief."

Now, Sir, that is entirely inconsistent with the position the hon. gentleman takes now, and the position that is taken in this House by the hon. member for Bothwell, for they both contended that the Canadian Pacific Railway was built too fast. This line that we have under discussion was built at the direct instance of the people of Manitoba. They were crying out for railway facilities in a section of the country where the farmers had to draw their wheat 60 miles to Brandon, on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, just the same as the hon. gentleman said the farmers had to do on the Illinois Central. It was a direct outcome of the agitation on the part of the people of Manitoba that the Canadian Pacific Railway built this extra 62 miles. It seems to me that hon. gentlemen opposite get more unreasonable as they discuss this question. After the explanations that have been given by the Minister, and after reading that Order in Council, after all the information that is in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, it seems to me that the Committee can arrive at no other conclusion than that the Canadian Pacific Railway is just as much entitled to the subsidy for this 62 miles as they were for the subsidy, by the Act of 1878, for the 152 miles.

Mr. WATSON. After the statement of the hon. gentleman that the Canadian Pacific Railway did not run trains for nothing, I am still more anxious to get information as to this understanding between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am of the same opinion as the hon. gentleman. I am satisfied that the men who were in charge of trains on election day did not pay for them out of their own pockets. No one supposes they would do it; therefore, we certainly ought to have the understanding that exists between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. If the company are to be paid for their services by legislation in this House we want to know it. Now, the hon. gentleman had to have a fling at the Northern Pacific. The Northern Pacific Railway Company have built some 225 miles of railway in the Province of Manitoba that is in operation to-day, and to the great advantage of the people of Manitoba, and this Government has not contributed one dollar to that company for the construction of that road. This Government apparently have only one company in that country which they will consent to assist. But the people of that province felt it was necessary to have competition with that one company, towards which this Government stands in the relation of a parent, and they found it necessary to give a cash bonus to the Northern Pacific in order to build a competing line with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to complete a railroad through that portion of country which was promised railway communication by the Canadian Pacific Railway four years before, and for which a reserve was set apart; but on account of some understanding between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway, that reserve was held for the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Northern Pacific built a portion of their road for a cash subsidy of $1,500 a mile, and another portion for $1,750 per mile, which was a subsidy less than that granted to any other road by any province in the Dominion of Canada. It paid the Northern Pacific to build that road in competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway for a small bonus, whereas the Canadian Pacific Railway are getting 6,400 acres per mile. I venture to say that the hon. gentleman will not get up in this House and state that the Provincial Government paid too large a subsidy for the construction of the Northern Pacific, and I do not think the hon. gentleman will state that he can buy in Southern Manitoba any land better than the land of that subsidy for less than $5 an acre; in other words, they are getting $32,000 of a bonus per mile for building a road through a tract of country in which the Northern Pacific built a road for a bonus of $1,500. Now, I say that we should not assist the Canadian Pacific Railway in getting control of that whole country through which they are building lines of roads. I do not think it is the business of this House to retain a monopoly in that North-West country. We know that the Canadian Pacific Railway is carrying wheat much more to the advantage of the settlers of the Western States than to the people of Manitoba. We know they are carrying wheat and flour from Minneapolis for 8 and 9 cents a bushel less than they are carrying it from Winnipeg over a line of railway built by the people of Canada. I say we ought to consider the interests of the North-West, and the interests of the North-West are not considered when you give assistance towards the construction of a railway to one corporation alone, when, if the information is correct which I have given here to-day. The Northern Pacific actually offered to put up a large deposit that they would construct 300 miles of road south-west of Brandon to the Souris coal-fields inside of two years. I say, in view of this fact, that the Government have not been doing their duty towards that North-West country. I am surprised to hear the member for Selkirk attempt to justify the Government in aiding the Canadian Pacific Railway to construct this road. I am satisfied, and I believe the hon. member for Selkirk is satisfied, that the settlers in the south-west portion of his constituency went into that country in 1880 and 1881 under the promise of a railway, and cultivated large tracts of lands, and they have not got a railway to-day. I am satisfied he would admit, if he honestly expressed his opinions in this House, that a line of railway would have been built in that country years ago if the Government had given the same assistance to outside corporations that it has given to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am surprised that he does not make that statement in this House ; but, apparently, he does not want to say anything against the Canadian Pacific Railway. I know that this road assisted him ; probably they were paid for it. I do not know anything about that, but I do not believe the Canadian Pacific Railway would do work for nothing, and I believe they were paid for it, or will be paid for it. I do not really believe that the hon. gentleman paid all the expenses of railway train services in Selkirk. I am pretty well satisfied that my opponent in Marquette did not pay for the railway service when the Canadian Pacific Railway brought in about 250 outside voters. We have learned during this session that funds are provided by different means for different purposes. We should have the information asked and the agreement arrived at between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway placed before the House, before we are asked to pass this Bill. The House should be placed in possession of the fullest information. We had already a road running through the section of the country from Barnsley to Manitou, partly constructed by the friends of the Northern Pacific road. Why this portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been built in the same district, when other sections of country are without railway facilities, I am at a loss to understand.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The road to which you refer is not to be built. The company gave up that piece of road, and we allowed the piece to be built from Clearwater Lake to Deloraine. It was on account of giving up that portion of the road the company were allowed to build the two extensions.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) admits that the charter for this road in question expired some years ago. Those Acts were revived by Order in Council. I am speaking now particularly of the extension of the south-west branch. A charter was granted by this Parliament in 1883, I think. The company had three years within which to construct the road through south-western Manitoba. At the end of three years they asked for a renewal, and the time was extended to three years, notwithstanding our protest and our demand that the Government should call upon the company to put up security for the construction of the road. The company come this year for powers to build the very portion of road for the construction of which they obtained a charter from this Parliament in 1883. Now we are asked to confirm these Orders in Council giving land grants to that road, although their charter practically lapsed five years ago.

Mr. TROW. Presuming the Minister of the Interior holds documents in his possession from the department which, as he alleges, would be sufficient to satisfy the minds of the Opposition, if they were brought down, I cannot understand why he should hesitate to do so and prolong this discussion.

Mr. DEWDNEY. In order to save time.

Mr. TROW. No more time would be occupied. I am still more surprised that a business company, managed by practical men like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, should construct upwards of 60 miles of road without having a proper and satisfactory agreement with the Government prior to its construction. We should be guarded in this respect. We have given away in the North-West and Manitoba already 100 per cent. more land than we have improved in the whole Province of Ontario, nearly 50,000,000 acres ; and great caution should be exercised by the Government in disposing of our territory. We want all our waste lands that are fit for successful settlement, that they may be settled and improved by honest settlers. If there is a tacit agreement between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that they should receive 6,400 acres per mile for the construction of that road, certainly we have no objection to that bargain and agreement being carried out in its integrity. I know the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have done much towards the development of that country and its successful settlement. The company advertise very freely in the old country, and probably they are the best immigration agents we possess. In the United States the railway companies have done more than the Government in developing that country, and filling it with successful settlers. I hope the Minister will see the propriety of not continuing this discussion longer, but of allowing the matter to remain in abeyance, until he produces these documents, which he admits he has in his possession, to satisfy members of the Opposition. They are not going to oppose a grant if it is a legitimate and proper one; but they wish to be satisfied that the whole matter has been done in a proper and legal manner.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I cannot object to the remarks which have fallen from the lips of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow). When I came down to the House with this proposition I thought the last Order in Council, which really embodies the whole of the negotiations that took place, would be sufficient to satisfy hon. members. It gives the dates of the Orders in Council, which cover every mile of road shown on the plan which I have laid on the Table of the House, with the exception of 27 miles, which it was found, after the work had been completed, the Order in Council had not given sufficient mileage to the company. That is the only portion of the road for which Orders in Council had not been obtained. The member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) evidently had not read the Order in Council. A special Order in Council was passed giving authority to make the two extensions, which cover the mileage of everything except the 150 miles of the original Order in Council. I have here the Order in Council of 5th April, 1886, and that of 15th November of the same year, which was the original one for 150 miles. I do not, therefore, understand what else hon. gentlemen opposite want. Those are the Orders in Council, based on the applications of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company when the different charges were made in respect to the construction and direction of the road. The matter, it appears to me, is perfectly simple. If any other information besides these Orders in Council is required, I shall be pleased to bring it down; but it appears to me that everything is contained in those two Orders in Council. They refer to the two alterations made in the construction of the road, the extension from Manitou to Barnsley and the extension from Whitewater Lake to Deloraine. I cannot see what further information hon. gentlemen can require. I can place these two Orders in Council on the Table. There is nothing else but correspondence, which can be brought down if necessary.

Mr. MULOCK. When I spoke on this matter at an earlier stage of the debate I did so from a purely constitutional standpoint. I wanted to know whether we were called on to agree to some obligation binding on Parliament, or whether we were making an expenditure to promote an enterprise. The resolutions recite that the work was constructed, and, therefore, it seems to me that the House is not here to vote the land on the ground that it was to promote railway construction. Therefore, it seems that we were simply being called upon to aid a railway in respect to something that had happened.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Will you excuse me for a moment. When that Order in Council was passed in 1886, and when the arrangement was made by the Government giving the land grant by Order in Council, the railway was not constructed at that time.

Mr. MULOCK. To continue what I was going o say: therefore, my enquiries were simply to ascertain, first of all, the true basis of the discussion—whether we are now being called upon formally to ratify some prior obligation of Parliament, or whether we are free now to consider the question upon its merits; and if we are to consider it upon its merits, that is an entirely different question from one that would depend upon the faith of the country. As I said before I repeat now: nothing can allow me knowingly to allow the faith of Parliament to be violated. I simply wanted then, as I do now, to arrive at a proper understanding as to the true position of the matter, in order to come to a proper conclusion. The Minister was asked on what he rested his arguments in asking Parliament to make this grant, and he stated that his reasons appeared in the Order in Council of February, 1891. That is, of course, a suspicious date. It is an historical period in the history of Canada.

Mr. DEWDNEY. You are always suspicious.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not going to allow suspicions to affect my judgment. I want evidence, and therefore, perhaps, the date may suggest a desire for further information, but only to that extent is the date at all material in connection with this matter. It does seem singular that a business-like corporation, such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, should have made the extraordinary mistake of running 62 miles beyond the point where the subsidy ceased. We are told by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) that the railway in question had a grant for 150 miles, and that by some curious mistake they did not discover that they had built 150 miles until they had built 212 miles, and that because of this mistake, and because Parliament had heretofore granted, under certain circumstances, a land grant of 6,400 acres per mile to other railways as well as to this railway, that therefore that rule carried the implied obligation to make an additional grant for the additional number of miles of road constructed. If that is a sound argument, any railway company having a grant for a certain number of miles can build beyond the limits so specified, and it would have an equally good claim for the recognition by Parliament to whatever extent it builds its road. I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that we cannot grant relief on any such ground as that. Again, we must come back to the information possessed by the Minister of the Interior. The Minister is the responsible representative on this occasion, and, while the information furnished by the member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) and the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is extremely interesting and, perhaps, correct, still they will pardon me if I say that, on a question such as this, the Minister of the Interior is the responsible party, and he is the one who should give the reasons. He has not yet said that any of the reasons advanced by his supporters from Selkirk and West Assiniboia were the true reasons. These hon. gentlemen are not members of the Privy Council. They do not know what reasons moved the Council to pass this Order in Council, and whilst, I dare say, they are both willing to get to the Privy Council, yet we can hardly assume that they yet know all the secrets of that body. The policy of the Government is, I presume, within the knowledge of the Government alone, except in so far as it is announced to the public, and on this occasion I am afraid we must still come back to the Administration and ask the Administration to tell us whether it was a matter of policy, or a matter of contract, or as a matter of good faith, that impelled them to bring about this Order in Council. The Minister of the Interior has stated in his report to Council :

"That the records of the Department of the Interior leave no doubt whatever that the company's statement, that both branches of the railway were constructed on the understanding that the usual subsidy of 6,400 acres per mile would be provided for the whole length of the road, is well founded."

You will observe that the Minister did not seem to think that the understanding was quite sufficient to move him to make this report, and so he commences to write down his own arguments and his own ideas, which he gives in explanation and excuses. He says :

"Apart from this, however, and in view particularly of the incalculable benefit which southern Manitoba has derived from the two branches of this railway putting in direct communication with the markets of the world one of the richest agricultural regions of the North-West, he (the Minister) is of opinion that the company's claim is a reasonable one."

Now why did he offer this matter by way of inducement in the second portion of the clause, if the railway had a legal, or even a moral, claim upon the country. If they had a right to it, a right such as could be recognized in the great forum of this tribunal, why had he to plead the cause of the railway company and set forth a reason that they themselves did not appear to have advanced ? If we as members of Parliament are here to-day to exercise our undoubted right, as I claim it to be, of hearing all the evidence, then and not till then shall we come to a conclusion, and the Minister of Interior should be the first to insist that at this stage we shall have laid upon the Table all these documents which warrant him in coming to the conclusion that he did, and which documents are necessary in order to enable us to come to a conclusion. I trust that the Minister will not withhold this information until the third reading of the Bill. When he stated he would offer it on the third reading I was at a loss to understand whether he was speaking in an ironical or serious way. The offer to give information on the third reading of a Bill which should be brought down at the first reading of the resolution which is to be the foundation of the Bill is a most extraordinary proposition to make to a deliberative body. Therefore, I will assume that he meant something different when he said he would bring it down before the third reading of the Bill. I can hardly think that he intended to offend the intelligence of Parliament and to outrage the rights of the House by withholding such information until that stage of the proceedings. I, for one, Mr. Chairman, maintain that Parliament cannot too soon re-clothe itself with its full rights. We have been too long a mere registry office of the will of others, and the sooner we arrive at a true recognition of the duties respectively of members of Parliament as a whole, the better for the country. This discussion, therefore, if it will operate as an educating influence to prevent such things as this happening in the future, will not have been without its advantage, whether this information comes to us to-day or to-morrow, or whether it is withheld for all time, as it is proposed to withhold it until the third reading, when Parliament will be in its dying momeuts, and when it will be of little use. At all events, I prophesy, if it is safe to prophesy at all what any Government will do, that Parliament will never again be called upon to deal in a matter of this kind in such a manner as it is asked to do to-day.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. When the Canadian Pacific Railway was launched upon the country the subventions given to it were of an enormous character ; and one of the reasons most strongly urged for the granting of all the subventions and privileges bestowed upon it was that the company would not only build the main line, but would, in order to reap a profit, build branch lines all through the country. That was stated again and again in Parliament by the promoters of the railway as a reason why these enormous subventions should be granted. Another strong reason given was that the Canadian Pacific Railway would become an immensely potent immigration agency—that in fact it would be the means of settling up the country. Well, we have had a good many years experience of it ; the railway has been built and the consideration has been paid, and how have these promises been kept ? If the immigrants were brought in by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company they are not there now. In fact, Sir, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and other railway corporations to which lands have been granted, I firmly believe, have done more to drive immigrants out of the country than all other causes combined ; I believe that they have driven out two for every one that they have brought in. Then, as regards the other proposition about building branch lines, we know that almost all the branch lines in that country have fallen into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That can be easily understood, because it is impossible for any branch line, depending upon the Canadian Pacific Railway for an outlet, to maintain an independent existence. But what I wish to call attention to is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has never built one branch line without getting more than double the cost of building it out of the country. Let us look at the one which we have before us now. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) stated, and I believe he stated truly, that the land which we are asked to grant to-day is worth on the average at the very lowest $5 an acre. What does that amount to ? It amounts simply to this, that we are asked to give that company just three times the cost of building that road. It has been the same all through. It has been granted the cost of building the road, in many cases twice the cost, and then it owns the road and everything connected with it. Apart altogether from the suicidal policy of handing over the best land to railway corporations and withdrawing it from settlement, I think it is time Parliament came to a halt in the matter of locking up these lands. The only plausible reason presented to-day why these grants were to be made at all was that in some way the faith of the country was pledged to them ; and the only serious attempt to prove that such was the case was made by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), but the reasoning on which he based his argument was, to say the least, peculiar. He said that an Act had been passed in 48-49 Victoria, granting a certain land subsidy to a certain railway company for the construction of 150 miles of railway. That was the sum and substance of his argument. The company to which that grant had been made was merged in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the branch had been handed over to them. And now mark the reason which he gives. He says that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, taking it for granted that the same policy would prevail with regard to the extensions, went on and built 62 miles more, on the understanding that they would get a similar grant for that extenson. Now, Sir, it does not need that I should point out the absurdity of that proposition. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell us that the Canadian Pacific Raiway Company are simple enough to take it for granted that without any authority all, without any Order in Council, without any Act of Parliament, when they choose to construct a certain work, for their own benefit, this House is bound to pay them a certain amount for doing so?

Mr. DEWDNEY. They do not. They had Orders in Council for it all, passed on statutory authority.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If these Orders in Council are intended for any purpose at all, they are only intended for emergencies, something like the Governor General's warrants.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but let them show that this is not the constitutional view. An Order in Council is simply made where a certain emergency requires it, such as the probable stoppage of any great work. Well, we are told that the Order in Council was made. Now, I submit that the constitutional rule is that whenever an Order in Council is made the Government must come down at the very earliest opportunity thereafter and ask the sanction of Parliament to that order, and stand or fall by it. Did they do that in this case? I have never heard one word of it until to-day. The last Order in Council was passed after the road was already built.

Committee rose; and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Before six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I was laying down the principle that when a Governor's warrant was issued, when an Order in Council was issued, or when any private agreement was made by the Government with any corporation or individual, it was the duty of the Government, at the very earliest opportunity, to submit that to Parliament and to abide by the decision of Parliament in the matter. The Order in Council we are now considering was made on the 4th of February last. I am not inclined to be suspicious, but, looking at all the circumstances, I am forced to conclude that the whole matter has a very equivocal appearance. It was issued just when the Government had decided to appeal to the country and were anxious to secure the support of the great railway corporation; and, if the information we have is correct, they were paying very high for that support. I am not prepared to say, nor will I venture to say, that any consideration was given by the railway corporation for the issuing of this Order in Council, but, to say the least of it, it looks very suspicious. This is a matter about which the Government ought to be very careful. We have heard the reason given in this House for the issuing of a Governor's warrant for a large amount required to meet important repairs on a great railway, that the warrant was issued because the Government had forgotten to include in the Estimates the amount required, and they asked the House to ratify what they had done. Some years ago, it will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that a great wrong was perpetrated on the people of Manitoba, when, in the charter which was granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the agreement which was made with them, under which the company were to be given a very large amount for building the railway, it was stipulated that no competition from outside would be allowed in the unorganized country. That was taken in the House to refer distinctly only to the unoccupied territory. The leader of the Government stated explicitly that it was not intended to apply to the old provinces, that it was not intended to apply to old Manitoba as then constituted, and he used in that connection the memorable words: "We cannot check Manitoba." Well, we all know that a secret agreement had been made by the Government with the Canadian Pacific Railway to disallow all charters granted by the Manitoba Legislature. The Government did so; the people of Manitoba were almost driven into rebellion; there was very near being bloodshed over the matter, and then, when they found the position they had taken was no longer tenable, the Government came down to this House and demanded that Parliament should make a large grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway for giving up a privilege they had never been granted by this House and to which they were not entitled, except under their private agreement with the Government. Some people might be inclined to be surprised that the Government should take such a risk, that they would do anything so unconstitutional, that they would not dread meeting the House with so unconstitutional a proposal; but anyone who has had the privilege of sitting in this House during the last eight or ten years knows from experience that whatever the Government thought fit to do the majority in this House was prepared to ratify, let it be right or wrong, and it was on this subserviency that the Government confidently relied. It might have been expected that this new House, with the disastrous results of so many of the Government projects plainly before them, would have some consideration for the rights of the country and insist on understanding thoroughly just what they were asked to vote, especially in the case of a proposition of this kind brought down in virtue of a secret agreement entered into without the sanction of Parliament. One would naturally expect that this newly elected House would require to know fully all the reasons which prompted that agreement. We may be told, as the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) has told us to-night, that the members on the Government side are satisfied with the reasons. How can they be? It can only be by the Government having taken their supporters into their confidence and told them freely and frankly the arrangements they made. I submit that we on this side have a right to the same confidence and the same information; I submit that we are not here to blindly ratify the wishes of the Government and register their decrees, but that we are here to defend the rights of the people, to look after the property of the people, and that we are standing upon the rights of the people and our constitutional rights as members of Parliament when we demand the freest and fullest explanation of the reasons which prompted the Government to make this agreement and demand the sanction of the House to this claim. That we demand, and with nothing else will we be satisfied. The Government by their majority may vote us down, but we demand, before the vote is taken and before the agreement is ratified, that we shall have the fullest and freest information of the reasons which prompted the Government to make this concession. I have already pointed out to the House the money value it is now proposed to give the Canadian Pacific Railway. A gentleman who is well acquainted with the country in question, the hon member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), stated this afternoen that the land there is worth on an average $5 an acre. If you figure that up, and then take the cost of building a road in such a country as that, you will find that we are handing over to that company a free gift of three times what it cost them to build the road, or within a trifle of $2,000,000. I have referred before to the disastrous results of locking up lands in the hands of speculators and corporatious. I have pointed out to this House before now, this session, that it would be to the advantage of the country materially, as a mere question of money, if we could get settlers into the country, to give these lands to them as a free gift. I need not point out to this House that the speculator, be he a private individual or a corporation, does not add one iota to the wealth of the country. He simply holds the land for a rise, and whatever he gets is taken from the pockets of the people and put into his own. On the other hand, every man who settles upon a lot of land and cultivates it, and produces grain or other produce, adds just so much to the wealth of the country; and looking at it in that light, we can see the enormous advantage to the country if, instead of handing over lands to railway corporations and speculators to keep settlers out of the country, we induce settlers to come in by giving them the land free. I need not tell the Committee that in the old land there is a strong agitation going on at present, occasioned by one of the most remarkable movements of soulless speculators, who are grasping the land into their own possession, and driving off the people, who for ages have defended that land with blood and sword, like cattle. And for what purpose? In order to make pleasure grounds for themselves and turn these happy homesteads into hunting grounds for their own amusement. In the face of such facts, is it any wonder that socialism should make its appearance in the old land? Is it any wonder that the people are beginning to demand that the land be nationalized and that they should have the free use of what the Almighty has freely given them? Are you not perpetrating very much the same thing in this country? Are you not doing the same thing on a large scale, and you will have to be answerable for the results. I have never seen my way clear to accept the doctrine implied in the single tax theory. It does not seem to me to be altogether just, but, if we have to take the choice between locking up lands in the hands of speculators and allowing them to go to the people, I say it is a thousand times better to have a single tax. There is another thing to be considered. There is a power in this universe which makes for righteousness. There is a court of equity before which both individuals and nations must defend their actions. When we are asked to take a certain action we must think what answer we are going to give in defence of that action. We have driven the people who originally owned these lands away from them. It is true that we give them a little calico and a little beef, but the aborigines had the land by the same right as we have—the right of possession. When we appear at the bar of eternal justice, what answer are we going to give in regard to them? There is only one excuse that we can make, and it seems to me to be a valid one. I, at least, am satisfied that it is a valid one, and it is this: that no class of men, be they who they may, have a right to shut up the land and to keep it from improvement and from cultivation. If that is not a valid excuse, we have none to offer. The law of the universe is eternal progression, and no one has a right to shut up the land that God has given from improvement and cultivation. Now, what are we doing? We are doing just the same thing as the aborigines did, on a gigantic scale. We have handed over this land to speculators and railway corporations without any terms of settlement, without any fixed rate at which the lands should be sold, allowing them to wring from the poor settlers every copper they can possibly exact or to keep the land locked up for an indefinite time. Do you suppose that, when these people feel their strength, they will not insist on a rectification of this systam? Happy for us if we do not find the country deluged in blood as a consequence of these regulations. It is time for this country to pause before handing over any more of our public lands to these corporations. It would be better, as I said on a previous occasion, heavy as our public debt is, to have added one-half to that debt and kept the land for our settlers. To-night we stand on our constitutional rights as members of Parliament, and before we assent to this being done we demand that the Government shall tell us why it is to be done, and how far the House is bound, and how far the Government is bound, before we vote this amount.

Mr. HAGGART. In reply to the hon. gentleman, who seems to think that there is something awful asked in this resolution, I may say that I think he will find there is very little in it. In 1879 a charter was granted to the Manitoba and South-Western Railway, which extended for 152 miles from Winnipeg viâ Manitou to a lake called Clear Water or White Water Lake. By the Act of 1879 we promised to that company 6,400 acres per mile. The Canadian Pacific Railway built another line parallel to the line which at present runs between Emerson and Winnipeg, from Winnipeg to Gretna and the boundary. They were anxious to occupy the ground occupied by the Manitoba and South-Western, and they made a divergence to Manitou, which was one of the objective points of the Manitoba and South-Western Railway. They extended their line to Boisevin and thence to Deloraine, and now it has been extended to the Souris coal-fields. Then, as alleged, the Canadian Pacific Railway became possessors of the Manitoba North-Western Railway, or what was known as the old Schultz Railway. It had been already built from Winnipeg to Elm River or Barnsley, and there was no reason for extending that road to Manitou, their charter allowing them to build the road westward on a parallel line to the south-west. Under the old pledge which Parliament gave to the Schultz Railway they were entitled to 6,400 acres a mile for 152 miles of the road. In 1885, what the Government did was to allow them to extend their line beyond the 152 miles to some distance beyond Clear Water Lake, and did not insist on their building the line between Barnsley and Manitou, because that had evidently become useless, and also to extend a parallel line northerly towards the road which runs from Brandon southerly towards the boundary. In 1885 the Government transferred a portion of the subsidy which the line was entitled to between Manitou and Barnsley to these extensions.

Mr. LISTER. Was that done by Act of Parliament?

Mr. HAGGART. It was done by Order in Council in 1885, and I think that was submitted to Parliament.

Mr. CHARLTON. What Act of Parliament approved of it?

Mr. HAGGART. All I know in reference to the Order in Council is, that it transferred the land grant to the two extensions. At the same time, the Order in Council gave them the land grant attached to the 30 miles which they were not required to build. Now we are asking your approval for a further grant which, by Order in Council, we agreed to give them for the 27 miles beyond the 30 which they have built. Now, objection is taken by hon. gentlemen that we do it by Order in Council. They say that, first of all, we ought to have come to Parliament and got the sanction of Parliament before we entered into the contract. That is a constitutional question, but it seems to me quite clear. We entered into a contract, as advisers of Her Majesty, subject to the approval of Parliament. The usual procedure was followed. Application is made to Council, and it is considered by Council whether the railway is one for which a grant should be made. If it is approved by Council, then we pass an Order, and, before it becomes of any effect whatever, we ask the approval of the Parliament of Canada. Now, this is simply the position of that road: The transfer was made of the acreage of land for 30 miles to the two extensions, northerly and southerly, and we promised them that the 30-mile grant should be applied towards the extension. We come here and ask the representatives of the people to approve of the arrangement which we have made with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and grant for the 27 miles of railway which they constructed over and above the amount of lands which was at our disposal the same rate per mile as we have given for the rest of the railway that they have constructed. Now, the question is simply this: Should we, first of all, have asked you gentlemen for your approval? Is it not the proper function of a Ministry to see, first of all, whether a proposed contract is in the interest of the country? If it believes it to be so, then we come to you and ask for your sanction. That is all that is contained in this matter, concerning which charges are made about the wrong done to the people in the country, the misfortune that has happened to the whole North-West; and an appeal to the Deity was made by the hon. member for Middlesex, to whom we are responsible for the just administration of affairs in this country, and he asks how we are going to account for it in the future. The simple proposition which you are asked to approve is this: Shall we, as representatives of the people, approve of the contract entered into by Her Majesty's advisers? Shall we grant to this 27 miles of railway, which they have built under an arrangement with us, the 6,400 acres of land which they got for the rest of the road?

Mr. LISTER. I would ask the hon. gentleman what authority he has for giving a land grant of 6,400 acres for the 30 miles already?

Mr. HAGGART. It was a transfer of the grant between Manitou and Barnsley to the further extension of the same roads which we had chartered. I suppose the Orders in Council were all submitted to Parliament. I cannot speak for a certainty whether they were all approved.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The Orders in Council were all laid on the floor of Parliament within 15 days after the opening of Parliament each year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has made a lengthy statement, and made it in an ex cathedra manner, as if nobody understood what they were talking about, and as if he was giving us some new information. He has not given any information to the House that was not in our possession before he spoke. All the points he introduced here had been debated during the afternoon, and had been discussed by the Minister of Interior and by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The hon. gentleman knew that the opposition made to the passage of this resolution was based very largely upon the fact that the documents upon which the Minister of Interior reported his opinion to Council, and on which the Council acted, had been withheld from this House, and that this House was asked at the initiatory stage to commit itself to the principle of the resolution before these documents were brought down. That is the point between both sides of the House. When this matter came up I confined myself entirely to that point. I felt, as was well remarked by my leader, that if this House or this country had been committed by the Government to a course of action which bound them morally or legally, the Opposition would not be justified in withholding its support. But we have not yet so far been in a position to judge whether we are legally or morally justified, and if we are not legally or morally justified, we echo the opinion given to-night by my hon. friend from Middlesex, that we have gone too far in this business already. I would like to know if the Postmaster General has taken the trouble to look at the map which the Government very properly, at the request of some members on this side, has placed upon the table. That map I hold in my hand, and it shows the quantity of land that this House has, I hesitate not to say, improvidently granted for the construction of railways in the North-West. I have made a calculation, and I see that we have granted about 47,000,000 acres of land in the North-West for the construction of railways. I take up the plan which the Government have placed in our hands, and I see red lines drawn across the North-West in its most fertile parts, showing that what would appear to be nearly one-half of the available territory of that country has gone; and if that is true, as it appears to be upon their showing, surely it is time to call a halt. Before we grant any more land we should know on what principle we are granting it. Surely the Opposition cannot be charged with factious opposition if, when they are asked to grant 737,000 acres more, we ask for all the grounds on which the Government ask us to make that grant. Sir, that minute of Council is conclusive. The hon. gentleman says that he has the records in his department which leave no doubt that the Government statement is true, that both branches of this road were constructed on an understanding that the usual grant of 6,400 acres was to be given. If that is so, produce the papers and no more is to be said.

Mr. HAGGART. You will find it in the Order in Council of 1886.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman does not quite understand the point I am putting. I am referring to a statement made by his colleague, in the report to Council made on the 4th of February last, wherein he recommends that the grant be made of the lands which you propose that this House should vote to-night, and he recommends to Council that it should be made because, among other things, he states that in the records of his department there is a document showing that an understanding to that effect existed. Now, the hon. gentleman should understand that we are asking for the data on which he came to that conclusion. He refuses to give it to us. That is the only point between us. It may be that these records, when produced, will justify him; it may be that they would not. We propose to have a say in this matter. In view of the startling revelations which are made in this House, we propose to be careful before we vote any more of the public domain, and not to vote it until we are satisfied that we are bound in honour or in law to vote it. Sir, I repeat what I said before, that the great danger which stares this country in the face is the power that we are vesting from time to time in this huge corporation. This huge corporation to-day dominates and rules this country; it possesses so much of the land in the North-West that it is preparing in the future to become the dictator of this country, if it is not so to-day. It behooves us who represent the people to pause before we give more power to this company, that seems to have almost unlimited power already. We want at the same time to do right. If the company have a right to this land, give it to them; but if they have not a right, I for one will not vote for the grant. They have too much power in this country. They have had voted to them millions of acres, and we have not clogged them with conditions with respect to sale or settlement. They have received the lands as a free gift. If what the hon. gentleman says is true, and I believe he would not have made the statement unless he believed it to be true, they hold these lands for a rise, acting not as a company to develop this great country, but as speculators to put money in their own pocket. They are a corporation with a single eye for their own benefit, like all corporations, and they do not care a curse for this country, except in so far as their interests and the country's interests coincide. They are essentially, as are all corporations, selfish, and they have obtained that power and means of power which make them a danger in this commonwealth. Therefore, before I will vote any more land, which means power, to them, I want to be satisfied I am acting rightly.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman asks the authority by which the grant is made. The Order in Council of 6th April, 1885, shows that that portion of the grant was transferred to those two different lines of railway, one on the north and the other on the south. The extension of the number of miles is mentioned in the Order in Council. Any communication from the railway company on the subject would be a simple request to the Minister to carry out the arrangements the company made with the Government. The Government by that Order in Council I have mentioned transferred that portion of the railway grant to those different lines of railway to be constructed, and with an understanding, as is stated by the Minister, that the same quantity of land should be applied to the whole extension. The only thing hon. gentlemen opposite can possibly ask further is with respect to the promise of the Minister that the land grant would be applied to any portion of the road over and above the 30 miles. There is no doubt in regard to the matter, and the Order in Council speaks as plainly as possible to that effect.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) To which Order in Council do you refer?

Mr. HAGGART. To the Order in Council, 6th April, 1885.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to read the part to which he refers?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have promised to bring down all the papers. We should pass the resolution, and to-morrow I will have all the papers down.

Mr. HAGGART. This Order in Council allows the company to transfer the land grant.

Mr. MULOCK. Why not lay these papers on the Table?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I promised to do so.

Mr. MULOCK. You told me you would place them on the Table before the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. HAGGART. The Canadian Pacific Railway have built 57 miles, 30 miles of which are entitled to the land grant for the 30 miles, and that 27 miles are unprovided for.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We have heard that now for the first time.

Mr. HAGGART. I understood all these Orders in Council were laid on the Table of the House fifteen days after the meeting of Parliament each year.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; they were.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) I do not know by what authority they were laid on the Table. There are certain statutes which provide that certain Orders in Council and certain contracts shall have the force of law if they are laid on the Table for one month, and no exception is taken to them by the House.

I never understood there was any provision in the law which says that every Order in Council that a Government may choose to adopt shall be laid on the Table within fifteen days after the meeting of Parliament, and if it is so laid on the Table and no exception taken within one month it shall become law.

Mr. DEWDNEY. This is simply in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have received a memorandum from my deputy, stating that all Canadian Pacific Railway Orders in Council are laid before Parliament within fifteen days of the opening of each session. This is done by Order in Council of 1882.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that the Order in Council is for the purpose of carrying into effect the contracts between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government. That is under a statute perfectly clear in its provision. The hon. gentleman is asking this House to legislate. The hon. gentleman should not have laid on the Table an Order in Council not under any statute. If he had done so with respect to this matter, there was no necessity for legislation. But the hon. gentleman is now seeking legislation because he has not the power, and there is no statute giving him authority to pass Orders in Council which will became law if no exception is taken to them within a certain period.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We are not claiming that by the fact of these Orders in Council having been laid on the Table they have the force of law. The complaint this afternoon was, that the records of the department ought to be brought down and that the Minister should not proceed until they were brought down. This is the state of the case: The Minister brought forward the Order in Council passed in February last, and inasmuch as that refers to other records in the department, gentlemen on the other side of the House insisted that whatever else appeared in the department ought to be produced and laid on the Table of the House. The Minister was not prepared at the time to comply with that request, although it was a reasonable request, but it will be complied with in due time. Now the Minister says: The reason that I ask you to pass the resolutions at this stage is, that these documents have already been produced in previous sessions and laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. He is not sure of that.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; he is.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not of the slightest consequence whether these Orders in Council have been laid on the Table of the House or not. It is not of the slightest consequence that in a Parliament which had been elected before this Parliament, in which there are seventy or eighty new members in the place of those who have been superseded by the result of the last election—I say it is not of the slightest consequence whether these Orders in Council were laid upon the Table during a previous Parliament. The provision of the law with reference to laying Orders in Council on the Table of the House is a provision with reference to Orders in Council that come into operation by the fact that they are laid on the Table, and are not taken exception to for a month. These Orders in Council are not of that class, and it is preposterous to refer to them as if they were, and as if they were giving to the House information by which the House is bound. The Minister of the Interior seeks legislation upon an important subject. He asked this House to grant a certain appropriation to a certain railway that is not built in consequence of the appropriation that is to be granted, but that is to be rewarded by the appropriation of public lands for having constructed a certain number of miles. The Government have not the power to make the grant or it would have been made. The Government have asked the House for power to make that appropriation, and the Orders in Council they have passed are not of the slightest consequence. This House is not bound, nor can it be bound with regard to a matter of this sort, by anything that the Government promised or may have undertaken. The railway company have assumed the responsibility of constructing this line. I do not know when this sixty miles of road were built. It may have been two years or it may have been longer, but, at all events, if the Government promised to make a grant to the railway company I would like to know whether this is the first time they have had an opportunity of bringing that to the attention of Parliament. They did ask this House for an appropriation for 150 or more miles of railway, and that appropriation was made, but this is a new appropriation for the construction of an additional piece of railway. It has no connection with any promise or engagement into which any past Parliament has entered with that corporation. Whether the railway company would have constructed that road or not, if they did not expect that land, I do not know, for there are no facts before us. These are the facts we require, and that is the information which we seek. The hon. gentleman says that information is in his department which satisfied him, and which he has no doubt will satisfy the House, and he asks us, until he gives that information, to suspend our judgment and to place ourselves in the hands of the Government as a mere registering body for what the Government may desire. Now, Sir, that is not a proper parliamentary proceeding. We are here taking an important stage in legislating on this question. The House has gone into Committee for the purpose of considering this matter, and the hon. gentleman tells us that he has not submitted to the House the necessary material upon which they may form a judgment. That information ought to be ready for us. The hon. gentleman, and the railway company, ought to have assumed, and had a right to expect that we would exercise an independent and fair judgment. It has a right to expect what is perfectly fair and just, and it will be, I have no doubt, fairly and justly dealt with by this House; but the House must have an opportunity of forming a judgment for itself, and what is due to the House and what the hon. gentleman should propose to the House is, that the Committee should rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again, and before he asks the House again to go into Committee the hon. gentleman should submit to us the information which he has in his possession, and which will enable us to form a clear judgment on the question, which we cannot do at the present time, because he has denied us the information upon which that judgment can be formed. That is the only proper course which the hon. gentleman can take. It is not of the slightest consequence to us whether the Government has passed one or two Orders in Council, or whether they were passed three years ago or five years ago, or whether these Orders in Council have been placed upon the Table of the House or not. All these indicate the conclusions to which the Government have come, but we want the material to come to a conclusion for ourselves. I hope, Sir, in this Parliament, that the day of emancipation has come, and that men on both sides of the House will assert the rights of freemen and the rights which belong to representatives of freemen, which hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House have for a long time allowed to remain in abeyance.

Mr. TROW. I would like to ask the Postmaster General, who has stated that he knows all about this line and all about the lands given for the construction of that road, whether the Schultz line is that line which runs thirty miles from Winnipeg to a place called Carmen, or near to Carmen—Maryland, I think, is the point on the road.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes ; that is the piece of road.

Mr. TROW. Well, then, that road must have been constructed ten or twelve years ago. That portion of the road was in running order in 1877, because I was then on that road myself.

Mr. DAVIN. Not at all ; you are quite wrong.

Mr. TROW. I say yes. I travelled on that road in 1877 within four miles of Carmen to a little place called Maryland.

Mr. DAVIN. You are quite wrong.

Mr. TROW. But I know better. You know nothing about it ; you were never there.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The charter was granted in 1879 and the time was extended after that. That portion of the 52 miles which the hon. gentleman refers to was not built until after 1879, so that he is mistaken in what he says.

Mr. TROW. Was that road constructed to Carmen by an American company which became insolvent and gave the land and the railway away ?

Mr. DEWDNEY. There were two companies, I think, who were fighting about the charter, and it may be that a company prior to the Schultz Company built a portion of the road.

Mr. DALY. In answer to the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), I may say that it was an American company, under General Hammond, which commenced the construction of the road, and which was subsequently absorbed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in supposing that he was on the road in 1877, because the work of construction was not commenced until 1881.

Mr. McGREGOR. Fifty miles of that road were built by an agent of the Northern Pacific Railway, General Hammond, in the fall of 1881 and the early part of 1882, under an agreement between Dr. Schultz's Company and the Northern Pacific. The parties who were acting on behalf of the Northern Pacific sold out to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and after that the railway was constructed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is true there was quite a fight in that county at that time, because this railway had the right to run to the boundary and make connection with the Northern Pacific there ; but after arrangements had been made under the new charter, by which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were to prevent it, going to the boundary, it only went as far as Maryland, or within four miles of the boundary.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the hon. Minister whether, in view of all that has taken place, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are entitled to this land grant as a matter of law, or is it now proposed to give it to them as a matter of discretion ?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think they are entitled to it as a matter of bargain between the Government and the company, to be approved of by Parliament.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But it is our right and privilege to know on what grounds the Government made that bargain. You come for our authority for it, and it is your duty to give us all the information in your power as to what induced you to make this bargain ; especially why, after giving away all the territory you have, you propose to add to the complications which notoriously exist in Southern Manitoba, by making an additional grant of 300,000 or 400,000 acres to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is on that point that we require and are entitled to have all the information on this subject in the possession of the Government. The very fact that the hon. gentleman proposes to give the information at the next stage is conclusive reason that we ought to have it now.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I may state that had these land grants not been given the whole of Southern Manitoba would be without railway communication to-day, and it was with a great deal of difficulty, even with the land grant, that the powerful Canadian Pacific Railway Company were able to obtain the means to construct these branches.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I was present at a committee of this House when a proposition was made to build this road without any land grant all, which was refused by the Government ; and I remember Sir Charles Tupper stating that it was with great pain and regret that he refused to grant a charter for a railway that might have been constructed in 1880 or 1881, and his refusal was based wholly on the ground that the construction of that railway would be contrary to the policy of the Government in reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Government deliberately cut the throat of Southern Manitoba, and deliberately prevented the construction of a railway in 1880 and 1881, when it could have been done, and when an enormous immigration was rushing into that country.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. Minister say when the bargain was made which he has referred to ?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The negotiations have been going on from 1884 up to this year.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman say on what he bases the statement that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are entitled to get the land grant as a matter of bargain?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Because when the representations were made on which the company claimed the land grant the Government considered them entitled to it, and agreed by Order in Council to give it.

Mr. MULOCK. When was that?

Mr. DEWDNEY. One in 1886, one in 1885 and one in 1884.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask, was there an understanding between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government that that tract of country was to be held for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and that they were to build the railway at their own convenience and get the land grant?

Mr. DEWDNEY. No; there was no arrangement of that kind.

Mr. WATSON. Why was not the privilege of going into that country given to other companies, who wished to get charters? Why was the Northern Pacific refused?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I do not know why.

Mr. WATSON. I think the hon. gentleman was Minister of the Interior when the application was made by the Northern Pacific.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think that country had railway communication before the Northern Pacific applied.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. gentleman knows that the Northern Pacific made application to this House for a charter, which they secured, and for a land grant, which was refused, for a railway running 300 miles south and east of Brandon to the Souris coal fields, and through the county he represents, the reason given for the refusal being that an Order in Council passed in the previous May authorized the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to extend the time for constructing the road which they are only completing this year.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Perhaps that was the reason. I know the land grant was refused.

Mr. DALY. This railway which we are talking about and the Souris Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway are two entirely different things. At the time the Northern Pacific Company applied to the Government for a subsidy the Government had already subsidized the Souris Branch with 6,400 acres a mile to run into the coal fields, and it would have been absurd to subsidize another railway parellel to a line already subsidized; and the Government properly told the Northern Pacific people that, having already subsidized the Canadian Pacific Railway to run to the coal fields, they could not subsidize another line.

Mr. WATSON. The only reason given to the Northern Pacific Company by the Government was that by Order in Council they had extended the time for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build the road, and the people of that section were deprived of railway accommodation simply because the Government saw fit, under some understanding, which we have not yet seen, that that country should be reserved for the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman knows that the people were promised railway communication nine or ten years ago, which they have not obtained yet. The road is only being constructed to-day.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman is mistaken about that. The road is in operation to Melita, and there is not a man living in south-western Manitoba who is not within 12 miles of a railway, and the road is now under construction to the coal fields. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in saying that the Government extended the time for the building of this branch by Order in Council. There was no Order in Council relating to the Souris Branch at all, except that relating to the land grant. The hon. gentleman was referring to the extension of the Manitoba South-Western Colonization Railway, the charter for which expired three or four years ago, and it was in lieu of the extension of that branch of the railway to the coal fields that the Canadian Pacific Railway undertook the construction of their branch from Brandon to the coal fields. That road is now in operation as far as Melita, and before the snow falls will be in operation to the coal fields.

Mr. WATSON. If the hon. gentleman would look at the map and if he had listened to the information given by the Minister of the Interior, he would see that I am correct. The map states that the Order in Council extending the time was renewed in May, 1889. In 1881 and 1882 there were thousands of acres of land under cultivation at the crossing of the Souris, and along the antler creeks large crops were grown, but these people were never able to market their grain, simply because they had no railway communication. A great number of people moved south of the boundary along the Northern Pacific. That I know. I say that country has been abused and the people unjustly dealt with in the south-western portion of Manitoba, simply because the Government extended the time to the Canadian Pacific Railway for constructing the line, and would give no other company the same privileges they are now giving the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. TROW. In reconsidering my previous statement, I find that I travelled through there in 1877, but it was in 1882 that I passed by rail. I merely wish to make this statement because my recollection now is more correct. That was nine years ago, and the question arises, how it is this matter has been lying in abeyance for nine years without having been brought before the House and definitely settled? There have been several elections and Parliaments since then.

Mr. DEWDNEY. It was brought before the House, and 150 miles granted by the Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When were these sixty miles completed for which the appropriation is now asked?

Mr. DALY. About four years ago.

Mr. WATSON. Is the Government not exceeding the land grant for the line of railway from Brandon and for all the extensions the Canadian Pacific Railway got this session—that is, from Brandon to the junction of the South-Western, and from the junction of the South-Western back to Deloraine.

Mr. DEWDNEY. That Act was passed last year or the year before.

Mr. WATSON. They are getting that in addition to what we are considering now?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; that is the Souris, which has nothing to do with the Manitoba and South-Western.

Mr. MULOCK. When was the claim first made?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I should have to go really through the whole negotiations from the start to find out. It has dragged on from year to year. When that Act was passed which gave a land grant for the 150 miles it was a direct line, and if it had not been broken there would have been no difficulty, but it was broken by taking these thirty miles almost in the centre. It was after that fresh negotiations were opened to take the land grant from that 30 miles and place it on the Glenora Branch.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is that 30 miles included in the 212?

Mr. DEWDNEY. No; the land grant is transferred to two other portions. They exceed 30 miles.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for Selkirk said that all these 212 miles, respecting which the land grant is asked, have been completed for a period of four years. I enquired whether there had been any applications until recently by the Canadian Pacific Railway for this grant, and, if so, when did they make their first application, and why was it not brought before Parliament sooner?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I cannot give you the information until I look at the records, but will do so and bring down any information there is. I do not for the moment recollect, but since I have been here, now some three years, the Canadian Pacific Railway, through their secretary and by correspondence, have been continually in communication with the Government in reference to it.

Mr. MULOCK. What I am trying to get at is whether this claim now rests in contract or is discretionary with the Government? From what the Minister has said, he evidently differs from the member for Selkirk. That hon. gentleman said that the Canadian Pacific Railway had a grant for 150 miles, and by some oversight extended their line 212 miles, on the understanding that the land grant was to be given them for the 212 miles, and that it was not until some time after they discovered the mistake and that there was no land grant provision for the remaining 62 miles. That was the conclusion I drew from what the hon. member for Selkirk said; but the Minister says the rights of the Canadian Pacific Railway are a matter of contract and not the result of some misunderstanding, and that they are here, not as suppliants for favours, but asking for their rights.

Mr. HAGGART. The Order in Council was made in 1885, transferring the land grant of thirty miles. We are asking an approval of that Order in Council of 1885 transferring the 7,483 acres per mile for the thirty miles. That was part of the original 152 miles which was entitled to 6,400 acres of land per mile granted to the Schultz Company, and which was transferred or changed from the right to purchase at $1 an acre to a free gift in 1884. So they claim, as remaining unsettled since the construction of the road, from 1885 to the present day, the additional twenty-seven miles besides the thirty miles, because they completed fifty-seven miles of road. That makes twenty-seven miles unprovided for. The Government thought their claim was a just one, and we ask the approval, not only of the Order in Council of 1885, but the Order in Council of 1891, giving 6,400 acres per mile for the mileage above that provided for by the Order in Council of 1885.

Mr. MULOCK. Then, if the Canadian Pacific Railway's position is that of people demanding their rights, I do not understand the language used in the Order in Council of February, 1891. In that their claim is not placed on that basis at all. That Order in Council states that from an examination of the records the Government have come to the conclusion—looking at the claim of the Canadian Pacific Railway and what I presume might be said against it—that it would be just to ratify the understanding—not a contract, but an understanding. The statement in the Order in Council is wholly at variance with that now made to the Committee, that the railway company is entitled to this land as a matter of contract. If it is, it was wholly unnecessary to use the language set forth in the Order in Council, namely, that there was some misunderstanding growing out of the dealing between the company and the Government, a fair construction of which makes its reasonable to yield to their claim.

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is not in the records.

Mr. MULOCK. We are told that the records of the department mean the correspondence. We have so many various explanations that we do not know what to conclude. First, we are told by the Order in Council that it is only carrying out in an honourable way an understanding which is not binding. Then, we are told by the hon. member for Selkirk that this is all a mistake, and that it was by some lapse or error of judgment this thing arose. Then, we are told by the hon. member for West Assiniboia that the records would simply show the argument, and we are told by the Minister of the Interior that the Canadian Pacific Railway made a claim and presented their case in such a way as to convince the Government that they should make the grant. We ought to see the arguments. I think it would be only reasonable that the Government should lay all these papers before the Committee. My sole desire is to ascertain the true inwardness of this transaction, and to see whether we are now adjudicating upon a claim which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is entitled to have granted as a matter of right or whether this is in the discretion of the House. If that company is entitled to it, I have no word to say on the subject; but if this grant is one in the discretion of the House, another question arises, whether we are prepared to inaugurate a new principle and to make grants either of land or money for constructed roads. That is the trouble in my mind, and I think it is unfair that the Minister should press this question to a conclusion to-night when the House is in darkness as to the merits of the case. I make these remarks simply because I desire to be informed in regard to these merits, and I complain of the unfairness of the Government if they insist upon taking a vote without giving us the information. It is making a farce of the whole system of submitting these matters to Parliament unless evidence is given on which we can act. I again put it to the Minister that this is a matter which should be laid over.

Mr. TROW. If the Minister persists in not laying before this Committee the papers which he says he has in his department, and in not treating this Committee with proper courtesy, I shall move that this Committee rise.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Minister of the Interior a few moments ago brought to the notice of the Committee some Orders in Council bearing on this subject. Hon. gentlemen intimated that these had not been laid on the Table, and the Minister of the Interior explained that in previous sessions these Orders in Council had been laid on the Table of the House. The argument of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was one that could not be seriously put forward. It was that Orders in Council that were laid on the Table during the session of Parliament preceding this one had nothing to do with the business which was now being transacted. In other words, his contention was that whatever took place in previous session had no application to this session. If that be correct, it would be necessary to bring down all the papers for the last twenty-four years and to pass again all the statutes that have been passed during that time. Let us have a fair understanding as to what hon. gentlemen desire, because we have every desire to accede to any reasonable request for information. I understand that the Minister of the Interior brought down the Order in Council in February last, which indicated that there were certain records in his department showing that the contention of the company was well founded, that they had constructed their line on the understand- that the usual subsidy of 6,400 acres a mile would be granted to them, and that the Committee desired that the records of the department should be produced. We are willing to bring down the records of the department, but let us understand what is wanted. The Minister of the Interior and the Postmaster General have stated what the records of the department show, namely, that step by step, as the work of construction went on in these three lines of railway, the company received a promise, under an Order in Council, of 6,400 acres a mile. Is it the production of the Orders in Council that the hon. gentlemen desire? In addition to that, there is a little correspondence stating that the company desire to have that subsidy confirmed by Parliament, and also the subsidy to the extra 27 miles, on the ground that it is an extension of the road to which the Government promised 6,400 acres a mile. That will be produced for what it is worth, but I want to know what we are asked to produce now? The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) declared that these Orders in Council should not be recognized as binding this Parliament to granting a subsidy. That is another question. We are prepared to bring down the Orders in Council and the correspondence for what it is worth, and then we will see, not that this Parliament is bound by these Orders in Council being laid on the Table, but that the claim is a meritorious one in regard to the railway itself, and that it has been customary to grant the 6,400 acres a mile to such undertakings, and that these lines have been built under that understanding. I should like to know from the hon. gentleman what is desired, because very vague statements have been made.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad the Minister of Justice has expressed himself as he has. Speaking for myself only, I would like the Government to lay upon the Table whatever documents they say establish the bargain the Minister of the Interior has referred to. If there is any bargain, I would like to have all the documents which refer to it, in order to see whether the House should be bound by it, and if it is committed to parting with this portion of the public domain. The Minister of Justice will understand the alternative position that might be taken, and, therefore, it is impossible for one actually to define what information we want. I would think it right that all Orders in Council that bear upon the case ought to be brought down. Then, I think the case as presented to the department, which is referred to in the Order in Council of February last, should be produced. For example, if the Canadian Pacific Railway has addressed arguments in favour of the grant, and on those arguments the Government came to a judgment, I think the House ought to be in the same position as the Government, and ought also to be free to form its judgment.

Mr. DALY. It seems to me an extraordinary thing that with the Order in Council of the 4th of February, 1891, before him, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) cannot find in it all the information he requires. Now, that document reads as follows:—

"The Minister states that, so far as he is aware, no work has ever been done on section 1, as described in the Order in Council of the 6th of April, 1885, that is to say, the 30 miles necessary to connect the terminal point of the 52 miles south-westerly from Winnipeg to Manitou: but in lieu of this the southern branch of the line, that is to say, section 2, was extended westward to Deloraine, near Whitewater Lake, about 20 miles, and the northern branch to be extended westward to Glenborough about 60 miles, and the company asks that these extensions be subsidized in lieu of the 30 miles north of Manitou, for which they claim there was no immediate need. As the necessity for extending railway communication westward was urgent, and as not only was the construction of the 30 miles north of Manitou not immediately required, but two large and important sections of the province, within each of which extensive settlements had been formed, would be given an efficient railway service by the proposed arrangement, the southern branch of the railway being already connected with Winnipeg by its junction at Manitou with the Pembina Mountain Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the request of the Company was acceded to. The Order in Council of the 15th of November, 1886, accordingly made the land grant of the railway applicable to these extensions, and upon the report of the chief engineer of railways of the completion of the additional 20 miles of the southern branch and the additional 40 miles of the northern branch, the land grant applicable thereto, 384,000 acres, was authorized to be conveyed to the company by Order in Council of the 19th March, 1887.

"The total area, therefore, which has been authorized to be conveyed to the company by Order in Council on the 5th April, 1886, and 19th March, 1887, is 1,132,384 acres—that is to say, for 27 miles in excess of the distance for which the Act 48-49 Victoria, chapter 60, provided a land subsidy involving a land grant of 172,384 acres.

"The Minister further states that the company have, however, actually built and have had in operation for some years 212 miles, including the 52 miles south-west from Winnipeg, known and hereinbefore referred to as section 1, and this length of road, at the usual rate of 6,400 acres per mile, would entitle them to a total grant of 1,356,800 acres, being 224,416 acres more than has so far been provided for by Your Excellency in Council and 396,800 more than authorized by the Act 48-49 Victoria, chapter 30."

Now, if the hon. gentleman wants the Minister to bring down any correspondence, that correspondence would only show, I suppose, that the Canadian Pacific Railway discovered that they had only received a land grant for 212 miles less 27, and they requested that this Order in Council should be passed giving them a land grant for the extra 27 miles.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would they be unaware of that until they counted up the miles?

Mr. DALY. Not until they had added up the exact number of acres they got.

Mr. CHARLTON. They are more shrewd than that.

Mr. DALY. I have it on reliable information that that is the exact state of affairs. Then the hon. the Minister goes on to say:

"The Minister further states that the records of the Department of the Interior leave no doubt whatever that the company's statement that both branches of the railway were constructed on the understanding that the usual subsidy of 6,400 acres of land per mile would be provided for the whole length of the road is well founded."

No one supposes, for an instant, that if they were to get, as they did, 6,400 acres per mile for 150 miles, they were going to build the extra number of miles of railway without the same land grant for the further extension; and when that line between Manitou and Barnsley was taken away, and they were given by Order in Council power to extend the land grant for that 30 miles to the Glenborough Branch and Pembina Branch, it seems to me that there is also a reason here.

Mr. MULOCK. Was that Order in Council ratified by Parliament?

Mr. DALY. I presume it was.

Mr. MULOCK. Do you refer to the Act?

Mr. DALY. No; the hon. gentleman says that it was not.

Mr. MULOCK. Then what good is it?

Mr. DALY. It was not necessary, for this reason, that the land grant applicable to that 30 miles was included in the 150 miles, after it received the sanction of Parliament.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) made a motion that the Committee rise. That would have the effect which hon. gentlemen on his side of the House, have already disclaimed several times, namely, of breaking up the measure entirely. Therefore, I will ask him not to press his motion, as I am sure that was not his intention.

Mr. TROW. I have no desire to do any injury to the Canadian Pacific Railway. If they are entitled to that portion of land I shall vote for it. At the same time, the Minister has been obstinate, and says he will not bring down the papers. Why not defer the matter for a day or two, and when the papers are brought down, if the Opposition finds there is no objection, doubtless we will be agreeable to letting the measure pass.

Mr. LAURIER. The object of my hon. friend was not to kill the project. His motion was to report progress and sit again—at least, that was his intention, although, by a slip of the tongue, he might not have clearly expressed it.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I move that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 109) further to amend the Act 52nd Victoria, chapter 4, intituled: "An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in land to certain railway companies."

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. WATSON. I beg to move that the following provision be added:—

Provided always, that in consideration of such grant of land the railway company shall not be entitled to charge more than one cent per ton per mile for each ton of coal carried over this road in car lots.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is an amendment which the hon. member moved in Committee of the Whole on this Bill at its last sitting. The hon. gentleman's proposal, in the first instance, is that a certain portion of the Railway Act shall be repeated in this Bill concerning the railway company under consideration. The provision involved in this amendment will contain nothing more than the provisions of the Railway Act referred to, which are clear and distinct as requiring that the tariff on all freight shall, before it is exacted, be approved by a by-law of the company, and that the by-law shall be approved by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. In the next place, if at any time the tolls shall be found excessive, they shall be subject to revision by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, whether too high or too low, without any initiation on the part of the company itself. Under these circumstances, the Government are not in a position to accept the amendment, which would make, in respect to this Bill, entirely special legislation.

Mr. WATSON. When this Bill was before the House on a previous occasion, I felt it to be my duty to move in the direction of the amendment. I consider it is a fair proposition, notwithstanding what has been stated by the Minister of Justice. I should like the Minister to point to an instance in which the Railway Committee of the Privy Council has exercised that power by reducing tolls charged by any railway in Canada. I have never heard of such a case. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman to name any case where they ever interfered with any rates charged by any Canadian railway. We know the power rests in the Government, but it has not been exercised, and for that reason I thought it necessary to move in the direction I have moved, that a fixed rate per ton per mile should be fixed by Parliament. We are giving a large grant of land to this company to build a railway, the principal purpose of which is to open up and develop a coal mine. We have had experience in the past with regard to these matters, and we should profit by it. The House made a valuable land grant to the Galt company to build a line from Dunmore to Lethbridge, and that company have done exactly what the Opposition contended they would do. When that Bill was before the House, I moved that a maximum rate for carrying coal be fixed, but the House rejected my amendment. My contention has since been borne out by the freight rates charged by that company, and, notwithstanding the fact that there are thousands of acres of coal lands in the vicinity of the Galt mines at Lethbridge, they are worthless, for the simple reason that the Galt company own the railway and only carry coal from their own mine to consumers. The whole region is practically locked up, and that company has a monopoly, simply because we gave them a monopoly in the railway and in the railway freights. It is wise for this House, notwithstanding the statement of the Minister of Justice, to provide as a condition of a land grant being given to this company, that a maximum price be fixed for the carriage of coal. I move that the maximum price should not exceed 1 cent per ton per mile, and I base my argument on the fact that that rate is considered a fair rate by hon. gentlemen opposite. We own and operate the Intercolonial Railway. That road carries coal from the mines in Nova Scotia at $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent per ton per mile. It carries coal a distance of 20 miles odd from Springhill Mines to the steel works at the low rate of $\frac{1}{2}$ a cent per mile. The road now under consideration is 54 miles in length, and I ask the House not to give a land grant to this company except on the condition that they will carry coal at a rate not exceeding 1 cent per ton per mile. We are told by Ministers who should be in possession of the facts that coal can be carried over the Intercolonial Railway at $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent per ton per mile and that it pays the road. I understand that on the Intercolonial Railway the road is difficult to operate in winter on account of the heavy snow storms, and that it is difficult to keep the line clear. We are giving a land grant to a road where they are not troubled with snow storms no less than 6,400 acres per mile, and from what I have heard of the land in that section, the land grant alone will build the road. It will not be fair if the House does not accept my amendment, because consumers will have to depend on coal in the near future for fuel. I would not be doing justice to my constituents and the people throughout Manitoba and the North-West if I did not move in the direction indicated by my amendment. If it can be clearly shown that the Intercolonial Railway, a road much more difficult to operate than a road in Alberta, can carry coal at $\frac{1}{2}$ a cent per mile on a short haul of 20 miles, and $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent per ton per mile on a longer haul, it is surely not unfair that the House should attach as a condition to the land grant to the railway now under discussion a provision that the company carry coal at 1 cent per ton per mile.

Mr. DALY. In reply to the statement made by the hon. gentleman, I will simply ask how he would expect the price of coal to be reduced in Manitoba if his amendment is carried. This amendment affects this line of railway alone. The contention of the hon. gentleman is that if you provide that this railway of 56 miles long shall not charge more than 1 cent per ton per mile for carrying coal, that that is going to lessen the price of coal in Manitoba, and he contends this, in view of the fact that before that coal reaches the homes of the people in Manitoba it has got to be carried for over 800 miles on the Canadian Pacific Railway, which railway the provision in the amendment will not bind at all. It seems to be ridiculous on the face of it, that any person in his sane moments should make the statement in the House that this is going to decrease the price of coal. How can coal be decreased in price by limiting the rate at which a railway 56 miles in length will carry it? If this railway ran all the way from the coal mines in the Province of Manitoba it would be a different thing. Then the hon. gentleman's contention might go for something, but when as a matter of fact, and he knows it, that so far as his constituency is concerned, and so far as my constituency is concerned, this coal has got to be carried for some 700 or 800 miles on the Canadian Pacific Railway which the amendment will not affect. It seems to me perfectly absurd to propose that, whether the amendment is carried or not, our constituents would be benefited in the slightest degree. I hope the amendment will receive at the hands of this Committee what it deserves, and that is, that it will be voted down.

Mr. WATSON. I am not at all surprised that the hon. gentleman who always poses as the champion of monopolists in this House is opposing this amendment. I would like to ask him in whose interests he is advocating the defeat of the amendment in this House? It certainly cannot be in the interest of his constituents.

Mr. DALY. Can you tell me how it will benefit my constituents?

Mr. WATSON. I say that the high rates charged on the 56 miles of road is the first step, if not the last, to increase the price of coal. I know that the Government are paying for coal at Calgary, a very short distance from the Lethbridge coal mines, $8.50 per ton for coal, when the same coal is sold at Winnipeg, a much greater distance from the mines, at $7 per ton. I know that the whole of the excessive rate is not charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I know from facts which I mentioned to this House a year ago, that the Galt Coal Company do charge an excessive rate, or do charge an excessive price for that coal at Dunmore on the Canadian Pacific Railway. That being the case, I do say that when we know that the coal that is supplied to us in Manitoba that comes from the west, has got to be supplied by branch lines of railway as feeders to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that if they are allowed to charge what they see fit, that they practically will have a monopoly of the coal of that country and will charge every cent that they possibly can. It may be if that amendment is not carried that they will not raise the price, but at all events they can prevent any other company from opening up and developing the coal lands in those different regions, simply because the Act gives the one company the monopoly. We are asked to give a subsidy of 6,400 acres a mile, which I claim is sufficient to build that road and equip it. Are we giving that subsidy for the purpose of benefiting the general public? No; we are not. We are giving it for the purpose of benefiting the particular individuals who own that coal mine, and that railway. I will not say I was surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) because I know his past record in this House, and I know that he is the champion of monopolists here. I would like to know when he defended the interests of his constituents against monopoly?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. WATSON. Hon. gentlemen opposite may not like to hear the question, but the people I represent will understand what I am speaking about.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DENISON). The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WATSON. I am speaking on the question. I know what the question is.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DENISON). Then, I want you to keep to it.

Mr. WATSON. I am keeping to the question. I am surprised that any member from the North-West should make the remarks that the member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) has made. He knows that we are obliged to consume the coal from the Lethbridge mines, and I contend that the first thing we should look to in granting these coal mines to companies, and particularly in granting assistance to construct railways, is to see that that coal is carried to consumers at the lowest possible cost. That is what I am here for, and that is what I am advocating, and I am perfectly in order and perfectly right in doing so. I will continue to do so as long as I have the honour of a seat in this House.

Mr. MULOCK. When this matter was before the Committee, some short time ago, some hon. gentlemen who take the same position as is taken to-night by those who oppose this amendment, declared that there was no precedent for any such proposition. I am sorry the member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) is absent, because he was one of those who took that view. In this particular case we are asked to make a free gift of land to a railway, and it is quite within the province of Parliament, and it is part of the duty of Parliament I submit to attach to that grant just such conditions as Parliament in its wisdom sees fit to attach. The Minister of Justice says that we should not make an exception to this particular company, but I would remind him, and I would remind the Committee, that this company is an exceptional kind of company. This is not an ordinary carrying company, but it is clothed with special powers by its charter, and it is empowered to buy coal lands, to sell coal lands and to go into the market and buy and sell coal. This railway company are merchants of coal and miners of coal. It is proposed to give them out of the property of the Crown the wherewith to build a line into the coal district, and when that line is built into the coal district there will never be another grant made by Parliament to build another road in that district. Therefore all the coal that comes out of that district has got to come over this particular line. This coal land company being engaged in coal mining will in that way, having the sole carrying trade, and practically the fixing of the rates, be in a position to render valueless every acre of coal land in that district which is held by other parties. You are practically placing within the grasp of this company all the coal lands that are going to be served by this railway. Other coal lands will be of no value because they will not be able to market their coal except over this railway whose interest it is to destroy all values in coal lands that this company does not own. You are putting this company in a position to destroy all values in coal lands that they do not own, and you are in fact making the whole of that part of the country tributary to this line which can impose just such coal rates as it may think proper. The Minister of Justice says that there is power in the Railway Act for the Government to reduce rates. I agree with him, but that power has ever been, and will continue to be, a dead letter. I do not think that this Government up to the present time has shown that it is any less free from railway influences than its predecessors. We have nothing to warrant us in supposing that they would dare to reduce the rates on coal, except that the company asked for it, and, inasmuch as this company would never be applicants for such a change, there will never be any such reduction made. The change in rates would never arise unless it could be shown that the railway would discriminate, and in this case it is not necessary for them to discriminate. They can charge on all coal, whether it comes from their own mines or from the mines of others, absolutely prohibitory rates. Those rates will not prohibit their own coal coming over, because it is immaterial what rates they charge themselves; it is simply a matter of book-keeping: there is no real transfer of money out of their pockets to other pockets, but simply a change from the right pocket to the left. So that this company, combining in itself trading powers and the powers of common carriers, does not come under the General Railway Act, but must be dealt with specially. That is one point I make. Then, there is a precedent for it. In the case of several railways in the Province of Ontario similar legislation has been imposed. For example, in the charter of the Legislature of Ontario for the Credit Valley Railway, running from the City of Toronto westerly, it is enacted in section 41 that "the said railway company shall at all times receive and carry cordwood or any wood or fuel at a rate not to exceed" a certain rate which is specified. A similar provision is found in the charter of the London, Huron and Bruce Railway, section 34. A similar provision appears in the Act incorporating the Fenelon Falls Railway Company. A similar provision appears in the Act incorporating the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway Company, section 30. A similar provision appears also in the Act incorporating the Toronto and Nipissing Railway Company.

Mr. BOWELL. Is there any provision in any of these Acts compelling the roads to carry the cordwood?

Mr. MULOCK. All the clauses are imperative. For instance, the Fenelon Falls Railway Act says that "the said railway company shall at all times receive and carry." Now, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) says that because this provision may not affect the price of coal in his constituency, therefore he sees no reason for adopting it. The hon. gentleman's argument is that it will not do any good in Selkirk.

Mr. DALY. Or in Marquette, or anywhere else outside of the town of Calgary.

Mr. MULOCK. Even if it does no good outside of the district served by the railway, that is no reason why we should not pass it. If it produces benefits at Calgary or along the line of the railway, that is a good reason why we should adopt it; and where is the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis)? Why is his voice not heard here now? The fact is that this is only a scheme of a set of speculators; it is as hollow as a drum; there is no public opinion at the back of it; it is a plain speculation by a number of persons who have succeeded in acquiring some political influence here, and who are coming here to grab another portion of the public domain; and they do not even live in Canada, but in England. We were told the other night that the railway was to fall into the hands of some persons who live in England, with the exception of one person in Calgary. I would like to know how far these people are going to operate the railway in the interests of the people through whose district it may pass. This is a pure speculation, a pure scheme to make money for a few promoters, and we are going to repeat the mistakes which we have made before, as for example when a few years ago we conferred a monopoly on the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway, which now practically controls all the coal lands of the Island of Vancouver. Surely, it is time for us to take warning, and if there has been no precedent established by the Dominion Parliament up to this moment, is there not independence enough in this new Parliament to strike out into a new course for the future? If there is not it speaks badly for the people of Canada. We see with what a lavish hand the public domain is being given away to aid in the creation and perpetuation of monopolies; and that is going to be the outcome of this scheme unless you attach conditions for the protection of the public as a matter of contract, instead of depending upon the good-will of an Administration: for we know now that these Administrations, strong as they think themselves to be, are easily amenable to the influence of railway corporations. The time has come when we have to decide whether the railway companies own Canada or the people own Canada. Is Parliament going to legislate for the people or for the corporations? It looks very much as if the people were losing power, as if the power was, not gradually, but rapidly, passing into the hands of huge railway corporations. Now-a-days individual men seem to have no rights at all or to meet with no favour at the hands of the Administration. I have listened to many a discussion in this Hoouse and in the committees of this House, especially the Railway Committee, and on one and all occasions when the interests of the individual citizens come into collision with those of the railways, the interests of the individual invariably suffer. The unorganized people are crushed to the wall by the great railway corporations; and while this company has not that power at this time, the fact that it comes here under the ægis of the railway corporation appears to be a sufficient reason for hon. gentlemen to surround it with all the power of a great railway corporation, and the consequence is that the people's interests are disregarded for the interests of monopolists. Now, I protest against this or any Administration legislating simply in the interest of railways or corporations. We have too much of that. I never can find when an individual right comes in collision with those of a railway company that he gets fair consideration here, and the surprising part of it is that members of this House, who ought to be free from such influence, who believe they are free from them, seem to hand over their judgment into the keeping of these corporations. For these reasons we should now make a new departure and protest against the people, through Parliament, parting with any powers that are not going to be exercised for the welfare of the whole community.

Amendment negatived: Nays, 61; Yeas, 37.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. When the resolution on which this Bill was founded was before the House, I took occasion to draw the attention of the Committee to the enormous quantity of land in the North-West which had been withdrawn from settlement and handed over to speculators and corporations. The fact has come out to-night that more than twice the settled area of the great Province of Ontario has been handed over to railway companies alone, to say nothing of the immense tracts belonging to the Hudson Bay Company and the large areas handed over to the land companies and land speculators. The fact of the matter is we have discounted the future of the country. Instead of keeping it for the people, we have handed it over to speculators and corporations; and now, in order to make it as easy as possible to prevent any more damage, in order to provide that these lands shall be sold at a reasonable figure and prevent corporations from grinding all they can out of the settlers, I move that the two following clauses be added to the Bill:—

The lands so granted shall be sold by the said company at prices in no case exceeding $4 per acre, the said lands, when sold by the company, shall be subject to the same conditions of settlement, improvement and residence as may be now in force respecting homestead lands in Manitoba and the North-West.

Any such lands so sold, on which the said conditions are not fulfilled, shall, at the end of two years from the date of sale thereof by the said company, revert back to and become the property of the Government of Canada.

The reason I move that clause to make the land subject to homestead duties is simply this: When the question was before the House before, the mover of the Bill said that we could not prevent the company from selling these lands to other speculators and to those other speculators holding them as long as they saw fit; but by inserting this clause, and there will be no hardship in inserting it, we provide that the lands sold by the company shall be sold subject to settlement duties, and we make it the business of the company to see that these duties are performed, because if they are not the land shall then revert back to the Government and become the property of the country.

Amendment negatived on same division.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I want to ask the House to discharge the Order for the third reading of Bill (No. 146) to amend the Dominion Elections Act, and to refer the Bill back to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of making two or three alterations, not of great importance, but which are necessary to carry out the policy already adopted by the House as regards this measure. I will explain briefly the amendments I propose to add to the Bill. In the first place, there is a clerical error in the Bill, as engrossed, which requires to be amended, and which I need not explain now, as it will be apparent when we come to deal with it in Committee. There is likewise an amendment with reference to the certification of the electoral lists to the returning officer. At present, they require to be certified by the revising officer when required by the returning officer, and I propose to ask the House to agree that they may be certified by the Queen's Printer. These lists are often required in a hurry when the revising officer is away. Last year there was a vacancy in the office of revising officer when an election was coming on, and it may occur that the revising officer is not accessible, or he may be out of copies of the list, and the Queen's Printer has to be sent to, and he should certify them, as he is the officer who compares them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman propose that they should be certified by the Queen's Printer, or that he should simply be a substitute for the revising officer?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose that they may be certified by one or the other. Then, I think the schedule of fees for returning officers needs to be revised in two or three particulars. The House has laid the duty on the deputy returning officer of returning the ballot box to the returning officer, but we have limited the fees to a certain number of miles, and I propose to allow the deputy returning officer for any actual travelling he may have to undergo under the Act, and, instead of the present rate, which I think is 10 cents a mile, to allow him 12½ cents a mile for necessary travelling. I think also there should be some addition to the remuneration of the returning officers, and in regard to this I am acting on information I have received from officers of the Government, not only as to returning officers in large communities, but also in regard to information furnished by the Auditor General, who has supervision over their accounts and is able to speak authoritatively as to the remuneration the law allows them. I propose therefore that, in addition to the present allowance of $60, they shall receive the amount of $2 a poll when there are more than thirty polls in the riding. In cities like Montreal and Toronto, where the ridings are very large, it is almost impossible to get returning officers to serve for the remuneration which the law allows. Of course, the returning officer has no power to increase his remuneration by increasing the number of polls, because that is regulated by the revising officer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the Minister of Justice whether he has considered the proposition as to the qualification of the returning officers? Of course, where the returning officer occupies an important official position such as sheriff or registrar, there is a guarantee for the discharge of his duties, but we know that many persons have been appointed against whom you might bring an action and get judgment, but they have nothing, and there is no means by which you can enforce the penalties of the law against them. I think, as long as the Crown has unlimited discretion in the appointment of returning officers, there should be some provision by which the person appointed should be amenable to the requirements of the law, and, therefore, some qualification ought to be required. It should be some person holding property in fee-simple to a certain amount, because it might be found very inconvenient to require the returning officer to give a guarantee for the performance of his duty. There should be some protection given to the public and to the candidates by providing for some qualification or other on the part of the returning officer. The Minister has proposed that the Queen's Printer may certify to the list instead of the revising officers. I do not see how he can certify to the list, especially he could not do so if the list was printed elsewhere than in the public department. In the County of Kent, my attention was called to the voters' list in which whole pages were omitted. The names were not there. The revising officer said he did not know how or where the mistake occurred. He believed he had sent the list properly revised to the department here, but the list was not received back properly printed. There were whole pages of names omitted. How could the Queen's Printer say that was a correct list? The revising officer could make a statement of that kind; but I do not see what value the certificate of the Queen's Printer would have. I do not see how any one other than the revising officer or his clerk could certify to the correctness of the lists.

Mr. TROW. I hope the Minister will see that it is made imperative for the revising barrister to make these certificates. In reference to the additional sums to be paid to the returning officers of $2 per poll, it seems to me to be a large increase, because in many ridings there are 60 polling subdivisions, and that would add 100 per cent. to the salary of the returning officer. In scores of instances there are at least 50 sub-divisions, which at $2 each, would make a very considerable sum.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Only for the additional number.

Mr. TROW. Suppose there are 60 sub-divisions.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Then he is paid $120 instead of $60.

Mr. CHARLTON. The history of legislation in connection with the Franchise Bill, is a very interesting one. I do not know whether we will ever get done tinkering with it; but I hope the Minister of Justice will one of these days take the sensible course of consigning it to the limbo of usless things. Now, this proposition to give the Queen's Printer power to certify to the list, I believe to be a very objectionable one. Viewing the Bill in the light of all its antecedents, I am very suspicious of it. This Bill was introduced for the purpose of obtaining an unjust advantage, it was palpably an unjust Bill. After we had been fighting it three or four months, some of the more unjust provisions of the Bill were eliminated, but it is still essentially unjust, and unnecessary, and always will be. Now, the Government has control of the printing of these lists. It appoints the revising barrister who makes these lists. The revising barrister holds office during the pleasure, practically, of the Government, he is their appointee and their creature. He makes these lists which are sent to the Government printing office at Ottawa, and there is no safeguard, no check that can be imposed by the public in the public interest. If that list is to be revised and certified by the Queen's Printer, the whole machinery in that case is in the hands of the Government. The Opposition literally and absolutely are at the mercy of the Government.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Will the hon. gentleman let us go into Committee?

Motion agreed to, Order discharged, and House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the second schedule,

Mr. TROW. I think the mileage allowed seems to be excessive. There is one item in which I hope the Minister will make a little change, that in which he allows $4 for the rent of a hall for nomination. I know that last nomination in my riding, the returning officer, through economy, I presume, hired a very small place. There was a very large attendance, and we were under the necessity of engaging the opera house and paying $10 for it ourselves. It is utterly impossible to get a building of sufficient size to hold the crowds at nomination, for so small a sum as $4.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think the hon. gentleman is correct. In county towns the court house is generally used, but in other ridings where there is no public building it is impossible to obtain a hall for $4. We generally pay more than that for a political meeting. The provision should be "not exceeding $8." I did not thoroughly understand whether it is proposed to pay the returning officer $2 for each poll.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He will receive a minimum of $60, and $2 for each poll above 30. If there are 30 polls, he will receive $60; if there are 40 polls he will receive $80.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not object to the increase proposed if there is a guarantee that the returning officers will be men capable of discharging their duties, and will discharge them. I know in the election of 1887 the returning officer in my county was a man who did not so act, and it was proposed to bring several actions against him for several violations of the law. Such, however, would have been unless, for while judgments could have been obtained, he was a man without means. At the last election in my own riding a similar observation might apply. In more than one riding men were appointed without means, and no man, however grievously the law is violated, can then be reached except for a criminal offence. Under the election law it is very difficult to get at a returning officer criminally, and so practically as regards violations of the law, which sometimes are gross violations, it is only by civil action, and it is useless to bring a civil action against a man of straw. I prefer to increase the fees if men of responsibility are appointed to positions of that kind. If the Minister would compel these returning officers to enter into sureties for the proper discharge of their duties it would be a step in the right direction. The Government should make it a condition of their appointment that these officers should fulfil the law, and the Government should take some guarantee that the law will be carried out and their duties honestly discharged.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We discussed this subject a good deal when the House had before it the proposition to alter the law respecting returning officers. The matter will have to stand over for the present. The leader of the Opposition suggested the advisability of having permanent returning officers, and perhaps that would be an improvement. We decided to consider that suggestion and various other suggestions made, including one from the hon. member for Bothwell in regard to the returning officers' sufficiency as regards property. I think, however, we cannot undertake, in regard to either of these Bills, to do all that is required to be done in the opinion of individual members by way of amendment at this session. We cannot undertake to do more than complete the outline of this Bill this session.

Mr. TROW.

Mr. WATSON. I agree with the proposed increase of the fees. If a man occupies the very responsible position of returning officer, he should be fairly paid: but I would urge that only respectable men should be selected to discharge those duties. This is not only important with respect to discharging his own duties honestly, but also in regard to giving good and proper instruction to his deputies, and selecting efficient deputies. I have known several cases at different polls in my own county where deputies employed in 1882 and 1887 have not to this day been paid for their services, and they had to pay out disbursements amounting, in many cases, to $10 or $15. The Government should see to it that the returning officers are not men of straw, but possess some means and are able to give security for carrying out the duties imposed on them. Unless something of this kind is exacted, the Government should not increase the fees: but it is well worth while increasing the fees if we have a guarantee that the men receiving the appointments will give some security that they will discharge their duties in good faith.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I hope the hon. gentleman is not under the impression that the fees generally are being increased. Only in the large constituencies will there be any change, and it is in those constituencies we have had trouble in obtaining suitable persons.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Under the provision made, the fees will be largely increased, in my own county at least one-half. There are 47 polls, and the returning officer will receive $94 instead of $60, and 12½ cents for each mile travelled instead of 10 cents. Some provision should be made to increase the fees, but at the same time the returning officers should be compelled to give security for the due performance of their duties. In many cases the officers are men of straw. If they make an error, either wilfully or negligently there is no way of recovering anything from them. The returning officer has also the appointment of his deputies. He should be held accountable for what they do. It is hardly fair he should have the appointment of 47 deputy returning officers in one county and not be held responsible for their conduct. This is not a party question, and we want to see good men appointed whether they be Reformers or Conservatives: men who will honestly and faithfully carry out their duties. I, therefore, think that the returning officer should be a man of some substance, who would be responsible for his appointments.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The law says that the lists can be certified by the Queen's Printer, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and the revising officer. That is the law under the Franchise Act of 1890. The errors upon which my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) remarked do not depend at all upon the Queen's Printer. Far from it. They were unfortunately the result of errors committed by the revising officers, which a new system adopted this year will prevent. I have to add to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who just sat down, that the returning officers are probably the hardest worked and the worst paid officials in all the service. I agree that they should be men who have a standing in the community, and I may add that, except in very rare occasions has it ever been complained, by the most exacting of the Government's opponents, that they were men of straw. I agree with the Minister of Justice that it would be well to introduce a provision in the law so as to make them responsible for their actions.

Mr. CASEY. I quite agree with the proposal to make the returning officer give security. I fancy the reason he has been omitted from the list of officers who give security is on account of the old practice of appointing sheriffs and officers who were officials already under bonds. I do not think there can be any objection to paying the returning officers an amount sufficient to induce responsible men to take the position. We ought to pay them substantially and well, but I do not quite like the way in which the increase is made here. The addition of $2 for any polls over thirty is right enough perhaps, but I would prefer to see the returning officer given a considerable increase in his minimum lump allowance, rather than see the mileage increased as in the proposed amendments. This is an increase of 25 per cent. on the mileage, and the mileage being a matter within the returning officer's own control, if he happens to be a man who would look sharp after his perquisites he could increase his allowance considerably by travelling more miles than would be necessary. I do not see, however, what reason there can be for considering the poll clerk underpaid, and increasing his mileage by 25 per cent. also, but I suppose the Minister has a reason. Under paragraph 14 of this proposed amendments it says: "For each mile necessarily travelled for collecting ballot boxes." During our discussion the other night it was well understood that it was the intention of the Government that the ballot boxes should be brought in by the deputy returning officers whenever it was possible to do so. It was urged by several members, of whom I was one, that they should be forced to bring them in in all cases so as to secure the superintendence of a responsible official over the boxes until they were finally handed to the returning officer. I objected then, and I object still, to allowing a returning officer to send out an irresponsible person to bring in these ballot boxes. This increase in the mileage will certainly induce the returning officer to go around and collect the boxes, or to send some one to collect them. The returning officer's own time may be worth 12½ cents per mile each way, but if he sends a man with his own horse for that purpose, the pay is absurdly high, and it is a premium for delay on the part of the returning officer. I find also that there is a provision made for swearing the deputy returning officers after the close of the poll, and if the deputy has to be sworn by the returning officer it is necessary that they should meet and I think it would be better if the deputies would bring in the boxes at once and be sworn. I find also that there is a provision made to pay a reasonable sum to the returning officer for supplying ballot boxes and stationery. I always understood that ballot boxes were furnished by the Government, and I think they should be so furnished to secure uniform and efficient construction of the boxes, and to get them cheaply by having them made in large quantities. Those are all the points which I wish to refer to just now. I put the greatest emphasis upon the objection to the manner of increasing the pay of the returning officer. I should much prefer his minimum salary being increased, leaving the mileage as it was before, so as to avoid the temptation to unnecessary mileage. I also think he should not be allowed to go around and collect the ballot boxes, but it should be the duty of the deputies to bring them in forthwith.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As regards the mileage, I have no personal knowledge. I merely speak from the information given by the Auditor General, who has checked all these accounts, and who has made strong representations for two or three years past that 10 cents a mile is not sufficient to cover actual disbursements; and finding this Bill before the House, although it had reached a late stage, he drew the attention of my officers to the necessity of remodelling the schedule.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Is is intended to pay 12½ cents each way?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; for each mile travelled, the same as before.

Mr. CASEY. I did not say that it was excessive pay for the returning officer if he went himself. I said it was excessive if paid to another man sent to collect the ballot boxes. I merely urged that if his present allowance was thought to be too low, it would be better to make that up by an increased allowance in another form than in the shape of mileage.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the present system will be better. We have to consider the two classes of constituencies, those in the cities and those in the country. In the city constituencies there is a great deal of labour and responsibility involved owing to the large number of polling places, whereas in country constituencies there is a good deal of travel, and on that account a good deal of absence from home and occupation of time. If we adopt the system embodied in the schedule, we give remuneration to the two classes—to the city returning officer a direct allowance by paying him according to the number of polling places, and to the country returning officer a larger allowance in the way of travelling expenses. If we made their allowance a fixed sum all round, we would not apply it proportionately to the amount of work done.

Mr. CASEY. I was not objecting to the allowance per poll.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As regards the travelling allowance, the opinion of those best qualified to judge is that 12½ cents per mile for the mileage actually travelled is a more reasonable allowance than 10 cents. I admit that the schedule requires alteration, and with the permission of the Committee I will make it read thus:

For mileage of deputy returning officer and poll clerk going to and returning from the polling station and delivering ballot boxes, each mile, 12½ cents.

We allow the same rate to the returning officer in case he should have to go and collect the boxes, because we do not make it imperative on the deputy returning officer always to bring them in. We lay that duty upon him, but we do not take the duty away from the returning officer, in case he should have to go, through accident or eccentricity on the part of any deputy returning officer. In such a case it is only fair to allow him the same mileage.

Mr. CASEY. I think that substantially removes the objection.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to the same thing which I tried to explain to this House before. In our cities there are polling sub-divisions where only fifty, or sixty, or seventy votes are polled, and it seems to me that it would be in the interest of the country if the law were amended so as to reduce the number of polling sub-divisions in our towns and cities. They cost the country too much now.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was under the impression that the change which the hon. gentleman suggests was made by an amendment to the Franchise Act, which made it unnecessary to provide for polling divisions for less than 300 voters.

Mr. INGRAM. What I complain of is that for instance in a ward having from 200 to 500 votes, there are in some instances two polling sub-divisions. Sometimes a vote for mayor, alderman and school trustee is taken without difficulty in one polling sub-division having from 500 to 700 votes, and it seems to me that in Dominion elections two polling booths would be quite sufficient for a municipal ward, because there are as a rule only two candidates. With two polling booths instead of four the country would save money, and it would be much more convenient for the candidates and all concerned.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. There is another point to which I should like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice. Under the law, I understand, the deputy returning officer and his clerk are not to be paid for more than 20 miles. In my county there is a polling division which is distant about 50 miles, or 100 miles going and coming. The returning officer sent in his account, but was refused payment except for 20 miles, and he had to pay the balance out of his own pocket.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. What is the number?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Number twenty-six.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We propose to strike out that limit.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. And there are now the old limits?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. With regard to the remark of the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram), it is highly desirable that municipal wards formed for municipal purposes should not be interfered with if possible, even when there is so low a number as sixty or seventy voters in the ward. In one of the ridings in my township, there was a division made in 1886 which created great confusion. The judge found it necessary to divide the township into six wards instead of five, and there was any amount of confusion and trouble. Men would go to one poll and not finding their names there go to another, and still not finding their names, go home in disgust without voting.

Mr. INGRAM. I had only reference to cities and towns.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved to amend section 13 by substituting two copies for one copy of the electoral list.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he has considered the point I mentioned to the Secretary of State when the Bill was up before, and that was that the returning officer should have the power, in his discretion, of appointing more than one polling place within a polling division. It happens in the free grant district, and in Algoma, that very often the revising officer, out of a desire not to multiply lists, will make the polling divisions inconveniently large, and it very often happens in the case of settlements in some remote parts of townships, there being no direct communication between the settlement and the polling place fixed for the polling division, owing to the nature of the roads, it is impossible for the people to get to the polling place without great sacrifice. It is hardly worth while to make a separate polling division and separate lists for that particular settlement; but if the returning officer had the power to say that in such a polling division there should be an additional polling place to suit the convenience of the people, it would be a great advantage to that part of the country to which I allude. In my constituency the Ontario Government have multiplied polling places to a greater extent than the Dominion authorities, and voting has been carried on with much greater convenience and much less confusion and loss of time. The only objection to the plan I propose would be the possibility of a repetition of votes, because the deputy returning officer in one township could not be absolutely certain that the voters in the township had not gone to the other polling place and voted there, but that risk is very small and trifling compared with the great convenience which would result from having one or more polling sub-divisions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was not aware that the hon. gentleman had mentioned that subject lately. It was brought to my notice a year ago by the member who then sat for Algoma, and it seems to me that the difficulty of preventing a repetition of votes was the great objection to the plan proposed. Each polling place would necessarily be furnished with a full list for that place, and a person would have the right to vote at either, and I cannot see how that could be avoided unless the lists were divided and then it would be necessary to divide the district itself.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I admit that; but at the same time I think the convenience would be much greater than the danger of repetition, which would be exceedingly small, because the population is scattered, and there is not much likelihood of personation in the localities to which I refer. I quite admit there is danger, but there is as much danger where a man is entered in two polling divisions which are adjacent to each other. I mentioned the subject to the Secretary of State, who had charge of the Bill first, and he promised to consider the matter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Would not the division of the polling district be a better remedy?

Mr. O'BRIEN. That involves multiplication of the voters' lists and a good deal of additional expense.

Mr. CASEY. Has the Minister made up his mind to provide the use of sealing wax for closing the envelopes? That is the only means of really preventing the improper opening of the envelopes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That subject was pretty well discussed, and I thought the Committee became finally reconciled to the idea of dispensing with the wax.

Mr. CASEY. The only reason was that the returning officer might not be familiar with the use of wax.

Bill reported.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 16th September, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPT.—CONTRACTS.

Mr. GIROUARD presented the seventh report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with minutes of evidence and proceedings.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to ask the hon. gentleman if the report of to-day's proceedings is included, so that the minority report may appear?

Mr. GIROUARD. It is brought down as a portion of the proceedings of the general Committee, together with all the evidence. I was going to ask hon. gentlemen opposite what day would be convenient for the discussion of this report?

Mr. LAURIER. Any time will be convenient to us, to-morrow or Friday.

Mr. GIROUARD. It will take at least a couple of days before the report is translated into French. I do not know whether the discussion can take place this week on that account.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps the proceedings might be translated to-morrow, and possibly Friday might be a good day to commence the discussion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. After a little reflection we can make an arrangement during the afternoon on the subject. It must be remembered the evidence has not yet been distributed. No doubt hon. members have followed the proceedings of the Committee and have read the evidence.

Mr. LAURIER. If the hon. gentleman will suggest a day, the subject may be brought up at 8 o'clock.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

THE MEMBER FOR EAST NORTHUMBERLAND.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to direct the attention of the leader of the House to the report presented yesterday from the special Committee to investigate into the charges preferred against the hon. member for East Northumberland. We have yet to fix a day for the discussion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand we will be able to take that to-morrow.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. SKINNER. As the present Chairman of the Committee, I spoke to the members of the Committee on the other side of the House on the subject, and they said that, other things being equal, it could come up to-morrow.

CANADIAN SEALERS CAPTURED.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). I wish to ask the special leave of the House to bring a matter of some importance to the notice of the Government. It is with respect to the seizure of Canadian sealing vessels on the Pacific coast by Russian authorities. I will not have an opportunity of asking information from the Government under the regular rules unless the House will allow me the special privilege of doing so now. Now, I repeat that it is a matter of very great importance. I notice in a report published in a newspaper in my county the following:—

"The startling news has been received in Cape Breton from Victoria, B.C., brought there by a sealing schooner, that Captain Alex. McLean, and his brother Captain Dan, Cape Bretonians, have been captured by the Russians, and are now prisoners at Copper Island. Further, that Captain Dan was caught ashore at Copper Island, and before he and his boat's crew could reach their vessel, which was anchored some distance off, they were fired upon, a ball knocking off Captain Dan's knee-cap and another piercing his left hand, after which he was made a prisoner, but while the Russians were taking him ashore, the crew put off with the boat and escaped with their vessel. It would appear from the following taken from a British Columbia paper, 'that the schooner Hamilton Lewis, Captain Alex. McLean, and the crew were seized and are also in the hands of the Russians. The captain of the schooner Theresa, which arrived in port to-day, September 2, reports that on Saturday, August 12, Captain McLean, of the Rich, was ashore with two boats, and just as they were returning ten Russian guards rushed on them over the sand hills and started shooting with rifles. They fired several rounds, and though many bullets hit the boats, only Captain McLean was struck. His knee-cap was smashed and his left hand pierced. Then both schooners made off to their position, 12 miles from Copper Island. The Russian man-of-war Alert, 13 guns, the next day steamed out after the three schooners at full speed. All of them put on every stitch of canvass, and for 12 miles there was a long chase, the Alert firing blank cartridges all the time. Then the wind fell off, and she came up to within a mile of the Lewis, and fired a ball which smashed the bowsprit in halves and brought her to. The Theresa then saw two boats pull off from the Alert and board the Lewis, which 10 minutes afterwards was taken in tow and rapidly disappeared.' It would appear from the above that Captain McLean, his vessel, crew, and catch of seals are in the hands of the Russians, as well as the wounded man, Captain Dan McLean, whose vessel and crew escaped. The position of the McLean boys is a most unfortunate one and there appears to be no remedy for it, as they were fishing inside of the Russian three-mile limit."

I should like to ask the Government, in view of the circumstances, if it would not be possible to make enquiries with a view of ascertaining whether the report that these men were fishing within the three-mile limit is correct or not; and if, on investigating the matter, any relief can be given to these people? They are people of my own county, and I understand several of the crew are from my county also. It is a matter of very great alarm to their friends, and I beg to ask the immediate attention of the Government to their case.

Mr. TUPPER. I may be permitted to say in answer to the hon. gentleman that the subject in some respects concerns the department over which I preside, and that the newspaper report to which he has referred I have seen. Our officers have been very active in all matters connected with the sealing fisheries, and I need hardly say that the Government will take proper steps in the matter, and will do whatever is possible to be done in the interests of the Canadians who were seized.

THE OTTAWA STRIKE.

Mr. LAURIER. It was stated in the press of last evening and this morning that the militia had been called out in connection with the strike going on in a part of this city. Can the Minister of Militia give information to the House in this matter?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I can tell the hon. gentleman that what was announced in the press last night is correct, and this morning the militia force was called out under the statute. The Government have no possible responsibility in the matter. The militia were called out under the statute, by which it is provided that by the advice of three magistrates the force can be at any time called out to aid the civil power. Hull is practically quiet so far, and there is no trouble as far as I have been able to ascertain.

Mr. EDGAR. What force was considered necessary to send out?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Four companies have been called out, and, as I already explained to the hon. gentleman, the discretion of the Government was not brought into play at all. It was at the request of three magistrates that the force was called out.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In what position do the force and the rioters or persons whom they were called out to quell, stand? Has the trouble been allayed, or has the hon. gentleman any official knowledge of the condition in which these matters are?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. All I can tell the hon. gentleman is simply what I have been able to ascertain just as he might himself. It is outside my jurisdiction as Minister of Militia, but as I took an interest in what was going on I merely ascertained that everything was quiet. The hon. gentleman on referring to the statute will see that the Minister of Militia has absolutely no responsibility, but that the responsibility rests with those magistrates who called out the force.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are these magistrates from the City of Ottawa or from Hull, or from both cities?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. They are from Hull.

THE SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. LAURIER. The Minister of Finance promised the Supplementary Estimates for yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. If possible.

Mr. LAURIER. Will it be possible to-day?

Mr. FOSTER. I hope so. I have a very strong hope this time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have had occasion in former days to have these Estimates printed in the ordinary way, and I must say that I have never had any trouble in getting them put through in three or four hours. It does appear to me that the Printing Bureau is falling very far short of the expectations, or that my hon. friend's estimates are preternaturally long, which, I presume, is not the case. If the printers are the cause of the delay, they ought really to be stirred up, and the proceedings of the House ought not to be delayed. I am quite certain that in any average printing office a few hundred copies of such a work as the Estimates, could easily be done in a very few hours.

Mr. FOSTER. I must exonerate the Printing Bureau. The last and final item was sent down to the printing office only about fifteen minutes ago, and all despatch will be used to have them here by six o'clock.

Mr. LAURIER. Is that positively the last item?

Mr. FOSTER. Possibly that is the last, and whether they are preternaturally long or not will be seen when they are on the Table.

Mr. McMULLEN. What was that important item?

Mr. FOSTER. It was not Cobourg Harbour.

THE DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved third reading of Bill (No. 146) to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. BARRON. Before this Bill be read the third time I would ask the House to adopt an amendment which I propose to make, and for which purpose I would ask the Bill to be referred back to Committee. If the Committee last night had adopted proposals made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to the effect that the returning officers ought to give security in order to ensure the appointment of really good men standing high in the community, then, perhaps, there might have been no necessity for my proposal. We have seen in the past such extraordinary conduct on the part of returning officers, that I feel the time has arrived when something must be done to secure more efficiency on their part. We know the history of hon. gentlemen opposite, so far as legislation is concerned, has been to take into their hands the appointment of returning officers on the eve of general elections. We know that when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) came into power, in pursuance of the promise he had previously made, he inaugurated an entirely different system so far as returning officers are concerned. He required that the returning officers should be men of position, and he provided by law that the returning officers should be sheriffs and registrars, men standing high in the community, officials who would have some regard for themselves, and for the acts of the deputies for which they were responsible. We find during the regime of Mr. Mackenzie that no trouble ever occurred, and it was never for one moment suggested that any improper act took place so far as returning officers were concerned; but, immediately after the Mackenzie Government were defeated, the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite repealed that law, and took upon themselves to appoint returning officers, and I say, partizan returning officers. Now, if they desired to avoid the excuse they set up for that course, they might have appointed County Court judges to this office, who are officials appointed by the Government. It was said by the late Premier that the reason he had to repeal the law passed by the Mackenzie Government was, because the registrars and sheriffs were all officials of the Ontario Government, which Government was at that time opposed to the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite. If that was so good a reason, surely there are officials within the different ridings appointed by gentlemen on the other side of the House who could have discharged the duties of returning officer, and as everyone knows officials have some reputation at stake, and they have more regard for what is right, and are more careful not to do that which is wrong. The Government, however, appointed men without any standing as a rule—of course there are exceptions—and without a particle of qualification, so far as property was concerned. What are the results? Time after time we found fraud has been committed, here, there, and everywhere by these returning officers with a view of assisting the candidates of the party opposite. When was there ever a greater fraud perpetrated than in the case of the Queen's County, New Brunswick, election? Because, as I understand, the agent of the returning officer practically handed the money with his left hand instead of the right, because in fact the money was not handed by the officially appointed agent, therefore the returning officer returned to the House a gentleman who had a minority of seventy, and the hon. gentleman who now sits in this House only gets light after a long period of four or five years, as to his right to be here as the representative of the people. Then we have the case of West Northumberland. The hon. member for that constituency (Mr. Hargraft) knows all about it, and perhaps it would be as well for me not to enter into it. But to show you the effect of the criminal carelessness and negligence of the returning officer, I may state that but for the honesty and uprightness of the County Court judge, Mr. Benson, of Cobourg, that hon. gentleman would have been counted out, and the will of the people would have been defeated. I have been told that so enraged were the people at the outrage perpetrated, no doubt with the connivance of the returning officer, that there was danger of bloodshed had the elected candidate been unseated. While the ballot boxes are in the possession of the returning officer, he leaves them everywhere and anywhere, so that they can easily be tampered with; then he closes his eyes and turns his back, so that ballots can be abstracted and others put in their places. In West Northumberland the official declaration was made on the 9th of March, when the hon. member sits in this House for that constituency was declared elected. Then a recount was asked for and held. It was found that in polling division No. 1 of Cobourg six ballots were marked for the hon. gentleman, but they were not initialled, and the counsel for the defeated candidate asked that these ballots be rejected, though the scrutineer and the deputy returning officer were both positive that every ballot placed in the ballot box had been initialled. At polling division No. 2, nineteen ballots were similarly found without initials, of which seven were marked for the hon. member who now sits in this House. At polling division No. 10 of Hamilton, eight ballots were found for the hon. member without initials, although the deputy returning officer and the agents all swore that when the ballots were placed in the box they were properly initialled; and so on all along the line. The counsel for the defeated candidate appealed to the judge, saying: You must see for yourself that these ballots are not the ballots that were placed in the box at the time the election took place. The learned judge said that he could not take judicial notice of that fact; it was perfectly clear that they were not the same ballots, but there were no evidence of the fact, and therefore he very properly refused to reject these ballots. Then, take the case of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). He told us the other night of the iniquitous frauds that were perpetrated upon him—why? Because when a recount is ordered the returning officer carelessly leaves the ballot boxes anywhere, and, as I said before, shuts his eyes and turns his back, and thus practically invites people to come and commit frauds whereby hon. gentlemen in some cases are nearly defeated and altogether defeated in others. We have also the cases of Nicolet and Montmagny. In all such cases frauds have been perpetrated, I will not say actually by the returning officer, but under circumstances of criminal carelessness and negligence on the part of the returning officer. Now, I propose to ask this House to throw upon the returning officer the onus of showing that while the boxes are in his legal possession, he must account for them. In other words, if any tampering with the boxes takes place while they are in his legal possession, the onus is thrown upon him to prove that he is perfectly innocent. Unless we have some such law as this, we shall never have an efficient protection against such frauds as those which have taken place. I know by my own observation that the ballot boxes lay on the counter of the returning officer, and could easily have been got at, and the expressed will of the people defeated; but in that case the returning officer was honest and upright. I do not say that all the returning officers are dishonest; far from it. I had reason to express my perfect satisfaction with the returning officer who presided at my recent election. But the Government opposite seem willing to appoint men as returning officers who are without standing or position, and who do not care what happens so long as their party is returned to power; and so long as hon. gentlemen opposite appoint men of that calibre, we must have some more effective law than we have at the present time. Therefore, I desire to move:

That the said Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to a Committee of the Whole House to insert therein as an amendment to chapter 8, Revised Statutes of Canada, after the word "fine" in the last line of the 100th section, the following:—"And whensoever it shall be proved before a court of competent jurisdiction, that the ballot box or its contents has or have been tampered with during the time when such ballot box or its contents was or were in the legal possession of the returning officer, election clerk or deputy returning officer, then such returning officer, election clerk or deputy returning officer shall be liable to the fines or penalties, or both, provided by law for offences under this section, unless such returning officer, election clerk or deputy returning officer, as the case may be, proves to the satisfaction of such court that the offence with which he is charged was committed without his knowledge or consent, assistance or connivance."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Bill has been in Committee twice, and the hon. gentleman, therefore, had two opportunities of bringing to the notice of the Committee the amendment he now proposes.

Mr. BARRON. The hon. gentleman is mistaken if he thinks I did not. I not only brought it to the attention of the Committee, but sent a draft of it to the hon. gentleman himself.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I never heard of the proposal before. Grievances with respect to returning officers were discussed repeatedly, and, if the hon. gentleman sent me such a suggestion, I certainly did not receive it. If he mentioned it in Committee, I have forgotten it. Either he is mistaken on that point, or I am; but that, however, is not very material. The hon. gentleman did not move his clause or take the opinion of the Committee upon it, and I think the Bill ought not to be sent back for that purpose now. I will not enter upon a discussion as to the instances which the hon. gentleman has given of complaints against returning officers. Whenever an election takes place, if any irregularity occurs at all, the responsibility is thrown on the returning officer who has the conduct of the proceedings. The hon. gentleman has suggested that certain judicial functionaries should be substituted for these; but we all know that, when the judges were entrusted with duties which appeared to hon. gentlemen opposite to be of a political nature, the revision of the voters' list, we had as emphatic and as strong an attack in the session of 1886 on the way in which these judicial officers did their quasi judicial duties as we have had at any time with regard to returning officers. I think it would not be wise to adopt the amendment for another reason. When the question of returning officers was under discussion, the proposition was made from the other side that permanent returning officers should be appointed, and I promised to consider that in connection with other amendments to the Election Act, which no doubt will be brought to the notice of the House before very long again. We are opposed to accepting as returning officers for elections to this Parliament any permanent officers who are under the control of another Government. Whether that Government is opposed to us politically or not, is not to the point. Its interests may be totally different from those of this Government and Parliament. It may be, and it is very likely to be, that on questions not political in the sense of being party politics, a Provincial Government may from time to time have a policy adverse to that which prevails in this Parliament; and we are opposed to giving the control of elections, in so far as it is possible for returning officers to control them, to officers who, not only are appointed by Provincial Governments, but are dependent on them for their offices. As regards many of these officers in various parts of Canada, who, hon. gentlemen opposite have suggested, should be entrusted with the duties of returning officer, they are liable to be dismissed at a moment's notice by the Provincial Governments; and I think it would be unacceptable to the deliberate judgment of any gentleman in this House, that persons whose tenure of office is of that description should be chosen as our officers in the performance of duties in connection with this Parliament. I am not averse to the principle of having returning officers permanent, however, and the question to be considered is whether we can select a class of officers with whose other duties this work might not be inconsistent, and who at the same time possess sufficient independence as to tenure of office to make them perfectly free and fearless as regards the discharge of their duties. If we can suggest to the House a class of officers of that description, the suggestion to have them permanent officers would be very acceptable. We must consider the present position of the returning officer as regards emoluments, and the mode of his appointment, in considering the value of the amendment proposed. The emoluments are very trifling indeed, for active, responsible work extending over there weeks, or a month, or even longer, involving the appointment of a large number of deputies, involving a very considerable activity and work during that four or five weeks, and the utmost allowance we allow a returning officer is $60, for which he has to incur, not only the labours of the office, but likewise very considerable responsibility, civil and criminal. Now, what the hon. gentleman proposes is that when we find anything in the procedure which is improper, the burden of proof is to be thrown upon the returning officer to prove that he is innocent. In other words, these ill-paid and hard-worked men are to be presumed to be criminals if anything improper has transpired in connection with the boxes under their charge, in a legal sense. All I have to say about this is that I think this matter ought to be left to the ordinary rule of law which exists on this subject; of that rule of law, I suppose, there can be no doubt. That rule is, if it has been proved that a criminal practice has been committed with regard to the ballots which have been in the actual custody of the officer himself, there is a presumption created which calls upon him to prove his innocence. But in so far as the amendment would alter that rule of proof, and throw upon the officer the entire burden of proof, involved in the mere presumption arising from the fact of his having had legal possession and control of the boxes, and these irregularities having been committed, I think the rule of evidence ought not to be changed. I understand, from hearing the amendment read, that its effect is that the mere fact of the ballots having been tampered with in the first instance would be sufficient to throw the presumption of criminality upon the officer himself. More than that ought to be done. It ought to be proved that the officer had control of the boxes, that they were in his actual custody and keeping, and that, during that time, reasonable care would have prevented the commission of any such offence. When that has been proved, the presumption of guilt is established by the present rule of evidence, and there is no necessity for such a provision with regard to that state of facts. If less than that is proved, it is cruel and unjust that the burden of proof of innocence should be thrown upon the officer.

Mr. LAURIER. If this amendment be of a nature to commend itself to the sense of the House, I hope the Minister will not press the objection with which he has met it, that it came rather late and should have been moved in Committee. I understand, in any case, that the amendment was suggested to the Minister of Justice and to the Committee. I am sorry to see that the Minister has not yet thought it wise to have the officer who now administers the law in the province, the sheriff or registrar, appointed returning officer. The objection that they are dependent upon another Government seems to me hardly a good one.

When we look at the operation of the American system, when we know that all the elections of the courts are under the control, not of Congress itself, not of the Federal Government, but under the control of the State Governments, it seems to me that offers a very cogent answer to the objection now raised by the hon. gentleman. I would also call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that, during the last two or three sessions of Congress, one of the principal discussions which took place, not only in the House of Representatives but in the Senate as well, was the Force Bill, a Bill which was calculated to remove the control of elections from the State Governments and place it in the hands of the Federal Government. After long discussion, Congress came to the conclusion that the system now prevailing would guarantee more freedom of action than if the authority were placed under the control of the Federal Government. It seems to me, therefore, that the objection the hon. gentleman now raises cannot be supported by any show of authority, and that the argument that, if we were to appoint such officials as the sheriffs, the clerks, or the registrars, we would be dependent on the Local Government, is not a valid one. Those officers have a character and a station in the community, and therefore they offer more guarantee of doing justice than a man who is selected for the occasion. The hon. gentleman says he is considering the propriety of making permanent officers. This proposal certainly has its value, and, if permanent officers were chosen in such a way as to give some guarantee of impartiality between party and party, it would go very far to cure the evils of the present system. This amendment may appear on its face a rather harsh one. It alleges that the ballot boxes have been tampered with. Then there will be a primâ facie presumption of guilt against the party in whose custody the ballot boxes were at the time they were tampered with. That may be a harsh disposition, but it is one which is warranted by the evidence we have to-day. The hon. gentleman knows, and the House knows, that the cases of tampering with the ballot boxes are becoming more numerous with each election. There was more of that during the last election than ever before. There was tampering with the ballot boxes in the County of Grey, in the County of Northumberland, in the County of Nicolet, and in North Middlesex, and in every case the returning officer has not been able satisfactorily to account for his custody of these boxes. In every case the returning officer has been guilty of negligence, to say the least. He leaves the boxes within easy reach of evil-doers, as in the County of Montmagny, and the evil-doers tampered with the ballot boxes. If you say that the returning officer who accepts the duty of his office shall be liable to a penalty if he does not properly perform them, he would be compelled to exercise great caution, and then he could rebut the presumption against him by showing that he has exercised all prudence and has taken all proper precautions, and then his liability will cease. But if he is not able to show that he has acted with that due caution with which he should have acted, it is not unfair to him to hold him guilty.

Mr. HARGRAFT. My hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Barron), in the course of his remarks, referred to the attempt which was made, just after the last election in West Northumberland, to steal my seat, and I cannot do better than explain it to the House, so far as at present known, especially as I claim that it was owing to the carelessness of the returning officer that this attempt was made, and I think the returning officer should be made responsible for the safe-keeping of the ballots while in his possession. On the Monday following the day of the election the ballot boxes were carted to the court house, where the seals were broken and I was declared elected. Since then I have been told that five of the envelopes containing the ballots were open, and the clerk advised the returning officer to seal them up. However that may be, they were all sealed when they came before the judge at the recount. After the declaration the ballot boxes were carted back to the returning officer's office, where they were left all night, and the next morning, when I happened to go in there, I found a son of the returning officer taking the contents out of the boxes, and when I asked him what he was doing he said he was separating the envelopes containing the ballots, from the others, and putting them in the safe for safe-keeping. This young gentleman has since left the country. He went quietly, without even telling his brother he was going. A day or so after this, a recount was asked for and granted, and almost as soon as we attempted to examine the ballots we found they had been tampered with. In the first lot examined, No. 1 of the town of Cobourg, we found there were nine ballots not initialled. The difference between these ballots and the others was very distinct. They were printed on different paper, and the ink was a good deal heavier, and whoever had put them there had not taken the pains to fold them up. They were as free from creases as if they had just come from the press. They could not have been put into the boxes without being folded, and you know that if you once fold a paper you cannot get the creases out. The returning officer called me to one side on the morning of the recount, and said there was no doubt that these ballots had never been in the boxes. There were 48 of these ballots which were not initialled and were on different paper, and every one of these bogus ballots was marked for me. My majority was 36. In polling place No. 2, of the town of Cobourg, there were 19 of these ballots. Immediately after the recount I saw the deputy returning officer of that polling place, and he told me he would swear on any amount of bibles—that is the expression he used—that there had not been one ballot put in that was not initialled. However, about half an hour afterwards, when I sent to get an affidavit to that effect, he said he could not sign one—in fact as soon as he saw the paper he said: "Oh, you need not come here, I am not going to sign any papers for you." Now, in another polling place in the township of Hamilton, a particular friend of mine happened to be deputy returning officer, and he has since told me that he was so particular that before he sealed up the ballot box he placed the ballots all face downwards on the table, and picked them up one at a time, to be sure they were all initialled, and yet we found in that envelope eight bogus ballots. I think the Minister of Justice must admit that we should be protected from the carelessness of these partisan returning officers.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am afraid the provisions of this amendment would not prevent the operations which the hon. gentleman has mentioned. I presume the returning officer in that case would be in a position to say that these acts were not committed with his knowledge or connivance. If, on the other hand, an officer can be supposed to connive at such a thing, I am afraid he would not have scruple to avail himself of the provisions of this amendment.

Mr. LAURIER. He would be more careful.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think the experience of those who have had anything to do with carrying on elections under the present system, has not been satisfactory, and it is evident why it must be so. The original intention of the Act, as explained in this House, and as I understand it to be, was that the Government only proposed to resort to the appointment of returning officers in cases where it was quite evident, either that the official previously acting was incompetent, or that there was a strong reason to suppose that he would not do justice in the premises; and considering the fact that all these officials were appointed by a Government decidedly hostile to the party in power in this House, there was some reason for coming to that conclusion. Now, I am not at all prepared to say that we ought to go back to the former system. There are many circumstances in which it would be decidedly unfair to make it a rule to appoint the officials of the present Administration in Ontario as returning officers for the Dominion elections. Altogether apart from the general principle very properly laid down by the Minister of Justice, I think that elections to this House ought to be conducted by persons over whom the Government of this Dominion has control. But the present system, I think, is objectionable in many ways. Now, the system works in this way: The candidate of the party in power, whoever he may be, as a matter of course selects a gentleman to act as returning officer; that gentleman, of course, selects friends of his own, or decided friends of his party, to act as deputies. Well, no matter how creditable in other respects that appointment may be, yet if that official so appointed commits any blunder, either through carelessness or through ignorance—and it must be remembered that the duties of a returning officer are by no means simple, by no means easily carried out, it is very easy for the returning officer to make a mistake, it is very easy for him to allow partisan zeal to blind his judgment. But whatever be the cause of any shortcoming on his part in the discharge of those duties, the person who has recommended him to a very great extent becomes responsible for those shortcomings, and consequently the candidate is placed in a very invidious and very unpleasant position. If that returning officer has disputes with his deputies, as in very many cases he has, or if questions arise as to the payment of these deputies, as in many cases they do arise, the sitting member, the man who has been elected, is at once appealed to for his influence and support in dealing with these matters, and altogether, judging from my own experience, the position in which a member is placed under those circumstances, is in all respects a very unsatisfactory one. There is no reason why he should be at all held liable or made responsible for the doings of the returning officer; on the contrary, it is very desirable that he should not be so held responsible, while under the present system it is impossible but that he must be so connected and held responsible. Under these circumstances, I hope the Government will be able to find some scheme for having permanent returning officers. Another great advantage would be that, as I have already said, the duties of returning officer being very onerous, very complex, and requiring experience, the man who has once discharged those duties and understands that he will be called upon to discharge them on future occasions, will be much more likely to make himself thoroughly conversant with his duties, and having discharged them once he will be much more likely to discharge them a second time with greater efficiency. There are many reasons why it is desirable that permanent returning officers should be appointed, and that candidates for whichever party may be in power, should be free from responsibility and from the invidious position in which the present system places them, of being called upon to recommend persons for that position.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not desire to make any reference to the legal effect of the amendment of the member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron), but I think that the charges preferred against a large number of efficient officers throughout the Dominion, are altogether unfair. He has said that the Government appoints men without property qualification, without position, and without standing. Now, I feel sure that the hon. gentleman does not even believe his own statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is unparliamentary to say that an hon. member does not believe the statement he has made.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not intend to be unparliamentary. I, therefore, take it back, and say that the charge cannot be laid to the great majority of the men who are appointed. I think there is really no reason for any hon. gentleman in this House to believe that the Government would make such appointments. These appointments are made, I believe, generally, on the recommendation of persons who are candidates in the interest of the Government for the time being, and I feel sure that these men would not be likely, in their own interest, to suggest the name of any man as returning officer who would not do credit to himself and to the party to which he belonged. I have had something to do with the naming of returning officers, and that has been the course I have pursued, and to show how effectual and how well approved my recommendations have been, I need only say that at the close of the last general election, at the close of the meeting for the declaration, there was a motion made by the financial agent of my opponent, tendering a vote of thanks to the returning officer for the impartial and efficient manner in which he had discharged his duties. I feel, therefore, I cannot sit in this House and hear the charges made that have been made by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron), of inefficiency and inability, without refuting them. Sheriffs and registrars in the Province of Ontario are usually appointed for political services, and as the Liberal party has been in power in that province for about 18 years, the great majority of these offices are filled by men belonging to that party. I feel that we would not be justified in throwing the positions of returning officers into the hands of political opponents, and I hold it would be wrong to do so. Take my own county, for instance, where the registrar is a license commissioner. In Ontario the license commissioners are the most active agents of the Liberal party, not only in Dominion but in Provincial elections, and by naming the registrar as returning officer the Government would be naming a most active political agent of hon. gentlemen opposite. I feel, therefore, a wrong would be done, and we should be careful in a case of this kind to allow the Government to make choice of a man fitted in every respect to perform the duties. I do not make charges against those men further than to say that they are usually appointed for political services, and for that reason we cannot reasonably expect to get from them the calm judgment and consideration which would be given by other men who have not received appointments for such services. At the elections of 1887, the Government in their magnanimity did appoint the registrar of my county as returning officer, and I do not wish to say one harsh word against that gentleman, because he no longer is registrar, but I will say this: We know in Ontario the election law is quite different, a man cannot vote at a provincial election unless he is a resident of the county; yet, in some mysterious way, blank forms of oath under the election law of Ontario were placed in the ballot boxes and distributed to the deputy returning officers, and some of the deputy returning officers used them against men who came up to vote for me, no doubt to prevent them from voting. In one instance, a gentleman from Toronto, a lawyer knowing the law, had this oath handed to him and he was asked to take it. He took the oath, saying that the deputy returning officer had no right to submit it, that it was no perjury for him to take it, and he did so rather than be deprived of his franchise. A young man, an income voter, was prevented from voting. In that manner the position was used against me, and this House can readily understand that, when I was defeated by only 9 votes, my defeat could very easily be accomplished in that manner when there were 32 polling places in the county. I feel it would not be fair at the present time to concede the position of returning officer to sheriffs and registrars throughout the country.

Mr. SCRIVER. I desire to say a few words as illustrative of my own experience of the inconvenience, not to say injustice, attending the present system of appointing returning officers. I may say that the registrar of the county which I have the honour to represent, has been registrar a great many years, and under the old system he acted as returning officer, acted with intelligence and acceptability. He was never a partisan, in fact I do not know he ever voted for either side, and he was in every sense eminently eligible for appointment as returning officer at the last election. But he was passed over and another gentleman was selected. I dare say a great many members of the House wondered at the time why the election for the County of Huntingdon did not take place at the same time as other elections in the Dominion. Well, it happened owing to the existence of the present system. The Secretary of State, I suppose, consulted some one in reference to the appointment of a returning officer for my county. I have the authority of this gentleman, in a statement made at a public meeting, for stating that he was so consulted. He was not even a resident of the county, but a professional gentleman residing in Montreal. He was consulted, and (perhaps naturally enough under the circumstances) he recommended a gentleman resident in the county, who, it appears, was ambitious to be candidate himself, and he was appointed, as I have his own authority for stating, without being consulted as to whether he was willing to accept the appointment. Indeed, I believe the receipt of the commission and other papers sent on such occasions was the first intimation that he was chosen as returning officer for the county. He declined to accept the appointment; he sent the papers back. I believe, to Ottawa immediately, acting honourably in every way. The Government, instead of acting promptly, as I think they should and might have done, allowed five days to elapse before appointing another gentleman. He took his own time in signifying his willingness to accept his appointment, so it became impossible to bring on the election for the County of Huntingdon at the same time as the other elections. The result of all this was to make this election a bye-election, and it brought to the Opposition candidate all the disagreeable consequences which generally exist in regard to bye-elections. It enabled a powerful Government to bring to bear a great many influences, legitimate, and probably some of them illegitimate, against the Opposition candidate which it would have been impossible for the Government to have brought to bear had the election in my county taken place at the same time as the other elections. It is true the circumstances had their consolation to myself. They brought me many expressions of sympathy from political friends, and in some instances I am glad to say from political opponents. They brought me and my people the distinguished honour of a visit from two prominent members of the Ministry and some other gentlemen, who attended the nomination and endeavoured with the eloquence they possessed to lead my constituents to believe that it would be to their interests to choose some other man than myself as their representative. I have an amusing recollection of some of the incidents of that important day, important to me in more senses than one, amusing, I say, because of the somewhat flowery oration of the Minister of Marine, his grandiloquent announcement that he was there as the representative of another and a better man, a gentleman who was then on his way to Washington to negotiate a reciprocity treaty. When I combine that recollection with the recollection of what attended the visit of that gentleman to Washington, I cannot feel otherwise than amused. The amusing part of the recollection extends a little further. The arrangement made for the speakers that day was that there were to be three on each side, and each of the three was to take 30 minutes. The hon. Minister of Marine, with that strange obliviousness of the flight of time which he sometimes exhibits on the floor of this House, trespassed on the rights of others.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I rise to a question of order. This is a question of the burden of proof.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is travelling out of the record.

Mr. SCRIVER. Perhaps I am wandering somewhat.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend is showing the consequences of the appointment.

Mr. SCRIVER. I have no doubt the Secretary of State will feel pleased at my reviving some of the recollections—some of them (not all of them)—which took place on that day.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I remember one especially, but it might be out of order to tell it now. I have a pleasant recollection of my hon. friend repudiating his leaders and his party on that day.

Mr. SCRIVER. Mr. Speaker, it is very easy for the Secretary of State to make such a charge as that, but he did not succeed in convincing my constituents that there was anything inconsistent in the position which I took at that time, and which I maintain to-day. As I am sensible that I am somewhat out of order, I will not trespass upon the indulgence of the House any further than to say that my distinguished friends departed that evening in their palace car, returning to their duties in other places——

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is wandering again.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Which car was it?

Mr. SCRIVER. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman: but it was a car well furnished and well provided with refreshments. That I am sure of. Although my hon. friends departed that evening, like the sheep in the nursery tale, they left their tails behind them. These distinguished members, and ex-members of Parliament, and Senators——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I will again try and draw the attention of the House to the fact, that upon a discussion of this kind it is desirable to keep as closely to the question as possible.

Mr. SCRIVER. I will say no more, Mr. Speaker, than that the election resulted, notwithstanding the unfair advantage taken of me in the way I have said, in a manner to afford me, not merely a personal triumph——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SCRIVER—but personal satisfaction; in that it showed that I represent a constituency——

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the hon. gentleman is not discussing the question before the House.

Mr. SCRIVER. I am about to close. I can inform the Minister of Justice that I will not speak more than a minute more. In that it showed that I represent a constituency——

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would be very glad indeed to allow the hon. gentleman all latitude, but this involves a reply, and we cannot afford time to continue the discussion.

Mr. SCRIVER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to finish my sentence.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SCRIVER. That I have the honor of representing a constituency, the majority of whom have intelligence enough to comprehend——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SCRIVER—that the statements made to them were inaccurate,——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SCRIVER—and independence enough to resist the illegitimate influences which were brought to bear upon them.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). After this pleasant little digression I may be permitted to direct the discussion somewhat towards its proper channel.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Ah.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Perhaps the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) thinks there was no digression?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Not a bit.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That may be his idea of order and procedure. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that if the Government is to be congratulated upon any one thing during the present session, it is upon the anxiety they have shown to amend the election law in any particular in which it is found to be faulty. At the commencement of the session several Bills were introduced by private members, and at the suggestion of the Government they were referred to a special committee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Order.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I am leading up to the question. That committee deliberated on several occasions and finally brought in their report. The matter has been discussed on more than one occasion, this among the number, and I think the discussion has upon every occasion resulted in good. I regret that the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) did not suggest some improvement in the present law, before he took his seat. He was rather opposed to the system of making provincial appointees the returning officers for Dominion elections. Well, if we are to take the testimony of my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) who has just spoken, and if we are to take other testimony which I think would be very easily found, it would be discovered that, simply because a man receives an appointment from a Provincial Government, he, therefore, does not forget that he is a political supporter of that Government. I do not think there is an hon. member in this House who believes that when a man receives an appointment—other than, perhaps, an appointment to the judiciary—that he to any great extent loses that active sympathy which has always characterized him in his support of the Government to whom he is under an obligation for that appointment. Now, Mr. Speaker, I might remind hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron), of something which he perhaps has forgotten. I understood him to say that we never heard of any election frauds, or of any misconduct on the part of the returning officer until the advent to power of the present party in 1878. I am sure that hon. gentlemen must have forgotten the very historical case which occurred in the County of Jacques Cartier, when, perhaps, election frauds of the most outrageous character that have ever been perpetrated in this country took place.

Mr. BARRON. Those were alleged frauds.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Just wait a moment and you will find they were proven as well as alleged. These frauds took place under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not for one moment intend to reflect upon the Government that made the appointment of that Mr. Valois, although be it remembered Mr. Valois held an official position which in the Province of Quebec is of a very much more important character than in the Province of Ontario: the position of a notary public. He was an official, and if not under his direct supervision, with his connivance at all events, almost under his very nose, there was perpetrated one of the most outrageous frauds that ever has been witnessed in this country in connection with any election. I do not remember just now what the result of the trial was that followed, but, if my memory serves me right, the returning officer and others were convicted and suffered terms of imprisonment.

Mr. LAURIER. Not the returning officer.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I may be mistaken in that. I do not think I am mistaken in my recollection of the fact that some one of the officials, or some one of the parties to that fraud, were punished.

Mr. LAURIER. There were parties punished, but not the returning officer.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I may remind hon. gentlemen of another fact. I notice that when the returns were brought down some three or four years ago in relation to that well-known election that took place in Queen's, N. B., in which Mr. Baird was returned to this House, that one of the objections raised in that case was, that some official was not appointed the returning officer, but that the returning officer, Mr. Dunn, was appointed by this Government, and that it was a part of the system which is being condemned and which it is alleged results in these frauds. Now, a reference to the return brought down to this House at that time will show that a sheriff of that county signed the nomination paper of Mr. Baird's opponent, so that you see it does not follow, if you were to change the system now in vogue, that you would very much alter the circumstances. You would find, Sir, that just the same irregularities would take place under partisan officials who are partisan appointees of Provincial Governments. When I remember that the leader of the Opposition, in looking back at the last election, can only mention three or four cases out of all the elections that took place in this country, I am disposed to think that the results of the last general election ought not to reflect discredit generally upon the system, however, much it may, in particular cases, have resulted in wrong, however much in particular cases returning officers may have lent themselves to the perpetration of crime or offences punishable by our laws. I do not for one moment pretend to condone any offence of that kind, but I do say that under any other system there is just as likely to happen what happened in three or four cases in the last election. I know that in my own county the sheriff and the registrar are active political opponents of mine. I find no fault with that. If either were appointed to the position of returning officer, I believe they would discharge the important duties of that office with just as much satisfaction as did the gentleman whom I have recommended to this Government in the last two or three elections. I make these remarks generally on behalf of the gentlemen who have been appointed by this Government during the last election. In all fairness, I do not believe that they should be spoken of as they have been spoken of by some hon. gentlemen opposite. Specify and particularize if you like, and punish as I think you should those who have been guilty of misconduct, but I believe that among the gentlemen who acted as returning officers during the last election, the large majority are honest men, and the result of the election shows that it was a pure election generally, so far as the action of the returning officers was concerned. I believe that the present law provides ample remedies for the punishment of any person guilty of any violation of the election law. If I thought otherwise, I am quite sure I should be in favour of amending the law in any way that would make it more effective in its operation. I do not believe, however, that any action of ours here will make that law any more stringent than it is now. The provisions of the law as it now stands seem to me to be amply sufficient, and it is well known that the legislation which has taken place within the last month is preliminary to a more thorough inspection and examination of the law with a view to a complete consolidation and change in another session.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not surprised at the speech made by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, because, if I remember rightly, he assisted in putting the present law on the Statute-book, and it is perfectly natural that he should defend it. The hon. gentleman says, that sheriffs and registrars are partisans, and that we have no assurance that we should have any more satisfactory results from elections held under these officers than we do under the law as it now stands, under returning officers appointed by the Government for the moment, who, when the election is over, sink back into their original positions—returning officers who appear like Arabs at a caravansary for the night, and when the day comes are gone. Now, Sir, I do not admit the contention of the hon. gentleman: and although he may satisfy himself that, theoretically, the law is quite as satisfactory now as it was when certain officials were designated, the experience of the country is altogether against his view. Ever since this law has been put upon the Statute-book, we have had returning officers acting illegally, and in an irregular and improper manner. Can the hon. gentleman point to instances where misconduct has been charged against sheriffs or registrars appointed as returning officers in the Province of Ontario? Has there been a single case in any local election that has been held since Confederation, in which charges have been made, or candidates have complained, against the conduct of returning officers, where these officials have been designated, such as have been made against returning officers arbitrarily chosen for this special purpose, with no official responsibility except that imposed upon them for the moment by that appointment? I do not know of any such. I call the hon. gentleman's attention also to this fact. In the election of 1874, although I am aware that at that time no law directed that these officials should be chosen, as a matter of fact they were chosen; and there was no charge against any returning officer of having returned the candidate of the minority, or that by any improper conduct on his part a candidate who ought not to be returned, was returned. In the election of 1872 there was a case in one of the Peterboroughs—I do not remember who held that election. In 1878, after the law was put on the Statute-book requiring sheriffs and registrars to be taken as returning officers, an election was held. The friends of hon. gentlemen opposite on that occasion had a majority returned to Parliament: the election was held under their political opponents: and if there had been any attempt to do wrong in any of the constituencies, you may be sure that it would have been dealt with: and yet there was no complaint. Now, that has not been the condition of things since there has been a change in the law. The hon. gentleman has referred to the case of the County of Queen's, N.B., in which a candidate who represented the minority was returned to this House. What was the excuse for the conduct of the returning officer on that occasion? He said that the deposit was made by the candidate and not by his agent, and was, therefore, an improper deposit. An election was held, deputy returning officers were appointed, polls were opened and votes recorded, and my hon. friend who now sits for Queen's had a majority of about 70 votes. Did the returning officer return him as elected? Not at all. He said he had no right to grant a poll. He reviewed his own conduct, and pronounced judgment against himself. He said: As there has been no poll legally held, as everything has been null and void since the day of nomination, as there has been only one candidate legally nominated, I will return Mr. Baird as elected; and Mr. Baird had the effrontery to take a seat in this House. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that under any sheriff or registrar any such conduct ever occurred? There is a vast difference between these officials and the existing class of returning officers. A sheriff or a registrar, who is a permanent official, has some amenability to public opinion, and some sense of responsibility to the law; the Government whose officer he is could not well maintain him in his position if it were clearly proved that he had disobeyed the law and committed a gross offence. The man who holds no official position in the country, who may not have property to the extent of a dollar, who probably owes his position to the nomination of one of the candidates, does not stand in the same position, is not amenable to public opinion in the same way, and an adverse judgment has no terrors for him; he is not afraid to suffer any injury or damage. Further than that, there is a great advantage in having officers who have had training and experience in elections. A sheriff of a county has probably held that position for a long series of years. For a quarter of a century he has had the writs placed in his hands for the province and also for holding Dominion elections. He is perfectly familiar with the law, he makes no mistake, and he makes proper allowance for the want of information and knowledge on the part of his deputy returning officers. He does not rule out the votes given by electors unfairly, as many an ignorant and inexperienced returning officer does, and so you are protected against the mistakes arising from inexperience and ignorance and those that arise from a sense of irresponsibility, which certainly is liable to accompany the acts of a man who has no official position and nothing to lose by his misconduct. But the hon. gentleman says that a sheriff may be a partisan and that a registrar may be a partisan. That is perfectly true. Nobody expects that any party whom you may appoint will be absolutely neutral and colourless politically. It is not the fact that he has his party preferences which unfits him for holding an election, but it is the fact that he has no experience and no sense of responsibility. So you have charges of misconduct again and again made against persons who are unofficial, apart from their appointment as returning officers, that you do not find in the case of sheriffs or registrars. Let the hon. gentleman take the election held in 1882 for Ontario. I think it was mentioned in this House before by the Hon. Mr. Blake, when he was a member, that there was not a single charge and not a single election contest pending in the Province of Ontario owing to any misconduct or irregularity or illegal act on the part of a returning officer, where he was a sheriff or a registrar, but in every case complaints arose where he was an unofficial personage. Take the County of Bothwell, where we have had over and over again elections held by the registrar of the County of Kent, we never had any complaint with regard to the conduct of the returning officer in those elections, either from the candidate on the one side or the other; but when in 1882 the election was held by a party named who had no official position, what was the result? Why, two of the polling divisions were thrown aside because they gave me a majority, and the candidate who polled the minority of votes was returned, thus rendering a legal contest necessary in order that I might obtain the seat to which the majority of the electors had appointed me. And I could name other constituencies where exactly the same result followed. And I say this, that unless you have an official or some guarantee of property or otherwise, you are not likely to have freedom from those mistakes and from all the vexation, worry and expense incident to them under such a provision of law as that which now exists. I admit that if officials, such as the county judge, sheriff and warden, were to meet and appoint a returning officer for an electoral division, and such officer was required either to give security or to possess a certain amount of real estate, that would be an immense improvement, if you are not willing to take the provincial officials; but no matter what the system, the appointments ought to be independent of the Government for the time being, whether the Government be composed of hon. gentlemen who are of our political way of thinking or of that of hon. gentlemen opposite. At all events, experience has shown in every province of the Dominion that the system which now exists, administered by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, is one which is in the highest degree unsatisfactory. The Government make the appointments, but do they know the men they appoint? Do they know their character or standing or anything with regard to them. Not at all. I take my own county and the election held in February last. Who was returning officer then? Why, a gentleman who had been caretaker of the central committee rooms of the Conservative candidate in 1887, who had not been paid for his services and was dissatisfied, and who was appointed by the Government to the office merely to compensate him for services he had rendered before and for which he had not been paid. That man had not a dollar; he was not worth anything; he would not have taken the position and accepted compensation for the services of 1887, if he had been a man of property and standing. I do not complain of any irregularity of action, but I say that after the election was over he did not return me as the law required. He kept back the writ and made no return for a fortnight after the law required him to make it. The law provides redress; it makes him amenable. But what is the good of a judgment against a man who has not a copper. And there are, I dare say, a score of other cases. I do not say that the Government knew anything about the standing or position of this man, but I say they are at the mercy of their candidate, whoever he may be, in every constituency; and great dissatisfaction will arise and great wrong will be done in many cases, so long as the law remains as it is. It is in the nature of things impossible that in a country extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the Administration can know the character or the standing or anything of the man recommended for appointments of this sort, and I say some other method of appointment is required because these appointments are all in the interests of hon. gentlemen opposite. They are not appointments which ought to be in the interests of hon. gentlemen on either side. The holding of an election is a matter in the public interest. It is the exercise of supreme authority in the state by the parties in whom, in the last resort, it is vested, and the regulation of the appointment of returning officers ought to be such as to satisfy their wishes, and promote their interests and maintain their rights, and this cannot be done so long as the law remains what it is. We have not pressed for amendment because we felt assured the whole subject would be taken up and dealt with at another session of Parliament. I think there is great force in the observation which my hon. friend has made, as long as you retain the present system, as long as you have this unusual method of appointment, while nominally the appointment is with the Crown practically it is with the Government candidate in every constituency no matter who he may be. He may be a worthy or a worthless man; he may be an eminently fair man, competent to exercise this trust, or may be utterly unfit to have such a great trust placed in his hands; and once you continue that system, unusual means should be taken to guard the public interest; and if my hon. friend's amendment goes a long way, it is because there is an extreme condition of things arising out of the law as it is, which ought to be met by extreme remedies.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If the remarks which have been just made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat had been made by the hon. mover of the amendment, we might have avoided all this discussion, a part of which has gone somewhat out of the record. The Government have admitted that there must be something done, and expressed their intention to try and render the position of returning officer less liable of being suspected to be at the mercy of party feeling and party exigencies. In doing this, in making them responsible either by asking them to give security or appointing them as permanent officers, or by any other means which may be devised, the Government has promised this Parliament they will consider between this and the next session. So we all agree on one thing, that these officers should have their responsibility made more definite, although the instances of defects or of wrong-doing are certainly very few if we judge from the discussion which we have had to-day. We have heard one case which has been brought before the House with great force, but that was the case of a provincial officer, a registrar. My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) brought that before the House in the beginning of the session, and the returning officer of whom he complained was the registrar. I am told that, if the Premier of Quebec had not been away in Europe being decorated, and if his friends in Quebec had not been working for profits as he was working for honours, that official would not have been the registrar at this moment. My hon. friends opposite should know that, during the last elections, three officials of the Local Government refused to be appointed returning officers, and one of them stated that, if they did their duty and did not appoint every deputy returning officer and every clerk who would be imposed upon them by the party managers of Quebec clique, they would be dismissed. We were told that if the returning officers did not suit the wishes of the Government of Quebec, they would either be dismissed or would have a joint registrar or a joint sheriff appointed, which happened before in two cases. I agree with my hon. friends on the other side that the returning officers should be men above suspicion in every way. My hon. friend has just quoted the case of Mr. Baird, and said that if the returning officer had been a public officer, we would not have seen the return of a man simply because the deposit of his opponent had been made by the candidate himself instead of by his agent. This was only a legal interpretation. I do not say it was correct. I do not think I voted on that question. But it was a question of law, it was a question of interpreting a statute, and could it not have been interpreted by a registrar, or a sheriff, or an official of the Government as it was by the returning officer in that electoral division? A precedent has been quoted. We know that, in 1878, when Mr. Valois was appointed returning officer in Jacques Cartier, there were two registrars for that district, Mr. Filiatreault and Mr. Sicotte. The Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) appointed one of the two registrars but left the other out. Why did they not appoint the two? Mr. Filiatreault was appointed for the City of Montreal, but Mr. Sicotte was left out, and why? Probably because he was not of their own political creed. I do not blame them. I do not say they were right or wrong, but this rule applies on both sides, and fault cannot be found and the principle cannot be condemned when we have such precedents as that. I had the unpleasant duty of occupying the position of Crown prosecutor when the deputy returning officer, Mr. Forget, a young lawyer, and Mr. Christin, the agent of the Liberal candidate, performed a certain operation in regard to ballot boxes, though I am ready to declare, without the knowledge of the member elected, the Hon. Mr. Laflamme. These were the parties who were found guilty. In regard to my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), it was my unpleasant duty—and it was unpleasant to me for more than one reason, though not for the one which the hon. gentleman said—to go to his county. The hon.

gentleman said I appointed the returning officer. I recommended a good and respectable man, and he was appointed. After his name had been given to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, I had nothing more to do with it. That returning officer at a late hour stated that he would become a candidate.

Mr. SCRIVER. Mr. Sanders received his papers one day and returned them the next day. I have his word for that.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend is not properly informed on that subject. This case came before me early in the session, and it was not the fault of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, or the fault of the Government.

Mr. LAURIER. It was the fault of the system

Mr. CHAPLEAU. But any public officer might have said the same thing, that he would be a candidate. The registrar or the sheriff might be a candidate. My hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) is an old friend of twenty years, and in this House and elsewhere we have always been friends. It was very unpleasant for me to have to go to his county. My hon. friend has recounted amusing scenes in the election. I must say that the result was not amusing to us, but the election was not at all amusing to him either. I know my hon. friend made a promise to his electors: he promised to vote against unlimited reciprocity and discrimination against England; but from the manner he has spoken and voted since he returned to this House, I do not think he has done his best to redeem his pledges made on the day when danger was near him. We have seen him giving a vote in this House, in a sense, exactly contrary to the promise which he made to his electors. Perhaps I am out of order in saying so, or in referring to that election, but I must say that I was surprised at the vote he has given in this House. However, coming back to the question in debate, I think the system can be amended, and as an amendment has been promised, I think the hon. gentleman from North Victoria need not press his proposition upon the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As to whether my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) has or has not redeemed his pledges to the electors, I think he is the best judge, and those who know my friend's upright and consistent conduct for many long years in this House, will not hesitate to believe with me that whatever my hon. friend has stated to his electors, that my hon. friend will be found to have redeemed in this House. However, I am not anxious to enter into the question of the election in Huntingdon. That, as the hon Secretary of State has correctly stated, is a little out of order on the present occasion. But I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Justice in particular to the fact that he admits himself, with very ample reason, that the present mode of appointing returning officers is eminently an unsatisfactory one. I want to call the attention of the House, also, to the arguments that have been adduced by some hon. gentlemen opposite, notably, I think, by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood). His argument is this: The old system under which this matter was entrusted to permanent officials, sheriffs, registrars and the like, is objectionable. Why? Because those officials may possibly be partisans: therefore, by way of improvement he appears to prefer a system under which these officers must be partisans in the strictest and straightest term. They must be appointed on the recommendation of the ministerial candidate of the day. They are, it is well known, appointed by him, not with reference to their experience, not with reference to their standing in the county, not with reference to their general capacity, but for the strictest party reason, and because they have power to appoint a number of minor officials by whose hands, perhaps, more than by those of the returning officers, any improper results that may occur in the course of the election can be manipulated. So that in order to avoid a possible contingency, my hon. friend from Brockville and those like him desire, as I say, to have unmistakably partisan returning officers appointed. I am glad to hear from the Secretary of State, and also, in a certain degree, from the Minister of Justice, that the Government are willing, having seen numerous examples of the evil effects of this system, to do what they can to improve it. Now, the hon. member for Brockville asked, what other plan could be adopted. The Minister of Justice, I think, asked for suggestions on that head, too. Well, Sir, I am going to make a suggestion to him, applicable certainly to my own province, and I think applicable to the most of the provinces of this Dominion. I have no doubt whatever that the people of Canada, or at least the people of Ontario, would be well content that neither political party should appoint these returning officers, but that they should be appointed by a board composed of one official nominated by the Dominion Government, of one official nominated by the Local Government, and of one official nominated by the people, and it can be done very easily. The Government of the day appoint the county judges in each case. The Local Governments appoint the sheriffs in each case, the people of each county appoint the warden: and I will venture to say that in Ontario at large a returning officer appointed by such a board as that, would command the confidence of the country in a very much greater degree than do the present nominees of the Government of the day, whoever that Government may be. For my part, I would be perfectly content that the nominee of such a board should be appointed returning officer. In England, if I remember right, the Government of the day do not attempt to appoint returning officers. Hon. gentlemen opposite are always desirous of imitating English precedents. There, if my recollection serves, the sheriff of the county, who is a very different official from our own, who is a man of weight and position in the county, who is usually a man of large estate in the county is, I think, ex officio returning officer: but, where the county is sub-divided, as is usually the case, into numerous constituencies, I think that the mayor, an officer elected by the people, is, ex officio, returning officer. Now, it is not convenient for us, it would not be practicable for us, in our different circumstances, to adopt the English custom, but we might adopt the principle underlying it; and if the Minister be desirous, and if his friends be desirous, of obtaining an impartial official in whom the people will have confidence, I venture to think, if that be their object, they could find it easily enough, so far as my province is concerned, and I think so far as the other provinces are concerned, by taking such a board as that, and allowing them to nominate the returning officer. However, I make that suggestion for the consideration of the Minister. With respect to the system itself, I must say that the instances that have been given by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Hargraft) and by my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Landerkin), and some facts that might be quoted with respect to some other constituencies in Ontario, go to show in the clearest manner that these returning officers are, to say the very least of it, extremely careless on many occasions in the performance of their important duties. It is within my own knowledge that they have very frequently appointed most improper persons to act as deputies in many counties, and it is within my own knowledge that they have shown themselves excessively careless in the custody of the ballot boxes, and if much more numerous frauds, and much grosser frauds, than have been narrated on the floor of this House in the course of this discussion, have not been committed, it was not by reason of any care or anxiety displayed by these returning officers to protect the interest of the public which had been committed to their charge. With respect to that famous case to which my hon. friend the Secretary of State alluded, the case of Mr. Baird, in Queen's, N. B., who was the returning officer who made that extraordinary finding? Why, Sir, it was proven here that he was a man who, but a few weeks before, had been secretary of the Conservative Association; the most pronounced partisan that could be found in the county was entrusted with this judicial office, on the recommendation of the man whom, in defiance of the verdict of the people, he returned to Parliament. Sir, it is just such abuses as that that we desire to put a stop to, it is just such acts as that of which we complain, it is just such instances of negligence and carelessness as these alluded to just now that we desire to avoid in the future.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. I am not at all surprised at the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite on this question. As a new member of this House, I have come to the conclusion that nothing will satisfy those hon. gentlemen but a law to legislate them into power. I do hope and believe that the representatives of the people in this House will not put on the Statute-book of this country a law which will enable those hon. gentlemen to get control of this fair Dominion. I would not have spoken on this occasion were it not for one remark that dropped from the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron), who, looking across the floor at me, stated that he had proof, of his own knowledge, of injustice having been done by incompetent officials. I want to tell the hon. gentleman this——

Mr. BARRON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I did nothing of the kind.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. I have taken down what the hon. gentleman said. I thought the hon. gentleman alluded to South Victoria, from the way he looked across at me. I want to say this, that my opponent in South Victoria, and his lawyer, and myself and my lawyer and agent, and the returning officer, when the official return was made, all shook hands, and it was said that it was as pure an election as was ever held in South Victoria or any other riding. That remark fell from the lips of my opponent and from his agent also. Nevertheless, they demanded a recount, and through some informality in regard to the deposit, the judge, who was a Reformer and as competent a man as was in the county——

Mr. LANDERKIN. As all Reformers are.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN—I would trust him more than you, I would trust him in any capacity of life—he did not allow a recount. That did not satisfy the candidate and his friends. They went to a protest, and we shall see what we shall see after the protest.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The debate has naturally divided itself into two parts: one on the justice or injustice of the system which permits partisan returning officers to be appointed, and the other more immediately connected with the amendment proposed to the House. On the first part of the debate I am not going to make any lengthy observations, because I am glad to say that, with one or two unfortunate exceptions, the Government have not introduced the vicious system of appointing partisan returning officers into the Maritime Provinces. As a rule, the sheriffs have been appointed returning officers, with one or two unfortunate exceptions that have occurred, and evil results have almost always followed the departure from this wholesome rule. I regret that the Secretary of State seems to have such want of appreciation of the circumstances of the Queen's County case. The hon. gentleman treated it rather lightly, as if there had simply been an error of judgment on the part of the returning officer. But the hon. gentleman must have forgotten all the facts connected with the case. The action of the returning officer was an outrage on all law. In the opinion of hon. members on both sides of the House it was an outrage on all decency. That partisan returning officer did not exercise his judgment as it were upon a point of law, but he deliberately returned the candidate having the minority vote. He accepted the candidature of the majority candidate, Mr. King; he received his money; he had the election held, all the formalities were complied with, and it was not until he found Mr. King had a majority of over 60 votes that he deliberately turned round and returned the minority candidate. There was no excuse, and there can be no excuse for that offence. It was an outrageous violation of law, of duty, of the wishes of the people, and if it was not condemned as it should have been in this House afterwards, it was an unfortunate event for the country. I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to the amendment which the hon. gentleman asks the House to adopt in case we continue the present iniquitous system. He says truly that it is the interest of every hon. gentleman that the returning officers and the deputy returning officers who are charged with the ballot boxes should be made responsible for their safe-keeping. We have attempted to make them responsible by general language, in which we say they shall be responsible. He attempts to ensure that responsibility. What does he propose? The hon. gentleman asks the House to enact that in those cases where it is proved that ballot boxes have come into the legal possession and custody of the officers, and while they are in their legitimate custody and possession, they are robbed or tampered with, in that case the returning officer or the deputy returning officer in whose possession the ballot boxes are when this occurs shall be held responsible to satisfy the court that when it did occur it was not with his assistance or connivance. Is that anything unreasonable? The onus to show that tampering occurred rests on the man who makes the charge. The onus of showing it occurred when the boxes were in the custody of the officer rests on the man who makes the charge. All my hon. friend asks is this, that when it is shown that the boxes were in the custody of the officer and that the tampering occurred while in his custody, he must satisfy the court that the action was done without his connivance or assistance. What less can hon. gentlemen ask? No honest officer would be placed in a false position if this amendment were carried. He is bound to take care that the boxes are not opened or accessible to thieves or thugs who go round tampering with ballot boxes; if he is so neglectful in his official conduct as to let the ballot boxes be accessible to those people, he should be held responsible. We know very well that it is absolutely impossible to bring forward positive evidence that the returning officer was a party to that proceeding, but you can bring against him cogent and sufficient evidence to call on him for a reply, and if he has no reply to make he will be held responsible for the outrage. Why should the amendment meet with any opposition? It should be the desire of everyone to punish those people who tamper with the ballot boxes, and to place them in the custody of officers who would know and feel that they were responsible for their safe custody, and if such an officer permitted them to be tampered with, there would be some means by which he could be punished.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I would not detain the House at this hour by making any remarks in regard to the Bill of the Minister of Justice, had the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) not thrown down a challenge to hon. members sitting on this side of the House to produce a case since Confederation of an official in the employ of the Ontario Government conducting an election having been guilty of corrupt practice. I am going to give an instance of that kind. But before I do so, let me offer a few remarks on the appointment of returning officers generally. As a rule returning officers are chosen, as I understand it, from respectable members of the community. They are gentlemen of position and station in the places where they reside. We can only speak from personal experience in matters of this kind, and I must say that my experience has been that the returning officers chosen for the Dominion election in the district that I have the honour to represent have been men of position, standing and means. On the other hand, we are asked, or the suggestion is made, to adopt another course, to adopt the course followed in Ontario, to take the registrars or sheriffs as returning officers in Dominion elections. I will point out as briefly as possible the objections to that course being followed. In the first place, I desire to consider from what class these officials are recruited. Are they recruited from the ranks of independent men of means in the Province of Ontario? No; they are recruited from members of the local House, from unsuccessful candidates for the legislature, or from broken-down political hacks who require positions; and into the hands of these men we are asked to place the duties of returning officers. In the district I have the honour to represent, we have not one, not two, but no less than three sheriffs: not one, two, or three registrars, but no less than four of them. Who would you pick out as returning officer in that district?

Mr. McMULLEN. The best of them.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). With the exception of one of them, they do not fulfil the conditions required by hon. gentlemen opposite: that is to say, they are not men of means and substance, and consequently they do not fulfil the conditions required on that side of the House. In the election of 1883 the registrar of a district was employed by the Ontario Government and after the election was over he was prosecuted in the courts of Ontario for corrupt practices and fined $1,000 for his guilt. That fine was never paid. He was afterwards whitewashed by the Government that appointed him and the evidence is on record that the leader of that Government drew the clause with his own hand that whitewashed that very official. Here we have the case of one of the officials of the Ontario Government convicted of corrupt practices. Would you want to place in his hands the duties of returning officer? Another returning officer in a local election, to my own knowledge, was engaged in distributing campaign literature while performing the other duties pertinent to the office of returning officer in that district. Is that a partisan returning officer or is he not. Now, Sir, I have in my mind another official of the Ontario Government, whom the gentlemen on the other side of the House would like to make a returning officer in the constituency in which he belongs. The constituency is East Northumberland, and the official is Mr. Mallory, the registrar of the county. He probably had nothing better to do, and he hied himself away to the district of Algoma to stump the county in the interest of the Grit candidate at the last election. I was not sorry to see Mr. Mallory there; on the contrary, I would be glad to have him come back again, because the peculiar fact was, that every place Mr. Mallory spoke in I got a majority, so that I have no reason to complain. In the face of these evidences before the House, would it be right for the present Government to take out of their own hands—because there is no doubt about it, the appointment of returning officers is now in the hands of the Government, and through the Government in the hands of the supporters of the Government—would it be fair to take that power out of their own hands and to place it in the hands of violent political partisans? I have not known yet a returning officer in the Federal elections who has been a violent political partisan. I may tell you, Sir, that in Algoma, with the exception of voting, I never knew a returning officer appointed by the Dominion Government, take any interest in a local election unless to poll his vote. Now, that cannot be called a partisan act on the part of the returning officer, but if you take the officials, such as are suggested by the opposite side of the House, you would undoubtedly get the most violent political partisans, because they only get their positions through their partisanship. Should the position be taken out of the hands of an ordinary partisan—because every man must have his feelings and his leanings towards one or the other of the two great political parties of this country—and given to the most violent partisans that exists in the Province of Ontario to-day?

Mr. McMULLEN. I had no intention of taking part in this discussion had it not been for the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman who his just taken his seat. In the section of the county to which I belong, the returning officer for many years was the registrar of the county. He was not appointed by the present Ontario Government, but by the Sandfield Macdonald Government many years ago. He was a very decent, respectable man. He discharged the duties of returning officer for many years up to and including the general elections of 1882, but after that he was never permitted to discharge the duties again simply because he would not consent to do an irregular act which was suggested to him by the candidate who ran in opposition to me. He was told distinctly then that he would not be appointed returning officer, and he never was since. As far as I am personally concerned I have no complaints to make against the returning officers I have had to deal with. I am glad to say that the returning officer in my county in the last election, is a decent, respectable man, so far as I know; a strong partisan no doubt, but he discharged the duties of returning officer fairly well. In reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) I must say that I cannot understand how he could have fallen upon such an unprincipled lot of Ontario officials as he says. He has stated that out of the several officials in the district he belongs to, there is not a man except one that he would be willing to entrust with the duties of returning officer.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I did not say that. I said that out of seven officials, three sheriffs and four registrars, there is but one that I know of who would comply with the conditions required on the opposite side of the House, that is, to be a man of means and substance.

Mr. McMULLEN. That certainly is one condition, but the great condition we should look to is a man of uprightness and honesty, and a man who has a disposition to discharge the duties faithfully and efficiently. It is highly desirable that we should not have a repetition in this country of the acts that have been recited before this House as having taken place in the constituencies of this Dominion during this last election. The transactions connected with the South Grey election are a matter of very sincere regret. The experience of my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) who had to fight through the difficulties that he had had to contend with to get his seat that was honestly won at the polls, is an experience that hon. gentlemen opposite would not like to pass through, nor would I like to see any of them obliged to pass through it. In the provincial elections held in the Province of Ontario there cannot be a single case cited where any such acts as those which took place in South Grey and Northumberland, and in the County of Queen's, N.B., ever were perpetrated in the Province of Ontario by officials who discharged the duties of returning officers. I am pleased to learn that although the Minister of Justice, if not prepared at this very late stage of the session to accept the suggestion now made in reference to returning officers, that he, at least, will take the matter up at no distant date, and provide that men will be appointed who will faithfully, and patiently, and creditably discharge these duties. While we may across the floor of this House and on public platforms discuss the trade question, and other questions of vital importance to this country, at least every member of this House should feel that principle of honesty between each contending party to secure the selection of returning officers who will faithfully, and efficiently, and honourably discharge their duties, and that the registered will of the people should not be thwarted by an unscrupulous, imprudent and dishonest returning officer, who is prepared to submit to the dictates of any man and to do wrong in the discharge of the duties that devolve upon him. I do hope that the law will be placed in such a position, that whenever in future we appeal to our constituents their will shall be recorded honestly and fairly, and not interfered with by partisans who are so unscrupulous as to lend themselves to the abominable and disgraceful acts that have been perpetrated in some constituencies during the last election.

Mr. MURRAY. The hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) has cast some reflections on Ontario officials. I happened to be an Ontario Government official for some three or four weeks myself, and I can assure you that when I hear gentlemen make reflections on the Ontario officials I feel rather sensitive on that point. However, apart from this, Mr. Speaker, I think it is the duty of members on both sides of the House to consider this very important question as to the proper mode of appointing returning officers. If the House is satisfied that the change that has been made is an improvement, that is, leaving in the hands of the Government of the country, whether it be Liberal or Conservative, the power of appointing their own returning officers instead of allowing sheriffs and registrars to act as such—if this House is satisfied that that is an improvement, I can assure you I am not satisfied. The idea of allowing the candidate of the party in power to name the returning officer, because that is virtually what it is, perhaps some strong partisan, such as the president of the Conservative association or the Reform association, as the case may be, instead of the registrar or sheriff, appears to me to be absurd. It is well known that the sheriffs and registrars appointed by the Provincial Governments are permanent officers, generally holding their positions during lifetime, unless some grave charge of dereliction of duty is made against them, which does not often happen; and I believe there are a great many sheriffs and registrars throughout the Dominion, appointed at Confederation, who are just as liable to be in sympathy with the Conservative party as the Liberal party. There has seldom been anything charged against the sheriffs or registrars of this country since Confederation in regard to the proper discharge of their duties. My hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) has made reference to some registrar who did not discharge his duties. I do not remember the particulars; but suppose there was one case of a sheriff or registrar failing to properly discharge his duties, under the present system there is likely to be and has been a deal more wrong-doing. I am glad to see that the Government are disposed to make some change in this matter. They suggest that the position of returning officer should be made permanent, perhaps that would be an improvement; but the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) suggested a very good mode of appointment, that is, vesting it in the Dominion Government the Provincial Government and the warden of the county. The warden of the county himself might be a good man for the position. I would take chances as to his political leanings. At all events, the present system I entirely disapprove of.

Mr. BOWELL. I desire to say one or two words before this discussion closes, and I am induced to do so by the challenge thrown out by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and repeated by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) had given one of the most flagrant cases of dereliction of duty, on the part of a returning officer who was an Ontario official, that ever occurred in the country. So flagrant was his conduct that the Local Legislature had to pass a Bill to relieve him of the penalties to which he had rendered himself liable. The hon. member for Bothwell has evidently forgotten a case that occurred in the county from which the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Murray) comes. No doubt he will remember that in 1874 the registrar of that county actually took upon himself the responsibility of deciding whether the parties who signed the requisition bringing a candidate into the field were legally entitled to sign it or not, and that he held in his hands the requisition to so late a period that it was impossible to put in another requisition—even supposing he had the power to do what he did—and returned the Reform candidate, who afterwards sat in this House, without holding an election at all. That was a case in which the returning officer being an Ontario official assumed a responsibility that has never been equalled by any other returning officer in any part of this Dominion. True, the courts set aside the return and declared the election null. But was that registrar punished either by the Local Legislature or by the Government of which my hon. friend afterwards became a member?

Mr. MURRAY. Do you refer to North Renfrew?

Mr. BOWELL. No; I refer to South Renfrew, which is a part of the county in which the hon. gentleman lives. I must say that I agree largely with the remarks of the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies). I care not what system you adopt, you will occasionally find officials who do not perform their duties strictly in accordance with the law, who are such strong partisans that they allow their political feelings to run away with their better judgment. I was pleased to hear the hon. gentleman say that in the Maritime Provinces the appointments made by the Government have been of such a character during the 12 or 13 years that they have been in office, that only one or two cases of dereliction of duty have been pointed out.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They were sheriffs.

Mr. BOWELL. In the county I represent, since I have had anything to do with it, I have recommended the registrar, who was appointed by the Reform Administration, as returning officer until the subsequent election; and my reason for not doing it then was this, that though while left to himself he performed his duty honestly and faithfully, yet the Ontario Government officials, and those who assumed to have the power went and threatened him with dismissal from office if he did not appoint just such deputy returning officers as they thought he should appoint. Though I had never had occasion to find fault with him, knowing that he had in the past, when left to himself, appointed deputy returning officers from both parties, and had always selected good and reliable men; yet when I found that the Ontario officials were using the power they had with the Government which they supported to compel him to do that which he otherwise would not have done, I thought it was quite time to use whatever influence I had in recommending some one else for the position. If those people would do that in the case of an officer appointed under the Dominion Government, how much further would they go if he were made the returning officer by law?

Mr. MURRAY. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BOWELL. I need only refer to the case of the returning officer for East Hastings at the late local election, in which the member whom the returning officer tried to deprive of his seat brought the matter before the Legislature upon his own responsibility as a member of the House, and in which the party of hon. gentlemen opposite defended that returning officer by declaring by their votes that no investigation should take place.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? He says that the Ontario Government interfered with the registrar in his county. Has he any proof of that?

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say so. What I said was that the partisans of the Ontario Government interfered with the returning officer and threatened, after they had discussed the matter in the Reform Association, to have him dismissed if he did not act according to their wishes and appoint such deputy returning officers as they suggested.

Mr. BARRON. What proof have you of that statement?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BOWELL. I am not in the habit of stating what I am not prepared to substantiate when necessary, whatever may be the course of the hon. member for North Victoria in discussing this or other questions. Neither do I desire to be judged by his own standard when I make a statement on my own responsibility in this House. Unless some one is prepared to deny it, the statement of any member made in this House should be taken without the insulting remarks which are constantly thrown across the floor by members of the character of the hon. member for North Victoria.

Mr. BARRON. When the hon. gentleman says partisans, he should give names. I challenge the hon. gentleman to give——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BOWELL. I am not particular what questions the hon. gentleman asks, or what challenges he throws out. We can accept them, as we are in the habit of accepting the insults constantly thrown across the floor by gentlemen opposite. I think I have kept myself strictly within the bounds of the question before the House. I have answered the challenge thrown down by the hon. gentleman as to the acts of registrars and other officials in the Province of Ontario; and, having done that, I should not have spoken further had not hon. gentlemen opposite indignantly protested that all their officials are pure. I am not prepared to say that they all are not, or that a large number of them would not do their duty; but while partisanship exists to the extent it does in the Local Legislatures, and while the officials are appointed in the manner they are by the different Local Governments, I contend that the power should be vested in the Government of the day of appointing as returning officers such men as they think fit, who are not only capable, but responsible for the duties they perform.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I notice what the hon. Minister of Customs has said with reference to irregularities that occurred in the County of Hastings. I am not surprised at irregularities having occurred there; but at all events, whatever Government might have been holding the election at that time, they did not make their returning officer return the candidate who had the minority of votes and who was on their side of politics. The candidate who was on the same side of politics as the Minister of Customs was returned by the returning officer, whether any irregularities occurred there or not; but we have had instances under the operation of this law where the candidates who had the minority of votes were returned by the returning officer. Speaking of the Ontario officials in the riding I have the honour to represent, two or three of them are the most violent opponents I have in the riding. They have been there a good many years and I have not complained of them, as I believe every man has a right to exercise his franchise as he deems best. With regard to the returning officers appointed under the present system, if the Minister of Justice desires to improve this law, he has got to begin with the declarations. Whatever appearance of desire to improve the law he may show, whatever willingness he may evince to have an honest election, if he allows the declarations to run two weeks, that will frustrate every good he appears desirous to do, because it is during that time the villainy is perpetrated. With regard to the returning officer in my case, I do not believe he was as bad as he was weak. He yielded to the importunities of those who were opposed to me, and after he made the declaration he left the riding. The ballot boxes then, I presume, were in charge of the election clerk, and after the recount the election clerk left the riding and the country too. He went to the United States. That is where a good many of our Tory officials have been obliged to go lately. Change of air and scene he thought would improve him. I understand he came back once since, not to the town in which he formerly lived, but met his friends at a distance of fifteen miles from it. If the Minister of Justice desires to improve this law, he must take these matters into consideration and look into the character of the men appointed; and when it is shown that returning officers have committed irregularities and deputy returning officers as well in former elections and were reappointed, that is clear evidence that a change is required. There has never been an instance I know of in all the irregularities that have been committed in Queen's and other counties where the officers have been rebuked by the Government. There was an officer in this House who committed grave irregularities, who was dishonest in his conduct, and unjust to the electorate. Was he reprimanded? No. He was removed to another office and his salary increased some $500 per year. That is the way in which these men are rewarded: and they consequently are convinced that if they will act dishonestly and unjustly, they will probably share the benefits of their action by receiving an increase in salary as in the case of the official I refer to. As long as the appointments of returning officers and deputy returning officers are controlled by the party, they are apt to have a partisan bias. No doubt if the Minister of Justice desired it, he could appoint honest men among his supporters, because many of them are honest men, and that would be a better way than the one the Government have taken of appointing men who have shown they are willing that the greatest laxity should prevail in the administration of elections.

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Before the Bill is read a third time, I want to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a section which I think requires a slight amendment.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to an amendment which I thought ought to be made to the Bill. The 63rd section of the Act has been amended by the Bill now under debate, and it is provided that, in the case of the loss of the ballot boxes, the returning officer shall proceed to ascertain in the best way he can the votes given for the respective candidates by taking evidence and otherwise, and, after coming to a conclusion, he shall report how many votes were given for each candidate. The Act did not provide for any mode of reviewing that determination if it was wrong, and I was suggesting that the same provision for review should be made in this case as in the case of the summing up of the votes. I, therefore, move that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole House with instructions that they have power to amend the same by adding the following as section 64:—

The judge shall also, if necessary or required, review the decision of the returning officer in respect of the number of votes given for a candidate at any polling place where the ballot box used was not forthcoming when he made his decision, or when the proper certificates or papers were not found therein: and for the purpose of arriving at the facts he shall have all the powers of a returning officer in regard to the attendance and examination of witnesses.

That is not exactly what I proposed, but I understand the Minister of Justice agrees to this.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will not oppose the amendment, because I think it is a useful one.

Mr. MULOCK. I have called the attention of the Minister to section 3 of the Bill and suggested an amendment so that the agents of candidates might have seals affixed to the envelopes containing the ballots, and this idea has been partially adopted in this clause, but I observe that the agent of the candidate is only allowed to write his initials. I was not present when the discussion on that clause took place, but I will ask why the agent should not be allowed to write his full name across the envelope, because, if the object is to prevent fraud or to prevent some other envelope being substituted, the mere initials might not be sufficient for the purpose of identification. I think an individual would be better able to identify his signature than his initials. I, therefore, suggest that he should be allowed to write his name across the flap. An ordinary agent in the country would not be likely to identify his initials at all. There would be only a couple of letters to swear to instead of his whole signature.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would just ask the attention of the Minister of Justice to this point, whether the words "shall have the power of review" and so on, are the most proper expressions to use as to the powers that are given to the county judge to recount. His right to recount can hardly be considered a review of the proceedings of the returning officer, but rather an independent proceeding which altogether supersedes that of the returning officer. I would suggest the phraseology "and in case a recount is demanded, the judge to whom aplication is made shall have a like power, and it shall be his duty to send for the deputy returning officer, clerk or agents" and so forth.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand the effect of the right of review, as distinct from the right of appeal, to be a right to enquire into the whole matter over again, and to arrive at a different result without being bound in any way by the evidence in the first instance, and it was in that view that I proposed to adopt the word "review."

Bill reported.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the Bill be now read the third time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will recollect that when we were in Committee on this Bill, I called special attention to the sections which provide that the returning officer may grant certificates to agents to go into other districts than those in which the agents are entitled to vote, and that is, no doubt, a necessary provision. The second section of the Bill now before us provides that the returning officer shall not grant certificates to more than two such agents, and that such agents, when they vote or offer themselves to vote, at a place where they are not registered as voters, shall take an oath which is set out in the statute. When we were in Committee before, I suggested to the hon. gentleman—and if the suggestion meets with his approval I would like to have the Bill amended in that regard—that the oath be amended, and that they be compelled to swear that they are registered on a list in the district. Now, the oath, as it stands, merely declares that "I, A. B., do swear that I am actually entitled to vote for a member of the House of Commons for this electoral district at the present election." I propose that these words be added:

And that my name is duly registered on the list of voters for sub-division No. of this district.

The reason of that will be apparent. Supposing two men are appointed. They apply to the revising officer, and they are appointed for polling district No. 10. They go to No. 10 and produce the sheriff's certificate. Well, they are not on No. 10. They say: "We want to vote, because we have got the certificates." Nobody knows whether they are on the list at all, and if they take a false oath there will be great difficulty in prosecuting for perjury because there is no means of determining whether they are on the list. I think that where a man claims to vote in a sub-division where he is not recorded, there is no harm in asking him to declare in his oath that he is recorded in some particular sub-division of the county. There can be no difficulty about it and no wrong in it. If a man taken from sub-division 1 and put in sub-division 4 presented a certificate asking to vote, he should not only be obliged to swear that he had a vote in the county, but that he had so because he was registered in sub-division 1 or whatever the number might be. I wish to make the affidavit as plain as possible in order that we might have some guarantee that those men who vote outside the sub-division in which they are entitled to vote shall have their right to vote in some degree tested, and that if they improperly take an oath they may be looked after afterwards. In a constituency of 60 or 70 polling places such as I represent, the importance of this provision is obvious. No less than 200 or 300 people might vote in a district where they were not registered and those appointed to watch would have no means of judging whether they were voters or not. If they are allowed simply to swear that they are entitled to vote in the county without saying where they are registered, it is making the matter very loose and not giving those opportunities for watching voters that should be given.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The returning officer has to be satisfied that the person whom he may transfer has the right to vote in the district from which he asks to be transferred, and certifies accordingly. I thought, when the matter of the oath came up, perhaps the better way to regulate the matter would be, and I actually proposed it, that the voter should swear he was entitled to vote in district so and so, filling in the number of the district in which his name appeared on the list. The proposition was very fully considered by the Committee, and this objection was made to my proposition that the list for the district where the name was originally inserted would not be in the polling booth where the person proposed to vote, and that there were no means of checking it. Finally, as a compromise, he took the old provision, declaring that he was entitled to vote, that he was a British subject, that he had not voted before, and had not received anything in the way of bribe. I think we must allow the section to stand as it is, although I still think the suggestion I made would have been the better one.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Will the Minister of Justice consent to make the declarations one week after the polling?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is a subject we have discussed very fully. The hon. gentleman will see the difficulty of doing it. The declaration will be made in almost every case within that time.

If not made, what is the result? We cannot provide that in such a case the declaration shall not be made hereafter, because, in such an event, we enable the returning officer, by postponing the declaration more than a week, to defeat the return of a candidate. We decided to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to make the time for petitioning date from polling day, and we made that a liberal time, I think 40 days, to cover all possible difficulty.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What provision is made in event of declaration being delayed two weeks? In my riding it was delayed 18 days.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There will still be 22 days to petition. Even during the whole of those 18 days it would be probably well known in the constituency which of the candidates was returned. The petition could be prepared for fyling. On full consideration of the question, both sides of the House agreed that the suggestion of the hon. member for South Oxford was the best possible solution of the difficulty.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of amending sub-section 2 of section 6, by striking out the words "two weeks," in the last line, and substituting in lieu thereof the following: "One week, except in the Electoral Districts of Algoma, Gaspé, and Ottawa, when the time may be extended if necessary to two weeks."

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. MULOCK moved:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to a Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of amending section 3 by striking out the words "initialled with the initials," and substituting therefor the words "marked with the signatures," and by inserting between the words "do and cross" the following words: "by writing their signatures."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1892, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 16th September, 1891.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the Message of the Governor General and the Supplementary Estimates contained therein be referred to the Committee on Supply.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 172) respecting frauds upon the Government.—(Sir John Thompson.)

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 169) further to amend the Act 52 Victoria, chapter 4, to authorize the granting of subsidies in lands to certain railway companies.—(Mr. Dewdney.)

THE SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS.

House proceeded to further consider amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 138) to amend chapter 135 of the Revised Statutes, intituled: "An Act respecting the Supreme and Exchequer Courts."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In the proceedings of the 7th September hon. gentlemen will remember that I took up these amendments, and was proceeding with their consideration, and the House concurred in all the unimportant amendments; but we were stopped and adjourned the debate on the amendment which related to the appeals from the Court of Review in the Province of Quebec. The provisions which are inserted by the Senate with regard to an appeal from the Court of Review I understand to be these, in effect: A suitor in the Province of Quebec has a right to appeal to the Court of Review which consists of three judges of the Superior Court. If the judges are unanimous there is no appeal provided by the Legislature of the province, but there is a right of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The amendment by the Senate provides that in such cases there shall be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, and it further limits that appeal in this way: That that appeal shall no longer exist, and this provision shall no longer apply, if the Legislature of the province shall create an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench in the province, which is the ordinary court of appeal in similar cases.

Mr. LAURIER. The amendment in itself is one to which the House ought not to give a very ready assent. First of all, I must say to the Minister of Justice, that although I am a Liberal of the Liberals I am very much of a Conservative when you have to deal with the constitutional laws of the country. The administration of justice is confined by the British North America Act to the provinces, and the House, I estimate, ought always to be very chary of substituting its own judgment for the judgment of the Legislature in matters which specially appertain to the domain of the Legislature, and such is the administration of justice. In the present instance, it is true, there is an appeal to the Privy Council in the cases referred to by the hon. gentleman; but this appeal has been granted by an Act of the Local Legislature passed about the year 1875 or 1876. At present, if a case is instituted in the superior courts, it is appealable either to the court sitting in review or to the Court of Queen's Bench, according to the option of the appellant. If he takes his case to the Court of Review, and the judgment of the first court is reversed, it may still be carried to the Court of Appeal; but if the judgment in the first instance is confirmed by the Court of Review; it is final so far as the province is concerned; but in such cases it has been enacted by the Local Legislature that though a further appeal is denied to the court of last resort in the province, it may be carried to the Privy Council. Now, I think that this clause ought to be amended by providing that the same class of cases which are appealable from the Court of Review to the Privy Council should be made appealable to the Supreme Court. I would, therefore, move that the amendment made by the Senate be further amended by adding these words:

And which by the laws of the Province of Quebec are appealable to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

That is, to give an alternative appeal from the Court of Review to the Privy Council or to the Supreme Court. Such is the case now in regard to all appeals from the Court of Queen's Bench, in cases involving future rights or amounts over $2,500.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection to accept the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Page 1, line 31,—leave out from "touching" to "provincial" in line 32.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) That seems to be rather an important amendment which the Senate have made. I confess I approach the discussion of these amendments under very great difficulties, owing to the condition in which they are brought before us under our rules. It is impossible to discuss properly a Bill with important amendments of this kind unless we have the Bill reprinted. The section it is proposed to amend reads as follows:--

"Important questions of law or fact touching the exercise of the power of disallowance of provincial legislation."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think it is a substantial amendment, but is intended to prevent misunderstanding. The Bill, as passed by the Senate, reads:

"Important questions of law or fact touching provincial legislation for the appellate jurisdiction."

The Bill, as passed by this House, reads:

"Touching the exercise of the power of disallowance of provincial legislation."

The meaning is the same. It is apparent to everybody that we cannot submit to the judiciary a question of policy as to disallowance; and the apprehension which led to the amendment of the Senate was that possibly the clause might be interpreted as conferring upon the Governor-in Council power to refer to the Supreme Court the question whether an Act ought to be disallowed or not. We intend the Act to be simply in conformity with the present law, namely, that we have the power to refer questions touching Provincial Legislation, relating to interpretation to that court, but not questions of policy. Otherwise the clause might seem to involve the right to exercise the prerogative with regard to disallowance.

Amendment agreed to.

4. Whenever the right to appeal is dependent upon the amount in dispute, such amount shall be understood to be be that demanded and not that recovered, if they are different.

Mr. LANGELIER. This is a most important departure from the present practice of the Supreme Court and the Privy Council, and I do not think it is a wise departure. No doubt the amendment is in accordance with the law in force in the Province of Quebec, according to which the right of appeal is determined by the amount demanded, and not by the amount involved when the appeal is taken out; but I know, as a matter of fact, that the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, appeal side in the Province of Quebec, are all against the present law, and several of them last year suggested to me that it would be most important to have it amended. The result of the law, as it is in Quebec, and as it will be here under this amendment, is that if a man takes an action of damages for $10,000 and recovers only $100, still the defendant, whose interests are involved only to the extent of $100 under the judgment of the court and the costs of the action, will have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court because the original demand was for $10,000. This is most unwarrantable, as it may ruin the plaintiff. The rule in the Supreme Court and in the Privy Council is just the contrary. The right of appeal to these courts is determined by the amount involved when the appeal is taken out and not by the amount involved when the case was originally instituted. That is a very wise regulation, and I think it is highly undesirable that we should change it. I know that such has been the rule before the Supreme Court in connection with cases from the Province of Quebec. For four or five years after the Supreme Court was established, the rule was that the right of appeal was to be determined by the amount demanded and not by the amount involved when the appeal was taken out, but this provision has been left out. For the last four or five years the Supreme Court has adopted the same rule for the Province of Quebec as for the other provinces, and now the appeals to the Supreme Court are regulated by the amount involved and not by the amount demanded originally.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I speak with great diffidence in regard to any matter of procedure in the Province of Quebec, which differs so much from the other provinces, but I understood that the amendments proposed here were acceptable to the bar of that province, so far as the procedure relates to the appeal. I would like to ask the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Langelier) whether this amendment is not in accord with the law of the Province of Quebec on the subject.

Mr. LANGELIER. I stated that this is the law in the Province of Quebec as to the appeals to the Court of Queen's Bench, but two or three judges of the Court of Queen's Bench called my attention to the opportunity of amending that law and making our law in the Province of Quebec in reference to appeals the same as that in regard to appeals to the Supreme Court and the Privy Council. This is the cause of many futile appeals to the Court of Queen's Bench, and the same will apply, and with greater force, to appeals to the Supreme Court. A great many futile appeals will be taken in which very trifling amounts are involved. I do not complain that this is an injury to the Province of Quebec. On the contrary, this would make the law the same as that which exists in Quebec in regard to appeals to the Court of Queen's Bench.

Mr. LAURIER. It may well be that the view taken by my hon. friend is the right view, but I would put this to him, wherever the legislation here is in accordance with the law of the province, is it not safe to follow the principles adopted in the legislation of the province, and then there can be no clashing or discontent. My hon. friend says his attention has been called by the judges to the extraordinary result sometimes of the legislation of the province. but when the province has not legislated on this subject, it is safer to adhere to the existing provincial legislation. Supposing it should be attempted here to override the legislation of the province, discontent would be created thereby. Therefore, so long as the Provincial Legislature has not chosen to speak on the subject, and to remedy the evil, if evil there be, the safest plan is for us to adhere strictly to the law of the province and the principles which are there admitted and understood, not only by the bench but by the Legislature itself. There is less danger in my opinion of creating discontent by taking that course than by adopting such legislation as has been suggested.

Mr. DAVIES. (P.E.I.) It seems to me that this section is wrongly worded. It should be "under this section" and not "under the next preceding section."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The difficulty is caused by this being numbered as a sub-section, while it ought to be an original section, and then the wording would be correct as applying to "the next preceding section." We will make this section 5.

Amendments concurred in.

LAND SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

House again resolved itself into Committee to consider certain proposed resolutions respecting the granting of subsidies in land to the Manitoba South-Western Colonization Railway Company, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 1,

Mr. DEWDNEY. I promised the hon. gentleman yesterday that when this matter was brought up again in the House I would lay on the Table such information as I thought would be necessary in order to bear out the clause of the Order in Council which stated that the records show that the Government were bound to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to give them 6,400 acres of land per mile. I have got here all the Orders in Council and letters which I think will be sufficient to warrant that statement, and I now lay them on the Table.

Mr. LAURIER. That seems hardly what the hon. gentleman promised. He was to give us not only what he thought sufficient, but whatever he had in his department.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I told you yesterday that every document had been laid on the Table, within fifteen days of the commencement of the different sessions. I went through the fyles this morning, and as time allowed me I have taken out what I think is sufficient to give the House the information I promised yesterday. If it is not sufficient, I will bring down the whole of the original fyles and lay them on the Table.

Mr. MULOCK. I want to appeal to the Minister of Justice. When we were discussing this question yesterday the Minister asked what was desired. The Minister of Justice will remember that while several explanations were offered, at last we had the statement from the Minister of the Interior that the railway was entitled to this land as a matter of contract "as a matter of bargain," was the term used. At this stage the Minister of Justice enquired what information was required, and I stated, speaking for myself, that I desired to see whatever documents there were that created any obligation, legal or moral, on the part of Parliament to make this grant. The Minister of Justice assured the Committee that the request would be complied with, that a search would be made and information to that effect would be given to the Committee. I also understood that the Committee rose for the purpose of enabling it to get information before we would be called upon to pronounce on the question. The Minister of the Interior now states that this morning he examined the fyles in his department and made this discovery, and he now lays these papers on the Table of the House when we have no opportunity to examine them before discussing the proposition. I submit to the Minister of Justice whether it is reasonable we should be called on to consider the resolution before we have an opportunity to make a practical use of the information said to be in these documents. There are 100 members present, and how can they inform themselves as to what these documents prove at this stage of the proceedings. It will be but fair to defer the consideration of the resolution until to-morrow at any rate.

Committee rose and reported progress.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 147) further to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have been informed that for the Province of Ontario it is necessary there should be a provision respecting the disposal of election petitions. I move that section 8 be amended by inserting the following:—

It shall not in Ontario be necessary that the two judges before whom in any case the trial shall be conducted shall be the judges that have been assigned for the trial, but the Chief Justice of Ontario, the Chief Justice of Queen's Bench, the Chancellor and the Chief Justice of Common Pleas shall arrange in such manner as shall be provided by the rules of the Supreme Court of Judicature for that purpose for the rota of judges for the trial of such cases, and hearing of such applications.

Mr. MULOCK. I quite approve of the proposed amendment as far as it goes, and it may go as far as I think it ought to go. I would ask the Minister of Justice whether it goes far enough to entitle the judges to assign the petitions to two judges, neither of whom is a judge in the court or division in which the petition is fyled.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand that this amendment in connection with the Act which it amends has that effect; but I should like members of the House who are members of the bar of Ontario to consider it.

Mr. MULOCK. There is this weak spot in it. Under this amendment the petition is assigned according to the rules of court. Suppose the rules of court provided that petitions should be triable by one of the judges of the court or division in which it is fyled, in that case the amendment would not be so wide as is supposed. I, therefore, think the assignment should be wholly regardless of the court in which the petition is fyled, and the judges should not be at liberty to make rules to the contrary.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am of the opinion that there is not any necessity for this clause. The court some time ago met, and the Chief Justice divided a number of election petitions among the whole court. If that is the object of the amendment it will be found that the Act of 1887 makes all the provision required.

Mr. MULOCK. That is the Act that creates the difficulty.

Mr. McCARTHY. In what way?

Mr. MULOCK. The judges had come to the conclusion that the petition was to be tried by two judges in the same division. The effect would be to interfere with the working of the court by taking two judges out of three. One or two of the judges spoke to me on the subject, and that was the view they took of it. They consider this legislation, or some such legislation, is necessary, in order that they may be free to select judges not out of the same court.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then, the explanation is this: That by reason of the change now made, trying petitions by two judges instead of one judge, it is necessary that this amendment should follow. I thought the amendment merely provided for the distribution of the work. I rather think this latter part will be found inconvenient. Why not allow the Chief Justices to arrange the assignment of judges' business as they now do the distribution, instead of waiting for any rules of the Supreme Court? Before we pass this we should determine whether we propose to leave the jurisdiction to the Court of Appeal, because if it is not to have jurisdiction then the Chief Justice of Ontario would not be one of the judges.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The amendment can stand.

Mr. McCARTHY moved that section 1 of the Bill be amended so as to read as follows:—

The paragraph letter (j) of section 2, of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, is hereby amended by striking out the words "the Court of Appeal for Ontario" in the first sub-section thereof, and the words "for Lower Canada" in the second sub-section thereof.

He said: I explained that the object of this was to confine the jurisdiction in election cases to the courts of first instance, and not to the Court of Appeal. My view has been that the Court of Appeal has now more work to do than it can properly discharge. I mentioned the other day that the Court of Appeal had fifty cases now before it, but in reality there are sixty-seven cases now on the list, and the average number of cases which the court disposes of at a sitting, I think, may be stated to be thirty. Two judges having been withdrawn in the spring for the trial of local election cases, there is really more work now than the court can dispose of during the balance of the year. If the second sitting of the court is to be interrupted by the judges being taken off to try election cases, we can easily contemplate that there will be such a list next year as they can hardly ever expect to wipe off. I think, therefore, it would be better if we did not interfere with the scheme of the Supreme Court, that is, that the Appeal Court shall deal with appellate matters, and the other courts deal with matters of this kind.

Mr. CASEY. That means, so far as Ontario is concerned, that judges of the Court of Appeal shall not be called upon to try in the first instance.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the Court of Appeal has spare time, they can be drafted into the different divisions. The object is that the appellate work of the Court of Appeal shall not be interfered with.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the readjustment of the work has already taken place.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understood from the Minister of Justice that he proposed to introduce a clause stating definitely which would be applicable to present proceedings and which would not be. Already there is some difficulty in the minds of the judges about which clause should apply. These petitions are entered in the Court of Appeal, and I do not contemplate that we should interfere with the present litigation.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McCARTHY moved:

That section 4 of the said Act as amended by section 2 of the Act intituled: "An Act to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act," being chapter 7 of 50 and 51 Victoria, is hereby amended by leaving out the words "Court of Appeal" in the sixth and seventh lines thereof, and the words "the Chief Justice of Ontario" in the eighth line thereof, and the words "said Court of Appeal and" in the eleventh and twelfth lines thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understand that the effect of all these amendments is that petitions must be fyled hereafter only in the three divisions of the High Court of Justice, and that we cannot utilize the judges of the Court of Appeal for the trial of petitions. If we should again have such a crop of petitions as we have at the present time, it will be quite impossible for the judges of the three divisions to dispose of them, and we are depriving ourselves of the services of four judges that we utilize at present. I understand that two judges are to try petitions in future. I approve of that, but it will probably have the effect of confining us to two judges in each division instead of giving us the use of three as at present. If these amendments are not to come into operation till next year or to apply to present cases, I think the Minister of Justice should pause, especially at this stage of the session, before adopting them, and they can be considered next session more carefully and fully than they can be now. I understand that the Minister proposes to consolidate the whole election law next session, and then such amendments might be made as circumstances would seem to justify. But it seems to me it only complicates the matter unnecessarily to press all these amendments now.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in saying that the amendment will not come into operation at once. It will, but it will not apply to petitions already fyled. It says that hereafter petitions shall not be fyled in the Court of Appeal.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Then there is the amendment respecting the judges who shall try the cases.

Mr. McCARTHY. That follows on the other. The amendment is not to affect the cases of which the court is seized at present.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If you do not want it to come into operation now, what object is there in pressing it now? You will get this Act on controverted elections so complicated and mixed up that the judges will find it almost impossible to know what they can do.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman's object is that which I understand it to be, I would suggest whether he should not listen to my hon. friend from Huron, and having brought the matter before the House, let it stand for consideration till next session. I do not want to interfere with Ontario practice; I do not know enough about it to do so; but I understand that if you carry all these amendments you will so complicate the Bill that we shall not know what we are passing at all. If the hon. gentleman wishes to provide that in future judges of the Court of Appeal shall not be used as judges in the first instance to try petitions, he can do that next session, I submit, better than he can now. I do not think any of us understand the effect of this amendment on other sections. I understand that the hon. Minister is going to introduce an amendment, saying that such and such sections shall apply to existing petitions, and such and such sections shall not. I think he will find it difficult to do that. If these sections are going to apply generally, how can you say that they are not going to apply to existing petitions? Most of these provisions which refer to procedure and practice were intended by the majority of the House, I think, to apply to existing petitions. Otherwise, there is no object in passing the Bill at this late stage of the session. I take it that many of these provisions are good in themselves, and if an amendment is to be introduced declaring that all these sections which form the beneficial parts of the Bill are only to apply to future petitions, I think we had better not pass the Bill at all.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The Bill originally introduced by the Minister of Justice, I understood, was intended to apply to the existing condition of things, and if so intended, was, in my judgment, a proper Bill. But if he has changed his opinion and does not intend to make it the law of the land at present, there can be no reason why it should be forced through this session, but it would be far better to let it stand until opportunity is had to consolidate the law and make all the amendments past experience shows to be necessary. The hon. gentleman knows better, perhaps, than most of us how difficult it is, when amendments to the different sections are sprung upon the House—without our having the opportunity of consulting the original statute and seeing exactly what effect the amendments will have upon the law—for us to decide upon the necessity or merits of the amendment. It is almost impossible for us to judge with any degree of accuracy the effect of these amendments. Either the Bill should apply to the existing condition of things or it ought not to be pressed through this session.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are various provisions in the Bill, and those which relate to mere procedure ought certainly to apply to existing petitions, according to the ordinary rule of construction of statutes. There are certain matters affecting questions of right, which may involve interference with existing rights, and it will be for us to consider how far these should be made applicable to existing petitions. That question can be dealt with when we finish the Bill and come to consider the section I propose to introduce, defining what provisions ought to apply to existing proceedings and what ought to be deferred. In the meantime, the hon. member for North Simcoe comes forward with the statement that the business of the Court of Appeals, in the Province of Ontario, would be interfered with if the judges should be withdrawn from ordinary business to try election petitions, and he proposes that they shall not be so used. The hon. gentleman moved that clause the other night, and I refrained from expressing any opinion: but I begged the members from Ontario, both lay and professional, to consider the effect it might have, to consider whether it would not be withdrawing from the trial of election petitions a number of judges who may be required, and may be more urgently required after the passage of this Bill, inasmuch as this Bill calls for two judges to try every election petition. The Committee, however, heard the reasons advanced by hon. member for North Simcoe, which I certainly was not in a position to controvert, and have now passed that clause. It will be for us to consider when we come to the end of the Bill whether its clauses shall apply to existing petitions or not. I take it for granted that the provision with regard to the Court of Appeal ought not to apply to existing petitions, because petitions have been actually fyled in the Court of Appeal, and we might seriously interfere with questions of jurisdiction were we to decide that the judges of the Court of Appeal shall not try them. That may be decided when we come to the work of closing the Bill. I think there are certain provisions which ought to be made applicable, and I am open to conviction by the Committee as to whether they ought not all to be made applicable to existing petitions. Having accepted the principle of trying by two judges, there can be no difference of opinion as to the propriety of applying that provision to existing petitions. As to the others, it is an open question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is no doubt that the ordinary business of the Court of Appeal will be more promptly dealt with and satisfactorily disposed of, if the amendment proposed by the hon. member for North Simcoe be adopted. That jurisdiction, however, has been given to the court by another Legislature, and it is a matter over which we have no jurisdiction. We have constituted the judges a part of the general election court of the Province of Ontario, and they are very competent judges, and as there is a very large number of petitions at present it would be highly inconvenient if the hon. gentleman's section were made applicable to the petitions now pending. He says that is not the intention and it will not be made so applicable; but whenever it is adopted we will certainly, if there is anything like the number of petitions fyled in the future that there have been after the recent election, seriously delay the trial of controverted election petitions by the courts in the Province of Ontario when we withdraw four judges from that work, as we will by withdrawing the judges of the Court of Appeal, though I have no doubt we will promote the ordinary business with which the Court of Appeal has to deal. I think there is a great deal of force in what the hon. member for Huron has said, that as the Government do not propose to apply these clauses to the existing conditions, they might stand over until the whole subject can be discussed at an earlier period next session. The hon. member for Simcoe himself no doubt has considered the Bill very fully, and on account of his large practice before the court has an excellent opportunity of judging what the effect will be on its general business; but at the same time this provision will, for all time to come, unless the number of judges is increased, delay the trial of controverted elections.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think that danger is very much exaggerated. The hon. gentleman speaks of four judges being withdrawn. What the courts do is this: They assign two judges, because the provision that the trial must be by two judges has been in force in local elections. They assign two judges from each court, so that this clause will have the effect of withdrawing, in point of fact, one set out of the four sets of judges who would be available for the trial of election petitions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There would be three in the future.

Mr. McCARTHY. Three in the future instead of four. The question is this: Ought we here, even if we had the power to do it, interfere with the appeal court of the province to that extent, when there are ten judges in the courts of first instance who at present certainly are not nearly as much pressed with work as the appellate tribunal? That tribunal started yesterday with sixty-seven cases. They do not dispose at a sitting of more than about thirty on an average. They ought to have another sitting before the Christmas vacation. Under the present condition of things they cannot hold that other sitting, so they will have more than half the list laid over till January with the whole six months work to add to that, and probably 100 cases on the list, so that cases that ought to be disposed of before the long vacation will not be disposed of for eighteen months to come, which will result in terrible inconvenience to individual suitors. I understand that these two clauses have been already carried, and all this discussion has been out of order; but I say, though I do not want the Committee to take my word for it, that the only two clauses that really need amendment are the first clause which strikes out the words "Court of Appeals," and the other clause which gives jurisdiction to the Chief Justice of Ontario to assign and distribute the work. There is no complication in these amendments. Then there is the 10th section, which we agreed upon the other afternoon, and it was arranged that, instead of amending it, a new section should be introduced. I move that section 10 of the said Act be hereby repealed and the following substituted in lieu thereof:—

Notice of the presentation of the petition under this Act and of the security accompanied with the copy of the petition shall within ten days after the day on which the petition has been presented or within the prescribed time, or within such longer time as the court or any judge thereof, under special circumstances of difficulty, allows to be served on the respondent or respondents within any place in the Dominion of Canada, if service cannot be effected on the respondent or respondents personally within the time granted by the court or judge, it may be effected in such other manner as the court or judge, on the application of the petitioner, directs.

Mr. BARRON. Why has the hon. member for Simcoe left out the words "at his domicile"?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. McCARTHY. The question was that a doubt existed whether a service might be made at a man's house, and I desired to make it clear that the service should be personal unless the judge ordered that it should be made in some other way.

Mr. BARRON. I see it reads "under special circumstances of difficulty." The original Act had the words "or difficulty".

Mr. McCARTHY. The original Act had the words "or difficulty" That was changed in the amending Act, I think by a mistake. I move this amendment:

Section 51 is hereby amended by striking out in the tenth line thereof, the word "one", and substituting the word "five"; and after the word "dollars" "in legal tender or in the bills of any chartered bank doing business in Canada"; and also after the words "ten dollars" in the twelfth line thereof, the words "and such further sums as the record, at the rate of five cents for every folio of 100 words which it contains, may come to."

The object of this is to compel the petitioner to deposit, not merely $100, but the same sum that every other appellant has to deposit, that is, the sum of $500. $100 goes no way at all towards the payment of the costs of an appeal, and I never could understand why we insist on keeping the deposit at $1,000, and when a suit is instituted we go to the opposite extreme and only require $100 as a deposit in case of an appeal. I, therefore, propose to make that sum $500, as it is in all other matters. That is quite little enough to secure to the respondent, if he is successful, the cost of pressing the appeal. The other amendment is to meet a difficulty which sometimes has resulted in great hardship. The registrar of the court is required by this section to certify the record to the Supreme Court on the payment of $10. Now, he will not do that, he says he cannot do it. The trial may last for days, sometimes a week, and he is not able to get the record of the stenographer's notes, and to certify them to the Supreme Court, for $10, and the result is that, in two cases to my knowledge, he has applied to the court and the court has paid the registrar out of the deposit. So when the successful party comes to get his deposit, he finds it has been absorbed in paying the registrar and the stenogragher for the record of the Court of Appeal. Now, I propose to add to the $10, that the sum of 5 cents per folio of 100 words shall also be paid for the record. The 5 cents is for copying. He has to pay it now, but they have in one or two cases paid the stenographer out of the deposit.

Mr. MULOCK. What right have they to take it out of the deposit?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think they have a right, but the court did it.

Mr. AMYOT. Why does not the hon. gentleman say at once that it will be impossible to resist a bad judgment unless we have $20,000 or $30,000 a year at our disposal? Why does he make it impossible for a poor man to get justice in this country? He might go a step further and that only his own political friends shall be appointed judges, and then we would not be allowed to go to appeal, and so he might provide by law that he shall remain in power for 50 years more.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understand the hon. gentleman proposes that instead of the sum of $100 being required as a deposit for going to appeal, the deposit must be $500. I am entirely opposed to that. I do not see why any more than $100 should be deposited. The hon. gentleman must recollect that respondents and petitioners are not all millionaires, and if the respondent who has already suffered a good deal for his country's sake by running an election and paying the expenses perhaps of a contest, then if he takes the case to appeal, and if there happens to be a judgment against him, he has to lose $500 more. I think $100 is quite enough.

Mr. McCARTHY. What if the appeal is against him?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). It does not make any difference. He cannot get the judgment of the highest court of the Dominion without depositing $500. He may be utterly unable to raise the $500. If the judgment of the Court of Appeal is against him, and the costs are against him, you have got your execution. Let him, at all events, get the judgment of the court. Then you have your execution the same as you have against the petitioner. The latter only requires to deposit $1,000, and the costs may amount to $3,000, and the only remedy you have for the balance over the $1,000 is an execution. So with the respondent. I do not believe in throwing obstacles in the way of appeal. I think that the cost in every case ought to be as low as possible. If a man deposits $500 he will never receive a cent of it back, that you may be sure of.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the hon. gentleman keeps looking only at his own side of the case.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No: I can stand it as well as anybody else.

Mr. McCARTHY. I mean the unfortunate respondent, after he has had to pay the election expenses. The hon. gentleman would not be so unjust as to say that if the petitioner appeals he has to deposit a sufficient sum to secure the respondent, but if the respondent appeals he is to be allowed to do so for a sum of $100. We all know that the printing necessary to bring a case to the Supreme Court, and the actual fees of the lawyers, come to that sum, or nearly that sum, much beyond $100. The appellant appeals vexatiously frequently; he puts in $100, and the unfortunate respondent is dragged a step further, and in the end is saddled with a large bill of costs.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Why can he not get this execution?

Mr. McCARTHY. I venture to say that if we called for a return of the petitioners in the election cases now pending, I do not think we would find 5 per cent. of them were worth their salt.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). They do not put up their own money.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then what happens? They can appeal from court to court without giving the slightest security to the respondent against whom they are petitioning. It is to protect the respondent, who, in nine cases out of ten, is able to pay, against actions by the other side that are unequal and unfair. There should be protection to both parties, and litigation should not be permitted without risk to the person initiating it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is a good deal to be said on both sides, and we must be careful not to limit the privilege of appeal to the wealthy alone. We hardly judge matters by the same standard as do the people of Ontario. The sum of $500 is a mere trifle to the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), but it is an enormous amount to the poor fellow who has gone through an election and whose election petition is being protested. The other day in my province there were four or five appeals on preliminary objections alone. $100 was quite sufficient in these cases.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not think of the preliminary cases. This should only apply to appeals against final results. $100 is sufficient for preliminary objections.

Mr. MULOCK. I think we should ascertain the feeling of the Committee in regard to the cost of the main trial. Having decided that, it would guide us as to subsequent proceedings.

Mr. McLEOD. If the party against whom the judgment is given wants to appeal, it is only fair that he should put up the same security in this as in any other case, and $500 is little enough. I do not think it is fair and reasonable to deny the right of appeal to the poor man. The law applies to poor and rich alike. When the case has been tried and the judgment of the court has been given against the party, and the defeated party seeks to get rid of the judgment, he should give sufficient security, $500, to pay the costs.

Mr. CASEY. If this is a matter affecting one side or the other to a petition, as if there were a member's point of view and a petitioner's point of view, I fail to so understand it. It is impossible to tell whether the petitioner or respondent is to be the appellant and has to put up the money. This question is merely one as to how much security should be put up to cover the necessary costs and to prevent vexatious appeals. Whether $500 is the right amount or not, legal gentlemen will be better able to determine than a layman.

Mr. BARRON. I am inclined to support the proposition of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). It is perfectly clear the principle he asks to be adopted is the original principle adopted when the original Act was passed. Then, $100 was required to be put up as security for costs. If that sum is insufficient, and it is clear it is, the party should put up such a sum as would afford security for costs, if we carry out the principle of the Act. $100 may not be too small a sum in the cases pointed out by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) agrees that the cost on preliminary objections should be limited to $100, but that on the ultimate appeal the amount should be $500. The respondent should have more protection than he has at present. I am glad to hear from the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that in 99 cases out of 100 petitioners were men of straw. We all know that such is the fact. I know that in cases not very far away from home men of straw are put up as petitioners. They fail. The sum of $1,000 is not one-fourth of the cost. An execution is obtained, but it is against a man of straw. It is all very well for the member for West Huron to say the person has an execution. An execution against a man of straw is worthless. That is the position in which the respondent is often placed. So I say that the amount should not be $500, but whatever is sufficient to cover the costs. I go further, and say that the petitioner should be a man of standing, and should not only put up $1,000, but fyle an affidavit that he possesses a certain amount of property over and above the amount of his debts, and then we would not have, as is the case now, petitions fyled for the sake of fyling them, and not because any real wrong has been committed.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) points out that the difficulty should be meet by requiring a large deposit on appeal. I think on both sides of the House there has been too much said as if these petitions were like ordinary suits. The Committee must remember that these are not matters of private right. These petitions are prosecuted for reasons that do not very frequently come within private or individual right, and, therefore, they stand on a different footing from other legal rights. There is one danger and that is of petitions of this class falling into the hands of speculative attorneys, who get hold of petitions when men are warm after elections, and do not allow them to use their better judgment in regard to the conduct of those petitions. A speculative attorney can generally control enough funds to deposit $1,000 or $500 for an appeal. The way to strike at him is to make his profits small and cut down the ultimate cost. If by depositing $1,000 he can gain another $1,000 in 6 or 8 months, he will obtain the $1,000 necessary; but if he is only to deposit $100 and only obtains $100, he will not go into the speculation. Whenever petitions are necessary in the public interest, there is always sufficient public interest to furnish the money to carry the case through. The men who carry on petitions are not beggars or paupers. I understand the Committee desire to protect men from vexatious petitions, and this can best be done by reducing the costs that may ultimately be obtained out of these cases.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Whatever may be the experience of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey), I think it is not the speculative attorney who gets up petitions in Ontario. It is a different party altogether. If you deal with the central political organizations that exist in the province, you will do a good deal more towards diminishing the number of petitions, than in dealing with any speculative attorneys. It is not by undertaking to cut down the costs, however desirable that may be, that you will prevent petitions such as we are now discussing. We must begin further back than that. It seems to me, as I suggested the other evening, that in order to diminish the number of petitions, and to make the law a punishment to evil-doers as it was intended to be, instead of a vexatious matter to the innocent, it is necessary that there should be some preliminary step taken to obtain the petition. The petition should be founded upon substantial knowledge on the part of the party petitioning, but where you permit a man living 500 miles away to furnish the money for the petition, without knowing anything of the way in which the election is conducted, and get some person who is a voter to sign the petition, you will always have a large crop of petitions and you will have them on both sides, because one side will find it necessary as a matter of precaution in order to prevent vexatious proceedings on the part of their political opponents. It does seem to me that in order to deal with this matter effectually, we must consider the circumstances under which a petition is to be allowed. I do not agree with my hon. friend behind me who talks about the right of petition being confined to a party who is a substantial property holder. Anyone who has a right to vote in an election ought to have a right to protect his vote and to petition, but you ought to be sure that he has a grievance before you allow him to do so. He ought to make it clear to some one that the grievance exists before he undertakes to exercise that right, in order that by the exercise of that right on his part he may not be doing a grievous wrong to some other person. Of course we know by experience that a Controverted Elections Act is necessary; we know that the trial of controverted elections by the judges is much more efficient than their trial by a Committee of this House. Long experience has shown that to be the case, but in the exercise of that right, and to ensure purity at elections, it is not necessary to adopt proceedings that drive every sensitive man out of public life. It seems to me that we ought to give serious consideration to the circumstances under which the petition is to be allowed in order to deal with this subject. I do not know what may be the views entertained by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), but it seems to me that where a party outside the constituency prepares a petition and goes into the constituency, and invites a party to sign it, and furnishes the money, that he is guilty of maintenance, and that the principles laid down in the case of Bradlaugh vs. Newdegate would apply. I do not think a petition of that kind ought to stand, and I hardly think it will. That is a question to be decided, and which every member having a petition pending against him will have an interest in having fully considered before it is disposed of. Before we can correct such abuses as these that now exist, we ought to provide that the party who petitions has some knowledge of wrong being done on the part of the member or his agents, before he undertakes to institute proceedings against him.

Mr. AMYOT. I will cite an example to the House to bear out the remarks made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills.) As a matter of fact, in one of the counties near Quebec a meeting took place of the friends of the defeated candidate. They had friends gathered from many parishes, and not one of them could find out a single case of corruption, and they there decided not to contest; but after that they received positive orders from Ottawa to contest the election, and a notary living far away from the county, and not having been in the county at the election, was furnished with the money to contest the election, and some of the electors were chosen and consented to sign the petition which is now before the courts. This is one of the numerous instances in which the rights of petitioning have been abused. We should take care in my opinion that no petitions would be taken unless there was a primâ facie case, sufficient to justify a judge to authorize the issue of the petition. When once the petition is in the court, after these precautions are taken, then do not make justice hard to be obtained. Make it as easy as possible to be obtained either by the poor or by the rich. If only a rich man may obtain justice in election matters, or in any other matter, then the principles of justice are wrongly applied. First, insure that no frivolous or vexatious petition can be taken, exact the necessary preliminary affidavits to show that the petitioners know something about what they sign their names to, and then facilitate the proceedings, when once you are sure that the proceedings are not vexatious.

Mr. McCARTHY. I desire to add to what my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has said in reference to the remarks of the member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey). So far as my experience has gone in the profession, I never heard it suggested or suspected that a speculative attorney, or any attorney of any kind, had prompted election petitions for the sake of costs.

Mr. AMYOT. Perhaps you were absent too often.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am speaking of course not with regard to the hon. member who represents the district of Quebec, but I do speak for my own province, and I heartily corroborate what the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has said, as I never knew a case of the kind. I agree also in what he has said that petitions are often prompted by the central political organizations. As a practical means of stopping election petitions the most available thing we can do would be to have them brought on to a speedy trial. I suppose it is within the experience of all of us that election petitions are taken in a great majority of cases, when if the rule which was spoken of by the hon. gentleman who last addressed the Committee was in force, the petition would not be allowed. In the early period of the thirty days the secrets of the opposite party do not leak out, but it is the delay that takes place that allows the secret to leak out, and affords means to the petitioner to prove his case. If the Act was carried out in its integrity as it is in England, and as it ought to be with us, and if the judges were permitted to leave their ordinary work and to be appointed on rota, and allowed to commence the trials forthwith after the election petitions are fyled, because they are issued within five days afterwards, I think we would all find that many of these petitions would be dropped; but if five or six or seven months roll around, during which a man's wife tells somebody, and the bribers tell somebody, everything will have leaked out by which the petition is expected to be sustained. I do not think it would be practicable to insist on such a hard and fast rule that a primâ facie case should be established before a petition is tried; but if the petitions were brought to a speady trial, I think it would be found in many cases that there was not evidence to sustain them, and this would be sufficient to prevent a multiplication of them. As regards maintenance, I think the hon. gentleman's view of the law has a good deal of force in it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would corroborate what my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) has said that it is found in practice that attorneys who are useful in no other cases are useful to promote election petitions. As regards the preliminary step to be taken before fyling the petition, I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for North York is the preferable one, that the petition should be founded upon an affidavit stating that the facts are true to the knowledge of the petitioner, and I think the fyling of an affidavit of that kind would be a wise precaution. I do not agree with the proposed remedy of a speedy trial, because the trial would then take place before the truth came out. I think that is an argument rather in favour of delay. However, we are approaching the hour when most of us are willing to stop work, and I would suggest that the Committee now rise and report progress. It seems that the longer we study the Bill, the greater the crop of suggested amendments, and I think I must appeal to the Committee to consider the propriety of limiting the legislation for this session. I think, perhaps, on the whole I may appeal to it on a future day to limit the present Bill to matters of procedure, leaving the substantive law for consideration next session, at a period when we shall have more time. I suppose we all realize that it is desirable that the House should prorogue some time in October, and I am afraid we cannot do that if we proceed with all the wise suggestions which have been made for amendments in the controverted elections law. In the meantime, I propose that the Committee rise and report progress.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am glad that the hon. gentleman has decided to take the course he mentions. I agree with the suggestion that there should not be too many amendments made to the election law this session; but I think some important amendments which we have made should not be dropped, for instance, that providing that two judges shall try petitions. Then, two or three years ago this House, after a good deal of consideration, decided with reference to treating that an isolated act should not void an election, if it was not done with the knowledge or connivance of the candidate. That principle has been carried a little further this session and applied to other offences committed without the knowledge or connivance of the candidate. If he has tried his best to comply with the law, and to prevent corruption and irregularity, it seems to me a monstrous thing that he should be unseated because some man has paid a dollar to some ragamuffin to vote. I hope the hon. Minister will not drop that provision, which I consider one of the most important of the Bill, and which is intended to protect the candidate who honestly and squarely tries to conform to the law and to avoid committing any offence. In this connection I was going to suggest to the hon. gentleman that his section requires the omission of the words, "contrary to the order," because it is absurd that the candidate should have to go to every elector in the constituency and repeat a positive order. It ought to be sufficient to show that any wrong done was without his sanction or connivance, and that he took all the means possible to prevent it.

Mr. TUPPER. Is that to be retroactive?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No; but it will apply to all cases to be tried.

Mr. TUPPER. That would make it retroactive.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not understand so. Of course, if you are going to legislate in the interest of the man who fyles a petition on spec, so as to make sure that he will get his paltry costs, I can understand you; but if you are removing an unjust anomaly, I want to know why you should not legislate for existing cases. I am going to support that amendment strongly, on the ground of common justice.

Mr. McCARTHY. I wish only to repeat the words of the Minister of Justice, by saying that it does not consort with the dignity of this House to pass what will be an ex post facto law removing disabilities which we have incurred. However right or just it is, it will have a bad appearance with the public if we are found sitting here as an omnipotent body relieving ourselves of the laws under which the last election was held. We may or may not have violated that law; but if parties have commenced proceedings against us based on that law, I think it would be very extraordinary if we should whitewash ourselves here by minimizing the law in the way which the hon. gentleman who last spoke has strongly advocated.

Mr. MULOCK. We are going to do some whitewashing to-morrow.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then, we had better not have any more of it than is absolutely essential. Permit me to add this: When I suggested that an early, speedy trial would have a deterring influence on the fyling of petitions, I was perfectly aware my suggestion was open to the objection the Minister of Justice has mentioned, namely, that it would be because the truth would not get out. But I was answering the appeal made to the House that no petition should be fyled unless a prima facie case was made out. My remedy was at all events not so stringent as that and more in accordance with the spirit of the law that these matters should be disposed of as speedily as possible.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. Has the Government decided to fix a day for the discussion of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That matter will be taken up on Monday. I do not think the members have yet received the evidence and the reports, and I am sure it is not likely that any member has had an opportunity of reading both fully as yet. In view of the importance of the subject, it would be perhaps on the whole better to take it up on Monday, and no time will be lost, as we have plenty of business to keep us occupied in the meantime.

Mr. LAURIER. Then it will be the First Order on Monday, and will be proceeded with from day to day until concluded.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 17th September, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SUBSIDIES OF LAND TO RAILWAY COMPANIES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed resolutions respecting the granting of subsidies therein mentioned to railway companies, and towards the construction of the railways also thereinafter mentioned.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McMULLEN. I understand that the papers in connection with this matter were handed to the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) last evening, and the members generally have not had an opportunity of examining these papers. I would say, however, in the meantime, that it is highly desirable that this House should investigate closely every proposition of this kind to part with our Dominion lands in the North-West. When we look at the map placed on the Table of this House a few days ago and notice the enormous amount of land which has already been given away, the heritage of the people of this Dominion, not only for the present generation, but for generations to come, and when we consider the fact that we have to protect coming generations against enormous taxation, to provide both for the interest and the principle of our heavy debt, it becomes the duty of every lover of his country to closely criticise the grants of land which are proposed to be made to railway companies or to any other companies. When we consider the fact that we have already granted in the North-West 2,000 townships of 23,040 acres each, to railway companies, including the grant made to the Canadian Pacific Railway——

Mr. DEWDNEY. Half of these.

Mr. McMULLEN. Between what is granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway and what has been granted towards the construction of other lines, including the line that we are now discussing, we have granted 47,230,000 acres, and you will find that that amounts to the 2,000 townships of the size that I have mentioned. When we consider further that this amount of land would give a homestead of 160 acres to each of 295,313 settlers, which is more than we have in Manitoba and the North-West altogether, including Indians, half-breeds and children; we will see that it is a very serious matter.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). It is only 10 per cent. of the whole, and that is a small matter for developing 90 per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman says it is only 10 per cent., but let us consider that in connection with the fact that in the Province of Ontario only one-quarter of the land of that province is now under cultivation, that a very large proportion of the best land is not under cultivation, and that we have only about 22,500,000 acres in the province under cultivation, and then let us remember that we have given away over 47,000,000 acres of choice land in the North-West for the purpose of encouraging railways, which is virtually twice as much as the land now under cultivation in the Province of Ontario. I believe both parties in this country, and the people of the country unanimously agreed that it was in the interest of the entire Dominion that the grant of 25,000,000 acres of land towards the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was a prudent policy, as it was desirable that the road should be built; but, Sir, we should have stopped there. We have no right to give away the heritage of the people of this Dominion for the purpose of developing one section of the Dominion at the cost of the whole. In the Province of Ontario, from which I come, we have been called upon to contribute by municipalities, by counties, and as a province, towards the construction of every railway line that has been built outside of the Grand Trunk Railway. I contend, that when we constructed the Canadian Pacific Railway through the North-West, the townships and counties in the North-West should have been called upon to contribute towards the construction of their own local lines, in place of our handing over by piecemeal the inheritance of the people of this Dominion to railway companies, at the cost of the entire people of the country. What has been done in the North-West has been done in the east of Canada, and while hon. gentlemen opposite who have continuously, I may say, I believe in many cases blindly, supported the policy of the Government in this regard, the day is not far distant when the people of this Dominion will bring these men to book for the manner in which they have permitted the heritage of this country to be squandered in the interests of railway companies in the North-West. If the whole territory which has been given away to railway companies were laid out in one block, it would be 24 miles wide and 370 miles long; it would extend from Winnipeg to 10 miles beyond Regina. These figures show what an exceedingly important matter this has become. We know the promises which were made this House years ago by men who claimed to be head and shoulders above ordinary people in statesmanship, such as the late Premier, Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Leonard Tilley. They promised that the heritage which we had in the North-West would continuously contribute towards recouping the people of this Dominion for the vast sums of money they had spent in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and in the development of that country. Now, Sir, where is our inheritance gone? Last year we realized from North-West lands only $16,000 over and above expenses, not including the expenditure for feeding Indians, which amounts to nearly $1,000,000 a year, nor the $773,000 a year spent on the Mounted Police, nor the expenses of North-West Government. So that I contend that the Opposition are discharging an important duty to the people of this country in criticising in a very pointed and searching manner the granting of lands in the North-West, which is virtually the only asset we have now left to meet the enormous debt which has been created for the purpose of constructing that road. The grant now proposed amounts to 17 townships for 62 miles of railway. If we were to run railways through that country 12 miles apart and give the same amount of land towards the construction of each railway, deducting the lands granted to the Hudson's Bay Company and those set apart for school and other purposes, we would give away every acre in the whole country.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). And if you got the roads, it would be a good investment.

Mr. McMULLEN. If my hon. friend thinks so, why did he support the statement made in this House some years ago, that our inheritance in that country was going to remove the debt which has been created for its development?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). We are not afraid of the debt.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not hesitate for a moment to swallow such statements one year, and to swallow themselves when the policy of such statements are exposed another year. For the reasons I have given, we consider it necessary to criticise these grants, and I hope that this one will receive, at the hands of the members of this House, the criticism it deserves.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of the Interior was good enough last night to lend me the map and a number of documents which he had laid on the Table. I was anxious to study them, so as to be able to give an intelligent opinion upon this resolution; but I had no idea that it would be made the first order to-day. It was impossible, after the House rose last night, to examine them fully, and to-day I had other work for a portion of the time, so that I have not been able to examine more than a portion of these papers. But so far as I have been able to examine the Order in Council, a great mistake seems to have been made. I have not got far enough in the examination of the papers to find out whether it is explained or not; but it would appear that the Government have granted 100,000 acres of land more than the Order in Council or the Act of Parliament warranted. I do not find anything to authorize more than 4,000 acres a mile on 100 miles; and according to the report of Mr. Burgess 740,000 acres have been conveyed. It may be that the papers explain this. I also find that the Order in Council purports to convey land for a line, the location of which was different from that defined by Act of Parliament, and I am at a loss to understand how that grant can stand good.

Mr. HAGGART. That is what we are asking Parliament to confirm now.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not approve of that system. I think legislation must control. I do not see what right the Governor in Council has to change the location of a railway after Parliament has agreed to a particular location, and to convey land to the company upon the changed location. This Order in Council seems to take a liberty with the legislation of this House. So far as I can see, there is no pledge of Parliament to a grant of land in favour of the direction in which the line was constructed. I do not wish now to express any final opinion from my partial examination of the papers, but so far as I have been able to read them, I cannot see that there is any contract between us and the railway company.

Mr. HAGGART. The increase in the subsidy from 6,400 acres to 7,483 acres per mile, is easily explained. The first grant was 6,400 acres a mile on 152 miles of the Schultz railway. The company completed in the first place 22 miles, and then came to the Government for a portion of the grant; and the Government, in order to ensure the construction of the remainder, said: We will give nothing on the 22 miles, but we will divide the 900,000 acres on the other 130 miles to be completed. That makes 7,483 acres per mile for the 130 miles. They completed the 100 miles for which they were entitled then to the 748,300 acres, and left unfinished the 30 miles of the gap between Elm River and Manitou, which was entitled by the new arrangement to 7,483 acres per mile, which was transferred over by the Order in Council of April, 1885, to the two portions or extension of the line from Elmswater towards the line that was extended south-westerly from Brandon and also westerly on the South-Western Railway. The confirmation of that is what is asked under the present resolution, also the difference between the amount of acreage transferred to the 30 miles and the 6,400 acres per mile on the amount finished.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not wish to discuss the matter to-day, for I do not feel in a position to do so; but, from the statement that has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman, it would appear that there can be no valid contract at present between Parliament and the company, and it strikes me, at the very threshold of the whole consideration is the question: Are we now free to do as Parliament chooses in its wisdom, or are we bound by any contract? The two positions are wholly different, and, therefore, the question cannot be properly decided until that matter is thoroughly discussed.

Mr. HAGGART. We are bound by the Order in Council in which we agreed to the transfer to the Canadian Pacific Railway of certain lands. That Order in Council is subject to the approval of Parliament, and is here for your approval.

Mr. MULOCK. As a member of Parliament, I cannot recognize any Order in Council binding Parliament to part with public money or property unless Parliament has sanctioned it. I do not consider that because a company chooses to run the risk of an Order in Council being confirmed, that Parliament is hampered at all by that transaction. The Government have no right to put Parliament in the position of being told that because the Government have chosen to pledge the credit of the country without the authority of Parliament, and the company, relying upon that pledge, has chosen to go on and do certain works, Parliament will be acting in bad faith if it does not ratify what the Government promised. The Cabinet has no right to pledge Parliament in this way. Otherwise, why have a Parliament at all? If that is what has taken place, there has been an entire departure from the proper system of Government, and Parliament is not left free to decide. The Government might just as well pay out money or convey lands away and afterwards apply to Parliament to ratify their act. It is another extension of the system of Governor General's warrants and is practically ignoring all the rights of Parliament. The Government first create obligations, and then come down and tell us it is too late, that we have no option and must ratify what has taken place. The Order in Council is an absolute nullity to begin with, and as such is incapable of ratification. We ought to be free to deal with a question like this wholly untrammelled by what has taken place. I do not wish to discuss the matter on its merits at present. I did not expect the Minister would have pressed it now. I shall not ask for any further consideration now; but when the time comes at various stages we will have opportunities for discussion, and I, therefore, will say no more on the subject at present. I can only say that the reading which takes place to-day of this resolution cannot be considered as anything more than a most formal one given by the House in Committee without our having really knowledge of all the rights and the circumstances. The Minister of the Interior will now understand that the statement he made, no doubt in the best of faith, was unsound in law. He said there was a bargain. If he meant by a bargain a legal obligation, I venture to say he is in error.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I do not object to the line of criticism the hon. gentleman has taken, and I expected to have been in my seat when the order was called. I am perfectly aware that the subject does require very close reading in order to understand the position. With reference to the hon. gentleman's criticism of the Order in Council, he must recollect that there has not been a single land grant given to a railway except in the way this has been given, that is by Order in Council being passed subject to the approval of Parliament. Not an acre is transferred to any railway company until we have the statutory authority of Parliament, and that is exactly the case with regard to this matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The papers came down yesterday and were handed to the hon. member for North York. I have not had the opportunity of seeing them at all, but I desire to say that I hope to have an opportunity at a further stage of the discussion.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand that at the further stages the point will not be raised that the Committee has accepted the principle, but it is understood that the reading now is merely formal.

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is the understanding.

The Committee rose and reported resolutions.

THE MEMBER FOR EAST NORTHUMBERLAND.

Mr. SKINNER moved:

That the second report of the Select Committee appointed to enquire fully into certain charges preferred against the member for the East Riding of the County of Northumberland, and submitted to the House on the 15th September instant, be adopted.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman not going to explain the report?

Mr. SKINNER. The hon. gentleman has read the report.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to know your reasons for asking us to adopt it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is indefensible, and he cannot give reasons.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I regret very much that the hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution has not seen fit to explain the reasons to the House why he makes this motion. The papers were only submitted to Parliament last night, the evidence and report were only distributed last night; and I venture to say that very few members of the House have had an opportunity of reading the evidence contained in these reports. I think it would have been well if the hon. member had seen his way to explain the report that he asks Parliament to adopt. This is an important case, one of the very few cases of the kind ever submitted to the Parliament of Canada, and it deserves the gravest possible consideration. It ought to be treated, so far as it is possible on the floor of Parliament, in a purely judicial spirit. So far as I am concerned, I have no desire to do otherwise, nor shall I do otherwise. I may find it my duty to call the attention of Parliament to the charges which have been made against the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane), and to point out, as shortly as circumstances will justify, the evidence which leads me to an entirely different conclusion to that at which the majority of the Committee has arrived. I have read the report of the majority, and I have read the evidence from beginning to end, I had the advantage of hearing the witnesses, and marking their conduct under examination and cross-examination, and I shall find it my duty to draw the attention of Parliament to such portions of the evidence as in my judgment may lead the country to a right conclusion on this matter. I propose to close my observations by moving an amendment in the sense that the motion of the hon. gentleman be not concurred in, but that another report be adopted in lieu thereof. I shall not read the report at present, and perhaps not at all, as the report is a long one, and at this period of the session I do not desire to trespass upon the attention of Parliament more than is necessary to submit to Parliament the important points of the case and the evidence which I conceive bears upon those points. I have read with care the report presented by the majority of the Committee and signed by the chairman; I have read it with that deliberation which I think every man ought to bring to bear when he is considering a case which seriously affects the standing of a member of Parliament. One of the charges was that, the position of lighthouse keeper at Presqu'Isle Point being vacant, a man of the name of Hedley Simpson made application for it, and that it was corruptly agreed by the member for East Northumberland that the position should be given to Hedley Simpson on payment of the amount of $200. It is not necessary that the agreement should have been made directly with the member for East Northumberland, if it was made with his authority. In the report this statement is made in regard to that charge, that Hedley Simpson voluntarily contributed $200 to pay an election debt. It is admitted on all hands, it was not disputed before the Committee, that Hedley Simpson applied for the office. It was admitted that before he secured the office he paid the $200. It is said that this was paid for the purpose of retiring in part a promissory note given for election purposes, for the purpose of paying some costs in connection with an election protest in the Local Legislature. It is not denied that the money was given or that the office was secured, but it is said that the contribution was a purely voluntary one for election purposes. It turns out, by the evidence, that the name of the member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was upon that promissory note, not the original promissory note which was made eight years ago, but the note for $619.69 which was given later. The hon. member was responsible for paying that note, and this $200 of Hedley Simpson was not a voluntary contribution for election purposes but was used to pay that note. Without saying any more than any person would say in conducting a criminal case before any court in Canada, I venture to say that no one will find in the evidence a syllable which will justify such a finding as the majority of the Committee arrived at. The evidence of Hedley Simpson shows the contrary, and I shall venture to trouble the House with a few extracts from that evidence, and then I will leave it to the House to judge whether it was a voluntary contribution or was one exacted on account of the appointment at Presqu'Isle Point. I may mention that James Stanley was a prominent Conservative in East Northumberland, and that eight years ago the Conservative party in East Northumberland became responsible for over $1,000 for election purposes in connection with the election of the Local Legislature. Originally the amount was $1,700, but it was reduced afterwards. Several attempts were made to wipe off that liability, but they were unable to wipe it off, and at the time this transaction took place the sum of $619.69 of that indebtedness still remained outstanding. That indebtedness was secured by a promissory note made by three or four prominent Conservatives, among others by the member for East Northumberland. Three or four Conservatives constituted themselves a committee for the purpose of raising money to pay off that indebtedness, and the mode that was adopted for that purpose, according to the evidence, was by trafficking in four or five positions upon bridges upon the Murray Canal, and by this lighthouse at Presqu'Isle Point. This committee met at the store of a person named Bullock; this committee, according to printed documents and other evidence, disposed of this lighthouse and other positions for a consideration. Whether the member for East Northumberland was cognizant of that, is another question and depends entirely upon the evidence submitted to the Committee, and now in the hands of members of this House. Upon that subject I quote the evidence of Hedley Simpson, one of the appointees to said office:

129. What did you send Stanley to Cochrane for? Out with it now?—For the appointment.

130. You sent Stanley to Cochrane for the appointment? What appointment was that?—For the lights.

133. I am going to ask you, had you not an interview about the getting of this appointment when you gave these notes?—Certainly.

134. You had in view the getting of the appointment when you gave the notes?—Yes.

139. Would you have given the notes without some understanding about getting the appointment?—Well, I do not understand how I could have paid them.

140. You would not have rendered yourself liable for the notes unless you had got the office that would have enabled you to pay them?—No.

I may mention here before proceeding further, that this $200 was paid, not in cash at the moment, but by giving two promissory notes for $100 each, and that was one of the stipulations made by Stanley upon compliance with which the position of lighthouse keeper was to be given. He gave two promissory notes which were discounted by this James Stanley, and the cash was paid by Stanley.—

141. Would you have given these two $100 notes unless you had got this office to pay for them?—No, I do not think I would.

142. Out of what sum did you expect to pay the notes?—I had no funds.

143. When you gave the notes how did you expect to pay for them?—I expected to pay for them out of the salary I got for the lighthouse.

144. Is that the way you paid them?—Yes.

146. You had not the promise of the appointment, but you expected to pay the notes out of the proceeds of the office?—I did.

147. Then if you had not the promise, did you think it likely you would get the office?—I had no straight promise, but I expected to get it.

149. If you had thought you would not have got the office would you have given the notes?—I could not have paid them if I had not got the office.

150. They would not have been much use if you had not got the office?—No.

151. You could not have paid the notes if you had not got the office?—No.

152. You would not have given them any way?—I could not have paid them unless I had got the office.

195. Did you ever subscribe before this to the party funds?—No.

196. This is the only occasion, according to you, that you ever subscribed?—Yes.

Now, how can any hon. gentleman say that this was a purely voluntary subscription on the part of Hedle Simpson when out of Simpson's own mouth it is shown that he paid $200 for the lights, that he never had subscribed before for political purposes, and that that was the first time he had ever paid a single dollar? On this occasion this poor man, a man of no means, gave $200, although he was not able to pay one single farthing of that money unless he got the lights. The salary was $400 a year, and this man, in order to secure this $400 a year, had to pay the party $200 in two promissory notes. Now, I would like to know upon what evidence the report of the majority can be affirmed, or upon what evidence it can be justified? It is further stated in the report:

"The said Edward Cochrane not being a party to the original note, and in no way responsible for its payment."

It is true that Mr. Cochrane was in no way responsible for the original note of $1,000, but four or five years ago he became responsible for a part of the original note, the residue of the original note having been satisfied by the Conservative party. He became responsible for $619.69, and the evidence will show that the $200 that Simpson paid was applied in reduction of the promissory note by just so much, and by just so much the member for East Northumberland was relieved from his responsibility on that note. The moment that $200 was paid, as the evidence clearly discloses, that moment the member for East Northumberland ceased to be responsible for any more; his share of that indebtedness was paid, and the other makers of the promissory note became responsible for the balance by a renewal, or something of that kind. At all events, Mr. Cochrane's responsibility then ceased. Then there is another charge in the impeachment presented against the member for East Northumberland, namely, that the office of bridge-tender was sold to a person by the name of Wesley Goodrich, in consideration of $200 in cash, and the giving of a life lease on his farm by Wesley Goodrich to a person by the name of Obadiah Simpson. Obadiah Simpson, as appears by the evidence, had been promised the position of bridge-tender upon the Murray Canal by Mr. Cochrane—so it is alleged, at all events; but Obadiah Simpson was a very old man, about 80 years of age, and it is shown by the evidence that when the time came for making the appointment, it was thought that Obadiah Simpson was too old, but Mr. Cochrane, in his good nature, undertook to provide that whoever got the position of bridge-tender should provide for Obadiah Simpson, and it is alleged, and the evidence sustains it, that Wesley Goodrich got the bridge upon condition of his giving a life lease of the farm owned by his wife to Obadiah Simpson, and his paying $200 in hard cash, and he fulfilled both these conditions. Now, the finding of the majority of the Committee upon that point is as follows:—

"That the only evidence which goes to substantiate even a portion of such a charge, was the evidence of one Arundel R. Simpson, and the Committee find, for reasons best known to the Committee, that the evidence of Arundel Simpson is not to be believed."

In other words, that he was not a credible witness. Now, whether fortunately or unfortunately, I know not and care not, but the fact remains all the same, that the charge does not rest entirely upon the evidence of Arundel Simpson. If it rested upon the evidence of Arundel Simpson, and if Arundel Simpson were a credible witness, the charge would be clearly proved; but the majority of the Committee say that the evidence of Arundel Simpson is not to be believed. But hon. gentlemen will find that the evidence of another witness confirms the story told by Arundel Simpson, beyond any reasonable doubt, that is, the evidence of Wesley Goodrich himself. He was put in the witness box, and he detailed the story as he understood it. Among other things he says:

"You have just told me, I think, that you told Mr. Cochrane you were willing to give a life lease of your farm for a bridge; is that so?—Mr. Cochrane mentioned to me that there was a man by the name of King who wanted a bridge. I said I would give $200 at that time."

I may say, without going any further, that there was not a witness called from the beginning to the end of the investigation that I know of who was not a pronounced Conservative, and a supporter of the hon. member for East Northumberland. The report declares that these men were prominent Conservatives. No attempt was made to discredit a single one of them. It is true that on a minor point the evidence of Simpson was contradicted, but it was on a minor point and of no consequence as regards reaching a proper conclusion. In Goodrich's testimony we read:

3691. You have just told me, I think, that you told Mr. Cochrane you were willing to give a life lease of your farm for a bridge? Is that so?—Mr. Cochrane mentioned to me that there was a man by the name of King who wanted a bridge. Then I said I would give $200 at that time.

Recollect that this is a conversation which took place between Goodrich, a friend and supporter of Mr. Cochrane, and Mr. Cochrane. Here he swears that Mr. Cochrane told him, speaking of the selling of the bridges and what he was to give for them, what I have read. He is asked by counsel:

3692. For the bridge?—For the bridge.
3698. You did pay the $200?—I did, sir.
3699. That was before you gave the lease?—Yes, sir.
3700. To whom did you pay the $200?—I paid it to Mr. Edward Cochrane.
3701. To the member for the east riding of Northumberland?—Yes. It was more convenient for me to go to him than to Mr. Wade. Wade's was a long way out of my way. He told me to take it to Mr. Payne when I offered it to him.
3702. Who told you?—Mr. Cochrane. I said to him, "Are you not going to Colborne soon? It is out of my way if I have to go on purpose." He said, "Wallace is going to-night with the grist.' The team was standing in the yard and I suggested that perhaps Wallace would take it up. He said he could. Wallace went for his overcoat, and I took the money out of my pocket and asked him to count it.
3703. Whom did you ask to count it?—Mr. Cochrane.
3705. What did you give that $200 for? What value did you get for it?—I got the situation—the bridge.
3706. And that is what you gave the money for?—I suppose if you put it in that way, I don't know any other. Mr. Wade told me he was holding it for some money he wanted to realize on it.

There is the evidence of the man who paid the money, who swore point-blank to the fact that he paid the money to Mr. Cochrane. It is true that Mr. Wallace Cochrane was called, and swore that he did not get the money from the hands of his father, but out of the hands of Wesley Goodrich. In so far as my judgment is concerned, it does not appear to me to make any particular difference. Goodrich swore that he went to Mr. Cochrane with $200; Goodrich swore tha the offered it to Mr. Cochrane; Goodrich swore that Mr. Cochrane did not want the money and told him to take it down to Mr. Payne, solicitor for the Conservative committee, to help to pay the party debt. He swore further that he took the money out of his pocket and handed the money to Mr. Cochrane, that he asked him to count it, that Mr. Cochrane did count it, and gave it to his son, Wallace Cochrane, to take to Mr. Payne. Wallace Cochrane swore that his father did not hand him the money but that Goodrich handed him the money. That certainly is no contradiction which would lead sensible and reasonable men to come to the conclusion that the evidence of Wesley Goodrich had failed. No attempt was made to break down the evidence. Above all, if this were not true, the person who could throw all possible light on the subject was the member for East Northumberland, and he did not pledge his oath to the incorrectness or falsity of a single statement made from the beginning to the end of the investigation. He was not examined. Counsel refused to put him in the box. Although these statements made by his neighbours and friends and appointees to office swore away his character and reputation as a member of Parliament, Mr. Cochrane did not see fit to enter the box and give evidence on his own behalf. Then it is stated further in this report that Goodrich gave the money voluntarily. Hon. members heard the evidence I read, the sworn evidence of Goodrich himself. He was asked: What did you give the money for? He answered: It was given for the position. He was asked: Given for the bridge? He replied: It was given for the bridge. Yet the majority of the Committee state in the report that it was a voluntary contribution on the part of Wesley Goodrich. A voluntary contribution! Is it at all likely, is it possible it can be so? Have my eyes been blinded, so that I am not able to read the English language printed here, or has some one else been blinded? Either the majority or the minority of the Committee must have been blinded, because the evidence was clear and the story was true. There are three or four other charges. There are Clouston, Brown and Robert May, each of whom obtained a position as bridge-tender on the Murray Canal, the two first contributing $150 each, the last named, Robert May, contributing $125. It is stated in the report of the majority of the Committee that these contributions were voluntary contributions, and were not given for the purpose of relieving the makers of the note, including the member for East Northumberland, but were contributions for political purposes. The finding of the majority of the Committee is that:

"The said Clouston and Brown each voluntarily stated that he would pay $150, and the said Robert May voluntarily stated he would pay $125 towards payment of such indebtedness, and afterwards the said Clouston paid about $100, and the said Brown and Robert May each paid $150 for such purpose."

If there was a scintilla of evidence on which to base that conclusion I would not be standing here to-day proposing to move an amendment to the report of the majority of the Committe. I believe no man, be he member or not, should be convicted of a grave charge like this unless the evidence is direct, strong and conclusive. Of course, we have a right to convict, as a jury has a right to convict, on circumstantial evidence if it leads to but one conclusion, and that is that the charge has been proven. Fortunately for the ends of justice the evidence is direct and it is positive, and it is given without any hesitation; and although it was given reluctantly by friends and neighbours of the hon. member for East Northumberland, it appears to have been given truthfully and honestly. So far as I was individually concerned, I had no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that these men swore what they honestly believed to be the truth, and what was the truth. If there was contradiction, it was only on unimportant matters, and in no way affected the general result. It is said that these men made large contributions, $150 and $125, for political purposes. If you, Mr. Speaker, had been present and seen the men you would without a moment's hesitation have come to the conclusion that this story was not correct. They were labouring men. One declared he had a wife and large family, and was living on his daily earnings, and had nothing to support himself with except his daily labour. Clouston gave evidence strong, clear and distinct on the subject of his own position, and as to whether it was a voluntary contribution or not. He said:

2023. Did you pay anything?—I suppose I did.
2024. Do you swear you paid a farthing?—Yes, sir.
2025. When?—I think on two different occasions I gave a dollar.
2026. On two different occasions you subscribed a dollar on the reduction of this indebtedness?—Yes.

Some seven or eight years ago he subscribed one dollar and some three years ago he subscribed another dollar, and yet we are asked to believe that all at once he subscribed $150 for political purposes. Mr. Clouston did not say that, and you will find on reading his evidence that Mr. Clouston would not have given a farthing had he not got the bridge. What does Will Brown say? Does he say that he paid this contribution for political purposes? No. He was asked:

2689. How long before this had you made any contributions to the party funds?—Several years before. It was when there was a protest.
2694. Do you remember how much you gave on that occasion?—I gave $2.
2695. The next payment was $150?—Yes, sir.
2696. Then an interval of 6 or 7 years had elapsed before the first subscription of $2, and the last subscription of $150?—A little length of time: I do not know what it was. It was the time the protest was going on, whatever time that was.
2697. Did you happen to be aware all these years that the party was in debt for these costs?—Was I aware of it? Yes.
2698. All these years you had not contributed anything since the $2 contribution?—No, I had not.

And yet, Sir, all at once, on the spur of the moment, this man is said to have contributed $150 to pay off the debt of the party. Even in that case, Mr. Speaker, I say it is wholly unjustifiable that men in the position these men were in, applicants for a bridge and recommended by the committee I have spoken of, should have been asked to make these donations in reduction of a debt for part of which the hon. member for the riding was responsible. Now, Sir, the motion I propose to move in amendment to this report sets out the facts as gathered by the minority from the evidence submitted to the Committee. It is set out in this report:

2. That the said Edward Cochrane, while he was such member, was and is a supporter of the Administration, and as such had the patronage of the Administration for Government offices in and for said riding.
3. That certain leading Conservatives in said riding, in or about the year 1883, assumed certain liabilities for certain debts, amounting to about $1,000, for certain costs arising out of a certain protested election for the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

4. That such liability, or portion of it, continued down to the year 1890 or 1891.

5. That the said Edward Cochrane, with others, was liable for $619.69 of said debt down until and after the payment by Hedley Simpson, hereinafter mentioned, was made.

6. That about four years ago certain electors of said riding, viz., Messrs. May, Adam, Stanley, Lawson and Bullock constituted themselves a committee for the purpose of raising money to pay off said debt, and the mode they adopted was by recommending certain persons to said Edward Cochrane as fit and proper persons to fill certain Government offices, the said Edward Cochrane then recommending such persons to the Government as fit and proper persons to fill said offices, the persons so recommended agreeing to pay a certain price or sum for said offices.

7. That the said Edward Cochrane was not a member of the said committee, but he knew of the purpose and object of its existence; attended one or more of its meetings, when matters relating to said offices were discussed; acted on the committee's recommendations, and when persons made applications to him for offices he referred them to the said committee for a recommendation, which he acted on.

Now, Sir, is that statement true or false? Is there any independent, impartial testimony upon which it can be shown, that although the member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was not a member of the committee, that he was cognizant of its existence, knew of the object and purpose of its existence, and that he attended one at least of its meetings when these very questions were discussed? If that is true, I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, it brings the matter home very close to the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane). We have upon that subject the evidence of a man by the name of Mr. Bullock, a merchant residing in the village where the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) principally does his business. He is favourable, politically, to the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane), and one naturally would suppose that he would be inclined, so far as would be consistent with his oath, to colour his evidence if he coloured at all, in favour of his member and his friend. Mr. Bullock gives the following testimony. I regret to trouble the House with these extracts; but as the report of the majority of the Committee is altogether contrary to what my judgment leads me to believe it ought to be, I beg to trouble the House with extracts from the evidence sustaining my views on the subject. Mr. Bullock is a resident of the county, a storekeeper in whose store the meetings of the committee were held, and a leading party man in the neighbourhood. He gives the following evidence:—

2406. What were the duties of that committee?—The duties of the committee were to see if we could not appoint somebody on the canal for the bridges there.

2407. How much were each of them to give?—We exacted $150 from every one of them. That is what we wanted.

2409. What was the $150 to be given for?—It was to be given for our influence.

2411. Who was to give $150?—Everybody who got the appointment.

2420. It was the rule that those who were applicants should pay $150?—I think it was.

2516. Did you say that the committee met there after the store was closed?—Yes.

2517. And Mr. Cochrane was there when the committee met?—Yes.

2518. For the whole of the time?—No: not when they were meeting.

2519. Oh, well, did he come in afterwards?—Yes; he came in after the committee met.

2524. Where did the committee transact its business in the store?—I believe it was right in the open store.

2525. Right in there in the main part of the store?—Yes.

2526. And that is where Mr. Cochrane came?—Yes.

2527. Mr. Cochrane was in there with the committee?—Yes; but he was not on the committee.

2529. You have sworn that Mr. Cochrane was there?—Yes.

2530. And you have sworn that he was there while the committee were there?—Yes; that's true.

2548. I mean the committee. What business did the committee do that night?—They talked over different questions about the bridges.

2549. How long did Mr. Cochrane remain?—As far as my knowledge goes, he did not remain very long.

2554. I suppose the discussion was going on while he was there?—The discussion was going on. Yes.

2555. The talk about the bridges was going on while he was there?—Yes.

2556. You were talking about the men who would get the appointments and the amounts they were to pay?—Certainly.

1040. You did tell Mr. Cochrane that Hedley Simpson gave $200?—Yes.

1041. How long after this was it?—I do not know.

1042. Would it be a week?—It might.

That is part of the evidence, and only part of the evidence, Mr. Speaker, that shows the connection between the hon. member for East Northumberland and this committee, a committee recognized by him, a committee not appointed by him but whose functions were well known to him; a committee to which he refers, according to the evidence as it appears in the testimony submitted to Parliament, and to which he referred every single applicant for an office on the Murray Canal. I shall not deal with all the charges because I feel they are too lengthy and would take up too much time, and I will leave that to other gentlemen who may speak after me. I shall, however, refer to the charge of Hedley Simpson. As I have mentioned, the charge with respect to him was that he was appointed lighthouse keeper at Presqu'Isle Point, and that in consideration of his being so appointed he paid the sum of $200. That might all be, and the hon. member for East Northumberland not be implicated; that might all be and the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) might know nothing about it. We have the evidence, however, and the only way to settle that point is by a short reference to a portion of the testimony that bears upon it. We have the evidence upon the subject of James Stanley, whose name I have already mentioned, and who is a leading man on that committee and had a good deal to do with the negotiations. Stanley says this:

693. Then how did Mr. Simpson come to be appointed?—Well, he was recommended by the committee.

694. To whom did the committee recommend Mr. Simpson?—I suppose to Mr. Cochrane.

695. How did this recommendation come from the committee to Mr. Cochrane?—Verbally, I suppose.

696. Then, if verbally, who talked?—Mr. Cochrane happened to be in town, I suppose, and they told him.

702. But you think you did see him in regard to the appointment of Mr. Hedley Simpson, after all this money was paid?—I don't know whether it was before or after.

703. But at all events, either before or after, you did see Mr. Cochrane?—Yes; I may have seen him before or after, but I don't know.

714. Did Mr. Cochrane know anything about the payment of this money?—I don't think he did at the time.

715. Well, when did he?—I think it was some time after.

716. How long after?—I cannot tell you.

717. How did he come to know it?—I don't know but what I told him myself.

718. You might have told him yourself?—I think I did.

720. How long afterwards?—I cannot tell you,

721. Before the appointment was made?—I cannot tell you whether it was before or after.

722. But you do remember now that you had a conversation with Mr. Cochrane, and Mr. Cochrane knew from you that the $200 were paid?—I don't say that. I say I may have had before or after; I don't remember.

There is the evidence given before the Committee by a friend and supporter of Mr. Cochrane, that not only was this done, but Mr. Cochrane was cognizant of the fact, so far as his recollection went, that $200 was paid by Hedley Simpson for some purpose. The case does not stand alone on the evidence of Stanley; the testimony of Hedley Simpson himself corroborates it. Pending the negotiations for this office between Mr. Cochrane, Stanley and Simpson, Mr. Cochrane wrote to Hedley Simpson a letter, which he sent by the hands of Arundel Simpson, to his relative, Hedley Simpson. In that letter, according to Arundel Simpson's story, it was stated by Mr. Cochrane that on the payment of $200 the office would be given to Hedley Simpson. The witness says that Hedley Simpson did not read the letter, but he carried it to Herbert Simpson, and Herbert Simpson's wife opened it and read it. I am bound to say that Arundel Simpson does not say positively that she read it, but he thinks she did. At all events, he said that some one read it, and he got that information out of it. The woman denies having read the letter, but Hedley Simpson thinks she did, and he swears whether she read it or not, it was a letter from Mr. Cochrane to Hedley Simpson; and Mr. Cochrane did not go into the witness box and deny that he sent that letter nor the contents of it. Now, Arundel Simpson says:

309. I ask you if you had any conversation with Mr. Cochrane, the member, in regard to the appointment of Mr. Hedley Simpson to a position of lighthouse keeper at Presqu'Isle?—Well, along in March I think. I think his father died in October, and I gave him a letter from Mr. Cochrane.

310. Did you see that letter?—No: I saw the letter, but I did not know what was in it. I could not tell you what what was in it.

311. Was that letter read in your presence?—I don't knew as it was. I don't think it was; I could not swear positively, it is quite a while ago.

312. Did Mr. Cochrane tell you what was in the letter?—He told me it was concerning the lighthouse, and wanted to know if I would send the letter to Mr. Hedley Simpson, for him to come and see him.

1857. You say Mr. Cochrane sent you with the letter to your relative Hedley?—Yes.

1860. Did you see Mr. Cochrane after he got the letter?—Yes.

1861. Now in the eighth paragraph of the declaration you said: "Subsequently said Cochrane sent to the said Hedley H. Simpson by me a letter in which it was stated that said Hedley H. Simpson would be required, in order to secure the said appointment, to give security for the payment of $200, which letter I delivered to the said Hedley H. Simpson." How did you know the statement that was in the letter?—Well, I took the letter down to Herbert Simpson; he stays at Whitney, and he said that he would have to pay the money, 1862. Were you there when the letter was read?—Yes.

1863. The letter was read by whom?—I think it was read in the first place by Herbert Simpson's wife. She is the one who read the letter first, I think.

1865. You say that was what was in the letter?—That is what they told me was in the letter. That is what would be required in order to get the appointment.

Mrs. Simpson's statement that she did not read it is the sole contradiction of Arundel Simpson's evidence. But the fact remains that Arundel Simpson swears that he took the letter there, and the purport of it was that if Hedley Simpson would give $200 he would get the lighthouse, and Mr. Cochrane does not deny it. As to the price paid for the office by Hedley Simpson, the evidence of Arundel Simpson is clear, if it can be relied on. It is as follows:—

324. Mr. Cochrane told you that Snetsinger offered him something?—Yes.

325. How much did he say?—I would not be positive, either $400 or $600.

This man Snetsinger was an applicant for the lighthouse, and Arundel Simpson swears that Mr. Cochrane told him that he had offered either $400 or $600 for it.—

326. He said that Snetsinger offered him, either $400 or $600 for the appointment?—I would not be positive which; he told me it was quite an amount.

330. What did he say?—He said that Hedley would get it for $200.

332. Tell us what he said?—He said he would get it for $200.

1812. Who is "he"?—Mr. Snetsinger. He said Mr. Snetsinger would give $600 for the lighthouse, and they only got $200. Cochrane said that to me in the store. He did not say he offered him; he said he would give it. But that Hedley only gave $200.

1813. But that he (Cochrane) would secure the appointment of said Hedley H. Simpson for a good deal less than $600?—He did secure it. This was long after, as Mr. Cochrane knows.

This is not all the evidence by any means or, perhaps, the most important; but it is sufficient evidence, I submit, to show that the report of the Committee is not in accordance with the evidence. There is another charge, namely, that Wesley Goodrich paid $200 and gave a life lease of his farm to secure the appointment of bridge-tender on the Murray Canal. I do not wish to make any observations on that charge; I only wish to submit the evidence given in support of it by the sworn witnesses, all of whom were supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite and friends of the hon. member for East Northumberland. I may say, in fairness to myself, that I am only quoting those portions of the evidence which have a direct bearing on the case, as some portions were wholly irrelevant. On that charge Arundel Simpson swears as follows:—

1519. Did you see Mr. Stanley in 1889, in regard to getting an appointment as bridge-keeper?—I did.

1524. Did he say anything about your getting one?—He said that I could get one by looking after my father and giving him $150.

1528. Did you afterwards see Mr. Cochrane about it?—He saw me about it.

1529. Mr. Cochrane did?—Yes.

1530. You met Mr. Cochrane in Brighton?—Yes.

1531. What took place between you and Mr. Cochrane? Did he send for you?—He called me into the room.

1532. Where was this—in the hotel?—In Mr. Stanley's hotel.

This is the same Stanley who was one of the members of the committee and one of the leading Conservatives in the riding.—

1533. What did he say to you?—He said they had made different arrangements about the bridge. That they were going to make some arrangements for fifty acres of land for my father, and let some one else have the bridge.

1541. What else did he say?—He said that Mr. Stanley could not pay off $900 with four bridges at $150 apiece.

At that time the debt of the Conservative party had been reduced to $900, for which a note was outstanding, and according to the evidence of Arundel Simpson Mr. Cochrane said that Mr. Stanley could not pay off the $900 note with four bridges at $150 each.—

1542. Where was that said to you?—At Mr. Stanley's hotel.

1543. By Mr. Cochrane?—By Mr. Cochrane.

1544. The member for East Northumberland?—Yes.

1691. Did he tell you anything more?—He said, that Mr. Stanley said, they could not pay off $900 with four bridges at $150 each. Mr. Stanley could not pay it off with that amount.

1833. What else were you to do?—I was to get the money for him, I suppose.

1834. Any other condition?—From Mr. Stanley? I don't know as there was, except to see my father—maintain my father.

1846. How much had he paid?—Who had paid?

1847. Whoever had been appointed?—He said that he could get more for it. He could get $200.

1848. No, no; you said before that he could not pay off $900 with four bridges at $150. What did Mr. Cochrane say?—About the bridge?

1849. Yes.—That is what he told me; he could not pay off with four bridges.

1850. Is that all?—He said something about getting more from this man; that is $200.

Now, Wesley Goodrich himself makes use of similar language on the same subject:

3691. You have just told me, I think, that you told Mr. Cochrane you were willing to give a life lease of your farm for a bridge? Is that so?—Mr. Cochrane mentioned to me that there was a man by the name of King who wanted a bridge. Then I said I would give $200 at that time.

3692. For the bridge?—For the bridge.

3698. You did pay the $200?—I did, sir.

3699. That was before you gave the lease?—Yes, sir.

3700. To whom did you pay the $200?—I paid it to Mr. Edward Cochrane.

3701. To the member for the East Riding of Northumberland?—Yes. It was more convenient for me to go to him than to Mr. Wade. Wade's was a long way out of my way. He told me to take it to Mr. Payne when I offered it to him.

3702. Who told you?—Mr. Cochrane. I said to him, "Are you not going to Colborne soon? It is out of my way if I have to go out on purpose." He said, "Wallace is going to-night with the grist." The team was standing in the yard, and I suggested that perhaps Wallace would take it up. He said he could. Wallace went for his overcoat and I took the money out of my pocket and asked him to count it.

3703. Whom did you ask to count it?—Mr. Cochrane.

3705. What did you give that $200 for? What value did you get for it?—I got the situation—the bridge.

3706. And that is what you gave the money for?—I suppose if you put it that way, I don't know any other.

That is the evidence of this man, yet we are told in the report of the majority of the Committee that all these sums were paid as voluntary contributions by these men. If hon. gentlemen, dealing with this question in a purely judicial spirit, as a judge would, upon the evidence I have submitted to Parliament, taken from the sworn testimony given before the Committee of enquiry, see fit to come to the conclusion that these were voluntary contributions, the responsibility must rest upon their shoulders and not upon mine. I can see nothing voluntary about them: I can see no payments made which were not exacted from the parties paying, as a commission for their appointment to lighthouses and bridges. I, being fallible like others, may be mistaken. I would like to see the Minister of Militia, on reading through the evidence carefully, arrive at a conclusion different from that set out in the minority report. I would like to hear his reasons for arriving at such a conclusion. I would like him to read to the House the evidence upon which he based it. If he can convince the House that all traffic in public offices is quite right, or if he can show that nothing of the kind has taken place, I shall be glad to hear him do so. It is no pleasure to me that a charge of this kind should be brought home to a member of Parliament or anybody else. There are three or four other cases. There is the case of William Brown, and I could sustain my argument by his evidence alone. But as I have taken up the time of the House sufficiently, I do not trespass any longer upon its attention, but will leave the other cases in the hands of some other hon. gentleman who may follow me. There is one case, however, to which I will just incidentally refer. That is the case of Thomas Fitzgerald. Now, there was no charge made in Parliament that he had got an office by corrupt means. There was no charge that the hon. member for East Northumberland, or his party, had corruptly given a Government office to Thomas Fitzgerald; but he was called as a witness on behalf of those sustaining the impeachment of the hon. member for East Northumberland and without objection by Mr. Cochrane's counsel, and he swore most positively that he himself had obtained the position of bridge-tender, and had paid $150 for it. If you follow the evidence of Fitzgerald from the beginning to the end, you will find no pretense that the sum paid was a purely voluntary contribution. In fact you must come to the conclusion that it was given solely for the purpose of obtaining the position of bridge-tender. There is also the evidence of Robert May who obtained the position of bridge-tender on paying $125. As he was a brother of one of the committee, he got the bridge at $25 less. There was the case of old Mr. Clouston who obtained a bridge without the intervention of the committee and solely through Mr. Cochrane. The money was paid by him, $150, not directly to Mr. Cochrane, but for the purpose of paying off a portion of his political debt. Now, Mr. Clouston did not pretend to say, although he swore that he was a leading Conservative in the riding and had taken part in the political contests for a long series of years, that he had ever given liberally for political purposes. If my memory serves me right, the outside amount he had given in a number of years for political purposes was $2 or $3. Yet we are asked to believe that these men gave these donations of $150 to $200 for purely political purposes. I do not intend to trespass much longer on the time of the House. I will read to Parliament the conclusion at which the minority of the Committee arrived in respect of this case. Upon all these charges the minority of the Committee came to the conclusion that the evidence pointed in one direction, and one direction only, and so believing they wound up their report as follows:—

That one C. D. Vanalstine (whose name I have not mentioned) corruptly paid the said James Stanley, in order to secure the office of tender of one of the bridges in said canal, the money to be used as aforesaid; that the money was returned to him because all the said positions had been disposed of.

The fact is that Mr. Vanalstine deposited his money, $150, for which he was to get the position of bridge-tender. It then turned out there were not enough bridges to go round, and he did not get the position, but got his money back. Is not that a complete answer to the statement made that the contributions were voluntary? Is it not perfectly clear that the men who paid the money got the bridges, and that those who paid money and did not get bridges got their money back? The minority wind up their report in the following language:—

22. That the said committee was organized for the express purpose of corruptly trafficking in said offices, and did corruptly sell and dispose of the same to Hedley Simpson, Wesley Goodrich, Robert May, Thomas Fitzgerald and J. D. Clouston, respectively, for a money consideration.

23. That said Edward Cochrane was aware of such corrupt sale and disposal of said offices, sanctioned the same, and made his said recommendations with the knowledge that said offices were so sold and disposed of.

24. That the payment by the said Hedley Simpson of the said sum of $200 directly relieved the said Edward Cochrane of just so much of the said Edward Cochrane's indebtedness on said note of $619.69.

25. That the said Edward Cochrane did not present himself as a witness in his own behalf before your Committee, and did not pledge his oath to the incorrectness or falsehood of a single statement made before your Committee by any of the witnesses examined before them.

26. That all said appointees are poor men, although strong Conservatives; some of them never gave a cent for political purposes, and, of the rest, none gave more than $3 each for such purposes for years prior to the payment of said sums.

27. That all the witnesses who appeared and gave evidence before your Committee, appeared to your Committee to be men of truth and desirous of speaking the truth, so far as they knew: and there does not appear to be any ground for doubting the credibility of any one of them.

28. That selling or disposing of offices for a money or other consideration is highly improper and reprehensible: and the parties shown to have been engaged in such a practice here should be proceeded against criminally.

Now, Sir, I leave the matter in the hands of the House, and I move this amendment trusting that the House will deal with it as a court would with an ordinary case, impartially, and without political partizanship and party prejudice. I move:

That all the words after the word "That" in the said motion be struck out, and the following substituted in lieu thereof:—

1. In the year A.D. 1888, there was a vacancy in the position of Government Lighthouse-keeper in the Government lighthouse on Presqu'Isle Point, County of Northumberland.

2. That one Hedley H. Simpson was an applicant for said office.

3. That Edward Cochrane then was, and now is, the member for the House of Commons for the Electoral District of the East Riding of the said County of Northumberland, and a supporter of the Government.

4. That in the year 1888 it was corruptly agreed to, by and between the said Edward Cochrane and the said Hedley H. Simpson, that if the said Hedley H. Simpson would make and deliver to one James Stanley two promissory notes for $100 each, endorsed by some responsible person, he, the said Edward Cochrane, would procure the appointment of the said Hedley H. Simpson to the said office of Lighthouse-keeper of the Government lighthouse on Presqu'Isle Point.

5. That the said Hedley H. Simpson, in pursuance of said corrupt bargain, did make the said two promissory notes for $100 each—procured their endorsement by a responsible party—handed them to the said James Stanley, who received the same and placed them in a bank for the use of the said Edward Cochrane personally or for political purposes.

6. That the said Hedley H. Simpson subsequently paid the said notes.

7. That the said Hedley H. Simpson, in pursuance of said corrupt bargain, received the said appointment.

1. That in the summer of 1889 Obadiah Simpson was promised by the said Edward Cochrane the Government office of keeper or attendant of one of the swing bridges over the Murry Canal.

2. That in the summer of 1889 the said James Stanley, who is a confidential friend and warm political supporter of the said Edward Cochrane, sent for one Arundel R. Simpson to call and see him. He did, when the said James Stanley proposed to the said Arundel R. Simpson, with the knowledge and consent of the said Edward Cochrane, that if the said Arundel R. Simpson would pay $150 and give to his father, the said Obadiah Simpson, the life lease of his farm (as compensation for his not being appointed such bridge-keeper)—he had been promised and had not received the said office—he, the said Arundel R. Simpson, would be appointed such bridge-keeper.

3. That shortly afterwards the said Arundel R. Simpson had an interview with the said Edward Cochrane on the same subject, when the said Edward Cochrane said to him that they could not take the $150 for said office, that Stanley should not have made that offer, that other arrangements had been made with one Wesley Goodrich, who agreed to pay $200 and give said life lease for said appointment.

4. That the said Edward Cochrane then and there corruptly proposed to the said Arundel R. Simpson, that if he would pay said Edward Cochrane $200 and give said life lease he would be appointed. This he refused to do.

5. That subsequently it was corruptly agreed to, by and between the said Wesley Goodrich and the said Edward Cochrane, that if the said Edward Cochrane would procure the appointment of the said Wesley Goodrich to the said Government office of keeper of said bridge, he, the said Wesley Goodrich, would pay the sum of $200; and execute to the said Obadiah Simpson, father of the said Arundel R. Simpson, a life lease on his farm, with a condition in said lease that if said Wesley Goodrich lost said appointment said lease would be cancelled.

6. That in pursuance of the said corrupt bargain the said Wesley Goodrich paid said money and executed said lease, and caused his wife to execute the same, to the said Obadiah Simpson, on part of Lot 18, in the 2nd Concession of the Township of Cramahe, in the said county, for the rent of one peppercorn a year and on the condition that if the said Goodrich should be released by the Government from attendance on said bridge said lease would come to an end and be void, but said condition was not to apply in case said Goodrich should be discharged on account of any act of his own.

1. That Edward Cochrane was, during the last Parliament, and now is the member for the electoral district of the East Riding of the County of Northumberland.

2. That while he was such member it was corruptly agreed to by and between the said Edward Cochrane and John D. Clouston, William Johnson, William Brown and Robert May, respectively, that if each of them would pay to him, or to certain other persons for him or for political purposes, the sum of $200, he would procure for each of them the position under the Government of Canada of attendant or keeper of one of the swing-bridges over or across the Murray Canal.

3. That in pursuance of such corrupt agreement the said several sums of money were paid, and the said persons were so appointed to said positions.

4. That while he, the said Edward Cochrane, was such member as aforesaid, it was corruptly agreed by and between the said Edward Cochrane and one Henry May, that if the said Henry May would pay the said Edward Cochrane, or to other persons for him, or for political purposes, the sum of $200, he would procure for the said Henry May the office or position under the Government of foreman or overseer of employés under the Government.

5. That in pursuance of the said corrupt agreement, the said sum of $200 was paid, and the said office or position duly received by the said Henry May:

Beg leave to report as follows:—

1. We find, that when the transactions hereinafter mentioned took place, the said Edward Cochrane was and still is the member for said riding.

2. That the said Edward Cochrane, while he was such member, was and is a supporter of the Administration, and as such had the patronage of the Administration for Government offices in and for said riding.

3. That certain leading Conservatives in the said riding, in or about the year 1883, assumed certain liabilities for certain debts, amounting to about $1,000, for certain costs arising out of a certain protested election for the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

4. That such liability, or portion of it, continued down to the year 1890 or 1891.

5. That said Edward Cochrane, with others, was liable for $619.69 of said debt down until and after the payment by Hedley Simpson, hereinafter mentioned, was made.

6. That about four years ago certain electors of said riding, viz., Messrs. May, Adam, Stanley, Lawson and Bullock, constituted themselves a committee for the purpose of raising money to pay off said debt, and the mode they adopted was by recommending certain persons to the said Edward Cochrane as fit and proper persons to fill certain Government offices, the said Edward Cochrane then recommending such persons to the Government as fit and proper persons to fill said offices, the persons so recommended agreeing to pay a certain price or sum for said offices.

7. That the said Edward Cochrane was not a member of the said committee, but he knew of the purpose and object of its existence; attended one or more of its meetings, when matters relating to said offices were discussed; acted on the committee's recommendations, and when persons made applications to him for offices he referred them to the said committee for a recommendation, which he acted on. Mr. Bullock, one of said committee, gave the following evidence, on oath, before your Committee:—

2406. What were the duties of that committee?—The duties of the committee were to see if we could not appoint somebody on the canal for the bridges there.

2407. How much were each of them to give?—We exacted $150 from every one of them. That is what we wanted.

2408. What were these people to get for the $150 they were to pay?—I cannot swear to that.

2409. What was the $150 to be given for?—It was to be given for our influence.

2410. Were you to put this $150 in your pocket?—No.

2411. Who was to give $150?—Everybody who got the appointment.

2412. And those who did not get the appointment were not to pay it?—Certainly not.
2420. It was the rule that those who were applicants should pay $150?—I think it was.
2489. Did Mr. Cochrane attend any of the meetings?—He was there once; I do not know whether he had any conversation with me or any of us."
2514. When your store was closed?—Yes.
2515. Then Mr. Cochrane remained there after the store was closed?—He came in accidentally, I think.
2516. Did you say that the commitee met there after the store was closed?—Yes.
2517. And Mr. Cochrane was there when the committee met?—Yes.
2518. For the whole of the time?—No; not when they were meeting.
2519. Oh, well, did he come in afterwards?—Yes: he came in after the committee met.
2520. Now, the committee met after the store was closed, and Mr. Cochrane, having come in after the committee met, must have come in after the store was closed?—He did.
2524. Where did the committee transact its business in the store?—I believe it was right in the open store.
2525. Right in there in the main part of the store?—Yes.
2526. And that is where Mr. Cochrane came?—Yes.
2527. Mr. Cochrane was in there with the committee?—Yes: but he was not on the committee.
2528. I know, but was he in there with the committee?—He was there when the committee was there in the store. I could not swear when Mr. Cochrane came in, but I know he came right into the store when the committee was meeting there.
2529. You have sworn that Mr. Cochrane was there?—Yes.
2530. And you have sworn that he was there while the committee was there?—Yes: that's true.
2548. I mean the committee. What business did the committee do that night?—They talked over different questions about the bridges.
2549. How long did Mr. Cochrane remain?—As far as my knowledge goes, he did not remain very long.
2554. I suppose the discussion was going on while he was there?—The discussion was going on. Yes.
2555. The talk about the bridges was going on while he was there?—Yes.
2556. You were talking about the men who would get the appointments and the amounts that they were to pay?—Certainly.
"1040. You did tell Mr. Cochrane that Hedley Simpson gave $200?—Yes.
1041. How long after this was it?—I do not know.
1042. Would it be a week?—It might.

8. That in the month of April, 1888, one Hedley H. Simpson was recommended by the said committee to the said Edward Edward Cochrane as a fit person to fill the position of lighthouse-keeper at Presqu'Isle Point.

9. That James Stanley, one of said committee, and by its authority, called upon said Hedley H. Simpson and told him of said recommendation, and made it a condition of his getting said appointment that he should pay the said Stanley the sum of $200 to be used in part liquidation of said debt.

10. That thereupon the said Edward Cochrane recommended the said Hedley H. Simpson to the Government as a fit person to fill the said office.

11. That the said Hedley H. Simpson duly paid the said sum, and on said recommendations he duly received said office and now holds the same—and this to the knowledge of said Edward Cochrane—the said Stanley, in his evidence before said committee, swore as follows:—

693. Then how did Mr. Simpson come to be appointed?—Well, he was recommened by the committee.
694. To whom did the committee recommend Mr. Simpson?—I suppose to Mr. Cochrane.
695. How did this recommendation come from the committee to Mr. Cochrane?—Verbally, I suppose.
696. Then if verbally, who talked?—Mr. Cochrane happened to be in town, I suppose, and they told him.
701. Then you think now you did see Mr. Cochrane, as one of the committee?—I say I may have done so; I may have had a conversation, but that was all.
702. But you think you did see him in regard to the appointment of Mr. Hedley Simpson, after all this money was paid?—I don't know whether it was before or after.
703. But at all events, either before or after, you did see Mr. Cochrane?—Yes; I may have seen him before or after, but I don't know.
714. Did Mr. Cochrane know anything about the payment of this money?—I don't think he did at the time.
715. Well, when did he?—I think it was some time after.
716. How long after?—I cannot tell you.

717. How did he come to know it?—I don't know but what I told him myself.
718. You might have told him yourself?—I think I did."
"720. How long afterwards?—I cannot tell you.
721. Before the appointment was made?—I cannot tell you whether it was before or after.
722. But you do remember now that you had a conversation with Mr. Cochrane, and Mr. Cochrane knew from you that the $200 were paid?—I don't say that. I say I may have had before or after; I don't remember.

12. Pending the negotiations between said Stanley, and the said Hedley H. Simpson and the said Edward Cochrane respecting said lighthouse, the said Edward Cochrane wrote the said Hedley H. Simpson a letter respecting said lighthouse, and sent it to him by the hands of Arundel Simpson, who in said investigation swore as follows respecting the same:—

309. I ask you if you had any conversation with Mr. Cochrane, the member, in regard to the appointment of Mr. Hedley Simpson to a position of lighthouse-keeper at Presqu'Ile?—Well, along in March, I think. I think his father died in October, and I gave him a letter from Mr. Cochrane.
310. Did you see that letter?—No: I saw the letter but I did not know what was in it. I could not tell you what was in it.
311. Was that letter read in your presence?—I don't know as it was. I don't think it was; I would not swear positively; it is quite a while ago.
312. Did Mr. Cochrane tell you what was in the letter?—He told me it was concerning the lighthouse, and wanted to know if I would send the letter to Mr. Hedley Simpson, for him to come and see him."
1857. You say Mr. Cochrane sent you with the letter to your relative Hedley?—Yes.
1858. And Mr. Stanley was present at the time, and knew the letter was going to Hedley from Mr. Cochrane?—Yes.
1859. Do you know whether he knew the contents of the letter?—I do not know.
1860. Did you see Mr. Cochrane after he got the letter?—Yes.
1861. Now, in the eighth paragraph of the declaration you said: "Subsequently said Cochrane sent to the said Hedley H. Simpson by me a letter in which it was stated that said Hedley H. Simpson would be required, in order to secure the said appointment, to give security for the payment of $200, which letter I delivered to the said Hedley H. Simpson." How did you know the statement that was in the letter?—Well, I took the letter down to Herbert Simpson: he stays at Whitney, and he said that he would have to pay the money.
1862. Were you there when the letter was read?—Yes.
1863. The letter was read by whom?—I think it was read in the first place by Herbert Simpson's wife. She is the one who read the letter first, I think.
1864. You all were there and heard it read?—Yes.
1865. You say that was what was in the letter?—That is what they told me was in the letter. That was what would be required in order to get the appointment.
1866. You did not read the letter yourself?—No.
1867. The letter was read when you took it there?—Yes.
1868. It was opened there?—The letter was not sealed up.
1869. The envelope was open?—Yes.
1870. In the presence of Hedley Simpson, Herbert Simpson, Herbert Simpson's wife and yourself?—Yes. It was read by Herbert Simpson's wife. Mrs. Herbert Simpson does the business—the reading and everything that is done in that way.
1871. Then the letter, the envelope not being sealed, was read by Mrs. Herbert Simpson in the presence of yourself?—Yes; and Hedley, when he found what was in the letter, asked me what I thought he should do, and I said that he had better take it. Herbert Simpson said no, not to take it. Afterwards, in a day or two, they wanted to know what I thought about it myself.

13. That, respecting the price paid for said office and the said Edward Cochrane's knowledge thereof, the said Arundel Simpson gave the following evidence:—

324. Mr. Cochrane told you that Snetsinger offered him something?—Yes.
325. How much did he say?—I would not be positive, either $400 or $600.
326. He said that Snetsinger offered him either $400 or $600 for the appointment?—I would not be positive which; he told me it was quite an amount.
327. What did he say, then, at the conversation, about giving it to Hedley H. Simpson?—I don't know exactly what he said about it.

328. Did he say anything?—I don't know; it is quite a while ago. He said, I believe, that he would, or they would, let him have it a good deal cheaper.
329. Would let who have it cheaper?—Mr. Hedley Simpson.
330. What did he say?—He said that Hedley would get it for $200.
331. Why do you refer to the word "cheaper"?—I don't know; I suppose that is what he said.
332. Tell us what he said?—He said he would get it for $200.
333. Did he use the word 'cheaper'?—I don't know as he did.
1812. Who is "he"?—Mr. Snetsinger. He said Mr. Snetsinger would give $600 for the lighthouse, and they only got $200. Cochrane said that to me in the store. He did not say he offered him; he said he would give it. But that Hedley only gave $200.
1813. But that he (Cochrane) would secure the appointment of said Hedley H. Simpson for a good deal less than $600?—He did secure it. This was long after, as Mr. Cochrane knows.

1. That in the end of the year 1889 or in the early part of 1890, the said James Stanley, with the consent of the said Edward Cochrane, proposed to one Arundel Simpson, that if the said Arundel Simpson would pay $150 to the said James Stanley for the purpose aforesaid, he, the said Arundel Simpson, would be appointed a bridge-tender on said canal. Arundel Simpson refused to pay anything, and therefore it was agreed to, by and between one Wesley Goodrich and the parties aforesaid, that if he would pay $200 for the purpose aforesaid and give a life lease of his farm to one Obadiah Simpson he would get said appointment, that the said Wesley Goodrich paid said sum, gave said life lease, and received said appointment on the recommendation of said Edward Cochrane. The evidence of said Arundel Simpson on this point is as follows:—
1519. Did you see Mr. Stanley in 1889, in regard to getting an appointment as bridge-keeper?—I did.
1520. What took place then?—Mr. Stanley sent for me.
1521. Well, what else?—I went up there to see him, and he told me they were about to let the bridges.
1522. What was said to you?—He said they were going to let the bridges, and that they intended me to have one.
1523. You say they were going to let the bridges. What do you mean by that?—To appoint the bridge-tenders.
1524. Did he say anything about your getting one?—He said that I could get one by looking after my father and giving $150.
1525. Who told you that?—James Stanley.
1526. Whom did you mean by giving "him" $150?—Mr. Stanley.
1527. When you say that he said you were to look after your father, were those the words that were used, or what did he mean?—He went, in the first place, to see my father, and told him that they had promised him a bridge, but that he was too old to be appointed. He asked him if he wanted one of his sons appointed in his place, and he said yes, and he would like to see me appointed.
1528. Did you afterwards see Mr. Cochrane about it?—He saw me about it.
1529. Mr. Cochrane did?—Yes.
1530. You met Mr. Cochrane in Brighton?—Yes.
1531. What took place between you and Mr. Cochrane? Did he send for you?—He called me into the room.
1532. Where was this—in the hotel?—In Mr. Stanley's hotel.
1533. What did he say to you?—He said they had made different arrangements about the bridge. That they were going to make some arrangements for fifty acres of land for my father, and let someone else have the bridge.
1534. Did he say with whom the arrangement was made?—I do not think he did that night.
1538. What did he say about the $150?—I do not know just what he did say.
1539. Try and think?—He said they had made other arrangements. I said it was all right; I was not very particular.
1541. What else did he say?—He said that Mr. Stanley could not pay off $900 with four bridges at $150 apiece.
1542. Where was that said to you?—At Mr. Stanley's hotel.
1543. By Mr. Cochrane?—By Mr. Cochrane.
1544. The member for East Northumberland?—Yes.
1545. When he said that they had made other arrangements, was anything said in regard to more money?—That is all I heard him say. I heard him say what I have just told you.
1573. How much was he getting from you?—Mr. Stanley wes getting $150.
1578. He gave you to understand, then, that some arrangement had been made by some parties which prevented him from recommending you?—That is what he told me.
1691. Did he tell you anything more?—He said that Mr. Stanley said they could not pay off $900 with four bridges at $150 each: Mr. Stanley could not pay it off with that amount.
1830. What did he say about your father?—He said the old gentleman was too old.
1831. He said the old gentleman was too old, and what else?—He would like to have the money right off, as soon as possible.
1832. How much money?—$150.
1833. What else were you to do?—I was to get the money for him, I suppose.
1834. Any other condition?—From Mr. Stanley? I don't know as there was, except to see to my father—maintain my father.
1846. How much had he paid?—Who had paid?
1847. Whoever had been appointed?—He said that he could get more for it. He could get $200.
1848. No, no; you said before that he could not pay off $900 with four bridges at $150. What did Mr. Cochrane say?—About the bridge?
1849. Yes.—That is what he told me: he could not pay off with four bridges.
1850. Is that all?—He said something about getting more from this man: that is $200.

The evidence of Wesley Goodrich on this point is as follows:—
3682. You talked of the life lease to Mr. Cochrane?—I told Mr. Cochrane what I would do about it. He told me I was very foolish.
3683. You told him about the life lease?—I told him that.
3684. That you were willing to give the life lease of your farm to get a bridge?—Yes, sir.
3685. Did you tell him you were willing to pay $200 besides?—I did not. I have no recollection of it.
3686. At no time?—I won't say at no time. I think I did once tell him.
3687. When?—Some time before that.
3688. How long before that?—I could not tell you.
3689. You told him at that time that you were willing to give a life lease and the $200?—No, sir. Wade proposed that if I got the bridge I should pay $200.
3690. You told Mr. Cochrane that Wade had proposed that you should pay $200 to the bridge?
3691. You have just told me, I think, that you told Mr. Cochrane you were willing to give a life lease of your farm for a bridge? Is that so?—Mr. Cochrane mentioned to me that there was a man by the name of King who wanted a bridge. Then I said I would give $200 at that time.
3692. For the bridge?—For the bridge.
3698. You did pay the $200?—I did, sir.
3699. That was before you gave the lease?—Yes, sir.
3700. To whom did you pay the $200?—I paid it to Mr. Edward Cochrane.
3701. To the member for the East Riding of Northumberland?—Yes. It was more convenient for me to go to him than to Mr. Wade. Wade's was a long way out of my way. He told me to take it to Mr. Payne when I offered it to him.
3702. Who told you?—Mr. Cochrane. I said to him, "Are you not going to Colborne soon? It is out of my way if I have to go on purpose." He said, "Wallace is going to-night with the grist." The team was standing in the yard, and I suggested that perhaps Wallace would take it up. He said he could. Wallace went for his overcoat, and I took the money out of my pocket and asked him to count it.
3703. Whom did you ask to count it?—Mr. Cochrane.
3704. I think you had better tell the Committee again what happened there?—I agreed with Mr. Wade to pay this $200. Mr. Wade lived at Hilton, quite a way from my place, and I went to Mr. Cochrane (he was in the barn-yard at the time when I arrived), and I asked him would he take the money. He told me to take it to Mr. Payne at Colborne, but that was quite a way for me to go. I said, "Are you not going soon," as I knew he went there often. He said, "Wallace is going to-night with the grist." I had noticed the team and waggon in the yard. Wallace was going to the house to get his overcoat and I suggested that somebody ought to count the money. I said, "Would he." He did not answer me, but he seemed not to want to do it. I took it out of my pocket and urged him. He then took it and counted it and then handed it to Wallace. Wallace had got back by this time. He said, "Wallace, give that to Payne." That is as straight as I can tell you.
3705. What did you give that $200 for? What value did you get for it?—I got the situation—the bridge.

3706. And that is what you gave the money for?—I suppose if you put it that way, I don't know any other. Mr. Wade told me he was holding it for some money he wanted to realize on it.

3721. What was the date?—I have no memorandum: I could not tell you the date. It will be two years ago this fall—from the fall of 1889.

3722. You said it was before the lease was drawn?—Before the lease was drawn.

3723. And the lease was drawn on the 15th of October, 1890?—I did not give the lease until after I got the position.

3724. And the payment of the money was before you got the position?—Yes, sir; a year ago last fall it was.

3725. Can you remember how long before you got the appointment it was that you paid the $200?—I paid the $200 a year ago last fall and I got the position a year ago last spring.

3769. How did Mr. Cochrane know that you should take it to Mr. Payne?—I do not know. I did not ask him, and he did not tell me.

3770. Did he appear to know what the $200 was for?—I do not know that he said a word. He said in one of the conversations that I had with him that he had got into trouble over the protest, and of course I understood that the trouble related to the funds. I understood somebody to say that there was trouble over the protest.

3777. I will read you this in order to ascertain if you heard of it before. I am about to read from the statement that Mr. Cochrane made on the 20th of August, 1891, in reply to one of these charges. In the course of his observations Mr. Cochrane said: "It had been understood I would recommend for appointment to the bridge an old man named Obadiah Simpson, and arrangement was made between Simpson and Goodrich by which Simpson was to take a life lease of Goodrich's farm."—Do you know that it had been so understood? Do you know that it had been understood that Mr. Cochrane would recommene Mr. Obadiah Simpson for the office?—I know that there was talk, that Obadiah Simpson had been promised a bridge, and I suppose it had been through Mr. Cochrane.

3778. You understood that he was to get the bridge?—Yes.

3779. And you found that if you were to have the bridge it would be necessary for you to satisfy Obadiah?—Yes.

3780. And it was to satisfy him that you gave a life lease of the farm?—Yes.

3781. Did you tell Mr. Cochrane that you were willing to satisfy Obadiah?—I might have done so. I dare say I did, but I really cannot tell.

3782. Had he mentioned to you that he had promised Obadiah?—I would not say whether he ever did so or not.

3783. Do you remember telling him what you were willing to do in order to satisfy Webb and Obadiah Simpson, and that you had satisfied Simpson with regard to the lease and Webb with regard to the money?—Yes, sir.

3784. You had satisfied the two?—I felt that I had.

3785. The arrangement was satisfactory all round?—Yes. I proposed to do that if that would satisfy them, and they were satisfied.

3786. And you entered upon your duties the following spring—in the spring of 1890?—Yes.

3787. This arrangement was made in the fall of 1889?—Yes: it was a year ago last fall.

15. That in or about the middle of May, 1890, one William Brown was recommended by the said committee to said Edward Cochrane for the position of bridge-tender on the Murray Canal, who recommended him to the Government for the said position. That the said committee exacted from the said William Brown the sum of $150 for said recommendations to be used for the purposes aforesaid. That said William Brown paid said sum and received said appointment with recommendation of said Edward Cochrane.

William Brown's evidence on this point is as follows:—

2561. Have you any position upon that canal?—Yes, sir.

2562. What position have you got?—Bridge-keeper.

2563. How did you come to get that position?—Through the committee.

2564. What committee?—The committee which was appointed to recommend somebody for the position.

2565. You knew a committee had been appointed for that purpose?—I was told by several of the committee they had been appointed, and I was told by Mr. Cochrane also that a committee had been appointed.

2566. You were told by Mr. Cochrane there had been a committee appointed for the purpose of recommending parties for the position of bridge-keeper?—Yes.

2567. Mr. Cochrane told you that?—He did.

2568. Who is Mr. Cochrane?—He is member for East Northumberland.

2569. And it was Mr. Cochrane, member for East Northumberland, who told you that a committee had been appointed for the purpose of recommending different people?—He was the only one that told me I would have to go to the committee.

2570. Then you went to Mr. Cochrane first of all?—First of all.

2571. What did you go to him for?—For a position on the canal.

2572. What did you say to him?—I asked him what my chances were for such a position. He told me he had left the matter in the hands of the committee and that I would have to apply to the committee.

2577. Who did you converse with in regard to the $150?—The first one I had a conversation with was James Stanley.

2578. And who was the second one?—That is all.

2579. You never had a conversation with anybody except Mr. James Stanley regarding the $150?—Outside the committee, do you mean, or the committee men?

2625. But it was arranged before you got the appointment that you were to pay the money?—Yes.

2626. With whom was that arrangement made?—Mr. Stanley.

2627. Do you know that Mr. Stanley was one of this committee?—I do.

2628. The committee to which Mr. Cochrane sent you?—Yes.

2629. Was it Mr. Stanley who told you to pay the money to Mr. Webb?—It was.

2646. Then that $150 had nothing to do with your getting that appointment? It had, hadn't it?—Yes, it had.

2647. When you went to Mr. Webb to pay the money, what did you say to him?—I said I was requested by Mr. Stanley to go and pay him $150.

16. That while the said Edward Cochrane was such member as aforesaid, one Thomas Fitzgerald was recommended by said committee to the said Edward Cochrane for the position of bridge-tender at Trent Bridge, Murray Canal: that the said James Stanley, as a member of the said committee, and by its authority, exacted from the said Thomas Fitzgerald the sum of $150, to be used for purposes aforesaid, for such recommendation and office; that the said Edward Cochrane recommended to the Government the said Thomas Fitzgerald for said office; that the said Thomas Fitzgerald paid said sum, and received said appointment on said recommendation.

In this case said James Stanley gave the following evidence:—

893. You had sent word to these people to assemble there?—Yes.

894. These various applicants, Daniel Vanalstine, Fitzgerald, Brown, May and Clouston, were present on your invitation?—These were the ones the committee recommended, and I sent for them myself afterwards.

895. Were they present at the meeting of the committee?—No.

896. Any one of them?—Not to my knowledge.

897. I asked you to say the first person you appointed afterwards, and you gave me this list of names. The committee recommended all these?—Yes.

898. Thomas Fitzgerald was recommended and he got the office?—Yes.

899. He paid $150 for the office of bridge-keeper?—Yes.

900. Who did he pay the money to?—To me.

901. And you applied that money how?—I put that money in the bank to my credit. I left it there until I got notice from W. L. Payne to send either the money or a draft. I forget which it was I sent.

902. What did you do with the money?—I think I sent on $150 in money or by cheque to W. L. Payne or the Standard Bank, I am not certain, to apply on the note in the Standard Bank.

903. Then Daniel Vanalstine did not get an office?—No.

904. He had paid $150 under the same circumstances?—Yes.

905. And he was repaid that?—Yes; he was repaid.

906. Because he did not get the office?—There were more applicants than there was bridges for them, and we paid the money back.

907. That is curious. Then his contribution was in a sense contingent on his getting the office?—He was giving it voluntarily.

908. You did not think it fair to keep it if he did not get the office?—No.

On the same point the said Thomas Fitzgerald gave the following evidence:—

1206. You live at the Carrying Place?—Yes.

1207. On the Murray Canal?—Yes.

1208. You paid $150?—Yes.
1209. To whom?—Mr. Stanley.
1210. What for?—To help the party through their indebtedness for the Wade and Ferris protest. That was what I was informed. I do not know anything about it.
1211. Who informed you that?—Mr. James Stanley.
1212. And you paid the money to him?—Yes.
1213. Did you see Mr. Cochrane before that?—Yes, sir.
1214. In regard to the appointment?—Yes, sir.
1215. What was the conversation you had with Mr. Cochrane?—I only saw him once. I got a petition from a few men in the riding and showed it to him. He said it was very good; "I will give it to the committee; I have nothing more to say. Whoever the committee picks out, will get it."
1216. That was before you were named by the committee?—I do not know. I had friends who put in the communication.
1217. That was when the petition was being got up?—Yes.
1218. Mr. Cochrane said he left matters entirely in the hands of the committee?—Yes.
1219. Then Mr. Cochrane knew of the committee?—I do not know that.
1220. Did you pay this $150 in cash to Mr. Stanley?—Yes, in hard cash.
1229. You know that you paid the $150?—Yes.
1230. At the time you paid it, were you then a bridge-keeper by appointment of the Government?—Certainly not. I was on the bridge, but not appointed by the Government. I had been on there for years.
1232. When you paid the $150 to Stanley you were not at that time a permanently appointed bridge-keeper by the Government?—Certainly not.
1233. Did you say before that you received a promise from the committee?—I will tell you all I know about it; I will tell it without question and answer. I was asked to go up to Brighton. I was informed by some of my friends there to make application to Mr. Cochrane. He said: "I cannot make you any promise; I leave it entirely to the committee." I merely showed him the recommendations I had, and he said: "They are very good, but I cannot make any promise." I walked away. I was informed to go up and see Mr. Stanley, and Mr. Stanley says, says he: "I understand from what I have heard that the committee has picked you out as a bridge-keeper on the Murray Canal, and you ought to help us on this debt that we are under to the party." I said: "I am willing to do my part," and that is all I said. I said: "When you are ready for me and want my money I will pay it." He said they had some notes to pay and that they were heavy in debt, and I said: "I am a Conservative and will do my duty."

17. That while the said Edward Cochrane was such member as aforesaid, one Robert May was recommended by said committee to the said Edward Cochrane for the position of bridge-tender on the Murray Canal; that Henry May, a member of said committee, and by its authority, called upon him and told him that he was so recommended and exacted from him $125 for such position, to be used for the purpose aforesaid; that on the recommendation of said committee the said Edward Cochrane recommended to the Government the said Robert May for said office; that said Robert May paid said money and received said office. His evidence on this point is as follows:—

2731. Have you got an appointment on that canal?—Yes, sir.
2732. What appointment?—Bridge-keeper.
2733. When did you get that appointment?—In the year 1890.
2736. Who told you that you had got the appointment?—Some member of the committee, I think it was Mr. Hugh McQuoid; I am not sure, however, whether he is the one.
2737. He told you of the appointment?—Yes, sir.
2738. And who else told you?—My brother Henry.
2750. How much money did you pay?—$125.
2751. To whom did you pay it?—To Henry May, my brother.
2752. What did you pay it to Henry May for?—(No answer.)
2753. Why did you pay it to Henry May?—To help pay the debt against the Conservative party.
2800. Was it not, for the purpose of getting that position, sir?—Yes.
2801. How did you know that you would get that position if you paid $125?—I did not know only from the committee.
2802. Then you knew from the committee that you would get that position if you paid the $125?—They told me.
2814. How was it you came to pay $125?—(No answer.)
2815. Somebody must have suggested money to you?—Henry said the Conservative party was in debt, and each one must pay a certain amount.
2816. Each one of whom?—Each one of the bridge-tenders. He said each was willing to pay, and I said I was willing to do the same.
2817. If you got the position?—Yes.
2818. Did you pay the money before or after getting the position?—Before it.
2838. You are a labouring man then?—Yes.
2839. Before you got this office you were working for days' wages?—Yes.
2840. You are a married man?—Yes.
2841. Wife and family?—Yes.
2842. And before you got this office you were working for days' wages?—Yes.
2843. And you gave $125 for the office and for the good of the Conservative party—the two things?—Yes.
2844. When before this had you given a contribution to the Conservative party?—I do not know as I ever did.
2845. How old are you?—Thirty.
2846. This was the first time you manifested your regard for the Conservative party in this substantial way?—Yes.

Henry May, a brother of said Robert May, and one of said committee, swore as follows:—

2885. How was it you asked your brother for $125?—Mr. Stanley told me it was required—that he should pay some money.
3020. And what did you tell him?—I told him (Cochrane) that Robert had got the appointment for the bridge.
3023. And you told him that Robert had got the appointment?—Yes, sir.
3024. You mean by having got the appointment that he had been recommended by the committee?—Yes, sir.
3025. You don't mean that he had been recommended by the Government?—No, sir; I did not mean to tell him that.
3026. You did not mean to tell him he had been appointed by the Government, only that he had been recommended by the committee?—That is it.
3027. And was that not the reason why you saw Mr. Cochrane; to tell him that Robert had been recommended by the committee?—I saw him and told him.

18. That in or about the month of May, 1890, one J. D. Clouston was recommended to the Government for the position of bridge-tender on the Murray Canal by the said Edward Cochrane; that the said Edward Cochrane knew, when he made said recommendation, that the said J. D. Clouston agreed to pay for said office to said committee the sum of $150, and had paid thereon about $100, to be used for the purpose aforesaid—that said J. D. Clouston did pay said sum—and on said recommendation of said Edward Cochrane received said appointment and now holds the same. The evidence on oath of said J. D. Clouston touching the same is as follows:—

1895. How much money did you pay when you got this appointment, Mr. Clouston?—I think some $70 or $75.
1896. You paid $70 or $75?—I think; I would not be positive.
1897. To whom did you pay that money?—To Mr. W. W. Webb.
1898. Did you tell Mr. Webb that you were instructed to pay any moneys—Mr. Webb has been examined?—Instructed?
1899. Yes?—No; I had no idea I was instructed.
1900. What did you tell Mr. Webb as to the balance?—I told him I would pay the balance as I went along.
1901. You told him you would pay the balance as you could?—Yes; the balance. I took it upon myself to pay a certain amount, and I told him I would pay the balance.
1902. How much did you take upon yourself to pay?—I took upon myself to pay $150.
1903. To whom were you to pay that?—To W. W. Webb.
1904. Who told you to pay it to W. W. Webb?—I don't know that anybody told me to pay it particularly to W. W. Webb.
1905. You say that nobody told you particularly to pay it to W. W. Webb?—Yes.
1906. How did you come to go to W. W. Webb?—Well, I was aware that he had a note that had to be arranged and settled up.
1932. You said it was on the 10th May, 1889. When the appointment was promised you, Mr. Stanley told you to go to Mr. Webb, and in the conversation he told you also that the others were paying?—Yes.
1933. That was after the appointment was promised but before you received it?—Yes; before I was notified to fill it.
1934. After you had received the promise, but before you were appointed or directed to take charge?—Yes.

1935. From whom did you receive the promise?—From Mr. Edward Cochrane.
1936. The promise of the position which you ultimately got?—Yes.
1937. But if you received the promise from Mr. Cochrane, it was Mr. Stanley who directed you to go to Mr. Webb?—I say it was by conversation.
1950. Did you see Mr. Cochrane in regard to the appointment?—I was talking with him.
1951. You say you had a conversation with him?—Yes, sir.
1952. You had a conversation with Mr. Cochrane, the member for East Northumberland?—Yes; I say I had conversations with Mr. Cochrane.
1953. And what was said at that conversation, or at any one of the conversations you had with Mr. Cochrane?—I don't know.
1959. But you received the promise of an appointment from Mr. Cochrane?—Yes.
1982. What old indebtedness?—This old protest cost, run up there between Mr. James Ferris and William Wade.
1983. And what others?—Other bridge-tenders.
1984. Mr. Cochrane told you—
1985. When he said to you that others were taking part in this old indebtedness, what others did he refer to?—I said that Cochrane may have said that others were taking part, and I think I said the others were bridge-tenders.
1986. How much did he tell you the others were giving?—He may have said that they were giving $150.
1987. Each?—Yes.
1992. You say he may have told you so on the occasion of that drive, that other bridge-tenders were paying $150. Do you believe now that he did tell you so, on your oath?—I believe he may had said so, as I said before.
1993. To the best of your recollection, you say he may have said that other bridge tenders were giving $150?—Yes.
2023. Did you pay anything?—I suppose I did.
2024. Do you swear you paid a farthing?—Yes, sir.
2025. When?—I think on two different occasions I gave a dollar.
2026. On two different occasions you subscribed a dollar on the reduction of this indebtedness?—Yes.
2032. Did you yourself contribute to the fund at that time?—Yes.
2033. How much?—I gave a dollar at that time.
2034. Was that the first time?—Yes.
2035. When was the next time?—The next time was when the protest was going on at Colborne.
2036. That is the Ferris protest?—Yes, the protest between Ferris and Wade.
2037. That is eight or nine years ago?—Yes, I think the other that I remember was when I saw Mr. Cochrane.
2038. Have you given anything since 1886 until you gave this generous donation of $150?—I cannot tell when I paid that dollar.
2048. Who told you first you were to be appointed bridge-tender?—I said Mr. Cochrane said there was a bridge for me.
2049. Mr. Cochrane was the first man that mentioned to you that you were going to be appointed?—Yes.
2090. I think you said that Mr. Cochrane told you that the other bridge-tenders were helping to pay the indebtedness?—Yes. I think he said so.
2091. Did he or did he not?—I think probably he did.
2092. And at the conversation he told you that you were going to be appointed a bridge-tender?—Yes.
2093. That took place when he told you that there was a bridge for you?—No; I think it was probably afterwards.
2094. Was it in the fall, when you were driving back to Colborne, that he told you that there was a bridge? Was that the time he told you that he had a bridge?—What time?
2135. Then you had no money to contribute until you got the promise of the bridge?—I don't know; I could not say.
2137. Was that the reason?—About.

19. That one other charge was referred to your Committee, namely, that one William Johnson paid $200 corruptly to secure an appointment as bridge-tender on said canal; that said William Johnson, after said charge was made, left Canada for the United States, and that his attendance as a witness before said Committee could not be procured, and that it was resolved by the said Committee that leave be given to withdraw said charge, and that it be considered as not made. Leave was accordingly so given.

20. That as respects that charge in which Henry May was concerned, no evidence was offered sustaining such charge, and that it was therefore not proved.

21. That the said C. D. Vanalstine corruptly paid the said James Stanley, in order to secure the office of tender of one of the bridges in said canal, the money to be used as aforesaid; that the said money was returned to him because all the said positions had been disposed of. Mr. Vanalstine on his oath said:

2245. With whom did you arrive at that sum? Whom did you talk to about the sum of $150?—This man Stanley.
2246. Did he tell you that that was the amount of money each had to pay?—I am not certain about it.
2247. What did he tell you?—He asked me if I was willing to give $150 to wipe the debt off, and I told him yes.
2248. The amount was fixed by him?—I could not say. He mentioned it.
2249. Did you then and there give him the money?—I told you before I gave him $50 at that time, all I had.
2250. When did you pay the balance to him?—Some three or four days after; I did not note it down.
2251. You paid $100 three or four days after that?—Yes; after that.
2252. And this, you say, was to go to pay off the party liability?—I understood it was to pay it off.
2253. You gave it solely with that end in view?—With the object of wiping off the protest indebtedness.
2254. With no other object?—With no other object.
2255. If that was your sole object, why did you let it go?—Other parties wanted the bridge, and they handed me my money back. I would be a fool if I had not taken it.
2256. You did not get the position?—No.
2257. And that is why the money came back to you?—Yes.

22. That the said committee was organized for the express purpose of corruptly trafficking in said offices, and did corruptly sell and dispose of the same to Hedley Simpson, Wesley Goodrich, Robert May, Thomas Fitzgerald and J. D. Clouston, respectively, for a money consideration.

23. That said Edward Cochrane was aware of such corrupt sale and disposal of said offices, sanctioned the same and made his said recommendations with the knowledge that said offices were so sold and disposed of.

24. That the payment by the said Hedley Simpson of the said sum of $200 directly relieved the said Edward Cochrane of just so much of the said Edward Cochrane's indebtedness on said note of $691.69.

25. That the said Edward Cochrane did not present himself as a witness in his own behalf before your Committee, and did not pledge his oath to the incorrectness or falsehood of a single statement made before your Committee by any of the witnesses examined before them.

26. That all said appointees are poor men, although strong Conservatives; some of them never gave a cent for political purposes, and, of the rest, none gave more than $3 each for such purposes for years prior to the payment of said sums.

27. That all the witnesses who appeared and gave evidence before your Committee, appeared to your Committee to be men of truth and desirous of speaking the truth, so far as they knew; and there does not appear to be any ground for doubting the credibility of any one of them.

28. That selling or disposing of offices for a money or other consideration is highly improper and reprehensible; and the parties shown to have been engaged in such a practice here should be proceeded against criminally.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), in the opening part of his speech complained that the mover of this resolution had pressed it with undue haste and had taken him by surprise this afternoon. However well that complaint might sound in the mouths of other hon. gentlemen, it was a singular one to hear from that hon. gentleman, as he had formulated these charges against Mr. Cochrane and therefore was presumed to know all the circumstances and details connected with the matter before he adopted such a course. He was also a member of the Committee and listened to the testimony, and read over the evidence which has since been printed, and he at all events should be fully prepared to meet this question at the present time and to discuss it intelligently. I agree with him in the proposition he laid down at the outset, that these charges were in the nature of a criminal prosecution and that we should look at them judicially, that it should be proved that there was a corrupt agreement in the giving of these offices and receiving the money, and that it was not necessary to prove that the agreement was made by the hon. member for Northumberland if it was done with his knowledge, his concurrence, or his approbation. There was another remark which he made which I was also glad to hear, that, if there was no evidence to prove that these payments were voluntarily made, he would not here on the floor of this House move this amendment. I take issue with him, and will try to show that the evidence is conclusive on that point, and will cite the evidence of the various witnesses to show that these payments were made voluntarily for the purpose of paying off this old indebtedness. It appears that there was an old indebtedness in this county going back to the year 1883 and growing out of a provincial election, with which the member for Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) had nothing to do. He was not interested in it at all. For the original debt of $1,700 he was not responsible, and after it dwindled down to $1,000 and a note was given for that amount, his name was not on that note, but the names of several of these people who made themselves, perhaps, somewhat officious in securing these amounts of money from these office-holders were on the note, and were also interested in the original indebtedness. Therefore I think we have the motive shown very clearly why they wanted to have the amount paid off, and why they resorted to the course they did. With regard to the agreement, I maintain that there is not a particle of evidence to show that any agreement was made by Mr. Cochrane or anyone on his behalf. I have refreshed my mind by reading over the evidence carefully, and I say that, as far as Mr. Cochrane is concerned, there is only one individual, that is Arundel Simpson, whose testimony I will call your attention to later, who brings Mr. Cochrane directly in touch with this transaction and these charges, and I am free to say that, if we could possibly believe Arundel Simpson, the charges formulated would perhaps assume a very different shape. As to the voluntary payments, what does Hedley Simpson say? The hon. gentleman from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has read extracts from the evidence. He read question 127, but he did not read question 122, which comes just before. What does Hedley Simpson say to the voluntary payments? It appears that he gave this $150 towards this indebtedness. He agreed to give that after he was recommended by the committee. The committee had told him that they would recommend him, and after that was done, Stanley sent word to him and asked him to contribute towards this indebtedness, and he agreed to do so. Now, what did he say? He had not the money, and he could not get the money; but Stanley lends him the money and takes the notes. He is asked why he gave the notes:

I gave them to help to pay the indebtedness of the party.

You gave them simply for that?—Yes, sir. Mr. Stanley told me whatever I gave was to be of my own free will.

Mr. Stanley told you whatever you gave, you gave of your own free will?—Yes, sir.

Now, that is the solemn statement made by a man on oath; and still we have been told by the hon. member who has just sat down, that there was not a particle of testimony to prove anything of the kind—of their having been voluntary payments. Again at 130 he is asked:

136. I ask you this: Was the promise of the appointment the reason why you gave the notes?—I gave the notes of my own free will.

Again, in 550 he says:

556. They asked him what he could afford to give to pay off the indebtedness for the old protest.

What protest?—The protest of James L. Ferris and William Wade.

Then, we find at 585 James Stanley is asked about the recommendation of the committee; and at 591 he is asked:

591. Would the committee have recommended him but for his paying the money or giving the notes?—They recommended him before they knew anything about his giving notes or money.

They had decided on him?—Yes.

When they were decided, was there any talk about getting any money from him?—No.

None at all?—No.

Then at 868:

868. Did the committee agree that he should pay $200?—No; they did not agree to that at all.

What amount did they name?—They did not name any at all.

Did they refer to any amount?—No, they did not.

Did they leave that to you?—Yes, they knew a certain amount had to be paid.

They left it to you to make the best bargain?—No, it was not a bargain.

Now take questions 995 and 1006.

995. Then was the recommendation of the committee conditional or unconditional as to the appointment of Hedley Simpson?—It was decided that he should have the appointment.

996. Without any condition?—Yes.

997. Then the decisions having been arrived at by the committee that he should have the appointment without any condition, you undertook the work of collecting money?—Yes.

998. And did you put that to him as conditional?—Yes; I put it to him. I asked him what he would give of his own free will.

999. In that way you got the subscription?—Yes.

1006. But what did you tell him about the condition on which the money had been paid?—Oh, there were no conditions. I did not tell him anything about conditions.

Then, again, Hedley Simpson had a very good reason to expect to get this office. His father had held the office for a long time, and was then an old man unable to perform the duties of the office, and for some years past Hedley Simpson himself had really been the office-holder, and continued to do the work after his father's death; so it was merely, as it were, confirming him in his position. Now, we have evidence here to show that there were no conditions in any of these appointments:

1013. You consider all the names and you conclude of make the recommendations?—Yes.

Now, was there any conditions attached to the recommendations that you were making?—No, no conditions.

The recommendations so far as the committee were concerned were unconditional?—Yes.

Now, we will take the evidence of Fitzgerald. Of course there was no charge made with regard to Fitzgerald; at the same time his appointment has been alluded to by the hon. member who has just addressed the House, and it might be well to see what he says with regard to conditions. Under 1233 he says:

1233. I was informed to go up and see Mr. Stanley, and Mr. Stanley says, says he: "I understand from what I have heard, that the committee has picked you out as a bridge-keeper on the Murray Canal, and you ought to help us on this debt that we are under to the party." I said: "I am willing to do my part." That is all I said. I said: "When you are ready for me and want money, I will pay it."

Further on he says:

I am a Conservative and will do my duty, and am willing to subscribe towards the debt.

Now take the case of John D. Clouston, who was also on the original note, and therefore may very well have felt himself, if not legally bound—because that note was taken up—at all events, morally bound, to see that the debt was paid. He had certainly an interest in doing his part towards its liquidation. In question 1902 he is asked:

1902. How much did you take upon yourself to pay?—I took upon myself to pay $150.

To whom were you to pay that debt?—To W. W. Webb.

Who told you to pay it to W. W. Webb?—I don't know that anybody told me to pay it particularly to W. W. Webb.

Then how did you come to go to W. W. Webb?—Well, I was aware that he had a note that had to be arranged and settled up.

How were you aware of it?—Well, I suppose I was something like yourself, I was taking an interest in political matters.

He is asked again:

2005. Would you have paid that money but for getting the bridge?—I think in all probability I would, provided there was necessity for it. I think probably I would.

You think probably. Would you?—Yes, I think so.

Then he says further on:

2175. Was there any condition or stipulation attached to the statement that there was a bridge for you? Did he say what you had to do?—Not a word.

Did he put a condition to it?—Not one word.

Did anyone ask you to pay this $150, or was it voluntary on your part?—It was a voluntary offer among ourselves, knowing that the party was involved in the way they were.

Was there with anybody a condition that you should pay the $150 if you got the bridge?—Not that I can bring to my memory.

Now, then, Robert May is asked:

2752. Why did you pay it to Henry May?—To help pay the debt against the Conservative party.

Are you sure that is what you paid it for?—Yes.

Have you had any conversation with anybody in regard to what you have to say here to-day?—No, sir.

So, one after the other, all these men actually come before the Committee and swear positively that they paid these sums for the purpose of paying off the debt owed by the Conservative party, that they did so with their own free will and in a voluntary manner. I am really at a loss to know how the hon. gentleman can make the statement he has made, that there is not a tittle of evidence to prove that these sums were voluntarily paid. I think if the hon. gentleman had paid more attention to this evidence, if his attention had been called possibly to these questions and answers I have mentioned, he, as he said himself, would not have been found on the floor of the House moving this amendment. As I said before, the charge rests to a great extent on the evidence of Arundel Simpson. Indeed, it was submitted at the investigation that Arundel Simpson's evidence was the most important; in fact, it was the crucial point of the whole question. I, for one, after having heard the evidence of Arundel Simpson, would not believe him on oath. Of all the witnesses, his testimony was the least reliable. He not only contradicted himself, he not only gave a great many versions of the same story at the time of his examination, but he had made a solemn declaration, previous to the investigation, which he had sworn and subscribed to, which was entirely opposed to and entirely contradictory of the statement he had made on oath. Again, he was contradicted by other persons in a manner that should have convinced the hon. gentleman who refused to accede to the majority report that he was telling what was not true. Take, for instance, the question of the letter. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) reiterate the statement that Stanley or Mr. Cochrane had actually given a letter to this man, Arundel Simpson, to carry to Hedley Simpson, and in that letter told him he would get the bridge, provided he would pay $150. Let us see what evidence there is on that point. This man Simpson, in the course of his testimony, question 310-11, says:

310. Did you see that letter?—No, I saw the letter, but I did not know what was in it. I could not tell you what was in it.

311. Was that letter read in your presence?—I don't know as it was. I don't think it was; I would not swear positively, it is quite a while ago.

This man on that occasion stated positively that he only saw the outside of the letter, that he never read it, never heard it read, and never heard what was in it. Yet we find in another portion of his evidence, after being examined and re-examined on that point, he again changed his statement. After a lapse of two or three days, and knowing something of the testimony of the other witnesses, and being confronted with his other declaration, he was brought before the Committee; and then he managed to tell this story: He said this letter was handed to him by Mr. Cochrane or Stanley, he did not know which; that he carried the letter to Hedley Simpson; that Mrs. Simpson was present; that the letter was delivered to her; that she read the letter to himself and some one else; and he went on to tell what it contained. That was not only a direct contradiction of what he said before, but Stanley came forward and testified that he had never given him a letter, that he had once sent a verbal message to Hedley Simpson, but he had never sent a message, written or verbal, by Arundel Simpson. Mrs. Hedley swore positively that the letter was never read, that Simpson never brought a letter of the kind either from Mr. Cochrane or Stanley, and that what Arundel Simpson said on the subject was entirely untrue. Yet we actually find, after that contradiction by two or three witnesses, and considering that this charge is of the nature of a criminal charge, that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) not only reasserted the opinion here, but in the minority report sent in by hon. gentlemen makes the statement that this letter was sent and contained the statements that Arundel Simpson at his last examination said it contained. Let me call the attention of the House to another contradiction of Arundel Simpson. As to the two notes already spoken of, given by Hedley Simpson to Stanley for the loan of $200: Arundel Simpson swore he saw those notes, that they were in the handwriting of Stanley; that Stanley was a maker of one of the notes, and not only a maker, but, strange to say, payee, and he swore those notes were both endorsed by Uriah Simpson. What are the facts? They were not in the handwriting of Stanley, that Hedley Simpson himself brought the notes to Stanley, that only one of them was endorsed by Uriah Simpson. Hedley Simpson in his examination said that Arundel never saw those notes, that no individual ever saw them but Stanley to whom he gave them. So we find that Arundel Simpson is contradicted again on a very material point by two witnesses. Then Arundel Simpson said he had several interviews with Mr. Cochrane. In one portion of his evidence he said he had only one interview, in another portion he said he had two interviews, and, finally, he said he had three interviews. Then he gave different statements as to what occurred at these interviews. In one instance he said they talked first about a bridge and then about a lighthouse; afterwards he said that was not the case, they talked first about a lighthouse and then a bridge. Worse than all; this witness had actually made a declaration, which forms one of the exhibits attached to the report, which is altogether contradictory of the statements he made in his examination. When he was confronted with that declaration he saw no way out of it except to say: first, that he had not sworn to it or declared to it although he admitted he signed, and secondly, that the gentleman, Mr. Gorman, who took it down did not take it down as he said he did.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman pardon me a moment. I would like to ask him if he has come to the conclusion that there was no letter written by Cochrane or Simpson?

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). I am perfectly satisfied there was not, from the evidence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) By neither of them?

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). By neither of them. I am satisfied, because Stanley said there was none and because Hedley Simpson said that he never got any. The statement to that effect is contradicted by two or three witnesses. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not by any means exhausted the reasons, but I think I have shown enough to warrant the Committee and to warrant the House in coming to the conclusion that Arundel Simpson's evidence be rejected entirely from consideration, and that he at all events was not worthy of credence. Nobody, as far as I know of, has asserted that Mr. Cochrane made any agreement himself with any of these parties, but it has been attempted to be proved that he was cognizant of all this, and that it was all done with his knowledge. We must remember that there was a committee appointed in this riding. I do not know if it is worth while to go into the history of the appointing of that committee; the facts are that the evidence is not altogether satisfactory on that point. Some think they were appointed by the general convention, and more say they were self-appointed, but be that as it may, these five or six persons acted as a committee and it was recognized that they were a committee for the purpose of ascertaining who were the proper persons to be recommended for these appointments. Now, the minority report charges, and the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) in his address stated, that Mr. Cochrane, if he was not a member of this committee—I believe that is not pretended—was at least at one or two of the meetings. I take issue with him there, for while it is true that Mr. Bullock gives some testimony which goes somewhat to that effect, yet, when you come to read his testimony carefully, you must see that he does not intend that. It appears that this committee were in the habit of meeting at Mr. Bullock's store. Mr. Bullock kept a grocery store at Brighton, and Mr. Bullock's evidence is as follows:—

2489. Did Mr. Cochrane attend any of the meetings?—He was there once. I do not know whether he had any conversation with me or any one of us.

2490. He was there once?—He was in the store once when we were all there.

2491. Was there any conversation when he was there about these appointments?—No.

2492. Did you ever tell Mr. Cochrane as to the deliberation with regard to the patronage committee? Did you ever inform him?—No.

2499. He was present there at the time the committee was there?—The whole of the committee was not there.

2500. Who of the committee were there?—Well, I can't tell you.

2501. You were there?—Yes.

2502. Was Stanley there?—I do not know, he may have been there.

2503. When was this?—I cannot tell you when it was.

2504. You cannot remember?—No.

2507. How did Mr. Cochrane come to be there?—I cannot tell you.

2508. Did he drop in by accident?—I cannot tell.

2509. What time of the day was it?—In the evening.

2510. How far does Mr. Cochrane live from Brighton?—Five or six miles from Brighton.

2511. And he happened to be there in the evening?—Yes; this evening.

2512. What time in the evening did the committee meet?—I cannot tell you.

2513. Was it early or late?—Not very late. I should say it was after eight o'clock; between eight and nine o'clock.

2514. When your store was closed?—Yes.

2515. Then Mr. Cochrane remained there after the store was closed?—He came in accidently, I think.

2516. Did you say the committee met there after the store was closed?—Yes.

2517. And Mr. Cochrane was there when the committee met?—Yes.

2518. For the whole of the time?—No, not when they were meeting.

2519. Oh, well, did he come in afterwards?—Yes, he came in after the committee met.

2520. Now, the committee met after the store was closed, and Mr. Cochrane, having come in after the committee met, must have come in after the store was closed?—He did.

2522. However, that was after the store was closed?—I think the store was closed.

2523. And it was after this Mr. Cochrane came in?—Yes; it was after the store was closed, as far as my knowledge goes, that Mr. Cochrane came in.

2524. Where did the committee transact its business in the store?—I believe it was right in the open store.

2525. Right in there in the main part of the store?—Yes.

2526. And that is where Mr. Cochrane came?—Yes.

2527. Mr. Cochrane was in there with the committee?—Yes; but he was not on the committee.

2528. I know, but he was in there with the committee? He was there when the committee were there in the store. I could not swear when Mr. Cochrane came in, but I know he came right in the store when the committee was meeting there.

2529. You have sworn that Mr. Cochrane was there?—Yes.

2530. And you have sworn that he was there while the committee was there?—Yes; that's true.

2531. Did he know that the committee was meeting there?—I do not know.

2532. Did he attend there by request?—No; not that I know of.

Now, Sir, the whole story of Mr. Cochrane being present at one of these committee meetings is based upon that evidence; and what does that evidence prove? It proves nothing more than that Mr. Cochrane happened there accidently, that he went to the store and some of the members of the committee were there, that they had a conversation of some kind or other, but this man swears positively there was no conversation about the appointment. The minority base their report entirely upon that evidence that Mr. Cochrane was present as one of the committee, and it appears to me to be a very extraordinary finding. But there is another piece of testimony which sets the whole thing at rest, and that is the evidence of Mr. Stanley, who was one of the members of this committee. If you look at questions 1026, 1027 and 1028 you will find that Mr. Stanley swears positively that Mr. Cochrane was never present at any one of the committee meetings:

1026. Was Mr. Cochrane present at any of these committee meetings?—He was not.
1027. Was he a member of the committee?—He was not.
1028. You say that Mr. Cochrane was not a member of the committee?—No: he was never present.

Now, I think that taking the two pieces of testimony together we cannot come to the conclusion that Mr. Cochrane was present at these committees, and that he knew what was going on; and there is no further evidence to show that he was present at any other committee meeting. That is the only evidence to show that he was present at that meeting, and there is no evidence to show that he was present at any other. Then, Mr. Henry May, who was also one of the committee, says, at question 3044, that he never remembered seeing Mr. Cochrane in Bullock's store at any committee meeting. At all events this clause in the report which has the sanction and approval of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) is certainly improper. The clause I refer to says:

"That the said Edward Cochrane was not a member of the said committee, but he knew of the purpose and object of it, attended one or more of its meetings when matters relating to the said offices were discussed, and acted on the committee's recommendation, &c."

It is quite true that he did act on the committee's recommendation, and he was quite right in so doing. That is a very common thing. In very many ridings and many of the constituencies there are committees appointed who look after the patronage and recommend officials for various positions, and whenever they are appointed it is almost the invariable rule that the members in these various constituencies take the recommendation of these committees. It could hardly be supposed that a member, at all events in an extensive riding, could be as well and thoroughly acquainted with the various persons who are suitable for these positions as members of a committee drawn from various portions of the locality. It is quite true that Mr. Cochrane did take the recommendation of these committees, and that he addressed letters subsequently to the department asking for the appointment of the various persons whose names are mentioned in these charges. So much for the charge against Mr. Cochrane; and I think we should remember that he is the only person who has been on trial. The Committee was not asked, and it was not their duty, as I understand, to investigate anything relating to these other persons. They were not on trial, they were not called on to make their defence, and, therefore, the Committee had nothing to do with any testimony implicating them. It is quite true, none of the Committee, and possibly no member of this House, would approve of the way in which this money was obtained.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear. What harm if it was given voluntarily?

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). All the members of the Committee agree as to that, and the two reports are in that respect to some extent similar. This is the report of the majority on that point:

"That the facts which your Committee have reported with reference to the manner of making recommendations for the appointments by the political committee in the riding and soliciting of subscriptions by the committee from the applicants, for the aforesaid purpose, all occurred before the last election of the said Edward Cochrane and were well known in the riding before the said last election, and discussed at the nomination on the hustings and at other places during said election contest.

"Your Committee report that the practice which seems to have been resorted to by the political organization referred to, in order to raise a fund for political purposes, though not connected with Dominion politics, was improper and reprehensible."

Mr. BARRON. It was not my intention until quite recently to take part in this debate, but having read the majority report, I feel it my duty to ask the House to listen to me, and I hope they will listen to me patiently, for a short time, while I set forth the reasons why I consider that report to be wholly at variance with the facts proven before the Committee. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) when speaking to-day, dwelt upon the necessity of one and all who have to sit in judgment on this case, approaching it with a calm, quiet, judicial mind.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Oh.

Mr. BARRON. And although my hon. friend across the floor of the House laughs, still I have confidence in myself, at all events, approaching it in that spirit, and in removing as far as I possibly can the mantle of the counsel, and considering fairly and squarely the evidence which has been adduced before the Committee. I have listened to the last speaker with a great deal of attention. I am sorry that his voice was not strong enough to reach all parts of the chamber, as I did not catch everything he said. But I ask the House to note this, that the beginning of his speech was entirely at variance with the end of it. His beginning was a contradiction of his peroration. He said that these payments were voluntary. If they were voluntary, then there was no harm in them; but out of his own mouth—and I use the word without any offence—he stultifies himself, because the report condemns these voluntary payments. If there was nothing wrong in these voluntary payments, why did the Committee report:

"That the practice which seems to have been resorted to by the political organization referred to, in order to raise a fund for political purposes, though not connected with Dominion politics, was improper and reprehensible."

Mr. Speaker, what is there improper and reprehensible in a man making a voluntary payment for party purposes? Yet out of the fulness of their hearts their mouths speak, or rather their pen writes, that the practice was reprehensible and to be condemned. Therefore, I say that the hon. gentleman has stultified himself by condemning at the end of his speech that which he approved of at the beginning. The hon. gentleman says that we must prove the corrupt acts, that is, we must prove the corruption. The hon. gentleman, I believe, is a lawyer, and I am told one of some standing; and does he not know that we prove the facts and the corruption is inferred? It is our duty here as judge and jury to infer from the facts proven whether they are corrupt or not; and when the hon. gentleman says that we must prove that the act was corrupt, in the sense of actually proving that it possesses the quality of corruptness, he asks us almost to prove an impossibility. The hon. gentleman says that Hedley Simpson did give $200, but that there was every reason why he should have got the appointment, because his old father was there before him. If his old father was there before him and he should have got the appointment, that was a reason why he should not have been asked to pay $200. That is the reason why, in the language of Bullock, $200 should not have been exacted from this poor man who had his mother and sisters to support on $400 a year. Now, I will consider the charges seriatim, because I observe that the report traverses them one after the other. The first is a statement and is conceded. The next one is that Hedley Simpson was an applicant. The hon. gentlemen who prepared the majority report skipped over this fact altogether: they do not notice the fact that Hedley Simpson was an applicant; they handle that particular fact with velvet gloves, because the significant fact that Hedley Simpson was an applicant and sent Stanley to Cochrane, brings Hedley Simpson at once into contact with Mr. Cochrane himself. What says the majority report, which hon. gentlemen opposite ask us to sustain?

"Whatever did take place with reference to the said appointment was between the said Hedley H. Simpson and the said James Stanley."

Do they not know—they do know—that the evidence is that Hedley Simpson sent James Stanley to Mr. Cochrane to get the position for him? Hedley Simpson knew that James Stanley was the intimate friend and close associate of Mr. Cochrane. Let the hon. gentleman look at question 152, on page 6, and he will see that in pursuance of Hedley Simpson sending James Stanley, the intimate friend and close associate of Mr. Cochrane, shown to be such by several witnesses, Mr. Stanley saw Mr. Cochrane. Where did he see him? He saw him at the hotel, and there it was that this celebrated letter was written. The majority of the Committee find that no such letter was written. How was it possible for them to find that no such letter was written? I ask them why they did not put Mr. Cochrane into the box to prove that no such letter was written, when Arundel Simpson said there was such a letter written and Hedley Simpson did not deny it, although pressed to deny it.

An hon. MEMBER. What about Mrs. Herbert Simpson?

Mr. BARRON. Arundel Simpson said the letter was given him on that occasion by Mr. Cochrane, and Mr. Cochrane then said this is in regard to the light. Then Arundel Simpson took this letter, and on the way he met Herbert Simpson, and he thought Mrs. Herbert Simpson read it, but could not swear positively. He heard it read by somebody, he does not know by whom, but he thinks it was Mrs. Simpson. Why did he think so? Because she was the woman who did all the writing and business for these different Simpsons. But the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White), when he argues that that is a contradiction of Arundel Simpson's statement with regard to the letter, argues beside the question, because Arundel said he thought it was Mrs. Simpson, but was not sure. If that letter was not written, why did Hedley Simpson, in answer to the question put him, say he had looked for it? Why did he look for it if none was ever written? But he knew such a letter was written, and because he knew there was such a letter written and called for by the subpœna he looked for it and could not find it because it was destroyed. I say that letter was written at the hotel; and will any hon. gentleman in this House say it was not written, when the hon. member for East Northumberland was at the Committee from day to day listening very attentively, because his political life was at stake, to every word said, and yet, although that letter meant his political death, so unwilling was he to speak that he left the room when the evidence was closed for the prosecution and did not dare go into the box. And what was the reason advanced by his counsel? It was, forsooth, advanced for him that he was afraid to contradict some of the witnesses on account of their being his political and personal friends, and the constituency being a close one he did not like to contradict them, as that would create unpleasantness. Now, Sir, I say that Hedley Simpson does not deny that letter. How shall I prove it? The hon. gentleman who has just spoken sought to create the impression that Hedley Simpson denied having received such a letter. I will ask you to look at question 30 and see what that says:

Q. Then you do not know of your own knowledge whether Cochrane knew about that petition or not? Before you got the appointment, did your brother Arundel bring you a letter from Mr. Cochrane in connection with the appointment?—A. I cannot say. Q. You do not remember?—A. No. Q. You have no recollection of getting a letter from Mr. Cochrane, brought you by your brother Arundel?—A. No. Q. Nor by anybody else?—A. No, sir. Q. Have you searched for letters from Mr. Cochrane to you?—A. Yes.

If no letter was written, why did he search for it? If there was none written, he must have known there was none written, and yet he looks for it. He is asked:—

Q. Why did you search for it?—A. My subpœna told me to bring all papers.

This subpœna suggests that there was a letter, and knowing the suggestion to be true, he looked for it—

Q. You say, at all events, you have not been able to find any?—A. No. Q. And you have no recollection of a letter from Mr. Cochrane?—A. No. Q. Will you swear that you did not get a letter from Mr. Cochrane?—A. I will not.

The next question was objected to by the counsel for the hon. member for East Northumberland, and I was not allowed to get an answer to it. Now I take occasion to say that during the examination we could not get evidence from the witnesses—they being both personal and political friends of the hon. member for East Northumberland—without the greatest difficulty. To get evidence from them was practically like straining porridge through a straw. It was almost impossible to get anything from them. The answer, "I do not remember" was given again and again. "It may have been so, but I do not remember," was reiterated without ceasing, and I say it was like extracting a tooth to get evidence out of the witnesses. But what evidence we did get was of the most convincing character in support of the charges brought by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) and the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). Hedley Simpson's evidence was of a most unsatisfactory nature. His mind was misty on all occasions. He seemed to be entirely oblivious of the facts. He knew the danger to himself of proving guilt in the hon. member for East Northumberland because he would have thereby brought himself within the scope of the decision in Regina versus Mercer, decided many years ago. He himself would have been equally guilty with the hon. member for East Northumberland. He would lose his situation and the $200 he gave for it would never be recouped to him, and he would have been left destitute as he was before he got the situation. Now Hedley Simpson says he never conversed with the hon. member for East Northumberland at all. If you will look at questions 34 to 36, you will see from what the hon. member for East Northumberland himself says, he did have a conversation with Mr. Hedley Simpson and in his letter to the department—his second letter to the department—reminding the department that Mr. Hedley Simpson ought to be appointed, the hon. member for East Northumberland says himself that he had at the previous Easter told Hedley Simpson he had got the appointment. How could he have told Hedley Simpson that, unless he did that which Simpson himself in his evidence says he did not do, namely, have any conversation whatsoever with Mr. Cochrane? So much, therefore, for the evidence of Mr. Hedley Simpson. Now, with regard to the notes, the hon. gentleman tries to make a point against Arundel Simpson's evidence, because he does not describe these notes as they were in point of fact, because he did not tell exactly who was the maker and the endorser. Does that negative the fact that the notes were given? Nobody denies that, and, therefore, if Arundel Simpson does not speak accurately, so far as the description of the notes is concerned, that makes no difference, because no one can deny that these notes were given to Stanley, on which the $200 were raised, and they were given to Mr. Stanley and discounted before the appointment was made. All this took place before the notes were given. Mr. Hedley Simpson goes to Mr. Stanley, and in pursuance of his request, Mr. Stanley goes to Mr. Cochrane who was at the hotel. They meet at the hotel, the letter is written which Mr. Arundel Simpson says requested—he having heard that letter read by somebody—that security should be given; and see how his statement is corroborated. Does not his uncle Obadiah Simpson give security, showing that there must have been something as to security, and that something is stated in the letter which was written?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Where was it written? There is no evidence to show that.

Mr. BARRON. There is no evidence to show where it was written, but my contention is that the inference to be derived from the facts which are proved is that Stanley, in pursuance of Hedley Simpson's request, was at the hotel with Mr. Cochrane, where they all three met, and there the letter was written telling Arundel Simpson that it was in reference to the lighthouse, and Arundel Simpson states that the letter expressed the desire that security should be given. That security was given by a note endorsed by Darius Simpson. Now, read the majority report, and what does that say? It states that the said Hedley Simpson applied his money to the payment of a promissory note. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) has set forth the facts as to how Hedley Simpson raised the money, and the report says that he applied that money to the payment of a promissory note in the bank. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken tried to draw a herring across the trail by saying that the $1,000 note was not one on which the member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was an endorser, but he should have admitted that that note was taken up and another for $618 was given, which was endorsed by the member for East Northumberland, and Mr. Edward Cochrane appeared on that equally liable with other gentlemen. Who were on the original note for $1,000? The son of the member for East Northumberland was on it, and the nephew of the hon. gentleman was on it. He had, therefore, a reason for undertaking a liability of $618 if the original note was redeemed. The report says that Hedley Simpson paid this into the bank. Do not hon. gentlemen know that Hedley Simpson did not know where the money was to go, and, when he raised the money from Stanley on the note, he asked: Where is this money to go for I do not know? That is what the evidence shows. He did not know where the money was to go; but Stanley knew, the intimate friend and close associate of the hon. member for East Northumberland. How did he know? He could only know from the lips of the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) that the note was in the bank at Colborne, because he says he had no communication with Mr. Payne, the solicitor, or with Mr. Larke, the manager. So he must only have known from the hon. member himself that this note was there and was partly to be liquidated pro tanto by the payment of this amount of $200, the purchase money of the situation from Hedley Simpson. Then he communicated that fact to Hedley Simpson, who did not go to the bank alone to pay that amount, but Mr. Stanley said, my rig is there at the door: and they went to the bank together, but they found the bank closed and the manager out. Then they paid the money to Joseph Cochrane, postmaster. How did Mr. Stanley know where that money was to go? I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to say. The only inference is that Mr. Stanley knew by the conversation of Mr. Edward Cochrane that Mr. Hedley Simpson was to get the appointment, and, knowing that, the money was paid to the extent of $200. Directly that money was paid, the hon. member's liability was wiped out in connection with that $600 note, because the other gentlemen had received money by discounting other notes on which Mr. Cochrane's name was not at all, because his share was wiped out by the payment of the $200. The hon. gentleman has asked how the balance of the note of $618, or thereabouts, was taken up? The moment the $200 was paid by Stanley and Simpson, Mr. Cochrane's liability was gone, and Mr. Payne, Mr. Pickworth and Mr. Webb raised the balance of the money through Mrs. Strong, a widow in Colborne, and with the proceeds of the second note they paid the balance of the $600, the first part of it having been wiped out entirely by the payment which was made through Hedley Simpson.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BARRON. From the evidence that I adduced to the House before six o'clock, it seems perfectly clear that Hedley Simpson sent Mr. Stanley to Mr. Cochrane, and these latter two gentlemen discussed the matter, and the result of their conversation was that the note in the bank was paid to the extent of $200 by the Hedley Simpson money. Now, to show that Hedley Simpson did not know anything about where this money was to go, let me quote from the evidence at page 22, where Stanley is asked what took place when Hedley Simpson went with the notes, the proceeds of which he got to the extent of $200 from James Stanley. Stanley is asked these questions:

667. What took place further?—He wanted to know where he should place the $200. My rig was there and I told him to get in and we would go to Colborne, where he deposited the money in the Standard Bank, I understood the note was there.
668. You went to the Standard Bank at Colborne to deposit the money?—Yes.
669. You understood the note was there?—Yes.
670. What was that note?—It was the note that was given by Mr. Wade and W. L. Payne and Pickworth. I believe that was it. I did not see them sign the note.
671. Who else signed the note?—I do not know: I did not see any of them sign the paper.
672. But there was a note there anyway made by some people, which was to be either taken up or paid by this $200?—It was to be endorsed on the note.
673. The $200 was to be endorsed on the note in the Standard Bank at Colborne?—Yes.
674. About what time of the year did this take place?—I could not tell you.
675. Was it in the spring or the fall?—I think it must have been in the spring; I am not certain.
676. In the spring of 1888?—It must have been.
677. Before the Government appointed Hedley?—Yes; he was still in the lighthouse at the time.
678. But at that time he had not been appointed?—No.
679. He was just acting in the place of his father?—Yes.
680. When you went to Colborne with the money, what occurred?—We went to the Standard Bank and it was closed.
681. Well, go on?—From there we went to W. L. Payne's office to give it to him, but he was away. Then we went to the post office, so that it might be paid into the Standard Bank the next morning.
682. With whom did you leave it the next morning?—With the postmaster.
683. What is his name?—Mr. Cochrane.
684. A brother of Mr. Cochrane, the member?—No, a nephew.

So you see from that evidence of James Stanley that Hedley Simpson did not know where this money was to go. He asked James Stanley and Stanley told him; Stanley knew all about it. Why? Because Mr. Edward Cochrane, the member for East Northumberland, in his conversation at the hotel, evidently told him so. How did Mr. Cochrane know? Mind you, at this time the note had been protested; it had been protested on the 9th of December, and Mr. Cochrane received notice of protest, he being one of the endorsers. He knew, then, the note was there unpaid, but he knew further. Why? Because the note was placed by the manager of the Standard Bank in the hands of Mr. Payne, the solicitor, and Mr. Payne was instructed to take proceedings; and he says that, although he himself did not write the letters informing Mr. Cochrane and the other parties on the note, that it was placed in his hands for suit, still, he had no doubt in the practice of his office that the several parties, including Mr. Cochrane, had notice that the note was in suit, and was placed in his hands as solicitor of the bank for collection. In that way Mr. Cochrane knew all about the note, and he it was who told James Stanley all about it. Stanley told Hedley Simpson, the man who paid the money. Why do I so contend? Because in no other way does it appear that James Stanley could have acquired the intimate knowledge that he had acquired in regard to the particular note in question, which was then to be paid, and subsequently was paid, by Hedley Simpson, $200, which he gave for his appointment to office. Now, then, what are the facts that I think I have fairly made out from the evidence in my remarks this afternoon? First of all, we find that Hedley Simpson wants the appointment. Next, we find that Hedley Simpson, wanting the appointment, sends Mr. Stanley, the intimate friend and associate of Mr. Cochrane to Mr. Cochrane. Then we find that Stanley meets Mr. Cochrane at the hotel; then we find that Mr. Cochrane, having conversed with Mr. Stanley at the hotel, sends a letter to Hedley Simpson. Mind you at this time Mr. Cochrane had not seen Hedley Simpson. Mr. Cochrane sends a letter to Hedley Simpson. Mr. Cochrane furthermore then tells Arundel Simpson, the messenger who takes the letter, that the letter is about the lighthouse appointment. Does any hon. gentleman doubt me? If so let him look at page 11, question 312, and there he will see an affirmative answer to my statement. Next, what do we find? The letter is sworn to contain a request that security must be given. Now, it is sought to diminish the value of Arundel Simpson's evidence by seeking to establish that he was an unreliable witness and could not be believed. But do we not find the fact following, that Hedley Simpson does give security: he gets Darius Simpson, his uncle, to endorse the note, and thereby meets the request contained in the letter. Surely, if there was no letter written, Hedley Simpson could say so; but he does not dare to deny that the letter was written. Then, we find that Hedley Simpson goes to Stanley and gives two notes for $200 and raises the money mentioned in the letter. What next do we find? Hedley Simpson does not know what to do with the money; but Stanley, the intimate friend and associate of Mr. Cochrane, tells him, because he had previously acquired the knowledge from Mr. Cochrane. Then they go to Colborne to the bank. The bank is closed, and they go to Mr. Payne, who is out of his office. Next, they go the postmaster, to whom they give the money, with the request that it be paid to Mr. Payne. Mr. Payne is examined, and he admits the fact that this identical $200 was placed by him in the bank to liquidate pro tanto the note of $618, upon which note Mr. Edward Cochrane, the member for East Northumberland, was an endorser. So we trace the money, the proceeds of this iniquitous sale, from Hedley Simpson to Mr. Stanley, then to the postmaster, then to Mr. Payne, the solicitor, then back from the solicitor's hands right on into the bank to be applied, according to Mr. Payne's evidence, on this particular note. Then we find Mr. Cochrane had previously received notice of protest. The note was protested on the 9th December. Thereby he knew all about it. The note was placed in the hands of the solicitor for collection. The solicitor swears that though he did not himself write the letters, letters were undoubtedly written, notifying the different parties that the note was there for collection; so that Mr. Cochrane in that way also knew that the note was there for collection. What next do we find? Mr. Stanley acquired his knowledge—that is the only conclusion we can come to, because it could not be acquired in any other way—he acquired it from Mr. Cochrane. Then we find, that having been done, that Hedley Simpson gets the appointment on the recommendation of Mr. Cochrane. That is not denied; it is admitted in the majority report. But here let me say that though these facts are so undeniably true that they must strike a responsive yes in the heart of the member for East Northumberland, he, who knew all the facts in regard to this matter from begining to end, is as dumb as an oyster, his mouth is shut, he does not say yea or nay in regard to the grave offence with which he is charged. I say these facts only can be adduced from the evidence given, and yet they seem to be entirely ignored by the hon. gentlemen who bring in the majority report. Then what does the majority report say? Why, that these sums were voluntary, and were paid as a contribution to the Conservative party. These different sums which these poor unfortunate men, getting only $1.25 a day for eight months in the year, these sums of $150 in all cases but one, and that man was so poor he could not raise it—these sums, they contend, were simply paid as a voluntary contribution towards the Conservative party, paid by men who never before, with the exception of two of them, had paid a single cent towards the Conservative fund. Why, Sir, it is an insult to the intelligence of men so to contend. It is an insult to the intelligence of this House for hon. gentlemen opposite to ask us to adopt that portion of the report, at all events, which says that these sums were voluntarily paid by these men. Sir, these sums were screwed out of these men; as the witness Bullock says, they were exacted from these men. Sir, if the sums were voluntarily contributed, there is no harm, no wrong done. It is a perfectly right and proper thing. But, Sir, their own report condemns that argument, because it says that the payments were most reprehensible and ought not to be condoned. Hedley Simpson got the position; he paid his money—voluntarily, it is said by hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me ask the House to listen to his evidence. Voluntary payments, forsooth! $200 paid by this unfortunate man on a salary of $400, a man who, by information I possess and which I believe to be true, was unable to pay his debts to W. W. Webb, and was brought up on a judgment summons, and swore in the court that the reason he could not pay Mr. Webb was because he had to pay these notes to Stanley, and the payment of these notes required every cent of his earnings. Yet we are asked to swallow the statements that these payments were voluntarily made by the man who got the office. What does Hedley Simpson say:

139. Would you have given the notes without some understanding about getting the appointment?—Well, I do not understand how I could have paid them.

140. You would not have rendered yourself liable for the notes unless you had got the office that would have enabled you to have paid them?—No.

141. Would you have given these two $100 notes unless you had got this office to pay for them?—No: I do not think I would.

Yet hon. gentlemen opposite say he voluntarily paid this money. The evidence continues:

142. Out of what sum did you expect to pay the notes?—I had no funds.

143. When you gave the notes how did you expect to pay for them?—I expected to pay for them out of the salary I got for taking care of the lighthouse.

144. Is that the way you paid them?—Yes.

Let there be no misunderstanding. I point hon. gentlemen opposite to page 6 and questions 139-144 to see a statement of the reasons why he paid the money; and yet hon. gentlemen opposite say that he voluntarily paid it, that it was not a quid pro quo for the situation he got, and that it was not given in consideration of getting the office in question. It is absolutely insulting to our intelligence to ask us to believe that portion of the report, that these poor men having to support their families, not one of whom had any money in his pocket or laid by, who had never contributed a cent before, with the exception of two of them—one of whom had subscribed $1 and the other $2—that these men voluntarily put their hands in their pockets and gave this money without expecting to obtain the offices in question. Hon. gentlemen opposite say they are voluntary payments. I said Hedley Simpson never subscribed before. Let me prove it. Look at question 195, and what is his answer:

195. Did you ever subscribe before this to the party fund?—No.

196. This is the only occasion, according to you, that you ever subscribed?—Yes.

And he was not a prominent man in the Conservative party. When asked the question, he said as follows:

Q. Had you ever taken any interest in politics?—A. Very little.

Here, then, is a man who had never in his whole life subscribed a dollar to party funds and who had never taken any interest in politics, giving $200, and hon. gentlemen opposite want us to believe that there was no bargain and sale of the office he received, and that the payment was voluntary and unconditional. What does Stanley say about it? At page 18, questions 545 and 548, and answers, hon. gentlemen will find he knew that Hedley Simpson was not worth any money himself; and yet a man not worth anything himself, not a dollar, we are asked to believe, for the love of his party, voluntarily contributes $200, when his income was only $400. Look at clause six of the majority report, which says:

"Whatever did take place with respect to the said payment was between the said Hedley Simpson and James Stanley."

I do not want to say anything that is wrong, but it seems to me that that clause in the report is an attempt to shield the member for East Northumberland, because it is not in accordance with facts, as I will prove out of a letter which the hon. member for East Northumberland wrote himself. Look at page 117, question 3416, and what do we find? Let it be remembered that the report says that all negotiations took place between Hedley Simpson and Stanley. The hon. gentlemen have not read the evidence and letter that Mr. Cochrane wrote. What was that letter? It was as follows:—

"Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER,
"Minister Marine and Fisheries.

"DEAR SIR,—I wrote you some time ago about the appointment of Manly Simpson '(It is Manly here)' as light-house-keeper at Presqu'Isle Harbour. I was at your department to-day, and found that the said appointment had not been made. I hope this will receive your earnest attention, as I informed him at Easter that he had been appointed.

"Yours truly,
"E. COCHRANE."

Yet hon. gentlemen opposite say that all the negotiations took place between Hedley Simpson and Stanley, and Mr. Cochrane knew nothing about them and had no conversation with Hedley Simpson. But we have the hon. gentleman's own letter, which gives a most condemnatory answer to hon. gentlemen opposite; for this letter, which I have read, shows that he acknowledges his own promise to Hedley Simpson. But supposing that my contention is all wrong, that it can be believed that the member for East Northumberland was not a party and privy to the negotiations that went on between Stanley and Hedley Simpson, so that he himself knew nothing about it, we know that Stanley was one of the celebrated committee, if you choose to call it a committee. It shows what a reliable man Stanley is, for he says the Commi tee was appointed at the convention held in the East Riding of Northumberland. Witness after witness came forward and said that was not the case, that it was a committee formed in Brighton, for the purpose, they say, in answer to words put into their mouths by the counsel for the defence, for the purpose of distributing patronage. Here let me point out this significant fact. It is true they did distribute these offices, but they were the only offices they ever distributed. Counsel for the defence tried to make out that this Committee was appointed for the purpose of distributing patronage generally, and hon. gentlemen have tried to make it appear that it was a very common practice to appoint committees for that purpose, that in various ridings patronage was regulated by committees and not by the representatives of the county. That is true. But if it is true in this case, tell me why this committee did not recommend a single other person to Mr. Cochrane except the men who were to get these particular appointments as bridge-tenders and lighthouse-keepers, from everyone of w'iom, according to Mr. Bullock, there was "exacted" a large sum of money. At page 16, questions 256-57, 932-34, hon gentlemen will find that James Stanley is the intimate friend and warm personal associate of the hon. member for East Northumberland. He says there was a committee formed. What was the object of the committee? Let Stanley himself answer the question. At page 32, question 993, when asked the question what did the committee ask him to do, he replied: "They said I had better raise funds to wipe out the indebtedness of the party, if I could." Mr. Stanley swears there that part of his duty as a member of the committee was that he had to try to raise funds to wipe off the indebtedness of the party, if he could. I do not deny that the proceeds of the sales of these offices went to liquidate the liability of the Conservative party, but I do assert that one of the gentlemen who was liable for a part of the liability was the member for the East Riding of Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) now being impeached. Now, Henry May, another committee man, was sworn, and I will read to the House his questions and answers. If you will turn to question 3048 you will find the following:—

3048. What did you learn was the object of this committee?—To settle on the men who were to take the balance of the positions.
3049. That was the work of this committee?—Yes, I think that was it.
3050. Then it had the two-fold object of settling on the men for the offices and of financing to liquidate the indebtedness of the Conservative party?—I suppose that was it.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, that the evidence of Mr. Stanley was that he was requested to raise money by this committee to liquidate the indebtedness of the Conservative party; Henry May, another witness, swears that he supposes it was for the purpose of disposing of these particular offices and financing to liquidate the indebtedness of the Conservative party. Then, what does Mr. Bullock swear, who was another member of the committee. Turn to page 85 and you will find that he swears as follows:

2406. What were the duties of that committee?—The duties of the committee were to see if we could not appoint somebody on the canal for the bridges there.
2407. How much were each of them to give?—We exacted $150 from every one of them. That is what we wanted.
2408. What were these people to get for the $150 they were to pay?—I cannot swear to that.

He evidently thinks that he has gone a little too far and he answers "I cannot swear to that."— 2409. What was the $150 to be given for?—It was to be given for our influence.

The influence of Mr. Bullock! This is too absur l.—

2410. Were you to put this $150 in your pocket?—No.
2411. Who was to give $150?—Every one who got the appointment.
2412. And those who did not get the appointment were not to pay for it?—Certainly not.

The hon. gentlemen, in their report, say that this money was paid voluntarily and for the love of the thing and yet we find from the evidence that men who put up their $150 expecting to get an office, when there were not sufficient offices for all of them, got back their $150. If the money was paid for the purpose of contributing to funds why should it be returned to these men when they did not get an office. Then Mr. Bullock further swears:

2413. Was any money paid do you know, by persons who did not get the appointment? Mr. Vanalstine paid some money, didn't he?—He did not pay it to me.
2414. But he paid it to somebody?—I do not know anything about that.
2415. Did Mr. William Mason pay any money to you?—He never gave me any money.
2420. It was the rule that those who were applicants should pay $150?—I think it was.

Therefore, from the evidence of Mr. Stanley, from the evidence of Mr. May, and from the evidence of Mr. Bullock, each one of whom was a committee man, it is proved most conclusively that the object of this committee was to give these offices out to these different men who would pay $150, and when they did not get the office the money was returned to them. That being the object which they carried out, let me show to this House how Mr. Cochrane himself, the hon. member for East Northumberland, knew all about this committee. Turn to page 30 and see what Mr. Stanley one of the committee swears:

948. You did tell Mr. Cochrane, as a matter of fact, that the committee had made recommendations from time to time?—I think most likely. It might have been a week after.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that I have established that the object of the committee was to dispose of offices and raise money from the men who were to get these offices. Now, I want to prove out of the lips of these very men that Mr. Cochrane knew of that committee, and here is the evidence again:

949. Within a week you did tell Mr. Cochrane what the committee had done?—I may have done so. I think Mr. Cochrane was in Ottawa at the time of the meetings.
950. You said something about his being in during the week, and you may have told him?—I don't know. I won't say; I may have done so.

Then go on to page 40, and what further do you find? Mr. Fitzgerald did get an office, but his case is not one of the charges made. He paid his $150 and he got his solace in the office. Mr. Vanalstine who paid the $150 and did not get the office, had the money returned to him. What does Thos.

Fitzgerald one of the men who did get office and pay money say :

1213. Did you see Mr. Cochrane before that?—Yes, sir.
1214. In regard to the appointment?—Yes, sir.
1215. What was the conversation you had with Mr. Cochrane?—I only saw him once. I got a petition from a few men in the riding and showed it to him. He said it was very good. "I will give it to the committee; I have nothing more to say. Whoever the committee picks out will get it."
1220. Did you pay this $150 in cash to Mr. Stanley?—Yes, in hard cash.

Then go to page 86 and what do we find, showing that Mr. Cochrane knew all about this committee? In Bullock's evidence we find the following :—

2447. You were not appointed a committee by the convention of the riding?—No.
2448. Mr. Cochrane I suppose, often drops into your store?—Why, certainly, he comes in, he trades with me.
2449. He knew that you, friends of his, had formed yourselves into a committee to regulate the granting of these bridges?—I could not swear to that. I could not swear that he knew of this thing.
2450. You are convinced that he knew what was going on?—Yes; I was pretty well convinced, but I cannot swear to it.
2451. But you are convinced he knew you men had formed yourselves into a committee to regulate the granting of these bridges?—Yes.

Then he was questioned by Mr. Osler, one of our most astute counsel who acted for the hon. member for East Northumberland, and here let me say that he could not have got a better gentleman in a particular case of that kind to act for him than Mr. Osler :

2489. Did Mr. Cochrane attend any of the meetings?—He was there once. I do not know whether he had any conversation with me or any of us.

Then Mr. Osler finds that he is treading on dangerous ground, he drops the witness at once because he knew that if he, known to be perhaps friendly to the witness, was to pursue that line the witness would be encouraged to give more evidence as to Mr. Cochrane being at the committee. But he was re-examined, and what was the answer he made. I ask the attention of the House to this evidence of Mr. Bullock because it proves most conclusively that Mr. Cochrane was present at one of the meetings when offices were disposed of and the money talked of which these offices were to bring :

You say that Mr. Cochrane was present once in your store when the committee was meeting there?—Yes; he was in my store once.
When the committee met there?—I think so.
He saw the members of the committee when they met at your store?—I cannot tell you that.
He was present there at the time the committee were there?—The whole of the committee was not there.
Who of the committee were there?—Well, I can't tell you.
You were there?—Yes.
Was Stanley there?—I do not know; he may have been there.

And the hon. member who has just preceded me tries to rebut the evidence of Mr. Bullock by saying that James Stanley says that Mr. Cochrane was never present when he was there. Well, surely Mr. Cochrane might have been at a meeting of the committee without Mr. Stanley being there. Mr. Stanley's statement does not negative the evidence of Mr. Bullock, because Mr. Bullock says he does not know whether Mr. Stanley was at the meeting at which Mr. Cochrane was present or not. The statement of Mr. Stanley that Mr. Cochrane was not present at a committee meeting when he was goes for nothing in the face of the evidence of Mr. Bullock. Then he is asked :

When was this?—I cannot tell when it was.
You cannot remember?—No.
Was it before or after the appointments were made?—Before.
Before the appointments were made?—Yes.
How did Mr. Cochrane come to be there—I cannot tell you.
Did he drop in by accident?—I cannot tell.
What time of the day was it?—In the evening.
How far does Mr. Cochrane live from Brighton?—Five or six miles from Brighton.

And that is important in view of the fact that it was after dark when these meetings were held.—

And he happened to be there in the evening?—Yes; in the evening.
What time in the evening did the committee meet?—I cannot tell you.
Was it early or late?—Not very late. I should say it was after 8 o'clock; between 8 and 9 o'clock.
When your store was closed?—Yes.
Then Mr. Cochrane remained there after the store was closed. He came in accidentally, I think.
Did you say that the committee met there after the store was closed?—Yes.
And Mr. Cochrane was there when the committee met?—Yes.
For the whole of the time?—No; not when they were meeting.
Oh, well, did he come in afterwards?—Yes; he came in after the committee met.
"Now, the committee met after the store was closed, and Mr. Cochrane having come in after the committee met, must have come in after the store was closed?—He did.
Then he did not come in to buy anything?—I cannot swear to that. Sometimes we did not close till ten or eleven o'clock.

Further on he says that Mr. Cochrane was there in the store :

I could not swear when Mr. Cochrane came in; but I know he came right into the store when the committee was meeting there.

Further on he was asked :

How long did Mr. Cochrane remain?—As far as my knowledge goes, he did not remain very long.
How long?—I cannot swear how long.
Half an hour or more?—Well, I cannot say. I do not think he did.
It was not then more than half an hour?—Not so far as my knowledge goes; I do not think it was.
Was it about half an hour?—I cannot say.
I suppose the discussion was going on while he was there?—The discussion was going on—yes.
The talk about the bridges was going on while he was there?—Yes.
You were talking about the men who would get the appointments and the amounts they were to pay?—Certainly.

There is the evidence of Mr. Bullock. He says that certainly Mr. Cochrane was there while they talked about the men who were to get the appointments and the amounts they were to pay. Now, I have shown, first, by the evidence of three committeemen, the objects of that committee, and then I think I have shown by the evidence of Mr. Bullock that Mr. Cochrane not only knew of this committee, but was actually present when they were talking over the dispensing of these offices, and the amount the recipients of the offices were to pay; and yet the majority report says that there was no corrupt bargain, that all was clean, and nice, and healthy, and that the hon. gentleman who sits now as member for East Northumberland should be relieved of all liability attaching to such outrageous acts as I believe have recently taken place in his constituency. Now, in regard to the Obadiah Simpson charge, that in the summer of 1889 the said James Stanley corruptly promised and agreed that Obadiah Simpson should have an office too. On that charge what says the majority report? It traverses the charge, and the answer is :

"That Obadiah Simpson was not promised in the summer of 1889 or at any other time by the said Edward Cochrane the Government office of keeper or attendant of one of the swing bridges over the Murray Canal."

Now, bear in mind the positive connection between Mr. Stanley and Mr. Cochrane. I do not say that Mr. Obadiah Simpson conversed personally with Mr. Edward Cochrane. I will admit on the evidence that he did not; but no man can say that a close and intimate relationship between Mr. Stanley and Mr. Cochrane has not been so indubitably proved that Mr. Cochrane knew all that was going on. Mr. Stanley was in fact one of the committeemen, and an agent of Mr. Cochrane, and what took place between Mr. Stanley and Mr. Obadiah Simpson? At page 133 Obadiah Simpson is asked:

Had you a conversation with Mr. James Stanley at any time?—Yes.

What was your conversation with him?—He came to me and the first I knew about him was—I am getting so I forget everything.

Take your time and don't hurry?—He gave me a right to the canal. You know what I mean—the right to a bridge.

He told you you would be appointed?—Yes; he came to me and appointed me.

That is, promised you the appointment?—Yes; promised me the appointment.

And yet the majority report says that no promise was made by Mr. Cochrane to Mr. Obadiah Simpson. In one respect that is correct. Of course, Mr. Cochrane did not himself personally promise to Obadiah Simpson, although he promised to others, the appointment of bridge-keeper. But there is more than one way of promising a thing. You may promise it through another man; and in view of the close relationship existing between Mr. Cochrane and James Stanley, one of the committee that distributed these offices and collected the money from the recipients of them, and in view of the evidence of Mr. Bullock and the evidence of Henry May, I ask this House how it is possible to disassociate Mr. Edward Cochrane from Mr. James Stanley. You cannot do it. The promise made by James Stanley, proven by the evidence of Obadiah Simpson, was in reality the promise of the hon. member for East Northumberland. Then the majority report denies that Stanley promised a position to Arundel Simpson, and I will read the denial, because it traverses the charge that was made:

"That James Stanley did not propose to the said Arundel R. Simpson, with the knowledge and consent of the said Edward Cochrane or otherwise, that if the said Arundel R. Simpson would pay $150 and give to his father, the said Obadiah Simpson, a life lease of his farm (as compensation for his not being appointed such bridge-keeper, which the charge alleged he had promised and had not received), he, the said Arundel R. Simpson, would be appointed such bridge-keeper."

That is a denial of the charge, a denial presumably based on the evidence. Now, what is the evidence? I ask how it is possible for hon. gentlemen to come to the conclusion that the statement of the majority report is true, in view of the undoubted evidence to the contrary. It seems to me the hon. gentlemen who prepared this majority report had not read the evidence through when this report was brought to them for adoption. I do not say that is so; but if asked to believe one way or the other, I would certainly believe, in view of the extraordinary report brought in by the majority, that the hon. gentlemen who made it had not read the evidence through and carefully digested it before coming to a conclusion. Look at page 53, question 1523. Mr. Arundel Simpson is asked:

You say they were going to let the bridges. What do you mean by that?—A. To appoint bridge-tenders. Q. Did he say anything about your getting one?—A. He said that I could get one by looking after my father and giving him $150. Q. Who told you that?—A. James Stanley.

And yet the majority report says that Stanley never did promise Arundel Simpson anything.—

Q. When you say that he said you were to look after your father, were those the words that he used, or what did he mean?—A. He went in the first place to see my father and told him they had promised him a bridge, but that he was too old to be appointed. He asked him if he wanted one of his sons appointed in his place and he said yes, and he would like to see me appointed.

On page 64 the following evidence is given:—

And what passed between you and Stanley?—A. He said that he was going to make an appointment that gave one to my father and me, and wanted my father to have his share of it.

There is conclusive evidence that Stanley did promise Arundel Simpson a position; yet the report says that was impossible, because Arundel Simpson could not give his father some interest in some land, when he had no land. Hon. gentlemen have not read the evidence. It is true he did not own any land, but he was a tenant on some land, and had the right to transfer his position as tenant to his father, which he would have done had the arrangement been carried out. Now, although I do not think that the reference to Obadiah Simpson and the reference to Arundel Simpson are very important to the charge, I have taken up the time of the House in discussing them——

Hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BARRON.—for the simple reason that hon. gentlemen opposite, in their report, attach importance to it, because they deny the assertions that were made in the charges brought forward on the 20th of August by the hon. member for West Huron. Hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear." I do not attach much importance to their interruption. The hon. gentleman who so interrupts has not been following me, or perhaps he does not attach much importance to the matter. Perhaps his mind is so blurred, perhaps his sense of right and wrong is so obscured, that he does not think it wrong to take $200 out of the pocket of a poor unfortunate devil——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BARRON—who has only $400 a year. Perhaps he does not think it wrong to take $150 out of a man who earns $1.25 a day for eight months in the year. If he sees nothing wrong in that, all I can say is that we have very little hope of convincing the hon. gentleman that the majority report is wrong and the minority report is right. Let me refer for a moment or two to the Goodrich charge. What was that charge? It will be found at page 8, clause 5:

"That subsequently it was corruptly agreed to by and between the said Wesley Goodrich and the said Edward Cochrane that if the said Edward Cochrane would procure the appointment of the said Wesley Goodrich to the said Government office of keeper of said bridge, he, the said Wesley Goodrich, would pay the sum of $200, and excute to the said Obadiah Simpson, father of the said Arundel R. Simpson, a life lease on his farm, with a condition in said lease that if said Wesley Groodrich lost said appointment said lease would be cancelled."

Then the charge goes on to say that the corrupt bargain was carried out. What does the majority report say with regard to that? At page 4, clauses 1 and 2, it says:

"That it was never corruptly or in any way agreed to, by and between the said Wesley Goodrich and the said Edward Cochrane, that if the said Edward Cochrane would procure the appointment of the said Wesley Goodrich to the said office, he, the said Wesley Goodrich, would pay the sum of $200, and excute to the said Obadiah Simpson a life lease of his farm, &c."

I will ask the House to look a page 124, question 3607, and see the evidence upon which these hon. gentlemen came to the conclusion that there was no proof to support that charge. The majority report of the hon. gentlemen, who, I believe, have not thoroughly read the evidence, says that there was no corrupt bargain between Mr. Cochrane and Wesley Goodrich whereby the latter got his position. The question is asked:

Q. Were you aware of the fact that Obadiah Simpson had been promised the position of bridge-keeper? A. I believe so. I understood him to say that he was encouraged in that way.

Q. You understood that from Obadiah Simpson?—A. I understood from some person that he was promised it.

The charge is that Obadiah Simpson was at first to get the office, but being an old man he gave up his right to the office for a lease of land to Wesley Goodrich, who got it and paid $200 in addition for it.

Q. You understood that from Obadiah Simpson?—A. I understood from some person that he was promised it. I think he informed me that Mr. Keeler once told him, but I am not positive. Q. Now you wanted the position yourself, did you not, Mr. Goodrich?—A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you see Mr. Cochrane about it?—A.—

For a moment the witness would not answer, and the stenographer took down "no answer." The witness was looking down to the ground, and he was asked:

Q. Will you kindly look and say whether you saw Mr. Cochrane about it?—A. I spoke to Mr. Cochrane about it. Q. Before you got the position?—A. Yes, sir. Q. What did you say to Mr. Cochrane?—A. I asked him if he could not assist me in the matter and let me have one. Q. That is what you said?—A. I am not positive of the words I used. Q. And what did he say?—A. He said there were others applying for it. Q. What others did he say?—A. He mentioned Mr. King and Mr. Cardington, a farmer, I believe. Q. Any others that he mentioned?—A. I am not positive that he mentioned any others. Q. Did he mention Mr. Obadiah Simpson?—A. I believe he did.

So that Mr. Cochrane knew that Obadiah Simpson was promised the office.—

Q. By giving him a life lease of the farm you were going to get the position of bridge-tender?—A. The position that he said he was promised.

Q. Who was promised?—A. Obadiah Simpson.

Q. You were to take his place and give him a life lease of your farm?—A. Yes.

I ask the House to bear in mind this question and answer:

Q. What did you get for this life lease?—A. I was to get the situation at the bridge if he got it.

Q. If who got the appointment?—A. Mr. Simpson?

Q. Obadiah Simpson?—A. Yes.

So you see that it is admitted that Mr. Cochrane promised him directly the position he subsequently got. Then what else does Mr. Wesley Goodrich say? In addition to getting the life-lease of the farm, which contained a clause that the old man Simpson was to have this for his life, paying no rent, but that it was to be forfeited if Mr. Wesley Goodrich did not keep the office, in addition to that he was to pay $200. The majority report admits that amount was paid to Mr. Edward Cochrane himself. There is a very significant fact in regard to the payment of this $200 by Wesley Goodrich to Mr. Cochrane, and I ask attention to this particular point. That $200 which Mr. Wesley Goodrich paid to Mr. Cochrane had to go into the hands of Mr. Payne, the solicitor for the bank at Colborne. Mr. Wesley Goodrich knew nothing about Mr. Payne, but only acquired his knowledge of Mr. Payne and as to where the money was to go from Mr. Edward Cochrane. Look at question 3704. The chairman says to Mr. Wesley Goodrich:

I think you had better tell the committee again what happened there.

Mr. Goodrich says:

I agreed with Mr. Wade to pay this $200. Mr. Wade lived at Hilton, quite a way from my place, and I went to Mr. Cochrane (he was in the barnyard at the time when I arrived), and I asked him would he take the money. He told me to take it to Mr. Payne at Colborne, but that was quite a way for me to go. I said: "Are you not going soon," as I knew he went there often. He said: "Wallace is going to-night with the grist." I had noticed the team and waggon in the yard. Wallace was going to the house to get his overcoat, and I suggested that somebody ought to count the money. I said: "Would he." He did not answer me, but he seemed not to want to do it. I took it out of my pocket and urged him. He then took it and counted it, and then handed it to Wallace. Wallace had got back by this time. He said: "Wallace, give that to Payne."

Now I ask how Mr. Wesley Goodrich knew that the money was going to Payne, the solicitor of the bank, who had the note in his hands for collection? Afterwards, in answer to Mr. Osler, he says that he learnt that he was to pay the money to Payne from Mr. Cochrane himself. So Mr. Cochrane knew where the money had to go. That is a very significant fact, and shows that Mr. Cochrane knew that this liability to the bank on a note which was in the hands of the solicitor was to be liquidated by these particular payments, and so he told Goodrich that the money was to be taken to Payne. Then the evidence further on shows that Mr. Cochrane, in answer to Arundel Simpson, said he was getting more than Arundel was to pay. He was to get $150, but Mr. Cochrane said there would be $200 to be received from Mr. Goodrich. I pass hurriedly from that to take up another point. It has been said that if the witness, Arundel Simpson, could be believed, the case was brought directly home to Mr. Cochrane, but of course the hon. gentleman says he is not to be believed. The reason given is that his evidence before the Committee is at variance with his declaration previously made. He said in his declaration he had several interviews with Mr. Cochrane, and it was shown that he had only three interviews, and because the three interviews are argued not to be several interviews, it was suggested that he was not worthy of belief. Then the declaration which he made appeared to make him say that before the appointment was made he had several interviews with Mr. Cochrane, and it turned out that he had only one. But it further turned out that the occasions which he looked upon as interviews were interviews which his wife's uncle had with Mr. Cochrane, at which he was present. But because he personally had only one interview alone with Mr. Cochrane before the appointment, it was sought to discredit his evidence. It was admitted that Mr. Cochrane had said that Mr. Snetsinger had offered him $600 for the office. Mr. Snetsinger says that is not true, but that afterwards he might have given $600 for the office. Mr. Cochrane retails that statement to Mr. Simpson, and because Mr. Simpson makes the statement it is endeavoured to discredit his evidence. It is said that Arundel Simpson is not to be believed, but when he states that Mr. Cochrane told him that four bridges at $150 would not pay $900, does Mr. Cochrane dare to deny that statement? Mr. Cochrane was there hearing what the witness said, but he went out of the room and never offered to give evidence, and he dare not deny that evidence. The witness says he carried a letter from Mr. Cochrane to Mr. Hedley Simpson. Does Mr. Cochrane deny that statement? No; he remains silent and dumb. Mr. Arundel Simpson also goes into the contents of that letter fully. Does Mr. Cochrane deny the statement as to its contents? No; although he was present every minute of the examination of the witness. The witness says: "You handed me the letter in the presence of Stanley, and it was about the lighthouse. The contents of the letter were read." Mr. Cochrane listened to every word that was said, but he dare not go into the box and deny the statement. Arundel Simpson says that Mr. Cochrane told him "that Stanley ought not to have agreed to take $150 from him; that he could get more from Goodrich; that other arrangements were being made." Does Mr. Cochrane deny that statement, although he heard it made? No; he leaves the room. He says that "Mr. Cochrane told him that Snetsinger had said that he would give more, perhaps $400 or $600, for the position." Does Mr. Cochrane dare to go into the box and deny that statement? No. There he was, listening to every word that fell from the mouth of the different witnesses, listening from early morning until late at night; he heard the arguments of counsel, and all; yet Mr. Cochrane dare not go into the box and deny the statements that were made by Arundel Simpson. Yet in face of that, the hon. gentleman who preceded me says that Arundel Simpson was not to be believed. And what was the excuse put into his counsel's mouth for not going into the box? Because some of those witnesses were personal friends of his, were political friends of his, and although his political life was at stake, although if he were found guilty he would be a ruined man, he would be ashamed to hold up his head or look anybody in the face, although he would not dare to go back to his riding if these things were proved, yet because he was afraid to contradict another man he would not go into the box. Does anybody believe that for one moment? Does anybody believe that that excuse, put into the mouth of his counsel, was the real reason? Then there was the Clouston charge. Now, Mr. Stanley, the intimate friend and confidential adviser of Mr. Cochrane, had nothing to do with Clouston. Mr. Clouston saw Mr. Cochrane himself. Look at page 29, questions 924, 925 and 926, and there you will find that Mr. Clouston lives close to Mr. Cochrane, and he went to Mr. Cochrane himself and got a promise directly from the hon. member for East Northumberland of the position of bridge-keeper. Does any hon. gentleman doubt that? If so, let him look at page 69, question 1935. What further do we find? We find that this man Clouston drove in a buggy with Mr. Cochrane to Colborne and back again, and during that time not only were these very bridges talked of, but Mr. Cochrane talked with him about the money being raised; and yet hon. gentlemen opposite say that Mr. Cochrane knew nothing about it. Look at page 70, question 1976, and there you will find the statement of Mr. Clouston, a man who, in giving his evidence, impressed everybody with his truthfulness; there you will find the statement made that in that celebrated drive to Colborne and home again they not only talked about giving these offices, but they actually talked over the fact that these men who got the bridges were paying a quid pro quo to the extent of $150 each. There it is brought home directly to Mr. Cochrane, and I challenge hon. gentlemen who follow me to deny these facts. Then Mr. Clouston was told to go and pay that $150—to whom? To pay it to Mr. Webb, the banker. Now, mark you, Mr. Clouston was himself personally liable on the original note of $1,000. But that note had been liquidated at this time, and the note that he was to pay the $150 on was another note entirely, not the original note of $1,000, of which he was one of the makers. That note was paid by another note for which he himself was not liable at all. Then he went to Mr. Webb, to whom he said: "I have come to you, Mr. Webb; I am instructed to pay the money." These were his words. From whom did he get his instructions, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite? Look at question 2090 and following, and you will see the fact stated by this man Clouston that the only man he spoke to in regard to these appointments from the time that he got the promise to the time he went to pay the money was the hon. member for East Northumberland himself. Understand me; he says to Mr. Webb: "I am instructed to pay the money." Mr. Webb says: "From whom did you get the instructions?" It must have been from the only man whom he saw from the time he got the promise until he paid the money, and that was the hon. member for East Northumberland. Then take the case of William Brown. He was recommended by the committee, not by Mr. Cochrane. But Mr. Cochrane knew of the operations of the committee. Look at question 916 and what did Mr. Cochrane tell him? William Brown, the man who paid $150, was told by Mr. Cochrane himself to go to this particular committee; and he says, in the answer to question 2658, that he never would have gone to the committee but for Mr. Cochrane. So Mr. Cochrane knew all a bout this committee, and he sent William Brown and Thomas Fitzgerald to this committee. He did not send Clouston, he promised him directly; but William Brown, who paid for a bridge, and Thomas Fitzgerald, who paid for a bridge, he sent to the committee. Brown says that he was instructed to pay money when he went to Mr. Webb, and Mr. Webb said to him: "Mr. Brown, you do not owe me any money." But Brown says: "I am instructed to pay you $150 on some note," and he described the note and paid the money. Now, I ask, who instructed him to pay this money? It was James Stanley in this case, the intimate friend and close associate of Mr. Cochrane, who instructed him to pay this money, because he knew from Mr. Cochrane where the money had to go, and knowing where the money had to go, and knowing well that Mr. Brown had already agreed to pay him $150, he instructed him to pay it in on this particular note. Hon. gentlemen say there is no bargain and sale about it. Look at page 92, question 2642 and following, and then will hon. gentlemen say there was not a sale of offices? Hon. gentlemen opposite say all these payments were voluntary on the part of these men. Sir, let hon. gentlemen opposite refer to the case of Regina vs Mercer, reported in our old Upper Canada reports, and there they will find that men were convicted of selling offices on not one-half the evidence, not one-tenth the evidence, that we find to-day in this particular case. What is the evidence now with regard to a bargain and sale? Look at question 2642:

Q. Was there any other object?—A. I was to pay $150 and get the appointment.
Q. Would you have paid the $150 if you had not got the appointment?—A. I would have paid it in time, but not just then. I was willing to pay my share in getting the party out of debt.
Q. But whether you got the appointment or not, were you quite willing to pay that $150?—A. Yes.
Q. Quite willing?—A. Yes.

So it is admitted that $150 was paid to get this particular office by William Brown; yet hon. gentlemen opposite say there was no bargain or sale, that he, with others, had paid money of his own free will and choice. How much did William Brown pay to party funds previously? It is suggested in the report that these men earning $1.25 a day during eight months of the year voluntarily paid $150 and $200 to the party funds. Let us look at the record of these men. It is true they are Conservatives; but if they are willing to pay that amount of money as a voluntary contribution to party funds at one time, their records will show that they had previously paid large sums. It appears that Brown paid during his whole life the large sum of $3 towards the Conservative party funds, with the exception of this amount of $150. Yet this man, who paid $3 in his whole life, we are told paid $150 not to obtain an office but simply for party purposes. Take the case of Robert May. Hugh McQuoid was another committee man mentioned by James Stanley; he was sworn to be a committee man by Bullock, and he sent Henry May to Robert May, this unfortunate man, who, when in the witness box, appeared to be in abject poverty, this man with a large family to support, to subscribe $125. The poor fellow had not the money, and so he was obliged to go to his old father, and he went with him to the bank at Trenton to help him to get the money. They obtained there a certain amount, $70. How was the balance to be raised? The poor wife, who had earned her money, had $50 laid by; and he said: Give me that $50; and with the money raised from the bank with his aged father's assistance, and with this money obtained from his wife, he paid $125 and got the appointment. We are asked to believe that this man, who was so poor that he had to take his wife's money to help make make up $125, out of pure choice and for the love of the thing, paid that money to help the Conservative party. Not only is this case as presented by the majority report a crying shame, but I say, in the language of one of the newspapers, that the men guilty of this sort of thing should hide themselves in the narrow crevices of a tooth comb. From these unfortunate men $150 and $200 were exacted, and when the last cent was taken and the $150 could not be made up, they took $125. Robert May, forsooth, gave this money, they say, out of pure love to the Conservative party. Then I suppose his record will show that he had previously given money to the same cause. But his answer is that never in his whole life had he given one cent towards the Conservative party. Then we come to Vanalstine, who had to pay $150. It is said he paid it voluntarily to help the Conservative party. That sum was, however, handed back to him, because he did not get a position.

Mr. TAYLOR. Ten o'clock.

Mr. BARRON. This point cannot be too strongly emphasized, notwithstanding the suggestion made by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), that it is 10 o'clock, because he does not like to hear this, although he approves of it all. It is quite right and proper to take the last dollar from a fellow to pay a subscription to a party fund. He approves of that sort of thing. No wonder he calls 10 o'clock and does not like to hear the iniquities of this transaction revealed. The point cannot be too strongly emphasized against the hon. member for East Northumberland, that he refused to go into the box and disprove the statements, if he could disprove them, made by the several witnesses who had given evidence in a most condemnatory way against him. Does anyone want to make this House believe that if the hon. gentleman's record was clean in this respect, if he had nothing whatever to do with this matter, he would not have gone into the box? No one would believe it. When a man's character is attacked, when evidence is given against him proving him guilty of an outrageous crime, would anyone believe that the man against whom such is proved, would not enter the box and disprove the charge if he could do so? Hon. gentlemen opposite are asking us to believe altogether too much, and the fact that Mr. Cochrane declined to go into the box must be taken as positive evidence, although not sworn evidence, that he could not, under cross-examination, refute the facts proved by the different witnesses, and that the hon. gentleman was guilty, if not actually in point of fact, from these acts being done with his knowledge and consent. The majority report is, indeed, a most unblushing defiance of proper deduction from evidence. I believe the hon. gentlemen who prepared that report had not carefully gone over the evidence, question and answer, and analyzed the evidence as judges should do before they come to a decision on such an important matter as this. I cannot believe they have done so, in view of the fact that the report is entirely mistaken as regards any proper deduction that can be drawn from the evidence. I say, in truth, that if this House approves the majority report, hon. members will be asked to twist the true facts of the case; they will be asked to forcibly wrench the true cause the wrong way. They will ask us to put a premium on this sort of thing, to tell evil-doers to go and do the like again, and if we support the majority report it will go through Canada that men can barter and sell offices, as has been done, and they will have a strong majority behind them to approve and condone the offence, and to declare that the man guilty of it, as is the member for Northumberland, is innocent and pure.

Mr. GERMAN. I certainly expected to hear some hon. gentleman opposite reply to the speech just delivered. Those who usually sit opposite are out of the House. They certainly have not had time to read all the evidence given, and I am forced to the conclusion that they do not care not only not to read the evidence but to hear it adduced in argument. They intend to vote at the dictation of their leader, whether their action be right or wrong. I do not feel inclined to be guided in that way. I feel it is the duty of hon. members of this House to discuss this evidence and to endeavour, if possible, to arrive at a fair, correct conclusion. It is a matter of serious moment. It affects the honour and position of a member of Parliament, a representative of the people, and we should here discuss whether or not he has been guilty of the charge laid against him. I am surprised that some hon. gentleman opposite has not deemed it advisable and wise in the interest of his fellow member to discuss to some extent these questions. I, Sir, cannot help but think, in discussing this question, of the past record of the hon. gentleman whose position as a member is affected. I have known that hon. gentleman by reputation from boyhood; I have known his past character as an honourable man, and, Sir, I am free to admit, and I do admit, that his record has with me considerable weight. It ought to have weight with every hon. gentleman in this House, and before severely criticising him, and before judging him guilty of the charges which are made against him, we should feel convinced that these charges are clearly and substantially proved. Now, Sir, I think it is not just to him and not just to his position that hon. gentlemen opposite do not see fit to discuss the question. Perhaps they are convinced that he is guilty. If they are, it is their duty to stand up in this House and say so, but if they believe him innocent it is their duty to point out to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House wherein they think he is innocent. There is what is called a minority report before the House. Three gentlemen who compose that select Committee have felt it incumbent on them to declare to this House that they believed the evidence shows that the member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was guilty of the charges preferred against him. Four members of that Committee have thought otherwise, and I think it is the duty, not only of these four gentlemen who are the majority of that Committee, but of other members on the opposite side of the House, to endeavour if possible to convince us, if they think we are reasonable men and open to conviction, wherein we are wrong, and wherein this man is not guilty of the charges laid against him. We are relieved to a certain extent of the difficulty of our position by the admissions of hon. gentlemen opposite. We are relieved to the extent that it is admitted by them, in the first place, that if the evidence sworn to by Arundel Simpson be true, then the charges, as made, are substantially proven. It was admitted by counsel for the hon. gentleman—and I must say that to me, sitting on that Committee, I thought it singular that the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) did not go into the box—it was admitted by his counsel, however, that if Arundel Simpson was to be believed, then the charges were substantially proved. We have, therefore, only to deal practically with whether or not Arundel Simpson should be believed, and to that point I will endeavour, for a few moments, to direct my argument. Let me preface what I have to say with this: That the committee established in the East Riding of the County of Northumberland, to dispense this patronage, was not a committee of the Conservative Association, and I am free to admit that I am glad of it. I am glad to know that the Conservative Association of the East Riding of Northumberland were not so mean as to appoint a committee who would exact this money from poor men seeking office. It was not a committee of the Conservative Association, it had no right to speak with the voice of authority, and it was not a committee that the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) should in any way recognize. If it had been a committee of the association, if it had been a committee authorized to speak for the Conservatives of the riding, then the member could have very properly said when being referred to: This is a committee of the party, this is a committee that I am bound to listen to, and this is a committee whose recommendations I must attend to. But no; it is sworn to positively by Mr. Payne and by Mr. Bullock, both strong Conservatives, and one a member of the committee, that it was a self-appointed committee; that it was a few men who had got together—leading Conservatives, it is true, in the vicinity of Brighton—to dispense these positions on the Murray Canal in order to exact and collect this money from the people getting the positions. I contend, Sir, that this places the matter in so much the worse light for the member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane), from the very fact that he had no right to listen to a self-appointed committee. He had the patronage of the county, he knew that the committee were not appointed by the convention, and he knew they had no right to speak for the people, and that the only right they had was to exact money from the poor men applying for offices. It is admitted and proved to a demonstration that Hedley Simpson paid $200 for his office, that the money was taken to the village of Colborne and paid on a note, on which the member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was the endorser, and that as soon as that $200 was paid the balance of the money was raised by a new note, from which the name of the member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was left out. He at any rate was relieved from any further liability by reason of the payment of that $200. Now, Sir, how did it come about that that $200 was paid. Arundel Simpson says: "I took a letter from Mr. Cochrane to Hedley Simpson asking him to come and arrange about the payment of that money." Now, I am quite well aware of the rule of evidence that if you show that a witness is telling an absolute falsehood, if you show that his evidence is not to be credited on one point, you can fairly say that other portions of his evidence should be criticised carefully before believing it. I submit to this House that Arundel Simpson is not contradicted in any essential particular. Arundel Simpson came before that Committee and his evidence stands before this House as the evidence of an honest man. His evidence stands before us unimpeached in any important particular, and we, as judges in this case, cannot hold that he was perjuring himself when he was giving evidence. It has been said that he swears one thing before the Committee and another thing in a declaration that he made. I ask any hon. gentleman to read the declaration that he made in the light of the explanation that he gave, and compare it with the evidence, and you can come to no other conclusion than that he was an honest man and gave honest evidence. If his evidence was not impeached on important particulars, then why should we not believe him? We should certainly believe it on these points as to which he was not contradicted—not contradicted by the declaration, not contradicted by any sworn testimony. As has been well argued, the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was present at the meetings of the special Committee to hear the evidence: he was there during the whole time, but he did not see fit to go into the box and give evidence contradicting the testimony of Arundel Simpson. Why was this? The most peculiar reason is given that I ever heard given in a court of justice as to why he did not like to go into the box and contradict some of the witnesses. We were told that his was a close constituency, and it might be necessary for him to contradict witnesses who were political friends, with a large family connection. That is the most absurd reason I ever heard of, when a man's position as a member of Parliament and representative of the people was at stake, and when a man's honour was seriously concerned. What difference was there between his going into the box and swearing that Arundel Simpson was a liar, and coming before this Parliament and saying that Arundel Simpson is a liar. What difference was there between his going into the witness box and swearing that Arundel Simpson was a liar, and having his counsel stand up in the Committee and say so? If he was afraid of the result in the constituency, surely the statement made by his counsel was as damaging as any sworn statement would be? Why did he not go into the box and contradict this man? So far as I know, Arundel Simpson had no political connection that could be injured. All the other Simpsons were friendly to Mr. Cochrane, and gave evidence in his favour, so that so far as I can see Arundel Simpson was the only man who would be seriously affected by showing that he had perjured himself. Then why did not Mr. Cochrane go into the witness box? Apart from contradicting Arundel Simpson, it was not absolutely necessary that he should contradict the statement of any other witness; and it is an insult to the intelligence of this House to ask them to believe that that was the reason why he did not go into the box. I do not believe there is a member of this Parliament who believes that was the reason. The only reason in my opinion was that he dared not go into the box and contradict Arundel Simpson; he knew that Arundel Simpson was swearing to the truth, and he had not the courage to go into the box; he had too much moral feeling of right to go into the box and contradict his testimony; but he asks this House to declare that Arundel Simpson is a liar. He asks this House to declare that the unsupported statement of himself, that of an honourable man heretofore I admit, but a statement not given with the sanctity of an oath, is more to be believed than the sworn statements of these several witnesses. It is asking too much of the intelligence of the members of Parliament; it is asking too much at any rate of my intelligence. Now, Sir, suppose you cast aside altogether the question as to whether or not Hedley Simpson paid the money with Mr. Cochrane's knowledge; suppose you admit, for the moment, that Arundel Simpson is a liar; suppose you admit that he perjured himself in the witness box; what will you say of the evidence of Wesley Goodrich? His evidence has not been contradicted: it is not suggested that he was swearing what was untrue: it is admitted in the report that he paid $200 into the hands of Edward Cochrane—for what? To be handed to Mr. Payne. Wesley Goodrich knew no more about Mr. Payne than he knew about the man in the moon.

Mr. GERMAN.

He said that he went to Mr. Cochrane and gave him the money; he did not know he had to go to Mr. Payne; it was Mr. Cochrane who suggested to him that he should take this money to Mr Payne in Colborne. Wesley Goodrich said he handed the money to Mr. Cochrane, and Mr. Cochrane counted it and handed it to his son. On that point Wesley Goodrich is contradicted. Wallace Cochrane said it was Wesley Goodrich who handed the $200 to him. It is not denied by the son that his father was present at the time, and the report finds that he was present and that the money was handed to him; but the young man says: "I took that money to Colborne: it was in an open parcel; I could see the bills; I handed the money to a man in Mr. Payne's office, not to Mr. Payne." If you are to test the veracity of the witnesses, look at the unreasonable statement made by the son. He said that there was a stranger in Mr. Payne's office, a man whom he did not know, and that he laid the parcel on the desk and said to the man: Hand this to Mr. Payne, without a statement as to whom it was from, as to who he was, or as to whom the money was for. Here is the young man's own testimony at pages 128 and 129: "I gave the money to a man in Mr. Payne's office; I did not know the man; he did not know me; I left the parcel of money on the desk, and came away; I did not tell the man for what purpose the money was to be used; I did not tell him who I was or where the money came from"—the most unreasonable statement I ever heard given under oath by an honest man, a statement that cannot be believed, because no sensible man, and he appeared to be a sensible man, would do such a thing. So I say, as between young Cochrane and Wesley Goodrich in regard to the payment of the money, I prefer to believe Wesley Goodrich, and he says: "I went to Mr. Cochrane; I took the $200 which I had previously told him I would pay; I had arranged about the lease; I handed him the money and he counted it, and he told me to take it to Mr. Payne; I said, I cannot go to Colborne, can't you take it down; he said: 'My son is going down and he can take it.'" And hon. gentlemen want us to say that the hon. member for East Northumberland knew nothing about the payment of these moneys. Then, look at the statement of John Clouston at page 70:

Q. Can you locate the time?—A. I could not. I have been trying to think it over and I cannot.

Q. You can within a year?—A. The year that Mr. Cochrane said there was a bridge for me you want?

Q. Yes? When was that: it must have been before the 10th May, 1890?—More than a year before that, I should say.

So that a year before the 10th of May John Clouston had the most remarkable conversation with Edward Cochrane about the sale of bridges that I ever heard of between two men, one not knowing anything about the sale of bridges.—

Q. When he said to you that others were taking part in this old indebtedness, what others did he refer to?—A. I said that Cochrane may have said that others were taking part, and I think I said the others were bridge-tenders. Q. How much did he tell you the others were giving?—A. He may have said they were giving $150. Q. Each?—A. Yes. Q. Then did he say anything to you about giving $150, because the others were going to give it, you know?—A. I do not recollect how that was. Q. Just try and brush up your memory?—A. You see the way this whole thing came around as I said before. I had been taking an interest in the movement of getting rid of this old indebtedness. I had even gone out in endeavours to collect. Q. I know you were anxious. Did he say anything to you about paying the same sum as the other bridge-tenders were paying?—A. He may have. Q. Do you not think that he did say so?—A. I do not know that I had better think much about it.

J. D. Clouston, a strong political supporter of the hon. member for East Northumberland, coming here to swear in his favour, standing up in the witness box, answers, when questioned with regard to the corrupt payment of money: "I do not know that I had better think much about it." Then further:

Q. You say he told you, on the occasion of that drive, that other bridge-tenders were paying $150. Do you believe now that he did tell you so, on your oath?—A. I believed he may have said so, as I said before.

What conclusion can you come to from reading that statement than that these two men had a conversation about the payment of this money for these bridges? If Mr. Clouston could have honestly sworn that no such conversation had taken place he certainly would have done so. On the next page he says:

Q. I want to know if you had any conversation with anybody else?—A. No; he was the only man.

The hon. member for East Northumberland was the only man he talked to about the getting of this bridge: he was the only man he talked to about the payment of money, or his undertaking to pay $150, and he said, when questioned on this point, that he did not know he had better think much about what Cochrane told him, but Cochrane may have said that other people were giving $150. Is it not an insult to the intelligence of sensible people to ask them to believe that the hon. member for East Northumberland knew nothing about the sale of these bridges? Here is the sworn statement of Goodrich not contradicted. In face of that, what can you say? Can you say he was lying as well as Arundel Simpson? Or if you do, will you say that Bullock was lying? Can you say that about this man Bullock, who was a member of that election committee? His evidence is not contradicted. What does he say about this matter? He says that Mr. Cochrane came to his store while a meeting was being held, and that while Mr. Cochrane was there they were talking about the appointments to these bridges and the payment of money. He says he did not know whether Mr. Cochrane took any part in the conversation, but that he was there about half an hour and saw what was going on. The hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon said that was contradicted by Stanley. That is a peculiar statement. Bullock does not say that Stanley was there, but that he did not know whether Stanley was at that meeting or not. Stanley says that Cochrane was at no meeting he was at, but Stanley does not say that Cochrane was not at the meeting Bullock says he was at, because for all we know Stanley was not there at all, so that Bullock's evidence is not contradicted in that particular. What are you going to do about that? Are you going to say he was lying? If he told the truth, the hon. member for East Northumberland knew that these men were paying money for the bridges, and was present at the meeting of this election committee and saw what was going on. He knew these men were being fleeced out of their money to pay this old indebtedness. Can you cast aside all this evidence? Can you say all these men were swearing to what was untrue? and if any one of them swore to the truth, the hon. member for East Northumberland stands convicted of the charges made against him. Lay aside Arundel Simpson if you will, and you cannot do so honestly; lay aside Wesley Goodrich if you will, and you cannot do it honestly; but you cannot lay aside the evidence of Bullock, a Conservative of the Conservatives in that riding, a strong supporter of the hon. member for East Northumberland, a gentleman who would not come here and give evidence detrimental to his interests if he could have avoided it. But he was bound, as a truthful man, to come and state on oath what was correct, and he said that the member for East Northumberland was present at one of the meetings and knew what was going on. You cannot get rid of such evidence as that. Even if there were no corrupt bargains between the hon. member for Northumberland and these men, even if he did not go to them or if they did not come to him, even if they did not agree corruptly that this money was to be paid, if he knew that this was going on he countenanced it, and should be condemned and censured. He certainly knew it was going on. Why, Stanley himself, on whose evidence hon. gentlemen opposite rely, says: I told Mr. Cochrane either before or after the money was paid, but certainly before the appointment was made, that Hedley Simpson had paid $200. That is Stanley's own evidence, see pages 20 and 23. He says he sent for Hedley Simpson and they saw Mr. Cochrane. So that there is conclusive proof from their own witnesses which show at any rate that the hon. member for East Northumberland knew this money was being paid, and he knew it before the appointment was made. Would an honest man, would a man who was not doing something that is improper, would a man who was not willing to engage in an improper transaction and who knew that these $200 had been paid by Hedley Simpson—by a man who could not afford to pay it—would not such a man have said this must be stopped; would he not have sent for Hedley Simpson and enquired into the facts, and have told him: You should not have paid these $200, as you can not afford it; you can have the appointment, but must take back your money. You did not pay it voluntarily, you cannot afford to do it. Why did the hon. gentleman not do that? He knew that Wesley Goodrich was paying $200; he knew before the appointment was made; he knew that Goodrich could not afford to pay the money; why did he not, as a member of Parliament and an honest man, deal properly and honestly with his associates, and say to this committee: This thing must be stopped; you cannot bargain and sell offices in this way under my control; you cannot fleece these poor men out of this money. He should have done that, but he did not do it. If there was nothing more than that in his action, it was censurable. If there was nothing more than the very fact that he knew the money had been paid before the appointment was made, he should have put a stop to it. All along the line the same facts appear. Now, if the hon. gentleman knew that these men were bargaining for bridges, he is guilty and should be censured. If we want to establish a standard of morals above that of the pot-house politician, if we want to establish in this House a standard that will be an example to the country, we should censure such conduct. But we are not censuring it by the report of the majority. I say that the people of the country to-day are looking anxiously for the verdict of this Parliament. I say that to-morrow they will look with interest for the report of this debate and the report of the evidence on this question, and I say that this new Government, with its new leaders, are to-day on trial as to what they will do in the future. To-day we find here a charge against an hon. member of this House, a charge which is true; and not a member of the Government, not a member on the Government side, but one, has stood up to express an opinion, and that one has opposed the charge. Will they stand up and vote against it? I say the people are looking to this House to see whether this Government is starting out with a clean record, but they will look in vain if the majority in this House will vote for this majority report. To warn hon. gentlemen opposite of the result which may follow their decision to-night, let me read a statement from one of the leading Conservative papers in this country, which will show whether or not the temper of the people at this time can be trifled with. I say that, when you have seen what the newspapers of this country are saying, not only the Liberal newspapers but the Conservative newspapers, you will hesitate before you vote for this majority report. I have here a statement made by the London Free Press, and that should be considered very carefully by the members of this House before they record their votes. I think I have shown that the evidence of Arundel Simpson is not impeached; that I have shown to reasonable men who desire to vote conscientiously on this subject, unbiassed by party feeling, that the evidence of Arundel Simpson is not impeached. Supposing a defendant in a court of justice made the excuse which has been made by the member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) for not appearing in the witness box, is there a judge in the land who would not say to the jury: It may be true that the evidence on that part of the prosecution is not very strong, but it is uncontradicted by the defendant, who has been sitting here in court all the time. We may criticise this evidence severely, but there is the defendant, and, if the evidence is not true, why does he not contradict it? I ask hon. gentlemen to view this matter in the same light. If the statement of Arundel Simpson, of Wesley Goodrich, of Bullock, is not true, why does not the member go into the box and contradict it? He was there all the time. The statement that he did not want to offend friends with large family connections will not answer. Here is a statement made by a strong Conservative newspaper, written after the evidence had been given. The London Free Press says:

"But the evidence put in on Thursday and Friday left no doubt of two important and damaging facts: First, that Mr. Cochrane was intimately associated with the operations of his committee, and second, that in one case he actually received two hundred dollars, paid into his own hand in return for the position of bridge-tender on the canal. It is of little consequence that he immediately sent this money to the man who was in charge of the notes that were to be redeemed. It is of no consequence that he advised Goodrich not to pay the money. The fact remains that a man who could not get the recommendation on his own political merits succeeded in getting rid of one aspirant by giving him a life lease of his farm, and ultimately got the position by paying two hundred dollars into Mr. Cochrane's hands. When this case is considered in the light of some six or eight other transactions of a similar character, we can see no room for exonerating Mr. Cochrane from blame. There were undoubtedly mitigating circumstances, but it is not enough, and quite apart from what Parliament may do, we shall hold to the view that Mr. Cochrane should forfeit his seat. No earthly good can come from looking with leniency on a case like this, either from a party or a public standpoint."

I ask hon. gentlemen opposite what they will do in the light of the views expressed by Conservatives from the western part of Ontario, not only by this paper, but by the Hamilton Spectator and others, condemning this transaction. I ask hon. gentlemen to vote to-night against the report of the majority in this Committee.

Mr. MASSON. This matter, as the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. German) has remarked, is of great importance, inasmuch as it involves not only the question of yes or no in regard to these charges, but it affects the reputation and standing of an hon. member of this House. If there is one thing which our legislators can feel proud of it is that they have established a court where charges affecting members of the House can be tried by a proper tribunal. It is almost too much for human nature to listen to hon. gentlemen opposite when they pretend to look at the matter from a judicial standpoint and then proceed to make vindictive harangues. The one important thing for this House to consider is what the charge is which is laid against the hon. member, and in doing so I start from the outset by saying that the charge is no less than the commission of a criminal offence. The hon. member is charged here with corruptly selling a position in his gift. He is charged with corruptly entering into such and such agreements. The first charge, shorn of its verbiage, is that it was corruptly agreed by and between the said Edward Cochrane and the said Hedley Simpson that, if he would deliver to the said Stanley two notes, and so on. Now the gist of that charge is that there was a corrupt agreement. The making of a corrupt agreement is a criminal act under the statute. An hon. gentleman opposite referred to the case of Regina vs. Mercer as evidence that both parties to a transaction were liable. Now, I will deal with this point later on, but for the present I wish to consider the fact that this is a criminal charge, and to be dealt with as such. If this House were to adopt the amendment that has been submitted to this report, we would not only condemn Mr. Cochrane of being guilty on a criminal charge, but we would be virtually recommending that he should be prosecuted for that act. Therefore, I do not understand what the hon. gentleman, who has just taken his seat, means when he says that there is no judge in the land who would not say that this is a weak case. I admit that it is a weak case, but weak as it is, why has not the defendant denied it? Now, we all know that when we come to deal with a criminal case we have to apply an entirely different rule of law from civil cases. The argument of the hon. gentleman would be right and proper in a civil case; it is entirely wide of the mark in a criminal case. Therefore the whole line of argument, whereby he attempted to show the corrupt connection of the hon. member in these transactions, is altogether irrelevant. I will not take up the time of the House in going over the evidence in detail on that point, but I will say that wherever they have argued that circumstances point to his knowledge they assume that this House, sitting as a jury and trying a criminal case, is to presume guilt. Now, it is said that it is right to draw inferences. Is it right to draw inferences or to presume guilt unless we are imperatively obliged to do so? It certainly is not. It is one of the fundamental principles of British law by which courts are guided, and by which this House must be guided in the present case, that a man is to be presumed innocent and not to be presumed guilty. You are not to gather in hearsay evidence, little tid-bits of stories told here and there, what one person has told to another person, and so on—it is not on such evidence that you are to assume guilt. Such is not the rule in criminal law, nor even in that respect would it be the rule in civil law. Then this being a criminal charge, and it being our duty to consider it in a judicial manner, what does the hon. gentleman mean by his references to the newspaper press of the country? Is that a judicial argument, or is he using it for the purpose of browbeating some weak member who may fear public opinion? Is he holding it as a rod over the backs of some who may consider that they have to face their constituents shortly, and that they had better beware of public opinion? If such is the case, the hon. gentleman has no right to call it a judicial argument. But I can assure the hon. gentleman that in using such arguments as that he has mistaken the calibre of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. There may be slaves who dare not do right, but they are not to be found here. There may be slaves who dare not be in the right, because those in the right are few in numbers. There may be slaves who will bow to a wave of public opinion without considering whether that opinion is well or ill-founded. But I tell the hon. gentleman opposite, who has paraded a variety of newspaper articles before the House, that we all know the press of the country is fond of things sensational, that they delight in exaggerating all kinds of charges, whether they be against a member of Parliament or against the humblest individual accused of crime. The newspapers delight in showing the worst side of a question. It has come to be a disgrace to the press of our country that no sooner is a man charged before our criminal courts than he is tried and found guilty by the press.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is pretty hard for the press.

Mr. MASSON. It may be hard for the press' but every honest man connected with the press will admit that there is too much truth in it. Now, I will say that this being a criminal case, we are not to deal with it as if it were a civil case, but we are to insist upon the strictest proof. The whole gist of all criminal charges is the corrupt intention under which the act is done. A corrupt intent is the very spirit of the offence. We have penal statutes, the courts of law deal with such cases, and where no actual guilt is proved the jury have reason to presume that no actual guilt existed in the mind of the accused, and juries in such cases are not only permitted, but they are directed, to acquit. Now, I wish to refer to the law as laid down on that point by the very best authority in this country. I will show how the courts construe statutes according to the spirit and the practice of natural justice. Cases may possibly arise in which a person, according to the letter of the law, may be liable to a penalty, yet the court will direct a jury to acquit, the accused not having offended against the spirit and the intention. In a case where that is the judgement of a court, I will quote the language of the Chief Justice:

"In these cases it may be contended that the words of the Act affording no latitude, conviction is inevitable, and the defendant must apply to the mercy of the Crown, which he will doubtless receive. I think he is more satisfactorily protected by the genius of our laws, and the spirit in which they are administered; I think he his entitled to an acquittal under such circumstances, from the verdict of a jury, and not driven to appeal to clemency, where there has been clearly no guilt."

Now, this being a criminal case, and that being the spirit in which we should consider it, I wish to take up, point by point, the amendment that has been moved to the report. At this hour of the night I will not trouble the House with going over the voluminous evidence, but merly confine myself to pointing out the weakness of the amendment proposed. Now, in the 7th paragraph of the finding, as suggested in the amended report, I find these words:

"That the said Edward Cochrane was not a member of the said committee, but he knew of the purposes and object of its existence; attended one or more of its meetings."

What is the meaning of that? There is a distinct admission that he was not a member of the committee, and we must therefore take it for granted that he was not a member of the committee. It has been stated that Mr. Cochrane was aware of the purposes and objects of its existence. What were those purposes and objects? We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the purposes and objects were not to dispense patronage, but to collect money. If we look carefully at the evidence we find that Stanley said the appointment of that committee was for the purpose of distributing the patronage. He says, not that the committee was actually appointed by the convention of the party, but it was recommended by that convention. That is the effect of his evidence. It is no use reading pages of questions and answers to come to that conclusion; his evidence means nothing more or less than that it was suggested that the patronage in the south end of the riding—because hon. gentlemen must remember that this is a string riding, narrow and long—should be distributed by a committee, as several appointments would have to be filled shortly after Mr. Cochrane's election. The convention met. Mr. Cochrane was in Ottawa, or it is said he was not present, and that recommendation was made to the convention. It was to the effect that the chairmen of township societies should be on the committee, if they were convenient. We are told there were two or three put on. They met at the south end of the riding; consequently, those at the north end could not be there, and their places were filled by seven prominent members of the party. It is said they were self-constituted. Be that so or not, it was a committee organized for the purpose of recommending to Mr. Cochrane persons who should receive the patronage; and if they took upon themselves other offices they did so without the recommendation of the convention, and without the knowledge and consent of Mr. Cochrane. There is not a tittle of evidence to show that they consulted Mr. Cochrane as to what they should do. There is a quantity of evidence to show that Mr. Cochrane did not know they were making these demands. There is the evidence of Stanley, who emphatically says so. There is the evidence of May, and of other witnesses, who spoke of the doings of the convention, and no word was told to Mr. Cochrane as to what the committee was doing as to levying money. If the case was that the object of the committee was to raise money, then this finding which hon. gentlemen opposite would ask the House to adopt is not correct, for it is not accurate to say that Mr. Cochrane knew the purposes and objects of that committee, if those purposes and objects were not only the dispensing of patronage but the levying of money therefor. Then we come to another statement, that Mr. Cochrane attended one or more meetings on that committee. There is not a tittle of evidence that he attended any meeting as such. It is useless to refer to the evidence of Bullock. I do not wish to make any disparaging remarks in regard to that gentleman. He is said to have been a member of that committee, and a leading Conservative on it. Unfortunately, as was remarked by counsel prosecuting these charges before the Committee, he was not in a very capable state that morning. We have the evidence of Mr. Bullock for what it is worth. What does it amount to? Simply this, that Mr. Cochrane dropped accidentally into the store while some of the committee were there, that he remained some little time—how long, the witness would not pledge his word—and it is sought to make us believe that they were discussing this matter. It is clear from a close scrutiny of the evidence that this was not his intention. The question is this:

Q. Did Mr. Cochrane attend any meeting of the committee?—A. He was there once. I do not know whether he had any conversation with me or any of us.
Q. He was there once?—A. He was in the store once, when we were all there.

This witness says later on they were not all there; when asked to give their names, he could not do so. The evidence proceeds:

Q. Did you ever tell Mr. Cochrane as to the proceedings of the patronage committee. Did you inform him?—A. No.
Q. How did Cochrane come to be there?—A. I cannot tell.
Q. Did he drop in by accident?—A. I cannot tell.
Q. What time of the day was it?—A. It was evening.

Further on, he says:

Q. He did not come in to buy?—A. I cannot swear; sometimes we do not close till 10 or 11 o'clock.
Q. It was after the store was closed?—A. The store was closed. Yes; it was after the store was closed, as far as my knowledge goes.
Q. Did the committee transact the business in the store?—A. Right in the open store.
Q. Right in the main part of the store?—A. Yes; that is where Cochrane came.
Q. Did he know the committee was there?—A. I do not know.
Q. Did he attend at their request?—A. No; not that I know of.

Then the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, who was a member of that Committee, put this leading question to the witness:

Q. What part did Mr. Cochrane take in the discussion?—A. No part whatever.

There, spreading over two or three pages of evidence, you can cull but one meaning out of it, the story told by the witness, namely, that Mr. Cochrane dropped in there accidentally only, that he took no part in the discussion; and he even was uncertain as to whether Mr. Cochrane knew it was the committee that was meeting. Before leaving this point, let me refer to the more emphatic evidence of Stanley:

Mr. MASSON.

1024. Did Mr. Cochrane know that you were collecting or getting any money from the parties recommended for the bridges?—I do not know whether he did or not. If he did, he did not know until the parties were all appointed.
1025. Did he know it from you?—No; he did not.
1026. Was Mr. Cochrane present at any of these committee meetings?—He was not.
1027. Was he a member of the committee?—He was not.

I will not detain the House longer on this point, as it may have to be referred to in reference to other findings. I say, therefore, that as regards this important finding, the first point of any importance for the House to consider is that Mr. Cochrane was not a member of the committee, and the assertion that he knew its object is true only to the extent that he knew of the one object of dispensing patronage. That he attended one or more of the meetings is absolutely incorrect, and it would be an improper and unjustifiable thing for this House, or for the Committee, or for any court of enquiry, to say that the incidental dropping into a place where the committee was sitting was an attendance at the committee. Therefore, I am satisfied that the House will have no hesitation in rejecting that finding. I attended the special Committee of the House during its deliberations, and I heard the address of the counsel who prosecuted these charges, and I also had the pleasure, if pleasure it may be called, of listening to a repetition of that speech here to-night. On both these occasions I heard great stress laid on the fact that Mr. Cochrane was actually five miles away from home after dark, and consequently it was urged that the Committee in one case, and that the House in the other, should assume from the fact that M. Cochrane was five miles away from home after dark there was some felonious intent lurking around somewhere. The hon. member for South Victoria (Mr. Barron) pointed out that Mr. Cochrane had stolen away from home after dark and entered into a store in a country village while some three or four men were sitting around on the counter. Surely no judicial mind would ask that guilt should be assumed under such circumstances as that. Before leaving this subject, I wish to refer to the ingenious, I will not say the improper, arrangement of the evidence in this connection. We are told at the close of this finding of the minority in the report of the proceedings which have been printed for the instruction of the members, that this finding is based on certain evidence, and it states that Mr. Bullock, one of the committee, gives the following evidence. It then goes over a number of questions and answers given by Mr. Bullock, and then without any charge or without any preface it launches into the statements made by Stanley, and reading these together it would lead to a conclusion which reading both in their proper shape would not be arrived at. Those who have the report and look at this finding will see that the questions running down to number 2556 suddenly break off, and then we have question No. 1040. 1040 is not Mr. Bullock's evidence, as stated here, at all, but the evidence of Mr. Stanley, given under entirely different circumstances and relating to a different matter and a different time, and should not be read in the connection set down in this report. The 8th section of the finding which we are asked to adopt is as follows:—

"That in the month of April, 1888, one Hedley H. Simpson was recommended by the said committee to the said

Edward Cochrane as a fit person to fill the position of light-house-keeper at Presqu'Isle Point.

"9. That James Stanley, one of the said committee, by its authority, called on Hedley Simpson and told of said recommendations, and made it a condition of getting said appointment that he should pay the said Stanley the sum of $200, to be used in part liquidation of said debt.

"10. That thereupon the said Edward Cochrane recommended the said Hedley Simpson to the Government as a fit person to fill the said office."

These clauses contain only one thing that may be a finding of importance, namely, that James Stanley, one of the committee, by its authority went to Hedley H. Simpson and told him of the recommendation, and made the payment on condition as to his getting the said appointment. The evidence on that point has been gone over two or three times to-night, and it was very fully entered into by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White). I will not trouble the House in going through it in detail again, but I would simply recite briefly what the evidence on that is. The evidence is that James Stanley was not authorized by the committee to put on any condition to the appointment. James Stanley positively swears, and we have no evidence to the contrary, that the committee recommended Hedley Simpson for the appointment, and attached no conditions whatever to that appointment; that they did not authorize him to demand any sum; that he did not demand any sum; that he told Hedley Simpson of his appointment, and after telling him that he had received the appointment, he spoke to him about the debt, and asked him what he could give to assist in clearing it off. It is sworn to that Hedley Simpson said he would be willing to give what he could, but that he had not the money; that he asked him (Stanley) where he could borrow it, and that Stanley offered to lend it to him, and the whole thing was completed there. Now, there is no evidence connecting Mr. Cochrane with that. The evidence before us is that Stanley was not authorized to make this bargain; he was authorized only to communicate what the committee had done, namely, to secure him the appointment so far as they could. He did that, and he took on himself to do what he could. The statement, therefore, contained in the ninth clause, that it was made a condition of his getting the appointment that he should pay to the said Stanley a sum of $200 to be used in the liquidation of the debt, is not borne out by the evidence, and it would be absolutely improper for this House to accept it. The eleventh clause of this report says:

"11. That the said Hedley H. Simpson duly paid the said sum, and on said recommendations he duly received said office and now holds the same—and this to the knowledge of said Edward Cochrane—the said Stanley in his evidence before said committee, swore as follows—"

Now, as to that we have no evidence whatever except that of Stanley. We have no evidence whatever as to what the committee were to do; we have no evidence whatever that Mr. Cochrane knew anything about it. It is not very plain what the last words mean where "and this to the knowledge of the said Edward Cachrane." What does this phrase refer to? If it refers to the fact that Mr. Cochrane knew that Simpson was appointed to the office and still holds it, the statement is true. That is the plain English interpretation of the phrase, but I fancy that is not what the framers intended it to mean. As these hon. gentleman opposite are aiming at bowing down to public opinion, and wishing by threats and presure of the press to cause others to bow down to public opinion, I have no doubt that the phrase is put there for the purpose of conveying the idea to the public that all these things were done by Edward Cochrane, of which there is not a tittle of evidence to show. Now, the next charge of importance is section 12:

"Pending the negotiations between said Stanley and the said Hedley H. Simpson and the said Edward Cochrane respecting said lighthouse, the said Edward Cochrane wrote the said Hedley H. Simpson a letter respecting said lighthouse, and sent it to him by the hands of Arundel Simpson, who in said investigation swore as follows:"

Now, to say what Arundel Simpson swore on that point would be to say a great deal. In the first place, Arundel Simpson swore positively enough that he got the letter, giving the time and place. He described clearly that he met Mr. Cochrane on the street; that Mr. Cochrane asked him to go into the hall of a hotel; that in the hall of the hotel, in the presence of Mr. Cochrane, Mr. Stanley gave him a letter. First, he made the statement that Mr. Cochrane gave him the letter; then he said Mr. Stanley gave him the letter in Mr. Cochrane's presence. Before giving this testimony he had made a statement saying what was in that letter; but he astonished the hon. gentleman who was leading him in his examination before the committee by saying that he knew nothing of the contents of the letter. Here is what he said. It has been read before, but I will read it again:

Q. Did you see that letter?—A. No. I saw the letter, but I do not know what was in it. I could not tell what was in it.

Could there be anything more emphatic than that to show that he did not know the contents of the letter?

Q. Was the letter read in your presence?—A. I do not know as it was. I do not think it was. I would not swear positively. It is quite a while ago.

Q. Did Mr. Cochrane tell you what was in the letter?—A. He told me it was concerning the lighthouse, and wanted to know if I would send it to Hedley Simpson for him to come and see him.

So far the evidence was read by the hon. gentleman who first addressed the House from the other side; but, strange to say, the hon. gentleman stopped there. The next question is:

Q. And that is all you know about the letter?—A. That is all I know.

There is his positive statement. It will be noticed that in his examination in chief and in his cross-examination he tells two different stories- one, that he got the letter directly from Mr. Cochrane, the other that he got it from Mr. Stanley in Mr. Cochrane's presence; but through all the examination and cross-examination he sticks to the point that he did not know what was in it. By following closely the proceedings we find that he is dismissed, that other witnesses are called, that the Committee adjourns. After a long delay he is called again, and right at the commencement of his examination a statutory declaration, a document having all the solemnity of an oath, which he had made before, was placed in his hands by the counsel for the prosecution. This was objected to, and properly objected to; and no member of this House, be he lawyer or layman, will deny that that was a most improper mode of examining a witness —to place in his hands a declaration in which he had told a different story, in order by the pressure of that document to lead him to say what it was otherwise impossible to get him to say. However, the document is produced, and he is examined: and follow his examination in chief carefully, question by question, page by page, and you will find that he tells an entirely different story from that which he told in the declaration. Then comes the cross-examination extending over several pages, before the document is placed in his hands, and he tells a story the direct opposite of what he had told on the previous occasion only a few days before, when his statement was reduced to writing. During that examination and cross-examination it was clearly established that in connection with the lighthouse he had only one meeting with Mr. Cochrane, that he was asked at that meeting, either by Mr. Stanley or by Mr. Cochrane, to take a letter. That is the sum and substance of all his evidence before this document was introduced. He had only three meetings altogether—one about the lighthouse, when he was asked to take a letter, one when he applied himself for a bridge, and one about things in general, when he was making complaints against Mr. Cochrane because all the appointments to the lighthouses and bridges were filled. Then this document was placed in his hands, making it clear that he had several conversations. The first clause of importance I read is this:

"I assisted the said Hedley H. Simpson in his efforts to secure the said appointment and had several interviews with Edward Cochrane, then and now member of the House of Commons of Canada for the Electoral District of the East Riding of the County of Northumberland and a supporter of the Goverment, in connection with such appointment."

What is his explanation of that? His statement was that he had not assisted, that he had not canvassed for him, that the only thing he did was at Mr. Cochrane's request to carry a letter telling him the appointment was made. He did not present the petition. It was urged that in that clause there was only a trifling variation, because it had been taken down that he did this himself, whereas the interview was by his uncle and his wife's uncle, and he was present. Now, his statement is that he was not present with his uncle. It is clear on that point. An hon. gentleman pledged his word that the evidence shows he was present with his wife's uncle. On page 63 there is the following evidence:—

Q. The fifth clause of this declaration of yours, which has been acknowledged by you as bearing your signature, reads as follows:—"At one of the said interviews the said Edward Cochrane informed me that he would not sign the petition hereinbefore referred to, and that if Hedley H. Simpson sent said petition to Ottawa he would not assist him in obtaining the said appointment, but if Hedley H. Simpson would leave the matter in his hands he (Cochrane) would secure the appointment for him." Is that true?—A. Will you let me explain? Q. Tell me first is that your statement that you made to Mr. Gordon?—A. No; not that I had an interview with Mr. Cochrane about the matter.

There is his positive statement that he had not an interview. But it is pleaded for this innocent man that he may have been misled into saying he had not an interview because he stood by while his wife's uncle had one. Can that interpretation be put on the evidence?

Q. You did not understand your making such a statement as that before Mr. Gordon?—A. I made such a statement; but I did not say I saw Mr. Cochrane.

Then he was not present with his wife's uncle to hear Mr. Cochrane, for he did not see him. That, surely, is clear. Then the whole question was put to him again:

Q. Recollect that this paragraph contains three statements: that you saw Cochrane and he would not sign the petition, and at that interview Cochrane told you that if Simpson sent a petition to Ottawa direct he would not assist him in getting the appointment; and third, if he would leave it in his own hands he would get him the appointment. These are the three distinct statements contained in that paragraph. Are they yours?—A. No.

He says further on: "to a certain extent they are." He is asked:

Q. What is your explanation?—A. He asked me if I ever——

Q. Who asked you?—A. Mr. Gordon. Understand, Mr. Gordon was asking me questions and I asked him to put them down. He asked about the petition and I told him my wife's uncle, Mr. Simpson, went to him with the petition and he would not sign it; that it would make no difference. I told him it was my wife's uncle who went there.

No hon. gentleman, acting in a judicial capacity as a judge, trying with judicial fairness a case of this kind, will argue from that testimony that that man went there with his wife's uncle and heard what passed, and consequently it was only by inadvertence he made the statement that he had an interview, that it was only a trifling inconsistency or evasion of the truth, and not one by which he could be convicted of speaking falsely. You have only to follow that cross-examination through a few more pages to find that, section after section, Arundel Simpson contradicts one day the statements he made the previous day and the statements he made in that declaration. So thoroughly did he contradict himself that it would be waste of time to point out the contradictions. Through a number of pages we meet with contradiction after contradiction, until at the end we hardly know what story the man wishes us to believe. And yet we are told that on such evidence, unsupported as it is, we are to convict an hon. member of this House of a criminal offence and direct the country to prosecute him for it. I say that is a statement that even did it stand there alone, shattered as it is by his cross-examination, contradicted as it is by his own sworn statement, would be unworthy of belief, and it would be improper for any judicial committee to decide against a defendant charged with a criminal offence based on such evidence. Not only is it unsupported, but contradicted in every possible way. That story about that letter meets with contradiction from first to last wherever it touches on another person. It is said to have been taken to Herbert Simpson's house, but he recollects nothing of it. He never heard of or saw such a letter. It is said to have been read by Mrs. Herbert Simpson. Mrs. Herbert Simpson says most emphatically that she did not read such a letter, that she never saw such a letter and never heard of such a letter. Language cannot be more emphatic than hers. She is put in the box and asked these questions:

Q. You are the wife of——?—A. Herbert W. Simpson.

Q. It is said, Mrs. Simpson, that you read a letter which purported to come from Mr. Edward Cochrane, the member, and was addressed to Hedley Simpson; that letter in transit being carried by Arundel Simpson, or in the hands of somebody, was brought to you and read by you. What do you say to that?—A. I never read any letter of the kind; I have never seen it, so of course I never read it.

Q. You never read a letter that passed between Mr. Cochrane, M.P., and Mr. Hedley Simpson?—A. No.

Q. Did you ever see a letter from Mr. Edward Cochrane?—A. I never saw any letter from Mr. Cochrane to any person.

She is pressed very hard, as if she had been primed to say that, and she says emphatically that she did not know Mr. Cochrane, and would not know him on the street, until she saw him that morning. Then they revert again to this letter, and it is attempted to draw out what she heard after these charges were noised abroad, and after this declaration had been made, but she states emphatically how she heard about this matter:

Q. You heard of the letter from Mr. Cochrane?—A. I heard you speaking of it.

Q. Are there any other persons from whom you heard it?—A. I have heard it talked of since these proceedings commenced, but I never saw the letter.

Q. A letter from Mr. Cochrane to Hedley Simpson?—A. That is what you tell me.

Q. You say you never read such a letter?—A. Most certainly: I think I have told you that already.

Q. Do you remember having read the letter that Arundel brought to the house?—A. No: he never brought a letter to the house, to my knowledge.

Instead of being supported or corroborated in any way, Arundel Simpson is contradicted first in the statement that Stanley gave him the letter. How did he know the contents? He says he did not know the contents, and we are asked to believe that he did. Take the statement put in his mouth by the hon. gentleman who first addressed the House on the other side, that he heard it read by some body, and that it was Mrs. Simpson. The hon. gentleman who makes this statement is a lawyer. Would he in any civil case presume in any court to give evidence of the contents of a letter by calling somebody who had been told of its contents? If the document could not be produced, would he not put the person in the box who wrote the letter or who read it, and not the person who heard what its contents were? This would not be accepted by any court of justice in a civil case, and yet we are asked to accept that statement in condemning a member of this House and finding him guilty of a criminal offence. I think we have here a thorough contradiction of the statement which has been made that:

"Pending the negotiations between said Stanley and the said Hedley H. Simpson and the said Edward Cochrane respecting said lighthouse, the said Edward Cochrane wrote the said Hedley H. Simpson a letter respecting said lighthouse, and sent it to him by the hands of Arundel Simpson."

We cannot sustain that finding. The next clause is:

"That respecting the price paid for said office and the said Edward Cochrane's knowledge thereof, the said Arundel Simpson gave the following evidence."

And we are treated to more of Arundel Simpson's evidence. Strange to say, they cull the evidence from one place and another; but notwithstanding that, in about half a page we have three differents stories told. One is that Mr. Cochrane knew all about it because he told this man so. The question is:

Q. Mr. Cochrane told you that Snetsinger offered him something?—A. Yes.

Q. How much did he say?—A. I would not be positive; either $400 or $600.

There is the first statement, that the amount was mentioned. A few questions further down it goes on:

Q. Did he say anything?—A. I don't know; it is quite a while ago. He said, I believe, that he would, or they would, let him have it a good deal cheaper.

Q. Would let who have it cheaper?—A. Mr. Hedley Simpson.

Q. What did he say?—A. He said that Hedley would get it for $200.

Q. Why do you refer to the word "cheaper"?—A. I don't know: I suppose that is what he said.

There, again, is a statement in reference to what Hedley Simpson was to get it at. The next statement is "he said he would get it for $200," not cheaper, but for $200. Then this is as to what Mr. Snetsinger said:

"He said Mr. Snetsinger would give $600 for the lighthouse, and they only got $200."

What are we to gather from all these selections which they have culled from the evidence to show that this man is to be believed, and that Mr. Cochrane had knowledge that they relied upon Arundel Simpson's evidence in support of these assertions? These assertions analyzed point to three different statements. Then, as the cap of the whole matter, we find they ask:

"But that he (Cochrane) would secure the appointment of said Hedley H. Simpson for a good deal less than $600?—He did secure it. This was long after, as Mr. Cochrane knows."

They stop there. Why did they not quote further? Because it would show another story contradicted. Therefore, the 13th statement of the findings which the House is asked to pronounce upon, to the effect that Edward Cochrane had knowledge of all these transactions, is not proved, because Arundel Simpson's statement does not prove it in the first place: and secondly, if it does, it is not worthy of belief. Then we have charge No. 14:

"That in the end of the year 1889 or in the early part of 1890 the said James Stanley, with the consent of the said Edward Cochrane, proposed to one Arundel Simpson that if the said Arundel Simpson would pay $150 to the said James Stanley for the purpose aforesaid, he, the said Arundel Simpson, would be appointed a bridge-tender on said canal. Arundel Simpson refused to pay anything."

Now, that statement as it stands, although containing inaccuracies, the House will see at once makes no allegation against Mr. Cochrane. It does, however, say in the first allegation "with the consent of the said Edward Cochrane proposed to one Arundel Simpson." Was that proposal made by Stanley to Arundel Simpson with Mr. Cochrane's consent? If so, where is the evidence of Arundel Simpson to prove it? Stanley does not prove it, nor has any other witness said anything on which this House can be asked to base a finding that what took place between James Stanley and Arundel Simpson was done with Mr. Cochrane's consent. There is also the same ingenious attempt—I will not say improper attempt—made to mislead by putting under the head of one witness the evidence of another, where the number 1691 is changed to 1830. Their evidence is hearsay evidence only. Yet the same personal pronoun is carried through as if the conversation was going on with Mr. Cochrane, whereas the conversation is with Mr. Stanley, and only as to him. The fifteenth allegation is that Wm. Brown was recommended for a position on the Murray Canal, and got the appointment. In that there is nothing wrongfully charged against Mr. Cochrane, and I will dismiss it. Now, coming to the 18th clause that we are asked to adopt as the finding of this Committee, it states:

"That in or about the month of May, 1890, one J. D. Clouston was recommended to the Government for the position of bridge-tender on the Murray Canal by the said Edward Cochrane; that the said Edward Cochrane knew when he made said recommendation that the said J. D. Clouston agreed to pay for said office to said committee the sum of $150, and had paid thereon about $100, to be used for the purpose aforesaid—that said J. D. Clouston did pay said sum—and on said recommendation of said Edward Cochrane received said appointment, and now holds the same."

And it gives the evidence. The examination of that evidence shows clearly how very carefully they selected it. Mr. Clouston, an honest old gentleman, is put in the box. He is anxious to tell his story in a straightforward manner. He is cross-examined from the first, and almost every question put to him is a leading question. Finally, at question 1954, he breaks out and tells his story in a concise statement of what took place :

Q. You told us you had received the promise of an appointment from Mr. Cochrane. That is correct, is it not?—A. Well, now, I hardly know how to give it. In the first place, it is nearly a year ago. I first asked Mr. Cochrane if he was successful in being elected—that was after Mr. Keeler died. Mr. Crouter was here one session, and then Mr. Cochrane after that defeated Mr. Crouter. Going to the nomination, when there was to be nominated candidates, I asked Mr. Cochrane if he was successful I would like him to remember me, in the way of getting me a bridge on the canal. Mr. Cochrane never made me an answer aye, yes or no, at that time. The conversation you are trying to get at was years after that. Mr. Cochrane and I drove to Colborne on that day. On our return in the evening he said: Clouston, I suppose you remember saying something with regard to an appointment on one of the bridges on the Murray Canal. I laughed. I says: Yes, Cochrane, I thought you had forgotten it because you did not mention it since. He says: I gave you no answer at that time. I says: I know you did not. Well, now, says he: There is a bridge for you on the Murray Canal. That is all the conversation.

Now, this evidence merely shows that these men were old friends, they were near neighbours, and Mr. Clouston and Mr. Cochrane went to a nomination, taking place some eight or ten years ago. On the journey he asked Mr. Cochrane to remember him if he got elected, and to give him a place on the bridge. Years after that, when driving home, as neighbours would, from an adjoining village, Mr. Cochrane voluntarily asked him if he remembered having asked him about a position as bridge-keepeer and then and there, without condition and without any bargain as to price or anything else, Mr. Cochrane says to him: "There is a bridge on the Murray Canal for you." Now, that is the whole story as gathered from Mr. Clouston, but nothing is shown that it had anything to do with his appointment. The hon. gentleman said, and I think the last speaker reiterated the expression: How could this man know about this debt unless Mr. Cochrane had told him? How could he know that Mr. Webb had this note unless Mr. Cochrane told him? Why, I have no doubt that Clouston knew as much about this debt as Mr. Cochrane did. In the first place, he had more to do with it than Mr. Cochrane. He was one of the signers of the original note, he was one of the promoters of the original protest under which this debt was incurred; and it is all nonsense to say that he must have received his information from Mr. Cochrane. He tells us positively that he knew all about it, that he was one of the parties who took an active interest in these things. All these things go to show that what Clouston did, he did voluntarily. He knew that these moneys were being raised. It is sought to be shown that he learned that information from Mr. Cochrane, but he does not say so. It has not been shown that Mr. Cochrane knew it, and it is improper to assume that he obtained such information. It is clear that if hon. gentlemen opposite rely on the evidence, which I may say they quote in garbled form, it is not right to assume that Mr. Cochrane knew when he made the recommendation that Clouston had agreed to pay the amount in question, because he had only agreed with himself to pay, but had never spoken of it to anyone; he simply went to the holder of the note and said: I have come to pay you. He had evidently asked where the note was. There is no evidence, however, as to an agreement with Mr. Cochrane or any one else that he should pay it. As regards Henry May, there is no evidence whatever. We come now to the 22nd paragraph :

"22. That the said committee was organized for the express purpose of corruptly trafficking in said offices, and did corruptly sell and dispose of the same to Hedley Simpson, Wesley Goodrich, Robert May, Thomas Fitzgerald and J. D. Clouston, respectively, for a money consideration."

There is no evidence to sustain that assertion. In fact, the whole evidence shows that the committee was not organized with the express purpose of corruptly trafficking in offices, that it was organized for the purpose of recommending persons to such offices, and that if other duties were assumed by the committee they exceeded the instructions and duties for which they were organized. The minority report also asks us to declare :

"23. That said Edward Cochrane was aware of such corrupt sale and disposal of said offices, sanctioned the same and made his said recommendations with the knowledge that said offices were so sold and disposed of."

I again repeat that there is not a tittle of evidence to support the charge that Mr. Cochrane knew those parties were corruptly selling those offices, or that when he made any recommendation he was aware that any corrupt bargain had been made. It is urged, very positively, that as regards Hedley Simpson, Mr. Cochrane certainly knew about it. It was said money passed through Mr. Cochrane's hands. In regard to Goodrich's money, it is said that that passed through Mr. Cochrane's hands. I would refer to what Goodrich himself said on the subject. It was urged by hon. gentlemen opposite that Goodrich did not know what to do with the money: that he did not know anything about Clouston and other parties, but he learnt it from Mr. Cochrane. Unfortunately for that contention, Goodrich gave evidence to the contrary. He states :

3732. With whom did you arrange this matter as to the payment of the $200?—With Mr. Wade.
3733. How long before you had paid this money was the arrangement made?—It was not a great while, but I have no dates.
3734. Who, besides Mr. Wade, had you the agreement with?—Mr. Obadiah Simpson.
3735. The old gentleman?—Yes, sir.
3736. Wade is his son-in-law?—I understand so.
3737. And is that the Wade who is said to be the member of the committee?—I don't know who the members of the committee were.
3738. You were to pay $200, according to your agreement, to Mr. Wade?—Yes, sir.
3739. Were you aware at the time whom you were to pay it to?—No, sir.
3740. What did you say about Mr. Payne?—I said that when I presented it, Mr. Cochrane told me to take it to Mr. Payne, to give it to him.

That is the statement he made in examination in chief. What follows :—

3741. Why did you present it to Mr. Cochrane?—I knew he frequently went to Colborne and it was most convenient to me.
3742. You did not want to go to Colborne?—No, sir.
3743. If you had gone, who would you have paid it to?—To Mr. Payne.
3744. Had Mr. Wade told you to?—I would not be sure whether it was Mr. Payne.
3745. If you had gone in to pay it to Mr. Payne—would it be because of an arrangement you had made with Mr.

Wade?—I understood, but I cannot say who told me that the notes were in Mr. Payne's hands for payment. I got the idea somewhere.

There is the statement of a man who was evidently intending to tell the truth; that the money was to go to Colborne, and it was because Mr. Cochrane went there frequently that he called on Mr. Cochrane. It was the statement of a man who had got the idea from Mr. Wade or some one, and it was that which took him to Cochrane. We have the whole transaction carried out, and it is clear that Mr. Cochrane knew nothing of the transaction; that Mr. Goodrich went to Cochrane; that he applied for a situation; that he was told there was none. He had, however, made up his mind to secure one of the places, but Mr. Cochrane told him the positions were all filled. He then made the statement that he would give $200. Mr. Cochrane told him he would have none of his money and would not take a dollar. Is there evidence of corruption in Mr. Cochrane's conduct? Goodrich then said he would give a life lease of his farm. Mr. Cochrane advised him against doing so. Without going over his evidence, I may say it amounts to this: That on two occasions he spoke to Mr. Cochrane, once on the road and once elsewhere, and both times Mr. Cochrane advised him not to give a life lease of his farm and not to give $200. But Mr. Wade learning, as he told us, from Mr. Cochrane at a funeral that this man was very anxious to get the place, and knowing that if the parties were appointed in the way recommended by the committee of which Mr. Wade was a member, that the old man, his father-in-law, would be left destitute because Arundel Simpson would not be able out of his pay at the bridge to keep the old man, and so he said himself he was afraid the old man would be thrown on his hands, he acted upon that knowledge, which he had obtained innocently enough. We cannot state that Cochrane had any design in talking to his neighbours about these appointments. No one suggested to Wade what he should do. But he sees the old man, his father-in-law and Goodrich, and he is the instrument in working up an agreement by which Arundel Simpson took a life interest in the farm. Mr. Wade tells us frankly that having heard that this man was willing to give $200 he made a proposition that that should go towards liquidating the indebtedness, and it was done. Until the whole affair is completed, there is no evidence of knowledge on Cochrane's part. One of the hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to argue that it made no difference whether knowledge of a criminal transaction, such as was charged, came before or after the event. I can tell the hon. gentleman that it makes all the difference in the world whether a person is an accessory before or an acessory after the fact, and a court or jury trying Mr. Cochrane upon the charge that he was a party to that transaction would have to be satisfied that Mr. Cochrane not only knew the facts, but that he knew the criminal intent, and failing to satisfy the court upon that a conviction could not be pressed. Yet this House is asked on just such evidence as that to find Mr. Cochrane guilty of being aware of these corrupt sales and disposal of the offices. We are asked to find in the broad language of the minority report:

"24. That the payment by the said Hedley Simpson of the said sum of $200 directly relieved the said Edward Cochrane of just so much of the said Edward Cochrane's indebtedness on said note of $619.69."

That was the statements made by the gentleman who made the charge; but the two gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House have taken a wider and bolder stand, and have said that Mr. Cochrane was discharged in toto from that indebtedness, and that Mr. Cochrane was no on the new note that was made. There is not evidence as to whether Mr. Cochrane was on the renewal of that note or not, and notwithstanding the fact that some hon. gentlemen appeared to be under the impression that note for $619 was the note upon which the $200 was paid, the evidence does not state that at all, and when the banker was brought before the Committee, we find that there was no $200 paid on that note, but that the note was paid in one sum. Let us deal with the language of this finding:

"That the payment by the said Hedley Simpson of the sum of $200 directly relieved the said Edward Cochrane of just so much of the said Edward Cochrane's indebtedness on said note."

Now the evidence is quite to the contrary effect. The evidence is to the effect that there was a note of $1,000 placed in the bank with some twenty names on it, that it was kept in the bank for several years, that during one of the many elections in that riding Dr. Willoughby, the local representative, and some three others of the twenty makers on that note were sued, and that these parties being sued, measures were taken to liquidate that note. It is clearly proved in evidence that Mr. Willoughby and other gentlemen were the makers of that note, and that Mr. Cochrane and other gentlemen were the endorsers. Bear in mind that the first note was a joint and several note in which all the parties were makers. On such a note as that it would be fair and reasonable to assume that it went to remove the indebtedness, but when we find the note made by two of the four parties who were sued, and endorsed by two parties who are not sued and who are not on the note, we have every reason to assume that the legal position of the parties on that note is the correct one, and that the note is not Mr. Cochrane's indebtedness, nor was it Mr. Cochrane's debt originally. Dr. Willoughby and another are the debtors on that note, and Mr. Cochrane at most is only a guarantor. Therefore, I think such a finding as that cannot be sustained from the evidence. If there were a liability which Mr. Cochrane had reduced, and even if he had even been the maker of the note, it would have to be brought to his knowledge that that money was corruptly obtained before he could be held in any way accountable for the use it was put to. We have heard a great deal on the subject that Mr. Cochrane did not present himself as a witness. As I remarked at the outset, it all depends on whether you deal with this matter on the principles of civil or criminal law. This being a criminal charge, created a misdemeanour by an old Imperial statute, and as the finding acknowledges is to be a criminal charge and directs that all parties connected with it ought to be prosecuted, it is proper to deal with this as a criminal case, and in dealing with it by any rule of criminal law it is an impropriety to comment upon the defendan not making a statement. The next clause of the finding is as follows:—

"27. That all the witnesses who appeared and gave evidence before your Committee appeared to your Committee to be men of truth and desirous of speaking the truth, so far as they knew; and there does not appear to be any ground for doubting the credibility of any one of them."

With one exception, I think that every member of the Committee would endorse that, but there is a very important exception, and that is Arundel Simpson, whose testimony is not worthy of belief, and cannot honestly be believed by any one member of the Committee. The twenty-eighth clause corresponds very closely with the clause of the report we are asked to amend, and it says:

"28. That selling or disposing of offices for a money or other consideration is highly improper and reprehensible; and the parties shown to have been engaged in such a practice here should be proceeded against criminally."

It is not only reprehensible, but it is criminal. They need not have stopped short there, for were the parties shown to be engaged in that practice they should be proceeded against criminally. I would point out that the report which we are asked to amend declares the same thing:

"4. Your Committee report that the practice which seems to have been resorted to by the political organization referred to, in order to raise a fund for political purposes, though not connected with Dominion politics, was improper and reprehensible."

The hon. gentleman from North Victoria (Mr. Barron) said that my hon. friend from Shelburne (Mr. White) had stultified himself in the report of the majority by saying that these were voluntary subscriptions, and at the same time saying they were reprehensible, and he stated that if they were voluntary they were quite proper. He announced the policy of his party when he said that it is quite right to go to the occupant of an office and solicit from him voluntary subscriptions for election purposes. That is the policy and practice of the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs, to go to office holders and office seekers and get from hem voluntary subscriptions, and the hon. gentleman endorses that policy when he says that if these subscriptions were voluntary they were all right, and he says that the majority of the Committee are stultifying themselves when they say they were reprehensible. If the hon. gentleman had read the report he would have seen that these gentlemen go further than this. They do not say that if they were voluntary it was no harm. On the contrary, they condemn the soliciting of subscriptions from office holders unconditionally. They do not condone the offence because it is voluntary. It was shown by the various applicants that what they paid was paid voluntarily; they were given to understand that this payment was not a condition of their appointment; nevertheless, the report of the Committee says that it is improper and reprehensible to solicit subscriptions in that way. That is as far as the report goes, and as far as the evidence warrants this House in going. But they say that it has not been shown that these things were done with the knowledge or consent of Mr. Cochrane, and I submit that that is the report that should be adopted. The evidence warrants its adoption, but the evidence does not warrant the adoption of a single finding of fact of any importance set forth in the amendment which we are asked to adopt.

Mr. FLINT. I regret very much that the hour is so late, and that the time which it would be reasonable for me to place at my disposal in dealing with this matter is necessarily limited. But at the same time, being indirectly connected with this case, as one of the members of the House responsible for making some of the charges upon which evidence has been taken, and concerning which comments have been made and probably will be made on both sides of the House, I would ask your indulgence for a short time while I make some observations in reference to these charges. I do not propose to go at any length into the charges connected with the name of my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron), because the evidence in regard to them has been very thoroughly summed up by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. I will, however, comment briefly upon the report of the Committee so far as it is connected with the charges made by myself; and I may say there was a certain appropriateness in my bringing the charges rather than perhaps some other hon. gentleman, for these reasons, that the constituency I represent is at a long distance from the constituency in which these unfortunate events have taken place, that my personal relations with the hon. gentleman who has been charged with certain offences and breaches of privilege here have been of the most agreeable kind, and, therefore, no other motive could have animated me than a proper motive, to defend the privileges of this House and bring forward for the consideration of the proper parties the grave charges which were laid before me; and I may say that no person in this House will be more gratified at the disproof of any of the charges that have been made than I shall be myself, because I have nothing but the kindest personal feelings towards the hon. gentleman, and I have a very strong anxiety that the credit of the constituency he represents should be spared and the reputation of this country should be protected as far as possible. I regret very much that intimations should be made that the person bringing charges of this kind renders himself liable to be censured by this House; and although the charges in some respect may have failed, and where they have failed I am glad of it, yet no matter what the risk may be to the personal position of any hon. member of this House, it is his duty to take that in his hands and endeavour as far as he has the opportunity to preserve the character and integrity of the House of Commons of Canada. The charges which I brought had reference to the cases of John Clouston, William Brown, Robert May, Henry May and William Johnson. The case of William Johnson has not been examined into, because that person was not within the jurisdiction of the subpœnas issued by authority of this hon. House, and it would be improper to comment on any of the reasons which may have actuated that person in placing himself beyond the jurisdiction of the House or its Committees. Therefore, our opinion cannot be pronounced one way or the other upon the charge made against him. The charge against Henry May was not proved, and I think the majority of the Committee would have discharged their duty amply had they made that simple statement. But they have gone beyond the record. As to the charge that it was corruptly agreed by and between the said Edward Cochrane and one Henry May, that if the said Henry May would pay the said Edward Cochrane, or to others for him, or for political purposes, the sum of $200, he would procure for the said Henry May an office or position under the Government, and so on, the Committee say:

"Your Committee find that such charge is wholly unsustained."

In this statement I agree, and I think the opinion of the majority of the Committee should have ended there. But they have seen fit to go further, and implied censure upon the gentleman who brought the charge before the House:

"Not only was there no evidence to warrant such a charge, but the testimony given clearly showed that the office referred to was not one within the recommendation of the said Edward Cochrane, or within the gift of the Government, but was under the appointment of the superintendent of the canal, without reference in any way to the Government, and the evidence further disclosed that the said Henry May had not had any communication with the said Edward Cochrane in regard to said position, and that the said Edward Cochrane had not intervened in anyway whatever with regard to the appointment of the said Henry May, and that such charge was not only groundless, but that the same had been made without information from the parties, who could have shown that no reason existed for making the charge."

With regard to any agreement between the hon. member and Henry May, I am perfectly willing to admit that the charge was not proved, and I apologize most cheerfully. There is no man in this House who, if the evidence brought forward does not sustain the information placed in his hands by those interested in purifying the House of Commons, would make more cheerfully any apology or reparation in his power than I would. I admit that it is the duty of every member to express his regrets when he has brought forward an unfounded statement, but it is also his duty to bring forward a charge, whatever may be the intimacy or friendship that may exist between him and the hon. member charged, if he believes in his heart that the evidence placed in his hands warrants him in making it. The Committee state in the majority report that there was no evidence to warrant such a charge. What right have they to make such an assertion? What warrant have they, without a particle of evidence, to go behind the records and state that the men who made the charge had no warrant for making it? How do they know what warrant he had? There is not a man on that Committee who can say that there was no evidence and that I had no warrant in making the charge. They would be only justified in saying that the evidence did not support the charge, but the statement that I had no warrant in making it is a false and impertinent allusion on the part of the majority of the Committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FLINT. And I take the responsibility of that statement from my place in the House. They furthermore go on to say that the same had been made without information from the parties who could have shown that no reason existed for making the charge. What warrant has the Committee in making that assertion? The evidence before the Committee bore out the statement, greatly to the surprise of the Committee, that the foremen or overseers on the works must be appointed by the superintendent, whereas the bridge-tenders are appointed by the authority of the Government. Into this grave constitutional question I do not pretend to have investigated. When the papers were laid in my hands, the evidence before the Committee showed that even those persons living in the neighbourhood are not aware of this distinction between the high and dignified position of overseer or foreman of works and that of a bridge-tender. Consequently, the assertion on the part of the Committee that I had no warrant for making this charge entirely falls to the ground. It was a little too strong in stating that there was no evidence to show any foundation for bringing the charge in connection with Henry May, although I cheerfully admit the charge is not sustained. It is proved by May himself, and by James Stanley, that Mr. Webb received money for his brother in connection with the appointment as a bridge-tender and paid money on certain notes or obligations given by the Liberal-Conservative party in that constituency. There is abundant evidence that he was a go-between between the person appointed as bridge-tender and the committee who recommended the appointment and the person who held the obligation of the party. So that there was strong evidence to presume at any rate that Henry May was paying thi money for his own position, although the evidenc did not sustain that presumption. There was strong primâ facie case which any reasonable man would be prepared to admit, unless explained, would have connected him with that charge. But it turned out, afterwards, that he paid the money for his unfortunate younger and poorer brother. There are two or three remarkable points in connection with this unfortunate affair. In the first place, let us look at the dramatis personæ of this comedy, or tragedy, or serio-comedy, as you may please to call it. We find on the one hand a supporter of the Government in this House, the chosen representative of the constituency of East Northumberland, and we find on the other hand half a dozen poor peasants, honest, faithful fellows, looking for humble positions on a public work, and between these two extremes, the power and patronage of the one and the poverty and the necessities of the other, we find a committee formed, a sort of buffer between Parliament and the courts, to screen the men and to screw the last farthing out of these poor men and their wives and families, as the price of securing some position on the public works. The statement is made that these contributions were voluntary. The hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White) dwelt on that with great unction. James Stanley, the manager of the conspiracy—because, if the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite is correct, it was a conspiracy on the part of these men to befool the representative of the constituency and to twist this money out of these unfortunate people—swears that these were voluntary gifts. So might the highwayman, when he stands in the shadow of the forest with his bludgeon or pistol pointed at your head, swear that when you hand him over your purse you made a voluntary contribution. It is a voluntary contribution in the same manner as is that which the shipmaster makes when he throws over valuable cargo to save life and property. These men, anxious to secure positions on a public work—two or three of them sailors and labouring men upon farms—we find giving for political purposes the huge sum, to them, ranging from $125 to $200. An effort has been made all through this evidence to show that they were in the habit of making contributions to assist the Liberal-Conservative party. But they were all humble, faithful followers of the party in power, and all the evidence reveals with regard to their former subscriptions is that one man gave $2, another $3, and another $5, previous to these large payments. And we are asked to believe that all of a sudden, voluntarily, without any ulterior motive, but solely to assist the great Conservative party, these humble peasants contributed large sums of $125, $150 and $200 for positions as light-keepers or bridge-tenders in that county. Is it not an insult to our intelligence for hon. gentlemen gravely to argue that the evidence will bear out any such interpretation of facts? Let us see the position of the hon. member himself. He was under personal obligation to pay a certain portion of this money; he is besides under strong political obligations to his friends to get these notes paid up, and we find from the evidence of Webb, the evidence of the manager of a bank, the evidence of the solicitor of a bank, that the hon. member himself had been pressed to see that these amounts were paid. He was liable himself upon one note for $619, and liable morally to these people, and he had generally to see that these obligations were retired. He promised on two occasions that it would be attended to and would be paid soon, and it was paid soon, as soon as these bridges and lighthouses were supplied with attendants. Now, the whole case for the majority of the Committee seems to depend, in their opinion, very much upon breaking down the testimony of one Arundel Simpson. That ground has been thoroughly gone over by gentlemen who have preceded me, and it seems that this man, who, as he stated himself, is uneducated, stood the ordeal of the examination and cross-examination very well, and, although he was contradicted on one or two minor points, and may, as it is stated, have contradicted himself on some minor points, his evidence in the main is thoroughly in line with the points which are admitted in the case from beginning to end. But we will throw out his evidence altogether, and the case is still as strong if not one word of Arundel Simpson's testimony is taken into account. The first person whose evidence I shall refer to is William Bullock, a storekeeper- and I was sorry to hear the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Masson), and who laboured hard against wind and tide to make a case for his friend, who tried to find here a flaw and there a current to help him up the stream—I was sorry to find that he was under such a stress of weather that he had to charge the leading member of the committee in Brighton, one of the great friends of the hon. member for East Northumberland, with having been under the influence of liquor during his examination. It is the first time that I have heard this insinuation. I was present in the Committee, and, although that witness was suffering from a certain degree of nervousness, he gave his evidence with a degree of candour and honesty which did him credit. The only point they make is that Arundel Simpson, who is a Conservative and has been a friend of hon. gentlemen opposite, is a perjurer, and that another leading Conservative in the riding is a drunkard, and that their testimony should be thrown out. I regret that they find it necessary to slander these honest men and try to destroy their character in this way. Take the evidence of Bullock, and see if it bears out the interpretation placed upon it by the hon. gentlemen. I will only read a few passages. The hon. gentlemen tell us that there is no connection between the hon. member for Northumberland, against whom these charges are made, and the committee either before or after they carried out these arrangements, and that it was done without his knowledge or connivance. Mr. Bullock is a leading merchant in the village, the committee meetings took place in his store, and he is the most influential member of the party there, next to James Stanley. Here is what he says as to the members of the committee. They consist of Stanley, Henry May, Adam, Lawson and Bullock. Mr. Bullock, one of the committee, was asked:

Q. What were the duties of that committee?—A. The duties of the committee were to see if we could not appoint somebody on the canal for the bridges there.

I may remark that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barron) seemed pleased at the thought that this committee was not necessarily connected with the great Conservative party of the county. I would hope, for the sake of that influential party, that it could be shown that there was no connection between it and this committee, and I think no connection has been made out, although the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) stated that it was true that this committee was appointed by the Conservative party there for this purpose. That statement is contradicted by the leading lawyer in this matter, Mr. Payne, and is not admitted by the leader of the gang of conspirators, but it cannot be doubted that the convention as a whole were in accord with the committee. It seems to have been a committee self-constituted in the neighbourhood of the residence of the member-elect, and for this purpose alone, because there is no evidence to show that it acted in any other way. The contention on the other side is that the actions of the committee were honest and honourable, but the majority of the committee have expressed a mild disapprobation of that committee dabbling in appointments to public offices. If that association was honourable and honest, I would call your attention to the very peculiar association between the committee and the hon. gentleman who is charged in connection with this matter. We find that David Bullock says:

Q. The duties of the committee were to see if we could not appoint somebody on the canal for the bridges there.
Q. How much were each of them to give?—A. We exacted $150 from everyone of them. That is what we wanted.
Q. What were these people to get for the $150 they were to pay?—A. I cannot swear to that.
Q. What was the $150 to be given for?—A. It was to be given for our influence.
Q. Were you to put this $150 in your pocket?—A. No.
Q. Who was to give $150?—A. Everybody who got the appointment.
Q. And those who did not get the appointment were not to pay it?—A. Certainly not.
Q. Was any paid, do you know, by persons who did not get the appointment? Mr. Vanalstine paid some money, did he not?—A. He did not pay it to me.

There is evidence afterwards from Vanalstine and Wade that Vanalstine deposited money, and it was paid back to him when he did not get what he wanted. The hon. member who preceded me laid great stress upon the fact that there was no evidence that the member for East Northumberland took part in that committee. I am willing to admit that there is no evidence that he was a member of the committee. Now, the only occasion upon which there is evidence that he met the committee is mentioned by the gentleman in whose store the committee met; he details all the circumstances with great vividness, and to this I will call the attention of the House. The hon. member who preceded me undertook to ridicule the idea that so much should be made of the member being in the village late in the evening and meeting with this committee. Let me point out the peculiar features of this case, upon the basis of a guilty knowledge, of a guilty arrangement. The hon. gentleman lives five miles from the village. It was after dark. The lights were lit; the store was closed for ordinary purposes; the committee was meeting in that store. The evidence is given on pages 88 and 89. The committee was meeting in this store, and the shop-keepersays that James Stanley, to the best of his recollection, was not there; consequently, when Stanley afterwards gives his testimony that he did not see Mr. Cochrane at the meeting of the committee, it is quite in line with the evidence given by Bullock, because Bullock swears that, so far as he can recollect, James Stanley was not in the store that evening. Four or five members of this committee were in the store, and the hon. gentleman for East Northumberland, who lives five miles distant, came into the store that evening. The evidence is very peculiar here. Can any hon. gentleman in this House imagine that he, as the representative for his riding, would drop into a store in the evening where four or five members of his advisory committee were present, while they were discussing an important matter to him and to his constituents, and that he would not utter a syllable? That not a word was said by Mr. Cochrane to those gentlemen that evening? Look at the extraordinary case. What would be the natural and honest thing to be done on an occasion of that kind? We know the greetings, and the pleasant words, and ordinary chit-chat that goes on between a representative and a meeting of his friends, or of any small or large body of electors. And yet the hon. member for East Northumberland dropped accidentally into the store—which certainly might have happened, but if it did happen, what more natural than that he would greet these gentlemen and talk with them upon this important subject? He dropped into the store accidentally, said not a word to anybody, and retired after a short time. I say the evidence upon that point is more conclusive, almost, than all the other evidence given in this book, to any impartial mind, that there was a guilty arrangement, and a guilty knowledge, and a silence more eloquent in meaning than large quantities of the evidence which has been placed upon this record. Let me quote from page 89:

Q. What were you doing that night?—A. Attending to my business.
Q. I mean the committee. What business did the committee do that night?—A. They talked over different questions about the bridges.
Q. How long did Mr. Cochrane remain?—A. As far as my knowledge goes, he did not remain very long.
Q. How long?—A. I cannot swear how long.
Q. Half an hour or more?—A. Well, I cannot say. I do not think he did.
Q. It was not more than half an hour?—A. Not so far as my knowledge goes, I do not think it was.
Q. Was it about half an hour?—A. I cannot say.
Q. I suppose the discussion was going on while he was there?—A. The discussion was going on. Yes.
Q. The talk about the bridges was going on while he was there?—A. Yes.
Q. You were talking about the men who would get the appointments and the amounts that they were to pay?—A. Certainly.
Q. What part did Mr. Cochrane take in the discussion?—A. No part whatever.
Q. He was a quiet listener?—A. I could not swear to that.
Q. He was listening, if he did not take part in the conversation?—A. I could not swear to that.

Let any person picture such a scene and imagine it consistent with ignorance of the situation and an absence of a guilty knowledge of what these men were talking about, and the purpose of their meeting. Run through the whole of this evidence from one end to the other, and remember the difficulties that the Committee had in ascertaining who communicated the decisions of the committee to the member for East Northumberland, and you have some idea of the position of the committee at the time. Let any impartial person run over this portion of the evidence, and he will see that the committee took the utmost pains to conceal the facts, and the names of those whom the sitting member should recommend to the Government for these petty offices. On the last page we find the list of appointees, an official list drawn from the records of the public department. We find the names of Wm. Brown, recommended by E. Cochrane, M.P.; R. May, the same; J. Clouston, ditto; W. Goodrich, ditto; J. Fitzgerald and W. Johnson, ditto. All of these, except Johnson, who left the country for good or other reasons, are proved to have paid this committee, or the chairman, or the leading members of this committee, a sum of money to be applied upon a debt for which the sitting member was either personally or morally responsible, because he was appealed to by persons holding these obligations to see that they were paid. Now, I will just call your attention to some evidence given by J. D. Clouston, a man past middle life, a man who stated that he had been a long and devoted supporter of the Conservative party. On page 67 he says:

Q. Do you occupy any official position on the Murray Canal?—A. I am a bridge-tender.
Q. When were you appointed?—A. I can scarcely tell you with regard to the appointment.
Q. You are under the superintendent?—A. I consider myself so, but I do not know.
Q. How much money did you pay when you got this appointment?—A. I think some $70 or $75; I would not be positive.
Q. To whom did you pay that money?—A. To Mr. W. W. Webb.
Q. Did you tell Mr. Webb that you were instructed to pay any money? Mr. Webb has been examined?—A. Instructed?

Mr. Webb, in his evidence, stated that when Clouston came to him to pay money, Clouston informed him that he was instructed to pay him this money:

Q. What did you tell Mr. Webb as to the balance?—A. I told him I would pay the balance as I went along.
Q. Who told you to pay it to W. W. Webb?—A. I don't know that anybody told me to pay it particularly to W. W. Webb.
Q. How did you come to go to W. W. Webb?—A. Well, I was aware that he had a note that had to be arranged and settled up.

It turns out afterwards that it was Stanley who told him to go to Webb, and many questions are put to elucidate that fact:

Q. Do you wish the Committee to understand that nobody sent you to Mr. Webb to pay this money?—A. Nobody in particular. I was under no compulsion in any shape.
Q. How did you know that you were to pay this money to Mr. Webb?—A. I knew because I was aware of the indebtedness, and that we were all to contribute in order to liquidate the indebtedness.
Q. If you were directed or informed, tell me who informed you or directed you?—A. I was informed by the general conversation that took place between one another. If I were to name the parties I would say that every bridge-tender had talked about the matter without exceptions.
Q. And you had only conversation with them?—A. With different ones. I might have had a conversation with Mr. Stanley.
Q. What did he tell you?—A. He told me that the others were doing this.

Q, Doing what ?– A. Paying towards the liquidation of these notes.
Q. After you were appointed or before ?—A. Oh, after I was promised that appointment.
Q. After you had received the promise, but before you were appointed or directed to take charge ?—A. Yes.
Q. From whom did you receive the promise ?—A. From Mr. Edward Cochrane.
Q. The promise of the position which you ultimately got ? —A. Yes
Q. But if you received the promise from Mr. Cochrane, it was Mr. Stanley who directed you to go to Mr. Webb? —A. I say it was by conversation.
Q. Yes, but you mentioned Mr. Stanley ?—A. Well, I had a conversation with Mr. Stanley at his place.
Q. Did you see Mr. Cochrane in regard to the appointment ?—A. I was talking with him.
Q. You say you had a conversation with him ?—A. Yes, sir..
Q. You had a conversation with Mr. Cochrane, the member for East Northumberland?—A. Yes: I say I had conversations with Mr. Cochrane.
Q. And what was said at that conversation or at any one of the conversations you had with Mr. Cochrane ?—A. I don't know.

Mr. Cochrane had apparently given some promise of this position long anterior to the subsequent negotiations for the securing of a bridge. Mr. Cochrane said on a later day: "There is a bridge for you on the Murray Canal."—

1955. That was years after the first conversation, you say?—Years after the first conversation.
1956. Can you locate the time?—I could not. I have been trying to think it over and I cannot.
1974. Was there any conversation about raising party funds at all ?—No, sir.
1975. Not at that time ?—Not a word.
1976. Had you any conversation with Mr. Cochrane since that time about raising party funds ?—I may have had.
1977. How were they to be raised according to your conversation ?—I thought I explained that.
1978. I say, according to your conversation with Mr. Cochrane, how were they to be arranged ?—I do not remember that we had any conversation particularly, but I say we may have. I do not recollect that we had any particularly.
1979. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Cochrane about raising party funds ?—We may have spoken of it. No doubt, we have.
1980. Now, you have no doubt you have had conversations with Mr. Cochrane about raising party funds ?—Altogether likely.
1981. If you had conversation in regard to it, how, according to the conversations, were the funds to be raised? —I think he may have said that others were talking it over in regard to this old indebtedness—that others were taking a part of it. He may have said that.
1982. What old indebtedness?—This old protest cost, run up there between Mr. James Ferris and William Wade.
1983. And what others?—Other bridge-tenders.
1984. Mr. Cochrane told you——
Mr. Osler objected.
1985. When he said to you that others were taking part in this old indebtedness, what others did he refer to ?—I said that Cochrane may have said that others were taking part, and I think I said the others were bridge-tenders.
1986. How much did he tell you the others were giving ?—He may have said that they were giving $150.
1987. Each ?—Yes.
1988. Then did he say anything to you about giving $150 —because the others were going to give it, you know ?—I do not recollect how that was.
1989. Just try and brush up your memory?—You see the way this whole thing came around, as I said before—I had been taking an interest in the movement of getting rid of this old indebtedness. I had even gone out in endeavours to collect.
1990. I know you were anxious. Did he say anything to you about paying the same sum as the other bridge-tenders were paying?—He may have.
1991. Don't you think that he did say so?—I do not know that I had better think much about it.

The whole line of this evidence goes to show that Clouston and Mr. Cochrane had talked about these matters, about the amounts being paid, and that the common rumours which most of these witnesses seem to have known were matters well understood and known by the sitting member.—

2010. Are you a member of this committee of the Conservative Association there?—Which committee do you refer to?
2011. This standing committee which they have for the purpose of making recommendations for political purposes generally: do you know anything about a political committee in that riding at all?—I believe there is a committee.
2012. Do you know it as a matter of fact?—I never dealt with them as a committee: I had no conversation with the committee.

Then, being pressed, and being anxious to satisfy the line of reasoning pursued by the sitting member and his friends, that these were voluntary contributions, he stated that he had contributed before. It was learned from him that this strong and devoted friend of the Conservative party had contributed two or three dollars during the past 7 years and that without any other improvement in his worldly condition beyond that of obtaining the position of a bridge-tender, he suddenly increased his subscription to $150. I need not read the evidence at length, because much of it has been read by the hon. gentleman who preceded me. But there are one or two portions so intimately connected with the payment that I would not do justice to the prosecution if I did not read them. We find the following evidence:—

2071. Did Mr. Cochrane tell you?—Perhaps he did. Very likely.
2072. You know whether he did or not?—We have all sorts of conversations on one thing or another. I don't know that we had on this particular affair.
2073. I want to know if Mr. Cochrane told you the amount of the balance due on the note?—He might have done so.
2074. That is not an answer. He might have gone to Jericho, but he didn't. What did he tell you?—Supposing I say I don't know.
2075. Well, do so?—Then, I don't know.
2076. I am sorry I suggested that to you. Will you swear that Mr. Cochrane did not tell you?—I won't swear that he did not, nor will I swear that he did.
2077. Will you tell me anybody who told you the amount due on the note?—I had conversations with others.
2078. I know you had conversations with others. Who were the others?—Stanley was one.
2079. Did James Stanley tell you before he went away?—I think, very likely, he did.
2080. I don't want you to think. I want you to be certain. Had you any conversation with Stanley about it at all?—I think I had.
2081. Will you swear you had?—I won't swear either way.
2082. Had you any conversation with Stanley about the amount due upon the note?—It is quite likely.
2088. You simply told Mr. Webb that you would pay the balance?—I told to Mr. Webb "I am going to pay it up as I can."
2089. Pay the $150?—Yes.
2090. I think you said that Mr. Cochrane told you that the other bridge-tenders were helping to pay the indebtedness?—Yes; I think he said so.
2091. Did he or did he not?—I think probably he did.

Hon. gentlemen must remember the position of this witness, a poor man, who, so far as I can judge, is an honest man, holding a position which is his all, and if he does not act, so far as his conscience will permit him, in favour of the men who placed him there, he need not expect to remain in office one hour; and we see how he was placed between his interests and his memory, and between what we can all read as the true facts of the case underlying this hesitating way in which he gave his testimony.—

2092. And at the conversation he told you that you were going to be appointed a bridge-tender?—Yes.

2093. That took place when he told you that there was a bridge for you?—No; I think it was probably afterwards.
2094. Was it in the fall when you were driving back to Colborne that he told you that there was a bridge. Was that the time he told you that he had a bridge?—What time?
2095. The time you were driving from Colborne?—Yes.
2096. Can you charge your memory to tell what took place on the subsequent conversation with you?—Oh, we talked about a good many things.
2097. You talked about bridges particularly?—No; not particularly at all.
2098. Did you not talk about bridges?—I think I got a statement with regard to further bridges.
2099. I think I understood you to say that Mr. Cochrane was the only man you had a conversation with until you went to pay the money?—Well, "until" I think I said that.
2100. This is what you told me, that Mr. Cochrane was the only man you had a conversation with about the bridge until you went to pay the money?—He was not there when I went.
2101. He was the only man you saw until you went?—Yes: that I can remember.
2102. You say that you were informed or directed to pay the money to Mr. Webb. Mr. Webb says that you were instructed. You say you were informed or directed to pay the money to Mr. Webb?—It was a voluntary affair.
2103. But you said you were informed or directed?—I suppose that is correct.
2104. You suppose that is correct?—Yes.
2105. Then Mr. Webb is inaccurate in saying that you were instructed?
Counsel objected.
2106. Then you were directed, or informed, to pay the money to Mr. Webb?—I could not exactly say I was told, because it was more of a voluntary movement of my own.
2107. How did you come to pay it unless somebody told you to do it?—I don't know that anybody told me to do it.
2108. How did you arrive at the identical sum the other bridge-tenders were paid?—I could not tell you. We had conversation one with another, between ourselves.
2109. You learned that was the tariff?—In a kind of a way.
2110. Who did you learn that from?—From a conversation between ourselves: I could not tell you any one in particular.
2111. Then you must have had conversations with other than Mr. Cochrane before you paid?—I dare say I did.

That evidence is conclusive as showing that Mr. Cochrane was perfectly familiar with the whole modus operandi from the beginning to the end of these extraordinary transactions.--

2148. Do you know a man named William Brown, who is a bridge-keeper?—Yes.
2149. You know him pretty well, don't you?—Yes.
2150. How long have you known him?—I have known him since the 10th of May last, when I first began work.
2151. You know how much he was paid?—I don't know anything about what any other person done, more than what I done myself.
2152. Did you ever hear that Brown was going to make a payment on a note for the party indebtedness?—I think probably I did.
2153. Did you hear what amount he was going to pay?—I do not know as to that.
2154. Do you know how much he did pay?—I do not know that he paid any.
2155. Did you ever hear that he agreed to pay $150?—I think some of my neighbours told me he was doing that, or had done it.

I quote this, not as evidence that Brown paid the amount, because we have other evidence in regard to Brown, but to show that it was a well-known thing in the community, and there are at least four places in the testimony where it is mentioned that this matter was talked about and well understood, and the majority report states that it was well known in the riding before the election, and referred to and discussed at the nomination and on the hustings. It was well known in the community and by all men who wanted the positions; by Brown who did not get a position, Vanalstine, who gave money and had it returned; they knew the tariff that was fixed and to whom to apply in order to get the position. There is the evidence of Wm. Brown, some portions of which I will read, to show not only that it was well known in the community what the functions of the committee were but that the relation of the sitting member to these payments was also well known. With the exception of the fact that the hon. gentleman was relieved of the pressure of outside influences to get rid of the debt, I admit there is no evidence that any of the money went for his personal use. Although that may to a small degree screen him from the contempt and indignation which must be felt if such proof were forthcoming, which I cheerfully admit is not forthcoming, it does not condone the immorality and contemptible character of the transaction as connected with these poor men and the political committee which undertook to squeeze from them large subscriptions towards relieving the whole party of that section from a troublesome debt. William Brown is the bridge-keeper, and he got his position from the committee. He deposes:

2563. How did you come to get that position?—Through the committee.
2564. What committee?—The committee which was appointed to recommend somebody for the position.
2565. You knew a committee had been appointed for that purpose?—I was told by several of the committee they had been appointed, and I was told by Mr. Cochrane also that a committee had been appointed.

I think it need not be enlarged upon at all as to the knowledge that Mr. Cochrane had of this committee and of its function. The only debateable point is as to whether the committee had authority from him, or that he had knowledge that they were exacting these sums of money from these applicants for office. There are at least two cases throughout the evidence in which he sent applicants directly to the committee. The evidence is clear, unequivocal and repeated on that point, and consequently the only point at all in issue between the majority and the minority of the Committee is as to his knowledge of these exactions, or as to the share that he had in exacting them. The witness goes on to state:

2566. You were told by Mr. Cochrane there had been a committee appointed for the purpose of recommending parties for the position of bridge-keeper?—Yes.
2567. Mr. Cochrane told you that?—He did.
2568. Who is Mr. Cochrane?—He is member for East Northumberland.
2569. And it was Mr. Cochrane, member for East Northumberland, who told you that a committee had been appointed for the purpose of recommending different people?—He was the only one that told me I would have to go to the committee.
2570. Then you went to Mr. Cochrane first of all?—First of all.
2571. What did you go to him for?—For a position on the canal.
2572. What did you say to him?—I asked him what my chances were for such a position. He told me he had left the matter in the hands of the committee and that I would have to apply to the committee.

There is scarcely any tangible evidence as to the communication between the committee and the sitting member, so timid were the members of the committee in giving evidence. We find from the evidence that the committee among themselves had agreed upon a certain amount, and then there is a gap in the evidence. We find afterwards, however, that the sitting member had recommended these workmen to the Government, but so frightened were those men to give evidence that a wild horse could scarcely drag from them the slightest information as to how the sitting member received these communications which he placed before the Government. Had this been an honest and straightforward transaction such as ought to exist, and I hope does exist, between the members of this House and their leading supporters, do you not suppose they would be anxious to give the whole tenor of the communications between themselves and the member in regard to making these applications for office? Here there has been a gap that we have been unable to a very great extent to fill by straightforward evidence, but the very fact that the Special Committee have not been able to extract this evidence is almost conclusive proof that there was that guilty arrangement between the parties which lead them to conceal or evade giving the particulars of it. The witness continues:

2590. Had you seen any of the committee before you went to Mr. Cochrane?—No, sir.
2591. You went to see Mr. Cochrane first?—Yes.
2592. Had you heard anything about money being required for these bridge-keepers before you went to Mr. Cochrane?—No, sir.
2593. You are quite sure of that?—Yes.
2594. And when was it you first heard of money being paid in connection with these offices or situations?—The first I heard of it was from Mr. James Stanley.

Mr. James Stanley was the bosom friend, the fidus Achates, of the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane); the chairman and manager of the committee, a prominent member of the convention and holding intimate relations to the parties who held these obligations, a petitioner against members of the Liberal party who had been attacked in their seats, and in fact a clever leading man in connection with the political affairs of the neighbourhood. The witness goes on to say:

2600. You say that Mr. Cochrane told you you would have to apply to the committee?—Yes.
2601. And in pursuance of that instruction from Mr. Cochrane, did you apply to the committee?—I did.
2602. To whom did you apply?—To Mr. Stanley.
2603. How did you know that he was one of the committee?—I enquired around and I found out who the committee men were.
2618. Had you any conversation with Mr. Cochrane except at that one time when you asked him for the position?—In regard to the position?
2619. Yes?—No: I have not seen him since about it.
2620. Then you paid how much to Mr. Webb?—$150.
2621. In cash?—In cash.
2622. That is Mr. W. W. Webb?—Yes.
2623. You got the money from W. H. Powers?—No, sir.
2624. Did you pay this money before you got the appointment?—Let me think. I cannot say whether I paid it before or after.
2625. But it was arranged before you got the appointment that you were to pay the money?—Yes.
2626. With whom was that arrangement made?—Mr. Stanley.
2627. Do you know that Mr. Stanley was one of this committee?—I do.
2628. The committee to which Mr. Cochrane sent you?—Yes.
2629. Was it Mr. Stanley who told you to pay the money to Mr. Webb?—It was.

And so it goes on through this whole wretched story which it is positively sickening to read and to load upon the record of Hansard; this paltry haggling between the committee and the poor labouring men. So it goes on, page after page of this testimony and I will now lay it down and read it no further. I will call the attention of the House to the salient features of the case as it has been proved on the records before this Committee. The hon. member who preceded me undertook the very labourious task of showing that this was a criminal charge, and that every item and detail of it must be made on positive testimony. Upon this point I take distinct issue with the hon. gentleman. In the first place, this is not a criminal court and we are not trying a criminal charge, although there may be features in it of a quasi-criminal character. We are trying a charge of breach of parliamentary privilege, of a breach of the position of the gentleman from East Northumberland as a member of Parliament and his position as a powerful and influential supporter of the Government in regard to these appointments to office. I need not enlarge upon the iniquitous character of the charge itself. No matter who benefited by the exactions from these poor men, once it is admitted that such things can be done with impunity in this country, then we have reached a pass at which honest men must blush and at which patriotic men must tremble for the future of this country. It is bad enough for men in high places to make use of their position to extract here and there percentages from large transactions, but when curruption reaches down into the home of the poor man, upon whom the whole structure of our national and political existence is based, then, indeed, is the country in a dangerous position. This canker will eat into the body politic and will ruin it more surely and more certainly than even the corruption which may be proved, or suspected to exist in much higher places. I trust for the honour of Parliament and for the honour of the people of this country, that although we have lifted but a corner of the veil, that it is not an indication or a sample of what is going on in many other portions of the Dominion of Canada. We have proved conclusively that there can be no doubt as to the payment of money; that the member had a knowledge of the payment of this money can scarcely be doubted by any impartial student of the record before us; that the understanding between the committee and the applicants for these positions was that if they failed in securing the position the money was to be returned as proved in the case of Mason and Vanalstine. All the features of the case convince me that a grave mistake has been made by the majority of this Committee in not pronouncing more strongly than they have done in regard to the salient features of the case as proved before them. They state:

Which seems to have been resorted to. With this evidence before them, having heard these witnesses one after another repeat this sickening story with all its variations of absurdity and weakness, and even of crime, the Committee are contented with calling it a practice that seems to have been resorted to. I agree with the hon. gentleman who preceded me, who defended as well as he could his colleague and friend, that the Committee did not use sufficiently strong language in characterizing these transactions, but tried to ignore or minimize them, trying in the language of the press, to whitewash the hon. member and his partisans in East Northumberland. I cannot but feel that they are doing a grave wrong to the credit and reputation of this Parliament, and to the people of this country who are looking eagerly for the verdict of the House of Commons upon these transactions. Although there have been great difficulties in the way of dragging to the light all their foul details, yet I trust that, in view of the interest which has been excited throughout the country, and the high moral feelings which must be appealed to when people contemplate the possibilities of the vast majority of the offices throughout this country being made the subjects of barter and sale by politicians for the sake of holding themselves in power or securing political influence, the terrors which this investigation must have evoked will suffice to prevent such bargaining and selling in future, and that the fair fame of this country will not again be smirched by an intimation that such things are possible throughout the Dominion of Canada. The sordid character of this system appeals rather to our feelings of disgust and contempt than to any stronger feelings. Imagine the poor unfortunate men, who are not the guilty ones, but only the victims of the system, which I hope had only begun in the constituency of East Northumberland; and I trust that the honest, noble-hearted Conservatives, of whom there must be many in that section of the country, will before twelve months have rolled around repay those poor men every dollar of the money which has been exacted from them by those political harpies in order to bolster up their influence and sustain themselves in power. I have not had it in my heart to use any harsh language towards the hon. member for East Northumberland, for whom I may say I have had no reason, as far as my personal acquaintance goes, to regard otherwise than with respect; but I cannot rid myself of the conclusion, honestly formed, that he had connection with and intimate knowledge of these transactions which constitute a breach of his high and responsible position as a member of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. SKINNER. I very much regret to have to rise to address the House on this question at so early an hour. I am not to blame for that, as the debate I take it will have to be finished by common consent to-night, and that must be my apology for speaking on the question at all. I would not address the House did I not consider it my duty, owing to my connection with the Committee, to explain in a few words the view of the Committee on the whole question. It must be borne in mind that the charge against the hon. member for East Northumberland was divided into a series of charges that may be grouped together for the purposes of description in this way. He is charged with having sold offices for his own pecuniary benefit, that is to say, with having received money for those offices, either for his own personal use or for his political use. He is charged with having done this himself; that should be borne in mind by any person who wants to come to a fair and impartial conclusion. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken upon this question to-day, really argue that the charge which has been proved against the hon. member is that he had a knowledge that this was done, and that having that knowledge, he was connected with it. They do not pretend, so far as I understand their argument, that it has been proved that he did it himself, but they say that he had a knowledge of what was going on. In reply, I say, suppose he had this knowledge; that should not lead to his conviction under the charges which have been made. It may very well have been that he did know what others were doing; but who will say that he ought to be found guilty on that account, simply because he was the member for the county and took the recommendation of those persons who made it to him. That was not the charge made against him or sought to be proved against him; but there is an endeavour to convict him of a charge that was never made against him. Now, what is the evidence which hon. gentlemen opposite have against the hon. member for East Northumberland? As they set out the evidence, it comes from the mouths of three witnesses—Arundel Simpson, Goodrich and Bullock. Just briefly pass under your minds the evidence of these three witnesses, and see how it stands? The evidence of Bullock is this: He was present at a meeting in a store at Brighton, and he says that Mr. Cochrane came into the store while they were there. He does not go substantially beyond that. In reference to Bullock being under the influence of liquor, it was not Mr. Osler who first drew the attention of the Committee to that; it was the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barron), who appeared as counsel for the prosecution; and I may say here, parenthetically, that I suppose that hon. gentleman will not now think of voting on this question on that account. When he came to discuss Bullock's testimony, he used the phrase: in vino veritas, signifying, as we know, that the witness being more or less under the influence of liquor, he got the truth out of him. He introduced the matter, and when Mr. Osler, for the defence, came to address the Committee in regard to the amount of credence to be placed on the evidence of Bullock, he referred to that fact, as, of course, it was his duty to do, as lessening the value of Bullock's testimony. You see how slim, even according to hon. gentlemen opposite, is the evidence of this man Bullock. All he says is that the hon. member for Northumberland was there. Stress is laid on the fact that the member for Northumberland lived five miles away from that place, But what has that to do with it? And significance is sought to be attached to the closing of the store. But whether he came in before the shutters were up or not what difference does that make? All that is mere by-play, mere reaching out and endeavouring to get a man convicted whether he ought to be or not. All that is but a lawyer's arguing, endeavouring to have a man found guilty whether the proof is sufficient or not. Let us turn to the evidence of Goodrich and Simpson. All that Goodrich says with reference to the hon. member for Northumberland is that he took the money which he was going to send to Colborne, that he called in at Mr. Cochrane's place of business and asked him to count the money, and Mr. Cochrane counted it; that after Mr. Cochrane counted it, Goodrich then handed it to his son to take on to Colborne. Would that constitute a payment to the hon. member for Northumberland? Will any one say that he should be considered as having received the money? He was asked to count it and that was all that he did. Turning from Goodrich's testimony to the son's, let us see what the son says. He said that when he came into Mr. Cochrane's place of business he was on his way to Colborne and had his rig prepared to go. Goodrich asked him, when he went in, to take that money up to Colborne for him. What does this young man's testimony prove? It proves that the hon. member for Northumberland simply counted the money and handed it back to

Goodrich, and Goodrich gave it to the young man to take up to Colborne, and that is the whole story. I ask disinterested gentlemen if on these two testimonies there is anything to convict the hon. member for Northumberland. The hon. gentleman, who has just sat down and who seemed to make up in malignity what he lacked in argument, said there was enough in these two testimonies to convict. I do not think any disinterested person will come to that conclusion. What is the other evidence relied on to connect the hon. member for Northumberland with the case? It is the evidence of Arundel Simpson; and I admit that his testimony was the great field of conflict between the parties. If it is to be believed, of course there is a great deal of it to connect the hon. member for Northumberland, not only with the knowledge of but actual participation in the whole matter. The majority of the Committee report that they do not believe Arundel Simpson. That was within their right, supposing they looked upon the matter honestly. It does not at all arise that they are wrong because the other gentlemen on the Committee did believe him. There must be certain points in his testimony, at all events, that they do not believe. An hon. gentleman on the other side took the ground that although Arundel Simpson may have stated what was false in some particulars, we ought to sift his testimony and find out what is true, as if we ought to go into a pool of falsehoods to fish for the truth. How could we tell what was true or what was not? We knew that the hon. member for Northumberland was accused of crime, or, as an hon. gentleman opposite said, of quasi crime. He was entitled at all events to the benefit of the doubt; and no one could convict him on the testimony of a man who admittedly was telling lies. I propose to draw your attention to a piece of testimony that leads us to believe this man was not telling the truth:

Q. You didn't see him?—A. No: I do not think I did.
Q. You did not canvass him or talk with him over Hedley's appointment?—A. No.
Q. It would not be correct to say that you did—if anybody came up and said so, that would not be correct? A. No; I think not.
Q. You would contradict him?—A. Well, I don't recollect now.
Q. If I had a witness that would go into the box, and swear that you canvassed Mr. Cochrane for Hedley's appointment three or four times, you would contradict him?—A. I would.

Remember he there swears that if a person swore to a thing he afterwards himself swore to, he would contradict that very person, or, in other words, contradict himself. Referring to the petition he says:

Q. This was your signature? You have already said it was?—A. Yes.
Q. Do you remember signing a document like this in Mr. Gordon's office? (Document fyled as Exhibit No. 4)?—A. Yes.
Q. Now, this is what you stated—every word in this declaration is given over your signature?—A. Yes.
Q. Did Mr. Gordon read over every word to you when you signed it?—A. Yes.
Q. The fourth paragraph says: "I assisted the said Hedley H. Simpson in his efforts to secure the said appointment and had several interviews with Edward Cochrane, then and now member of the House of Commons of Canada for the electoral district of the East Riding of the County of Northumberland, and a supporter of the Government in connection with such appointment." Now, is that statement which is contained in the fourth paragraph true?—A. I did not say that to Mr. Gordon. I do not think that is what I signed.
Q. Is it true?—A. I did not say that to Mr. Gordon.
Q. That is your signature?—A. Yes, that is my signature.
Q. Well, is what you have stated there true?—A. I don't understand. I had several interviews with Mr. Cochrane. I don't recollect this.
Q. Is it true?—A. Part of it.
Q. You say: "I assisted the said Hedley H. Simpson in his efforts to secure the said appointment, and had several interviews with Edward Cochrane." Is that true?—A. I did say so.

There you see on a vital point of the case, he actually swears one thing in his affidavit on which hon. gentlemen opposite base their case one way and in the court, before the Committee, swears exactly the opposite. There is plenty more similar testimony from the cross-examination, but I only give that as a specimen of how you may judge and look upon his evidence. We must, therefore, conclude that the Committee were justified in not believing him and had every reason in coming to the conclusion they did. Then, that being the case, what do we find? We have good reason for setting the evidence of Arundel Simpson aside. We come to the evidence of Bullock and Goodrich, and their evidence is so slight that no one would have any chance to find against the hon. member on that. The Committee could not do anything but what they did, and everyone will know that he is not straining anything when he sustains the report of this Committee, and the country, when they understand it, will justify the Committee and the House in reference to this matter. The hon. gentleman who spoke, being a member of the Committee himself, intimated that we were too partial, and that we did not come to the consideration of the question with a fair mind, and he claimed that those who were acting with him were acting judicially and impartially. But where did he get in a few moments? Acting as a judge, he stretched his hands to some of his friends and got hold of a newspaper, and asked if we would dare to give a verdict contrary to what the newspapers said. Imagine a judge who, after the lawyers had spoken and the evidence had been taken, looked at a newspaper, and told the jury they should be governed by what it said. Hon. gentlemen think they are impartial, but they may be running in most partial ways. I think the Committee were entirely correct in coming to the conclusion they did, and in not believing the testimony of Arundel Simpson. There are a few things which have been said by the hon. gentleman that I will refer to before I close. Some attempt has been made to throw ridicule as to these subscriptions being voluntary. I do not pretend that they were voluntary in the ordinary sense, but I say that that portion of the report was based strictly upon the testimony. It must be remembered that the witnesses who were brought there were brought by the gentlemen who were conducting the prosecution, and one after the other said they gave their subscriptions voluntarily, in this sense, that they were about to get the appointments and were asked if they would assist in paying off this debt, and they made their subscriptions voluntarily. I admit that I do not think they would have given the money unless they were going to get the positions, but what they said was, while they thought they were going to get the positions, they did this willingly and as a meritorious act. Hon. gentlemen laugh at it, but these men thought they were doing a meritorious act. I do not say they were doing a meritorious act, neither did the Committee say so, but these witnesses said they thought they were doing a meritorious act. The hon. gentleman who just sat down drew a picture of want and desolation on the part of these men who got those offices. They did not say so themselves. They did not give any intimation that they were hardly used. They did not seem to have any regret about this matter. They did not make any complaint. The only man who made any complaint was the informer, and that was for some reason which we may never have explained. These men never wanted the sympathy which the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) seems to throw over them as a mantle. More than that, these men evidenced that this was a common affair up there. It was not done with any secrecy. The member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was charged with doing this corruptly, and unless he did it corruptly there is no offence made out. One of the hon. gentlemen opposite asked if we wanted him to prove the corruption. No; the act itself will prove the corruption. Just as you charge malice in law, if you prove sufficient facts the law will infer the malice, and so in this case you will infer the corruption. But you have to take the environment into account, and, when this was publicly done and no secrecy was observed, what do you find? You find that these people did not think they were doing wrong as the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) says, and as it might appear to a great and generous intellect like his, coming from the sounding sea, with the sound of the billows in his ears, and being anxious to condemn this poor inland town. They may not have reached the great moral altitude which he has reached, and, if the hon. gentleman was not thirsty for the ruin of the hon. member for East Northumberland, he would not have soared as high as he has to-night. He has not brought home to the member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) the charge of doing this corruptly. As to this word "voluntary," I think it took from it almost entirely the idea of corruption. The House should look at it from this standpoint. When the charges were made, no doubt the hon. gentlemen thought the hon. member for East Northumberland had put money into his own pocket. He did nothing of the kind. He was looking after nothing for himself, he made nothing for himself, he in no way used his position except in regard to that matter of the note, and so searching were hon. gentlemen in their enquiries that, if there was a single point on the horizon which they could see they would have used it to injure the hon. gentleman. It turned out accidentally that the son of the member for East Northumberland had driven away a cow, and I think a pig, from one of the farms, and they immediately threw out the insinuation that this cow and pig had been given to the member for Northumberland in some corrupt way. But when evidence was brought before the Committee it was shown simply that his son had purchased these animals, had given his promissory note for them, and had paid more than half the note, and the transaction was as honest as any transaction could be. That incident shows the overweening desire on the part of the hon. gentleman conducting the prosecution to fish out, anywhere and everywhere, anything that would injure the hon. gentleman that he was prosecuting. Therefore it shows clearly to the Committee that the prosecution was not animated by those noble motives that animate a true Crown prosecutor who is carrying on the Queen's business and the Queen's court. Now, as to the member for Northumberland not going upon the stand. An hon. gentleman opposite who spoke earlier in the evening alleged that the reason why he did not go upon the stand was that he did not want to offend persons in his constituency that he might swear against. I have nothing to do with that one way or the other, but I can suggest a very good reason why, under the circumstances, a man like him would not want to go on the stand. Supposing he had gone there and had sworn against these parties, what would the hon. gentleman conducting the prosecution have said? He would have turned around and have charged him with perjury therefore, in all probability the man would have come down with his character blackened by charges of that kind, in addition to what was said against him in the Committee. Surely he was at bay before his enemies. I will say to the gentlemen on the other side that whilst I think they were fair and reasonable, and conducted the case very properly from their standpoint, yet from the record what do we find? That, after the prosecuting counsel had got all the evidence that he could, they looked everywhere, they ransacked the mind of every witness, they looked into every intellectual crevice they could find, in the hope of discovering some testimony against the member for East Northumberland, and they did all they could to bring out evidence and pile it up against him in order to get this conviction. What did it bring about? The member for Northumberland stood, probably, at the very crisis of his life. A charge was made against him that he never had any idea would be made: he was in face of his enemies, verily, and they were seeking for his destruction with all the power and energy they could command. Will any gentleman on the Committee sitting opposite, will the gentleman who conducted the prosecution, also sitting opposite, say that they were not ardent in their search for testimony in order to convict him? There was, also, the prosecutor from Yarmouth, the gentleman who prides himself in living remotely from the place where this matter arises, and, therefore, being disinterested. He has endeavoured to draw a picture of himself before this House to-night. He says that because he was 800 miles away from the scene, therefore he is disinterested, impartial, fair, honest, and all that sort of thing. If he had stopped there, one might say that that was an argument, but as he developed his remarks and drew his conclusions, he disclosed that his heart towards this man was as full of wickedness, so to speak, as the hearts of any of the prosecutors could possibly be. And that gentleman was on that Committee, sitting by the window, drinking in every bit of evidence that came out, and seemingly wanting to have this case prosecuted with the utmost energy that could be brought to bear, he being a lawyer, and knowing where any weak spot in the case would be, and where he could give the most and the best information that would be required. Then, in addition to that, the hon. member for Northumberland finding himself so prosecuted—what would he say? I presume he would say this: These charges are made against me. My enemies are seeking for my destruction. Let them prove their case, I will stand here and let my case go to my peers; let them judge of it upon the evidence that may be brought out, from the witnesses that may be produced. That is one reason why I brought up these facts just now as to how this prosecution was conducted. They had no feeling of sensitiveness towards Mr. Cochrane. The hon. member for Yarmouth, if he could have got another nail to put into that man's political coffin, would have sprung forward with his hammer and nailed it there with a rapidity that would have been remarkable. They were not animated by any feeling of respect for the man. They were doing all they could to destroy him, they were getting evidence wherever they could get it. Why did they not call him themselves? It was within their power to do it. They had gone into his county and taken out his friends and acquaintances and brought them into court. Why did they not call him also, if they were going to make any remarks about it? They had as much power to call him as to call anyone else. I do not think myself that the presence of Mr. Cochrane upon the stand would have made any difference at all in this case, judging from the evidence that has been brought before the Committee. Now, a good deal of stress has been laid upon Mr. Bullock's testimony in reference to the member for Northumberland attending the Committee. Now, the member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron) when he was examining James Stanley, put this question (1028) and got this answer:

Q. You say that Mr. Cochrane was not a member of the committee?—A. No, he was never present.

Well, it may be said that there is some other evidence the other way. I want to remark that this was evidence introduced by the prosecution, and we are called upon to give our decision upon all the testimony; and if the prosecution in one portion of the case proves that the man was never present, by a reputable witness, as no doubt this man was, then I say it is evidence for us to show that he was never present and never had anything to do with the committee. But you take that in connection with the charge that the prosecuting counsel made against Mr. Bullock, in vino veritas, and the evidence of this man will stand upon that point, and I would say it proves conclusively that Mr. Cochrane never had any connection with the committee. Now, if he never had any connection with the committee the case is narrowed down, as I said before, to the evidence of Goodrich, and that is so weak as really not to be worthy of attention. Then, when the testimony of Arundel Simpson fails, the case becomes clear, and the member for Northumberland passes out of the ordeal without any reproach, or at all events, without any such reproach as would call upon this House to put the hon. member in a position to be expelled from Parliament. Surely we have a right to look at these things from the standpoint of reason, even from the standpoint of justice and sympathy. That is one of the appeals that may rightly be made in all cases. Supposing that an offence had been committed by the hon. member for Northumberland, and that, in view of the whole circumstances, such a calamity should occur as that he should be liable to be expelled from Parliament; would it not be within our province to take that view? Here we administer law upon right principles, as right-thinking men. Here we have a right to listen to justice, and to allow the element of sympathy, to a certain extent, to enter into our deliberations. Therefore if Parliament concludes that even if an offence had been committed, if there was no corruption intended, and if the penalties would be too severe, if we were to accept the document which we are now asked to adopt as the judgment of this House, we would be perfectly right in taking a merciful view of the case, if it was right to invoke mercy under these circumstances. The paper that hon. gentlemen opposite ask to be substituted instead of the report of the majority goes like a stream of fire over the hon. member at every point. Every turn of the testimony is twisted into severity, every point is taken against him; every conclusion is forced to its ultimate end, and, so to speak, the evidence is strained until the whole line breaks into tatters in order to sustain the various conclusions at which hon. gentlemen opposite had arrived. That is not right and is not merciful, even if the crime were worse and if the proof were stronger; but in a case like this, standing as the member for East Northumberland does, this matter having been discussed among his constituents at the election, it having been a matter of public notoriety—taking the whole case together the hon. member for East Northumberland comes out of it with clean skirts, and if not entirely clean, they are as clean as is necessary for his protection in this House when justice is tempered with mercy.

Mr. MULOCK. Oh.

Mr. SKINNER. Hon. gentlemen opposite may have their laugh if they will. I should like that their laugh should go out and sound through the country as it is heard here. I would not say it was like the laugh of something looking for its prey, but if that laugh could be phonographed and sent over the country, it would tell much more loudly than any evidence that could be given.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner), by way of an appeal to the merciful feelings of this House, says that if the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) has not come out of this enquiry quite clean, still he has come out of it with skirts quite clean enough for this House. It is not whether the hon. member has come out of it with skirts clean enough for this House, the question is whether he has come out of the enquiry according to the proper views that ought to be entertained in respect to the duties of members of Parliament. What are the rights, privileges and obligations of members of a deliberative assembly such as this? The hon. gentleman has given a blow to the present Parliament by his closing observation, because in it he hinted that, even if the hon. member for East Northumberland had been proved guilty of some offence, still, having regard to this particular Parliament, this House must not regard it as an offence. The hon. gentleman in making that remark has, unintentionally I am sure, lowered the dignity of this particular Parliament, and the sooner we endeavour to get back to a healthy view of our obligations the better it will be both for this and future Parliaments. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) seems to have entirely misapprehended the nature of the charges, and in saying this I, perhaps, might be allowed to offer an excuse for the finding of the Committee. The Committee's report is, no doubt, as the hon. member for St. John seems to imply, open to very serious criticism, and if I should offer an apology for it, it would be this: That one could hardly expect it to quite meet the requirements of the case, inasmuch as it was prepared before the evidence was closed, and before one word of argument had been addressed to the Committee——

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). It is not true.

Mr. MULOCK—and before the Committee had conferred. Did an hon. gentleman say it was not so? I would remind him that on Thursday morning, the last day evidence was received, we began our evidence at 10 o'clock in the morning. We continued, with a short interruption for lunch, until well on in the afternoon, and when the evidence was closed the argument followed immediately. When the argument of counsel was closed, the chairman produced from his pocket the draft report, and said it was a report which he had prepared; but we determined not to dispose of it at that moment, for it was nearly six o'clock. At half past eight we met, and he read it to us; and that was the report signed and presented to this House. I say that the report presented to this House was a report prepared when there were quite a number of witnesses to be examined, who were examined, and before one word of argument on the merits of the case had been adduced by counsel, and before the Committee had conferred. Therefore, if there is any defect, I offer this as a slight justification—

Mr. SKINNER. I would say that the hon. gentleman's remarks are not entirely true.

Mr. MULOCK. Correct me where you believe I am wrong?

Mr. SKINNER. The chairman of the Committee, who was under great stress of appointments to leave Ottawa as soon as he could, sat down and prepared his views on some of the questions, but the report was not finished, and on quite a number of questions the findings were left open. That far the chairman went, but no further. When the hon. gentleman says that the report as signed is the report he prepared, he is in error to that extent.

Mr. MULOCK. I should be glad to be corrected, but I am sure if I appealed to the chairman, and if he were present he would corroborate all I have said. The chairman told us, at half past 8 o'clock, that that was the report he presented between 5 and 6 o'clock, and the report he presented at that time he told us was one he had prepared some days before, for there had been no meeting of the Committee for some days: that was the only meeting that week, and he took advantage of the interval to prepare that report. Not one word was added to that report, according to my belief. The report now before the House is the report prepared before Thursday, on which day we examined about half a dozen witnesses, and heard arguments, and had our conference. I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me. However that may be, I would just say that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) has, in my judgment, first, entirely misapprehended the charges, and, in the second place, the proper view to take of such charges. He says the charge is that the hon. member for East Northumberland, for his own pecuniary or political gain, took the action complained of. It is not necessary in order to have corruption under such circumstances that the sitting member should be a gaining party. The first question is the public service, and the theory in reference to appointments is that men are recommended to public offices by reason of their fitness for office, and that no other consideration should be allowed to enter the minds of those who have the patronage. If any bargaining or selling takes place, even if the patron, he with whom the appointment rests, does not profit, if he allows others to profit, if he allows his appointment to be influenced by considerations of gain, that is equally an offence in law as if the sitting member himself was an agreeing party. A man seeking office offers a consideration to some parties of influence, and that influence so purchased procures that appointment to office. If the person who has the power of appointment is aware that he who asks him for the office, the middleman, has purchased it for a reward, there is a corrupt bargain. If you take any other view of it, where do you land? The public service is entitled to an honest recommendation on the merits. If instead of that a member of Parliament can say: I appoint an irresponsible committee, or I am willing to be governed by the recommendation of an irresponsible committee, abdicating my functions, and my responsibilities, where does the safeguard of the public come in? The committee is not responsible; the committee's influence is to be bought, and in this case Mr. Cochrane says all through that he has nothing to do with the appointments, as they rest with the committee. The committee can be purchased; it has the appointment de facto; the member is denuding himself of his real obligation to select the best men for the service regardless of other considerations, and he chooses to accept the recommendation of a purchased committee. When he does a thing like that he has got to take the recommendations of that committee with all the responsibilities that attach. He has, as it were, given a blank power of attorney to that committee; he has assigned the power of appointment to that committee, and having so assigned it he is responsible for that abuse of the power of appointment. That is what occurred here, and I again tell the member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) that he is entirely in error in his view of the law. If the man buys that office, whether the purchase money goes into the pocket of the member who recommends him or to some middleman, if the member who directly appoints the man enables that fraud to be committed upon the public service by his culpable negligence in lending himself to this scheme, then he assumes all the responsibility that attaches to it. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) says that the whole thing rests upon the evidence of two or three witnesses, but he abhors details. I do not wonder at his avoiding details in this case. He skims gently over the evidence of three witnesses, and he says that the evidence of the other twenty-seven witnesses that were examined before the Committee has no bearing on the case. The hon. gentleman says the delivery of the money to Cochrane by Goodrich was not sufficient, and that Cochrane was simply an accountant to check off the money. He forgets that Mr. Cochrane on that occasion did something very much more important than counting the money. When Mr. Goodrich took the money to Mr. Cochrane to count, Mr. Cochrane counted it, and what did he do with it? According to the uncontradicted testimony of Mr.

Goodrich, Mr. Cochrane took the money, and he told his son to take it to Mr. Payne, at Colborne.

Mr. SKINNER. You should not say uncontradicted, because it was contradicted.

Mr. MULOCK. You will remember that the Committee reported before young Cochrane gave his evidence. The Committee have reported against young Cochrane. They have accepted practically the statement of Mr. Goodrich.

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, no.

Mr. MULOCK. Who said "no?"

Mr. WALLACE. I did.

Mr. MULOCK. You do not know.

Mr. WALLACE. I heard the evidence.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, we will see what the report is. According to young Mr. Cochrane the money was never paid to the old man, but to the young man direct by Mr. Goodrich. Young Mr. Cochrane says that Mr. Goodrich took the money to him and handed it to him and asked him to take it to Colborne. Goodrich says he went into the yard, handed the money to Edward Cochrane, the member, who counted it, and without any further reply passed it on to his son and told him to take it to Mr. Payne in Colborne. That is what the evidence is, and what does the Committee find:

"When the said Goodrich was about taking the $200 which he said he was willing to contribute towards the payment of said indebtedness, to W. L. Payne, he asked the said Edward Cochrane to count the money for him, and he, the said Goodrich, to save time and trouble in travelling, sent the money to W. L. Payne by Wallace Cochrane, a son of the said Edward Cochrane, who was going on other business to Colborne, the place where said Payne lived."

Here your report has found that Goodrich handed the money to be counted to Edward Cochrane, the member.

Mr. SKINNER. That is right.

Mr. MULOCK. Then, that report is against the evidence of young Cochrane. Goodrich's evidence is, therefore, not contradicted, when he says that Cochrane, the member, told his son to take it to Payne. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) says that the bridge-keepers have not complained, and therefore he wonders who should complain. He says they have not found out that they were injured or that they have done anything wrong. Are we here to be governed by their standard of morality? We are not trying the bridge-keepers; we are ascertaining whether a member of this House did anything wrong or not. I agree with the hon. gentleman when he says there was no secrecy. It was impossible that these various schemes should have been conducted secretly, and because they were not conducted secretly they must all have been known to the sitting member, and being known to the sitting member there is the explanation of his not taking the witness stand. What had he to fear from perjury if he told the truth? A truthful man has nothing to fear from telling the truth in the witness box. He says he was afraid of being accused of perjury. Did he propose to go into the witness box and perjure himself when he was confronted by a dozen witnesses, a great many of whom he would have to contradict? He was on the horns of a dilemma, and the hon. gentleman has told us what the dilemma was. He either had to admit the truth or take the consequences, or adopt the alternative and be liable to a charge for perjury, and so he took the middle course, of keeping out of the witness box. There can be no possible excuse offered for his not having given his own testimony. A primâ facie case of the strongest kind was made against him, and at this stage, just as the member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) said, this is a criminal charge. It happens to be a criminal charge in the sense that the accused is a competent witness, and with this strong charge made against him, at this stage is was his duty if he desired it, to have offered his testimony to the Committee. He has chosen not to do so, and, not having done so, a large quantity of the evidence implicating him seriously in this case stands uncontradicted by the only man who could contradict it. His conduct in that regard is in itself an admission of guilt. Now, Sir, the circumstances connected with this case afford some key to the problem. We have it in evidence that Mr. Cochrane had been a candidate some years before for the Local Legislature, and his party had become involved in debt at that time, and this debt has continued to the time when these difficulties began.

Mr. WALLACE. Not at all. It was a protest of Dr. Willoughby that created the debt. There was no debt connected with Mr. Cochrane's candidature.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, I accept the correction. It is immaterial whether Mr. Cochrane was a candidate or not; the party, by a number of leading men, had become responsible for a considerable sum of money, and this debt took the form of a promissory note. That note was signed by a number of friends and some relatives of Mr. Cochrane. One or two of his sons I think were parties to it. At last that note was changed into several smaller notes. But there was a note for $619, dated November, 1887, payable at 20 days, on which note Mr. Cochrane was one of the parties liable. At that stage an opportunity occurred for doing a stroke of business. A vacancy occurred in the lighthouse at Presqu'Ile, and that was the first transaction dealt with. The total debt we are told was some $900 odd, and we have it that that debt was ultimately wiped out by payments made as follows:—Hedley Simpson paid $200 and got a lighthouse; John Fitzgerald paid $150 and got a bridge; William Brown paid $150 and got a bridge; Robert May paid $125 and got a bridge; John Clouston, paid $75, and I think gave a promissory note for another $75, and got a bridge; William Goodrich paid $200 and gave a life lease of a farm to another man, and got a bridge; and altogether these contributions made up some $900 odd, which went to liquidate the debt in question. There was the party with this debt hanging over it and a number of offices about to be filled. The canal was approaching completion, and here was an opportunity to utilize the situation for the good of the party, and to get rid of this debt. Those moneys were paid, and Mr. Cochrane recommended every one of those men to office after they had made their payments or promised to make them, and they got their offices, the party got the money, and the notes were paid; and we are now enquiring how comes it that this money was paid under these circumstances through the assistance of Mr. Cochrane? The programme appears to have been this. The committee was the buffer ; it made the promise ; it pretended to have the right of appointment, and as soon as it had selected a favoured person as the nominee that person was informed that he had got the good-will of the committee, and that they were going to recommend him. But still the man did not get the office. The committee had no real status, but it prevented the sitting member having to meet and deal with the parties; and this committee having made the promise, Mr. Stanley or some other person suggested to the nominee that it would be a good thing for him now to do something for the party ; and at that stage, before the nominee got his appointment, he suddenly became generous and made this voluntary gift. If he made it, the news was passed on to Mr. Cochrane, and the appointment was made. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) says that this was done without any secrecy. Of course it was done without any secrecy ; Mr. Cochrane then knew of the deal ; and it is immaterial whether he pocketed the money or not, although in one instance he practically did pocket a portion of the money. But it is wholly immaterial, so long as he knew that there was corruption, whether the corruption inured to his benefit or to the benefit of some one else. If his recommendation to the Government was procured by these improper influences the public service was damnified to that extent, and that is where the crime comes in. Now, with regard to Hedley Simpson, what is the evidence? Hedley Simpson got his appointment. He made his payment on the 25th January, 1888, and his money was paid on a note in the Standard Bank, on which Mr. Cochrane was a party. This note was a 20-day note. The bank had evidently got tired of carrying this paper, and had come to short dates ; and on the maturity of that 20-day note, namely, on the 7th of December, 1887, it had been placed in the hands of the solicitor of the bank for protest and collection. Hedley Simpson paid the $200. On the 24th of January Hedley Simpson, having received the promise of the committee that he was to get the lighthouse, takes the $200 to Colborne, and the next morning it is paid into the bank on the note of Edward Cochrane and three others. That payment went directly to the benefit of Edward Cochrane the member. There is no conflict of testimony on that point. The matter was traced beyond dispute or contradiction. The $200 that Hedley Simpson paid to get the recommendation of Edward Cochrane for the lighthouse was paid on a note that Edward Cochrane was about to be sued upon, and on which he was liable. He got the benefit of the scheme to which he was a party. That was on the 25th of January, 1888. Mr. Stanley says, in his evidence, that he told Edward Cochrane of that payment when it was made. He tells us that Edward Cochrane came to Colborne, where Stanley lives, several times a week for his mail. He lived near Colborne and it was his trading town, and Mr. Stanley's hotel was the place where Mr. Cochrane put up. It was Mr. Cochrane's practice to see Stanley, who was a particular political and personal friend of his, and therefore it is incredible that Stanley omitted for years to communicate this fact to Edward Cochrane. On the contrary he tells us that he told him about it. What did Mr. Cochrane do after he learned of this transaction? What should he have done, supposing he were innocent? He had created the scheme and made it possible to have a sub-committee, for without his consent there could not have been any such committee. He made it possible for such a committee to do such a work as this ; and after he learned of the committee's operations, after he learned of the collection from Hedley Simpson and that it had been used to retire partly a note of his own, did he repudiate the transaction? Did he say this was an improper transaction and refuse to dispense public patronage under any such circumstances? No. Had he done so, he could not have been blamed, and his duty would have been to refund the payments. But what did he do? He adopted the whole transaction. If you will look at the evidence of Mr. Smith, Deputy Minister of Marine, you will find that three months afterwards, the 26th of April, 1886, Mr. Cochrane wrote to the department requesting the appointment of Hedley Simpson to the office in question, and the department appointed him. If that is not bringing this transaction home to Mr. Cochrane, there is no possible way of bringing it home to him. I would ask whether, in view of the overwhelming case made against Mr. Cochrane, it was not his duty, if he were innocent, to have pledged his word of honour to his innocence. Were a judge charging a jury, under such circumstances, I think he would tell the jury but one thing. Mr. Cochrane preferred not to add to his offences another. He could not conscientiously commit the other crime to which my hon. friend has referred, and he preferred to leave his case with the jury in the hope that they might perhaps differ in their finding. However that may be, it is proved that Mr. Cochrane learned of the improper use being made by this committee of the power he had vested in them before he had made a single recommendation. Then, when there still was a locus penitentiæ open to him, he should have repudiated the action of the committee and refused to accept any of its recommendations thereafter. But what did he do? For two years or more that committee continued to make its recommendations, and on the 2nd of May, 1890, nearly two years and a-half after this first wrong, Mr. Cochrane wrote a letter to the department asking the department to appoint to office a whole batch of his friends, who, in the meantime, had been dealt with similarly by the committee. Can any reasonable man believe that Mr. Cochrane was not aware on the 2nd of May, 1890, of the bribery by Hedley Simpson in 1888, through which he obtained his office? Is it possible that two years and a-half after that transaction, going in and out of Colborne several times a week, being in constant communication with his intimate friends on this committee, Mr. Cochrane was not aware of the practices this committee was resorting to? What had become of this note? It is to be remembered that this note of $616 to which I have referred, on which he was liable and on account of which $200 was paid, was retired from the bank by this payment of $200 and by another note for the balance, and Edward Cochrane was discharged with regard to the balance. So that this $200 paid on this $600 note left the hon. member for East Northumberland out of the whole transaction. He knew in the month of February, because the renewal note was put in during that month, that his debt had been paid by this means.

Mr. WALLACE. He was an endorser.

Mr. MULOCK. Of course he was. They were all joint sureties on the note, and it is immaterial whether a man is a maker or an endorser, he is responsible in law. They were all sureties together. It is immaterial in a debt of that kind what position the parties occupy upon the note. However that was, the note was protested and all were liable upon it. So that when Mr. Cochrane became discharged from liability, he must have learned of his discharge. He must have learned that money paid for these offices went to take up his note, and he recommends the party who paid the money to office. I cannot conceive of a clearer case, especially when we bear in mind that the witnesses who proved this charge are all strong supporters and friends of the hon. member. Mr. Hedley Simpson was biassed in his favour. Mr. Payne, the solicitor for the bank, Mr. Stanley, his leading supporter and intimate friend—these are the men who established the charge. Had they been willing witnesses of course we might have had something further from them. But that is the way the case was left. Arundel Simpson's evidence has not been contradicted by Mr. Cochrane. There are some points upon which Mr. Cochrane alone could contradict that witness, and it was due to the Committee, it was due to the House, it was due to East Northumberland that, if Mr. Arundel Simpson was not telling the truth, the only man who could contradict him should have gone into the witness box, and that man was Edward Cochrane. I listened to Arundel Simpson and I considered his evidence appeared to be reliable. He may not have had the astuteness of some witnesses, but he was truthful to a degree, and you can understand readily how a simple man like that could be twisted about and made to contradict himself. At all events, I think Mr. Cochrane would have aided the search after truth if he had given to the Committee and the House the benefit of his testimony. We are told that there was a petition in circulation for the benefit of Hedley Simpson. No doubt it was, and it was also in evidence that Mr. Cochrane desired to anticipate that petition, and why? He did not desire that the community should aid Mr. Hedley Simpson's appointment except through him and this machine, and so he took steps to crush out the petition. Mr. Arundel Simpson says that Mr. Cochrane told him he would look after the matter and there need be no petition. Why did not Mr. Cochrane go into the witness box and contradict Arundel Simpson on that point? Mr. Arundel Simpson asked if Mr. Cochrane said anything. He swears that Mr. Cochrane told him Hedley Simpson could have the appointment for $200. Should not Mr. Cochrane have contradicted that statement if it were untrue. I congratulate my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Skinner) on the simple manner in which he considers evidence when he thinks these contributions were voluntary because the witnesses say they were. There was one who made a voluntary deposit, but, when it turned out that there were not enough offices to go round, the money came back to him. He said: No bridge no money. Mr. Vanalstine got his deposit back. Could there be anything clearer than the evidence that these moneys were given for a consideration? Mr. Cochrane repudiates any responsibility for the payments. They are not his acts, but the acts of a committee which he has appointed, and which in fact is his attorney. He cannot approbate and reprobate that committee at the same time. Having appointed the committee, he must take the responsibility for their acts. After the recommendation of Stanley, but before the appointment, he asks the man how much he can afford to give, and because the man says it is a voluntary gift, are we to assume that it really was voluntary? Men who had never given more than $1 or $2, men with wives and families, are asked to give $150 apiece for small offices which they have to secure, in some cases by getting friends to endorse notes for them and in others by mortgaging their effects, and we are asked to believe that these were voluntary gifts? And thus we notice the illegal transaction, Mr. Cochrane makes his recommendation, and the Government act upon it. Now Fitzgerald had a conversation with Mr. Cochrane, and he testified as to Mr. Cochrane's views of the status of this committee. Fitzgerald testifies thus:

1215. What was the conversation you had with Mr. Cochrane?—I only saw him once. I got a petition from a few men in the riding and showed it to him. He said it was very good—"I will give it to the committee: I have nothing more to say. Whoever the committee picks out, will get it."

Then Fitzgerald is picked out by the committee, he pays his $150, they recommend him to Mr. Cochrane, who recommends him to the Government and he gets the office. Then William Brown appears upon the scene. On the 20th January, 1890, he pays $150. When did Mr. Cochrane learn that? We are told by the member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) that these things are not kept secret. Mr. Cochrane did not make the recommendation all at once, but he waits until the 2nd of May, nearly four months. Is it to be believed that Mr. Cochrane did not know in the meantime about this transaction? He had learned clearly that Fitzgerald had made his payments. Then, we come again to Stanley's evidence, who testifies as follows:—

1519. Did you see Mr. Stanley in 1889, in regard to getting an appointment as bridge-keeper?—I did.
1520. What took place then?—Mr. Stanley sent for me.
1521. Well, what else?—I went up there to see him, and he told me they were about to let the bridges.
MR. OSLER—I object to the witness stating what Mr. Stanley said.
1522. What was said to you?—He said they were going to let the bridges and that they intended me to have one.
1523. You say they were going to let the bridges. What do you mean by that?—To appoint the bridge-tenders.
1524. Did he say anything about your getting one?—He said that I could get one by looking after my father and giving him $150.
1525. Who told you that?—James Stanley.

Now, we come to his conversation with Mr. Cochrane:

1528. Did you afterwards see Mr. Cochrane about it?—He saw me about it.
1529. Mr. Cochrane did?—Yes.
1530. You met Mr. Cochrane in Brighton?—Yes.
1531. What took place between you and Mr. Cochrane? Did he send for you?—He called me into the room.
1532. Where was this—in the hotel?—In Mr. Stanley's hotel.
1533. What did he say to you?—He said they had made different arrangements about the bridge. That they were going to make some arrangements for fifty acres of land for my father, and let some one else have the bridge.
1534. Did he say with whom the arrangement was made?—I do not think he did that night.
1535. Did he at any other time?—I do not know that he did. I could not say that he did.
1536. Just try and think, because you say he did not say that night?—I do not think Mr. Cochrane ever told me.
1538. What did he say about the $150?—I do not know just what he did say.
1539. Try and think?—He said they had made other arrangements. I said it was all right; I was not very particular.

1541. What else did he say?—He said that Mr. Stanley could not pay off $900 with four bridges at $150 apiece.
1542. Where was that said to you?—At Mr. Stanley's hotel.
1543. By Mr. Cochrane?—By Mr. Cochrane.
1544. The member for East Northumberland?—Yes."

There we find in the evidence of this man, that Mr. Cochrane told him they could not pay $900 with four bridges at $150. He tells them there is a bridge for sale, but Mr. Cochrane does not go into the witness box to deny that. What is the probable presumption to be drawn? There can be but one inference—that he cannot deny it. His silence is an admission. Then we have the evidence of John D. Clouston. He paid $150 for a bridge, and he was appointed in May, 1890. He testifies as follows:—

1993. To the best of your recollection, you say he may have said that other bridge-tenders were giving $150?—Yes.
1994. On the occasion of that drive from his house to Colborne?—I do not say that.
1995. When was it, then?—I think it was along in the fall.
1996. What fall?—The fall of the same year. I think it was a year ago last fall.

I am not aware that anybody has reflected upon the veracity of John D. Clouston. He gives it as his opinion that a year ago last fall, before he had got his recommendation, before he had made application, Mr. Cochrane had told him that the bridge-tenders were paying $150 apiece. Now, if his evidence was untrue, why was not Mr. Cochrane put into the box to say so? It is evident, from reading his testimony, that Clouston was not anxious to tell any more than he was compelled to; but Clouston tells us that before he got his appointment, before he made his payment of $150, Mr. Cochrane told him what the tariff was, that the bridge-tenders were paying $150 apiece. I ask hon. gentlemen how they can get over that statement? They have endeavoured to show that Mr. Clouston was a very strong party man, but he admits that with the exception of this $150 that he paid, prior to his appointment, he had only contributed, in all his life, but one dollar on two separate occasions, for the cause. He goes on to say:

2090. I think you said that Mr. Cochrane told you that the other bridge-tenders were helping to pay the indebtedness?—Yes; I think he said so.
2091. Did he or did he not?—I think probably he did.
2092. And at the conversation he told you that you were going to be appointed a bridge-tender?—Yes.

Could there be a clearer invitation to make his contribution? Mr. Cochrane tells him that the other bridge-tenders are paying $150 apiece, and he says: "There is a bridge for you." What was his object in telling Clouston that the others were paying $150, unless he meant that he was to do the same? And we have him doing the same. There can be but one inference drawn, I fear, from that evidence. Mr. Osler tries to draw a different conclusion, and this is the way Clouston gives his evidence of a voluntary contribution:

2172. How long before the 10th May, 1890, had you been told by Mr. Cochrane that there was a bridge for you?—I think this was in May, and it must have been as far back as July or August of the year previous.
2173. Ten months before, in the year 1889?—It was just after my daughter was buried.
2174. It would be some time in the year before?—Yes.
2175. Was there any condition or stipulation attached to the statement that there was a bridge for you? Did he say what you had to do?—Not a word.
2176. Did he put a condition to it?—Not a word.
2177. Did anyone ask you to pay this $150, or was it voluntary on your part?—It was a voluntary offer among ourselves, knowing that the party was involved in the way they were.
2178. Was there with anybody a condition that you should pay $150 if you got the bridge?—Not that I can bring to my memory.
2179. You say that Mr. Cochrane told you that you could have the bridge without conditions, and considering the way the party were involved you concluded voluntarily to pay the $150?—That was the way I undertook it, as far as I was concerned.

That is the result of the best explanation that Mr. Osler could get the witness to make of the fact that Mr. Cochrane had told him that the bridge-keepers were paying $150 each, when Mr. Osler wanted, if possible, to drag Mr. Cochrane out of the scrape, and put a better character upon the transaction. Bullock has been referred to. I will not dwell on his evidence; it has been dwelt on at sufficient length already. I understand he is a merchant in business in Colborne, an intimate, personal and political friend of the member for East Northumberland, and there is no reason to discredit his evidence in any way. He told us with candour the practice of the committee, which was to sell their influence for money; to sell the patronage which Mr. Cochrane had delegated for money. That statement stands uncontradicted. William Brown says Mr. Cochrane told him he had left the matter in the hands of the committee, and he should have to apply to the committee. He goes to the committee. What occurs? He is asked for $150. He is asked whether he did it in consequence of his conversation with Cochrane, he replies in the affirmative. He applies to Mr. Cochrane and he tells him that he must apply to the committee. He applies to the committee—in what form?

Q. Who did you converse with in regard to the $150?—A. The first one I had a conversation with was James Stanley.

He pays Stanley $150—Stanley to whom he goes in consequence of this interview with Mr. Cochrane. Brown's payment was made to Wade. Wade held one of the notes of the party, and Brown's $150 was paid on 20th January. After that no appointment was made for some time. On 2nd May, something over three months afterwards, Mr. Cochrane wrote to the department recommending Brown. Is it credible that he had not learned of the whole job, although he said he had nothing to do with the appointments and recommended Brown to go to some one else? But after he had paid $150, the recommendation came, and with it the office. Brown says:

2658. You never would have gone to the committee but for what Mr. Cochrane told you?—No answer.
2659. The first you heard of the committee was from Mr. Cochrane?—Certainly.
2660. And, in pursuance of your conversation with him, you went to that committee to pay the money?—Yes.

In pursuance of Brown's conversation with Mr. Cochrane he goes to the committee and pays the money, not because of any conversation between Brown and the committee, but in consequence of a conversation between Brown and Cochrane. What was that conversation that led him to pay the money? Is it not clear that Mr. Cochrane was bound at this point to offer an explanation? I think Mr. Cochrane at that stage was bound to tell us whether it was true or not, that he had such a conversation with Brown as led Brown to go and pay that money. Robert May paid $125 for the purpose of obtaining a position. He says:

2800. Was it not for the purpose of getting that position, sir?—Yes.
2801. How did you know that you would get that position if you paid $125?—I did not know, only from the committee.
2802. Then you knew from the committee that you would get that position if you paid the $125?—They told me.
2803. Who told you?—Some of the committee."

What was the object of this committee? Some hon. members said it was only patronage. This committee really was in existence for a different purpose altogether. Patronage was but a means to an end. The debts that have been over the party for over 8 years had to be wiped out, and an opportunity was presented, and a machine was invented in order to accomplish that end. I am not aware that anyone has discredited Henry May's testimony. He is a Government appointee, and is in the employ of the Government at the present time. He evidently is in favour with the Administration, for he obtained employment without having to pay anything. He was of the inner circle, a member of the committee himself, and so he obtained a position without paying for it. When asked as to what was the object of the committee he gave his version of it as follows:—

3050. Then it had the two-fold object of settling on the men for the offices, and of financing to liquidate the indebtedness of the Conservative party?—I suppose that was it.

I suppose that is it. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) referred to a charge which I think the report of the majority of the Committee suggested that we should consider as not having been made. If the hon. member had not dwelt on it, I would not have made any reference to it. I refer to a charge made against William Johnston, and notwithstanding the evidence given, I am of the opinion that the case still needs investigation. The suggestion, I understand, was that Johnston gave cattle and stock for an office. What is the evidence of what occurred? Mr. Cochrane's son, a man who is notorious as worth nothing, who had sworn he was worth nothing, obtained a large amount of stock from a man who was seeking an office, stock aggregating in value about $160, or just about the price of a bridge appointment. This stock was not paid for; it was handed over to a man who was not good for it. Johnston was in the employment of the Government. He had a position at one of the bridges; but when he was wanted as a witness he crossed over the lake to Rochester. The excuse offered at some period of the enquiry was that he was absent in consequence of the illness of his son. But it was also in evidence that as his son was better, apparently there was no necessity for his absence, but, nevertheless, he continued away and what occurred as far as the evidence went was this: The son who was examined as a witness said that he owned some stock on a little farm of his, and that the son authorized the father to sell it and that his father sold it to Mr. Cochrane's son. He never got a farthing down for it, but he took the notes of Mr. Cochrane unendorsed and unsecured; the first one at a period fourteen months distant, and the other somewhat later. Not one cent was paid on these notes which were made by a man who was not worth the paper he was giving. He got a valuable stock worth $160 from William Johnston's son, and William Johnston got a recommendation and got his office. There was not a cent paid on those notes until a charge was made in respect to them during the last general election, and Mr. Cochrane having denied anything wrong in connection with the matter, just before voting day, a payment of $40 was endorsed on one of these notes which is produced. My own opinion was that it was a very suspicious transaction at least, but it could not be properly disposed of except that William Johnston was examined. It is well known that some matters of that kind can be cooked, and it had all the appearance of that, and I think it would have been just as well had the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) not referred to it. It was a charge on the face of it of a most suspicious character, and I would like to know how it came that the Government did not produce the absent William Johnston and allow the charge to be properly investigated. It is still open for investigation if the witness can be produced. Now, in regard to Wesley Goodrich. He had dealings with Mr. Cochrane too, and he told Mr. Cochrane that he was giving a lease and $200 to another person to get him out of the way. It appears that one Obadiah Simpson has got a promise of the office, and it was necessary to satisfy Obadiah Simpson. He was to be satisfied by getting a lease from Goodrich, and it was also necessary to pay tribute to the committee, and that was to be accomplished by the payment of $200. Now, Mr. Cochrane knew that Goodrich was buying the influence of the committee. He said on page 127:

3691. You have just told me, I think, that you told Mr. Cochrane you were willing to give a life lease of your farm for a bridge? Is that so?—Mr. Cochrane mentioned to me that there was a man by the name of King who wanted a bridge. Then I said I would give $200 at that time.
3692. For the bridge?—For the bridge.
3693. What did he say?—He said he did not want the money. He said he would not have a dollar.
3694. Did he refer you to anyone else?—I am not sure whether he referred me to Obadiah Simpson or not.
3695. Did he refer you to the committee?—No.
3696. Did he refer you to Webb?—No.
3697. Or to Stanley?—No, sir.
3698. You did pay the $200?—I did, sir.
3699. That was before you gave the lease?—Yes, sir.
3700. To whom did you pay the $200?—I paid it to Mr. Edward Cochrane.
3701. To the member for the east riding of Northumberland?—Yes. It was more convenient for me to go to him than to Mr. Wade. Wade's was a long way out of my way. He told me to take it to Mr. Payne when I offered it to him.

Now, do you not think that when Mr. Goodrich said he gave that money to Mr. Cochrane and that Mr. Cochrane assumed dominion over it, by not only taking possession of it, but saying what should be done with it?

Mr. SKINNER. It is scarcely fair to read the part of the testimony on page 127 without reading the whole of it.

Mr. MULOCK. Do you want me to read further?

Mr. SKINNER. Yes; read below what you were reading on the same page.

Mr. MULOCK. Very well, I will read:

3702. Who told you?—Mr. Cochrane. I said to him: "Are you not going to Colborne soon? It is out of my way if I have to go on purpose." He said: "Wallace is going to-night with the grist." The team was standing in the yard and I suggested that perhaps Wallace would take it up. He said he could. Wallace went for is overcoat, and I took the money out of my pocket and asked him to count it.
3703. Whom did you ask to count it?—Mr. Cochrane.
3704. I think you had better tell the Committee again what happened there?—I agreed with Mr. Wade to pay this $200. Mr. Wade lived at Hilton, quite a way from my place, and I went to Mr. Cochrane (he was in the barnyard at the time when I arrived), and I asked him would he take the money. He told me to take it to Mr. Payne at Colborne, but that was quite a way for me to go I said: "Are you not going soon," as I knew he went there often. He said: "Wallace is going to-night with the grist." I had noticed the team and waggon in the yard. Wallace was going to the house to get his overcoat and I suggested that somebody ought to count the money. I said: "Would he?" He did not answer me, but he seemed not to want to do it. I took it out of my pocket and urged him. He then took it and counted it, and then handed it to Wallace. Wallace had got back by this time. He said: "Wallace, give that to Payne." That is as straight as I can tell you.

3705. What did you give that $200 for? What value did you get for it?—I got the situation—the bridge.

3706. And that is what you gave the money for?—I suppose if you put it that way, I don't know any other. Mr. Wade told me he was holding it for some money he wanted to realize on it.

3710. How did you arrive at the sum of $200?—I offered him at one time that I would give him that, and he said he would not take a dollar. Mr. Wade, I suppose, had heard that I offered $200. I did not ask Mr. Wade how he knew. I offered it myself, it was my own offer.

3712. You were willing to give $200?—I was, and to give the lease of the farm to anybody who had the promise of the bridge.

3713. How did you discover it was necessary to pay $200 to get the position?—Well, I had heard some time before that there had been a protest between Mr. Wade and Mr. Ferris and there was a deficiency there and they wanted to try and raise money to meet it. I thought if they wanted some help to raise it I would help them.

Then further on he says:

3738. You were to pay $200, according to your agreement, to Mr. Wade?—Yes, sir.

3739. Were you aware at the time whom you were to pay it to?—No, sir.

3740. What did you say about Mr. Payne?—I said that when I presented it, Mr. Cochrane told me to take it to Mr. Payne, to give it to him.

The evidence of Mr. Goodrich, where he swears that Mr. Cochrane told him to take that money and give it to Mr. Payne, is not contradicted. He says again:

3769. How did Mr. Cochrane know that you should take it to Mr. Payne?—I do not know. I did not ask him, and he did not tell me.

3770. Did he appear to know what the $200 was for?—I do not know that he said a word. He said in one of the conversations that I had with him, that they had got into trouble over the protest, and of course I understood that the trouble related to the funds. I understood somebody to say that there was trouble over the protest.

3771. What do you mean by getting into trouble—getting into debt?—Yes, I took it that way.

3772. You say you told Mr. Cochrane when you went there to leave the money with him, that you had made an arrangement about your place, and that they were satisfied?—Yes.

3773. You are sure you used the word "satisfied"?—Yes.

3774. What had you agreed to give at that time?—I had agreed to give the old gentleman a life lease of the place and pay $200 for the debt of the party.

Then Mr. John Wade gives evidence to the same effect and shows that Cochrane was aware of the doings of the committee. When the lease was given in order to get one man out of the way and let another man in, Cochrane was a party to the transaction, and I say again it was immaterial in law whether this consideration went into his own pocket or not, so far as a consideration was given in order to procure a verbal recommendation, either from him or from a committee, which was the same as from him. Well, looking at all that evidence, what do we find? We find a large number of witnesses connecting Mr. Cochrane with this transaction. Hedley Simpson swears to Mr. Cochrane's connection with it; Arundel Simpson does the same; Walter Simpson does the same; Stanley does the same. He says he told Mr. Cochrane about Hedley Simpson paying the money; John D. Clouston does the same; Bullock says he is convinced that Mr. Cochrane knew all that was going on; Brown says that Mr. Cochrane knew of the bargain and what he paid the money for; Wesley Goodrich says he knew of the $200 that he was paying. Eight witnesses in all connect Edward Cochrane with this transaction; and he does not go into the witness box to deny it. Could there be a greater accumulation of evidence? Is there not a formidable case made against him? And consider with that the circumstance that he will not take the book in his hand and pledge his oath to the untruthfulness of any of these statements or attempt to explain them away. Under these circumstances, the finding of the majority of the Committee is not, in my judgment, according to the evidence; and if this House condones this offence by adopting their report, it will not bring credit upon itself or upon the members of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MULOCK. Hon. gentlemen may not think that to-night; but I think they will live to regret any action they may take in endorsing these dealings in public offices. I cannot conceive of clearer evidence being brought out; I cannot conceive of a case more flagrant, even if the transactions are small in themselves; and, being of that opinion, as a member of the Committee, I feel it my duty to give the conclusions and inferences which I have drawn from the evidence, and to say that, in my opinion, complete justice will not be done in the premises by adopting the report of the majority of the Committee.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I never trouble the House at great length and I ask its indulgence for a few moments, late as the hour is. Hon. members of this House who desire to give an intelligent and impartial vote on this question are placed at this disadvantage, that this voluminous mass of evidence was placed in their possession only a few hours ago, and it is impossible for those who were not members of the Committee, and who did not pay close attention to its proceedings from time to time, to give an intelligent vote on the question before us. Under these circumstances, one is compelled simply to be guided by the evidence adduced in the two reports before us, and by the little knowledge that one is able to gather during the debate in this House. But, first of all, I desire to say that this question is not and ought not to be regarded on either side of the House as a party question. It is not one that involves the existence of the Government, and I trust that it is not one that involves the credit or reputation of the Conservative party. It is a question that involves the reputation and standing of this House, because the reputation and standing of a member of this House are concerned in it. In that sense, and in that sense only, I want to deal with it. Now, Sir, from the conclusions which I have been able to draw from the evidence, I feel disposed not to agree to either report. I do not believe that the evidence, so far as it has been adduced, justifies the very strong and decisive conclusions set forth in the report which has been placed before the House by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). I think that the evidence, so far as I have been able to form an opinion upon it, does not justify the conclusion that there has been proved absolutely that guilty knowledge on the part of Mr. Cochrane which that report avers. It is argued that this is a criminal offence, and in that regard it may fairly be questioned whether this case is one that ought to be dealt with by this House—whether this House is a competent tribunal to deal with a matter of this kind—whether we can in such a matter divest ourselves of all party feeling, and give to it the time and attention which would enable us to arrive at a verdict, on which should depend, not only the reputation of an hon. member of this House, but to a great extent the credit and character of the House itself. However, we have been called upon to give this vote, and give it we must, and we ought to give it as honestly, as free from party convictions, and with as due a regard to the evidence before us as possible. If this is to be treated as a criminal case, and if the hon. member for East Northumberland is before us as one charged with a crime, we are as much bound as any court to give him the benefit of any doubt; and giving him the benefit of all the doubts which I think exist in the evidence, notwithstanding the arraignment of him made by his opponents, I feel justified in coming to the conclusion that so far as his knowledge of these transactions is concerned the case is not proven. But when we pass beyond that we have to deal with the report made by the majority of the Committee, and I have no hesitation in saying that it is a miserable piece of special pleading. It utterly fails to grasp the questions which ought to have been dealt with by that Committee. I think we have before us evidence that most of the persons concerned in these transactions are—I will not say innocent—but I think had not the slightest idea of the gravity or the possible consequences of the transactions in which they were engaged. I do not believe that the men who made these contributions to pay off this old debt had any idea, or at least anything more than a vague and misty idea, of the nature of the transactions in which they were concerned; and it would be exceedingly hard, under the circumstances, to deal with them as criminals. But when this matter is brought before a Committee of this House, I think they should deal with it in a different manner and spirit than this Committee have done. They should give this House and this country to understand, in the plainest terms, that would leave no doubt, the serious nature and consequences of these transactions; but this Committee have stated their conclusions in terms which I think under the circumstances are contemptible. The simple remark at the end of the report that these transactions were reprehensible fails altogether to give the country a true idea of their nature; and the voters of East Northumberland, when they read that report, will naturally come to the conclusion that the transactions in which they have been concerned are venial offences, and will not consider it very great harm to undertake similar transactions in the future. There are many words used in that report which I think bear out this conclusion. It lays a great deal of stress on the word "voluntary." If I buy a horse and pay a hundred dollars for it I voluntarily pay the hundred dollars for it, but if I do not pay it I do not get the horse; and that is exactly this case. I find fault with the report because it lays stress on the word "voluntary," and in that respect it is calculated to mislead the electors, and the conclusion they will draw from it is, that when a man gives a contribution voluntarily he is perfectly justified, in return for that consideration, in taking an office if he can obtain it. I say that the use of the term in that report, the manner in which it is used, is calculated to convey an erroneous impression, and fails to bring home to the people of the country, as it should, the nature of the transaction with which that report deals. Taking the evidence altogether, I think that the Committee is not justified in the absolute conclusion to which it has come, that there is no evidence of these charges, and no evidence of complicity on the part of the hon. member for East Northumberland with regard to them. I say that the case against him is not so conclusively proven as to prevent our giving him reasonably the benefit of the doubt; but on the other hand, we are not justified, on the evidence before us, in coming to the conclusion that there is no proof in support of the charges. Taking all these circumstances together, taking the paltry, inadequate conclusions which are arrived at, under circumstances which would have justified, and not only justified but called for a very distinct, emphatic and clear expression of opinion as to the character of such transactions, and also taking the terms or expressions used with regard to them throughout the report generally, and which do not convey properly, to my mind, the nature of the transactions, but make it appear as though the offence was a mere venial and trifling one, under those circumstances I am not prepared to accept the report in amendment to that of the Committee brought in by the hon. member for West Huron, nor am I prepared to sanction, by my vote, the report which the Committee have presented.

Report concurred in.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 3.45 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 18th September, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

LAND SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

Report of Committee of Whole on a certain proposed resolution respecting the granting of subsidies in land to certain railway companies (Mr. Dewdney), read the first and the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 173) to authorize the granting of subsidies in land to certain railway companies.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 147) further to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.—(Sir John Thompson.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McCARTHY. I beg to move the amendment which was discussed the other evening, increasing the deposit in case of appeal to $500 instead of $100.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Very often you desire to appeal merely on a question of law. The law allows you to limit your appeal as you please, and it is for us to consider whether, if an appeal be taken simply on a question of law, the appellant should be obliged to deposit $500. The first consideration should be that the right of appeal should be protected. The Act works well as it is, and I have not heard of any great hardship having arisen under it.

Mr. DICKEY. I brought up the other night the question whether or not the costs of appeal should not be limited, and if the Committee are of opinion that the costs of appeal should be limited to a smaller sum than $500, it would be useless to insist on a deposit of $500. I intend to invite the Committee to come to the conclusion that the counsel fees allowed on appeals, that is the fees over disbursements, should only be $100, and in that case this deposit of $500 would be more than is required, I think we should be willing to fix it at $250 or $300.

Mr. MULOCK. I cannot regard an election trial as a contest in respect of a private right. The consequences are really criminal. If the petitioner succeeds, somebody has violated the law and is liable criminally. In any event, it is a question for the people, and that being the case I do not see why private suitors should be in the position of parties to an action in respect of private rights. That being the case, I think that at no stage should there be any costs at all, but in deference to the opinions of other members, not wishing to propose something so radical, I prefer to propose in regard to the costs of the main trial that there should be a maximum, and I think that in regard to the costs of appeal there also should be a maximum. Whilst I would give the respondent the right to ascertain what the principle of law is and what the merits of the issue are by placing no unnecessary obstruction in his way, at the same time I would limit the costs, no matter what the consequences might be, of the appeal. I, therefore, think that the proposition to increase the deposit as a condition precedent to the right of appeal is legislation in the wrong direction. The proposal is that the deposit shall amount to $500 and the rate per folio for all the pleading. I cannot tell what that rate may amount to, but added to the $500, it means practically that no appeals will be taken to the Supreme Court. The Committee decided at an earlier stage that it was not inclined to do away with the appeal to the Supreme Court. Why do in an indirect way what we refused to do in a direct way?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not desire to prevent an appeal.

Mr. MULOCK. No; but the effect would be that the appellant would have to deposit $500, and 5 cents per folio as well, which may amount to a very large sum. We are legislating in the wrong direction. We are in the first place preventing a person from taking his case to appeal, and, secondly, we are increasing the costs, no matter what may be the issue, because this 5 cents additional is to be added to the costs of somebody. I think the proper way would be to provide for maximum costs in appeal, and limit the deposit to that. If the proposition be adopted that the outside costs be limited to $100, that should be the measure of security in the first instance. If there are no costs allowed in the appeal, there should be no deposit required. The deposit is only an indemnity at the best, and should not exceed the possible demand upon it.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman is mixing up two questions which should be kept separate. The 5 cents a folio is a fee to be paid to the officer of the court, and at present there is no means of compelling him to certify to the finding of the Supreme Court, because, if he goes to the judge, he declines to give the notes of evidence, and he goes to the stenographer and he refuses to give it unless he is paid for it. The stenographer's fees have been paid out of the deposit, so that the security which was given and intended to be for the benefit of the respondent was often paid out in fees.

Mr. MULOCK. That was illegal.

Mr. McCARTHY. That has been done twice to my knowledge, and the court has decided it in that way. My hon. friend may have a very strong opinion on the subject, and I also have a very strong view that it was not within the statute, but that will not stand against the positive decision of the judges. You give a man the right of appeal and he deposits $10. I go to the judge to get a copy of his notes, and he has not got it. I go to the stenographer, and he says: If you pay me I will give it to you but not otherwise.

Mr. MULOCK. How is the registrar paid?

Mr. McCARTHY. By the fee of $10.

Mr. MULOCK. But how is he paid for his other services?

Mr. McCARTHY. The registrar is the chief officer of the court and does not get anything. It is no use to say that he is to do this for $10, because he cannot.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand that this officer is an officer of the court and is paid a salary. If anything is to be paid to him in these matters, let the Government pay it. Why should an officer of the court, whose whole time is engaged for a salary, have a right to a perquisite of this kind, which would go into his own pocket?

Mr. McCARTHY. No; it would not go into his pocket. Take Mr. Grant, of the Court of Appeal. He is required to certify to these documents, but first he has to pay this amount to the stenographer.

Mr. MULOCK. The stenographer is an officer of the court.

Mr. McCARTHY. There ought to be a provision for the payment of the stenographer out of the general funds. There is no such provision, but he gets paid out of the deposit, and what I want to arrange is that this payment shall not encroach on the security put up for the sitting member.

Mr. MULOCK. Then the proper way is to provide that the stenographer shall be paid out of the general funds, but not by the parties. He is an officer of the Crown. It is the people's cause that is being litigated. There is a great deal in what my hon. friend says, but he is putting the saddle on the wrong horse. I do not think the parties should be charged with this payment to the stenographer.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is a very good suggestion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I). I think there is a good deal in what the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says, as to the appellant providing enough money to enable the record to be obtained. I see nothing unfair in his being required to pay sufficient money to enable the officers to prepare the record, but that being so, and involving the expenditure of a good deal of money, would it not be doing justice and fair-play by leaving the law as it stands as to the deposit of $100, and amending in the direction which he suggests, by providing also for the payment of the $10 and 5 cents a folio for all the documents he requires? In that way the officer would be guaranteed against any loss, sufficient money would be deposited to ensure the record being made, and then, I think, the deposit of $100 would be reasonable under the circumstances. In a long trial, the party may have to pay $200 or $300 for the record.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would prefer to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), if the Minister of Justice could see his way to accept it. When this Act was passed there were no stenographers in the courts. The judge took the evidence himself, and it was very simple to have the evidence certified. Now, in our province, at all events, it is always the stenographers who take the evidence, and if they were called upon, as in the provincial courts, to certify to this evidence, then the $10 would be ample. As it is, I think they should be paid by the Government, as the judges are.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think that system prevails only in one province, and to carry out the suggestion I would have to begin by resolution, and we could not prorogue within two weeks.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the suggestion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is a proper one. It is no more just to charge the parties with the salaries of the stenographers than with the salaries of the judges. Election trials are trials in which the public are interested as well as the parties, and, if the public were always right, there would be less cause for these election trials.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the best way would be, for the present, to reduce the amount required to $200, $300 or $400.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) A compromise might be made. Suppose the hon. gentleman made the deposit $200.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not care in the least, but it seems to me that a man who has been harassed in the court below and makes an appeal should not have to pay the costs after he wins the appeal.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Make it $300.

Mr. McCARTHY. Very well.

Mr. DICKEY. With regard to section 51, I would like to take the sense of the Committee on a provision limiting the costs payable to counsel on appeal. That would come in properly, I think, as an amendment to section 51, and I propose to limit the counsel fee payable on appeal to the sum of $100. My reason for suggesting that is to prevent, as far as this House can legitimately do so, an abuse of the right to appeal. I think that no one here wants to prevent a legitimate appeal. Of course, at the same time, we want to prevent, if possible, an abuse of the right to appeal, and I think that the best way of doing that is to limit, so far as we can, the ultimate reward that may be obtained by counsel. I, therefore, move the addition of a sub-section to section 51, to this effect:

No sum greater than $10 shall be taxed against either party as costs of, or incidental to, an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, besides taxes and disbursements.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman is acting a little hastily. Nobody desires that abnormal fees should be paid to counsel. In the first instance, the counsel fee is fixed by the registrar in court, and it must necessarily depend to a large extent upon the importance of the case, the importance of the issues discussed, and the length of time counsel is engaged. You cannot fix an arbitrary fee, and say a man can only get $100 if he is there for one month arguing the case: it would be absurd. The result would be that if a man appeals and loses his case, his opponent will have to pay the fee of his counsel. If I appeal improperly and lose my case, why should my opponent have to pay it out of his pocket: why should I not have to pay it myself? Why should he have to pay counsel if I appeal wrongfully? You cannot, by an arbitrary rule of this kind, obtain the confirmation of justice. You must leave it to the discretion of the court which, according to the circumstances, determines how much the counsel fees shall be. In some cases $100 might be too high; in other cases that sum would be absurdly low. I have known cases to last for days and days, perhaps ten days, or fifteen days; and if a man travels a thousand miles to come to this court and stays here for fifteen days arguing a case, I think you will hardly say that he is paid when he gets $100. I think it is better left to the registrar who, subject to appeal to the court, determines what counsel fee is reasonable.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The proposition is not to confine the counsel fee to $100; it is only to confine the costs and disbursements. The counsel fee, I think, comes under the head of disbursements.

Mr. CURRAN. No.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I feel a good deal of sympathy with the proposition to restrict the costs which may be recovered on appeal, because it is supported by the argument that sometimes these petitions are fostered for the purpose of costs. But it seems to me this is going in the other direction, and that you are encouraging appeals.

Mr. DICKEY. What I had in my mind was this, that limiting these fees to $100, without stopping appeals absolutely, would have a tendency to make a man careful before he appeals. But if it is not the sense of the Committee, I will not press it.

On section 5,

Mr. MULOCK moved that:

Section 5 is hereby amended by inserting in sub-section "a" after the word "relates" the following words: "And who, if not the candidate of such election, is at the time of the presentation of such petition the owner of real property situated in the electoral district for which said election was had, of the value, according to the last annual assessments, of at least five hundred dollars over and above all encumbrances thereon."

He said: The meaning of the amendment is that a petitioner shall not be a man of straw, and while I will not say that the ownership of real estate in the riding to the value of $500 is the best guarantee that can be obtained of a man's bonâ fides, yet it is some guarantee. At present it would appear, if an examination were made, that most of the petitioners are men who have taken no real interest in the matter. Their names have been obtained simply because they are men without property, and that is an abuse of the Act. I do not wish to prevent the proper operation of the Act, but it should not be open to abuse. I do not think the machine part of politics should be allowed to go into a riding and discover some irresponsible man, who happens to have his name on the voters' list, and use him as a petitioner, unless he chooses to take an interest in the matter. If you cannot get a man of some substance to a petition, there has not been any great wrong; and, therefore, it is one safeguard, which I would suggest to the Committee, that the petitioner be the owner of some real estate.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The petitioner has to deposit $1,000 in cash, and it is now proposed that he be a man worth $500 besides. My opinion is that the law on this subject is all wrong. I do not think a man should be called on to deposit any money in cash, but he should give two sureties worth at least $2,000 and enter into bonds for that amount to pay the costs. It is quite clear at present that $1,000 is not sufficient security, for the costs in most of the contested cases exceed that sum, and it is equally clear that in most of the cases the petitioners are wholly men of straw. As a general rule they are men of no means and are selected because they are such, and where the costs exceed $1,000 nothing can be got out of them. If the law were so amended as to compel the petitioner to give security—not a deposit of money—to the extent of at least $2,000, and two sureties worth at least $1,000 each, it would, in my opinion, meet the evil, and petitions of that kind would not be presented unless there is reasonable ground for their presentation. It is well known that at present many of these petitions are speculative on the chance of something turning up before the case is tried or on the chance of pairing off with someone else.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It seems to me that the remarks made by the hon. gentleman are very pertinent to the question, and there is no doubt that many of these petitions are fyled to annoy and harass the sitting member. Responsible men of a political party desiring to petition are afraid to come forward and unwilling to put their names to the petition, and so they pick up some irresponsible person, who knows nothing about the case whatever. He comes to a lawyer's office to sign the paper and he does not know whether there is a word of truth in the petition or not. This is a very improper proceeding. We amended the law during the time of the late Administration with regard to proposing members. Then the same objection was made that, at nomination, men came forward to propose a candidate merely for the purpose of annoying the person who was certain to get elected, and with a view of obviating that evil the law was amended so as to require twenty-five electors to sign the nomination paper. Now, why should we not require more than one petitioner? Surely one man ought not be able to upset a whole constituency and to put it in that political turmoil and fever that is done by the contestation of an election. Why not provide that five or ten men should come forward to sign a petition. I think that would be a good plan, and then if these men know they are responsible for the costs you will probably find that out of these five or ten men there are some who are worth it. At all events, they have to put their names forward to guarantee the bonâ fides of the petition.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) While intending, as I hope we all intend, to legislate in the direction of preventing improper petitions being fyled, we are in danger of going too far in the other direction. I cannot see why a voter in an electoral district should be deprived of his right to petition against the return of a candidate simply because he does not own a certain amount of real estate. I doubt the propriety of that proposition a good deal. The possession of $500 worth of real estate does not necessarily guarantee that a man takes more interest in public life than a poor man who may be more intelligent, and if a man is properly qualified as an elector I do not think he should be deprived of his right to petition. I notice that the hon. gentleman has got on the Paper another amendment which seems to be directed in the proper channel, and which, in my opinion, will obviate the difficulties he is seeking to overcome much better than the proposal now before us. What we want to do is, I take it, to prevent petitions being fyled which are merely speculative, but you do not want to legislate so as to prevent men from signing bonâ fide petitions simply because these men do not own real estate. The section to which I refer says:

"That at the time of the presentation of the petition there shall also be presented therewith a solemn declaration by the petitioner to the effect that he has good cause to believe, and verily does believe, that the allegations contained in the petition are true."

I believe the adoption of that amendment would be a step in the right direction. I do not think we should limit the right to fyle a petition to the owners of property alone. Every elector should have the right to fyle a petition, and if you take measures by a provision such as the one I have read to secure that the petition shall be bonâ fide, you are legislating in the right direction. I think the hon. gentleman's proposed affidavit may be amended so as to carry it still further than he suggests, but I believe he is on the right track in this amendment, and I respectfully submit that the amendment requiring a real estate qualification is not proper.

Mr. SPROULE. The principal result of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) would be to give a bone for the lawyers to nibble away at. If you made the property qualification $4,000, I am sure the lawyers would manage to keep the contest going on for a long time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it is better to leave out the real estate qualification.

Mr. MULOCK. If the Committee does not desire, it I will not press it. I will move:

That section 5 be amended by the following words:—"At the time of the presentation of the petition there shall also be presented therewith a solemn declaration by the petitioner, made under chap. 141 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, entitled, an Act respecting Extra Judicial Oaths, to the effect that he has good reason to believe, and verily does believe, that the allegations contained in the said petition are true."

Mr. BARRON. I cannot altogether approve of that. In any case, it ought not to be a solemn declaration, but an affidavit. People have got the idea that by merely signing a paper they are not taking an oath, but the formality of taking the book and kissing it gives more security. I submit it should be an affidavit.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not think that an affidavit or declaration will accomplish any purpose whatever. I venture to say that there never was a political party defeated in a constituency where you could not get fifty men to make a solemn declaration that they believed the election was carried by bribery and corruption. I believe there is not a petitioner who has presented one of the numerous petitions fyled in the courts at present who would not make a declaration that he believed that the statements in the petition were true. It will accomplish no purpose unless you go a step further: Apply the same law that you do in the case where you want to arrest a man. There you make an affidavit and set up the facts upon which your belief is founded, and then you get an order to take the necessary proceedings. But the bare and naked affidavit which we used to have in our practice, stating that you have good reason to believe and do believe that the statements are true, will deter no man from fyling a petition. What I should like would be to require an affidavit to be presented to a judge of the court, and if it appears to him from the affidavit that there are reasonable grounds for the presentation of a petition, he should make an order granting leave to fyle a petition. That, in my judgment, is the only safe plan. I am prepared to stand by the adjudication of a judge on the subject, providing that if a primâ facie case is made out by the affidavit a petition may be fyled, and not otherwise.

Mr. FRASER. I see a difficulty in the proposition of my hon. friend from Huron. I do not think the petitioner ought to be asked to state the grounds on which he makes the application; that would be simply asking him to give away his case. I think there would be a gain even in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for North York. As an example, I know a case not very far away from the county I represent where a petition was sent to a solicitor in a village, and he was asked to get a man to sign it. I venture to say that if he had to make the affidavit proposed by the hon. member he would not do it so easily. I think most people have an idea of what an affidavit is. You can get some men to make an affidavit without good grounds, but there is a general understanding everywhere that certain results will follow from such an affidavit. I would prefer to leave the law as it is, rather than adopt the proposition of the hon. member for West Huron.

Mr. BARRON. It does seem, after all, that this question of the affidavit is creating some difference of opinion, and I think the proposal made by the hon. member for Frontenac, that there should be a certain number of petitioners instead of one, is a very good one. We recognize the principle in different proceedings, such as nominations, acknowledging the importance of avoiding silly and vexatious proceedings, such as many of these petitions no doubt are. Only this morning I received a newspaper in which there was an advertisement of a petitioner asking leave to withdraw a petition, because he had been persuaded to sign the petition by a candidate who offered him a situation if he would do so. That man was a man of straw, and now, because the candidate who bribed him has broken faith with him, he wishes to withdraw. I venture to say that many petitions are fyled under similar circumstances. I venture to say that 75 per cent. of the petitions fyled are vexatious, entered upon the beginning without the least tittle of evidence to support them; and then there is a sort of trust-to-luck policy of trying to find out between the time the petition is fyled and the time it is tried whether there are not cases which would unseat the successful candidate. I think that should be stopped, and I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Frontenac is a most excellent one, that a petition should be signed by five or ten voters.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I would propose in section 5, of chapter 9, of 49 Victoria, to strike out the words "any one or more of the following persons," in the sixth line, and in sub-section (a) to strike out the words "a person," and insert the words "five persons." That would make the law read that a petition should be presented by five persons who voted or had a right to vote at the elections, or by a candidate. If a candidate chooses to come forward, I think he should have the right to fyle a petition.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We shall have to consider this a little. I think we are adopting a good many restrictions on petitions. We have yet to consider what kind of a Bill Parliament can pass with regard to sitting members. We must not lose sight of the fact that we are requiring petitioners to put up $1,000 in money, and the policy of the Act was to regard that as the great safeguard of the responsibility of the proceeding. Then, all we did was to ascertain that somebody should petition who had the right, either the candidate or a person entitled to vote. If, in addition, we charge five men with the responsibility of the cost of the petition. I think we shall be going altogether too far. I think it is questionable whether we should make any change in that regard. If we do, I think we ought not to insist on more than two names.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The change which has just been suggested may have its merits or it may not, but it is a most radical departure from the policy which we have hitherto pursued: and there is a danger, and a considerable danger—knowing as we do that corruption has undoubtedly been practised pretty extensively on many occasions in elections in this country—about making the process of getting election petitions too difficult. I think this is one of these amendments which, if considered at all, ought to be considered next session and not now. It cannot affect any election case that is going on at present: it cannot affect any hon. gentleman whose seat is contested one way or the other. I do not profess to express a positive opinion at present. This has been sprung on the House at too late a period to be properly considered, and it would be better that the hon. member should withdraw it, and we could consider it calmly and deliberately at the commencement and not at the close of a session.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think, too, it is a departure we should be slow to adopt without full consideration. I have not much faith in its efficacy. I think it is as easy to get five men as one man.

Mr. MULOCK. Ten men would have saved Sodom and Gomorrah.

Mr. McCARTHY. If we required ten men, we would be practically making it prohibitory. The affidavit suggested by the hon. gentleman is a declaration copied from the Ontario election law, and will be of no practical utility. That has been in force in Ontario, and I do not think there has been the slightest difficulty in getting a petitioner to say that he has good reason to believe and does verily believe the petition is well founded. A man who is prepared to sign a petition is equally prepared to swallow that affidavit. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for Huron, I think that what the hon. member for Guysborough has said with reference to it has great force and requires careful consideration. In the proceeding with which the hon. member for Huron illustrated his arguments, which at first sight seem to be almost on all fours, there is a very great difference, as the hon. gentleman will see on reflection. What is required to set out in the application to which he alluded, namely, to obtain a capias, is, first, the cause of action, and, secondly, the grounds which induced the party to say that he believes the defendant is about to abscond. That does not at all interfere with the suit. It does not disclose his case. But what would this affidavit require to set out? That bribery had been committed. It would not do to say bribery merely, but you would have to say such-and-such a man had been bribed by such-and-such an agent. You would have to go into that detail; and when you have to draw your witnesses from the opposite camp this would make your difficulties in proving your case almost insuperable. You would find these men either spirited away or not in the same mood to speak, and it would be impossible to sustain your case. I think the suggestion last made a wise one, and that is to let the matter stand over.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of allowing it to stand over. There can be no practical advantage in discussing it now. The objection of the hon. member for North Simcoe to the affidavit at the time of the petition is an objection which lies against the present proceeding, because before the trial the other party might enquire as to the character of the evidence on which he relies, and the petitioner must give the information.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is only a few days before the trial.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Long enough to spirit witnesses out of the way.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. If the Committee thinks this important amendment is being sprung on them too suddenly, I will withdraw it, and consider whether I will bring it up on the third reading or wait until next session.

Mr. MULOCK. With regard to my motion, which is the real motion before the Committee, the hon. member for North Simcoe says there is such a provision in the Ontario Act. I think that is rather an argument in favour of the proposition. We have not heard of petitions being filed right and left on speculation in Ontario.

Mr. McCARTHY. How many were filed after the last election?

Mr. MULOCK. I do not know.

Mr. McCARTHY. Almost as many as after this.

Mr. MULOCK. At all events, I see no reason why an affidavit should not be required. Not being aware whether in each province there was a provision for the making of affidavits before there was a case in court, I preferred to adopt the form in the provision respecting extra judicial oaths.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Better use the word "affidavit."

Mr. MULOCK. I have no objection to make it "affidavit," and the amendment will read as follows:—

Add to section five the following words: at the time of the presentation of a petition there shall also be presented therewith an affidavit by the petitioner that he has good reason to believe and verily does believe that the several allegations contained in the said petition are true.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MULOCK. I beg to move:

That no greater counsel fee or fees shall be taxed, as between party and party, in respect of or in connection with the trial than $50, and when the trial shall continue beyond one day a further sum not exceeding $40 for each additional day the trial shall continue, whether one or more counsel be engaged at the trial."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You are inviting people to fyle petitions. A member may employ counsel and keep him ten or fifteen days, and pay him $500, and he cannot ask that the counsel fee be taxed against the petitioner as well as the other costs. I do not see why you should offer undue facilities for the fyling of election petitions. A member has sufficient difficulties to meet now. It costs sufficient in legitimate expenses to get elected, and if we have to fight for our seats afterwards and pay the costs out of our own pockets we will have to get an additional indemnity.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that this clause is a proper one. Unless you can make the reasons for unseating a member much less strict than they have been in the past, it is almost impossible for anyone to go through an election trial without being unseated. If this is adopted, men will not enter a protest unless they have some valid reason for doing so. I think the clause is a good one, though I would reduce the amount to $100 or strike it out altogether. I think these protests should be entered on public grounds, and that the public should bear all the expense, each party paying its own costs. That would prevent many lawyers from taking up cases simply because they expect to get their fees out of them.

Mr. GERMAN. I think this question of costs is somewhat misunderstood. I suggested an amendment the other day, not because I desired that the costs should be restricted absolutely to the amount of $300, but because I think it is absurd that the petitioner should be liable to pay only $1,000 of costs in the event of his losing the action, while the respondent has to pay any amount of costs which may be taxed against him. I am prepared to take a fair fight with anybody, but, if the petitioner is only liable for $1,000, it is unfair that I should be liable for the whole of the taxed costs. If he is liable for the full amount of costs I am prepared to accept the same responsibility. Whether the amount for which the petitioner would be liable were $300 or $3,000, it would not make any difference. If the amount is limited to $300 the petitioner would only have to pay that and his taxable costs, but if there is no limit he would have to pay the whole taxable costs of the other party. My suggestion is that both parties should be placed on the same basis. If the petitioner is only responsible for $1,000, then the respondent should only be responsible for the same amount. It may be said at this time that anyone who has a petition filed against him may talk feelingly on this matter. That is true enough, and I have one filed against me. A man of enormous wealth may be the real petitioner, but he may get a man of straw to appear as the petitioner. I may be mulct in the costs, but if the man of straw is to pay the costs I may be unable to get them from him. I think, if a man of straw is made the petitioner he ought to be compelled to give bonds for the full amount of costs that may be taxed against him.

Mr. GILLMOR. I observe that the public mind seems just now to be alive to all these matters, and I might suggest that we should settle this question by doing away with all the protests now existing and commence anew, because we are all now in the right frame of mind to adopt a measure which would be just to everybody.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It might shorten the discussion if we where to agree that no man who has a petition fyled against him should take part in the debate.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am afraid that in that case there would not be a quorum.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There may be a good deal in the argument of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). The object of the amendment is to remove an existing evil. During the last few years petitions have been entered for frivolous reasons, for spite, and in order to make money, or, in other words, for blackmail. I think the argument of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) was well founded. If the parties were put on equal terms it would be more fair: but, where a petitioner is put forward who has no responsibility, it is not only a hardship on the candidate who is petitioned against, but is an injustice to the public. I believe the amendment will have the effect, not as the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) thinks, of encouraging protests, but, on the other hand, if a member has gone through a fair election, a protest will not be entered against him on any frivolous ground. I think that, in justice to the country and to the candidates, the party who petitions should be made responsible either by a sufficient deposit or in some other way. I believe that these frivolous petitions have had a worse effect on the people than any corruption which has taken place. Worthless people have been put in as petitioners, and the result has been that the candidates have had to make settlements with parties behind the scenes. Not being a lawyer, I cannot state what is the best way to remove this evil, but there is no doubt that the evil exists. I have had personal experience of these things, and I think it is the duty of the Minister of Justice and of this Parliament, if it be possible, to remove by some legislation the existing evils. I think this amendment will to a great extent effect that result. My own opinion is that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) is right when he says this should be made a criminal action, and that if a man has been found guilty of corruption in election matters he should be prosecuted at the expense of the public. There have been many cases where men have combined to make a protest simply out of speculation, and their object is not to go on with the trial, but to find out how much would be paid to have the petition withdrawn. Such cases ought to be provided against, if possible, and I hope this amendment will be adopted and tried, and if it does not prove effective, then I hope the legal gentlemen in this House will devise some other means that will protect both the candidate and the public from this abuse.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was very much impressed with the proposition made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). It is admitted on all sides that the present Act is faulty, and I think we cannot do better than to spend another day and look into this matter thoroughly, and have it perfected at this session of Parliament, for the reason that I believe there is something over a hundred protests pending at the present time. These cases will, no doubt, be tried, and the seats of many hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House may be declared vacant. They will have to run another election, and we will have the same difficulty to contend with after these elections are over. Other protests will be fyled on the same terms that present protests have been fyled, many of them vexatious. I know in my own case a protest was fyled simply because it was rumoured that a protest was going to be fyled against the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Grieve). I understand that on the Saturday preceding the last day allowed for fyling a petition Mr. Preston came down to Kingston and stated there that as the seats of the hon. members for North York and North Perth were going to be protested a protest must be fyled against the late Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald and myself. Mr. Preston returned from Kingston, having had a protest prepared to be fyled against Sir John A. Macdonald. He sent a young lawyer down to Gananoque on Monday morning to have one prepared and fyled against myself. They could not get a party there to go to Toronto by special train on Monday to sign the petition. Telegrams passed to Toronto, and at last a man was secured in Toronto, who is an elector, to sign the petition, and afterwards he put in his own declaration, stating that he did not know what he had signed, and it was fought out on preliminary objections.

Mr. GERMAN. What about your doing the the same thing in the western part of Ontario?

Mr. TAYLOR. I say that members on both sides have a right to complain. Now, I have no objections to the proposition of the hon. member for Frontenac limiting the right of protest to the candidate, and if any person else than the defeated candidate may protest the right should be limited to at least five or six electors, men of standing, freeholders, and men responsible for the costs. I suggest that this Committee could not do better than to rise and report progress, and let a couple of leading lawyers on both sides come together and frame a clause that will cover the point suggested by the member for Frontenac, namely, that the defeated candidate, and no other person, unless five responsible electors combined, shall be allowed to petition, so that we may avoid the practice of parties putting in petitions merely for the sake of being able to pair them off with petitions on the other side, when there has been no corrupt act committed in the election. I think we should deal with it now, in view of the number of protests that are pending, and that will eventuate in many new elections.

Mr. MULOCK. The particular clause now under discussion provides that counsel fees shall be limited to $50, or if the trial lasts for more than one day, that the fees shall be not more than $40 for each succeeding day. In the Province of Ontario counsel fees have grown to an enormous amount. In an election trial a counsel is engaged on each side, and it would not be an unusual thing for the court to allow $100 to the first counsel and perhaps $50 to the second counsel. No matter which party succeeds, suppose the petitioner succeeds, he gets taxed against his opponent $150 for a day's work for the two counsel, and his opponent has to pay a similar amount to his own counsel. The counsel fees that then fall upon one of the suitors for one day amount to $300, or thereabouts. If the case lasts two or three days more the costs may swallow up a whole farm. If the petition lasts for a week $1,000 would not be anywhere near enough to pay counsel fees alone. I do not like to see farms run away in costs in this manner.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it is due to the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution to say that when I spoke a little while ago I quite misunderstood his resolution. I thought he was limiting the counsel fee to $50 entirely, but I see he is limiting it to $50 for the first day and $40 for every subsequent day. The resolution is aimed at a grievance that exists in the Province of Ontario which I know nothing about; therefore my remarks are not applicable to the resolution as I now understand it.

Mr. SPEAKER. When the hon. member for North York, the other day, gave notice that he intended to move this amendment, I thought his object was to limit the costs to the respondent.

Mr. MULOCK. The subsequent section in the Chairman's hands does provide for such limitation, but we are now on the question of counsel fees, which is a very large item of the disbursements.

Mr. SPEAKER. I see it is all included.

Mr. MULOCK. The printer has made a mistake.

Mr. SPEAKER. I want to say that I am afraid the amendment which the hon. gentleman is proposing will defeat its own object. I could understand a proposition that a larger amount of deposit should be made than $1,000, so that the costs, if they went against the petitioner, could be taken out of the deposit in the court. But I am quite sure that my hon. friends will agree with me that so far as the parties themselves are concerned, this amendment, if it is adopted, will not induce counsel on either side to take a less fee from the party employing them than they would if no such provision as this was made. Now, what would be the effect of it? To my mind, the effect will be that the petitioner will know that $300 at the utmost—only $50 for counsel fees for the first and $40 for each subsequent day—can be levied against him in the event of his fyling a petition and in failing in it. But if my hon. friend lived in the Province of Ontario he would know that he cannot secure the best talent in that province for any such amount. My opinion is, that instead of this proposition having a deterrent effect, it would rather encourage the fyling of petitions, because it limits the costs to the petitioner, in the event of his failing, that could be levied against him. I presume that everybody who is dealing with this question will admit that if a candidate is improperly elected his election ought to be set aside. The proposition here made has only reference to those petitions that are fyled simply for the purpose of harassing the elected member. So far as I can judge of the amendment, I confess that my view of it is that instead of its relieving the sitting member of the embarrassment and annoyance to which he is now subjected, it would have a contrary effect.

Mr. SEMPLE. I think the hon. member for North York deserves credit for bringing this motion forward. The costs charged by eminent counsel are enormous. They mete out justice but no mercy, and some eminent counsel have made fortunes out of the misfortunes of others. It will be a good thing in some respects that it should be laid down that these exorbitant fees be not allowed. To make litigation as cheap as possible is in the general interest. Much has been said in regard to the unfortunate position in which some candidates are placed on election trials. It was agreed to, almost unanimously, that the Bill regarding controverted elections, introduced by the Minister of Justice, was a good one, and there was scarcely a word of dissent from its provisions. In my opinion, there is no measure on the Statute-book more disgraceful than this Controverted Elections Act, because a candidate may wish to conduct the election as purely as possible, he may not wish to spend any money except for lawful purposes, and would rather be defeated than run the risk of being elected by improper means, yet there are always people in the constituency who do not understand the law, and owing to their actions he may be unseated. I hope the same treatment will be extended to candidate, agents, and everyone else taking part in elections.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If the amendment of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) would have the effect of lessening counsel fees I would give it my hearty sympathy and support. It will not, however, prevent counsel charging any fees they can exact from either respondent or petitioner. The only effect it will have, so far as I can see, is that the unsuccessful party will be called on to pay so much less, and the successful party will have to pay out of his own pocket the difference between the counsel fees he can exact on taxation from the unsuccessful party and the fees he is called upon to pay. On reflection it appears to me that this will be no benefit to the sitting member, nor will it prevent the fyling of petitions. On the other hand, as Mr. Speaker has well said, I am rather inclined to think it will encourage the fyling of petitions. A petitioner is now required to deposit $1,000. He does not know but that every farthing will be exhausted, and more than exhausted, if he fails in his petition. But if, under this amendment, there is only exacted a counsel fee of $50 for the first day and $40 for the second day, he knows that all the costs taxable against him will not amount to $1,000. He therefore risks so much the less; he does not risk $1,000; and, unfortunately, the sucessful party, because in that case he is unfortunate, has to pay all the difference for his own counsel and solicitor's fees out of his own pocket. I am afraid that will not have the effect of preventing the fyling of petitions, and I am afraid it will not have the effect of protecting the sitting member. The only way, in my judgment, to prevent the fyling of vexations petitions without justification, or petitions on pure speculation —and we know there are many of them fyled—is to compel the petitioner to give security for a larger amount than he is compelled to deposit now, and allow the costs to stand as at present. The man in the wrong will then have to "pay the piper," and the man in the right, the sitting member, will not have to put his hand in his pocket and purse. Make the petitioner give security for $2,000, two good sureties in the sum of $2,000, that the costs will be forthcoming when required, and I believe that will have more effect in stopping the fyling of petitions than any law Parliament can pass limiting the amount of costs. I admit that the costs are excessive and that counsel fees are very large. Who can help it? If you want to secure the services of eminent counsel you have to pay what they charge. If not, they simply say: Employ some other counsel. I know that in a case in the Supreme Court, with which I had a little connection, the counsel fees—there were two counsel—amounted to $800, and the case only occupied one day. The successful party could not tax that fee, and had to pay it out of his own pocket. That fee was paid because the successful party thought fit to employ one or two counsel who might look upon themselves, perhaps, as at the head of that branch of the profession in Ontario, instead of employing other counsel, who would probably have handled the case as well and as successfully. If a man will select his own counsel, he must pay for doing so. This amendment will not, I repeat, deter people from fyling petitions. The only way to do so is by compelling them to give security. What have we now? I do not speak of one party more than another when I say that whenever an election is over the election agents from Toronto, travelling over the whole of Ontario, beg that a petition be fyled against the sitting member, whoever he may be. I know that in my county the Conservative Association passed a solemn resolution that there should be no petition, and as a matter of fact the agent of the Conservative party was in the riding at the time and said that was all right, unless he got orders from headquarters to the contrary. The matter was left over to the last hour of the last day, and then a petition was fyled. If the petitioner had to give security, securities who are well known and respectable men, petitions of that kind would not be fyled. I do not make this observation as being applicable to one side more than another, but it is the fact. I do not object to a petition being fyled when there are reasonable and just grounds for so doing, but I object to speculative petitions being encouraged, and I am afraid we will encourage the fyling of speculative petitions by limiting the counsel fees to $100 or $200. which will result in the successful party having to pay the balance out of his own pocket.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I agree with much that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) has said, but I differ from his conclusion. It is true this Bill will not prevent counsel earning the fees which they are entitled to demand, and if it did I would be very much inclined to oppose it. It is likewise true that it will not deter the fyling of petitions, nor should we adopt any section which would do so. When we look at the mischief complained of, these two sections together, which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) proposes, are found to give a practical remedy for a practical evil. The practical evil is said to be this: In legislating about ordinary litigation he may regard the parties as evenly balanced, but this is a class of litigation in which the petitioner is very likely to succeed. The law is of such great stringency that the success of the petitioner does not depend on the criminality of the sitting member, but on thousands of irregularities and accidents almost out of the power of human vigilance to control. Under these circumstances, the danger is, that this kind of litigation may be seized on for the purpose of making costs, and for the purpose of making vexatious costs. If that be the fact, and I think it is well established to be the fact, the practical remedy is, to make it profitless to cultivate that kind of litigation as regards professional men who seek to make profit out of it. There may be also a complaint of this kind, that when a petition is well advanced, and when it is found likely to succeed, especially when there are charges of personal corruption against the sitting member, professional men engaged in the case summon a great number of witnesses, far exceeding those which are sufficient to prove the case on which the petitioner eventually rests his case, and summons witnesses in many cases on mere suspicion as to what they can prove. In that case he swells his own fees for subpœnas and everything of that kind. This will have the effect of meeting that grievance, and for that reason I think it would be well to adopt it.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I must say that I have heard nothing in the discussion here which would induce me to oppose the amendment of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). I fully believe that it is a step in the right direction. I am fully sensible of the difficulties in the way, and I fully realize that it may not be a complete cure for the evils which we now suffer, on account of the excessive counsel fees allowed. Members of the bar outside of the City of Toronto, in this Province, have very little chance and are very seldom called upon—perhaps on account of their inferior ability, or on account of the big counsel from Toronto, who seem to absorb very much of this business. I think that is owing to a large extent to the fact that very large counsel fees are allowed. I am not insensible to the argument made by Mr. Speaker, but I think he omits to consider this: that whilst it is true that the petitioner may have to pay out of his own pocket costs which he cannot have taxed against the respondents, at the same time he can use this argument to his counsel: you should not charge me such excessive fees, because in the event of my being defeated I cannot tax this large fee you are charging me.

Mr. SPEAKER. Would that have any effect?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think it would. As it is now, the counsel would say to him: It matters not to you what fee I charge. I can get very large counsel fees, and it will come out of the pocket of the other party. It is equally bad if it comes out of the pocket of the other party in the case, because the other party may have, and probably has, proceeded in perfect good faith. Looking at the whole case, and viewing the evils which we now have to face, I shall support the amendment of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) with great pleasure.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think, so long as the lay members of the House understand the effect of it, that those of the profession to which I have the honour to belong ought perhaps not to press their views very strongly on the Committee. It is quite true what the member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) says, that this is not going to cut down counsel fees one iota. To-day there is not the slightest trouble in getting counsel—I will not make any personal allusions—who are quite willing to accept a much smaller fee than those counsel to which my hon. friend refers, and the counsel fee is only such as is paid in ordinary cases, and not always that, by any means. But the people prefer other counsel, and there is no law that can be passed anywhere that will prevent a man paying to the counsel what the counsel chooses to ask and what the man chooses to pay——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We do not want to do that.

Mr. McCARTHY. If you do not want to do that, realize that a successful member who is in the right, and who has been successful in his petition, notwithstanding that he has succeeded, has got to put his hand in his own pocket and pay a large sum of money. If that is understood by the Committee, then they will vote intelligently upon the question that I submitted; but what appears to be opinion of the lay mind is, that if we pass this amendment, saying counsel fees should only be $50 the first day and $40 the next day, counsel fees will be reduced accordingly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It will help.

Mr. McCARTHY. Nothing of the kind. I agree with what the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) has said; but why not in election cases, as cases where security for costs is required, if the man is out of the jurisdiction, give the power to the judge to say that the deposit shall be increased if the litigation requires it?

Mr. MULOCK. That is not the point.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is connected with it.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Why not do that in the first instance?

Mr. McCARTHY. Because, in an ordinary case $1,000 ought to be sufficient; but if, as the case proceeds it would seem to involve a greater amount than that, then there ought to be power to apply to the court for a stay of proceedings, or that the judge should have power to say that a further amount should be deposited. That is only applying the ordinary practice to the practice in election cases.

Mr. MULOCK. This amendment for $1,000 will be enough.

Mr. McCARTHY. It will be enough, but the sitting member will have to put his hands in his pocket and pay more.

Mr. DICKEY. That is the case, anyway.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not able to answer my hon. friend, because my connection with election cases has been as counsel, and I have had nothing to do with the settling up.

Mr. MULOCK. We all know that the larger the estate in issue the longer the case, and we know that the suit terminates as soon as the estate gives out.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, I think we are perhaps a little wide of the mark. This seems to be a discussion as to what has to be paid and what must be paid in the Province of Ontario; but I would remind the Committee that Ontario is not the whole of this Dominion. I say that the question whether or not you cannot get a first-class man less than so much ought not to weigh in this discussion. I contend that the sum mentioned in the amendment is a fair remuneration, and what is ordinarily got, for example, in the Province of Nova Scotia. More than that, it is what is ordinarily got here in the Supreme Court. I know that I had a case in the Exchequer Court, and had to go to Sydney, away from home, for a fortnight, and to Halifax, to conduct the argument before the court there, and the whole costs as taxed, exclusive of witness fees and disbursements, did not amount to $300. That is the case as between private parties, and why should there be given in an election petition the power to tax a very much larger sum? Why are election petitions fyled? Is it for the maintenance of solicitors? No; it is in the interest of the public, and when you lay down a rule that beyond a certain amount these will not be collected, the effect will be that you will not have to pay very many of these dearer counsel, because there will not be so many petitions fyled. We seem to be arguing that the better counsel—and I hope no man will misunderstand me when I say that the better counsel always will get employment and larger fees—but we are arguing as if there are going to be as many petitions if you curtail the costs as there would be otherwise. I maintain there will not be. I maintain that in many cases there is such a thing as election petitions being filed in which more than the electors are interested; in which, unfortunately, solicitors are more interested sometimes than the electors, and we must meet that case just as well. It has always been a question with me as to whether or not we should not adopt, in part at least, the rule that prevails over the border. There are not very many things that we can learn from them, but there is one thing that we might learn, that is, that all the costs in a case piled up will not go against the unsuccessful party—that if a man goes to law he must understand that there are certain expenses which he will have to bear himself. I do not say that that is the better method; but there should be a mingling of the two, so that any person who chooses to go to law will not get everything from the other side. We must remember also that many parties have been brought into court on election petitions who are not able to pay the bill of costs, and very often they are not the worst men. While we should do all we can by legislation to provide that elections shall be conducted in the purest possible way, we should make such provision that even if an election is set aside the candidate will not be required to pay everything. I claim that $50 a day is enough. It may not be for Ontario, but Ontario should not decide everything for us. There are counsel in Ontario who not only get these large fees, but are entitled to them; but such fees are not paid in the smaller provinces. If you make it impossible to charge more than just fees you will find that there will be fewer election petitions, and better results will follow. For that reason, I am in favour of the amendment.

Mr. CASEY. I am fully in favour of the amendment. I quite see, as the hon. member for North Simcoe says, that no amendment can prevent any client agreeing with his counsel to pay him as much as he chooses; but if it were known beforehand that the client must himself pay all above $300 out of his own pocket, that provision would have this effect, that a man who knows that his case is sound will not go to any unnecessary expense; so that the most costly experts will not be engaged, except by the man who has a poor case. In this sense I think the amendment will undoubtedly reduce the cost of election trials, although it cannot interfere with any agreement between the counsel and his client.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I wish to know if this amendment applies to existing election petitions, because, if it does, it may be unfortunate for those persons who have worked them up.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MULOCK moved the following amendment:—

Except as to such witness fees and other actual disbursements in respect of evidence taxable in ordinary actions between party and party, as may be valued by the judgment or order of the court apportioning costs, no greater sum, including counsel fee, than $300 shall be taxed or taxable against either party as costs in the cause.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 8, sub-section 2,

Mr. LAURIER. This provides that if the judges differ the election is maintained and their judgment is final, or rather the absence of judgment is final. I drew the attention of the Committee to this point the other day. It seems to me that no reason can be advanced why, if an appeal is allowed where there is a judgment, you should not allow one where there is not a judgment. If an appeal is granted when the judges agree, still more, by parity of reasoning, there should be a further hearing of the case when the judges do not agree. Therefore, I propose this amendment to section 50 of the Act:

In all matters whatever to be heard and determined by two judges, if after the case has been argued such judges state that they are unable to agree upon such a decision, it shall be open to any party who thereby feels aggrieved to have the case heard and decided by the Supreme Court of Canada, and for the purpose hereof all the rules applying to and governing appeals shall also apply.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am afraid that the amendment will be hardly workable. If the two judges disagree there is no result of the trial, and one of two events, it seems to me, must follow, either that the petition shall drop, or else it shall go to trial again, as if a jury had disagreed and another jury had to be summoned. I do not think the procedure of appeal would be applicable or useful. The judges of appeal would not be exercising the functions of judges of appeal; they would be endeavouring to try the case, and to try it without hearing the witnesses, which is a very serious drawback indeed. It may be that the judges differ in their views of the weight of the testimony given, as derived from their observation of the demeanour of the witnesses, or from local knowledge of their character. Judges in appeal have not an opportunity to form an opinion on these things, and they are continually insisting that they should not be treated as judges trying cases. The more philosophical provision would be that in the event of the judges disagreeing the case should go to trial again before two other judges, and it is for Parliament to consider whether that course ought to be pursued in quasi penal actions like these, or whether the practice which prevails elsewhere of allowing the defendant the benefit of the doubt indicated by this agreement ought not to be established here. What I propose is just the course followed by the English Parliament. If the judges differ, there is no conclusion and the petition drops. If we adopt any other course we should have to provide for a new trial and not a mere appeal.

Mr. McCARTHY. I agree in the substance of the amendment, because I think it is manifestly out of keeping that an appeal should be allowed when two judges decide in one's favour, and that an appeal should not be allowed and the cause be successful when they differ. That is an inconsistency we should prevent if possible. The Minister of Justice pointed out with a great deal of force that the court of appeal have not the same opportunity of judging the evidence of witnesses as the judges who saw and heard them giving their evidence. That is a difficulty no doubt, and one which cannot be avoided in the case of a disagreement. In practice, however, I do not think there has been any very evil results, because there is a clause in the Ontario Controverted Elections Act which permits an appeal in case of disagreement.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. On questions of law?

Mr. McCARTHY. On questions of law and fact. It would be well if the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment would copy this clause, because it has been carefully considered and seems to me to cover the point.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CASEY. Whatever clause may be adopted in arranging the matter, there can be no two opinions as to the advisability of giving the right to appeal in case of a disagreement. If there is to be an appeal from the decision of two judges clearing a man, there should also be an appeal in the case of a disagreement. The diversity of human nature is such that the chances probably are rather against than for the agreement of two judges, and the law would simply stop all proceedings in cases where the natural tendency of human nature evinced itself. The practical results would be that the greater number of petitions before the court would fall to the ground through disagreement of the judges. That certainly should not be the intention of the House in passing an Act to try controverted elections. As to the question of how the appeal should be taken, whatever may be the present practice in the courts we are quite capable of devising a certain practice which will be applicable in these cases. That is only a question of detail. I hope the Minister of Justice will drop opposition to the principle of the amendment and aid in devising a means to carry it out.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It seems on its face very reasonable that you should have an appeal where the judges differ, but when you come to examine the matter closely you are not very sure whether the Bill is not better without the amendment. In the first place, a man who is tried on an election petition is not tried for any offence he commits himself, in nine cases out of ten, but for an offence alleged to have been committed by another party who, by rigid construction of law, is held to be an agent. If there are sufficient doubts to justify two judges in differing, if one judge says he does not think the agency is proved or that the act constitutes a breach of the law, I think the matter should rest there and the member be allowed to hold his seat. If both judges agree, give an appeal; but if there is so much doubt that the one says he does not think there is sufficient evidence to convict and the other says there is, a case is not made out and the petition should be dropped. You ought to have the union of two minds before giving the right to appeal.

Mr. McCARTHY. If they both agree that the petition should be dismissed?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In case of unanimous decision there should be the right to appeal.

Mr. CASEY. Suppose the two agree to clear him, why should there be an appeal?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You cannot bring this thing down so fine that everything will be exactly logical. Where one of the judges says the evidence is not sufficient, you have not made out a primâ facie case.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman's arguments have a great deal of force, but they are in the direction of having no appeal at all. If they have any weight at all, it is in favour of having no appeal. He says that, if one judge is induced to refrain from signing a decision against the respondent there should be no appeal, and how much more should an appeal lie if the two judges decide that there is no case against the respondent? I am willing to vote that there should be no appeal from the decision of the two judges, but as long as one judge thinks the man is guilty and the other judge does not, then there is a ground for an appeal. If the judges agree to dismiss the case there is no ground for going further, but if one judge thinks the person is guilty there is ground for going further. But the law as proposed by the Minister of Justice would permit an appeal where both judges agreed to dismiss it, but no appeal where one judge thought the respondent was guilty, though the other judge took another view.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I regret to hear that the Minister of Justice does not desire to support the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. At present the Court of Review have to decide the case on a legal point, but if it is a question of fact they have not the advantage of hearing the witnesses and observing their demeanour, which is a very important fact in forming an opinion as to their credibility. The appeal here is allowed when the judges are unanimous, but there is no appeal when the judges did not agree. The six months which are allowed may have expired before the time comes for an appeal, and the respondent will still hold his seat, however unjustly, unless there is an appeal allowed to the Court of Review. I regret that there is to be no appeal. We know that even judges make mistakes. Some of the most eminent judges in the Province of Ontario have decided against the respondent, and their decision has been reversed on appeal. Every fair argument points to an appeal where the judges do not agree; the reasons for it are stronger than where the judges do agree.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I prefer the English rule to the Ontario rule, and I think the argument in favour of an appeal where the judges do not agree as compared with an appeal where the judges do agree is most fallacious.

Mr. CASEY. The English rule is no appeal at all.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. When two judges decide questions of fact the court above, as a rule, will not disturb that decision, unless they have decided on a wrong principle.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to hear the Minister say that he prefers the English rule that there should be no appeal on questions of fact in any case. I would like to see a provision that there should be no appeal where the respondent was cleared by the action of the lower court, but that there should be an appeal, at all events on points of law, where the respondent is made liable to penalties by the action of the lower court. I think the country generally would be content to have no appeal in any case; but, if we are to continue this rule of an appeal from two judges, we must, as a matter of justice, as well as of logic, provide for a second hearing of the case, whether you call it an appeal or a re-trial in case of disagreement. The lawyers in the House seem not to look upon it as a proper subject for appeal, but whatever you may call it, you should have a new trial of the matter if necessary, and it is the right of the public to have a final decision given on the points by the superior tribunal.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think you will find that there is no difficulty in this matter. We have found none in Ontario in allowing appeals of this kind. The only appeals I can think of were on very important questions of law. One appeal was in reference to one of the Northumberlands, where the Chancellor took one view and the late Chief Justice Cameron took another view, as to whether there was any breach of the law in accepting passes on a railway. Both judges might agree as to the credibility of witnesses, but they might differ on the legal construction, and generally the difference between the judges has been on questions of law and not on questions of fact. Consequently, to avoid a second trial, the Supreme Court ought to be allowed to decide on the question of law. As to the question of fact, there is no difficulty. If there is a witness that one judge has chosen to believe and the other judge has chosen to disbelieve, the result is that the Supreme Court will not believe that witness, and the case would be tried on other grounds. We are now allowing appeals on questions of fact from two judges. Two judges have said upon questions of fact: We have arrived at certain conclusions. The Supreme Court will not differ from their finding as to the credibility of the witness, but they will, and frequently do, draw different conclusions from the admitted facts. Now, that is what happens when two judges decide. Supposing the judges differ on a question of fact. The Supreme Court would be exactly in the same position; they will not accept the evidence of a man that one judge has discredited, but because one judge has discredited him that would be sufficient, I think, for the appellate court to say: We must take the views of that judge. That being so, the conclusion the judges have arrived at from the facts on which they agree may be, and possible will be, the cause of the differences. Why, therefore, should there not be an appeal? Don't call it an appeal; if you like, call it anything you please; but why, in that case, should there not be an opportunity of finishing the litigation in a legitimate manner, instead of terminating it in a futile way of having the court disagree and nothing being done? The effect is, that if two judges agree the petition is dismissed; if the judges differ the petition is dismissed; there is a finality; but according to this section, if the judges agree there is an appeal; if the judges differ, it rests there, unless the judges find a way of giving relief to the parties. As I understand the section, the case is neither dismissed nor is it allowed; it remains there. I think we ought to allow an appeal, taking such provisions as may be necessary that the Court of Appeal should not accept the testimony of any witness whom one of the judges has discredited.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman advocate an appeal in every case where the judges differ on fact as well as law?

Mr. McCARTHY. Now that we have settled that there is to be an appeal in every case, I think we ought to allow an appeal a fortiori in a case where the judges differ, if we are going to allow an appeal where judges agree.

Mr. LAURIER. If the sense of the Committee is to accept this amendment, I would beg to move the Ontario amendment, which is copied verbatim from the Ontario statute.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Do you wish to divide?

Mr. LAURIER. Not unless you do.

Committee divided on the amendment of Mr. Laurier: Yeas, 32; nays, 33.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I would draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to a point which occurred in Toronto the other day. I am told that a judge of the Court of Appeal has decided that where the respondent to a petition dies there is no mode by which the petitioner can get the deposit out of court. If that is so, the hon. gentleman ought to provide for it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will have something prepared to meet that difficulty.

Mr. CASEY. I move that the following subsection be added to section 15, as amended by section 6:—

The Government shall name and appoint an officer whose duty it shall be to prosecute all persons found guilty of corrupt practices during the trial of election petitions, except such as have received certificates from the judges for the enforcement of the penalties to which they are liable under this Act.

As a matter of fact, although the agents of candidates are placed under penalties for corrupt practices charged during elections, they are practically never prosecuted, and consequently they escape punishment as a rule. The party which succeeds at a trial is satisfied, and does not care to raise animosity by instituting prosecutions. The party which has been beaten is friendly to the man who has committed the corrupt act. Unless it is made the duty of some particular person to enforce the law, it will not be, and has not been enforced. I use the words "name and appoint" so that the Government might name some existing officers, such as the county attorney or some officer in the Department of Justice, or might appoint a new officer for the purpose of conducting these prosecutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman will examine the clause relating to this subject he will find that power is given to the Governor in Council to prosecute in all cases of corrupt practice. I have acted on this power several times.

Mr. CASEY. It is left optional.

Mr. McCARTHY. No; it is not optional.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As this question which has been raised may involve questions of very considerable importance, it is desirable it should be discussed after recess.

Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CASEY. After further inspecting the law as it now stands, I find what seems to be sufficient provision for carrying out what I intended to effect by my amendment, and I will, therefore, withdraw it.

Amendment withdrawn.

Committee rose and reported progress.

FRAUDS ON THE GOVERNMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 172) respecting frauds on the Government.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the Minister state what he hopes to accomplish by this Bill that he cannot accomplish with the law as it now stands?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Bill proposes to go further than the existing statute, principally in this particular: The present statute makes it an offence for a public officer to receive a gift for the purpose of inducing him to neglect any duty which he owes to the Government, or for the commission of any fraud on the Government. The statute, likewise, makes it an offence for any person to give, or offer a gift or gratuity for that purpose. The object of the present Bill is to make it an offence, likewise, for a public officer, under any circumstances, to receive a gift from a person dealing with the Government. Circumstances have occurred in which it would be impossible to prove that in the discharge of his duty the officer in any way was influenced by the gratuity. It has been so alleged, and in all probability would have been proved in the trial of any such case, that the duty had been faithfully discharged for the Government, that the contractor or person who offered the gift had not obtained an enhanced price in view of such consideration, and the Government had sustained no injury. Nevertheless, it is most desirable that such an evil should be stopped at its source, and that it should not be necessary, in order to make such an offence punishable, that we should have to prove injury and actual fraud committed, or even fraudulent intent. It is necessary that officers of the Government should be free from suspicion in regard to any such matters, and therefore the reception of gifts under such circumstances by such officers is made an offence by this Bill. This is the main distinction between this and the existing statute. If the House is prepared for it we can go on in Committee; if not, we can simply take the second reading and go into Committee on Monday.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. gentleman had better let the Committee stage stand until Monday, when we will have an opportunity of comparing the Bill with the existing statute.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will say Monday next.

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY TO PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 111) to authorize the transfer of certain public property to the Provincial Governments.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When this Bill was read the second time I expressed my views upon it, and I expressed my regret that the Bill extended to the foreshores of the provinces when in the open sea or in the bays. It did seem to me, and I have not seen any reason to change my opinions, that these territorial foreshores are at present vested in the Local Government, and I do not see any reason for taking power to transfer them, as this Act does, under certain conditions and limitations set out in the schedule. It seemed to me that the rights in these foreshores are vested in the Local Governments, without any limitations except the limitations attached to all provincial lands. The Bill to that extent, I think, goes too far and deals with a subject, we have no power to deal with. Having made my protest in the matter, I do not propose to take up any further time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I may say that the question remains undecided as to the ownership of the coasts and open foreshores. The Bill, when it comes into operation by any transfer being made under it, will, in point of fact, be a treaty between the two Governments—the Government making the grant and the Government receiving it. The Government making the grant will certainly have property to transfer, because the Bill proposes to include property which is decided to be ours, and as regards that which may be in doubt, and to which the hon. gentleman particularly refers—the sea coasts—not only is the question of title undecided, but the boundary is always open to doubt and uncertainty, in view of the decision that the harbours belong to us. In that view, in dealing with the Provincial Government, we are in the position of a neighbour whose boundary line is in dispute, and we settle once for all, by conveyance to one of the parties, all questions of boundaries, and we receive from the other party concessions which are of advantage to us, as regards any different interest we may have in relation to the property.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I may just say, in passing, that I have always entertained the opinion, although the Supreme Court decided differently, that the foreshores in the harbours belonged to the Local Governments, and although we are bound to to accept the decision of the court, it did seem to me that the intention of the British North America Act would have been better carried out if we had passed a statute expressly declaring that the foreshores in the harbours did belong to the Provincial Governments. That would set the matter at rest. The decision of the Supreme Court went counter to the opinion entertained by the majority of the provinces and by the majority of lawyers in the provinces, and was contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act, although they held it to be within the letter. I foresee that great difficulty may arise out of this statute, because the Provincial Governments, instead of taking this property and holding it as ordinary public land, will hold it on the terms set out in the schedule.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not know whether the Minister of Justice or the Committee have considered sufficiently the result as to rivers and harbours that may follow from this transfer of property. If the property belongs to the Dominion, as has been so far decided, whether rightly or wrongly, of course the provinces cannot dispose of it in any way. By this Act it is intended now to confer upon the provinces the property, leaving with this Parliament the legislative control and jurisdiction over harbours, which, of course, we are not at liberty to delegate or part with. Has the Minister of Justice considered what the effect may be on a harbour of the sale and disposition of a portion of it by a Provincial Parliament? For instance, now, in the city of Toronto, by an arrangement, which I am not saying is at all objectionable, the harbour is interfered with by the land being extended out 200 or 300 feet beyond what is called the old windmill line. In that particular harbour that does not work any mischief, but if you part with the control of the soil there will be nothing to prevent a Provincial Government from disposing, for valuable consideration or otherwise, of such property, and constructions may be put upon it which will interfere with the harbours.

Mr. SPEAKER. It seems to me there is a very strong objection to the transfer proposed in this Bill. There are in many places wharves and other accommodations to navigation, and the soil upon which they are erected has not been acquired by patent or otherwise by municipal or private corporations who may have put up those constructions; and if this Bill passes, unless there are some very strict reservations in it, the Provincial Governments to whom the lands are conveyed may sell them to private individuals, who may then require the removal of those constructions which are necessary and useful adjuncts to the navigation of navigable rivers and streams over which this Parliament has control. The hon. Minister ought to consider very carefully the question of reserving any rights of that kind, some of which may have been acquired, not by statute, but by the consent of the Government, which was presumed heretofore to have control of these structures.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The matter has been fully considered, and if the view I take is right, there can be no inconvenience resulting from this measure. We are dealing, as the hon. member for North Simcoe said, merely with our right of property, and transferring that alone. Our right of property in these harbours, taking the case of harbours alone, is the ownership of the bed of the harbour and its foreshores. While that property remains in use we can sell it or transfer it by lease or otherwise; but we cannot, by virtue of our mere ownership, authorize the erection of any structure, we cannot authorize any harbour to be filled in in the manner in which Toronto harbour is being filled in, or authorize a private citizen to erect a wharf, no matter how small, upon it. The ownership is subject to all the rights of the public as regards navigation, and, therefore, anything that disturbs navigation, as, for instance, the filling in of the foreshore in front of Toronto city, or the erection of a wharf, may be an interference with navigation, and cannot be authorized by us by the mere transfer of the property. If I, as a private individual, were to receive a patent from the Crown of a portion of the foreshore of Toronto harbour, that would not of itself give me the right to drive a post in it, or fill it in, or do any act which would in the least degree interfere with the navigation of any person who likes to use the water which flows upon it. All that species of property, all that kind of right, is controlled by the legislation of this Parliament which enables the Minister of Public Works to sanction the erection of bridges and wharves and such works as are going on in Toronto harbour; but without that sanction, that control cannot be exercised by a patentee of the Crown. It is true that in all the harbours wharves are erected. They are erected, generally speaking, by persons who have received patents from the Crown, but their patents did not authorize the erection of those structures. They exist by the permission of the public, and by virtue only of their being a convenience to navigation, and not an obstruction, except where there has been an arbitrary enactment of this Parliament, which gives the Minister of Public Works power to erect these structures. Independently of that permission, the right to build a structure does not follow from the right of ownership in the soil of a harbour. That must depend on its being susceptible of proof that the structure is not a nuisance but a public convenience. Therefore, the Provincial Governments will take the transfer we propose to make in this Bill with the same limitations. They will have the same property as we had. They will have the same rights to give patents to private individuals that we had; but under this Act Provincial Governments will not have, any more than ourselves, the right to fill in or obstruct or build wharves on these properties. All that will remain under our control as affecting navigation, and as regulated by our statutes.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the statement of the Minister of Justice is correct, and I have no doubt it is, this result will follow: Suppose that land conveyed to a province is then transferred by the province to a private individual, that individual cannot, according to the statement of the Minister of Justice, make any erection upon land covered by water without getting the consent of the Department of Public Works or the Governor in Council. But suppose that the person owning the land chooses to prevent any person else from erecting a structure on it which may be necessary, and supposing he wishes to prevent a municipal corporation from putting up a structure necessary for the purposes of navigation, I take it the Minister of Public Works would have no power under this Bill to compel him to do so, for I do not think it provides for expropriation, if private individuals to whom the land may belong, or a Provincial Government, may choose to prevent the erection of structures that may be considered a great public convenience, and this Government will be powerless.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. With regard to the class of cases mentioned by Mr. Speaker, and to which I forgot to refer, of persons having built structures for public convenience without having received a patent from the Crown, those cases can easily be protected. We may think it well to protect them by some further provision of the Bill before leaving Committee, or by a further condition attached to the transfer, because we have taken power in the first section to attach any condition we please to any transfer, or it may be those matters will be dealt with fairly enough by the Provincial Governments. I admit that the rights are not reserved of persons who have built structures already without having received a title from the Crown or permission from the Minister of Public Works, and it will remain to be considered, before we close the Bill, whether it may or may not be well to protect them. As regards the other class of cases, Mr. Speaker assumes this state of facts: that I should be the owner of property upon the bank of a river, lake, or harbour, and that a Provincial Government will patent to some other individual the water bed, and thereby prevent me putting up a structure which might be a public convenience and would be a convenience to me particularly. I do not think I can conceive a Provincial Government permitting an injury like that. Provincial Governments have dealt with the foreshores all along under the assumption that they owned them—at any rate, until the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Holman and Green. They had dealt with other portions of the foreshore since, and I think the occasions are very rare indeed in which grievances have arisen. If a Provincial Government has granted to another the water in front of any lands owned by private individuals, it would require that state of facts before the inconvenience Mr. Speaker refers to would arise, and I see no reason to apprehend that a Provincial Government would deal less fairly with the disposition of the land than we would ourselves. I think they have not done so in the past. I have had some knowledge of the administration of matters of this kind in one of the provinces, and I know that the cardinal principle which has guided the administration of the foreshores was that the water in front of private property was never to be granted, except to the owner of the property. It was offered to him or was retained by the Crown.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope that may be the result; but I have in my mind a case which occurred in my own town. The eastern boundary of the town runs in a north-westerly direction to the Ottawa River, whilst the western boundary runs north-easterly. There was a farm on the western boundary of the town, and the Ontario Government have, without consulting the town authorities, granted to the owner of that land the land covered by water in front of his farm overlapping the front of the town. If that can be done in regard to land in the west of the town, it might equally be done in regard to land in the east of the town, so that the private owners might own the soil in front of the town, and if the wharves were required to be extended the owners of private property might have it in their power to prevent the extension.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the legislation proposed by the Minister of Justice is founded upon the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Holman vs. Green, and it has been assumed that the foreshore is the property of the provinces, and does not differ from other public property under their control. Upon that decision this legislation is proposed, in order to bring about the state of things which it is supposed existed before the decision was given. I do not suppose that that decision goes as far as this Bill. I understand that it refers only to property in harbours in the sense described in the British North America Act, which is a small bay or basin on which an amount of money has been expended, so as to make it a property having a certain value. The harbours of this description are included in one of the schedules of the British North America Act, and it is provided that these shall be the property of the Dominion. Whatever may be the nature of the property in the harbour, it seems to me, if there were any such comprehensive rule of property as is assumed to exist by this Bill, there was no necessity to declare that these harbours were the property of the Dominion, because the transfer of these properties to the province would certainly imply that all property of that description belonged to the Dominion until it was transferred to the province. I do not think that question is interfered with by the decision in the case of Holman vs. Green. In the decisions of the English courts it is recognized that the King had no power to grant property in harbours or the right of fishing by letters patent, or vesting that right in particular persons. It was declared that, though the property was vested in the Crown, the right of transfer did not exist, and could only be exercised by the supreme authority, that is, by Parliament itself. It seems to me we go a long way by this Bill in transferring property, which it may be argued does not belong to us, but it may be stated that it belongs to a province. I do not think the case of Holman and Green is a justification for such legislation as this. It may be said that we cannot convey more interest than we possess, and if the right to the foreshore is already in the province our claim to exercise a right of transfer to the province may not do any mischief; but we may attach conditions to the transfer which might be an interference or a limitation of the provincial right, if they accepted or acquiesced in our action. Then it would be difficult to go behind the Act and into the motives of the transfer. Any province which refused to accept this transfer and contested it would, under this Bill, have a different position.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The argument of the hon. gentleman amounts to this: that the Federal Government, under the word "harbours," has only jurisdiction over harbours which have been made by public expenditure, but that is not the view which has been taken by the Supreme Court of Canada. The decision in the case of Holman and Green related to a portion of the harbour of Summerside, which is a natural harbour, and that was followed by a decision in regard to the harbour of Halifax, which is also a natural harbour, upon which no expenditure has been made nor improvements constructed. Now, that being the case, the hon. gentleman will see that the decisions have gone far beyond his interpretation of the British North America Act. I do not say that they are correct; it would be presumptious in me to say that they are open to the suspicion of being incorrect. But I am availing myself of this decision to obtain a settlement of all questions, and I admit that I am acting on the strongest assumption as to what our rights of property are. I admit I am assuming that the foreshores and beds of all the natural harbours belong to us, and the sea coasts and lake shores as well. I find, on the other hand, that the Provincial Governments are anxious to get a settlement of these questions without litigation. It may be that if we resort to litigation to settle them one party or the other may lose rights which it is important they should retain, and which it is not important the other party should acquire. For example, the decision in Holman and Green was practically of no benefit to us. It charges us with the administration of the foreshores and beds of all the public harbours, and that administration is of no profit whatever to the Dominion Government, and can perhaps be better carried on by the staff of officers which are available for the Provincial Governments. Acting on the strongest assumption that I can entertain as regards our right of property, I put forward a scheme for a settlement with the provincial authorities, and I say to them: "Will you settle this question now on terms which will adjust the rights of both parties completely, and which will give both parties what it is desirable, in the interest of the public, they should have?" If any one province does not acquiesce in that view, and prefers to settle by litigation—reaching, as it must, the Privy Council eventually—what its actual legal rights are, we shall both stand on our rights to get them adjusted; but my belief is that nearly all the provinces are willing to avail themselves of this scheme of settlement, and that the result will be beneficial to both Governments.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The decision in Holman and Green was as large and comprehensive as the Minister of Justice states. I argued that case myself, and I contended for the legal construction of the words "public harbour," under the British North America Act, that the hon. member for Bothwell advocates. I contended that the public harbours were artificial harbours that had been constructed at the expense of the Provincial Government. That was the conclusion to be drawn from the collocation of the words where "public harbours" appeared. But the court did not hold that. They held that it extended to all harbours, natural as well as artificial. Therefore, so far as the Bill extends and embraces public harbours, I would have no criticism to offer, because I think the House would be justified in assuming that the decision of the Supreme Court is the law of the land. But the point of exception I take is this: That the decision in the Supreme Court should not be extended further than that. The sea coast and arms of the sea are not and cannot be, in my opinion, by any intendment, brought within the words of the British North America Act. Public harbours mean just what the phrase expresses, and nothing more. The shores of the sea and the shores of bays and harbours were not conveyed, and were not intended to be conveyed by the British North America Act, from the Local Governments to the Dominion Government. Passing from that point, I will take very strong exception to the introduction in this Bill of any more exceptions, such as Mr. Speaker suggests. I entirely object to any attempt being made by this Parliament to adjust complex questions which may arise between the different riparian owners. These questions must be adjusted in each case as they come up by law; we cannot do it here. He talks about lines converging in such a way in front of some town or village that the riparian owners in the town itself are cut off. It is impossible for anybody to give an opinion without knowing the exact facts. But it was long ago decided in the celebrated case of the Fishmongers, that went up to the House of Lords, that the rights of the riparian owner, whether on the sea shore or river, cannot be taken from the owner by anybody else; that is, that subject to the right of navigation, which is paramount the right of all riparian owners, to free access to and from the shore of the sea or river, is indisputable, and there must be no attempt made on the part of this Parliament to interfere with that right. Mr. Speaker suggests that possibly if we transfer this right, that we claim to be vested in Canada, to the Provincial Governments, the transfer might have the effect of depriving some riparian owner of his rights. I cannot see that it would do anything of the kind. In the province from which I come I never knew a grant of the foreshore given to anybody except the riparian owner; in fact, it would not be legal in our province, because the local statute expressly declares that if the Crown grants the foreshore it can only be given to the riparian owner or to somebody to whom the riparian owner has given a written consent that he may become the grantee. But we must be very careful in dealing with this very important and complicated subject of riparian ownership, and we must avoid using any language which would in any way prejudice the right of the province or of the individual owners. Let them decide that for themselves. We are engaged here, not merely in transferring from the Dominion to the province rights which we claim to possess, but rights which I for one claim we do not possess, and in doing so we should see that there are no improper conditions annexed to the transfers. But to the introduction in the Bill of anything such as Mr. Speaker suggests I would take strong exception, and I assume the Government will not yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think this is a measure that requires a good deal of consideration before we accept it, because if we are mixing up our right of property we are in danger of sacrificing our right of property to our right of legislation. Now, it does not appear to me that the Crown, as represented by the Dominion, can claim at all to have a right of property in the soil of the harbour. The transfer evidently is intended to be a transfer of the constructions.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is not the decision.

Mr. McCARTHY. It may not be. We ought, perhaps, to consider what really is the effect of the Act. Then it is quite clear we have got legislative control over the harbours, and that we should be very careful not to do anything that by any means might interfere with the proper legislative control and jurisdiction which we have over the public harbours of the country. What I had in my mind when I rose first—I have sent for the statutes since—was this: that some years before Confederation, in the old provinces of Canada, power was given to convey the soil in navigable waters and in harbours.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was not that restrictive of the riparian owner?

Mr. McCARTHY. No. I suppose that does not apply beyond the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada. But what I thought of was that if we have the power—we have the practice in the first place—and if we have the power in the second place, to transfer that property to any other body, then it becomes subject, unless we make some controlling exceptions, to their control, to their right of conveyance; and their right of conveyance, although more limited than I first thought it was, still leaves discretion with them. The words of the section are:

"It has been heretofore, and it shall be hereafter lawful for the Lieutenant Governor in Council to authorize sales or appropriations of land covered with water in the harbours, rivers, and other navigable waters in Quebec, under such conditions as it has been, or it may be deemed requisite to impose, but not so as to interfere with the use of any harbours or harbour, or the navigation of any harbour, river or other navigable water."

That leaves it, of course, to be settled as a question of law, whether the erection which the private purchaser might make would or would not interfere with the harbours or harbour, or with the navigation of the rivers or river. What I desire to draw the attention of the Committee to is this: If we go back to the old common law, which has been correctly explained by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and that is, that the right in the soil rests in the Crown merely as trustees for the public, we cannot in any sense take it unless we give ourselves authority by legislation to do so as a matter of property. It is a trust we hold for the public, subject to public rights and public easement. We are proposing to convey all that property to another Government, to be by that Government dealt with under such restrictions as are determined by Order in Council, but not under such restrictions as are settled by Parliament, not reserving to Parliament from time to time the power to make restrictions; and, consequently, we may at once find ourselves at conflict with the Provincial Governments in regard to a question the jurisdiction of which is exclusively vested here. Dealing with harbours and rivers, why should we hamper ourselves, if they are not valuable as a property—I do not see how they can be valuable as an asset, and I do not understand we have found them so—by transferring them; why not hold them in trust for the public, subject to the control of Parliament? I submit, before we adopt this measure, we ought carefully to consider whether we will not be involving ourselves in conflict, or involving ourselves in possibility of a conflict, not by any means desirable in a federal constitution, such as ours, between the local authority and this authority; whether we had not better keep such right as we have in harbours and rivers, where it is given to us by the British North America Act, because we have the legal control.

Mr. SKINNER. I should like to say a few words as to our position in the Maritime Provinces. The term "foreshore," taken in a strictly legal sense, is that portion of the shore between high and low water mark. The land or portion of the country between high or low water mark on the shores of the Bay of Fundy is very large. I know one portion of the bay where the foreshore extends between high and low water mark a distance of at least two miles. Taking the Province of New Brunswick, from the State of Maine to the head of the Bay of Fundy, a distance of 150 miles, there is a sequence of small rivers pouring into the bay, which not only drain a large portion of country, but have valuable timber lands on their upper waters, and there are mill privileges at the mouth of every one of those rivers. These mill privileges cannot be enjoyed, the lumber cannot be brought down and preserved, unless the foreshore is infringed upon, that is to say, booms erected upon the foreshore and also wharves built for the bringing of the merchandise out and shipping of the lumber after it has been manufactured. Thus we are now in this position: That to put any of these booms at the mouth of these rivers, or to erect any of the wharves on those foreshores, is to infringe on the right of navigation; and in order to obtain the right to do so, that is to infringe on the privilege of navigation, the parties have to come to the Dominion Parliament, because all questions of navigation are centralized here. Therefore, if this Bill is passed we will be brought into conflicting circumstances, for the right to handle the foreshore will rest in the Local Legislature, but the right to regulate navigation over those shores rests in the Dominion Parliament. I do not see how they can be managed in that way with this conflict of authority. With some experience, arising from cases with which I have been connected, it occurs to me that it would be better in the interest of trade and commerce, at all events in the Bay of Fundy, if, instead of the foreshores being vested in the Local Legislature, they should be vested in the Dominion: because, the Dominion having the right of legislating regarding the question of navigation, it would be much better if it also had the right to regulate the property where the navigation is. Before this Bill is passed, and I am not making these remarks as opposing the Bill, but to throw light on the question, it should be very well considered whether it would be in the interest of the business of that portion of the country to have it settled that the right to legislate with respect to this matter must be vested in the Dominion Parliament, while the bare right of property remains in the Local Legislature, and therefore there must be a conflict of authority. It would be much better that the power that had the right to legislate with regard to navigation should also have the right of ownership of the property, so that the two might be united together, and those rights and privileges and property be regulated by one power instead of two powers.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I admit all that has been said about the common law rule as to the ownership of the Crown in public harbours and property of that kind. It is, I think, not useful for us in considering how we should legislate in view of that principle, because that principle has been abrogated by statute everywhere long ago. Every province passed statutes enabling the Crown to alienate the foreshores, beds of harbours, and so forth. The Dominion Parliament has done the same. At the present time we have a statute which enables grants and patents to be made, as of public property of the soil, and beds of harbours and streams, and other properties which may be considered to be vested in us, so far as title goes. There is a good deal of plausibility in the view which strikes the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner), that it would be most convenient that the right of property should remain in the authority that has the power of legislation. But my hon. friend will observe, in the first place, that by the last provision in the Bill it is distinctly provided that our rights of legislation with respect to navigation, shipping, fishing, and everything of that kind, shall not be in the least impaired by this statute. The question, then, narrows itself down to this: By what Government can these properties be most conveniently administered? Let us take the case of property in St. John or in Halifax. It is of great importance that authority to regulate trade and commerce, navigation and shipping, should remains with us; but if it were a mere question respecting the erection of a wharf in a particular locality, it is more convenient for the people of the province that their own Provincial Governments should deal with that matter, as with public lands. They have officers on the spot, surveyors, who can go to the locality from which an application is made. They report on it, prepare a plan and furnish any observations they can offer in the way of information. The plans, which are accessible to every one, in the Crown lands office or public lands office, show every grant that has been made, every structure that has been authorized and there is every application on fyle. We have here to consider the mode of administering such property all over the Dominion, without any local system of registration, of plans or otherwise, without any staff of local officers who can give their attention to the matter, and the whole thing would be lacking in system, inconvenience and in expedition, unless we go to the expense of organizing a kind of public land system in each province, for the administration of property of this kind, which is of no value to us whatever, out of which we cannot get the income that is necessary to pay the expenses, and which, it seems to me, can conveniently fit into the management of the public lands of the provinces. These are theories on which, it seems to me, this kind of property can be best administered locally, and I do not think there is likely to be any confusion between legislative powers and the right of property, considering that everywhere these properties have been dealt with by virtue of statutes, as belonging to the Crown, to be alienated.

Mr. SKINNER. I know of one case in New Brunswick where the Local Legislature granted the power to a company to erect booms for the purpose of protecting lumber, which erection went over the foreshore, and the riparian owners objected to it. The case was that of Davidson against the Petit River Boom Company. The case came to the Supreme Court of Canada on appeal, and it was decided that the Local Legislature of New Brunswick had not the power to act as they did. Can we not avoid this; that is to say, will the Local Government have the power to give to every authority the Minister refers to the power to erect these wharves, if it interferes with navigation? The point I fear is this: that although it may be said under the law that the Local Government can do this, yet if it interferes with navigation it cannot give them the power to do it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It would not matter in what Government you vested that power, for in no case would they have power to make that grant. That grant was held by the Supreme Court not to be valid because it interfered with the riparian owner's rights. The riparian owner has the right to free and uninterrupted access to the sea. The Local Government gave power to a boom company to interfere with private rights, and neither the Dominion Government nor the Local Governments have power to do that. I agree with the Minister of Justice that it is better these lands should be vested in the Local Governments. My opinion is, that it at present is vested in the Provincial Governments, except so far as public harbours are concerned, and that is the reason I took exception to the Bill in the first instance.

On section 2,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would venture to ask whether this is a fair provision. If my contention is correct that these lands are at present vested in the Local Government, as it was the intention of the British North America to invest them, it is hardly fair that we should take to ourselves under this section a right which we do not at present possess. Assuming my argument to be correct that the foreshores are vested in the Provincial Governments, then we have no right to expropriate any part of it for Dominion work, and the hon. gentleman is making it now to contain in the transfer from the Dominion to the Provincial Governments of rights which I say do not exist or are at least in doubt: that we may have the right for all time to expropriate these lands for public works, provided they are not sold or improvements made upon them. It seems to me after all said and done, that looking at the doubts which exist, it would be better to transfer to them, and if we want to expropriate afterwards take it in the ordinary way.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will see that we are not doing this without the consent of the Provincial Governments. With a view to a settlement of the whole question, we are asking of them terms which the hon. gentleman thinks are a little unreasonable, but when that view was put to me by a gentleman on behalf of one of the provinces, I answered him by asking, whether, under the circumstances indicated here, the Government of Canada, desiring to erect a public building on part of the foreshore belonging to the province, the province would not at any time give the transfer for that purpose? We are in the habit of giving them our property, and they give us theirs for such purposes.

On section 3,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will that extend to reserves 200 feet at the side of a public pier, as well as in front of it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And the Provincial Governments have assented to that?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Those with whom I have conferred about it. The original Act claimed 1,000 feet and we have settled on 200 feet.

Committee rose and reported progress.

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 165) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I explained it when I introduced it. The provisions are not very important. One refers to school lands, which we propose to give to railway companies in granting alternate townships in lieu of alternate sections. Then there is an amendment to the provision requiring an application for a patent to be made after an occupation of three months. In some cases the application has not been made until a later date, and it has been held that the patent could not be issued unless the application was made immediately on the completion of the three months' residence. Another clause amends the provision requiring five years' residence, a certain cultivation in the first two years, and six months' occupation in each of the three following years, the Bill providing that the patent may be given though the cultivation prescribed for the first two years has not been carried out. Then there is a clause which compels a party to apply for his license five years after the entry. In some cases parties who have carried out the provisions have left the country and their whereabouts cannot be discovered, and this is to enable us to cancel the homestead entry if the patent has not been applied for within the five years. A good many complaints have been made in reference to lands not having been applied for after the patent has been earned, the result being that municipalities have not been able to collect any taxes upon such lands. Then there are two or three clauses enlarging the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act in regard to liens. This is the substance of the Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think there is very great objection to the first amendment to this Bill, which allows the Government to treat as a portion of a subsidy the lands set apart by the Parliament of Canada for school purposes. These lands have in many cases become valuable on account of the improvement of the surrounding district ; and it is because they have become valuable that their sale will in time serve to constitute a school fund of a considerable amount, which in itself will afford a corresponding relief to the population who settle in the country, in connection with the maintenance of public schools. What the hon. gentleman proposes by this Bill is to take power to the Government to take these school lands and apply them as a portion of a railway subsidy or for some other purpose, altogether foreign to the purpose for which they have been reserved.

Mr. DEWDNEY. We substitute others.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman may substitute lands on the shores of the Arctic. It is important that these lands, which have been specifically named from the very first survey of the country as school lands, should be applied to no other purpose whatever. If we consent to break in upon that reservation which has been made for educational purposes, the lands that will be substituted for them will always be in the newer districts, where lands are less desirable and less valuable, and where they may acquire no increase of value for many years to come, so that the population may receive no relief from their school burdens within any reasonable time by bringing the school lands into the market. This provision simply means that the railway corporations are becoming very powerful in that country, and that they are exercising undue influence over the hon. gentleman and those of his colleagues who have assented to this change—a change which in my opinion will be of very serious detriment to the well-being of the country. It reveals simply a desire for Naboth's vineyard. The hon. gentleman proposes to give lands elsewhere that will have little or no value. Well, if lands elsewhere can be had that are about as valuable as these, let the corporation obtain them, but do not divert the school lands from the purposes for which they were set apart. Allow them to remain as such, and when they have acquired proper value, put them upon the proper market and let the proceeds be devoted to the wants of education, but do not hand them over to railway companies to be held for speculative purposes, and to be, as experience has shown, impediments in the way of settlement instead of instruments for the rapid settlement of the country. Let the school lands originally set apart remain school lands and take care they are not appropriated for any other purposes. The hon. gentleman proposes that lands elsewhere may be substituted for them. If such lands are susceptible of being substituted for the original school lands, they ought to be acceptable to the railway company. I trust the hon. gentleman will not proceed in the direction of this clause. Let it be struck out, and let the public who are invited to come into the country feel that the lands set apart for the purposes of education will be used for those purposes alone.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman as to the way in which we should deal with the school lands. They are a solemn trust which should be very carefully administered, but the proposition I submit to the House is one which was made in accordance with the policy advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite, that of giving alternate townships to railway companies in preference to alternate sections. The land given to railway companies there are not as a rule agricultural land and it is not expected they will be thickly settled, and it was in order to give them these alternate townships so that railway corporations might be able to dispose of a portion of the range of country in a solid block. By Act 49 Victoria, chapter 12, passed the 2nd of June, 1886, we gave the Government the power of not only dealing in that way with the school lands but also with the Hudson's Bay lands :

"Notwithstanding anything contained in sections eighteen and nineteen of the 'Dominion Lands Act, 1883,' the Governor in Council is hereby empowered to grant the subsidies in land authorized by the Act cited in the preamble to this Act, wholly or in part, in tracts each comprising a township or a fractional part of a township, as he deems expedient : but no such grant shall be made until an extent of land equivalent to that reserved for the Hudson's Bay Company in the township, or fractional part of a township to be so granted, has been set apart for the company out of other ungranted available public lands, and such change has been assented to by the said Hudson's Bay Company."

This was the arrangement come to by Mr. Brydges, commissioner of the Hudson's Bay Company, and the Land Commissioner at Winnipeg, with the Government. The land was inspected by the land inspector and he recommended that this should be done. Sir Donald Smith, Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, objected to it, and we were unable to deal with the school lands without the consent of the Hudson's Bay Company. We cannot deal with the Hudson's Bay lands as they will not consent, and this is for the purpose of giving us power to deal with the school lands of that country. It is a question of course of policy, which I do not feel very strongly about, and I agree with what the hon. gentleman says with reference to the manner in which the school lands should be dealt with.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Better drop it.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not feel that any very great injury would be done to the interests of education by the passage of this clause, although at the same time I do not see any very great necessity for passing it. The Minister of the Interior seems equally indifferent which course is taken. If there would be any advantage to the school interests by allowing these lands to remain as the Hudson's Bay sections are, I think they should not be disturbed. I confess if equivalent lands are given, I cannot see what injury would be done. The clause reads:

"Provided that lands equivalent in extent, and as nearly as may be in value to that so set apart as aforesaid as school lands in such townships, are first set apart in lieu thereof out of other ungranted available public lands."

I want to point out one inconvenience that may arise from the passing of this clause. If you take the school lands out of the township that you are about to give to the railway, and you set apart other school lands equivalent, you must take the school lands equivalent from townships where settlement is going in. In that way you will diminish the number of sections open to settlement and, therefore, liable to contribution for school as well as other purposes. For instance, if you take out of a township a number of school sections and you seek their equivalent elsewhere, you will have to find them where settlement will ultimately go in or is going in, and in that way you will have double the number of school sections in one township that you would otherwise have, and I think some harm might in that way be done. However, I am not sure that this is a very serious matter. I hope the hon. Minister and the Government have considered the suggestion I ventured to make on the first reading of this Bill. I had a Bill on the Paper and a resolution with regard to one of the clauses, and the House will remember that there was a very strong feeling in favour of a resolution embodying the principle of one of the clauses, and that feeling was expressed by a vote in this House, and there were other means taken to express the same sentiment. I withdrew that resolution and I also refrained from moving the second reading of the Bill, because I was told by the Government that my Bill would be placed on the Government orders. The reason it was not placed on the Government orders was that the Minister of the Interior brought down a Bill, and there would have been two Bills dealing with Dominion lands on the Government orders. The Minister of Justice is not here, but he told me that he would make a statement to the House at any convenient time, declaring that that was the position of the Government. Therefore, I assume that the principle of these clauses in Bill No. 108 is agreed to by the Government. One of the clauses deals with the prevention of the pollution of the waters, another deals with the sale of homesteads for taxes, and another deals with second homesteads. I assume that the principle of these clauses has been acceded to by the Government, and whether during the interval the Government has decided to put them into their Bill when we go into committee or not, I do not know. I also spoke of the necessity of setting aside lands for a university. It does not follow that we should establish the university at once, but it is clear that you cannot too soon set aside lands for the purpose of a university. The census shows that we have 67,000 inhabitants. When Manitoba had only 62,000 inhabitants, 150 acres were set aside for a university, and, if the House and the Government will turn to the legislation of 1882 and 1885, they will see how liberally Manitoba was dealt with in that matter, though its population in 1882 was less than the population of the North-West Territories to-day. Before I left the territories, a meeting of gentlemen interested in education was held and certain resolutions were passed in reference to the establishment of a university in the territories, and I think these resolutions were sent on to the Minister. I find that, on the Thursday in the first week of the present month, another meeting was held in Regina, which was presided over by the Bishop of Saskatchewan and Calgary, and among those present were the Rev. Dr. McLean, of Moose Jaw; Rev. Father LeDuc, of Calgary; Rev. Messrs. Carmichael, Harrison, Dawson and Caron, of Regina; Rev. Mr. Green, Principal of St. John's College, Qu'Appelle; Mr. Justice Rouleau, of Calgary; Rev. D. G. McQueen, of Edmonton; Inspector Rothwell, of Regina; Captain Craig, of Prince Albert; Mr. Chisholm, Principal of the Regina High School; Mr. Calder, Principal of the Moose Jaw High School; Mr. Thornburn, of Broadview; Mr. Secord and Mr. Forget, Dr. Willoughby, Mr. J. J. Young and others. They passed resolutions such as were passed at the meeting I attended about a year ago, and the point they make is that we cannot too soon set aside lands for a university. The Bishop of Saskatchewan and Father Leduc and Dr. McLean, the leading men in the Methodist Church, in the Roman Catholic Church and in the Church of England, contended that we cannot too soon establish a university. They do not propose to have a building erected right away, but to have, so to speak, a university on paper, qualified to have professors and examiners who shall lay down a curriculum and shall have the power of granting degrees, but the chief thing they contend for is that the land should be set aside as soon as possible. I have hoped, as I have previously expressed in this House, that, if action is taken at once, we might lay the foundation of higher education in the territories on a sounder basis than it is laid in any province in the Dominion of Canada. As everyone who knows anything about university education is aware, our defect is that we have so many universities that the universities are competing for the students, instead of the students competing for the degrees of the universities. The result is that the universities make the gate easy for the students to pass through. It is made known that it is easy to get a degree in this or that university, and we know that a young lad entering on manhood is not always wise as to the best means of strengthening himself for the battle of life. And, if it is easier to go to one university than to another, he will go to that university, with the result that the standard is lowered. One of the first men in the University of Toronto to-day, gave me amusing instances, on one occasion when Mr. Goldwin Smith and he and I were chatting about this matter, of the blunders made by men who had taken honours at our first university. I hope the Government will consider this question. I hope the Minister has considered another matter which I brought forward and which he very properly stated could be dealt with by Order in Council, to enable those who want to use the two-mile radius provision in regard to cancelled lands to do so. As you are now about to abolish the two-mile radius provision, I hope, while it remains in operation, an Order in Council will be passed enabling men who are there with their boys to settle on lands within two miles, though they may settle on cancelled lands. My hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Davis) is very anxious in regard to another matter, and I find there are people in my own constituency who are very anxious to have an amendment made to the Bill providing that, in cases where land is better adapted for grazing than for cultivation, the cultivation should not be insisted on, but that, in lieu thereof, continuous residence and improvements to the value of $500 within three years from the time of perfecting the entry should enable a man to get his patent for his quarter section. That concerns the people of southern Alberta more than it does the people of Assiniboia, but I do not see why it would not work well. The two provisions I am most interested in are these, and in Committee I shall move these clauses:

Whenever, under this Act, lands are entered for either as a homestead or pre-emption, or sold or otherwise disposed of, and such lands contain or border upon a coulée or ravine, which has been utilized for the purpose of forming a reservoir for the storage of water, or which, in the opinion of the Minister, or of the agent or other officer by whom such entry is issued or such sale or disposal is made, is capable of being so utilized to advantage, such entry may be issued or such sale or disposal made subject to the condition that no building shall be erected within a specified distance from the border of such coulée or ravine, and to such other conditions as, under the circumstances of the case, seem desirable with a view to the prevention of the pollution of the water stored in such reservoir; and in every such case any patent issued for such land shall be expressed to be subject to the conditions so imposed.

We have, Sir, coulées in the North-West in places where you have no running streams, and if you dam them up you find you get a lake. Sometimes it is made by the melting of snow, and where water is not plentiful, it is of great advantage to the people. But I am speaking about the case of a man who has, it may be, built his stable or house near it, and the undesirable fluids from his house and stables may pass into that little artificial lake and destroy its value for cattle and for man. Now, the Minister of the Interior must have had representations from Moose Jaw on this subject, where they take great interest in it, and I hope that he has provided for it, and if he has not, when we go into Committee, I shall move in that matter. I may say, as the Minister of Justice is in his place, that he will remember that I withdrew my resolution, and I did not move the second reading of this Bill because I was given to understand that the Government would place it amongst the Government orders. Another clause is this:

Where land has been homesteaded, and five years have elapsed without the homesteader taking out his patent, the interest of the homesteader who has thus failed to take out his patent for such land may be sold by a municipality or school board for taxes levied within the municipality or school section wherein the lands are situated.

I may add that there is a clause in the Bill that I think satisfactorily provides for that. Now, there is another clause which it is also problematical if I move, because I am not quite satisfied about it myself, although some of my constituents are anxious to have it:

From and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five, no patent for land shall be issued to a homsteader without its containing a provision that should the land be suffered to remain two consecutive years without the cropping of at least fifteen acres the homestead shall revert to the Government.

I see myself great difficulty about that, and I bring it before the attention of the Government more with the view of ventilating the idea, so that the object of it may, at some future time, be reached. The clause in regard to the second homesteading is exactly the same as in the statutes, with the change that instead of 1886 you have 1889, or from 1887, as in the amending Act, to 1889. When I brought forward this subject before, in the early part of the session, hon. gentlemen connected with the party in which I serve, took a sympathetic view of this matter, I do not see them in their places now, with one exception. My hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) told me that he agreed with me, and he came to me and asked me not to press my resolution. He mentioned to me the names of at least a dozen members of the House, of prominent Conservatives, some of them from British Columbia, and some from the North-West, some from Manitoba and some from Ontario, who sympathized with the view I took. One hon. gentleman said he had analogous cases in his own constituency in consequence of legislation by the Ontario Government, and he was fully alive to the justice of the demand of these second homesteaders. I certainly have the strongest grounds for believing that the Government in their conscience approve of this. I have been informed on very high authority, that the Prime Minister admits that my contention, in regard to this second homestead question, is a just contention. Of course I have not had that from Mr. Abbott. I have not conversed with him save once on the subject, but I was told on high authority that Mr. Abbott was of that opinion. Now, I should not be surprised if it were so. When I did converse with Mr. Abbott I found him on this, as on other subjects upon which I have conversed with him, prompt in grasping the question, sympathetic and ready to consider your views, so that I think there ought to be no difficulty now in passing this clause. The arguments that I have chiefly used against it are arguments that emerge from the bureaucracy. I have studied the history of the management of our Dominion lands for the last nine years. All through those years, from month to month, from week to week, from day to day, my attention has been directed to the management of those lands, to the way they have been dealt with by the Department of the Interior. I have been in constant communication with the Department of the Interior, in constant communication with Mr. H. H. Smith, and I will say this that I do not think the management has been such that we should have an extraordinary reverence for any dicta that may come from the bosom of that department. Now, the great argument is that the public domain cannot be spared; that is, that a few sections of land cannot be spared. We must have railways. The more railways we have the better. I do not at all agree with arguments, such as I sometimes hear from those benches, against subsidizing railways with lands, because as Mr. Cochrane, of San Francisco, stated in his evidence: "Land is of no use until you have railways. The way to colonize is, first build a railway and then settlement goes in." That is the way to settle a country. But I say this, that without compulsion, without a sigh, without one regretful glance, we will vote away any number of townships, we will vote 6,400 acres of land per mile for a railway. Our conscience in regard to the disposal of public lands grows sensitive, however, the moment the question comes up of giving to a man a second homestead to whom you are as much bound in honour as you are to pay for the bacon you buy for your breakfast to-morrow morning; our consciences in regard to these lands become sensitive and then there is a cry raised respecting the public domain. The amount of the public domain, I may say here, will be very small. But I am told that a man very highly placed in Canada at this moment, when that argument was used to him, declared that the question is not in regard to the public domain, if justice demands that these people should get second homesteads. If he said so, it was greatly to his credit; if he said so, it reflected honour on his sense of justice, and I will go further, and say it would reflect honour on his statesmanship; because it can never be wise statesmanship to do injustice to any class, especially to a class that is representative, and I may say, coming down to a lower point it is bad politics. If I may separate politics from statesmanship—and I believe there is sometimes a divorce between them—if I may separate the politics that looks to the success of a party from statesmanship, I say it is bad politics to act unjustly towards a large class, towards a representative class, towards settlers who diffuse their grievances amongst their brethren who have no interest whatever in second homesteads, and who thereby get an idea like this: "Oh, we are poor settlers, and so disregarded; but if we were rich and powerful, our claims would be acknowledged." I do hope that when I come to move that clause in Committee, I shall have, if they are here, the support of those hon. gentlemen who have so generously told me they agree with me; but what I would prefer would be to see the clause placed in the Bill by the Government itself, because it is my desire that all the credit of such action may go to the Government, and that as for myself I shall be effaced before them. There is another suggestion that has been made, and that is, that a clause should be placed in the Bill, that where pre-emptions adjoin homesteads the homesteader should not be required to live on his pre-emption, but he should be bound to cultivate 10 acres the first year, 15 acres the second year, and break 15 acres and have it ready for crop the third. My anxiety respecting the ranching clause is emphasized by the fact that my hon. friend, who is very anxious about it, is not here. I throw that out for the consideration of the Minister, so that he may, if he approves of it, give this clause that would enable a rancher, by fulfilling certain conditions, without cultivation, to obtain a quarter section. I did not think any of my constituents took interest in it, but I find they do. I do not set any store by it myself; but my hon. friend does, and others do. I have now explained the points of importance. I want to say, with the permission of the House, that I think the Government cannot deal too generously with the North-West. There is a general impression that we are dealt with very generously. But if hon. gentlemen will take the Manitoba Act of 1870, and examine the clauses respecting the Government of that province, they will find that Manitoba, which at that time had an estimated population of 17,000, received $30,000 for government; 80 cents per head was given on an estimated population of 17,000, and there are other clauses that would show hon. gentlemen that at the present time, with our 67,000, as the Minister knows, we are entitled to a very much larger sum than we have received. I make that statement with the permission of the House, for I do not think this Bill could properly deal with it. I think there are some clauses of the Bill that will prove very useful, and it will be made very much more valuable if the clauses that I have described are added to it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is due to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that I should say a word as to the fate of the clauses which are comprised in his own Bill, because it is true that when the hon. gentleman proposed to bring forward again his resolution with respect to second homesteads, he acquiesced in my proposal not to press it then, because it required a good deal of consideration on the part of the Government, and I told him that his Bill on the subject of Dominion lands would be moved to Government Orders, if the House would acquiesce in our proposal to do so, in order that the delay for which I asked him should not prejudice his opportunity of bringing his Bill to the attention of the House. The opportunity was provided the other day. I did not move to transfer the hon. gentleman's Bill, because the Minister of the Interior was about to introduce a Bill on the same subject, and the discussion of that Bill would enable the hon. gentleman to bring forward the clauses contained in his Bill. The progress made with this Bill to-night will not be very great, I suppose, and I will have an opportunity in the early part of the week, when in Committee on the Bill, of informing the hon. gentleman what policy the Government will adopt on this subject.

Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DEWDNEY. Sub-section 3 of section 4 of the Dominion Lands Act authorizes the Minister of the Interior or the Dominion Land Board to authorize any person named therein to make a homestead entry. I wish to make it read that the Minister of the Interior, or any member of the Dominion Land Board, shall be able to make the entry, because it is seldom that the Board are all together, and the present provision is found inconvenient where the agents are at such long distances.

Mr. LAURIER. The only change is to give to a member of the Board the power to make an entry or to receive.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

On section 4,

Mr. DAVIN. I think this clause is a great improvement and will meet with approval in the North West.

On section 5,

Mr. DEWDNEY. If we agree to adopt this clause I would extend the provisions to 1893 or 1894. I explained before that I think we have too many different regulations with regard to taking up land, and I think the simpler they are the better. Therefore, if the Committee could agree on a date I would very much like to see this adopted.

Mr. DAVIN. It think this is a step in the right direction. It think the simpler our conditions of entry are the better. It was undoubtedly a mistake to have so many fancy franchises for entries. I would suggest that this clause be allowed to stand, and we will discuss the date before we go into Committee again.

On section 11,

Mr. WATSON. Does this apply to charges for seed grain?

Mr. DEWDNEY. No; it applies only to the lien clauses, and it is for this purpose. In the case of a homestead on which money has been advanced, but on which the settler finds that he is not able to live, it is provided that if he changes his homestead the lien may be transferred to the new homestead.

Mr. WATSON. I had a communication to-day from a person who wishes to obtain a homestead in the Gladstone district. He wishes to take up a homestead which has been abandoned, but against which there is a mortgage for seed grain advanced to the person who previously occupied it, and the man who now wishes to take it up is informed by the agent that by paying the claim on the land for the grain he can get it. It seems to me that is unfair. I think the Minister should transfer the mortgage for the seed grain to the homestead occupied by the person who got the seed grain.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Of course the Government must have some security for the payment for the seed grain; but as long as it has the security, I do not think it matters where it lies. The question raised by the hon. member has not yet been brought to my notice, and I think it is worthy of consideration.

Mr. WATSON. The person who has obtained a homestead ought to be liable on the land he occupies. If he abandons the homestead, the Government have no security, because they own the land, and it appears to me that if a person comes along and wishes to take up the abandoned quarter section, he should not be liable for the seed grain advanced to the other man.

Mr. DAVIN. I could not agree very well with what my hon. friend from Marquette says, because there might come a year when some of our settlers, especially new settlers, would want seed grain; and if that contention of my hon. friend prevailed, the Government would meet us with the response: You cannot give any security; and we have contended that the Government might very properly take the security which in the case referred to by my hon. friend was taken. I think with the hon. Minister that the suggestion of my hon. friend from Marquette that where a settler against whose homestead there is a lien for seed grain is allowed to enter for another homestead, the liability should be transferred to his new homestead is a good one. But my hon. friend went further. If a settler borrowed seed grain from the Government and abandoned his homestead altogether, and took up no other homestead, he still seems to contend——

Mr. WATSON. I did not.

Mr. DAVIN. Then there is no difference between us. I understood he contended that in that case the incoming settler who wanted the abandoned homestead should not be asked to pay the obligation for seed grain. As the Minister properly says, the Government must have some security, and there ought to be no difficulty about the new settler paying the lien because there will be improvements on the abandoned homestead, and the settler who wants an improved homestead ought not to object to paying the small amount due for seed grain. Oddly enough, in abandoned sections, there is, generally speaking, something desirable and often competition as to who should get it. It would be not at all desirable that we in the North-West should place ourselves in this position, that the Government would be justified in saying, in case another year should occur, and it is to be hoped it never will, when some of our settlers would need seed grain: "Why, you cannot give us any security." However, that has nothing to do with this clause. This clause will meet a difficulty we have felt in the North-West. For instance, a man who has a homestead entirely suited for agriculture desires to get one which he can convert into a mixed farm. He is restless where he is and wants to get another entry. The department will have no objection to that, but if there is a lien against this quarter section—and we have had in my constituency south of Dunmore some Germans and one or two others who came in by the aid of certain parties and whose sections were subject to a lien—there is a difficulty about getting that entry, although it is desirable on several grounds that they should remove. This clause will enable them to make a transfer to another homestead.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. member for West Assiniboia entirely misunderstood me. My contention would give the Government ample security. I want them to follow the settler for security.

Mr. DAVIN. Suppose the settler goes out of the country altogether?

Mr. WATSON. You have simply to hold the land. But the case I refer to is where a settler has abandoned land and taken up a more desirable homestead. The seed grain he has received from the Government should be a charge against the homestead he has taken up.

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. At present that mortgage is not transferred and certainly the abandoned homestead is no security as there is no one living in it. A person might secure seed grain on a worthless piece of land and then abandoned it to take up a good section which would be ample security. The lien for the seed grain should be transferred to the land he takes up. I cannot understand that any persons would act as the hon. member for Assiniboia says they would, and consider a piece of land abandoned as desirable for settlement. As a rule, settlers do not leave desirable pieces of land. If land is abandoned by one settler and taken up by another, the latter should get it for the simple homestead entry and not be charged any mortgage standing against it. There are some vacant sections which were abandoned on account of the wet, around Lake Manitoba, seven or eight years ago, which some people now want to take up. But they would have to assume a lien for seed grain furnished the former settlers, and they will not take up the land subject to such lien. I have a letter from a person who applied for a quarter section, which he says he would take up if he had not to assume the mortgage for seed grain. The man who received the seed grain should pay for it, and it should not be a charge on the land.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not lay down the broad proposition that every abandoned quarter section is a desirable one, but it is well known that it frequently happens no more desirable quarter section can be had than one which has been abandoned, and my hon. friend illustrates this by pointing to quarter sections around Lake Manitoba which were abandoned some years ago and now turn out to be very desirable sections. The point my hon. friend contends for is one of importance for the future, namely, that where a man abandons a quarter section against which there is a lien for seed grain and takes up another, that lien should be transferred to the other. The Minister agrees with him in that view, and so do I. But in the case of a section abandoned on which there is a claim for seed grain and when no other section has been taken up, the only security the Government can have is the homestead, and it is in the interest of the incoming settler himself that he should be asked to pay that claim. It generally is a very small claim, and by paying it he keeps up the credit of the settlers with the Government. I might point to an analogous case. When imprisonment for debt was abolished, it had the effect of destroying the credit of the poor people in whose interest it was abolished, and the learned judge who was mainly instrumental in carrying out that law devised the judgment summons as a means of restoring the credit of the poor. I asked him how that came into existence, and he told me that he himself contrived it with the view of restoring the credit his own act had destroyed. So, if you take away the lien from the homestead of the settler who has abandoned it and left the country, you would place the incoming settler in this position, should he ever require to borrow seed grain from the Government, that the Government could reply: You have no security to offer for repayment. I have no doubt that when we go into Committee again, the Minister of the Interior will provide for the transfer of the mortgage, but I would not advocate abandoning the claim of the Government on the homestead.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). Because a man has abandoned his homestead does not necessarily reduce its value, and I think you should follow him on the mortgage for the seed grain. I have two cases in my county where homesteaders took up abandoned homesteads and performed the duties, and when they applied for their patents, they were told that seed grain mortgages were on those homesteads. It would not be fair to make them pay on these mortgages without having received any notice or any value. If these homesteads were of more value after they were abandoned, it might be another thing, but when homesteads are abandoned they are of no more value, because, where the ploughing has been done, the weeds have grown, and the land is not worth as much as it was before. The difficulty is where the party leaves the country, but even then I would not charge the new homesteader with the mortgage.

Mr. TROW. Such cases as have been described by the hon. gentleman must be very rare, because a man would not abandon his homestead if it was a good one, and he should receive no seed grain unless he had considerable improvements. There may be some cases of this kind, but I do not see any possiblity of following the man on his personal bond, because unfortunately in those cases they go across the line. I do not see how they can get other homesteads under the present law, but, if they do, it would be right to hold your claim on the first homestead, so as to have two strings to your bow, and thus secure the claim of the Government.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not lay down the absurd proposition that a homestead was more valuable because it was abandoned, but, reasoning a priori on this subject, we might agree that an abandoned homestead was not a desirable homestead. As a fact, however, some of the most desirable homesteads in the North-West are homesteads which have been abandoned, especially in the neighbourhood of Lake Manitoba.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). They were abandoned during the wet years.

Mr. DAVIN. They were abandoned for some reason, and I do not suppose the homesteader was struck suddenly with a desire to fly off without any reason, but there is no doubt that some homesteads that were desirable have been abandoned. Nobody disputes the proposition that, if a man leaves one homestead, and, by permission of the department, goes to another, the lien should follow him. The point we are discussing now is, whether the Government should abandon its claim for seed grain in regard to a homesteader who has gone no one knows where. It is not in the interest of the settler that the Government should abandon that claim, because it is only in that way that you can keep up the credit of the settlers with the Government. The settler who goes in does not know whether he may not want to borrow seed grain from the Government. What my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Ross) says is true, that at times a homestead which has been abandoned is not as valuable as another. I know there are cases of that kind. There are cases where, actually, the ploughing, instead of being an advantage, is a disadvantage. I understand all that; but I say that there are cases, and not a few, where homesteads have been occupied, and where, by reason of their occupation, they have been made more valuable. What I say is, that it sometimes happens that a very desirable homestead has been abandoned by a homesteader, and persons will sometimes seek for it, and the amount that stands against it for seed grain they will be ready to pay.

Mr. WATSON. The lands referred to by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) are probably similarly situated to the lands mentioned in this letter. The hon. gentleman knows that from 1879 to 1885 these lands were wet. The lands that I have referred to in township 14, range 12, west of the first meridian, were homesteaded in 1874, and during grasshopper time seed grain was given, and that stands as a mortgage chargeable against those lands. In 1879 and 1880, settlers in township 12, range 14, were allowed second homesteads by the Government, on account of their lands being so wet they could not cultivate them, and they had to leave them. These lands are subject to wet again, and any person taking them up has got to take those chances, unless the Government, either Provincial or Dominion, who are interested in those lands, take means to prevent it. That overflow will occur again, unless means are adopted for the purpose of widening the outlet of Fairford River out of Lake Manitoba. That lake forms the basin for the drainage for a very large tract of country, a large number of streams run into that lake, of which the only outlet is the Fairford River. That outlet is not sufficient to carry off the water that runs into the lake. I have known, in wet seasons, the lake to rise as high as six feet above its lowest level, and the result was that a large tract of country was rendered useless. But the last few years the lands have become dryer, and people are now willing to take them up as homesteads and go on and cultivate them. I say that it is in the interest of that country, and in the interest of the municipalities, that these lands should be settled immediately, that homesteaders should go on and reside there and cultivate them. But if the mortgages for seed grain given in 1874 are allowed still to stand against those lands, with the interest on that seed grain from that day to the present time, they will not be occupied. I think it is in the interest of the department and of the Government to have those lands occupied and settled upon. I would say that so far as I am concerned —and I hope the department will take the same view—it is simply a matter of profit and of loss, and I would be willing that the Government should relinquish its claims on these small amounts of grain given from 1874 that have prevented the settlement. Still it may not be necessary, it is not necessary where a large number of settlers transfer their homesteads in that particular section to a more desirable place: in that case the Government ought to place the persons who got the seed grain in the same position as they were before. I hope the Minister will provide for such an emergency. There is only a limited number of such cases. We hope that seed grain will never again be required either in Manitoba or the North-West, but it is in the interest of that country that these lands should be settled. Applications are being made for these lands, but people object to take hold of them simply because a mortgage is standing against them.

Mr. TROW. I can corroborate the statements of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson). Lake Manitoba more than any other lake is subject to rise and fall in wet seasons. I know that the lake he has described in wet seasons spreads over a very large area of country, rendering thousands of acres unfit for settlement, and this overflow may sometimes occur during four or five successive seasons. I think it would be in the interest of the Government to abandon their small claims upon the land for seed grain given in 1874-75. I know that several of my friends took up land, in that region and two or three years afterwards, when they obtained their title, they found they could not get near the lands unless they had a boat.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have made up my mind, after considering this matter, to drop clause 1. The last clause we will not consider now.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Mr. WATSON.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 21st September, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

LANGEVIN BLOCK.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) asked, 1. How much has been paid on the Langevin Block up to 1st September, A.D. 1891? How much under each contract and outside of the contracts? 2. How much has been paid to Charlebois and each of the other contractors under their contracts and outside thereof? 3. How much has been paid for the land, and for legal expenses and commission, giving each separately and to whom paid? 4. Have all the appropriations made by Parliament for the construction of said block, and the purchase of said land, &c., been expended? If not, how much remains over, and how has it been disposed of?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The expenditure up to 31st of August, 1891, was $782,491.18. Of that amount, $575,134.78 was under contract, and other payments, including the cost of land, amounted to $207,356.40. The amount paid to A. Charlebois was $490,060. Paid Carrière, Laine & Co., $15,241.54; paid John Fensom for elevators, $45,099.94; Garth & Co., heating apparatus, $24,733.40; total, $575,134.78. As for the land it was acquired from eleven proprietors. The cost of the site was $88,130; interest, $3,243.15; compensations, $300; commissions and legal expenses, $2,325.42; damages, $750; part premiums of insurance, $27.50; total, $96,776.07. As to the question whether the whole vote has been expended, the answer is, that the amounts voted were $1,273,350.04, and the amount expended $782,491.18, leaving a balance lapsed of $490,858.86.

AMERICAN CATTLE FOR SLAUGHTER.

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. CHOQUETTE) asked, Whether an Order in Council was adopted, since the first day of January last, authorizing the admission, duty free, of American cattle for slaughter at Three Rivers? If so, was the said Order in Council submitted to the Imperial Government, and did the latter signify its approval, or otherwise? Was the said Order in Council repealed, and if so, when and for what reason? If not, do the Government intend to give effect thereto?

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the hon. gentleman I would state that no Order in Council has been adopted since the 1st of January last authorizing the admission, duty free, of American cattle for slaughter at Three Rivers.

PIER AT THREE RIVERS.

Mr. AMYOT asked, 1. Did the Government get a pier constructed at Three Rivers, in 1890? Who was the lowest tenderer for that work? How many tenders were received? What tender was accepted, and what was the amount thereof? How much money was paid by the Government, for the construction of the said work, to the party whose tender was accepted? How much money in all have the Government paid for the said pier, to whom were the payments made, and how much to each person, that is to say, to the said tenderer and to any other person, and what are the names of such persons? 2. Do the Government intend to construct another pier at Three Rivers? Are tenders to be called for for that work, and when? 3. Is Mr. Thomas Berlinguet, of Three Rivers, in the employment of the Government? In what capacity is he so employed? What is his salary? How much has he received: (1) By way of salary; (2) as travelling expenses up to this date, and how much for the year ending 30th June, 1891? 4. What was the revenue yielded by the slides and booms on the River St. Maurice for the year ending 30th June, 1891? What is the amount expended for maintenance during that period, for the said slides and booms? What is the amount paid to keepers and for other expenses of management of the said works, for that period? What are the names of the keeper of the said slides and booms and of any other person to whom money has been paid in respect of the said works, and how much has been paid to each such person?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The contract for the construction of a wharf at Three Rivers was signed on the 13th of November, 1889. Mr. T. E. Normand was the lowest tenderer. Nine tenders were received. The lowest was accepted, that of Mr. Normand for $8,525. $10,894.50 was paid him for the construction of the work. The difference between the amount paid and that of the contract was authorized by Order in Council of the 8th of November, 1890, to raise the level of the wharf 4 feet 6 inches. $12,307.79 was paid by the Government for the wharf in question, as follows:—T. E. Normand, $10,894.50; George Leprohon, inspector, $327; J. M. Desilets, professional services, expropriating land, $159.30; advertising and printing, $146.46; F. M. Hamel, travelling expenses, $36.05; treasurer, Province of Quebec, claim of lot bought from A. Baptist, $744.48. Total, $12,307.79. There is a sum of $10,000 in the Estimates of 1891-92 for the construction of an addition to the wharf. Tenders will be called for the work as soon as the plans and specifications are prepared. Yes, Mr. Berlinguet is in the employ of the Government as resident engineer at Three Rivers, for the Department of Public Works. His salary is $4 per day. During the year ending 30th June, 1891, he was paid $1,803.32, as follows:- Salary, $1,440; sustenance allowance and travelling expenses, $1,363.32. This may be taken as an average of the yearly payments made to Mr. Berlinguet. The revenue yielded by the slides and booms on the River St. Maurice for the year ending 30th June, 1891, has been $3,953.87. The amount expended for maintenance during that period, $17,111.81. The amount paid to staff people and labourers during the year ending 30th June, 1891, $13,896.79. It will be impossible for me to answer the last question in a shape sufficiently concise, and the hon. gentleman had better move for a return. It is the intention after the session to take steps to reduce the expenditure for staff and maintenance considerably for next year, there being a reduction of $3,000 in the vote asked for that purpose this year.

ADMIRALTY COURTS.

Mr. FRÉMONT asked, When is it intended to insert in the Canada Gazette a proclamation declaring in force the Act passed during the present session and sanctioned on the 31st July last, intituled: An Act to provide for the exercise of Admiralty Jurisdiction within Canada, in accordance with the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As soon as the assent of Her Majesty's Government is signified to the Canadian Government.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPT.—CONTRACTS.

Mr. GIROUARD. After an enquiry which has lasted nearly four months, the first sitting of the Committee on Privileges and Elections having taken place on the 15th May last, after having presided at 100 sittings of that Committee, including 29 sittings of the sub-Committee, I feel very little disposed to make a speech, and especially to make a long one. If I was to consult only my own disposition, I would ask the members of this House to do what the members of the Committee did the other day, pass a vote without any debate or discussion. The consideration of this division which took place in the general Committee without any debate leads me at the very beginning to consider whether this Committee on Privileges and Elections is really the best one that can exist for the protection of members of Parliament against whom serious charges are made like the present one, and at the same time to protect the dignity of the House of Commons. A division adopting the report of the majority took place in Committee without any debate, on a strict party vote. I am not surprised at that result. It has been the history of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in almost every instance since I have presided over that Committee from 1882 to the present time. I recollect, when we discussed the validity of the election in Queen's County, P.E.I., we had a majority and a minority report. The majority wished to give the seat to a gentleman who was not elected. The minority wished to give the seat to the one who had been returned although ineligible. I did not agree with either the one or the other. My opinion was that a new election should take place, but on that occasion, as usual, there was simply a party vote. Take the "Blind Shares" Colonization Company case. There was a majority report and a minority report. I agreed with a great portion of the majority report, but I had to agree with a portion of the minority report. Last year we had another case, but there the evidence was so clear and complete, the member charged had written so many letters and communications that the Committee had to come to a unanimous report. This year, in reference to this very complicated case—not only case but cases—the Committee has come to the conclusion that the charges made by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) were substantially—in fact amply—proved as far as the Hon. Thomas McGreevy is concerned, but as far as Sir Hector Langevin is concerned the members of the Committee came to a division. The minority report concluded that Sir Hector Langevin knew of the conspiracy of McGreevy with Larkin, Connolly & Co., but the majority could not arrive at that conclusion. I ask whether the Committee, having a history of this kind, in which almost every serious charge that comes before it seems to be decided by a party vote—honestly it is true, I do not pretend to accuse the other side of acting dishonestly more than I do this side—we all have our predilections—but it is time to consider, when the honour of a member of the House and the honour of his family are concerned, whether we should not adopt a tribunal which would give a guarantee of greater justice to the party concerned. I heard an objection made by an hon. member of the sub-Committee that it would be unfair for us to divest ourselves of jurisdiction in a case of this kind. We have already divested ourselves of our jurisdiction in regard to the very existence of this House. At one time election petitions were always tried before a Committee on Privileges and Elections, but it was thought the ends of justice would be better attained if these cases were brought before the courts of justice, and I say that justice would be better rendered if such grave charges as these were brought before a court of justice. I think the constitution ought to be amended in that respect, not to destroy the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but to give this House power to refer any such charge to the Exchequer Court with an appeal to the Supreme Court. If we are going to continue to refer these grave matters to the Committee on Privileges and Elections I would recommend a change in the constitution of the Committee, and that, instead of 42 members, we should have 9, with a quorum of 7, or even a Committee of 7, with a quorum of 5. What have been the facts of this case? In the beginning we were not able to proceed with a quorum of 22 members, and we had to ask this House to reduce that quorum to 11. Hon. gentlemen, no doubt, have noticed the voluminous evidence which has been adduced before our Committee, covering about 1,500 pages. A great deal of that evidence is perfectly needless; it is a repetition of previous evidence. Hon. members sometimes came to the Privileges and Elections Committee and put questions to members on points which had already been disposed of in their absence. I would, therefore, suggest that if the usefulness of the Committee on Privileges and Elections is to be continued in trying cases of this kind, the quorum should be greatly reduced, and every member of the Committee should make it his duty to attend the sittings from beginning to end. Now, it may not be out of place to give a little history of this case from the day it was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. We had, as I have said, 100 sittings of the Committee, and during the four months during which the Committee sat, many unforeseen occurrences took place. First, perhaps, the most important witness had left the country, that is, Martin P. Connolly, book-keeper of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. In the next place, Michael Connolly, one of the members of the firm, refused to produce his books, and we had to report him to this House, and it was only when he had been brought before the Bar of the House, that he consented to produce the books. A sub-Committee was appointed to examine those books, and in the first examination it was found that some of the books belonging to Larkin, Connolly & Co., implicating other parties, had been mutilated. The Committee then decided that it was necessary to call in the assistance of accountants. Accountants were summoned who took possession of the books, and they presented to the Committee a report which forms a portion of the evidence which has been presented to this House. It was also found that no reliance could be placed upon the calculations made by Mr. Boyd and Mr. Perley in extending the quantities, when the tenders were opened. The Committee procured the assistance of skilful engineers to go over the figures of Mr. Perley and Mr. Boyd, and their report also forms a portion of the evidence submitted to the House. Another difficulty which met the Committee was the fact that Thomas McGreevy was asked what he had done with a portion of the moneys he had received, or that were supposed to have come from Larkin, Connolly & Co., through his brother Robert H. McGreevy. He refused to answer and was reported to the House, and then sent in his resignation. A difficulty in parliamentary procedure arose in consequence of that resignation. It was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who referred it to a special committee, and a report upon that incident of the case has also been presented to the House. Another incident in connection with the case was the resignation of Sir Hector Langevin. It was considered at the beginning, and, in fact, I believe it was expressly stated that Sir Hector Langevin, being charged as he was with an offence, was bound to tender his resignation as Minister of Public Works. He did not do so at first, but he did so about the time that he made his statement before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. His resignation was not accepted at once; it was only in the course of last week that the Government announced that his resignation had been accepted. Some criticism has been made of the course followed by Sir Hector Langevin. I have looked up some cases of parliamentary practice in similar circumstances occurring not only in England, but in this country. I do not intend to review all the precedents on that branch of the case, but I would refer, so far as our own practice is concerned, to the Blind Share case of the Prince Albert Colonization Company, which was referred to a committee six or seven years ago. An hon. member of the Government, Mr. Bowell, and Mr. White, a member, were accused, and the case was referred to that Committee. On that occasion no one suggested that Mr. Bowell, the accused Minister, should resign his position in the Cabinet. The investigation went on, no objection was raised, and the report of the Committee completely exonerated Mr. Bowell, and also Mr. John White. In regard to English precedents, I have no doubt my hon. friend will refer to the case of Lord Lennox, which came before the English Parliament in 1876. Certain revelations had been made against him in a trial before a court of justice in relation to the Lisbon Tramway. Lord Lennox immediately resigned, but contrary to another precedent the same year. In the same session a charge was made against the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. He did not resign; he made a statement in the House, there was a discussion, and he was exonerated immediately. He did not resign before a vote was taken, nor afterwards. Take another case which is, perhaps, more striking still, the case of Mr. Stanfield, in 1864. I do not intend to go beyond that date. A charge was made against Mr. Stanfield, a Civil Lord of the Admiralty, upon which an enquiry took place. Mr. Stanfield took part in the debate, but he did not resign—or rather he had sent in his resignation, but it was not made known to the House. Mr. Stanfield not only did not resign, apparently, but he voted on the motion which was made implicating himself. The motion was carried by a majority of ten only. It was very evident that Mr. Stanfield had a weak case, and after he had voted, the attention of the Government was called to the fact that Mr. Stanfield was still in the Government, and he then stated that, considering that he was a source of weakness to the Government, and a cause of embarrassment to his friends, he had tendered his resignation. So much for the precedents with reference to the resignation of Sir Hector Langevin. I think the members of the Committee will bear me out in saying that the greatest latitude has been given to the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) in proving his charges; the greatest latitude has been given him, not only by the Committee, but also by the Government. We had the assistance of two counsel engaged by the Government to defend the department, of two engaged by Mr. McGreevy, and of one engaged by Mr. Tarte. I may say here that I am glad to recognize that the onerous duties of the members of the Committee have been greatly relieved by the assistance that we received from all those learned gentlemen. I do not think I am transgressing the rules of the House when I say that there was a verbal expression of opinion in the Committee that Mr. Geoffrion, counsel of Mr. Tarte, should be paid by the Government, together with Mr. Osler and Mr. Henry. The greatest latitude was given for the production of evidence. There were no divisions in any of the 100 sittings except on one day. I did not happen to be present, but I am aware that it was on a question on which the majority ruled that the investigation should go on—it was whether Mr. Thomas McGreevy should be reported to the House to answer or not, and it was carried in the Committee by 2 to 1, by 12 against 6 votes. All papers were produced. The papers of the firm were produced; not only the papers of the firm, but also the private diaries of all the parties, the private diaries of Thomas McGreevy and Robert McGreevy; and Sir Hector Langevin was asked to produce his diary, if he had one. There was no paper so private as to be excluded from the examination, the careful examination, of the sub-Committee. I state the sub-Committee, for, in order to do as little injustice as possible and disclose as little of the private business of these parties, a sub-Committee was appointed to examine the private books and papers before they were delivered to the full Committee. All possible information was obtained, and we have come down with the report the adoption of which I move. Before I consider the two reports presented, permit me, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House and the country to a fact which is undisputed: that the works done by Larkin, Connolly & Co. were carried out in a substantial manner, and that the country received the value it paid to those gentlemen. This is admitted all round. The total number of contracts, there being several in connection with the Quebec harbour, and one in British Columbia, was six or seven. The total amount of the contracts was $3,138,234. These contracts extended from 1878 to 1891, 11 years. The profits received on these contracts by the contractors was $735,061, or less than 25 per cent. It is generally conceded that contractors are entitled to receive a profit of 20 per cent. on all contracts. I must say that, in addition to those clear profits, the expenditure in connection therewith comprised also $48,466 for salaries paid different members of the firm. The sum of $170,407 was also paid by them, in addition to said salaries and said profits for donations and other extraordinary expenses for political and other purposes, subscriptions to churches, subscriptions to charity, and subscriptions for party purposes: the total amount of the expenditure, comprising clear profits as well as this extraordinary expenditure, was $953,975. These facts, I believe, are indisputable. Now, let us come to the two reports which were made by the sub-Committee. Before reading the conclusions of these reports, I will remind the House that these charges were directed against three parties: First, the Hon. Thomas McGreevy, member for Quebec West; second, the Department of Public Works; and third, Sir Hector Langevin, the Minister himself. At page 39 of the report of the majority of the Committee, the charges against Thomas McGreevy and the department are disposed of in the following words:—

"Having regard to various features which appear in the contracts which were the subject of this investigation, we feel bound to report that the members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. conspired to defraud the Government and the Harbour Commissioners, and were materially aided in their designs by the interference of Thomas McGreevy, as has been shown in earlier parts of this report. This conspiracy has been all the more powerful and effective by reason of the confidence which the late Minister of Public Works had in the integrity and efficiency of his officers and by reason of the confidence which the late Minister entertained with regard to Thomas McGreevy, and has accomplished results which are to be deeply regretted as regards the administration of the department, and greatly to be condemned as regards those who lent themselves knowingly to the purposes of the conspirators."

Finally the Committee recommended:

"That in addition to such action as may seem to be called for under the findings hereinbefore expressed, such legal proceedings as may be available be taken against those who are concerned in this conspiracy, and that for that purpose the books and papers which were before your Committee be retained (or so many of them as may be necessary) in order that they may be available for such proceedings."

The way I read the conclusions of the minority report is that so far as Thomas McGreevy and the department are concerned, the two reports are not very far apart, if there is any distance at all between them. The minority report reads as follows:—

"In concluding their report your Committee would observe that the manner in which the several contracts were obtained by Larkin, Connolly & Co. from the Public Works Department and the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, the modifications subsequently made in these contracts in the interests of the firm, the enormous sums of money paid and allowed to them out of the public funds for extras and for damages, indicate without any reasonable doubt that this firm had gained a controlling influence over the Minister and Department of Public Works,

"That influence we believe to have been largely exercised through Mr. Thomas McGreevy."

I do not intend to dwell any longer on the case of Thomas McGreevy. It is almost a unanimous report so far as he is concerned, in fact I may say it is so. That hon. gentleman, I understand, has placed his resignation in your hands, Mr. Speaker, and has thus confessed that he committed the wrong that has been charged against him; and so, I think, it is not necessary on my part to offer any more remarks on this branch of the case nor with regard to the department. I come now to Sir Hector

Langevin, where the division of opinion seems to begin and to end. At page 39 in the majority report it is stated:

"The charges against Sir Hector Langevin, as already intimated, having been as above set forth, the Committee would observe that in course of the investigation an effort was made to connect him with the wrong-doing of others who have been reported against as directly connected with fraudulent conduct.

"Your Committee, therefore, report that the evidence does not justify them in concluding that the Minister knew of the conspiracy before mentioned, or that he willingly lent himself to its objects."

The minority report upon the same branch of the case says:

"It was suggested that the frauds might have been perpetrated upon the department through improper influences used upon Perley and Boyd, the engineers, but the closest examination of the books and the witnesses failed to disclose evidence of any improper payments having been made to Boyd, while the only one made to Perley was that in 1887 of the jewellery and diamonds—a time long after many of the contracts had been improperly awarded and moneys improperly paid.

"Except the desire to please and obey the Minister at the head of the department, we cannot discover any motives which would induce these engineers to assist in defrauding the public in order to put money in the pockets of Larkin, Connolly & Co.

"It is true we find that Boyd is a party to the fraud connected with the awarding of the cross-wall contract, and that Perley was a party to this and other frauds in the letting of the contracts and the payment of the moneys to Larkin, Connolly & Co., but the fruits of these frauds did not go into their pockets, but into the pockets of Thomas McGreevy, towards the support of the newspaper Le Monde, to which Sir Hector swore he himself financially contributed, so that he might have a controlling influence over it if and when required, and to the fund managed by Thomas McGreevy on behalf of the party in the district of Quebec in the political interest of Sir Hector Langevin."

You have, Mr. Speaker, the two reports word for word. Now, it seems to me that you would be struck with the finding of the minority report when they can see no motives for Mr. Boyd and Mr. Perley to act as they did, except the desire to please and obey the Minister of the department. Where is the proof to justify such a statement? There is none. Suppose they were not able to find the motive why Mr. Boyd and Mr. Perley acted as they did, would it be reasonable to infer and to conclude that it was to please and obey the Minister of Public Works, especially in the face of the following sentence which is to be found in that very report of the minority:—

"It is true we find that Boyd is a party to the fraud connected with the awarding of the cross-wall contract and that Perley was a party to this and their frauds in the letting of the contracts and the payment of the moneys to Larkin, Connolly & Co."

We find that the minority report says that Boyd and Perley from the very beginning had been guilty of fraud, and are we going to suppose for one moment that they did so to please, and upon the order of the Minister of Public Works, when there is no proof whatever to that effect? Now, Mr. Speaker, let me first dismiss the charge that was made against Sir Hector Langevin, the only charge in fact made in the reference which was sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. At page 44 of the minority report you find this charge reproduced from the reference:

"That certain members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. paid and caused to be paid large sums of money to the hon. Minister of Public Works out of the proceeds of the said contracts, and that entries of the said sums were made in the books of that firm."

The minority report concludes as follows upon that charge:—

"We find that the $10,000 was drawn by Murphy from the bank on the respective dates of the cheques, 2nd November and 21st November, 1887, and that each of the cheques was endorsed in the handwriting of Nicholas K. Connolly, but in view of the statement on oath made by Sir Hector that Murphy 'did not offer, loan, or pay him any sum of money,' which we assume he intended as a denial of his having received any moneys whether as gift, loan or payment, we are unable after much doubt to come to the conclusion that we would be justified in finding this charge proven."

In reference to this charge, I may mention, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) himself was very careful not to charge Sir Hector Langevin with any corrupt act and with any corrupt motives in his reference. Not only was he very careful in his doing so in his charge, but he also made a declaration which will be found at page 1141 of the evidence (old series). We here find a declaration of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) to the effect that he never intended to charge Sir Hector with corruption or any corrupt motives. Now, let us see the statement of Sir Hector Langevin himself. At page 1055 of the evidence you find this general statement made by Sir Hector Langevin which covers all the charges made either against himself or against the Hon. Thomas McGreevy or the Department of Public Works, so far as he himself is concerned:

"I begin by declaring that, in all departmental works mentioned before the Committee, I have fulfilled my duty most conscientiously, to the best of my knowledge of matters and of my ability, without ever having allowed anyone to influence me by promises or gifts of any kind whatever, and that my acts have always had public interest as their object; that I never received gifts, loans or values whatever, directly or indirectly, from the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., or from any of its members; that, in truth, Mr. Thomas McGreevy and I have been, for a long time, on friendly terms, and that he has been my guest at Ottawa in the period from 1878 to 1890, whilst I resided here as a Minister, and during which I did not receive from him, and he never offered me, any sum of money, gift or loan; that Mr. Thomas McGreevy has never tried directly, or, to my knowledge, indirectly, to influence me unduly in the execution of my duty, nor to obtain directly, or, to my knowledge, indirectly verbal information or documents that my duty would have required me to hold as private; that I never authorized any one to communicate to him any such information, and he has received none to my knowledge: that I did not know, before Mr. Tarte adduced evidence on the subject, that Mr. Robert H. McGreevy was a partner with Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co. or interested in their contract, and that Mr. Thomas McGreevy never gave me reason for suspecting that he was personally interested, directly or indirectly, in their works; that I always had full confidence in the integrity and capacity of the Chief Engineer of Public Works (Mr. Perley), and of the other officers of my department who had anything to do with the works which have been enquired into; that, up to the time Mr. Perley admitted it, I did not know that he had received any gift from the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., or from any of its members; that, therefore, not being myself an engineer, I considered I was justified in accepting and treating as correct the statements of the chief engineer and to adopt his advice about works of which, on account of their special nature, I was not competent personally to form an accurate idea."

Then at page 1066 you find another fact which throws more light upon the doings of the Minister of Public Works:

"In so important an administration as that of the Public Works, where the correspondence alone in this last year represents nearly thirty thousand official letters, besides 8,946 cheques, it is impossible for the Minister to see and know everything. He must necessarily leave to his chief officers that part of the work of the department which does not require a decision on his part. He must also have confidence enough in them, so long as they have not shown themselves unworthy of it, to rely on their fidelity and depend on their submitting to him all questions which require his interference."

That is the statement of Sir Hector Langevin; could a statement be more direct or positive? Why was his statement not accepted in the whole case? The minority report accepts Sir Hector Langevin's statement with regard to the alleged payment of $10,000 to him. If you are willing to accept his statement in that branch of the case, why not believe him with regard to every portion of the case in which he is interested? Allow me to call the attention of the House to certain rules of evidence, although rules of evidence do not always prevail even in the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It has often been impossible to adhere to the strict rules of evidence. For instance, a letter from one witness to another witness is produced, containing disparaging statements concerning one of the parties accused. That letter could not be admitted as evidence; but on the following morning it was published in the press, and, therefore, as chairman of the Committee, I thought it was better to admit illegal evidence with the possibility of explanations, than to have such letters published in the press without any explanations whatever. No doubt during the investigation a good deal of illegal evidence has been allowed; but when we come to give a decision on the merits, it appears to me that we ought to adhere most strictly to the rules of evidence. What Starkie says is an old rule of law:

"Positive testimony ought not to be rejected on the ground of inconsistency with circumstances, unless the incongruity be of a conclusive and decisive nature."

Where is the inconsistency in this case? Have we not the fact, which has been found by the minority report, that Perley and Boyd acted fraudulently from the beginning? Have we not there an explanation, and a natural one, of how the great frauds have been perpetrated by the department, aided by the Hon. Thomas McGreevy, in favour of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co.? Is not that sufficient to explain the success which all these parties achieved? Well, what was the good of having Sir Hector Langevin in the plot? The engineers were in the plot; the inspectors were in it; the contractors were in it. But the engineers, the inspectors, Mr. Thomas McGreevy and the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., did not need the intervention of the Minister of Public Works. The minority report contains charges in the body of the report which are, I believe, still more serious and more grave than the findings contained in the conclusion. For instance, at page 16, in regard to the dredging of the wet dock, it says:

"That the facts connected with the letting of the contract and its subsequent execution were known to Sir Hector Langevin, the Minister of Public Works, and that the frauds were perpetrated at least with his passive connivance."

Then, at page 22, with reference to the Lévis graving dock, the same report says:

"We find that the supplementary contract for $74,000, except that part which related to the building of the caisson for $10,000, was entered into without any justification, and that the contractors received this money without giving any consideration therefor, being bound by their original contract to do the work. And we find that all the facts were known to Sir Hector Langevin and his engineer, Perley, and that their conduct in assenting to the giving of this contract was highly censurable and a violation of public trust."

In relation to the cross-wall contract, at page 27, the minority report says:

"We find there must have been a conspiracy between McGreevy and some one or more of the engineers of the Department of Public Works to procure the contract for Larkin, Connolly & Co., and we find it difficult to absolve the Minister from a knowledge of the existence of that conspiracy."

There is not a particle of evidence in the whole of that report to show that Sir Hector Langevin knew that large sums of money had been paid either on account of the Lévis graving dock or any other contract, or that he knew of any conspiracy or any illegal payment. It is in evidence that in everything Sir Hector Langevin was supported by a report from his chief engineer. Mr. Speaker, I would blame the Minister of Public Works if he had undertaken to play the role of chief engineer, or if he had undertaken to pay the money to these contractors without having the report of his engineer; but once the engineer has taken the responsibility of his position, it is not for Sir Hector Langevin to interpose his own authority unless he sees clearly that the chief engineer is wrong. Why should not Sir Hector Langevin take the advice of his chief engineer? Was he not reputed to be an able man? Was he not also reputed to be an honest man? When he appeared first as a witness before the Committee on Privileges and Election, there was not a member of that Committee who was not satisfied that he was a perfectly honest man. It was only when the story of the diamonds and the jewellery came before us that we had to change our opinion. It is all very well for us to blame a Minister for having followed the advice of his chief engineer, after we have spent three or four months in an enquiry, after having the report of the engineers and the accountants who examined the accounts in the very minutest manner, and after having examined under oath 70 or 75 witnesses. We know more about the case than Sir Hector Langevin. If Sir Hector Langevin had had time to make such an enquiry into every contract and every payment, no doubt he might have found something that he would not have sanctioned, even in a passive manner. But let us place ourselves in the position of a Minister who receives 30,000 official letters every year; that is 2,500 letters a month, over 100 letters every day. You may say that he does not read every one of them, that a great portion of them are read by his subordinates. That is no doubt true, because he would not be able to read them all; but it must be supposed that a large proportion of that vast correspondence requires the attention of the Minister. Then, besides this official correspondence, you must remember that Sir Hector Langevin was one of the leaders of his party, and consequently he had to devote a good deal of his time to political interviews, besides almost daily Council meetings. Taking into consideration the position of the Minister of Public Works, the important and onerous duties he had to perform, will we not admit that Sir Hector Langevin took the correct view in his statement, when he said: I was bound to accept the advice of my chief engineer whose integrity and ability I had no occasion to doubt? If a Minister in dealing with technical or scientific matters is not to be protected by the advice of the scientific men he has to consult, I would like to know what Minister could consider himself safe. You see presidents and directors of banks deceived, and deceived for years, in matters with which they are familiar. You may also conceive of a Governor or a Lieutenant Governor being deceived by his advisers. His Ministers may be squandering away public property, it may be said that their acts are publicly known, everyone may be talking about them, but still will you say that the Governor may be impeached without actual proof that he knew of the designs and doings of these thieves? It is the same thing in the case of a Minister. Unless we have actual positive proof that he knew of the wrong-doing of his chief officers, his denial, his positive denial, ought to be believed. The doctrine I am advancing is not new. It has been the rule of conduct of all Cabinet Ministers in this country. In matters of that kind the Minister has always been guided by the advice of his chief officers. Extras and changes have been allowed to contractors clearly against the terms of their contracts, claims have been made and allowed, not only by Governments, but by Parliaments—and this I will show, supported by a court of justice—clearly against the law and against the terms of the contract. Why were these claims allowed? Because strong equitable grounds were urged in their favour. I could find many such instances in the Department of Railways and Canals. I find a good many claims made against the very terms of the contract and against the law, in the case of the Intercolonial Railway contracts. These cases are of recent date, and I will content myself with referring to a few of them. Take the Sessional Papers of 1873, 1878, 1879, 1880 and 1881, and you will find therein a whole list of them. Many members of of this House know that under the terms of the Intercolonial Railway contracts and of the Intercolonial Railway Act of 1867, no extras were to be allowed except when caused by change in the grade or the location; but still, under one pretense or another, payments of large sums were made under the authority of this Parliament to contractors, contrary to the statute and agreements. Sumner & Somer, contractors, section 12 of the Intercolonial, received $702,866, although their final estimate was $548,844, making an amount over-paid, "by cost of work," of $154,022. Alexander Macdonald, section 5 of the Intercolonial Railway, whose contract price was $533,000 and final estimate $460,773, was paid $526,000; or $65,225 over-paid. Sutherland & Grant were over-paid $103,632. And King & Gough, $40,000. Here is a claim that was admitted by my hon. friends opposite when in power: the claim of G. and T. Worthington, sections 1 and 2 of the Intercolonial Railway contract. Their contract, like the others, excluded all claims for extras except when caused by change in grade or location, and they received $60,000 for extras. The following is the entry:—

"Partly on account of the difficulty met in the clay at Trois Pistoles."

Does anyone pretend to say that the Minister of Public Works in those days did not act properly, when he took the advice of his chief engineer in favour of those claims? Well, I hold that if that doctrine were good in the case of the late Minister of Public Works, it ought to hold good in the case of Sir Hector Langevin. But we have another case, in which several contractors on the same railway were paid large sums of money against the terms of the contract. A commission was appointed by the present Government to investigate the balance of the claims not yet settled. The commission was composed of Judge Clark and Messrs. Bolton and Broughton. In 1884 they brought down to this House a report granting to four different contractors a sum of no less than $253,996, contrary to the terms of the contract. I have read the report, and anyone who will read it will find that this amount was awarded in consequence of the Government instructing the commission not to charge the decreases to the contractors, notwithstanding that, under the contract, the contractors were to be charged with the decreases just as they were to be allowed the increases. This was done against the terms of the agreement and against the law, but it was sanctioned by Parliament in 1884, because it was supported by the advice of the chief engineer and upon equitable grounds. But we have also on this point the opinion to some extent of a court of justice. Some hon. gentlemen will recollect the case of the Queen and Murray, arising out of the Intercolonial Railway contracts, which came before Justice Fournier. There were a great many items in the claim which were clearly against the terms of the contract. Mr. Justice Fournier ordered the matter to be referred to experts. The Government appointed Mr. Samuel Keefer to examine into the claims. I leave out a great many items exacted by the terms of the contract, but I find, for instance, that there was 30,998 cubic yards of earth excavation, 23,881 of bush excavation, 6,878 yards of rip-rap, 6,207 yards of crib-wharfing, and even $1,000 allowed for damages caused by detention. This money was paid in consequence of a vote of Parliament, and the deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Lash, and Mr. McIntyre, counsel for the Government, reported that these moneys were fairly due. If it was right to pay those moneys in those days, because of the report of the chief engineer, why was it not right for Sir Hector Langevin to order the payment of money on the report of his chief engineer? I could quote many other cases where Ministers, unless some explanations could be given, acted apparently against the law. We have a law which declares that the contract must be awarded to the lowest tenderer. How often is that done? Are Ministers to be impeached for not doing so? Take during Mr. Mackenzie's Administration the River St. Charles improvements, which are a portion of the work done by Peters, Moore & Wright; the lowest tenderers were Denis O'Brien and Denis Gaherty by $25,000. Section 2 of the Welland Canal was let to an American company, though Macdonald & Tabb, and A. P. Macdonald & Co. were lower tenderers. Then take section 7 of the Welland Canal, which was awarded to Higgins & Sutherland, though there were three others lower; and section 13 of the same canal which wes awarded to Ginty & Dickey, though there were two lower tenderers. Take the dredging of the Goderich Harbour, which was awarded to David Moore who was $29,525 above the lowest tenderer. The contract for the Montreal examining warehouse, which was let to Bourgouin & Lamontagne, though Martin was lower. Look at the celebrated steel rails, for which the contract at $54.26 was given to Cooper, Fairman & Co., while the tender from Cox & Green for $48.67 was rejected; take the Lévis graving dock, which was awarded to Patrick Larkin, though Denis O'Brien and F. B. McNamee were both lower. The awarding of that contract to Patrick Larkin was the beginning of the now celebrated firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. Then there was the Quebec Dufferin Improvements, which were let to L. Z. Mallette, though there were two lower tenderers. Then take the question of Section B of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which was awarded to Fraser, Manning & Co. at an amount of $4,130,707, though Morse, Nichols & Co. tendered for $3,364,274, involving a loss to the country of $776,433. I do not intend to accuse the Ministers who awarded these contracts to men who were not the lowest tenderers of breach of trust against the terms of the statute, but I ask that the same rule should be applied to Sir Hector Langevin, and no more. We have, therefore, no reason to be scandalized because the terms of the contract have been exceeded or have been carried out against the law. We have no reason to be scandalized because Sir Hector Langevin, in acting as he did, followed the well-settled practice of the departments of the country. We have no reason that can be advanced to put aside the statement of Sir Hector Langevin and accept mere suspicions. Hon. members may have suspicions. There may be some circumstances which may throw some suspicion, but are we going to decide this case upon suspicion? No: we can decide it only upon the most positive evidence of the guilt of the Minister of Public Works. The way in which I view this case is this: Sir Hector Langevin has been the victim of his long intimacy with the Hon. Thomas McGreevy, an intimacy which began long before he became a Minister of the Crown, an intimacy which he did not see any reason for destroying when he became a Minister of the Crown. That has been his misfortune, and to-day he is the victim of that misfortune. Were it not for that, Sir Hector Langevin's name would not have been mentioned in relation to the charges of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte). The best, or at all events one of the circumstances which tend to corroborate this impression, that Sir Hector Langevin was not a party to the plot or conspiracy, is the fact that he did not see and did not take any means to pay these accommodation notes which Thomas McGreevy endorsed for him in regard to the confiscation of the Charlebois election, before the electors and before the Supreme Court. If Sir Hector Langevin was in the plot, he knew that McGreevy could obtain any money he pleased, and these notes would have been withdrawn from the public and from the banks, but those notes have been renewed within the last two or three months. Another suspicion is said to arise from the Langevin testimonial fund. The list of subscribers has not been reported, but I have read every name, and I say that that testimonial fund shows that, out of 150 names of subscribers, there is only one subscription of $1,000, that of Larkin, Connolly & Co. True, Mr. McGreevy brought $1,800 to that fund, but he stated that he obtained that from the City of Quebec, and we do not know who the contributors are. Most of the contributions are small, from $25 to $150, and made by personal admirers of Sir Hector and not by public contractors. Sir Hector Langevin has stated that he did not know who the subscribers were until this investigation commenced. This House has already passed an opinion in regard to the receiving of testimonials, and I accept that as sound. One more remark, and I conclude. A good deal has been said as to subscriptions for election purposes. I am sorry to say that the evil of these subscriptions lies on the people themselves. As long as the electorate will not cast their votes without their expenses being paid—call them legitimate expenses if you like—as long as committee rooms are required from candidates more than are actually necessary; as long as paid canvassers must travel through the country during the whole of the election time, the people must not expect that the money necessary to pay these expenses will come in every case out of the pockets of the candidates. There are some rich constituencies where the friends of the parties are wealthy enough to subscribe the necessary funds to defray those legitimate expenses; there are also counties where the candidates are rich enough to provide for such expenses; but, Mr. Speaker, there are constituencies where the funds must come from a distance. As long as the people of the country will not learn that they must cast their vote—I do not mean without bribery, but without involving a large expenditure to the candidate, I am very much afraid that the practice of subscribing for election purposes will continue, and that a portion of those subscriptions will come indirectly from the public purse. But, Mr. Speaker, whether election expenses must be continued or not, the moral lesson of this case is that members of Parliament must be careful not to handle any of that money. In England the subscriptions are handled by agents, and the same practice should be followed here. Members of Parliament should be very careful to keep their hands perfectly clean. It must be gratifying, however, notwithstanding the bad features of this case, that only one member of Parliament has been found guilty. If you look to the charge that has been made there is a reference to other members of Parliament. It is stated in the reference that Thomas McGreevy conspired with contractors to induce certain members of Parliament to assist them in obtaining certain public works, and that members of Parliament were paid by members of the firm. I am very glad to have to announce that at page 39 of the minority report, the minority state that this charge has not been proved. Upon the whole, I think that this enquiry will be productive of a great deal of good. I think that first-class engineers should be obtained to conduct the public works of this country; and if it is necessary to increase their salary, let their salary be increased, instead of exposing the public treasury to be plundered. I believe that not only the chief engineers of the Department of Public Works and of Railways and Canals should be able men, and men of character, but the deputies of those departments should also be engineers of high standing. The proceedings which the Committee recommends to the Government to take against the contractors and all who are parties to the frauds, will, I believe, have a good effect. They will teach contractors that if they subscribe funds for election purposes, they must keep within the limits of the law. Canadian contractors are so little accustomed to the new methods which have been introduced by Mr. Murphy into this country, in dealing with public contracts, that Mr. Murphy was very careful to keep some of them, so far as possible, in absolute ignorance of his doings. At the time their books were audited he represented to them, in answer to the charge that he was expending their money lavishly, that "It will be all right in the end." If we are to believe Michael Connolly, Nicholas Connolly and

Patrick Larkin, he kept them in ignorance of his doings: and if we are to believe Robert McGreevy, the moment he heard that the inspectors were paid, he sent a protest to the firm saying that he would not for one moment consent to such bribery. A big steal has undoubtedly been perpetrated on the public treasury: but I am confident that the revelations made before the Committee, and the proceedings that are to be taken, will check the evil. I move that the Seventh Report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections be adopted.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the first duty which I have to fulfil in taking the floor at this moment, is one of the pleasantest, that of congratulating the hon. member who just resumed his seat, upon the dignity and the tact with which he presided over the long sittings, the outcome of which we are now to examine. The hon. member proposed another mode of judging such cases as we now have to deal with. Were we always sure of a chairman as impartial, as distinguished and as enlightened as the one who presided over the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I would unhesitatingly say that we would have no ground for desiring the reforms which he suggests.

Mr. Speaker, on the 11th of May last, in answer to a charge that I made before the House, Mr. Thomas McGreevy spoke as follows:—

"I am very glad this charge has been made, and I hope a speedy investigation will take place. I am prepared to defend myself, and the result will be that the whole thing will be proved a conspiracy and false from beginning to end. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte), who takes up the case for those two parties whom I might call his associates, because the hon. gentleman has associated himself with them, has made statements and taken a position out of which I think he will have some difficulty in getting. I am prepared for a speedy and thorough investigation."

The first general observation of the report moved by my hon. friend reads as follows:—

"Having regard to the various features which appear in the contracts which were the subject of this investigation, we feel bound to report that the members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. conspired to defraud the Government and the Harbour Commissioners, and were materially aided in their designs by the interference of Thomas McGreevy."

Without reading further from the conclusion of the Committee, I stand ready to admit, we all stand ready to admit, and I will say more, we all stand obliged to admit that a conspiracy has taken place. As to the extent of that conspiracy, I think we must be as prudent as true. In order to understand the matter truly, I think some reference should be made to the past. After the funeral of Sir G. E. Cartier, the distinguished statesman that in my early days I learned to love and admire, Sir Hector Langevin was elected our leader in the Province of Quebec. A great political crisis came upon us in 1873. The Government we sustained at the time was defeated. General elections followed in 1874. Sir Hector Langevin did not think proper to offer himself for election. His popularity had been destroyed to a very large extent by the accusations brought against him, accusations, which I say frankly, I did not believe at the time, and do not believe now. Time went on. My political friends then on your left, Mr. Speaker, made the gallant fight we all remember. In 1876 the Conservative reaction had commenced. I had, although a very young man, made up my mind to be a member of Parliament. An election was then contested, the election of Charlevoix. My political campaign had begun, when some friends, leaders of mine, came to me and told me: Sir Hector is a fallen man—he has been beaten; in the Conservative party we never go back on our leaders: you had better give up the chance you have and try to have him elected. I accepted the proposition at the time, and, after one of the most important fights that ever occurred in the Province of Quebec, he was elected. He was unseated for undue influence. In 1877 he was elected again, but by a reduced majority. The general elections of 1878 came. Sir Hector Langevin at the time thought proper to abandon Charlevoix and run his chance in Rimouski, where he possessed large family influence. In spite of it all, he was defeated. Sir John A. Macdonald came out victorious at the polls. We all remember the day he came down to Quebec to form his Administration so far as the Province of Quebec was concerned. I speak in the presence of friends who were there with me, and I call their attention to the circumstance, that, in spite of the fact that Sir Hector Langevin had been defeated, in spite of the fact that at the time Sir John A. Macdonald did not feel inclined to take with him Sir Hector Langevin, we rallied around him like true friends. The hon. gentleman I see before me, the Secretary of State, was with us at the time, and we asked the old chieftain, whom we are all sorry not to see again, we begged him to take again in his Government the man in whom we had confidence. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence had rendered great service: he was one of us, a young man; but we went back on him—he was not pleased at the time—and Sir Hector was taken in the Administration. He was appointed Minister of Public Works. In past days, during the fights of 1876-77, Thomas McGreevy had helped Sir Hector Langevin to a very great extent. As soon as Sir Hector Langevin was elected a Minister, Thomas McGreevy began to live with him in Ottawa. Sir Hector Langevin is not in his seat to-day, and no one is more sorry than I am: but he will remember that at the time a great many of us young men went to him and made representations to him. We felt they were not men of the same training: one having been a Minister, besides being, as every one knows, an educated man; the other man being scarcely able to write a letter correctly in his own language. We did not understand why such influence—and we felt it a very few months after Sir Hector Langevin was taken as a Minister—was made to interfere between the man in whom we had confidence and ourselves. At all events, such was the case. In 1879 Thomas McGreevy was elected a member of the Harbour Commission in Quebec, and Mr. Valin was elected chairman of the same board. Mr. Valin was at that time also a member of the House of Commons. Mr. Valin has been before the Committee. He has given testimony under oath, and I did not hear anyone state that Mr. Valin was not an upright and honourable man. Mr. Valin swore that finding that Thomas McGreevy had an idea of doing everything, that he was trying to run the Harbour Commission, that he was using Sir Hector Langevin's name, he, Valin, enquired what it meant. He received as his reply from Thomas McGreevy this statement: "I must tell you that I am Sir Hector Langevin's confidential man. He requires a confidential man, and it might as well be me as another." Mr. Valin then went to Sir Hector Langevin and told him that McGreevy was taking this attitude, and the Minister advised him to follow Thomas McGreevy. He said: You know we frequently meet and consult together; by following him you could not make any mistake, he is a trusty man. On one occasion Mr. Valin said: The Minister told me that if the commision did not do well, he would dissolve it; and Thomas McGreevy repeated the same statement as coming from Sir Hector Langevin. Half the money that was spent by the Harbour Commissioners was money voted by this Parliament. Mr. Valin says in his evidence:

"I stood by the Minister's advice, and I followed Mr. Thomas McGreevy, and when I had a doubt I consulted the Minister himself."

Well, Sir, with a chairman instructed as Mr. Valin was, Mr. Thomas McGreevy in a short time, as a matter of course, became the chief factor and Deus ex machina of the Harbour Commission. We have had before the Committee several members of the Quebec Harbour Commission, and they have all established the very material and important fact that they have followed their engineer blindly—from the very moment that their engineer was Mr. Perley; so long as the engineers were Kinipple & Morris, it was quite a different thing. There are nine members of the Quebec Harbour Commission, and out of these nine five are appointed by the Government. It was very reasonable indeed that the five commissioners appointed by the Government should look for advice to their chairman, and also to the trusty man who was so near to the Minister; the Minister to whose department their principal officers belonged, the Minister from whom they were receiving the large sums of money they were spending, the Minister who took such an interest in the work that Mr. Dobell, one of the most intelligent men of Quebec, and a member of the Harbour Commission, stated in his evidence:

Q. From your acquaintance with Sir Hector Langevin during all this time you have been on the Harbour Commission, do you consider that he was very careful about details, and looking after all matters himself, giving personal attention to them?—A. I never knew a man that seemed to be able to take in every detail as completely as Sir Hector Langevin has been in this work, and he did not seem to neglect it. He seemed to be familiar with them all.

Q. He was perfectly au fait with all details of the contract?—A. With everything.

Then, Sir, with the chairman under his control, by the Minister's direction, if we are to believe Valin's evidence, thanks to his position as an intimate friend of the Minister, Mr. McGreevy was the head of the board which looked upon him, as Mr. Dobell says again:

"As the natural medium by which they would learn what the Minister of Public Works' views were."

Mr. Valin was a member of this House just as well as Mr. McGreevy. From 1878 to 1887 he represented the same county that I represent now. He was chairman of the Board of Harbour Commissioners, and still, strange to say, Mr. Valin was not looked upon as the natural medium of communication between the Minister and the board. Mr. Dobell says that he voted against Mr. Valin from the very beginning, and that he maintained all through a steady fight against him, because:

"I believe him incapable of performing the duties properly."

Mr. Giroux, the present chairman of the board, expressed the same opinion. Still, Mr. Valin was maintained in the position, in spite of us all, as I may frankly say. He was maintained in that responsible position until the last general elections, when he had, as I had myself, to incur the displeasure of the late Minister of Public Works. He was the right man in the right place. Was it because he had chosen to follow blindly and implicitly the "trusty man" who was very imprudently indicated to him by the late Minister of Public Works? Will you permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that this very fact that Mr. Valin—an honourable man, but I admit at once, a man who might have been replaced as chairman of the Harbour Commission—is a fair sample of the direction given to the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec during the past ten or twelve years.

When the Harbour Commission was reorganized in 1879 with Mr. Valin as chairman and Mr. McGreevy as the Minister's confidential man, Larkin, Connolly & Co. were building the Lévis graving dock. The firm was then composed of Mr. Larkin, Mr. Nicholas Connolly and Mr. Nihan. One year after, in 1880, O. E. Murphy joined them on Nihan going out of the firm. Michael Connolly was evidently connected in some way or other with the firm, because in 1880 we find that Mr. Larkin writes to him as follows:—

"I am afraid that parliamentary duties absorb all of Langevin's time and that he is neglecting it. Urge your friends to immediate action."

Mr. Thomas McGreevy admits in his evidence that he knew Michael Connolly in 1878 or 1879, before even making the acquaintance of Murphy, and their relations seem to have been very intimate, if we are to judge of their nature by Mr. Michael Connolly's letters from Texas; in one of them he says:

"You do right in keeping in with Hon. Thomas, as just at present he has the whole thing in the hollow of his hand."

Strong as Mr. McGreevy was, it appears that some difficulties were in his way and in the way of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. That firm did not pull well and Mr. McGreevy, I suppose, did not pull better with the engineers, Kinipple & Morris, and Mr. Pilkington, their resident engineer, and they resolved that those engineers should be done away with. Murphy in his evidence says that those engineers were very severe upon them, that they obliged them to execute their work to the very letter. But he intimates clearly—and in that he is corroborated by other evidence—that their first reason in seeking to have these engineers dismissed was the fact that other works were at the time contemplated, especially the cross-wall. Murphy put himself in communication with Thomas McGreevy; they discussed the question together, and the question was pretty quickly resolved. The changes that they wanted specially at the time, and that they could not obtain, were changes in the stone backing. If hon. gentlemen will look at the evidence on page 1171, they will find that the very change to which Kinipple & Morris would not consent was made as soon as Perley was appointed; and the bill of fare of Larkin, Connolly & Co. for the change was $32,318. Well, Mr. Valin swears—and I believe him, not only when he speaks of Mr. Thomas McGreevy, but all through his evidence, because I know him—that Mr. Thomas McGreevy told him that Kinipple & Morris were bound to go. I am prepared to give Sir Hector Langevin all the benefit of the doubt. Mr. Valin says: "I do not remember whether I spoke at the time to Sir Hector Langevin." At any rate, Kinipple & Morris were dismissed in June, 1883. The pretext of their dismissal was that they were absent, that they were not living in Canada, and that in consequence mistakes had been made. Sir, that pretext does not stand very well to-day in face of the facts we have before us. It is true, they may have made mistakes. Engineers, like all men, and it may be more than other men, may make mistakes, but still, if we compare the mistakes they made with the results that followed their dismissal, I believe that our judgment must not go too strongly against them. I wish to call your attention immediately to a fact, which is a striking feature in this case. For every fraudulent act that has been committed during all that long series of robberies, we find an official pretext or an official report. Kinipple & Morris were dismissed on an official pretext after an official correspondence. If you look at their reply you will find that their dismissal was not justified by the facts, but was the first move in the conspiracy as to which we all agree in this Parliament. It will be borne in mind, Sir, that Kinipple & Morris were at the time in charge, not only of the Quebec harbour works and the Lévis dock, but had been in charge of the Esquimalt dock also.

They were succeeded by Mr. Perley as chief engineer. Mr. Perley was as the time engineer in chief of the Department of Public Works. With Mr. Perley having his headquarters at Ottawa, and Mr. Thomas McGreevy and Mr. Valin working together in full harmony by the Minister's direction, both of them being members of the House of Commons, Thomas McGreevy living in close intimacy with the late Minister, and using his name freely, in spite of the denial of this fact in the report, with a firm of shrewd business men, bound together by a common interest in the hundreds of thousands of dollars which they saw they were going to make—I say, Sir, that was a strong combination of men and circumstances. And, had it not been for the fortunate quarrel which took place between them, they would have taken possession of nearly all the important public works of Canada, and they would have acquired an even stronger influence in our political world. I have in my hands plans of works that they were preparing to make, that they were sure to have; because it seems to me to-day as clear as sunshine that they were masters in the Department of Public Works. We agree, Sir, that there was a conspiracy; but it may be just as well now for me to say that this conspiracy was of a double nature. There was a political conspiracy and a financial conspiracy, the political conspiracy being aided, sustained and substantiated by the financial conspiracy. I am speaking to-day in the presence of the Province of Quebec, in the presence of my old political friends of the Province of Quebec, and I think, Sir, that the day of my vindication has come. That conspiracy which we Conservatives have seen at work for the last ten years was a very powerful one; it could crush nearly everyone. When I look around me, in the field of my political action for the last ten years, I see many men gone into private life who would have been to-day ornaments of this Parliament but for that conspiracy. I see other men before me who have fought arm-in-arm with me that conspiracy. The conspirators had money, they had public money, as we see to-day. Nay, more than that, any one of us who made up his mind to have an idea of his own, to stand by himself, was sure to incur the displeasure of those men, and if more of us are not politically dead, it is not their fault. Ask my hon. friend, the Minister of Militia and Defence, by whom he has been fought and nearly politically ruined in his own district. He will say, like a man, that he has been wrecked, as have been other Conservatives of the district of Quebec, by those men. Ask all the members of the Conservative party in the Legislature of Quebec by whom they have been ruined and thrown into Opposition and kept in Opposition, and they will say as I do—because I have the written evidence in my hand—that they have been ruined and betrayed, nay, more than that, the day came when they were very nearly being sold for money by those very peculators. If the old chieftain, whose seat is empty forever, were to-day in his place, he would be at liberty to produce before you the solemn protest that all the members of the Conservative party in the Legislature of Quebec signed in 1889. I was the one who, with another friend, brought the protest here to him. That protest declared that the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec was ruined and disgraced by Mr. Thomas McGreevy. Ask Mr. Taillon, the personification of honour, one of the most honourable men I have met, why he is no more in public life. He has been fought, as other men have been, from the very moment he would not comply with Mr. McGreevy's order to grant a bogus claim for $400,000 which Mr. McGreevy had fyled against the Quebec Government. In vain did we protest. The provincial elections of 1890 were at hand. Many of those papers which are brought to light before this Committee were in my hand. We had organized for the fight. Our Ottawa friends will remember the numerous interviews I had with them at the time. We found good-will, but there was a power behind the "throne" which was stronger than any one of them, as far as the province was concerned. All our efforts were in vain. We felt we were betrayed; and having had recently in my hands the papers, I made up my mind to publish what I did publish. I am fully prepared to admit to-day that I have been nearer going to gaol than coming to Parliament. Mr. Thomas McGreevy boasted in the streets of Quebec, even in this chamber, that he was quite able to ruin me, that he was controlling criminal justice, and that my days were numbered. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition who stood by me as true as steel in those fights knows what difficulties we had to face together; he knows in what way they came upon us; we saw there was an intrigue on both sides of politics to crush me, to send me to gaol, and that intrigue would have succeeded if justice were not stronger than wrong-doing. I make statements that may be very strong, but are very true. Criminal justice, to a certain extent, was at one time in the hands of Mr. Thomas McGreevy. He had also, with his other influences, the strong political influence of money. He was a powerful man in the banks of Quebec. In the Union Bank he was, and I believe he is still, vice-president. That bank had a peculiar way of doing business when he was concerned. We have discovered in our Committee that the bank carried Sir Hector Langevin's notes endorsed by him, for the last ten years. I do not know any other bank which does such a kind of business. We have also discovered that Mr. Robert McGreevy's notes were carried for a long period, I think, eighteen years. I would like to know, and the Government itself may have reason to know, if the Union Bank is carrying a great many other notes like these. I speak on my responsibility, without any desire of injuring the bank, when I say that it is time the credit of Canada should no more be lent to men who do business as the Union Bank has done it, not only in this but in some other cases we know of. I have been very much accused for the course I have pursued. I must admit that I have been obliged to make a good deal of fencing: and if I had not made up my mind to look to the end, de regarder le clocher, as we say in French, I would not be here to-day. I did not make any dishonest bargain, however, thank God, but I repeat, I have been obliged to pass through many ways and roads. I think, however, that after all I find myself to-day in the right track. If my own political friends of twenty years' standing had chosen to have a little more belief—I do not say in myself alone, but in the written documents I offered them—I would not be to-day on this side of Parliament. My colleagues on both sides know full well that I have not been able to agree to a very great extent with the fiscal policy of my hon. friends on this side, and have been obliged to absent myself from divisions. That is a painful position for me to be in; but my political friends on the other side did not stand by me. I will say more than that—without a word of reproach, without any personal allusions and if only the friends I never deserted had had the courage to stand by me to the end, they would have achieved greater results.

At the time Larkin, Connolly & Co. contemplated the dismissal of Kinipple & Morris, they had made up their minds to arrange that Robert McGreevy, brother of the Hon. Thos. McGreevy and his confidant in politics and finance, should enter their firm. Both reports admit, and it cannot be doubted as a matter of fact, that Thomas McGreevy was a party to that partnership in this way, that his brother and himself consulted and agreed upon it. It may be true, and I believe it to be true, that Thomas McGreevy did not inform the other members of the firm that he knew that Robert McGreevy was a partner with them. Because it seems to me very clear, first, that he wanted to protect himself from indiscretion, which came later on upon him, and secondly, that he contemplated to have his share of the gain which his brother would get from the firm, and also he wanted to draw money directly from the firm, as it is proved he has done. In 1884 or 1885, eighteen months or two years after the cross-wall contract was awarded, Mr. Dobell, one of the Harbour Commissioners, warned the members of that body, and Mr. McGreevy was there at that time, that Robert had become a partner in the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. Mr. McGreevy denied this, and he denied it with some anger, at least so Mr. Dobell says. Having been warned in this way, why did he continue to furnish his brother with the information in the years 1885, 1886, 1887 and 1888? When pressed with questions, he refers to his brother as the broker of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. I think the real broker was Thomas McGreevy himself. The final correspondence between the two brothers is sufficient to establish the perfect knowledge that Thomas McGreevy had of that partnership. On the 14th January, 1889, Robert furnished Thomas with a statement of account since 1883—it reads as follows:—

"I received from Larkin, Connolly & Co. about $135,000, something under that I believe; you received from me out of this $135,000, or thereabouts, $58,000, besides some $117,000 paid direct to you by Larkin, Connolly & Co., and still you are not satisfied."

On the 24th, Thomas McGreevy answers:

"DEAR ROBERT,—Your letter dated the 14th January, 1889, with enclosed statement and charges against me from 20th February, 1883, to date, with also an interest account for same, and also statement of moneys collected on my account, has been duly received by me. I have handed your statement to Mr. Chaloner, who has given you credit for the full amount with interest. I would be obliged if you would see Mr. Chaloner and arrange with him our respective proportion of the National Bank account. Would you also send me statement of other properties or securities which you hold belonging to me. And in future you will make no further transactions in my name or on my account. I shall attend to it myself.

"I remain, yours truly,

"THOMAS McGREEVY."

It has been said, and it is said in the report of my hon. friends opposite, and in the report of the minority also, that we cannot exactly come to the amount that was paid to Thomas McGreevy. This answer of his of the 24th January, 1889, is by itself a very strong document. If Thomas McGreevy had not received from Larkin, Connolly & Co. the $117,000 his brother said he had, would he not have denied it at once? He said nothing of the kind. He said not one word of protest, and it seems to me that silence in that case is the same thing as admission. In 1884, when he wanted money for Le Monde, it was to Robert McGreevy that he applied. It was the same thing in 1887. He says: "What is the firm going to subscribe?" In June, 1885, he reminded his brother of the calculation they had made together. He says:

"According to your estimate and mine made here (Ottawa) the other day, only $190,000 would be required for the summer, and the $23,000 included in that."

In short, Mr. Thomas McGreevy's interference in the commission and the Public Works Department is felt in every contract we have gone through in connection with the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and that interference has taken place through the medium of Robert H. McGreevy, his brother. It was through him that he kept himself posted as to the doings of that now celebrated firm. The close intimacy of Robert McGreevy with Murphy is also to be attributed to that fact. Murphy was the confidential friend of Robert McGreevy. He was at the same time the confidential and financial agent of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. I do not agree with my hon. friend who has moved the report, when he says—and I know that he means what he says—that the other members of the firm did not know of all the doings of Murphy. I fully admit that, during the first years of the existence of the firm, Murphy was the head man of the firm.

He may be called the bad angel of the firm, if there were any good angels in the firm, but he is not the worst. Knowing all the facts of the case as I do —I do not suppose I am bound to defend any members of that firm—I say that he is not the worst of the lot. The close intimacy of Robert McGreevy with him is to be attributed to this fact. It is to Murphy that Nicholas Connolly, Michael Connolly and Larkin applied to see "their friends" and arrange with them. There are numerous letters and a quantity of verbal evidence to prove that. I hold that every one of them, from Thomas McGreevy to the last member of the firm, knew Mr. Murphy's antecedents. Murphy came into Canada in 1877. He has narrated under what circumstances he came. He went directly to his cousin and friend, Nicholas Connolly. He was a defaulter on the other side of the line in the way he has explained, but having some money still at his credit there, he gives to Nicholas Connolly, the ideal witness, a cheque to his own order, that Nicholas Connolly endorses himself, on those funds. If the cheque was not honoured, it is not the fault, at any rate, of Nicholas Connolly. Nicholas admitted that he knew the past career of Murphy; Michael Connolly knew it also. Michael Connolly has gone nearly all round the world with Murphy. Thomas McGreevy admitted under oath that he heard about Murphy's antecedents very shortly after he came down to Quebec.—

Q. Will you kindly tell us when you made the acquaintance of Murphy for the first time?—A. I do not remember much about it.
Q. Try to?—A. It must have been some time before I came on Harbour Commission.

He came there in 1879.—

—I do not think I knew him before that.
Q. Is it a fact that he came there in 1880?—A. I do not know what time he came there.
Q. In 1882 did you know Murphy?—A. I knew him to meet him, he was around the office.
Q. When did you learn for the first time that Murphy was a fugitive from justice?—A. I learned it sometime—I do not remember well.
Q. Can you recollect when you learned for the first time that Murphy was a fugitive from justice?—A. It was talked of in the streets from the time he came there.

Murphy, known as he was by Mr. Thomas McGreevy, a fugitive from justice, as they call him to-day, signed nearly all the contracts of the firm with the Department of Public Works and with the Harbour Commission of which McGreevy was one of the members. I do not see, then, what right they have to throw discredit upon the man they have chosen as their own associate. I do not see why, after he has signed with them nearly all the contracts that we have been called upon to investigate, they have devoted so much time and so many words to throw discredit upon him. They have chosen their own company. Before the Committee, Murphy was not treated as an ordinary witness, he was not treated as a man from whom it was sought to elicit the truth. I admit that he had a doubtful career; but at the same time it should not be forgotten that that career was known from the very men who allowed him to become a public contractor. The representatives of the Minister of Justice on this occasion, I submit, committed a mistake that is to be regretted; because I claim, and I do not make any boast, that Murphy has not told everything he knows. But, Sir, I must immediately say this much to the credit of the Minister of Justice. On this question, which is of so grave a character, I feel that I am not speaking as a partisan. From the very moment that the Minister of Justice perceived that I had a case, that he had been deceived by these men who had deceived the country—from the very moment he perceived that—and I am at liberty to say it because I have his permission to say it—he sent to me the two counsels for his Administration, Messrs. Henry and Osler; it on was the day that Mr. Perley was found to have received a bribe. They came to me and to my lawyer, and they said: It is better not to say publicly that we will work together as much as we can, but we have been authorized to come to you." I asked them, "By whom are you authorized?" They told me they had been authorized by Sir John Thompson. I asked them: "Are you going to take your orders from the Minister of Justice, or from Sir Hector Langevin?" Mr. Osler and Mr. Henry replied to me: "We are taking our orders from the Minister of Justice, and we are prepared to work with you to find out the truth as much as we can." I say that they have helped me, and Mr. Geoffrion, my lawyer, will tell you the same thing; they have helped us as much as their delicate position, and the delicate position of the Minister of Justice, allowed them to do so. I think, Sir, it is well that we should know, and that the world should know, that when a grave and momentous question like this is thrown upon Parliament, the representative of justice is prepared to stand by his duty, however delicate and difficult may be the position in which he is placed. Murphy, Sir, I must say, has not been an informer. We must draw the line somewhere. He did not volunteer to me much information. It is my fault if he is in the painful position in which he finds himself now. When he came to me with Robert McGreevy and gave me the first information, I solemnly declare that it was only to be shown to Sir John A. Macdonald—I swore that in another place. I am not in the habit of giving up a fight, when I think I can win it. I began to look after evidence; it came to me piece by piece; and, Sir, Murphy accused himself before a criminal court, was obliged to reveal what he has given to me. I am fully prepared to admit that there have been a great many perjuries committed in this case; it is just as well to admit there have been perjuries committed that are a scandal to Canada. We can trace them. I will not insist on the perjuries that I have heard, and of which I have been a witness; I will not name the parties who have perjured themselves to my knowledge. Sir, it is to be regretted that perjury can be tolerated in such a country as ours. I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the necessity of reforming the law.

I said a moment ago that the first trace of the conspiracy can be found in the dismissal of Kinipple & Morris. At the same time it is apparent also in the dredging contract of 1882. I think my hon. friend who has moved the adoption of the majority report has not paid sufficient attention to this part of the case. One of the findings of the report is as follows:

"This is denied by Thomas McGreevy. The Committee have come to the conclusion that Thomas McGreevy knew of his brother's interest at the time that interest was acquired.

"There is no evidence of any express agreement on the part of Thomas McGreevy to give his help or influence to Larkin, Connolly & Co. in connection with these tenders or their contract, but it seems to have been understood by the parties interested that such help and influence would be given."

I beg to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the facts of the case. It is admitted that Thomas McGreevy knew of his brother's interest; he also knew that Robert McGreevy was using Beaucage's name. In his evidence Thomas McGreevy says:

Q. You told us that Mr. Beaucage used to tender for Mr. Robert McGreevy?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you know that in 1882?—A. Oh, he had been doing it for a long time. He was under me as a sub-contractor on the North Shore Railway and he supplied me with quarries. I knew the men very well.

Again, let hon. members notice that Thomas McGreevy knew those two things. Tenders were called for in the spring of 1882. The members of the firm made their arrangements together. Owen Murphy's evidence on this point is as follows:—

Q. Will you tell us, if he was taken into the firm with the consent and knowledge of the Hon. Thomas McGreevy?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you discuss the matter yourself with the Hon. Thomas McGreevy?

Q. Did you discuss the position that Mr. Robert McGreevy was going to have in your firm, with anybody?—A. I discussed it with members of the firm—Mr. Larkin and with Mr. Thomas McGreevy.

Q. Then Mr. Thomas McGreevy knew full well that you were to take with you Mr. Robert McGreevy?—A. Yes.

Robert McGreevy examined, answered:

Q. Do you know, or are you able to state, whether your brother, Thomas McGreevy, had any knowledge about your interest in the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co.?—A. I do state so—yes.

Q. Will you explain to the Committee whether he had any knowledge, and to what extent his knowledge was?—A. He knew I was going into that contract, because he said before closing he would see Sir Hector to get permission from him whether I would go in or not.

Thomas McGreevy has denied the fact, and Sir Hector Langevin denied having been asked the question. Thus, on this point, as far as Sir Hector is concerned, I am prepared to admit there is no evidence. Let us now look at Larkin's testimony, as follows:—

Q. You stated yesterday that you thought it advisable to take a partner in Quebec, on account of your being strangers, from the place. Will you explain why you took Mr. Robert McGreevy?—A. I think I stated yesterday.

Q. Repeat it, please?—A. It was to have some person, as we were not treated fairly by the engineers, and, I thought, by the Harbour Board, to state our case to the Harbour Board, who had some influence with them. That is in relation to the dock. That was my reason.

Q. Were you aware that Robert McGreevy had some influence with the Board?—A. Certainly: his brother was a commissioner.

Q. You had in view his brother in taking him as a partner?—A. Yes, certainly I had. His brother would listen to him sooner than to us.

Q. Had you any conversation with Mr. Thomas McGreevy about that when you took his brother in?—A. None whatever.

Q. Was Robert McGreevy to be interested in the dock or future contracts?—A. He had no interest in the dock.

Q. But in any future contract that you might get in connection with the Quebec Harbour?—A. Yes.

I call attention to this answer because it corroborates entirely the answer given by Mr. Murphy, in which he said that when Robert McGreevy was taken into partnership with them, it was not only for the dredging contract of 1882 but for all future works in Quebec. The dredging contract was signed in September, 1882, and was continued until the end of the season of 1883. When Robert McGreevy was taken in as a partner with them the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. knew full well the extent of Mr. McGreevy's influence. Michael Connolly, writing from Texas on 12th October, said:

"SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, 12th October, 1882.

"FRIEND OWEN,—Yours of the 2nd inst. was here in San Antonio before I arrived. I am glad to hear that you have got along so well with the work the past season. You do right in keeping in with Hon. Thomas, as just at present he has the whole thing in the hollow of his hand. You tell me you have the contract signed for the harbour work, but I think you have given Bob more than he is entitled to, especially as he is not furnishing any capital. But of course you, who are on the ground, ought to know best, and it would be better to make a hundred thousand dollars with him in, than fifty thousand dollars with him out."

That has been the policy that Larkin, Connolly & Co. have pursued all through these transactions. They found it better to make thousands of dollars with their "friends" with them than a few hundred dollars with their friends out. Owen Murphy explains very well the whole case, and he is corroborated all through in the following words:—

Q. Have you any recollection that tenders were asked twice?—A. Yes; this (referring to a paper in his hand) is the first dredging contract.

Q. Did you put in a tender the first time?—A. No.

Q. Why?—A. I had it made out and was going to the Harbour Commissioners to put it in when I met Mr. Thomas McGreevy, who told me not to put it in; that they would not be opened: that the commissioners intended that the contract would be re-advertised. The consequence was that I did not put it in.

Q. Did he give you any reason why you should not put in a tender?—A. There were considerable reasons, but I have no remembrance of any other one than that he said they would re-advertise to show Moore & Wright that we were not going to tender and that we would have an advantage in the next tender put in.

As a matter of fact, the first tenders were not opened, in conformity with a motion moved by Thomas McGreevy. In the minute book of the Harbour Commissioners, page 350, we find the following:—

"Moved by Hon. Thomas McGreevy, seconded by William Rae, Esq., and Resolved, That inasmuch as it appears on the recommendation of the Harbour Master to be advisable that a depth of water in basin and docks, new harbour works, be increased from 24 feet at low water to 26 feet, it be decided upon not to open the tenders for excavation, &c., on the 24-foot basis, but to advertise for tenders on the 26-feet line, and they be required to be sent in by noon on Tuesday, 4th July prox."

Mr. Speaker, here is another instance of official pretext. Look at the facts. A depth of 26 feet was never reached. It was given as a pretext for new tenders that they should reach 26 feet, and Mr. Thomas McGreevy, the Deus ex machina of the Harbour Commission himself moved that the depth should be 26 feet, but it never was reached. He has remained since that time a member of the Harbour Commission, and what do we find? Listen to Mr. Boswell's testimony:

"Examined by Mr. Tarte:

Q. Will you point out to us and count the spots on which there are not twenty-three feet of water (referring to the chart)?—A. That is the only spot.

Q. Only one spot?—A. Only one spot.

Q. I speak of the whole basin?—A. There are places in here (pointing to the lower left hand corner) where there is only one foot or two feet of water. That is in the corner where there never has been any dredging. The ground is as it was originally.

Q. Will you count the spots on which there is less than twenty-five feet?—A. As I told you yesterday, these marks indicate the places that are less.

Q. Count them?—A. About forty-nine, somewhere about there. That is not absolutely correct.

Q. There are forty-nine spots on which there is not twenty-five feet of water?—A. Yes.

Q. What is the depth of these spots?—A. Between twenty-three and twenty-four and a-half feet.

You will see that this was not a very willing witness. The official pretext this time is very clear, and the results are very clear too. New tenders were then called for, and what happened? Eight tenders were received and the lowest of all was that of Messrs. Fradette & Miller: the next lowest was the tender of Beaucage, and, as I have said, Beaucage was known as the tenderer of Robert McGreevy. This fact was known by Thomas McGreevy. The duty of the latter then, as a member of the Harbour Commission, was to insist that the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. should take the contract of Beaucage, but what do we find? We find here again another official pretext. We find on the 10th of July a letter from Mr. Verret, the secretary of the Harbour Commission, which reads as follows:—

"10th July, 1882.

"Messrs. Fradette & Miller,
"Contractors, Quebec.

"Gentlemen,—I am directed to inform you that the Commissioners are prepared to accept your tender for dredging provided you make a deposit of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) in cash on or before three o'clock, p.m., on Wednesday next, 12th instant, for the due performance of the work you have tendered for, and provided also that if the contract is awarded to you, you will undertake to commence the work on or before the 1st August next and that you will deliver the whole on the 1st November, 1883, it being, however, understood that the award of the contract must be ratified by the Honourable the Minister of Public Works.

"I am, Gentlemen,
"Your most obedient servant (Sgd.) "A. H. VERRET,
"Secretary-Treasurer."

There is a condition very clearly stated here, namely, that the works were to begin on the 1st August, 1882, a very few days afterwards, and a deposit of $10,000 was to be made. Fradette & Miller could not comply with that new condition, and although they had already done important works for the Harbour Commissioners, yet being given only 24 hours to provide for a deposit of $10,000, they found it impossible for them to do so. We find another tenderer, Mr. Askwith, of Ottawa, sending immediately his cheque for $10,000, and at the same time a letter to the Harbour Commissioners which contained the following:—"Gentlemen will you give me two weeks to bring my plant on the ground. I have dredges for the works on the lakes. I am not quite sure that they will suit for the tidal work in Quebec; give me two weeks only and one week more to bind myself and I will see what I can do." What is the answer of the Harbour Commissioners? The answer is: "If in 24 hours you do not give us your answer 'yes' or 'no' we will send you back your cheque." He was not able to comply with that condition, and what do we see next? Beaucage, the bogus tenderer of the firm of Robert McGreevy, to the knowledge of Thomas McGreevy, asks from the Harbour Commissioners permission to withdraw his tender and that permission is granted him immediately.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. TARTE. I was calling your attention, Sir, to the Askwith tender. I think, for the understanding of the case, it is better that I should read Mr. Verret's answer. On the 28th July, 1882, he writes as follows:—

"Sir,—I am directed by the Quebec Harbour Commissioners to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th instant, enclosing a cheque for $10,000 as security for the due performance of the contract for dredging, which you have tendered for, and which has been conditionally offered to you. I am further requested to inform you that the commissioners cannot allow you any further time to consider your acceptance or refusal of the contract, but insist on an answer within twenty-four hours from now, this day, as to whether you accept or refuse. Your cheque will be returned if the commissioners do not hear from you within the time above directed, and the contract will be offered to other tenderers.

"I am, Sir,
"Yours,
"A. H. VERRET."

Askwith being given so short a notice, was obliged to withdraw his tender. But what do we find? The Harbour Commissioners who were in so great a hurry when Askwith was asking for some delay, signed the contract with Larkin, Connolly & Co. only on the 25th of September, that is to say, two months after the day fixed for all the other tenderers. They told him he would be obliged to begin the work on the 1st of August; but they signed the contract with Larkin, Connolly & Co. on the 25th of September. I refer my hon. friends to page 3 of the blue-book. But what is worse even than that is that Larkin, Connolly & Co. had no plant at all on the ground. They began the works only in the following spring, and their first estimate was not paid until the month of June, 1883. Robert McGreevy, examined on this point, speaks as follows:—

Q. Do you remember when the works in execution of that contract were begun by Larkin, Connolly & Co.?—A. In the spring of 1883—the next year after the contract was entered into.

Q. No work was done in the fall of 1882?—A. No: they had no plant. They had to build their dredges and scows during the winter, and they did not begin until 1883—May, 1883.

Now, this contract was approved by the late Minister of Public Works. I do not accuse him of a wilful fraudulent act in this matter. In such a case the benefit of the doubt must always be given to the man who is accused, especially when that man is not only a member of the House but a Minister. But the late Minister cannot be exonerated from all blame in such a case. He had before him all the facts. He knew that the date fixed for the beginning of the work was the 1st of August, 1882; he knew at the same time that the work did not begin till 1883. These are not arguments; these are facts. That contract, which had been given for a certain amount of work, to be finished in 1884, was continued until the end of the season of 1886. If you refer to the quantities given in the tenders, you will find that they amount to 433,000 yards in round figures; and if you refer to the quantities paid for, you will find that the contractors have been paid for nearly 2,000,000 yards. When the tenders were asked for, a certain quantity of work was specified; but that quantity of work has not been adhered to. No conditions that were imposed on the tenderers have been complied with. If I insist on this point, it is because my hon. friends who have drafted the report have thought proper to find that Mr. Thomas McGreevy did not use his influence on behalf of Larkin, Connolly & Co. I believe that that part of their report cannot be sustained by the facts. When the moneys voted for the first contract were exhausted, Mr. Thomas McGreevy—not the Harbour Commissioners—went to the ex-Minister of Public Works and arranged with him for a new subsidy. In 1885, you find in a letter, page 974, which Mr. Gobeil wrote to the Harbour Commissioners, that an agreement took place between Sir Hector Langevin and Mr. Thomas McGreevy to the effect that $50,000 more would be spent on dredging. It seems to me that when we are face to face with those facts, especially with this last fact, that a second arrangegement was made by Mr. Thomas McGreevy with the ex-Minister of Public Works, it is not possible to say that Mr. Thomas McGreevy did not interfere to help the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. through. I hold that Mr. Thomas McGreevy helped them in getting the first contract for dredging in 1882; I maintain that he helped them in that second transaction of $50,000: and it seems to me that these facts prove that the organization, whose working we will be obliged to follow through all those fraudulent transactions, was then beginning to work too well for this country. Before leaving this subject, I beg to call your attention to a letter of the late Minister of Public Works, dated 31st July, 1882, in which he enquires from the Harbour Commissioners if there has not been any collusion among the parties who tendered for the dredging. This letter was answered by the Harbour Commissioners, who said that it was useless for them to defend themselves against such an accusation. Mr. Thomas McGreevy, knowing everything that we know now, was guilty of a breach of trust because he allowed the Harbour Commissioners to reply that they were sure that there was no collusion whatever. In this instance, taking the most lenient view of the case, namely, that Sir Hector had been deceived by Thomas McGreevy, he was deceived in a way in which no man who took greater care in the administration of public affairs, could have been deceived. The letter was more than this. It is much to be regretted that the late Minister of Public Works did not follow in other cases the precedent he adopted in that dredging contract. For instance, why did he not write in the cross-wall matter? Why did he not enquire if the parties tendering for that contract were not guilty of collusion, as he enquired in the matter of the dredging contract of 1882? Is it not a striking fact that in this case Beaucage's name appears for the first time, in 1882? And is it not a striking fact also that in the cross-wall contract, two months afterwards, in 1883, we find the very same name and the very same results? In the tender of 1882 Beaucage was allowed to withdraw the lowest tender of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and in 1883 the same permission was again given.

Coming to the cross-wall contract, tenders were asked in April, 1883. They were opened by the Quebec Harbour Commissioners and then sent to Ottawa to be moneyed out. There were five tenderers: John Gallagher; George Beaucage; Larkin, Connolly & Co.; Peters, Moore & Wright; Samson & Co. The three tenderers, Larkin, Connolly & Co., Beaucage and Gallagher, belonged to the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and their tenders were prepared in the interests of that firm. Mr. Thomas McGreevy was aware of all those facts, as he was aware of his brother's interest in the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. On the 5th of May, 1883, he writes as follows from Ottawa:—

"My Dear Robert,—The tenders for the cross-wall only arrived here yesterday and are locked until Monday when he will commence his calculation. I will write you Tuesday and let you know the result. Larkin was here yesterday. I told him it would be useless to get Peters out of the way, as it would be tantamount to giving the contract to the highest tenderer, that you would have to stick to the Beaucage tender as it was fair.

"Yours truly,

(Sgd.) "THOMAS McGREEVY."

This letter proves most conclusively, first, that Mr. Thomas McGreevy knew that the Gallagher tender was the lowest; second, that Mr. Beaucage's tender was the second lowest; third, that Peters, Moore & Co. came after those two; and the highest tender was the one of Larkin, Connolly & Co. I ask members of this House if a man occupying a seat in Parliament and who was at the same time a member of the Harbour Commission at Quebec, was not bound by his oath of office, was not bound by honour, to stand by the lowest tender? In his own evidence he admits that when the tenders were opened in Quebec he knew that Gallagher's was the lowest. Well, what do you find? In the very first letter of the 5th of May, he writes to his brother: "You will have to stick by Beaucage's tender;" that is to say, the tender higher than Gallagher's. One unfortunate feature of the case is this, that the ruling of Mr. Thomas McGreevy on the 5th of May was followed by the Minister of Public Works. It seems to me that, as soon as these tenders came before him, as soon as he saw clearly that Gallagher's tender was the lowest, his duty was to stand by that lowest tender. But let us not anticipate. Thomas McGreevy admits in this letter that he had seen Larkin that day and told him that it would be useless to get Peters out of the way—meaning to buy him out—because it would be tantamount to giving the contract to the highest tenderer. At that time he found it would be impossible to reach Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s tender because it was too high. But he says, I will give you information. Under the 7th May he writes again to his brother:

"I hope to let you know to-morrow about the result of cross-wall tenders. Have your arrangements right with Beaucage before result is known. I will give you timely notice."

Thomas McGreevy admits by this he knew that arrangements had been made between the firm and Beaucage. The fraud which began on the 5th May was going on. On the 7th May, Thomas McGreevy still believed it was impossible to reach Larkin & Connolly's tender. On the 8th May he writes that Boyd has finished his calculations. He admits in his own evidence that he sent to Robert McGreevy, his brother, the schedule of rates as moneyed out by Boyd. On the 13th May Robert and Thomas McGreevy meet together in Montreal. There Thomas McGreevy gives his brother all the figures he has, and I call your special attention to this important fact, that Robert McGreevy swears, that they then had the original figures as made out in the Department of Public Works. This has not been denied either by the Minister of Public Works or by Mr. Thomas McGreevy. This fact is a most important point in the case. After having in this way met Mr. Robert McGreevy, Mr. Thomas McGreevy meets Murphy in Quebec, and there Murphy tells us he offers Thomas McGreevy $25,000 if he can manage in such a way as to reach Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s tender. I know that Murphy's evidence will be assailed, but facts are facts. Nothing is stronger than facts. What has happened? From the very moment that this offer is made, what do we see? Thomas McGreevy changes his mind immediately. He does not stand any more by Beaucage's tender. I suppose it would have only paid him $5,000. the price mentioned in Beaucage's transfer to Larkin, Connolly & Co., but there begins the intrigue which does not seem to have attracted the attention of my hon. friends on the other side of the House. On the 17th May the Department of Public Works writes a letter to Larkin, Connolly & Co., another to Beaucage and another to Gallagher, calling the attention of each of them to pretended errors in their tenders, and on the very same day Thomas McGreevy writes to Robert McGreevy in this way:

"As I told you yesterday to try and get a good plan and as quick as possible in answer to letters that Gallagher and Beaucage will receive about their tenders."

Thomas McGreevy here is clearly guilty of a conspiracy, and I say that the Department of Public Works is itself clearly guilty of the same conspiracy, because from whom could Thomas McGreevy ascertain that these letters would be written on the 17th. I would like my hon. friends who have drafted the report to answer me clearly on this point. They have said that Mr. Boyd is guilty. I am not prepared to go so far. He is a dead man, and is not prepared to defend himself, and it may be that the guilty parties may shield themselves behind him. The schedule of rates was out of Boyd's hand on the 17th. On the 16th it was in the hands of Perley and of the Minister, and I say without any hesitation that one of them is guilty of giving Thomas McGreevy the information which he used as the keystone of this conspiracy. There is no other alternative. One of the two is guilty. Who is the guilty man? We will wait for the evidence by-and-bye. It may be better to read the whole letter of the 17th May:

"As I told you yesterday to try and get a good plan and as quick as possible in answer to letters that Gallagher and Beaucage will receive about their tenders to bring them over L. & C. so as their tender will be the lowest."

As soon as this letter is received, the fraudulent work begins, and here to my mind begins also the responsibility of the Public Works Department. Boyd completed his work of moneying out the divers tenders on the 8th May, if we are to believe McGreevy's letter of that date. For several days nothing seems to have been done. When Mr. Perley described to us the way of opening tenders he told us that the tenders, after being opened, were put into the hands of the Minister. If it was done this way on that occasion, the Minister must have had the tenders and the moneying out of the tenders very shortly after 8th May, 1883. As Mr. McGreevy has sworn, Gallagher's tender was clearly the lowest. I am expecting an explanation from my hon. friends who have drafted the report on this point. How is it that the late Minister of Public Works, seeing that Gallagher's tender was the lowest, did not call upon him immediately to sign the contract? This has not been explained. I do not think it can be explained. The Minister and his department cannot plead that they were in ignorance of what was going on. On the 7th May, 1883, Sir Hector Langevin wrote this letter to Mr. Peters:

"MY DEAR MR. PETERS,—Your letter of the 26th reached me some days ago, but it was impossible for me to answer you before to-day. I cannot fix a day to have an interview with you. If you want to see me during the session you must run your chance, inasmuch as I cannot foresee, from day to day, whether I shall be free the following day or not.

"Yours very truly,

"HECTOR L. LANGEVIN."

Mr. Peters did not get discouraged. On the 9th of May he answers as follows:—

"MY DEAR SIR HECTOR,—I am this moment in receipt of yours of the 7th instant, will have to do as you say, run my chance.

"I would now ask your favourable consideration of my tender for cross-wall, we are the only parties having all the plant required for immediate carrying out of this work. The experience acquired in constructing the Louise Embankment fits us in a special manner for the successful performance of this contract: besides, Colonel Moore, with whom I am associated, has had much experience in the building of coffer dams which would be of great advantage in the present work.

"Trusting that it will be in your power to award me the above contract, as being a continuation of the work I commenced, including the ballast wharf in 1864.

"Believe me, dear Sir Hector,

"Yours faithfully,

"SIMON PETERS."

Well, Sir, this was a pretty strong warning, but another warning had preceded. On the 5th of May Mr. Peters wrote to Mr. Baillairgé, the Deputy Minister of Public Works:

"DEAR SIR,—Amongst the tenders for cross-wall of Quebec harbour works sent in on Wednesday last, you will find my tender. From information obtained since that day from the other tenderers, we have reason to believe that when the quantities are worked out the tender that bears my signature will be found to be the lowest; although one tender is below us on the lump sum for coffer dam and unwatering, this difference will be more than made up on the crib-work, stone-filling, masonry backed with concrete, and earth-filling, &c. I would ask you for old acquaintance sake to take a personal interest in looking into this matter for me. I have not the pleasure of knowing your Mr. Perley, or I would have written to him. We have all the plant and experience for this work.

"Believe me,

"Yours faithfully,

"SIMON PETERS."

This was on the 5th of May. The Department of Public Works, usually so quick in answering letters, was this time very slow indeed. I find that the answer came only on the 16th of May, as follows:—

"DEAR SIR,—I duly received your letter of the 5th inst., on the subject of the tender submitted by you for the construction of the proposed cross-wall in connection with the Quebec harbour works—and have communicated it to the Chief Engineer of the department, Mr. Perley.

"The schedule of tenders has been handed to the Honourable the Minister.

"I am, dear Sir, yours very truly,

"G. F. BAILLAIRGÉ."

On the 16th of May, as Mr. Baillairgé says, the schedule, as prepared by the engineer, was in the hands of the Minister. From the 8th of May till the 16th no step was taken by the department to call on Gallagher to sign the contract. Mr. Peters could not find his way in the department, he could not be seen; but Thomas McGreevy had been given ample time to work out his "good plans," and on that day the plans were ready, as we find by Gallagher's letter:

"To the Secretary,

"Department Public Works,

"Ottawa.

"MONTREAL, 16th May, 1883.

"SIR,—Since my proposal for the 'cross-wall,' Quebec, which I learn from the secretary of the harbour works has been sent to your department, I find, owing to the length of time that has passed since my tender went in and the time it may take to decide, and from the fact of fearing further delay, I have taken another contract and I wish to withdraw my tender for the said work on condition of my deposit cheque being returned to me.

"Very respectfully, &c.,

"JOHN GALLAGHER."

That is to say "very respectfully, Michael Connolly," because the letter is in Michael Connolly's handwriting. It is printed at page 88. Well, Sir, it is a peculiar fact that no answer is to be found to this letter. The ruling given in Thomas McGreevy's letter of the 5th of May is adopted by the Department of Public Works. Gallagher's tender, it is a foregone conclusion, will not be entertained at all; they are bound to have the highest tender by any means. The only reference in the public records that we find about that letter, is in Mr. Perley's report to the House last year, as follows:—

"The reply to my letter to Mr. Gallagher was to the effect that he has withdrawn the tender, and on enquiry I find that on the 16th May, 1883, he had written to the department asking to withdraw his tender, and that his cheque should be returned."

I say again that no permission was given to Gallagher to withdraw his tender, but effect was given to Mr. Thomas McGreevy's letter of the 17th, and of Perley's letter of the same date. You will remember that this letter was to the effect that in answer to Perley's letter to Gallagher and Beaucage, the answer should be made in such a way that his tender should be put higher than Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s. Beaucage, so invited to amend, does so. It seems to me that it will appear clear to every reasonable man that his so-called amendment was a fraud of the worst kind, worse than the so-called errors in the three tenders of Larkin, Connolly & Co., Beaucage and Gallagher. In those tenders they had put for sheet-piling 19, 17 and 15 cents per lineal foot, which was a ridiculous price. What does Beaucage do? In order that his tender may become higher than that of Larkin, Connolly & Co. he replaces 19 cents with $19, 17 cents with $17, and 15 cents with $15. A reasonable price was $8 or $10. By this "good plan," as Thomas McGreevy calls it, Larkin, Connolly & Co. became the lowest tenderers. Gallagher was permitted to withdraw; Beaucage's tender was amended in the shameful way I have indicated. There was not an hour lost. On 23rd May Mr. Perley made a report, in which he advised that Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s tender be accepted, and the Minister immediately concurred in his engineer's opinion. I do not wish to incriminate, more than does the evidence, the late Minister of Public Works. We have here the statements from which to judge. I do not say I am not prejudiced; I say frankly, I may be prejudiced, and I may be mistaken. But when we come to the evidence, it is for every member to judge. In Perley's evidence there are the following words:—

"I am aware that those tenders were placed in his hands (Boyd's), that he prepared the schedule, and he discovered the errors in three of the tenders, marking those errors on the margin of the schedule sheet. I believe it is in evidence; he called my attention thereto, and as it was my duty to do so, I laid that schedule sheet before the Minister of Public Works and discussed with him the errors that had been detected and that unless those errors were cleared up in some way it was impossible to make a comparison between the three tenders which were incomplete and the two tenders that were complete.

"At that discussion I have no doubt no direction was required, but as it is the course I have always pursued in cases of tenders, and as I have done in many instances since—I won't say by direction of the Minister, but with the knowledge of the Minister—I wrote the three letters to the parties, that is, Larkin, Connolly & Co., George Beaucage, and John Gallagher. Two of the letters were exactly alike."

Before the letters to Larkin, Connolly & Co., Gallagher and Beaucage were written, the Minister had before him the schedule of rates. If it was not by his directions it was after there had been a discussion with his engineer, and to his knowledge, that the letter of 15th May was written. He knew then the so-called errors; and if we are going to stand by the brief of the lawyers of the Public Works Department, the Minister should be condemned, because they said that those three errors were perceptible errors, and those three tenders bore every evidence of a common origin. But let us not take for granted as criminal facts matters respecting which there may be doubts. Mr. Perley continues his evidence as follows:—

"I received the letters in reply. I then wrote a letter to the department submitting the schedule with the corrections made. I might say that after my letter had been despatched to Gallagher and almost before he could have received it, there had been received in the department a letter from Gallagher asking to withdraw his tender for the reason stated in that letter. Therefore no change was made and he adhered to his prices, I think. That narrowed us down to the four put in. Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co. stated they adhered to the prices they put in."

Mr. Perley swears that all the papers were put in the hands of the Minister. He goes on to say:

"All the columns were added up, because the addition is in my handwriting, but the body of the schedule is in the handwriting of Mr. Boyd. It was then sent forward to the Minister. That is my connection with these schedules."

I want an explanation of this evidence of Mr. Perley. Did Mr. Perley speak the truth? He has been severely discussed, and he deserves to be severely condemned by this Parliament without doubt. But is his evidence true or false? If it is true, the Minister of Public Works must explain his conduct to Parliament, because if he saw the errors before they were corrected, if he consented that the letters of the 17th May should be sent, if after the replies came in he consented, knowing that Gallagher's tender was the lowest, to passover that tender, and if he consented to the amendment of Beaucage's tender—I say there is no alternative for us after all. I hope to obtain some explanation, because it is a case in which the Minister of Public Works has been placed in a position of great difficulty by his own engineer's evidence. In their brief Messrs. Osler and Henry say the three tenders bore marks of common origin. I think the Department of Public Works, or some one in the department, was acting in the interest of those parties; and there is no stronger evidence of the truth of this assertion than the following, which I find in a letter dated 28th May, 1883. It is a letter from Mr. Ennis, Secretary of the Department of Public Works at the time, and the following is an extract:—

"I return herewith the tenders forwarded with your letter of the 2nd inst. and the cheques enclosed with those offers, with the exception of that submitted by Mr. Gallagher, which is retained pending the taking of the necessary steps for its proper disposal."

Well, Sir, how is it that the Department of Public Works was sending all the other cheques, and that they kept that cheque of Gallagher's. We find the explanation of that fact in the evidence of Mr. Larkin. He says that cheque was provided by him, and was a cheque of the Toronto Bank, dated St. Catharines. No clearer evidence than this letter could be adduced to show that the department knew that Gallagher's tender was a bogus tender; and so they kept the cheque for proper disposal—that is to say, until the Department of Public Works could see some of the tenderers, and ask them if it was safe for them that the cheque be sent to Gallagher. As a matter of fact, that cheque was sent down to the Harbour Commission only on the 9th June (page 89 of the evidence). It is not out of place, Mr. Speaker, to call your attention to a ruling of the chief engineer in this cross-wall case. One of the reasons given by him for allowing Gallagher's tender to be withdrawn, was that it was too low. We all remember the painful scene that occurred in the Privileges and Elections Committee during the examination of Mr. Perley when we asked him: "Had you any data at the time, on which to base your assertion that Gallagher's tender was too low," and he could not answer. When pressed upon that point he told us that he had no data, and then he fainted. It is a pity that Mr. Perley has been so sick, because I have no doubt that had he been able to continue his evidence it would have proved my case stronger even than it is proved to-day. But, few months after that, I find a ruling from Mr. Perley in the Esquimalt graving dock case that I must call your attention to. In April, 1884, Perley made a report to the Minister of Public Works, in which he declared that Starrs & O'Hanly would not be permitted to amend their tender. He says:

"As they have asked to amend their tender which course is not usually pursued."

We find that in the cross-wall case, not only did the Department of Public Works allow the lowest tender to be withdrawn, but they actually suggested themselves by their own letter to Gallagher to withdraw that tender or to amend it, while in this case of the British Columbia dock, they say that Starrs & O'Hanly should not be permitted to amend. Why was that, Sir? It was because Larkin, Connolly & Co. were tenderers for the work. We find ourselves here face to face with the same result; in the first case an amendment is allowed, is suggested, and Larkin, Connolly & Co. get the work: in the second case no amendment is allowed, and Larkin, Connolly & Co. again get the work. In view of the fact that in the space of a few months such a different ruling was given, there can be no clearer evidence that we have to deal to-day with an organized and long-standing conspiracy, the very root of which is in the Department of Public Works. Again, Sir, if you refer to the south wall tender, which my hon. friends who have drafted the majority report do not seem to have studied carefully, you will find that there is a palpable error in the prices of Cameron & McCarron's tender, not only by thousands of dollars but by hundreds of thousands of dollars. Still, the very same man who has ruled in the two cases I have just explained, does not ask any explanation from Cameron & McCarron; and why? Because in this case Larkin, Connolly & Co. are again involved and they get the work again. It might be just as well, Sir, to call your attention now to a part of Mr. Perley's evidence, which to my mind is of very great importance. Gallagher's tender, as I explained, had been withdrawn, and if Mr. Perley is to be believed, he states as follows:—

As a rule, when a tenderer is to be allowed to withdraw his tender you do not act on your own authority, do you? A. Oh, no.

Q. You have to consult the Minister? A. I must state that I have nothing to do with the acceptance or rejection of a tender.

Then, Sir, if this rule of the department, as laid down by Mr. Perley, is the right rule, the Minister is directly responsible for the withdrawal of Gallagher's tender. The figures of the tenders stood as follows, in round numbers:—Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s tender, $634,000; Gallagher's tender, $552,000; a difference of $82,000. It seems to me that the lowest tender should have been accepted. There was a deposit of $7,500 as security. The firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., by Murphy, have sworn here that they were prepared to do the work. As a matter of fact, they were prepared to do the work for that price; and it is a mystery to me, or rather, it would be a mystery to us, that the lowest tender had not been accepted on that occasion, were it not for the fact that Thomas McGreevy had acquired such influence in the Department of Public Works as to be practically the master there. My hon. friend who moved the adoption of the report (Mr. Girouard) has attached more importance than I have to the Langevin testimonial fund. Although there is some importance to be attached to the fact that $1,000 were subscribed to that fund four days after the contracts for the cross-wall were signed and the $1,000 subscribed by the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. was collected in Quebec by Thomas McGreevy on the 4th of June—I do not intend to incriminate more than necessary the late hon. Minister on that account. I am fully prepared to admit that all through the late Minister has made a mistake in accepting such a testimonial from some parties who have subscribed to it. I know that a great many of us in this House—I am one of them—subscribed to that fund; but at the time none of us suspected that a great part of that fund was going to be composed of moneys collected from public contractors. And certainly in this case Thomas McGreevy has been more than imprudent; he had been the engineer of the frauds committed in that cross-wall affair. He had received payments for his corrupt bargain, and it was more than imprudent in him to collect for the Minister that money immediately after such a fraud. But the Minister swears that he did not hear anything about it.

Now, the report of the majority admits that $14,000 were paid to Thomas McGreevy; but they are not very sure whether there has been a corrupt bargain beforehand. Well, Sir, I want to know how it could be that a member of the Harbour Commission, having sworn to be true to his duty, would on such an occasion receive $14,000. Thomas McGreevy, in his evidence, to which I will not allude more than is necessary, because it is a painful subject, and is calculated to create the impression that members of Parliament have very poor memories, denies everything or nearly everything, except the fact, which he could not deny, that a judgment of $15,000 was paid out of those funds. But he said: "I knew only one year after that these moneys were coming from the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co." The majority in their report, after having carefully examined the evidence, have put aside that part of Thomas McGreevy's evidence, and they are right in doing so. But, Sir, they have made a reflection on Robert McGreevy and Murphy which I believe is not borne out by the evidence. They have said that it appears that Robert McGreevy and Murphy have appropriated for themselves the balance of the money. It would not make a great difference after all if $10,000 had been stolen by them; Thomas McGreevy would be equally guilty if he had received only $15,000. But where is the evidence that he did not get the whole amount? If there was a bargain, and there was clearly a bargain, where do you find the evidence that Thomas McGreevy did not get his whole salary? I know that Mr. McGreevy's lawyers have insisted very much on this point, although I do not see the importance of it. But I insist that the corrupt bargain is clearly proved, there is no escape from that. Thomas McGreevy began by standing for Beaucage's tender, but he changed his mind—why? It is explained in Murphy's evidence and borne out by the facts. Because, after having asked $5,000 for Beaucage's tender which the two McGreevys controlled, he was offered $25,000 by Murphy, who measured his men evidently. Thomas McGreevy accepted the bribe, and immediately changed his mind, and the conspiracy was successfully carried out, through the complicity of some one in the Department of Public Works.

I propose now to come to the Lévis dock contract, and I will pass as quickly as I can over it. Mr. Perley took charge of that work in 1883 after the dismissal of Kinipple & Morris. Those engineers had proved that the total cost of the work would not and could not possibly amount to more than $500,000. But, as I have already indicated, the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. wanted changes, and to get these changes it was felt necessary by them that Kinipple & Morris should be sent home to England. The first important change, if I may call it that way, was the supplementary contract of 1884; and the political reason for that contract, the only reason, was the purchase of that important paper Le Monde, which we know in the Province of Quebec very well, indeed. Sir Hector Langevin admits in his evidence, page 1108, that he spoke to Mr. Thomas McGreevy about the purchase of Le Monde, and Thomas McGreevy says that he paid in 1884 $35,000 for that paper. Sir Hector Langevin thought that it was only $27,000 or $28,000. Thomas McGreevy admits that he applied to Robert McGreevy for the money necessary to buy it. Well, Sir, it is a curious coincidence. That paper has been known in the Province of Quebec as the personal organ of the late Minister of Public Works. I have no hesitation whatever in saying, before my hon. friends of the Province of Quebec, that the newspaper Le Monde has been one of the causes of our divisions. More than that: it has been the cause of the downfall of the Conservative party in that province. Many of those I see around me were Conservatives who have fought the battles of the party with me, and they know as well as I do that it is this newspaper and the policy followed by Sir Hector Langevin which were to a great extent the cause of our defeat. This $35,000 was required to purchase Le Monde. By looking into the accounts of Le Monde yesterday somewhere, I found that the ex-Minister of Public Works has a claim against that paper for $39,000. It will be a surprise to his colleagues to find that the ex-Minister did not think proper to free himself from that debt of $10,000 which Mr. Thomas McGreevy has been carrying for him for the last twelve years when he was able to advance Le Monde $39,000. I repeat, you will find in that purchase of Le Monde, you will find in that heavy indebtedness of Le Monde to Sir Hector, the cause of the disastrous policy followed in the past in the Province of Quebec. If my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, were in his seat, I would enquire of him what that paper has done in the district of Montreal? I would ask him what nefarious influence it exercised over the Conservative party. The clique of schemers, who substituted themselves for the Conservative party in that district, ran Le Monde: the best elements of the Conservative party in the districts of Montreal and Quebec were rendered powerless in spite of their good-will, by those schemers who exercised more influence than the ablest and best men of the party. That Riel crisis which created such a storm in this country, by whom was it first raised? Look at the fyles of newspapers in our library, and you will find that the organ of the late Minister of Public Works was the first to deceive public opinion in the Province of Quebec. At that time the McGreevy fight was already beginning between some of us and the late Minister of Public Works, and we were every day begging that he should disassociate himself from Mr. Thomas McGreevy. But we could not approach him with confidence; we were not allowed to tell him the truth. In that Riel affair Le Monde raised the storm which wrecked in a great measure the influence the Province of Quebec held in this House. If I insist on this point, it is to vindicate the character and the position of many of us. We have been, as a matter of fact, I would say as a matter of policy, expelled from the Conservative party. We were not allowed to give sound advice. The Minister of Militia and Defence knows that I am telling the truth; he knows that we were crushed, one after the other. He knows that our best friends in Quebec have come over and over again to Ottawa to the late First Minister, and he knows that Sir John Macdonald said to us: "You may be right, but what can I do? The Province of Quebec has its leader and I cannot do anything else than let things go." I believe it is more than time these facts were known in our own vindication, because we have been accused of all sorts of crimes, for having refused, as free men, to submit to that state of tyranny. I have given the reasons for this charge. If you will look carefully to that supplementary contract, you will find that it was no contract whatever. Larkin, Connolly & Co. had been working at the Lévis dock since 1878. They wanted money, and Mr. Thomas McGreevy wanted money to purchase Le Monde, and between them they invented that supplementary contract. And what do we find? We find that Mr. Thomas McGreevy, according to Murphy's evidence, which it is just as well I should read now, wanted that means of raising money. The evidence is as follows:—

Q. Had Mr. Thomas McGreevy anything to do with the negotiations to come to these supplementary contracts?—A. Yes. Q. Had you anything to do with that contract?—A. I had. Q. Personally?—A. Yes. Q. Please explain to the Committee how you came to tender and under what circumstances?—A. We had a great deal of trouble with the engineers and the harbour commissioners generally, and under a lump sum contract we could make donations to parties, if you please, and for other purposes. Q. Was there any talk of it before the tender was made about the future donations?—A. Yes; Mr. McGreevy made this statement: that Sir Hector's paper was not paying.

That was a slight mistake, for the paper was not then bought.—

Q. Which Mr. McGreevy?—A. Thomas. He said if some lump sum contract could be made, so as some of his friends could be pleased, they could make something out of it. After several conversations, carried on chiefly by myself and Thomas McGreevy, they figured up to us what it would come to, and I finally came to the agreement with McGreevy that all over $50,000 himself and his friends could take, and we submitted plans or estimates in pencil to the principal engineers that amounted to some $43,000: and on the shortening up of the dock—it was to be shortened a certain number of feet—the increase would show $64,000: and then there was to be $10,000 allowed for building the caisson, which made it $74,000, and after we agreed on that and got the contract, there was a slight misunderstanding between Mr. McGreevy and myself about $2,000. It was a trifle data, and that is how the note for $22,000 came to be given instead of $24,000.

Well, the facts of the matter are, that their engineer, Mr. Hume, as it is proved later on, made fictitious figures. The pretext of the contract was that the dock would be completed during the season. The dock was not completed until the end of the season of 1886, so that the pretext is altogether gone. But the money was paid, and on that account the report of the majority agree that there was an understanding between Mr. Thomas McGreevy and Mr. Murphy to the effect that a certain sum of money was agreed between the parties. I call your attention, Sir, to this fact, that in this matter of the Lévis dock, Murphy's evidence is accepted against Thomas McGreevy's, and on Murphy's evidence my hon. friends have based a verdict against Thomas McGreevy. Well, if Murphy is to be believed on such a pint, I do not understand why he should not be believed on some other points. It is true that this man Murphy has made mistakes, and I do not explain or condone his faults. That is not my duty. As I said, he has been here as my witness or rather as the witness of the people of Canada. In this case as in other cases, Robert McGreevy has been the instrument of Thomas McGreevy. On the 13th March, 1884, Robert McGreevy writes to Murphy:

"I will get my brother to interview Perley with Valin before I leave on graving dock."

On the 17th he writes:

"My Dear Sir,—The result of the interview between Mr. Perley and my brother was that he (P.) will write you to ascertain the rate at which you will complete the dock, giving a guarantee of completion within this year or season of navigation. I will be done in a few days and see you. In meantime do not reply until you see me. The question of some diminution in the value of dock, being shorter than contract, came up. Perley says it is 31 feet shorter. I think they can be convinced that only a bulk sum contract will ensure completion this coming season.

"Yours,

"R. H. McGREEVY."

What do you see? Mr. Perley, on the 16th April, writes to Larkin, and an answer is given to him. If you compare the two exhibits you will find that the letter drafted by Robert McGreevy and submitted to Thomas McGreevy is the very letter that we find sent to Mr. Perley. This is a fact of the utmost importance, which tends to show in the clearest possible way that Thomas McGreevy was a conspirator with them, and that a big fraud was perpetrated in that case. But here again the question of money arises. Thomas McGreevy seems to complain that he does not get the money that is put to his account in Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s books. I will not insist very much on that, because, whatever was the amount, the corrupt bargain was made and carried out. But Thomas McGreevy has tried to explain about this Lévis contract, that he did not get the whole $22,000, and that he reimbursed to the political fund $15,000 that was used in 1883 to pay McCarron & Cameron. That evidence has been destroyed. I think that this Lévis dock job is probably the worst of the series of robberies which we have before us to-day, and I am anxious to call the special attention of my hon. friends who have drafted the report to the following facts. I will try to make them as clear as I can. Larkin, Connolly & Co. were bound to finish the work by the supplementary contract, during the season of 1884. The work was not finished until 1886. Then we find this letter:

"Office of the Minister of Public Works,

"Ottawa, 20th September, 1886.

"My Dear Mr. McGreevy,—The contractors for the Lévis graving dock should ask a settlement from the Harbour Commissioners, who then will most likely consult with their engineer. For the Esquimalt dock it is different, because the work there is altogether under my control."

"Yours truly,

"HECTOR L. LANGEVIN."

The words "their engineer" are underscored. I do not want to attach more importance to that than it is necessary, but I call the attention of my hon. friends to that letter. On the 24th January, 1887, a few months after the letter, Perley makes a report of the statement of accounts presented by Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co. to the amount of $814,241.98, and gives them an estimate of $77,887 in round figures. Again please mark the dates. The Minister of Public Works suggests to Thomas McGreevy, who had evidently written to him, that they should have a settlement of their account with the Harbour Commissioners. A few weeks afterwards the account is put in, amounting to $814,241.98. They were pledged to complete the dock during the season of 1884, and in 1887 they put in a claim for $110,000 because they had not completed their work in the proper time. It was a pretty queer claim, but still you will find that claim has been paid. Mr. Perley says in his letter that Larkin, Connolly & Co., when he took charge of the work, had made no claim whatever, in fact it had been stipulated that there would be no claim at all, but still they were allowed first $30,900. On the 5th November, Larkin, Connolly & Co. refused to accept that account as a full settlement of their claim and suggested an arbitration. On the 11th February, 1888, the commissioners agreed to that suggestion and named their own arbitrator, and Larkin, Connolly & Co. appointed theirs. A few weeks afterwards Larkin, Connolly & Co. applied to Mr. Perley to be paid the $30,900 pending the settlement by arbitration of their claim. Mr. Perley declines positively unless they give a clear receipt. Then, Sir, comes an important point. On the 8th March, 1888, Thomas McGreevy writes the following letter:—

"HOUSE OF COMMONS. 8th March, 1888.

"MY DEAR ROBERT,—Tell Murphy I have seen Perley, and he will report to arbitrators or to commission of the amount to be submitted to them, which will be on their total plant $814,000; at the last meeting they wanted to make it out that the amount to be submitted was the balance of $110,000 for damages."

On the 19th of March, as appears from the minutes of the Harbour Commissioners, Mr. Perley wrote a letter to the effect that it was desirable that the contractors should furnish the Harbour Commission with a full statement of their claim, as they intended to submit it to the arbitrators. On the 26th of March the contractors answer that their claim is the same as the one lodged by them previous to the issue of the final estimate in January, 1887. Then, again, I am sorry to say that we see the intervention of the Minister of Public Works. You have not failed to observe that he wrote a letter in the last months of 1886, in which he suggests that the claims of Larkin, Connolly & Co. should be submitted to the Harbour Commissioners. After their claims are so submitted they form a "good plan," as Thomas McGreevy would say, to kill that arbitration and go quicker and safer. They ask to change their own arbitrator, and then we see that the hon. the Minister of Public Works is communicated with on that very point. It is difficult to understand how it is that the arbitration that was settled between the Harbour Commissioners and Larkin, Connolly & Co. needed to be submitted to the Minister of Public Works, but it was submitted. That is not our fault; we are not responsible for it; the Minister is responsible for his deeds. Well, the Minister said: I will not allow you to change your arbitrator. Then, the arbitration falls to the ground. But we find that a few days afterwards, on the 1st of May, $35,000 are paid to Larkin, Connolly & Co. in addition to the award of $30,900 already given to them, making over $65,000 for that bogus claim of $110,000. I say that is one of the worst features of the case. Allow me to call your attention, in the light of all these facts, to Larkin's letter of the 16th June, 1881, which has its importance now:

"ST. CATHARINES, 16th June, 1881.

"MY DEAR MIKE,—I have your letter of the 12th inst. As you say, we are very much disappointed. Matters are not turning out at all as we anticipated. I am in hopes, however, that Sir Hector will not recede from what he said about furnishing the funds for work controlled by Kinipple & Morris; in that case all may be right yet, and if not the changes contemplated must be of a considerable advantage if proper prices are obtained, which no doubt you will look sharply after."

My hon. friend who has moved the adoption of the report said that a good deal of illegal evidence has been admitted in this case. It may be so, but I claim that the letters exchanged between members of the firm are not illegal evidence. They are the strongest possible evidence that could be adduced; those letters are written on the spot, so to speak; they were written at the time the fraudulent plans were made. Then, again, coming to the dismissal of Kinipple & Morris, I say that they were dismissed just because all these changes were contemplated. The changes took place, and the original price of that contract for the Lévis dock, which was $330,000 in round numbers, was raised to $726,000, about double the original price, although the dock has been shortened twice since Mr. Perley was named engineer of the Harbour Commission. If the late Minister of Public Works stated to Mr. Valin one day that Mr. Perley would not cost anything, he made a very great mistake indeed.

Now, Sir, I do not know that, being aware of the fact that a great many of my hon. friends are ready to discuss the matter fully, I should go on any further. But I want to touch a little on that dredging contract of 1887, and I will leave the balance of the case to my hon. friends on this side of the House. As I said, the contract of 1882 was made in such a way as called for its completion in 1884; still, it went until 1886. The contract of 1882 was a schedule rate contract for 15 feet below low water. As you may see on page 10, B book, 27 cents were given. By that contract the materials were to be thrown in the embankments. It has been explained in the evidence of Mr. Boswell and others, that throwing materials into the embankment is a great deal more expensive than throwing them into the river. There is a great deal more handling, and so much is that the case that Mr. Boyd, who was supervising the contract of 1882, deducted 5 cents on every yard of material that was thrown into the river at the time. It is true that later on, when Mr. Perley became entirely the tool and instrument of the contractors, that deduction was given back to them. But as a matter of fact those 5 cents were deducted—putting to 22 cents the price of the dredging by the contract of 1882. It is admitted in both reports, that Thomas McGreevy made a bargain in the winter of 1886-87, by which he undertook to raise the price for the dredging to 35 cents per cubic yard. The elections were at hand, and he thought it a proper time to commit a fraud, evidently to secure a victory for public morality. I am bound to say this much, and I say it on my responsibility as a member of Parliament, and as one who took a considerable share in the election of 1887, that Thomas McGreevy appropriated for himself, or unknown purposes, that sum of money, because I know that the Conservative party at the time did not need those funds. I do not say that as a justification of the party to which I have belonged so long, but simply as a matter of fact. It does not change the facts of the case, they remain as they are; but I say from my seat here, that when the elections of 1887 were over Thomas McGreevy had in his hands nearly $30,000. It has been tried to be proved that that man was not an ordinary conspirator but a polical conspirator. He may have been both, I do not know; but I know he never conspired successfully for the true Conservative party. That contract is, in my opinion, one of the most shameful deeds a member of Parliament could have committed. The first proof of the shameful conspiracy is found in a memorandum as follows:—

"If contract is entered into with Harbour Commissioners, and approved of by the Minister of Public Works, for eight hundred thousand yards of dredging at thirty-five cents, to be dumped in river, or if in more difficult place to be paid extra, we give 25,000. All over 200,000 at Lévis dock. Extras British Columbia about 73,000, of which we give 23,000.

"LARKIN, CONNOLLY & CO."

The hon. gentlemen who drafted the report made a mistake. They claimed that the contract was reduced to the amount of $100,000. I had better read the contract:

"Therefore these presents and I the said notary witness that the said parties of the second part did hereby undertake and promise, bind and oblige themselves, jointly and severally, conjointement et solidairement, their heirs and assigns, executors and administrators, to execute, perform and complete in a good and workmanlike manner, to the satisfaction of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners and their engineers, all the dredging and removal of materials required to be made in the wet basin of the Quebec harbour works, and that they shall place and level the dredged materials on the Louise Embankment, or on such other locality belonging to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, or that may be hereafter acquired, the balance to be dumped in the river."

At the time it was known that 1,000,000 yards was required to be dredged there. The contract thus was made for all the work to be done. But it was stipulated that for the season of 1887 only $100,000 should be spent. What took place? That condition was immediately put aside. During the first season there was an expenditure of $169,000. When Mr. Dobell was heard before the Committee he swore positively that this additional dredging was forced upon them. They were not prepared to spend more than the sum I have mentioned: but they were not the masters of the situation. Thomas McGreevy was the master. I know in the majority report the hon. gentlemen say the Minister is not responsible for it. How is that? How could it be so? Mr. Valin was sworn, and we can only put aside the evidence of credible witnesses by declaring that they perjured themselves. I cannot believe it, because I know that gentleman. Mr. Valin swore in a most positive manner that before signing the contract he consulted Sir Hector Langevin. Sir Hector told him: "I have seen Thomas McGreevy, and he tells me it is all right." Has the Minister been deceived. Has the Minister by his improvident confidence in this man, who has been found guilty of conspiracy, by his long friendship for him, been deceived? It may be so. I hesitate to be a judge in such a case. At all events, without being authorized in any way, Thomas McGreevy begins to negotiate. On 16th April he wrote to Robert McGreevy:

"HOUSE OF COMMONS, CANADA, 16th April.

"MY DEAR ROBERT,—I have just seen Perley about dredging. I have arranged to meet him on Monday to discuss his dredging report before he sends it to Harbour Commissioners, also other matters about graving dock, &c.

"I have arranged with Fuller to have office in Quebec opened as Public Works office and put Lépine in charge and let Peehey be architect. I want you to get O'Donnell to write a letter to Fuller as inclosed, so as they may get another month's pay. They may not get the balance of their pay until the money is voted. As Curran's motion is coming up on Monday, I thought better to remain here, also to see Perley and arrange matters with him. When I am wanted below you will let me know.

"Yours,

"THOMAS."

On 26th April he wrote again:

"HOUSE OF COMMONS, CANADA, 26th April.

"MY DEAR ROBERT,—I have just seen Perley on dredging. I think he will report on 35 cents, and put some conditions which will amount to nothing. He will report when I will be there."

The last letter of Thomas McGreevy is written on the 26th April; the following day, the 27th April, Perley writes, and on the 28th, Larkin, Connolly & Co. answered, and the contract is signed on the 5th May. Well, Sir, this contract, which as my hon. friends on the other side believe was to be only for $100,000, has lasted until 1889, and I will say that had I not interfered with their shameful operations, they would still be at work there. At any rate, we have found enough of evidence in this "35 cents contract," as we call it, to prove that we have to deal with a dangerous set of men. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) stated to-day in his able speech that the country has got the value of the money paid. How can he entertain such a belief, when in that dredging contract alone half of the money has been stolen? We have paid for half of the work that has not been done, and as it has been proven before the Committee, we have paid in the Lévis contract for half the work that has not been done either. Let us go straight to the point in this matter. It is better for our credit and reputation to admit frankly that we have been robbed to a large extent. It is not our fault. There have been able men in this Parliament. From that press gallery, where I spent so many years, I have witnessed here very able debates and seen very strong men. But, under the eyes of these men, for the last ten years, fraudulent practices and conspiracies have been going on which, until now, we were not able to discover. We have the evidence of this fraud to-day, and it is better, as I have said, to admit the facts plainly, and to punish the guilty parties. I will not insist very much on the so-called difficulties that have been invoked to justify that contract. The case is very clear. As I have shown, in 1886 the same firm carried on dredging for the same price of 27 cents in the same wet basin. The caisson was removed only in 1888 and at that time they had a large passage of nearly 200 feet, and there were no more currents than in 1886. I think, Sir, that my duty, as far as I am concerned myself, will be over when I have called the attention of my hon. friends on the other side of the House to their finding which is to be found on page 23 of their report. Charge No. 10:

"That the name of the Honourable Minister of Public Works was made use of by the said Thomas McGreevy in his dealings with Larkin, Connolly & Co. so as to give the impression that he had control over him; the said Thomas McGreevy undertaking to obtain his co-operation, or declaring he had secured it, and that in the name of the Minister of Public Works large sums of money were corruptly demanded by the said Thomas McGreevy from Larkin, Connolly & Co. That he used the Minister's name before the Harbour Commissioners, and that from 1882 to the present session of Parliament he lived in the same house as the Minister, thereby giving the impression to Larkin, Connolly & Co. that he had absolute control over him and that he was acting as the Minister's representative in his corrupt transactions with them."

The Committee find:

"As to this charge, that the name of the Minister of Public Works was made use of by Thomas McGreevy in his dealings with Larkin, Connolly & Co., and that this was done in such a way as to give the impression that he had influence with the Minister. They do not find that sums of money were corruptly demanded by Thomas McGreevy from Larkin, Connolly & Co., nor do they find that he used the Minister's name improperly before the Harbour Commissioners. It appears that during the time that Thomas McGreevy attended the sessions of Parliament, since the year 1882 to the beginning of the present session, he lived in the same house with the Minister, but the Committee are unable to find any evidence that he thereby gave the impression to Larkin, Connolly & Co. that he had control over the Minister, or that he was the Minister's representative in any of the transactions referred to."

I am prepared to admit, Sir, that the evidence does not show that Thomas McGreevy was in these transactions a direct representative of the late Minister of Public Works, but I would like to know from my hon. friends how they have been able to come to the conclusion that Thomas McGreevy did not create the impression on Larkin, Connolly & Co. that he had influence over the Minister. I say that this finding cannot be justified by the facts. Look at the results as they are. McGreevy may have deceived them. His role I suppose to a certain extent was to squeeze them as much as he could; but, Sir, here are the facts, and it is with pain and sorrow that I am obliged to refer to the letters that I am now going to read. At page 213 of the evidence I find this letter from Michael Connolly:

"SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, 31st December, 1882.

"* * * * I think if you manage your affairs properly there is no doubt but you will get the cross-wall. By all means keep in with friend Thomas, and be guided by him in everything that you do, and as yourselves and Moore & Wright are the only ones in the Dominion who have proper plant for doing such work, I think there is not a doubt but you will get it; for they cannot give it to Moore & Wright, as they are at loggerheads with the Board. Then you will be the only party who are in harmony with the Harbour Commission, and have the necessary plant to do the work: therefore, you will get it, for friend Thomas can work it in many a way. For instance, he can have the engineers in charge make out a report in your favour, which will justify the Commission or Minister of Public Works in giving you the work, even though you are not the lowest. If you get the work and want me back of course I will come back: but if you do not get it I think there are enough of you there now to attend to what you have in hand.

"Very truly yours,

"M. CONNOLLY."

And on the 27th February, 1883, the same Michael Connolly writes as follows:—

"SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, 27th February, 1883.

"Yours of the 15th and 18th inst. came duly to hand. I am really very glad to hear that you have everything in such good shape. I think, as you say, there will be no difficulty about your getting the cross-wall. Even if the Minister has to strain a point you will find the work will be awarded to you, for he is not overscrupulous when his friends need assistance."

Well, Sir, where did Michael Connolly get the impression that Thomas McGreevy had such influence over the Minister? I say, without fear, that my hon. friends have not drawn the proper conclusion. Thomas McGreevy, all through that long series of fraudulent operations, created the impression in the minds of Larkin, Connolly & Co. that he controlled entirely the late Minister of Public Works. It is a painful duty for us to acknowledge that; but it is the fault of the late Minister himself. He should not have allowed Thomas McGreevy to live with him; he should not have allowed him to go among his employés as he has done; he should not have said to Mr. Valin, of the Quebec Harbour Commission: "You follow McGreevy in spite of all." It has been a great and unfortunate mistake that he has made; but the facts remain. You say there was a conspiracy. There is no doubt there was; but it was not a pleasure to Larkin, Connolly & Co. to bleed as they have done; it was not a pleasure to them to pay the large sums of money they were obliged to pay. It was a conspiracy, but a conspiracy forced upon them on a great many occasions. Again, Thomas McGreevy, in the letter that he wrote on the 2nd of May, 1885, boasts that he has seen the Minister, and that the Minister and Perley have agreed to dismiss Bennett. You will tell me that Bennett was not dismissed. But look at Murphy's evidence. Murphy tells you in so many words: "We tried to find a party as suggested by Thomas McGreevy himself in his letter of the 2nd of May; we tried to get Williams, who was asked by Thomas McGreevy, but he would not go." Then they made up their mind, as Murphy explains, that Perley should go and settle the matter himself. That fact, having been brought to the knowledge of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., was sufficient to create the impression on their minds that Thomas McGreevy controlled the Minister. As I have said, I may be prejudiced; it may be that many of the members of this House are prejudiced by political feelings; but the facts of this case are of such a nature that we must condemn this conspiracy with the utmost severity. If we find that the Minister is guilty, after the whole discussion has been carried on in the same way as the enquiry has been conducted, with fairness, we must say so. It would be very improper if this Parliament should condemn only the minor parties, and fail to condemn the most guilty party. If the evidence does not go to show that Sir Hector Langevin knew the whole conspiracy, well and good; but, Sir, let us discuss the facts as they are. He has been guilty at any rate of a great neglect of duty; he has been guilty of a great imprudence. It has been said that he had a great deal of work to do. There is no doubt that he had; but when he had to deal with millions he had work that was worthy of his attention. It would have been well for him as a Minister of the Crown to have written fewer letters and to have attended to his great public duties. It is a pity that Sir Hector Langevin, after his long career, should have fallen in such company as we find him in to-day. It is a pity, I say again; and I believe that no one will say it with greater sorrow than I say it myself. I cannot ignore the fact that the race to which I belong is under a cloud, and I will not be found among the men who will try to find Sir Hector Langevin more guilty than he is. I do not want to condemn him as being more guilty than he is; but on the other hand it is not a question of race; it is a question of public duty with us. If that conspiracy had not been discovered by fortunate circumstances, who can tell to-day what would have been the result? Millions of money would have been stolen; there is no doubt about it. Larkin, Connolly & Co. got everything they wanted; they had to take a little time here and there, but they always succeeded. Sir, my duty is done. I brought before this Parliament grave charges. I was accused of a great many things, I know, from the first day that I put my foot in this chamber. There were men deceived by Thomas McGreevy who said: That man Tarte is for sale. Mr. Speaker, if I were an indiscreet man, if I were the man to strike those who have fallen, I could say things to-day that would surprise you. If I had been a man for sale, I think it would have been very easy for me to have made a good little fortune. I have spoiled the game of people who were stealing every year hundreds of thousands of dollars. Money was no object with them. They have tried to ruin my character and reputation in connection with that Baie des Chaleurs affair, in which my name has appeared; they have said that I shared in the money. Well, Sir, there will be an enquiry in the Province of Quebec. It is true that I have been obliged to accept political assistance from my hon. friends on this side of the House. But, Sir, if I got one cent of that mon[illegible] I shall be here during the next session of Parliament, and you will expel me from this chamber. I have endorsed notes at a time when nobody knew a word about the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. I have endorsed notes to protect myself. I knew that my election would be contested, I knew that my credit was ruined by those men. Mr. Thomas McGreevy controlled, as my hon. friends in Quebec know, banks in that city, he controlled the influence of this Government, he could ruin any man, and he did his best to ruin my credit. I was obliged to pass through all those humiliations. I am sorry to say that among my hon. friends opposite, with whom I have worked very long, were men who believed I would have disgraced myself in such a way. I did not do anything of the kind, and I stand to-day ready to go before any committee. If my hon. friends who endorsed notes had only suspected what has since come out, they would not have done so. The money that represents those notes is still in the Quebec treasury. If Pacaud paid them, he made a mistake, because as a matter of fact he was not obliged to pay them. They should have been renewed, as our money is there. You will pardon me if I allude to-night to this matter; but I do so because I wish to be looked upon by my colleagues and peers just as I am, no better than anybody else and no worse. Another allusion was made to another matter. My hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) put in the Committee a question which was an unfair question, as both sides admitted, and which he would not have put had he reflected, but I must answer that question on the floor of Parliament. I never got any money from Mr. Thomas McGreevy for myself. I subscribed to a political fund in his hands by the direction of the late Minister of Public Works, and none of us who subscribed suspected at the time that we were mixing our legitimately earned money with plundered money. I cannot take my seat before thanking in English, as I did in French at the beginning of my remarks, the chairman of the Privileges and Elections Committee for the dignity and tact he showed all through this enquiry. At the beginning, I believe he was a little prejudiced against our case, and there was some little difficulty between us. At the time I must admit I was rather quick, and I feel bound to repair to-day the wrong I may have done then. The enquiry was conducted with a view of getting at the facts, we had no quarrel, everything went on as it should before a Parliamentary Committee, and I cannot agree in the idea the hon. gentleman has suggested that this Parliament should abandon control of enquiries into the honour of its members. I believe as long as the Parliament of Canada will be worthy of remaining a Parliament, we will be able to take care of our own dignity. I must also thank the members of the Committee for the assistance they have given. Even in our differences of opinion, we have found the ways and means to get at the truth. I resume my seat feeling satisfied that, as far as I am concerned, my case is through. I know it is difficult to give judgment beyond the charges I have made, because I am prepared to admit, I did not at the beginning, when I made those charges, believe that the written and verbal evidence would go so far, but the facts are there. The judgment of the House must be what it should be. I am not prepared to say now what it should be.

Mr. TARTE.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I have seen in my short parliamentary career many strange things, but I do not know that for twenty-five years I ever saw a more extraordinary spectacle than that presented to-night. A member of Parliament, a former political friend and supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, has, for three hours arraigned the policy and the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to their administration of Public Works, and yet upon the ministerial benches, behind them and on each side of them, there is not a man who has courage enough to rise in his seat and defend the position of the Government. Hon. gentlemen will remember that this is not an assault solely upon the late member for Quebec West or an assault solely upon the late Minister of Public Works. It is an assault upon every hon. gentleman who was the colleague of the Minister of Public Works while he was a member of the present Administration. They supported and sustained him; and if they know anything about parliamentary constitutional rule, they must know perfectly well that each one of them is just as responsible as the late Minister of Public Works. I am astounded that the Minister of Justice, and the Minister of War, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the Minister of Finance, and above all the Secretary of State, should remain silent in their seats. Are they going to plead guilty to the charges levelled against them? Are they going to allow judgment to pass against them by default or are they going to be satisfied with the speech made upon behalf of the Administration by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard)? I have no objections to the statements of that hon. gentleman except this, that he assured Parliament that all the evidence, all the documents, everything that would tend either to incriminate or exculpate was submitted to the investigating committee. That is not the case. What has become of the documents that are missing? What has become of the mutilated books, and where were the explanations of the mutilated books? What has become of the mass of correspondence that we know passed between Sir Hector and Uncle Thomas McGreevy? Not a scrap of that correspondence could be found. It had been in Sir Hector Langevin's private room in this building, a portion of which was occupied by Mr. Thomas McGreevy when attending to his parliamentary duties. The correspondence disappeared. It was destroyed or stolen, and not a single tittle of it produced before the investigating committee. What a tale would have been unfolded had that correspondence only seen the light of day, the secret correspondence that passed between the Minister of Public Works and his bosom friend for long, long years? We were not favoured with the sight of that correspondence. The letters mysteriously disappeared—burnt or destroyed. And what has become of Thomas McGreevy? The very moment that we came to the critical point in the investigation, the very moment when we wanted to bring home the charges to the proper person, at that moment Thomas McGreevy became dumb and would not open his mouth. When we asked Thomas McGreevy what became of the enormous sums of money obtained by the conspirators from the Dominion treasury, Thomas McGreevy was silent. He was reported to Parliament and the Sergeant-at-Arms went to Quebec to find him, but he was not to be found, and the story that Thomas McGreevy could have told is untold to this hour. What a tale he could have told if he were brought back and made to speak, and that ought to have been done if the hon. gentlemen wanted to clear their skirts and free themselves from the charge of allowing conspirators to rob the Dominion treasury? If they desired to do that they would have brought Thomas McGreevy back, and we would have made him answer those questions. They knew better. Thomas McGreevy told too much, and they did not want to hear anything more from Thomas McGreevy. And so Thomas McGreevy rusticates at the seaside or in the United States of America. We are told by the mover of this report, which is submitted by the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that we should not convict Sir Hector Langevin because he acted under the direction of his employés, that the business of his department was so large, the correspondence so voluminous, and the contracts so numerous, that it was impossible for the Minister to personally attend to the matter, and that things were left largely in the hands of the employés of the department. If I recollect rightly, a gentleman who was called before the Committee swore that of all the departmental heads Sir Hector Langevin was the best, and, more than that, that there was not a detail in his department that Sir Hector Langevin was not conversant with. Yet this man, who was so conversant with every detail of his department, is to be relieved from the consequences of his own act in conspiring with conspirators, if the evidence establishes that, on the ground that he did not know what was transpiring in his own department? We have been told ever since Sir Hector Langevin has been a Minister of the Crown that he was the most efficient and the most accommodating of all the Ministers, and was thoroughly acquainted with all the details of his department. If the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) has no better defence than that to make, some one else should try some other excuse. He sought to justify public stealing from the public purse in this way, and even the majority of the Committee have had to admit that there was a huge and gigantic conspiracy on the part of the contractors, aided by Thomas McGreevy, to defraud the public treasury. The hon. gentleman seeks to justify that by saying that large sums were paid in the past in connection with the Intercolonial Railway in addition to the contract prices and in defiance of the law, referring to 12 or 15 years ago. Is it any justification for John Jones committing highway robbery that Peter Snooks has also committed highway robbery? Is it any justification for this Government, committing these acts, that the old Government of which it is the rump, and the inferior part of the rump at that, paid claims which should never have been paid? Is that a justification of the outrages and frauds on the country which has been committed by these conspirators? But the Committee have declared that these conspirators shall be indicted with all the form and solemnity that the Minister of Justice can bring to bear in Her Majesty's courts. The small thieves are to be brought to justice, but the big thieves, if there are any such, are to escape scot free. If the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) wanted to satisfy the demand which is made from one end of the country to the other, he ought to have reported that men in or out of the public service who violate their duties shall be punished, and then he would render a service to his country. No defence has been offered to Parliament for the report submitted, no defence has been given of the circumstances that bring these charges directly home to the late Minister of Public Works. This is a great and important question, the greatest question that this or any other Parliament has been seized of. In olden times, Ministers of the Crown were impeached before the high court of Parliament for violating the trust reposed in them. They were impeached, and convicted, fined, and imprisoned by Parliament; but we have reason to be thankful that in the high court of Parliament of Canada this is only the second time that a member of Parliament has been impeached before his peers for misconduct as a member of the House. The question is a great and wide one. I do not pretend, in the short space which I have to address the House, to overtake all the charges the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) has preferred against the member for Quebec (Mr. McGreevy) and the Minister of Public Works. I shall deal only with a portion of them; but, even so, I think I shall be able to show the frauds committed and the frauds arrived at more clearly than is shown by the report of the Committee. I shall deal as shortly as possible with this matter, having in view the presentation of this case before the public of this country as well as the Parliament of this country, in plain and simple words. I shall deal with the frauds, the terrible frauds, that were committed in connection with the Esquimalt graving dock, and the contract in relation to that graving dock, and the changes made in connection with it. In the spring of 1884 the Minister of Public Works called for tenders for the construction of the Esquimalt graving dock. Two tenders were received. It is unnecessary to refer to these two tenders, because nothing was done in respect of them. The engineer of the department having reported to the Minister that one of the tenders was too high and the other too low, in the fall of 1884 the Minister of Public Works again calls for tenders. Eight tenders were submitted, but in dealing with the frauds committed in connection with that graving dock it is only necessary to refer to two of those tenders, namely, the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly, who agreed to do the whole work for $338,945, and the tender of these conspirators, so described in the report of the majority of the Committee, who agreed to do the work for $374,559. These tenders were subject to certain conditions, especially two conditions, as stated by the Minister of Public Works at an interview, which I shall refer to in a moment or two, had between himself and Michael Starrs. One of the conditions was that plant which the Government of Canada took over from the Government of British Columbia should be taken by the contractors at $50,000, and that that sum should be applied in reduction by just so much of the contract price. The other condition was, as stated by the Minister of Public Works, and sworn to by Starrs, that there should be no extras in connection with this contract. Sir, I say here and now that the evidence discloses that from the very moment the tenders were called for, from the very moment it was ascertained that the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly was the lowest by $35,000, from that very moment we are forced to the conclusion that there was a deep-laid scheme between Thomas McGreevy and the late Minister of Public Works to defraud Starrs & O'Hanly out of the contract, and to award it to the contractors Larkin, Connolly & Co., at a loss to the country upon the contract of $35,000, and an ultimate loss to the people of this country of $242,000. Sir, the first step in this scheme to cheat Starrs & O'Hanly out of the contract will be found in a letter written by the Department of Public Works to Starrs & O'Hanly, as follows (page 91 of the evidence):

"DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
"OTTAWA, 7th October, 1884.

"GENTLEMEN,—Having reference to your tender, dated the 20th ult., for the completion of the graving dock at Esquimalt, B. C., I am directed by the Honourable the Minister of Public Works to inform you that he allows you until Saturday next, the 11th inst., at 11 o'clock a.m., to strengthen yourselves financially by associating with you some man financially strong.

"At the time mentioned he, the Minister, will expect to be informed of the name of such associate, if any; and whether he and you will be prepared to sign then a contract for the execution of the work.

"I have the honour to be, gentlemen,
"Your obedient servant,
"F. H. ENNIS,
"Secretary."

Now, here, as I said, is the first attempt on the part of the Minister of Public Works to squeeze Starrs & O'Hanly out of the contract. Will the hon. member for Jacques Cartier or any other hon. member in the House tell me what right the Minister of Public Works had to write a letter to Starrs & O'Hanly that they could not get the contract unless they "strengthened themselves financially?" What business was that of the department? If Starrs & O'Hanly were respectable men, respectable contractors—and there is no pretense for saying they were not—if they were prepared to put up the security, and did put up the security, what right had the Minister of Public Works to say to them: "You come to me in four days, and let me be satisfied that you have strengthened yourselves financially, and we will talk about your taking the contract?" That, Sir, is the first step in the scheme to squeeze Starrs & O'Hanly out of this contract. So far the scheme had not succeeded. These men are business men, they live in the City of Ottawa. They were contractors; one of them is an engineer. They were not men to be trifled with. They were not exactly the men that the Minister of Public Works, or any official in his department, could subdue to their will without their knowing the reason why. So, on the 10th day of October, three days after the former letter of the secretary of the department, Starrs & O'Hanly wrote the following letter to the Minister of Public Works. Now, I regret to find it necessary to take up the time of the House in reading these letters; but as every one of them is a link in the chain that binds down the Department of Public Works and the head of it, I find it necessary, for the information of Parliament and the people of this country, that these documents should go before the people of Canada. As I said before, Starrs & O'Hanly were not men to be trifled with: they were not the men to be bamboozled by letters from the Department of Public Works; they were men not to be terrified by the Department of Public Works. On the 10th October, 1884, they addressed the following letter to the Department of Public Works (see page 91 of the evidence):

"SIR,—We have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th inst., conveying the wish of the Honourable the Minister of Public Works, re our tender for the completion of the Esquimalt Graving Dock, British Columbia.

"In reply, we beg to inform you that after considering the suggestion made of associating another contractor with us, we are of opinion that as we have the necessary means ourselves we will be better able to perform the contract to the satisfaction of the Government, without the assistance of another contractor.

"We will be ready to sign the contract Monday, and make the necessary deposit.

"We have the honour to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servants,
"STARRS & O'HANLY."

Mr. Speaker, this letter startled the Department of Public Works. These men were evidently not to be trifled with. The Minister found that correspondence would not bring these men to his terms. Besides, correspondence was dangerous, and the Minister of Public Works, 11 days afterwards, writes the following persuasive letter to Mr. Michael Starrs, inviting him to visit the department (see page 91 of the evidence):

"DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
"21st October, 1884.

"MICHAEL STARRS Esq.,
"Ottawa.

"Will you be good enough to call to this department at once, re Esquimalt graving dock.

"F. H. ENNIS,
"Secretary."

In pursuance of this letter, Mr. Michael Starrs called upon the Minister of Public Works. Michael Starrs interviewed the Minister of Public Works. You will bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that he was a staunch political friend of the present Administration. Michael Starrs was a strong personal and political friend of the late Premier of the Dominion. He had claims on the Government. He did not want to embarrass the Government, and more than all, he did not want to embarrass the Minister of Public Works. But Michael Starrs yielded to the pressure brought to bear on him by the Minister of Public Works. He yielded to the persuasive eloquence of the Minister, especially, as that eloquence was backed up by some very persuasive hints that it would be so much worse for Michael Starrs if he did not yield. What Micheal Starrs said on that occasion is all-important, because, in my judgment, if his evidence is to be believed, it brings the charge of connivance at fraud right home to the door of the Minister of Public Works. If the evidence of Michael Starrs is to be believed, and it is backed up in some respects by the testimony of his partner, Mr. O'Hanly, these men were unjustly and improperly thrown out of this contract, which they had agreed to take for $35,000 less than the tender of Larkin, Connolly & Co. What was said on the occasion is best told by the sworn testimony of Michael Starrs taken before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I will place before this House and the country the sworn testimony of Michael Starrs, and ask this country to say, under all the circumstances, which of the two men should be believed, the man who gives his testimony without anything to induce him to conceal the truth by perjury, or the man directly interested in the results of the enquiry. Michael Starrs' testimony is as follows :—

Q. Did any person suggest to you that you should withdraw your tender?—A. I have no recollection of the first tender at all. There was so little talk about the first tenders that went in, I have no recollection of that particular tender at all. There was scarcely anything said about it, either in the department or outside.

Q. Well, then, the second tender? Do you remember whether anybody suggested that you should withdraw your second tender or any tender?—A. Yes. It was suggested that I should withdraw the second tender.

Q. Tell me the circumstances under which that suggestion was made?—A. There was considerable circumstances in connection with that. Sir Hector sent for me and I went up and seen him. He told me, of course, my tender was too low, and he called in Mr. Perley and talked the matter over. He discussed the question and suggested that I was entirely too low.

May I ask what business a public servant, such as the Minister of Public Work then was, had to tell a respectable and responsible contractor that his tender was entirely too low? What motives actuated him, and why did he do it? Did he ever do it in any case, except in the case of Michael Starrs? This witness goes on to say :

WITNESS.—He went on to tell me that I knew myself there was a certain amount to be paid for plant and it was necessary to pay that $50,000, and that there was no getting out of it. He also told me that I could not expect any extras, that in was straight sailing, and so and so; that the work had to be done, and taking the $50,000 that was to be paid for plant out of our total, there would not be enough left to complete the work. That is about the sum and substance of the conversation.

Q. Had you any influence as a contractor?—A. A little.

Q. Were you prepared to carry out your contract?—A. I was.

Q. Were you able to carry it out?—A. I think we could have had means to carry it out with friends to assist us.

Q. Had you any means of your own?—A. If we had not——

Q. Did you put up your deposit?—A. Yes: we did. If we had not means we could not have put up the deposit.

Q. What deposit did you put up with the tender?—A. I think it was $7,500 that the tender called for.

Q. Did you comply with Sir Hector's request?—A. I did at last.

Q. What do you mean by "at last"?—A. At the wind up.

Q. At that interview?—A. He gave me three or four days to consider it, and I took up the balance of the deposit, amounting to $9,000 more, which made the total sum of $17,000.

Q. You brought that at the time?—Was it in money? A. It was an accepted cheque.

Q. Which, with the original deposit of $7,500, would have made $17,000?—A. Yes.

Q. What did you do with that when you brought it to the department?—A. The first cheque went in with the tender and the next I handed to Sir Hector himself.

Q. Why did you hand that second cheque to Sir Hector?—A. Because we had the conversation, and he gave me, as I have already stated, three or four days to consider. I was not anxious to take the work, but my partner was and some friends, and as I told you before, it was I who did the business with Sir Hector and I took the cheque up with me and handed it to him.

Q. Sir Hector assured you that if you got the contract the $50,000 for the plant would have to be paid and there would be no extras?—A. That is right.

Q. And that it was all plain sailing?—A. Yes.

Q. That you need not look for anything above contract prices?—A. I told Sir Hector I thought from the tone of his discussion that he did not want me to take the work, and said: "Sir Hector, I believe our figures are enough to do the work, but I see that you do not feel inclined to give me the work and consequently I will withdraw."

That evidence will be found on pages 1159-60 of the evidence taken before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That interview took place on the 24th October, 1884. Sir, the Minister of Public Works, by his solemn assurance to Mr. Starrs that certain things would inevitably occur, induced Mr. Starrs to withdraw his tender. By assuring Mr. Starrs that his tender was too low, that from the $50,000, the estimated value of the plant, not one cent would be deducted, that no extras whatever would be allowed; and by telling Mr. Starrs that it was a plain contract at a fixed price, and by suggesting to him every obstacle, raising every difficulty, and by throwing in the way of Mr. Starrs, as he swore, every obstacle that could possibly be placed in the way of his taking a contract, he withdrew his tender. So clearly is that pointed out by Mr. Starrs in his sworn testimony that I will venture shortly to quote a passage or two from it. At that interview the Minister of Public Works succeeded in squeezing Mr. Starrs out of the contract. He wanted not only to squeeze Starrs & O'Hanly out of the contract, but he wanted to award the contract to Larkin, Connolly & Co. He wished also to protect another important individual. Sir Hector Langevin suggested to Mr. Starrs that he had better write him a letter withdrawing his tender. He did more than that. He suggested to Mr. Starrs that he should write a direct and deliberate falsehood to him in order to justify himself before the country in passing over the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly and awarding the contract to Larkin, Connolly & Co. He suggested to Mr. Starrs that he should write to him (Sir Hector) a letter stating that he had made a mistake in his figures and tender. Sir Hector Langevin did that to protect himself, and to guard himself, if possible, when the question was discussed in Parliament and before the people as to why he should have passed over the lowest tender and given the contract to Larkin, Connolly & Co. Starrs & O'Hanly in a moment of weakness yielded to him. They wrote the letter. They gave the reason. They did so because there was a deposit of $17,000, and Mr. Starrs says that he and his partner came to the conclusion, when they saw the hostile attitude of the Minister of Public Works, that he was bound not to give them the contract, or if he did, that it would ruin them: they made up their minds to sign a letter, and the following letter was written to the Department Public Works (see page 1193):

"OTTAWA, 24th October, 1884.

"The Honourable Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN, K.C.M.G., "Minister of Public Works,
"Ottawa.

"HONOURABLE SIR,—We find that we have made a mistake in some of the items in our tender for the Esquimalt graving dock, B.C., and find that our prices are generally too low.

"We consider it therefore not prudent to take the contract, and that it would not be in the public interest if we were to do so.

"We therefore beg to withdraw our tender, and respectfully request that you may be pleased to return our deposit cheque.

"We have the honour to be, Sir,
"Your most obedient servants,
"STARRS & O'HANLY."

If the evidence of Mr. Starrs is to be believed, and I do not think there was a man who heard him give his evidence before the Committee who was not perfectly satisfied that he was honestly telling the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, then a gross fraud was committed. Now, Sir, here is what Michael Starrs swore, and recollect it is not a letter, although letters are valuable as evidence, it is not what he told somebody, but it is his sworn testimony. Sworn upon the Holy Evangelists to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, he tells the following story of that interview, and how he was induced to write that letter. If Michael Starrs' story is true it discloses the most extraordinary state of affairs that was ever known in the history of any Government in any country. Michael Starrs swore as follows (see page 1190):

Q. Were there any reasons in regard to the price of the contract to induce you to withdraw the tender? You say: "We find we have made a mistake in some of the items in our tender for the Esquimalt graving dock, B.C." Is that correct? Had you made any mistakes?—A. I will explain. No: I did not make any mistakes.

Q. You say "We find our prices are generally too low?"—A. No: it is there, and I did not object to it being there, but I want to give my reasons why this was worded that way.

Q. Go on. Will you tell the Committee, please, why you made these statements in this letter?—A. For the very reasons I gave at the last meeting: That Sir Hector threw so many obstacles in the way, and then, of course, we had a deposit of $7,500 up that went in with the first tender, and, of course, there is always supposed to be a risk about getting that back—if the tender is awarded to you and not complied with. So that Sir Hector threw so many obstacles in the way, showing me the lowness of our tender, and the difficulties that we had to contend with—no extras and $50,000 to be paid for plant—I asked Sir Hector: "Well, then, what am I to do to get our cheque back?" He suggested, "Write a letter to the department, officially to me, and I will get you your cheque returned." I said: "What will we say?" Sir Hector himself, I swear positively that he is the man who suggested to write it in the tone in which that letter is written now.

Is that statement true, Mr. Speaker? Is it true that a Minister of the Crown, ruling over a great public department in this country, the spending department of this country, in order to keep out a contractor to whom he did not want to award a contract, in order to enable him to award a contract to a favourite contractor who was always generous in his donations for charitable purposes, should have suggested to this contractor, to this respectable man, that he should solemnly sit down and write a deliberate falsehood and pen a deliberate lie to the Public Works Department? If the story of Michael Starrs is true, then that is the exact condition of affairs in relation to the Public Works Department. Michael Starrs goes on to testify (see page 1140):

Q. Did he then make a suggestion on which you made this statement?—A. He said: "You can write a letter representing that you made a mistake," and so on.

Q. Then you say now, on your oath, that this statement—that this letter, wherein you say you had made a mistake in your tender and that your tender was too low, was not your suggestion, but was suggested by Sir Hector?—A. Oh, certainly. It was suggested by him in his own office in the Public Works Department.

Q. Was that the reason and the only reason you wrote him the letter and made the statement?—A. That was the reason—to get back the other cheque for $7,500. Of course the $9,400 cheque when I handed it to Sir Hector, he took and looked at it, and said: "I see you are determined to take this work." I said: "Sir Hector, I have not been very anxious for it," and then after the conversation, the letter was written by my partner.

Q. You handed your cheque to Sir Hector. Did he see the cheque?—A. Yes: he looked at it and examined it.

Q. And afterwards he returned it?—A. He returned it to me before I left the room.

Q. Did he make any observation when he returned it?—A. The last words he said in connection with it was: "Thank God; you have relieved yourself of a great burden."

What an exclamation for a Minister to make! What was he thanking God for? Here was a man who went to the department with $17,000, prepared to take the contract, prepared to run the risks, if there were any to be run, prepared to go on with the contract in good faith, and when Sir Hector gets him to write a deliberate falsehood to the department, he exclaims: "Thank God." It is a melancholy condition of affairs, if the evidence of Michael Starrs is true, and the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) did not claim that it was not true, and, in fact, made no reference to it. Does it not show a degrading and humiliating condition of affairs in the Public Works Department, if not in other departments? So far, you will observe, Mr. Speaker, the scheme that I mentioned in my opening remarks, and which was concocted the moment the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly was received, prospered. The fraudulent plan adopted to freeze Starrs & O'Hanly out of the contract and to award this contract to Larkin, Connolly & Co. at a sum of $35,000 in excess of the sum that Starrs & O'Hanly were willing to do the work for succeeded. Without a moment's delay, the moment Sir Hector thanked God, and Michael Starrs was out of the way, in hot haste, without an instant's delay or a moment's reflection, Sir Hector rushes off to the Executive Council with a report, prepared, written on the spur of the moment, and he presents his report to Council. The report itself is an extraordinary and suggestive one. It speaks loudly; it speaks in no uncertain terms of the scheme concocted and the fraud carried out. I shall read only a portion of this report which relates to the matter I am now discussing. It is as follows (see page 93):—

"CERTIFIED COPY of a Report of a Committee of the Honourable the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General in Council on the 25th October, 1884

"On a Memorandum dated 24th October, 1884, from the Minister of Public Works, submitting that Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly, whose tender for the completion of the Esquimalt graving dock was accepted by Order in Council of the 16th October instant, have to-day by letter signified that they made mistakes in some items of their tender, and find that their prices are generally too low, submitting that it would not therefore be prudent for them to take the contract, and requesting to be allowed to withdraw their tender and have their deposit cheque returned to them.

"The Minister states that the chief engineer of his department reports to the effect that their tender was too low and that the work could not be done for the prices named: that the figures for masonry and concrete, the two principal items, are so low that they barely cover the cost of the stone to be quarried, leaving nothing for cement and labour and cutting and setting the stone in the work, and that it is evident that Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly have made serious mistakes in their tender as regards these items.

"The Minister, in view of these circumstances, recommends that Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly be permitted to withdraw their tender and have the security deposit returned to them, and that the contract be awarded to the next lowest tenderers, Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co., whose offer is for $374,559.53, if concrete be used for backing, and $403,373.03 if rubble backing be used.

"The Committee submit the same for Your Excellency's approval."

And of course it was approved of accordingly. I state here, without fear of successful contradiction, that this Minute of Council contains at least three, if not four, deliberate misstatements and misrepresentations made by the Minister of Public Works. You will observe that according to the evidence of Michael Starrs, Starrs & O'Hanly made no mistake in their tender. The Minister of Public Works, in his report to Council, stated that they made a mistake in their tender and wished to withdraw; but Starrs & O'Hanly swear they made no mistake in their tender. The Minister of Public Works reports to Council that the prices in the tender were altogether too low; Starrs swears point blank that their prices were not too low, and judging by the report of the auditors appointed by the Privileges and Elections Committee to investigate the accounts of Larkin, Connolly & Co., if Starrs & O'Hanly had got the contract at their price, and had even paid the $19,000 deducted for plant, they would still clear in hard cash $50,000, and in all reason that is enough on a contract of two or three hundred thousand dollars. That report to Council is a gross misrepresentation of the facts. They did not submit that it would be impossible for them to take the contract; that was the suggestion of the Minister of Public Works. They did not request to be allowed to withdraw the contract; on the contrary, if the evidence of Michael Starrs is to be relied upon at all, backed up as it is by the evidence of O'Hanly, these men did not want to withdraw from the contract. These men did not think their tender was too low: they swear they made no mistake in their contract; and the report to Council was a pure invention of the Minister of Public Works. That report was adopted by Council, and Starrs & O'Hanly were cheated out of the contract, and Larkin, Connolly & Co. got it. The story of the Esquimalt graving dock is a disreputable and disgraceful story to be told in the Parliament of Canada. If we deal with the case as a criminal case, or even as a civil case is dealt with in the ordinary courts of justice, one would say that all these facts and circumstances bring the charge directly home to the implicated and incriminated Minister. Is this not so? If you have followed the evidence of Michael Starrs, if you have followed the history of the tenders, if you have followed the conduct of the Minister of Public Works, if you have followed step by step the different stages in that history, and if you have observed the anxiety exhibited by the Minister to get rid of the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly, and to award the contract to Larkin, Connolly & Co., but one conclusion would strike your mind or the mind of any reasonable man, and that is, that the circumstances which tell for the guilt of the incriminated Minister are overwhelming. If it is not so that the Minister of Public Works squeezed these men improperly out of the contract, and saddled upon the people of the country an addition of $35,000, the difference in the prices of the two tenders, and awarded the contract to Larkin, Connolly & Co., by which the people of this country ultimately lost in extras $242,000, will the Minister of Justice or any other member of this House tell us how it was that Starrs & O'Hanly were assured by the Minister of Public Works that not a cent would be deducted from the price of the plant, $50,000, when the very same Minister deducted $19,000 for the price of the plant when Larkin, Connolly & Co. got the contract? Will the Minister of Justice or any other member on the Treasury benches or in Parliament tell us, if my view is not a correct view, and if the conclusion I have arrived at is not a correct conclusion, why the Minister of Public Works should have told Starrs & O'Hanly that no extras would be allowed on the contract, when the evidence shows conclusively, and the report of the auditors appointed by the Committee to investigate these matters shows, that extras were paid on that contract to the amount of $207,000 or thereabouts? If the conclusion I have arrived at is not correct, will some hon. gentleman explain to us the extraordinary and inexplicable conduct of the Minister of Public Works in reporting to Council that these men had made some mistake in their tender, and that their prices were altogether too low? The thing is impossible. The conclusion one is forced to arrive at from the evidence, and this is only a small part of it, is simply irresistible, bringing the crime home to the doors of the Department of Public Works and the Minister. We have another item which goes to confirm my theory, and it is this: At pages 175, 296, 301, 303 and 321, you will find that on various occasions during the investigation, Owen Murphy swore that he offered the Minister of Public Works 25 per cent. upon the contract prices, if the contract for the Esquimalt graving dock were awarded to Larkin, Connolly & Co. It may be said right here that no importance can be attached to Owen Murphy's evidence. I shall speak of that later on. Every step taken, so far as we have gone, is only confirmatory of the story told by Owen Murphy. If it is not true, what other theory have hon. gentlemen to advance? What other story have they got to palm off on the people of this country if the conclusion which I have arrived at is not correct, that there was collusion, connivance and fraud in the Department of Public Works and the Minister with the conspirators? There are other circumstances, convincing to the minds of thinking, reasonable men, who are not carried away entirely by political partizanship, but who will take the trouble to read the evidence given before the Committee and judge of it on its merits. The contract was awarded to Larkin, Connolly & Co. without any justification; but no sooner was that contract awarded by the Minister of Public Works to Larkin, Connolly & Co. than these same conspirators set their machinery in motion to secure changes in that contract to their own advantage; and several changes were secured, and several changes were agreed to be secured, that were not ultimately carried out. The first change was to allow the contractors to use stone instead of brick in the caisson chamber, and $6,000 or thereabouts was allowed for that change. The next change was in the entrance to the graving dock, the double entrance being done away with, and a circular head substituted; and this change, which was estimated to cost $35,000, really cost about $39,000. Then, on the 16th of April, 1885 (see page 122), another change was applied for, the re-coursing of the graving dock and altering the course for the inclination of the bottom; and that change was assented to on the 20th of April, 1885, by the Minister, without cost to the country (see page 123.) There was another change in April, 1885, which will be found mentioned at pages 124, 125, and 128 of the blue-book, involving the use of larger stones than those called for by the contract. Leave was given to use larger stones without cost. Now let us see what the sequel was. Everyone knows from the investigation and from the history of Larkin, Connolly & Co., in connection with this contract, that these were pratical business men, who never did any work without getting paid for it, and never expended 50 cents without expecting to get a dollar in return. On the 11th of September, 1885, Michael Connolly writes to Nick Connolly, and among other things he said (see page 380):

"Instead of Trutch complying with the request of Sir Hector that we should receive every possible indulgence and encouragement, he is doing everything he can in an underhand way to embarrass us, and Bennett is his tool all through."

Whether this letter reached Sir Hector Langevin's eye or not I am not prepared to say; but he gave them every indulgence; he gave them more than indulgence, he gave them hard cash. The changes were to be made without any cost to the country: yet I find that on the 25th of January, 1886, the Minister of Public Works, by Mr. Perley, sends the following telegram to the agent of the Dominion Government in British Columbia; and mark, it is not done on Mr. Perley's responsibility at all. The telegram is in the following words (see page 127):—

"25th January, 1886.

"Hon. J. W. TRUTCH.
"Victoria, B.C.

"Minister directs contractors shall be paid for full quantity of stone in dock and caisson recess, and full measurement on all stones. Letter by mail.

"HENRY F. PERLEY.
"Chief Engineer."

And the letter followed by mail. Now this little scheme, according to the evidence of Mr. Perley, cost $23,000; and according to the evidence of Sir Hector Langevin it cost $40,000. Another change was proposed to be made, a most important change in the construction of the graving dock at British Columbia. On the 26th of January, 1885 (see page 95), the contractors applied for leave to lengthen the British Columbia dock by 100 feet. On the 3rd of February, 1885, permission was refused by the department in the following words:—"That no increase in the length of the dock was required." But the question of the Esquimault graving dock was not to be settled by that. These contractors were men of perseverance; they were men of resource and resolution: they were men looking after the almighty dollar, and who would stop at nothing to gain it. And we find Michael Connolly writing his friend Owen Murphy from Esquimalt on the 21st of March, 1886 (see page 218):

"FRIEND OWEN,—Yours of 8th inst. came duly to hand. I hope you will soon hear definitely about the extension of the dock, as we have some men we would like to retain. Of course if the estimate passes we will give everything we can afford. We have not heard anything from the $20,000 drawback yet, but perhaps we will in a day or two."

Mark the words: "if the dock is lengthened, if the estimate passes, we will give everything we can afford." To whom were they to give everything they could afford. Was it to be given to Mr. Thomas McGreevy or to Sir Hector Langevin to supplement the reptile fund? On the 15th of February, 1886, Michael Connolly again writes his friend Owen Murphy as follows (see page 187):—

"Now about the dock, if the $250,000 pass in the Budget, we of course will have some work to tear down, &c., but if you can get a lump contract for extending at $250,000 we can give $50,000."

To whom were they to give the $50,000? And through whose instrumentality and by whose influence were they to secure the change in the contract by lengthening the British Columbia graving dock? There was no man but the one able to do it. There was no man to intervene and act as go-between except the omnipotent Thomas McGreevy, and he was utterly helpless without the aid of the Minister of Public Works. To show still further upon what these men depended and the reliance they had on Thomas McGreevy and the Minister of Public Works—and their reliance was not in vain—the following letter throws some light on the subject. It is from Mr. Larkin, one of the best of the conspiring contractors, to Mr. O. E. Murphy (see page 184):

"I have just got your letter of 17th inst. Our friends call for another $5,000——"

It is very much like old times, Mr. Speaker: "Send me another $10,000." Our friends in Quebec want another $5,000, and Pat. Larkin, now become a little alarmed, said:

"I have just got your letter of the 17th inst. Our friends' call for another $5,000, on account of British Columbia, is not in accordance with the agreement we had when the $50,000 was divided—that was that there was to be no more calls or divisions to be made until the indebtedness of the British Columbia dock and Quebec harbour works to the Quebec dock was paid; that was distinctly stated by me, and agreed to by R. H.; otherwise, I would not have agreed to the division of the $50,000."

In further confirmation of that, let me read an extract from the letter of the 25th of Febraury, 1886, page 186 of the report, written by Michael to Owen:

"I told you in a letter lately that if $250,000 were granted for extending the dock we would give $50,000 of it for some charitable purpose."

Let the hon. Minister of Public Works tell us to what charitable purpose this $50,000 was to be donated? Let any member of the Administration, let the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, tell this Parliament and the country to what charitable purpose this $50,000 was to be given?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Speak now.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Why should these contractors give $50,000 to some charitable purpose? They were not the men to do that unless there was some reason for it. They were not the men to give a red cent, unless they knew it would be recouped by one hundred red cents. These pressing demands upon the contractors—the conspirators as they are called in the majority report—were so great and so frequent that they had to insist upon the Government changing the contract by lengthening the Esquimalt graving dock 100 feet at the cost of $100,000 to the people. Let me read a short extract from another letter to be found on page 18 of the blue-book, in further confirmation of the statement I am making, and as bringing nearer the Department of Public Works and the Minister the charge of fraudulent connivance with these conspirators. Above all things, it is written from the Canadian House of Commons, where it is supposed honesty and purity are to be found, if they are to be found anywhere, and it is written by Mr. Thomas McGreevy, as member of Parliament, on the 26th April, 1887, shortly after the elections of the year and when funds were required and had to be obtained (see page 18):

"MY DEAR ROBERT,—I have just seen Perley about dredging. I think he will report on 35 cents and put some conditions which will amount to nothing. He will report when I will be there. I have had a conversation with Shakespeare on the lengthening of the British Columbia dock. I told him to unite with the others and push it. He is prepared to to so."

Prepared to push it, Mr. Speaker—

"I told him to write and get the length of steamers chartered by the Canadian Pacific Railway from the Cunard Company."

In pursuance of these repeated demands made upon the contractors by the conspirators who lived in the Province of Quebec and the City of Ottawa, and yielding to the pressure of these conspirators who had to be recouped for their outlays, the Minister of Public Works penned, on the 18th of November, 1889, a report to Council in favour of extending the dock by 100 feet at a cost to the people of $100,000. Instead of the Minister of Public Works thanking God that Starrs & O'Hanly were relieved from a burden, the people of Canada, from one end of Canada to the other, have reason to thank God that there is a higher power than the Minister of Public Works. The dock was not lengthened, not through any fault of the Minister of Public Works, but because the Imperial Government intervened, and saved $100,000 to the people of this country. In the evidence, there was a little document produced by Mr. M. P. Connolly, the book-keeper of these conspirators. It is a singular little document, produced as an extract from the books of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and relates to the Esquimalt graving dock. It is as follows :—

"ESQUIMALT DOCK.

August, 1885		$4,000
February, 1886		3,000
April, 1886		1,000
June, 1886		3,000
March, 1887		17,000
do	Three Rivers	5,000
March, 1888		2,000
		$35,000

26th April, 1889. "Certified correct,
"M. P. CONNOLLY,
"Clerk."

The item of $5,000 for Three Rivers is exceedingly suggestive. What does it mean? Was that a charitable donation given by the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. Three Rivers was the constituency of the Minister of Public Works; March, 1887, was very shortly after the general election; funds were required to pay election bills, and what more natural than that the men who had received such pronounced favours at the hands of the Department of Public Works should be called upon to replenish the funds required for election purposes at Three Rivers.

Mr. COATSWORTH. You had better read Connolly's evidence upon that.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I have read it, and there is the evidence upon it, and it shows that that $5,000 was charged in the books of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and the document is signed and certified by Connolly himself. Is it disputed by any reasonable man that that money was expended for election purposes? Why should it be in the books marked "Three Rivers, $5,000," if the money was not so expended? Other changes were asked for in this contract, and the Minister was always ready and willing to make the changes, and the Government, for they are responsible for his actions, were always ready to accede to whatever demand was made by the conspirators. Although at first the Government refused to lengthen the graving dock, afterwards they agreed to lengthen it by 100 feet. They made the change from sandstone to granite when they were asked to do so, and when they were asked to change back to sandstone, because the contractors found that they would make more money by using sandstone than they would by using granite, they assented also to that change. Some officials who would not collude with the contractors were on the eve of being dismissed. The Minister and the chief engineer were willing to dismiss them, and all this was in pursuance of the original corrupt contract with Larkin, Connolly & Co. Now, let us refer for a moment to the $50,000 for the plant. The firm of Starrs & O'Hanly were distinctly informed that by the terms of the contract the plant taken at $50,000 cash would be adhered to. Starrs swears that the Minister impressed upon him that he must not expect one cent of reduction from that amount, or any extras, and Larkin, Connolly & Co. took the contract on the same understanding, and paid the amount of $50,000 out of their monthly estimates. But they knew the men they had to deal with. They knew the influence of Thomas McGreevy in the Public Works Department. They knew that they controlled the power behind the throne, and they succeeded in reducing the amount to $30,000. In April, 1885 (see page 98) they applied to Trutch, the agent of the department in British Columbia, for a reduction of $12,403 in the price of the plant. On the 16th April, 1885, Trutch writes to the Minister of Public Works, stating that the demand made by the Connollys had been refused by him, excepting to the extent of $10.45. On the 12th May, 1885, Gobeil writes to Trutch that "by the direction of the Minister of Public Works, no deductions can be made." Subsequently things change. The contractors get new light. They make another application for the reduction, and in January, 1886, Perley reports direct to the Minister of Public Works, that a reduction should be made of over $19,000, and I am not aware that the Minister of Public Works has denied that statement to this hour. That report was sent to the Department of Public Works, and it was sworn that it was the constant habit of the Minister of Public Works to examine all these reports and discuss them with Mr. Perley; so that, if this report was not examined and discussed by the Minister, it was about the only one that was not. If the Minister of Public Works did not see this report, it is because he closed his eyes and stopped his ears to all information on the subject. In view of all this, I ask if, in the manipulations of the Minister with the tenders and the contract, the changes in the contract without justification, the reduction in the price of the plant without justification, there is a single man who can lay his hand on his heart and honestly say he believes that all this was going on for years and years and that the Minister of Public Works knew nothing about it. If the Minister of Public Works did not read his reports and did not know what went on in his own office he is not the man we have always supposed him to be. What is the result of all this manipulating of these tenders and the changes which were made in the contracts? The result is, that work which Starrs & O'Hanly were willing to do for $338,945 cost the country $581,841, or a dead loss to the people of Canada of $242,896, in addition to $27,000 given by way of a donation. What is the cause of these startling results? There can be only one of two causes: There must be either gross negligence and mismanagement, or criminal connivance. I leave hon. gentlemen opposite on either horn of the dilemma. One or the other is inevitable. Let me submit a very short resumé of the facts and circumstances, either admitted or proved, that I think must carry conviction to the mind of reasonable men. First, there was the shabby and dishonest way in which the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly was passed over and the contract awarded to Larkin, Connolly & Co. Then there was the gross misrepresentation of the facts to Council made by the Minister of Public Works in reference to the Starrs & O'Hanly tender. Now, let us see what all these changes have cost. At this late hour I do not propose to enter into the matter in detail. All I desire to say in reply to what hon. gentlemen, in the face of all this evidence, ask us to believe, namely, that the Minister of Public Works is innocent, is that if he is innocent in this matter, if the conspirators ruled every official in the Public Works Department, then these conspirators were enabled to rob this country of an enormous sum of public money by the gross negligence of the head of the department. The collusion of the Minister of Public Works to betray the trust that the people reposed in him is so clear, to my mind, that I do not believe it is open to a reasonable doubt. The collusion is clearer still, more irresistible, in view of the sworn testimony that was given before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that a large portion of this money, stolen out of the public treasury, went into the hands of Thomas McGreevy, and by him was disposed of for election purposes, if it did not go into the hands of Sir Hector Langevin. Now, I want to point out a few remarkable pieces of evidence that, in my judgment, I regret to say, still more clearly connect the Minister of Public Works with this conspiracy. Now, we all know that the Minister of Public Works is impeached for a grave crime, a grave misdemeanour. That impeachment rests upon several grounds, and the evidence that was adduced before the Committee on Privileges and Election, and upon which I am now addressing the House, covers several of these grounds. First, it is charged that the Minister of Public Works connived at the frauds perpetrated by these conspirators; that he fraudulently lent himself as a tool in the hands of Thomas McGreevy to pass over tenders that were lower than those of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and to award the contract to them; that he colluded with Thomas McGreevy to award to Larkin, Connolly & Co. contracts that they were not entitled to; that he colluded with Thomas McGreevy to award these conspirators contracts without tenders; that he colluded with Thomas McGreevy to give these contracts on terms that were outside and wholly irrespective of the call for tenders and the specifications; that he colluded with Thomas McGreevy and these conspirators to give to these conspirators exorbitant prices; that he was guided and directed solely by Thomas McGreevy—that he was, in a word, a blind tool in the hands of Thomas McGreevy; that he was as clay in the hands of the potter; that Thomas McGreevy was the power behind the Throne; that Thomas McGreevy ruled the Department of Public Works and the Minister of Public Works. Sir, I have submitted to you evidence that I think sustains the conclusion that the impeachment in that respect is true. We know that this impeachment, like every other charge of a criminal or a civil nature, must rest either upon circumstantial or direct evidence. I have submitted to you a number of circumstances that directly point to the Minister of Public Works, and I propose to submit to you additional facts and circumstances that I think will enable every reasonable man to conclude without hesitation that the Minister of Public Works is not free from guilt in this matter. We know that the weight to be attached to a good deal of the evidence on which this question depends rests largely upon the surrounding circumstances; we know that it is said that circumstantial evidence is more weighty than direct evidence; we know that one of the first judges of England, 100 years ago, declared in a celebrated case that witnesses would lie, but circumstances never. How true or how untrue that may be is a matter of little consequence now, because I believe that the circumstances surrounding this case are so many, so numerous and so clear, that they lead to but one conclusion. It was admitted, and it will be admitted now, that for 20 years Thomas McGreevy was the bosom friend and chosen companion of the Minister of Public Works; it is admitted that for 10 years Thomas McGreevy was an inmate of the residence of the Minister of Public Works at Ottawa, and occupied a room in his private office in the Parliament buildings at Ottawa, as if it were his own. It is admitted, or proved, that Thomas McGreevy was the treasurer of the Conservative election fund in the City of Quebec, and of the eastern portion of the Province of Quebec; it is admitted that the Minister of Public Works was the leader of the great Conservative party, and as such would know something of the workings of that party in the Province of Quebec; it is admitted that for 25 years Thomas McGreevy sat in Parliament behind the Minister of Public Works as the steadfast and unswerving follower of the Minister of Public Works; it is admitted that a voluminous correspondence was carried on between the Minister of Public Works and Thomas McGreevy; it is admitted—if not admitted, it was proved—that 12 years ago Thomas McGreevy donated to the Minister of Public Works $10,000 of hard cash to pay either the election expenses of his own political contests, or the expenses connected with the election protests in which the Minister of Public Works was the respondent; it is admitted that up to this hour Thomas McGreevy has carried and still carries in his possession the promissory note of the Minister of Public Works for that $10,000; it is admited that for these 12 years Thomas McGreevy paid every four months the discount upon that $10,000; it is admitted that the Minister of Public Works expects—he swore it himself—never to pay a farthing of that $10,000, but that Thomas McGreevy is to pay it all. In a word, Mr. Speaker, up to this hour it is clear as the noon-day sun that during these ten years Thomas McGreevy held the Minister of Public Works firmly by the throat, and the Minister of Public Works could not budge except by the will of Thomas McGreevy. It is admitted that Thomas McGreevy out of this fund, stolen from the people of this Dominion, paid $25,000 to subsidize the personal organ of the Minister of Public Works, an organ that he secured in order that he might control it himself; it is admitted, or proved, that Thomas McGreevy, out of this same fund so stolen from the people of Canada, paid $3,000 to subsidize the personal organ of the son-in-law of the Minister of Public Works; it was proved by Thomas McGreevy's own brother, Robert, that out of this fund so stolen from the people of Canada, Thomas McGreevy secured $170,000 odd; Thomas McGreevy admits that he secured $60,000, and the accountants showed that at the very least about $130,000 passed into the hands of Thomas McGreevy. These facts, either admitted or proved by evidence that cannot be questioned, lead to but one conclusion, and that conclusion is that the Minister of Public Works was an instrument in the hands of Thomas Mc Greevy, and that Thomas McGreevy, as the majority report find, was the paid servant of these conspirators. It is said, as I mentioned a moment ago, that witnesses may lie. Circumstances also may lie; but written correspondence, written calmly, deliberately, after reflection, ought, in my judgment, to have more weight than oral testimony. Let us examine some letters that passed between Thomas McGreevy and his brother Robert; and bear in mind that these letters were written by Thomas McGreevy nine years ago. They were written at a period when the closest personal friendship existed between the Minister of Public Works and Thomas McGreevy. These letters were written on the subject of these very contracts which we are now discussing, some of them on the subject of the Esquimalt graving dock. They were written on the subject of the changes made in the contracts and of the extras paid on the contracts. They were written in strict confidence between Thomas McGreevy and his brother Robert, and are, in my judgment, the best pieces of evidence that can be submitted to Parliament. What object had Thomas McGreevy nine years ago in lying about the Minister of Public Works? What object had Thomas McGreevy nine years ago in writing a deliberate falsehood to his brother Robert, with whom he was on the closest terms of friendship? What object had he in misrepresenting the true state of affairs. None whatever; and yet, if Thomas McGreevy spoke the truth in those letters, the charge of criminal connivance with those conspirators is brought directly home to the door of the Minister of Public Works. On 5th May, 1883, Thomas McGreevy wrote to Robert (see page 16):

"The tenders for cross-wall only arrived here yesterday and are locked up until Monday, when he will commence his calculations. I will write you Tuesday and let you know the result."

The evidence has reference to the Minister of Public Works? Will the Minister of Justice, or anyone else, tell me exactly how Thomas Mc Greevy knew on 5th May that tenders directed to the Minister of Public Works had arrived in Ottawa? Will hon. gentlemen tell me how Thomas McGreevy discovered that on the following day, 6th May, the Minister of Public Works would begin his calculations on the tenders? There was only one source of information, and that source was the Minister of Public Works. How could Thomas McGreevy know that the tenders for the cross-wall arrived in Ottawa the day before he wrote that letter? The tenders I have mentioned were addressed to the Minister of Public Works and opened, I suppose, by the Minister. He could not know, unless he knew it from the Minister of Public Works. How did he find out that the Minister would commence his calculations on the following day, and how could he write to his brother: "I will write you to-morrow and let you know the result," except through the Minister of Public Works. The following letter will throw more light on the subject. It is written from the House of Commons, and is dated 7th May, and is as follows (see page 17):—

"I hope to let you know to-morrow about the result of cross-wall tenders. Have your arrangement with Beaucage before the result is known. I will give you timely notice. Murphy might approach O'Brien in the matter, but he would have to promise to get Charlebois away. All the others might be passed over."

Here hon. members will see in the clearest possible light the connivance between the Department of Public Works and Thomas McGreevy, else how could Thomas McGreevy write to his brother Robert that all the other tenders would be passed over if Beaucage's tender was out of the way. It was impossible for Thomas McGreevy to say that out of his own mind. The knowledge had to be acquired, and it could only be acquired in one way. There is another letter, an extraordinary letter, a suggestive letter. It was written by Mr. Perley, the confidential friend of the Minister of Public Works as well as his chief engineer, the man in whom he had unbounded faith, to Thomas McGreevy, and it contained bold statements regarding the Department of Public Works. It is from the chief engineer, dated 11th September, 1884, marked "private," and addressed to Thomas McGreevy. Hear what it says (see page 137):

"(Private.)

"My Dear Mr. McGreevy,—Your private note of the 9th to hand, and in reply I send you herewith a copy of the specification of the graving dock, British Columbia, two copies of tender, and sheets showing the quantities of work to be done to complete the work, these quantities having been computed by the resident engineer in British Columbia. I cannot send the rates supplied by myself, as I have never determined them. My estimate of the probable cost to finish was arrived at en bloc, and amounted to $390,000, or, deducting the $50,000 for plant and materials (see specification), $340,000 net. I send a photograph of the work as it stands, which may be of assistance to you, but an examination of the plans on exhibition here is desirable. I am told the best and most suitable quarry is 80 miles from Victoria, at or near Nanaimo."

This letter, dated from the Department of Public Works in Ottawa, is marked "private" by the engineer of the Minister of Public Works. Why should the engineer of the Department of Public Works send to Thomas McGreevy, in a letter marked "private," the specifications for the construction of the Esquimalt graving dock in advance? Why should he send Thomas McGreevy in advance copies of the proposed tenders? Why should he send Thomas McGreevy in advance copies of the estimates? Why should he tell Thomas Mc Greevy what the estimate was for the construction of the dock? Why should he tell Thomas McGreevy where he could conveniently get stone? What was done respecting other contractors? I challenge the Department of Public Works and the Government to adduce a tittle of evidence to show that this information was given to other tenderers except Thomas McGreevy. Why should Mr. Perley do this, except at the instigation and command of the Minister of Public Works? He could not do it except by direction of the Minister. Not only was Thomas McGreevy omnipotent in the Department of Public Works, and over the Minister, but he was omnipotent everywhere, and in regard to the officials of both inside and outside services. When the resident engineer in British Columbia does not give satisfaction to the contractors, and will not collude with them to defraud the Government, communication is had with Thomas McGreevy. Thomas McGreevy complains to the Minister, and the Minister agrees to remove the obnoxious engineer, as the following letter, written by Thomas McGreevy, will show (see page 19):

"It is now understood that Bennett, the engineer at B.C., will not suit, so the Minister and Perley are prepared to change him. He asked if I could recommend one."

Is this not a degrading and humiliating position for the Government to be placed in? Here is an official in the service of the country not giving satisfaction to the contractors; because he will not connive to defraud his employers, application is made to dismiss him. Thomas McGreevy writes that he is not the man to suit. The Minister is prepared to change him, and asks Thomas McGreevy to recommend another. But the power of Thomas McGreevy in the department and over the Minister of Public Works is shown in the most conclusive manner in the following letter, portions of which I will read. This is a letter dated Ottawa, 13th May, 1885, and addressed to his brother Robert. The following is an extract (see page 21):

"OTTAWA, 13th May.

"MY DEAR ROBERT,—I enclose you letter from Rousseau. You ought to sell him the stone cheap—we don't want it. Telegraph him to Montreal on receipt of my letter price. Tell Kerrigan & Co., plumbers, that they have contract for Marine Hospital. They were not the lowest: Vandery was. I got the Minister to give it to them. Your expense account has not reached Railway Department yet. Will look after it to-day.

"I wish you could get $480 for a week, by cheque or otherwise, to pay $300 to Stanley Smith and Lindsey at once. They have both written for it. I am afraid they will insist on the capital. Tell me to-morrow if you can do it at once; if not I will have to go down and look to it.

"Bradley told me he has sent to Larkin, Connolly & Co. what they asked for by my telegraph.

"Riopel will be in Quebec Friday morning, and will give the necessary authority required to make a beginning on the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, in order to save the charter.

"Yours truly,

"THOMAS McGREEVY."

Now, what a shocking commentary is here upon the management of the Public Works Department. If hon. gentlemen can blush, they ought to blush at this exhibition of the degraded condition to which the department has been lowered. Thomas writes from Ottawa to his brother in Quebec:

"Tell Kerrigan & Co., the plumbers, that they have secured the contract."

Kerrigan was not the lowest tenderer, but what of that? Thomas McGreevy was at headquarters; Thomas McGreevy was manipulating the matter for them. Vandery was the lowest tenderer, but what of that? Thomas McGreevy was at headquarters, and "I," said the omnipotent Thomas McGreevy, "I induced the Minister to pass over the lowest and give the contract to Kerrigan & Co." Is it not a humiliating condition of affairs to which the country is reduced by the misconduct and maladministration of hon. gentlemen opposite, misconduct and maladministration that has been going on for ten years, and every year becoming intensified, until the departments in Ottawa and the Government in Ottawa have become a by-word and a reproach throughout the nations of the earth. If Thomas McGreevy induced the Minister of Public Works to pass over the tender of Vandery for the Marine Hospital at Quebec and to give the contract to Kerrigan & Co., by the influence of Thomas McGreevy, in which contract Thomas McGreevy had no interest himself, is it not a reasonable conclusion that Thomas McGreevy induced the Minister of Public Works to pass over the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly, and to give the contract to Larkin, Connolly & Co., at an advance of $35,000, in which contract Thomas McGreevy had a direct pecuniary interest? Sir, the following letter written again impudently from the Public Works Department, and written before the eyes of the Minister of Public Works, and under the nose of the Minister of Public Works, speaks in thunder tones of the condition to which the Public Works Department had been reduced by the Minister of Public Works and Thomas McGreevy. It shows the power and supremacy of the man over the Minister. It shows the abject submission of the Minister to the man (see page 22):

"DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS, CANADA,
"OTTAWA, 1st March, 1886.

"DEAR ROBERT,—Nothing new since I wrote you last. I have had a long interview with Perley on harbour works and graving dock at B. C. Fleming was to have signed his report to-day on harbour works. It will be shown to me as soon as signed. I will see it to-morrow and Sir Hector and myself will decide what is to be done for future. He will adopt my views. I will see you and Murphy about it before doing anything. It is a big thing for the future.

"I think the graving dock at B. C. will be lengthened; they are now making estimates. I think he is going to put another $150,000 in estimates for it.

"Yours truly,

"THOMAS McGREEVY."

Not the Department of Public Works, not the Government of Canada, not the engineers or the principal employé's in the Public Works Department, but "the Minister of Public Works and myself will decide by to-morrow." "The Minister of Public Works will adopt my views," wrote Thomas McGreevy. Now, Sir, is it not an extraordinary condition of affairs that a member of Parliament, a friend of the Government, writing from the Public Works Department, should write in that style. "The Minister and myself will decide," "the Minister will adopt my views," "there is a big thing for the future," "the Esquimalt graving dock may be lengthened, and we may get a large sum for that, but at all events we will have a large sum in extras." Did Thomas McGreevy deliberately sit down in the Public Works Department, under the nose of the Minister of Public Works, and before the eye of the Minister of Public Works, and write a lie. If he did, I have nothing more to say upon the subject so far as this letter is concerned; but if Thomas McGreevy wrote the truth when he wrote that letter, then the charge of criminal conspiracy to defraud this country out of a large sum of money is brought right home to the Minister of Public Works. That is not all. There is something else; there is something else that shows that the money of the people of Canada has been used by the Department of Public Works and by these conspirators, including Thomas McGreevy—Thomas McGreevy especially—for unlawful purposes. A letter of the 9th March, 1886, touching the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, throws a flood of light upon the relations that existed between Thomas McGreevy and the Minister of Public Works. Thomas writes to his brother Robert as follows (see page 23):

"HOUSE OF COMMONS, CANADA, 9th March, 1886.

"MY DEAR ROBERT,—I send you a letter from Marine Department. You will read it to Fradette and tell him that contract will be sent in a few days. If he wants to copy letter let him do so. Will write you again this afternoon. I had a meeting this afternoon with Sir Hector and Sir Adolphe on Baie des Chaleurs. Sir Hector insisted on an understanding being come to. I refused to do so, and told him at last to let Robitaille make a proposition himself; that I was not going to make brains for him forever and let him take advantage of it. They proposed (not Caron, Sir Hector) to give me control of road to St. Ann's, with subsidy of $6,000 per mile, if I would withdraw my opposition to B. de C. Railway and relieve you and me of our stock. They are in a complete fix. The Armstrongs can't get anybody to touch them. Isbester sent word by Mitchell that as long as the Armstrongs had anything to do with it they would not.

"Yours truly,
"ROBERT McGREEVY."

Does not this letter show, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Public Works was as clay to be moulded by Thomas McGreevy just at his will? When Thomas McGreevy and his fellow conspirators quarrelled over the spoils stolen out of the subsidy voted by the Canadian Parliament to build the Baie des Chaleurs Railway the Minister of Public Works sought to calm the gathering storm. He interviewed them, and when he found he could do nothing else, he made the proposition to Thomas McGreevy that if he and his brother Robert would withdraw from that railway he, the Minister of Public Works, would give Thomas McGreevy a subsidy of $6,000 a mile for another railway without the consent of Parliament, or without the approval of the people of Canada. Is not that a startling condition of affairs? Is it not enough to disgust a free people in a free country? Now, Sir, I shall submit another piece of evidence to the House as showing the power of Thomas McGreevy, not only over the Minister of Public Works, but over the whole Government. Here is the letter (see page 20):

"DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS, CANADA,
OTTAWA, 17th March, 1886.

"MY DEAR ROBERT,—Larkin and Murphy are here. Larkin has learned a good deal of what has been done. The estimate for February is through, and amounts to over twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000); that makes nearly seventy-five thousand dollars gone out within a month. They ought to be flush out there now. I sent you to-day the Votes and Proceedings about what Edgar asks about Baie des Chaleurs R. R. Pope sent for me to ask what answer he would give. I agreed that he should give the required information, but will state that I have notified him of my withdrawal from the direction and severed my connection with the company. Other questions will follow. Pope told me that they have put in some answer which he has sent to the Minister of Justice. I will go and examine them to see what they have put in. Your letter received; I will attend to what you ask.

"Yours truly.
"THOMAS McGREEVY."

Why, Sir, the Minister of Railways was not at liberty to answer a simple question in Parliament without first submitting the question and submitting the answer to Thomas McGreevy. Thomas writes to his brother Robert:

"I agreed that the Minister should do this. I will go and see in the department what answer the Government propose to give to the question."

Is that not a startling commentary, I ask again, upon the relationship that existed between the Government and Thomas McGreevy? I have merely read a few letters, but they all show that the Minister of Public Works was passive in the hands of Thomas McGreevy. The correspondence that passed between Thomas McGreevy and his brother conclusively proves that Thomas McGreevy had not only power and influence over the Minister of Public Works, but such power and influence as enabled Thomas McGreevy to dictate his own terms as to the kind of contract which should be given and as to the changes that should be made in it. But there is another piece of evidence which, if not just as conclusive, yet adds great weight to the circumstantial evidence already given. We find in the correspondence which passed between Michael and Nicholas Connolly, and Owen Murphy, a number of letters that throw a wonderful amount of light on this subject. These men relied upon Thomas McGreevy as the intermediary between themselves and the Minister of Public Works. They knew the man on whom they relied, not only to secure the contracts but to procure the necessary changes afterwards. They were not men likely to donate thousands of dollars for political purposes without being absolutely certain that they would be recouped. Now, I find at page 213 of the blue-book, that Michael Connolly writes to Owen Murphy on the 25th of August, 1882, a letter, from which I make the following extract:—

"I am glad to hear that you have ousted Peters, Moore & Wright out of the harbour work. Stick to Tom, and I think we will work matters all right; any way, I have great confidence in him."

Now, why should he stick to Tom? Why should he have great confidence in Tom? Tom was not an extraordinary man. I am sure he was not a brilliant parliamentarian. He may have been a good business man, but he was not an extraordinary man. Why, then, should Michael Connolly write: I have great confidence that Tom will pull you through? Men do not talk in that way to ordinary men, unless they have a good reason why; and the reason is clear. It will be admitted that Robert McGreevy had an interest in almost all of these contracts without putting in a cent of capital, and Thomas McGreevy was a sharer in whatever spoils he obtained from the band of conspirators. A letter written on the 12th of October, 1882, and found at page 212 of the blue-book, written by Michael Connolly to his friend Owen Murphy, also throws some light on the subject. He says:

"You do right in keeping with Hon. Thomas, as just at present he has the whole thing in the hollow of his hand. You tell me you have the contract signed for the harbour work, but I think you have given Bob more than he is entitled to, especially as he is not furnishing any capital."

Bob, I apprehend, is the brother of Thomas McGreevy—

"But of course you, who are on the ground, ought to know best, and it would be better to make a hundred thousand dollars with him in than fifty thousand dollars with him out; so I suppose you have done the best you could under the circumstances."

How did Michael Connolly know that Thomas McGreevy had the whole thing in the hollow of his hand? Was it because he manipulated the other contracts in connection with the Quebec harbour works? Undoubtedly. He knew what he was writing about. Another letter written by Michael Connolly to Owen Murphy, dated the 9th of December, 1882, and found at page 215 of the blue book, contains the following:—

"If you get the cross-wall I think you could have the necessary changes made in design and material to suit; so you had best try hard for it."

Tom can manipulate the tenders, and when the contract is obtained he can manipulate the changes. A letter, written on the 31st of December, 1882, and found at page 212 of the blue-book, from Michael Connolly to Owen Murphy, states:

"I think if you manage your affairs properly there is not a doubt but you will get the cross-wall. By all means keep in with friend Thomas and be guided by him in everything that you do. You will get it, for friend Thomas can work it in many a way. For instance, he can have the engineers in charge make out a report in your favour, which will justify the Commission or Minister of Public Works in giving you the work, even though you are not the lowest"

Now, I ask again, is not that an extraordinary condition of affairs? I have shown you already how Thomas McGreevy boasted of what he was able to do to induce the Minister of Public Works to meet his views. In another letter, dated the 27th of February, 1883, Michael Connolly writes to Owen Murphy (see page 212):

"Yours of the 15th and 18th inst. came duly to hand. I think, as you say, there will not be difficulty about your getting the cross-wall. Even if the Minister has to strain a point, you will find the work will be awarded to you, for he is not over scrupulous when his friends need assistance."

Now, Mr. Speaker, do you suppose that Michael Connolly, writing thus from San Antonio, Texas, would have said what he did unless he knew the influence of his friend Thomas McGreevy with the Minister of Public Works? He advises his friend to work upon Thomas McGreevy, and especially upon the Minister of Public Works, who is not very scrupulous, and who can be manipulated, at all events with the aid of Thomas McGreevy. I would ask you again, if there ever was such an exhibition in any Parliament in any country in the world as the exhibition shown by these letters from which I have just quoted? The influence of Thomas McGreevy over the department was known not only to the Connollys and to Murphy, but it was a matter of discussion in the family; for I find that Michael Connolly, writing to Murphy on the 23rd of March, 1885, found at page 229 of the blue-book, speaking of one of the McGreevy boys, says that he—

"Used to tell herself and mother a little too much about his uncle's influence with the Minister of Public Works."

So it had become a subject of family conversation what Uncle Thomas McGreevy could do with the Minister of Public Works. Such are some of the pieces of circumstantial evidence which in my judgment bring the charge home conclusively to the Minister of Public Works and to the employés of the Public Works Department. In fact, it looks to me as if every person in and about the department were in some way tained and tainted. There is another piece of evidence, which has not been touched on in one of the reports, and not much in the other report, but which to my mind carries considerable weight. It will be remembered by those who paid any attention to the evidence that Owen Murphy swore he went to the house of the Minister of Public Works and offered him a share of 25 per cent. in the Esquimalt graving dock contract. It will be remembered that Owen Murphy swore before the Committee that subsequently he went to the house of the Minister of Public Works with two parcels in his hand, containing $10,000 in two envelopes, $5,000 in each. He went into the Minister's house. He saw the Minister. The parcel upon that occasion was not given to the Minister, but was laid by Owen Murphy upon his table. Owen Murphy said. "A little present;" the Minister of Public Works said nothing; Owen Murphy said nothing; the Minister put out his hand and gathered the parcel into the drawer of his table, and said nothing; Owen Murphy said nothing, and left the house. Owen Murphy said that each envelope contained $5,000, that he did not intend—of course he did not—to bribe the Minister of Public Works. Nobody supposes that; it was merely "a little present." He did not intend to corrupt the Minister of Public Works, because the department was incorruptible. It was just a "little present" which he left on the table. He did not say: Here is a testimonial, Sir Hector, which I am handing over to you. No; he said nothing, but left his little voluntary contribution, given without any particular reason, without his having been asked to give it, and just as "a little present." That is what we were told by Owen Murphy, and he swore to it. Now, there are many ways of testing a man's credibility. Let us test Owen Murphy's: First, had Owen Murphy a motive for committing wilful perjury? Second, was his previous record of such a character as would not entitle him to be believed. The Minister of Public Works met the evidence with a denial, and the question arises: Is the Minister a person in whom the House and the Committee can place reliance? It has been suggested that Owen Murphy got the money and put it in his pocket, and it is further suggested that his previous record does not entitle him to credence. The answer to that is plain and simple. This money, if stolen by Murphy at all, was stolen years before the investigation took place. It was in Owen Murphy's pocket; if stolen by him, it was the money of the firm; the firm never complained; there was never any investigation or enquiry, and it never came out that he paid this money to Sir Hector Langevin until this enquiry. What object, then, had Murphy in lying, since he had the money in his pocket if he stole it? The fact is, this evidence was forced out of him in Committee. But it is said his previous record is not a good one. I know nothing about that except what was said in Committee; but I know that he was the confidential partner of the Connollys, and the McGreevys, and I know that the Minister of Public Works offered to recommend him as a contractor for a graving dock to be built in Halifax. I know that Mr. Giroux, harbour commissioner of Quebec, who appeared before the Committee, said he knew Murphy well, that he bore a good character in Quebec, that he was as good as the rest, if not better, and that he (Mr. Giroux) personally would believe him on oath. If all this is true what object could Murphy have in committing deliberate perjury? What object could he have in swearing his immortal soul away? Men do not commit perjury for the mere fun of doing it, but because there is a motive an almost irresistible motive, impelling them to it. Let us see, with respect to this "little present," how far we can say that the Minister of Public Works received it, and how far Owen Murphy's statement is confirmed by other events and circumstances. It is admitted by the Minister of Public Works in his evidence that he wrote the following letter to a contractor who had claims against the Government at the time he wrote the letter, and the letter is dated at the office of the Minister of Public Works, Quebec, 17th June, 1882:

"MY DEAR MR. PETERS,—You promised to send me something about the elections; will you kindly do so to-day?

"Yours truly,

"HECTOR L. LANGEVIN."

It is admitted that letter was written by the Minister of Public Works and sent to Mr. Simon Peters. It is admitted that, in response to that letter, Mr. Simon Peters sent the Minister of Publics Works $1,000 for political purposes. It is admitted by the Minister of Public Works that Mr. Thomas McGreevy gave him $10,000 for election purposes. It is admitted—it was sworn to, and there is no dispute about it—that the Minister of Public Works received a testimonial of $22,000 in hard cash, the contributors to which were most of them contractors having dealings with the department. It is admitted that not very long ago the Minister of Public Works received from contractors and others a service of solid silver plate valued at over $1,800. Is it not a fair inference, I ask the Minister of Justice, that a Minister of the Crown who would accept a testimonial from one contractor would be equally ready to accept one from another? Was it a greater sin to accept a testimonial from Owen Murphy of $10,000 than to accept a testimonial of $1,000 from Simon Peters, or a testimonial of $10,000 from Thomas McGreevy, or a testimonial of $22,000 from other contractors, or a solid silver service of plate from other contractors? The sin in the one case is as great as the sin in the other, and the Minister who would accept one testimonial would have no scruples about accepting another. But does the Minister of Public Works himself squarely and fairly deny what Owen Murphy has sworn to in his evidence? A careful examination of the evidence of the Minister of Public Works will show you he does not meet the case fairly and squarely as Mr. Murphy puts it. What the Minister swears to is as follows: He swears—you will find the evidence at page 1067—that Owen Murphy did not speak to him about money, gift or loan; that he did not offer to lend or pay him any money, and that he never asked him for money. But Owen Murphy never swore to any of these things. What Owen Murphy swore is that he took the parcel containing the money and placed it on the table and said nothing, but that it was "a little present," and that Sir Hector Langevin said nothing. That is the whole story as told by Murphy. There never was any pretense for the Minister of Public Works denying that Owen Murphy spoke to him about money, gift or loan. Murphy never swore that he did. There never was the slightest pretense for the Minister of Public Works swearing that Owen Murphy never offered to lend him money. Murphy never swore that he did. There never was any pretext for the Minister swearing that he never asked Owen Murphy for money. Murphy never swore that he did, and the denial of the Minister in no sense meets the case, so that practically Owen Murphy's evidence stands uncontradicted by the Minister of Public Works. But there is another significant fact in connection with the evidence given by the Minister of Public Works, which, I think, will largely lessen the weight to be attached to it—and that is this. He was squarly contradicted by other witnesses: On the 11th of August, 1891, the Minister of Public Works swore:

"Mr. Noel having been examined about a testimonial that was begun in 1890, and presented to me in 1883, I wish to state that I did not know of the names of the subscribers to that testimonial until they were communicated to this Committee by Mr. Noel, nor the amounts subscribed by them. I may add that I have not received the list of subscribers or statements of receipts."

Here, in order to test the value of the hon. gentleman's testimony, I point out that he swears positively that he never knew one of the subscribers to that testimonial until the list was produced by Mr. Noel before the Committee. The very next day he admitted that, some years before, Mr. John Rochester, one of the contributors, paid directly to himself $300 in two payments of $150 each. Then, either the memory of the Minister of Public Works must have been treacherous or his honesty was at fault. At least seven years before the period mentioned in his sworn statement he knew who some of the contributors were. In the Globe newspaper of the 17th April, 1884, the attention of the public was called to the fact that the Minister of Public Works received from contractors and others a testimonial of $22,000 in hard cash. On the 19th of the same month the Globe newspaper discussed it again, and mentioned at least the names of three of the contributors. Did Sir Hector Langevin read the Globe newspaper, and did he know the statements which were made therein? He knew them very well, because in the Hansard of 1884, page 1465, it will be found that Sir Hector Langevin, as a question of privilege, called the attention of Parliament to the letter and editorial in the Globe. He then knew at least the names of three of the contributors to that testimonial. Yet on the 11th August, 1891, seven years after he knew the three whose names were stated, he declared on his oath that he did not know one of the contributors before Mr. Noel gave his evidence before the Committee. There is another piece of evidence given by the Minister flatly contradicted by independent evidence. Sir Hector Langevin's memory must be very treacherous. He further swore:

"In September tenders were called a second time for this work, and in reply eight tenders were received, the lowest of which was that of Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly, and the next lowest that of Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co.: and I immediately recommended, on the 13th October, 1884, that the tender of Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly be accepted. However, having before me the report of my chief engineer that their price was too small, I directed them to be asked on the 7th October to strengthen themselves financially by associating some other contractor with them; but although their price was very low, as they considered it unnecessary to have the assistance of another contractor, I (the Minister) being desirous of giving the contract for the lowest possible price, recommended to Council the acceptance of the said lowest tender, on condition that they would deposit to the credit of the Government an additional sum of $9,500 to complete the amount of 5 per cent. security required, and an Order in Council was passed to that effect on the 16th October, 1884.

"However, on the 24th October Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly wrote stating that they found they had made a mistake in some of the items of their tender, and it would neither be prudent for them nor in the public interest to take the contract, and they asked, therefore, leave to withdraw their tender."

Every word of this is flatly contradicted by Michael Starrs, who, as I have stated, is a strong Conservative and a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. In addition to this, the Minister of Public Works swore:

"I never tried to prevent him taking the contract, and I never intended to do so. I never suggested that he should withdraw his tender."

Michael Starrs swears the exact contrary in express terms. The Minister of Public Works in another part of his statement says:

"The fact is, on the 24th a letter was received from Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly, in which they say they find they had made a mistake in some of the items in their tender and find their prices generally too low. They consider it therefore not prudent to take the contract, and that it would not be in the public interest if they were to do so. They therefore beg to withdraw their tender and request to have their deposit cheque returned. Their cheque was accordingly returned to them on the 27th. If the contract did not go to Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly, it is evidently due to their not wishing to have it, they having, as they say, made mistakes in their tender and finding their prices generally too low."

Every word of this is flatly contradicted by Michael Starrs. The Minister of Public Works further says:

Q. Mr. Starrs in his evidence says (page 1166) "Sir Hector sent for me and I went up and saw him. He told me of course that my tender was too low." Is that correct?—A. No.

Michael Starrs swears this is false. The Minister of Public Works further gives this evidence:

Q. You told him it was straight sailing?—A. No.
Q. Did you tell him "that the work had to be done, and taking the $50,000 that was to be paid for plant out of the total, there would not be enough left to complete the work?"—A. No. That was read from the report of Mr. Perley. I was reading to him the report of Mr. Perley so that he might understand what the chief engineer had put there about his tender.

Michael Starrs swears that Sir Hector Langevin told him there would be no deduction made and no extras allowed. It was a plain contract at a fixed price. Every statement in regard to the Esquimalt graving dock made by Sir Hector Langevin is flatly contradicted by Michael Starrs, and partly by J. L. P. O'Hanly. Whom should we believe? Starrs or Sir Hector? Michael Starrs solemnly swears that the Minister of Public Works suggested that he should withdraw his contract, and warned him against the hope of obtaining any reduction in the price of the plant, and further warned him against expecting extras. He further swears that the Minister of the Public Works threw every obstacle in the way of his getting this contract. The Minister is further contradicted by his employés. At page 1147 he says the tenders were not submitted to him, but Mr. Perley and Mr. Baillairgé swears to the fact that these tenders were always submitted to the Minister. With all this evidence, some positive and some circumstantial, I am afraid that the conclusion to which the people of this country must come is irresistible, that this country has been robbed by the fraud and conspiracy of these men of the sum of $242,000, in addition to $27,000 for donations, and that the Minister of Public Works connived at it. The deductions to be drawn from the circumstantial and the positive evidence point in one direction. It is true that the Government by their numerical strength in the Parliament of this country may shield the incriminated Minister from the consequences of the great crime he has committed. It is true that the Parliament of Canada may whitewash the Minister of Public Works, but that will not lessen the crime with which he stands charged before this high court of Parliament. It is true the Parliament of Canada might undertake to whitewash Judas Iscariot, but that would not lessen the sin of Judas Iscariot in betraying his master. The Minister of Justice may to-night, as he has on more than one occasion before, crack the ministerial whip over the heads of his followers, and they may reluctantly vote to whitewash the Minister of Public Works. The Minister of Justice may to-night, as upon other occasions during this session he has done, appeal to his followers behind him, and his supporters to the right of him, and to his supporters to the left of him, to come to the aid of this Government in this, the supreme hour of its peril, and hon. gentlemen behind him may yield to the demand of the Minister of Justice—

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

"Theirs not to reason why, Theirs but to do and die."

But I fear that many a good man will fall in the fight victims to a misplaced confidence in the most corrupt Administration that ever disgraced this fair land of ours. Mr. Speaker, you cannot check the Falls of Niagara with a pitchfork; you cannot quench a conflagration with a two-penny squirt; no more can you check the tide of intelligent public opinion with a false and misleading report acquitting the Minister of Public Works. You cannot stifle the honest sentiments of a free people by declaring that black is white; you cannot silence the voice of the Canadian press, both Grit and Tory; you cannot silence the voice of the American press, both Democratic and Republican; you cannot silence the voice of the English press, both Whig and Tory, that has already denounced you for the last two months as a band of conspirators and a den of thieves; you cannot do so by declaring in the face of the clearest possible evidence that the Minister of Public Works is guiltless of connivance at public plunder, and innocent of sharing in the fruit of a great public robbery.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 22nd September, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SPANISH AMERICAN TREATY.

Mr. FOSTER laid on the Table the correspondence respecting the Spanish American Treaty.

SECTION B CONTRACT, CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. LISTER. I rise to a question of privilege. My object in rising is to notify the Government that to-morrow I shall make to this House the following statement:—

That James Frederic Lister, Esquire, the member representing the electoral district of West Lambton in this House, having declared from his seat in the House that he is credibly informed, and that he believes that he is able to establish by satisfactory evidence:—

That in the year 1879 Messrs. Alexander Shields, John James Macdonald, Alexander McDonell, James Isbester and Peter McLaren entered into contract with the Government of Canada for the construction of a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway between Port Arthur and Rat Portage, known as Section B.

The said contract and the work in connection therewith were completed by the said contractors, to whom they were a source of great profit.

During the whole period covered by the said contract the Hon. John G. Haggart, now Postmaster General and a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council for Canada, was a member of the House of Commons for the South Riding of Lanark, and is still such member.

That the said Hon. John G. Haggart became and was beneficially interested in the profits of said contract which accrued to the share thereof standing in the name of the said Peter McLaren, and has received large sums out of the said profits, and has otherwise derived direct and substantial pecuniary benefits therefrom.

That during the progress of the said works, and while the said Hon. John G. Haggart was so interested therein, members of the said firm were called upon by members of the Government of Canada for large contributions for political purposes, and such contributions were paid out of the moneys of the said firm, and with the knowledge and assent of the said Hon. John G. Haggart were charged against the profits of the firm, and while the said contributions were so demanded and paid, the said firm of contractors were in various ways dependent upon the Government by reasons of many matters being unsettled and in dispute in relation to the said contract, which were at the time of such contributions, or subsequently, settled not unfavourably to the said contractors.

I shall thereupon move:

That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire fully into the said allegations, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation, and to employ shorthand writers to take down such evidence as they may deem necessary, and to have the evidence printed from day to day for the use of the Committee, and that the Committee do report in full the evidence, taken before them, and all their proceedings on the reference, and the result of their inquiries, and that Rule 78 of this House as to the selection of committees be suspended, and that the said committee be composed of Messrs. ——

And in order that witnesses whom it may be necessary to subpœna should be known at once, to prevent the possibility of their disappearing, I may state that the Hon. Frank Smith, the Hon. Peter McLaren, Mr. J. J. McDonald, Mr. Alexander Manning, Mr. Trudeau, the Deputy Minister; Mr. D. Nichol, and Mr. John Shields, are among the witnesses I propose to bring before the Committee to substantiate the charge. The Government may fairly say that I have been guilty of delay in bringing this matter forward, that we are near the end of the session, and that a matter of this importance should have been brought before the attention of the House before this day. I can only assure the House that the information and evidence I am possessed of has only come into my possession within the last few days, and it was impossible for me to call the attention of the House to it before; and it is a matter of such grave consequences, in my opinion, and so very serious in its character, that I believe I would not be doing my duty if I did not take this course, even at this season, late as it may be. As all the witnesses live within a hundred miles of Ottawa, I hope the whole investigation may be closed within four or five days at the most.

Mr. HAGGART. If it were in order, I would give the answer at once, but as the hon. gentleman intends this, I suppose, as a notice of motion, I will give the answer to-morrow.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPT.—CONTRACTS.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Girouard: That the seventh report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections be adopted.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I trust that in the consideration of the important question we have to decide in connection with this investigation we shall not allow ourselves to be moved by any personal or selfish considerations, or by any considerations except those which are brought under our notice in the voluminous evidence that was taken during the progress of the investigation. In order to make the matter possibly a little clearer to those who have not had the privilege of listening to the evidence from day to day as it has been given, or of reading it as it has been taken, I might preface my remarks with a few observations about the contracts in question, showing what they are, and the relations that the Government have borne to them. The first contract, which goes back to the year 1878, was the contract for the Lévis graving dock opposite Quebec. The second contract is one for dredging in the harbour improvements in Quebec, and was made in September, 1882. The third is what is called the cross-wall contract in the harbour improvements of Quebec, and is dated May, 1883. The fourth contract is the supplementary contract for the Lévis dock, and is dated in June, 1884. The fifth contract is the contract for the Esquimalt graving dock, dated in November, 1884; the sixth contract is what is known as the contract for dredging No. 2, dated in May, 1887; and the seventh contract is what is known as the south wall contract in the harbour improvements of Quebec, dated in February, 1887. There were two or three other matters besides these contracts which were brought into the investigation, the question of the subsidy of the steamer Admiral for the use of the Government during a number of years, and the allegation that the steamship was actually owned by Thomas McGreevy; also certain charges against Mr. McGreevy in connection with moneys received out of the parliamentary subsidy to the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. It was also alleged that during all these years Thomas McGreevy was the paid agent and representative of Larkin, Connolly & Co. The last charge that was made was that Thomas McGreevy, during these years, made use of the name of the Minister of Public Works in connection with contractors and others in such a way as to lead to the conclusion that he had influence with the Minister. Now, in beginning to consider the question of the responsibility of the Department of Public Works and of the Minister, which is all that I propose to deal with this afternoon, we have in the first place to try to satisfy ourselves so far as we can, by a reference to the statutes, as to the liability and the responsibility of the department and of the Minister of Public Works in relation to the different contracts, as it is my purpose only to refer to those that affect the department and the Minister. I will, therefore, have to refer to only four of the contracts, because in the others no charge is made and no finding is made against the Minister of Public Works. The contracts that I shall refer to are, first, what is known as the cross-wall contract of 1883; in the second place, the supplementary Lévis graving dock contract of 1884; next, the Esquimalt graving dock of 1884; and, lastly, the contract known as the dredging contract, No. 2, of May, 1887. The first enquiry that naturally arises is, what was the relation of the Department of Public Works to those four contracts? When we find out the relation that the department bears to these contracts it will enable us, to a certain extent at least, to determine the responsibility and liability of the Minister and of the department in connection with the charges and findings brought against them. In the first place, I would like to impress this fact upon the House as being very important, that in connection with the harbour works at Quebec the moneys that were paid and expended on those works were not moneys belonging to the Dominion of Canada. It is true that the moneys at the time came from the Government of the Dominion, but these moneys were loaned under authority of the different statutes by the Dominion Government to the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec, and very strict and explicit provisions were made in the statutes authorizing these loans, for the repayment of the advances which from time to time were made. The first of these statutes I shall refer to is that of 1873, chapter 62, intituled an Act further to amend the Acts to provide for the management and improvement of the harbour of Quebec. In this Act it is provided that the Government of the Dominion may loan $1,200,000 to the Harbour Commissioners for the purpose of carrying out their improvements. Section 17, containing the provision for the repayment of that sum by the Harbour Commissioners, reads as follows :—

"Upon the payment or advance of any sum by the Government under the foregoing provisions the said corporation shall deposit with the Receiver General their own bonds for the same amount in such form as he may approve, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and 1 per cent. per annum for a sinking fund, and the sinking fund so created shall be kept by the Receiver General as a special account, and interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum shall be allowed by him on all amounts received from it from time to time, or investments of such amount as may be made by him from time to time in securities approved by the Minister of Finance, and interest thereon credited to the corporation in said accounts."

So in that statute there is a provision for a loan of $1,200,000 to the Harbour Commissioners at Quebec, repayable according to the terms and conditions that I have read from the statute, and secured in the way that the statute indicates. The next statute relating to the same subject is in the year 1880, chapter 17, which is intituled an Act to authorize the raising of a further sum to enable the Quebec Harbour Commissioners to complete their tidal dock; and it provides for the raising of a sum of $250,000 on the same terms and conditions as those mentioned in the original statute, and to be repaid in the same way. There is one more statute relating to the harbour works and providing for the raising of a further sum of money, that is the statute of 1884, chapter 9, where authority is given to the Government to loan $300,000 more to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners. I thought it well, Mr. Speaker, that we should perfectly understand, at the outset, that these moneys were moneys that belonged at that time to the Harbour Commission, because in the report made by the minority they are referred to as public moneys of the Dominion of Canada, and the impression has gone abroad that the moneys which have been expended on those contracts were moneys belonging to the Dominion Government, whereas the fact is that the moneys were loaned by the Dominion Government to the Harbour Commissioners under authority of the statute for the purpose of carrying out those works. A further similar provision exists in relation to the Lévis graving dock, which might not be strictly considered as a harbour improvement; but, in the Act of 1875, which authorizes the Government to assist the Commissioners in the construction of the graving dock, they are authorized to loan $500,000 to the Harbour Commissioners, and provision is made for the repayment of this amount somewhat similar to the provision made for the repayment of the loans for the other harbour works. It is true that subsequently, within the last year or two, a statute has been passed by the Dominion taking over this graving dock at Quebec and making it a work of the Dominion of Canada; but with that we have nothing to do at present. What I want to impress on the House is the fact that the moneys paid over by the Government for the purpose of carrying on these works were moneys loaned by the Government to the Harbour Commissioners, and that the responsibility of the proper expenditure of these moneys rested with the Harbour Commissioners; and so far as those moneys were obtained by fraud, so far as they may have been wrongly obtained, they were not obtained as moneys of the Dominion Government, but as moneys belonging to the Harbour Commissioners, for which they gave security to the Dominion Government. There is no doubt we cannot go very far into the evidence before we discover the traces of a very great conspiracy. That conspiracy has extended its ramifications in Quebec for a number of years, between 1880 and 1890. It was a conspiracy, not against the Dominion Government alone; it was a conspiracy against the Harbour Commissioners as much as it was a conspiracy against the Government, because it was in the main the money of the Harbour Commissioners that was obtained by those contractors and used for their own purposes. So we must bear in mind that a conspiracy existed, not merely against the Dominion Government, and not only against the Dominion Government, and not to its fullest extent against the Dominion Government, but it was largely against the Harbour Commissioners, and to obtain from them moneys on the various contracts which they had borrowed from the Dominion Government. I have heard it said recently, in discussing with various parties the evidence that has been taken in this investigation, that it could not be possible for the Minister of Public Works not to have known what was going on, that it was not possible for all this fraud and wrong-doing to go on and for him not to be cognizant of it. At first sight that may appear very reasonable. It may seem reasonable to suppose that it was impossible for the Minister as the head of the department not to have known that fraud was committed. Yet when we consider the other parties that were interested, when we come to consider analagous cases, we find it to be not at all surprising that these frauds could be committed, and were committed, and this conspiracy be successfully carried on, and the Minister all the time be unconscious of it. It is not claimed by any person that the Harbour Commissioners were aware of this wrong-doing. It is not claimed by anyone that they were parties to the fraud. Yet, as I will take occasion to show in going through the various contracts, they had more to do with the details of the contracts, and with carrying them out, and with personal supervision over them, than the Minister of Public Works. They were living in Quebec, seeing the works every day, seeing the contractors every day, knowing exactly what was going on; while the Minister of Public Works spent most of his time at Ottawa directing the affairs of his department. No one ventures to say that the Harbour Commissioners were cognizant of or in any way lent themselves to this conspiracy; and yet we are forced to this conclusion, that if the Minister of Public Works knew of this conspiracy, by so much stronger reason the Harbour Commissioners must have been cognizant of it. So, when we absolve the Harbour Commissioners from any connection or knowledge of it, we must at the same time admit that they were more likely to know, in a better position to know and to ascertain the workings of the conspiracy than the Minister of Public Works, and it is very unfair to say that, because he was at the head of the Department of Public Works, because of that very fact, he must have known of these things going on at the time. There is another illustration I might give in connection with the same works, and it will show that the point I am taking is well taken, and that is the connection of Mr. Boswell, the engineer, with the inspectors. The evidence shows very clearly that during the time the dredging contract was going on under the personal and daily supervision of Mr. Boswell, the inspectors, who were working under him, who were reporting to him from day to day, were paid large sums by the contractors for giving false reports and aiding and assisting them in various ways. It is not alleged, it is not even suggested, that Mr. Boswell had any knowledge of the conspiracy between the inspectors and the contractors; and yet during the short time the dredging contract was going on, the inspectors received in small sums no less than $5,000 from the contractors for the purpose of assisting them in carrying out the conspiracy. All that was done without the cognizance and knowledge of Mr. Boswell, who should have been intimately acquainted with all the details connected with carrying out the work. We next ask ourselves: What were the relations of the different parties in this conspiracy to each other, and what was the object of the conspiracy? In the first place, we have the firm of Larkin & Connolly, a firm of contractors, whose avowed object it was to make money out of the contracts. In the next place, we have Robert McGreevy, who became a member of the firm for the purpose of, and with the object of, making money out of the contract and assisting them in carrying on their work. Then we have, unfortunately, brought into it a member of this House, Mr. Thomas McGreevy, who, being a creditor of his brother and desiring the payment of his debts, lent himself to this conspiracy and was the active medium, was an active participant, we must admit, for the evidence shows it, in enabling the contractors to carry out their conspiracy to a successful issue. There is no doubt that, if Thomas McGreevy had been true to the confidence and trust reposed in him, we would not have been called on to make this investigation. There can be no doubt, if he had been faithful and true to the Minister who relied on him, this investigation would never have taken place; but, with the avowed object, or the object, if not avowed, of obtaining payment of this large claim against his brother, he lent himself to the conspiracy and became an active participant in it. We look, however, in vain for any connection of that kind on the part of the Minister of Public Works. When we ask ourselves: Where did the moneys go that were obtained by these contractors? we do not find one single cent finding its way into the pockets of the Minister. There is not a single piece of evidence, I do not think there is even a suggestion through the whole of the evidence taken, that the Minister put into his own pocket a single dollar of those funds wrongfully obtained: and yet they say he was connected with them, and we are asked to believe that he lent himself to the conspiracy. It is said there are two proofs brought forward that go to show the connection of the Minister with this conspiracy. In the first place, he had a newspaper under his control, and, in the second place, he had a political fund, which was assumed. In regard to the newspaper, the evidence does not bear out the conclusion that whatever Thomas McGreevy may have invested in that newspaper, and it is very uncertain what amount he did invest, was invested for Sir Hector Langevin, or invested at his request, and he had no connection in any way whatever with it, or any knowledge of it, at any rate until this investigation took place. Now, with regard to the claim that the late Minister of Public Works obtained political funds out of these moneys, the only evidence we have on that point is this: That the Minister of Public Works, during the progress of his election and the contests that resulted after the elections, became indebted to the extent of about $10,000, and in order to accommodate him Mr. McGreevy discounted notes for him in the bank to pay this $10,000, and those notes have been carried forward from that time until the present, so that no part of these funds has gone to the payment of these notes or for the payment of that amount. I claim, Sir, that we cannot discover that Sir Hector Langevin in any way whatever obtained any benefit from this conspiracy. On the other hand, what is the result of this successful conspiracy? It is that after a long period of service, after serving his country for thirty or forty years, the greater part of that time in a high and important office, by reason of this terrible conspiracy that was successfully brought to bear against his department he is taken from his office and he finds himself in such a position that he resigns in order that this House may, without prejudice and without fear or favour, pronounce a judgment upon the evidence that has been taken. We do not find, therefore, after the most careful consideration of the evidence, that of all this $130,000 which the minority report says Thomas McGreevy received out of these funds, a solitary cent went into the pocket of Sir Hector Langevin. We do not find, that on that newspaper a solitary cent was spent at his request or with his knowledge and consent, and we do not find that the political fund has been paid out of this $130,000, but that if the money was received by Thomas McGreevy it was all retained by himself, and there was none whatever of it went for the benefit of the Minister of Public Works. It is said, Sir, in some parts of the evidence that the Minister of Public Works was very familiar with all the details of his department, and I am sure it is very creditable to any Minister that he should be familiar with the details; but there are certain details that it is impossible for a Minister to know thoroughly. When we consider, as was stated in the evidence of Sir Hector Langevin, and which is not contradicted, that during last year there was written from his office and signed by him over 30,000 official letters and that he signed 8,946 cheques, we can readily understand that in the case of these outlying works, while he may be familiar with the details of them, that it must be through the reports of his subordinates, and that only to the extent they report to him can he possibly have any great familiarity with the works that are going on in different parts of the Dominion. A number of letters were put in evidence, and the hon. gentleman who spoke last night (Mr. Cameron, Huron) referred to a number of them in order to establish as he thought, and as I think he desired, a connection between the late Minister of Public Works and the conspiracy. Now, there is this weakness about all that correspondence: that in no single case is that correspondence, or a knowledge of it, brought home to the Minister of Public Works. Not one of these letters in which he is referred to is shown to have come to his knowledge, nor is it shown that with his authority or consent or to his knowledge that any one of these letters were written. That is a very important consideration. It is true, Sir, that when a conspiracy has been established, that if we once establish the fact that the Minister of Public Works lent himself to the conspiracy and that he was aiding and abetting these contractors in carrying out their fraud, that we would be entitled to read these letters as evidence against him; but I say, Sir, until we establish the connection, until we show that the Minister of Public Works was a party to or lent himself to this conspiracy we cannot bring to bear against him letters that are written between those parties without his knowledge and without his consent. In fact, Sir, I think that the object of these letters, or that the letters themselves in the way that the hon. gentleman made use of them last night, go to prove too much. No one knows better than the hon. gentlemen who drafted the minority report, as do many other hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, that we have in court very often evidence that proves too much, that goes so far beyond what is necessary to prove the case that it shows clearly that the witness, whoever he may be, is not telling the truth. Now, I say that some of these letters bear intrinsic evidence of proving too much, and giving too much influence to Thomas McGreevy. I have just now referred to one of these letters; for instance, the letter that he wrote in which he referred to the late Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Pope), seeking to throw out the idea, seeking to fasten upon his friends the impression, that he had as much influence with the late Minister of Railways and Canals as he had with any other Minister, and as he had with all the other Ministers. I say, Sir, that that letter shows us that he is trying to prove too much, and it goes very far to weaken all that he says, as between themselves, about his influence with the Minister of Public Works. In dealing with the different contracts, Mr. Speaker, I propose to follow the order that has been taken in what is called the minority report. It must strike us at the outset in that report, that it goes very far beyond the charges that are laid. I know that our friends on the opposite side of the House have claimed all through, and perhaps truly, that the investigation was not limited to the charges that were actually made, and yet this unfortunate result comes from that fact, and I think I can show pretty clearly to the House presently that it was a very unfortunate thing, that we were not able to grasp the full scope of the investigation at the outset. The unfortunate result was this: That a large amount of the evidence which is necessary to enable us to form a proper opinion as to certain findings which are in this minority report has been omitted altogether and has never been taken; that is very strikingly illustrated in the case of the Lévis graving dock. The charge there was in connection with the supplementary contract; but in the finding, as you will notice, the original contract of 1878 is brought in, and the finding is based, not on the supplementary contract, on which the charge was based, but on the whole work from 1878 down to the time when it was finished. Now, what is the result of that? The result is that we have no clear and satisfactory evidence to show the condition of the work at the time the supplementary contract was made, or to show the reason for making the supplementary contract at the time it was made, in the year 1884. In fact, Sir, the findings present to us this anomaly. It is as if we charged a man with a misdemeanour and found him guilty of a felony; as if we charged him with misconduct and found him guilty of a misdemeanour; as if we charged him with manslaughter and found him guilty of murder. That is just the relation which the original charges bear to the findings contained in the report of the minority. It may be that to a certain extent that is a necessary evil. I am not prepared to say that it is not, because it was claimed during the investigation that we were not limited to the charges, but were entitled to go into anything at all in relation to these works; but, as I have pointed out, the result of that is that the evidence in many respects is incomplete and inconclusive, and does not enable us at all to find in the way the minority report would have us find. The first of the contracts in which the finding of hon. gentlemen opposite implicates the hon. Minister of Public Works is the dredging contract of the 23rd of May, 1887, wherein Larkin, Connolly & Co. obtained a contract for dredging in the wet basin, at 35 cents a yard. The charges, which I have summarized so as to put them into few words, are: That for and in consideration of $25,000, Thomas McGreevy agreed to get Larkin, Connolly & Co. 800,000 yards of dredging at 35 cents a yard, although the previous dredging had been done at 27 cents a yard; next, that he used his influence as a member of the House of Commons and as a Harbour Commissioner, both with the department and with Mr. Perley; next, that Larkin, Connolly & Co. paid him $20,000 and retained $5,000 which they subsequently used in the election in which he was a candidate; next, that pursuant to the above arrangement between them, the contract was obtained without putting in a tender. Now, the findings of the minority report on these charges are as follows: (a) that the contract was let as the result of a corrupt bargain; (b) that Thomas McGreevy successfully used his influence; (c) that enormous sums of money were paid to Larkin, Connolly & Co. beyond the true value of the work of dredging done; (d) that on the 9th of January, 1887, Perley had received jewellery and diamonds to the value of $1,885 as a bribe; and (e) that the facts connected with the contract and its subsequent execution were known to Sir Hector Langevin, the Minister of Public Works, and that the frauds were perpetrated at least with his passive connivance. Now, I will give a short statement of the facts connected with the letting of this contract and the relation that the Minister of Public Works bore to it. The contract was let by the Harbour Commissioners; their engineers supervised it; the Minister of Public Works had no control over it whatever. All the relation that the Government had to that contract or those works at that time was, that they advanced money pursuant to the statute of 1873 authorizing them to lend the Harbour Commissioners the sum of $1,200,000 for the purpose of carrying out their works. So that this was a contract let to Larkin, Connolly & Co. by the Harbour Commissioners, let on the report of their own engineers, supervised by them and their engineers, and the Department of Public Works had no control over it, and no connection with it, so far as we are able to ascertain from the statutes or from the evidence. It may be worth while to say something about the constitution of the Board of Harbour Commissioners. This board was formed in the year 1870, and consisted then of eight members. Four of those members were selected by the tax-payers, one by the Board of Trade, and three were appointed by the Government; and it may be that a very nice question arises in this connection. Mr. Dobell, in his evidence, at pages 762 and 763, speaks of the formation of the Board. He speaks of the fact that the Government at the time wanted control over the Board, desiring a majority of the Commissioners to be their appointees. "But," he says, "we resisted that, and resisted it successfully, so that at the time the Board was formed in 1870 the Government had only three representatives, while the tax-payers and the Board of Trade had five." But about the year 1875, under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, the Board was changed, and after that time it consisted of nine members, of whom five were appointed by the Government and the others by the tax-payers and the Board of Trade. At that time the Chairman was allowed a salary of $2,000 a year, and the Commissioners also were each to receive a salary after that date. So that the hon. gentlemen opposite must take the responsibility of establishing the precedent of having the majority on the Board consist of Government representatives. I do not think, however, that point amounts to anything, because it is not shown that the Harbour Commissioners used any improper influence. Now, the question arises: Why was this contract let without tenders being called for? Why was it Larkin, Connolly & Co. were given the contract at 35 cents a yard without going through the formality of tendering? The evidence on that point is rather meagre, and I do not know that we ought to justify the action of the Harbour Commissioners in letting that contract without tenders. The facts as stated in the evidence are these: Larkin, Connolly & Co. were the only firm who had the plant and machinery necessary to carry out successfully the dredging, and were consequently in a position to do it much cheaper and to better advantage than any other contracting firm. Whether that explanation absolves the Harbour Commissioners or not on the charge of not having advertised for tenders or not, I am not prepared to say. It depends entirely on the circumstances of the case; but be that as it may, the contract was let by them at 35 cents per yard, on the report of their engineer, without calling for tenders. It is alleged that this price was very high, and we do not find that the Commissioners were perfectly satisfied. We find that one of them, Mr. Giroux, considered it necessary to make some enquiries before he would give his assent. He tells us that he made enquiries at Montreal before the contract was let: and that, after considering the price paid for dredging Montreal harbour, he concluded that 35 cents per yard was a reasonable figure and consented to the letting of the contract. Considerable effort was made to establish a connection between the Minister of Public Works and this contract by showing that it was let through the influence of Mr. Thomas McGreevy, acting on the Minister of Public Works and the engineer of the Harbour Commissioners. No less than five Harbour Commissioners were called to give evidence on this point. The first one called was Mr. Valin; and if his evidence had been sustained, it might have appeared somewhat damaging. It is true, he says that he asked Sir Hector Langevin what he would do, and Sir Hector told him to follow Mr. McGreevy and to go with him. Now, we must bear in mind, in weighing the evidence of Mr. Valin—and it is very curious that hon. gentlemen, in making up their report, did not refer to it—that Mr. Valin subsequently contradicted that statement and made a declaration in which he says that this statement was not correct, and he signed a declaration to that effect. Which are we to believe? Are we to believe his evidence that Sir Hector told him to vote with Mr. McGreevy, or his declaration in which he says Sir Hector did not tell him anything of the kind? When we have evidence before us of that contradictory nature, the only thing we can do is dispense with it altogether and rely on the evidence of other witnesses. Such evidence, standing alone, uncorroborated and contradicted as it is, must be struck out altogether. There is another fact in connection with Mr. Valin's evidence to which hon. gentlemen opposite omitted to refer in their report, and that is that Mr. Valin was very anxious to be a Senator, and has been very much disappointed since because he did not receive the appointment, and we do not know to what extent his evidence may have been coloured by that fact. He evidently was very much disappointed and annoyed at not having his ambition gratified. The next Harbour Commissioner who was called on was Mr. Dobell. In his evidence, at page 976, he stated what his dealings were, so far as any connection with Sir Hector Langevin is concerned. The evidence is as follows:—

Q. Speaking of Mr. Thomas McGreevy's position upon the Board in relation to the Department of Public Works and the Minister of Public Works, what would you say you understood it to be?—A. Nothing irregular. Nothing that I would regard as other than being one conversant with large contracts; he gave the benefit of that experience to the Harbour Commission. Q. And in respect of the mutual interests of Sir Hector Langevin and the Dominion Government, have you anything to say with regard to his position?—A. I have no reason to doubt any action he took while on the Commission. Q. Were you or were you not aware that on account of Mr. Thomas McGreevy's double position, as it may be called, it would be inconvenient—and it was so treated by the Board, that he should communicate with the Department of Public Works at Ottawa in respect of matters of common interest—as a member of Parliament and a member of the Board?—A. Coming to Ottawa so frequently, he was the natural medium by which we would learn what the Minister of Public Works' views were.

Now, Mr. Dobell was personally largely interested in the successful carrying out of the works, because, as he tells us subsequently in his evidence, he contributes $5,000 to $6,000 a year out of his own money in taxes to support the harbour. Further on, he is asked this question :

Q. I think you said that the Commissioners relied mostly on Mr. McGreevy because he was a man of great experience in public works?—A. I do not think I said that. I did not say we relied on Mr. McGreevy, but I said we looked upon him as having great experience in public works, and being a member of Parliament, he naturally would be the medium of communicating with the Minister of Public Works. Q. Is it not a fact that you also took into consideration his relations with Sir Hector Langevin? Was it not a fact—had it not come to be a matter of notoriety in Quebec—that his influence with Sir Hector was paramount?—A. We did not look upon it as anything we need be afraid of in communicating with Sir Hector through Mr. McGreevy. Q. But was it not a fact generally known among the Harbour Commissioners, that Mr. McGreevy's influence with Sir Hector Langevin was paramount?—A. No; our chairman claimed that he was all powerful at Ottawa. Q. What is his name?—A. Mr. Valin. He laid claim that he was running you all here. Q. How long had Mr. Valin been there?—A. About ten years; he claimed he was going to be made a senator.

The next Harbour Commissioner brought to testify on this point was Mr. Giroux. He states his experience as far as this is concerned. I would ask the House to mark this fact that, although so much force and point was made in regard to this connection during the evidence of Mr. Valin, although Mr. Dobell in his evidence repudiated it, and the other Commissioners, one after the other, repudiated any connection of the kind, when the last Commissioner, Mr. Forsyth, was put into the box, he was not asked the question whether there was such a connection between Sir Hector and Mr. McGreevy or not. This is the statement of Mr. Giroux. He is asked :

Q. What I want to get at is whether it was due to the intervention of any one member or more of the Commission, or whether it was given on the report of the engineers?—A. It was on the report of the engineers.

Q. Did the report of the engineers meet with approval on the part of the Commissioners?—A. I think so.

Q. Was there any attempt by any Commissioner to influence the Commission in any direction?—A. Not that I am aware of.

Q. As far as you know, it was done wholly on the report of the engineers?—A. Yes.

Q. And the report recommending itself to the Commissioners as it did?—A. Yes.

Q. You approved of it as best under all the circumstances?—A. Yes.

Q. And accordingly passed the order, believing all the Commissioners thought likewise?—A. There were no dissensions.

Q. Do you recollect the dredging contract in 1887?—A. Yes.

Q. And the circumstances?—A. Yes.

Q. State how it came to be given without tenders being asked?—A. The contract of 1882 came to a conclusion, I think, and the Commissioners desiring that there would be no delay in the continuance of the works, concurred in Mr. Perley's recommendation to give the contract for 35 cents per yard.

Q. Was that price considered by the Commissioners as a reasonable price?—A. As far as the Commissioners knew it was, because it was strongly recommended by Perley as a reasonable price.

Q. From what the Commissioners knew in view of the contract of 1882, and of the possible difficulties in connection with the work, do you yourself consider it reasonable as a business man?—A. I think I compared these prices with the dredging done in Montreal, and I came to the conclusion it was a low price.

Q. Now, will you state with reference to the Hon. Thomas McGreevy. Was he a more prominent member of the Harbour Commissioners than others?—A. I do not think so.

Q. Did he appear to take the direction of the Commissioners?—A. Certainly not.

Q. Have you any recollection that McGreevy stated at a meeting of the Commissioners that he represented the views of the Minister of Public Works, and imposed his views, and those of the Minister upon the Board?—A. I do not recollect it.

Mr. COATSWORTH.

Q. Have you any recollection that the Hon. Thomas McGreevy at any time spoke as being the mouth-piece of the Minister of Public Works, or of the Government, upon matters before the Board?—A. My recollection is that the Hon. Mr. McGreevy being a member of Parliament, we often requested him to put before the Minister of Public Works any matters in which we were interested. We very often did that, and it was by request of the whole Commission.

Q. In any case did he hold himself forth as being the organ of the Minister of Public Works, or as being specially instructed?—A. I do not think so.

So that you see that Mr. Giroux distinctly repudiates in his evidence any connection whatever such as is sought to be established in the finding. The next witness put on the stand in regard to that is Mr. Rae, of the firm of the Allan Steamship line, and he is asked :

Q. Now, Mr. Rae, do you remember whether there was any pressure exercised of any sort to influence you or any other of the Harbour Commissioners, to your knowledge, to have that contract awarded to Larkin, Connolly & Co., otherwise than on merit?—A. I may as well say for once and for all time, that I never was present at a meeting of the Harbour Commissioners that I did not to the best ability exercise it in discussing anything that came before us, and as for pressure of any description, the very possibility of being influenced in favour of any particular contractor is absolutely impossible. The only thing in my mind in connection with any business transacted before the Commission was what is best in the interest of the work, and when we were giving a contract we were particularly careful as regards that.

Q. Now, let us see if I can get you to remember one thing. Are you in a position to state with absolute certainty that you never at any time concurred in the award of any contract or payment of any sum of money to any contractor unless you were absolutely certain it was in the interest of the public?—A. I cannot use stronger words than yours. I never would have acquiesced if I thought otherwise. I agree most positively, without reservation, in what you have said.

So we see, as the Commissioners come forward, one after another, they grow even stronger in their denial, that any improper influence was brought to bear on them in connection with this contract. Now, the evidence of Mr. Forsyth, another of the Commissioners, was the next taken, and I may say that they dropped that question entirely on that point, that is reported at page 987 in the old volume, and any hon. gentleman can see that they did not ask him anything in regard to the connection with Sir Hector. I would like to refer to the statement made by the Minister of Public Works on that point, and in connection with it, I would like also to refer to the statement made by the hon. gentlemen in their reports. We must, of course, sympathize a great deal with the hon. gentlemen in the enormous task they had in reading through this evidence, as I suppose they did, and compiling their report, but I do not think these difficulties will justify their statement as to the evidence of Sir Hector Langevin. It seems to me either that the hon. gentlemen who drew up the report omitted to read a very important part of the evidence, or that they have forgotten it, or that their report must be taken to be intentionally misleading. That part of the report is this: Going over the details in relation to these contracts, after giving the evidence of Mr. Valin, which they take care to set out in full, without stating that he had contradicted it in another place, they say :

"The entire statement made by Sir Hector on this contract is as follows."

I ask you to notes these words. Then they give the statement made by Sir Hector in the following words, contained in about eight lines of their report :—

"Mr. Tarte contends that by the influence which Mr. Thomas McGreevy had in the Department of Public Works, the Chief Engineer made a report for the purpose of obtaining for Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co. the dredging at exorbitant prices. I had nothing to do with the contract of this work. The Commissioners have themselves given the contract, as the statute authorized to do, without being bound to obtain the approval of the Government to their draft contract or the dredging work. I had no other duty but to recommend the payment at the request of the Commissioners, backed by the advice of the Chief Engineer of my department.

"I have never attempted to influence the Harbour Commissioners, and I have not been subjected to any undue influence in connection with the payments which I have recommended in their favour."

Now, the hon. gentlemen who drew this report say that that is the entire statement of Sir Hector in regard to this matter. Now, I say that is not true, and I can convince the House in a very few moments that it is not true. But I will just mention this fact, that this statement made by them as to Sir Hector's evidence immediately follows the evidence of Mr. Valin that they set out in full, and it is given for this reason, evidently, as much as to say: Here is Mr. Valin's evidence, here is the entire statement of Sir Hector Langevin. Sir Hector does not deny the statements made by Mr. Valin, and therefore they must be true. Now, what I have to say to the House is this, that the statement made in the report by the hon. gentlemen who drew the report is not true—I do not say it is wilfully untrue, but it is a fact that that statement is untrue. Now, I would like to turn to the evidence of Sir Hector Langevin at pages 1154 and 1155, where we will see whether the statement made in that report is true. Now, you will bear in mind that what they say is this, that the entire statement made by Sir Hector Langevin on this contract is as follows—and they give it all in about half a dozen lines. Now, then, I have a statement here made by Sir Hector Langevin in his evidence, occupying almost a page and a half of this report, in which he reiterates, in answer to the questions put to him, his denial of Mr. Valin's evidence, and repudiates every bit of it. I think it is of sufficient importance, in view of the fact that they have put it in their report, that I should read this evidence to the House, although I desire to be as brief as possible. He is thus cross-examined by Mr. Lavergne:

Q. In your statement of yesterday you say: "Mr. Valin states in his evidence that I told him to follow always Mr. Thomas McGreevy at the Quebec Harbour Board, and that he always did so, convinced as he was that it was my wish and desire: this I most positively deny." Mr. Valin is evidently mistaken. I understand that you have read the evidence of Mr. Valin?—Yes.

Q. Mr. Valin says at page 492: "I told the Minister that the names of Gallagher and Murphy might cause trouble with the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. because he was one of its members, and that it did not from that seem to me to be a different firm, and that it might cause trouble. He said: "I have spoken to Mr. McGreevy about that: both vote for and follow Mr. McGreevy, and I tell you everything will be all right. You know we meet frequently and that we consult together." Will you undertake to swear that this is false?—A. Mr. Valin is quite mistaken about this; I did not do that.

Q. Will you undertake to swear that he is swearing falsely?—A. Well, a man might be quite mistaken; you must have seen in my statement that I have avoided anything of this kind, because I would be the last to suppose that a man like Mr. Valin would come here and state a deliberate falsehood under oath.

Q. That is not true, then; you say that no such conversation took place as mentioned there?—A. No; it is not true.

Q. Then, is it false?—A. I gave you my answer.

Q. If this statement was only one of its kind, it might be all right, but if you look at page 493 you will find:

Q. "This was after the conversations that you had?—A. It was very nearly always the same thing repeated. I had several conversations with the Minister; every time anything important came up I consulted him and had always very nearly the same answer." Do you suppose that Mr. Valin would make the same mistake so many times?—A. Mr. Valin came, as I have stated before, repeatedly to my house; I would say he came too often. At all events he came very often, and the object that he had constantly in view was to remind me that he wished to be a Senator, and that I should have him appointed as a Senator. This was his hope all the time. Now he would speak about what passed in the Harbour Board, and he would say: "Well, what can I do" and "What shall I do." I would say to him to hear the discussion that was going on and give it the same amount of attention as others did, and if you are different from the others you cannot help that. You are there on the Board, a number of friends together whom you can consult. You have Mr. Hamel, Mr. McGreevy, Mr. Giroux and others, and you must just do the best way you can. Mr. Valin had this difficulty that he was very deaf and he could not follow all the discussions that were going on there, and at times he would be in this position: that another subject would come up and he would not see very well what they were deciding about or the manner in which the first subject had been dealt with or decided, being a little deaf, he would not hear that. He spoke to me about this once or twice. He said: "I cannot hear them." I said: "Why don't you ask your neighbours. If Mr. McGreevy is near you ask him. If not, ask some other member." I never told him to be there and be like a piece of wood and not use his own intellect, and go according to the will of another man.

Q. Is it not as he says that you have several times told him this?—A. It is just as I have stated. I did not tell him to be the tool of Mr. McGreevy or follow him implicitly or anything of the kind.

Q. You see that he said so several times?—A. Yes; and I state the contrary to that.

Q. At page 498 I read this: "Q. Now, when you were appointed Chairman of the Harbour Commission, were you put there as a safeguard to the interest of the Commission or to do as Mr. McGreevy would tell you to do?—A. That is what I told at my examination in chief. When I saw that Mr. McGreevy wanted to take the control, then I asked the Minister whether I did well in following his advice or not. Q. Then when Mr. McGreevy proposed anything before the Commission, you considered that you had nothing to do except accepting his propositions?—A. Not always, since on various occasions I consulted the Minister of Public Works. If you want to know a little more, Mr. Fitzpatrick, I will tell you. On one occasion, Mr. Langevin said to me: "If the Commission does not act properly I shall dissolve it."

Q. Is that statement true?—A. I do not say that.

Q. You deny that?—A. I deny that. I read that before, and it is not so.

I should like to know, on the face of that long cross-examination on that particular point, how the hon. gentlemen who prepared that report can distinctly say at page 16, that the entire statement made by Sir Hector Langevin in this connection is as follows, and then give about half a dozen lines, when I have read nearly a page and a half of his evidence on cross-examination. It appears to me to show a great weakness in their report; and no doubt they will withdraw that unfair statement, and desire to have the report amended on that point. They would not, of course, have it go to the country in an untrue form as it is. The question is, how many more misstatements or misleading statements are contained in that report. I must say I have been able to find one or two others in important particulars, misstatements made in the report or misleading statements—statements intended to mislead the public, either wilfully or not, and such must be the effect of the statements. In dealing with this branch of the case, that is the contract for the dredging, I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that there was no suspicion in the minds of the Harbour Commissioners that there was anything wrong going on. They came up one after the other and gave evidence, and even that man Valin in his contradictory evidence, where he swore one thing one time and contradicted it by a declaration at another time, even his evidence does not go to show that there was any improper connection, any improper influence, that that contract was let under circumstances which would justify the House in finding there was any evidence that wrong influence was brought to bear on the Commissioners. I say, therefore, when we find that fact, that the Harbour Commissioners were perfectly satisfied with the work, that they saw nothing wrong about it, that they were conversant with every detail of it and visited the work every day, and consequently were conversant with everything that took place--when they were not able to see there was anything wrong, how can we assume and infer, because it is merely an inference, that the Minister of Public Works in Ottawa, having no cognizance of the work, no supervision over it, had any connection whatever with this contract, or that any improper influence was used, as hon. gentlemen opposite ask us by their report to infer? It is impossible for us to come to that conclusion. The next contract in which their report assails the Minister of Public Works is the contract for the completion of the Lévis graving dock, dated 23rd June, 1884. Under that head the charge was this:

"That Thomas McGreevy agreed to secure for Larkin, Connolly & Co. this supplementary contract in consideration of their agreement to pay him all they should get on the contract over and above $50,000."

That is a very simple charge. That charge does not in any way implicate the Minister of Public Works; yet we have a very long finding in that report, in which hon. gentlemen opposite attempt to connect the Minister of Public Works in these words:

"And we find that all the facts were known to Sir Hector Langevin and his engineer, Perley, and that their conduct in assenting to the giving of this contract was highly censurable and a violation of public trust.

"We further find that the payment of $65,900 to these contractors as alleged damages was illegal and unjustifiable. That the conduct of Perley in recommending it, and of the Minister in sanctioning it, was a violation of public trust.

"That the express condition on which Sir Hector recommended the Governor in Council to agree to the supplementary contract, viz., 'that the contractors should make no claim for extras for the future,' was deliberately violated, and claims for extras to the amount of $50,214.02 were made and allowed, and that in permitting and sanctioning these payments both Sir Hector and Perley, his engineer, were guilty of violations of public trust."

I should like to say in reference to that contract that it has a history, and that the history of it goes back to 1878, a year long to be remembered in the history of this country. That contract was let in August, 1878. The relation of the Government to that contract was, perhaps, a little more intimate than it was to the contract for the dredging to which I have been referring. In this way: Plans and specifications for the work were approved by the Governor in Council under recommendation of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Marine. The moneys to be paid therefor were to be paid from time to time as the work proceeded, upon the report of the Minister of Public Works that progress was satisfactory. If hon. gentlemen will read the report of hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to this matter, they will find it seems to set up a state of facts that would justify, or tend to convince anyone that he would be justified in supporting their finding. But we must go back to 1878 before we can form a proper conclusion as to that contract, and as to their finding being a fair or an unfair one. If we commence there and go from 1878 to the present time we will find this report is misleading in almost every respect so far as the findings are concerned, and the facts stated in it are concerned. This is one of those cases where, owing to the investigation extending so far beyond the charge that was made, a large portion of the finding is based upon a mere statement by the accountant and not upon evidence of the progress and condition of the work at any time. Incidentally, however, and in connection with one or two of the reports we glean some idea of the difficulties that were encountered in the progress of this work, and we begin to feel a certain amount of sympathy with the contractors who took hold of the work and carried it to a successful conclusion, although we are bound to condemn their acts in many other respects. What was the position of affairs in 1878 when that contract for the Lévis graving dock was let? The plans and specifications were prepared, based upon surveys and explorations made by the engineers of the Harbour Commissioners. Their plans and specifications contained certain representations. Among the representations contained was this, that there was a good bottom to the dock, a good foundation to the gates of the dock at the entrance, that experiments had been made by boring in order to ascertain what kind of a bottom would be found. As the facts subsequently transpired, and as the evidence on them in a scattered and meagre way showed, when these surveys were made for the purpose of finding a bottom to build that dock upon, the engineer when he ran down his rod struck it on a boulder and took it for granted that this boulder was a rock bottom, and therefore the representation was made in the plans and specification that at a certain distance down they would find a bottom sufficient for the carrying out of the work. These contractors then commenced the work and continued for several years, but instead of being able to complete according to the plans and specifications, when they dug down to the depth required for the purpose of getting a foundation, and when they built their foundation to a considerable height, they were surprised to find, and the engineers were surprised to find, that the wall was caving in and that that solid rock bottom which they expected to get was, on investigation, shown to be a bed of sand thirty-five feet in depth. Yet hon. gentlemen insert in their report a clause to this effect:

"Special clauses were inserted throwing the risks and the responsibilities on the contractors with respect to the foundation on which any of the works were to be erected, and with regard to the materials to be excavated."

You see, Mr. Speaker, they knew what the trouble and difficulties were, but they were not fair enough to state in their report that the plans and specifications misrepresented the foundation to the contractors, as it stated that they were going to build a wall upon a good rock bottom, whereas it turned out to be a bed of sand. I say that if these gentlemen were fair in their report—I would not say, if they were honest, because I would be called to order again—they would have stated some of the difficulties that those contractors had to contend with, they would have stated that the original plans and specifications upon which the contract was based were not true in their representations, and that the engineers who made the original survey had made a great mistake.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has the hon. gentleman read the original contract? He had better read that before he makes such a criticism.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I think I have read all the papers in connection with it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think not.

Mr. COATSWORTH. And I have more here which I will read to you presently. I will read to you in a very short time the report of the engineer, Mr. Tomlinson, who investigated the work in order to report upon the difficulties which existed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The contract is the important paper.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman had better not interrupt the hon. member until he hears what his argument is.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I quite understand the hon. gentlemen wanting to interfere, because they have made an improper, and I believe an unfair statement in that report. They have not set out truly or fairly the difficulties that had to be contended with owing to the improper plans and specifications submitted to the contractors. These improper plans were submitted under the Government of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and I charge that they were responsible to a large extent for the fact that these works were carried on so long, and with such great difficulty and expense. Now, Sir, what are the facts during the progress of the work? When it was found out that the walls had caved in, information was sent to that effect to the engineers in the old country; and if these engineers who had charge of this work had taken the same view as hon. gentlemen opposite, they would have telegraphed back in the words of this report:

"That clauses were inserted in the contract throwing the responsibilities on the contractors and they must carry out the plans and specifications."

But the engineers did nothing of the kind. They cabled back: "Move it 70 feet further back again," and so the work had to be put under reconstruction. After a year or so word was sent again to the old country: "Seventy feet further back has been gone and the walls are again without a foundation, what are we to do?" There were delays and difficulties standing in the way of the contractors all the time, and after consideration Kinipple & Morris, the engineers, cabled again: "Move it 70 feet further back." They were determined that they would move back until they got the foundation if they had to move back as far as New Brunswick. Now, Mr. Speaker, that was after some years of delay, that was after the contractors had been put to all these difficulties, that was after enormous expense had been incurred in extra work, that the instructions came from the engineers, not as my hon. friends in their report say, to keep the contractors to the contract, but to "move it 70 feet further back." Twice that order came by cable from the engineers in the old country in order to find a proper foundation. A good deal was said in the evidence as to the dismissal of the engineers, Kinipple & Morris, and I say, in connection with this point, that Mr. Dobell, one of the Commissioners, who incidentally brought up this question, made the statement that he considered that the engineers were so grossly negligent of the work at that time, that they deserved to be dismissed. He said that if they could do nothing more than cable out from the old country to move the dock 70 feet further back, that they were not entitled to have the supervision of it any longer, and that he was satisfied they should be dismissed then, although he protested against it before. Now, Sir, the difficulties did not end there. The work went on from year to year, and four or five or six years had passed and the contractors were not doing anything during the time, but struggling with the difficulties that were imposed on them by reason of the original wrong survey. There is no question, in the mind of any fair man, who will read this evidence, that if the dock had been established upon a proper foundation in the first instance, none of this trouble would have occurred. After Mr. Perley, the engineer for the Harbour Commissioners, was appointed the engineer over these works, in place of Kinipple & Morris, he found it necessary to move it back twice to the extent of 55 feet, before he was able to get a proper foundation for the work. Now, is it fair that we should endeavour to come to a finding upon this supplementary contract in the way hon. gentlemen opposite ask us to do, without taking these difficulties and the responsibility of the Government into consideration? I say it is very unfair, and the report which says that the contractors were bound to carry that out, in spite of the false representations of the plan, is not a fair report. I would like at this stage to read the official report that was made by one of the engineers, Mr. Tomlinson, on 3rd December, 1880, and this will show you that I have not exaggerated the difficulties, and I do not think I have exaggerated the responsibility when I throw it upon hon. gentlemen opposite, because it was under the supervision of their Government that the contract was let in 1878. This report of Mr. Tomlinson, addressed to the hon. Minister of Public Works about two years and a half after the contract was let, says:

"In compliance with your instructions, I have examined the graving dock at Point Lévis, and have the honour to report as follows:—

"The wing-walls forming the entrance to the graving dock were designed for their foundations to rest on clay overlaying rock, but on examination, and on borings being made, it was found that fine sand extended to a depth of 35 feet, no rock being reached except at the inside soundings.

"The foundations for the walls have been built according to the original design for a clay bottom, and have consequently proved insufficient for either supporting the walls or for making the water-tight dam to the inner works as was intended.

"After the sand had been dredged to a uniform depth the outside piles were closely driven to a depth of 8½ feet into the sand, the back ones to a little less depth and the space between was filled with concrete, upon which rests the masonry. The latter is of a superior description and well laid, the stones being considerably larger than the dimensions called for in the specification.

"The proportions of the walls are such that they would undoubtedly have been a substantial piece of work, if the foundations had been of a reliable character. The long wing-wall has settled considerably and has been forced outwardly some inches, so that most of the bottom vertical joints of the masonry have opened, and some of the cracks extend from the bottom to the top.

"There is no possibility of making the present design for the dam answer the purpose. A new dam will have to be built inside the wing wall and should extend past them to where the rock reaches the level of high water.

"The new dam should be planned at once so that everything required may be prepared this winter for the earliest possible prosecution of the work. It must be of the most reliable description and the parts under the entrance masonry should be designed so as to form a part of the permanent work.

"I would respectfully suggest that the engineers be asked to furnish plans for the new dam, as it will be impossible to execute the work without them.

"I am fully convinced that the westerly wing-wall can last only a short time if some plan is not adopted to prevent it getting more out of place."

That is the report of the engineer sent by the Minister of Public Works to examine the work before the change was made to move the dock back 70 feet; and that shows that owing to the original mistake in the plan and surveys, it became necessary to construct a new dam. Now, the importance of that will present itself to the House when you become aware, from looking at the accounts, that the new dam which became necessary by reason of the mistake of the engineers, cost upwards of $140,000. We have, as I said, very little evidence in regard to this. I would like to read a few words from the evidence of Sir Hector as to this graving dock. At page 1055 he says:

"Mr. Tarte insinuates that the Minister of Public Works has caused this contract to be granted in June, 1884, against public interest, after a promise made by Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co. to Mr. Thomas McGreevy to pay him certain sums of money.

"According to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, 38 Vic., cap. 67, the Minister of Public Works had to cause to be approved by the Governor in Council a report made by him jointly with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries about the choice of a site and the dimensions of the dock, the plans and specifications and the draft contract of the work, and to recommend, according to the progress of the work, the payments to be made to the Harbour Commission.

"The choice of a site of the dock, the first plans, specifications and draft contract have been made and approved under Mr. Mackenzie's Administration. I have not to discuss it here.

"On the 19th of May, 1884, the Harbour Commissioners informed the department that they had given to Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co. the contract for the works yet to be executed, and sent the draft contract to be submitted to the Governor General in Council to be submitted for his approval. On the 7th of June following the draft contract was approved, on the favourable advice of the chief engineer of the department.

"The above is all I had to do with the matter. I have acted conscientiously, to the best of my knowledge, not being aware whether Mr. Thomas McGreevy might have an interest in the work tendered for by Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co., having been subjected to no undue influence on his part, or on that of anyone else, and having myself tried in no way, directly or indirectly, to induce the Harbour Commissioners, or any other person to favour the tenderers whom I have just mentioned."

Now, the evidence does not disclose it clearly; but, as far as one can gather from it, it appears that the condition of the works at the time this contract was awarded was such as justified the Commissioners in entering into a new arrangement. Any idea of carrying out the original contract had been abandoned altogether. For a long time the contractors had been supplying materials and working by the day; so that any pretense of carrying out the original contract according to its terms, had long been abandoned by the Harbour Commissioners. Consequently, for the purpose of bringing the work to a successful termination, they arranged to give the contract to the men who were constructing it on time, for the completion of the whole of the work, so that they would know exactly what it would cost, and that was let for about $74,000. There is not a tittle of evidence to show that the Minister of Public Works had any connection with this. As he states in his evidence, the contract was prepared by the Harbour Commissioners, they had all to do with the arranging of it, it was submitted to him and approved by him and the Governor General in Council, and the payments were made from time to time on the reports of the chief engineer, as submitted to him. Now, the report of the hon. gentlemen finds, first, that there should not have been any supplementary contract let: and, second, that a large claim for extras was made and allowed by the contractors, notwithstanding the clause in the report of the Minister of Public Works that no future claim for extras should be allowed. It appears to me we are justified in coming to the conclusion from the evidence that the Harbour Commissioners had the right and acted wisely in bringing to a certain definite amount the sum they had to expend on that dock, and in letting a supplementary contract for the purpose of completing it. With reference to the extras, is it a fact, as stated in the hon. gentlemen's report, that there were $50,000 of extras allowed after this contract was let? I do not think they will pretend to prove that. I do not think they will pretend to say that after this contract was let the contractors acquired a claim for $50,000 of extras. The work that this claim for extras represents was, I think, in whole, but if not in whole, in the greater part, done prior to the time this contract was let, and the claim for extras existed at that time, so that the report of the hon. gentlemen opposite is, in regard to that, misleading. The supplementary contract was let on the 23rd of June, 1884. At that time, and up to that time, the contractors had done a large amount of extra work, amounting to between $40,000 and $50,000; so that you will bear in mind that a claim for extras had accrued at that time. The Minister of Public Works at that time reported in favour of the supplementary contract and against any further claims for extras being allowed. The hon. gentlemen report that a further claim was allowed the contractors of upwards of $50,000, although, as I read the evidence, and I feel sure I am right, that claim for extras existed almost in entirety before the supplementary contract was made. If I am right in my interpretation of the evidence, and I am reasonably certain I am, because I have looked at the accounts and papers, and find the account was put in prior to the time the contract was let, the report of hon. gentlemen on that point is misleading, as there was no further claim after the 23rd of June, 1884, put in for extras to the extent of $50,000, and there were no extras done after that time to that extent. It appears to me, on summing up the evidence with regard to this contract, that we are not justified in sustaining the finding of hon. gentlemen opposite. It appears to me that they have failed entirely in their evidence and in their argument, so far as we have heard any argument yet, to establish any connection whatever between the Minister of Public Works and any wrong-doing in connection with the Lévis graving dock. But I must pass on to the next contract, and that is the cross-wall contract, dated 26th May, 1883. It is charged in connection with that contract that Larkin, Connolly & Co. took into partnership Robert H. McGreevy and gave him an interest of 30 per cent. to secure the influence of Mr. Thomas McGreevy, and that other tenders were put in by this firm besides their own, to the knowledge and with the consent of Mr. Thomas McGreevy. These were tenders of Beaucage and Gallagher, and that while the tenders were before the department, Mr. Thomas Mc

Greevy obtained information from the department concerning them which he gave to Larkin, Connolly & Co. It is stated that Mr. Thomas Mc Greevy knew of the Beaucage and Gallagher tenders, that he knew they were lower, and that, in consideration of a payment to him of $25,000, he assisted in manipulating all the tenders so as to secure the contract for the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and that there was also in connection with this contract $1,000 paid to the Langevin testimonial fund. It is also alleged that while the works were in progress changes were made against the public interest and to the advantage of the contractors. The finding of the minority report on these matters is :

"We find it difficult to absolve the Minister from a knowledge of the existence of a conspiracy. We find further that the Minister had been guilty of a breach of public trust in permitting double payments for the dredging used in filling the cross-wall."

It is claimed that, concurrently with the contract for dredging, for which work Larkin, Connolly & Co. were paid 35 cents a yard, they had another contract for this cross-wall, that they were to receive 40 to 45 cents a yard for filling the cross-wall, and that a large portion of the material which they dredged out of the harbour at 35 cents per yard, they placed in the cross-wall at 45 cents per yard ; and the finding is that the Minister was guilty of a breach of public trust in permitting that double payment to be made. What was the position of the Minister in reference to that contract? I do not know whether hon. gentlemen find it easy or difficult to bear in mind the relative positions of the Public Works Department and the Harbour Commissioners in regard to each of these works. You will remember that the Public Works Department had nothing whatever to do with the dredging contract, except to pay over such money to the Harbour Commissioners, from time to time, as they demanded it for the work. With regard to the Lévis graving dock they had further duties. The plans and specifications were submitted to and approved by them, and they had to see to the proper application of the money. Now, in this cross-wall contract, the plans and specifications were prepared under the direction of the chief engineer of Public Works, approved by the Governor in Council, tenders were to be asked for and the contract was to be awarded by the Governor in Council. But you will remark in regard to this, and it is important in connection with the finding which hon. gentlemen bring against the Minister of Public Works, that the department had nothing to do with the seeing to the application of the moneys lent by the Government to the Harbour Commissioners for the purpose of carrying on the work. All that the department was authorized to do was to lend this money to the commissioners, and the commissioners were bound to see to its expenditure. Now, in dealing with the report of the hon. gentlemen in regard to that, there is one thing in which I think they gave themselves away a little, and, if that was misleading, it was misleading in the right direction, and I am always glad to acknowledge any fault of that kind. I want to dwell upon that fact, because it will go to establish in our minds that Sir Hector was not guilty of any connivance with the conspiracy and had nothing whatever to do with it. The statute authorizing this work, or the advancing of moneys for the purpose of carrying on this work, apparently, is capable of two constructions, or at any rate two constructions have been placed upon it. It says that the plans and specifications are to be prepared under the direction of the chief engineer of Public Works, the tenders are to be called for and the contract is to be awarded by the Department of Public Works. You see that divides it into three parts : first, the plans and specifications are to be prepared under the supervision of the Public Works Department ; then the tenders are to be called for, and thirdly the contract is to be awarded by the Department of Public Works. It is the second of these that I wanted to call attention. That was apparently construed to mean that tenders should be called for by the Harbour Commissioners. Hon. gentlemen opposite—and I will not say they are wrong, because I am inclined to think they are right—say that these tenders were to be called for by the Public Works Department. That seems to me to show that Sir Hector was not cognizant of any conspiracy or took any part in it or lent himself to it in any way. It was very simple for Sir Hector, if he wanted to do so, to put the same construction upon it and say that the whole thing should be done from his office, but on the contrary, and it may be a providential thing for him, because it shows that he was not trying to keep the thing in his own hands, he construes that to mean that the tenders were to be called for by the Harbour Commissioners. So we have first the plans and specifications prepared by the department, next the tenders advertised for by the Harbour Commissioners, and then the contract let by the department, and then it is carried out under the supervision of the commissioners. As to these tenders, in which, beyond doubt, there was a great deal of manipulation, if the department had placed the construction put on that paragraph by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the tenders should be called for by the department, then the department would have been open to more suspicion as to the manipulation of tenders than they are now : but the fact that they allowed the tenders to be opened by the Harbour Commissioners absolves them from having had anything to do with the tenders. The plans and specifications were prepared, the tenders were called for and sent to the Harbour Commissioners and opened by them, and read by them, and sent by them to the Department of Public Works for the purpose of their letting the contracts. That there was a manipulation of the tenders there is no doubt. Every one who has read the evidence is aware that Larkin, Connolly & Co. sent in three tenders, one in their own name, one in the name of Beaucage, lower than theirs, and another still lower, under the name of Gallagher. Every one also knows that they made a mistake in those tenders, so that they might have an opportunity of withdrawing them, and the result was that the Department of Public Works wrote asking them what their meaning was in regard to certain items of their tender. In one case, that of Beaucage, he wrote back to say that he meant so-and-so, which made his tender higher than that of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and made him the second instead of the third lowest tenderer. Gallagher withdrew his tender and Larkin, Connolly & Co. wrote, keeping the figures of their tender. So there was the Gallagher tender withdrawn, the Beaucage tender increased, and Larkin, Connolly

& Co. left the lowest tenderers for the work. An effort has been made in connection with this to show that there was a wilful miscalculation of quantities in these tenders, and that Larkin, Connolly & Co. were not really the lowest tenderers, but that the lowest were Peters & Moore. If we are to accept the report of the expert engineers, there is no doubt that is shown to be the fact. We must, however, read that report of the engineers with a great deal of reservation, because the original plans are not all forthcoming. The original estimates prepared by Boyd are not forthcoming, and, therefore, the expert engineers had not the material to show them how Boyd made the mistake. In their conclusions they state that Boyd did make the mistake. They take the plans and specifications that remained and worked them out, and they say that, according to their judgment, the lowest tender was that of Peters & Moore, and not that of Larkin, Connolly & Co. While dealing with that question last night the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) referred to a letter from Thomas McGreevy to his brother dated the 3rd May, 1883, in which he says: "He will commence his calculations," and my hon. friend in dealing with that letter insinuated—because I cannot characterize it as anything less than an insinuation—that the word "he" referred to Sir Hector Langevin, and that he was discussing it with McGreevy, and they were going to make a calculation, but the evidence shows that it referred to Boyd. In the letter of the 8th of May, a day or two afterwards, he says: "I have seen Mr. Boyd this morning, and he has not yet finished the cross-wall." So the evidence is clear that at that time Mr. Boyd, the engineer, was referred to, and not Sir Hector. Now, Sir Hector himself denies very explicitly that he had any connection with the manipulation of the tenders. In his evidence, at page 1061, he says:

"I have complied with all these conditions in good faith. I have had no knowledge of the manipulations Mr. Tarte complains of in connection with the tenders, nor of information unduly communicated by officers of my department or others. I never authorized any one to make any such communications; I was not aware that the Messrs. McGreevy were interested in the contract for the works tendered for. I had in view under the circumstances only the public interest."

Now, in regard to the dredging that was put into the cross-wall contract, and which forms a subsequent part of the finding of my hon. friends, they find this:

"We find the Minister to have been guilty of a breach of public trust in permitting double payment to be made for the dredging material used in filling the cross-wall."

I would like to ask the hon. gentlemen if they think that is a fair finding on the evidence, if they think that, taking the Minister's connection with these works, it is fair to charge him with the knowledge of that payment for filling the cross-wall. Why, there is not the slightest tittle of evidence to show that he had any knowledge of it whatever. He could have had no official knowledge of it. The work was being done under the Harbour Commissioners, was being paid for by them, and it was not reported to him in any way, and I feel assured that the fullest reading of the evidence by any hon. gentleman will show that Sir Hector had no connection whatever with the filling of the dredging into the cross-wall. Now, in regard to the finding in connection with the Esquimalt dock, I do not think it is quite fair for me to go into all these contracts. Other hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the evidence are doubtless better qualified to deal with them, and I have occupied so much of the time of the House this afternoon——

Mr. ALLISON. Give us something Tarte.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I do not catch the remark of the hon. gentleman. It is like a great many of the remarks made by that hon. member: we can neither hear them nor understand them. The contract for the completion of the Esquimalt dock of 1884 was entirely under the supervision of the Department of Public Works, and the charges made in connection with it are that Thomas McGreevy agreed to help, and did help, by obtaining information and figures from the department, and that with his knowledge and consent Larkin, Connolly & Co. took Robert McGreevy into partnership and gave him an interest of 20 per cent.; that during the execution of the works Thomas acted as the paid agent of Larkin, Connolly & Co. in dealing with the department, and obtained from them important alterations and more favourable conditions which enabled them to realize large profits; that large sums of money were paid by Larkin, Connolly & Co. to Thomas McGreevy for services in dealing with the Minister of Public Works to obtain his influence, and he furnished information and procured from the department alterations which cost large sums; that Thomas McGreevy endeavoured to induce certain members of Parliament to join with him in this part of the conspiracy; and also that he endeavoured to procure the dismissal of certain officials who were objectionable to the contractors because they bound them to the terms of the contract. Now, the findings on that, so far as they affect the Minister, are as follows:—

"That before the contract was entered into Sir Hector Langevin secretly assented to changes and modifications of the contract which were to be afterwards made in the interest of the contractors, amongst which was a rebate of part of the $50,000 to be paid for plant.

"That there was a change to be made in the re-coursing which was not to cost extra, but notwithstanding these facts the Minister subsequently improperly paid the contractors for this a sum of $32,839."

Now, in regard to the first finding, that the Minister secretly agreed beforehand with the contractors that there was to be a rebate of this $50,000 that was to be allowed on the contract price for the plant that was assumed, I would like to ask the hon. gentlemen how, in the face of Mr. Perley's evidence, they come to that finding. I suppose we will have to assume that they have read all the evidence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You are very generous.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I would be prepared to guarantee that the hon. gentleman has not read all the evidence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is pretty clear that you have not.

Mr. AMYOT. We heard it.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Nor heard it all, either. But in reference to this secret agreement that they say existed between Sir Hector and the contractors for the allowance of a rebate for this $50,000, I challenge hon. gentlemen to produce one tittle of evidence to establish that finding. I am prepared to show to them the only evidence that has been given on that point, and it directly refutes the statement they have made in their report. Now,

I do not know whether they have read Mr. Perley's evidence on that subject. They surely cannot have read it and come to the conclusion that they have come to there. I will inform them that it is to be found at page 145 of the old edition. Mr. Perley, when questioned in regard to this allowance of $50,000 for the plant, makes a statement at some length that he had gone out to British Columbia and inspected the plant for himself, and had found it almost worthless, or comparatively worthless. He says :

"I think my report is dated January, 1886. I refer therein to this very matter, and state that the claim would come up when the final estimate was made. I had obtained a statement showing that the articles were worthless, and I struck $19,000 off. The contractors, had these articles been good and of value, could have taken them and used them in their work, but as they could not be furnished, as they were worthless, they had to buy other articles to take their place, and therefore I considered it was only fair and just not to call on them to pay it. That is my explanation of it. Mr. Trutch had nothing to do with it. I had all to do with it, and in my position as chief engineer I took that course."

In another place he said that he took that course without even consulting the Minister of Public Works, and he was not prepared to say that the allowance of $19,000 allowed by him to the contractors for plant came in any way to the knowledge of the Minister of Public Works at any time whatever. What does the Minister of Public Works say about the matter? His evidence is confirmatory of that of Mr. Perley. He states the matter was not referred to him and he had no knowledge of it, that it was done, as Mr. Perley stated, entirely on his own responsibility. How can hon. gentlemen opposite, in the face of Sir Hector Langevin's evidence, in which he stated he had no connection with the matter, in the face of Mr. Perley's evidence, in which he stated he did it on his own responsibility, state as their finding that there was a secret agreement beforehand that Sir Hector was to make an allowance. There is no possibility of sustaining any such finding. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House gave a good deal of attention to one part of the contract, and that was as to the letting of the contract and the discussions in regard to tenders previous to the contract being let. But there were some points in the evidence which the hon. gentleman was guilty of leaving out. It must be a matter of surprise that the hon. gentleman omitted those parts of the evidence that were favourable to us or to the Minister of Public Works, while he quoted all those portions that seemed to be against the Minister. At page 1116 we have the evidence of Mr. Starrs. Mr. Starrs was asked the following questions :—

Q. Were you able to carry it out? A. I think we would have had means to carry it out with friends to assist us.

Further on he said in cross-examination :

Q. Were you ever in British Columbia? A. No. Q. Nor your partner? A. No. Q. Have you ever built a dock like that before? A. No.

That brings us to the root of the difficulty. The chief engineer of the Public Works Department made his report to the department and he estimated the cost of finishing that work at $390,000. Then the department called for tenders. Two tenders were put in ; the tender of Larkin, Connolly & Co. was for $374,569, something below the estimate of the chief engineer ; while the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly was for $338,945, or over $50,000 below the estimate of the chief engineer. Here was the position of the matter : Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly, who were men without any financial responsibility, according to their own admission, put in a tender for the work at a price $50,000 lower than the chief engineer had estimated for the work and $30,000 or $35,000 lower than the other contractor. They had never done any work of this kind before. Larkin, Connolly & Co. had gone on successfully in the face of all difficulties and completed the Lévis graving dock. Although Starrs & O'Hanly state in their evidence they are contractors, it is well known that such a firm as Starrs & O'Hanly does not exist. It is well known in Ottawa that the head of the firm, Mr. Starrs, has a bowling alley and sells groceries in this city, and Mr. O'Hanly is a civil engineer and has been an unsuccessful contractor. So here were two men, without means of any consequence, without the ability to carry on the work, because Mr. Starrs said in his evidence "I think our friends could have helped us to carry out the work," these men put in a lower tender than the Minister thought the work could be done for. They came before the Minister with that tender, and asked him to accept it, and give them the contract. The Minister's statement contains a reasonable explanation of the whole matter. He said :

"I called their attention to Mr. Perley's report, and on my calling their attention to that report and that they were $60,000 lower than the estimated price, they withdrew the tender, and would not have anything to do with the work."

That seems a reasonable explanation. These men had never done that kind of work before ; they knew nothing at all about it. Mr. Perley was thoroughly familiar with that work, and had made his estimate of the cost, and these men had evidently made a miscalculation as to what it cost them and had put in too low a tender, and they withdrew it when their attention was called to the thing. In regard to the allowance for re-coursing, I do not know whether the hon. gentlemen who find so strongly against the Minister on that point, have read the report that was not fyled. I must assume they did not read the report which was omitted to be fyled or marked as an exhibit. I am sure if they take into consideration the report of Mr. Perley on that subject, to be found on page 30 of the majority report, they will be of opinion that they should at least modify their finding, if not withdraw it altogether. Mr. Perley in that report said :

"According to the specification, the stone work is backed by concrete, each being paid for at a different price. By the substitution of larger courses of stone, the quantity of stone used has been increased beyond the quantity originally specified and the quantity of concrete backing proportionately lessened, and the change thus made will increase the cost on the dock about $35,000."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman defending the allowance made for re-coursing?

Mr. COATSWORTH. I am defending the Minister of Public Works in reference to it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not quite catch what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. COATSWORTH. What I said was this : That I thought that if the hon. gentlemen had fully considered this report of Mr. Perley's or had considered it at all, that they would not have thrown the whole responsibility for it on the Minister of Public Works. Mr. Perley goes on to say :

"I may here mention that originally the masonry in the graving dock at Lévis, Quebec, was intended to be in comparatively shallow courses, but, it having been found possible to obtain a very much heavier class of stone, the courses were doubled in thickness to the material advantage of that work."

So that it appears Mr. Perley had had experience in increasing the thickness of the courses of stone and knew the advantage it would be to the work.—

"The stone used at Esquimalt is a sandstone, not differing much in hardness and texture from sandstone generally and not so well adapted for wear and tear as limestone, granite or hard stone of that class, and in view of the great amount of wear and tear to which a dock of this nature is subjected, it is in my opinion a most fortunate thing that the contractors were able to obtain so large a class of stone as they have used, and, as a direct benefit has been conferred, I have to recommend that they be paid full measurement for all the stone they have placed in the dock, due care being taken to reduce the quantity of backing."

It appears to me that if the hon. gentlemen had attached any weight to that report that they ought to modify their finding.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman kindly read to me on that particular point what portion of the finding he complains of? I think the finding of the majority report on that point is stronger than ours.

Mr. COATSWORTH. At the top of page 40:

"That the change made in the re-coursing of the dock was applied for by the contractors in their own interest, they having discovered a quarry within accessible distance, which furnished suitable stone for the proposed change, and was assented to by the Minister on the distinct understanding that it should not increase the cost of the work to the Crown; nor does it appear why it should have done so, inasmuch as Engineer Perley pointed out at the time the cost of the work to the contractors, in the use of the larger stone, would be lessened.

"That notwithstanding these facts, the Minister subsequently improperly paid to the contractors for this change the sum of at least $22,839."

Now I submit that in all fairness to the Minister, the report should have stated that he recommended that payment on the certificate of his chief engineer.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would the hon. gentleman kindly read the report of the majority on that one point?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has no right to interrupt. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) is making his own argument.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I will leave the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to read that for himself.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock, in speaking of the allowance made by the Minister of Public Works for re-coursing, the question was suggested by my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) that the majority and minority reports did not disagree on that point, and he asked the question, in what respect they did disagree? I may point out to my hon. friend that they disagree in this: That the report of the minority finds that the Minister recommended the payment of that sum in pursuance of, and in connection with, the alleged conspiracy. There is no such finding as that in the majority report. They admit the payment, of course that is undisputed, and they feel that the payment should not have been made, but they do not think that payment is any evidence of, or was made in connection with, any conspiracy between the Minister or any other person. There are one or two points more I would like to refer to before concluding. The report of the minority in reference to the Esquimalt graving dock deals with several questions, in which it does not seem to me there is a great deal of point. One of them is the proposed change to lengthen the dock, and the suggestion was made that that was part of the corrupt agreement between the contractors and the Minister of Public Works. In this connection I would call the attention of the House to the fact that the report of the Minister of Public Works in favour of the lengthening of the dock was conditional on the Imperial Government concurring in it and agreeing to share a portion of the expense. If that had been part of a corrupt arrangement we would not have found that the Minister of Public Works would have made such a recommendation as that the Imperial Government should take part in it. I think that is conclusive evidence that the Minister of Public Works was acting in good faith, and as he thought in the interest of the country in having a longer dock, if the Imperial authorities, who are chiefly interested in it, would share in the expense; and as they did not concur, the length is not increased. Considerable space is allotted in the minority report to the alleged attempt to procure the dismissal of Bennett. The best evidence that the Minister was acting in good faith in that matter is the fact that Bennett was not dismissed, and that he continued as the engineer all along to the completion of the work. My hon. friend, in speaking last night on this matter, referred to the $5,000 alleged by him to have been contributed towards the Three Rivers election, and he produced in support of that a memorandum made by the accountants from the books; but he forgot, or else he intentionally omitted to remark, that when Martin P. Connolly was examined in regard to this item, he stated that he had made the "Three Rivers" entry on his own responsibility, that he had no authority to do so except his own surmise, and that he was not authorized to do so by any member of the firm. There is, therefore, no evidence to show that that $5,000 had any connection with Three Rivers. I was rather surprised also that my hon. friend made some effort to connect the Minister of Public Works with the payment of money directly to him from Murphy, one of the contractors. I was surprised at that, in view of the fact that the hon. gentlemen who drew up the minority report did not feel that they were justified in finding that the money had been paid, and I am sure that the House will concur in the minority report on that point, that the evidence does not justify the finding that Sir Hector Langevin received any money whatever from Murphy. The hon. gentleman also raised the question of the testimonial fund to the Minister of Public Works and referred to the speech of that hon. gentleman in the Hansard of 1884, page 1465. He did not read that speech to us, but referred to it as evidence that Sir Hector at the time knew the names of some of the parties who contributed to that fund, although he had stated in his evidence that he was not aware of any of the names. I have looked up that report, and I do not find that it bears out what the hon. gentleman said, and I would like to read a short extract from it to show that Sir Hector at that time did not know and that there was no evidence to show that he knew who the contributors were. After referring to one of the names mentioned in the Globe newspaper, he said:

"Well, I see to-day in the papers—though of course I could not say whether it was the case or not, because I do not know the names of those parties who were kind enough to contribute to that testimonial; the list was never shown to me, and therefore I do not know the contributors—I see in the papers a statement which is evidently coming from that gentleman, in which he says that he never contributed to the fund."

So that there was the best evidence present to the mind of the Minister of Public Works that at least one of the gentlemen whose names were mentioned had not contributed to the fund, and that, so far as the other names were concerned, he had no evidence brought before him that they were actual contributors. In conclusion, Sir, I would just like to say that I do not see how we can possibly concur in the report of hon. gentlemen opposite. There is no direct evidence on any of the charges to connect the hon. Minister of Public Works with the transactions in question; but I think there is abundant evidence to show that he had no connection with them whatever. We are asked practically to infer that the hon. Minister was guilty, and that the findings brought against him are correct. I submit that no such inference would be right. I submit that there is not even circumstantial evidence which would justify us in agreeing to such a finding. It appears to me, taking into account all the circumstances and all the evidence that has been brought before us, that the severest finding we would be justified in coming to against the hon. Minister of Public Works is that contained in the report of the majority.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I can hardly find fault with the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Coatsworth) for the length of time he has taken up, on the assumption that he was put forward to attack the report which my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and I have the honour to submit, and to support the one which the hon. gentlemen on the other side have submitted to the House as the majority report. I had not the knowledge before that my hon. friend had the honour to belong to the long robe. When he was speaking I learned for the first time that such was the case, for we live in different parts of the Dominion; and perhaps that may account to some extent for the particularity with which he went into the evidence. I cannot say that I congratulate him altogether on the manner in which he has approached this case. My hon. friend at my left (Mr. Mills) and myself felt the responsibility which rested upon us when, after differing from our colleagues, we had to present a minority report; and when I say that we approached the consideration of that report seriously and solemnly, I do not think I shall ask the House to assume more than they already believe. We felt that we were not acting as partisans, that we had no right to present a partisan report; if we had done so, we would get no credit for it; so we tried to present a document judicial in its tone, judicial in its conclusions, and which we respectfully submit can be judicially defended. Under the circumstances, Sir, I resent strongly the unjustifiable charges which the hon. gentleman has several times made in the course of his speech, that my hon. friend and myself had wilfully misrepresented the facts and the evidence. It will be impossible for me, in view of the duty which I think devolves upon me, of defending more or less the report which we have presented, to follow the hon. gentleman through his long speech. I understand that he presented to the House five or six different statements as reasons why he should not only vote for the report presented by the majority, but why he should go much further than that report, and completely absolve the Minister of Public Works from all responsibility whatever for any of the admitted frauds which have been committed upon this country. The hon. gentleman argues that inasmuch as the Harbour Commissioners were not proved to have known of the frauds, therefore we may justly draw the conclusion that the Minister did not know of them. The hon. gentleman argues, with a disregard of the facts which to me was Napoleonic, that the Minister derived no benefit from these frauds. The hon. gentleman argued that the money which was squandered, which was paid improperly, which was robbed by these contractors, was not money belonging to the Government, but belonging to the commissioners—ignoring the fact, which one would suppose as a member of Parliament he must have been acquainted with, that two years have not elapsed since this country, at the request of the Minister of Public Works assumed the whole of the debt, every dollar of it, of that commission. The hon. gentleman argued that the report which I, coupled with my hon. friend who was the senior member on the Committee, have the honour to present, was wilfully wrong in that it did not give a fair or honest statement of the facts connected with what is called the 35 cents dredging contract—that we did not give an honest statement of the facts connected with the Lévis dock and the enormous amount improperly and illegally paid for extras in connection with that dock; that we did not give an honest account of the Minister's connection with the money paid improperly on the cross-wall; and that we did not attempt to prove the existence of any secret agreement which we alleged to exist with respect to the rebate of moneys on the Esquimalt dock. The hon. gentleman will not imagine that I intended to treat him with disrespect if I say that I propose to take up these different points as I reach the different portions of the case, because it would not do to take them up by themselves. I beg to say, with regard to this report which my hon. friend and I have presented to the House, that it may be true and defensible, or it may be untrue and indefensible; but I want the hon. gentleman to understand that it has been honestly presented to this House by men who felt the responsibility resting upon their shoulders, and who desired to present a report which would not disgrace the reputations which I venture to say we each hold in our respective provinces. Sir, I am not going to charge against those who differ from me that they do so from improper motives. The evidence on which we formed our conclusions is very voluminous and very extensive, and men may honestly differ as to the conclusions to be drawn from that evidence; but while I will not charge against the majority of the sub-Committee that they presented a fraudulent and corrupt report, as the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) has not scrupuled to charge against my hon. friend and myself. I claim from the House and the country that the same courtesy may be extended to us as we willingly accord to our friends who differ from us. Sir, before I pass to speak of that report, I may be allowed to re-echo what is, I think, in the mind, not only of every member of this House on both sides, but in the mind of every thinking man in this country, that there is one gentleman to whom Canada at present is under a very heavy debt. I say the man who had the pluck, the persistence and the courage to cut away the ties which bind a man to party in this country, and make these serious charges on his responsibility in the House, and press them with the care, the ability and the assiduity with which he pressed them to a conclusion, deserves the gratitude of every true Canadian. I say that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) is not only justified in the position he took: but in the minds of honest men on both sides of politics, he stands forward as a man entitled to the gratitude due to everyone who deserves well of his country. We cannot ignore the fact that in this matter a Minister of the Crown, who occupied a position second only to that of the First Minister, has been impeached of high crimes and misdemeanours. We cannot minimize the fact. He stands before this country to-day impeached, on his trial, and awaiting our verdict. At an early stage of this enquiry, I took occasion to present the view which I personally held, and which I have never seen any reason to retract, that that hon. gentleman, charged as he was, on the responsibility of a co-member of Parliament, with having improperly received public moneys from contractors, had a duty to discharge, in the first place to himself, in the second place to the colleagues with whom he is associated, and in the third place to the constituency he represents and the country at large, and that was to step down and out from the high position he held as Minister of Public Works until these charges were investigated. I held this view for two reasons. The first was that, as Minister of Public Works, he was the custodian of the evidence which was to prove his guilt or his innocence, and secondly because when he was so charged in this House, he did not deny the accusation frankly and squarely, but only went so far as to say that he had not received the money for his own personal use and benefit. And I stated then, with that charge, with that impeachment hanging over him, and with only that qualified denial in his favour, looking to English history and English precedent, looking to what was in itself right and just, and to the position he held as the head of the Public Works Department, he had a duty to discharge primarily above all others, and that was to resign into the hands of some other colleague the custody of the papers he held and the control of the department, the duties of which he was accused of having abused. It is argued that Sir Hector Langevin's long services should weigh very strongly in his favour, and I do not think there is anybody who sits as one of the jury on the trial who would dispute the force of that argument, always provided he was reasonably satisfied that there was a doubt of the guilt of the member incriminated. I say if a man's course of conduct for thirty or forty years has been above suspicion, and if he is charged with a political offence, and there is reasonable doubt of his guilt, his past conduct should count for something: but I entirely deny that if a man is charged with a political offence, a criminal offence, and that charge is brought home with reasonable certainty to the minds of those who are to try him, he is to be absolved because he has been thirty or forty years in the public service. I think myself that the long time during which he has been engaged, the responsibilities which attach to the position he held, so far from leading us to decide in his favour, only add to his guilt, if guilt in fact exists; and, therefore, we have to approach this case irrespective of the fact that he had long service, because there cannot be a gentleman on either side who will deny that the evidence is of such a character as to raise doubts, which no man can rid his mind of, that if Sir Hector Langevin has not been actively engaged in this conspiracy he has been a passive and willing party to it. These charges were made against the Minister, and I regret the manner in which he met them in this House and afterwards before the Committee. If the hon. gentleman will take the charge as it was first presented, he will find that the Minister of Public Works was accused directly, in these words, of having received public moneys:

"That certain members of the firm of P. Larkin, Connolly & Co. paid and caused to be paid large sums to the Minister of Public Works out of the proceeds of the said contracts, and that entries of such payments were made in the books of the firm."

Nothing could be more specific, nothing could be more certain. How did the hon. gentleman meet them? When he came before the Committee, he attempted to make the Committee believe that this was something he had then heard of for the first time. I call the attention of hon. gentlemen who are to judge in this matter between Sir Hector Langevin and the country to the fact that he had made a qualified denial, and only a qualified denial, of that charge when it was stated before this House. He said: "I did not receive the money for my own personal use and benefit." The inference, the only inference which could be drawn by any honest man from that statement, was that he had received the money, but had received it for other purposes than his own use; and when he came before the Committee—see page 1048 of the evidence—he said:

"On reading the minutes of the proceedings in this Committee, I find that my name was connected with this enquiry, and have thought fit to come forward of my own accord and make a statement before the Committee."

He wishes to lead the Committee to believe that that was the first time he heard there was a charge made against him, when, as a matter of fact, that charge was made two months previous by the hon. member for Montmorency, on his responsibility, from his place in this House. The hon. Minister went on to say:

"If Mr. Tarte, when he brought his accusations in the House of Commons on the 11th of May, 1891, had made his charges directly against me, I would have at once, pending the enquiry, put my resignation as Minister of Public Works in the hands of the Prime Minister, in accordance with the custom followed in such cases in England. But his statement apparently aimed only at Mr. McGreevy, and the facts with which he subsequently connected my name were not stated at the time as directly implicating me in any improper act or as indicating on my part any guilty object or any intention of failing in my duty, and so far as they seemed directly directed towards my conduct they were vague and indeterminate."

I only quote that to show the frame of mind in which the hon. Minister approached the charges, for remark that in the two paragraphs of the charge which precede the last one, the hon. member for Montmorency charged that there had been a political conspiracy to defraud the Government and the people of Canada out of large sums of public money in the letting of public contracts; after charging that accusation home upon the members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and after charging it home upon the officers of Sir Hector Langevin's department, he wound up his charge by stating that:

"Certain members of that firm had paid and caused to be paid large sums of money to the hon. gentleman himself personally."

Yet two months later, the Minister of Public Works said he did not understand that any charge had been made against himself. I quote this to show the extraordinary condition of mind in which the Minister of Public Works approached this matter. No man doubted, every one knew, that the charge had been made across the House, that the Minister was personally guilty of corrupt conduct, and I repeat again, in my humble opinion, his duty to the country should have compelled him to resign the responsible position he held the moment that charge was made. Now, before passing to the evidence on which my hon. friend and myself based the report we have presented to this House, I wish to make one or two preliminary observations respecting the character of the witnesses and the relations the different parties bore, the one to the other, in that enquiry. Sir, a good deal depended on the evidence of Mr. Owen Murphy and of Mr. Robert McGreevy, and it is open to any hon. gentleman on either side to affirm what opinion he likes as to the credibility to be given to the statements of these gentlemen. I wish to make only one or two observations and they are these, that, so far as both these gentlemen are concerned, they produced before the Committee every document they had which had any relation to this enquiry. Their private diaries, entered from day to day for eight or ten years, containing every secret transaction they had during that time, were produced and subjected to the strictest scrutiny and enquiry, and that voluntarily. There was no reason why they should have produced those documents. They had no money at stake in this enquiry. No one knew them to have those documents to produce, but it is one of the strongest pieces of evidence in favour of these men that they produced their private diaries for six or eight years, showing every transaction with which they were connected. Compare their conduct in that regard with the conduct of other gentlemen who were more or less incriminated in that enquiry. I want to ask you, did or did not the hon. gentleman from Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy), who was incriminated and who has been found guilty by both reports of the highest crimes a member of Parliament can be guilty of, produce his private books or papers? Did he produce one letter? I challenge those who are prepared to defend him in this House to show that in the long series of years during which he is charged with a long series of crimes, he ever produced a letter or a document, of a private nature, to show that he was innocent. They were all suppressed, or all destroyed, or all stolen. Where was Sir Hector Langevin, who has been occupying a public place before the people of this country so long and who has occupied such high positions in the state? He was charged with having received moneys from time to time. He was charged with having received ten thousand dollars at one time, paid into his own hands, as a corrupt bribe. Did he produce his bank books to show that no ten thousand dollars was ever deposited? The point may be strong or weak, as hon. gentlemen may regard it, but I remind you that he produced nothing. You have the evidence, the recollection, the oral testimony of Thomas McGreevy and of Sir Hector Langevin, and you have the sworn testimony of their opponents coupled with the production of their books, papers and letters. There is one thing upon which both reports agree, and that is that the members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. collectively and individually were parties to a corrupt and wicked conspiracy to cheat the public. That is admitted on all sides. I have not even heard the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) defend the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., although I think he defended everyone else concerned in the transaction. They are admittedly corrupt, and I think some gentlemen are apt to assume that, whereas Murphy, one of the guilty parties, is as black as the devil, all the others are almost as white as angels. We will weigh the credibility of the respective parties in that firm when we come to consider the different points hereafter, but I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that, during the very period of time when the production of the cheques of that firm could have shown who was lying or who was telling the truth with respect to the moneys paid to Sir Hector Langevin and the money paid for Sir Hector Langevin's election, the cheques of Larkin, Connolly & Co. were missing. There was not a man in the Committee who believed a word that Nicholas Connolly spoke in reference to these transactions. There was not a man there but knew that Nicholas Connolly deliberately stated what was untrue, and the book-keeper of these parties swore that he believed the cheques were brought up here and put in the Committee room, and if they had been produced they would have shown who was telling the truth and who was telling a falsehood, but most extraordinarily, when we come to look for the cheques for six or seven months, those cheques have mysteriously disappeared, and the Committee are without the benefit of that evidence. So we find that the books of the firm have been scraped or erased in order to destroy, as the book-keeper honestly admits, the incriminating testimony, and, further, we have the fact that either Michael Connolly or Nicholas Connolly endeavoured to spirit the book-keeper away and he was only brought back because one of the counsel stated that, if he was not brought back, he would throw up his brief. Yet, in face of all these facts, there are men who do not scruple to say that they will believe Michael and Nicholas Connolly rather than Murphy. I am not going to detain the House on this point. I am going to plunge in medias res; but, first, let us see what relations these parties bear to one another. We have the Minister of Public Works charged with complicity with these frauds. We have the member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) charged as one of the chief conspirators, and we have the members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., admitted on all sides to be conspirators. What relation do these persons bear to one another? It has been proved, that as far back as 1876 or 1877, Sir Hector Langevin and Mr. Thomas McGreevy were united together as bosom friends, that at that time Mr. Thomas McGreevy advanced Sir Hector Langevin $10,000 to pay some election expenses and that up to this day that amount is still due, the notes having been renewed every two or three months, and to that extent Sir Hector Langevin is obligated to Thomas McGreevy for the last 12 or 14 years. You can draw what conclusions you like from that. You find that Thomas McGreevy was his bosom friend, lived in his house at Ottawa, dined at his own table, and had his private desk in Sir Hector Langevin's private room in the Parliament buildings. You find that, like David and Jonathan, their souls were knit together, that there was nothing that one knew that the other did not appear to know, and that the very papers that Thomas McGreevy says he lost, were stated by him in the first instance, before he thought the matter over and consulted other people, to have been taken out of the private room of Sir Hector Langevin. It is necessary to know these facts and to bear them in mind when considering the weight to be attached to different pieces of evidence as you go along. If Thomas McGreevy, the bosom friend and intimate companion of Sir Hector Langevin, the man who lives in his house, who dines at his table, who lives with him day and night, occupies his private rooms—if he writes letters contemporaneous with the facts saying such and such things are going to occur, why, there is much more reason to believe that he has knowledge whereof he writes than if a stranger was writing with respect to them. But when you come to estimate the degree of weight to be given to Thomas McGreevy's letters, mind you, not letters written years afterwards, but letters written contemporaneously with the facts to which they relate, and if you want to give an honest judgment you must not eliminate from your mind the fact that Thomas McGreevy and the man to whom he was writing were the closest bosom friends. Sir, they both knew Murphy well. It is now said that Murphy was a scallawag, that his past history was one of which no man need be proud, and that no weight should be attached to his statements, because he admitted himself that in the City of New York he had been guilty of conduct somewhat similar to that which he admits to have been guilty of here. That may be so, but there is this to be said, that from beginning to end of the evidence you will see that McGreevy, the Harbour Commissioners, and each individual member of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., treated Murphy with the utmost confidence, that he was the man to whom they entrusted the duty of carrying out their biggest schemes, their most secret designs, their most secret purposes; and that if he was not the head and front of the offending, he at least was the man upon whom they all relied as the one who was capable and able to carry out their schemes. Sir, if you take, for instance, the Lévis graving dock, when the Harbour Commissioners wanted to determine whether they would give a supplementary contract, who did Thomas McGreevy recommend them to see? He told them to go out into the anteroom and see Murphy, and the whole deputation of Harbour Commissioners went out into the anteroom to see—whom? Why, the goal bird who is not to be believed now, but the man in whom at that time they had every confidence, and the record shows that the three commissioners appointed, Thomas McGreevy, Mr. Rae and some other gentleman, whose name I forget, adjourned to the anteroom, and after consulting with Murphy, returned and advised that the new contract be given. And I say you will find all through Larkin's correspondence with Murphy, that he had most implicit reliance upon him. You find Nicholas Connolly and Michael Connolly corresponding with Murphy and evidencing by their correspondence that he was the man upon whom they relied. And although you do not find letters from Sir Hector Langevin corresponding with Murphy, I think I will be able to show to the House evidence so clear and so conclusive that there can be no reasonable doubt that he knew of this entire conspiracy and was a direct party to it. Now, Sir, let us go on into the facts. We find that these parties had contracts to the amount of $3,000,000; we find that they divided as profits about $1,000,000; and we find that they dispensed in bribery about $170,000. The question is here right at the threshold—between what parties are you to apportion the responsibility, and how far is the Minister of Public Works responsible? Well, let us get down to that argument. A distinction has been attempted to be drawn between the contracts carried out by the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, and the contracts carried out for the construction of the Esquimalt dock, on the ground that the Quebec Harbour Commissioners were a buffer between the Minister and the public, and that he was authorized and justified in depending upon an authority constituted as they were, and authorized as they were, by Parliament—that he was justified in depending upon them and in assuming their honesty and in relying very largely upon their integrity. The argument at first sight, I admit, is a very strong one; but I propose, Mr. Speaker, to show you that the argument will not hold for this conclusive reason, that Parliament, not once, but twice, and three times, by its express statutory declaration, took the power and the responsibility from the Quebec Harbour Commissioners and vested them in explicit language upon the Minister of Public Works alone. Sir, I am not going to enquire to-day why Parliament did that; I am not going to spend time upon an enquiry as to the motives which prompted the Parliament of Canada to declare that the power to let the contract, and the power to spend the money, and the responsibility for the expenditure of every dollar, should be vested in the Minister of Public Works and not in the Quebec Legislature.

Mr. COATSWORTH. You cannot find that in the statutes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman says I cannot find it, and, therefore, if I cannot, to that extent he has the better of me, to that extent he is justified in the course he has taken. But when I read him the statutes I will expect him, as an honest man, to rise in his place and say that he was wrong. Sir, I will call attention, in the first place, to the statute of 1875, because I think this is an important point, and the hon. gentleman evidently thinks so by his interruption. Before the statute of 1875 was passed, the Harbour Commissioners were an independent board, the Government had not a controlling power over them, the Government could not nominate a majority. But in 1875, a statute was passed altering that, and vesting the power in the Government of appointing a majority of the board, so that the Government should have a controlling power and influence upon the Quebec Harbour Commissioners. In 1875, another statute was passed which declared as follows :—

"The Minister of Finance shall not pay to the Quebec Harbour Corporation any moneys under this Act until the location and dimensions of the graving dock and the location, plans and specifications, and proposed contract for the construction thereof, shall have been approved by the Governor in Council, upon the joint report and recommendation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and of the Minister of Public Works, and any moneys to be hereunder paid to the Quebec Harbour Corporation shall be so paid from time to time as the work proceeds, upon the report of the Minister of Public Works that such progress is satisfactory."

Mr. COATSWORTH. That is only as to the Lévis graving dock ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes ; and to that extent the hon. gentleman acknowledges he is entirely wrong.

Mr. COATSWORTH. No ; I read that myself, I read it to the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then I only wish the hon. gentleman could have read it intelligently.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I read it distinctly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not concerned to bandy words with him. I am not arguing the case with him, I am arguing the case with the House, and I want to ask whether I have not proved my point to that extent.

Mr. COATSWORTH. That is the point I proved.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then I take up the Act of 1887 which authorized the expenditure of $1,250,000. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has read that Act or not ; but if he has read it, he will have found that the Minister of Public Works was to pay out that money to the Harbour Commissioners in the same form and on the same conditions as are expressed in the Act I have read. The Act said :

"The Governor in Council may advance from time to time to the corporation of the Quebec Harbour Commission, such sum or such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole $160,000, as may be required to enable them to complete the graving dock now in course of construction at Quebec harbour; and also, a further sum not exceeding in the whole $1,100,000, to enable them to complete improvements in the harbour ; such sum or sums to be in addition to the sums already authorized to be advanced to them for the same purpose, and to be received as advances by the said corporation in the same way and on the same terms and on the same conditions, and subject to like provisions as the appropriations for increased draught of vessels, &c., and to pay for the interest as is enacted in the Act passed during 38 Victoria (which Act I have just now read.)"

So the hon. gentleman and the House will see, and I want to enforce the point on those who believe, and honestly believe, that a broad distinction should be made between works under the direct supervision of the Minister and those executed through the superintendence of and supervision of the Harbour Commission, that Parliament had expressly charged upon the Minister of Public Works not only the responsibility of the expenditure of the money, but in so many words it declared that he should see from time to time how the money was expended and should report himself satisfied with the work before he paid out any more dollars. If that is true, we will now come to the contracts themselves. The first contract we meet is the contract of 1882, a contract for the dredging of the Quebec harbour works, the tidal dock at Quebec. Both the reports concur that Thomas McGreevy knew of his brother's interest in that contract when it was acquired. Both reports, therefore, condemned the member for Quebec West in that respect. We need not waste any more time on it ; I assume the House is unanimous on the point. But the minority report declared that he used his influence to get Larkin, Connolly & Co. the contract. The majority report says there is no evidence of any interference or the exercise of influence by Thomas McGreevy. So in regard to this small contract of 1882, the two reports differ to that extent only. On what evidence did my hon. friend the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and myself report in our opinion Thomas McGreevy used his influence to get that contract ? Hon. gentlemen will remember that the contract was let as far back as 1882, and they will remember that, when tenders were first called for it, two tenders were received, and that Larkin, Connolly & Co. did not tender at that time, because, as Murphy swears, they were told by Thomas McGreevy not to show their hand, that the contract would not be let on those tenders, that they were bogus. What is the fact ? The contract was not let ; the tenders were cast to one side ; Larkin, Connolly & Co. did not show their hand, and new tenders were called for. Everything transpired just as Murphy was told by Thomas McGreevy would be the case. Then, we find that Askwith's tender—I will not say anything about Fradette & Miller's tender, because there is evidence to justify that tender being put to one side, as the engineer said he thought the tender was too low—is by many thousands the lowest tender. Why did he not get the contract ? The contract was formally awarded to him, and he was asked to come in and complete and sign. He said : This is a very large contract, and I am not quite sure whether the dredges I have in view are as good for tidal water as they are on the lakes ; and the commissioners said they wanted security from him, an additional sum of $10,000, and he would have to put it up within 24 hours. The man very naturally said : Give me time, a few days only, only a fortnight, to see whether those dredges I have in view on the lakes will do for the tidal waters. The answer of the Harbour Commission, of which Thomas McGreevy was a member and the controlling spirit, was : Close up within 24 hours or withdraw. The man said : I cannot do it. And he withdrew. They forced him out ; and then Larkin, Connolly & Co. came in. What about the 24 hours ? They had no dredges. They did not pretend to have any. They were not required to close up within 24 hours or within 24 days. They had time to the following spring to begin operations, and that was in August. They had 10 months to do what was denied a fortnight to the other man. Their contract was very much higher ; but they got the time and the contract. They built their dredges ; and I tell the hon. gentleman who spoke of the desire of the Harbour Commissioners to give the contract to men who were qualified to fill it, that at that time when their contract was put in and Askwith afterwards forced out, Larkin, Connolly & Co. had not one dredge in Canada. They had to build them that winter. They got 12 months' time and they began work next spring. That contract was a reasonably good one, it paid fairly well. Although only entered into for one year, 1883, it was continued during 1884-85-86 without new tenders being called for. They made very reasonable sums out of it, as I will show directly. What is the next item of proof we possess? While this contract was being carried on from year to year, beyond the time when the contract expired, the money ran out. But were they to be stopped from making money, because the money ran out? Not at all. An arrangement was come to, between whom? Between Thomas McGreevy and Sir Hector Langevin, and we have it in black and white, in an official letter written from the Public Works Department, in which Sir Hector Langevin agreed, although no money had been voted by Parliament, with Thomas McGreevy for a further expenditure of $50,000, but the contractors were to take the chance of Parliament voting it, because he could not take it out of the treasury. Knowing that that would be perfectly safe, they went on with the work, and of course they got the money. Hon. gentlemen who desire to follow the testimony will find on page 974 the evidence and letter from which I am quoting. Many years afterwards this contract was called up. Mr. Boyd, the engineer, had deducted 5 cents per square yard on the quantity of dredging material they had deposited in the river instead of on the embankment, amounting to $16,000; and when Boyd was dead and gone, the Department of Public Works and the engineer turned round and gave the contractors back $16,107, to which they had no right whatever. Sir, I will tell you during that period of time these men made profits, as shown by the report of the accountants, amounting to $135,844. But it was not enough. The elections of 1887 were approaching and although profits to the amount I mentioned were made, Thomas McGreevy was not satisfied. Now, Sir, I will pass from this contract, reminding the House that the facts upon which my hon. friend and myself based our report were contained in the evidence of which I have given you a short summary, and I say there is no man who looks through that evidence who can doubt that our report is not fully and amply justified. We come now to the 35 cents dredging contract. How do the reports differ there? Both reports concur that Thomas McGreevy agreed in consideration of $25,000 to use his influence to obtain 35 cents per yard for 800,000 yards of dredging, or an increase of 8 cents per yard; in other words, Thomas McGreevy corruptly agreed—the Minister of Justice and my friend from Northumberland (Mr. Adams) and my friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) report that he corruptly agreed—in consideration of $64,000 to be stolen from the public treasury, to give Larkin, Connolly & Co. the contract if the contractors would give him $25,000 for political purposes. The country was to be robbed of $64,000 in order that a portion of the people might be debauched by the expenditure of $25,000. Sir, that is not the report of my hon. friend and myself, but that is the report of the Minister of Justice, and the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) and the member for Northumberland (Mr. Adams). Nobody can doubt that finding, and why? We were not depending upon the oral testimony of witnesses, or upon the weak memories of frail men, but we had the agreement down in black and white, written by that paragon of perfection, Michael Connolly. If Murphy had written it, it would not have been believed, perhaps; not even Nick; it was Michael wrote it, the man who was ashamed to go on the stand and give his evidence. There it was, in black and white, signed by Larkin, Connolly & Co., that corrupt agreement sworn by Murphy and Robert McGreevy to have been carried, after being written by Michael, and shown to Thomas McGreevy, who said it was satisfactory. And so both sides cannot help but agree in the face of the oral testimony and the written document that the corrupt agreement was proved. Now, Sir, wherein do the reports differ? The majority report says substantially:

"There is no evidence that Thomas McGreevy used his influence with the Department of Public Works in connection with the making of this contract. The contract was not let by the Department of Public Works but by the Harbour Commissioners, and it appears that the department had nothing to do with the contract. Mr. Perley was connected with it only as engineer of the Harbour Commissioners.

"The only evidence of the use of influence upon Mr. Perley, as the chief engineer of the Harbour Commissioners, is that constituted by the inference arising from Thomas McGreevy's letters."

The minority report says substantially:

"That McGreevy successfully used his influence to procure the contract for them without calling for any tenders.

"That under the contract enormous sums of public moneys were paid to Larkin, Connolly & Co., beyond what the work was worth, and beyond the actual quantities dredged by them.

"That Mr. Perley had received from the contractors jewellery and diamonds on the 9th of January, 1887, to the value of $1,885, which were intended as a bribe to improperly influence his conduct as chief engineer of the Department of Public Works, and as engineer of the Quebec Harbour Commission, and that the facts connected with the letting of the contract and its subsequent execution were known to Sir Hector Langevin, the Minister of Public Works, and that the frauds were perpetrated at least with his passive connivance."

These are very serious findings, and we will see how far the evidence justified us in making them. The first finding is that Thomas McGreevy successfully used his influence in the premises. Did he do so? I will ask any hon. gentleman to turn to the evidence which is published on page 11 of our report and he will find that Thomas McGreevy stands on record as having written what to my mind—I do not know how it would strike other hon. gentlemen—is almost conclusive evidence; that is contemporaneous letters written by Thomas McGreevy at a time when he had no object to state anything falsely, and reciting what the facts are. He is writing to his brother, he could not have any prévision that ten years afterwards this matter would be brought before a parliamentary committee. He was quite satisfied that it was all to be kept quiet and he writes to his brother in April that he has just seen Perley on the dredging. Before I read his letters let me say that Murphy swears:

"I met Thomas McGreevy and I bargained with him that if he would give us the contract for 35 cents a yard instead of the 27 cents we are getting paid for dredging, we would pay him $25,000."

Eight cents per yard extra for 800,000 yards gave $64,000 extra and they were only going to pay $25,000 of that for corruption, and so they could well afford it. Thomas McGreevy in pursuance of the contract which Murphy alleges, comes to

Ottawa, sees the Department of Public Works, sees Perley, and writes :

"My Dear Robert,—I have just seen Perley on dredging. I think he will report on 35 cents and put in some conditions which will amount to nothing. He will report when I will be there."

Now, is that true? He succeeded. A few days afterwards you find Mr. Perley writing down to these gentlemen, asking them if they want to take the contract for dredging in the harbour and at what rate, and the day after Perley writes his letter, you find Larkin, Connolly & Co. accepting his offer for 35 cents a yard ; the exact sum previously and corruptly agreed upon, and stating :

"That the difficulties are greater than we had to contend with during the progress of our previous dredging, inasmuch as the passage is narrower, the currents stronger, and the distance to the place of deposit further."

Now, Sir, every one of these statements are false and are proved to be false by the evidence of Charles McGreevy, of Peters, of the engineer Boswell and of Robert McGreevy, who swore positively that there was not a shadow of ground for any one of these statements. What were these false statements put in for ; to deceive Mr. Perley or Sir Hector Langevin? They could not do that, because the witnesses proved to you that Sir Hector gathered his knowledge on the ground that nobody knew as much as he did, that he was there frequently enquiring into the details, and Mr. Dobell swore that no man had such a knowledge of details as he had. These statements were not to deceive Sir Hector, they were to deceive Parliament in case Parliament asked for the papers. So, Sir, the contract was entered into, and what does it provide? They had been paid 27 cents for that same work and I have shown you they had made in the three years they had carried out the contract at that price over $100,000. It paid pretty well, but they got a new contract and it provided expressly that the contractors should place and level the dredging materials on the Louise Embankment or on some other locality belonging to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, or that might be thereafter required by them. So that they had to dredge this down to a depth of not more than fifteen feet and they had to put it in the Louise Embankment or some other work belonging to the Harbour Commissioners. They did put it in some other work ; they put it in the cross-wall. Sir, a number of witnesses swore that a quantity was put in the cross-wall which would give them over $50,000 in payment ; but Mr. Boswell came along and swore that the quantity only gave them $22,000 ; and my hon. friend and myself accepted the lowest statement ; and I stand here to-day to state that those gentlemen were paid in defiance of the express words of the contract, with the positive knowledge of the engineer, and with a knowledge on the part of the Minister which must be assumed—it cannot be otherwise, for he had the contract before him, ratified and approved of by him ; they were paid at the least $22,000 of cash for putting that dredged material in the cross-wall over and beyond the 35 cents. So they got 45 cents for putting it in and 35 cents for dredging it, and the sum paid was what I have stated. Now, Sir, how much did they make out of that? They made the $64,000 and the $22,000, stolen out of the treasury—I use that language, because I think it is justifiable—in all, $86,000. Now, it is important, vitally important, to determine whether Sir Hector Langevin knew or did not know of that. If he knew of that, I think, Sir, the case is closed. I am not going to ask Mr. Murphy. I assume that there are those who would perhaps not be prepared to accept his testimony ; I will not take it. I will not ask any of the contractors. I will not ask any of Sir Hector Langevin's political opponents. I will take his own friend and supporter, Mr. Dobell, and I will ask you what Mr. Dobell said as to Sir Hector's knowledge of these facts. I have never heard it suggested by anybody that Mr. Dobell was anxious to incriminate Sir Hector Langevin. I think my hon. friend beside me would rather be inclined to think that Mr. Dobell, within the limits of what was reasonable and honest, would be inclined to shield him. What does he say upon his examination? He was asked by my hon. friend Mr. Edgar :

Q. Then, during your membership, which has lasted from the first to the present time, you were not aware of any impropriety in the relationship between Mr. McGreevy and any person whatever, either contractor or persons in authority in connection with the work? A. No. I may state that I had no suspicion of anything wrong, except when the dredging contract was given, and then I protested. I did not like that dredging contract. It was forced upon us, and in a way I did not like.

Now, who forced it on the Harbour Commissioners? Will the hon. member for East Toronto or any other member tell me what Mr. Dobell meant? Who forced it? Who was the authority, the only authority, above and beyond the Harbour Commissioners? The Government of Canada acting through the Minister of Public Works. There is no other person to do it. The engineer was their servant—he could not force it ; the Minister was their master—he could. Mr. Dobell says it was forced on them.—

By the Chairman :

Q. What was your protest? A. That they should not be allowed to throw any more of the dredging material into the river, and I thought the price was far too much for the work performed. Large portions of the work were forced upon us time after time.

By Mr. Edgar :

Q. What dredging are you speaking of? A. The thirty-five cents contract. My suspicion was that this work was being forced upon us and that it was not done as we wanted it.

Q. Then you did not consider the way it was being done was in the interest of the trade of the place? A. Of the public; and I believed the dredging could have been done at far lower cost.

Q. State your reasons? A. We decided that we would have no more dredging done after the $100,000 contract was completed; still we found them going on with it. After the Commission, as a body, decided that no more material should be dumped in the river, and instructed the engineer to that effect, the engineer having told the contractors that no more dredging would take place, we still found the dredging continued, and we then claimed that they should not be paid for that dredging, but they were paid.

Now, who is this person or power or authority that defied the Harbour Commissioners and paid the contractors for dredging after the Harbour Commissioners stopped it? Can any hon. gentleman tell me? There is only one person—the Minister of Public Works. I am not going to abdicate my reason and my common sense because I am a judge for the moment. Why, Sir, we are told that we are to judge by evidence. So I am prepared to judge, but I want to bring an intelligent mind to bear on the evidence. I am not going to abdicate my common sense and my common knowledge, and in judging by evidence you must apply your common sense and common knowledge.—

By Mr. Mills (Bothwell):

Q. I understand you to say you yourselves were of opinion that 35 cents was altogether too high? A. For dumping it into the river. If they placed on the embankment and levelled it I don't know that it would be too high—I would not have raised a difficulty about it; but it was taking it out of the bank and throwing it into the river—taking what we had been protesting against for years and allowing it to be thrown into the river.

By Mr. Edgar:

Q. If you had been aware that they were going to be paid 45 cents a yard for the portion of this excavation which they put into the cross-wall, would you not have thought that 45 cents in place of 35 cents was somewhat of a high figure? A. I should not have approved of it.

Q. If you had known—as a matter of fact, I think I can tell I have been informed it will be proved here that out of the dredging under that contract which was paid for at the rate of 35 cents a yard these contractors filled in all the cross-wall and were paid over $79,620 for it—how would you have characterized such a thing? A. I leave it to every gentleman present to know.

I do not think anything stronger could have been put than that statement of Mr. Dobell.—

Q. But you were a party to giving the 35 cents contract, and you were unaware that they were going to be paid during that contract 45 cents a yard for part of this stuff they were taking out at the rate of 35 cents a yard? A. I stated distinctly the cross-wall section we had nothing to do with, but I should say, with everyone here, if we were paying 70 or 80 cents for what ought to be done at 35 we were paying too much.

With respect to Sir Hector Langevin's knowledge of these contracts and of the details of the work, Mr. Dobell testifies:

By Mr. Edgar:

"Q. From your acquaintance with Sir Hector during all this time you have been on the Harbour Commission, you consider that he was very careful about details, and looking after all matters himself, giving personal attention to them? A. I never knew a man that seemed to be able to take in every detail as completely as Sir Hector has been in these works, and he did not seem to neglect it. He seemed to be familiar with them all.

Q. He was perfectly au fait with all the details of the contract?—A. With everything.

By Mr. Amyot:

Q. So he must have known the dredging was paid at the rate of 35 cents and then 45 cents? A. I should say he must have known.

Now, Sir, Sir Hector Langevin, I will do him the justice to say, never posed before this country as a great statesman. I do not think the Statute-books show that he has ever placed upon them any great law reforming the body politic. I do not think he ever claimed to be an orator; I do not think he ever claimed to possess any particular knowledge of the routine of the public business of the House. I never heard him or anybody on his behalf make such a claim. But he did claim that over and above everything else he was a thorough administrator—not superficially attending to the policy of the department, but digging down to and carrying out the details. His cry and that of his friends was this: "I have no other claim; I am not a brilliant man; I cannot speak or move crowds as my rivals can; but I can administer a department; I know what is going on everywhere; I can see everything." And Mr. Dobell says it is all true; and he says that Sir Hector Langevin knew all about that 45 cents contract and all about the payment of the 35 cents besides. Well, Sir, that is not all. Then you have Mr. Valin's testimony, and I am not going to read the whole of it. The hon. gentleman charged in that portion of his remarks to which I took the strongest objection that my hon. friend and myself had wilfully misrepresented the facts.

I hurl the indecent and improper accusation back in his teeth. I tell the hon. gentleman that nothing but his ignorance can excuse him. He has not the excuse of having charged a man in the heat of debate with making a statement that he must know or may know to be untrue, but he charged two men with making a wilfully false representation in their report, and I am going to prove that his charge is false. He has charged two men, with the responsibilities of judges on their shoulders, with having made a wilfully false statement. I tell the hon. gentleman that the statement made in our report is literally and substantially proved to the letter, and I will prove it. What is the statement? It is with reference to Mr. Valin's testimony. I will read the testimony first, and then I will deal with the charge the hon. gentleman has made. On this very point, this crucial point, does the evidence show, beyond reasonable doubt, that Sir Hector Langevin knew or must have known of these frauds? What does Mr. Valin say? He is asked:

Q. Had you any connection or occasion to confer with the Minister of Public Works with reference to the dredging contract of 1882—the 35-cent contract? A. Yes; I spoke to him about that. He told me that from information he had received he believed the change—that is, from 27 to 35 cents—was desirable, that he had spoken of it to Mr. Thomas McGreevy, and he believed it was the best thing to do.

Now, I am going to repeat what is stated in the report, and that that statement is absolutely uncontradicted, not only uncontradicted but not commented upon even by Sir Hector Langevin. Sir, when we made the report, we quoted verbatim every word that Sir Hector Langevin said in his written defence with respect to this contract. More than that, we put in the report the only statement made by Mr. Valin, of the numerous statements he did make reflecting upon Sir Hector Langevin, which that hon. gentleman dared to deny. We gave him the benefit of everything; but we drew this conclusion: When an hon. gentleman occupying Sir Hector Langevin's position stands charged with a public crime, and a witness charges against him seven or eight specific points, and when, after having taken three weeks to consider that evidence, the incriminated Minister comes in and denies one, but remains silent with regard to the other six, I say that, as judges, we have to draw one irresistible conclusion, and that is, that if he could have denied the other six he would have done so. Why, that is common sense; and I challenge the hon. gentleman or anybody else to show that in his written statement presented to the Committee, three weeks after he had read over all that had been said against him, he gave expression to one word of denial with reference to Valin's testimony on that 35 cent contract which I have just quoted. We have embodied in our report the ipsissima verba of his denial. But the hon. gentleman says: Why did you not give his cross-examination? Because the cross-examination had no reference to the 35 cent contract. Does the hon. gentleman see the point? Let him turn to the page and a-half he read, and if he will show me one word of denial with reference to that point I am prepared to vote to modify the statement made in our report. Said the hon. gentleman: Why did you not quote the page and a half of matter which had no reference to the charge at all? He talked a good deal about a general statement Mr. Valin made, and gave us a long rigmarole about Mr. Valin's wanting to be a senator. What had all that to do with this contract? What had it to do with the specific charge sworn to by Mr. Valin when he said:

"I consulted Sir Hector Langevin with reference to this particular change, and he told me he had consulted with Mr. Thomas McGreevy, that it was the best thing to do, and that I should do it."

Well, you may vote to declare Mr. Valin a gentleman who made false statements. I decline to do so. I propose to accept the sworn statements of these two men, coupled with the surrounding circumstances which not only give colour to their statements but convince me they are true. Now, I lay this down as a general proposition, which I will submit to anybody. I am repeating myself, it is true, but the point is so important that I cannot pass it over without repetition. There is that sworn specific statement: "I told Sir Hector Langevin about this particular thing, and he told me he had consulted with Mr. McGreevy and it was the best thing to do. And I went back and ratified it because Sir Hector told me to do so." Sir Hector Langevin is brought on the stand, and he does not dare to deny one word of this statement. Yet, Sir, you are asked to say that you do not believe it. Why? Is it because you believe that Mr. Valin perjured himself for nothing? Is it because you believe that, for no earthly object under Heaven, he came forward and made a wilfully false statement which Sir Hector Langevin dared not deny? And are you, when Sir Hector Langevin would not deny it, prepared to vote that Mr. Valin's sworn statement is not true? But, Sir, you will find that in addition to all that, in addition to the facts reiterated in the letters, Sir Hector Langevin, after that contract was entered into, came to Parliament and asked for this vote of $1,100,000 to pay these men for this new contract he had entered into, and explained to this House why he wanted that vote. Hon. gentlemen are asked to say, on their responsibility as members of this House, that the Minister of Public Works did not know what he was doing. I propose to leave that part of the case altogether; and I think I can make this statement to the House, that the evidence on which we base our findings in the report amply justify them. Now, we come to a very important branch of the case, to which I wish particularly to call the attention of those who desire to follow up the connection that Sir Hector Langevin must have had with these contractors. I refer to the Lévis graving dock; and I must say, in introducing that branch of the case, I can only express my regret that an hon. gentleman, representing such an important constituency as Toronto East (Mr. Coatsworth), should have made such a charge as he has made in this House against my hon. friend and myself with reference to our findings on the Lévis graving dock matter, findings based to a very large extent upon the words of the contract and the specifications attached to the contract, which the hon. gentleman himself had to admit he never to this day had read. Does the hon. gentleman say he has read the contract and the specifications? Because if he says so, I will have a more serious charge to bring against him than that of ignorance. The majority have reported with reference to this graving dock that there was an understanding between Mr. Thomas McGreevy and Mr. Murphy that the former was to receive a sum or sums from Larkin, Connolly & Co. in connection with this contract, and that, in pursuance of that understanding, he did receive an indefinite sum. That is quite true, but we go a little further. We report that Mr. McGreevy agreed with Larkin, Connolly & Co. to secure for them a contract to complete the Lévis graving dock on condition of his receiving all over $50,000, and he did procure it, and he did get the money, $22,000. So that we allege two things: We allege a corrupt agreement in the first place, and we allege the fulfilment of that corrupt agreement by the payment of $22,000 afterwards. Now, how do we prove that? Let us see what the profits were in connection with this contract. I am sure it must have been a matter of regret to the contractors that in this matter of the Lévis graving dock the profits were comparatively so much smaller than they were in other matters. Why, in this matter they only cleared $125,931—nothing at all—and the poor fellows had to pay out of that $22,000 to Mr. Thomas McGreevy to start with. We find further that the supplementary contract for $74,000 was given without any consideration—in other words, that it was a corrupt contract, a present of $74,000 given wickedly to these men for nothing, the contractors being bound by their original contract to do all the work they were bound to do by the supplemental one. There is one exception and one only, that I desire to make with respect to that want of consideration, and that is the caisson, $10,000. I take that out of the amount, leaving $64,000 which was agreed by Sir Hector Langevin and his commissioners to be paid to these people. There was not, with the exception of that caisson, the shadow of foundation for a consideration. It was a pure gift. It was a wicked steal. I cannot find language strong enough to condemn it. It is intolerable that the public works of this country and the public money of this country can be stolen and squandered in this way, and Parliament would have known nothing about it, if it had not been for my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Tarte), who made this charge. Not satisfied with taking this money, the minority of the Committee find that Sir Hector Langevin corruptly paid $50,000 for extras. The member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) rose to-day in his place and told us we had wilfully put that in our report. I throw that back in his teeth as being born of ignorance or of some improper motive. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to read both reports he would not have found that my hon. friend and I would risk our reputations by any silly or unfounded insinuations. I hold in my hand the original contract for the construction of the graving dock entered into in 1878, a contract so thorough and so complete in all its details that, if he undertook to read it, as I have done, from page to page, he would find that nothing was omitted and that the interests of the people were conserved and preserved in every page. By that contract they bound themselves to construct that dock for $330,000, and that dock was to be 55 feet longer than the one they ultimately did construct. I tell the hon. gentleman that in that contract the responsibility for ascertaining the character of the foundation, whether it was sand, or clay, or rock, was explicitly placed upon the contractors, and, if language was capable of binding anybody to anything at all, the men who entered into that contract were bound to take the sole and entire responsibility for the foundations of that work.

The hon. gentleman had the temerity to say, quoting superficially from the remarks of some of the witnesses, that the plans had misled these men and they were deceived in that way. If he had gone further, as he was bound to do before making such charges, if he had gone to the contract itself which was before him in evidence, he would have found how silly and unfounded his charges were. This contract provided for a dock 500 feet in length and 55 feet in width. In page 2 of specification it says:

"Borings have been made over the site of the proposed works and indicate generally that the strata in which the works will be situated are sawdust, top-soil, clay and rock, as shown on the sections in the contract drawings. Should the various strata, on opening out, be found to vary in any degree whatever from the sections, or at any of the sections tend to produce false information as to the nature of any ground lying between them, whereby loss may be incurred by the contractor, the contractors shall have no claim whatsoever upon the Harbour Commissioners for any extras in respect thereof.

"The levels of the ground and the soundings beyond low water mark from which the sections are made are supposed to be correct, but the contractor is at full liberty and desired to take any other levels or soundings he may deem fit to test their accuracy, and he alone will be held liable for the consequence of any errors which may be discovered at any time after his tender has been accepted by the Harbour Commissioners."

And further on:

"The contractor is to examine the grounds, foreshores, banks, the bed of the river and borings, and fully satisfy himself as to the nature of the materials to be excavated or dredged, or on which any works are to be founded, before he fills up his rates or prices in the schedule affixed to this contract, for excavation and foundations situate in any position about the works, lands, foreshores, banks or bed of the river, &c."

And he is to take the sole responsibility. The hon. gentleman sees, therefore, that the agreement explicitly provided not only that the contractor was to take the borings and find what the foundations were, but if he made any mistake it was to be on his sole and entire responsibility, and so the contract which he, with a fine sense of satire, remarked was made under the regime of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), and so, of course, might have allowed a loop-hole for corruption to creep in, was a contract complete in every respect. These men went on with their contract and were paid, up to and before entering into the supplemental contract, extras amounting to $40,000, and in addition to that they were paid the sum of $141,326 for their efforts to try and get a foundation at the entrance to the docks. But my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) and I have made no charge against the Department of Public Works with respect to those items. We thought they were wrong, but we did not want to raise any issue here as to whether that $141,000 was paid out rightly or wrongly, because, as we say in the report, we had not sufficient evidence to enable us to come to a right judgment, and it was the same in regard to the $40,000. It may be wrong, it may be rotten, but we made no finding, because we had not sufficient evidence on the subject. Now, I bring the hon. gentleman to what we did find after the $40,000 and the $141,000 had been paid out. After the foundation has been found and everything was right, then the devil entered into somebody's head, and a proposition was made that, if they would complete the contract within a year —a contract they were bound to complete already and in the completion of which they were five years behind—they would be given this $64,000. I have that supplemental contract in my hand, and I offer a challenge to the most astute member who has listened to that evidence to show one atom of consideration for the $64,000 in that supplemental contract. I charge, on my responsibility as a member of Parliament, that that $64,000 was a pure unmitigated steal, without any mitigating circumstances whatever. Now, that is a very strong statement to make. I would be a fool to make it if I was not sure of my ground. Hon. gentlemen opposite have heard the statement; if I am exaggerating they can throw me over. The hon. gentleman from Toronto triumphantly asks: How do you connect the Minister? Can the hon. gentleman have failed to read the evidence which is before his own eyes? If he takes up this contract which I hold in my hand he will find that Mr. Perley, the engineer of Sir Hector Langevin, reported in favour of giving that supplemental contract to the Minister, but the Minister did not accept his report. The Minister could not go before the Council with a bald report such as Perley had made to him, and the Minister, I allege—I do not want to put it too strong—deceived the Council and got that report adopted by giving them to understand that if it was adopted there would be no claim made for extras. Sir, I will read the report made by the Minister on which he induced the Governor in Council to pour out that money of the public. The Council ratified that contract on the 5th day of June, 1884, on a memorandum from the Minister of the same date, submitting that:

"The Harbour Commissioners of Quebec state that they have awarded, subject to approval, to the present contractors for the Lévis graving dock, a contract for the completion of that dock for the sum of $64,080, with the erection of a caisson for the sum of $10,000, it being understood that the new agreement does in no way prejudice the rights or claims of either party for the past up to date."

So far the Commissioners' report, so far Mr. Perley's report. Now, the Minister wanted to induce Council to accede, and reports further:

"The Minister recommends that the action of the Harbour Commissioners in this matter be approved on the conditions——"

And I want to ask special attention to this—

"—that the caisson shall be completed by the first of December next, that all risks and responsibilities be assumed by the contractors, and that the contractors shall make no claim for extras in the future."

Sir, the Council acceded to that. They did not read the old contract, they did not know they were paying $64,000. I am charitable enough to assume, without any consideration at all, and they approved of the Minister's report on the expressed stipulation that there should be no extras. Sir, let me invite the attention of the House to the sequel. The $64,000 was paid, and later on the hon. gentleman had the temerity to say that there were no extras charged. The hon. gentleman has heard me read that up to the date when the supplemental contract was entered into, the extras were $40,000. Now, let him do me the justice to follow me as, page by page, I point out to him his blunder, and then let him rise and apologize and withdraw. Sir, if he will turn to page 1173 of the revised evidence he will find in January, 1887, an estimate given by Perley, and passed on that date, in which the $331,000 for the original contract is allowed; the $40,000 of extras up to the time the supplemental contract is entered into is allowed; the $141,000 for digging a foundation at the mouth of the dock is allowed; the $64,000 for the supplemental contract is allowed; the $10,000 for the caisson is allowed; and then the details of the $50,241 of extras which the hon. gentleman——

Mr. COATSWORTH, Give the dates?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman so absolutely stupid? Don't I tell him that I hold them in my hand; I hold in my hand the details of the $40,000 of extras up to the date the supplemental contract was entered into on the 23rd of June, 1884. The $50,000 were for further extras incurred after the supplemental contract of 1884. The date for each is not given. It does not matter, they were after that, between 1884 and 1887—$50,241. Sir, I am not reading just now the account which Connolly & Larkin presented; I will read it in a moment. I am reading now the account which Perley and the Minister sanctioned; I am reading the amount which was paid on that date.

Mr. DICKEY. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to give the page?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Page 1173 of the revised edition. Now, Sir, follow me a moment longer. On that date Mr. Perley reported in favour of paying that much. That made $640,000. They had already received $562,000, and he reported in favour of paying the balance of $77,000. But that was not the total claim of Larkin, Connolly & Co., because if you turn back to page 1171 you will see that they presented a claim embracing $110,000 for damages, for delay, if you please, for damages for their own delay in not completing their own contract. Because they had been behind four years, they presented a claim against the Government. It does seem ridiculous, but it is there in black and white, and in addition to that is the $35,000 for an additional foot in the depth of the dock. Well, Sir, what do you think transpired? Did Mr. Perley allow them the whole? Not at all; it was too much to swallow. They were allowed $640,000; they were allowed $50,000 for extras, but none of that $110,000 just now. You must wait a little while. In a little while the claim is pressed. Mr. Perley reports what that $110,000 consists of. Let the hon. gentleman turn to page 1166 and he will see the details of this claim. It consists of the salary of Mr. N. K. Connolly, salary of O. E. Murphy, salary of M. Connolly, salary of T. Hume, salary of bookkeeper, salary of T. H. Gallagher, salary of time keeper, salary of stable boys, salaries of two watchmen; interest on $90,000 capital, at 7 per cent., which they had invested; cost of maintenance of organization at Lévis, $11,350, making in all $27,500, or, multiplied by four years, $110,000. Mind you, they were engaged all this time. They had received $40,000 of extras, and the $141,000 for the amount they had spent at the mouth of the dock, the $50,000 for extras, and $64,000 for the supplemental contract, and they wanted $110,000 besides. Well, Mr. Perley reports a few months afterwards: I have considered the matter, and I do not think they ought to be allowed the whole amount, but I think if you paid them $30,000 they would take it in full. And, Sir, Larkin, Connolly & Co., finding their claim is admitted, that it is simply a question of amount, and that the principle is admitted that they are entitled to damages and the only question is the amount, said: We will not take it, we will go to arbitration. They go to arbitration. Arbitrators are appointed. After a time they seek to change their arbitrators. What does the Minister know about it? He is following the whole matter, and he interferes. On 28th March, 1888, Sir Hector writes that he objects to this change of arbitrators and he will not have it. He is following the matter closely. He is willing to pay the $30,000, but he is not willing to change the arbitrators. I only quote this to show what a close watch he is keeping on the proceedings. But he does not allow new arbitrators, and in a short time Mr. Perley comes in and writes another report. He thinks he will allow $35,000 in addition to the $30,000 previously recommended, and so they got $65,000 out of $110,000. I want to ask the House this question: At whose instance was that infamous claim presented to Parliament? Who was the man who suggested that that claim should be presented? Was it Mr. Perley? No. Was it the Harbour Commissioners, or any of them? No. Then who was it? It was Sir Hector Langevin himself. Sir Hector Langevin over his own signature, for the claim never was thought of, wrote a letter to Thomas McGreevy and suggested that those men, whom he had reported to Council could have no claim whatever for extras of any kind, should submit their claim to the Harbour Commissioners, and the Harbour Commissioners would report to the engineer. So this infamous claim to which I have referred was submitted at the instance of Sir Hector Langevin himself. Hon. gentlemen can find at page 17 of the report we submitted this letter signed by Sir Hector Langevin.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) It reads:

"OFFICE OF THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS, CANADA,
"OTTAWA, 20th September, 1886.

"MY DEAR MR. MCGREEVY,—The contractors for the Lévis graving dock should ask a settlement of their account from the Harbour Commissioners, who will then most likely consult with their engineers. For the Esquimalt dock it is different, because the work there is altogether under my control.

"Yours very truly,
"HECTOR L. LANGEVIN.

"HON. THOMAS MCGREEVY, M.P., Quebec."

What account? The hon. gentleman declared a short time before that these men should only have the supplementary contract on the express condition that they should not be allowed any extras whatever. The ink was hardly dry on the Minute of Council, to which the Minister of War was a party, before the other Minister wrote stating they should hand in their account. How did he know they had an account? How did he find out that these men who were not to have any extras, had a claim of $50,000 for extras, and one for $100,000 besides? So I charge that the Minister of Public Works was directly cognizant of this fraud, and we found he was guilty of violating his public trust, and that not only did he stand charged but that he had been proved guilty of high crimes and misdemeanours against this commonwealth. For a moment let me call attention to the cross-wall contract. I will not dwell much on that, because the matter has been very well brought to the attention of the House by the hon. gentleman who preceded me on this side. But those hon. gentlemen who will do me the honour to turn to the passages of the report dealing with the matter will find that the majority report says:

"(1.) That in the year 1883 Larkin, Connolly & Co.' amongst others, tendered for the cross-wall, and that before tendering, and in order to secure the influence of Thomas McGreevy, they agreed to take into partnership with them Robert H. McGreevy, brother of Thomas, giving him thirty (30) per cent. interest in the work, and that this was done with the knowledge of Thomas McGreevy.

"(2.) That among the parties tendering were George Beaucage and John Gallagher. That with the knowledge of Thomas McGreevy the tenders of Larkin, Connolly & Co., of Beaucage, and Gallagher, were prepared by members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co.

"(3.) That while the tenders were being examined and quantities applied in the Department of Public Works, Thomas McGreevy obtained from the late John E. Boyd, an engineer in the Department of Public Works, information in relation to said tenders, which he communicated to Larkin, Connolly & Co., before the result of the application of quantities to the tenders was officially known.

"(4.) That to the knowledge of Thomas McGreevy, the tenders of Gallagher and Beaucage were lower than those of Larkin, Connolly & Co., but that Thomas McGreevy co-operated with O. E. Murphy and Robert McGreevy to secure the acceptance of the tender of Larkin, Connolly & Co.

"(5.) That in July, 1883, Thomas McGreevy received from the proceeds of certain notes for five thousand dollars each, made by the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and endorsed by Patrick Larkin and Owen E. Murphy and N. K. Connolly, respectively, the sum of $14,344.51."

The majority find those conclusions, and there they stop. I find no blame attached to any one. Substantially, although they do not say so, their findings result in this: there was a corrupt agreement, but no one was to blame. I charge on the hon. gentlemen who drew that report, that when they came to the crucial point, they failed in their courage, and had not the courage of their convictions. Who was to blame for this matter? The conclusion was inevitable. Some one robbed the public of, they say, $14,000; we say of $20,000. The amount does not matter much, as it is the principle we are talking of. Who did it? They do not say; we do say who did it. The minority report reads:

"That in consideration of offers of large sums of money by members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. the said Thomas McGreevy entered into agreement with the said Larkin, Connolly & Co., whereby, for the consideration of $25,000 to be paid to him, he agreed to secure the contract for the cross-wall for the said firm, notwithstanding they were not the lowest tenderers.

"We find also that the fact of Peters & Moore's tender being lower than that of Larkin, Connolly & Co. was well known to said Thomas McGreevy, and was communicated by him to the members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. before their tender was accepted, and that in pursuance of the corrupt arrangement made between said McGreevy and the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., he, McGreevy, so manipulated and arranged matters in the Department of Public Works that the tender of Larkin, Connolly & Co. was falsely made to appear lower than any of Peters & Moore, and was accepted.

"We find also that the said McGreevy was paid by Larkin, Connolly & Co. the sum of $25,000.

"We find that the loss to the public treasury arising from the acceptance of Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s tender, instead of that of Peters & Moore, amounted to, at least, the sum of $69,860.96, and that, in addition to this loss, there was improvidently paid to Larkin, Connolly & Co. a sum of $22,412 for placing certain material they dredged from the wet basin in the cross-wall."

I want to know if the figures and conclusions in this report have been challenged. I have not heard them challenged. They are admitted as true so far, and I will pass them by without adducing any further proof and corroboration until their truth is denied, and then my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) who prepared this report with me will be prepared to substantiate their accuracy. The report further says:

"We find there must have been a conspiracy between McGreevy and some one or more of the engineers of the Department of Public Works to procure the contract for Larkin, Connolly & Co., and we find it difficult to absolve the Minister from a knowledge of the existence of that conspiracy.

"We find the Minister to have been guilty of a breach of public trust in permitting the double payment to be made for the dredging material used in filling the cross-wall."

Let us see what proof we have further of these statements. It is admitted on all sides that these tenders were put in in the interest of Larkin, Connolly & Co., tenders under the name of Gallagher, Beaucage, and Larkin, Connolly & Co. It is admitted they were opened at Quebec and forwarded to Ottawa. On that point I wish to call attention to the statute I read in the early part of my argument, which provided expressly that all matters should be taken out of the hands of the Harbour Commissioners, and the preparation of plans, the calling for tenders and the letting of contracts should be vested in the Minister of Public Works. I want to call attention at the threshold of the argument to the fact that allowing the Harbour Commissioners at Quebec to call for these tenders, and allowing these tenders to go before the Harbour Commissioners previous to their coming before the Public Works Department, was a direct breach of the law, for which the Minister is directly responsible. But what harm was there in it? The only harm was, that it was successfully used to get information for Thomas McGreevy and those associated with him, as to which was the lowest tender. Peters swore, and Murphy and Robert McGreevy also swore, that they gathered sufficient information at the time the tenders were opened at Quebec, and before they came to Ottawa, to know the relative position they held. That, I charge, was one of the objects sought by the Minister, when, in violation of the law, he allowed the Quebec Harbour Commissioners to call for the tenders. What have we more? Immediately it was learned that Mr. Peters' tender was lower than that of Larkin, Connolly & Co. Thomas McGreevy wrote advising them—I need not read the letter, as it is known to everyone—to stick to the tender submitted in Beaucage's name, which was lower than that in the name of Larkin, Connolly & Co. Thomas McGreevy came to Ottawa, and he obtained information from the Public Works Department how these tenders stood, and just now it is important for the Committee to determine how the tenders then actually stood and how they were made to stand after the operation which one witness denominated as "manipulation," and which Murphy denominated "as figuring up and figuring down." I will not quote the evidence recited by my hon. friend and myself in the report, but I will quote the conclusion we came to. You will find from the report of the engineers appointed in this matter that taking the plans which were produced in evidence, and which I may remark, in passing, were sworn to by the engineer, Boswell, by Nicholas K. Connolly, by Mr. Perley himself, to be the only and identical plan on which the tenders were made; and taking the quantities from these plans and applying to the quantities which have been taken from these plans the tenders made by the respective parties, we find the engineers report as follows:—

"By a comparison based on quantities of crib-work, concrete, stone ballast, sheet-piling and earth-filling, taken by us from the said original plan and specifications, we find the following result in these items alone:—

S. Peters & Moore	$281,009 00
Larkin, Connolly & Co.	369,971 70
G. Beaucage	389,871 00
J. Gallagher	405,346 32

"And this comparison carried out by the addition thereto of the items in schedule of quantities used in above comparisons, and not obtainable from plans and specifications, we find the position of the tenders to be :

S. Peters & Moore	$ 736,243 50
Larkin, Connolly & Co.	753,371 70
J. Gallagher	762,378 32
G. Beaucage	765,510 50

Now, leaving the plans and going to the records of the Public Works Department, and taking therefrom Mr. Boyd's private memorandum in his own handwriting, we find, Sir, and I will read in the words of the engineers themselves :

"A further comparison based on quantities in cribwork, masonry, concrete, stone ballast, pile-driving to any depth, &c., sheet-piling, and timber in piles, all as taken from the late Mr. Boyd's 'estimate book,' and evidently made up prior to changed form of entrance, and before cribs were built, or any considerable amount of work had been done (say in the spring of 1884), shows the following :—

S. Peters & Moore	$586,436 63
Larkin, Connolly & Co.	620,733 10
G. Beaucage	629,635 25
J. Gallagher	658,930 46

So that, figure it out as you may from the plans, from the specifications, from the plans plus the specifications, from Mr. Boyd's private estimate book, from every possible mode of making the estimate up, the engineers prove conclusively that Peters & Moore's tender was by many thousands of dollars the lowest. Sir, what became of it? Peters & More were not the lowest when the extensions were made out, and why? Because false extensions and false quantities were made out ; because the original document produced to us, which, on the 15th May, was first submitted to the Minister and added up by Perley with the items figured out, had false quantities put on it for the purpose of making the tender which was the highest to be apparently the lowest. A gross, wicked fraud of the worst kind was perpetrated in that. The evidence is absolute, the evidence is conclusive, and the report of the engineers appointed by the Committee says that, twist and turn it as you may, apply the final quantities when the work was finished to the tender prices as put in by these several parties, even then Peters & Moore are the lowest tenderers by thousands and tens of thousands of dollars. Sir, what was done then? These tenders were brought into the Minister. I want to call your attention to the fact that Peters & Moore figured them up from the information they got in Quebec, and had written to the Public Works Department stating that they were the lowest tenderers. I refer now to the letter to Mr. Baillairgé, published in the evidence at page 147. On the 5th day of May Mr. Peters, being aware that he was the lowest tenderer, writes to the Deputy Minister of Public Works that he is the lowest tenderer, and on the 16th of May the Deputy Minister writes to him and states : He has received his letter, that he has communicated that letter to the chief engineer, and that the schedule tenders have been handed to the Minister himself. Now, Sir, we have three facts there. We have the fact that Peters & Moore were the lowest tenderers, that, being the lowest, Peters communicated that to the department officially, that that communication was handed by the Deputy Minister to Mr. Perley, and that the schedule showing him not to be the lowest was handed the day after to the Minister, so that he had the whole facts before him. What did he do? Mr. Perley tells him that there is an apparent error in the three tenders put in by Larkin, Connolly & Co., and, contrary to custom, he writes to these parties to know what they are going to do about the error; and, of course, Thomas McGreevy is at hand, and anticipating the letter that the department is going to write, he advises his friend :

"Be sure to get a good plan and as quick as possible, in answer to a letter that Gallagher and Beaucage will receive about their tender, to bring them over Larkin, Connolly & Co."

Why, Sir, you might draw an indictment of twenty pages, you might draw a brief for counsel, and you could not put in a stronger evidence of conspiracy than is contained in these two lines. Here is an outsider addressing himself to the three tenderers ; and he says to Connolly : "You will get a letter from the department calling your attention to certain errors ; in the meantime, try and get a good plan by which you will put the tenders of these two parties above that of Larkin, Connolly & Co., so that you will get the tender at the highest price you have put in." There was a corrupt bargain, the good plan was secured, and these men sent in an amended tender, Gallagher having previously withdrawn, and I think Beaucage wrote saying that he meant $19 per foot where he had put in 19 cents. The result of all that manipulation, the result of this error, this palpable error as Perley called it, the result of putting in false quantities, and of getting the "good plan" which the conspirators agreed upon, was that Larkin, Connolly & Co. were made the lowest tenderers, whereas in point of fact they were the fourth from the lowest. Sir, you tell me that the Minister did not know that. Mr. Perley himself says that he took those tenders into the Minister on the 17th, before the letters were written, and that he wrote those letters, if not by the direct order, yet with the full knowledge and at the instance of the Minister.

Mr. DICKEY. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I). I will read the words exactly. On page 156 Mr. Perley says :

"He (Mr. Boyd) discovered the errors in three of the tenders, marking those errors on the margin of the schedule sheet. I believe it it in evidence : he called my attention thereto, and as it was my duty to do so, I laid that schedule sheet before the Minister of Public Works and discussed with him the errors that had been detected, and that unless those errors were cleared up in some way it was impossible to make a comparison between the three tenders which were incomplete and the two tenders that were complete. At that discussion I have no doubt no direction was required, but as it is the course I have always pursued in cases of tenders, and as I have done in many instances since—I won't say by direction of the Minister, but with the knowledge of the Minister—I wrote the three letters to the parties."

Now, I will ask my hon. friend this question : If a chief engineer takes such a sheet as this was into the Minister and tells him there are errors there, and it is impossible to make a comparison, and if, although he had not the direction of the Minister in so many words, he wrote the letters as the result of that interview, and with the knowledge of the Minister, is it going too far to say that it was at the Minister's instance?

Mr. DICKEY. It is going too far to say that was his testimony when it was not his testimony.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have read his testimony word for word :

"These letters, with my copies, went in to the Minister, and I altered in red, on the schedule sheet, the Beaucage tender."

The hon. gentleman acknowledges therefore that the letters were written as a result of the interview that Perley had with the Minister, with the Minister's knowledge, and after the department had been informed by Peters that he was the lowest tenderer. And further, the facts were fully within the knowledge of the Minister when he authorized the writing of those three letters which we now know were written for the fraudulent purpose of devising some plan by which the lowest tenderer should be made higher than that of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and they should appear to be the lowest. And Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s tender was figured down, just as that man Murphy—who seems to be corroborated in nearly every statement he made—says, in the first part of his evidence, had been agreed, and Mr McGreevy had told him, he did not know exactly what the plan was, but in some way or other one was to be figured down and the other was to be figured up. That was the homely way of putting it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him this question, for information ? I understand him to say that this tender of Simon Peters & Moore was, by the introduction of false quantities, made to appear the highest tender, and that that was done by Mr. Boyd. That does not appear from the Schedule A, at pages 1320 and 1321, which the engineers have attached to their report.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said that Boyd's book was produced.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is in evidence that the extensions were made by Boyd.

Mr. McCARTHY. But I mean the figures. This extension appeared to be $643,000 for Simon Peters and $634,000 for Larkin, Connolly & Co.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is speaking of the totals. They were made by Perley. The original documents were produced, and Perley swore that these were in Mr. Boyd's writing, that the quantities were put in by Boyd, and the extensions made by him, and that he, Perley, merely added up the columns.

Mr. McCARTHY. What I wanted to know was whether the quantities here were put in the different tenders, or whether there has been an assumption of false quantites in order to make the quantities different.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They are figured out rightly in the private book of Boyd, which is in evidence.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not printed here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No; it is not printed. It contains a series of calculations which no one but an engineer could understand; but the engineers understood them and figured up from it. They took their plans, and said the quantities should be so-and-so from those plans, and they took Mr. Boyd's book, and it showed the same thing; but when we take the exhibit itself, we find that the figures are not what they should be. If they had been what they should have been, Peters & Moore's tender would be the lowest, whereas, because of the false quantities put in, they are made the highest on the crib-work, the earth-work, &c. There is no dispute about that; it is not denied by anybody; and the only vestige of argument offered by anybody was the feeble suggestion made by the engineers that it was incredible that these could be the plans at all. It is very well for the engineers to say: "We refuse to believe that these were the plans, because if they were a fraud was evidently committed." We, in this House, have nothing to do with the result; we have to do with the facts—and that these were the plans, St. George Boswell, the sub-engineer at Quebec, Mr. Perley, the chief engineer of the department, Nicholas K. Connolly and Mr. Verret all swear, and that there never were any other plans; these were the plans; and when you have contractor, chief engineer and secretary of the Harbour Commissioners all uniting on that one fact, and nobody denying it, I think we must accept it. Therefore, I say it stands here beyond contradiction, indisputable and undisputed, that there was a conspiracy to cheat the lowest tenderer out of his rights, that this conspiracy took the form of inserting false quantities in the extension sheet from which the relative positions of the tenderers was ascertained, and that was brought about at the instance of Mr. Thomas McGreevy, that Mr. Thomas McGreevy had conspired with some one in the department to do it, and had notified his confrères in Quebec in advance it was going to be done, and advised them to get a good plan to complete the corrupt bargain. That was done on the very same day, the 17th of May. The letters are there, and the letters from the department written to Gallagher, and Beaucage, and Larkin, Connolly & Co., on that very day. There is a concurrence of testimony so powerful and of such a character, being contemporaneous with the fraud itself, not based on the weak memory of man, that nobody can deny that a wicked conspiracy was devised and executed between the Public Works Department and Mr. McGreevy, and Larkin, Connolly & Co., whereby this fraud was carried out. As regards the payment of moneys, I do not think that is disputed. I am not going into that branch of the case, for I do not think this House is interested in determining whether Mr. Thomas McGreevy received $14,600 of the swag, as the majority report, or whether he received the $25,000. We believe he did. It does not matter whether one of the conspirators intercepted the other $10,000 or not. That is a matter of no public moment whatever. Murphy agreed to pay and McGreevy agreed to receive $25,000, and he got it; and although it is attempted to be said that a portion of it never was given to him, the vast preponderance of testimony is in favour of the contention that it was paid. I, at any rate, am not going to waste time on that point, and I just want to call the attention of the House to this fact, that we were very careful in our finding on this particular branch of the case, because, although there was very strong evidence to establish the direct interposition of the Minister, there was no written testimony catching him squarely, and therefore we merely reported that we found it difficult to absolve him from a knowledge of the facts. Our finding, therefore, is very moderate and reasonable. We find that owing to the circumstances it is difficult to absolve the Minister from a knowledge of the facts when this fraud was committed by his bosom friend and by the chief engineer and the other engineer, right under his nose. It is alleged by an hon. gentleman in this debate, and I think it is insinuated in the majority report, that it is consistent with the evidence that Mr. Boyd may have carried out this fraud and that the Minister was innocent. Sir, such a thing might be possible; but in common justice to the dead, it is fair I should here state that there is not a scintilla of evidence, from beginning to end, to show that Mr. Boyd received a dollar of bribery money. There is not a scintilla of evidence to show that Mr. Boyd had any personal or pecuniary interest in being a party to this fraud, and although we find that he must have been, from the fact that his figures in the extension sheet differ from his figures in his private books, a party to the fraud, we do not go further than to say that he may have obeyed the orders of his chief or sought to please his chief, and that is the only excuse we can find for his course in the matter. He may have done as he was told. There is no evidence to prove that he was bribed to do wrong. I will go further, in justice to a man whose name has been blasted in this enquiry, Mr. Perley, and say that outside of the paltry $1,800 worth of jewellery which he took, there is no evidence to show that he received any money. Where did the fruits of this wrong-doing go? Who profited by the moneys stolen from the public? Into what coffers and for what purposes did they go and were they paid? Sir, there is a consensus of opinion that outside of the $15,000 or $20,000 which Mr. Thomas McGreevy paid for himself on the judgment of Cameron and somebody against him, the balance went to Le Monde newspaper, of which Sir Hector Langevin was the controlling power and to the party of which he was the head, and to further the political purposes of the party in Quebec over which he presided. Sir, in looking at these points and deciding as judges whether such a man is responsible and wholly responsible, you must go below the surface and see where is the motive for doing wrong. There was every motive for the Minister. There was money, there was place, there was continuance in power, there was patronage and political life. For him everything was at stake and he got it and won; while for Boyd and for Perley there was nothing but degradation, if discovered, and the retention of their offices if they obeyed their chief and were undiscovered. And now, Sir, a few words upon the Esquimalt dock contract, and on this branch of the case I will only ask for a few words, because it was admirably exposed by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) and by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron). But I may be permitted, very shortly, to call the attention of the House to one or two matters which, perhaps, were not put in the same light as that in which they struck me. What were the charges in respect of the Esquimalt dock contract? The charges were substantially that Robert McGreevy had 20 per cent. interest in it, that Thomas McGreevy agreed to help Larkin, Connolly & Co. to get the contract in the first instance and to procure for them profitable changes and extras afterwards, and that he did help by getting secret information, and received in consideration of his services large sums of money, and that Thomas McGreevy corruptly endeavoured to procure Bennett's dismissal. Those were substantially the charges made. What are the findings? The majority find that he did receive money, but that the amount is unknown, from Larkin, Connolly & Co. in remuneration of his services. To that extent both findings agree—that Thomas McGreevy received a large amount, an unknown amount, for his corrupt services, from Larkin, Connolly & Co. Then the majority find that he did endeavour to procure Bennett's dismissal. The evidence is there, in black and white, over his own signature, on that point, and we need not waste time in discussing it. He did his best to secure Bennett's dismissal, and he succeeded. As far as the Minister is concerned, he was prepared to dismiss Bennett. If anybody doubts this, let him read Williams' evidence—the evidence of the man who was to be appointed by Sir Hector Langevin in Bennett's place at Mc Greevy's instance, and who was not appointed because he went himself personally to Sir Hector Langevin and gave him private reasons why he could not go. The majority again find that the sole responsibility for the rebate of $19,876 rests with Perley, the Minister having been ignorant of it. Upon that finding, we, the minority, take distinct issue; and I rise here to-night for the purpose of proving, as I believe I can, that the Minister, and not Mr. Perley, is directly and primarily responsible for that steal of $19,000, that he personally had made a secret agreement with Larkin, Connolly & Co. to return them that money, and that the evidence of it is right here under our hands. The majority further report that they disapprove of the allowance in respect of the plant and re-coursing, but they do not say, in respect of the re-coursing, who is responsible. The hon. member for Toronto was prepared to defend everything. He found no fault with the re-coursing although the majority did. They do not say whom they blame, but they blame some party or parties unknown. The hon. member for Toronto, however, was prepared to hold that there was nobody responsible at all and that there was no harm done. What did the minority find? We found that all Mr. Tarte's charges were proved except the one relating to members of Parliament; that Mr. Thomas McGreevy received moneys from Larkin, Connolly & Co. to get the contract and changes made, and for his influence with the Minister of Public Works; that other large sums were corruptly paid out by Larkin, Connolly & Co., but the recipients were hidden, that Sir Hector Langevin had secretly assented to changes in the contract before it was entered on, which were subsequently made, the rebate of $19,000 being amongst them, and that the $32,000 paid for re-coursing was improperly paid, and that the Minister was responsible. That the Minister improperly agreed to lengthen the dock and substitute granite, but was unsuccessful in carrying out the first change, and afterwards revoked the second at the contractors' own instance. Sir, I say deliberately that the history of that dock, from beginning to end, if all the other evidence relating to the Quebec harbour works and the Lévis dock were out, is sufficient to prove the conspiracy between Larkin, Connolly & Co. and McGreevy, and further to prove that the Minister was as deep in the mud as McGreevy was in the mire. What do we find? We find that when the call was made for tenders, Starrs & O'Hanly and Baskerville & Co. tendered. Larkin & Connolly at that time were not in the race. On the 8th May it will be found that Baskerville & Co. wrote a letter at Perley's suggestion agreeing to make a certain change in their tender, on which change Sir Hector agreed to give them the contract, if they would dispense with the use of concrete and brick backing, and substitute solid masonry. They wrote the letter, and Perley wrote that Sir Hector had agreed to give them the contract, and that they were to hold themselves in readiness to take the contract. The next day Perley makes a formal report in favour of their getting that contract, because the amount to which their tender had been reduced, $362,000, is, as he states, "a fair value of the work to be done to complete the dock." On the next morning Sir Hector Langevin goes to Quebec. When leaving Ottawa he had agreed to give the contract to Baskerville & Co., and his chief engineer had reported in favour of it. When he got to Quebec, Murphy met him, and, if Murphy is to be believed, he offered to give him 25 per cent. on a certain amount of money if they got the contract. Murphy swears, and Sir Hector does not deny, that Sir Hector said at first he did not see how he could do it, but, after talking the matter over, Sir Hector thought he had better readvertise and he came back to Ottawa, and in spite of the influence brought to bear on him by Baskerville's brother and in spite of the promise he had made to give Baskerville the contract before going to Quebec, he re-advertised. There is the first evidence that Sir Hector Langevin intended to do anything wrong to the public, and I say that Murphy's evidence as to that point stands uncontradicted as far as I can see, and all the surrounding circumstances and the results confirm the statement of Mr. Murphy. The Minister advertises and throws over Baskerville & Co. and just at that time, when Larkin, Connolly & Co. are appearing for the first time, their co-conspirator, Thomas McGreevy, writes to Perley asking for information. Perley sent him the information in a letter dated the 11th September, 1884:

"My Dear Mr. McGreevy,—Your private note of the 9th to hand, and in reply I send you herewith a copy of the specification of the graving dock, British Columbia, two copies of tender, and sheets showing the quantities of work to be done to complete the work, these quantities having been computed by the resident engineer in British Columbia."

Giving away information to these people which never ought to have been given outside of the department, and giving them information which no other party had. Murphy swears that they took this information, and that with this information obtained in this corrupt way, they figured out and sent in their tender. What were the results? There were two tenders—the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly at $338,945, and the tender of Larkin, Connolly & Co. at $374,559. Why did not Starrs & O'Hanly get the contract? The story was well told last night by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron), and I cannot improve upon it. Starrs was sent for, not by Perley or by any subordinate, but by Sir Hector himself, and he was frightened out of the contract. The Minister told him that there were to be no extras, that there was to be no rebate on the $50,000 to be charged for government plant, and in fact he could not make a dollar, and he was begged to give it up; and when he asked how he could get his cheque back, he was told to write a false letter, to tell a lie, to say he had made a mistake in his tender and he went to his partner, and said, as he was going out: "Sir Hector, I see you do not intend to give me the contract and therefore I will withdraw." Sir Hector's reply, and the evidence that he made, and it has been uncontradicted, was: "Thank God, you have got rid of a great burden." Starrs withdrew his tender, and the very day he withdrew it, Sir Hector reports to Council that Starrs had withdrawn, Council having previously agreed to give the contract to Starrs, and then Larkin, Connolly & Co. get it. There was to be no rebate of the $50,000. Do not tell me that Sir Hector knew nothing about that. How do we report that Sir Hector knew? We have conclusive evidence to my mind that Sir Hector made a corrupt bargin with Larkin, Connolly & Co., that they should have the rebate though the contract said they should not. You ask what is the evidence. The first is Nicholas K. Connolly's letter to Larkin, dated 29th October, and to be found at page 32 of our report:

"Dear Sir,—You will see by the enclosed message that we are offered the Esquimalt graving dock. I cared nothing about tendering for the dock and scarcely expected to get it, but now we are offered it, and under the circumstances, I think it would be best to accept it, with the proviso that the changes we suggest are made and have been partially agreed between parties. They say there will be no security (cash) required by us. Our friends propose to arrange this; moreover, there is no money paid for securing contract."

How did Nicholas Connolly know on the 29th October that the changes had been partially agreed to between the parties? Nicholas was astonished that no money had to be paid. It was the first grand contract he ever got without being obliged to bribe somebody to get it for him and without paying money in advance. Now, I only want to quote that letter to show one point, that so far as Nicholas Connolly was concerned, he was aware that there had been an agreement partially come to between the parties that the changes should be made. What is the second piece of evidence? On page 798 of the evidence, we find in Mr. Larkin's examination, that he states:

"The following morning I went to Sir Hector Langevin's office. I drew his attention to the amount of material that we were called on to take over and pay $50,000 for. I told him that one-half of that stuff was no use to us. In reading it over any man accustomed to contracts could see at a glance that the stuff represented there was good for nothing at all. There were derricks, and those sort of things which are never used with us. When I mentioned the matter to him Sir Hector sent for Mr. Perley and Mr. Perley came in. We had some sharp words over the thing. I wanted a clause added to the contract that we should only pay for what material we could use. Mr. Perley would not consent to putting any such clause in."

He further stated that the reason he signed the contract was that he relied on Sir Hector's assurance that he would have the matter looked into, and he expected that the reduction would be made, but that Sir Hector did not say so. Now, everybody might say: That is not very strong testimony because it only amounts to this, that Larkin said: "I must have a deduction made, it is outrageous to charge me for this," and Sir Hector Langevin replied: "We will look into it." But is that the only evidence? I hold in my hands a copy of a letter written by Robert McGreevy at that time, from Ottawa, in which he states that a memorandum of these proposed changes had been submitted to the Minister and that the Minister had agreed to make the reduction. Mr. Speaker, this is not the memorandum of Robert McGreevy in the year 1891; this is a letter written by Robert McGreevy in the year 1884, on the very day that the secret memorandum was handed to the Minister, containing the secret agreement whereby the Minister pledged himself to make that rebate to them. Just look at it. The hon. gentleman smiles. The statement was made in 1884. What earthly object had he in writing just then? He was writing to his partners. When you read the letter you will see that it bears evidence and contains statements which show it must be true. I will read it:

"My Dear Sir,—(Private). Memorandum of yesterday re British Columbia dock is with the Minister. He says that these conditions cannot be embodied in the contract as it will be the same one as submitted to O'Hanly & Starrs, and it would not do to make it different. But he says that all what is asked for is so fair that there will be no trouble in obtaining them, especially the $50,000 material one. However, you are to urge them just as if nothing had transpired. It is for you and your partners to say that you will sign without them being embodied in the contract. Politics changes, so does Ministers. I will be back Tuesday. My address will be St. Lawrence Hall."

Does any man doubt in the face of such contemporaneous evidence that the memorandum was handed to the Minister, that a secret agreement was come to that these changes would be made, that in order to deceive the public they were not to be put in the contract because they were to sign the same contract that Starrs & O'Hanly first had submitted to them; they were to go through the farce which Patrick Larkin went through in poor Perley's presence, of pressing all these changes and that the Minister was to refuse and to say that he would think them over, but that all the same they were to be granted in the long run. There, Sir, is evidence so strong that I say no reasonable man can doubt that all these changes which were subsequently made, were secretly and fraudulently agreed by the Minister to be made, and that memorandum was reduced to writing and handed to the Minister. We are asked to show the hand of the Minister subsequent to this. Why, Sir, I do not take the Minister to be a fool. He had made his agreement in writing, he had pledged his honour to these parties to make them a rebate, and he took mighty good care that his subordinates should carry out the contract. He even went so far as to refuse to Patrick Larkin to make any change. He says: Not a t shall be crossed, not an i dotted of that contract; you must sign the same contract that the others signed. But I can almost see the wink of his eye as he referred to the memorandum in his pocket that Larkin knew all about. He says to Larkin: You are to press for the changes the same as if this agreement was not made, and Larkin presses for them. I want to point out that when the matter is referred to Bennett, and when Bennett receives the claim from the contractors themselves, they only ask to have a rebate of $12,600 made them, whereas the Minister afterwards generously gives them $19,600, or $7,000 more than they asked. He is a good, kind, benevolent Minister, the kind of man with whom one would want to do business. Large sums of money are being dealt with. If $10,000, more or less, is wanted as a rebate in a contract by the contractor, the Minister gives it up. If $20,000 is wanted by the Minister for an election, it is handed over at once. If $10,000 is wanted at a pinch at Three Rivers it gets there through some unknown channel, nobody knows how. Mr. Lachance may deny that he got the money, but the money gets there all the same, and these contractors, so free with their money, are just the men to whom to make a generous and liberal allowance of $7,000 more than they asked for. Now, I ask these hon. gentlemen whether, with these three pieces of evidence, I have not proved direct personal knowledge on the part of the Minister of Public Works quoad that change and that rebate of $19,000. Now, we have the subsequent corrupt payment of $35,000 by the contractors. We find that these contractors, out of the moneys received by them for constructing the Esquimalt dock, paid $35,000 in bribery. Hon. gentlemen can turn to the report of the accountants and they will see the facts which we have transcribed in the report we have presented. Look at pages 32 and 33. Now, I want to ask the attention of the House so as to do justice to one man, to one conspirator. I am not going to justify or even palliate any portion of his conduct, but I noticed a disposition prevalent amongst many members who attended that Committee to throw the whole blame of the fraudulent expenditure upon Murphy. Sir, out of the $35,000 of bribery money paid out of the Esquimalt contract, Murphy handled only $2,000; the other $32,000 was handled and paid by the two leading conspirators, Nicholas and Michael Connolly. Fraud there was, bad enough; Murphy was as bad as the others, I acknowledge. But remember when you come to this contract you are not dealing with the evidence of a Murphy; you are not dealing with the payments made by Murphy, you are dealing with the written evidence of the cheques drawn by, and endorsed by, and the money drawn out of the bank by those two paragons of perfection, Nicholas and Michael Connolly, these twin brothers and angels of light, who shone so brightly during the investigation. Where did that money go? Two of those cheques for $5,000 each were drawn by Nicholas Connolly in his own handwriting, signed by himself, endorsed by himself, drawn out of the bank by himself. Murphy swears and Robert McGreevy swears that Connolly told them at the time he had sent it to Three Rivers to help Sir Hector's election. Martin P. Connolly, the clerk, swears he made an entry at the time from the conversation he overheard between Nicholas Murphy and McGreevy that $5,000 went to Three Rivers. Laforce Langevin swore that the Three Rivers election was on at the same time as he went to Connolly, and that he said he would like $5,000 or $10,000 for the election, as it was wanted. Further than that deponent saith not, for he says he did not get it and did not forward it. Nicholas drew the money. When asked: What did you do with that money, to whom did you pay it and for what purpose? Nicholas Connolly said: I do not remember. That will do very well as a story for the marines, but ordinary sailors will not believe it, and men of the world will not believe it. $10,000 were drawn in cheques of his own out of the bank, and Nicholas says he does not know the purpose for which they were paid. $5,000 of this amount of $35,000 was sworn by Robert McGreevy to have been paid by himself to Thomas McGreevy. $4,000 was paid by Nicholas Connolly to Thomas McGreevy. $10,000 was paid by Nicholas Connolly to Sir Hector Langevin's election at Three Rivers. Sir, we have the concurrent testimony of Robert McGreevy and Murphy and the written evidence and recollection of Martin P. Connolly, combined with the two cheques drawn and endorsed by Nicholas, showing the money was drawn out at that time by him—and these facts place beyond reasonable doubt that Three Rivers is the spot where the money went, and it was the consideration of the corrupt agreement for the re-coursing of the dock and of the rebate allowed for plant of $19,000. Where is the other money? $2,000 of it was paid by N. K. Connolly, who said: I do not remember to whom I paid it. $3,000 was transferred from the Quebec harbour improvements, and $3,000 was drawn by Michael Connolly and paid by him, and $2,000 constituted the money which bought the jewellery for Perley. I desire to read quotations from the evidence at pages 348-49 given by Nicholas Connolly. I have no hesitation in saying that he swore falsely deliberately. I did not believe one word he said with respect to the payments of these moneys. If there is such a thing as indicting for perjury, that man should be prosecuted, and that is a pretty strong statement to make. What did he say? He gave evidence as follows:—

Q. Mr. Connolly, one question. Mr. Geoffrion placed in your hands two batches of notes, containing one for $25,000 and another for an amount of $22,000. and you endorsed personally one of the notes in each batch; he showed you the books with these two sums of $25,000 and $22,000, showing they were charged to expense account, and he showed you two trial balance sheets, one for Quebec harbour improvements, and the other for graving dock—these two amounts are charged respectively to expense account in each of these sheets; and he showed you your signature signing you approved of these trial balances, and of the audit, and that you found it correct. Do I understand you to tell the Committee you have no knowledge whatever where that $40,000 went? A. I have no personal knowledge of where it went.

Q. I don't ask your personal knowledge. Do I understand you to swear to the Committee that in the two years from March, 1883, to May, 1885—two years and two months—$47,000 were paid out, and that you signed the trial balances acknowledging it was paid out correctly? You had signed one of the notes in each batch, and do I understand you to swear you don't know where that money went? A. I don't know where it went. Mr. Larkin signed the trial balances first and I signed afterwards.

Q. Or for what purpose it was paid? A. No.

Q. Did nobody ever tell you? A. No.

That is simply an incredible statement. No one believed it at the time he made it, and no one believes it now. But he went further. He was asked with respect to the specific sums, and he said, as will be found on page 458, as follows:—

Q. In the evidence given before the sub-Committee, it was stated by Mr. Martin P. Connolly, your book-keeper, that on 3rd January, 1887, there was a Union Bank cheque made out to your order for $5,000, to be charged to dock. Can you tell me the purpose for which that cheque was drawn? A. No, I cannot.

Q. On the 4th of February, 1887, there were two cheques. The first was on the Union Bank to your order, B.C. division, $5,000. The other was British North America Bank cheque to your order, B.C. division, $5,000. Can you tell me what those cheques were for? A. No, I cannot.

Q. On the 3rd of March there was a cheque to your order for $5,280. Can you tell me what that was for? A. I cannot.

Q. On the 3rd of August, 1887, there was also a cheque to N. K. C. for $1,000. The book-keeper remarked: "The blank is there, because I did not have any explanation for what the money was for." Can you give an explanation? A. I cannot.

Q. On the 8th of August there is a cheque to N. K. Connolly for $4,000. Can you give any explanation about that? A. I cannot. My private cheques may show something about that.

Q. I am asked by a member of the Committee to ask you if you could give any explanation of the letters "E.W." which appear in the evidence at page 344? A. I do not know.

The Committee will remember that these were the initials to designate Robert McGreevy; he was called the "east wind."—

Q. In Exhibit "L3" page 346, on the 8th of March, 1888. "N. K. Connolly for amount of his private cheque for donation re B. C. as agreed, $2,000." Mr. M. P. Connolly explained: "It was agreed by the members of the firm that Mr. Connolly should get $2,000, which I suppose he had expended.' Did you state that you paid out this money with a private cheque and afterward got it returned to you, and do you swear you do not know for what purpose any of it was paid? A. I never had any such agreement with the firm.

Q. Do not escape me with the word "agreement." Did you pay that money out of your private cheque, and do you swear you do not know what it was paid for? A. I do not.

I think any judge in the world having a blank mind brought before him like this man's would dismiss his evidence altogether as being unworthy of credence, and he would look to the other parts of the evidence to find out where the other money went. If he found that $10,000 was drawn just before the election at Three Rivers, if he found that Murphy and Robert McGreevy swore that Connolly told them at the time he had sent it to Three Rivers, if he found that the book-keeper, Martin P. Connolly, had made an entry "Three Rivers" in the books at the time opposite the sum charged, because he heard these words when Nicholas Connolly and Murphy were talking about it and understood from the conversation the money had gone there, if, I say, he had this combination of evidence, coupled with the cheques proving the fact that the money had been drawn from the bank, he would have found it established conclusively that the money was drawn by Connolly, and paid at Three Rivers for Sir Hector Langevin. There are only two things to infer. That it was drawn by Connolly was admitted; and it was either stolen by him, or paid at Three Rivers. It was said at the time that it was to be paid at Three Rivers, and Sir Hector's son went and asked for money for the Three Rivers election, but he said he did not send it. The entry in the book made by Martin P. Connolly said it was sent to Three Rivers, and if all this evidence is to go for nothing, why we would stultify ourselves. Now, Sir, the changes in this contract are substituting one circular head for the double entrance which cost $17,025 and changing granite for sandstone. Although that latter change was not carried out, there is evidence which conclusively establishes the conspiracy which existed, and that Sir Hector Langevin was a party to it. The parties wanted granite substituted for sandstone, and they said that if that was done and the dock lengthened, they could give $50,000 for charitable purposes. McGreevy came to Ottawa, Perley reported in favour of it, the Minister went to Council and recommended it, and it was on the eve of being carried out, and the country would have been mulcted in $100,000 more, when suddenly there appeared upon the scene a messenger from Larkin, Connolly & Co. in hot haste, requesting that the change be not made: We want no change, see the Minister and have sandstone substituted again." Robert McGreevy rushes to Ottawa and the change which was agreed to by the Minister, substituting granite for sandstone was not made. In the words of the witness: they had a "close shave, they just caught the Council as it was ratifying the change from sandstone to granite," and at the instance of these parties it was brought back again. There was no change in their interest or for their benefit that they had not the power to induce the Minister to make, and if this change had been carried out this country would have been mulcted in $100,000 more than it was. It was not carried out so far as the granite was concerned, because the members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. discovered after the change had been agreed on, a quarry which would enable them to provide sandstone at a cheaper and more paying price, and then you had the lamentations of Jeremiah copied in the letters which Murphy wrote out to them and in which he stated: "What a false position you put your friends in before the Council; after they had agreed to changes and done everything, we had to rush up in hot haste and they had to make fools of themselves before the Council, by recalling the very changes we suggested." Was there ever such humiliation? The evidence is conclusive, and any one who wants to read it will find it in that report. There was another question about the lengthening of the dock and the Minister of Public Works was willing to do that. It was recommended by Sir Hector Langevin to Council, and it was only stopped because the Imperial Government said that the dock was long enough for all the ships in Her Majesty's navy, and they would contribute nothing more to it. Therefore, that change which would have involved this country in an enormous expenditure and which the Minister in his reckless prodigality was willing to make, provided the Imperial Government would contribute to it, was not carried out, and we have to thank the Imperial Government for it and no one else. Hon. gentlemen will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that there was a charge of personal corruption against Sir Hector Langevin, to the effect that he was paid $10,000 in cash by Murphy, and I have been troubled more in conscience over the finding I have made in that matter than over anything else. My hon. friend and I after a great deal of doubt, after weighing the evidence carefully pro and con, came to the conclusion that we ought to give the Minister the benefit of the doubt, and find a Scotch verdict of "not proven." We could not find "not guilty;" the evidence was too strong, but we were willing that a verdict of not proven should be rendered, and I doubt very much whether we are altogether wholly justified. Sir, the evidence upon that matter is very very strong. We find, in the first place, that Murphy swears explicitly that he did pay Sir Hector Langevin or give to him two sums of $5,000 in his own house. Murphy explicitly swears that he was not asked for it, he says no conversation took place further than three words: "a little present." Murphy says he did not make it as a payment, he simply left it there. Sir Hector Langevin goes to great pains in denying that he ever asked them for money; he goes to great pains in denying what Murphy never said, but when he comes to the point he says:

"I add that Mr. Murphy did not speak to me about money, gift or loan."

Murphy never says he did.—

"That he did not ever lend or pay me any sum of money."

My hon. friend and I, after a long deliberation, came to the conclusion that Sir Hector Langevin must have intended to deny that he received the money. He does not say he did not, but we think that is what he must have intended, and we gave him the benefit of the doubt, inasmuch as nobody else was present, and Murphy's evidence alone went against Sir Hector Langevin's. But there are these facts to be considered: The money was drawn out of the bank by Murphy, but it was not drawn out of the bank by Murphy on his own cheque or his own responsibility. It was drawn out of the bank by Murphy in conjunction with Nicholas K. Connolly, and Nicholas K. Connolly's own name is written on the cheques which drew the money out. The money was drawn out, and Murphy said: "I do not remember the day, the month, or the year, or the season of the year when I paid it, but if the cheques are turned up they will show the day and the season of the year, and I stand by the cheques." The counsel urged on him that there was no entry in the book, and Murphy urged strongly that there were entries in the book, and he would stand by them; and afterwards it transpired and is reported to us that the entries were there. The cheques were produced drawn by Murphy and endorsed "Nicholas K. Connolly," and entered in the books at the time. Murphy says he left the money on the desk for Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Hector says he did not. We cannot find a verdict of guilty on this, we cannot find not guilty, we simply report that we do not feel ourselves justified, owing to the contradiction in the evidence, in reporting that the charge was true. It remains so far not disproved, it remains not proved and we return the Scotch verdict of "not proven." Sir, I have spoken much longer than I intended to, but I have felt that being responsible in conjunction with my hon. friend, Mr. Mills (Bothwell), for this minority report, responsible for the important statements and findings it makes, responsible for a verdict which impeaches the second Minister of the Crown of high crimes and misdemeanours which will drag him down from his high place, disgrace his character and relegate him to the cool shades of private life for the rest of his natural existence; I felt it was due to myself, due to my friends, due to the House, due to my colleague, that so far as in me lay I should submit to the country, and to the House, the evidence on which I came to that conclusion. Sir, I never came to a conclusion more reluctantly than this one. I hope I will be credited with having some kindly feelings and instincts in my heart, and that my word will be accepted by all when I say that it was with feelings of regret and pain I was forced to bring in such a verdict against a man with whom I have sat for ten years in this House. We have nothing to fear from him. He was a doomed man politically whichever way we found; his race had been nearly run, and he could not be much of an obstacle to the Opposition any more. Sir, having sat ten years in the House with that gentleman my desire would naturally run in the direction of excusing him if I could excuse him consistently with the discharge of my stern duty. But I had a duty to discharge in conjunction with my hon. friend—almost a sworn duty; a duty as strong and as binding as if it had been a sworn duty; and from that duty I could not deviate, I could not swerve, even to save an hon. gentleman with whom I have been sitting in this House for the last ten years. Sir, I regret the findings very much, but they only go to show the corruption, the deep political degradation to which this country of Canada has been reduced. Sir, no man takes up the leading newspapers published in the great centres of the world, whether in the United States or in the mother country, without feeling his cheeks tingle with the blush of shame as he reads his native country spoken of as a bye-word and a reproach among the nations; and if, with the evidence before us, convincing, damning evidence, we fail to find a proper verdict awarding punishment to wrong-doers irrespective of their station, if instead of condemning we condone, instead of punishing we palliate, we will rightly share in the common disgrace, and our names shall be held in deserved reproach among the people. I move that all after the word "that" be struck out, and the following substituted :—

That the report of the sub-committee, as submitted to the Committee by the Hon. Mr. Mills and the Hon. Mr. Davies, be adopted by the House.

Mr. DICKEY. In rising to discuss this case—I hope not at quite so great length as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies, P. E. I.) who has just sat down—though I do not blame him, in view of his intimate connection with the minority report, for taking up the time he did—I wish to premise that I do not intend to go at any length into the evidence on which the conclusions reached are based. I also wish to say that I speak only for myself. In a matter of such magnitude, with the evidence spread over some 1,500 pages, and involving a large number of distinct issues, it is impossible that a large number of persons can come to a conclusion which will, in all its details and in all its arguments, commend itself to the individual judgment of each person concerned in the decision; and, therefore, I do not consider myself bound by every argument and every word that is to be found in the majority report, although I propose to support it as a whole. Nor do I propose to be bound by the line of argument which any hon. gentleman on this side of the House may adopt in support of that report. My views are my own, and I do not wish anybody else to be bound by them. I am always glad to hear the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). He always speaks pleasantly, and it is always a great pleasure to hear him. I have seen him here, as Shakespeare says of man, playing many parts; I have heard him address the House in a great many characters; but I have had the pleasure to-night of hearing him in a new character, the character of an impartial judge; and I must say that the hon. gentleman in that character, coming to decide this question entirely upon the evidence, without political or other prejudice and addressing to the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) such remarks as he did during the first part of his speech, gives very little encouragement to his political friends to put him on the bench of his native province, where some of these days I hope he may be. I do not know how the hon. gentleman, on the bench of Prince Edward Island, would be regarded by his brother judges if he accused them, in consulting with them over a case, of ignorance, of malign motives, of making silly statements, of showing great temerity, of quoting superficially, of making statements that were silly and unfounded, of being absolutely stupid, and of making a speech that was full of blunders. I do not know how the hon. gentleman's brother judges would appreciate compliments like these coming from him in deciding an important case. The hon. gentleman, towards the close of his speech, said a great deal about the supreme importance of this case to at least one individual, and in fact he thinks to the whole country. And yet the hon. gentleman during the first part of his speech approached the decision of this momentous and important matter in the spirit which is indicated by those epithets which he thought proper to throw at the hon. member for East Toronto. Now, I am sorry that the hon. gentleman has left the House. He says that the majority report lacks in conviction. Well, I do not think that any hon. gentleman in this House who listened to the hon. member for Queen's just now will say that in this case he lacks any conviction. I think he is ready to convict on every possible charge and on every possible ground. I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman through the whole of his remarks; but I wish, in justice to my hon. friend from Toronto, to point out one or two instances in which he was right and my hon. friend from Queen's was wrong in those ex cathedra and self-sufficient statements that the hon. member made as to the state of the law upon this subject. The hon. member for Queens said that the hon. member for East Toronto ought to know that these expenditures were all by statute under the direction of the Minister of Public Works, and he stated that in the statute of 1873 the Government took power to appoint a majority of the Harbour Commissioners. I beg to say that the statute of 1873 prescribes nothing whatever of that sort.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). 1875.

Mr. DICKEY. Exactly; and therefore the hon. member for Queen's misquoted the statute, or else, as he charged against the hon member for East Toronto, he was speaking in ignorance or he had some malign intention of deceiving the House. It may be only a coincidence that the Conservative party was in power in 1873, and he wished to throw the responsibility of that Act upon them, whereas his party were in power in 1875, when the Act was passed. That may be only a coincidence. I can forgive any hon. gentleman in this House for making a misstatement because we cannot be infallible; but when an hon. gentleman gets up and talks about ignorance, and stupidity, and imputes motives to another hon. gentleman, it behooves him in the matter concerning which he professes to correct his opponent to show at least moderate accuracy in his own statements. As a matter of fact, the expenditures in connection with the Quebec harbour works were not required to be under the supervision of the Minister of Public Works, except with regard to the graving dock, only under the statutes of 1875 and 1887; and before the statute of 1887, all the expenditures which are here in controversy had been made and completed. Therefore, with regard to the dredging and cross-wall contract, over which the hon. member for Queen's has been so eloquent, there is not one word in the statute requiring the Minister of Public Works to report as to the progress of the work. Yet the hon. member for Queen's attacked my hon. friend from Toronto for having stated that, in his judgment, the law did not affect that result as to the whole of these works. So that, in his statement of the law, I submit the hon. member for Queen's is not altogether justified in taking the high and lofty tone he did towards my hon. friend from.

Toronto. I will follow him just a little further, and will speak of the dredging contract of 1882. I do not propose to discuss the details of the contracts made by the Quebec Harbour Commissioners. I take the ground that, with regard to this dredging contract of 1882, the Minister of Public Works had no legal duty thrown upon him, as that contract was made by the Harbour Commissioners themselves, on their own responsibility, and they alone must answer for it. I, therefore, transfer to the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec those strong and eloquent adjectives which the hon. gentleman from Queen's County used in characterizing this transaction when referring to the Askwith tender: and I say that whatever odium may be attached to getting rid of the Askwith tender, must be taken by the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec, aside from that part which Larkin, Connolly & Co. and McGreevy took in it, which is not now in issue. The hon. gentleman says there was $22,000 stolen, because the stuff dredged was put in the cross-wall and paid for. That is not in dispute here; but the hon. gentleman knows that that was done by the Harbour Commissioners themselves, and they are responsible. Now, the hon. gentleman talked also a good deal about his impartiality in making quotations, and he said he would prove out of the mouth of Mr. Dobell that Sir Hector Langevin forced the dredging contract on the commissioners.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, if he objects, but I would like to call his attention to the Act 47 Victoria, chapter 47, which relates to the cross-wall, and which provides that public tenders for the said work shall be called for, and the contract awarded by the Governor in Council, so that the contract to pay 45 cents per cubic yard for putting the dredged material into the cross-wall was a contract let by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. DICKEY. I am quite aware of that, but the hon. gentleman will see that it does not touch the point I am stating. Now, with regard to Mr. Dobell, the hon. member for Queen's said he would prove that Mr. Dobell said Sir Hector had forced this dredging contract upon the Harbour Commissioners, and he read to the House the statement in the minority report. I say most positively that, so far from making such a statement, Mr. Dobell distinctly negatived it, and it is extraordinary that in a report purporting to repeat the evidence upon this point, and the minority report need not have given the evidence, but have simply given the conclusion—only that part was given which, if not read in connection with what followed, might bear out the conclusion at which the minority arrives. The hon. gentleman who prepared this minority report did not quote the whole of the evidence, but only a small portion which suited him, in order that the balance might not go to the country in that connection, and thus lead members of this House, who are not familiar with all the evidence, to come to a conclusion not warranted by it. This is what the hon. member for Queen's quoted as establishing his proposition that Sir Hector Langevin forced the contract on the Harbour Commisioners. Mr. Dobell said:

"I may state that I had no suspicion of anything wrong except when the dredging contract was given, and then I protested. I did not like that dredging contract. It was forced upon us in a way I did not like."

The hon. gentleman, knowing all the evidence, as I assume he does, was content to give that piece out of the whole, and to base an argument upon that one statement, when he knew that a few pages further on Mr. Dobell explained that he did not mean that the contract was forced upon them, but that he meant that, in carrying out the contract after the $100,000 was spent, the contractors acted in spite of the Harbour Commissioners. On page 775, under cross-examination by Mr. Tarte, he gave the following evidence:—

Q. You told us that the dredging work of 1887 was forced upon you?—A. Not the contract, but that the dredging was exceeded and forced upon us continually, over and above the $100,000.—I don't know how much was expended—instead of confining it to that figure.

Q. By whom was it forced upon you? You are not ready to accuse the Department of Public Works?—A. No: I accuse the Government members on the commission.

The point I make here is, that the hon. member for Queen's stated to the House that Mr. Dobell complained that the contract was forced upon the commission, and he quoted a part of his evidence to induce this House to vote a censure upon Sir Hector Langevin, and to send him, as he expressed it, at the close of his address, to private life in disgrace. He sought to induce this House to do that without quoting the evidence further on, where Mr. Dobell, under oath, in the same examination, explained that he did not mean anything of the kind. Now the hon. gentleman also made use of Mr. Dobell's evidence to prove that Sir Hector Langevin was very careful: and I do not know of anything this House could have which could be more significant of the spirit in which the hon. gentleman approached this question, which is more significant even than these elegant epithets he addressed to my hon. friend from Toronto, than the use he made of the evidence of Mr. Dobell, in order to fasten a criminal knowledge of these transactions upon Sir Hector Langevin. To do this, the hon. member for Queen's quoted Mr. Dobell's opinion that Sir Hector was a very careful administrator and knew all the details. Now, even a Crown counsel before a jury, prosecuting in the public interest, would not demean himself by taking a piece of evidence relating to a criminal and trying to force a verdict on that portion, without giving the whole evidence relating to the point in question. I think the hon. member for Queen's would have done himself more credit if he had read the further evidence of Mr. Dobell. Mr. Dobell said:

"My experience of Sir Hector has been that no one could blow hot and cold with him. He has always appeared to me to be better up in the details of his department than any man I know."

Now, if the hon. gentleman had wished to act in a judicial spirit, I think he would have favoured the Committee with the question which led to that answer, and the whole answer. Mr. Langelier asked:

"Was it not considered by the Harbour Commissioners, as well as by the general public of Quebec, that Mr. McGreevy's influence with Sir Hector Langevin was paramount—that he could blow hot and cold, and do what he liked with the department?"

The answer is:

"I do not think so. My experience of Sir Hector has been that no one could blow hot and cold with him. He has always appeared to me to be better up in the details of his department than any man I know. He was always at us in regard to the tremendous cost of the works at Quebec, whether they were going to be useful, &c. His anxiety was always, I believe, very great to keep the cost down."

That is a statement made by Mr. Dobell in the same deposition, and one or two pages away from the statement the hon. gentleman quoted, and I thought it might fairly be laid before the House. If he was going to attempt to fasten a criminal liability on Sir Hector Langevin, as to his capacity, by Mr. Dobell's opinion, he might have given Mr. Dobell's opinion on the subject, of which he could give a better opinion at the time than any body, and that is, in regard to Sir Hector's actions then, his endeavour to keep down the cost of the work and his anxiety that it should be useful. The hon. gentleman, rising to a high plane, says that, as a judge, looking at this garbled testimony, this testimony which he has picked out from Mr. Dobell and others, and has tacked together, he approaches the subject as a judge, and in that capacity is bound to find that Sir Hector is guilty. I do not know anything more calculated to edify the public, more calculated to elevate Canada and to remove the stigma which has been attached to Canada, than the picture of the hon. gentleman as a judge arraigning the Minister of Public Works on evidence he picked out in the manner I have described. I will follow the hon. gentleman further, by speaking very shortly of the Lévis graving dock. On that subject the hon. gentleman has elaborated in his report and in his speech to the House the tremendous difference between the cost of this work and the original estimate, and in order to fasten a criminal liability on the Minister of Public Works he has read the contract and said: "There is your bond." But my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) says that in 1880, whether rightly or wrongly, on the report of an engineer, that contract was set aside and the work was done by days' work. We are not trying Sir Hector Langevin for the administration of his department in 1880, and my hon. friend from Toronto proved that on the report of an engineer the original contract was found impracticable, and was set aside, and the Harbour Commissioners went on by days' work. It is clear that that was the work of the commission. It is proved by Mr. Dobell, and, I think, every other commissioner who was examined. But the hon. gentleman says the supplementary contract was a steal, and nothing but a steal; and how does he prove it? Because there was no consideration for it. Why, no consideration is one of the pleas that we attorneys sometimes put into a suit on a promissory note, when we have no other defence, and I can only suppose that the hon. gentleman is taking some such technical view as that. The consideration was the work that was done, and whatever was over and above that, and was stolen by the Murphys, the Connollys and Mr. McGreevy, is another thing. Up to the amount of the work done there was plenty of consideration for the contract. I call the attention of the House to this, that the papers on which the charge in regard to the graving dock is based were put in on the very last day that the Committee met. They were put in by Mr. Edgar in a very quiet way, and I do not say anything in regard to him; but I know that he looked over the papers, fished out some more information than the Committee had seen, and it is upon these papers unexplained that the hon. gentleman is asking for a verdict of the House. With regard to the rest of the evidence, it is quite different. As to the Lévis graving dock, we have not material enough to convict any one—the full evidence to justify us in convicting any man accused of the high crime and misdemeanour which is charged here. Would any hon. gentleman like to have a man convicted on testimony put in in the manner in which a great mass of this testimony was put in, without being submitted to the Committee, without being read, or without any opportunity for real investigation? With regard to the contract itself, it is perfectly clear that we have the information, because all the profits which it is claimed were made out of this transaction, amounting to $125,000, and the amount they received was $726,900, so that work cost them $601,000 according to their books. The hon. gentleman wants us to believe that that is the same work that they tendered for for the sum of $330,000. The thing is absurd on the face of it. It shows there were alterations, modifications and changes in the contract as the work went along, because in the face of that report Larkin, Connolly & Co. have performed $601,000 of hard work, and, therefore, that amount of work was done. The hon. gentleman says, no. But I am not discussing now whether it was right to allow the contract. That is not a criminal charge. The change was made from the original contract. We do not know why it was made, but it is quite clear that we have no evidence to enable us to come to an intelligent conclusion in regard to it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The change was shortening the dock 55 feet.

Mr. DICKEY. I will ask the hon. gentleman, when he addresses the House, to give us a full history of the changes made in the Lévis graving dock, and to give us the information in detail which will be sufficient to convict the Minister of Public Works on that point. Now, with regard to the cross-wall, there is no doubt that the department had the letting of that work. According to my reading of the statute, the department had both the advertising and the letting of the work. Now, I ask the House to consider the view taken by the hon. member for Queen's with regard to this work. The Minister, instead of advertising himself, as he should have done, or as he might have done under the statute, instead of advertising for tenders for the cross-wall, through some error sent that matter down to the Harbour Commissioners at Quebec, and the advertisements were made there, and the tenders were sent up here to be investigated. Now, what conclusion did the hon. member for Queen's draw from that? That hon. gentleman has got his mind into such an inflamed condition that the sending of the advertisements down to the Quebec commission at once struck him as an indication of some tremendously deep scheme. It would naturally strike one that if Sir Hector Langevin wanted to manipulate these tenders, if he wanted to commit some fraud to benefit Larkin, Connolly & Co., he would have advertised himself, he would have kept the whole matter under his own control. Instead of that, he sends the advertisements down to the Harbour Commission, and the member for Queen's thinks that the Minister did that in order that Thomas McGreevy might get information before the Harbour Commission. The hon. gentleman contends that Thomas McGreevy had such complete control of the Public Works that he could get any information he liked with regard to those tenders, and yet the hon. gentleman contends that the Minister sent these tenders down to Quebec to be advertised, in order that Mr. McGreevy might get information down there. I do not know in what respect information down there would be better than information here, if Mr. McGreevy could get it in both places. The fact of the matter is, that it was a mere accidental omission in the department, and it is just like a good many other points in this case which the hon. gentleman has contemplated so long that he has got into such a state that everything he sees which is a little out of the usual course becomes a matter of grave suspicion to his mind. With regard to the cross-wall tender, there is no evidence whatever to show that the Minister had any connection with the manipulation of the tenders. I was rather surprised, in considering the estimates made by Mr. Boyd as compared with the estimates made by the engineers who reported on this matter, that the hon. member for Queen's did not draw the attention of the House to the difference in the figures between these two tenders, an apparently irreconcilable difference. It seems to me that the difference has a very serious bearing on the question whether the engineers have found the right plans. The figures given by Boyd, with regard to the Larkin, Connolly & Co. tender for the cross-wall, were $637,000, and for the tender of Peters & Moore, $643,000. The figures that the engineers arrived at are $736,000 and $743,000. Therefore, it is doubtful if the engineers got the original plan right in their report which is reproduced in the report of the majority. It is quite clear that there is some enormous element of error which has not yet been discovered, as in comparing the quantities made by Boyd and those made by the expert engineers, to whom this matter was referred, it is a matter of indifference to Boyd what the gross amount was. Boyd had no interest in making Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s tender $637,000 as against $737,000. His interest was only as to the relative position of these tenders. But the House is fully seized of the engineers' report, which is copied in the report of the majority of the Committee. With all deference to the member for Queen's, I think that the engineers, whose statements he accepted on every other point, have given very good reasons for us to hesitate before we accept their figures as being final, so as to convict Boyd of fraud in manipulating the tenders. Now, a good deal has been said in regard to letters written by Perley to Beaucage, Gallagher, and Larkin & Co. Mr. Perley states that he did that in the ordinary course; that it was in the ordinary course of business, when an error such as that was found, to call the attention of the contractor to it. He assumes that the errors had been pointed out to the Minister, and that it was done with the Minister's knowledge, not by his direction. Every step in regard to that cross-wall matter is taken by the Minister on the report of his expert officer beneath him. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how the Minister of Public Works was to know which tender was the higher and which was the lower? They came into the department without any quantities applied. They were sent to his engineers to apply the quantities. But how was the Minister of Public Works to know which was the higher and which was the lower tender, unless he depended upon the report of his engineer? It has been suggested here that the Minister of Public Works went to Mr. Boyd and instructed him to make fraudulent quantities. Now, I do not know how that strikes the mind of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I must say that it seems to me a monstrous proposition that any Minister, with the responsibility of his office upon him, with the ordinary feeling of self-preservation belonging to every man having regard to his own character and his own dignity, should instruct an officer like Mr. Boyd to commit a fraud upon the public treasury. It seems to me you can imagine almost any sort of fraud that a man might commit to advance his own aims, always allowing reasonable regard for his own safety and for his own reputation. A man in ordinary life with ordinary reputation for respectability, if he is going to steal, surely will take some precaution with respect to the way he goes about it, and not adopt such a method as will proclaim his guilt and damn his reputation from the house-tops. It is preposterous to believe the statement that Sir Hector Langevin would have gone to Mr. Boyd, his inferior officer, and told him to fraudulently manipulate those tenders in the interest of Larkin, Connolly & Co. One thing is quite clear and that is, that Boyd gave Thomas McGreevy figures with respect to the tenders, and it was quite clear that the explanation given on behalf of Boyd will not justify his action. The excuse put forward is that he, being in the employ of the Harbour Commission, had a right to give the information to Thomas McGreevy, who was a member of that commission. But, unfortunately, Boyd was not appointed an officer of the commission until some months afterwards. The whole transaction is open to this conclusion that he was put on the Harbour Commission because he had done this, rather than that he did this because he was on the Harbour Commission. I wish to draw the attention of the House in regard to the cross-wall contract to a letter dated 25th May, printed on page 20, for I consider the expressions used are very significant. It reads:

"I believe no report will be made on any of them for this session or for the estimates only after the close. The tenders for cross-wall only arrived here yesterday and are locked up until Monday, when he will commence his calculation."

There is no person mentioned in that letter to show who Thomas McGreevy meant by "he;" and for myself it is very difficult to resist the inference that there was an understanding or a common knowledge between Thomas and Robert as to who was to extend those tenders or calculate those tenders, because Thomas McGreevy on arriving home wrote immediately to his brother that "he" will commence his calculation to-morrow—not Boyd or the engineer, but as if there was some understanding between them, "he" will commence the calculation to-morrow. Although the majority report does not say whether there was fraud in the manipulation of the tenders or not, whatever manipulating there was must certainly have been done by Boyd who made out the schedules and applied the quantities, and there is no evidence and no attempt on the part of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to connect the Minister of Public Works with it, except the statement that it having been done in his department he must be regarded as having known it. I will now refer shortly to the Esquimalt graving dock, which was directly under the charge of the Minister of Public Works; and I desire to preface my remarks by stating that in carrying out a public work such as that, it seems to be almost impossible in the present state of engineering to have plans and specifications prepared in such a shape that there will not be extras. We know that even in building houses for ourselves it is almost impossible, even by employing the most expert architects, to finish the work without something turning up during construction that results in extras being charged. Hon. gentlemen opposite, therefore, are to some extent open to this charge, that they are using a feature that is common to all large contracts as if it were a feature particular to these contracts, and they are making a great deal out of it. There are extras in connection with this Esquimalt dock, and there are extras with regard to all these works. Some of these are excessive and were improperly obtained no doubt, but I wish to emphasize the fact that the mere fact of finding extras does not show anything wrong or irregular, and extras are certainly nothing uncommon in carrying out large works. The first irregularity refered to by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) with respect to the Esquimalt dock was the Baskerville and Starrs' tenders on the first advertising. The hon. gentleman complained that Baskerville being ready on 8th May to perform this work, Perley having told him the Minister would give him the contract, there was some indication of fraud in the circumstance that he did not get it. The facts on record are these; these tenders came in. That of Starrs was too low, while Baskerville's tender was too high, and on 19th April Council passed an Order in Council rejecting both of those tenders on that ground. From that moment the power of the Minister of Public Works to deal with the tenders or make any other arrangement with respect to those tenders ceased. The matter was taken out of his hands by Council, which rejected the offer made by Baskerville, and then the Minister of Public Works had no authority. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) would have had much more of which to complain if after that action Baskerville had been given the contract. It is said by the member from Queen's that this arrangement with Baskerville should have been carried out, that no new tenders should have been asked, and the work should not have been put up again. I do not think Sir Hector Langevin can be blamed for taking the course he did by readvertising and throwing the work open to public competition again. It gave Mr. Baskerville and Mr. Starrs an opportunity to again tender with the knowledge they had gained on their first tender, and there was an equal chance for all concerned, so far as the readvertising was concerned. Therefore, so far as that particular charge was concerned, that Mr. Baskerville should have been given the contract, there is nothing in it outside of the routine of the department, in fact it was following the routine of the department and might be expected to be the course to be adopted in a properly conducted department. With respect to Baskerville's evidence, I may say that he is entirely mistaken as to his dates. Sir Hector Langevin was in Ottawa on 26th May. On the 26th May, or thereabouts, Sir Hector Langevin instructed his clerk to write to Mr. Baskerville's brother that the contract would go up for tender again, but Mr. Baskerville says that it was not for three or four months afterwards that he heard he was not going to get the contract. It is quite clear that Mr. Baskerville is mistaken as to the length of time that elapsed before he heard this, because the matter was talked of in the newspapers and it was made the subject of remonstrance by an Order in Council of the British Columbia Government within a month after that. In connection with this I may refer to the fact that Murphy swears he offered Sir Hector Langevin 25 per cent. if they would get the contract, and Sir Hector referred him to Mr. McGreevy. I was very sorry that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), without taking the responsibility of stating that he believed that statement, steered the middle course of refusing the responsibility of adopting the statement, and yet withholding the generosity of disbelief. I think the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) might have taken the one course or the other. He might have said in regard to the statement of Murphy: "I believe it," and if he had said that the only way it could have been met was by an attack on Murphy credibility: or he might have said: I disbelieve it on the whole of evidence; but the hon. menber does neither. On this and on every other point in which Murphy is contracticted by any credible or respectable witness whatever, I distinctly say that I attach no reliance or credit whatever to any statement Murphy may make on oath or otherwise. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) did try to rehabilitate Murphy's character a little. He put a little dash of paint here and a little dash there and fixed it up a little as he went along. I dare say that if he went back over it he would find that he had got Mr. Murphy dressed up into a pretty respectable member of society, if he picked out all the compliments he paid him as he went along. Perhaps it was not that he loved Murphy so much as that he hated the others more, but whatever the reason was, I think the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) must be troubled with a little weakness for Murphy. Murphy's statement that he offered a Minister of the Crown 25 per cent. interest in a contract betrayed such an utter want of all sense of morality on the part of a man who would make the offer that, on that ground alone, I would not believe him when he came to swear to it. To think that any contractor would go to a Minister of the Crown and offer him $25,000 of the people's money to put in his own pocket, and to expect anyone to believe him when he made the statement, is something that, so far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to endorse. I believe that statement to be utterly and absolutely untrue and unfounded, and I think also that it is an after-thought of Mr. Murphy's, got up as a great many of Mr. Murphy's statements were, to fill a little gap in the evidence with regard to the Baskerville tenders and to offer a pretext for finding a charge against Sir Hector with regard to these Baskerville tenders, which without this made-up statement of Murphy's are perfectly innocent and straightforward on their face. Now the next charge that has been made is one with regard to getting Starrs & O'Hanly out of the way. It is charged that Sir Hector drove Starrs & O'Hanly out of the field, and if we believe that of Sir Hector we must credit him with being a very awkward man, to say the very least. The hon. gentleman wants us to believe that Sir Hector wanted from the start of this project in May to give Larkin, Connolly & Co. the contract, and that he deliberately set to work to crowd Starrs & O'Hanly out of the contract. How did he set about doing that? The tenders came in, and that of Starrs & O'Hanly was the lowest. Mr. Perley, the engineer, reported to the Minister that the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly was too low, and that the work could not properly be done at their price. I ask any fair-minded man in this House, that if in May Sir Hector Langevin had conceived the design of giving the contract to Larkin, Connolly & Co.; when his engineer made a report like that to him, a report that would justify him in the face of Parliament in refusing them the contract; does any sane man believe that Sir Hector, if he was a rascal trying to do what he was represented to be doing, would let a chance like that pass? Would he not at once have said: If that is the case, Starrs & O'Hanly cannot get the contract. On the contrary, Sir Hector declines to receive this recommendation of Perley's. He says these men tendered before, and they were too low, and they have tendered again. Now, you say they are too low, but we will give them a chance. How did he give them a chance? He wrote to them and asked them to strengthen themselves, they being men of no substance, by adding another contractor. Is there any wrong in that? Is there any symptom there of any desire to crowd Starrs & O'Hanly out, or is it not a desire to protect the public interest. Starrs & O'Hanly came and said: We cannot or we will not do it. Well, Sir Hector, with this report of Mr. Perley in his hand, which would have shielded him for all time to come, does not use it. He deliberately refuses to shelter himself behind this report of Mr. Perley, that Starrs & O'Hanly's tender was too low to do the work. No; he says: These men have tendered twice; I believe they are too low; but I will give them a chance; I will recommend Council to adopt their tender. Council did adopt it, and awarded the contract to Starrs & O'Hanly. Now, comes the stress which is laid by hon. gentlemen opposite. They wish us to believe that Sir Hector, having thrown away this opportunity of carrying out this scheme in such a manner that it could never have been charged against him, called Starrs into his place and crowded him out of the contract. Now, Sir, I have another explanation to offer in regard to the matter, though I do not think it will commend itself to the hon. member for Queen's, because from his point of view it has one fatal defect; it does not go to convict Sir Hector Langevin. I am afraid for that reason the hon. member would totally reject it. Yet it seems to me a wholly reasonable explanation. Sir Hector had impressed upon his mind that the tender of these men was too low, that if they took the contract at their own figures, they would be ruined and would have to throw the work on the department half done, and the result would be that new tenders would be called for, and more expense and trouble would be entailed. Mr. Perley swears that that was his constant practice—that he constantly begged the Minister to reject the lowest tender when he thought it too low for the work. Sir Hector Langevin sent for Starrs, and put the question to him plainly. It makes no difference to me whether he read Perley's report or not; as he says himself it seems probable that he did. He says what Starrs says: there is no substantial difference between them. There is no doubt that Sir Hector Langevin expressed to Starrs the doubt he had, and told him that he thought he was a very foolish man to take the contract at that figure. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite want us to think that that was done in the interest of Larkin, Connolly & Co. We say it was done in the interest of the country. It is plain and palpable on the face of it that it was done to prevent the contract going to a tenderer who was not able to carry it out.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that Starrs & O'Hanly's tender was some $30,000 higher than the actual cost of the work as reported by the engineers.

Mr. DICKEY. I will answer that in a moment. Sir Hector pointed out to him that the work would cost more than he would get for it, and very naturally Starrs said: "I see you do not want me to have it," as Sir Hector very properly did not want him to have it. Then Starrs said: "I will give it up," and Sir Hector said to him: "Thank God you have relieved yourself of a great burden." The hon. member for Bothwell says the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly was more than the work cost. Would the hon. member find Sir Hector guilty of a fraud committed in 1884, because years afterwards it turned out that the conditions were not what his engineers in British Columbia and here reported to him at the time? Would the hon. member for Bothwell try to induce this House to find the Minister of Public Works guilty of a fraud committed with regard to these contracts when he knows that the only evidence the Minister had before him was the reports of his own engineers? He knows that the Minister was no prophet, that he could not tell how these works were going to turn out. The hon. member for Bothwell knows that the works cost less than it was expected they would cost, that the conditions of the stone work were different, and that 40 per cent. was saved in labour: and yet the hon. member for Bothwell would throw some suspicion on Sir Hector's action in 1884, for not delving into the future and finding out what was going to happen. This is just the trouble with a great deal of the evidence in this case. We have all the facts plain before our eyes; everything is explained to us; and we ask: If we can see all these things after they have happened, why could not Sir Hector Langevin see them at that time? The difficulty is one which I am afraid the hon. member for Queen's has not been able to meet, that is: Put yourself in Sir Hector Langevin's place at that time; take the information which he had before him, the figures he had, and the limited technical knowledge he possessed, and then try to arrive at a better conclusion than he did; and if you can, then consider yourself a superior man to him and censure him for neglect of duty or for fraud as the case may be. But do not, as the hon. member for Bothwell attempted to do just now, use your knowledge acquired after the fact, to charge the Minister because he had not equal knowledge at the time these transactions occurred. Now, the next item to which I will refer is the agreement as to the conditions in the contract. That, as the hon. member for Queen's stated, rests on Larkin's testimony, and on certain expressions in the letters of Robert McGreevy and Nicholas Connolly. Now, what is the statement that Larkin makes? Larkin says that he went to the Minister and asked him about the $50,000 worth of plant. He wanted it to be put in the contract, but the Minister would not put it in. The Minister said: I will look into it. Now, I only wish hon. gentlemen opposite, when the Government state about any matter brought before them, that they will give it their consideration, would be as easily satisfied as Larkin was when the Minister of Public Works said to him that he would look into it. I think anyone who is familiar with Sir Hector Langevin and the working of his department would be very chary of accepting his statement that he would look into a matter, as an assurance that what was asked of him would be done. On the evidence of Larkin himself, re-enforced in terms by the evidence of Sir Hector Langevin, what took place was that Larkin spoke strongly about the plant, and Sir Hector said he would look into it. Robert McGreevy's letter refers to the same occasion as Larkin does, no doubt, and amounts to the same thing; it may have been based on a report from Larkin to him. Hon. gentlemen opposite want us to believe that Sir Hector Langevin made a condition with Larkin that he would give him something of that $50,000. Here, again, we find that Sir Hector Langevin had a very curious way of carrying out his fraudulent objects. If he wanted to give part of this $50,000 to Larkin, Connolly & Co., one would think that the very last thing he would do would be to put on record in his own department an official letter stating it could not under any circumstances be done. Yet that is exactly what he did. On the 12th of May, 1885, an official letter was written by Mr. Gobeil, the secretary of the department, in which he says:

"I am directed by the Minister of Public Works to state that the specification is very clear, that there is no option on the part of the contractors to take what plant they please and refuse what they do not want, and that they will have to take over all that is named in the schedule."

I do not know what course it would have been more crass or stupid for the Minister to adopt if he had formed the scheme credited to him with regard to this plant. I was glad that the hon. member for Queen's did not tackle the evidence, if I may use that expression, with regard to the payment or the allowance on that plant, because by Mr. Perley's evidence it is absolutely clear that the allowance was made on his own responsibility entirely, that it was passed by him into the final estimate, that that final estimate went in the usual course, and as a matter of fact, did not in this instance go before the Minister, that it was paid without the knowledge of the Minister; and Mr. Perley went further and assumed the whole responsibility. So that you have, as against this alleged agreement to defraud, the official letter from the department showing no such agreement was made, so far as Sir Hector Langevin is concerned, and that he had no connection with the matter. Now, with regard to the change from granite to sandstone. In the first place, it is clear it was recommended, that the Minister approved of it, and that subsequently it was not granted. The evidence as to its having been stopped rests on Mr. Robert McGreevy's letter of the 24th of February, page 35 of the minority report, in which he says:

"The granite substitution was just about being sent to Council, but happily my letter came in time to put it back to sandstone, where it is now; high courses and beds will be put—the additional length will hereafter be settled."

I have this to say with regard to this letter, that it is a letter written by Robert McGreevy to Murphy, and as such, unless it bears internal evidence of genuineness, it is a suspicious document. A letter written by one of these gentlemen to the other might have been concocted, and these gentlemen were quite capable of concocting it, so that I hold it is subject to suspicion. In the next place, it contradicts Murphy's letter on the same subject, because it states that it was a letter of Robert McGreevy's to somebody else which stopped the substitution of granite, whereas Murphy says:

"I had our friend send a dispatch to Ottawa to stop the substitution of granite."

"Our friends" presumably being Thomas McGreevy. So that the evidence resting on those letters is self contradictory, and McGreevy's letter is one which may have been made for the purpose. At any rate you will observe that Robert McGreevy says the substitution was just about being sent to Council but that he stopped it. Now, it is perfectly clear that it was before Council, and that in that respect the letter was false, for Sir Hector Langevin has sworn that it was before Council and the Council rejected it. I might call attention in this connection to the fact that the minority report at page 36 only quotes a portion of Sir Hector Langevin's evidence. It quotes this portion:

"I have only a word to say on the proposed substitution of granite for sandstone. When Mr. Perley, who was favourable to that change, consulted me, I was inclined to consent to it. For prudence sake I spoke of it to Council. Council was of opinion not to accept the change, and I informed Mr. Perley accordingly."

It is only fair to say that Sir Hector said a great deal more than that about it. He was cross-examined at length on this matter—see page 1135 of the old edition. In answer to Mr. Davies he said in reference to this matter:

"I will give you what I can. Of course I am on my oath as Privy Councillor. This question of putting in granite in place of sandstone came up. It was recommended, I think, by Mr. Trutch and then it was recommended by Mr. Perley. On that I submitted it, with my recommendation, to Council, because that is the only way I could reach Council—by recommending it. I recommended it to Council, and the result of the deliberations of Council was that I brought back the report and stated to Mr. Perley that Council would not consent to the change."

The question for us is whether those two letters of Robert McGreevy and Murphy are, in the case of a charge like this, to counterbalance the sworn statement of Sir Hector Langevin. Another matter to which the hon. member for Queen's alluded, and it is a characteristic matter, is the proposed lengthening of the dock. The hon. gentleman pictured how Murphy stated that they would give $50,000 if they got the contract for $250,000, and that Sir Hector Langevin was willing to do that, and recommended it to Council. I think it would have been better if the hon. gentleman had been a little more frank and told the House what the facts were. It would have been better, in dealing with a criminal matter of this kind, if he had put all the evidence before the jury, and not only a part of it. I do not know what the House will think as to the hon. member for Queen's ideas of fair-play in this matter, when I tell them that this proposition to lengthen the dock was made by Murphy, I believe, three years before the Canadian Pacific Railway stated that they were about to put on steamers and applied to the Government to have it lengthened, and that it was on their application Sir Hector Langevin made his report to Council.

Mr. AMYOT. Do you find that in the report, about the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. DICKEY. Yes, on page 155.

Mr. AMYOT. That was before the English Government refused the allowance of fifty thousand pounds?

Mr. DICKEY. Yes.

Mr. AMYOT. The Minister himself declared it was not necessary for that then.

Mr. DICKEY. The Order in Council is on page 105 and is dated the 21st of November, 1889. It states:

"On a report, dated 18th of November, 1889, from the Minister of Public Works submitting that the secretary of the Canadian Pacific Railway represented to him that the company has entered into contracts for the construction of three steamers for service across the Pacific Ocean * * * the Minister, in view of the representations of the Canadian Pacific Railway and of the growing importance of the Pacific trade, and the necessity of affording it proper facility, is of opinion that the length of the graving dock at Esquimalt should be increased by 100 feet and that its extension would cost at least $100,000."

I will not discuss Bennett's dismissal, as that has not been much touched upon. As to the recoursing of the lines for the larger stone, it is quite clear from the documents that the change was allowed in the first place on the distinct understanding that it should not cost the country any more. Some read it to mean that no more would be allowed for the stones in price because they were larger, but I understand it to mean that no more was to be allowed in the gross. There, again, an injustice is done, and it is one of the characteristic injustices which abound in this case. In a letter of Perley's, dated 4th May, 1885, he says:

"I am of the opinion that the contractors should have preferred their request in writing before being permitted to change the courses, but as they have not done so, but have informally applied here for permission to do so, it has been granted to them."

As I understand that, the reference there is to an application by the contractors' engineer, who has not yet entered into this case as a conspirator, but who on the 16th April, 1885, submitted his design as appears from a telegram of that date from Perley to Trutch:

"Contractors' engineer has submitted his design for recoursing graving dock, and also for alteration in the course for inclination or drip in bottom, and informs me that he furnished Bennett with copies of changes proposed."

Then on the 4th May, in the course of a letter, Mr. Perley naturally says:

"I am of the opinion that the contractors should have preferred their request in writing before being permitted to change their course; but as they have not done so, but have informally applied here for permission to do so, it has been granted."

The changes have been rung on that, and all sorts of innuendoes have been made out of this "informal application," which seems to be the report of the contractors' engineer. So there goes another of these imaginary cases of fraud. I may say that the report itself refers to the fact that the application was made to the Minister personally, but it is the application of the 16th April which is referred to by Perley in his telegram of that date. Now, Sir Hector Langevin allowed the payments for this recoursing. Thus far we can go, that the additional size of the stone improved the work, if Mr. Perley is to be believed. Mr. Perley swears positively that it improved it very materially:

By Mr. Osler:

Q. Which is the better for this work, large or small? A. The large courses.

Q. Much better? A. So much was I struck with the work that was done with the large courses in Quebec that I was very glad to give a recommendation increasing the size of the courses in Esquimalt, and when it fell to me as chief engineer of Public Works to design the graving dock at Kingston, I did not put any courses in it less than two feet eight inches, except one. I used the big, heavy courses purposely, because I was struck with them. You get stronger work, better work and lasting work by using the heavier stone.

So far we are on safe ground, that the work was better. Perley reported this improvement, and that he thought they ought to be allowed for it and the Minister recommended the payment. There is no doubt that the payment was illegal. Because it was illegal it was not necessarily fraudulent. Because it was not justified, therefore we are not to say it was fraudulent, but, being illegal, it is very frankly and fairly condemned by the majority report which this House is asked to assent to, and I think that is the proper course for this House to take in regard to a payment which, while admitting of some justification in argument, was not justified by the contract entered into by the parties. A crucial point is what was Sir Hector's relation to the Harbour Board in Quebec. Are we to accept the theory of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), that these members of the Harbour Board were pawns to be moved by Sir Hector Langevin, that they were puppets to be moved as he pulled the string? What kind of business men are they in any city of Canada who could be brought together and act as the hon. gentleman says? It is an insult to them, and not only an insult to their honesty to lend themselves to the supposed fraudulent courses of Sir Hector Langevin, but it is also an insult to their integrity, their intelligence and their business abilities. I do not know the views of Mr. Valin on that subject, but it is peculiar for him to come here before the Committee and insist that he was a puppet of Sir Hector Langevin. He would not accept any suggestion that he was not a puppet at some one time. He insisted that he was a puppet of Sir Hector Langevin, and the strings were pulled by Thomas McGreevy. That is not a very high standard for any man to lay down for himself, and we certainly cannot form a very high opinion of Mr. Valin when he gives that statement in regard to himself. But we have to take his evidence as we find it. We find that Mr. Valin is a disappointed office-seeker. We find that he is charged in the books of Larkin, Connolly & Co. with having been paid improperly $3,625 of their money.

Mr. TARTE. No; that is not true.

Mr. DICKEY. He is so charged in their books.

Mr. TARTE. It was disproved afterwards.

Mr. DICKEY. We find that Mr. Valin signed a declaration which is inconsistent with his testimony under oath given before this Committee. We find that Mr. Valin is contradicted by Sir Hector Langevin, we find that Mr. Valin's testimony is absolutely irreconcilable with the testimony of every other harbour commissioner that was called before the Committee. Now, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) calls my attention to the fact that this is disproved. It is disproved by a witness in whom the member for Montmorency has a great deal of confidence, Mr. Murphy. Mr. Murphy states that, although the other charges in that book are right, although charges of this kind with other people are right, that this $3,000 of Valin is a mistake. Mr. Valin admits that he received money from Larkin, Connolly & Co.; he admits that he received money for his election from these people. He will not say it was not $3,000. He says: I will take whatever Murphy says, and Murphy had already sworn that this $3,000 was a mistake.

Mr. AMYOT. Murphy said it was a mistake, and Michael Connolly too.

Mr. DICKEY. But independently of them, and assuming, as may be quite possible, that a mistake may have crept into those books, assuming that there is a mistake in the statement submitted to the Committee, we find Valin in hopeless contradiction to Sir Hector Langevin, to Mr. Dobell and to the other Harbour Commissioners. In the first place, he swears that Sir Hector Langevin directed him what to do in regard to all matters. Now, here is his statement signed by himself. I will read first the article from Le Canadien:

"QUEBEC, 16th February, 1891.

"SIR,—Passing along the street just now, I saw Mr. P. V. Valin come out of your house. On Tuesday last, in the afternoon, he was at my office on Fabrique street. He came there to describe you to me as the most culpable of all the criminals whom I deemed it my duty to denounce in Le Canadien. Mr. Valin assured me that he was in a position to prove that it was at your request and by your order, that the Quebec Harbour Commissioners awarded to Larkin, Connolly & Co. the contracts out of which Thomas McGreevy has made, since 1882 or 1883, his quarter of a million. 'You have written the truth,' he said to me, 'but you do not know the whole truth.'"

There is a distinct statement exactly in line with the evidence sworn to by Valin before the Committee. It is consistent with that, it is the same as his evidence. Now, what does he say about that? On the 19th February, 1891, he signs a paper written to Sir Hector Langevin:

"SIR,—I read this morning the letter published to-day in Le Canadien by Mr. J. I. Tarte. Mr. Tarte did not understand me."

I would like to know whether the member for Montmorency believes this, and which document is true?

"I did not tell him that I had things to say to him, or to say against you; the fact is I told him nothing against you."

He further states that he never made those statements at all to Mr. Tarte. Now, I have already read Mr. Dobell's testimony. He says there is nothing improper, so far as he knows, except the pressing of a dredging contract after it had expired. Edmond Giroux denies that Sir Hector's name is used before the board by Thomas McGreevy. J. B. Forsyth says that he relied on the engineers. William Rae says he relied on Mr. Perley. He says:

"I remember we had great trouble in selecting the inspectors. We had a great many applications. The commissioners exercised their best judgment in the men they selected."

Unfortunately their selection was not very good. Thomas McGreevy and Sir Hector Langevin also contradict Mr. Valin. Therefore, we have this position of affairs, that in order to connect Sir Hector Langevin criminally with the Harbour Commission, you have to rely upon Valin's evidence alone, and he stands contradicted by a mass of evidence and by himself, in a such manner as to wipe his testimony out of consideration altogether. Therefore, it is that I have not entered into the general question of the 35 cents for dredging, and the other dredging contract, because, before any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House can make that relevant to the question whether Sir Hector is guilty, he must first establish that Sir Hector's relations with the Harbour Commission were improper. Now, a few words with regard to the general probabilities of this case. I do not wish to get rid at all of the proper principle of ministerial responsibility. It would be of no avail, of course, for me to say that Sir Hector relied upon his engineer, in a case of departmental action. In a matter of ministerial responsibility in the ordinary sense of the term, it is no protection to him at all. He is the head of the department, and he must be responsible. But in regard to criminal responsibility you must judge of the evidence according to the rules laid down in criminal law, and if Sir Hector relied upon his engineer, that clears him of all criminal responsibility. It is exactly the same as in cases where men take the advice of counsel and act upon their advice, and if a man acts upon the advice of counsel I can scarcely conceive of a case where he would be held guilty of a crime. In this case if Sir Hector relied honestly upon the advice of his engineers he cannot be charged with anything criminal, although he may be chargeable with negligence. In that connection I would say that the majority report that the House is asked to adopt, distinctly condemns the administration of the department; it distinctly says that this state of affairs has led to consequences which were greatly to be regretted in the administration of that department. The evidence against Sir Hector is unsubstantial and is all indirect, and the main argument in favour of it is Sir Hector's intimacy with Thomas McGreevy, the number and extent of the frauds, and the fact that political subscriptions came out of them. These facts have been elaborated by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I wish to draw the attention of the House to a few of the letters in connection with this matter to support the proposition that these letters show a disposition on the part of contractors to go direct to engineers, which fact seems to negative any presumption that they had control over the Minister. At page 23, Thos. McGreevy writing to Robert McGreevy on 6th May, says:

"The tenders for cross-wall only arrived here yesterday, and are locked up until Monday, when he will commence his calculation. I will write you Tuesday and let you know the result."

That is Boyd. On page 22, Thomas McGreevy writing on 16th April, 1887, says:

"MY DEAR ROBERT,—I have just seen Perley about dredging. I have arranged to meet him on Monday to discuss his dredging report before he sends it to Harbour Commissioners, also other matters about graving dock, &c."

On the same page, 26th April, he says:

"MY DEAR ROBERT,—I have just seen Perley on dredging. I think he will report on 35 cents, and put some conditions which will amount to nothing. He will report when I will be there."

On page 22 under date 2nd May, 1885, he says:

"MY DEAR ROBERT,—As I telegraphed you this morning about estimate for graving dock at B.C., Perley has telegraphed Trutch to send amount of estimates to-day without fail."

On page 23 under date 4th May he says:

"DEAR ROBERT,—As I telegraphed you this morning, no estimate has been telegraphed. Everything and every order has been sent to them that was possible to make them understand. But still there was a dispatch from them to-day which cost $15, which they had in writing for over a month out there. Perley went to see Page this morning to try and get another engineer to send out at once and dismiss Bennett."

On page 24 under date 1st March, 1886, he says:

"I had a long interview with Perley on harbour works, and graving dock at British Columbia. Fleming was to have signed his report to-day on harbour works."

At page 189 under date 9th February, 1886, Larkin writing to Murphy says:

"I was in Ottawa on Tuesday last and had a long interview with Mr. Perley, he assures me that the dock will not be lengthened before completion, as Sir H. is bound to have it completed by the time specified in the contract, even if it has to be lengthened immediately afterwards: he also read me the telegram he sent Trutch and the letter confirming it, to allow us full measurement on the masonry all over, and for masonry in the caisson chamber where we had put it, and for which Trutch only allowed a price for a 17 inch brick wall. So far so good. I spoke to Perley about the $18,500 security: he advised not to ask for it now, that Sir H. did not like to return security until the work was completed, as it would be establishing a precedent which he did not want to do."

That, again, is Perley. At page 208 under date 11th January, 1885, Michael Connolly writing to friend Owen, says:

"I hope Mr. Perley has made the proper report on the retention, and that you have the funds ere this."

At page 215, under date 21st January, 1886, Michael Connolly writing to friend Owen says:

"We sent to Mr. Perley at his request recently a list of the materials the Government turned over to us which we decline taking, and our reasons therefor. I think the amount of the rejected materials will reach about $20,000, so you see it's worth looking after."

At page 604 under 8th May, 1883, Thomas McGreevy writes:

"MY DEAR ROBERT,— * * * I seen Boyd this morning. He has not finished cross-wall yet. I will meet him this afternoon about it and know the result."

At page 613 on 17th—, 1884, Robert McGreevy writes to Murphy:

"MY DEAR SIR,—The result of the interview between Mr. Perley and my brother was that he, P., will write you to ascertain the rate at which you will complete the dock, giving a guarantee of completion within this year or season of navigation."

At page 637, under 8th March, 1888, Thomas McGreevy, writing to Robert, says:

"MY DEAR ROBERT,—Tell Murphy I have seen Perley, and he will report to arbitrators or to commission of the amount to be submitted to them, which will be total claim of $814,000."

At page 642, under date of 27th January, Robert McGreevy writes to Murphy:

"MY DEAR MURPHY,—I reed. your memo.; but did not understand the whole of it. P. has been seen to-day, his report on St. Joseph D. is $100,000 under claim, or as I understood it for about $100,000 more whether this includes the $30,000 certificate you got during the summer I will explain you further when I see you."

In Perley's report of 3rd March, 1887, page 700, it is said:

"I am personally aware of many of the difficulties Messrs. Larkin & Co. have experienced with this work, also with the progress they have made and the excellent character of the work they have executed, and I have the fullest confidence in their ability and intention to bring it to conclusion."

I have not referred to the oral evidence in regard to this matter, but have simply taken the letters, and I think it is shown, although the hon. member for Queen's has said it is very ungenerous tactics to blame men who are dead, and men who are ill, still the question is here, and the report throws the blame on them, and it seems to me these various letters show dealings with the engineers which certainly appear to be very extraordinary if the Minister were in the hands of the contractors. There are also letters referring to interviews with Sir Hector Langevin. That is to be expected. A Minister will naturally have contractors interviewing him on many matters connected with their work. But it is quite an unusual thing for a man like Boyd, the assistant engineer and even for the chief engineer to be interviewed with regard to these reports. One would think that if Sir Hector Langevin was instructing Perley to make these reports wrongly, that he would be approached, and that he would send instructions to Perley to have the report made as he wanted it, but you find that the contrary is the case. It is also very important to remember the origin of these transactions. The origin was in 1881 when we find Murphy pressing Thomas McGreevy to get Kinipple & Morris dismissed. The first contract was the dredging contract made in 1882, and it is not pretended that Sir Hector Langevin had any interest in that contract. Thomas McGreevy went into that matter because Robert McGreevy was made a partner. It suited Thomas McGreevy to have Robert McGreevy as a partner because Robert was heavily in his debt and he wanted him to be supplied with funds to pay his indebtedness, and subsequently Robert McGreevy paid to Thomas portions of the profits out of these contracts. In connection with that look at Murphy's testimony. He says on page 37 of the evidence:

"We took in Robert McGreevy to secure the influence of Thomas with the Minister of Public Works."

He is speaking of the dredging contract of 1882, and he made that statement on oath. That statement on its face is absolutely false. The firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. had then no contract with the Department of Public Works. The Minister of Public Works had nothing whatever to do with the contract in which they took Robert McGreevy as partner, and, therefore, this statement of Murphy's is one of these after-thoughts put in to blacken the case against Sir Hector Langevin, and so false is that statement that the minority itself contradicts it and says what is perfectly plain on the face of it, that they took Robert McGreevy into their partnership to secure the influence of Thomas McGreevy with the Harbour Commissioners, which of course is perfectly evident. But Murphy did not allow an opportunity like that to pass, and over-reaching himself in his anxiety to injure Sir Hector Langevin he swears that it was to get the influence of Thomas McGreevy with the Minister of Public Works who had no right to deal with that contract at all. There we have the beginning of these transactions in this contract of 1882 in which the Minister was not interested directly or indirectly. So far as the cross-wall is concerned, Thomas McGreevy got some money out of it, and put it into his own pockets, or paid his judgments with it. What I want to know from hon. gentlemen opposite is, when did Sir Hector Langevin enter that conspiracy. It is evident it was conceived without him and it is evident that it carried on very extensive operations in the contract of 1882 without Sir Hector Langevin being in it. The fact of the matter is that the Harbour Commission of Quebec is just as liable to suspicion and just as liable to conviction here to-day as Sir Hector Langevin is. The same fraud has been perpetrated on the Harbour Commisson, the same course of dealing has been carried on with regard to their contract as with regard to the Esquimalt dock, and yet I am surprised to find that while the minority report condemns the Minister of Public Works and wants to invite the censure of this House on him, they make no comment whatever, so far as I have been able to discover, on the conduct of the Harbour Commissioners in allowing themselves to be misled; the fact of the matter being, as the majority report puts it, that the Harbour Board was misled and the Minister of Public Works as well. As an instance of that I will cite a letter writen to the Harbour Commission in reference to this contract by Sir Hector Langevin. It will be found at page 892 of the evidence:

"OFFICE OF THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS, CANADA,
"OTTAWA, 31st July, 1882.

"SIR,—Your letter of 29th July, with accompanying statement, has reached me. Before being able to take into consideration the matter of awarding the contract for which the Harbour Commissioners indicate their preference I desire to know: 1. Whether the commissioners have reasons to believe that the tenders received, which are lower than the one they prefer, have been made in good faith, and that there has not been any collusion with respect to the withdrawal of these tenders. 2. Whether the commissioners, after enquiring from their engineer, consider the amount of the tender which they prefer is a reasonable amount, and not out of proportion with the work to be done.

"An immediate answer will oblige.

"Yours very truly,
"HECTOR L. LANGEVIN.

"A. H. VERRET, Esq.,
"Quebec."

That shows that at that time Sir Hector Langevin was guarding the interest of the public as well as he could through the Harbour Commission, to prevent fraud, and I would ask the hon. gentleman opposite if he wishes to contend that that letter of Sir Hector Langevin's is a piece of solemn jugglery meaning nothing at all, or whether he will accept it as a genuine document, written at the time for the purpose expressed in it. I do not think the hon. gentleman will go so far as to say that it was not bonâ fide as it purports to be. I have dealt with the question of the improbability of the Minister of Public Works placing himself in the hands of the chief engineer, of the assistant engineer, of the members of the Harbour Commission of Quebec, and of these contractors by joining with them in a conspiracy to rob the public. It certainly seems to me a most extraordinary proposition that he should do so. I cannot believe, nor is there any evidence to show, that Sir Hector Langevin knew that Thomas McGreevy was getting money out of these contracts for his personal profit, or that he was getting Robert's profits to the extent of $67,000, and if he did not know that, why should he know anything else with regard to the criminal part of the charge. The great argument made by hon. gentlemen on the other side was that Sir Hector Langevin had a motive. The first question I submit is: What is the evidence, and then what are the motives? I have shown what the evidence is; and I think the evidence does not justify the imputing of any motives to Sir Hector Langevin in this regard; but I can quite conceive motives prompting Mr. McGreevy to carry on this work in the way he has done. He had strong monetary reasons for keeping Robert McGreevy employed and in order to get repaid by him out of the profits of these contracts. He was an ambitious politician; he had many rivals in the field in Quebec. It was of immense importance to him, from a political standpoint, to have the command of funds to serve his own purposes of ambition and to keep control of the constituency against ambitious rivals, of whom he had so many. It was quite conceivable and quite possible that Mr. McGreevy would use these funds for the purpose of strengthening himself with the leaders of the party, and if he were a friend of Sir Hector Langevin he certainly would not tell him. If he were a particular friend of Sir Hector Langevin he certainly would conceal from him that he was getting money for this purpose. Of course, these are but inferences, and they are simply a set-off against the inferences that are drawn on the other side. The facts, it is admitted by the other side, are in favour of the verdict rendered by the majority report, but it is argued that there are circumstances against Sir Hector Langevin, and these inferences of mine are given as a set-off against the inferences which are drawn by gentlemen on the other side. It should be remembered by the House, and more particularly by the country, that a member of Parliament has a legitimate influence with the Government, and a legitimate influence with the Minister, and Thomas McGreevy particularly had a strong, legitimate influence with Sir Hector Langevin; he had also a strong legitimate influence with the Quebec Harbour Commission. Both of those influences he abused. He had an influence with Sir Hector Langevin as an old friend and a prominent supporter; and no matter what party is in power here, under our system of party government, the Administration must place some reliance upon their supporters with regard to matters connected with their constituencies. They must to some extent, and within certain defined bounds—which I am quite prepared to admit Mr. McGreevy went far beyond—accept their recommendations. Therefore, having that legitimate influence with the Minister and the Harbour Board, and using the engineers as the evidence shows he did, Mr. McGreevy has been able to produce the result that we see to-day. At least, that is the theory which I for myself offer, and which is consistent with the majority report. In conclusion, I would say, as hon. gentlemen before me have said, and what is quite apparent to everybody, that this is a very serious matter to Sir Hector Langevin. If this House should condemn him its condemnation would stain back through every page of his life's history, and it would stain forward through every page of the history of his family. We must not forget that Sir Hector Langevin is a man of long public service, and in some instances of great public public service; that he is one of the fathers of Confederation, so many of whom are gone; and that once at any rate, in a very trying crisis of this country's history, Sir Hector Langevin stood by what at any rate he thought were the best interests of this Dominion, strongly and manfully against the cries of race and creed; and although these considerations should not influence a verdict if the facts are clear; still I think they should make hon. gentlemen opposite pause before adopting a verdict that would have such disastrous consequences. At any rate, speaking for myself, and I think for other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, seeing that we can support the majority report, these considerations will enable us to do so, not only with a sense of duty, but with a great sense of relief and joy that we can properly and conscientiously render the verdict which that report contains.

Mr. AMYOT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.30 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 23rd September, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PAYMENT OF DEBATES TRANSLATORS.

Mr. DESJARDINS (Hochelaga) moved that the Fourth Report of the Special Committee appointed to supervise the publication of the Official Debates, be concurred in. He said: The Committee recommend that, owing to the unusual length of the session, the salaries of the translators, and Mr. Boyce, the secretary of Chief Reporter, be increased on the basis of the increase that was granted to them in 1885 on account of the unusual length of that session. It was considered then that the amount of work done, and the time given by them to that work, were of such a character as justified the House in granting them an increase. On that occasion the increase was $500 each, but in this report the Committee recommend that the increase be calculated according to the time this session has lasted above the usual length of the sessions.

Mr. LAURIER. I regret that my hon. friend had not given notice of this motion. I would suggest that he let the matter stand for a day or two in order that we may give it some consideration.

Mr. DESJARDINS (Hochelaga). Will you accept this motion as a notice of motion?

Mr. LAURIER. Yes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is quite proper, I think, that the House should have a little notice of this motion, and I am glad that the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) has agreed to let it stand. But I think that there will be great difficulty in the House concurring in this report. It involves a money vote, and according to the view I entertain, this is a matter that ought not to be initiated by a vote of the House.

Mr. DESJARDINS (Hochelaga). The last time an increase was voted to the translators, it was done through a recommendation by the Committee to the House, in the same way that the Committee are making a recommendation on the present occasion. The recommendation had to come from some quarter, and it could not be made otherwise than by the Committee who supervise the publication of the Debates, and who know the amount and the character of the work done. Both the translators and the reporters were appointed and their salaries fixed, by a recommendation of the Committee to this House, and then the Government took action.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am aware that moneys have sometimes been passed by the House in that way; nevertheless, I think it very irregular. This is not a recommendation that the matter should be considered by the Government, it is a recommendation that the translators be paid; and a vote of the House adopting the report, according to my motion, would be an order to the Government that they should be paid. This is not the initiation of a money vote in the usual course by the Government bringing down an estimate, but it is a recommendation of the House to the Government that these men be paid.

Mr. DESJARDINS (Hochelaga). I always supposed that the officers of the House were to be paid in this way, by the House recommending their payment to the Government.

Mr. LAURIER. I believe that the point or order just taken by the Minister of Justice is not well taken—at least, there are numerous precedents to the contrary, and I believe the House can vote any money it pleases to carry on its own business. However, I do not care about the point of order at this moment; it is in order that we may have more time to consider the merits of the proposition, that I think the matter ought to stand for the present.

CHARGES AGAINST THE HONOURABLE THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. LISTER. In accordance with the notice that I gave yesterday, I beg to move:

That James Frederic Lister, Esquire, the member representing the electoral district of West Lambton in this House, having declared from his seat in this House that he is credibly informed, and that he believes that he is able to establish by satisfactory evidence:

That in the year 1879 Messrs. Alexander Manning, Alexander Shields, John James Macdonald, Alexander McDonell, James Isbester and Peter McLaren entered into a contract with the Government of Canada for the construction of a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway between Port Arthur and Rat Portage, known as section B.

The said contract and the works in connection therewith were completed by the said contractors, to whom they were a source of great profit.

During the whole period covered by the said contract, the Honourable John G. Haggart, now Postmaster General and a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council for Canada, was a member of the House of Commons for the South Riding of Lanark, and still is such member.

That the said Honourable John G. Haggart became and was beneficially interested in the profits of said contract which accrued to the share thereof standing in the name of the said Peter McLaren, and has received large sums out of the said profits, and has otherwise derived direct and substantial pecuniary benefits therefrom.

That during the progress of the said works, and while the said the Honourable John G. Haggart was so interested therein, members of the said firm were called upon by members of the Government of Canada for large contributions for political purposes, and such contributions were paid out of the moneys of the said firm, and with the knowledge and assent of the said Honourable John G. Haggart were charged against the profits of the firm; and while the said contributions were so demanded and paid, the said firm of contractors were in various ways dependent upon the Government by reason of many matters being unsettled and in dispute in relation to the said contract, which were at the time of such contributions, or subsequently, settled not unfavourably to the said contractors.

That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire fully into the said allegations, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation, and to employ shorthand writers to take down such evidence as they may deem necessary, and to have the evidence printed from day to day for the use of the Committee, and that the Committee do report in full the evidence taken before them, and all their proceedings on the reference and the result of their enquiries, and that Rule 78 of this House as to the selection of Committees be suspended, and that the said Committee be composed of Messrs. Mills (Bothwell), Edgar, Barron, Lister (who shall not have the right to vote), Dickey, Wood (Brockville), Girouard and McLeod.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the motion of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), in which he stated that while I was a member of Parliament representing the South Riding of Lanark I became beneficially interested in the profits of the contract which was made with the Government in 1879 between Alex. Manning, Alex. Shields, Jno. Jas. Macdonald, Alex. McDonell, Jas. J. Isbester and Peter McLaren, and that the share thereof standing in the name of Peter McLaren I was beneficially interested in, and that I have otherwise derived direct and substantial pecuniary benefits therefrom, let me, in the first place, give the most explicit and full denial to that statement. Perhaps I had better make now an explanation in regard to the whole matter. In the year 1880, the same charge was made. I took the first opportunity of denying it. A Royal Commission was appointed by the Government to enquire into all matters relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I came down here and upon my oath before the said commission I gave this evidence:

Q. Have you had any personal interest in any of the transactions of the Canadian Pacific Railway?—A. I never had, or in any other contract with the Government, directly or indirectly.

Further on in the same enquiry, I was asked about the same questions in regard to Mr. John Ryan. To these I said:

"I was not aware but what he was going on to complete his work when I was up there, and the first intimation I had of the contract being cancelled was seeing it in the public press. I wish also to state as emphatically as I can, because there have been insinuations in some of the papers, especially in a paper published in my own county, that I was connected in some way or other with these matters, that I am in no way connected, and have no interest in any contract or sub-contract; that I never received a cent from any contractor or any person for any service in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other matter as a member of Parliament."

Afterwards in Winnipeg there was a suit conducted there between Lockwood and McLaren. I was examined on oath before that court, when I stated I had not directly or indirectly any interest in connection with Mr. McLaren in section B. Mr. McLaren was examined in the same suit and gave the same denial. Now, it may be necessary to make a statement in reference to my connection with section B. The contract for section B was let in the first place to two tenderers, Fraser, Pitblado & Co., and another firm, connected with the same firm, consisting of Alex. Manning, Alex. McDonell, Jno. Jas. Macdonald, James Shields and Jas. Isbester. After they had received the contract from the Government, from some quarrel or some disagreement between themselves, Fraser and Pitblado could not get along with the other parties, and there was an arrangement entered into by which they left the work to the rest of the partners connected with the contract. In order to strengthen themselves, or in order to carry on their engagements, Mr. McLaren was requested to become a partner and to assist in the purchase of the other partners' interests. At the solicitation of Mr. McLaren, I arranged the partnership between him and the other parties for the purpose of carrying on section B business, and at his solicitation and at his request I overlooked the carrying on of the contract and the final settlement. At the time of the final settlement between the parties in Toronto, at the request of Mr. McLaren and at his solicitation, I went there for the purpose of arranging the pecuniary difficulties between them; but, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. members of this House, that I received no large sums of money from Mr. McLaren for doing this business. The only sums of money which I received during the five or six years which I was looking after that affair were my travelling expenses and bare hotel allowance. I may tell you I was interested with Mr. McLaren in other business, that I was his partner in another transaction, and that I had a good many pecuniary relations with him, but I was always very careful that in all the transactions connected with section B I should have no communication with the Government or any member thereof in reference to the contract, and that I should receive no sums of money in any shape of the profit arising from that contract. The only sums of money that I received from Mr. McLaren was, as I have stated before, barely the travelling expenses to and from attending to his business, and perhaps small sums of money which I got as my hotel fares. I do not know what sums of money are entered in Mr. McLaren's books as against me, because I have not had since the charge has been made an opportunity of looking at those books, but for the six years that I attended to that business I do not think that the sum of money charged against me, amounts to over $1,500, and that was barely the amount that paid my travelling expenses. Yesterday I heard that Mr. McLaren was going to Virginia, but when the hon. gentleman made the statement in the House I had him telegraphed not to go on any account. I hear he is in Perth to-day and that he will be down this evening in Ottawa, and I will take the first opportunity of getting a statutory declaration from him, and reading it to the House, in which declaration I am sure he will confirm every word I have said. As to the rest of the hon. gentleman's declaration that I was the medium—I had better read it in his own words:

"That during the progress of the said works, and while the said the Honourable John G. Haggart was so interested therein, members of the said firm were called upon by members of the Government of Canada for large contributions for political purposes, and such contributions were paid out of the moneys of the said firm, and with the knowledge and assent of the said Honourable John G. Haggart were charged against the profits of the firm."

If it is so, I have no knowledge whatever of that statement. I can state here that not to my knowledge did the contractors of section B contribute any sum of money towards any political purpose or to the Government, and I certainly was no medium of communication between the Government and them in reference to it. As that constitutes the whole charge, I think, Mr. Speaker, I have given an emphatic and positive a denial as I possibly could on this motion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, before you put this question to the House I wish to call to the attention of the House, certain features connected with the motion which the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) has made, and certain principles which are involved in it, which I think require the very careful consideration of the House for its own interest, for its own dignity, and for the preservation of the rights of its members. There must come a time when, irrespective altogether of the opinion of the hon. gentleman presenting a charge to the House as to whether he would desire an investigation or not, and irrespective altogether of the preference of the hon. member against whom the charge is made as to whether he would not prefer an investigation before a committee in order to completely remove the accusation, the House will be called upon to decide how far it shall go in dealing with allegations as regards private transactions of a by-gone time. That is the more necessary when we consider how frequently, with regard to parliamentary proceedings, and with what force, the weight of precedent is urged upon the House. The suggestion was made a little while ago that a provision of the British North America Act had become inoperative because the House has occasionally failed to observe it. I do not entertain that opinion for a single moment; but, in any case, whether that be so or not, the House must, irrespective of the impulse of the moment, irrespective of the preference of the members immediately concerned in the charge, consider what limit there shall be to charges and to the exercise of jurisdiction of this kind on the part of the House. That is the more necessary, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, because, in taking control of charges of this kind, the House is practically exercising jurisdiction with regard to them. We do not sit here for the purpose of trying different questions in which one or two members are interested. We entertain charges of this kind only for the purpose of exercising control over the member whose conduct may be impugned, and it is essential to the rights of every member of the House, and essential to every constituency of this country represented by a member of the House, that the House should be careful to keep its own jurisdiction in proper and well-defined channels. I would ask the House, therefore, to consider with care the position of its jurisdiction as regards questions of the kind now before us. I admit that it is an unfavourable moment to do so, because of the heated state of feeling which has prevailed during the last few months, in consequence of charges, and counter charges, having led members on both sides of the House to prefer that anything which is put forward, even by the way of mere attack, should not be resisted so far as investigation is concerned, and should be allowed free course and an investigation before a committee. But, as I said before, members on both sides of the House are interested in seeing how far the jurisdiction of this House could extend upon questions of this kind. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it would have been perfectly competent for me at this stage, to have called your attention, and to have asked your ruling upon this motion as being, or not being, a question of privilege. I would ask the members of the House, who will do me the kindness to follow the observations I may make, to reflect for a moment or two upon what the charges are which have been preferred by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), and to examine them for the purpose of satisfying their minds on this question. What question of privilege is involved in his motion from beginning to end; what question of privilege as regards the rights or powers of this House, or of any member who sits within its walls? The charge will be examined in vain to find that, even if substantiated, even if proved; the rights, the privileges, the powers of the person impugned, or of any member of the Government, or of any member of the House would be in the slightest degree infringed. If that be the case, Sir, this is not one of the questions which should have come before the House in this way. The rule is perfectly well ascertained, Mr. Speaker, and I presume it would be enforced at any time that you would be called upon to enforce it. The rule laid down by the Speaker of the House of Commons in England is that a matter of privilege should relate to some subject which has recently arisen, and which fairly involves the privileges of the House, and calls for its immediate interposition. The rule of the Speaker of the English House of Commons is:

"A matter of privilege which claims this precedence should be some subject which has recently arisen, and which clearly involves the privilege of this House and calls for its immediate interposition. I stated to the hon. Baronet that as this subject has already been twice under the notice of this House as questions have been asked twice in this House concerning it, it did not appear to me to come under the character of something which had recently arisen and required the immediate interposition of the House without notice. I told the hon. gentleman that he could move in the ordinary way."

My memory recalls one or two instances in which an hon. gentleman who at one time led the Opposition in this House, in preferring charges of this kind against some gentlemen on this side of the House, sensible of the fact that not being of recent occurrence, and not immediately affecting the privileges of those members or of the House: it was his duty, in asking for an investigation, to give notice of his motion, and to put it on the Order paper, and to reach it, and ask the decision of the House upon it in due time. But I refrain from taking the objection. Considering the lateness of the session, considering the impossibility of the hon. member reaching his motion if he took the ordinary course, I am willing to waive any point of that kind. I am willing to treat this motion coming now, as if it were a motion placed on the Order paper and reached in due course, and I shall ask the judgment of the House upon it with regard, not to any technical rule of order, but to the decision that the House should come to as the judge of its own privilege, and the judge of its own jurisdiction; feeling sure that the House will be careful to keep in mind the cardinal principle laid down from the time that the privileges of members and the privileges represented by members came to be appreciated—the cardinal principle that the House has power, where members have been guilty of a positive crime, or have offended against the laws and regulations of the House, or have been guilty of fraudulent or other disgraceful acts which proved that they were unfit to exercise the trust which their constituents had reposed in them, and unfit to continue to associate with the other members of the Legislature ;—to exercise its control ; but remembering, too, the cardinal principle, which runs side by side with it and is of equal value for the preservation of the liberty of constituencies and of members, that it is not for the House in the exercise of that jurisdiction to create a new disability or to enquire into the private transactions of members of the House. Now, let me ask the House, as I did at the outset, to consider carefully what the charge is which is put forward by the hon. member for West Lambton. I will assume, in dealing with it, that it conveys to the House far more than its expressions contain. I will assume the interpretation which is the widest that can be adopted ; although the right of the hon. Postmaster General is that the charge should be strictly stated and strictly proved. Adopting the very widest interpretation that can be put upon this charge, it is that twelve years ago the hon. member for Lanark then, the hon. Postmaster General now, violated the Independence of Parliament Act. I will refer presently to the charge for the purpose of showing that if we ought to take jurisdiction in regard to such a charge now, enough is not contained, and should be contained, in the notice itself. But let me assume, as I have said, that it impugns the Postmaster General for having violated the Independence of Parliament Act in 1879 or 1880. Let me ask the House at the outset this question : What consequence follows if that charge be proved ? Why, Sir, the acting as a contractor under a contract with the Government, express or implied, by which any sum of money may possibly be payable from the Crown to a member, is a statutory offence, which has been created for the purpose of keeping Parliament independent of the control of the Government of the day ; and the penalties which follow the commission of that statutory offence are well defined in the statute which creates it ; and I humbly submit that no other penalties than those can possibly be imposed. What are those penalties ? In the first place, there are pecuniary forfeitures ; there are fines which can be sued for ; and let me remind the House that in making that provision, Parliament at the same time made current with it the limitation that those penalties should not be recovered after the lapse of 12 months. There is a further forfeiture of the seat of the member who violates the Independence of Parliament Act. It is very doubtful, indeed, whether the forfeiture of the seat can be enforced after the lapse of 12 months. But let me ask you what sense is there in instituting an enquiry into an allegation that twelve years ago the member for Lanark of that day forfeited his seat ? Sir, assuming that the facts are otherwise than stated by the Postmaster General, assuming that they are otherwise than as sworn to by himself in the testimony which he read to the House to-day, the hon. member for Lanark lost the seat which he then held in this House. He lost that seat by the expiration of the Parliament of that day ; he lost it by the expiration of the next Parliament ; he lost it by the expiration of a third Parliament ; and to-day there is not one provision of the statute relating to the independence of Parliament which attaches any penalty to the Postmaster General, even if every charge which the hon. member for West Lambton has preferred were proved. It cannot be supposed that I am making a merely legal argument on the question. Does not the common sense of every hon. gentleman tell him that if that penalty is incurred by any member of this House, he is completely absolved when a new election takes place and he acquires his seat by another title ? The member for Lanark, if it is true that he violated the Independence of Parliament Act in 1879, forfeited his seat. He got another afterwards ; he got another a third time ; and it is by the fourth title that he holds the seat which he occupies in this House to-day. Now, Sir, while no pecuniary penalty attaches at this day, and while the loss of the seat by no means follows now—because it is perfectly clear that a seat gained in the elections of March, 1891, is not forfeited by reason of the forfeiture of a seat which occurred in 1879—can it be contended for a single moment—and I am stretching to its utmost limit the argument which may be advanced, I suppose, on the other side—that any stigma attaches to the man who violated the Independence of Parliament Act in 1879, which would make him unworthy now for a seat in this House or unworthy now to be a member of the Government ? Why, Sir, is it not the every-day practice with regard to matters of this kind that the member who has been accused of having forfeited his seat, gains it a second time by re-election, and has as much right then to his seat in the House without any stigma attaching to him, as if he had then sat in the House for the first time ? I suppose it will be said, or at any rate it is implied in the mind of the hon. gentleman making the charge, that a stigma does attach : and I think I heard an echo from the other side intimating that that might be urged. Why, Sir, we have settled that matter by precedents in this House as fully and as effectually as such a matter could be settled. The House will not forget the eventful period of 1877 when charges were made against members on both sides of the House, when the action of the House was invited, and when actions were taken in the courts of law. On that occasion a Minister of the Crown, the Minister of Militia of that day, was charged with having violated the Independence of Parliament Act. That Minister was accused of having, as a member of a printing partnership, had received from the Government of that day about $10,000—I am speaking within limits—and the charge was so capable of proof that the Minister of Militia resigned his seat in this House and sought re-election by his constituents. The doctrine was not then held—I do not know whether it was even advanced by anybody—that a stigma would attach to him, which would prevent his sitting again in the House or in the Government. But I know that he went and sought re-election as Minister of Militia and that he did not cease to be Minister of Militia until he was defeated by his constituents. But we had a more striking case occurring at precisely the same time. Another member of the same partnership was the Hon. Mr. Jones, of Halifax. Mr. Jones was not a member of the Government ; he resigned his seat after the Hon. Mr. Vail resigned his ; he sought re-election as every member does who is unseated under those circumstances and desires to return to the House, confident of course that no allegation would be made against him that he had a stigma attached to him for having violated the Independence of Parliament Act, and that he had committed one of those fraudulent, discreditable acts, which would have made him unworthy of a seat in the House, because such a doctrine had never been then advanced and has never been advanced until to-day. But having resigned his seat for having violated the Independence of Parliament Act, let us recollect the fact that while he was seeking re-election, he was appointed by the Governor General to be a Minister of the Crown, and when nomination day came, he went to the poll, with the oath on his lips as a Privy Councillor, in the place of Mr. Vail who had been defeated. But we have a more striking instance still, because in the same session of 1877, no less a personage than the Speaker of this House was accused of having violated the Independence of Parliament Act, in the grossest manner, by having received for his own use and benefit, under a contract with the Crown, a sum upwards of $19,000 of public money. At the close of that session, that charge was found to have been proved. The report of the committee appointed to investigate it was presented, and the head of this House resigned his seat and sought re-election, on the principle again that no stigma attached to him which would prevent his occupying a seat again in this House; and when he came back from his constituency, instead of its being charged against him that he was unworthy to sit here, the House, on the first day it met, made him its Speaker again. Under these circumstances, I do not need to seek for old precedents on this question as to whether this charge ought to be investigated on the ground of its implying in the least degree a stigma which would mark the Postmaster General as unworthy to sit in the Government, or unfit to exercise the trust his constituents repose in him, or unfit to continue to associate with the other members of the Legislature. I do not make these observations or cite these precedents, by any means, for the purpose of applying the tu quoque argument to the other side of the House. On the contrary, I do not understand, and the little search I have made into the question does not lead me to believe, that the course which was pursued on that occasion was challenged on the ground which is implied in the resolution to-day, or that it was argued that men who had regained their seats by a new title were at all unworthy of any office or trust which the House or the Crown might think proper to impose on them. It may possibly be said, but it would be quite beside the question, that in those cases the violation of the Independence of Parliament Act was made unconsciously by the members impugned. I trust that argument will not be advanced. It makes no difference in the principle whatever, and it was not only utterly incapable of proof but capable of the most distinct disproof on those occasions, that the printing contracts which were held by Messrs. Vail and Jones and their partners were held without their knowledge. It was capable of quite distinct disproof that the Speaker was unaware that upwards of $19,000 of public money went into his pocket, under a contract with the Government, while he was sitting, Sir, in your chair. But that does not touch the question of principle or the question as to the jurisdiction of this House. Now let me call the attention of the House to what else we must find in this accusation, in order that it may justify the hon. gentleman's resolution. The accusation against members of the Government is that in 1879—twelve years ago—members of the Government of that day solicited subscriptions from certain contractors who were the contractors for section B; that those contractors, while in the position of contractors, contributed for political purposes, at the request of members of the Government of that day; and the hon. gentleman goes on to add further that at that time the contractors had matters pending before the Government, which were not unfavourably disposed of by the Government afterwards. The hon. gentleman has carefully refrained from charging that any improper decision on those claims was arrived at by the Government of that day, and he has carefully refrained from charging that any decision upon those claims was in the least degree induced by the subscriptions which these contractors had given. And yet the hon. gentleman desires investigation to be made by this House in the same way as if those charges were contained upon the face of his accusation. Let me call the attention of the House to what then, after all, his charge amounts to. It is an imputation that the Independence of Parliament Act was violated by Mr. Haggart, and that members of the Government of that day received political subscriptions and decided questions which these contractors were interested in, with no charge whatever that these decisions were improperly made or even improperly influenced. Now, there is nothing more fully admitted, in every discussion which takes place on such matters, that when the jurisdiction of this House is invoked to deal with the conduct of a member in relation to so serious a matter as one which may cause a forfeiture of his seat, or at any rate in relation to so serious a matter as to cast a doubt upon his fitness to exercise a trust which his constituents reposed in him and to continue to associate with other members of the House, the accusation shall be explicitly made, and shall be made on the responsibility of a member of this House. The House would never entertain an accusation made by an irresponsible party outside. The charges may fill the air, they may fill the press, but they are not investigated under a resolution of this kind, as a matter of privilege, or as a matter affecting a member's seat until some person in the House, who has a seat to lose, takes the responsibility of making the charge and invoking the jurisdiction of the House. But you will find, Mr. Speaker, on looking through the resolution the hon. member has moved, that he has taken no responsibility at all, and that if every charge he made here should be distinctly disproved, his answer might well be: I made no charge whatever against the Postmaster General of fraudulent or dishonest conduct, I did not impute to him anything more than that some years ago he might have been turned out of his seat for having violated the Independence of Parliament Act; and I made no charge against the Government even of 1879 of having been influenced by any money considerations to do any favour to the contractors, or of having rendered an improper decision with regard to any claim which those contractors preferred. So that the principle which requires that somebody must be responsible for the accusation into which an investigation is demanded, is utterly uncomplied with. But let me ask the indulgence of the House while I call its attention, turning from the assumption I made a few moments ago as to what may be intended by the hon. member for Lambton, to what he says. I call your attention, Sir, to the fact that there is no accusation in reality here, even that the hon. Postmaster General ever violated the Independence of Parliament Act. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) has steered clear, and carefully steered clear, of even making that accusation which I have dealt with on the assumption that it was made. On the contrary, instead of alleging, in the words of the Independence of Parliament Act—for those words must be made applicable to such a case—that the Postmaster General had a contract with the Crown, that he was interested in a contract with the Crown by which the money of the Crown would be payable to him, he alleges that he was beneficially interested in the profits of the contract under a share standing in the name of Peter McLaren. If it should transpire that, in consequence of any other business connections between Mr. McLaren and Mr. Haggart, in which the interests of Mr. Haggart were deeply concerned in other ventures with Mr. McLaren, it being to Mr. Haggart's interest to improve Mr. McLaren's chances in regard to section B, the member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) would say: I have proven my charge: but he would not have proved, even in that case, that Mr. Haggart had violated the Independence of Parliament Act or had committed any act that the most scrupulous member of Parliament might not commit, preserving in his conscience every principle that members of this House should preserve. Let me call attention further to the fact that the hon. member is asking the House to return to transactions which took place twelve years ago. I am not asking the House to adopt any hard and fast rule as to how far back we should go, or to say that we should not go back to a period before the last general election and before the existence of the present Parliament. But here is an accusation laid as the basis for an investigation, as to things which occurred twelve years ago against a Government, only one member of which sits in the House to-day, and against that member there is not the slightest insinuation made in this case. Under these circumstances, let us consider whether there must not in reason be some limit to the extent to which we are to go back. Would the House feel disposed, for instance—I am not putting it as a hard and fast rule at all—to now appoint a committee to investigate all the accusations which may be made, or which may have been made against the Government that held office between 1873 and 1878? I am sure that the good sense of the House would be inclined to say, that those transactions might have been investigated by Parliament at the time, and that ample time and opportunity had existed to investigate them. Although there is no statute of limitation in matters of this kind, it would be said that there must be some limit, and that every stale charge is not to be brought up for the exercise of the power of this House. Let us consider, in regard to the charge made against the Postmaster General and the members of the Government, whether this objection in regard to the point of time is not a reasonable one. As to the charges made against the Postmaster General we have found, from his own statement, that this subject is not new to the House, that it was the subject of an enquiry by a Royal Commission who heard him under oath, that he was cross-examined in reference to this matter, and that the Royal Commission reported to this House in 1880 or 1881 the evidence as well as the conclusions at which the Commissioners arrived. That Royal Commission was appointed to investigate all the payments made in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they discharged that duty. Their report was laid upon the Table of this House, and this House, which is asked in 1891 to take cognizance of this as new matter brought up by the charge of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), having received that report and distributed it for the public information, never questioned for a moment the conclusions then arrived at, nor does the hon. member for West Lambton venture to say that any evidence has come to his knowledge since that time, which would disturb the conclusions then arrived at.

Mr. LISTER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I stated so to the House yesterday.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was not aware that such a statement had been made. The hon. gentleman then puts himself in the position of a person who has come here eleven or twelve years after this matter was investigated, and who now says: I have got some further information, let us have this all over again, let us have it all investigated again. I think, while I do not desire to press it too strongly on the House, that the stage of the session has something to do with the investigation of a matter of this kind. We have been laboriously discharging our duties here during the past five months, and now, within what everybody who has only human endurance hopes are the closing days of the session, the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) asks the House to enter into an enquiry on the ground that what has kept for twelve years cannot keep for four months more. The hon. member says that, after being here through May, June, July, August and September, in an Ottawa climate, we should wait a few days in October in order to give him about four days to investigate this matter, but I am afraid he forgets that there is another side to the question, and that possibly the other side will not be content with the small allowance of space which he takes for his own side. I do not intend to weary the House by referring to precedents on this subject. There are precedents established in the old country which no Parliament in a civilized country would now be disposed to follow, precedents which are stigmatized by all writers on parliamentary practice as specimens of arbitrary exercise of power in regard to the jurisdiction of the House of Commons. But I say you will look in vain, either among old precedents or new, for a charge as vague as this being referred to a committee to investigate the conduct of the Government for an expenditure of this kind occurring twelve years ago. There is a view in connection with the recent precedents of this Parliament which, perhaps, I ought to refer to, because it was suggested from across the House—I do not know whether the remark was intended for me—that it was a parallel case to the charge in respect of which this House has just been holding an investigation. Sir, these cases have no parallel whatever. In the case which the House took up and investigated last session, for example, the case of the then sitting member for Lincoln, there was a question of privilege involved; there was not merely an accusation that the member for Lincoln had violated the Independence of Parliament Act, but there was an accusation that being a member of this House, he had sold his influence as such with the Government, or if he had not sold his influence, he had obtained money under the pretense that his influence was for sale: and there was an accusation that as a member of the House, and having influence with the Government of the day, he had induced the Government to deprive certain applicants for the public domains of that which they were entitled to by law and by right. And there was the further question of privilege involved, that the letters which the member for Lincoln had written, impugning the honesty and integrity of members of the Government, who were, of course, members of this House, involved a question of privilege with regard to them, and affected their privilege in this House; and nobody could pretend that the members of the Government who were impugned had not a right to treat his accusations as a question of privilege, if they pleased. When the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved his resolution, he conveyed an intimation of that kind, if I remember aright, to the House, and told the members of the Government that they were the guardians of their own honour and of their own privileges, and if they chose not to accept his resolution, it was a matter concerning their own honesty and their own right. They did act upon the assumption that it was a matter concerning the privileges of the whole House, that a member should be accused of having thus abused his position in the House, and that it was a matter affecting their privileges that they should be charged with having abused a public trust out of favour to the member for Lincoln. Then, in the charges which have been investigated during the present session, presented by the member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte), it is true that the expenditures which were investigated extended back over a period of upwards of eight years, but they continued down to the present time. Moreover, the charges which the hon. member for Montmorency preferred were made and published during the last session, and were answered by the then Minister of Public Works and by the member for Quebec West in their places. But, Sir, apart from any question of privilege at all, these charges contained an accusation that the public moneys voted by this House and which had been expended under the authority of this House, had been improperly and corruptly expended. We need not search for precedents: it will be admitted at once that in relation to expenditures which are going forward, or expenditures of a recent time in respect of which any charge is made of misappropriation of public money, the charge ought to be entertained by the House and investigated. But if that case should be cited, we have not only to consider the remoteness of these occurrences, but we have to consider this fact, that the charge before us to-day preferred by the member for West Lambton, does not accuse anybody of having misspent one dollar of public money: so that the case of the charges made by the member for Montmorency cannot possibly be drawn in as a precedent here. Now, under these circumstances I feel confident that I can appeal to the fair judgment of the House, that I am bound to appeal to it especially regarding the period of the session at which this charge is brought forward. But even at an earlier period I would have appealed to it equally, until the hon. member for West Lambton had altered his accusation in such a way as to accuse either the Postmaster General or the Government of some wrong-doing, some misapplication of public money as having taken place at a period not unreasonably remote from the present time. When the hon. member makes such a charge, it will be a matter to be considered, but when it is put forward to the House in such vague terms as not to impute even a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, and when no misappropriation or misapplication of public money is charged against the Government, and all that is insinuated is in relation to a bygone Government: and when the member for Lambton does not even suggest that the action of the Government was improperly taken or improperly influenced, I think I can appeal to the House with confidence to say that its power and authority, great as they are, and ready as the House will always be to exercise them in the public interest, are not required to be exercised at this time: and that to exercise them now upon a complaint of that kind, would be subversive of, instead of sustaining, the privileges of this House, and the rights of the people who sent us here. Under these circumstances, I will move that the House having heard the statement of the hon. member for West Lambton, and the statement in reply thereto, of the Postmaster General, do now proceed to the Orders of the Day.

Mr. LAURIER. I had understood from the argument of the hon. gentleman that he objected to this motion on points of principle, until he came to refer to the lateness of the session, when I understood him to object to it in point of expediency. I do hope and trust that the members of this House, whether they are political friends or foes of the Postmaster General, will not allow the question of expediency to weigh with them one single moment. In relation to this accusation we have a duty to discharge to this House, and a duty to discharge to ourselves; and though the period of the session is late, and though the motion, if granted, will involve some delay and prolong our stay here, still I am sure there is no member who would not be ready, at whatever inconvenience to himself, to discharge the duty which would be imposed upon him by the granting of this motion. Sir, this is not a question of expediency, it is a question of right and a question of duty. But I have no objection at once to meet the hon. gentleman upon the ground upon which he has based his objection to this motion, namely, that this House has no jurisdiction to investigate the charge brought by the member for Lambton. I cannot do better—and I hope in this I will have the full concurrence of the hon. gentleman—than to refer the House to what is the well-known practice in England with regard to these matters. The privileges and the rights which we have in this Parliament, I am sure, we will always be glad to exercise in the light of the precedents which have come to us from the mother land. Now, Sir, let me quote the rule that prevails in England in these matters. That rule is as broad as it can be, and it extends thus far, that the House of Commons will not tolerate as one of its members any man who has disgraced himself in any manner whatever. If that is the rule, then we have only to ascertain whether the charge made by my hon. friend from Lambton comes within the purview of the House according to the rule thus laid down. But before I come to this, let me quote from one of the standard authorities on this matter, May, who says :

"Members have been expelled as being in open rebellion, as having been guilty of forgery, of perjury, of breaches of trust, of misapplication of public money, of conspiracy to defraud, of corruption in the administration of justice or in public office, or in the execution of their duties as members of Parliament, of conduct unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman, and of libels and various other offences committed against the House itself."

As I said a moment ago, this rule is as broad as possible, and it extends to this, that no man shall be tolerated as a member of the House of Commons whose conduct is in violation of those laws which should guide and direct a gentleman's life. Let us now look at the charge brought against the hon. gentleman and see if it comes within the rule as laid down by this authority. I agree with the Minister of Justice at once that the charge which has been brought against the Postmaster General is, in fact, for a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. The hon. gentleman stated that the Postmaster General was not charged with any misapplication of public money. He is not charged, indeed, with any misapplication of public money, but he is charged with misappropriation of public money, and certainly, if, apart from the quotation from May which I have cited to the House, it would be, as the hon. gentleman himself admits, an offence against the law of Parliament for a member of Parliament to be guilty of a misapplication of public money, it is a greater offence for him to be guilty of a misappropriation of public money. As the hon. gentleman stated, the offence is not only a moral one, but is also a statutory offence ; but because an offence is a statutory offence, the hon. gentleman, I am sure, will not claim that it may not be a moral offence as well. What is the fact ? I take the charge against the Postmaster General, and though I must say at once that the Minister of Justice at one portion of his argument stated that the charge was one of having violated the Independence of Parliament Act, yet he rather questioned that point a little later on in his speech. I take the case such as it is, and no one, I am sure, will contend that the charge which is embodied in the motion does not come directly within the four corners of the Act for securing the independence of Parliament. The charge is :

"That the said Honourable John G. Haggart became and was beneficially interested in the profits of said contract which accrued to the share thereof standing in the name of the said Peter McLaren, and has received large sums out of the said profits, and has otherwise derived direct and substantial pecuniary benefits therefrom."

Certainly, nothing can be clearer than that charge. It is here stated that the Postmaster General was interested in the interest of Mr. McLaren, and out of the profits of Mr. McLaren received large sums himself. This is enough, in my humble opinion, to lead any one who reads these words to admit that they bring the charge within the four corners of the Act. I admit that the circumstances have been altered by the facts which have taken place since. It is stated, and this is a fact to be investigated, but I assume it for the sake of argument, that this offence took place in 1879. I think it took place also later on ; but let us say it took place then. Three elections have occurred since that time. What is the effect ? If the charge had been brought home to the Postmaster General during the term of the Parliament then sitting, the consequence would have been that the hon. gentleman would have forfeited his seat. This offence has been made a statutory offence and there has been statutory punishment applied to it, and if the offence had been brought home to the hon. gentleman the House of Commons would not have to enquire into it or to pass judgment upon it, or to express its approval or disapproval of it. The punishment would have been applied by the law itself, and the hon. gentleman's seat would have been forfeited. Will it be pretended for one moment that because the statutory punishment attaching to the offence, has been, as it were, limited, and it can no longer be exercised, the moral offence is also limited, and is not to be gone into ? This is the argument made a moment ago by the Minister of Justice. He stated that no other penalty could visit the offence than that provided by statute. I deny that assertion. The hon. gentleman and the House have only to look at the authorities to see how fallacious that contention is, that while the punishment of the law which should visit that crime would be visited upon him through the power of the law, yet the House of Commons cannot now take charge of the case and apply to it the censure which it passes on like cases. What are the facts of the case ? We will take the case as stated by the Minister of Justice. The Postmaster General has been guilty of a serious offence, the punishment for which can no longer be visited upon him ; and I again ask, will it be pretended that if during those years—and assuming that everything charged is true—he had been guilty of sitting here without any right to occupy a seat, it was not a moral offence that an hon. gentleman guilty of such a crime, because crime it is, of having deceived the House, of having occupied a seat to which he had no right, had not been guilty of conduct unbecoming a gentleman, and therefore should not be visited by punishment ? The distinction, I say, is this : If the Postmaster General committed this offence during the period stated, and had been proved guilty of it during that Parliament, by that simple fact he would have forfeited his seat and have ceased to be a member ; but because he committed this offence at some period anterior to the present Parliament, then it is the duty of the House to investigate the case and ascertain whether or not his offence was unbecoming a gentleman, or whether or not it is one to be approved in every particular. This is the extent of the charge, this is the way I put it to the House at this moment—though the hon. gentleman has committed, it is alleged, a statutory offence which cannot be punished, and a moral offence in the eyes of the law, yet it is the duty of the House of Commons to pronounce upon it, either to absolve or to condemn as the case may be. If, as the Minister of Justice stated, at one period of his argument, it was useless to go into the matter because at this moment the seat of the hon. gentleman could not be attacked, and he might be re-elected, I hold that such an argument is simply begging the question. When the House of Commons expels a member for undignified conduct, it does not create a disqualification, but it simply expresses its opinion that the member is not entitled to a seat in the House. Let me refer to May on this point. He says:

"But notwithstanding their extensive jurisdiction in regard to election, the Commons have no control over the ineligibility of candidates, except in the administration of the laws which defined their qualifications. No power exercised by the Commons is more undoubted than that of expelling a member from the House, as a punishment for grave offences; yet expulsion, though it vacates the seat of a member, and a new writ is immediately issued, does not create any disability to serve again in Parliament."

That is the well understood law, and, Mr. Speaker, it is no argument to say that the hon. gentleman might be elected again if he were unseated on account of the offence charged against him. In the same manner I give the same answer to the case which had been cited by the hon. gentleman, of a late Minister of Militia, and of another Minister of Militia, and of a former Speaker of the House of Commons. In all these matters, true it is said, that the report of the committee which enquired into the case stated that the offence had been committed unwittingly, but still the law being violated—and though in consequence the law was amended afterwards—still the case had been investigated, and that is the only thing which we ask at this moment from this Parliament. We simply ask to investigate the case and to ascertain whether or not the member who is supposed to have been guilty, who is charged, at all events, with being guilty, and of having deceived for years the House of Commons, is a fit and proper member of the House of Commons. That is the way that I put the question, and that the question which has to be investigated is whether or not the charge is true. If it is true that the Postmaster General has been all these years occupying his seat under false pretenses, having no right to it, deceiving his colleagues, deceiving the country, deceiving his electors, then the question is whether or not under such circumstances he is a fit member of the House of Commons. But, Sir, it is preposterous, in my opinion, to say that we should not do it because at one time his seat might have been forfeited. What, Sir, if the hon. gentleman, assuming that he is guilty, which I will assume just for the sake of argument at this moment—had been so cunning as to deceive the House, and to deceive the electors, and to deceive the country at large: should that be an argument why his offence should not be visited upon him? In my humble opinion, it would be a stronger argument why his offence should be visited, because it seems to me that the House of Commons, for its own dignity, should punish not only the offence, but the attempt to conceal it from the House of Commons itself. It is also said, Mr. Speaker, that these charges have been investigated by a commission, and upon this I join issue with the Minister of Justice. The commission which sat upon these matters never had any special warrant to investigate these charges against the Postmaster General. The commission had warrant and authority simply to investigate generally that contract, along with other contracts, but no one certainly would pretend that the commission which sat at that time had authority to determine whether or not the Postmaster General, then member for Lanark, was or was not a member of the firm of contractors who built these works, or whether he had or had not violated the Independence of Parliament Act. This was not the question, and no opinion which may have been given on that point would be of any avail. In fact no opinion has been given on that point. True it is that the hon. gentleman was heard as a witness before this commission, and that he denied the charge that is now brought against him. So far, so good. His denial will go in his favour, but at the same time I submit humbly to the judgment of the House of Commons, that the hon. gentleman must stand on this question in just the same position as any other man. His denial may go for what it is worth, but his denial cannot go against the charge at this moment. I refer the House to a statement which was made by the Postmaster General. He stated that as soon as Mr. McLaren would come to this city, he would have a statutory declaration and would have it published and communicated to the House. Is that the way this charge is to be investigated? Does not the Postmaster General himself give the case away and show the necessity of having an investigation, since he finds that although the Government are ready to absolve him, although the Government are ready to ask their followers not to proceed with the charges, although the Government ask their followers to accept the version of the hon. gentleman, still he finds himself obliged, in deference to his own dignity, in deference to public opinion, to give some evidence that the charges brought against him are not true? Well, Sir, if we are to have an investigation, I submit to the fairness of the majority—not to the minority of this House—I submit to the fairness of the majority that this is not the way that the hon. gentleman is to clear himself of the charges brought against him. There is only one way he can so free himself, and that is by an investigation held by a committee of this House where he and his accuser can be heard, and can be heard with all the advantages accruing to both upon such an occasion. Mr. Speaker, the only thing which I regret in this matter is that it comes late in the session. This is very true, but, Sir, the fault does not lie with my hon. friend who makes the charge to-day. If he has brought it so late in the session it is because so far the evidence upon these charges has been well concealed. As has been stated by the Postmaster General himself, the charges have been known to the public. There has been a general impression in the public mind that there was in section B contract some such thing as is now charged against the Postmaster General, but it was only an impression, and it is only within the last few days, four or five days, that my hon. friend has obtained the evidence on which he is now prepared to bring the charge, and to say he is ready to prove it. Although it is late in the session it is no fault of his why the evidence did not come sooner into his hands, and I submit again that it is not a question of expediency but it is a question of duty for every man, whatever may be the inconvenience to himself, to see that justice is done in this matter, not only to the Postmaster General, but to the public as well, who are still more interested than the Postmaster General in having these charges cleared.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, I, for one, am very glad indeed that at last a stand has been made with regard to accusations of this kind. I think that we ought in our own interests, and in the interests of this House, to remember that we are not here for the purpose of enabling charges to be made against hon. members under the cover of the protection which the privileges of this House afford, and which in point of fact enables these charges to be made with absolute impunity to the member himself preferring them and to those that are in privity with him. The privilege of this House is absolute and complete, and necessarily and properly so in the public interest, but if in moments of excitement such as at present prevail, we are to take advantage of them in order to hurl charges against one another, and to ask that these charges should be investigated, then I am sure that my hon. friends who sit on the opposite side of the House will see that it is they, and not the majority, who would be in danger. In the interest, therefore, of each and every member of the House, and more especially, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of the minority in this House, whether it be composed of one political party or the other, it is well we should weigh with care, and decide with judgment, before we accept any charge that has been made, and before we permit it to be referred to a committee. No person doubts the absolute power of this House to expel any one member, but, Sir, that power is restrained and restrainable by constitutional rules and constitutional usages, and we are bound to respect these constitutional rules in the interest of the public we represent, as well as in the interest of the gentlemen who sit on the floor of this chamber. Now, Sir, a man can be expelled for forgery, perjury, or any other crime he may commit; but it is perfectly well settled that the House of Commons in England—and I join with the leader of the Opposition in saying that we look to that body for light and guidance in these matters—never undertakes to try a man for a criminal offence. The laws of the land are open for that: and it is only after a man has been tried by his peers and upon his conviction or upon his outlawry, as the case may be, that the House of Commons acts. This year we have had examples of that. Two members were accused, one of abduction, and the other of a still more abominable crime. Did the House undertake to investigate those charges? Did a member rise up and accuse those men, and ask for a reference of the charges to a committee? No, Sir; it was remembered that the business of Parliament is not to try men accused of criminal offences: they knew that the law of the land is open for that purpose; and they waited, in the one case until the conviction was obtained—that of Captain Verney—and the other case they are at present dealing with, the member having absconded. But even after the member, who represented one of the divisions of Belfast, had absconded, even after the criminal charge was made against him, and he was ordered to attend in his place in the House, they would not made against him, because he sent a medical certificate that his health would not permit him to comply with that order. They even went to the extent of sending physicians over to France, where the hon. gentleman was in concealment, in order to test whether the medical certificate was genuine or not; and upon the report of their own medical men, they agreed that the matter should stand over till next session. Now, I do not pretend here, and it would be presumptuous in me to lay down any hard and fast rules in a matter of this kind; but I think there are some general principles—and it is in the interest of us all as well as of those whom we represent that we should know them, which we can and ought to adopt with reference to charges of crime. Now, if an hon. member who sits in this House is charged with a crime, why should his case be prejudiced, why should his chances of a fair trial be jeopardized by accusations made here?—by it being made, in point of fact, a political question, as was done in the case of the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) the other day? Why, I say, should that course be taken? If an hon. member here commits any offence, no matter what it may be, no matter in what category it may be, the proper way is to let that man be tried, and tried fairly by his peers: and when he is found guilty, and upon the record of his conviction, and not upon the decision of a committee—which as we all know is, generally speaking, apt to act in a partisan sense—to deal with that hon. gentleman on the case which is already established. There are, however, cases of breaches of our privileges, breaches of our own rules, offences against this House, which we are not only bound to investigate, but with the investigation of which we would not permit any court of law to interfere, if I understand the principles which regulate these matters. These are matters which can only be dealt with here. Then you come to a third class, and it is one of that class which we have now before us. There is the case which is not criminal, there is the case which involves no breach of our privileges, in reference to which we cannot act in accordance with constitutional usage, and there is the case of mere scandal, making the committees of this House, and this House itself, vehicles for scandal and for abuse. Those, I say in all calmness and sincerity—not desiring to shield any person—we ought to stop on the threshold, and not give countenance to them by referring them to a committee. Now, what is this charge? The hon. member who last addressed the House (Mr. Laurier) has told us that it was not merely an illegal offence, but an immoral offence; it was not merely malum prohibitum, but malum in se. Any man who has read parliamentary history will acknowledge that that is not a correct statement. Why, Sir, when the Independence of Parliament Act was passed, professional contractors could sit and did sit in this House, and no man could expel them; and it was no offence of a moral character—no offence, to use my hon. friend's expression, unbecoming an officer and a gentleman.

Mr. LAURIER. Is it an offence now?

Mr. McCARTHY. It was no offence at that time, and no contractor could be expelled from the House. But my hon. friend says that because Parliament has decreed that no contractor may be elected a member of this House, and that if a member becomes a contractor he shall thereby lose his seat, that thereby becomes a moral offence. I think the hon. gentleman has been associating with very immoral men for many years past if that is true. I think the hon. gentleman was a member of the Administration which put that immoral man, Mr. Anglin, into that chair after he had committed that immoral offence. I think the hon. gentleman was a member of the Administration which countenanced His Excellency the Governor General giving his commission to empower to sit on these Treasury benches, men who committed that offence.

But the hon. gentleman is not serious. Parliament says that if a man is a contractor he is ineligible to sit in this House. It does not say that because he has been a contractor he has thereby become ineligible to sit in this House or is an immoral man. For what purpose, then, is this enquiry? Grant that the charge is proved. Grant that the charge—which the Postmaster General has denied, not only in his place in Parliament, but on oath—is well founded and true, that after the hon. gentleman was elected in 1878, and during the time of that Parliament he became a Government contractor. Grant that that charge is sufficiently explicit in the statement made by the hon. member for West Lambton. Assume all that. Assume that a report is brought to the Table finding that the charge is true. What are we to do? What is to follow? Can you expel him? On what ground? Parliament has not said so by its Act: Parliament has not said so by its precedents. The report would lie there. It might be useful possibly as a compaign document to hon. members on the opposite side. But for all parliamentary purposes it would have to lie there as a dead letter, as every member of this House perfectly understands.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. My hon. friend from Bothwell says "hear, hear." I respect my hon. friend, although I do not always concur in his arguments or conclusions. But I think my hon. friend will admit that when the hon. member for South Lanark sits here under the writ which called on the people of South Lanark to return their representative, it does not lie with this Parliament to turn out that representative and disfranchise that constituency except under the law, under the constitution, or under precedents which any man can cite. Now, I need not go on repeating the argument which was so well put by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, and which the hon. gentleman who last spoke has not in the slightest degree attempted to controvert. He has pointed out that, stale as the charge is, there was no pretense that there was any cause and effect, any bargain, any exercise of improper influence by the Postmaster General or any wrong-doing on the part of the Government in connection with the hon. gentleman, supposing him to have been the contractor they allege. No charge of that kind is made. Surely, we ought to deal here not as partisans. This is a matter that concerns the honour and dignity of the House: this is a matter that ought to be dealt with on that principle. If that was the charge, surely the hon. member would have made it. The hon. member knows that these charges are not to be lightly made: and no doubt every word of this statement has been carefully and deliberately scanned and weighed, before being presented to this House; and the charge, therefore, contains all that the hon. gentleman pretends he can prove. Now, I submit, with every degree of confidence, that no man who has any regard for the dignity of this House, no man who has any regard for the principles which should guide our parliamentary practice, would for one moment countenance an accusation of this kind presented in the language in which it has been embodied. An hon. member said something about the Postmaster General having given the case away. I utterly deny that it rests with him or anybody else to determine that question. No doubt the Postmaster General desires an enquiry; no doubt he fears personally to have this charge made here and be denied the opportunity of disproving it before a committee: but that is a matter which concerns the Postmaster General simply and purely, and which does not concern this House. He may well desire that this thing should be set at rest once and for all—this stale charge which was made so long ago that I forget when it was made, my hon. friend beside me says ten years ago, before a commission: which came up afterwards before a court where not only Mr. Haggart himself, but Mr. McLaren was examined and cross-examined on the subject; which has, in point of fact, been public property during all these years. And yet, at the tail end of the session we have it again brought forward, with, I am confident, the best motives on the part of the hon. member for Lambton, but, I venture to say, without full consideration of the consequences involved in the application.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I agree with one observation made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, namely, that we ought not to approach the consideration of this question as partisans. We ought to approach it with the view of following the ordinary parliamentary rule and of exercising, or refraining from exercising, our parliamentary authority. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) referred to events which have recently transpired in the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and he pointed out that in certain cases that Parliament awaited the decision of the courts before taking any action on the conduct of members accused. The hon. member's statement is entirely accurate in that particular; but it is worthy of observation that the accusations brought against those hon. members were accusations affecting their private conduct and not their conduct as members of Parliament. The accusations made against them were not for offences against the law of Parliament but against the ordinary law of the land, for the enquiry and determination of which the ordinary law of the land makes proper provision. This is no new rule. It will be remembered that in the case of Lord Cochrane, which took place many years ago, he was accused of having speculated improperly in the funds, with a view of affecting their value and putting the money in his own pocket. That was a criminal offence, and he was tried for it and found guilty. It was subsequently shown that the verdict had been unjustly found against him, but Parliament took action upon the decision of the court, and refused to make any enquiry into his conduct, because it was a transaction altogether apart from his duties as a member of Parliament. Now, I understand that this accusation is of a very different kind, and I do not understand, from reading the charge made by the hon. member for West Lambton, that it is of the light character described by the Minister of Justice and by the hon. member for North Simcoe. Sir, if such a defence were made of a judge as the Minister of Justice has made here of a colleague, he would at once indignantly repudiate it. I remember the case of Lord Bacon, who accepted bribes from suitors when Lord Chancellor of England. In his own defence he declared that his conduct had never been influenced in the slightest degree by the acceptance of those bribes. Was that regarded as a defence? The Minister of Justice says that it has not been charged here that the conduct of the Government or the conduct of the Postmaster General in reference to these matters was at all improper. Let me say this, that I altogether repudiate that proposition. I say when the hon. member for West Lambton comes into this House and charges the Government with having received large sums of money from these contractors while their claims against the Government were still pending, that of itself is a charge of a high crime and misdemeanour against the Administration. I say it is not necessary that the hon. member for West Lambton should have said that the Government had corruptly received moneys from the contractors. I declare it my conviction, as a member of this House, that it is utterly impossible for an Administration to receive large sums of money from contractors to promote the interests of themselves and their party at elections in any other way than in a corrupt way; I say that the acceptance of money is a corrupt acceptance, and that when the hon. member charged that fact he made a charge sufficient to warrant an enquiry by a committee of this House. It is not necessary to go beyond that. The Minister of Justice and the hon. member for North Simcoe intimated that this was not a proper subject for enquiry by a committee. I would like to know what body is the proper body before which such an enquiry should be had. Where is the court in which the conduct of the Minister in having improperly received money from contractors is to be investigated? Is it not in this House? Is it not the most important duty of the high court of Parliament to enquire into the proper appropriation or misappropriation of the moneys of the people? The Crown has not moneys of its own. It has what we choose to give it, and we give the Crown what we are authorized, as deputies of the people, to give and grant. This money granted is money held in trust for public purposes, and who are the parties who should see whether that trust has been honestly discharged or not? Is it not this House, by a committee of this House, which should investigate this matter? Sir, we are the only tribunal which has jurisdiction. I know it has been sometimes suggested that a Royal Commission should enquire into these matters. I utterly repudiate that doctrine, as at variance with the principle and spirit of our constitution. It is not right that a Royal Commission should investigate into a matter of this kind. We do not propose to delegate to the accused parties the right to appoint the court by which they may be tried. That would be a most improper proceeding. When may a Royal Commission be appointed? It may be appointed for enquiry into subordinate matters, and is appointed upon the recommendation of Parliament in the mother country. Take the case of Lord Torrington, in the matter of the rebellion in the Island of Ceylon. A Royal Commission was appointed there, as it was too far away for Parliament to investigate: but it was appointed upon the express authority and recommendation of Parliament, and not upon the mere motion of the Government. We say here that the only proper parties, the only tribunal by which this enquiry can be made, before whom these parties can be brought, is this House, or a committee appointed by this House to take the evidence and report upon the subject. There can be no doubt of that. I was astonished to hear the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) referring as he did to the case which was before us of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane). What tribunal has a right to enquire into the conduct of a member? It is true that other parties may be implicated, or that other parties may have violated the statute and may be brought before the courts of law, and may be punished for their offences, but this House has a right to enquire into the conduct of its own members, it has a right to enquire into the conduct and methods of administration. It is said by the hon. the Minister of Justice and by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that this is a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, and that the Parliament in which the hon. gentleman had no right to sit, if these charges were true, is dead, that the hon. member was elected under a new writ and to a new Parliament, and that we have no right to investigate what transpired before. I am not going into a discussion of that matter at all. I may say that the violation of the Independence of Parliament Act is the violation of a statutory law, that, when the opportunity for punishment has gone by, there is no opportunity for enforcing the statute, and that, if there is simply an offence against the statute and against the statute alone, I agree with the hon. gentleman that this House would have no right to investigate the case, and that the election of the hon. member afterwards would be a regular and valid election, and his seat could not be touched, or, if it was touched, it would be done by an arbitrary act of the House, as the House of Commons in England acted arbitrarily in the case of Mr. Bradlaugh. But the question here is totally different. The question is not whether the hon. member's seat is affected, but whether the facts, if they are established, leave the hon. gentleman a proper officer of the Crown, a worthy representative of this House in advising the Crown; is he a worthy representative of this House as a member of the Commons which is to give advice to the Crown? That is the question, and that question is as fresh to day as it was on the day when the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) was sworn in a member of the Administration and received his patent as Postmaster General. The question, therefore, which we have to consider in connection with these charges is whether the hon. gentleman was a contractor with the Government at that time, or was so connected with the parties who had contracted with the Government, as to have a beneficial interest in the contract: did he, as one of the parties, pay out to the Government large sums of money for the purpose of influencing the election? Every hon. gentleman will understand that these men were not going to pay out money at a loss. Every hon. gentleman knows the evidence connected with that section B contract. Everyone knows that there were charges made against the engineer by the contractors, that he was removed, that the work done was remeasured, that the contractors received something in the neighbourhood of $400,000 more under the remeasurement than they were entitled to under the measurement of the engineer who was there before. If that be so, was that a correct measurement, was that man sent for the purpose of making such a measurement as would put money into the pockets of the parties more than they were entitled to receive? That is a proper thing to consider, when it is said that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been paid by these contractors over to the Administration for election purposes. Will the hon. gentleman say that, when members of the Administration who assumed the responsibility of dealing with these contractors, of in my opinion violating a public trust, if these charges are true, of taking money which was paid to the contractors in the first instance and repaid by the contractors to the Government in the second instance for improper purposes, it can for a moment be argued that they did not take out of the public treasury a much larger sum than would have been taken out if these contractors had been fairly and squarely dealt with? So, when we look at the statement contained in this allegation, this charge of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) affecting, as it does, the Postmaster General, and still more largely the members of the Administration who received that money; if the charges be true, looking at these facts, it is important that this House should investigate these charges and ascertain whether they have any foundation in fact or not. Surely, if this is not a proper subject of investigation by a committee of this House, then nothing we have done this session in that way was a proper proceeding. Take the case of the Admiral. Charges were made by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) against the Hon. Thomas McGreevy, that he had, in violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, between 1883 and 1888, had a contract with the Government in the name of another party by which he received the amount of $12,500 a year for services in connection with the Intercolonial Railway in the Baie des Chaleurs. Did the Minister of Justice rise and say: This is an old matter, the House has nothing to do with it, the Independence of Parliament Act has nothing to do with the case, new writs have been issued and we should not investigate that matter in the present Parliament?

Mr. GIROUARD. The offence was committed up to February, 1891.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The offence ceased before the writ was issued.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That does not appear by the charge, and I think the hon. gentleman will in fairness admit that it was only one in a large number of charges.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I admit in all fairness, as I only desire to be fair, that this was only one in a number of charges, but still the hon. gentleman reported it and censured the party charged. If that was a proper matter to investigate, this is an equally proper one. There are other matters which have been investigated this session which are quite as old as this one. The hon. gentleman says this is about eleven years old. He is mistaken. It is true that this contract was begun eleven years ago, but it was not ended eleven years ago. I understand that in 1884 over $200,000 were paid under this contract. I understand that this contract was not terminated until 1886 or 1887. The year 1887 is not so remote a period in antiquity that it is not proper for this House to investigate the matter. We say that the parties who are charged with acting improperly are still here. The parties who are charged with acting improperly are advisers of the Crown. If these charges are true, if a member of this House concealed the fact that he was a contractor with the Government, if he denied the fact on oath, and if my hon. friend is able to show that it was all true nevertheless, and that he was a contractor, that he did receive large sums of money, and that he contributed as one of the contractors large sums of money to the Government for election purposes, I think he will have gone a long way to establish that those gentlemen are not parties who ought to be entrusted with the duty of advising the Crown with regard to our public affairs, or of taking charge of the expenditure of the public moneys of this country.

Mr. BOWELL. Then you accuse the Postmaster General of perjury.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I point out this, that the Postmaster General has made oath that he was not a member of this partnership, that he was not beneficially interested.

Mr. BOWELL. You stated positively that the member for Lambton could prove that it was not true.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say that the member for Lambton states in these charges that he can prove that the hon. Postmaster General was beneficially interested in this contract. Now, that is what he says.

Mr. BOWELL. That is what you say.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, that is precisely what I say, and the Postmaster General has said to the contrary. He said the contrary to-day. He proposes to produce here a solemn declaration made by Senator McLaren that he was not a member of the partnership, that he was not beneficially interested in it. Certainly that is a clear issue. Parties could not stand in more direct antagonism with each other with regard to a question of fact than the hon. member for West Lambton in his charge and the hon. the Postmaster General in his denial. Is not that a proper matter for this House to enquire into? Has it no public importance? When Ministers take large sums of money from those contractors and use it in an election, will hon. gentlemen say that that does not affect the amount of money paid on the contract? Will any hon. gentleman say that if the Government received $200,000, or a less sum, from contractors for election expenses, that the work does not cost the country any more? Is this to be a matter of commission over again? Will it be contended that the payment of 10 per cent. did not add anything to the amount of money that was taken from the public treasury? I apprehend that the country will not accept any such defence; and I say again that when my hon. friend states that he is prepared to establish, if given a committee, the fact that the Government did receive large sums of money from these contractors, there is a charge made against the Administration that it is the duty of the House to enquire into. It is one of those cases that fall wholly within the purview of this House; this is the proper tribunal in which to make the enquiry; and there is no other tribunal known to the law that can enquire into the validity of those charges other than this House, or a committee of the House appointed to investigate the matter.

Mr. SKINNER. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down generally argues a case with a closeness that links principle and fact together so as to carry in the minds of hon. members at least a conviction that he understands himself what he is speaking about. But in this case he feels, I fancy, the weight of the arguments that have been used against the position he takes in reference to the staleness of the charge, in reference to the uncertainty of the charge, and in reference to the fact that if it were proved, it would have no effect upon the seat of the hon. member who is so charged; and also in reference to the fact that no moral offence is charged. He feels the weight of all these things, and practically casts them over, and makes what might be called an election or a hustings speech, instead of one applicable to the case now before the House. Now, what does the hon. member for Lambton say, in the first instance, in reference to this charge? He says he is credibly informed and believes that he is able to establish by satisfactory evidence such-and-such things: in other words, he makes no charge at all. It cannot be said that the hon. member for Lambton stands at the back of any charge. He says that he thinks, if he is given an opportunity to do so, that he will be able to establish thus and so, but he does not say that thus and so are true, he does not say that the hon. member did this or that with reference to these matters, but he only alleges that if he had an opportunity to do so he could prove them. He does not make any direct charges against the Postmaster General, but he merely casts a slur or a suspicion upon the Minister of having done something for a political purpose. With reference to the case the hon. member for Bothwell has cited, that of Lord Cochrane having speculated in public funds, as he says, in that case a crime had been committed, and Parliament acted upon the conviction of the party. Now, is there any parallel between that case and this? Has any crime been committed here? Is there any charge of crime here? Does the hon. member for Lambton say that he has even a suspicion of crime, or that he could prove it if he had an opportunity to do so? Nothing of the kind. The precedent has not in it the weight of air. With reference to the case of Lord Bacon having accepted bribes, surely the hon. member is hard pressed when he has to go back through the centuries for precedents. No precedent involving bribery has reference to any charge that is now before this House. All these things are common law offences, and whatever Parliament did in connection with them, Parliament acted in a different way from what we are called upon to act here: and if hundreds of years ago Parliament would have tried out the question of a crime, it is notorious that Parliament does not so act now with reference to charges of crime. It is very unfair and unjust to attack individual members of the House in their capacity as members, and to fling these charges of crime across the floor when hon. members have no charge of crime to make, and are not making any charges of crime. All this quotation of precedents having relation to crimes, is mere dirt throwing at members of this House. Now, supposing the tables were reversed. The cases of Mr. Jones, formerly a member for Halifax, and of Mr. Anglin, at the same time a Speaker of this House, have been referred to. Suppose, for example, these two gentlemen were sitting now on the other side of the House, having been returned in the elections that took place last winter. Suppose that some hon. member should get up on this side of the House and make the same charges against those two members for which they resigned at that time, and say there were moral offences committed, and that they were not worthy to be members of the House on account of what they had done then. Suppose these two gentlemen were members of the Government of the day, and that it should be claimed that they ought not to be members of the Government because of those offences, would not such charges be laughed at? Would not hon. gentlemen opposite themselves say that the thing was absurd? Would they not say that the charges were made merely for political effect? And yet that is just what the hon. member for Lambton is now doing in asking for a committee of investigation into certain insinuations he has made against the Postmaster General. Surely those hon. gentlemen are not sincere in the position they take. The hon. gentleman said the charge is one of the nature of a high crime and misdemeanour. Any one answers that argument by reading the charge. All the charge, if it be a charge, mentions is that the member infringed the Independence of Parliament Act. It has been shown that that is not a crime at common law, but an offence created by virtue of a statute. If an hon. gentleman rose in his place and declared that at an election ten years or five years ago the hon. gentleman in question had committed an offence against the Independence of Parliament Act, under which he would be punished by forfeiting his seat, would he be justified in asking for a committee to try the charge? Under that Act it is specially provided that disqualification is punishment for such an offence. After the lapse of one year, however, the operation of that Act lapses as regards any particular case. I will not undertake to argue that point, but I only mention it, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has omitted to reply to that and other arguments. The hon. gentleman spoke of appealing to the people, and at the same time he dodged the arguments brought forward, and in effect he said: I know my position is unsound, that these charges cannot be substantiated, that a committee should not be struck; but I will appeal from Parliament to the people, who will not examine the question in the same manner as will be done by hon. members in this House. The hon. gentleman comes down to refer to the position which the Postmaster General occupies towards the Government of the day. Let me read that portion of the charge, as I wish to make the reply as close as needs be. It is in these words:

"That during the progress of the said works, and while the said the Honourable John G. Haggart was so interested therein, members of the said firm were called upon by members of the Government of Canada for large contributions for political purposes, and such contributions were paid out of the moneys of the said firm, and with the knowledge and assent of the said Honourable John G. Haggart were charged against the profits of the firm."

Does the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member think for a moment that the offence of a gentleman sitting here contrary to law is increased because he contributed to election expenses? I hold that it would not affect the case one way or the other; it would not as a moral offence, and certainly it would not as a statutory one, if it was such an offence. It is not alleged that the hon. gentleman, or the firm with which it is alleged he was connected, took any money out of the public treasury, or that the Government contributed one cent more than it should pay. We find that the firm obtained money to which they were properly entitled, and they had a perfect right to contribute of their own money, if they pleased. It could not seriously be argued that they had not a right to contribute to elections if they thought fit to do so. There is a great deal of false virtue exhibited in this Parliament and before its committees and in the country about contributing to elections. We all know there is a very large legitimate expenditure in connection with elections.

Mr. GILLMOR. No, not very large.

Mr. SKINNER. I say there is. Take the elections which occurred last March. Hon. gentlemen opposite made an attempt—I will not, for the purpose of this argument, say they acted wrongly—to turn the legitimate course of this country into an entirely new stream, and they endeavoured to bring about a state of things in that regard that was almost revolutionary.

Mr. LISTER. How was it four years before?

Mr. SKINNER. Perhaps the same. I am not saying that hon. gentlemen opposite at the last election acted improperly, but they attempted to do something which in the nature of the case would have been of a revolutionary character, and in carrying forward that propaganda they of necessity went to very large expenditure. We know that the press cannot work for nothing. A large amount of money was required for advertising and publication purposes. We know that a large number of speakers were employed, that men travelled up and down the country as probably they had never travelled before on an election campaign. I do not wish to introduce anything of a controversial character; but, giving hon. gentlemen opposite credit for working according to their belief, it is commonly known that they went to a vast expense for the purpose of carrying forward the movement which they thought would benefit the country. How was that movement to be met? Was it to be met by hon. gentlemen abrogating their principles and by allowing matters to go their own way, and stating that they would meekly submit to this propaganda? No; expenditure had to be met with expenditure; and it had to be so.

Mr. LISTER. You got it from your contractors, and we from our supporters.

Mr. SKINNER. It does not affect my argument from whom the money came. I am giving hon. gentlemen opposite credit for getting the money honestly; and outside of all this question of contractors, within my knowledge I know that plenty of money was correctly and honestly spent in the elections on our side, and no contractors ever contributed anything.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Which side is that?

Mr. SKINNER. It scarcely becomes us to be eternally talking about the expenditure of money on elections, and at the same time shutting our eyes to the common history of our country, as we are doing. Let us apply these arguments to this portion of the charge:

"That during the progress of the said works, and while the said Hon. John G. Haggart was so interested therein, members of the said firm were called upon by members of the Government of Canada for large contributions for political purposes."

If that were true, it is not a matter for enquiry here. Even according to this charge the money belongs to this firm, and even if they paid it out for political purposes, that was their own business; and if it was expended for political purposes, it is not for us to ascertain whether it was so or not. It is not for us to enquire here——

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear hear.

Mr. SKINNER. You will make yourself hoarse.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Go to the courts.

Mr. SKINNER. I am going to finish this sentence as I started it, notwithstanding the interruption. It is not for us to enquire here, after the manner of an election court, as to expenditures made years and years ago. It would be the most supreme folly for us, if charges were made respecting expenditure of money as this charge is made here, to have a committee of enquiry appointed on each case. I could understand the hon. gentleman, if he made a charge that in 1879 the Government received money from contractors and so forth; and hon. gentlemen opposite might make that the subject of a motion of want of confidence in the Government, and have it turned out. But it will not do by inserting the thin end of the wedge to turn our parliamentary committees into committees of enquiry on election cases, and thereby rob the election courts of their jurisdiction so far as they may take it up. Examining that portion of the charge, it does not allege that any money was dishonestly taken from the Government. It is going rather too far to say, as the hon. member for Bothwell argued, that the moment a member violates the Independence of Parliament Act, it becomes an offence such as he has attempted to describe, and becomes immoral. The taking of that money because you are a member of Parliament is not to rob the country of anything. It is only to say that you being in that position, notwithstanding the services you may have rendered, you are not entitled to the money. That is all the law says on that point. When it was alleged that the Hon. Mr. Jones and the Hon. Mr. Anglin of the Parliament between 1873 and 1878, took money, I do not understand that because they took money that they were not entitled to by law, they did anything immoral because they had not rendered services to the country. I suppose Mr. Anglin gave value for the money; I never heard it contended that he did not. But if the hon. gentlemen opposite were correct in their argument, notwithstanding that he gave full value for the money, still because he got the money in violation of the Act, he became immoral and became tainted forever, and could never again sit in the House without having the shadow of an immoral offence upon him, and at all events would never have been in a position to become a member of the Government in Canada. That is the length to which the hon. gentleman wants us to go. I think he must know on reflection that he can not only produce no precedent for an idea like that, but he must know that it is absurd, that it is against all sound reasoning, and that it is an argument which on reflection he would not put to this House again, nor even to the electors on the hustings, if he wanted to guard his reputation and to keep it as high as it now stands before the House and before the country as well. Therefore I think that the hon. gentleman stands now in a double position. Not only did he fail to meet the unanswerable arguments of the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), but he has also put forword arguments which are unsound in themselves and which cannot be for a single moment maintained in this House. The hon. gentleman's concluding argument was, that the firm referred to in the charge may have taken larger sums of money than they were entitled to. That is a very easy thing to say; but does the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) charge it? Is it going to be said that an hon. member can get up in this House and say that he will have an investigation because it was possible that under certain circumstances a certain thing could have been done. I say such a thing cannot be allowed, and I think the hon. gentleman would not again have advanced that argument to the House if he considered the proposition it contained. I say the argument is unworthy of him, and, therefore, I come back to the fact that the arguments of hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this side have not only not been met, but that hon. gentlemen on the other side have put forward the weakest case that it is almost possible for a person to imagine, when it is seriously demanded that a Committee of Parliament should be asked to enquire into such a matter. I maintain in the first place, as has been stated, that there really is no charge at all. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) does not say he makes the charge. He only claims the privilege to see whether or not he can prove it, and when his supporters speak in this Parliament in favour of that proposition they carry it no further, and only ask that a committee be appointed upon a grave charge which can neither be sustained in fact nor in law. I believe that the proposition to appoint a committee should be rejected by the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I listened with extreme regret, Sir, to the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. Minister of Justice, and for my own part I desire to record my conviction that no more immoral speech was ever delivered in Parliament. Sir, we had hoped, as we had some right to hope, that the hon. gentleman who is a comparatively new member of this Cabinet, who may have been supposed not to be acquainted with all that we have known as to the ways and means by which his predecessors got into office and were kept in office; was to some extent at any rate sincere in the declaration which he and his chief have made over and over again, that they desire to screen no man, that they desire to make honest enquiry and honest investigation into every reasonable charge that can be preferred against any member of their Cabinet or against any member of this House. Now, Sir, we know what that hon. gentleman's professions are worth. We know, Sir, what we have to expect from this hon. gentleman. Sir, the hon. gentleman perhaps has heard, as I have heard and as others have heard, that there are certain casuists who are willing to prove that there is no conceivable crime in the calendar that cannot be committed ad majorem dei gloriam. Substitute party for Providence, and we have a tolerable idea of the morals and principles which the hon. gentleman, to my regret, and I hope to his own regret when his conscience wakes up, proves to have advocated to-day. Why, Sir, what has this hon. gentleman got to tell us? That it is no crime for a member of this House to have taken, it may be, $100,000 or $200,000 of the public money under false pretenses as a contractor, and in conjunction with other members of that same firm of which he was a member in disguise, to have paid large sums to the Government for political purposes. That is the charge. We are told that it was no crime for him to have expended large portions of that money for the purpose of debauching the electors in connivance with the Government of the day, and that, in the opinion of the Minister of Justice, is no offence, it is not a statutory offence, it is not a moral offence, it is not a thing that requires the investigation of Parliament. I never heard such a doctrine proclaimed before, and I trust, for the honour of Canada, that we will never hear it advanced again. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, besides that, was disingenuous as mortal man can be in dealing with the statements of my hon. friend. What was his argument from first to last? These things he says took place twelve years ago. Why, Sir, he knows, if he knows anything of the history of section B, and if he had listened to the statement of his friend the Postmaster General, he would have known, that whether it commenced in 1879 or 1880 it did not matter, because it extended over six or seven years, and probably the end of this affair was not attained until 1887, a matter of barely four years ago. Yet he and his friend who has just spoken have made the House ring with their denunciation of stale charges dating back half-a-score of years. Why, Sir, this charge is not nearly so stale as the charge which I made from my place here twelve months ago against the then hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). That matter had all been disposed of, that matter had all been closed years before the charge was made, but we did not find that an objection to going into the question: we did not find that a reason why we should not examine it. But, Mr. Speaker, I think it would have been better on the whole if the hon. gentleman who spoke last had confined himself—for, after all, perhaps that would be his best defence—to an argument which I heard advanced not very long ago in respect to a somewhat similar case. The hon. member, the Postmaster General, may not be clean, but he is probably quite as clean as is necessary for the company he keeps. Let us consider the desperate position which the Ministers have assumed on this question. If this charge be false, if my hon. friend has been misinformed, if he be unable to establish it, the political advantage to the Ministers of proving that charge false, would be immense. If this charge could be shown and proved to be false, it would go very far indeed to relieve them from the cloud which hangs over the hon. gentleman and his colleagues with respect to the doings of other members of that Cabinet than the late Minister of Public Works. They would have everything to gain, in a political point of view, if this charge be false, by causing it to be investigated. Sir, I say that these hon. gentlemen have committed, or rather are committing, a political mistake of the very first magnitude, because even if this charge is proved it will do them less evil, it will do them less harm in the public mind, and in the minds of all honest men the world over, than if they refuse, as they now propose to do, to allow it to be investigated. Mr. Speaker, these things are not done in a corner. Every word my hon. friend stated in his place yesterday has long ere this been placed in the hands of all the electors of the Dominion of Canada; it has appeared this morning in all the leading journals of the adjacent republic; it has appeared in the principal journals of the mother country——

Mr. FOSTER. The party machine.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—and after what we have known and seen during the last few weeks, but one conclusion will be drawn from the conduct of the hon. gentlemen—that they know that the Postmaster General is guilty of everything that has been alleged, and dread and fear the result of the investigation, and therefore they call upon their majority to vote it down. Sir, I have no doubt myself, and never had, that the Railway Department was a worthy sister of the Department of Public Works. I have no doubt and never had, that just as we have found that for the last eight years hundreds of thousands of dollars of the public money have been stolen from the public chest, by the aid of the officers of the Department of Public Works, and have been divided up for political purposes with the co-conspirators, who aided in that steal, in the same way, I have no doubt, if my hon. friend were permitted to have his committee to go into the matter, that we should find that the sister department has been keeping up its end of the stick in precisely the same fashion. Sir, this is not a matter, even if it occurred twelve years ago, which we should be justified in allowing the lapse of time to prevent us dealing with. Sir, I have always contended, as hon. gentlemen know, and my contention is the only possible principle on which the conduct of members of Parliament can be regulated, that every member of Parliament is ex officio a trustee, and every member of the Government is doubly and trebly a trustee by virtue of his office; and if it can be shown that lapse of time does not prevent us dealing with the trustees in their management of the affairs of their wards, and if it can be shown that one of the colleagues of hon. gentlemen opposite, five or six or eight years ago, forgot his duties as a trustee so far as to put large sums of money into his pocket, whether it be $100,000, or $150,000, or $200,000, by a deliberate violation of the Act of Parliament in such cases made and provided, that act alone would condemn the Postmaster General. If he were found thus guilty of being a false and fraudulent trustee to the people of Canada, he would be utterly and wholly unfit to continue one hour an adviser of His Excellency; and, Sir, although we do not often introduce His Excellency's name here, I would like to know whether His Excellency is acquainted with the course his Ministers are preparing to take on this occasion. The hon. gentleman will not undertake to say that he has communicated this charge to His Excellency, I venture to say, and received any intimation from His Excellency as to how he would like it to be dealt with. But, behind all this, there is a very large question of policy. It is inexpedient to the last degree to the good government of this country, that we should offer a premium to concealment. Every man who knows anything of the mode in which these contracts were let and carried on, and the way in which the political machine on the other side has been run, knows that it is and always has been a matter of extreme difficulty, except, indeed, in cases of a quarrel occurring among the parties, to ascertain what has been going on. Remember that my hon. friend has made statements which involve the honour and implicate the good government of an Administration of which a portion at any rate of the hon. gentleman's colleagues were members as long as his contract continued, which I believe was up to 1885 or 1886 or 1887 at any rate, until it was finally finished. Now, Sir, is there any man here who will dare to rise up and tell me that the contractors on section B came down here times without number and subscribed large sums over and over again for political purposes, out of pure good will towards hon. gentlemen opposite? We know this: never a dollar is subscribed by contractors without being repaid ten-fold out of the treasury. We know that contractors, being keen business men, will make no contribution to party funds unless they have a perfect certainty that the bread they cast upon the waters will be returned to them buttered on both sides before many days. Now, Sir, there is no use in telling us that it need add materially to the length of the session. Why, Sir, the men chiefly concerned are within two hours rail of this place; a telegram would reach the remainder. One or two of them are either members of the other branch of the Legislature or colleagues of the hon. gentleman. I would venture to say that a very few hours of investigation, properly conducted, would enable the hon. gentleman to establish the facts of his case, and would, if he has been misinformed, enable the hon. gentlemen opposite to clear themselves of the accusation which has been brought against them. Sir, I desire to say a word or two as to the duties of this House; and I think my knowledge of constitutional law on this subject is as good as that of either my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Mc Carthy) or the hon. Minister of Justice. As I understand it, we sit here, the representatives of the people of Canada, for the especial purpose of watching, checking, investigating and ascertaining how the moneys which we, in our capacity as members of Parliament, vote to the Government are expended; and everything connected with them is a proper subject of investigation by this House or by any committee which this House may choose to appoint. That, Sir, I contend, is the true constitutional doctrine; and when my hon. friend rises in his place and declares: You have seen from day to day and from hour to hour how your confidence has been abused, you have seen how the people of Canada have been plundered, you have seen what an organized system of corruption has existed in one important department of the Government; I should like to ask: Is he not justified under these circumstances in saying, information has come into my hands which shows that another great department of the Government has been honeycombed with corruption, and has been the means of providing equally large sums to those which have been scattered in connection with the Esquimalt dock, the Quebec dock and the Lévis harbour works, for the purpose of debauching the electors of Canada. My hon. friend is in his right in every way. I may tell the hon. gentlemen that they need not delude themselves with the idea that this matter is going to rest here. They need not delude themselves with the idea that, though their majority will vote down the proposition of my hon. friend, this matter will rest or that they will escape. In the present temper of the people of Canada, their refusal will be interpreted, as it ought to be, as a deliberate confession of guilt.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Their refusal will be interpreted as a proof of what I have again and again declared on the hustings and from my place in this House and over my signature, and to which I have challenged proof in rebuttal, which proof was never given, that from first to last, from the time their precious policy of legalized robbery, otherwise called the National Policy, was inaugurated, down to these latest developments, when we find the pettiest offices put up to sale to provide funds for political purposes, the Government of which the hon. gentleman is a member, the Government which he and his predecessors have pretended has the confidence of the people, owe their position to this and to nothing else, that they have succeeded, just by such means as these, in providing funds to influence the ignorant portion of the electorate, by whose votes alone they have succeeded in keeping the places they hold.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CASEY. I confess that, looking at this matter merely as a party man, I think the whole party to which I belong should be extremely well satisfied with the turn this affair has taken. If anything could be conceived more calculated to injure the Government than their refusal to grant an enquiry which is demanded by constitutional practice, into the conduct of one of its own members, such a thing has, at least, not yet been imagined by any preceding government. At the same time, while this course is so favourable to us and so hurtful to the Government, it has a bearing upon constitutional government and the dignity of this House which does not allow us to regard it with unmixed satisfaction, and therefore it is necessary that we should criticise it further. The principal subject of criticism must, no doubt, be the speech of the Minister of Justice. A couple of his supporters came to his aid, but I cannot see that their observations had much to do with the question. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) expressed the whole pith of his speech in the first few sentences he uttered, when he said it was about time for the House to consider when these investigations were going to stop. That is the whole point of the hon. gentleman's speech. I do not wonder that he came to that conclusion; I do not wonder that he thought it high time for these investigations to stop. The result of the investigations which have been held have not been of a nature to reassure hon. gentlemen on that side as to the propriety of going on with any more; and the whole drift of his speech was to produce reasons why no more investigations into the alleged misconduct of members of the Government and their supporters should be permitted. From a personal and party point of view, it would be better for some members on that side that the investigations should not proceed. The hon. gentleman's argument strongly reminded me of the expression used by a little darkey boy who was in a crowd of other boys. The question arose as to the whereabouts of a missing jack-knife, and it was proposed to search the pockets of Sambo to find it. Sambo had not learned his lesson in casuistry from the Minister of Justice, and agreed in the first instance to have his pockets searched, and said nothing until they came to a particular pocket. When they came to look through that he said: "You can't put your hand in dar." "Why not?" they asked. "Because," he said, "that is where the knife is." Probably this is one of the reasons why the investigation into this particular pocket is not granted on the other side. This may be where the jack-knife is. I am afraid that the hon. Minister implicated in this matter must have had a chance to whisper to the jury. He must have copied the expression of the betting men who when on trial for having swindled somebody out of a bet, was given the opportunity to whisper into the ear of the foreman of the jury: It is time for us betting men to stand by one another—and won his case. The hon. Minister must have had the opportunity to whisper into the ear of the hon. member for Simcoe: It is time for us boodling men to stand by one another, and see where this process of investigation is going to stop. The hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Skinner) also chimed in to support boodling, or, to put it more exactly, against investigation into boodling. It was of course necessary for that hon. gentleman, who has so lately become a recruit to the Conservative party, to prove that he is thoroughly in sympathy with the methods and aims of his colleagues. His remarks on this case, as well as another matter on which he spoke, the East Northumberland matter, a few days ago, are sufficient evidence of his intention to be a thorough-going colleague of hon. gentlemen opposite for the future. He has paid his footing as a member of that party by these two speeches. He is thoroughly entitled now to be enrolled on the books of the party; but, apart from this circumstance his speech has little to do with the question at issue. The Minister of Justice, on the other hand, being not only the representative of the Government in this House, but the representative of justice in the whole Dominion, is entitled to have his remarks carefully studied and their import thoroughly understood. He has gone further than any of his predecessors ever went when he denied the right of this House to enquire into matters affecting its own privileges and the standing of its members. His predecessor, as leader of this House, the late Premier, never ventured to go so far. Why, when the late Mr. Huntington made his charges in regard to the Pacific scandal, in 1873, it is true that Sir John Macdonald gave the word to call in the members without a word of debate on the question and voted down the motion for a committee of enquiry. But he was careful, a few days afterwards, to come down to this House to explain his action on that occasion, to say that he did not think it was right that the House should be asked, on the first blush of the charge, to appoint a committee of enquiry, and he then himself proposed the appointment of a committee of enquiry into those charges. The Government, which at first refused to allow a committee to be appointed on the motion of Mr. Huntington, had a committee of enquiry appointed on its own motion. It appeared afterwards that that committee had not the requisite powers to examine witnesses under oath and to get at the facts of the case. The Government proposed to get over that difficulty by appointing a commission, and, though that was objected to by some of the members on this side of the House, they did appoint such commission. It may have been a partisan commission, but it was a means of enquiry, and, as a matter of fact, that enquiry led to the downfall of the Government. We find that the late Sir John—the great Sir John—had so much regard for constitutional practice and for the privileges of this House that, after he had administered a rebuke to the members of the Opposition, he went on to get an enquiry made. Has the present Sir John the intention of following a similar course? On the contrary, he flouts the right of the members of this House to get an enquiry, and moves that the House, having heard the charges and the denial, shall proceed to the Orders of the Day. He offers nothing whatever to take the place of a committee, to which he objects on the ground of the lateness of the session, and he simply ignores the charges. I ask the House to contrast the course taken by the two knights who have had the honour to lead this House on these different occasions. The one, though carried away by his feelings for the moment, finally did what was necessary to support the dignity of the House. The other proposes to pass the matter by because the charges have been denied by the party accused. What has our late experience taught us in regard to the denials which have been made across the floor of the House by members who are accused? Was not the denial of Mr. Rykert, whom the Minister of Justice practically assisted in expelling from the House, as full and complete across the floor as that which has been made to-day? Was not the denial of the member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) as complete a denial as could be made across the floor of the House? Was not the denial of the late Minister of Public Works as to irregularities in his department as complete a denial as possibly could be made across the floor of the House? The result is that each of these denials has been found to be contrary to the facts of the case. So we cannot be asked to accept a denial made by a Minister as a conclusive answer to an accusation made on the responsibility of a member of the House. Then the objections of the hon. Minister of Justice may be condensed into these—first, that he thinks the privileges of the House are not involved in this matter; secondly, that the action complained of took place too long ago; thirdly, that it does not matter anyhow whether the Postmaster General was guilty of this conduct or not; and fourthly, that it is too late in the session to enquire into it, no matter what might be the consequences of the lack of action. As to the question bearing on the privileges of the House, I do not think there can be two opinions. It is certainly a question of privilege whether a member has been guilty of a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, but here again the hon. Minister has had the—what shall I call it?—I can call it, at all events, within parliamentary language—the audacity, to say that it makes no difference to the present standing of the Postmaster General whether these charges are proved or not, that no stigma would rest on his character for having broken the Independence of Parliament Act for a series of years. If the Minister of Justice thinks it would reflect no discredit upon him to sit in the same Cabinet with a man guilty of the offences charged against the Postmaster General, I am sorry for his taste and for his opinion of his own dignity and honour. But whatever degradation of sentiment the hon. gentleman may have undergone in regard to this matter, no matter how much he may feel that it is proper to sit in the same Cabinet with a man convicted of this crime, I believe the country and the other members of this House will regard it in another light. The hon. Minister has tried to get around that by saying that other members who had erred in this way have come back from the people afterwards and occupied their seats in this House without a stigma resting upon them. The hon. Minister deliberately misrepresented the facts in regard to those gentlemen. The actions in consequence of which they forfeited their seats were not of the same character as that alleged against the Postmaster General, and which the Minister of Justice would not allow made any difference in his standing in Parliament. He instanced the case of the former Speaker of this House, Mr. Anglin, and of Messrs. Vail and Jones, successively Ministers of Militia. Let me recall to those who were members of the House at that time, and let me inform those who were not, that these cases differed entirely from this one. In the case of Mr. Anglin, there was not a contract with the Government, as has been incorrectly stated by the Minister of Justice. That was charged by the present Minister of Customs, but it was proved that there had been none. In the case of Messrs. Jones and Vail it was also shown that there had been no contract. Their offence was simply what is going on to-day, without exciting any disgust on that side of the House and apparently without being sufficient to void the seat of any member. It was just that the Government of that day gave certain printing to the newspapers in which these gentlemen were interested. That was the offence of Mr. Anglin, that was the offence of Mr. Vail and of Mr. Jones, who were interested in newspaper offices to which printing had been given. It was a transaction exactly of the same kind as the one that is going on now with the Montreal Gazette, a paper with which the late Minister of the Interior and the present member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was and is respectively connected as much as Mr. Vail or Mr. Jones was with the newspapers in consequence of their connection with which they had to give up their seats in this House. Their case was by no means as clear in either of those instances as the case of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who practically owns the whole of the Regina Leader, a newspaper to which a large amount of Government printing is given every year, entirely out of proportion to the amounts given in those other cases. And yet, Sir, these facts are not held to void the seat of the gentlemen named, because the management of these papers is nominally vested in joint stock companies. But at the time when these occurrences took place to which reference has been made, it was the rule enforced by many precedents in the past, that the Government might give printing to such of its supporters as controlled newspapers, or rather to the newspapers under their control, without voiding their seats in the House.

Precedents had been made to that effect, and I am going to give you in some detail an account of how the precedents came to be reversed in the case of Mr. Anglin and in the cases of Mr. Vail and Mr. Jones, to show you how differently the Government of that day dealt with allegations of this kind, from the manner in which the present Government propose to deal with them, or rather refuse to deal with them. Now, let us take the case of Mr. Anglin. In view of the exordium of the Minister of Justice, in which he stated that notice ought to be given of this motion in the ordinary way, and that it should have been taken up as a notice of motion in its due course, I will call attention to the manner in which the attack was made upon Mr. Anglin. The attack was made by the gentleman who is now Minister of Customs; and how was it brought up? On notice of motion? No, Sir. As a matter of privilege, even? No, Sir. It was brought up as an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply. We find that on that occasion Mr. Bowell "moved that the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved," and so on, quoting the facts and reciting from the Independence of Parliament Act, and concluded by moving that such practices are calculated to detract from the independence of members of this House.

Mr. BOWELL. That was an attack upon the Government, not upon the Speaker.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman says now, as he pretended then, that this was an attack upon the Government and not upon the Speaker, whereas we all know perfectly well that he and his leader both made it an attack upon the Speaker, and I think Sir John A. Macdonald himself told the Speaker that he had no more right to sit in his chair than one of the pages who ran about the floor.

Mr. BOWELL. That is quite true.

Mr. CASEY. It may have been quite true, but it was an attack upon the Speaker, and the present Minister of Customs and his leader, and all who backed them up on that side, attacked the Speaker and attempted to belittle him personally. The only possible outcome of the motion, if it had carried, would have been that the Speaker's seat would have been declared vacant; consequently, this motion was an attack upon the Speaker as well as upon the Government. Sir, the motion involved a question of fact and a question of law. It was an admitted fact that certain payments had been made to Mr. Anglin by the Government on account of printing. That resolution alleged that this money had been paid under an agreement or contract with Mr. Anglin. There was a question of fact and of law both, whether the order to do certain printing and the subsequent performance of the printing constituted a contract. The discussion went on for some time in this unfair method of argument, because it was markedly unfair to attack a member's seat on a motion moved as an amendment to go into Committee of Supply. The discussion continued for some time, and finally the motion was defeated. Amongst those who voted on the motion to condemn the Speaker and to declare his seat vacant, without even a reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, without notice given in the ordinary manner, and on the unheard of and unfair proceeding of moving on going into Committee of Supply—amongst those who voted to condemn the Speaker in that matter were several gentlemen who are now members of this House, and who now object to any enquiry at all into the acts of the Postmaster General. I will read a few of the names: Bowell, Caron, Costigan, Desjardins, Dewdney, Ferguson, Haggart—above all others the gentleman who is now Postmaster General, who now is not willing that his conduct should be investigated by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who shirks any enquiry into the allegations made against him; on that occasion he voted to condemn the Speaker, who sought the privilege of justifying himself before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, while the then member for Lanark, the present Postmaster General, voted to refuse him that privilege and to condemn him unheard. I see also the names of Kirkpatrick, Langevin, Macdonald (Kingston), McCarthy, Ouimet, White (North Renfrew). Those gentlemen, of the opinions of one of whom, at all events, you, Mr. Speaker, may have some recollection, voted to condemn the then Speaker without giving him the privilege of having his conduct reviewed before the Committee of Privileges and Elections. Now, Sir, the rest of the gentlemen whom I have named, not including yourself, will have an opportunity of voting to prevent the investigation of the charges against the present Postmaster General. They who were so eager to condemn a man unheard then, are now unwilling to let the charges against another man be heard. After that motion had been defeated, I want to call your attention to the manner in which the Government treated this matter. After that motion was defeated it fell to myself, then acting as the Government whip, to move a reference of the whole matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It was felt that a case for enquiry had been made out against the Speaker. I moved:

"That attention having been called to the matter, all the said papers be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and they be directed to enquire into the facts, to search for precedents, and report the result of their enquiries; and whether the said Hon. T. W. Anglin has vacated his seat."

The case went to that committee, composed then, as now, of members of both parties. And what was the result? Did the Government of the day try to burke the enquiry before that committee? Far from it. However, we find that the Committee on Privileges and Elections made a unanimous report, as follows:—After hearing Mr. Anglin, Hon. A. Macdonald, late Postmaster General, and other witnesses, and after papers had been examined, the committee came to the conclusion:

"That it appears from the evidence before the Committee that the Hon. T. W. Anglin, since he has been elected a member of this House, has fulfilled various orders given by public officers for the insertion in his newspaper, the St. John Freeman, of advertisements in connection with the public service, and various orders given by the post office inspector, under the instructions of the Postmaster General, for the printing of forms required for the Post Office Department, and has received public moneys for such advertisements and printing; that it appears from Mr. Anglin's evidence that his action was taken under the bonâ fide belief, founded on the precedent and practice hereinafter stated, that he was not thereby holding, engaging, undertaking or executing any contract or agreement within the second section of the Act 31 Victoria, chapter 35, for securing the Independence of Parliament.

"That in the year 1864, an Election Committee of the Legislative Assembly of the late Province of Canada, found that the publication by the member for Russell of advertisements for the public service, paid for with the public moneys, did not create a contract within the meaning of the Provincial Act, the provisions of which are, so far as is material, as follows:—

"No person whosoever holding or enjoying, undertaking or executing, any contract or agreement with Her Majesty, or with any public officer or department with respect to the public services of the Province, or under which any public money of the Province is to be paid for any service, work, matter or thing, shall be eligible as a member, &c."

In giving their decision the Committee used the following language:—

"It is to be remembered, however, that the statute is a disabling and penal one, and must be strictly interpreted. The word 'contract' is accordingly to be taken in its most restricted meaning. There must be, in our opinion, a distinct covenant, or a subsisting and continuous agreement, assented to by the parties, and having the character of mutuality. The words themselves may be said in some sense to bear out this view, for it is required to be held or enjoyed, undertaken or executed.

"That it appears from the evidence taken by the Committee and from the Public Accounts of the Dominion, and returns laid before Parliament, that between 1867 and 1873, numerous orders given by public officers for the insertion of advertisements connected with the public service were fulfilled, and various sums of public money were in respect thereof received, by several persons then being members of Parliament: and that, under the practices were notorious, it was never alleged in Parliament, that the members concerned therein, had entered into disqualifying contracts, but they held their seats unchallenged through two Parliaments. The Committee are of opinion that, in point of law, the same principle must govern the case referred to them, and the cases of the Russell election and the said other members."

Thus it appeared from the precedents of Parliament of Canada that up to that time the seat of a member of Parliament was not necessarily vacated by the fact that he had done printing of any kind on the order of the Crown or any officer thereof. What conclusion did the Government arrive at? Did the Committee say that Mr. Anglin was cleared, although he had innocently and in good faith and in the presence of many precedents done Government printing, as it was then understood he had a right to do? No; that Committee, on which the friends of the Government of the day were in a majority, reported as follows:—

"The Committee are, however, of opinion that the said precedent and practice are erroneous, and that, according to the true construction of the Act for securing the independence of Parliament, the transactions in question did constitute disqualifying contracts."

The Committee held that there was no contract, and therefore Mr. Anglin's seat was not vacated according to the law as interpreted up to that time. The Committee reported:

"And therefore find: That the Hon. Timothy Warren Anglin, member for the electoral district of the County of Gloucester, after his election for the said electoral district, became a party to a contract or agreement with the Postmaster General of Canada, with respect to the Public Service of Canada, and under which public money of Canada has been paid for certain service and work, and that this election thereby became void."

And therefore the seat of Mr. Anglin was vacated. The Minister of Justice has said that if the charges against the Postmaster General were all proved, no stigma would rest on his character. He quoted the case to which I have been referring in some detail in illustration, because no stigma rested on the character of Mr. Anglin. The cases are quite different, and the difference is clear. Mr. Anglin had acted in accordance with all precedents up to that time. He was unseated because the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which the matter had been referred by the action of the Government of the day, and in spite of the fact that a majority of his own friends were on the Committee, reported that although Mr. Anglin was technically within his rights, yet, taking a broad view of the independence of Parliament, he had gone beyond it, and must vacate his seat. He went back to his constituents and was re-elected, and, as the Minister of Justice has said, he came back without the slightest stigma on his character. Why? Not because he was re-elected, but because he had not been guilty of any crime. It was because he had acted in good faith and in accordance with parliamentary usage up to that time, that there had never been any stigma on his character. The Minister of Justice contends that re-election would remove a stigma, and quotes this case as proof. The cases of Messrs. Jones and Vail were similar. Their disqualification arose in the same casual manner from some printing matters. In consequence of this new interpretation of the law they went back to their constituents, and they also came back without any stigma on their character, for the same reason, viz., that no stigma had ever rested there. They went back to their constituents to remove a technical disability, newly created by the decision of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. These cases, so far from assisting the Minister of Justice in his contention, show in the broadest and clearest light the difference in the methods of dealing between the Liberal Government of that day and the Conservative Government now. In that case enquiry was courted; in that case the Government's friends on the Committee on Privileges and Elections, went far beyond existing precedents in pressing the carrying out of the law both in the letter and spirit against one of their own friends. In this case, the Conservative Government refuse enquiry altogether. If re-election would remove a stigma, if it was only necessary that a man should be re-elected to wipe out such a blot, why did the Government consent to an investigation in the case of the hon. member for East Northumberland? He had been re-elected since the time he was charged with committing petty acts of corruption, not to be compared in amount and importance to these now charged against the Postmaster General. The Government had not then reached the sublime point of audacity to which they have now attained. They did not feel that they dare refuse an enquiry into the Cochrane case, and although that hon. gentleman has been re-elected since the time of committing the irregularities, the Government granted the committee enquiry was made, and a report laid before the House. It may have been in consequence of their experience in that case that they came to the conclusion that enquiry must be stopped; but, at all events, the granting of their consent to the enquiry in that case has estopped them from objecting to enquiry in the present case, on the ground that the Postmaster General has been re-elected since those events happened. Only four or five years have elapsed since this contract in question came to a termination, although it was entered into twelve years ago. It went on during two Parliaments at all events, and although there has been an election since, that fact certainly does not estop enquiry in this case any more than in the case of the hon. member for East Northumberland. The argument as to the lateness of the session requires to be mentioned more by way of ridicule than by way of serious argument. What does it matter how long the session has been, what does it matter whether members are put to inconvenience or not, compared with the question of either proving or disproving the charges that now rest on a Minister of the Crown. Is it to be supposed the Postmaster General can hold up his head among his colleagues and hon. members and before the electors with these charges hanging over him, and with the fact that his colleagues, no doubt with his consent, and perhaps at his urgent request, decided to refuse to him and his accusers the chance, respectively, of clearing or condemning him? Can he pose as a member of the Government in good standing while these charges hang over him? He cannot. The Minister of Justice is doing an injustice to his own colleagues by keeping him in that position. If the Postmaster General can be proved innocent, our party will have received a more crushing blow than it has received for many years, in view of the manner in which these charges are being pushed forward and pressed. While hon. gentlemen opposite declare these charges are false, they refuse us the opportunity of proceeding to their proof, and they refuse the opportunity to their colleague of proving his innocence. The country must and will draw the conclusion that his innocence could not be proved, and that the Government and he himself are afraid to have the case go to trial. While that state of things exists, I say that the Postmaster General cannot be recognized as a member of Parliament in good standing, and as one free from all suspicion of having sinned against the privileges of this House, and neither he nor his colleagues nor those who vote to prevent enquiry in this case can hold themselves free from suspicion of connivance at a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act. But, Sir, still worse than the effect upon the character of the Postmaster General and of those who vote to prevent enquiry in this instance is the effect that this will have upon the reputation of the Minister of Justice himself. That hon. gentleman had begun to earn a reputation for impartiality from his remarks in the earlier part of this session, and it had begun to be believed that he really wished to see an investigation into all matters where wrong-doing was alleged, and the punishment of everybody who was proven to be guilty, no matter how high the guilty person might be placed. We began to think that the Minister of Justice preferred righteousness and purity to guilt and corruption, and that he intended to induce the Government of which he was a member to set out on new principles, punishing corruption wherever it was found and keeping their skirts clear from the sins which had defiled the garments of their predecessors, and going ahead with a clean sheet as that re-constructed Government might have done. If that policy had been adhered to the Minister and his Government would have obtained credit for the desire to do well and for the acts which they did do well. But, Sir, what a fall is there when we find the Minister of Justice, the first who has ever dared to lay down the dictum in this House that it is not wrong that a member of Parliament and a Minister, for a number of years, should have systematically violated the Act securing the independence of this House. It was bad enough when a few days ago the House voted that it was no offence against Parliament to sell petty offices for cash for elections or personal purposes, but when we find the highest authority on jurisprudence in the Government and in the country declaring that such conduct as is charged against the Postmaster General is no stigma on a member of this House, we have reached a depth of degradation still lower. The manner in which the Minister of Justice argued has done everything to ruin the reputation which he was gradually building up. We had begun to have an idea that the mind of that hon. Minister was as transparent to the rays of truth as glass is to the rays of the sun, and that he transmitted to the House the full truth that flowed upon him from the contemplation of any subject. We had begun to think that the pure white light of truth penetrated his intellect and was transmitted to the House, but now we are forced, on account of his casuistry, and by his twisting and turning of truth, to recall some of the qualities which appear in very transparent glass or crystal, to which I have likened his intellect. There are many crystals as bright and lustrous as glass which have a peculiar property; for when a gleam of white light passes through these crystals in a certain direction it comes out on the other side apparently as pure as ever, but, that light has undergone a change in the body of that crystal. It has come out of the crystal polarized. It has had to twist around the axis of the crystal in its passage through, and that light, pure as it looks coming out of the crystal, is still not true white light because it has been twisted around the axis of that crystal, as the truth in this case has been twisted. Now, Sir, taking all these things into account, the injustice that has been done to the maker of these charges, the injustice that has been done to the man against whom they are brought, the damage that has been done to that pride of the Government, the Minister of Justice, the insult that has been offered to the dignity and privileges of this House, and the general degradation of public feeling that must arise: I say that although from a party sense we might rejoice in the course the Government has pursued to-day, yet from the point of view of patriots and honest citizens of this country we must deeply deplore it and protest against it to the best of our ability.

Mr. GIROUARD. When the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) closed his speech at six o'clock I intended to offer to the House a few remarks upon this matter, but as I had hoped we would reach a vote then I did not do so. However, seeing that my expectations and the expectations of many members of the House were not realized, I will venture to offer one or two remarks now. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) closed his speech by saying that we were afraid of the investigation, and, in his eloquent and at the same time violent language, he asked: What will the mother country say to-morrow when the people there will hear that the grave charges which have been published in the London press this morning did not meet with a proper answer from this side of the House; what will the people of England say when a serious charge is made against a Minister of the Crown and against the whole Administration; when an investigation is demanded, and when that investigation is refused? Mr. Speaker, if we judge by the communications which have been sent from this side of the Atlantic to the mother land respecting all these scandals and so-called scandals, I think I may say that the object of hon. gentlemen opposite in bringing this charge was to bring infamy upon this country in the mother land. I am going to read from the news sent by—I would not say by hon. gentlemen opposite—but by a gentleman who is very well known for his zeal for their cause, a gentleman whom I see now in the press gallery, a gentleman who is very well known as the correspondent of the Dalziel News Agency. There was a charge made on the 7th September, in the shape of a query, by the hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Forbes) against the Secretary of State. It appears hon. gentlemen opposite were not satisfied with the revelations made in the Public Accounts Committee and in the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I admit that these revelations were too much for the good name of Canada; but why were hon. gentlemen opposite not satisfied with the facts, instead of concocting imaginary scandals? The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Forbes), acting under their instructions, knew that the charge which he brought was brought only for the purpose of bringing scandals before the people of this country. He would not dare to make a charge against the hon. Secretary of State; but he put it in the shape of a query, and it was telegraphed to the London press on the following morning. Now, for the edification of the House, to show how these charges are telegraphed across the Atlantic, I will read a despatch which was sent to the London Times of the 8th September, signed "Dalziel:"

"OTTAWA, September 7.—Mr. Forbes, one of the members for Nova Scotia, has given notice in the House of Commons of his intention to call the attention of the Government to statements contained in a letter written by Mr. William McDougall, a former Cabinet Minister and Privy Councillor, which is widely published in the press here. The letter contains serious reflections on the Hon. J. A. Chapleau. Mr. McDougall intimates that he now believes that Mr. Chapleau, or somebody on his behalf, was paid 10 per cent. on $83,000 which the Government awarded to Messrs. Smith & Ripley, a New York firm of railway contractors, in settlement of a claim for damages. Mr. McDougall, who is counsel for Messrs. Smith & Ripley, has been questioned."

Here is quoted the letter on which the query was made:

"Mr. Forbes will ask the Government what action they propose to take in the matter."

Now, there are almost as many falsehoods, wicked falsehoods, and libels upon members of this House in this communication as there are lines. Do you want me to name a few of these falsehoods? First, the year is not mentioned, and the communication as sent gives the impression that this so-called scandal has just arisen out of facts happening at the present time, whereas it is very well known that this quarrel between the Hon. Mr. McDougall and the hon. Secretary of State happened in 1882, at a time when I believe the hon. Secretary of State was not a member of the Government or a member of this House, but when he was acting as counsel for Smith & Ripley. That is a very important fact to ignore. This was done in order to malign, in order to slander, in order to libel the Conservative party and the Government of the day. But that is not the only falsehood. In order to give more colour to the statement that these charges referred to events just happening or having just happened, it was said in the same communication that Mr. William McDougall has written a letter which is going through the press. That letter did not go through the press for the last ten years. It was put on the Order Paper, and it was very likely reproduced in the press after that. But the impression given by this correspondent was that this communication came from the Hon. Mr. McDougall at the present time, which was just as false as any statement could be. Another falsehood in that communication is that Mr. McDougall is the counsel for Smith & Ripley, whereas the fact is that he has not been counsel for them for ten years, because this case was settled in 1882. Yet this slander and libel is sent abroad to vilify this country. That is not enough. It is said that 10 per cent. of the $83,000 was paid to the Secretary of State or to some one on his behalf. The correspondent, whom I see now, in the press gallery, was just as careful about this point as about the others, to leave the impression that the money was paid when the Secretary of State was on the Treasury benches, whereas this whole transaction happened in 1882. Another false statement is that Mr. McDougall has been questioned, the inference being that he has just been questioned or interviewed, and that the answer has been given to-day; whereas the reference was to the letter written by Mr. McDougall in 1882. That fact is not disclosed; it will not serve the purpose of the correspondent; and the letter of Mr. McDougall is published in the London Times as a communication which has just been written by him. Now, I hope that this correspondent of the Dalziel Agency will take very good care—he ought to do it now if he has not done it yet—to send to the London press the answer of the Hon. Mr. McDougall to the charge of the hon. member for Queen's. It is moreover very important that proceedings should be taken to put an end to these libels upon the House of Commons. In no other country of the world would such scandalous conduct be permitted; and the correspondent should be brought to the Bar of the House to answer for it. The hon. member for South Oxford referred to the communication sent with regard to this charge against the hon. Postmaster General, and it was undoubtedly published in the London press of this morning. Judging from the past, I have no doubt how that communication was sent last evening to the London press. In ten days, when that communication reaches this country, it will be too late for us to take notice of it; but when it reaches us, we shall find that falsehoods have been communicated to the people of England in regard to this charge. We shall find that the date of the supposed interest of the hon. Postmaster General in the firm of Manning, Macdonald & Co. will not be mentioned. The correspondent will merely state that the Postmaster General had an interest in an important railway contract with the Government, and was sharing in the profit, and very great care will be taken not to name the year. Now, the last speaker does not suppose that we are going to take him seriously when he asks us to compare the case of Mr. Anglin with that of the Postmaster General. The cases of Mr. Anglin, Mr. Jones and Mr. Vail, had reference to violations of the Independence of Parliament Act, not even in the preceding Parliament, but in the very Parliament then sitting. The hon. member for South Oxford concluded this afternoon by saying that we must not only look to the year of the contract, 1879. If the mover of this motion intended us to look to any other year, he should have mentioned it in his reference. He did not state that this contract was entered into in 1879 and completed in 1886 or 1887; but he only mentioned 1879. He does not suppose that all the transactions happened in the year 1879. What are the facts of the case? Was this contract completed in 1885, 1886 or 1887, as the hon. member for South Oxford has said? He was very careful to say it was not completed until 1885, 1886 or 1887. When an argument is based upon a statement of that importance, the statement ought to be precise. In the Sessional Papers of 1879, some explanations concerning this contract are given. It is said that the contract was let in February, 1879, and that the time stipulated for its completion was the 1st of July, 1883. Was it completed on the 1st of July, 1883? I know it was personally, and a great many members know it was, and if they will look at the blue-book for that year they will find it was. In 1882, when I happened to be at Thunder Bay, the road was open to a certain extent, but not to the public, and I believe that some of the Ministers of the Crown went over the whole road during that season. But, Sir, it is a well known fact that in 1883 the road was in full operation and open to the public. The transactions of these railway contractors closed somewhere about the 1st of July, 1883, when a final estimate was made and a closing settlement arrived at. The contract was at last completed and settled in 1883. This is established by the blue-books and by those who are aware of the facts. In 1883, and this will make at least eight years, this transaction was closed. There was an election in 1887, and another one in 1891, and we are now asked, in the face of the Independence of Parliament Act, to enquire whether the hon. member for North Lanark has violated the Independence of Parliament Act. There are in that Act three or four sections bearing on this point. Any contractor or anyone having an interest in a contract under the Government is disqualified from being elected; and if elected, is disqualified from sitting or voting, and the punishment is first, the forfeiture of his seat, and secondly, a penalty of $200 a day for every day he sits as member of this House. But there is an express provision of the law which says that any proceeding thereunder for the forfeiture or the penalty must be commenced within twelve months. Now, not twelve months but eight years have elapsed, and we are asked seriously to grant an enquiry, when the law says positively such enquiry shall not be had unless the proceedings have been commenced within twelve months. But the hon. gentleman says that the offence committed by the Postmaster General is an immoral one. If it was an immoral one, why should we require a statute to declare it illegal? There are many offences which may be committed against the privileges and dignity of Parliament, although not defined by statute. Why? Because they are immoral. And why was this transaction declared illegal? Because it was not immoral. The necessity of the statute became apparent because the offence was not an immoral one. It was not immoral for a contractor to sit in this House, or for a sheriff to sit in this House until that statute was passed. I can give another striking illustration of the correctness of this principle. The qualifications of members of this House are not the same as those of the Senate Chamber. No sheriff has a right to sit in this House, and he is exposed to having his seat declared vacant and to be subjected to a penalty of $200 per day if he should violate that law. The same statute which creates a prohibition with regard to contractors creates it also with regard to sheriffs and other public officers. But hon. gentlemen are aware that Sheriff Thibaudeau, who is a senator, does not by reason of his holding the office of sheriff render himself incapable of sitting and voting in the Senate. If his so doing were an immoral act, he would forfeit his seat. The disqualification, as regards this House, of a sheriff or other public officer is a legal one established by the statute in the same way as the disqualification of a contractor, and both stand on the same footing. They are mere legal disabilities, and where there is no legal disability and no immoral offence, this House cannot create one except by statute. The hon. member for South Oxford has given us a lecture on constitutional law. He does not pretend to know parliamentary law better than anyone else, but he knows it just as well; and he asks: Is it not an elementary principle that this House has a right to enquire how public moneys have been expended? Is it not the duty of this House to enquire whether money has been spent especially, to use his expression, to debauch the people of the country? I will only say to the hon. gentleman that it is not necessary to know much parliamentary law to know that principle; but I will say this, that if the charge made by the hon. member for Lambton contained the statements which the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford did contain, the case would be in my opinion a very different one. But look at the charge made. There is no misapplication of public money mentioned in it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. GIROUARD. There is nothing of the kind in it. The only charge is that this firm have taken some of their money, not the public money, for political purposes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GIROUARD. I would like to know if contractors are prohibited by statute from spending their money as they please. If the hon. gentleman wanted to reach the Administration and make it a crime, he should have said that the Administration acted corruptly or knew of some misapplication, but he merely charged them, to use the expression of the reference.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would that rule apply to Armstrong in appropriating his money?

Mr. GIROUARD. I am not dealing with the case of Armstrong, but the present case.

Mr. McCARTHY. We are going to ask you that.

Mr. GIROUARD. I take the case as you make it. You cannot go beyond the terms of your own reference, and you say in your own reference—which is not an inference but a paper submitted to the consideration of the House:

"That during the progress of the said works, and while the Hon. John G. Haggart was so interested therein, members of the said firm were called upon by members of the Government of Canada for large contributions for political purposes."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GIROUARD. Where is the wrong there? Where is the law which prohibits a Minister of the Crown from asking anyone for subscriptions for political purposes? If the order of reference had contained the other words which the hon. member for South Oxford used, if it had said for political purposes to debauch the electorate, there would have been something in the charge. The order further says:

"And such contributions were paid out of the moneys of the said firm."

I find nothing in the charge, and really I think that many hon. members on the other side are too familiar with parliamentary practice and our statutes to make me believe for one moment that they are serious in making this charge. It is made only for the purpose for which the one against the Secretary of State was made, and for no other purpose. It was made with the view of vilifying the country before our people and before the mother land, and for no other purpose.

Mr. EDGAR. I am very much surprised at the tone and manner and language of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who has been for more than a hundred days, as he tells us, presiding as the Chief Justice of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He has worked himself up to a great state of excitement over this matter. He began by telling us that the charge made by my hon. friend would bring everlasting infamy upon this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this charge be true, why should it not be published in this country or in any other country?

Mr. GIROUARD. Correctly.

Mr. EDGAR. Correctly, yes; but the hon. gentleman asserted that it would bring everlasting infamy upon this country, and he insults an hon. member of this House by saying that he brings this charge in order to vilify hon. members on the other side. That is an imputation of motives which I think should not be allowed. Surely the hon. gentleman had not listened to the hon. the Minister of Justice, who said these charges meant nothing at all, that these charges, if true, would be no stigma at all on his colleague, the hon. the Postmaster General. If that is the case, why did the hon. gentleman fly into a sudden passion because these charges were made? He not only attacked the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), but he attacked gentlemen in the gallery. He attacked gentlemen of the press who, as I dare say he will find out, are well able to take care of themselves. He blames them for publishing a letter from Mr. McDougall. If Mr. McDougall chose to write a letter to the press over his own signature—and I think it was in 1886 and not in 1882, as the hon. gentleman said—he should be too experienced a politician to complain of his letter being used at another time. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the Dalziel reports sent to England as not being correct. I will let them take care of themselves. I wonder if the hon. gentleman has looked at Reuter's reports sent to the English press. That agency has been subsidized by this Government for many years, and there has not been for many years a truthful statement published in the English press in regard to Canadian matters owing to that fact. Does he not know that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) had to get up in his place in this House and denounce a falsehood cabled over by Reuter's Agency? I think he should have taken some of his judicial mind to that agency as well as to the Dalziel Agency. The hon. gentleman has compared, as others have done, the position of Mr. Anglin and Mr. Jones, of Halifax, in former Parliaments, with the Postmaster General to-day. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that those gentlemen were found guilty, by a Committee of their own friends, of having unwittingly transgressed the spirit of the Independence of Parliament Act, in a way in which it had never been interpreted before, and others on both sides of the House were the victims of that strict interpretation; but, when this charge is made against the Postmaster General of having been interested in the profits of a public contract, there was no doubt at all about the law on the subject. Was it not settled and beyond a peradventure then as to what the law was, so that if the hon. the Postmaster General was guilty of violating that Act he did so with his eyes open, with the full knowledge of the condition of the law which had been discussed when he was in Parliament in the cases of Anglin, and Jones and Vail. They may have done this in ignorance of the law, but he cannot plead that he has done this in ignorance of the law, if he did it at all. I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman say that there is no allegation in this charge of the misapplications of the public moneys. I could scarcely believe that I heard the Chairman of the Tarte-McGreevy-Langevin Committee say that. Has he not learnt enough, in that long, tedious investigation, to know what was meant by misapplication of public moneys when contractors gave subscriptions to members of the Government for political purposes? He knows that contractors never do that for nothing. He knows that was the case in reference to these contracts, and in this motion it is alleged:

"That the members of that firm were called upon by members of the Government of Canada."

Not by Thomas McGreevy or other private individuals, but by members of the Government of Canada, for these subscriptions, and that these contributions—

"Were paid out of the moneys of the said firm, and with the knowledge and assent of the said Hon. John G. Haggart were charged against the profits of the firm."

And more than that: that while all this was going on—

"The said firm of contractors were in various ways dependent upon the Government by reason of many matters being unsettled and in dispute in relation to the said contract, which were at the time of such contributions, or subsequently, settled not unfavourably to the contractors."

That is all right. There is nothing wrong about that. My hon. friend, in the beautiful innocence of his heart, thinks there is no possible misapplication of public moneys to be apprehended under that charge. I am sorry I cannot agree with him. In the opening remarks of the Minister of Justice he contended that this, if it were a crime at all, was a statutory crime, a crime by a statute alone relating to the independence of Parliament, and that the Postmaster General, if guilty of it, was whitewashed by elections he has subsequently gone through. I wonder why the Minister of Justice did not think of that before. Why did he, after careful consideration, allow the member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) to bring his charge against the member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) this session in regard to the steamer Admiral, charging him with having received public moneys, when that was not during the present Parliament.

Mr. GIROUARD. Yes; up to February, 1891.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member cannot remember, but if he looks at the report signed by himself he will find that none of these payments to Mr. McGreevy were shown to have been made since his last election.

Mr. GIROUARD. The contract was in force in February, 1891.

Mr. EDGAR. There was no payment made after the 24th February. The sale to Mick or Nick—I do not know which—or to Bancroft, or some one, took place before the election, and I am sorry the hon. gentleman should have signed the report without having known that; but the Minister of Justice knew it, and he also signed the report, and to-day he says it is improper for Parliament to investigate a charge that a member has received public money when he has since gone through an election. He not only allowed that investigation in the Tarte-McGreevy case, but he took part in that investigation and signed a report to the House on that very subject. Then the Minister of Justice complained very strongly and warmly to the House that it was too late in this session for the investigation to take place. Now, Sir, we have got, through past experience, very expert in the making of these investigations, and we have learned that we can hold sittings of the Committee during the session of the House. We could have had three sittings of this Committee every day—at morning, noon and night, and closed it up without detaining the House, perhaps, more than three or four more days longer than they will be under any circumstances: and the public will not understand that after we have been here five months we cannot sit here five days more to investigate a charge like this. Then we come to the defence of the position of the Minister of Justice made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He stated to the House, I think, very emphatically, his opinion that the House, or a committee, should not try a member for a crime. That was one point which he made. Then the next point was that the House should not try a member for anything less than a crime, or, at any rate, anything that does not involve expulsion from the House or punishment by the House. I really think that the hon. gentleman will not say that I misinterpret his position in that respect. Now, Sir, I am very sorry, if it is so improper and very wrong for this House to try a fellow member for a criminal act, that the hon. member for Simcoe did not think of that when he was here in the early part of the session and assented to the charges of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) being brought before this House. There he charged a fellow member of this House with criminal conspiracy, and the hon. member for Simcoe did not find fault; but now at last, in the same session of this House, he raises an objection to another motion of the same kind. But, perhaps, it is not a crime, perhaps it is whitewash, perhaps the statute of limitations shuts him out. Well, then, he says that if this case does not involve expulsion we should not take it up. Now, I think I can show a precedent that will satisfy even the hon. member for Simcoe that he is wrong, entirely wrong, in that contention. He calls for precedents from England or from Canada; the Minister of Justice calls for precedents from England or from Canada, for the action that we propose. I will give them a precedent now from Canada, one which they will both remember well; and the Minister of Customs I think will also remember it, and will corroborate what I say. In 1886 a charge was made in this House by myself against the hon. member for East Hastings, that he had promoted the interests of a colonization company and had received blind shares for his services. I also charged that a Minister of the Crown was cognizant of this, and had been consulted during the course of the negotiations. That Minister of the Crown was the Minister of Customs. Now, I think I have fairly stated those charges. Many members of this House remember them. They have been discussed a good many times in the House and out of it, and members know what happened then. Those charges were nothing like as serious as these. They involved no criminal charge. They involved no question of unseating a member if they were proved to be true. What was the position taken in the House when that matter came up? Why, Sir, the Minister of Customs got up in his place, the day after notice was given, and called upon me to bring those charges and to have them investigated before a Committee; and very properly he did so. The member for East Hastings also got up subsequently in his place and stated that he wanted an investigation too. They took no technical objection to that proceeding, but perhaps it will be said that the attention of the House was not called to that objection, and therefore it would not be a good precedent, even if it were acted upon. But, Sir, the attention of the House was called to this very objection which was taken to-day by the member for Simcoe, and it was called by the present Postmaster General. The present Postmaster General took that exception himself in 1886, I think with a fine prophetic view of what might happen to himself, because if these matters occurred that are alleged by the member for West Lambton, they had occurred before 1886. Now, that there may be no doubt on this point, I will read to the House the exact terms of the objection taken by the Postmaster General. He said then, in Hansard, page 491, 1886:

"Let me draw attention to the fact that there is no charge against the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. White) in this statement of Mr. Edgar. Suppose that everything proved true before the Committee which the hon. gentleman charges, what action is the House going to take?"

I think these were almost the words used by the member for Simcoe to-night.—

"There is no charge of corrupt practices or anything. I think that before a committee is appointed the charges should be such that if they are found to be true some punishment should be visited upon the member, either unseated or something else. There is not the slightest charge of a corrupt practice in all this statement."

That was the position taken on that occasion by the Postmaster General. Perhaps you will say that the hon. member for Simcoe was away. He was not; he was in the House at the time. The Postmaster General insisted upon having a vote on the motion made by Sir Hector Langevin to refer this charge to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and, like a man, he voted according to his argument. But the hon. member for Simcoe voted against him; the hon. the Minister of Justice voted against it and voted down his contention of to-day that such a charge as that was not a matter of privilege, and should not be referred to the Privileges and Elections Committee. They both voted to refer it to that Committee. If the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) was here he voted that way too, because Mr. Haggart's is the only name recorded on the other side. Now, Sir Hector Langevin moved this reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; I had moved its reference to a Select Committee. Sir Hector Langevin, in moving that reference, used these words:

"The charge is one which affects the standing of two hon. members of this House, one of whom is a Minister of the Crown; and as it is not a mere matter of curiosity, but is a charge or an insinuation against those hon. gentlemen, I think, under the circumstances, the House will see that it is a matter of privilege, as the hon. gentleman stated just now, and should therefore be investigated by the Committee on Privileges and Elections."

And whom do you think seconded that motion? Why, Mr. Thompson, of Antigonish, the Minister of Justice. He seconded the motion and voted for it, and so did the member for Simcoe. Now, I think they have got a precedent. Therefore, it is not for want of precedents they are going to vote this motion down; it is because they do not want the investigation held. I want to draw the attention of the House to one point. It has been stated that the Postmaster General has given his denial to this charge under oath. That is not the case. I listened attentively to what he said. He said that in 1880—remember the contract was entered into in September, 1879—he had sworn that he was not interested in any contract. The charge here was that he became interested in the profits under that contract accruing on the interest or share standing in the name of Mr. McLaren, and certainly no profits would have accrued in 1880 when he made that statement, and therefore it is no defence to these charges. It was very satisfactory, of course, to hear the hon. gentleman make his statement in this House and deny the charges after they were made. But it was also very satisfactory early in the session to hear Mr. McGreevy make a similar statement. I do not know whether this is done as a matter of course in these cases or not; but such is the case. We have heard the statement made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) making the charge. We are now in this curious position: We have to accept the statements of both these hon. members, which we do, and the only way we have to enable us to decide is to refer the charges to a Committee for investigation, which would take the evidence and we would thus be enabled to settle the point. If the Ministry are satisfied there is nothing in these charges that cast a stigma on a colleague, very well, and perhaps we ought to be satisfied in a political sense, too. If they are satisfied of that, I think the matter will be thoroughly and distinctly understood by the country. We want this investigation. We are pressing for it here to-night. We are ready on this side of the House to sit till it is finished, and the other side are not willing. They will not have an investigation; they say there is nothing wrong and they will not have it. Let them accept and occupy that position, and we will occupy the position of having to vote down the amendment.

Mr. LISTER. I will ask the privilege of trespassing on the attention of the House for a very few moments while I address myself to the subject that has been under discussion for three or four hours. I desire, so far as I am concerned, that nothing shall pass my lips that in any way can be construed as prejudging or reflecting in any way on the hon. gentleman against whom I have preferred the charges laid before the House to-day. In preferring those charges I have been actuated and animated not by any unfriendly feeling to that hon. gentleman. I have never had such a feeling; I have not it now. I believe I am safe in stating that so far as I am concerned no such feeling will be found with me. In preferring those charges I have discharged, and am discharging, what I conceive to be a public duty, regardless altogether of the feelings and relations which have existed between the hon. gentleman and myself, and in any remarks I have to make to this honourable House I will be guided by the feelings which have animated me in making the charges against that hon. gentleman. The Minister of Justice in his speech on this subject has thought proper to say, and other hon. gentlemen have done so as well, that in making this charge it was my bounden duty to have made it positively, upon the strength of my position here as a member of this House, that I should not have made the charge on information and belief, but I should have made a positive charge against the hon. gentleman, and, not having made the charge in that way, it should not be entertained by this House. I will call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that all charges that have been presented by members of this House, for at all events nine years, have been worded and couched in exactly the words which are found in the motion I have presented to the House. In the case which the hon. member for Montmorency presented the words used were as follows:—

"That John Israël Tarte, the member representing the electoral district of Montmorency, having declared from his seat in this House that he is credibly informed and believes he is able to establish by satisfactory evidence," and so forth.

The motion I have presented to the House is in precisely the language used in this motion which was adopted by the House. And not only so, but in other instances I could mention the wording was exactly as I have it here. In the Cochrane case and in the case referred to by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar), the wording is precisely as it is in the motion now before the House. Sir, what is that charge? The charge is that an hon. member of this House, who was in 1879 a member of this House, who from that date down to the present has been a member of this House, and to-day is a member of the Government, was a secret partner in fact in a contract made between the Government and certain individuals. That is the substance of the charge. It is further declared that in addition to being a secret partner in a contract, he, as such partner, contributed from that date up to the present large sums of money for the advantage of the Government. I heard to-day for the first time with some little amazement from members supporting the Government in this House that it is no offence against the law of Parliament, it is no offence against political morality, that men holding contracts with this Government involving millions of money should turn round and take from their pockets thousands and tens of thousands of dollars and hand them back to the Administration for the purpose of sustaining them and their party in office. Sir, if that is not political immorality, if that is not an offence against Parliament, if it is not a crime against the people of this country, then I concede at once, without further discussion, that the charge I have made against the hon. gentleman must fall to the ground. We have had it stated in this House by the leader of the Government here that he would purge the public service from all immorality and impurity. We have had it stated in the Senate by the leader of the Government himself that be the man high or low against whom a charge is made it will be investigated, and regardless of his position he will suffer. We have had before us during the past five months subordinates in the public service who have been proved to have been guilty of receiving trifling sums, and instantly their official lives have been destroyed. But while it is a crime in an official to receive money from contractors, it appears that members of the Government, the Government as a whole, may do it with impunity, and they are to be supported and sustained by the majority of the House in refusing to have the matter investigated. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier waxed eloquent to-day. He looked up to the gallery at a man not able to defend himself: but I will venture to say he is able to defend himself against any accusation the hon. gentleman may think proper to bring outside of this House. Was the hon. gentleman fair and honest? Did he tell the members of the House and the country that for long years the Reuter Company has been sending from this House, through a paid servant of Parliament, the most infamous lies concerning their political opponents? If all that has been telegraphed through Dalziel's Agency is not exactly true, we are giving hon. gentlemen a little dose of the medicine they have been administering to the Opposition for so many years past. As I stated a moment ago, the charges are as they appear in my motion. These charges are in the phraseology adopted in introducing similar motions in this House. And these charges, if they are not a crime, if they do not amount to an offence against the law of Parliament, must fall to the ground. But does my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Mc Carthy) pretend to argue that because a statute has been passed creating an offence, which gives an individual a right to prosecute, that Parliament has divested itself of its right to investigate the question as to whether a man has been properly sitting in Parliament or not, and does he pretend to say that owing to the lapse of time during which Parliament and the public have been ignorant of the fact, still, when they became aware of the facts, that they have not the right to deal with the men against whom the charge is made? I contend, Sir, that in passing that Act Parliament retained the right that it possessed before to deal with a man who violates the law of Parliament in such a way as Parliament thinks proper, and that the right which is given under the statute is an additional penalty which any person and every person has a right to enforce if they think proper. But in addition to all that, the charge here is that the hon. gentleman while a member of this company, while beneficially interested in these profits, while deriving large sums from this Government—because, remember, the contract involves over $4,000,000—that while beneficially interested in this work the co-partners were from time to time contributing enormous sums of money for the purpose of maintaining in place and power the gentlemen who now hold the Treasury benches. I ask hon. gentlemen and I ask the country is that a politically immoral act, or is it one that can be justified in this House and before the people? No member of the Government has dared to justify it; they have left it to their followers. Let their utterances go abroad, let the people of this country draw their own inferences, let them be told by hon. gentlemen supporting the Government that the Government were justified in taxing the contractors of this country, that they were justified in drawing by force from their pockets enormous sums of money which come from the public treasury of this country in order that the people themselves might be bribed by the taxes they paid into the treasury of Canada. If, Sir, that is the law of this country, if this has been the view of hon. gentlemen opposite during all these years past, God only knows that we are to-day just what we ought to be, a politically demoralized country. I say to-day to every hon. gentleman here, and to the country at large, that we are worse than any South American or Central American republic. Sir, when we try to investigate these matters, when we ask to have them enquired into, when we ask to lay the facts before the people of the country, we are refused the committee, and the Government say: You shall not enquire, because, forsooth, we want to get home within the next four or five days. Sir, the charges made here against an hon. member of this House are connected with the section B contract, which has become famous in the history of Canada. Sir, the Government of the country is a sink of iniquity to-day. All of us who remember anything about the politics of thirteen years ago remember well poor old Whitehead and those connected with him. The contract was passed on from one to another, until it came down to Manning, Macdonald & Co., and while it was under these people things were done that I believe will not bear the light of day. I state to this House again that hon. gentlemen have denied charges on the floor of this House which have been brought against them. The member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) denied all the charges that were made against him: Thomas McGreevy denied the charges that were made against him: but, Sir, the investigations afterwards proved that every statement that was made to the country was true; and I say further, after all that has been stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, that I believe from information I have received, if the committee is granted I will be able to establish that the Postmaster General was beneficially interested in these profits; I believe I shall be able to establish that members of the then Government received large sums of money which were charged to the profits of that contract. I believe I will be able to prove that a lawyer, eminent in his profession and otherwise, advised these contractors to keep their books clean, and that their books were kept in such a way that it would be impossible for an outsider to get at the charges. They were more skilful than some others; they acted under legal advice and "Mick and Nick" did not. These gentlemen were well advised, and it would be almost impossible to get at the true condition of affairs, so far as their books are concerned. I believe, Sir, that I can show that after their contract was ended they had a friendly arbitration. I believe that I can show that the arbitrators were told the exact state of affairs, and that upon the basis of that the award was made giving to each of the contractors the sums to which they were entitled. This is the information which I have received. I believe it to be true, and I believe if I were granted a committee that I shall be able to establish the charge which I have made to this House.

Mr. BOWELL. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that a member of the Government advised these parties to keep their books clean ?

Mr. LISTER. No, Sir; I did not. I said that they were kept well advised always, and that a gentleman eminent in the profession advised them to keep their books clean ; that they expected session after session to be brought to Ottawa for the purpose of parliamentary investigation, and that they took every precaution that clever, cautious business men could take for the purpose of thwarting, so far as they could, any investigation that Parliament might think fit to order. That is the position. If the Government says it is no crime, that this Parliament has nothing whatever to do with the fact that a member of this House is beneficially interested in a contract, then, so far as that portion of the case is concerned, it must fail. If the Government says it is legitimate and right and proper for public contractors of this Dominion to pay back to the Government thousands, nay, tens of thousands of dollars, for the purpose of debauching and corrupting the electorate of this country, then I say this charge must fail. But, if it is an offence ; if the charge states as an offence that it is wrong for a member of Parliament to be interested in a contract ; if it is wrong for public contractors to contribute vast sums of money to political heads who give them their contracts, and who ask for the money : if that is an offence, then I say, Sir, that the charge which has been made here ought to be investigated. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that in this matter I am proceeding on information which I have received and which I believe to be true, and I believe if a committee is granted to me that I shall be able to establish the charges which I have prepared and formulated and presented to this House.

House divided on amendment of Sir John Thompson :

PUBLIC WORKS DEPT.—CONTRACTS.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Girouard : " That the seventh report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections be adopted ; " and the motion of Mr. Davies, in amendment thereto.

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker, I intend, as briefly as I can under the circumstances, to present my humble views upon this case which has occupied the attention of a great many members of this House and the country at large during the last four or five months. I suppose you remember perfectly under what circumstances that enquiry took place. During the last session of Parliament a series of charges were published and inserted in the papers of this House, and received a denial from the hon. member who then represented Quebec West. It was too late to proceed with the enquiry that session. This session, however, over a year afterwards, the charges were reiterated, but by an hon. member of this House from his seat: and then we received the same answer from the hon. member from Quebec West, and we also received an answer from the hon. Minister of Public Works, both denying emphatically all the charges. So far nothing was proved: we were completely in the dark, we had often to find out by mere guessing what we suspected. At all events, we went before the Committee. The amount of trouble we had to procure the documents, even the books of the department and the books of the firm concerned, was something extraordinary, when we consider that this Committee was the first tribunal of this country. At all events, we proceeded and the further we went the more astonished we were at the revelations. What the principal witness, Mr. Murphy, stated was so wonderful, that many would not believe a word of what he said. We will see later on whether he was right or not; we will see whether or not the indications he gave us as to all the facts were correct. For the moment I intend to speak of some of the contracts, more especially as they relate to the hon. Minister of Public Works. The two reports of the Committee agree as to the culpability of the member for Quebec West, but they do not agree as to the extent of his culpability, and they disagree entirely so far as the hon. Minister of Public Works is concerned. I will take first the contract for the Esquimalt graving dock, in which I think the hon. Minister is more directly concerned. The first matter to which I will draw the attention of this honourable House is the plant. Let me first remind you of the letter wherein one of the partners writes:

"The Government are asking for tenders for British Columbia again. You had best see one of your uncles about it."

The uncles were then already known to the partners. We will see later on that these uncles had been utilized very largely, nor for the benefit of the country, but for the benefit of the contractors. On the 15th of March, 1884, Mr. Perley writes to the secretary of the Department of Public Works, which means the hon. Minister himself, about the plant, saying:

"There is no doubt but the Dominion has come into the possession of the plant, quite a large amount, which it is proposed shall be taken and paid for by the contractors who undertake to complete the dock in accordance with the tenders lately received therefor."

I quote this now to show that the hon. Minister of Public Works was fully informed about that plant, which had been received from the Local Government of British Columbia, and which was intended to be paid for by the contractors of the dock. A letter from Mr. Ennis, the secretary of the department, dated 24th March, 1884, says:

"Ask Mr. Trutch to prepare and transmit to the department a statement in detail of such plant."

I will now treat more fully the first tenders asked for by the department. There were two series of tenders asked for; one series in the month of April, 1884, and the other in the fall of the same year. Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly had been tenderers with Mr. Baskerville in the first series. They had committed an error, and on the 24th of April, 1884, they asked leave to amend their tender in order to correct the mistake they had made. That request was refused: I would like to know why? We will see that in the case of the Quebec cross-wall, the department themselves, under the direction of the hon. Minister, not only allowed an amendment, but suggested an amendment. In this instance, Mr. Starrs is refused permission to amend in any way. In the first tender, the Government, upon the report of Mr. Perley, finds that the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly is too low and that of Mr. Baskerville too high; and they decide not to accept either. As to this point, I do not throw any blame either upon the Minister or the department, except that it seems strange they should have refused an amendment which would have been to the advantage of the country in this case, whilst in other cases they suggested amendments which were not to our advantage. But a few days after that Mr. Perley, who was looked upon by this House as an eminent engineer, had an interview with Mr. Baskerville, and the result of that interview was that Mr. Baskerville made the following offer to the Minister of Public Works, dated 8th May, 1884:—

"DEAR SIR,—We have some time since submitted a tender for the completion of a graving dock at Esquimalt, British Columbia. If you will agree to the substitution of solid masonry and dispense with the use of concrete and brick backing, we will consent to build the same for $16 per square yard, which will reduce the bulk sum about $53,000. Hoping that this will meet with your approval.

"BASKERVILLE & CO."

On the 9th of May, Mr. Perley reported in favour of that. He said that Mr. Stewart, of Baskerville, Cassidy & Stewart, had gone to British Columbia and made special examination, that concrete is expensive, and that rubble is much better and less expensive, and he added:

"Having submitted to Messrs. Baskerville & Co. a proposition to amend their offer by the substitution of rubble backing in lieu of concrete backing, brick work, &c., they now offer to build the masonry for the sum of $16 per yard." * * *

And he adds:

"As Messrs. Baskerville & Co. have executed for the Department of Railways and Canals the new works on the Ottawa at St. Ann's, and as contractors possess experience and means for carrying out large works, I beg leave to submit for consideration by the hon. the Minister the desirability of arranging with that firm for the works at Esquimalt, under the terms of their tender as amended by them, and the alteration of the plans whereby rubble backing shall be used instead of concrete backing, and that such other changes be made as will dispense with the use of brick-work in connection with the walls."

Had this proposition been accepted it would have put Mr. Baskerville's tender at $362,000, which would have been a saving of $41,000, as compared with the next series of tenders, that of the Messrs. Connoliy, which was accepted later on. About the same time Mr. Baskerville wrote to Sir Hector Langevin a letter with reference to this report of Mr. Perley, a very interesting letter all through, but of which I will only read this portion:

"As your honour remarked to me to have this matter kept quiet, my brother and I did so. He still holds the cheques in his possession, as he expected he would get the work and would require to return them to you."

And he strongly urges his friends and chief in politics, Sir Hector Langevin, to consider the fairness and justice of the tender as amended at Mr. Perley's request. As I have said, his tender, as amended, would have been a great benefit to the country. What follows? The answer to that letter was written by Sir Hector Langevin, informing Mr. Baskerville that new plans and specifications had been prepared and that new tenders would be called for. Hon. gentlemen who defend the ex-Minister of Public Works are requested to take note of this point, which will be considered a most important one in the country at large. The defence we have heard up to now is that the engineer is the man who must be looked upon in the department to guide the Minister. Sir Hector Langevin himself, under oath, said:

"I am a layman in matters of this kind, and Mr. Perley was the scientific man."

He says later on:

"It is always on the report of the chief engineer or the chief architect, as the case may be, that my report is made to Council, because I know nothing of these matters personally."

Mr. Perley reported to the Government, advising them to accept Mr. Baskerville's tender as amended. He also insisted on the solvency and the capacity of the firm of Baskerville & Co. to carry out the contract. Yet, without any report to Council, without basing his action upon the opinion of any engineer whatever, the Minister ordered new tenders to be called for. Why? Because he had gone to Quebec and had seen parties there; and, after seeing those parties, he, a layman, in spite of his chief engineer, decided to call for new tenders. Where is the man in this country who will say that in this instance it is not the Minister himself personally who must be held responsible? He did not act on the report of his engineer, but directly contrary to that report; and are we to be told that his engineer is responsible? There is no possible defence on that ground. In this instance the money which has been lost to the country was lost entirely through the personal action of the Minister of Public Works. We will see, when I come to conclude my remarks, what influence it was which moved the Minister in this instance. It must be remarked here that Mr. Perley declared in favour of rubble, and wrote on the 26th of May, 1884, agreeing to have rubble masonry substituted for concrete, and he says in his letter to Mr. Trutch, page 153:

"Our Canadian contractors have had many years experience in the construction on the canal system of Canada of heavier works than are to be executed at Esquimalt, and the experience gained in the use of concrete backing as specified by Kinipple & Morris for the harbour works at Quebec has proved that it would be cheaper and more satisfactory to use rubble backing."

This was Perley's idea then. On the next page of my scrap book are to be found five celebrated promissory notes. There is a letter which will be found on page 196, which is most extraordinary, dated 3rd of June, 1884, addressed to Mr. Noad of Montreal, and signed by the secretary of the department:

"SIR,—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 28th inst., making enquiries about Portland cement for the Esquimalt graving dock, and to say that no information can be given as to the quantity which will be required."

This information we will see later on was furnished to Mr. Thomas McGreevy though it was refused here to an honest contractor. On the 23rd June, 1884, the report of the Executive Council of British Columbia is sent to the department, and it is stated there that:

"Any modification in the direction of cheapening and lowering the character of the dock would relieve the Imperial Government from any obligation to pay the otherwise promised subsidy, and will be regarded by the province as a deliberate breach of contract and violation of the settlement arrangement on the part of the Dominion Government."

And then it goes on to say:

"The Minister recommends that a strong protest against any modification of the plan and specifications of the dock, and against any further delay in the commencement of work, be presented to the Federal Government; and that they be requested to carry out the terms of settlement promptly, honourably and equitably."

The answer to that is sent. The Order in Council is referred to Mr. Perley, and he reports:

"I have no hesitation in stating that the substitution of rubble masonry for concrete backing will be a benefit to the work, and in this I am borne out by Mr. Bennett, the residing engineer, who is of opinion that rubble backing will cost more than concrete. Personally I would not permit such an indiscriminate use of concrete as specified for the graving dock, B.C."

In this report it is stated that rubble backing will be more expensive than concrete. On the 27th July, Mr. Bennett writes:

"I have the honour to send you herewith three tracings showing proposed alterations in the construction of the caisson recess, and a copy of the specifications and form of tender altered so that rubble masonry be substituted generally throughout the work for concrete backing or hearting to side walls, quay walls and floor of dock."

He goes on:

"The change will not, however, ensure a better or more water-tight job, nor will the proposed alterations of materials to be used in construction in any way, in my opinion, tend to decrease the ultimate cost of the dock."

In spite of that the specifications were altered; they were altered in spite of the danger of losing the £50,000 promised by the British Government, in spite of the report of Perley, of the report of Trutch and the one of Bennett; the changes were ordered without any Order in Council. But when the time came to send in the notices the Government ordered that in the tenders the amount for both rubble backing and concrete should be inserted. On the 11th September, when the tenders were not yet received, information was sent to Mr. McGreevy which had been refused to Mr. Low. Even a photograph of the place was sent to him. The tenders were received, and the tender of Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly was the lowest. The request that they should strengthen themselves financially has already been explained. It is a most extraordinary procedure and one perfectly unknown before that. By the notice to the public it was asked that the tender should be accompanied by a deposit of $7,500 which was supposed to be a sufficient guarantee. But, if Starrs & O'Hanly had got the contract the object of the trip of Sir Hector Langevin to Quebec would not have been attained. They answered that they were financially strong enough and they refused to take any partner. The Minister did not know what to do. We have seen these promissory notes. Doubtless consideration had to be given for them. There was some delay, but we find that Robert McGreevy says in his evidence that he wanted to know for Larkin, Connolly & Co. what was doing with the tenders, and that Sir Hector told him he had telegraphed to Thomas McGreevy to look after the matter. I want to know what Thomas McGreevy, who was then in Quebec, had to do with the contract, which was to be executed in British Columbia. Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly having deposited their accepted cheque for $7,500, the Minister could not go beyond that, and had to report to Council, because I suppose then as natural Council would not have overlooked that tender which was accompanied by a sufficient guarantee. The report was made, and Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly's tender was accepted by the Council. Then comes the letter of the 21st October to Michael Starrs signed by Mr. Ennis :

"Will you be good enough to call to this department at once, re Esquimalt graving dock."

Then comes that famous conversation which was so well exposed by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) that I will not again go into it, but it shows that Messrs. Starrs & O'Hanly by threats, by false representations, by inducements to lie, and so on, withdrew their tender, and Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s tender was finally accepted, due to the actual interference of the Minister, and by that the country lost heavily. Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s tender was $28,000 above that of Starrs & O'Hanly as far as rubble was concerned, and the country lost to that extent, if we take the concrete the country lost $35,000. It is remarkable that wherever Larkin, Connolly & Co. got a contract, there has been a loss to the country ? Is that due to any action of Perley's ? No ; it is due entirely and exclusively to the wrong-doing of the Minister, and in vain can we say to-day that the Minister relied upon his officers, when the documents which are before the House establish the contrary. In this case I have tried to form an opinion not based upon the oral evidence but nearly exclusively upon the documentary evidence, and it is extraordinary enough that we should be able to decide the greater part of this matter without requiring the oral evidence. I remark that this contract, in spite of the tenders, in spite of the habit of the department, was not signed by all the members of the firm but by only one member. But the question of the plant came in with that tender, and Mr. Robert McGreevy wrote to Mr. Murphy on that subject as follows :—

"My Dear Sir,—The memo. of yesterday in re B. C. dock is with the Minister."

With the Minister, mind you. It is not with Mr. Perley, it is with the Minister. In 1884 did Robert McGreevy foresee there would be any difficulty seven years afterwards, and did he prepare documents that would injure the Minister upon whom he relied for so many hundred thousand dollars ? Well, he wrote this letter, and I prefer it to any oath, because unfortunately in the year in which we live, I have heard so many oaths which I could not believe, that I prefer a letter written seven years ago as evidence.—

"The memo. of yesterday in re British Columbia dock is with the Minister. He says that those conditions cannot be embodied in the contract, as it will be the same one as sumitted to O'Hanly & Starrs, and it would not do to make it different."

Here is the affirmation of that conversation I referred to a moment ago. "It would not do to make it different." Why would it not do ? Because the fraud would be detected at once. Here is a condition which it was distinctly stated could not be put in, and if you put it a few days afterwards in another contract, then anybody can see at once that Starrs & O'Hanly are deceived at the public expense.—

"But he says that all what's asked is so fair that there will be no trouble in obtaining them, especially the $50,000 material one, however you are to urge them just as if nothing had transpired."

Can there be more direct evidence that the whole thing concerning the plan is the exclusive action o the Minister ?

"Of course it's for you and partners to say if you will sign without them being embodied. Politics changes : so does Ministers."

We will see that the Minister was kept in his office long enough that it was not necessary for the contractors to insert that clause in the contract so that they could benefit by it. It was also said in the conversation with the Minister above referred to, that the contract would be rigidly followed, and no extras would be granted. However, a precaution was taken so as to make Starrs & O'Hanly afraid of taking the contract. We will see how these threatenings were executed. There is another letter of the 29th of October (page 1113) of Nicholas Connolly to Mr. Larkin. This one is not sent to Murphy, but to Larkin :

"You will see by the enclosed message——"

This letter is from Point Lévis, and is sent to St. Catharines. I attach importance to that, because Sir Hector had gone down.—

"You will see by the enclosed message that we are offered the Esquimalt graving dock. I cared nothing about tendering for the dock, and scarcely expected to get it, but now that we are offered it——"

They are offered the dock. By whom ? It is not by Mr. Perley. We have seen that this contract was signed by Mr. Murphy alone. Larkin seems to have known all about the contract:

"I cared nothing about tendering for the dock and scarcely expected to get it, but now that we are offered it, and under the circumstances I think it would be best to accept it, with the proviso that the changes we suggest are made, and have been partially agreed between parties. They say there will be no security (cash) required by us. Our friends propose to arrange this ; moreover, there is no money paid for securing the contract."

The other contracts, I suppose, were secured through money : this one Nicholas Connolly says there is no money needed to secure it, but we will see later on that money has been paid abundantly. On the 5th of November Larkin, Connolly & Co. are told to go and deposit a further sum of $11,200 with their cheque of $7,500. Starrs had been refused under a pretext that it was too low. He had his cheque of $9,400 ready, his cheque of $7,500 deposited, and he was to leave 10 per cent. on every monthly estimate of work done as a guarantee to the public. On the 24th November, 1884, Mr. Perley writes (page 699) :

"In determining the several amounts of the tenders received for this work, they were prepared so as to show the cost of completion using concrete (items 11, 12, 13), and using rubble backing (item 13½), and, as in all cases, it was found that the use of rubble backing would increase the cost of completion, it has been decided to adhere to the original plan, and to use concrete backing."

It will be observed, in reference to this Esquimalt dock, that the opinion of the engineers residing at Esquimalt, Mr. Trutch and Mr. Bennett, has never been looked upon as of any importance by Mr. Perley. We see that the Government decides to use concrete in spite of the refusal of the first tender:

"The contracters claim that, seeing they have to take men and materials from this side of the Dominion, the time allowed for completion—viz., eighteen months—is too short; but, as they have signed the contract, no change can now be made; but you might arrange to defer as long as possible the giving your order to commence.'

I beg to draw the attention of the Government to that point. Here is the chief engineer of the department who writes to the resident engineer representing the Government at Esquimalt: "To defer as much as possible to give the order." Why? Is it in order that the contractors may be able to ask for extras? What can be the possible reason for that? I suppose the members of the Government look upon the trust with which the country has charged them as something serious. Well, here is one of their officers who writes to another officer of the Government to delay, unduly and improperly, the execution of the work so as to prepare for extras, at a large expense to the country. If the Ministers have not remarked this letter, they will find it at page 699. I hope they will find some explanation for that letter. I have been inclined all along to look upon Mr. Perley as an honest man, as a man desirous of doing his duty to the country, without displeasing the Minister. Then comes the partnership of 20 per cent. only this time, but the members of the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. had promised to make the difference good, and so they did. We have seen regarding the two tenders, and we have seen the contract awarded. We have the interference of the Minister direct on these two points. We will now proceed to examine the question of the substitution of granite for sandstone, and I call the attention of Ministers and hon. members to this point, because it is one, which according to my view, in which the late Minister of Public Works is most directly interested. The history of this matter begins on 12th December, 1884. Nicholas Connolly addresses his dear friend Murphy as follows:—

"I think that Mr. T. would like to have the dock builte of grannet and hee said that it would not cost much over sixty thousand in adishin to our prise for sandstone and I also think that the folkes heer would lik to mak it a hundred feet longer. If corse thoes thinges are for our frend two work on But for the substitutin of grannet would be worth one hundred thousane moeur and the lengthing preporson if corse Mr. T. would have two bee seen in the avent of aney chaing as hee is the Dominion agent heer and all pourfull as well as our folkes there. We will want changes mad in the sise of the stone and paid for all the stone we put in that is we wnt to increase the thickens and the weth of bed and be alouded for it at our prise and in that way we will make a good thing. The best way would be to have them order hever corses as by that it would give us a chance of an extra as well as giving us our prise. Your can tell our frend But I will write you more fully in a day or two."

The contractors begin by saying that the people there desire granite substituted for sandstone. They themselves wish the lock lengthened, and recourses of stone. On 19th December, 1884, Nicholas Connolly refers to plant, and he says:

"I hope friend Sir H. will not punish us thus.

"ther is a verey strong feeling heer that the dock must bee built of grannet and a hundred feet longer or a hundred and fiftey which you want two adeviсat for you now that whem the C. P. R. is compleeted and they get the line to China and Japan you now it would bee a verey onfortunate thing two have the dock two short or built of perishable materil lik sandstone when good grannet can bee had at verey littel more expence, of corse wee donat want aneything more than the adishional expence of cutting a and other things.

"Mr. Trutch semt for mee twoday and asked mee in a verey frendley maner about the stuf that I was objecting two and after a long conversatin and at which I made some good pointes hee Mr. Trutch said hee would bee glad if the Dominion Government would take my vew of it and he said that hee would lay the case befour Sir Hector and that hee would not inger us on the contrary would help us all he could I told him if that was the case ther would bee now truble. But wee would sueseed Sow you want two prepair the folkes ther for thees thinges wee want thim all wee want the corses of stone incrased in sise and alowed for sade incrase. If now more at last the seedule of rait, if corse wee can get a long with the sand stone and build verey well with it but ther is maney cole vainis in it and hard laires of iron that is verey bad and it scales off with the wether and the other kind that is heer is hard and full of iron and discolors verey much this is the kind the mint is built of in Sanfrancisco But if wee have two use sandstone wee will get it about 40 miles from heer and softer than what the used for the mint the quarry that the got the stone for the mint out of is about a hundred miles from heer ther is not aney offes for us on the work and wel have two build and at onse and all the dericks are now good."

Nicholas Connolly mentioned in a postscriptum that the sandstone is bad and that the post office built there of that stone had to be pulled down, and a new one built. On 2nd January, 1885, Larkin writes:

"My Dear Sir,—* * * I hope that Uncle Thomas will succeed in getting the percentage."

We see there Uncle Thomas helping Larkin, Connolly & Co., regarding the graving dock at Esquimalt where he was not a Harbour Commissioner. On 16th January:

"Besides this, Mr. Trutch started nearly a week ago for Ottawa, to (I think) press the matter on the attention of the proper officials in Ottawa. The people here are also very anxious to have granite substituted for sandstone in the dock, and I think Mr. Trutch will also bring this matter to the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works."

On 14th January, Larkin writes to Murphy:

"Should you have an interview with Sir H. and talk over B.C. affairs make no definite arrangements until Nick's arrival, as he may have things to suggest that we at present know nothing about."

On 16th January Michael Connolly writes to friend Murphy:

"The people here are very anxious to have granite substituted for sandstone in the dock, and I think Mr. Trutch will also bring this matter to the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works. If there is a change made we cannot afford to make the substitution for less than $75,000, in addition to the present sum, and if it was a hundred thousand it would be all the better, and we can then afford to devote more to charitable purposes."

On 27th January, 1885, Murphy writes to Larkin:

"I have heard nothing from Perley as yet in reference to the B. C. dock or Trutch, but McGreevy leaves here tomorrow and he will look after the matter."

We see by other letters that the Minister of Public Works had decided beforehand. Of course, he had to wait for Mr. Trutch in order to cover himself, but he had determined to grant the request of the contractors. On 18th January a letter from Michael Connolly is sent as follows:—

"We found a very good quarry, and left Gallagher and a few men there to get the buildings ready for the men and intend sending the balance of the men up Wednesday next. As soon as this reaches you make no delay in seeing the proper parties and get the double entrance at the head of this dock changed to a circular head, the same as the dock at Lévis. You can use as an argument the fact that there is quite a large hill behind this one and to build a dock in the rear of this one will cost more than to put in another coffer dam and build an entirely new dock alongside of this one. This is very important and should be attended to at once. Mr. Perley will see the absurdity of this double entrance business."

I will say en passant that it is very extraordinary that the plans for the Esquimalt dock contained absurdities that had absolutely to be changed a short time afterwards. Perley, without asking the engineers of British Columbia, wrote on 21st January :

"As before stated, the works for a second entrance at the head of the dock are and will remain useless; and if the dock bottom were carried out, and these works abolished, a further length of 50 feet would be obtained within the limits of the present contract, at an additional expense of, say, $35,000, or a total of $410,000."

A layman, an ordinary man, finds out and writes to Ottawa, that a second entrance is an absurdity, and Mr. Perley a few days afterwards decides that it is an absurdity and suggests that $35,000 in extras will be granted to have that absurdity disappear. It reminds me of another contract we know about, where a proposal to diminish the work entailed an increase of cost. In this instance also the extent of the work was cut down, yet the country had to pay $35,000 more because the contractors had less work to do. Immediately upon that report of Mr. Perley, which is not based upon the report of the engineers at Esquimalt, Sir Hector sanctions the change suggested. On the 27th January, 1885, Mr. Murphy writes to Mr. Larkin :

"I have heard nothing from Mr. Perley as yet in reference to the B. C. dock, or Trutch, but Mr. McGreevy leaves here to-morrow and he will look after the matter."

On the 1st February, Michael Connolly writes to friend Owen :

"I don't think $100,000 would any more than pay for the difference of cost of substituting granite for sandstone, as it is a very costly and tedious job to cut and prepare granite for this work"

On the 2nd February, Michael Connolly writes to friend Owen :

"Sir Hector has telegraphed instructions to Trutch to measure all the stone in the dock full as built, but there has not been anything done about the old plant yet."

I leave aside for a moment the question of the granite stone. Will the hon. gentlemen opposite tell me upon what authority Sir Hector Langevin had been telegraphing to Esquimalt to measure all the stone? Is there any report of the engineer to justify it? This, in the mind of the Minister, must have been nothing else but a preparation for extras for the contractors. You see by a letter I quoted, of the 1st February, that the contractors find out that the granite is very expensive and they say that $100,000 would not pay them. Then, on the 8th February, Michael Connolly writes to "friend Owen" :

"Nick at first was very anxious to have the stone changed to granite, but I hope no such change will be made, for the granite here is terribly hard and the quarry about 180 miles distant. If possible get them to extend the dock 150 feet and do away with the double entrance but put in a circular head, the same as at Lévis, and let sandstone go in as it is. Be sure and do what you can for this matter. Dispensing with the double entrance head is very important, as it is very difficult work."

On the 12th February, Michael Connolly writes again to "friend Owen" :

"I am delighted to hear that they have determined to extend the dock, as you say, 100 feet. If it was 150 feet it would be all the better. I didn't care so much about the change of sandstone for granite, as the granite here is terribly hard, and will take a tremendous time to cut it. Nick thought at first if we got it changed to granite it would be a good idea, and there would be money in it. Now we have the sandstone quarries open and communication established with them, so that it is no trouble to run up or down to them, and besides, if we have to put in granite we will have to go about forty miles further off where no boats call, and if we have anything to send there it will have to go by special conveyance. On the whole, I would rather put in the granite, as we would be able to finish in a shorter time, and I think there is fully as much money in it."

Now we have got the letter of the 16th February, 1885, of Mr. Trutch to Mr. Perley, and I draw the attention of the Minister to that letter in which it is stated as follows :—

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of a copy of an Order in Council, conveyed to me under covering letter of the 14th instant from the chief engineer, authorizing the omission of the works for a second entrance at the head of the Esquimalt dock and the extension of the dock, bottom and side walls to obtain a further length of 50 feet in the body of the dock, and to state that the necessary instructions will be at once sent to the resident engineer and to the contractors, for carrying these alterations into effect.

"In connection with this subject, I take this opportunity of calling your attention to the fact that the sandstone intended to be used in this work, though the best obtainable after a careful search, and selection, is of a soft character, and will, I fear not wear well in positions in the work where it is liable to crushing strain, heavy blows or much friction, as, for instance, in positions such as the altars, the ladders, the dock bottom under the keel blocks, the culverts, &c.

"It would undoubtedly add very materially to the value of the dock by rendering it a more permanent work, and thus diminishing the liability to after expenditure for the removal of these portions of the work (which would certainly be a contingency to be provided for if they were built of sandstone) should they be constructed at once of granite instead, an abundant supply of which material of excellent quality is available to the contractor. (Sgd.) JOSEPH TRUTCH."

But, Sir, on the 18th February, 1885, Larkin writes to Murphy as follows :—

"ST. CATHARINES, 18th February, 1885.

"O. E. MURPHY, Esq., Quebec.

"MY DEAR SIR,—After posting my letter to you yesterday I received a letter from Mike dated the 8th. You may have one of same date and to the same purport. In case you have not I will give you the main points. The first is that they are working the sandstone quarry. It has turned out first rate. A steamer calls there alternate days, making communication with the dock easy, and that the substitution of granite, even at a dollar a foot, will not pay as well as the present contract for sandstone, and Mike does not want the change. The granite is good but hard to cut : and the quarries are 180 miles from the dock and no regular steam communication to them as there is to the sandstone quarries. The latter is only 45 miles from the dock. Of course Nick is anxious for the lengthening but nothing more. Better see our friends on this matter." * * * *

"Yours truly,

"P. LARKIN."

Not only Mr. Trutch, not only the contractors at first, not only the people of British Columbia by sending petitions, but even Mr. Perley under date of the 21st February, 1885, considered that the stone should be granite, and Mr. Perley says :

"I have carefully read Mr. Trutch's letter of the 16th (No. 56915) calling attention to the desirability of substituting granite for sandstone in certain portions of the graving dock at Esquimalt, and recommending that such substitution be authorized.

"Having had occasion last summer to examine a large number of graving docks in England and Scotland, I particularly noticed that the bottom of the docks, the altars, filling and emptying culverts, steps, timber slides and copings were the points where the greatest wear and tear took place—in fact that they were the working points of the docks, and, therefore, were built accordingly.

"The sandstone specified for the Esquimalt dock is of a very soft and friable nature, and liable to fracture under a heavy blow or strain, and may be classed as unfitted for use at points where it would be subject to the constant wear it would sustain if placed in the parts of the dock above referred to.

"By substituting granite for sandstone, at these points, not only would a greater degree of solidity be given to the work, but the amount of ordinary wear and tear would be reduced to a minimum—in fact, it might be assumed that once built a necessity for repair would be almost nil, whilst, if built of sandstone, I believe a yearly expenditure would have to be made for restoration of damaged work.

"I have also looked into the matter of cost and find that by substituting granite for sandstone at the salient points, there would be added about $45,000 to the cost of the dock, and I am of the opinion that the benefit to be derived by the use of granite would justify the expenditure required to place it in the work, and I therefore join with Mr. Trutch in recommending its use."

We find at the bottom of this letter:

"Approved and recommended.

"H. L. LANGEVIN."

Mr. Speaker, we all admit; Mr. Perley admits, Mr. Trutch admits, and Mr. Bennett acting for Mr. Trutch admits, and the people of British Columbia admit, and the contractors admit, and common sense and experience were also there to prove that sandstone was not good, that the interest of the country required that granite should be supplied, and the Minister himself recommends the change to granite; but notwithstanding all this we find that the Council refuses to accept the recommendation, and why? They refused it against the report of Mr. Perley, and did they do it of their own act? If they did, they must take the responsibility of having refused the change against the advice of everybody, and of having refused to do what was in the public interest in this matter. I do not charge that the Council was at fault in this, because I understand that they must have acted upon the advice of the Minister at the head of the department. But surely they will be more manly than to throw the responsibility of that on Mr. Perley, when they have got the report of Mr. Perley that he was in favour of granite. When Sir Hector accepted that change, did he do so in the interest of the public? We will see. On the 24th of February Mr. Robert McGreevy writes:

"DEAR MURPHY,—The second entrance has been done away with, and circular head substituted at an increase of $35,000. The granite substitution was just about being sent to Council, but happily my letter came in time to put it back to sandstone, where it is now; high courses and bed will be put—the additional length will be hereafter settled. I think this is what you want, but it was a close shave."

Here is abundant proof that the Minister has been sacrificing the public interest for the benefit of the contractors. I do not care for the oral evidence on that point; I have got the documentary evidence all through, and we will see how it confirms that fact. On the same day that Mr. McGreevy wrote to Murphy Mr. Perley wrote to Mr. Trutch, telling him that a decision adverse to his recommendation had been given by the Privy Council. On the 24th of February, 1885, Nick writes also:

"As to the sandstone, if they can make as much out of it as they can out of granite it would be as well to stick to the former if we can, as it is far more covenient. No doubt Nick, on investigating the matter, has come to this conclusion, and since writing you first about substituting granite, and he is on the right track now."

He was not aware that Mike had written on the 18th February. On the 26th of February Murphy writes to Larkin:

"DEAR SIR,—You letter just arrived, and in reply would say that our friends here are greatly disappointed in the way we have treated them both here and at Ottawa, after everything was done to suit us, then it has to be undone again."

Do we see there what was done before the Council? Do we see the action of the Minister, deciding first in the interest of the country, but when he received word from the contractors that if it was in the interest of the country it was not in their interest, going before the Council and asking for the withdrawal of his signature? There was the report before the Executive Council: there was Sir Hector Langevin's signature approving of it, and he had to say to the Council that he begged to withdraw that report; and of course he must have complained to his friend Thomas McGreevy of the position in which his friends had put him. Murphy writes to Larkin:

"I cannot understand Nicholas, as you know, Mr. Trutch stated, there would be a letter in Quebec, giving a detailed statement of what we wanted in the way of changes and proposed costs of the same. However, there came none, of course, when Michael's letter came to me, I had our friend send dispatch to Ottawa, stopping the substitution of granite, you see the position this places our friends in there before the Council."

What a humiliating position it is for this Dominion to see the hands of the contractors surreptitiously at work in the sacred room where the Council sits, taking away a document before them so that their interests would prevail upon public interest. Here are men under oath to protect the interests of this country, and that oath is laughed at and sneered at by contractors, whose influence reaches into that chamber; and to-day we are told that Mr. Perley is the responsible man. Will not the fourteen men of that Council be brave enough to say that they decided, and will they not be able to give us reasons why they did it? I say that nobody except Sir Hector Langevin, or the whole Ministry if they prefer it, is responsible for that change, which was made against the interests of the country. But Owen Murphy is not the only one to give us corroboration of that. On the 28th of February, 1885, Larkin writes from St. Catharines:

"MY DEAR SIR,—Your letter of the 26th instant received, and contents carefully noted. I cannot see why our friends should be disappointed or that they have cause to think that we have treated them in any way discourteously, either at Quebec or at Ottawa: in fact, this is a matter in which all are interested, and the more made out of it the better for them as well as us. It was first thought that substituting granite for sandstone at $1.00 per foot additional would be a big thing; afterwards, it was ascertained that the sandstone at contract prices would pay as well, owing to the quarries being working well and the facilities of getting the stone to the dock would expedite the building and shorten the time materially. I am not prepared to say that the granite would not pay, but I am satisfied to leave the whole matter with Nicholas, Mike and Hume: they are on the spot and have fully investigated the whole affair, and are better judges of what will pay best than we are or could possibly be at this distance from the scene of action."

On the 23rd of March, 1885, Michael Connolly writes again to "friend Owen":

"FRIEND OWEN.—Yours of the 10th received to-day.

"I agree with you, things were badly mixed up and too much confused, in reference to the granite. This was owing to not getting proper data on which to base figures when writing or tendering to the Department of Public Works. Nick at first thought, and indeed so did I, that we could substitute granite for sandstone at a very moderate advance on the price of sandstone. I should be very sorry to have our friends think that that matter was done intentionally or with any view to placing them in a false position. The first letters were written without giving the matter due consideration, which I am ready to admit was our fault, but after due examination we came to the conclusion that it could not be done for the price; therefore we are grateful to our friends for having our proposition rejected. I am sorry to hear that our friends are annoyed over the matter, for surely it's better not to get the substitution than to have it at losing figures. There are many ways, however, in which they can make up for this matter, by increasing the beds of the stone, &c., and by adding to the length of the dock will more than compensate for the loss in the granite substitution. I was not aware and I do not think that any one here knew that our friends had been ignored or that there had been any overtures made except through you to them. If there were I certainly had no hand in it, and I do not think Nick had either."

Then he says that he had some difficulty with a young gentleman, a nephew of the Hon. Thomas McGreevy, who used to talk too much about his uncle's influence with the Minister of Public Works. That influence was well known to the contractors, and they knew well what they had to pay for it. This ends the matter of the sandstone, and I will be glad if there can be any possible answer made concerning it. I will sum it up in a few words. It was found out by experience at Esquimalt that the sandstone was bad; the post office there had been built of sandstone and had to be pulled down and rebuilt of other stone. It was asked by Mr. Trutch, assented to by Mr. Perley and by Sir Hector Langevin, that granite be substituted, and the thing was to have been done when word came from the contractors that it would not be financially beneficial to them, and Sir Hector Langevin, to please the contractors, withdrew his report from the Council and placed himself in the humiliating condition which was depicted by the contractors among themselves. If anyone will pretend that the Minister himself did not join the contractors in their conspiracy against the public interests, I must say that I did not understand the meaning of the words I have been reading. The Minister, and not Mr. Perley, was responsible in this instance, just as the Minister, and not Mr. Perley, was responsible for the loss suffered by the country on the first and second tenders. Now, I will come to the re-coursing; but before doing so let me read a letter from Michael Connolly to his friend Owen, page 209, in which he says:

"I think Bennett will object to us putting large stone in the concrete. We put some large stone in yesterday to test the matter, but Bennett did not come here. He will be down to-morrow, and if he objects I will write you at once and let you know. He is exacting every petty foolish thing the specifications speak of, all of which we will of course comply with until we get orders from headquarters."

Here we see that the contractors always looked to Ottawa for protection against the officers of the department at Esquimalt, the government engineer, Mr. Trutch, and Mr. Bennett, the resident engineer. They do not care what is done by these men, but they write to friend Owen to get the department to comply with their wishes. On the 16th of April, 1885, Mr. Perley wrote to Mr. Trutch:

"Contractors' engineer submitted his design for re-coursing graving dock, and also for alteration in the course for inclination or drip in bottom, and informs me that he furnished Bennett with copies of changes proposed. You are authorized to permit contractors to make these changes; plan circular head will be forwarded."

It is very extraordinary that the officers at Esquimalt were not consulted, but that instead there was direct communication between the contractors, engineer at Esquimalt and the department at Ottawa. Why had we a resident engineer at Esquimalt? Why had we another officer there representing the Government, when the contractors did not deign to consult them and communicate through them, but wrote direct to Ottawa to obtain orders for extras and changes? That was a very extraordinary state of things. Now, we have seen that the contractors complained of Mr. Trutch, and on their complaint Mr. Perley interfered, by his letter of 16th of April, 1885, page 122:

"There would appear to be an intention on the part of Mr. Bennett to adhere literally to the plans for this dock, even where it has been shown to him that a change is necessary for the benefit of the dock. This ought not to be so, for there is no doubt that before the dock is finished many occasions will arise when departures must be made from the plans, and Mr. Bennett should exercise judgment in such cases."

Judgment he could not exercise, because he was always being checked by Ottawa. By following the dates of the letters we come on one referring to the plant, Mr. Trutch, according to Mr. Bennett, the resident engineer, found out that all the plant had been handed over to the contractors, except $10.45 worth, and the contractors objected to the amount of $12,403. Mr. Trutch writes as follows:—

"I represented to Mr. Connolly that I understood it to be clearly one of the terms of the contract that the whole of the plant mentioned in the schedule should be taken over by them, and be charged against them at the prices stated, and that this material and plant had accordingly been handed over to them, and was now in their possession and would accordingly be charged against them, except as to the missing articles to the value of $10.45, and that, as provided in the specification attached to the contract, a deduction of one-twelfth of the aggregate price of the material and plant so handed over to them would be made from the amount of the payments to be made to them on each of the twelve first monthly progress estimates, certified to by the resident engineer."

This will be found on page 99 of the report. On the 18th of April, 1885, Mr. Trutch wrote to Mr. Perley, see page 123:

"Design furnished Bennett by contractors for re-coursing will be carried out as authorized by your telegram of 16th inst.; alterations appear unobjectionable, but their adoption will increase cost of work by additional price of dressed stone resulting from necessarily increased width of bed proportionate to increased depth of courses."

On the 20th of April, 1885, Mr. Perley wrote to Mr. Trutch:

"As the alteration in depth of courses was requested by the contractors for their own convenience, and not ordered by the department, there will not be any extra amount of dressed stone allowed beyond the schedule quantities which will be adhered to in making estimates. * * * What I wish to convey in the above is that as the contractors suggested the change in the dimensions of the stone, and were not ordered by the department to make the change, they have no right to be paid for any extra stone supplied."

It was well decided then by Mr. Trutch and Mr. Perley that they would not allow anything for the re-coursing. In another letter of the 29th of April, 1885, page 141, Mr. Perley writes:

"It now appears from Mr. Trutch's letter that the contractors desire to accept plant, &c., to the value of $38,000 only and do not wish to pay for the balance, amounting to $12,400, because they say they have no use for it. The specification is very clear on this point, and there is no option on the part of the contractors to take what they please and refuse what they do not want."

On the 2nd of May, 1885, page 18, Mr. Thomas McGreevy wrote to his brother:

"If this arrangement does not suit Mr. Murphy, telegraph me what he wants done and I will have it done for him."

By whom?

"It is now understood that Bennett, the engineer at British Colombia, will not suit, so the Minister and Perley are prepared to change him. He asked if I could recommend one. 'Could you think of one that would suit, and I would have the Minister appoint him?'"

On the 2nd May, 1885, another letter was written by Mr. Trutch as follows:—

"A month ago I apprised Mr. Connolly that substitution of larger courses would not be objected to, and that on his written application to be allowed to substitute any larger courses without increased cost of work to Government I would return him written sanction. No such written application has, however, been received, and consequently no written sanction has been given by me. Contractors submitted to Bennett, twentieth March, plans of proposed changes in mode of construction which he referred to me on my return: these changes appeared both to Bennett and myself unobjectionable, except as regards question of cost as I wired you eighteenth ult., and I understand work is proceeding in accordance therewith, but without letter from contractors to above effect. I hesitate to give written sanction or to formally approve plans as specifications request least complication as to cost should result. Of course, however, I will do so if Minister so directs. Please answer."

On the same date Perley writes:

"Minister directs that no deduction for plant be made from first progress estimate, but shall begin with second and so continue monthly. You can allow ninety per cent. on materials delivered subject to the deduction of ten per cent. Wire on Monday morning amount which can be paid to contractors, as they are pressing for payment."

On the 4th May, 1885, Perley telegraphed:

"Minister authorizes you to permit contractors to build work with stone of increased sizes, as proposed by themselves; they to be made aware that this permission is merely acceding to their request and not ordering them to make the change."

On the same day he writes in confirmation of his telegram and adds that the permission to do so has been granted to them at their own request, "and I would inform them here of this decision of the Minister and that no extra payment will be made to them on account of this change." On the 4th May Thomas writes to his brother:

"As I telegraphed you this morning, no estimate has been telegraphed. Everything and every order has been sent to them that was possible to make them understand. But still there was a despatch from them to-day which cost $15, which they had in writing for over a month out there. Perley went to see Page this morning to try and get another engineer to send out at once and dismiss Bennett. He that goes out will get his instructions before going out."

The contractors wanted the re-coursing and plant paid for, they wanted the new stones paid for on the same basis as the outside masonry. They could not obtain the consent of Trutch or Bennett, but you see that Mr. Perley himself was supporting them. Then Mr. Thomas McGreevy sees that somebody must be removed, and he sees Perley and they decide to get rid of Bennett and to have another engineer who will have his instructions before starting. Mr. Trutch, on the 11th May, 1885, protests against what has been insinuated against Mr. Bennett, and says that there is no intention on his part of doing anything of which he is accused. On the 12th May, 1885, the Minister cannot do otherwise than to follow the advice of Mr. Perley and Mr. Trutch, and to say that the plant must be paid for as specified in the contract and the specification. But every hope is not lost for the contractors. Mr. Trutch, on the 18th May, 1885, writes to Larkin, Connolly & Co.:

"I have also been apprised by Mr. Perley that you have applied to the Minister ——"

You see they have applied to the Minister and not to Mr. Trutch.—

"to the Minister and to him for permission to be allowed to carry out the works in accordance with these plans; and that the Minister had decided that such permission should be given on the distinct condition that no extra payment will be made to you on account of the changes to be effected by the adoption of these plans, and especially that no extra payment shall be made to you on account of the increased sizes of stone proposed by you to be used in the work, as this is to be done at your own request and for your own proper advantage, as you think, and not by order of the department, and I am authorized and requested to convey to you such permission.

"I have, accordingly, pursuant to the requirements of the conditions of the specifications on which your contract is based, signed the plans under reference, and hereby convey to you my consent to the work being carried out in conformity therewith on the conditions above stated as prescribed by the same."

Mr. Trutch wanted at first a written bond by the contractors that they would not ask any extra payment. They have received direct from the Minister at Ottawa permission to measure all the stone, then they have permission to employ these new stones without the consent and against the will of the engineers at Esquimalt. On the 28th May Michael Connolly writes:

"Yours of the 17th instant is just to hand. I wrote a letter to Mr. McGreevy a few days ago, telling him about Trutch. I don't think much of him; he was terribly put out when he found the Government had ignored him, and approved the changes we suggested without consulting him; hence his letter about not allowing us anything for the additional sizes of stone. I treat him with great consideration when he calls, but don't intend to trouble him much in future."

No, he need not trouble him much. He will simply write to Ottawa, to friend Murphy or friend McGreevy, and every one of his wishes will be complied with. He goes on:

"While I was away, under telegraphic instruction from Ottawa, Bennett prepared the estimate, but I knew we did not get all we were entitled to, as, for example, our engineer tells me he did not allow us for any headers in the first and second altars, when I know there is the regulation number in, and if not, how can we face the chief engineer, after allowing the work to be built so much at variance with the specifications."

I think Mr. Trutch was quite correct in feeling that he was not consulted. What was his use there, and what was the use of the money we paid for him? I think we might as well decide, looking at the small number of members actually present in the House, that the minority's report should be adopted and that the Government should be upset at once. Judging from the small number who want information on this subject, we might stop the debate and vote at once. On the 9th of September, 1885, Larkin and Connolly write to the Hon. Mr. Trutch and want to be paid for the re-coursing of the stones under the head of masonry. They have obtained the permission they asked for. They did not consent to sign a document by which, as requested from them, they would have agreed not to ask for changes. They have received permission from the engineer and orders from the Minister, and now they begin to fyle their claims. On the 11th September Michael Connolly writes to his brother and complains again of Messrs. Trutch and Bennett, and says they think they know more than the Minister of Public Works or the chief engineer:

"Instead of Mr. Trutch complying with the request of Sir Hector, that we should receive every possible indulgence and encouragement, he is doing everything he can in an underhand way to embarrass us, and Bennett is his tool all through."

"Received all possible indulgence and encouragement." When Sir Hector told Starrs & O'Hanly that it would be a strict contract, that there would be no extras and no change he was telling Trutch at the same time to use every possible indulgence towards Larkin, Connolly & Co. He goes on:

"If the Department of Public Works is going to allow Trutch and Bennett to dictate to it in this manner, we might as well, and better, stop at once, for we cannot stand this sort of humbugging any longer."

He concluded by saying :

"I wish, as soon as this letter comes to you, you would go to Ottawa and see Sir Hector and explain the matter to him, who, I believe, when the situation is explained to him, will apply the necessary remedy."

On the 7th December, 1885, Michael Connolly writes to friend Owen, and says :

"I judge from the tone of his remarks——"

That is of Perley.—

—"that he is in favour of lengthening the dock, but as he has not yet seen it reported to the Minister, of course he cannot say what will be done. We did not ask him anything about Bennett, but from the drift of the conversation we concluded that Bennett would be allowed to finish the dock."

Mr. Perley had just come back from British Columbia. We have seen that the contractors could not be paid for their plant, and they could not be paid for the re-coursing of the stone? What do they decide in Ottawa? They sent that useful Perley to British Columbia, and when he gets back then he finds that, as the sandstone is not very good, it was well to employ larger stone than stipulated by the contract. Now, it has become fair to pay for the sandstone fully and completely, in spite of the contract, in spite of the engineers' report, in spite of the previous decisions. His trip to British Columbia was for what purpose? Was it to show that he knew nothing about it beforehand? Was it to go there and prove that these previous reports were based upon erroneous information? It would appear to be so. At all events he comes back and he suggests that the plant should be paid, and that the engineers should be fully paid for their re-coursing. I might refer this honourable House to his letter of the 18th January. There are two letters of that date. One is Exhibit "86," which is to be found in the report of the majority. I have heard complaints that in the Lévis dock the documents were only put in at the end of the enquête. But Mr. Henry and Mr. Osler were there, and the officers of the department were there, but this letter quoted in the majority report has never been fyled as an exhibit, and is not to be found in the list of exhibits. We do not complain of it, but I wish only to remind them that when they complain about the exhibit fyled in the Lévis dock matter, their complaints are not based upon equal justice and fairness. Those two exhibits, which I will not read in order to save time, are dated the 18th of January, 1886, and are the confirmation of what I say, that Perley's trip was with the only object of putting him in a position to recommend the payment of the plant and the re-coursing. It was to accomplish the promise made by Sir Hector which is related to us in the letter of Robert McGreevy. It was to accomplish the promise to which Larkin has referred in his letter. All through we see that Perley is simply a cover and a sham to take away the responsibility of the direct action of the Minister. We see also by telegrams of 15th November and other dates, what means the Minister took that no delay should occur concerning the contractors. He acts towards them as a very good father, and I presume that the contractors felt obliged under these circumstances to show practical gratitude. On the 15th of February, 1886, Mr. Trutch writes to Mr. Perley, and says :

"To-day I have received from Mr. Bennett the progress estimate to the end of January under Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co.'s contract for the completion of the dock, with a covering letter from Mr. Bennett, in which he states that the measurements for this estimate have been made by him in accordance with the Minister's said directions, and that the sum of $23,844.13 has consequently been added to this estimate.

It is good to have friends at court. In one month the amount due is increased by $23,844. Is this Mr. Perley's fault? No; this is the order given specially by the Minister to measure the whole of the inside stone. The permission was given at the start to the contractors to re-course the stone with a special understanding and agreement that nothing will be allowed extra for that. Afterwards Mr. Perley goes to British Columbia and finds, against the views entertained by the resident engineer, that the contractors must be fully paid. He did not know it before leaving here. Here I see the direct intervention and action of the Minister himself. Then there was a question of lengthening the dock further, and Michael Connolly writes on the 15th of February, 1886 :

"Friend Owen,"—

We are happy to have those letters. If we had them not we would never have found out anything. If Murphy had come before the Committee, that man who was a defaulter in New York, and sworn to these things without there being abundant letters and documents to corroborate his statements, he would be in gaol for the rest of his life. But we have letters. Everything he said in his evidence was astounding. We all looked at them as if it was impossible. But there were letters and documents discovered everywhere, and now the history is made pretty complete. Here is one of these documents about the dock (page 191) :

"Now about the dock here. If the two hundred and fifty thousand pass in the Budget, we, of course, will have some work to tear down, &c., but if you can get a lump contract for extending at $250,000 we can give fifty thousand dollars. If we don't get it of course we will finish up as soon as possible. If you can prevent the appointment of Muir, whom Bennett appointed inspector of machinery on the dock here, do so by all means."

Is it possible that these contractors are obtaining from the Government a contract for $250,000 which will place then in a position to give $50,000? What is the state of the country in which we live? These contractors were planning for a contract at such extravagant prices that they would be able to give $50,000 out of their profits. On 19th February, 1886, the following letter was addressed to Murphy :—

"My Dear Sir,—I have just got your letter of the 17th inst. Our friends' call for another $5,000, on account of B. C., is not in accordance with the agreement we had when the $50,000 was divided—that was, that there was to be no more calls or divisions to be made until the indebtedness of the B. C. dock and Q. H. I. works to the Quebec dock was paid, that was distinctly stated by me and agreed to by R. H.; otherwise, I would not have agreed to the division of the $50,000. You did quite right to refuse—stick to it; should we get an order to lengthen the dock 100 feet or even 75 feet I would be quite willing that $5,000 should be given at once. Bear in mind, my dear fellow, that there is a large amount due you, Connolly and myself, and that if we continue donating as we have been doing there will be nothing left to pay us, except old plant. Keep the eleventh commandment in view—that is, look out for yourself."

Further down the letter reads :

"We can apply for the percentage any time. I do not think, however, that it would be advisable to do so for some time, as we are getting paid for the increased masonry, and it would be asking too much at one time. If Trutch was removed we could get along with Bennett all right, but as long as he is under Trutch's influence we cannot. I have just received a letter from Mike; he says that Trutch is very much annoyed because he was not consulted before the order was given to measure the increased masonry."

Michael Connolly writes to Owen:

"I told you in a letter lately, that if $250,000 were granted for extending the dock we would give fifty of it for some charitable purpose. I think it will be quite possible to get that amount, and as we will have to pull down a considerable quantity of work it will be worth that amount to pull the work down and extend it 100 feet. We have not incurred any expense in connection with the agitation about extending the dock, but I suppose we will have to give something to the Colonist, whose proprietor is a pretty decent man. * * *

"P.S.—I don't see why our friends should ask for another $5,000. I know and heard a distinct understanding and agreement in presence of Capt. Larkin that after the division of the $50,000 there should be no further calls until all the debts were paid. I think our friends should have a little patience with us, and wait a little. We have not acted badly by them, for I see by the statement you sent out they have received out of this work alone $14,000, all before we were charged one dollar on it; I would advise you to be careful. There may not be so much saved or made on this work as we expected; for we have had to advance the men's wages here lately, as we could not otherwise get labourers, most of them having started out to the gold mines on Granite Creek.

"I think perhaps Nick and Hume will start about the 15th inst., or thereabouts.

"Be careful and don't pay out too much."

On 26th February, 1886, Thomas McGreevy writes to Robert from the House of Commons:

"I wrote you yesterday about Halifax graving dock. Sir Hector would be glad to recommend Murphy. The way for them to do would be to apply to the company in England, offering to build the dock for them, stating that they built the one in Quebec and were finishing the one in B.C. and referring to the Minister of Public Works of Canada as to their ability to do the work."

On 1st March, 1886, Thomas McGreevy wrote Robert from the Department of Public Works:

"I have had a long interview with Perley on harbour works and graving dock at B.C. Fleming was to have signed his report to-day on harbour works. It will be shown to me as soon as signed. I will see it to-morrow, and Sir Hector and myself will decide what is to be done for future. He will adopt my views. I will see you and Murphy about it before doing anything. It is a big thing for the future."

On 11th March, Thomas McGreevy wrote to his brother again from the Department of Public Works:

"My dear Robert,—I enclose you the amount of estimates for December and January. The January one includes the new system of measurement. The advance $20,000 on drawback has been passed and will be sent at once to B.C. The amount of estimate for February has not been telegraphed yet. I will let you know when it comes."

On 16th March, 1886, Michael Connolly wrote to Owen:

"Friend Owen,—I thought you said some time ago that the Government only intended to charge us thirty-seven thousand dollars for the plant they had on the ground here. Mr. Perley sent out a request and a list to mark and note what quantity of the plant we used or could use in connection with the work here, so we marked the different items we accepted, and their value, which in the aggregate amounted to thirty-one thousand dollars. Yet these people here, Trutch and Bennett, keep deducting the amount monthly prescribed by the specifications, viz., $4,000 a month, so that we have already paid on the old stuff forty-two thousand dollars. If Mr. Perley recommends that we be not charged with this worthless stuff and Sir Hector acts on his recommendation, Trutch and Bennett ought to be instructed in reference to the matter."

On 15th March, 1886, Thomas McGreevy wrote to Robert:

"My Dear Robert,—Larkin and Murphy are here. Larkin has learned a good deal of what has been done. The estimate for February is through and amounts to over $25,000, that makes nearly seventy-five thousand gone out within a month. They ought to be flush out there now."

On the 21st March, 1886, Michael writes to Owen Murphy:

"Yours of the 8th inst. came duly to hand. I hope you will soon hear definitely about the extension of the dock, as we have some men whom we would like to retain. Of course, if the estimate passes, we will give everything we can afford. We haven't heard anything from the 20,000 drawback yet, but perhaps we will in a day or two."

On the 13th May, 1886, Thomas writes to his brother Robert, from the House of Commons:

"House of Commons, Ottawa, 13th May, 1886.

"My Dear Robert,—Your letter received. Will be home on Saturday morning. The tenders for Cape Tormentine work were opened to-day by Sir Hector. The lowest is an Ottawa man. He is $134,000. His name is Perkins. The next after him is another Ottawa man. Perley says the estimate of the work is $170,000. You know what the tenders were that you were interested in. It is a great pity that a fine job like that should go so low. Give enclosed to Mr. Chaloner.

"Yours truly,

"THOMAS McGREEVY.

"I have seen Ferguson. He is going to push on the suit. Government won't ask any delay.

"Yours,

"T. M."

We see here that Thomas McGreevy knows it as soon as Sir Hector does anything. Mr. McGreevy knows all that Mr. Perley does, and there is no secret for him there. On the 13th September, 1886, Perley writes to Mr. Trutch:

"Ottawa, 13th September, 1886.

"Sir,—I am directed to inform you that the Honourable the Minister wishes to be furnished with a final estimate of the work done, &c., by Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co., on the graving dock at Esquimalt, B.C."

On the 20th September, 1886, Sir Hector himself writes to Mr. McGreevy:

"Office of the Minister of Public Works, Canada,

"Ottawa, 20th September, 1886.

"My dear Mr. McGreevy,—The contractors for the Lévis graving dock should ask a settlement of their account from the Harbour Commissioners, who then will most likely consult with their engineer. For the Esquimalt dock it is different, because the work there is altogether under my control.

"Yours very truly,

"HECTOR L. LANGEVIN.

"Hon. Thomas McGreevy, M.P., Quebec."

On the 11th December, 1886, Larkin, Connolly & Co. receive a letter from Mr. Gobeil, as follows:—

"Department of Public Works,

"Ottawa, 11th December, 1886.

"Gentlemen,—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated 7th instant, transmitting statements of claims on your part on account of your contract for the completion of the graving dock at Esquimalt, B.C., and to inform you that the matter has been referred, for report, to the chief engineer of department.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"A. GOBEIL,

"Secretary.

"Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co.,

"Contractors, Quebec."

We see here a most extraordinary request from Sir Hector Langevin who writes to them to send the account, and his request is complied with by the contractors immediately. The contractors not only succeeded in obtaining the changes I speak of, but they get another account for extras, and then comes the celebrated memo., corresponding in date with a letter of Sir Hector Langevin, advising them to send in their account. The memo. is as follows :—

"If contract is entered into with Harbour Commissioners, and approved of by the Minister of Public Works, for eight hundred thousand yards of dredging at thirty-five cents, to be dumped in river, or if in more difficult place, to be paid extra, we give 25,000. All over 200,000 at Lévis dock. Extras B. C. about 73,000, of which we give 23,000.

"LARKIN, CONNOLLY & CO."

They wanted something to make things smooth. Sir Hector writes to them to send in their account and the memo. was signed. This memo. was corroborated a few days afterwards by Larkin, because the first memo. they wrote was signed by Larkin, Connolly & Co. On the 1st February the contractors met at Nicholas Connolly's in Quebec, and another memo. was written by Larkin as follows :—

"QUEBEC, 1st February, 1887.

"Memo. of meeting this afternoon at the residence of N. K. Connolly, between N. K. C., O. E. Murphy, R. H. McGreevy and P. Larkin, and agreed that 'twenty-five,' (it does not go any further, but I know what that 'twenty-five' means $25,000. The memo. goes on) "and agreed that 'twenty-five' should be given and charged to dredging contract if obtained. If not obtained, to be charged to B. C. and Q. H. I., and that a former proposal, a memo. of which was taken by M. Connolly, should be cancelled."

On the 1st May, 1887, Michael Connolly writes to "friend Owen" as follows :—

"LARKIN, CONNOLLY & CO.,
"CONTRACTORS ESQUIMALT GRAVING DOCK,
"ESQUIMALT, B.C., 4th May, 1887.

"FRIEND OWEN,— * * * * I am trying to keep up the agitation of the dock extension as well as I can. I send you a paper to-day with a very good letter written by the engineer we had here, Mr. Aylen.

"I am glad to hear that yourself and Nick are making money in the stock business, but I think it is scarcely a prudent thing to do to give Clews a carte blanche to buy and sell as his opinion dictates, but of course he and you should know best. If you give these B.C. M.P.'s too much money you will spoil them ; I did a good deal for both of them here during their recent contest ; I helped them with votes and my personal influence on their platforms at their meeting, and besides subscribed about two hundred dollars to defray their incidental expenses.

* * * * * * * *

"Yours,
"M. CONNOLLY."

Whilst we were paying very largely here out of the public money, they were working the electors in British Columbia with our money to induce them to return members to support the Government. The power of these contractors was felt very heavily everywhere. It has been said that Mr. Perley is responsible for the remission of the money for the plant, and although Mr. Perley now assumes the responsibility for it, yet if the Minister after having known for such a long time the history of the plant, having known the conditions imposed, having known the objections of the engineers here and at British Columbia to paying that amount of $50,000 to the contractors ; if after that, Perley paid the money without his consent and knowledge, Sir Hector was not fit to be a Minister. Of course I am bound to accept Mr. Perley's evidence on that, but even accepting Mr. Perley's evidence, I say that it is gross negligence, and culpable and quasi criminal negligence on the part of the Minister, for which there is no possible excuse. The House remembers the conversation which took place in presence of Mr. Perley in reference to this matter, and which will be found related on page 102 of the evidence. Mr. Perley got into a passion because the contractors wanted a clause inserted about that, and he would not consent. Hon. gentlemen will also remember Mr. McGreevy's letter, which says that further on they will succeed, and so they did succeed. But who wanted to get rid of Mr. Bennett on account of the extras which were asked? On the 21st September, 1887, Mr. Perley reports to Sir Hector Langevin that Mr. Bennett will not be required after the 1st September, and Mr. Bennett is consequently dismissed. We have seen the great effort on the part of the Minister to have the dock lengthened. An Order in Council was passed to that effect, and they wanted the consent of England to the proposal, but England refused to agree to the lengthening of the dock, and that scheme, which would have put the contractors in a position to get $50,000 cash out of the public money, was spoiled by the honesty of the English Government, who would not lend a hand to that theft. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have dealt with the Esquimalt affairs so far as it concerns Sir Hector Langevin directly. I do not see how, in justice and fairness, we can seriously say that anyone else is nearly as guilty as the Minister himself. Anybody who will look, I will not say at the verbal evidence, but at the documentary evidence, will come to the same conclusion as I have arrived at myself, that in this contract, in which the contractors made the enormous profit of $240,000, besides donations, this terrible result for the country has been achieved through the direct, I might say the criminal conduct of the Minister of Public Works himself. I will not take up the time of the House to speak of the share of Mr. McGreevy in that, as both reports agree to make him responsible to a certain extent, though they differ as to the extent. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, to take up so much of the time of the House, but I think it fair to put these facts, as I understand them, for reference in the Hansard, so that it will be possible for our friends in the country to have my humble view of this case. The other contracts I will deal with in shorter terms, trying always to limit myself to the share that Sir Hector Langevin had in the matter. I come now to the dredging contract. On the 17th of June, 1882, the following letter was written by Sir Hector Langevin :—

"MY DEAR MR. PETERS,—You promised to send me something about the elections. Will you kindly do so?"

Where is the harm? If Mr. Murphy took $10,000 of his money and gave it as a subscription to Sir Hector Langevin, what harm can hon. gentlemen opposite find in that, when their late chief himself asked a contractor for a subscription? Another Minister of the Crown lately said before a committee of this House that he had asked for a subscription from a party furnishing goods to his department. The principle laid down on that side of the House is that it is fair and proper to ask for such subscriptions. Mr. Murphy thought so, and he said he had paid $10,000 ; and here we have the proof that Sir Hector himself asked for a subscription from Mr. Peters. We must remember that the dredging contract was subject to the approval of the hon. Minister of Public Works. It appears in all the official documents fyled before this House. Then, here is the letter of Sir Hector Langevin to the commissioners, asking if there was any collusion :

"I desire to know whether the commissioners have reasons to believe that the tenders received which are lower than the one they prefer, have been made in good faith, and that there has not been any collusion with respect to the withdrawal of these tenders."

Was the commission the proper party for him to apply to? Should he not rather have applied to the engineers? I do not object to the precaution he takes: it would have been all right if the results had been good; but he would have been better informed perhaps if he had asked Mr. McGreevy at once all about it. It is very strange that this man slept in the same house with Sir Hector, that he was then in Ottawa plotting, and sending to his brother the necessary advice. That most intimate friend, Sir Hector, writes to the commissioners: "Are you sure there is no collusion?" On the 25th of August, 1882, Michael Connolly writes to "friend Owen":

"I am glad to hear that you have ousted Peters, Moore & Wright out of the harbour works. Stick to Tom, and I think he will work matters all right; anyway, I have great confidence in him. If Larkin won't get out I would give him the whole thing, for he is a drag chain to carry with the present Administration; so, if he don't get out I would have it with him at a valuation."

That first contract obliged the contractors to dump into the embankment at a given price. Another letter of the 4th of October, from Michael Connolly says:

"You do right to keep in with Tom, as he is the main guy."

Another letter of the 12th of October from Michael Connolly says:

"You do right in keeping in with Hon. Thos., as just at present he has the whole thing in the hollow of his hand. You tell me you have the contract signed for the harbour work, but I think you have given Bob more than he is entitled so, especialy as he is not furnishing any capital. But of course you, who are on the ground, ought to know best, and it would be better to make a hundred thousand dollars with him in, than fifty thousand dollars with him out; so I suppose you have done the best you could under the circumstances."

You will remember on this point that Mr. Boswell informed Mr. Perley uselessly about the dredging being done deeper than the specifications provided for. It has been said that Mr. McGreevy knew that his brother was a partner, but that his object was to be paid his debts. How can hon. gentlemen dare to say such a thing, when Mr. McGreevy himself swore that he received directly from the contractors, from $50,000 to $60,000, though his brother says $117,000. Nicholas Connolly, in a letter, says:

"About the prise for throwing the materil back and leveling I think you are about right, and I think that Mr. Perley or Mr. Boyd would recomend it with very litel perswasan, if our friend would lay it before them in the proper light."

His letter is very compromising for the parties concerned. I want to draw your attention to an extract from the Minutes of the Quebec Harbour Commission of 4th July, 1885, according to which it appears that the contractors were still going on, in spite of their contract, with that dredging, and they were going on at the same price as before:

"The secretary is also directed to instruct the engineer in charge to notify the contractors that the commissioners will have to stop the dredging if they do not succeed in making arrangements that will allow them to proceed with the extra dredging the contractors are now executing, and to notify them also that it must be understood, however, that all works performed by them, or that may be performed out of their contract, not especially agreed upon, are and will be considered as forming part of the contract, it being established by certificate No. 13, read at the meeting, that the moneys already paid on account of dredging have exceeded the total amount of the contract."

We will see that through the intervention of the Minister they succeeded in going on, for larger quantities, with their contract of 1882 at the price stipulated therein. This is an important point, and I doubt not that the Minister who at this moment represents the Government in this House will remember it. In 1885, the ex-Minister of Public Works was informed that the contractors were going on with their contract at the same price as was stipulated in 1882, and it was he who allowed them to go on to the extent of $50,000 more at that price. Mr. Gobeil writes as follows:

"I am directed by the Honourable the Minister of Public Works to inform you that the understanding in the matter was as stated by the Hon. Mr. McGreevy, and to authorize your board to act accordingly."

On the 29th of July, 1885, Mr. Verret wrote to Sir Hector Langevin himself:

"As this dredging cannot be resumed without the consent of the Government, the commissioners most respectfully urge you to come to their relief."

You see there that Mr. Verret states the commissioners cannot do anything without the consent of the Minister. On the 29th of June, 1886, Mr. Boyd, in a letter to Mr. Verret, said:

"If Larkin, Connolly & Co. are willing to go on at their present prices, a good deal of valuable time will be saved by allowing them to do so."

On the 5th of July, 1886, the commissioners themselves inspected the work, and then Mr. Murphy, on behalf of the contracting firm, undertook to perform the work at contract prices, that is to say, as work executed under their contract for dredging, dated 25th of September, and on the 8th of July Mr. Verret wrote to Mr. Boyd as follows:

"They (the contractors) have undertaken to dredge to a uniform depth of at least 25 feet at low water mark, all the lumps designated on your plan. The work to be performed at contract prices, that is to say, as work excavated under the contract for dredging dated the 25th of September, 1882, with the proviso that the handling and levelling of the dredged material, after its dumping on the Louise embankment, shall be paid extra."

But the putting in of the dredged material on the embankment forms part of this extension of the contract. On the 23rd of December, Mr. Boswell was appointed resident engineer at $2,500. He is the man who later on signed the false report spread all over the world, as to the depth of the dock. Mr. C. McGreevy, a son of Robert McGreevy, was appointed assistant engineer at $1,800 a year, and Mr. Laforce Langevin was appointed another assistant engineer at $1,800 a year. After they were appointed, a letter came from Larkin, Connolly & Co. to the Harbour Commissioners claiming that they were entitled to over $13,000 more than was allowed them. Mr. Perley answered that on the 22nd of February, 1887:

"I may tell you that when going over this matter I found that Boyd had made an error whereby you were overpaid $13,000 and this may account for the smallness of the amount found to be due to you."

But there were two very able assistant engineers, Mr. McGreevy and Mr. Langevin. Where they had made their studies to become engineers nobody knows, but they were very competent. One was the son of the Minister of Public Works, and the other was the son of Mr. Robert McGreevy, one of the contractors and a brother to Thomas McGreevy. What was the result? It was that the claim for $13,000, which was refused on the 14th of March, 1887, was granted, not to the extent of $13,000, but of $17,000. That is, the contractors asked for $13,000 and got $17,000. It is under those circumstances that I refer to the correspondence to prove that the dredging contract was entirely under the control of Sir Hector Langevin. He knew that the contractors had been going on at the price of their contract, 27 cents, ten times beyond the quantities specified by their contract, and he knew that they were satisfied to keep going on at that price. That is proved by all the written evidence I have quoted, and we find further the following:—

"If contract is entered into with the Harbour Commissioners and approved of by the Minister of Public Works for 800,000 yards of dredging at 35 cents, to be dumped in river, or if in more difficult places to be paid extra, we give $25,000."

That is signed by Larkin, Connolly & Co. They had been ready to go on at 27 cents, and at that price were making a profit, but we find suddenly this offer signed. On the 26th April Mr. Thomas McGreevy wrote to his brother as follows:—

"I have just seen Perley on dredging. I think he will report on 35 cents, and put some conditions which will amount to nothing. He will report when I will be there."

Remember that Perley had nothing to do with granting or refusing contracts. That belonged exclusively to the Minister. The work had been going on very smoothly before, large quantities had been dredged at the 27 cents, and suddenly, on the 27th April, Mr. Perley, when nobody asked him, wanted to know from the contractors what they would charge at a uniform price for further dredging. The next day the contractors replied they would take 35 cents. On the 6th May Mr. Perley wrote to the commissioners and recommended that the 35 cents be granted, as it was a fair and reasonable price. And the commissioners, of course, seeing the recommendation of Mr. Perley, accept. Mr. Forsyth tells us it was the first time he ever heard about it, and they all say they only acted upon Mr. Perley's advice. It was proved before the Committee that 17 cents was paying the previous contractor. The answer to that, and I was rather astounded to hear it, was that the commissioners were responsible and Mr. Dobell's name was given, and I think it was the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) who asked what kind of men are the citizens of Quebec? I will tell him that unfortunately a great many of the active, intelligent citizens of Quebec are no longer in Quebec. They are gone, they have had to go away. The division represented by Mr. McGreevy has been diminished by 3,400 souls during the last decade. And who are those commissioners after all? Who are those who are given to us as representing the citizens of Quebec, and as being persons who should be looked to in defending the interests of the city? There was Mr. Valin. The friends of Mr. McGreevy have taken the trouble of bringing one of Mr. Valin's confrères here to state that he was not fit to be chairman of that commission. They testified against his intelligence, but they did not dare to speak against his honesty. Then we had Mr. McGreevy himself. We also had Mr. Julien Chabot, a most respectable man, but one who was entirely in the hands of Mr. McGreevy. Then we had Mr. Edmond Giroux, one of the directors of the Union Bank, who was appointed through the intervention of Mr. McGreevy. And we had Mr. G. B. Forsythe, who has since been recompensed for all the troubles he suffered in that office by being appointed in the Custom house at Quebec. His name is also to be found on one of the notes given by Mr. Murphy. There were two others, Mr. Dobell and Mr. Rae, but have not they been protesting against that amount of 35 cents? I say this to the hon. the Minister of Militia, who pretends to command in the district of Quebec, let him dare to charge the Harbour Commissioners there or anywhere else that they are responsible for the payment of the 35 cents, and he will find the result. Here, away from the City of Quebec, here where they are not present to defend themselves, he may attempt to throw the responsibility upon them, but they have sworn that, if they accepted that exorbitant price, it was because Mr. Perley, their engineer, recommended it. The hon. gentleman may laugh at this statement here, but we may have the opportunity of meeting him in the presence of these commissioners and then we will see as to the responsibility of this commission for this large price. It is ungrateful for the hon. gentleman to refer in such a manner to those gentlemen, in view of the help the Government have received from them. If Sir Hector Langevin knew nothing about that 35-cent contract, his proper place was not at the head of the department; he would not be worthy to be the tail of a department. What is the policy which has been pursued under the Quebec Harbour Commissioners if it was not a plan and a plot and an effort to rob the City of Quebec, and finally to throw it in the Dominion's hand? Let the hon. gentleman tell us if they ever asked the citizens of Quebec to go into that commission? When did they ask the mayor of Quebec to go into that commission?

Mr. IVES. He is a boodler.

Mr. AMYOT. Does the hon. gentleman say that the mayor of Quebec is a boodler?

Mr. IVES. The ex-mayor.

Mr. AMYOT. The ex-mayor? You say the Hon. Mr. Langelier is a boodler? You say that from your seat in Parliament? The hon. member is here and will be able to defend himself. If he were not here I would do that for him.

Mr. LANGELIER. Is the hon. member speaking of me?

Mr. IVES. Yes.

Mr. LANGELIER. That is a lie.

Mr. AMYOT. Let the hon. gentleman take that direct, and take it between his lips and swallow it, and not take it back. That hon. gentleman's family has ruined Quebec, that family has deprived us of a railway, that family has provided us with a short line railway which takes away so many of our people. That family wants to take away to Texas a great many citizens of Canada.

Mr. IVES. That is Pacaud's partner who spoke last.

Mr. GUAY. Where is Seneeal?

Mr. AMYOT. Who is the partner of Pacaud? What does the hon. gentleman mean? If nothing but dirty things can come from his lips, I would like to know to whom he dares to address them. Whom does he mean by Pacaud's partner? Does he know what he says? Is it not too late in the night for him to know when he is addressing a man who is worthy of his position in this House? What does he mean? If he has nothing to base his accusations on and they are thrown into the air, he should stop.

Mr. LAURIER. I move the adjournment of the debate. I think we have reached a point when it is better to adjourn.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I hope the hon. gentleman will not insist upon it.

Mr. LAURIER. I do insist.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, if the hon. gentleman will insist upon interrupting me, I do not see the necessity for the hon. gentleman striking his desk with his fist when I am repeating to him, in the most civil way possible, my suggestion that the hon. gentleman should not insist upon the discussion being interrupted now. It has been going on for a long time, and I hope that we can finish it without any more interruption. It is getting a little late, or rather a little early, and I think the hon. gentleman himself should feel that it would be better to continue the discussion now than have it interrupted.

Mr. LAURIER. Not at all. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives), when the House is almost empty, insulted my hon. friend in a most wanton manner. It was a most cowardly act which he would not dare to do in a full House. When such things are being done, no man on the other side of the House has the courage to bring the hon. gentleman to his senses. To-morrow, when the House is full, the hon. gentleman will repeat his words if he dares.

Mr. LANGELIER. He was encouraged by the Minister of Militia.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. What does the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. LANGELIER. He is encouraged by his neighbour.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I say that the hon. gentleman, as usual, is quite incorrect in the statement he is making. I say that the hon. gentleman was quite unwarranted in stating that I was encouraging the hon. gentleman from Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) or any other hon. gentleman here. I was taking notes. I did not open my lips, I did not say a word, good, bad or indifferent; and I think that the hon. gentleman is quite unwarranted in making the statement which he has made. I am quite certain that when he feels that he has made a mistake, he will take back his statement. I was encouraging nobody, I did not attempt to encourage anybody.

House divided on motion of Mr. Laurier to adjourn the debate:

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker——

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I beg to remind the hon. gentleman from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) that he has given up the floor, and he can no longer continue this interesting discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot resume the debate; he has given up the floor.

Mr. LAURIER. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. AMYOT. I wish to say that I do not think it would be proper to adjourn the House now, because I desire to lay before this honourable House certain facts that require the immediate attention of Parliament, facts that are important for the present and future of this country. It has been established that the Government were informed of all that took place concerning the dredging in the Quebec harbour. We know that through Mr. Perley's interference a new contract was given at 35 cents a yard. We say that two new engineers were appointed, Mr. Laforce Langevin and Mr. McGreevy. The former was never an engineer in his life, but Mr. McGreevy had some experience. When these new engineers went on we find that the inspectors were paid by the Harbour Commissioners and were also paid by the contractors, to make false reports. We see men paid by the contractors to give false certificates as to the amount of dredging, and we see any amount of work reported as done which was not done, and the contractors are paid $13,000 extra when they had only asked for $7,000. I believe I have demonstrated that in the dredging contract, the first as well as the second, and in the Esquimalt work, Sir Hector Langevin knew personally and exactly all that was going on, and was responsible for everything. Now, we have been told that the commissioners knew all about it and were responsible. I will refer to the evidence of Mr. Dobell, who was called by the Government themselves as a witness. I will read it at page 768, and I wish the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) was here so that he might hear it:

Q. And is there any special tax on the shipping at Quebec—when the ships arrive loaded with merchandise? A. They pay the equivalent of that one-tenth of one per cent. on the merchandise they bring into the country. It is both in and out a tax of one-tenth of one per cent.

Q. This tax does not exist in Montreal? A. No.

Q. So the ships that go to Quebec, either to bring in goods or to carry away goods, have got an additional tax to pay now on account of these works? A. Certainly.

Q. And those works and those improvements, since the law has been changed, I think from 1873, have been decided by the majority of the commission appointed by the Government? A. Certainly.

Q. And the majority of either the city or the corporation have never had control as to alterations to be made or decisions about the works? A. Certainly.

Q. They have been entirely in the hands of the Government?—A. Certainly.

Q. And those very large works which have been carried out there have not, properly speaking, been yet used by the Quebec commerce or shipping? A. No; we did not expect they would be used.

Q. But, as a matter of fact, they have not been? A. Not yet. They are being used now to a small extent; they are beginning to use them.

Q. Of course, you are in a position to say that, as far as you are concerned, you never found anything incorrect in your share, or in any share of the commissioners in the decisions about contracts, and so on? A. None.

Q. They have generally decided at Ottawa and you carried out the decisions from Ottawa? A. Well, the first contract that was given out from Ottawa direct was the cross-wall. Previous to that we shared in the responsibility in the awarding of contracts.

Q. But the cross-wall, that was in 1883? A. In 1883. Then the tenders were all sent up to Ottawa and they were there dealt with, and an Order in Council passed authorizing us to accept such-and-such a contract. It was taken out of our hands.

Mr. OUIMET. I rise to a question of order. It is as to whether this motion is regularly before the Chair. The motion for the adjournment of the debate was moved by the hon. member for Quebec East, and I understand he has since moved the adjournment of the House. Having moved the adjournment of the debate, I understand the hon. gentleman has no right to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LISTER. I now move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. GIROUARD. The leader of the Opposition should not be allowed to withdraw his motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point raised by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) is well taken. The hon. member for Quebec East, having moved the adjournment of the debate, cannot move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LISTER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. AMYOT. With respect to the dredging at Quebec, to which I was referring when I was interrupted by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives), I believe it is fully proved that the Minister of Public Works was cognizant of all that occurred and is personally responsible. Notwithstanding any interruptions that have been made I intend to continue my remarks. I have studied this case from the beginning to the end, and I believe I know something about it. I think it my duty to express my views, and I intend to express them. It has been argued before this House that the Minister of Public Works was not personally responsible. I am endeavouring to prove that he is personally responsible. The story of this public work was well told by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I will only add this, that the Minister, after having written to the contractors to send in their accounts to the engineer, must be presumed to know exactly the account they would send in. What is that account? These contractors asked $110,000 more. For what purpose? We have the history of the matter stated in a communication, 14th September, 1887. Here is the account:

Our claim is made up as follows:—
To salary of Mr. N. K. Connolly, one year	$ 2,000 00
To salary of Mr. O. E. Murphy, one year	1,200 00
To salary of Mr. M. Connolly, one year	1,200 00
To salary of Mr. P. Hume, one year	1,800 00
To salary of Book-keeper, one year	800 00
To salary of Mr. J. H. Gallagher, one year	1,200 00
To salary of Time-keeper	350 00
To salary of Stable boys	600 00
To salary of Watchmen (2)	700 00
Interest on $90,000 at 7 per cent	6,300 00
Cost of maintenance of organization at Lévis and at the quarries, consisting of machinery, derricks, horses, waggons, carts, sleighs, &c., and for loss sustained in not being able to realize from the plant	11,350 00
One year	$ 27,500 00
Or four years	110,000 00

Who was asking for this amount for salaries? Michael Connolly, Murphy, Nicholas Connolly, and the rest of them. During the time they were plundering the public treasury with respect to the Quebec dredging work, which they had at 25 cents and 35 cents per cubic yard; during the time they were plundering the treasury with regard to the British Columbia dock, where they were making extraordinary profits which reached nearly to a quarter of a million—they came to the Minister and asked him to pay them salaries of $2,000, $1,800 or $1,200. They multiplied that amount by the four years, and asked for a total sum of $110,000. We are told that the Minister in granting $35,000 on that account, is justified in throwing the responsibility on Mr. Perley. The commerce at Quebec had to be taxed for that payment. The Government never, however, consulted Quebec interests. The Government imposed a Harbour Commission on Quebec. On that commission they imposed loans of over $3,000,000. They constituted a commission of their own friends, of those men who came here and swore that Sir Hector Langevin was the man most devoted to Quebec interest. They decided they would build an artificial harbour, when in Quebec we have the finest harbour in the world. They decided to tax the commerce of Quebec in order to meet the amount they would spend in paying the chairman and the members of the Board of Harbour Commissioners. And the contractors will receive large sums of money, and will buy Le Monde and will buy the electors, and subscribe here and there to sustain the party in power. They conspired to ruin Quebec, but to remain in power, and when all that was done they said: We will say it is Perley's fault. The country will not accept that answer. From the beginning, these works in Quebec have been absurd. Mr. Rae and other commissioners not appointed by the Government, have been protesting against them, and the citizens of Quebec have for a long time protested against them, but the Government was stronger than they were. If a member objected to the system his credit was ruined and he was slandered in the ministerial press, and every attempt was made to destroy his influence. We have been kept in Quebec for years under a reign of tyranny, but the Ministry are beginning to receive their chastisement. They have lost their hold on the district of Quebec, they drove their friends one by one from the ranks of the party, and whenever there was a member who showed any independence he was hounded down. These men who try to ruin Quebec and its members, bought for $26,000 a paper called La Minerve, and through the columns of that paper they hurled accusations and slanders at some of the members of this House, which they dare not utter on the floor of Parliament. They had plenty of money from the contractors, and they thought they could rely on it to carry on their tyranny. The Quebec Harbour Commissioners were appointed by the Government and were not responsible to the people. They acted on the orders of the Government, but to-day when we ask the Government to render us an account, they say that the commissioners are responsible for that. The Government got their tools, the commissioners, to do all the harm they could to the City of Quebec, to destroy our commerce, to drive away our people, and to make of Quebec a poor city, to demoralize and to ruin her, but when we call them to account for it they say: Perley is responsible. That is not the answer of men. I hear it said in some places in Ontario: Oh, this is French boodling. Yes, I admit, but I say that the Government sitting opposite, with the money of the country, and by schemes skilfully arranged, carried out all the corruption and boodling. Let me tell the House and the country that they were not all Frenchmen engaged in this boodling. The McGreevys are not Frenchmen, Larkin is not a Frenchman, the Connollys are not Frenchmen, Murphy is not a Frenchman. It is true that there has been boodling in Quebec, but gentlemen on the other side of the House have no right to throw that in the face of our people, because it is they and the Government who have systematically tried to demoralize Quebec during the last twelve years. Who has tried to-day to bring that boodling to a stop, if it is not a Conservative member and a French Canadian, and who is helping him now if not another Conservative member who was driven from the ranks of the Conservative party, when that party was leading us to ruin and demoralization? We do not refuse an enquiry into French boodling, but the Government opposite refuse an enquiry into the English boodling. When it is a Frenchman you think you have a right to strike at him and to condemn French boodling, but you give English boodling protection. There are some Ministers, some high citizens who came into politics very poor and who are millionaires to-day, but that is English boodling, and you do not think of it. If there is French boodling, it has been due to the Government which has fostered it for years and years, and it has ruined and demoralized Quebec, but we want to stop it now and the Government want to protect it. When they bring a Bill before this House to prevent boodling and corruption they are careful to exempt members of Parliament and members of the Government from its operation. We say now on this side of the House that it is time we put a stop to this boodle. The population of Quebec is diminishing, and the population of the rest of the Dominion was at the eve of diminishing, while large sums of money were expended at Esquimalt and at Kingston, and would have been expended in Montreal and all through the Dominion, corrupting the people, had we not been able to make these revelations and to make an effort to put a stop to it. We propose to you that the Minister himself is the author of this, and we prove to you that he is the author, but yet you hold there is no connivance on his part and no responsibility. Just look at this account of Connolly & Co. for $110,000 damages, consisting of salaries and so on, whilst they were making hundreds of thousands of dollars at the same time at Quebec and Esquimalt. If in any other civilized country of the world that account had been approved of by a Minister of the Crown, that Minister would have been looked upon as unworthy of confidence and would have been driven from office. Now, Mr. Speaker, as it is a very late hour I will draw my remarks to a close shortly. I would have gone on to speak about the cross-wall and the other contracts, but I will not. In conclusion, I humbly submit that in the Esquimalt work the first tender was refused by Sir Hector Langevin at considerable loss to the country in spite of Perley's report and that the second contract was granted to Larkin, Connolly & Co., and refused to Starrs, on account of the false representations of Sir Hector and the false conditions which he wanted to impose upon the contractors, all that involving a loss to the country of a considerable amount. The tender of Starrs & O'Hanly was for $338,000; adding the cost of the change, $55,000, you obtain $392,000. If you take what Larkin, Connolly & Co. got, $581,000, and deduct their profits, $240,000, you obtain $340,000. Deduct that from $392,000, which the contract would have cost Starrs, and you find that the profits which Starrs would have obtained are $52,000. So that Starrs & O'Hanly would have got amply sufficient profits from that contract. I contend, in the third place, that the change from granite to sandstone decided by Sir Hector Langevin against Perley's report, against the wishes of the people of British Columbia, and against the reports of the two engineers of the Government there, was to the detriment of the work and at the country's expense. I submit, in the fourth place, that the re-coursing was allowed against the reports of the British Columbia officers, on condition that no extras would be allowed; but Mr. Perley was sent to British Columbia so that he might report against his previous report in favour of the payment to them; for that, too, I find Sir Hector Langevin personally responsible. In the fifth place, I say that the $19,000 were paid as promised by Robert McGreevy and as he had been led to understand by Sir Hector, and that payment indicates either connivance or gross neglect on the part of Sir Hector. In the sixth place, the attempt to extend the dock 100 feet was checked by England, and it amounted to a conspiracy by Sir Hector with the contractors to obtain the money promised by the contractors, if that lengthening could have been obtained. I say, in the seventh place, that the $6,000 per mile in connection with the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, offered by Sir Hector Langevin to Mr. McGreevy, as stated by McGreevy in his letter and sworn to by him, constitutes a direct offer to bribe and boodle by the Minister of Public Works. I say, in the eighth place, that Sir Hector granting a contract to Vandry, as appears by one of the letters of Thomas McGreevy, was a gross injustice and unfairness. I say, in the ninth place, that the payment of $65,900 to the contractors on the Lévis dock as damages was a wilful plunder and conspiracy, or scandalous negligence. I say, in the tenth place, that in the cross-wall contract there was gross negligence, direct responsibility, and great unfairness on the part of Sir Hector towards Mr. Peters, who was one of his best friends. In the eleventh place, I say that in the south-wall the wrong principle of granting contracts under false names was assented to. In the twelfth place, in the dredging, there was gross negligence all through on the part of Sir Hector. In the thirteenth place, I say that the purchase of Le Monde, by Sir Hector paying $39,000 and Mr. McGreevy paying $35,000, makes of this paper nothing but the product of boodle. I say, in the fourteenth place, that if Mr. Valin is the imbecile they try now to make him, his appointment by Sir Hector and his friends as chairman of the Harbour Commission was a conspiracy to defraud Quebec and the public at large. In the fifteenth place, I say that the works at Quebec were perfectly useless, imposed on the City of Quebec directly by Sir Hector, that they have brought ruin to Quebec, either financial or moral, and that the Government are responsible for the results which we see to-day. In concluding, I regret that the Government have taken the responsibility of the acts of Sir Hector. As they do not want to disavow them I presume that they believe that by admitting ministerial responsibility of Sir Hector, they will maintain the ministerial solidarity, which they are afraid to break. I cannot conclude without joining with other members of this House in congratulating the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) upon the courage he has shown in bringing this matter before the House. I know the trouble to which he has been subjected; I had as Crown attorney to protect him before the courts against powerful influences. He next came to this Parliament, and I trust that now that the public at large know something of the facts of this case, we shall receive some help and support. I apologize for having spoken so long. It is painful for me to have to condemn two citizens of Quebec, but there is something stronger than their interests, and that is the public interest. It is the duty of all citizens to promote public purity and to strive to make it possible for an honest citizen to live in this country.

Mr. OUIMET. Before the motion for the adjournment of the House is disposed of, I wish to raise a question of order. I did not interrupt my hon. friend; but now that he has finished his speech, to prevent a bad precedent being established, I raise this question of order: that under the cover of a motion of adjournment an hon. member is not allowed to speak on a question which is on the Order Paper. I admit that an hon. member may take that opportunity to give personal explanations or perhaps reply, but it would surely be extending the rule rather far to permit an hon. member, on a motion to adjourn the debate, to resume the discussion on the question before the House. I will read for your Honour from May, page 352:

"Again on the 24th of November, 1882, the Speaker explained that it was an established and fundamental rule of debate that, on a motion for adjournment, a motion standing on the Order book should not be discussed, and that this rule was in no way affected by the new standing order regulating motions for adjournment, and this rule applies even when no day has been fixed for a motion."

I read from Bourinot, page 352:

"But even this practice, which is liable to abuse, has its limitations. No member will be permitted, on such a motion, to discuss an Order of the Day, or a Notice of Motion on the paper, or a motion which was dropped owing to a count out."

I know very well that it is previously mentioned by Bourinot that:

"Motions for the adjournment of the House or the debate are generally made in the Canadian Houses in the course of a discussion, in order to give an opportunity to members who have already spoken, to speak again or to make certain explanations, which otherwise they might not be able to make,"

I can find no precedent for this doctrine, and I must say that even this will not justify a member in resuming his speech or the discussion of a question after he has lost the privilege of addressing the House on that question. I raise this point, not to be disagreeable to my hon. friend, but in order that we may arrive at a decision, so that, if the thing is irregular, it should not be made a precedent.

Mr. SPEAKER. With reference to the question raised by my hon. friend from Laval, I understand the statements both in May and Bourinot to mean that on a motion to adjourn the House, a member cannot anticipate an Order which is upon the paper, but I do not understand that a member is prevented from discussing the question which was before the House at the time the motion is made. Where there is an Order or a Notice of Motion on the paper, a member cannot, under cover of a motion to adjourn the House, anticipate discussion upon such Order or Notice of Motion, but I cannot go so far as to agree with my hon. friend that a member cannot discuss the question which was before the House when the adjournment is moved.

Motion to adjourn the House negatived.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. BOWELL moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.55 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 24th September, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to-morrow, to consider the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to grant the subsidies hereinafter mentioned to the railway companies, and towards the construction of the railways also hereinafter mentioned, that is to say:—

To the Great Northern Railway Company, for a subsidy from a point at or near New Glasgow or St. Lin to or near to Montcalm, in the Province of Quebec, eighteen miles, the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act forty-ninth Victoria, chapter ten, not exceeding in the whole $28,100.

To the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company, for the railway bridge over the St. Charles River to give access to the City of Quebec, the difference between the amount already paid to the company, and the limit fixed by the Act fifty-third Victoria, chapter two, a subsidy not exceeding $5,250.

To the Oshawa Railway and Navigation Company, for seven miles of their railway from Port Oshawa towards Raglan, in lieu of the subsidy for a like amount granted by the Act passed in the session held in the fiftieth and fifty-first years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter twenty-four, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $22,400.

To the St. Lawrence, Lower Laurentian and Saguenay Railway Company, for the section of their railway from Grand Piles, on the St. Maurice River, to its junction with the Quebec and Laks St. John Railway, the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act passed in the session held in the fiftieth and fifty-first years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter twenty-four, not exceeding in the whole $92,784.

To the Great Eastern Railway Company, for thirty miles of their railway from the River St. Francis to the Arthabaska Railway, at St. Grégoire station, the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act passed in the session held in the fiftieth and fifty-first years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter twenty-four, not exceeding in the whole $79,700.

To the South Ontario Pacific Railway Company, for forty-nine and one-half miles of their railway from Woodstock to Hamilton, in the Province of Ontario, in lieu of the subsidy for a like amount granted by the Act fifty-second Victoria, chapter three, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $158,400.

To the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company (formerly the Vaudreuil and Prescott Railway Company), for thirty miles of their railway from Vaudreuil towards Hawkesbury, the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act passed in the session held in the fiftieth and fifty-first years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter twenty-four, not exceeding in the whole $46,040.

To the Tobique Valley Railway Company, for fourteen miles of their railway from Perth Centre station towards Plaister Rock Island, in lieu of the subsidy for a like amount granted by the Act passed in the session held in the fiftieth and fifty-first years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter twenty-four, a subsidy not exceeding $6,400 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $89,600.

To the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway Company, for fifty-six miles of their railway from the city of Kingston to Smith's Falls, in lieu of the subsidies, not to exceed $179,200, granted by the Acts fifty-second Victoria, chapter three, and fifty-third Victoria, chapter two, a subsidy not exceeding $12,534 per annum, to be paid in semi-annual instalments of $6,267 each, for twenty years, which represents a grant in cash of $179,200.

Provided, that upon the completion of twenty-eight miles of the said railway a semi-annual subsidy may be paid proportionate to the value of the portion so completed in comparison with that of the whole fifty-six miles: Provided also, that the company shall deposit with the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, a sum not exceeding $1,170,000, in consideration whereof there shall be paid to the company, for twenty years, a semi-annual annuity, calculated on a basis of three and one-half per cent, on the amount so deposited: Provided further, that the Governor General in Council may permit the company to assign the said subsidy and annuity to trustees by way of security for any bonds or securities which may be issued by the company in respect of their undertaking.

To the Quebec Central Railway Company, for ninety miles of their railway from St. Francis station, on the Quebec Central Railway, to a point on the Atlantic and North-Western Railway, near Moose River, or from a point on the Quebec Central Railway between the Chaudière River and Tring station, to a point on the International Railway at or near Megantic, in lieu of the subsidy for a like amount granted by the Act fifty-third Victoria, chapter two, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $288,000.

2. Resolved, That the subsidies hereinbefore mentioned as to be granted to companies named for that purpose shall be granted to such companies respectively; all the lines for the construction of which subsidies are granted, unless they are already commenced, shall be commenced within two years from the 1st day of August next, and completed within a reasonable time, not to exceed four years, to be fixed by Order in Council; and shall also be constructed according to descriptions and specifications and upon conditions to be approved by the Governor in Council, on the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and specified in an agreement to be made in each case by the company with the Government, and which the Government is hereby empowered to make; the location, also, of every such line of railway shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council; and all the said subsidies respectively shall be payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, by instalments, on the completion of each section of the railway of not less than ten miles, proportionate to the value of the portion so completed in comparison with that of the whole work undertaken, to be established by the report of the said Minister, or upon completion of the work subsidized,—except as to the subsidy granted to the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway Company, the first semi-annual payment upon which shall be made at the end of six months from the date of the chief engineer's certificate of the completion of twenty-eight miles of the railway, and each subsequent payment at the end of each six months thereafter, for the term of twenty years.

3. Resolved, That the granting of such subsidies respectively shall be subject to such conditions for securing such running powers or traffic arrangements and other rights as will afford all reasonable facilities and equal mileage rates to all railways connecting with those so subsidized, as the Governor in Council determines.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPT.—CONTRACTS.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Girouard: "That the Seventh Report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections be adopted;" and the motion of Mr. Davies in amendment thereto.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, almost ever since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, it has been my privilege to be a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. This year, however, I do not belong to that Committee, and not being in attendance at the very important investigation which has been going on there, and which is now the subject-matter of the protracted debate which has been occupying the attention of Parliament during so many days, I have not had the advantage of following, day by day, the various phases of the case as presented to the Committee and the evidence as given before its members. Owing to other duties, I have not had the time to take up critically every incident of that very important case and to examine fully into the evidence, which would require many days to comprehend as it should be comprehended; I have not looked into the testimony adduced sufficiently closely to be able to discuss it in the few remarks which I consider it my duty to address the House, but I will address myself more particularly to certain remarks and attacks made by hon. gentlemen opposite who have taken part in this discussion. I may say at the outset that ever since I have occupied a seat in this Parliament no investigation or enquiry has been more important or more painful than the investigation now occupying our attention. I look upon it as important from the far-reaching consequences that acts such as the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) has brought before the attention of Parliament can exercise on the political life of a people like the Canadian people. I look upon it as painful because the first result of such an investigation is, to a certain extent, to tarnish the reputation of one of Canada's most prominent public men. From the importance of the far-reaching consequences of such an investigation I consider it is the duty of every member of Parliament, whether he considers politics from one side or the other, to bring to the consideration of a matter like the present one a judicial and not a party spirit. I hope the discussion that has taken place has displayed as little party spirit as possible, and I will endeavour during my remarks to avoid anything that may be looked upon as party spirit. The reputation of public men is national property. The reputation of public men forms one of the most important pages that can be written in the history of a people. They are the men who control the destiny of a country, and their names, handed down to posterity, will be names which will be used as examples to those who may follow to guide and govern the people in the right or in the evil direction. It is because of that that it is the sacred duty of every man to protect the reputation of our public men to the fullest possible extent, and whether they be attacked on one side or whether they be attacked on the other, it is the duty of every patriotic heart to protect them to the fullest extent. If it is a duty to give them that protection, it is a greater duty still, when they are being tried before the highest tribunal of the country, to give to the consideration of their case that judicial mind without which it is impossible to treat questions of such importance. Sir, it is for that, that with the knowledge which I have acquired of the evidence, imperfect as I admit it is, it seems to me that I should require much stronger proof than the evidence produced and contained in the voluminous report now before us: I would require stronger evidence by a great deal than that which I have been able to find, to arrive at a conclusion different from that which the majority of the Committee have arrived, and to declare that Sir Hector Langevin personally has been guilty of conduct which would necessitate the censure and condemnation of the House. Mr. Speaker, in dealing with a matter of this kind it is of importance to look back into the antecedents of the man who comes before us for judgment. For upwards of thirty years previous to Confederation and since Confederation, Sir Hector Langevin has been one of the most prominent figures in the political history of Canada. Before Confederation, almost the moment which saw him enter public life saw him also taking a prominent position in the official life of his country. Almost from the moment that he became a member of Parliament the confidence of the people of his native province indicated him, without any hesitation, as one of the leaders of public opinion and entrusted to him the most important positions that can be entrusted to a public man. Before Confederation he had been Solicitor General, and subsequently Secretary of State. He became Postmaster General, Minister of Railways and Canals, and Minister of Public Works, subsequent to Confederation. Any of us who have read our political history know well that he was one of the most trusted colleagues of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, and that he was the right-hand man and trusted lieutenant of that great patriot Sir George Etienne Cartier, who governed, and governed so well during so many years, the destinies of the race to which I belong in the old Province of Quebec. Under Sir Hector Langevin, when he was occupying a prominent position in the counsels of his country, Canada from disjointed provinces became the great Confederation which we are so proud of to-day. He was one of those who, consulting with men who up to that time had not viewed politics from the same standpoint, put aside their differences for the patriotic object of saving the country from the dissensions of the past; and looking to the brilliancy of the future they united their efforts to make Canada what Canada subsequently became; a Confederation which I am proud to say has made the name of Canadians abroad more respected than ever before among the old nations of Europe, and Sir, it has opened up to us Canadians who have benefited by the energy of these patriotic men, new destinies which, from the standpoint of the development of our country, must make us more eager and more determined to work to the utmost of our ability to secure for Canada the advantages of that destiny which Providence seems to have carved out for her. Under him as one of the public men of Canada, not only Confederation became an accomplished fact, but the North-West, Manitoba and British Columbia, following in the wake of the older provinces, came across the continent to shake hands with old Canada and to make of Canada one united nation under the one flag which we are all proud of. Not only that, Sir, but after achieving these peaceful revolutions—because they are nothing else but revolutions which in other countries have cost blood and treasure—he went to work in earnest, and he contributed his great influence towards building up the Canadian Pacific Railway which to-day is the great military and commercial highway of the Empire through Canadian territory, and which has extended Canadian trade and the Canadian flag across the Pacific Ocean to Japan and to China. Now, Sir, we know Sir Hector Langevin's loyalty to his country, his loyalty to the Empire, and his loyalty to the nationality to which he belongs. When it was my privilege and my pleasure to have accompanied him during political meetings in the different sections of the country, on every occasion he laid aside the question of sectionalism, whether he was speaking in the fair Province of Ontario or whether he was addressing in a tongue different from that which is spoken in Ontario the people of his own race in the Province of Quebec. The same expressions of loyalty to the Empire, and the same expressions of loyalty to Canada, was always heard to be echoed by the man who to-day is no longer occupying the high position which he once occupied on the Treasury benches. He was over and above everything—and that is a point which I consider important in the present discussion, although possibly he made a mistake in carrying it to the extent which he did—over and above everything he was devoted to his department. He was devoted to his department to the extent that every moment of his time was given up to work, and to hard work indeed, to administer this great department and in trying to deal with details in every portion of the Dominion of Canada, and to control numberless employés, some in technical branches of the department, but still requiring the supervision of the Minister. Let me ask even his most bitter enemies—if he has bitter enemies—if it is not the fact that, unselfishly, he gave every moment of his time to the administration of his department? Sir, if to-day he retires from public life and from official life, shattered in health, almost broken down, I attribute it altogether to the energy which he has displayed in fulfilling, according to his lights and his best abilities, the duties which he considered to be in the interest of the department over which he presided. I know very well that in the matter which is now the subject of discussion he may have attempted to grasp more than he could possibly control. But be that as it may, he comes before us as one of our colleagues, who has been subjected during three months to one of the most searching investigations—not upon positive charges, but in an attempt to connect him with charges which were preferred against other individuals. Therefore it is important for us to consider the intention which controlled him in the discharge of his duties. He may have attempted to grasp more than he could control. That was his mistake, which may have been due to his belief in his ability to control a large amount of work ; but it was no mistake so far as his intention to patriotically do his duty towards his department was concerned. Now, Sir, in speaking of his responsibility, I claim, from what I have been able to ascertain, after looking into the evidence which has been adduced, that no direct charges were made against Sir Hector Langevin by the hon. member for Montmorency ; but the attempt has been made during the investigation to connect him with the different charges upon which the conspirators, as they are called to-day, were being tried. I claim, as I have stated, that it is impossible for any Minister to control in all its details a department as extensive as the Department of Public Works. In that department, or in any other equally technical in its nature, it is the bounden duty of the Minister, it is a necessity for him to rely almost implicitly upon the technical officers who are there to advise him, and upon the other officials who happen to be in his department. Not only Sir Hector Langevin, but his predecessors have been obliged to do this, and his successors will have to adopt exactly the same system. It will be their duty in every matter affecting public works of a technical nature, to consult the engineers. Those officers are given prominent positions in the large departments of the Government, and they are paid large salaries, for the reason that they are looked upon as reliable men, as men who from their scientific training are able to give to the man who presides over the department that advice necessary to enable him to carry on the public works of the country. I remember during the time that the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie led the Government, when it was my privilege to sit in the House with him, when he was questioned on the floor of Parliament as to a certain policy adopted in regard to public works, that hon. gentleman, like Sir Hector, said on many occasions that he had consulted his engineers, and that the policy which he was carrying out was a policy which had been advocated by his officers ; and I think it would be wrong, for one who does not possess any technical qualifications, to set up his judgment in opposition to the judgment of a trained engineer, a scientific man, and say : I will conduct this great public work, involving hundreds of thousands and sometimes millions of dollars of expenditure, according to my own judgment, and I will overrule the judgment and recommendation of the technical adviser who is in the department. Now, Sir, as I understand the case, an attempt has been made to connect Sir Hector Langevin with charges in connection with the following contracts, though no positive charge is brought against him by the hon. member for Montmorency : with the contract of 1882 for dredging in the harbour of Quebec ; with the contract of 1883 for building the cross-wall and locks or gates in the said harbour ; with the contract of 1884 in connection with the Lévis graving dock ; with the contract of 1887 for the dredging of the wet basin ; and with the contract of 1886 for the building of the south wall in the same harbour. I take it that, according to the sworn evidence of Sir Hector Langevin—evidence which has remained unchallenged, and the credibility of which has not been attacked in any way —these works were carried out by the Quebec Harbour Commission, a body incorporated by a statute of Canada, having its rights and its franchises, and that if any mistake has taken place in connection with these works, it must be laid at the door of the harbour commission and the technical officers of that commission, and not at the door of the ex-Minister of Public Works. I claim that the evidence of the ex-Minister of Public Works has proved clearly and conclusively that these contracts were carried out by the Quebec Harbour Commission, and that is the view which was taken when the votes for these different works were passed in this House. Now comes another charge, that concerning the Esquimalt graving dock. I admit, and nobody can deny it, that this charge must be viewed from a standpoint quite different from the five other charges I have referred to, and the reason of the difference is simply this. The harbour works were conducted by the commissioners, and I hold them responsible for their mistakes ; but the Esquimalt graving dock was carried on by the Department of Public Works under the immediate control of the Minister of Public Works, and as such I consider he would be responsible, if anything could be established against him personally. I would consider that this charge should be treated in a different manner from that made in the case of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners. Let us see how this work was carried on. The charge is made that certain changes were operated in the construction of that work, and without going critically into the nature of the changes, it is an important factor in the charge made by those who contend that the responsibility of the Minister is paramount in those works whether they were made in the public interest. As I view it, every change which was made, was made in the interest of the public, and for the money which has been expended the public has received full value. But admitting, for the sake of argument, that these changes were wrong, I fall back upon the rule I have already stated, as being that which, in my honest belief, should prevail in every department of that kind and govern the conduct of the advisers of the Ministry. No change of any importance, not the slightest possible change, can have been made, and I find no evidence whatever in the record to show that it is intimated even, that any change has been operated, except on the advice of the engineer. If that be so, whether each change was in the interest of the public, as I claim it was, or not, it was made on the advice of the engineer ; the Minister was powerless in the hands of his adviser, and, consequently, if anybody is to be blamed, it is not the Minister. I know the official responsibility which attaches to a Minister, but we are not discussing that point, it is not for that official responsibility he is being tried, but it is for having done things which should have been left undone in the interest of the public. In every change he consulted his advisers and could not possibly be held responsible unless he had gone in direct opposition to the advice he received. The most serious portion of the charge is that concerning the payment of extras, which, it is supposed, the contractors had abandoned. Well, there is one thing to be said on that subject, and that is that no extras were paid by the Minister of Public Works, except upon the twice repeated report of Mr. Perley who had gone out for the purpose of inspecting the works, who came back, after personal inspection, and recommended these amounts to be paid. There is another accusation, leaving those which I have referred to, which was more painful to me still than any other which has been brought forward, and, if it had been established, I admit that that alone would have been sufficient to have placed Sir Hector in the position described by the hon. member for Queen's the other night, of going back to private life a dishonoured man, and not carrying away that respect which a man, ending his political career, hopes to retain when he gives up his arduous labours. That is, the charge made against the Minister of personal corruption. It was attempted to be shown that Sir Hector Langevin had received large amounts of money from Larkin, Connolly & Co. Now, we have to follow, in the present instance, as in any other case submitted to any tribunal, the ordinary laws of evidence. That charge is based upon the testimony of Mr. Murphy. I do not want to go into the details which have come out during the investigation; but I say we have Sir Hector Langevin, upon his oath, stating positively that he never received, directly or indirectly, from Mr Murphy, or the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., or anybody else belonging to that firm, any sum of money. We must accaccept his evidence, which has not been attacked as to credibility; and I believe it was the opinion of the Committee that, as between the two witnesses, the positive evidence of Sir Hector Langevin had to be taken and that of Mr. Murphy had to be rejected. Another attempt made, and it was made during the investigation, was the attempt to establish that Sir Hector Langevin had an interest in the Baie des Chaleurs subsidy. There, again, I state, in so far as Sir Hector's explanation is concerned, and from my own personal knowledge of the locality and the people connected with the enterprise, I am perfectly willing to accept his explanation of the matter. He says that two old friends, men who during years had been intimate, had fallen out, and he used his best efforts to reconcile them, to get them to shake hands over their difficulties, and renew their old friendly ties. In a portion of the evidence, it is stated that he used Mr. McGreevy to effect this reconciliation, but still he said positively and absolutely that he had at no time any interest, direct or indirect, in the Baie des Chaleurs contract, and I am bound to believe his testimony. His credibility is not attacked, and I am bound to take that evidence as being what it pretends to be, the explanation of the relations which existed between him and those parties connected with the railway. Now, we had last night the advantage of listening to a very long speech from the hon. gentleman from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). The hon. gentleman from Bellechasse seemed to view the matter in quite a new light, a light that I had no possible idea could be the light according to which the different phases of that important state trial could be considered. The hon. gentleman seems to lay all the blame on Sir Hector Langevin.

I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman in examining seriatim the different charges and the different portions of the evidence which he submitted to the House last night, but after submitting each portion of evidence he invariably said that the responsibility was on the Minister and that it could be seen he was guilty and responsible. He invariably defends Mr. Perley and condemns the Minister. As I read the evidence, I think the view of the Committee was that Mr. Perley was guilty and that no guilt attached to Sir Hector Langevin. The hon. gentleman spoke of the different changes which took place at Esquimalt and all that, but the matter has been discussed in every detail and every point of that evidence has been handled by members of the Committee who have been sitting day after day and have heard the witnesses giving their evidence, and it is an important feature in appreciating evidence to have the opportunity of judging of the manner in which every witness gives his testimony. I will, therefore, not go into that question, but I was rather surprised to hear the hon. gentleman, in a burst of eloquence, state that fourteen men under oath as members of the Privy Council had permitted contractors to surreptitiously put their hands into the public chest and get papers which they altered in the interest of the contractors. The hon. gentleman is mistaken, because it is impossible to find anything in the whole of the evidence to justify his statement. The hon. gentleman should be careful in dealing with men under oath. It has happened before that men may stretch their conscience to a great extent when money is at stake, but I cannot see that anything which has been established can possibly warrant the hon. gentleman in making the statement he has made.

Mr. AMYOT. I did not mean that the hand of the contractors was physically there. It was invisibly there. The effect was the same as if the hand was there. I never contended that the hand of any of the Connollys would be as strong as the hand of the fourteen Ministers.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I never supposed that the hon. gentleman meant that burglary had been committed, but last night the hon. gentleman laid the responsibility almost entirely upon Sir Hector Langevin. Of course, he spoke of the conspirators, of McGreevy and all that, but, as far as the Public Works Department was concerned, he put the whole responsibility upon the Minister and defended the engineer. I think that is wrong, and, knowing as I do, that for years and years the hon. gentleman has been kindly treated by Sir Hector Langevin and has been very friendly with him and kindly treated by him, although he is of course bound to fulfil the duty he is called upon to fulfil as a member of Parliament in this disagreeable matter, he should avoid anything which would lead anyone to suppose that there is any feeling of hostility between him and the Minister he is now accusing. Yesterday, in scanning the Hansard of 1883, I stumbled over what seemed to me to be the expression of opinion of a man who knew well the situation and who knew well the merits of the contending parties at that period of time. I found these remarks:

"Well, I say to the recognized leader of the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec (that is Sir Hector) that he can continue without apprehension to discharge the duties of his department with the same success which he has achieved in the past, without bothering himself with the nonsense and reproaches of the Opposition; let him continue as in the past, and all parts of the Dominion will be willing to recognize him as a useful man who consecrates every moment of his life to the service of his country, who pushes rapidly to completion the great undertakings of Canada, and who is always found at his post in the House ever ready to meet any accusation of his adversaries. General accusations are indulged in without giving any details. Why? Because they know that there is not one of the works now commenced or under construction by the present hon. Minister which is not for the well-being of the country where it has been undertaken. They know very well that, if any particular work was attacked, there would be immediately a complete refutation of the charge."

Mr. AMYOT. What year is that?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1883. Again, speaking of Sir Hugh Allan, he says:

"There are in countries enjoying the blessing of that system of government of the people, by the people, moments when the people become tired of those who govern them. The reason is that for a long time they have lent an ear to the incessant, excited and disloyal accusations of a political party whose sole programme is accusation, and during the fifteen, twenty or twenty-five years that the same party is in power the same accusations are repeated. The people, alarmed at the numerous accusations, each succeeding one more vile than the other, says to itself: Perhaps there is some truth in these accusations on the part of the Opposition. Let us try them. And that is what occurred, when what is called the Pacific scandal happened."

He goes on, and referring to Sir Hugh, he says:

"He made a mistake—a mistake which many people often make; he thought that with lots of money he could succeed. This was a mistake. But let those who never said 'come down handsomely,' the disciples of the 'big push,' and of certain other maxims which have now become historic, come forward and cast the stone at him."

Now, I have known of instances where doctors differed among themselves, but I never knew of an instance where a doctor differed with himself. The expression of opinion of last year, and the extracts I have read from the Hansard of 1883, are the expressions of opinion of the hon. gentleman who represents in this Parliament the County of Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). Now, Sir, it is not my intention, as I stated before, to address the House at any great length, and I think that in being brief I shall show a determination to please my colleagues to the fullest extent in my power. We have had such long speeches upon this important question that I believe I shall deserve the gratitude of the House if I cut my remarks very short. I desire simply to express this opinion, that from the evidence I have read it is extremely difficult, I look upon it, indeed, as impossible, for any hon. gentleman on either side of the Speaker to stand up here and declare Sir Hector Langevin guilty of any personal malfeasance. I think it would be assuming a very grave responsibility indeed, if, considering his past services and considering the evidence which has been adduced, any hon. gentleman should allow himself to be carried away so far as to condemn Sir Hector Langevin unjustly; I will not say carried away by prejudice, because I give credit to every hon. gentleman, whether sitting on our side or on the other side, for that impartiality and spirit of fair-play which, in a matter of this importance, would hesitate before blasting a long and useful career; I say I give to every hon. gentleman on the floor of Parliament credit for that spirit of fair-play which would prevent me from imagining for a moment that any hon. gentleman will be influenced in his decision by anything else than his honest and conscientious opinion. When the excitement is over, when, calmly and dispassionately, that report of the evidence will be considered, I hope that inside and outside the House, and throughout the extent of this vast Dominion, wherever the name of Sir Hector Langevin is known, his reputation will be as clear from taint as it is to-day, and as it was before this investigation was commenced. Sir, I think I have shown on more than one occasion that I am not in favour of sectionalism, I am not in favour of parish politics; but I cannot forget that Sir Hector Langevin and myself belong to a race who are a minority in this Dominion, we belong to a race whose history is glorious, and I am proud to say it; a race that has given to the political records of Canada names as eminent and reputations as stainless as any other nationality of which the people of Canada are composed; a nation that can find upon its records the names of a Lafontaine, a Papineau, a Taché, a Morin, a Dorion, a Cartier, a Langevin, and others; that nation need not be ashamed of walking side by side with the other races, proud as those races may be, who compose the people of Canada. Sir, I would ask, and, as I say, without a particle of sectionalism, without any idea of appealing to prejudice—I would ask this House, in dealing with this case, to hesitate before casting a shadow on the pages of that history which we all love. I say that if the evidence is convincing we have a duty to perform, and we must perform it like men. But unless that evidence be convincing, let us pause, let us hesitate, before we brand the reputation of a man who has been useful to his country, who has exercised a beneficial influence in uniting the various nationalities which make up the people of Canada, and which may have been, at times, antagonistic. The names of the leading statesmen of to-day are just as dear to us as those whom I have named were dear to their admirers of a past generation. Sir, let me here also say, for I consider it my duty as a public man to say so, that we are at this time traversing a crisis in our history. We have had for the last few years, several so-called scandals in a province dear to us all. We have had investigations going on in the Parliament of United Canada; we have had investigations going on in other provinces. Well, Sir, abroad, where the public ignore the bitterness of our political contests, and the manner in which these attacks may be organized and led for political purposes more than for any other reason—I say that abroad, the notoriety and the history of these scandals, magnified, as they are, ten-fold, injure our credit and injure our reputation. I was very sorry to hear the other day an hon. member of this House compare Canada to the South American Republics. Well, Sir, so far as my weak efforts can avail, I want to keep Canada above the level of the South American Republics; and it is the bounden duty of every Canadian who is proud of the land, and proud of the flag, to avoid, as much as possible, anything that may, at the very beginning of our existence as a people, prevent our growth, prevent us from extending our influence, that may injure our credit where our influence and our credit ought to be extended and strengthened. Sir, there is only one word more which I desire to address to the House before I take my seat. It is said that Sir Hector Langevin was influenced, to a great extent, by Mr. McGreevy, that Mr. McGreevy exercised an extraordinary influence over Sir Hector Langevin. Now, I do not know to what extent that influence went, but I am quite free to admit that the influence did exist, and the reverse would surprise me. In the dark days of Opposition, when Sir Hector Langevin was hounded down by charges that for a time drove him out of public life, Mr. McGreevy stood by him, and stood by him right loyally. When the bright days came back and Sir Hector Langevin returned to power, the friendship which had taken root in adversity was strengthened and developed in prosperity. I would be ashamed of the man who in the days of his prosperity would forget the friends he possessed in the dark days of adversity, and I admire him for having done so. Whether this is the fact or not, we have to decide this, not upon supposition, not upon the theory as to whether the influence of Mr. McGreevy was great or small, but upon the sworn evidence of the witnesses, and the unchallenged testimony of Sir Hector Langevin. In dealing with the question the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), I thought, was rather severe in the terms he used in regard to Sir Hector. It struck me more forcibly from the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite, when Sir Hector Langevin was administrating his department, considered he acted invariably in the most courteous manner to them, and was frequently the subject of congratulations at their hands. In this respect I think he established for himself a position in which he placed his colleagues at a disadvantage so far as courtesy was concerned. I mention this because Sir Hector is most painstaking, and is a man ready, even at his own inconvenience, to answer any questions put to him and do everything to officially fulfil the arduous duties of his position. I am not ashamed to say that I differed with Sir Hector, as the hon. member for Montmorency knows, and he referred to the fact the other day, on very important questions. I differed from him in matters not affecting the responsibility which Ministers assume together, because, if we differed on important matters so far as that is concerned one Minister would have to give way, but I differed with him on important subjects, and the opinions I held on those several questions I hold to-day. Nevertheless I am bound to say that during the ten years I sat side by side with him in Council, I never met a man who was more industrious, hardworking and really devoted to his department and to his work. I must apologize to you, Mr. Speaker, and more particularly to my colleagues, for having spoken longer than I intended to speak. I have only one excuse, and it is that I do not trouble the House very frequently. I am always so much interested in listening to other hon. gentlemen who address us occasionally that I am satisfied with that role without intruding myself on the House. I regret the fact that I have not had time to go into every portion of the evidence which forms the small library, which will considerably increase our collection of books, and have been unable to treat, as well as I would have wished, a matter which I consider one of the greatest possible importance to Canada from every standpoint. However, I have touched merely certain points, and I have done it imperfectly; but I have addressed myself to those points which struck me as being more important than others and more prominent as factors in the discussion that has taken place.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, after the feeling remarks with which the hon. gentleman, who has just taken his seat, opened his address to the House, upon the painful character of the debate in which we are now engaged, it may not be out of place that I should refer, for a few moments, to the motives which have guided and inspired the Liberal party, from the time the charges were first brought to the House, down to the time now reached when we have come to the critical period when a verdict is to be pronounced, a verdict warranted upon the facts disclosed before the Committee. The assertion has been made, on more than one occasion since the debate commenced, by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the hon. members who drew the report now before you, Mr. Speaker, in the form of an amendment, could not have done it in good faith. The insinuation has been made persistently in the press, and sometimes also the assertion that the Liberal party, in insisting that all the charges, formulated by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte), are proved against all the parties implicated, are simply trying to throw dust in the eyes of the people, to the detriment of the Conservative party, by ruining the reputation of one of its leaders, with the hope thereby of enhancing their own chances of obtaining power. As to the first part of this charge, I have nothing to say. I do not impugn any man's motives and I will not defend my own. As to the latter part of the charge, it is, to say the least, a very singular one. To charge against a party that it is striving to obtain power, is to reproach that party with its very existence. Under our system of Government all parties are striving to obtain power. That aim in its higher form, is the advancement, the promotion, of those political principles which the members of a party hold together; that aim in its lower form, yet a form implying nothing ignoble, if kept subordinate to the first, is to enjoy the legitimate advantages which power gives. But speaking here in behalf of the Liberal party, neither from one consideration nor the other consideration, I have this to say, that I would prefer a thousand times to fight the battle with hon. gentlemen opposite solely on the ground of political questions, solely upon the merits of their policy and our policy, solely upon the merits of unrestricted trade and of restricted trade, solely upon the merits of unrestricted reciprocity on the one side and the National Policy on the other side, rather than to have to accuse them either collectively or individually of malfeasance in office. Let me tell this to hon. gentlemen: The Opposition during the session has been engaged in a kind of work, which, whatever may be insinuated to the contrary, was not a labour of love but a labour of necessity, which had to be followed to the fullest consequences however painful they might be. At the opening of the session the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte) brought accusations of the gravest character against the administration of the Public Works Department, implicating personally the Minister of Public Works, and implicating as well another member of this House. As to the latter member, the member for Quebec West, all the charges brought against him have been proved as fully as they were charged. He has confessed his guilt by his own act, and he is practically expelled from this House. And now that the scapegoat has been sent into the desert burthened with the sins of Israel, it is suggested that justice ought to be satisfied, that we should rest there and that we should go no further. But I shall be sorry to hear any such language here. It cannot be a question here of revenge or of mercy. This is a question on which justice has to pronounce. justice alone, as the ancients represented her, with bandage on her eyes, blind to the rank or condition of those whom she is called on to absolve or condemn. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has brought in a report which asserts that the Minister of Public Works is guilty of the charges brought against him. Now, let me say this at once, Mr. Speaker. I assert that on this side of the House there is not the slightest animosity against the late Minister of Public Works. There is no one on this side of the House who would do him the smallest wrong. But is this the first time in a British Parliament that it has been found to be the duty of men to accuse their fellow men? Is this the first time in a British Parliament that fellow members have been constrained by the facts to bring charges against a member, and to follow them to the bitter end? When Edmund Burke, a man distinguished by the noblest attributes of mind and heart, distinguished perhaps beyond anything else by his high sense of justice, by his unswerving notion of right, stood at the bar of the House of Lords to impeach Warren Hastings of high crimes and misdemeanours committed, or alleged to have been committed by him in the discharge of official duties, history attests, Sir, that the motive which impelled him was not an ignoble one; history attests that the motive which impelled him was the highest sentiment of patriotism and humanity; history attests, Sir, that his object was not to ruin, or to degrade, or to humiliate a man who had done important services for his country, but that his motive was to destroy the system of corruption and evil which had marred the course and impaired the value of these services. And when, Sir, we likewise here accuse the late Minister of Public Works, I protest that our aim is not to degrade a reputation hitherto honourable, but our aim is, if possible, to destroy that system of corruption and evil which has too long prevailed in this country. And if, in order to reach that object, a reputation hitherto honourable is shattered to the winds, the blame does not lie with those who make the exposure, but the blame rests with him who committed the faults which have to be exposed. I repeat again, Sir, we would much prefer to fight the battle with our opponents solely upon political ground, but if we on this occasion depart from that ground, it is because on no occasion yet would the Government of this country meet us upon the ground of purely political questions. It is because up to this day they never would meet the people face to face on political questions, but they relied in every instance upon that system of corruption which we want to destroy now if possible. I see signs of dissent upon some faces on the other side of the House. Do I understand that the statement which I now make is denied? Then, Sir, what is the meaning, I want to know, of these scandals which day after day and week after week for the last three months have been exploding like craters bursting out in a volcanic region? What is the meaning but that there is underneath a mass of corruption, seething and fermenting, and which can no longer be repressed by the crust of deceit which has too long concealed it from view? Is my statement denied? If so, it is easy of proof. There is one thing which gentlemen on the other side will not deny. They will not deny that year after year, we on this side of the House have charged them with governing by corruption and bribery. The charges were indeed so persistent that their late leader, Sir John Macdonald, one day thought it his duty to refer to them. The occasion was one which the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House remembers very well. It was on the occasion of a banquet in the City of Quebec tendered to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia. Sir John Macdonald upon that occasion referred to the charges made against his Administration, and now, Sir, listen to his language:

"Our opponents say that we bribed the constituencies."

There is the charge; did he deny it? Did he attempt to explain it, did he extenuate it? Nothing of the kind; he rather gloried in it, and what was his answer?

"Our opponents say that we bribed the constituencies, but we bribed them with their own money."

This is the painful truth. Such were the ethics which were taught to his party by the late leader of the Conservatives. I have always said that I am an admirer of Sir John Macdonald. I will not deny the great services which he rendered to the country, but nevertheless history records that his fondness for power led him to speak such language as he spoke on that occasion. If his party was to be kept in power, and if to attain that end the constituencies had to be bribed, bribed they would be. I say, Sir, before history he stands answerable, not only for the fact, but for all the consequences which have to follow, and have followed, and of which we are to-day the humiliated witnesses. That was his doctrine, and what was the practice? We remember on the eve of a general election that Sir John called together the manufacturers of the City of Toronto; the invitation had been public but the meeting was secret. What was discussed there? Affairs of state? No. If affairs of state had to be discussed Parliament was the place to discuss them; and why of all men should he call the manufacturers together, but in order to have the funds necessary to bribe the constituencies with their own money.

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Mr. LAURIER. Order! is this not history?

Mr. FOSTER. It may be history, but it is not the question.

Mr. LAURIER. The language which I use, Sir, is history, and it is within the question, and if to-day we charge the Minister of Public Works as we do, it is because the system proclaimed upon that occasion has been followed too long. Is it anything extraordinary, Sir, that when such were the ethics and practice of the leader, the man who held the second rank in command should have also done his best, in his own way, to provide for the raising of a fund in order to bribe constituencies with their own money? Is it not to be expected that since that was the example in upper quarters, the practice had to be followed, and that it continued radiating all around, until it has reached the point we have now seen. I repeat, Sir, that it is a painful duty for me to speak as I now do upon this occasion; but, Sir, the duty is one which not only concerns the late Minister now accused before us, but it is one which concerns every man in Canada; because, I submit, that no nation can live in which such a system has been tolerated as has been tolerated in this country. I see men on the other side of the House to-day, who when these words of Sir John Macdonald were uttered, protested in their hearts that such a policy as this could not be tolerated in any country; but such was the prestige of the man, such was the great authority which he exercised, that the protest remained unuttered. But at last the system had to be investigated publicly before this House, and it is the duty of everyone now to deal with the facts, and to deal with them, as has been stated by the hon. gentleman who spoke last, according to his conscience and in the light which his conscience gives him. The hon. gentleman stated a moment ago, and the remark was made by an hon. gentleman before him also, that it was not fair for my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) or my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) to have put his name to such a report as this, because Sir Hector Langevin, the late Minister of Public Works, had denied under oath the charges brought against him. Sir, I have no desire to be offensive, but this is a painful subject, and if it is to be treated as it ought to be treated, it is not possible to treat it without giving pain. I would not give pain, if it were possible for me to avoid it. I do not want to make any reproach against Sir Hector Langevin, but I simply say this: that the testimony which he gave, in my humble judgment, cannot form the basis of an opinion to be rendered upon this charge, because, in my judgment, in the testimony which he gave, he laid himself open to the charge that, after all, his memory is a very confused one. I take the very opening sentence of his testimony and this is what I read in it:

"I regret that in consequence of the manner in which, as respects myself, this enquiry originated, I have been obliged to appear to be passive, while charges of the gravest character have been gradually accumulated against me by the slow and unusual process of adducing evidence upon them, before they had been formulated or communicated to me.

"If Mr. Tarte, when he brought his accusations in the House of Commons on the 11th of May, 1891, had made his charges directly against me, I would have at once, pending the enquiry, put my resignation as Minister of Public Works in the hands of the Prime Minister, in accordance with the custom followed in such cases in England."

We are to understand, Sir, from the words of the late Minister of Public Works, that when the hon. member for Montmorency brought his charges against him in the House, he, the Minister of Public Works, did not understand that he was accused, and that if he had so understood, he would have at once placed his resignation in the hands of the Prime Minister. Well, everyone will agree with me that if the hon. Minister of Public Works did not on that occasion understand that he was accused, he was the only man in this House on either side who did not so understand. Everyone understood that he was accused; and more, Sir, if there could be any doubt in his own mind as to that, not a week elapsed before he was called upon from this side of the House to resign because he was accused. On the 19th May, when the House was in Committee of Supply, and when the estimates for the Department of Public Works came up for discussion, my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar) suggested that the Minister ought to resign because he was charged. He said:

"If the Minister of Public Works had looked a little further into British precedents he would have found out that whenever a Minister of the Crown is charged as he is charged to-day, with a gross offence, which if it is proved would have the most serious consequences to himself and his colleagues, I say that if he looks at British precedents he will find that in no case has a Minister who has charges like that hanging over his head continue in office until a decision on the accusations was arrived at."

So also spoke my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies); so spoke my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). An hon. member on the other side of the House, the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives), also took part in the debate, and this is what he said:

"I do not think that the course proposed by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) or the hon. member who has just addressed the House, would be practicable. I do not think it would be practicable to carry on the business of Government, if, every time an accusation is brought against a Minister, he should take the course suggested."

On all sides, therefore, it was understood that the hon. gentleman was accused, and if he did not so understand on the 11th of May, surely he should have understood it on the 19th of May and taken the course which he says he would have taken if he had so understood. But there is more. Let us look at the language used by the hon. gentleman himself on the 11th of May, and let us see, let us ask ourselves how in the face of that language he could say on the 11th of August, three months afterwards, that he had not understood that he was accused. As soon as the hon. member for Montmorency took his seat after making the charges, the late Minister of Public Works rose and said:

"This matter being a matter of privilege, we have a standing committee appointed by the House—the Committee on Privileges and Elections—which has to deal with matters of privilege, and this matter should be sent to that committee. My intention from the beginning had been to make the motion myself, but I understood that the hon. the mover of this motion had other matters to bring before the House than those which were published in the press, and I thought it therefore but fair to leave the hon. gentleman to take his own course."

The charges had already been made in the press. The Minister had seen them, and he stated that even if the hon. member for Montmorency had not moved, he himself would have moved in the House for an investigation. Moreover, if I remember rightly, these charges were commonly repeated in the last election contest, and Ministers of the Crown stated that they should be investigated. How, therefore, can it be possibly held that the hon. gentleman did not understand on the 11th of May that he was accused by the hon. member for Montmorency? So clearly was he accused that he ventured to explain:

"As my name is connected with this question by the hon. gentleman,"——

Nothing could be plainer——

——"I think it my duty to make a statement to the House. That statement I now make as follows:—I never communicated in any way to anyone tenders or prices of tenders, or relative position of tenders,"——

This was a charge——

——"or names of tenderers at any time before the contract was allotted and signed and the work in progress;"——

This was another charge——

——"the only persons having the same information being the members of the Privy Council and such of the officers of my department as were entrusted with the opening of tenders after the period fixed for their reception."

Mr. Speaker, in the face of this the hon. gentleman stated under oath on the 11th of August that he had not understood that he had been accused on the 11th of May, three months previous, although on that occasion he ventured to explain the charges which were brought against him. Now, as I have said, I do not want to be offensive to the hon. gentleman, who is not here. I do not want to make any charges except such as I am bound to make in support of the position which has been taken by my hon. friends, and which I believe to be the correct position. But without at all impugning the honesty of the hon. gentleman when he made that statement under oath, I say that if his memory is so defective that on the 11th of August he forgot the words he had uttered only three months before in the full publicity of this House—words uttered in the hearing of hundreds of people, and recorded in the Official Debates of this House—can it be expected that the slightest impression has been left upon his mind of events which took place years before in the dark recesses of the Department of Public Works? Sir, I am sorry to come to that conclusion, but if that conclusion is not perfectly warranted by every word that I have uttered, then let the friends of the late Minister of Public Works rise up and defend him. But, Sir, if we cannot take the version of the facts which was given by the hon. gentleman before the Committee, in order to come to a proper conclusion on this matter, there are two facts, at all events, within the knowledge of every man in this House which ought to be remembered, and which, if kept in view, may illuminate the way, as we proceed through the corners, paths and by-ways of the evidence, in the search after truth. These two facts are, the well-known character of the hon. gentleman, and the condition of his department. Sir, the late hon. Minister of Public Works has been for many years a prominent man in this country. In fact, for the last twenty years his position has been only second to that of Sir John Macdonald. Since the death of Sir George Cartier, as the hon. Minister of Militia has stated, he has been the head of his party in the Province of Quebec. Before him all other ambitions had to take a back seat. He has been for years the all-powerful sun before whose luminous rays the brightest stars were extinguished. Now, what was the peculiar quality which gave the hon. gentleman his eminence in the country? He was, as all will admit, quite dissimilar from the two great leaders with whom he was so long associated: yet the variety of the human mind is so immense that no single mind can compass all its qualities: but in every mind there is an attribute which marks the man above others. What was the attribute of the mind of the hon. Minister of Public Works? It has been stated over and over again; it was one in which he prided and which gave delight to all his friends: it was his great ability as an administrator; and indeed all who have sat in the three last Parliaments, and who have seen the hon. gentleman in this House—who saw the skilful manner in which he could present all questions concerning the great public works which were constantly going on, who saw the knowledge he displayed of the details, not only of his own department, but of every other department in the Government—must have come to the conclusion that as an administrator he was endowed as few men in this country were endowed. Now, what was the condition of his department? I venture to say that four or five months ago, at the opening of this session, the impression was general, not only in the country, but more especially among the members of this House, that the department of the hon. gentleman was not only unimpeachable but a model department in every particular. And yet how erroneous an impression, how fallacious a view. It has been proved by incontrovertible testimony, not an iota of which can be impugned, that the department of the hon. gentleman which was thought a model department in every particular, is a mass of irregularities, jobberies and corruption. The evidence has proved that every contract given by the hon. Minister cost the country just double the amount he set upon it, that every plan, every specification which he signed himself, was altered, once and more than once, before the contract was completed. The evidence has proved that tenders and specifications in his department were, through some mysterious manner, communicated to a friend of his, and altered so as to favour particular contractors. The evidence has proved that his chief engineer was bribed, that his inspectors of masonry were bribed, that his overseers of crib-work and dredging were bribed, and that in the contracts investigated by the Committee the country has been robbed and cheated out of hundreds of thousands of dollars. Now, I ask this question of friend and foe: Are these things consistent with the character of the hon. gentleman as an administrator? Is it possible that these frauds and jobberies and peculations can have gone on for years before the eyes of such an able administrator without his having perceived them? The fact is not possible. Then, what is the explanation? It is that given by the gentlemen who have placed in your hands, Sir, the minority report—knowledge, participation, connivance. This is hard language undoubtedly, but the choice has to be made between two alternatives. Either the explanation is knowledge, participation and connivance on the part of the Minister, or the Minister was utterly incompetent. Is there a man here, who has been in Parliament for the last fifteen years, and who has seen that Minister leading the House in Committee of Supply, who will say that he was incompetent to discharge the duties of his department? But I will be told that after all there was a conspiracy of which the Minister was the victim, among Perley, the two brothers McGreevy, the brothers Connolly, and Murphy, that of course these conspirators did not give up their secrets, and that but for the quarrel betwen the two brothers McGreevy, nothing would ever have been known. There might be plausibility in that assertion, if it could be said that the Minister had never before this year heard of these charges; but I affirm this, that although the facts had not leaked out to the general public, still every fact, now proved to be true, as to the condition of the department, was known by a small circle of men, at all events. Let me quote here an article published in a newspaper published in the City of Montreal:

"Unfortunately all questions relating to public works are determined at Ottawa, by the worst of all bad reasons, by bribery.

"To keep aside the contractors who ask a fair price, and who desire to perform their work honestly, recourse is had to those tricks which are common to all Administrations guilty of malversation. Underhand some favourite contractor is told to tender at the lowest price. The contract is awarded him, and immediately he makes the share of the Minister under the form of a subscription to the electoral fund. But he must be recouped. The engineers, the inspectors, the overseers are chosen so as to help him. After the contractor has tendered for no matter what price, a most important omission is discovered by accident in the specifications. A protest and an investigation follow. The end is that the Minister has a report addressed to him, which concludes that there must be a modification of the specification, the effect of which is an alteration, to the advantage of the contractor, of all the conditions agreed to in the contract. After having tendered at a lower figure than the real price of the work, for no other object than to keep aside all serious competitors, the minion of the Government gets double the price of his tender, and everybody is delighted.

"We could defy the Department of Public Works to show us a single contract which, for several years past, has been executed literally according to the specifications. It is all profit for the reptile fund; and those who supply it also find therein an ample compensation to their apparent sacrifices. But the public works cost from twenty to thirty per cent. above their real value."

When was this written? Is this a piece of writing indited since the facts disclosed before the Committee were published? You would imagine that this was a comment on the report of the Committee. No, Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, this is almost ancient history. This was written in the year 1886, and published not in a Liberal paper, but in a Conservative paper, La Presse. I had occasion, some time ago, to mention that paper to the Secretary of State, and he replied that it was not a Conservative paper. Sir, it never was a Liberal paper; it always was Conservative, though not always a ministerial organ. It was at times independent, and it was in a fit of independence that the editor gave to the world the knowledge he had acquired while in the secrets of the gods. But it matters not whether this paper was Liberal or Conservative; the important fact to which I want to call attention is this, that the condition of the Public Works Department, such as has been disclosed before the Committee, was known outside, was known to the editor of a newspaper, who published it to the world five years ago. The assertion was then made that favourite contractors always got the preference, and the assertion has been proved true. The assertion was made that tenders and specifications were altered to benefit the favoured contractors, and the assertion has been proved true. The assertion was made that overseers and inspectors were chosen, who would help the contractors, and the assertion is true. Now, can it be possible that these facts should have leaked out of the Department of Public Works, and that the Minister did not know a word about them? Can it be possible that such a vigilant administrator could have been so blind to what was going on in his own department as not to know what was known outside. The thing is not probable or reasonable. But there is more than that. It was asserted also, and it has been proved to be true, that these fradulent contracts were entered into and these fraudulent manipulations of specifications committed, with an object, and that object was to create a fund in order to bribe the constituencies with their own money. We have that fact proved, and the further fact also that the manipulator of those frauds, the collector of that fund, and the bosom friend of the Minister of Public Works, was Thomas McGreevy, the member for Quebec West. It may be said that I speak warmly on this subject. Sir, I do not desire to pose as laying pretensions to any puritanical sensitiveness; I do not claim to be better than my fellow men; but there is not a man for whom patriotism is not a vain and empty word, who can see, without shame on his brow, the finger of scorn pointed to this country from all parts of the civilized world. There is not a man who has a spark of patriotism in his heart, who can see, without feeling humiliated, the degraded condition to which the country has been sunk by this infamous system of bribery and plunder of public money. And on this occasion I may be pardoned if I remember that the city which I have the honour to represent has been the victim selected to be preyed upon. It was a crime, but it was a double crime, when the trade of that city was declining and when every effort should have been made by the Minister, who was a native of that city, to assist it in the endeavour to retain its ancient control of business, it was a double crime to load it with a debt, of which hundreds of thousands of dollars were engulfed in remorseless peculations and malversations. Sir, the report which has been made by the accountants employed by the department has shown that the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. has derived out of the public treasury the amount of $3,138,234 for the works in the harbour of Quebec and the harbour of Esquimault. Out of this the members of the firm have divided among themselves as profits what follows:—Patrick Larkin, $106,161; Nicholas Connolly, $148,172; Michael Connolly, $125,422; O. E. Murphy, $167,000, and R. H. McGreevy, $187,000. Besides that, the firm has paid $170,000 as gratification, as donations for charitable purposes, because those were some of the euphonic terms used by the firm to disguise their contributions, for the purpose of bribing the constituencies with their own money. The contracts were the following:—The first contract was for the graving dock at Lévis, the second was for dredging the wet basin at Quebec, the next was for building what is known as the cross-wall in Quebec harbour, then there was one for the completion of the graving dock at Lévis, another for the graving dock at Esquimalt, one for the south wall at Quebec, and one for dredging the basin at Quebec. It is to be remarked that all these contracts but one were made under the name of the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec, but all these contracts without exception were carried out under the authority of the Department of Public Works. The hon. gentleman who addressed the House last stated that the Minister was not responsible for these contracts because they were carried out by the Quebec Harbour Commission. I deny that altogether. I will not go into the question, because my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has dealt with it thoroughly and has shown that the moneys expended were moneys belonging to the people of Canada, and that they were expended under the direct authority of the Minister of Public Works. The Harbour Commission consists of nine members, five of whom are selected by the Government. When this Government came into power in 1878, one of the first things they did was to cancel the appointments made by their predecessors and to appoint other members of that commission, one of whom was Mr. Thomas McGreevy, who was then member for Quebec West. From that time on, all the moneys which were expended in the harbour of Quebec were expended under the authority of the Minister of Public Works. When Mr. McGreevy became a member of the commission, Larkin, Connolly & Co. had a contract which had been given to them in August, 1878, under the former Administration, to carry out the construction of a graving dock at Lévis. The next contract given to them was in 1882, to dredge the harbour of Quebec, that is to say the wet basin. In that contract, Mr. Robert H. McGreevy was taken into partnership and was given an interest of 30 per cent., and in every subsequent contract he was given an interest of not less than 20 per cent., except one, the contract to complete the graving dock at Lévis. On all the other contracts he received an amount varying from 30 to 20 per cent. It is in evidence that Mr. Robert McGreevy never put a dollar in money or labour into the business of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and yet he got 30 per cent. of their profits. It is in evidence that they never received an hour of his time or a dollar of his money, and yet they agreed to give him 30 per cent. of their earnings, and he received in all more than $187,000. What is the reason that Larkin, Connolly & Co. gave him that large amount of money without any consideration for it? It is not in human nature to give anything without consideration, and it is certainly not in the nature of the Connollys, who have proved themselves to be remarkably human in that respect. The only reason for this course is that Robert McGreevy was the brother of Thomas McGreevy, who was a member of this House, a member of the Harbour Commission, and an intimate friend of the Minister of Public Works, and the object as stated by Murphy himself—and his evidence on this point cannot be challenged—was that they wanted to make money. To make money—how? By having the influence of Mr. Thomas McGreevy on their behalf, and through him the influence of the Minister of Public Works. You can imagine how deep that firm expected to dip their hands in the public chest when they consented to pay to the brother of Thomas McGreevy 30 per cent., which proved to realize an amount of $187,000. But I will be asked: Can you say that Mr. Thomas McGreevy really influenced the Minister of Public Works? I will put the question in another way. Was Mr. Thomas McGreevy in a position to influence the Minister of Public Works? I say yes. I say he was in a position to unduly influence the Minister of Public Works. But let me say this before I proceed with that question. It is proved that Mr. Thomas McGreevy continually exerted himself in behalf of the contractors to secure them favours, to secure reductions in the conditions, to secure increases in the prices, favours which swelled their profits to an enormous degree, and for these services, in addition to the interest they gave to his brother, they gave him also, as is proved in evidence, different and various sums of money amounting to a very considerable total. As to what amount of money he received directly or indirectly, there is a confusion of testimony. Robert McGreevy says he himself gave him over $57,000, and that Larkin, Connolly & Co. gave him $117,000. Thomas McGreevy admits only receiving $55,000 from Larkin, Connolly & Co., out of which he says he gave $35,000 to Le Monde, a paper notoriously published in the interest of the Minister of Public Works and to which the Minister was a heavy subscriber. As to the rest, he would not say how he expended it, but we know that he expended it with a view of bribing the constituencies with their own money. We have, then, the evidence of the constant interference of Thomas McGreevy with the department in the interests of the contractors, we have the direct evidence that the contractors received favours from the department. We have the evidence of the benefits which he received for himself and for his party, and now I again ask: Was Mr. Thomas McGreevy in a position to unduly influence the Minister of Public Works? Was he in a position to unduly influence the Minister of Public Works? Sir, the investigation has revealed this fact, the investigation has revealed that from about the year 1877, the Minister of Public Works borrowed money from the banks to the extent of $10,300, and that Mr. Thomas McGreevy became his endorser, and that from that time to the present day, these notes have been constantly renewed every four months, the interest being paid all the time by Mr. Thomas McGreevy. What is the meaning of this? Let us see what the Minister of Public Works himself has to say upon that point:

"In the account books of Mr. Thomas McGreevy, laid before the Committee, mention is made of certain promissory notes on which my name is. I wish to state in connection with this, that in 1876 and 1877, not being then a member of the Government, I ran twice for parliamentary elections in the County of Charlevoix."

Then the Minister goes on to say that he had no money, and that he had incurred some debts; and he continues:

"Mr. Thomas McGreevy, knowing the circumstances, endorsed my notes, paid out of his own money the interest or discount when due, and told me then that later on he would see the notes redeemed. I have considered, therefore, that he assumed the notes, and I have been confirmed in that idea by his having met regularly the interest or discount since then, and I have never troubled my mind about the matter."

Now, Sir, this, to say the least of it, was an extraordinary explanation, extraordinary from its brevity, extraordinary from its tenor. The Minister speaks of all this as quite natural, as if Thomas McGreevy had been his debtor and had told him: "Don't concern yourself about these notes, I will redeem them, and you will place the amount to my credit." But Mr. McGreevy was not the debtor of the Minister, and therefore when the Minister says that he understood from Mr. McGreevy that he would redeem these notes, after paying interest on them all the time, what was it if not a gift of $10,300? Was it anything else? I call upon every friend of the late Minister of Public Works in this House to say if it is not evident that when Sir Hector Langevin was told by Mr. McGreevy that he would redeem these notes for him, he was accepting a gift of $10,300? Now, it is true that the Minister in the first part of his declaration had made this general statement. He had stated generally:

"That, in truth, Mr. Thomas McGreevy and I have been, for a long time, on friendly terms, and that he has been my guest at Ottawa in the period from 1878 to 1890, whilst I resided here as a Minister, and during which I did not receive from him, and he never offered me, any sum of money, gift or loan."

Well, Mr. Speaker, much as I regret—because I assert again that I have no animosity against the Minister of Public Works, I would rather fight him upon political grounds than any other—but much as I regret it, in face of that testimony I must ask: Is there a man here who can say that the Minister of Public Works has not received a gift of $10,300 from Mr. McGreevy? That is the charge. Sir, will any man tell me—and I put this question not out of animosity to the late Minister—will any one tell me that when he accepted from one of his supporters a gift of $10,300 he was a free agent in so far as his relations with that supporter were concerned? And remember, remark the cunning of Mc-

Greevy. It would have been easy for him to have paid these notes, it would have been just as easy for him to pay these notes as to subscribe to a newspaper: yet he kept the sword suspended over the head of the Minister for ten long years and more. And every time the Minister came to him and asked him to renew these notes, Mr. McGreevy told him he was paying the interest and would redeem the capital—I say that on every such occasion the Minister of Public Works was signing the instrument of his own bondage into the hands of Thomas McGreevy. Now, Sir, I put the question as a plain man to men of common sense: When Thomas McGreevy, like Mephistopheles, was whispering in the ear of the Minister that it would be advisable to change the specifications of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and to give them increased prices for certain works and to give them certain reductions in the conditions of the contracts, was the Minister in a position to deny a favour to so generous a friend who had undertaken to free him and to relieve him from a debt of $10,300? Sir, the logic of facts is too strong in this matter to allow us to come to any other conclusion than that the Minister of Public Works had surrendered his freedom into the hands of Thomas McGreevy. I do not say it with any pleasure at all. If we accuse the Minister of Public Works we do it in sorrow, and not in anger. But before such facts as these, whatever may be the opinion on either side of the House, I will say there is no man who will listen to the voice of reason and to the voice of conscience but must come to the conclusion that the Minister of Public Works has placed himself in a position that he could not say nay to any request of Thomas McGreevy. But I will be told, perhaps, that Thomas McGreevy never approached the Minister to obtain favours; that the Minister never gave favours to Larkin, Connolly & Co. at the instance of Thomas McGreevy. Now, I say this, and I intend to prove it, I will show from the public records, that Thomas McGreevy approached the Minister of Public Works to obtain favours for the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and that at his solicitation the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. received favours from the Minister of Public Works. Now, I will not review the whole evidence, I will review it only in so far as necessary to prove the points I have just stated. Let me take the first contract, the contract for the Lévis dock. This was a contract entered into under the late Government, and my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has shown the other day that under that contract the contractors assumed all responsibility for the foundation, whether it was of clay or of sand. It was stated in the specifications that borings had been made to test the matter of the soil, that the conditions revealed were satisfactory, and the agreement was imperative that if the soil was not ultimately found to be as the borings seemed to indicate, the contractors would be responsible. It appears that the contractors found sand instead of clay, and they made a protest accordingly. It matters not whether it was sand or clay; at all events, according to my construction of the contract, it seems to me that no one can gainsay that the firm had taken all risks; but instead of being forced to execute their contract, they were allowed to make more favorable conditions, under which they expended $180,000 by day's labour, which they charged to the department. In 1884, as stated by Murphy, they were making a profit on that kind of work, but they thought that by having a lump sum they would make still greater profits, and they would be able to give donations to their friends who had assisted them. They entered into a contract of $74,000 to complete the works of the graving dock, and it was understood between them and Thomas McGreevy that he was to receive out of this sum $24,000, and it is now proved that he received $22,000. Now, so far, the hand of the Minister is not shown, but the hand of the Minister is shown later on when, on the 20th September, 1886, he writes thus to Thomas McGreevy:

"MY DEAR MR. MCGREEVY,—The contractors for the Lévis graving dock should ask a settlement of their account from the Harbour Commissioners, who then will most likely consult with their engineer. For the Esquimalt dock it is different, because the work there is altogether under my control."

What does this letter prove? It proves that the contractors, Larkin, Connolly & Co. had a claim—whether good, bad or indifferent, I will not discuss at this moment—against the commissioners for their works at Lévis and in British Columbia. This letter proves that the Minister of Public Works had been approached by McGreevy asking him to have this claim recognized and paid. The Minister answered in substance that as to the works in British Columbia he could attend to that himself, but as to the works in Lévis the contractors would do better to present their claim to the commissioners, who would refer it to their engineer; and the engineer of the commission was the engineer of the Minister of Public Works. Such was proposed, and such was done. Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co. produced a claim later on, in which they pretended that the total indebtedness to them for the Lévis graving dock work was $814,241. On 24th January, 1887, the engineer reported on that claim. He reduced it to $640,000. He reduced the claim on several items, and an item of $110,000 he rejected completely. That item was, as stated by Larkin, Connolly & Co., for "detention, salaries, maintenance of organization at Lévis and at the quarries." That was simply an outrageous claim, and it is sufficient to read it to show its character. The claim was put forward in these terms:

"Our claim is made up as follows:—Four years' detention on account of the engineers, Messrs. Kinipple & Morris, having assured the existence of clay in the foundations of the wing walls and the coffer dam, and so distinctly shown and stated on both plan and specification furnished by them, whereas a fine sand existed, and we were misled. Had the foundation been as described, there is no reasonable doubt but we would have completed the works within the time specified, or in other words, we were four years longer constructing the work owing to their error and stubbornness in not adapting themselves to the circumstances when made acquainted by personal observation and our written protest. Our claim is made up as follows:—

To salary of Mr.	N. K. Connolly, one year	$ 2,000 00
do	O. E. Murphy do	1,200 00
do	M. Connolly do	1,200 00
do	P. Hume do	1,800 00
do	Book-keeper do	800 00
do	T. H. Gallagher	1,200 00
do	Time-keeper	350 00
do	Stable boys	600 00
do	Watchmen (2)	700 00
Interest on $90,000 at 7 per cent		6,300 00
Cost of maintenance of organization at Lévis and at the quarries, consisting of machinery, derricks, horses, waggons, carts, sleighs, &c., and for loss sustained in not being able to realize from the plant.		11,350 00
One year		27,500 00
Or four years		$110,000 00

Upon this item, what was the opinion of Mr. Perley at that time? It was as follows:—

"With reference to this claim I desire to state that when I took charge of the dock in September, 1883, it was not presented to me, although I had asked that every claim the contractors might have be submitted, so that I could investigate them and see to what extent the commissioners were indebted. Only one claim to my knowledge, that of the extra foot in depth in the dock was withheld, because there was not at the time any certainty as to the correctness of the bend marks and tide-gauge on which the matter depended, and its investigation was therefore deferred: and at the time of preparing the supplementary contract of June, 1884, I was under the impression that the clause inserted therein, admitted the right of the contractors to submit further claims for the extra foot; and I desire to have this statement made on record."

So when this supplementary contract was entered into in 1884, it had been understood between Mr. Perley and the contractors that the contract was to cover every claim. Not only so, but the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) showed yesterday that a condition of the Order in Council that granted the contract was that no claims for extras should be admitted in the future. Yet, although this was the written condition of the contract, Mr. Perley on that occasion had the weakness to admit the claim, not in toto, not for $110,000, but for $30,900. Well, the wily contractors then had the advantage. The principle of their claim, which should have been denied, was admitted, and they asked for an arbitration. The arbitration was granted, but did not go on. Why? Because we find that on 1st May, 1888, Mr. Perley wrote as follows to the Harbour Commissioners:—

"In reply to yours of the 25th April, asking for an opinion on an offer by Messrs. Larkin, Connolly & Co. to accept the sum of $35,000 with interest in addition to the sum of $30,900 offered by the board in full settlement of their claim in connection with the graving dock at Lévis, I have to state that, in view of the assumption of the dock by the Dominion Government, and the relief thus to be afforded to the Board from all future liability and responsibility in connection therewith, I am of the opinion that it is desirable the dock should be handed over free and unencumbered, and to do so it is advisable that the contractors be offered the sum of thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000) without interest in addition to the amount, viz., $30,900, in settlement in full of all claims and demands."

The further sum of $35,000 was paid for that bogus claim, which should have been denied under the very terms of the contract itself. What is the reason? How silly and how absurd it is. The reason given is that because there was an Act just passed by Parliament assuming the proprietorship of the graving dock at Lévis it was desirable to pay this money to relieve the Harbour Commission from the responsibility, when it was known that the commission never contributed a cent of its own money, but every cent was paid by the Dominion Government; and whether the works remained in the hands of the commission or passed into the hands of the Government, so far as money was concerned it did not matter, because every expenditure had been paid and would be paid by the Dominion Government. We are told: What had the Minister of Public Works to do with this? In the first place, he is responsible for every act done by his engineer. I will not, however, put the matter on that broad ground. There is a letter written by Mr. Perley to the Harbour Commissioners dated 28th March, 1888, when an application was made by Larkin, Connolly & Co. to change their arbitrator from J. J. Macdonald to Mr. Aylen. Mr. Perley says that the Minister objected to that. It thereby appears that he kept the matter in his own hands, and therefore it was with his consent that $65,900 was paid to Larkin, Connolly & Co., who had no more claim to it than I had or any other member of this House. How was it done? I have shown by letter written by the Minister of Public Works to Thomas McGreevy that it was done at the solicitation of Thomas McGreevy, who appealed to the good offices of the Minister to have that claim allowed. I pass now to the contracts in British Columbia. Hon. members will find there at every step the hand of Thomas McGreevy on the Minister, and the yielding of the Minister to Thomas McGreevy. It is well known that works in that province had been undertaken and commenced by the Provincial Government, and afterwards turned over to the Government of Canada. Tenders were asked for the Esquimalt dock in 1884. Two tenders were sent in; one, the tender of Starrs & O'Hanly, for $315,240; and the other, the tender of Baskerville & Co. for $465,309. These two tenders were rejected under Order in Council, on the advice of the Minister of Public Works, because one was too low and the other was too high. The tender of Starrs & O'Hanly was too low and the tender of Baskerville was too high, it being $465,000. It is in evidence that a short time afterwards Baskerville & Co. were approached by Mr. Perley, who told them that if they were ready to reduce their tender by $50,000, the contract would be given them, and he had the authority of the Minister to make that statement. Then there was a letter sent by Baskerville & Co., wherein they expressed the desire, on the suggestion of the engineer, to amend their tender and reduce it by $53,000. A report was made, accordingly, by Mr. Perley, recommending that the tender so amended be accepted. Nothing was done on it. Now, what had taken place? The Minister of Public Works had gone to Quebec and had met Murphy. Murphy says he made a proposition on that occasion, which I am almost ashamed to believe. I can hardly believe that a Minister of the Crown would have listened to such language as that; but, at all events, the language is there. The Minister said to Murphy that he would readvertise the tenders, and he did readvertise subsequently. In the meantime Mr. Baskerville, who had written to the Minister to have his tender amended, asked for a reply; and upon that we have this answer made by the Minister: Tell Mr. Baskerville that the specifications have been altered, and new tenders will be asked for. Now, Sir, I charge this, that when the Minister said that the specifications had been altered and tenders would be asked on the altered specifications, that was a deceit on Mr. Baskerville and the country. It is true that new tenders were asked for; but I say this also, and I challenge contradiction on this point, that the new tenders were not made on the specifications as amended or altered, but were made on the old specifications. We have the evidence of it in the blue-book which was laid on the Table of the House last year by the Minister himself. You have it in evidence, in the following language of Mr. Perley to be found at page 38, that the works had been commenced by the Government of British Columbia and handed over to the Government of Canada. He then continues:

"As soon after the transfer as possible tenders were asked for the completion of this work. Two only were received, both of which were objected to and cancelled. A second set of tenders was called for, on exactly the same plans, &c., which were those prepared by Kinipple & Co., and fresh tenders were received."

Now, that is not all. There is also another letter of Mr. Perley to Mr. Trutch in which he states the same thing. So, Sir, we have in the evidence of Mr. Perley that the second tenders were asked for upon exactly the same plans and specifications as the first tenders, and it was to deceive Baskerville & Co. and the country that the specifications were said to have been altered with a view to asking for new tenders. New tenders were asked for, and there were several tenders received, and Starrs & O'Hanly were the lowest, and the contract was awarded to them. Starrs & O'Hanly were the lowest, but they were told by the Minister of Public Works that they need not expect any favour, that they would have no extras and that they would be bound to pay every cent of the $50,000 for the old plant, which was a condition of the tender. On account of the stern language of the Minister, Starrs & O'Hanly thought that the best plan after all would be to recede and to tender another time. They withdrew their tender, and the contract was awarded to Larkin, Connolly & Co.; and, Sir, it was awarded at a time and under conditions which were not given in the contract, but by which they had already secured alterations in the tenders upon which they had based their contract. Here is a letter written by Nicholas Connolly to Patrick Larkin on the 29th October, 1884:

"You will see by the enclosed message that we are offered the Esquimalt graving dock. I cared nothing about tendering for the dock and scarcely expected to get it, but now that we are offered it, and under the circumstances I think it would be best to accept it, with the proviso that the changes we suggest are made and have been partially agreed between parties."

Although Starrs & O'Hanly were told that they would be held rigidly to the letter of the contract, Larkin, Connolly & Co. were told that they would have the contract upon conditions which were not written in the tender. Now, Sir, let us see what were the changes which they expected in the contract. You find these changes enumerated in a letter of Nicholas Connolly to Murphy on the 20th December, 1884. He had proceeded to Victoria, and he wrote from Victoria as follows, with his quaint orthograph:

"I think that Mr. T. would like to have the dock builte of grannet and hee said that it would not cost much over sixty thousand in adishin to our prise for sandstone and I also think that the folkes heer would lik to mak it a hundred feet longer. If corse thoes thinges are for our frend two work on But for the substutin of grannet would bee worth one hundred thousand moeur and the lengthing preporson if corse Mr. T. would have two bee seen in the avent of aney chaing as hee is the Dominion agent heer and all pourfull as well as our folkes there. We will want changes mad in the sise of the stone and paid for all the stone we put in that is we wnt to incrase the thickens and the weth of bed and bee alouded for it at our prise and in that way we will make a good thing. The best way would be to have them order hever corses as by that it would give us a chance of an extra as well as giving us our prise. Your can tell our frend But I will write you more fully in a day or two."

Then there is another letter from him written on the 19th February, in which he says that they also wanted a reduction in the price of the plant which is old and useless, and he concludes:
