However, I do want to bring to the attention of the minister a question which I have raised in this chamber before. I have been asked by a number of my constituents to raise it again and then to make certain suggestions to the minister. The subject I have in mind is the unethical practices of a number of United States lumber and forest products industries particularly in the Kootenays in recent years. There have been 20 or more of these companies established. They operate for a year or so, show a profit in some cases and then owners or management disappear across the border while the employees, the creditors and others are left holding the bag.

The latest case involves the Hilco Lumber Company, Limited, near Fruitvale, British Columbia, whose activities I brought to the attention of the house on an earlier occasion. This company has been in operation for two or three years, and it succeeded in showing a profit of more than $43,000. In 1960 it ceased operations just prior to Christmas and showed total current liabilities of $141,893.46. Not only were the wages of employees unpaid for two or three months—some employees were owed up to $1,200—but a large number of business people had been defrauded. Provincial government assessments had been left unpaid. Money was owing in respect of the social service tax, the British Columbia property tax and other taxes.

There was, for example, the income tax deducted in respect of employees. The department is, I think, owed nearly $9,000. This money was deducted from the pay of employees and it belongs to the Department of National Revenue. There are other taxes, accounts and so on owed all over the country. These men were left without a cent, and, to make it worse, when they went to collect their unemployment insurance they found that although this company had been operating for two or three years it had not paid a cent of unemployment insurance contributions. Here were these poor chaps left on the rocks without any entitlement to unemployment insurance benefits because the company had not purchased the stamps.

I understand that after a review of the circumstances had taken place provision was made for a considerable number of these men to receive unemployment benefits. I have received a good number of letters on this subject. The clergy of the churches of various denominations in the area have written to me, as have a number of other people, because they are aware of the circumstances and of the plight caused to these employees by this dishonest management.

In addition to that I received a letter from a pioneer rancher who accumulated quite a large estate but who suffered the loss of a great many of his assets in recent years through the unethical practices in bankruptcy of the Wesley Lumber Company and the Ray Ragsdale Lumber Company. This is one illustration of what has happened at Golden, in areas along the Crowsnest Pass west of the Alberta border, around the Lardeau district, in the area of the upper Arrow Lakes, and in the Revelstoke area. This situation has become a blight in recent years. I want to emphasize the importance of this to the people in those areas concerned, as well as in other constituencies than mine. I was asked to take this matter up in the house and I have done so.

Mr. Hees: I thought the hon. member had finished. I was going to say that I am very interested in what he has said, and assure him that I will take this matter up very seriously. It does sound quite serious to me. I will discuss it with my appropriate colleagues to see if we can get to the bottom of this situation.

Mr. Herridge: I appreciate the minister's co-operation and thank him for it. I intend to outline the story, but I will write the minister fully giving him photostat copies of the correspondence I have, as I am sure he is concerned with this situation.

The commercial attache to the United States embassy noticed some remarks which I made earlier this session, as they appeared in Hansard and, as a consequence, very kindly telephoned me stating that he was very disturbed about the situation and would do everything he could to assist. He has done that. An investigation was carried out in this regard. I will not deal with my correspondence with the commercial attache fully but will send copies to the minister. That individual has gone to considerable trouble instigating an investigation into the companies concerned in the United States. The results of that investigation are not of very much credit to the companies or individuals concerned.

I have also taken this matter up with the superintendent of bankruptcy who is also concerned with these repeated occurrences in my area as well as, I assume, other areas. I should suggest that these losses could be avoided with the co-operation of the department because they are occasioned by the lack of information and guidance. Honourable people living in isolated spots, not used to consulting lawyers or bankers, witness a man driving a Cadillac—this did happen on one occasion—spending a few thousand dollars for a week or so and think he is a millionaire. I am not as easily taken in as some individuals in my constituency have been. I would suggest that perhaps the minister should look at the situation and, with the co-operation of other departments and the commercial attache to the United States embassy, who I am sure is very willing to co-operate, could supply the information in order to curb this rash of fraudulent operations in bankruptcy. Perhaps an amendment to the Bankruptcy Act, will be required.

The superintendent of bankruptcy wrote me a letter dated April 21, 1961 from which I would like to quote a paragraph which reads as follows:

> However, unfortunately, the Bankruptcy Act as now constituted does not seem to contain a remedy and I must confess that the solution is not immediately apparent. Should you have any suggestions, I shall be only too pleased to receive them and to give them due and proper consideration in conjunction with a study of the present provisions.

While it may be possible to amend the Bankruptcy Act so as to have stricter control over these things, I am of the opinion that the most effective approach must be made through the minister's department, with the assistance of the commercial attache to the United States embassy. I urge the minister to give this his consideration, to see what can be done either by distributing information to various organizations, such as the chambers of commerce and farmers' bodies, advising them of the steps that can be taken, or perhaps by an amendment to the Bankruptcy Act. I shall be very pleased to assist the minister in any way I can and give him any information I have in this regard.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I will be very glad to look into the matter as soon as I receive that information from the hon. member.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in this discussion, I cannot but congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) and express my admiration for the work he has accomplished since he was appointed to this department. Needless to say my admiration also goes to the staff of that department.

Bold legislation has been initiated under the minister and is beginning to give results which certainly may give some encouragement to our people.

Of course, the minister alone cannot be responsible for solving our problems. All concerned should be ready to make every effort of which they are able. There should also be some contribution on the part of governments, provincial, municipal and federal, of industries, business and the workers themselves. Without such co-operation, all work proposed to stimulate business at home will give only partial results if it does not lead to complete bankruptcy. Governments should co-operate in order to create a climate favourable to trade between the various countries.

As for industry, it should try to explore all avenues to ensure that the work and products offered to their customers are of the highest quality.

Businessmen, on their part, should as much as possible promote the sale and distribution of Canadian products, so as to give employment to the greatest possible number of Canadians.

As far as the workers are concerned, they also should make every effort to cut down losses, and thus help manufacture goods as economically as possible.

On the other hand, consumers must, I think, give preference to Canadian made goods; this will promote employment at home and give work to a greater number of Canadians who depend on that type of activity.

I also believe that it would be well for our chambers of commerce and trade unions to promote a "Buy Canadian" campaign.

Such an attitude would allow our economy to recover its strength, as it is only normal that Canadian products be first absorbed by those who manufacture them and by the taxpayers of this country.

As the minister stated this afternoon—and I think it bears repeating—some countries which formerly, and more particularly during the war, were among our customers, have in the last two years become our competitors. That is our position now. To my mind, the best way of settling the issue would be to compete in the most efficient manner with those who were formerly among our best customers. Those countries have conquered markets we would like to have ourselves.

This afternoon I listened with sustained interest and attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). He painted a very dark picture of economic conditions supposedly prevailing in Canada.

In turn, I should like to show the other side of the picture and point out what is happening in particular in my own home town. I have here a copy of the Southern Canada Power Review for March 1961, on page 8 of which, under the heading "Industrial Development in the Eastern Townships in 1960", one can read:

> The following is a list of the industries established in the territory served by Southern Canada Power in 1960. There are 64 of them a number of which provide work for a hundred or more people. Also included in the list are the industries whose facilities were extended during the year.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I believe that expansion requires new industries. Businessmen must have faith in our future, in the leadership of the government and particularly that which the Minister of Trade and Commerce exercises within his own department. I see on page one—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not probable that they are wrong.

Mr. Ricard: Is it possible that Mr. Crump is wrong?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Possible, but hardly probable.

Mr. Ricard: On page 1 of the magazine, I see the following:

> Eberhard Faber in full expansion in Acton Vale.

And the president of that company said:

> The Eberhard Faber Company is happy to have contributed to the economic growth of the city and hopes to do much more in that connection with this modern and larger plant.

And here is the last paragraph:

> The Eberhard Faber Company believes that a growing market requires increased production. By taking in more employees now in Acton Vale, the company is showing that it has faith in the future of the Canadian economy.

In my own town of St. Hyacinthe, according to municipal statistics, 11 new industries have been established since the coming into power of the Conservative government. This has meant jobs for 413 workers. It is said that a worker in a plant provides a living for about four dependents; so, a simple calculation will show that a certain number of my fellow citizens rely on industries that have been established under the present administration.

I am at present undertaking a survey of the economic situation in St. Hyacinthe. I have sent to 200 merchants and manufacturers of that city a questionnaire in which I ask especially this: has there been any increase or decrease in your turnover in the last three years? Of the 51 answers I have received so far, 36 say that their turnover has increased by 2 to 25 per cent, while six report a decrease in their turnover. However, nine of the merchants I have contacted say that their turnover has remained unchanged.

I note here in an article from Le Courrier of St. Hyacinthe, for September 1, 1960, some figures that this paper has obtained from Sales Management, of New York. The article in question is headlined as follows:

Up to $30,109,000 spent in St. Hyacinthe in 1959.

This represents an increase of $2,929,000. Well, Mr. Chairman, that will be all for now, because I would not like to delay the adoption of the first item of the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. But before I resume my seat, I should like to pay tribute not only to the minister and his staff, but to all those who help him, Canadian businessmen, manufacturers, industrialists and workers who, in considering it their duty to face their obligations, are contributing to the development of Canada and displaying their confidence in the future of their country. (Text):

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask the minister one or two questions on one subject. It will be noted that the large wheat sale to China announced yesterday is to be paid for in sterling. I want to ask the minister first whether the acceptance of payment in a currency other than dollars indicates any change in policy as it affects exports other than this particular sale?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I am advised that this is the first time we have accepted sterling. Sterling is fully convertible and therefore I can see no disadvantage in our accepting sterling in this case. In order to make this important transaction it was necessary for us to accept sterling and the government had no hesitation in doing so.

Mr. McIlraith: I was not questioning that part of it. I wanted to know whether it represented any change in policy beyond what was involved in the particular transaction because, as the minister knows, the practice was to have the purchaser convert the currency and pay in dollars. This has always been our practice up until this transaction, with the exception of one or two very special transactions immediately after the war.

Mr. Hees: The reason we did business in United States currency in the past is that most other currencies were not convertible. Now they are becoming fully convertible and I can see no disadvantage in doing business in those currencies.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not want to develop an argument as to how fully convertible currencies are. It would be a long, rather technical argument. But any sudden increased demand on any country's reserves of a particular currency does or may create a problem, and I want to know whether there is a change of policy as it affects exports other than this special wheat sale? I think it is clear from the minister's answer that there is not.

My second question is, are there any implications in accepting such a large amount of sterling in this transaction on the increased sale of our manufactured products in the sterling area, or any other implications that the minister sees in the fact that we have accepted such a large quantity of sterling in this one transaction?

Mr. Hees: I do not see any. There may be, but I do not see any.

Mr. McMillan: May I ask one question. I notice that the minister's predecessor had an economic adviser and a senior economist. Does the minister intend to get along without a senior economist and a senior economic adviser? Is there any economic report in the department?

Mr. Hees: I take it that the hon. member is speaking about Dr. Firestone. He has, as hon. members know, gone to the University of Ottawa. He is still on contract with the department. We have considerable use of his services.

Mr. Peters: I should like to make a few remarks. I have looked through the duties and responsibilities of this and other departments. I am not completely sure whether we are going to be talking about what is in the department or what should be, but I am interested in the matter of the development of secondary industry in certain areas of the country which have not that development, and will express some of the conclusions I have come to in this regard.

The minister said this afternoon that the small business bureau of the department has received some impetus in the last few months and that it is now growing greatly—

Mr. Hees: If I may correct that, the change was in the volume of small loans to business, which were introduced in the baby budget.

Mr. Peters: Of course, the major impetus to the development of small industry would be through loans. This has been the big change in the bureau itself, its function as a tool in developing business compared with its former practice of merely telling businesses how to look after themselves.

The problem that we are now facing in many parts of the country has to do with the vital need to change our economy from the development of primary industry to the development of secondary industry, and we have no machinery or means to accomplish this end. Some people look to the small business bureau because it is in a position to give some encouragement to the development of certain types of secondary industries, but in the main it would seem to me that much more could be done to provide such an impetus by following the suggestion in the bill of a private member whereby money would be made available and assistance and even direction given in the redevelopment of certain areas and relocation of industry.

England has had this same type of problem. The problem simply is that in parts of Canada where we did have commerce and industry we no longer have these activities because the industries concerned have not been able to find the right markets or their resources have become depleted to the degree that it is no longer economic to operate them. I am particularly interested in the lumber and mining industries in my area, both of which reached and receded from their peak some years ago. Towns like Kirkland Lake are faced each year with a loss of another mine and the income derived from it. We regard with envy Toronto and some of the other major cities that are situated close to the markets for their products because while we are losing our resources these areas are overexpanding until it has become detrimental to many of the people who live there. It seems unrealistic to me that a person has to get up three or four hours before he is to start work and drive for two or three hours to get to his place of employment when we in other parts of the country have facilities very close at hand and would welcome plants that could be located almost in the backyard of the employees' residential areas.

It seems to me that we are going to have to do in Canada what has been done in other countries. I should like to refer to Great Britain as an example. I am told that recently when the Ford Motor Company asked for permission to expand in the location in which they were then situated they were told that they would be given a permit to expand but their expansion would have to take place in Liverpool because Liverpool had a surplus of labour and it was advantageous to have the new development carried out in that area.

I suggest that this is the type of development we need in Canada. There should be some leadership from the Department of Trade and Commerce in the establishing of secondary industry in those areas where there is now none and will not be unless there is government intervention, either through rendering assistance in the form of a subsidy or in the form of direction by telling a company that it cannot have a licence to establish a plant in a certain town because the government wants the company to establish it in another town. The company could be told that it would be given a licence and encouragement to establish in the other town. If this is done, we will be able to share the wealth, so to speak, much more evenly than at the present time.

I should like to use the example of the town of Matachewan in my riding. No doubt many members of the Conservative party were interested in the past in the stocks of mines such as Young Davidson, Matachewan Consolidated and other producing mines in that area. The town has four or five grocery stores, a couple of drug stores, a small hardware store, a police station, a fire brigade and two or three schools, but the facilities available are not now being used. The town does not even have the money to pay for caretakers for some of the public buildings. The town is bankrupt for the simple reason that there is no industry there.

It seems rather unreasonable that new factories should be allowed to locate in a high wage area such as Toronto where agricultural lands are being taken over for the building of homes. There are many reasons why that also should not take place, but people are living so far away from where they work that in some cases the situation is becoming ridiculous. Yet this is happening while at the same time a municipality such as Matachewan will provide free land for the establishment of industries and will make every reasonable concession, tax or otherwise, to get firms to establish factories there. There are many natural resources in the area of Matachewan that would lend themselves to the establishment of secondary industry. The authorities there will grant every reasonable consideration just to get an industry to establish there so that the people of the area will again be employed and will be able to maintain their community in a reasonable degree of prosperity.

I think it is not unreasonable to ask that the small business bureau of the Department of Trade and Commerce undertake such a program in conjunction with what it is now doing because in my opinion it is going to be vitally necessary. The junior member for Halifax, who is parliamentary secretary to the minister, has a somewhat similar situation in the area he represents. We continually hear complaints from the maritimes that they have a problem quite similar to the one to which I have referred in connection with northern Ontario. As one of his colleagues has mentioned, assistance is going to have to be given.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business is for tomorrow and the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: The objective is to complete the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, those of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources which have been under consideration earlier and those of the Department of Fisheries during the course of this week. If we conclude earlier than six o'clock on Saturday, I am sure the house will be pleased to rise.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a good touch.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

ST. JEAN, QUE.—BUSINESS ESTABLISHMENT R.C.A.F. BASE

Question No. 127—Mr. Dupuis:

1. Is there a business establishment on the Royal Canadian Air Force base at St. Jean, Quebec, operated by a person who is not a member of the Royal Canadian Air Force?
2. If so, where is such establishment located, and what is the name of the person in charge?
3. What kinds of goods are offered for sale by the said establishment?
4. Since what date has this business been carried on?
5. By whom was this merchant granted leave to occupy these government premises and to do business therein?
6. What rent has been asked for the said premises?
7. Were public tenders invited before renting the said premises?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes.

2. Building 124, Mr. Albert Vilandre.

3. Bottled soft drink dispensing service, automatic photo machine, ice cream bar vending machines, coin operated weight scales, cigarette vending machines, candy vending machines and a popcorn making machine.

4. August, 1955.

5. Concession authorized by memorandum of agreement between Her Majesty the Queen and Mr. Vilandre and the estate of the late Mr. Emile Hachez.

6. $93.75 per month payable to the Receiver General of Canada.

7. The present memorandum of agreement is a renewal of a previous agreement made in 1955. It was renewed in May 1960 due to the death of Mr. Hachez. Due to the time interval and changes of station personnel it cannot be determined if tenders were invited before the original agreement was negotiated.

C.N.R. LINE, FARNHAM, QUE.

Question No. 192—Mr. Fisher:

1. Does or did the Canadian National Railways have a rail line from Meigs in Farnham, P.Q., to the old station in Farnham which crossed Charbonneau street, Berard street, and Park avenue? If so, when was the line built, and at what cost?
2. What scheduled trains, if any, ran on the line?
3. Is the line still in use? If not, what disposal was made of it?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. The Canadian national has a line of railway from Meigs in Farnham to the old Farnham station. It used to cross Main, Charbonneau, Park avenue, Berard and St. Louis streets. It now crosses Main, St. Louis, Depot and Meigs streets. Original track was built 1858-1860, and was placed in operation in 1861. However, records are not available as to its original cost. It was originally known as Chambly, Shefford and Stanstead railroad. The original track was relocated and some track retirements were made to provide a new entrance to the Farnham station, which is the reason for the old and new street crossings.

2. There have been no major operational revisions within the past 10 years. Present schedule—Nos. 713 and 714—mixed train—daily except Sunday, runs from Granby to Farnham and return.

3. Line is still in use.

C.N.R. LAY-OFFS, SIOUX LOOKOUT

Question No. 194—Mr. Fisher:

1. Are there any plans to reduce the working force of the Canadian National Railways at Sioux Lookout through lay-offs in the next six weeks?
2. If so, how many men will be affected?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. No.
2. Not applicable.

COUNTY OF ESSEX—REQUESTS FOR DESIGNATION AS DOUBLE DEPRECIATION AREAS

Question No. 201—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has a request been received from the county of Essex, province of Ontario, to be designated as a double depreciation area?
2. If so, what action has been taken on the request?
3. Has a request been received from the city of Windsor, Ontario, to be designated as a double depreciation area?
4. If so, what action has been taken on this request?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. Yes.

2. A report on this application has been prepared and is under active consideration.

3. Yes.

4. A report on this application has been prepared and is under active consideration.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 4, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

STANDING ORDERS

Tenth report of standing committee on standing orders—Miss Aitken.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LENGTH OF RACE MEETINGS AND NUMBER OF RACES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-89 to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I, in addressing a question to the Prime Minister, presume it is a fact that he has received the report of Professor Bladen, the royal commissioner inquiring into the state of the automobile industry. If this is the case, in view of the importance of this report to the riding I represent in this house, may I ask the Prime Minister when we may expect that this report will be tabled?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): In due course, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I ask the Prime Minister to answer the first part of my question. Is it a fact that he has received the report?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The answer I gave indicated that I had.

[Later:]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, now that the Prime Minister has indicated that he has the Bladen commission report, may I ask him whether it is the intention of the government to withhold this report from the house until after the Department of Trade and Commerce estimates have been passed? These estimates are now under discussion, and this report should now be before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the report of the Bladen royal commission has nothing to do with the Department of Trade and Commerce. I should consider that it is mainly concerned with fiscal matters and the like.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the Prime Minister not realize that the automobile industry is a very—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Both the question and the answer are more in the nature of a debate as to the relevancy of this report, and not appropriate for the orders of the day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I, on a point of order and with great respect, suggest that this is such a vital matter that a question of this kind should be dealt with. Surely I am entitled to ask the Prime Minister whether he does not think that this matter affecting the automobile industry is one involving a matter of trade as well as one of concern to the Department of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked the question and received an answer. In my view both the question and the answer were opinions and not questions of fact.

DRUGS

BARBITURATES—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the hon. gentleman yet in a position to advise the house what action is planned to meet the growing problem of goof balls?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have been investigating this situation for some months in co-operation with my colleague the Minister of Justice. As I advised the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean, an interdepartmental committee was formed to assess the various courses of action open to us, and I hope to present appropriate amendments to the Food and Drugs Act to the house very soon.

PROPOSED LIMITATION OF PRODUCTION OF NARCOTICS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, of which I gave notice. Is the minister in a position to inform the house whether there will be any early ratification by Canada of the new narcotics treaty agreed upon by the 108 nations represented at the recent narcotics conference called by the world health organization at the United Nations, in which Canada played such a prominent part?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, a formal copy of the single convention on this subject was received from the United Nations only within the past few days. The contents are now being reviewed with regard to possible ratification by Canada, a course that I feel sure will be followed.

PRODUCTIVITY COUNCIL

INQUIRY AS TO UNION REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I should like to ask the minister whether any consideration is being given to the inclusion of representatives of the major industrial unions on the productivity council.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I could not understand the hon. member's question and would ask that he repeat it, or suggest that I could take it as notice and provide an answer tomorrow.

Mr. Badanai: I should like to ask the minister whether any consideration is being given to the inclusion of representatives of the major industrial unions on the productivity council.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker. They are represented by Mr. Jodoin, the head of the Canadian Labour Congress and others.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORTED DENIAL OF DAY'S BENEFITS TO UNEMPLOYED DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received information to the effect that notwithstanding his assurance given to members of the unemployed delegation who visited Ottawa ten days ago, they have been deprived of their unemployment insurance benefits for the day of that visit?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I have turned the correspondence over to the unemployment insurance commission in an attempt to discover whether there is anything in the act which will enable us to settle this matter satisfactorily.

Miss LaMarsh: I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister assure the house that those individuals who have already been deprived of the day's benefits will have those benefits reinstated?

Mr. Starr: I cannot give that assurance until I receive a report from the unemployment insurance commission.

THE SENATE

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE REFORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Following a press report which appeared in the Montreal Star to the effect that upper house reforms are expected soon in the United Kingdom, is the Prime Minister in a position to say whether similar reforms can be expected here?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is perhaps not asking a question of great urgency in view of the history of the subject. In any event, I think he is asking for a declaration of policy. I do not wish to prevent the Prime Minister from answering, but in my view that is not a proper question for orders of the day.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order you have raised, I suggest that this is one promise made three years ago.

Mr. Speaker: That fact does not support the hon. member's case.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, this did seem to be a matter of urgency in 1957, and four years have now passed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to answer the question, but the hon. gentleman raised a point of order and I might say that I recall very well the election of 1925 when Mr. Mackenzie King stated that if he was returned to power the Senate would be reformed immediately.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—INQUIRY AS TO SAFETY OF CANADIAN MISSIONARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could he inform the house as to whether the government has taken measures to ensure the safety of Canadian missionaries in Cuba?

(Text):

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with this question briefly yesterday. Since then we have received no further report, but our embassy in Havana will certainly do anything it can to protect those Canadians.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Does the government intend to make any protest against the statement made by Premier Castro with regard to priests and others in Cuba, including Canadian priests, to whom he referred as scoundrels? Surely this country should protest to the Cuban government, whose members were referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as good fellows.

Mr. Green: As I pointed out yesterday to the hon. member for Essex East, it is my belief that the statement made by Premier Castro referred to the Spanish born clergy. Certainly there is not very much point in stirring up a lot of trouble if that is the case. When we know the actual situation we shall certainly take the appropriate measures.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Those, too, are not scoundrels.

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can confirm the report that there has been a cease fire arranged in the Laotian matter. Is it a fact that the truce commission on which Canada is represented is now moving from Delhi? Perhaps the minister could also say whether the truce commission will exercise any powers other than that of determining whether there has been a cease fire.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the cease fire in Laos does appear to have become effective. As yet there have been no instructions from the two co-chairmen of the Geneva conference, namely the United Kingdom and the Soviet union, to the supervisory commission authorizing them to proceed to Laos. I am not yet in a position, either, to say what additional responsibilities will be placed on the shoulders of the members of the truce commission.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PICTOU, N.S.—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF WORK FOR SHIPYARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister, arising out of a serious unemployment situation in Pictou, Nova Scotia. In view of a recent letter from Mr. MacPhail, secretary of local 4702 of the united steel workers of America, addressed to the Prime Minister and dated April 24, pointing out existing unemployment in the shipyard of Ferguson Industries Limited, can the Prime Minister use his good offices to obtain a refit or a conversion for the Pictou shipyard, as requested in the letter?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): As the distribution of refits and repairs comes under the Minister of Defence Production, I am looking into the matter to see what can be done for Ferguson Industries.

Mr. Argue: Will the minister give a report to the house after he has made his inquiry?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Speaker, when I have a report from my shipbuilding branch as to the work going on at the present time at Ferguson Industries Limited and on what can be done at Ferguson's, I shall certainly report to the house.

PROPOSED JOINT CANADA-U.S. ORGANIZATION TO SOLVE UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Does the minister have a reply to my question of April 27 concerning the formation of a joint committee between Canada and the United States to find solutions to the unemployment problem?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Ann asked his question the other day while I was not in the house. It had to do with a press report that a joint organization had been set up by Canada and the United States to deal with unemployment. At the outset I wish to say that no formal organization of any kind was set up. Informal discussions took place while I was in Washington, and further exchanges of information have been provided for in the future.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO FRENCH SPEAKING MEMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State. Is he aware that there is no French speaking representative on the advisory committee of the Glassco commission? If so, will be the Secretary of State see that this situation is corrected?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I read in this morning's paper the report mentioned by the hon. member. First of all, I must tell him that Mr. Therien is the French speaking representative on the Glassco commission. I understand, however, that the hon. member refers to a sub-committee. I shall make inquiries, therefore, and provide an answer for my hon. friend as soon as I get the required information.

PUBLIC WORKS

PORT RENFREW, B.C.—REQUEST FOR CONSTRUCTION OF BREAKWATER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works, of which I have given notice. Is the minister in a position to reply to the urgent submission sent him from various organizations emphasizing the need for immediate consideration and action on the construction of a breakwater at Port Renfrew, San Juan bay, on Vancouver island?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I have been urged to construct a breakwater at Port Renfrew, San Juan bay, on Vancouver island, in conferences with Mr. George Chatterton who is, I believe, the reeve of Saanich. Within the past few days his representations have been supported by a brief signed by several organizations, and I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that careful consideration is being given to this matter. Government engineers are engaged in arriving at a decision on the facts, and in due course I will be very happy to inform the house.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO BORDER CROSSINGS BY UNDESIRABLE PERSONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Will the parliamentary secretary advise the house whether the department has taken any steps to restrict the wanderings of race track touts, hoodlums, bookmakers, con men and other undesirables across the Canada-United States border?

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I will take notice of the hon. member's question.

COMBINES

DRUGS—INQUIRY AS TO HOLDING OF PUBLIC HEARING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on April 28 I asked the following question in the absence of the Minister of Justice:

> In view of the news reports that the combines branch of the Department of Justice has just completed a report on an inquiry into Canadian drug prices which indicates that Canada's drug prices are the highest in the world, and in view of the great interest in and importance of this matter, does the restrictive trade practices commission intend to hold public hearings on this question in the near future?

The Solicitor General replied that he would take the question as notice and bring it to the attention of the Minister of Justice. Has the Minister of Justice considered this question, and can he give us a reply?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. gentleman will find that his question was covered fairly completely in the reply I gave to an oral question yesterday dealing with the same matter. The decision whether or not to hold public hearings is entirely one for the chairman of the restrictive trade practices commission. The act specifically provides that he and he alone determines whether hearings will be public, and so far he has given no indication that he intends to hold public hearings.

TELEVISION

SASKATOON—RECOMMENDATION OF BOARD OF GOVERNORS RESPECTING LOCATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Transport to convey to the Minister of Transport a request for an answer at the earliest possible time to the question about the Kindersley satellite station for television purposes, to which question the minister had planned to give an answer on Tuesday and was unable to reply, I believe, because he was not in the house at the time.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am advised by those around me that the minister gave the answer to that question yesterday.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the minister very much. I glanced hastily through Hansard and did not see it. I am sorry to have taken up the time of the house needlessly.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

394. Departmental administration, including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates (also includes the national industrial design council transferred from the national gallery), $3,275,445.

The Chairman: This item will be found at page 74 of the blue book, the details at page 507.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have a question to put to the minister. I have been absent from Ottawa for a few days, but I read the minister's initial statement to the committee. Anything that has been done to increase Canadian exports to other countries is most welcome. My remarks are related to the field of industrial as well as agricultural products.

The contracts for the sale of Canadian products abroad, whether grain sales through the Canadian wheat board or sales of steel produced in Canadian mills, are contracts signed by the agencies involved. The minister's department, through the trade commissioners, has taken a very active interest in promoting Canadian trade and exports of all kinds. I should like from the minister an indication of what is involved in a general sense in trade commissioners promoting the sale of Canadian products. If it is possible for him to do so I should like the minister to inform the committee what part the trade commissioners play in the sale of grain, and whether any part was played by the commissioners in the preliminary stages preceding the signing of the grain agreement recently negotiated with China.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to answer that question. In many cases our trade commissioners make the initial contacts for Canadian firms which are anxious to sell in foreign markets. The trade commissioners give Canadian firms preliminary information regarding freight rates, tariffs and information concerning other pertinent matters before a deal is consummated. If necessary the trade commissioners act as interpreters between the Canadian businessman and the foreign customer. As I said yesterday in committee, the trade commissioners do everything except actually sign the deal. They may be compared with a catalyst in a chemical reaction which does everything except actually make the reaction.

Regarding sales of wheat, to which the hon. member for Assiniboia has referred, our trade commissioners are very active in the preliminary contacts with the government agencies of the foreign governments concerned. They act on behalf of the wheat board in the same way they do on behalf of Canadian business companies. In the case of the recent deal signed with China, our trade commissioners were very active indeed in making the initial contact and helping line up the deal.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I very much appreciate getting that information from the minister, because it means that the specific details of any contract, whether it be entered into by a private company or by the Canadian wheat board, are signed by the company involved. But as the minister himself said, the trade commissioners, as I would think they should, do everything in the promotion of these sales except sign on the dotted line.

I was very much interested in the statement about the sale of additional grain to China. The minister has at this time referred to the role his department played in this contract, as well as having referred to it on April 28. With regard to this sale of Canadian grain, as with a private sale if it should have been a private sale by any company, I wish to make it clear that we are in favour of this kind of increased trade in non-military products, no matter what the political complexion of the government involved.

If we are to hope that in the future these governments which are so much different than ours may come closer to the road to freedom, the way to encourage this, in our judgment, is to undertake this kind of agreement and negotiate a trade in non-strategic materials. We are happy that this is done with China, with Cuba or any other country, even though we may object very violently to the particular form of government in those countries.

A great deal has been said about this grain deal which was announced in the house on May 2. I read the reports in the western newspapers. I do not think any transaction has been undertaken in the field of trade which has been given more widespread or more favourable publicity than this particular transaction. I read all the reports I was able to find in all the different newspapers. I read that it was a sale of 186 million bushels of wheat and 46 million bushels of barley; that the sale was worth $362 million, and it would take place between June 1 this year and December, 1963. In my comments I was just as much in favour of it as any hon. member in this house. The president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool went so far as to say that this solved the grain problem for the farmers; that this would mean that the surplus of grain would be moved off the farms.

I was astounded to read the provisions of this agreement when I went over them in Hansard as set forth by the minister. I have never seen an instance in my experience in the house—and I think other members of parliament will agree—when the press gallery failed to see a joker in an announcement; and there is a big joker in this announcement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: This is a firm agreement for the sale of 28 million bushels of wheat, 17 million bushels of barley and 1.5 million bushels transferred or related into flour. After that there is no firm agreement. There is certainly no firm agreement on behalf of China or the China Resources Company. As far as the future is concerned, these are the minister's words:

> Each future contract will be negotiated in respect to price and quantity.

I put it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that there is no guarantee, in this agreement which has been announced, for sales beyond the 28 million bushels of wheat. This is not what it has been dressed up to mean, a firm sale within a period from now to December, 1963, of these huge quantities of grain. I think in making the announcement the minister was really putting his public relations people to work, because they have blown up and exaggerated this agreement almost beyond recognition.

There is something firm in the agreement. It is firm, as I understand it. I should like to read the agreement; I think it should be produced.

An hon. Member: What good will that do you?

Mr. Argue: As I read the statement there is something firm in it. I will read the minister's words:

> We have committed ourselves to provide up to six million tons of barley, wheat and flour.

That is the main agreement. Canada has been committed to provide but China is not committed to purchase that quantity, to say nothing about the price. We had an experience in the uranium industry. Letters of intent were exchanged which seemed pretty firm. There is nothing nearly as firm in this agreement. I cannot see, from reading this agreement anything as firm as there was in the uranium deal. The uranium deal is not too firm at the moment, but it was certainly much firmer to begin with than this agreement.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): This sounds like sour grapes.

Mr. Argue: I am just telling the truth, and these are the facts.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): It is your truth.

Mr. Argue: I put it to the minister that all that has been done in this agreement is that Canada agrees to keep the grain available, and China may or may not buy it. This is a storage policy for 158 million bushels, because 28 million bushels are being sold. This will provide for the storage within Canada of 158 million bushels of wheat earmarked for China, available to China, but of which China does not undertake to take delivery.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is a shocking line of reasoning for a Saskatchewan member of parliament.

Mr. Argue: Never mind the line; these happen to be the facts. These facts have not been in the newspapers. These facts were not made very clear in the house. The hon. member for Acadia does not think of the facts.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): They were announced in the house and I heard them. You didn't; you were not even here.

Mr. Argue: An announcement was made in the house and there was a press conference held afterward. Every newspaper says, "Terrific. We have made a deal for $362 million worth of grain". No such deal was made, none whatsoever.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Strictly sour grapes.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Trade and Commerce may point out where I am in error, if he can. I challenge him to do it. I say the only thing which is firm in this agreement is that Canada undertakes to keep the grain in storage, available to China, but China does not agree to buy it. This is the flimsiest kind of transaction I have ever heard of. We used to have a wheat agreement with Britain. It was firm as to quantity; it was firm as to minimum price—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): We lost $600 million on it.

Mr. Argue: Yes, sure; but we had these clauses in the agreement. There is nothing in this agreement even as firm as there was in that one.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Look at the—

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor. My friend can make a speech when I sit down, and I will be very interested to hear it.

The Chairman: Order. I ask hon. members to allow the hon. member who has the floor to express his views.

Mr. Argue: I can understand the sensitivity of hon. members, because even the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool thinks this is going to take all the grain off the farms and sweep all the granaries clean—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You are afraid it will.

Mr. Argue: —and he has been sold a bill of goods. I hope the granaries are swept clean from sales, and not because of drought.

Mr. Pascoe: Can I ask the speaker a question?

Mr. Argue: I would love it.

Mr Pascoe: Is the hon. member for Assiniboia attacking this agreement on behalf of the New party or personally?

Mr. Argue: That is what you get from members on the opposite side. No contribution to the debate, no statement—

Mr. Drysdale: And no answer.

Mr. Argue: We should like to hear from the minister on behalf of the government whether or not $362 million worth of Canadian grain will be sold, and I say there is no such assurance and no such agreement. In the past this government has turned down an opportunity to sell on a contract basis, on a loan and partial cash basis, any part of 586 million bushels of grain, an opportunity which was picked up by the United States and the grain provided by the United States. I am in favour of selling to communist China; I have made that clear, but I do not think we have to lean over backward in a one-sided deal. We shall keep it in storage. We shall keep it available. The farmers will have the cost of storing it on the farms; the national treasury will have the cost of storing another part of it under the storage program. China may or may not buy, but we shall keep it available.

This is the most one-sided agreement I have ever seen. I have been making inquiries, and I am confident that China has not agreed in a firm manner to buy a single bushel of wheat beyond the 28 million bushels to be delivered between June 1 and November 30. We have agreed that if China wants the wheat we shall have it. We may have it, all right.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I should like to ask the hon. member whether he is against this deal that we have completed with China.

Mr. Argue: I have made my position clear. I am against this thing being blown up as a firm agreement when it is no such thing. I am against false publicity, and I am against the farmers of western Canada being shown what could turn out to be a hoax unless the Minister of Trade and Commerce—and he is the minister who can do it—assures us that communist China will buy this quantity of grain and that Canada is prepared to sell it no matter what price communist China may offer and will pay. I am suggesting that this is just another of those areas where this government is operating by hiring public relations people to put something in the best possible light from the standpoint of the government, but not necessarily very close to the hard facts and the substance of what is involved.

Let us be perfectly clear about this. This is no firm transaction for the sale of 186 million bushels of wheat. This is just what it is not. This is a firm transaction for 28 million bushels of wheat. Beyond that China commits herself to nothing. The Canadian government says it has a storage plan under which we shall have the balance of 158 million bushels available if China should decide to buy it on the basis of future contracts, when both price and quantity will be under negotiation.

Mr. Johnson: Now that the hon. member for Assiniboia has completed his comments I believe the committee will not mind if I take this opportunity, the first I have, to congratulate the new Minister of Trade and Commerce.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I have always admired the former minister of transport. I hope you will not mind if I take this opportunity to congratulate him although the minister is a veteran of the cabinet on his appointment as Minister of Trade and Commerce.

In the last few months, it has been repeatedly said that the province of Quebec is on the go. If the province of Quebec is on the go and if the rest of the country is on the go, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) can claim part of the credit for it, because it is due to his efforts and his marvellous talent for organization.

Instead of indulging in pointless and groundless criticism of the type we have just heard a few moments ago from the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), I shall just take a few seconds of the time of the house to place before the Minister of Trade and Commerce a suggestion which has repeatedly been made to me by experts in commission sales.

It has been suggested to me repeatedly by experienced salesmen that I ask the government to try hiring people to sell on a commission basis on behalf of Canada in our trade commissioner service abroad. I think such a move would produce practical results, because there would be an incentive for such agents to sell more.

I know things are not done that way under the present system, but perhaps amendments might be made to the legal foundations of the department before hiring such salesmen to represent Canada abroad, whether they be paid on a commission basis by the companies doing the business, or by the government.

In any event, even if it required amendments to the Civil Service Act and to the government's hiring practices, I think it would yield practical results.

I therefore place this suggestion before the minister, and I leave it to the Department of Trade and Commerce to organize such a system and put it into operation. I do think the idea has merit and that it should gain acceptance or at least be thoroughly examined by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

(Text):

Mr. Macdonnell: I have a few brief remarks which I intend to make at this time. It is a mere platitude to say how important trade is to our country, both externally and internally. We have been listening to comments on one important incident of trade. Another aspect we should not overlook is not merely material aspect but the extent to which it indicates that interdependence which, I suppose, is the best hope we have of peace. We ought to welcome it in every way and in every place we can find it.

I suppose when we look back to the nineteenth century it is clear that the peacefulness which, in the main, characterized that century was largely due to the influence of Britain and, most of all, to Britain's free trade policy, which one might say spanned the world and did so much to make people live happily together. Since then we have had a half century which in some ways seems almost like a mad period. We have encountered difficulties in the sphere of trade and elsewhere which call for new qualities, qualities which perhaps we have never had to show before except in time of war.

I should like to read a sentence or two from that great public servant, as I regard him, Adlai Stevenson, who seems not only to think clearly about these matters but to have a wonderful gift for expressing himself:

> What lies ahead of us in this bewildering century is invisible but it may be even more significant. In the past the north Atlantic nations dominated the world. But they could not control themselves, and after their great world wars the power and influence of Europe declined; Russia and the United States suddenly emerged as the two dominant powers. Already the brief day of two power domination is passing and new centres of power are rising from old ashes in Asia.

Let me repeat these important words:

> —new centres of power are rising from old ashes in Asia.

This is something we should all be taking most seriously. He goes on to say:

> By the end of the century China and India will be industrialized, and China's population will be close to a billion.

Then he says:

> To guide us through these uncharted seas, to comprehend and direct prodigious forces now shaping the new world, is going to make heavy demands on our resources of wisdom, leadership, self-discipline and magnanimity.

Let me call your attention again to these words:

> —wisdom, leadership, self-discipline and magnanimity.

Let me now come closer home and use words which should come directly to the mind of each of us, because they come from a man of ability in private industry who has been drafted into public service in an important capacity. I refer to Mr. George de Young, chairman of the productivity council. He used words which I found a bit startling but which no one should disregard. He said:

> Passive confidence—

Note the word "passive".

> Passive confidence in our now disproved technological and economical superiority, and continued factional and segmental rivalry have resulted in Canada's economy no longer being able to provide work for all its own people through private enterprise.

Mr. de Young has been on a mission to the European economic community, and he has the following to say about that:

> The mission concluded that government, business and labour in Canada must immediately adjust to this vital new economic area, check rising costs here, and achieve maximum utilization of resources, skills and manpower.

Our own Minister of Trade and Commerce has been speaking plainly to us about this. He used an illustration in regard to our own performance here which I found interesting, coming from him. He said we had gone soft, and compared us to a boxer who had gone soft. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was once a boxer himself and I would rather he boxed with other individuals than me, because in his day he was a formidable individual at a strange place called Cambridge. The minister has talked plainly when he has spoken and has not pulled any punches in telling us what we need to do.

The same can be said of his deputy, who was speaking the other day in Montreal when he used words which I wish to read. He said this:

> —problems and challenges in the economic and trade field, which stand in the doorway to our future. We must be concerned with these challenges today, for the future is tomorrow, and it is in the future that we, and our children, will be spending the rest of our lives.

Then he had this to say:

> I am sure none of you are under any illusions about the difficulties and frustrations which face us. The economies of western Europe and Asia have been rebuilt.

I repeat the word "rebuilt". He went on to say:

> We are confronted with bitter competition from many countries equally as hungry as we are, for a bigger share of world markets. Goods from the United Kingdom, West Germany, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands and Japan, for example, are competing with our own in foreign markets and even in our own back yard. These goods, produced in new factories equipped with the most modern machinery and by highly skilled workers, whose wage rates are lower than those in Canada, are of excellent quality and design. In many cases they are lower in price.

The Department of Trade and Commerce has done much. I believe that the conference held here late last autumn accomplished a great deal, first of all in stimulating and encouraging our own trade commissioners and, second, by stimulating and directing the efforts of our exporters. The problem of unemployment is still serious, but there is no mystery about it; none whatever. We had a boom; some people say it began in 1935 and some say it began in 1940, but at any rate it lasted until after the middle of the 1950's. Then it flattened out a bit, but it has not turned into a depression. We are still doing well, as was reported in the Winnipeg Free Press some months ago. That article referred to a curious situation where we had substantial unemployment in the midst of prosperity.

This is a strange new phenomenon. I think the reasons for it are perfectly clear. At the time the boom flattened out a bit, competition from abroad increased enormously. Western European nations, as we know, were given a flying start, which really gave business a fresh start under the Marshall plan. The workmen there realized that their own hard work would produce benefit for themselves, and I think perhaps they have that sense more strongly than we in this country have. At the same time other things happened, such as automation. Further, many individuals were leaving farms because one man on a farm could grow many times that which could be grown before. We had all these influences occurring at the same time.

I think everyone will agree that at the present time what we need more than anything else is increased world trade. I was very interested in speaking with an acute observer a few weeks ago who made an interesting remark about our own country, looking back over 60 years. He pointed out that in the early years of this century our economy was sparked by a railway boom. After that we had the motor car industry boom, which this man described as being now in what he called a state of high level stagnation. He next pointed out that we then had the chemical industry boom, followed by an electronic industry boom and, one might add, the boom resulting from two wars. This man went on to say that he thought the next economic impulse in our country must come from raising economic conditions in underdeveloped countries.

This is the subject I want to speak about now. I have done so before, and as long as Mr. Speaker will allow me and while there is breath in me I will continue to do so, because I believe this is the most important thing which faces us now. I think we are not alive to it. I do not flatter myself that my words are going to change the minds of the people, but I should hope that the press would take more interest in it. A few of the better newspapers have done so already, but I think this subject should appear in every newspaper. However, this is just my own opinion.

I would like to refer now to the experience we had 15 years ago, in 1946, when we made a loan of $1,250 million to Great Britain. I would like to refer to what was said at that time by the then minister in his speech introducing this subject. He said that this loan would be just as much in our own interests as in the interests of the people to whom it was being made. As a matter of fact, that advance to the people of Britain in 1946 was followed by the purchase of hundreds of millions of dollars of our exports and was of great assistance to us in those years after the war.

I would like to make a point now that I have made here before, because it seems to me to illustrate the trade advantage derived from this kind of thing. That is, trade is aid, or aid is trade, whichever way you like to put it. Some years ago when we made a gift —I am not talking about gifts now but about loans—under the Colombo plan of some $35 million, 95 per cent was in the form of manufactured goods, which represented Canadian employment. We did not ship barrels of dollars over to India.

We now have a new impulse from President Kennedy. His views may not rank quite as high today as they did a month ago, but after all, any man can make a mistake and recover from it. Anyone who has read his statement to congress will agree that it was a great document indeed and showed a constructive attitude. One of the great things he did was to point out that if aid to those countries is going to be effective it must be done not year by year but based on several years—he suggested five—so it can be used in a planned way.

Then I come to that great paper we all respect, the London Economist. It is a very conservative paper, and I mean conservative with a small "c". I think it is full of realism and experience. I was very interested in what it had to say about assistance. It made one or two very practical suggestions. It referred to the meeting of the development assistance group which took place in London about a month ago. This is what it said:

> What the Americans would like each of their allies to do is to commit itself to give definite amounts of assistance, and to co-ordinate individual national programs in some international new deal designed to capture the imagination of the world.

That, of course, is what is necessary. Next, the Economist speaks of the dramatic effect which would be caused if a lead were given in Europe. Then it adds this:

> Now, in short, is the historic opportunity for Mr. Macmillan to make a speech that could launch a whole new conception of international economic relations, and for people here to start thinking about the best form that a world aid scheme could take.

I have no time to deal with the details of what the Economist said, but I want to draw attention to one thing which I think is very practical. What they have in mind is a loan for five years at a time. They point out that the contributions would not have to be made from tax appropriations immediately. They say:

> The strain that these contributions would impose would then fall upon the contributing countries only as they were used—mainly—

And note this:

> —mainly in order to buy their capital equipment or the services of some of their technicians.

In other words the loan would be spent at home. Then the Economist remarks shrewdly enough:

> This "strain" would thus show itself at first in the form of a recorded increase in the donor country's export surplus, which is not the sort of strain that usually causes great difficulties.

They are saying the same thing that I said a moment ago about our Colombo plan contribution, namely that it represented Canadian employment. The Economist also suggests that the international monetary fund could assist in the problem of foreign exchange which will arise. I hope to go into that matter again later this session, indeed to bring it up again when I have the chance, but I quote the Economist as a witness of proven experience, of common sense and realism. Its comments should indicate that this is not pie in the sky but is common sense and good business.

I have already referred the committee to our own experience in 1946 when the minister of finance, in speaking on this billion and a quarter dollar credit, said:

> The need for a credit of this magnitude and on these terms springs not only from the effects of the war upon Britain, but also from the vital importance to Canada of the re-establishment, expansion and continued development of foreign trade.

That is what we did in 1946. It succeeded then and there is no reason why it cannot succeed today.

I am not going to take up too much of the time of the committee, but I do want to refer to the great world figures who have studied this matter, who are giving their lives to it and whose opinions I believe are more valuable than any other opinions we can get. I refer to Hoffman, Black and Adlai Stevenson. I prescribe for hon. members a course of reading of some of the things they have written. Until we have read what they have to say I suggest we are not in any position to make up our minds. I have a pamphlet by Adlai Stevenson which I think is one of the most important bits of reading I have done. I am going to see whether I can get our mechanical staff to make some copies, and if I can I am going to take the liberty of putting them in the post office boxes of hon. members.

Again, without giving figures, I want to remind the committee of what I said before. Paul Hoffman gives astronomical figures as to what will be done in the way of foreign trade if we raise the buying power of the underdeveloped countries, those hundreds of millions of people who go to bed hungry every night. Do not let us forget that if we raised their purchasing power, that is the per capita income, by even a dollar a year over the next 10 years the results would be astronomical.

I should like to refer to another matter with which I was greatly struck in reading the Prime Minister's speech at the United Nations last September, a speech which caused such world-wide interest. At that time he had a good deal to say about the new states coming into existence. He said:

> Since the war 14 colonies and territories comprising half a billion people have achieved complete freedom within the commonwealth.

I learned also that France had also given independence to 14 colonies. But this political independence is going to be a barren and negative thing unless economic independence goes with it. We have this whole flock of new countries which are now aware of their miserable conditions. I noticed the other day that a far eastern statesman was in the United States. He was talking to the big producers of radio and television in Hollywood. He accused them of being revolutionaries, because he said that for the first time these producers in Hollywood had made clear to the people of the underdeveloped countries the terrible plight they were in, although it is hard to believe it is true that they had not realized it before.

I think it is fair to consider the urgent need from the point of view of the underdeveloped countries in the commonwealth. I talked about India before. I shall not take the time of the committee now, but I do want to say this. Serious, competent people who have come back from India after months of study have said that she is entitled to assistance on economic grounds. Some of them are bankers. Three, including Sir Oliver Franks, head of one of the big British banks, representing leading world banks, came back from India and said she was entitled to assistance. Others have done so as well, including those I have mentioned.

I am not going to take more time. I make no apologies for bringing this up again. I believe it is something that we should all be interested in. I believe it to be in our own interest, just as it proved to be in 1946. Plans made then paid off abundantly. For that reason I put it in this way. I am not able to believe, and I do not find men whose opinions I value most saying, that there are any clear indications that we shall be able to deal with the problem of unemployment unless by a substantial increase in the mass of world trade. I find scarcely anyone who disagrees with this. Also, what I read from the deputy minister makes it very clear that the difficult competition we face from the western European nations makes our problem that much greater. The minister made this clear also. The western European nations have come back in a big way with what I call a flying start. Of course people are entitled to reach their own conclusions, but the stock market at the present time seems to believe that things are on the uptrend; it has a hunch that everything is going to be all right. People are busy climbing on the bandwagon. This seems to me to indicate there is every reason to believe that it is in our own interest—I do not think the minister will disagree with this for a minute; indeed, I am sure he has said it—to insist on an increase in world trade.

I pause on the moral argument. If we had those miserable people living within our sight we could not stand it, of course. Being compassionate people we would act on that basis. I am not going to deal with that today, or with the political side.

Of course from the political side we should be deeply concerned. We should be deeply concerned about helping these people so that they can work out their economic salvation by the institutions of freedom and not by the institutions of totalitarianism.

One only needs to pause a moment to realize how much that means to us. I have quoted before in the house from the book by Chester Bowles, one-time ambassador to India, his reference to a conversation he had with an Indian statesman who said to him, "You people, whether or not you like it, are in competition with the communists. First of all, you are in competition because we are going to ask whether you are making more rapid economic progress than they are. Second, you are in competition because we are going to compare the help we get from them with the help we get from you." We cannot overlook that for one moment. The same man said to Bowles, "Of course, if India goes the whole of southeast Asia goes".

I leave this with the house and I ask hon. members to consider it. I shall try to place the speech by Stevenson in hon. members' hands, and I would beg hon. members to read it. I do not believe anyone who reads it will fail to be impressed with the urgency and the importance of reaching the right decision on this question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have been very much moved by the remarks we have just listened to by the hon. member for Greenwood in what was a truly Liberal speech. I would remind the hon. gentleman that in times past he has talked about strengthening the opposition in the house, and I assure him that if he feels he can contribute to the strengthening of the opposition there is always a light in the window for him on this side of the house.

Indeed, it might be a very useful thing for the hon. member to be associated with those who originated the policies he commended so highly today. I thank him for his commendation of the courageous things that were done by Mr. Mackenzie King, Mr. Ilsley and Mr. St. Laurent in 1946, because it did take courage at that time. The loan to Britain and the other loans that were made at that time were not made with the unanimous approval of everyone in the country. It was a policy that required courage and fortitude, a policy that was attacked in certain parts of this country, particularly, I regret to have to recall, by the friends of the hon. gentleman in one part of the country under the slogan, "Les Libéraux donnent aux étrangers, Duplessis donne à sa province".

Notwithstanding that kind of appeal, the majority of the Canadian people in every province approved this policy. We have been able to build on it and I think Canada, under whichever government has been in office, has no reason to apologize for what has been done in this field of aid for underdeveloped countries. I think we have given a lead both in measures for the restoration of trade and in the inauguration and building up of the Colombo plan; and, because of the high respect in which the hon. gentleman is held not merely in this house but in many parts of the country, I sincerely trust his remarks will fall on listening ears and not on deaf ears.

Mr. Macdonnell: If I may have one moment, Mr. Chairman, I wish, of course, to repudiate the suggestion of the hon. gentleman that whenever one says anything that he considers sensible it is a Liberal remark. However, I was reassured when he said before he sat down that both parties had reason to take satisfaction from their attitude in this matter, and I think that is true. I have never been at pains to deny the Liberal party whatever credit is due them, but I am certainly at pains to point out that the party to which I belong has shown itself broad, tolerant and constructive in these matters for many years.

Mr. Hees: I should like to thank the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville and the hon. member for Greenwood for the very constructive remarks they have made this morning. I should also like to comment briefly on the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia. In doing so I should like to quote a paragraph from the statement of the Minister of Agriculture when he spoke in the house a day or two ago about the wheat agreement with China. As found on page 4205 of Hansard he said:

> I have made it clear that there is a long term agreement. Under that agreement one contract has been signed. Each future contract will be negotiated in respect to price and quantity.

In speaking this morning the hon. member for Assiniboia, it seemed to me, tried to make out that the Minister of Agriculture had in some way misled the house as to what amount was in this agreement. I think it is evident from my quotation of the minister's words that he made it very clear exactly what this agreement is. On behalf of the government may I say that we believe this agreement is a good agreement, one which will benefit greatly our wheat and grain farmers and the Canadian economy as a whole. From the words of the hon. member for Assiniboia it is quite clear that if he and his party were the government of Canada today they would not have signed this agreement, with its great benefits to the farmers of Canada and to the Canadian economy as a whole.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I am exceedingly disappointed by the statement of the minister, because it confirms in a very real way all the suspicions I have had about the agreement. No one has complained about the government signing an agreement. I am not even complaining about the signing of this agreement, although I have not seen it and think it should be produced. I am complaining, however, about the very misleading terms in which the minister referred to this agreement.

This is the history of sales to China this year. On February 2 there was an announcement by the government of the sale of 40 million bushels of wheat and barley valued at $60 million. On May 2 the minister announced in the house that in addition to this earlier sale there had been a sale of 2.2 million bushels of wheat valued at $3.7 million. The next sale the government announced was the sale of 28 million bushels of wheat and 17 million bushels of barley with an estimated total value of $66 million. Under the long term agreement the terms of payment are 25 per cent cash and the balance in 270 days.

But in order to get this additional agreement for the period June 1 to November 30 —and the minister can correct me if he believes I am wrong—Canada has had to do a great many things. The government has agreed to provide, and parliament will have to provide, a $50 million credit in order that this transaction may be undertaken. So that what the minister should have announced when he came back was not a gigantic sale of $362 million worth of grain, which has not taken place and for which an agreement has not been signed, although he talked about a sale, but rather a second agreement for a certain quantity of grain. At the same time he should have announced that in order to have this firm agreement signed for a much smaller sum, Canada has had to provide a credit of $50 million.

The Minister of Agriculture has talked about a sale of this order, namely 186.7 million bushels of wheat and 46.7 million bushels of barley worth approximately $362 million. He has told us the value and has called it a sale, but there is no sale. If there is to be any sale in the future, the price and the quantity will be negotiated. The farmers of the prairies have been fooled into believing, and have been kidded, that this is a sale of 186.7 million bushels of wheat —they have even got it to the decimal point —and 46.7 million bushels of barley, which is worth $362 million. The only people who have decided to make a firm commitment are the people of Canada. No firm commitment has been made by China.

My understanding is that when a sale is made it must be a contract entered into by two persons. They agree to specific things. In this case the two parties would be the wheat board and the China Resources Company. No such transaction has been agreed upon. There is no firm agreement beyond November 30 this year, and I put that to the minister. China has committed itself to absolutely nothing. Our Minister of Agriculture called it a sale of this order which was worth $362 million. He pointed out what this would do for the country. I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to deny what I have said. I know he cannot.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: I suggest that beyond November 30 this year there is a guarantee of absolutely nothing on the part of China, and all Canada does is say that no matter what other customers might happen to be available, even if—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: When I am finished I will permit a question. No matter what other countries may want to purchase our wheat, we are committed to keeping in storage between now and the end of 1963 these quantities of wheat and barley, even though China has committed itself to absolutely nothing.

I say that the government and the minister, by the very careful phraseology of this statement, by using language in a way to mislead, by putting to work the high priced public relations people who have been hired not to sell wheat but to sell the Tory party, have perpetrated what may yet be the greatest hoax that the grain industry has seen for a long time. As I say, China has committed itself to nothing beyond November 30.

The government has allowed the story to go across Canada. Here we have the Winnipeg Free Press with a headline, "Red China Buying Canadian Grain for $362 Million". There is no such agreement, and I challenge the government to produce the agreement, make it a public document and let us not continue the argument in committee. Let the people know what is in the agreement. Let us see who is correct in his analysis of what this agreement means.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I believe the hon. member said he would permit a question.

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The hon. member has referred to the fact that the Canadian government has committed itself to keep this grain in storage. There are two questions I should like to ask. First, does the hon. member believe this grain will be in storage?

Mr. Argue: I am afraid with the Tory party in power it will be. I hope it will not.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The second question is, is this not a major breakthrough in accepting sterling for our grain, something the farmers have been requesting for a number of years?

Mr. Argue: Well, I took it that the sterling would be convertible. My hon. friend can tell me if they have taken sterling which really cannot be converted into dollars and, therefore, is blocked sterling. Perhaps the hon. member can tell me if this government has decided to take blocked sterling only from communist China. I assumed that the sterling that was taken was convertible and that it was, in fact, a cash sale. There is a breakthrough—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is a big admission for you.

Mr. Argue: —in the quantities that have been sold.

Mr. Chambers: You do not want the sale cancelled?

Mr. Argue: I just want the truth. Let us put all the facts on the record. The fact of the matter is that this is just a pipe dream. This is just a hoax. This is just part of the vision. This is just another Tory promise that exists for the public relations people, but does not really exist.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You see your dream of taking over the leadership of the New party failing and falling.

Mr. McIlraith: This subject of the wheat agreement certainly has generated a great deal of heat. Undoubtedly the agreement is of major importance. I must say that the allegations made by the leader of the group on my right, the C.C.F. group, are of a very serious nature. If they are sustained when the agreement is produced, they will certainly represent a matter of major importance to the country.

I listened with great interest to the announcement of the Minister of Agriculture in common with all other hon. members in the house. I attached great importance to it and subsequently I read the statement very carefully. When I read it carefully there were some questions about it that concerned me. I did not want to put the questions to the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday because, as I mentioned in my remarks, he has a truncated department. When I made that reference I had in mind the fact that the wheat board had been taken from his jurisdiction and given to the Minister of Agriculture, rightly or wrongly. I thought the questions that arose in my mind about this contract were ones that should properly concern the other department. I had some questions, however, concerning the form of payment as they related to trade generally. The agreement itself, as announced, did raise questions in my mind, so I took what I thought was the proper course and put a motion on the order paper requesting production of the document.

This is something that cannot be debated in the committee at this stage. I would expect that the document would be produced, and we could then see whether or not the things that have been said about the agreement are right. They may or may not be. I simply do not know. I felt that the course adopted ought to be explained to the committee in case hon. members should assume from the failure to deal with it in my remarks yesterday that we somehow thought the agreement was not of major importance to the economy of this country, or of any significance to agriculture. It was simply a matter of taking the view that the agreement itself was something that came under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture.

I should have liked to ask this Minister of Trade and Commerce some questions about it, and indeed raise some arguments with him about it, but I thought it improper to do so. I should like the minister's view on what the situation is with respect to jurisdiction over this subject of the sale of wheat, now that jurisdiction over the wheat board and the board of grain commissioners has been taken from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and given to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Hees: It is very easy to answer that question, Mr. Chairman. The wheat board and the board of grain commissioners now come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture. He is responsible for the operation of these bodies. In the selling of wheat and grain abroad, my department gives every possible assistance to the board of grain commissioners and the wheat board, as well as to the minister himself. We will continue to do that.

Mr. McIlraith: Is it quite clear that the actual agreements are negotiated by other departments and not by your department?

Mr. Hees: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask a question of the hon. member for Assiniboia, who has been making statements about misleading the house and these mythical public relations officers who have misled the public. As I understand it, the criticisms made by the hon. member for Assiniboia are derived from his having read the statement made by the minister to the House of Commons. As I listened to the minister the other day it seemed perfectly clear to me. It was perfectly clear that there was no misleading of the house in that statement. The minister did not pretend that the whole of the $362 million sale was in the same class. I think it was perfectly clear, and anyone who read the whole statement could understand it. That was my feeling when I listened to the statement.

If I am wrong, I want to be corrected, but I understood the hon. member's criticism was of statements which appeared in the press, and that when he saw the actual Hansard record he realized that those statements were a little too enthusiastic. Sometimes newspapers do become enthusiastic, but the idea that the minister should be blamed or was in any way responsible for misleading the public is, I think, something which is utterly unfair and which I hope the hon. member will withdraw.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, as we go along some things are at least becoming clearer to me, and the statement the hon. member for Greenwood has just made is exceedingly important. While he objects to the kind of language I may have used this morning—this is his perfect right, and I respect his opinion—he does not quarrel with the substance of what I said. He is not quarrelling with my interpretation of the agreement itself.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am quarrelling not with your interpretation of the agreement but with your suggestion that the minister was in some way responsible for what appeared in the press. That is going very far in itself, but also in addition the member for Assiniboia said the minister made the statement in such a way as to not really give a disclosure. My point is that it is clear the minister gave a full disclosure, because that is where the hon. member obtained the information on which he bases his argument.

Mr. Argue: The important thing to me, as a member of parliament representing a part of Canada that has a tremendous interest in this matter, is that the hon. member agrees that my interpretation of the terms of the agreement is a correct one. He does object to my stating that the minister misled the house. He does not quarrel, apparently, with my statement that the press misled the country. I am really amazed that so many experienced members of the press gallery should buy this statement as they heard it, without really looking to see whether the Minister of Agriculture had something covered up a bit in the verbiage that he used. I say this statement was worded in a way that misled the house.

Mr. Chambers: It was not.

Mr. Argue: My friend can get up and talk—

Mr. Ricard: It would be much more interesting than what you are saying now.

Mr. Argue: —when I have resumed my seat. The Minister of Agriculture came in with this announcement and said this deal was worth approximately $362 million. That was the thing he was announcing. Then he added it to what had gone on before and said the approximate value was $425.6 million. The minister later on called it "a sale of this order". I think this was a carefully worded statement, and I think it was carefully designed to mislead. The minister did not come back and say, "We signed an agreement worth $60 million earlier. We have put a little bit on top of it".

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The Minister of Agriculture is not present, and it is not within the rules of this house for an hon. member to say that another hon. member of this house deliberately designed something in order to mislead.

Mr. Pickersgill: He did not say that.

Mr. Argue: If the hon. member is right, if that is what I said, I apologize. I did not mean to put in the word "deliberately". But if the minister had meant it to be deliberate he could not have done a better job. I will say I think this statement misled the house.

Mr. Macdonnell: No.

Mr. Lambert: You were not here; you were out politicking.

Mr. Argue: I should say it was put in a misleading manner. It certainly misled the country. It misled no less a person than the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. He said "This is a wonderful deal. It will take the surplus off the farms".

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Sour grapes.

Mr. Argue: It is not going to take the surplus off the farms. This is just another fleabite, and a welcome one; and I hope we have some more of this order. But 28 million bushels of wheat, when related to the hundreds and hundreds of millions of bushels which are surplus, are not going to take the surplus off the farms. The way the announcement has been interpreted, there is a lot more in it for the future. I do not know why the government signed this agreement as it is drawn, and I should like an explanation—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): In other words you think they should not have signed it?

Mr. Argue: I think this government signed an agreement to keep in storage and to provide, to have available, this huge quantity of grain, and that communist China did not make any commitment in exchange as to quantity or price. The Canadian government, through the Canadian wheat board, has committed itself to sell, but China has committed itself, I submit, to absolutely nothing beyond November of this year.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, could I correct the hon. member. I am advised that the government of China have agreed to take the full quantity, and that the only thing which remains to be negotiated is the price and delivery of the quantities from time to time. But they have agreed to take the full quantity over the period of time mentioned.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I think the only way the minister can put forward this statement is to produce the agreement. I challenge that interpretation of the agreement. We have been on this subject for one hour—

An hon. Member: Longer than that.

Mr. Argue: —and the minister has now said there is a firm commitment from China.

Mr. Chown: He is not the responsible minister.

Mr. Argue: He is the responsible minister; he is a member of the cabinet. I used to hear about cabinet solidarity and that you cannot have ministers talking in different directions at different times. Now the hon. member says "Don't hold this minister responsible. He is not responsible; he did not negotiate the agreement".

Mr. Chown: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I simply said that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not responsible for producing the agreement the hon. member seeks. That is the only point I made, and I do not want the record to be covered with a cloud of the hon. member's verbiage because he takes it upon himself to misinterpret what I said.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could just read again the statement the Minister of Agriculture made in the house when making this announcement. He said:

> I have made it clear that there is a long term agreement. Under that agreement one contract has been signed. Each future contract will be negotiated in respect to price and quantity.

The operations of the wheat board do not come under my department, but trade generally does. I have been willing to discuss this matter in that context, but we are getting down to specifics which have to do with something that comes under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of Agriculture. I suggest that we pass on to another subject. I think this matter has been thoroughly discussed as far as I am able to discuss it. I suggest we now pass on to other matters of trade and commerce. As soon as the Minister of Agriculture comes back, I suggest that the hon. member for Assiniboia puts his questions to him. I feel sure my colleague will be very glad to answer the hon. member.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, we are really getting the runaround. The minister now says there is an agreement. Nobody has been denying that there is an agreement, or that there is some document which has been signed. I should like to see the agreement. Certainly there is an agreement, but it is the most lopsided agreement I have ever heard of, where Canada agrees to provide and keep available this quantity of grain and, as far as I can tell, China has committed herself to nothing. To support his contention that there is some commitment the minister reads from his colleague's statement the words:

> I have made it clear that there is a long term agreement.

Of course there is, but it does not necessarily mean a thing. China does not commit herself to take a quantity of grain. She does not commit herself to the price that will be paid. Everything will be under negotiation except the Canadian part, which provides that we shall keep the grain available. Countries such as India have wanted our grain in the past and have gone into the markets of the world to obtain 586 million bushels of wheat in a four year period. We should have been engaged, long before, in the sale of our grain in the distressed areas of the world. However, the agreements we make should be agreements which provide for the sale of certain quantities of grain under guaranteed arrangements, and when agreements are signed they should mean something. I suggest that this agreement in its present terms does not say anything at all in support of the impressions which the minister sought to convey.

Mr. McIlraith: Before the vote carries I wish to raise another matter in connection with the administration of the department, having to do with the advice available to the minister from economists and related officials of the department.

It will be recalled that in January of 1958 a well known episode took place in the House of Commons, when the present Prime Minister made reference to a document called "The Canadian Economic Outlook, 1957". There was considerable controversy at the time with regard to this. It was a document marked "secret" on some pages and "confidential" on others, a document from which most of the blue covers had been torn off. When it was tabled a small part of them remained.

In any event, the document was an analysis prepared by economists in the department on a confidential basis for use by the government in helping them to formulate policy. Subsequent examination of the document showed that the Prime Minister in referring to it in the course of his speech had taken excerpts from it which were completely out of context. Study of the document after it had been tabled also showed that it was a comprehensive one, a document of a type which would be very helpful to the government in formulating policy by way of legislation or otherwise.

The next year, after a lot of delay and a lot of argument in the house, "The Canadian Economic Outlook, 1958" was tabled. A great deal of argument took place about it, but finally it was tabled and it appeared to be a document of the same general nature as previously. Then in 1960 when a motion was put forward asking for the tabling of "The Canadian Economic Outlook, 1959", the document was not produced; in fact there was a refusal to produce it. The motion was voted on by the house and the government succeeded in voting down the request for the production of that document without giving any reason at all for this action, though the government itself had set the precedent for the tabling of the document.

Later, when we raised the matter on the estimates of the department last year, after a great deal of somewhat heated argument the minister of trade and commerce of that day, now the Minister of Veterans Affairs, took the position that there was no such document as "The Canadian Economic Outlook, 1959". Be that as it may, there appeared to be a contradiction at that time between the position taken when the production of the document was sought and the statement made when the matter was raised again on the estimates, when the minister said no such document had been prepared.

The question I wish to ask the present minister is this. Does he have such a document prepared for the use of the government? That is the narrow question I want to ask.

Mr. Hees: As the hon. member has said, two years ago, in accordance with what my predecessor stated when speaking on the estimates of this department—

Mr. McIlraith: It was just a year ago.

Mr. Hees: —last year the department adopted the procedure of preparing regular reports for the guidance of the minister and the government. This procedure is currently being followed.

Mr. McIlraith: That does not deal sufficiently with the question I sought to raise. Last year the matter was debated at some length on the estimates, as will appear from the report in Hansard of August 6, 1960 at pages 7724 and following. Summing up the whole argument—and I think I can do it fairly—it is clear the position taken by the minister was that the comprehensive document, the economic analysis for the year, the outlook for the year, was no longer provided, though he indicated that other related information was available from economists in the department.

I think that is an accurate summary of the position taken by the minister. What I want to ask the present minister is this. Is there one comprehensive report similar to the former "Canadian Economic Outlook" for particular years now provided for the use of the government?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McIlraith: Then, since we have a new minister of trade and commerce and since, except for the fact that he was a minister at that time, he was not directly involved in what I think must be regarded by most people as a most unusual procedure in relation to this document and to this whole affair, and since the hon. gentleman would not be subject to embarrassment if he were to reverse the decision which has been taken and were to put the production of this document back on a proper basis, I should like to urge him to re-establish the section of his department which did that work and to strengthen the present economic research section of his department in order that it may once again take up this task on a proper basis. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman and, indeed, the whole government are materially handicapping themselves by cutting themselves off from this kind of assistance, and that they have undoubtedly cut themselves off to some extent at least from this type of expert advice which it is very necessary for any government to have.

Mr. Hees: I am glad to be able to assure the hon. member that the expert advice is still available and is still given. However, it is given at more regular intervals now and much more frequently than in the past. The government is receiving the same kind of information from our economists as we did before, but now I get it several times a year instead of once a year.

Mr. McIlraith: The former information was not given only once a year. If the minister would look at those former reports he would find there were regular supplements, monthly supplements and that sort of thing. I urge the minister not to let the matter go in this way. The section of his department concerned could stand additional support from the ministry, proper support for the handling of the type of information it must prepare if it is to do its work successfully. The government would do well with more of that kind of advice.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question along the lines of those asked by the hon. member for Ottawa West. I should think the members of this committee would be interested, as I know I am, if the minister told us how frequently he receives these reports, and when the change in procedure was made.

Mr. Hees: I have been receiving these reports, ever since I became minister, I would say every month or six weeks.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister know whether he receives them each month or six weeks; whether he receives them at regular or irregular intervals?

Mr. Hees: I receive them at irregular intervals, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister answer my other question regarding when the system was changed?

Mr. Hees: It was changed two years ago, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: What was the nature of the change?

Mr. Hees: The change was that the reports were given to the minister at much more regular intervals than formerly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say whether the custom that was followed by the previous administration of circulating these reports to every minister is being carried on, or has that been stopped?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman these reports are circulated to any minister that I consider would be particularly interested in the matters discussed therein.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it there is no regular system of distribution as there formerly was?

Mr. Hees: That is right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, in other words the minister is now keeping most of his colleagues in the dark most of the time.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, my colleagues are not in the dark at any time. I do not believe, as the other government perhaps did, that one should put a lot of papers on the desks of individuals at regular intervals.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I take it the minister is perhaps afraid that there might be something hidden which, after the next election, will be dusted off by someone else in the fashion we all recall so well.

Mr. Lambert: Just guilty individuals do things like that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the minister is taking the precaution of hiding the information so completely that no one will possibly find it. I would like to ask the minister whether these reports are sent regularly to the secretary of the cabinet.

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman, they are not.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister one or two questions. I do not intend to hold up these estimates, but I would like to know whether, in connection with application of quotas on imports and measures taken under the anti-dumping act, there is close co-operation between the minister and his colleague the Minister of National Revenue. I ask that question because it seems to me that the minister's department would be the only department conversant with Canadian production and, therefore, able to give that information to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, my department, the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Finance work very closely together on matters of this kind at all times.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, in connection with this matter, in the last issue of the Leather and Shoes magazine I noticed a statement to the effect that the Japanese ministry of international trade has asked the Japanese exporters of baseball gloves to set voluntary quotas on their shipments to the United States. This has been done at the request of the government of the United States. Has similar action been taken in Canada, and have leather manufacturers asked for that type of action? I know that leather goods manufacturers feel that the production of similar goods is subsidized by foreign governments. I would also like to know what action the minister has recommended to the Minister of National Revenue regarding a similar situation in respect of silverware and other commodities which he might now have in mind.

Mr. Hees: I am not aware of any such request regarding baseball gloves. Such requests would be made directly to the Minister of Finance. I am unaware of any having been made, although there may have been.

The Chairman: Shall vote 394 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. I should like to ask the minister a question, and if his answer indicates that my opinion is correct I will have some observations to make. The minister is probably aware that in late 1953 or 1954—I am not sure precisely when it was—the prime responsibility for the sale of fish was transferred from the Department of Fisheries to the minister's department. Is that still the situation?

Mr. Hees: Yes, it is, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: In that case, Mr. Chairman, I have some observations to make regarding this very important subject. The minister will recall that he received a delegation of gentlemen, whom he variously described as the finest businessmen he had ever known, good traders, and so on, from Cuba, one of our principal customers for salt fish. The minister is probably aware, notwithstanding his enthusiasm for this delegation, that the market for salt fish in Cuba is not exactly buoyant at the present time. The minister is perhaps also aware that we have been facing increasing competition in many of our traditional markets which were mainly supplied by Canadian fish. I am sure he is thoroughly familiar with the difficulties there have been during recent years with respect to the exchange problem in Brazil. The result is that in the past year, particularly, there has been a growing accumulation of salt fish for which apparently there is no immediate market.

This problem has caused very grave concern to the producers and merchants on the east coast. I feel that before the minister's estimates are completed—I would not necessarily insist upon his doing so on the first item of his estimates, if he feels there is some other more suitable estimate—he should make a statement regarding both the situation in respect of stocks and measures now being taken to deal with the problem. If the minister considers, as many other individuals do, that there is an emergency regarding this matter, what emergency action does the government plan to take?

I see it is one o'clock, and as I have a few other brief observations to make in respect of this subject, perhaps I could now call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rose rather unexpectedly just before one o'clock; I had not realized that we seemed to be so near the conclusion of debate on the minister's first item, perhaps because I was unfortunately not able to be here yesterday. Instead of putting the position in my own words I think, if the committee will bear with me for a moment, I will put it in the words of Mr. Harold Shea as they appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of March 16, 1961. Mr. Shea had obviously done a good deal of hard work on this problem. I think he has set out the position in a more succinct way than I could do it just by speaking off the cuff which, as hon. members know, I sometimes do. The article is headed:

> And now a salt fish crisis for Maritimes.
> With a growing cod surplus at home and a mounting dollar shortage in traditional markets, exporters have called upon Ottawa for assistance through give-aways to Congo or long term credits for foreign countries.

The dispatch itself reads:

> Problems of currency and competition are creating severe marketing difficulties for salt fish exporters in the Atlantic provinces and, unless the above average stockpile can be sold soon, lower returns to fishermen may be expected this year.
> This situation is causing concern to the federal government, too.

I hope Mr. Shea was right in this. I continue:

> It has been asked to help, but officials candidly admit that there does not appear to be any easy solution.

Well, I do not think there is an easy solution. That is why we have governments. If all our problems could be solved easily I imagine we would dispense with government altogether, especially in the economic field. The dispatch goes on:

> At a time when exporters on the east coast would normally be clearing away the last stocks of salted cod and shipping them off to the traditional markets in the Caribbean, there is a heavy hold-over of this fish with little hope of volume sales.
> And with a new salt fishing season only weeks away—

Unfortunately it is not getting on very fast yet because of the ice, as the minister knows. If he does not, if he would consult the officials of his former department—transport—he would soon find out. I continue:

> And with a new salt fishing season only weeks away, the stockpiles are going to grow and grow unless a way is found around marketing difficulties.
> As of January 31, according to government figures, the salt fish exporters in the maritimes were carrying 443,000 cases of salted cod (100 pounds to the case). At the same time last year, the reserve supply was less than half that.
> Sale prospects between now and the start of the new season are not bright. Orders are held for only 180,000 cases, which would leave the shippers with a backlog of 263,000 cases. What has caused this marketing problem?

I think it is worth putting these things on record because perhaps the minister can bring us more up to date than Mr. Shea has done about these particular markets.

> Brazil, with a new government, hasn't yet decided how many dollars it will release for salt fish.
> Spain, normally an importing country, is now selling fish to Puerto Rico and Portugal, two of Canada's customers.

Notwithstanding that statement, sir, I imagine that if we were producing the right kind of fish we could still sell fish to Spain, because I do not think the Spaniards can catch and cure the kind of fish they want for the high priced Spanish market. This is a problem on which I intend to say something when the estimates of the Department of Fisheries are in committee, but it would not be entirely fair to take up the time of the committee on the minister's estimates. The article goes on:

> Cuba, suffering a dollar shortage because of the drastic cut in American tourist travel to the island, has run out of money. It has ceased buying fish from Canada and Norway, and proposes to offer, instead of money, such items as fruits, vegetables, tobacco, rum and sisal in exchange for fish.
> Jamaica, Puerto Rico, British Guiana and the Dominican Republic are heavily overstocked with salted fish, and are not in the market immediately.
> Dominican Republic is apparently short of dollars too, because there have been reports that accounts with maritime companies are several months in arrears.
> With stocks 50 per cent heavier than last year, and with such dismal marketing prospects, and with a new fishing season scheduled to open soon, maritime exporters, and fishermen, are in trouble.
> They have appealed to the government for assistance.
> One suggestion offered by the exporters is that Ottawa purchase some of the backlog and contribute it to the people of the Congo. Norway is donating food now, and officials here say that no decision has been reached as to whether Canada will make food donations.
> It might be resolved through provision of export credits to Cuba, for example. But while Cuba has long been the largest single salt cod importing island in the Caribbean, there is little chance that it will be able to build up a dollar supply, and repay Canada, as long as it is involved in its hassle with the United States.

Should the federal government purchase the surplus, as it has done with certain agricultural products, and make it available to municipalities to help feed the needy and the poor?

Should it buy the surplus and give it away through the Colombo plan?

While the government and the industry ponders what to do, there remains the ironical fact that the Canadian people could solve this problem in a matter of a few days.

Then, Mr. Chairman, the writer goes on to point out that if every Canadian would eat one and one half pounds of this fish the whole problem would be solved. Well, as a matter of fact that is no doubt true, but I would not be honest, notwithstanding the high regard I have for my fellow citizens, if I thought that solution, even with all the salesmanship of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if he would just give up all his other activities and start peddling salt fish from Esquimalt to St. John's could be arrived at. I doubt whether the minister would accomplish that in time to solve the problem. I suggest, however, that the minister do try to peddle a little of it in Esquimalt, if he happens to be going there at this time of the year for any other reasons.

This is a very serious problem. For the people involved it is in every respect as serious as the problem of the wheat surplus was. Perhaps that has not been entirely solved yet, but at least there has been great improvement with regard to that situation.

I just happen to have here one of the many reports of speeches made by the minister's leader in 1957 when he was campaigning in the Atlantic provinces. This one is from the Globe and Mail of April 16, 1957. It is a report of a speech made by the present Prime Minister at St. John's, Newfoundland, in which the Prime Minister advocated a stronger support program for fish.

I think I am right in saying that from the time the right hon. gentleman who was minister of trade and commerce in the previous government took over the marketing of fish up to the present time, it has not been necessary to use the fisheries price support legislation for the support of salt codfish at all. During all that period I think the market has been able to absorb what was available and the prices have been reasonably good, not as good as we would like to see them by a long shot but reasonably good.

But this year there is a crisis and I think the fishermen and the fish trade in the Atlantic provinces will look to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to strengthen the arm of the Minister of Fisheries, and perhaps twist it if necessary, in order to see that they get just as good treatment as the farmers get and that the fisheries price support legislation, which was put on the statute books at the same time as the agricultural price support legislation and for the same purpose, is used with the same zeal if it needs to be used.

Perhaps the government can think of some other way to meet the problem. Particularly in the light of what was said just before lunch by the hon. member for Greenwood, I must say there is a great deal to be said, when you think of the numbers of people in the world who go to bed hungry every night, for the government taking this surplus off the commercial market if it cannot be sold on the market and disposing of it in an area where it will not depress the markets for the year 1961. The sum involved in such an operation would not be tremendous. Then the minister could get to work with his trade commissioners and others to try to improve the whole market situation for 1961, but no one can improve the market situation for 1961 if there is the overhang there now is in the form of this surplus.

I point this out to the minister as something that is of the most serious consequence to an industry that is just as important to those engaged in it as any other industry in the country.

Mr. Hees: If I may answer the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, just before one o'clock he indicated that he would like some information on what the stocks are of wet salted cod and the various other types of cod.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, not just wet salted cod.

Mr. Hees: I asked the department to give me the figures, and I have them here. The figures of stocks on hand as of March 31 this year are as follows: Wet salted cod, 14,485,000 pounds; dried salted cod, 14,919,000 pounds, and boneless salt cod, 360,000 pounds. I asked for a report on our activities in assisting to get this fish sold, and am able to report as follows.

The question of helping our producers to move this cod is at present receiving the careful attention of officials of both the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Trade and Commerce. While stocks of salt cod as of March 31 are considerable in comparison wtih the corresponding period last year, it must be remembered that stocks in 1960 were inadequate. There are still three months remaining in the 1960-61 marketing year. It is expected that much of this surplus fish will move to markets other than Cuba prior to the end of June. In any event, we are watching the situation carefully and will do everything possible to assist in disposing of any stocks remaining at that time.

I again assure the hon. member and others interested in the fishing industry that our trade commissioners will work just as hard to help the producers of fish to sell their product, which is a very important one, as they will to help other producers to sell their products.

The hon. member asked if I would give him a comparison of sales in the last three years. I have asked for this information but have not received it yet. As soon as I receive it I will send it to the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: When the minister receives it will he ask to have it included in Hansard? I think it would be of great interest to everyone who is anxious to appreciate this problem properly and not to exaggerate it.

Mr. Hees: I will be very glad to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I might just add that I think those of us who are concerned about the plight of the fishing industry and the fishermen hope the minister will do more than watch the situation. I do not believe there is any possibility of the surplus that has now accumulated being absorbed by the the commercial markets this year without depressing the markets in a very serious way, and I think more than merely commercial operations will be required to deal with the emergency.

Mr. Matthews: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to take very much time in discussing this department, but I do think I should say a few words. Perhaps one of the most important departments that a government can have is the department of trade and commerce. This is not a new idea. It was a fact hundreds of years ago when the British empire started its great history in the field of commerce. History shows that, starting with British ships of commerce trading with all countries of the world, great strides were made in the building of the British empire.

It is quite interesting to know that the reign of Elizabeth I of England was a period of great significance in the advancement of the British nation. During her reign the nation made the greatest advances in the arts, the construction of many beautiful buildings, and also in trade and commerce. It is also interesting that Britain under Queen Elizabeth II is again making a wonderful recovery. Her economy is being built up by dedication and hard work, and we know that trade and commerce is one of the main contributing factors.

Our Minister of Trade and Commerce is, you can be sure, quite aware of these facts, and I know he has made a study of the factors that have contributed to the improved economy of Britain in the past few years. It is quite evident that Canada is now on the right path, and great credit is due to our Minister of Trade and Commerce. He is a real sales manager, has great faith in the people of Canada, and also knows that Canada has a great future if we Canadians will work to build this future.

A few years ago Canada was in the same position as a business, say a factory or a retail store, that had been left without proper management more or less to run itself. I have known businesses, and good ones too, that have not been properly operated; where the employees, while they were good workers and faithful, had been left by management without supervision and direction. The building and equipment had not been kept up to date, and the buying and selling of merchandise had not been done in a way suitable to the changed times. In other words the smart competitors had passed them and left them behind. Then a new management was installed to pull the business out of the rut, new approaches were used, good sales managers put new ideas and new faith into the workers, and after hard work by all a strong and healthy company was built.

When the voters of Canada changed the management of our fine country a few years ago they did so because they were sure that indifferent management was fast slowing down the economy of the nation. In spite of some people who have done their best to block the program of bringing Canada back to the position she should occupy as a nation with many natural resources, Canada has a bright and prosperous future.

Hon. members may not know that my constituency of Nanaimo contributes greatly to the commerce of the world. As many ocean-going freighters are loading their cargoes at the assembly wharf at Nanaimo, others are loading at Crofton. At the same time lumber freighters from all parts of the world are loading at Chemainus. This assembly wharf at Nanaimo is now being reconstructed. The reconstruction will take perhaps 14 months to complete at a cost of about three quarters of a million dollars.

On March 30 this year I wrote to the Minister of Agriculture requesting him to consider the construction of grain loading facilities at the assembly wharf while this reconstruction to which I have referred was taking place. I also spoke to the Minister of Trade and Commerce about this important matter. Grain storage facilities at this central port of Vancouver island could be a very important part of trade and commerce. While the federal government, in most cases, does not build these grain storage plants, I hope the Department of Agriculture will encourage the construction of such facilities.

I consider my constituency of Nanaimo to be a very important location which has contributed and will contribute greatly to the trade and commerce of Canada. Another important step in the improvement of deep-sea shipping facilities on the Pacific coast will be the building of a breakwater at Chemainus. For over 70 years Chemainus has loaded timber for all parts of the world and has contributed greatly to the economy of Canada. I hope every consideration will be given to the building of this breakwater, because Chemainus is certainly a part of the trade and commerce of Canada.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, this morning's discussion concerning the sale of grain to red China took an extraordinary turn.

I followed it with great interest. The government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) were clearly on the defensive.

I have read a number of times the statement made on May 2 by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton), and I noted particularly a paragraph on page 4205 of Hansard in which the minister said:

A sale of this order will spread substantial benefits through the Canadian economy.

In the same statement, the minister had previously announced a deal of some $362 million.

That is what the Minister of Agriculture said, that is what we understood and what Canadian newspapers and the Canadian people understood.

But there is more. In this morning's Gazette, we find the following statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green):

(Text):

External Affairs Minister Green said yesterday that the big Canadian grain sale to communist China might be one of the many factors taken into consideration in the recognition of red China in the United Nations.

(Translation):

The government very definitely gave us the impression that this grain deal with communist China was worth $362 million.

If we go carefully over the details supplied by the Minister of Agriculture in the statement he made on Tuesday, May 2, we note the following facts.

First of all, the minister referred to the sale of 40 million bushels of wheat and barley, valued at approximately $60 million contracted between the Canadian wheat board and the China Resources Company. That is the first sale, a bilateral contract between China and Canada.

Second, the minister informed us that there is an additional sale to China of 2.2 million bushels of wheat, valued at $3.7 million, for shipment during March to May 1961. This is also a sale that puts China, as well as Canada, under certain bilateral obligations.

The minister then made another statement about a $66 million contract, signed under a long term agreement, by which China and Canada have mutually committed themselves, the latter to deliver goods, the former to pay an agreed price.

I therefore submit that there are three contracts, duly signed, and imposing a legal obligation upon China and Canada.

As for the rest of his statement, I suggest we have again been victims of a new vision. In fact, this agreement for $362 million worth of wheat and barley is only a promise to buy on the part of China. It is therefore on the part of Canada a unilateral commitment under which it would undertake to keep available for China 186.7 million bushels of wheat and 46.7 million bushels of barley from the 1st of June, 1961 to December 1963. Moreover, China would not be bound to buy the above mentioned quantities during this period.

Therefore for China this would amount to no more than an insurance policy covering the period from June 1961 to December 1963, in case its future crops fail to fill the gap that might exist in this year's wheat and barley crops.

What impressed me most this morning is that the matter was pointed out to the Minister of Trade and Commerce with a request that he then give an explanation concerning this agreement. Well, the minister found nothing better to do than read again parts of the statement made to last May 2 by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton). Unquestionably, these are disturbing facts we are now facing and not only are we entitled to an explanation but we also have the right to ask that any agreement signed by this government and the government of China, or a Chinese wheat committee, be tabled immediately, so that we may know whether we have not been left under a false impression following the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture on May 2.

Mr. Chairman, it would be proper at this stage, while we are on the subject of agreements, to review the fundamentals of any sales contract.

What is a sales contract? Let me refer to the civil code of the province of Quebec, section 1472, which reads as follows:

A sale is a contract whereby a person gives something to another person for a price in money which the latter undertakes to pay.

Mr. Chairman, first, it is essential for me to know the facts. In the Ottawa Journal of May 3, may be read the following statement made by the Minister of Agriculture, following a question put to him by Richard Jackson, a newspaperman.

(Text):

But wasn't trade a two-way street, and didn't the Chinese hope to recover some of their $326 million through sales of their own to Canada?

Could be, agreed Mr. Hamilton.

(Translation):

Well, Mr. Chairman, after all this window dressing about a sale which, in the main, is nothing of the kind, I think we are entitled to some explanations. In my opinion, it is quite obvious, in the light of the facts now given us, that the government of China has contracted no legal obligation in regard to the greater amount of money concerned for the purchase of that wheat. If we re-read the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture, the only conclusion we arrive at is that both the public and parliament were left under a false impression, an impression that even the figures provided by the minister fail to support. Therefore, I think we are entitled to demand the tabling of all documents and agreements concluded and signed, that we may know the actual scope of the sales made; in other words, in order that we may have the whole truth.

(Text):

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make just a few brief remarks. It is not often that I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. However, in this instance I wish to endorse his remarks with regard to the salt fish situation.

All of us who represent fishing ridings are vitally concerned with this problem. At the present time there is a surplus of heavy salt codfish, and every effort is being made by the industry to move this surplus. As a matter of fact, some 200 tons were recently offered to Portugal at unprofitable prices. Although a sale has not been made, negotiations are still going on. Even if the sale is made we will still have abnormally heavy stocks for this time of year, particularly with the loss of the Cuban market, which was open to us a year ago.

In addition, sales of heavy salted pollack to the Dominican Republic have declined. This is due to their loss of purchasing power. As a result the Saguenay Shipping Company has reluctantly reduced its service to this area to once a month. This has created further hardship for both shippers and those who are in a position to buy.

As I mentioned, it is very important to the east coast that we move the present stocks of salted fish and that these stocks be reduced as soon as possible to a level where there is not likely to be any large carryover at the beginning of next season. If this is not done there is always the risk that an exporter may completely disorganize one or more of the regular markets by deciding to reduce his stock by selling at abnormally low prices. If this should be done it is obvious what the result would be, and not only to present Canadian exporters. If a large carryover is on hand it will abnormally reduce the price when fish are landed in the 1961 season.

I wish to bring this important matter to the attention of the minister. The situation is very serious. Possibly the minister could arrange to increase the amount of fish that is sold in the West Indies market. In any event, I am pleased to have this opportunity to bring this important problem to the minister's attention.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, there is one additional matter about which I thought the minister would say something today, particularly in light of the fact that notwithstanding his disclaimer earlier in the session the minister has a responsibility along with the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Finance. As we know, the only positive program brought forward by the administration this year, apart from the limited winter works program, to provide a solution or mitigation for unemployment was the proposal of the Minister of Finance for the application of the principle of accelerated depreciation to assist industry to locate in areas where heavy pockets of unemployment now persist.

I am sure the government's proposal for double depreciation, as the minister called it in his budget speech of December 18, commended itself in principle to most people in the country as a constructive approach to this problem. But when analysis is given to the proposal it is apparent that what the government has in fact brought forward is not a very effective application of this principle.

The proposal is that there shall be double depreciation extended for one year to industry under certain conditions and where it is located in an area of chronic unemployment. The contention is made, and I repeat it now, that this program, in so far as it concerns the relocation of industry or encouraging industry to stay where it is already, will not bring forward one single case.

The minister has a responsibility in connection with this matter. He has not properly outlined exactly what his role in this program is to be. It has to do, of course, with the importation of certain articles which will have to do with encouragement of new industry, and I think the minister ought to tell the house now what progress has been made in this matter.

The minister should indicate whether the government has received any indication from any part of the country that there is to be a voluntary relocation of industry. Unless we have some satisfactory explanation we must conclude that this program is nothing more than a façade. I am convinced that this is all it is. It is part of the government's method of trying to create the impression that it is doing something to meet this serious problem of unemployment.

The Minister of Labour, when he presents his estimates, will be called on to report his achievements with regard to this program, as will the Minister of Finance. We are now dealing with the Department of Trade and Commerce, and we should have from the minister some indication of the number of applications which have been received, together with an indication of what this is going to mean in keeping down the numbers of unemployed and preventing a recurrence of unemployment.

What we shall want from the minister is not his usual friendly display of apparent good humour. What we shall want from the minister is a report which will indicate that this program has substance and is not merely a façade. The minister has been very active in meeting with his trade commissioners. He has been very active, he tells us, in meeting with the industrialists of this country, although I see he has begun to scold the industrialists for failing, he says, to follow the directions he has given.

In any event, the Minister of Labour is not alone responsible for doing something about unemployment. That is a responsibility which must be shared by all members of the government, notably by those responsible for the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Finance, the Department of Defence Production, the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Health and Welfare and others. This is a responsibility which does not belong only to the little Minister of Labour. It is one which also devolves on the shoulders of the big Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think we are entitled to hear from the minister some indication of what the program means in practical results.

The hon. gentleman has changed his understanding as to the responsibility of the government toward unemployment. Only two or three months ago he said this was a problem which was now outside the scope of government responsibility, that it was something which was the responsibility of all the people of Canada. This is not, of course, what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said when he spoke on this subject when in opposition as a private member. Nor is it what he said as one of the chief tune makers of the administration during the elections of 1957 and 1958. The minister cannot hope to satisfy members of this committee merely by his friendly manner, his engaging smile and the fine impression we gather when we look at him. Fine impressions of this sort are not sufficient to warrant a conclusion that the minister is fully discharging his responsibility.

I should like to hear from the Minister of Trade and Commerce today what his solution is to the problem of unemployment. He has a responsibility in this matter. The Prime Minister made a most amazing statement when he said that the Bladen royal commission was not one which concerned the Department of Trade and Commerce but was of primary concern to the Department of Finance. I do not know whether this means that the government intends to take some fiscal steps at long last. I do not know whether this foreshadows the abolition of the excise tax on automobiles. I hope it means that, and I hope it means other things as well. But I cannot conceive that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would concur in the view stated by the Prime Minister that his department is not vitally concerned with whatever recommendations are made by Professor Bladen with regard to an industry which means so much to Canada.

I have not in the past pursued the Minister of Trade and Commerce on his estimates, but I do pursue him today in respect of this matter because I want some indication, and I believe this committee and the whole country want some indication, of how this program of double depreciation is developing and what it is doing to meet the objective set for it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has an opportunity now of telling us exactly what has been done in this regard.

Mr. Hees: I was most interested to hear the hon. member for Essex East describe his imagined difficulties in getting a straight answer from me. It took me back to the days when he sat on this side of the house. Hon. members who sat in opposition in those days will remember what an operation it was at any time, whether on the orders of the day or on the hon. gentleman's estimates, to get any sort of an answer from him. It was really a big day in our lives if we could get the hon. member for Essex East, who was then minister of national health and welfare, to give us even a partial answer to our questions.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister would permit me to ask him a question. Is the minister seeking to model himself upon the hon. member for Essex East?

Mr. Hees: I certainly am not; and as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate knows, having watched me across this chamber for four years, I have tended in the completely opposite direction. But when I hear the hon. member for Essex East describe what he imagines to be me—I guess he was in the same seat four years ago—then my mind goes back to the good old days when he was here and giving the kind of answers about which he is complaining today.

With regard to the hon. member's question, there have been about 200 applications for double depreciation allowance in respect of buildings or machinery connected with the manufacture of products that are new in Canada. These are under careful study by my department at the present time to ascertain whether the granting of double depreciation would be justified. As of April 26 last 28 areas had applied to be designed as surplus areas, and as of that date one of those areas had been so designated by the Department of Labour, the area of Cornwall. This plan is in operation, as the hon. member knows, for three years and the double depreciation allowance can be taken in any one of those three years.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When was the first of the 200 applications submitted to the government?

Mr. Hees: I am advised it was a month or six weeks ago.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Six weeks ago, and only one has so far been positively dealt with?

Mr. Hees: These are matters of great importance, and they have to be dealt with very carefully to make sure that no applications which are justified should be turned down. They are being studied intensively, as I have said, and it is our intention to give a well considered reply as quickly as it can be done. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there has been no unnecessary delay in this regard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says there has been no unnecessary delay. I want to indicate to him that I know the application of the city of Windsor was put in over a month ago. It was approved, I have been advised, by the hon. gentleman's department and was sent to the office of the privy council over ten days ago. A government which is disposed to deal with unemployment in a vigorous way is not going to allow delays of this kind to take place.

Not only is this program ineffective because of the fact that it only operates for one full period of 12 months, but to the extent that it has any value at all the three departments of government concerned are obviously not displaying the kind of vigour which a problem as urgent as this requires. The government cannot hope to convince the country that it is doing anything serious about unemployment when, first of all, it brings forward such a limited formula, and then takes so long to deal with the applications. Only one area has been designated. The government has the criteria and all the facts so this delay can only mean one thing, and that is that this government has not diligently met this problem in accordance with the opportunities presented by its own declaration of policy.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, with no intention of holding up the estimates, as I know the minister is anxious to have them passed, I should like briefly to discuss this matter. There is a point to be made first in connection with the delays which have been encountered in designating these depressed areas, as well as the weakness of the policy in general. I think it has been stated in the house before, and perhaps it is well that it be stated again, that the policy which the government has presented, with reference to assistance to depressed areas, is not one which is going to be of very much use.

To substantiate that statement all I have to do is refer to a statement made by a prominent industrialist in this country in a speech he made at a Progressive Conservative meeting held in Toronto. He said words to this effect. Where is the industry that is going to establish itself in any area in Canada when all it will receive is double depreciation for a period of one year over a period of three years? He indicated quite clearly that this was of no use. While I do not know what the political affiliation of this gentleman is, he lost no time in condemning the government for that policy.

There are areas in Canada which are depressed. They need not be publicized, but it is a fact, and the minister should know, that little if anything is being done by means of this policy to assist those areas. At the moment I have particularly in mind areas in the province of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. We have repeatedly placed on record here what we think should be done to assist secondary industry. The Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have repeatedly indicated in this house the proposals they had in mind, and the government has brought in legislation in this respect. But having brought in that legislation to give assistance to secondary industry these ministers tell us, in their next breath, that they have not used this policy or, if they have done so, it has been done very irregularly.

I think the time has come for positive action rather than negative action, particularly in the field of secondary industry. I am not going back to the debate which was entered into in this house having to do with the Atlantic economic area, when we supported a proposed amendment to the motion to go into supply, but it indicated one way of encouraging assistance to manufacturing industries. There are other ways, such as income tax exemptions, loans, subventions, and more particularly specialization in certain groups of industries. We have indicated on more than one occasion that the government—not overnight, because this is a matter which cannot be done overnight but will take a number of years—could assist industries in specialization. Certainly the program which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been given to administer is not one which is going to be of much benefit to those areas.

The next point I had in mind when I rose had to do with the delays which have been encountered in dealing with these applications. The minister has told us there have been 200 applications.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, may I correct that statement. I have just received further information in this regard, and can now say that there have been 200 applications for double depreciation in regard to machinery and products new to Canada, but only 10 applications have arisen out of these inquiries. In addition, there have been 28 applications for designation as surplus manpower areas.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is an even worse situation.

Mr. Chevrier: That situation is entirely different from the one which the minister certainly indicated to us a moment ago.

Mr. Hees: I corrected the figures as soon as I received the information.

Mr. Chevrier: I am grateful to the minister for his correction, but 200 applications for double depreciation in respect of machinery and equipment, and 28 applications for double depreciation because of a depressed area, are two different things, not akin one to the other.

I take it there are 28 applications which have been filed for assistance under the new policy and that only one such application has been approved. I too, along with my colleague from Essex East, deprecate the delay in dealing with these applications. It seems to me that the government could show a great deal more celerity than it has in the past.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The main point is, as anyone who has studied this policy will realize, that the policy in itself is not sufficient. A great deal more will have to be done to give assistance to depressed areas.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister one or two questions about this subject. It seems from the last figures the minister gave that two things are being confused. As I understand the policy, and I hope the minister will correct me promptly if I am wrong, there are two kinds of things which can be applied for. An area can apply to be classed as a depressed area—a totally unnecessary thing in our view—and when the area has been so classed, any industry in that area, whether it is producing new products or not, may apply for double depreciation.

Mr. Hees: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: Also, any industry in any part of Canada can apply for double depreciation in the production of new products. I think it would be helpful to the committee in understanding this question if the minister would say how many areas have applied. I know those applications have to be made to the Minister of Labour, but I assume that these two ministers are still talking to one another, particularly in view of the zeal of the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding this program.

It will not do an area much good to be called a depressed area unless someone in that area applies for double depreciation. That is the minister's responsibility, and he ought to know about it from the start. I assume that he does. I think we should know how many areas have applied to be classed as depressed areas, and how many industries in those areas have applied for double depreciation. We ought to know how many industries in other parts of Canada have applied for double depreciation for new products. We should be given the three separate statistics involved, and I should ask the minister if he can give us this information.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make it clear that applications in respect of surplus manpower areas—not depressed areas—are made to the Department of Labour, and the decision is made in that department as to whether an area is or is not a surplus manpower area. There have been 28 such applications.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Only one has been dealt with.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, one has been classified as such, not dealt with. These applications are all under examination and consideration. One area has been classed as a surplus manpower area, and that is the area of Cornwall.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is correct when he suggests that when one of these areas has been classified as a surplus manpower area any industry in that area can apply for double depreciation. In addition, applications can be made by industries in any part of the country for double depreciation in respect of the manufacture of products which are considered to be new products in Canada. We have had approximately 200 inquiries from industries of that kind which have resulted in 10 formal applications for double depreciation.

Mr. Bourget: Can the minister give a breakdown of the number of applications by provinces?

Mr. Hees: Yes, we have that information here. The applications for areas to be designated as surplus manpower areas are as follows: Nova Scotia, 7; New Brunswick, 9; Quebec, 6; Ontario, 4; Manitoba, 1; Alberta, 1; total, 28. This is the total as of April 22.

Mr. Nixon: Can the minister say whether Elliot Lake applied and was the application considered?

Mr. Hees: I am advised that that area did apply.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, I had expected that the discussion on surplus manpower areas would take place on the estimates of the Minister of Labour. However, I am very happy to join in the discussion at this particular time.

About a week or so ago I placed a question on the order paper asking how many areas had been named as not distressed areas but surplus manpower areas. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce has just said, 28 areas have been so named. It seems to me incredible, since this program was announced late last year and, after a good deal of prodding by the hon. member for Essex East, a system was finally devised under which designated surplus manpower areas were to be named, that here we are in May and only one area has been so named. I can remember the Minister of Labour standing up and congratulating the government for not knowing of the areas because so few had applied. But here we find that 28 have applied and only one has been designated.

I should like to know just what system is being used to determine what is a surplus manpower area. I understood the whole system was based on the fact that the Department of Labour began to get statistics of surplus manpower areas in 1953. I went to the trouble of going down to the basement of the library and digging out all the Labour Gazettes and looking at Peterborough to see just where it stood. I discovered that this particular constituency had a labour manpower surplus, and could be designated as a surplus manpower area only 66 per cent of the time. When I last spoke on this particular measure I suggested that this was a ridiculous system for an industrialized area where fluctuations can take place very quickly. I discovered, and I congratulate them most heartily, that the members of the city council have come down here and asked whether their city could be named a surplus manpower area. Members of the staff of the Department of Labour are now going into the constituency to discover whether it should be named as a surplus manpower area.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They should have gone in on their own initiative.

Mr. Pitman: The point I wish to raise is this.

Mr. Argue: Which side are you on?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am against it, but I think they should have gone in on their own initiative.

Mr. Pitman: If this is a definite system that has been established, and if everybody knows what the criteria are, why should it take this length of time to decide whether or not an area is a surplus manpower area? It took me approximately 45 minutes to look through the Labour Gazette and discover whether Peterborough was. I can see no reason why the minister should have to bring in the whole city council of Peterborough, or the labour officials, to discover this if the criterion is, as the Minister of Labour suggested, based on statistics which have been available since 1953. I think this is something which should be cleared up. It is a matter of some embarrassment. For example, I was questioned by people in my own constituency as to whether the constituency should be named a surplus manpower area, and I simply replied that I had gone through the Labour Gazette. I suggested that maybe other people could convince this government that we need every kind of assistance we could possibly get. I am not saying that this particular type of assistance is going to be much good but nevertheless we grasp at straws in this particular situation. I suggested to those people that they should make every attempt to get assistance but I indicated on the basis of the study I had made that, in the months between November and May in the years 1953 to 1960, in only 66 per cent of those months could this area be classed as a surplus manpower area. Moreover, there were only two months during this period in which this area could be called more than a moderate surplus manpower area.

This is something which should be a matter of some concern. Perhaps the reason that this government has received very few applications is that nobody actually knew what the system was. I think it is about time that we found out exactly what are the criteria and just exactly how we are going to use them. In other words, why was this area declared a surplus manpower area? If it is not going to be based on the statistics which have been available since 1953 in the Labour Gazette, a magazine put out by the Department of Labour, if it is possible we should be told what the basis will be from this point forward.

Mr. Hees: I have sent for the criteria from the Department of Labour. As I have pointed out, the matter of designating surplus manpower areas comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour, and not under mine. I would be very glad to get a statement concerning the criteria and send it over to the hon. member. I think he will agree that the actual designation is not my responsibility. Once an area has been designated a surplus manpower area, then my department handles it. As I say, I have asked for a statement concerning the criteria from the Department of Labour and I will send it over to the hon. member.

Mr. Chevrier: I believe the minister is technically correct in the answer which he just made; it is the Department of Labour which decides—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is a surplus area.

Mr. Chevrier: What is a surplus manpower area; but there is one thing that does clearly come under the minister's department, namely the depreciation aspect. Once an area has been designated as a surplus manpower area, then what can be depreciated is a matter for decision by the Department of Trade and Commerce. I should like to ask the minister what can be depreciated in a depressed or surplus manpower area?

Mr. Hees: I am advised that it is any new machinery, equipment or plant.

Mr. Chevrier: May I just follow that up. Is that over and above the double depreciation for one year in the surplus manpower area, or is it separate and aside—

[Mr. Pitman.]

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman. If a plant is in an area designated as a surplus manpower area then it can apply for double depreciation for one year for new plant, equipment or machinery.

Mr. Chevrier: That applies no matter where an industry is in Canada, for a new product, as it is now?

Mr. Hees: Yes, that is correct, for a new product, but it applies to machinery or plant which is used to manufacture any product.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does it not also apply to plants already in existence in an area that has been designated as a distressed area. The provision for double depreciation will also apply to goods that have heretofore been produced in that area? I want to justifiably depreciate the program of the government, but in fairness I want to indicate some positive features of this plan, as it presents a good picture in principle. If the minister will answer this question I will make my further comment.

Mr. Hees: Yes, it applies in an area designated as a surplus manpower area, to any plant, machinery or equipment that is new, for the manufacture of any product.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was trying to help the minister to indicate that it went further than that. If he will look at the order in council he will find that it applies as well to a plant already in existence in a distressed area and in respect of the production of goods in that plant in that distressed area. But the point is that the program is not going to be of any value whatsoever because this is a program designed to be operative for one year only. Surely it cannot possibly achieve anything approaching a substantial solution to the problem of unemployment or the mitigation of it.

We have had an amazing revelation today from the minister as to the number of applications in respect of those applications that come under his jurisdiction. He has, in addition, given us the number of areas that have made application for the program under the Minister of Labour. But the statistics clearly show how bankrupt this program is. It is inconceivable that a government, faced with the problem of unemployment we have in this country at the present time, should seek to try to put over the house and the people of Canada the impression that this is a program that is really seriously designed to deal with unemployment. I doubt whether any government in Canadian history has ever brought forward a program which on the slightest examination has been revealed to be so inadequate and so unworthy of presentation in this house.

I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that if he alone had the responsibility for this matter I am sure, whatever might have been the weaknesses in the thinking processes that might have accompanied the idea, the program would at least have had much greater substance than this. For the government to think that it can put over the house, the businessmen of the nation and the unemployed of the country the idea that this program designed for one year is capable of doing the job is a simply monstrous suggestion. It is part of the pattern of behaviour of the government from the beginning of this session.

The government will be able to say, "See what we have done. We have brought forward a program of double depreciation. We have brought forward a program to provide for vocational rehabilitation". In fact all the government has done has been to bring forward in a new form an idea and program that have been in existence in this country for 12 years. "See what we have done," the government will say. "We have brought forward the productivity council". But at the same time hon. members opposite do not tell the unsuspecting public that this program is to be effective only in the long range future. "See what we have done," hon. gentlemen opposite will say, "We have brought forward legislation to assist small business," when in fact all they have done has been to bring forward legislation to assist in the improvement of the premises of certain business categories.

I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce this program is not an effective one. This program in principle could be an effective one but it would have to be a program that would give relief by way of accelerated depreciation for an extended period. Why does the minister not do what has been done in England? Why does he not do what has been done in Belgium and in West Germany? In the case of these countries the lowest period prevailing under such programs is, I believe, eight years.

If we had a program that was going to be in existence for a period of eight years there would be some inducement for a company to move from Toronto to Essex county or from Ottawa to Cornwall where there is a serious unemployment problem. In Cornwall over 16 per cent of the work force is out of work. But what company is going to move from Ottawa to Cornwall when all it is going to get is the benefit of this principle of double depreciation for one year?

I say to the government members that they do not like it when we criticize them for not doing anything about unemployment. They characterize our efforts as being those of men who are simply bent on presenting the gloomiest picture and delighting in it. Well, that is an argument but it is not a fair argument; it is not an honourable argument. Today we are face to face with an examination of the government program, a program that was vaunted by the Minister of Finance in the baby budget. The word went out throughout the country that the government at long last had recognized the urgency of the problem and was going to do something along the lines of the program that had been followed in the United Kingdom. It took two and a half months of prodding on our part to elicit from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister some indication as to when this program might be presented, and finally after two and a half months what did we get? This anaemic child, this puny child from a government which represents itself as a giant in its vision and in its desire to meet the problem of unemployment.

I say that there is no program this government has brought forward that has brought it into greater disrepute than this particular program, and that it is no credit to a government that should have brought forward serious legislation in the house.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, the only comment I should like to make is to congratulate the hon. member most genuinely because, after making the identical speech on at least 12 other occasions in the house during this session, he is able again today to simulate that righteous indignation which he is so skilled in simulating. Truly the stage lost a great actor when the hon. member for Essex East decided to go into politics.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, this personal remark is one to which I have no objection. I thank the minister for the compliment, but I want the committee and the country to know that all the minister has said in reply to what I have said is that I have repeated positions formerly taken and that in the repetition I have displayed a histrionic and dramatic skill which he admires. He has said nothing about the substance of my criticism and I can only take it that the fact that the minister sits there now blushing indicates that he recognizes and is greatly embarrassed by the kind of program that the government has brought forward. I say that the minister's silence indicates clearly that down in his heart he knows this is the kind of program with which he wishes he had nothing to do.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if it would be a correct summary of the statistics he gave us to say that out of the applications received by the Department of Labour for areas to be declared to be surplus manpower areas only one area has been so declared—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Cornwall.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and that of the applications for double depreciation there has been none approved yet. Is that correct?

Mr. Hees: I said that out of 28 applications by areas to be designated as surplus manpower areas one was so designated as of April 26 last. We have received 10 applications for double depreciation from areas other than surplus manpower areas. These have all been under very intensive consideration since they were received within the last month or six weeks and we expect to be able to make our decisions very soon.

Mr. Pickersgill: The plain fact is that five months after the introduction of the baby budget absolutely no company in this country is receiving double depreciation at the present time. There is no company whose application has been allowed five months after this program was announced by the Minister of Finance. That is a single sentence summary of the minister's report of progress on this program.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, under item one I should like to refer to another matter which is of particular interest to me and which I am sure has far less political significance than what we have just been discussing. It has to do with the dominion bureau of statistics. The dominion bureau of statistics is certainly a very admirable organization. However, I should like to read a resolution which was passed by the county council in my area. It is in these words:

> Whereas the number of requests for statistical information with accompanying forms required from municipalities from various government departments is steadily increasing, with accompanying demands on municipal officials.
> Whereas these reports increase the work of local staff, necessitating increased personnel with additional cost to the taxpayer. As an example we wish to cite a new monthly form requested under the caption of "Government and Payroll" requested by the dominion bureau of statistics.
> Therefore be it resolved that by unanimous agreement the council of the county of Peterborough in regular session assembled requests the support and co-operation of the dominion and provincial governments in the elimination of duplication and growing volume of statistics required to be filled out by our county and local offices. These reports are increasing the work of local staffs and will certainly require additional staff at our local level in the near future.

This particular resolution was sent to all the counties in Ontario. Within the last couple of weeks or so a stack of letters has been received stating that the councils in all parts of Ontario had unanimously endorsed this resolution. Certainly, our civilization is becoming more complex. We need more and more research and, therefore, more and more statistics. This is not a political situation at all. This situation would obtain if our friends to the left were in office or if our friends across the aisle were to remain in office.

The point is the municipalities are finding the work extremely burdensome. The problem is not one limited to municipalities and counties but is one which businessmen face as well. I feel it is about time we spent less effort trying to devise new forms and more effort trying to get co-operation between the various government departments. An example of the situation which has developed is seen in one statistical form which requests information be sent to the bureau of statistics which has already been transmitted to the provincial government. This form requires from municipalities certain information concerning debenture debt. The county treasurer has to dig out all the records for the year before to secure the information, and this requires hours and hours of labour. The annoying aspect of the matter is that the information has already been submitted. Indeed, I believe in many cases it has already been published.

One county clerk and treasurer of tremendous ability has estimated that 75 per cent of the information being sent to the dominion bureau of satistics has already been submitted to the provincial governments or some other organization. Has the minister something he would like to say by way of reply?

Mr. Hees: Yes, this is an important matter to which the hon. member has referred. I am very glad to be able to advise him that discussions have already begun between the dominion bureau of statistics and the Ontario department of municipal affairs to ascertain whether or not this duplication can be avoided. We are aware of it, and the matter is now in hand.

Mr. Pitman: I do thank the minister for those remarks.

Mr. Hees: I should like to mention also that this matter was brought to my attention by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac, who is keenly interested in this matter.

Mr. Pitman: I am sure that this information will lead me to curtail my remarks. I hope that this meeting will seek to gain the co-operation of the various county clerks and treasurers, who are already overburdened, in doing the best possible job. In many areas the furnishing of this information means calling in extra help and, while this may be one way of creating employment I am not sure it is the best way. I thank the minister for his remarks.

Mr. Peters: Before this vote carries I should like to refer to a matter I mentioned last evening, the desirability of establishing a division of the Department of Trade and Commerce which would have as its goal the establishment of secondary industry in those areas in which, under the private enterprise system, it has not been established because the criterion used is the proximity to markets. Does the minister have something to say on this subject?

Mr. Hees: Yes, I am glad to tell the hon. member, and the members of the committee, about our domestic commerce service which was established in my department last August with an assistant deputy minister in charge. We consider of prime importance the matter of the development of secondary industry in this country. I should like to tell this committee something of the work of the industrial development branch which co-ordinates the federal government activities in the industrial development field. It assists Canadian companies considering expansion or seeking new products to manufacture. In addition, the branch seeks out and assists foreign companies interested in establishing plants in Canada.

The branch works closely in carrying out its functions with provincial governments, municipal bodies, business associations and other agencies interested in industrial development. In addition to supplying general information on domestic markets and trade to businessmen, the branch can provide special statistical information on imports and in the past few years has prepared an extensive number of import studies, the most recent being the study of the imports of chemical products. The branch has also been active in promoting licensing arrangements between Canadian and foreign companies. In this connection, it publishes regularly a bulletin entitled "New Methods and Products for Licensing in Canada". This bulletin lists various products and processes for which foreign companies are seeking Canadian production facilities. Other publications prepared by the branch in response to business requests provide information on taxes, tariffs, sources of financing, forms of business organizations and other matters related to doing business in Canada.

I think the hon. member, and other members, will agree that we are taking this matter very seriously indeed. We are doing everything we can to help new industries become established and to carry on their operations successfully. The branch is ready and willing to receive inquiries, either by mail or in person, from any business firm that wants to come here and talk over matters with us. We believe that the most important means of providing jobs in Canada is by helping the development of secondary industry. I agree with the views expressed by the hon. member last night that this development must be carried forward with all possible speed and I should like to assure him my department will help secondary industry help itself in every possible way we can.

Mr. Peters: I want to thank the minister for his remarks in this context. While this branch of the minister's department is new and has new ideas, it is probably going to be the most important aid to the development of industry in those areas that are now not getting industry. I was wondering whether or not the department has given any consideration to means other than those mentioned. We listened this afternoon to some discussion about one method for aiding industry, namely double depreciation. This is an inducement the government has provided to persuade industry to locate in an area.

Is the government giving consideration to some other methods? I suggest consideration might be given to the various types of inducement used in Great Britain, both during the war and after the war, to induce industry to disperse from overcrowded areas. I think Toronto would probably be in that category in Canada. Has the government investigated the methods used by other countries to move secondary industry into other areas?

Perhaps the word "subsidy" would not be acceptable to the present government and it might look with more favour on the word "inducement". Whatever method is used, it is apparent now in northern Ontario—it was not apparent five years ago—that we are going to have to provide some type of assistance to attract industry into that area, even if we call that state socialism.

We would not want to suggest to the minister that he go this far, but there are other inducements which perhaps have even more acceptable names than compulsory resettlement, or something of that nature, which I am sure could be investigated. I wondered whether the minister and the department are carrying out any investigation along this line. Inducements are going to be necessary, and I think everyone will agree that if a plan were operated on that basis it would make available larger markets for our products.

We suggest that the factory be located close to the natural resource concerned so that the finished product could be exported from that area. There will need to be some encouragement on the part of the government to get industry to change the system.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, when firms indicate to us that they would like to establish branches in Canada, we point out the desirability of moving to areas which are designated as areas of surplus manpower. We do everything we can to try and persuade them to establish their plants in those areas, and we will continue to do this.

We have studied the English system very carefully. Their problems are different than ours, but the result they achieve is very good. We are studying the possibilities of influencing businesses to move to areas where employment is badly needed. I hope we will be able to work out a practical plan along that line in the not too distant future.

Item agreed to.

400. 1961 Decennial census of Canada, $13,539,378.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in connection with this matter, which is one of considerable importance, or at least it has been so described by the government. I should like first of all to refer to a speech made by the Prime Minister on "The Nation's Business" on April 12, 1961. During that speech on television the Prime Minister made the following statement:

> For the first time in Canada's history, you, no matter what your racial origin may be, you have the opportunity of registering as a Canadian.

Mr. Chairman, that is not a true statement. That statement is not only inaccurate, but it is false. I think I can demonstrate that from information which I hold in my hand having to do with the decennial census of 1951 when the previous government was in office.

In the questionnaire which I hold in my hand and which was used in the year 1951, heading 16 is entitled "Citizenship (Nationality)", and the first answer given is "Canada". In other words, every Canadian citizen could describe himself in that fashion, as a citizen of Canada, in the census of 1951 and could answer the question truthfully in no other way.

Therefore I say without hesitation that the Prime Minister's statement is simply not in accordance with the facts and he is obviously seeking to claim credit for something with which his government had nothing to do. This, of course, is characteristic of the present government and I feel the record should be corrected in that respect.

I do, however, think that another statement made by the Prime Minister relating to this matter should be put on the record. This statement can be found at page 749 of Hansard of June 13, 1940. At that time the Prime Minister said:

> My criticism of the census is that, regardless of the number of generations that have elapsed or the admixtures of nationality that have taken place during 40, 50, 75 or 125 years, so long as persons must register under the nationality of their paternal ancestor, there will never be that Canadianism which we wish to establish.

I should like to say a word in connection with that statement. In 1940, when the Prime Minister made this statement, he said there would never be a Canadian spirit as long as our citizens were obliged to declare their ethnic origin. I certainly do not agree with that statement. It shows—I say this with all respect—a deep misunderstanding of the history and traditions of the Canadian people.

Of course, we all want to build and develop a united nation, a united and distinctive Canadian nation; but in order to maintain that unity in our country, diversity is also essential and important. Canadians never wanted to follow the policy and attitudes which existed in the United States melting pot, because there cultural diversity has in effect been banished. I believe we want in Canada, as the Leader of the Opposition has said so often, unity without uniformity.

Those two characteristics of the Canadian nation are reflected in questions 8 and 10. Question 8 asks for our nationality and question 10 for our origin. The first one is intended to stress the unity of our people, and I am sure that when question 8 is asked of those who have received their Canadian citizenship they will be very proud indeed to answer that they are Canadians.

Question 10, on the other hand, stresses the element of diversity which can be found in Canada and which most Canadians, I am sure, desire to preserve. This diversity of cultural origin has been in the past, and will be in the future, a great source of cultural enrichment for Canada.

French Canadians are not the only ones who are proud of their cultural ancestry. So are the English, Scots, Irish, Italian, German, Ukrainian and many others. This can be illustrated by the numerous St. Andrew's societies in all parts of Canada.

We want to continue to be informed, as we have in the past, of the composition and cultural origin of all Canadians, because we are convinced that in maintaining cultural diversity we will strengthen the unity of our country. This question, therefore, does not concern only those Canadians of French origin, but all other Canadians. I am convinced that the government was well advised to change its attitude and restore question 10 as it was in 1951, because the object of this change will prevent any future weakening of that Canadian spirit and unity which all of us in this committee want to see strengthened.

There is another aspect of this matter. It is that there is provided by this question a great deal of information which otherwise could not be obtained. It seems to me that a census should provide the most complete information about the composition of a people and since there are questions here having to do with age, occupation, marital status, religion, geographical distribution, spoken language and urban and rural density of population, why should there not be a question about racial origin? It is equally important to obtain information as to the racial origin of the individual because this is the only means by which Canadians of all ethnic groups can ascertain their numbers and their distribution across Canada. Why, then, should this question not be asked, since it has been asked since 1891? Why take it away now?

Again, the science of sociology requires that the census reveal the ethnic origin of Canadians. Thanks to the information which has been obtained from this question in the census it has been possible for sociologists to prepare and write works of great importance upon the concentration and the diversity of population in urban as well as rural areas. For these reasons I think it was well to restore the question as it was in 1951 and, as I have indicated on a former occasion, I believe the government was well advised in doing what it did. My regret at the moment is that the Prime Minister should have made the statement which he did creating the impression that this was the first time in history when this action has been taken. Such is not the case, as I have attempted to show.

Mr. Hees: I should like to answer the hon. member. With regard to question 10, the hon. member for Laurier said it simply restores the question to the form in which it had originally been presented. On the contrary, I believe we have improved question 10. The way that question is now asked, we are bound to get a correct answer. In other words, we shall have people answering as to their ethnic origin and nothing else. As we all know, the form in which the question was asked in 1951 led to 150,000 people answering incorrectly. They answered either "Canadian" or "unknown", thereby making the final figures incorrect. I think the hon. member will agree that the question as reworded now is greatly improved and I am sure we all welcome this because it is important that these figures as to ethnic origin should be correct.

Mr. Chevrier: That was not the point of my intervention, that is, that the question had been reworded. My point was that the question on racial origins had been asked before. I think I have made it clear that in the census of 1951 both questions 16 and 17 make it evident that Canadian citizenship could be given as an answer to the former question and, of course, racial origin in answer to question 17. There was an attempt made to take that away in the 1961 census. That is why I said, I think with some degree of assurance, that the question had properly been restored.

Mr. Hees: I feel sure that when the Prime Minister spoke on this matter he meant that never before had the question been asked as directly as it is now. It is now impossible for anybody to misunderstand. The question is now "Are you a Canadian"? It is impossible to misunderstand that question and Canadians can answer with a straight "yes". There can be no misunderstanding at all. I am sure that is what the Prime Minister meant.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words to commend the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, in co-operation with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) and other members of the cabinet, had the census form completely revised, as it was not in accordance with scientific requirements.

I should like to read part of a letter from the dominion bureau of statistics, signed by the acting dominion statistician, Mr. Marshall, and I quote:

> Before the 1951 Canadian census, the government then in office had instructed the dominion bureau of statistics to accept "Canadian" and "American" in reply to the question on "Origin".

It will be noted that the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) was then minister of transport and therefore a member of the cabinet. I wonder why he did not protest such a decision at the time.

May I also point out to the house that national organizations such as the Conseil de la vie française and the Societes Saint-Jean-Baptiste have commended the action of the government in setting that matter right and giving much greater force to our statistical data.

Finally, I should like to refer to the remarks made yesterday by the member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). In part of his speech, he used what I think were uncalled for expressions in reference to the people of the province of Quebec. I must point out to the member for Port Arthur that such statements do not contribute to a strong and healthy national unity.

French speaking Canadians have their rights, just as English speaking Canadians have their rights, and if we want a powerful confederation, both groups must co-operate and be fair to each other.

Then too, I should like to emphasize this quotation from a statement made by Mr. Bourguiba, prime minister of Tunisia, during his visit to Canada:

> Communism grows when it can take advantage of intolerable discontent, when feelings of dignity, freedom, justice and equality are trampled on.

I commend those words to the hon. member for Port Arthur, and I also point out to him that, instead of the word "communism", we might perhaps substitute the name of a certain movement which is emerging in part of Canada and which is described as being a national independence movement.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Like the hon. member who has just spoken I should like to take some exception to what I think was—if I shall not be considered disrespectful in referring thus to the hon. member—a rather silly observation made yesterday by the hon. member for Port Arthur. I wish he was here to hear me say that because I felt it was very silly that a gentleman with the cultivation of the hon. member for Port Arthur—and I am not seeking to disparage it because the hon. member is a well educated and cultivated member of the house who frequently makes very valuable contributions to our debate which, like other hon. members, I very much appreciate—should make such observations. But I thought, yesterday, he was really indulging in what I call silliness when he said, for example, that when the census enumerator called around he was going to tell the census enumerator, whether it was question No. 10 or the next question, that he was a Canadian and that this nonsense of ethnic origins, as he called it, in terms of so many of the people of this country does not mean a thing.

That is nonsense, sir, but it is, of course, precisely what the Prime Minister said in 1940 when he was sitting on this side of the house, as the hon. member for Laurier pointed out by reading the quotation he read earlier. I do not know why some people are so anxious to suppress this inquiry into ethnic origin. Nobody is compelled to answer this question. You can say you do not know, and there will be a good many people who do not know. If you want to, at least when you have a Liberal government in this country, you can say you are a Canadian or an Iroquois or anything you like, and you are not going to be haled before the courts. I hope the present minister is not going to take anybody before the courts if he insists his ethnic origin is Canadian.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member is quite correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what Mr. St. Laurent said in the letter to which reference has been made. He said if an individual wanted to declare his ethnic origin as Canadian in this free country he would not be stopped. However, the vast majority of us are quite willing to attempt to give the best answer we can to this question. I admit that a lot of us are a little mixed up about this. I know perfectly well where my paternal grandfather came from; he was born in England, However, if I consider the first of my ancestors who came to Canada from the United States was descended from ancestors who were born in Holland, there is a nice question involved in the case of many of us to the predominant strain, but I suspect that these things iron themselves out, and that we reach a good average cross section by simply taking the ancestry of the paternal line.

What Mr. St. Laurent said in 1951, which was characteristic of his approach to problems of this kind, was that this is a free country and if anyone wants to declare his origin as Canadian, no one would stop him because we do not have a dictatorship. However, for the most part I think people will give the correct answer.

If the hon. member for Port Arthur, as an exercise in eccentricity, wants to have nothing to do with what he calls this nonsense about ethnic origin, I see no objection to that at all. It is his own affair, but I do not really think it is nonsense. I think, even if it were not for the historical problem, as the hon. member for Laurier has mentioned, involving the relationship between the two founding nations of this country on which our whole constitution is based, I think both sides have a right to have the best statistics which are available, and on which many of the conventions in the Canadian constitution rest. I say it is important to have that information as accurately as it can be acquired in a free society. I do not want any thumbscrews used to compel people to say they are one thing rather than another, but I do not feel most people will need that type of persuasion before giving the correct answer.

The hon. member for Port Arthur asked yesterday when we were going to have a chance in this country to be Canadians and to forget about this ethnic nonsense. I do not think a man is a worse Canadian because he is proud of the history of his ancestors in the Ukraine. I do not think a man is a worse Canadian because he admits that his grandfather was born in England. I do not think a man is a worse Canadian because he can trace his ancestry back three centuries to some hamlet, village, seaport, or town in France. I think we are better Canadians for knowing more about ourselves, and I am very surprised that anyone should think the reverse. After all, we are trying to have a varied society, not to be like a lot of peas in a pod.

Then hon. member for Port Arthur also asked this question as reported at page 4305 of Hansard for May 3, 1961:

> But I should like to ask the minister again: when, in Canada, are we going to be able to declare ourselves Canadians and not in terms of citizenship?

I do not know what he meant. If his words are transcribed correctly, I simply cannot figure out what they mean. How else are we going to declare ourselves Canadians except in terms of citizenship? That is what makes us Canadians, our citizenship.

Those of us on this side of the house who supported the hon. member for Essex East when, as secretary of state, he introduced the Canadian Citizenship Act which came into force on January 1, 1947, are very proud that our party happened to be in office and took the initiative in establishing that legislation which removed any doubt about citizenship.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Why did you wait until 1947?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman will have to wait, I should think, until the year 2047 before he is a member of any government and has a chance to do anything.

I might point out, since the hon. gentleman is seeking to introduce a partisan view, which I was attempting to avoid, that one of the reasons this was not done earlier was that the hon. gentleman's party contained a considerable number of people who did not want it done, but who preferred a colonial status to a national status. It has always been the view of Liberal governments that they should not force things down people's throats but should secure the general consent of the vast majority of people. We believe one person has as much right to an opinion as another, whether or not we agree with it. There is no doubt that, notwithstanding the view of what you might call the residual colonials in this country, most of them in the Tory party, there was by 1946 when my friend, the hon. member for Essex East introduced that historic bill, a general consensus among the Canadian people that we wanted to have an undoubted status as Canadian citizens. I think even those residual colonials that were once in the Tory party are nearly extinct now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are two of them left.

Mr. Pickersgill: There may be one or two of them left, but when I hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that old colonial, travelling around the country talking about independence, I realize that even the Tories have made some progress.

I think my friend, the hon. member for Laurier, was right in drawing attention to the statement made by the Prime Minister on April 12 on the television program "The Nation's Business", because that statement was not true. It cannot be fobbed off by saying it has something to do with racial origin. The Prime Minister said that, for the first time this government is allowing people to declare themselves as Canadians. That is not true. The first time individuals were allowed to declare themselves Canadians without any doubt of that status was when the Canadian Citizenship Act was brought into force in 1947, and that was reflected in the census questionnaire of 1951, as my friend the hon. member for Laurier has pointed out, which contained in respect of citizenship the word, "Canada". So that statement made by the Prime Minister was not true. That program is supposed to be the nation's business, not the nation's misinformation. It is impossible to believe that the Prime Minister was so unaware of the facts that he could have made that statement inadvertently, although I hope he did. At any rate, I repeat, that statement is not true.

What is true is that this government misguidedly and at considerable expense to the taxpayer, had printed a lot of forms which have had to be withdrawn and reprinted. While it may be that in technical language the question may now be a little better than it was in 1951, the actual meaning of the question is precisely the same. This government misguidedly tried to do something different and found that it had made a terrible boob. There was violent protest against what it did and, as a result, it did precisely that which was done by the Liberal government in 1951. We are very pleased that the government did this, and we commend hon. gentlemen opposite for their judgment in doing so. There is no controversy about this in the house now except for those extraordinary excursions into the realm of fancy and fantasy—the extraordinary "vols de pigeons" made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am always confused about this racial origin question, and sometimes the hon. member for Port Arthur makes suggestions in this regard which I do not understand. I am pleased to know that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is also in the same category as myself in not having the same mental capacity as the member for Port Arthur. Sometimes we just do not understand what he is saying. This is not his fault, it is ours.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is ours?

Mr. Peters: I am also concerned over the fact that this little group should be attacked all the time.

An hon. Member: You are not objecting.

Mr. Peters: We are not objecting to it very strenuously but it seems surprising that many times we find ourselves in the position of being the opposition of not only one government but two, namely the one we had before and the one we have now. We will bear up under the strain, although at times we find it amazing.

If I can speak only for myself, may I say I am very happy over the fact that we are able to declare our Canadian origin. Also, I am not in complete disagreement with the fact that we are able to indicate what is our ethnic origin, but I think it is a very misleading question to most of us. I think there are really two kinds of people in the world, namely those who are Irish and those who would like to be. Those of us who do not know what we are immediately put down that we are Irish, anyway, and probably this is the reason why the number who declare themselves as of Irish ethnic origin is so large.

Mr. Small: That gives you at least a bit of respectability.

Mr. Peters: I agree that it is probably not the main part of my ethnic origin, it is only a very small part. But it seems to me that some of our claims to origin are rather ridiculous. I had an opportunity to observe this because I worked with a chap at one time who would have told you that he was French. When you checked you found that he was born in Mont Laurier, but his father was a Scotsman and did not speak much French, particularly when he got drunk. At that time he could not say anything in that particular language. The children were raised to speak French. I presume there was a bit of understanding among the family because they did learn some English as well. If you asked that man what was his ethnic origin I am quite sure he would have said French; but they were not French at all. His name was MacMillan. For reasons which we need not go into, for a time he called himself St. Amour and it was a somewhat appropriate name at the time because he spoke English rather badly. This was no fault of his. Until he reached a late age he had spoken only French.

Before very many years go by there will be people who will claim they belong to this ethnic origin or to that, but they will not have my particular background. I think it is true to say, and it will be more true as the years go by, that most of us have not the faintest notion what would be the predominant origin if we were honest about our ethnic origin. I do not think there has been any new blood introduced in my nationality on either side in Canada for five generations. It is so mixed up that I think it would be rather difficult to know—

An hon. Member: You are inbred.

Mr. Peters: We are really not inbred but we certainly are Canadian and are very proud and happy to have this opportunity of declaring it.

I have not seen this year's census form and I should like to ask the minister whether it is similar to the forms which asked various questions about property, the location of property, whether you were in agriculture, how many cows were on the farm, and that sort of thing?

Mr. Hees: Yes. I have sent over to the hon. member a copy of the census form, Mr. Chairman. It is very similar to the form of recent years. Some changes have been made, of which all hon. members have been made aware.

Mr. Peters: This is exactly what I thought it would be. For this reason I want to raise a problem. This problem was raised yesterday in another context, and it is one that I had a great deal of difficulty in following. When I finish discussing it the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will be able to understand as I do, even though he may have been confused yesterday. It relates to this matter of appointing census people.

I have no particular interest in who are appointed from my riding as census commissioners. I should like to read what has been said because I think the parliamentary secretary confused the situation considerably in the minds of the Canadian people when he answered several questions. I should like to refer to the question which was raised on March 29 and which is to be found on page 3445 of Hansard. The question was asked by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, and reads as follows:

1. Are workers being recruited at present for the taking of the census?

2. If so, what method of recruitment is used, and are local offices of the unemployment insurance commission asked to provide personnel for census taking?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, many thousands of Canadians will be employed in the important national undertaking of the 1961 census of Canada this year. Several hundred are being recruited by the civil service commission of Canada to augment regional office staffs of the dominion bureau of statistics across Canada and the head office at Ottawa, and in this phase of the work the commission is following its customary relationship with the national employment service. In addition, some 1,300 commissioners and 27,000 enumerators will be required. The time allowed for replies to starred questions is not such as to permit a detailed description of this procedure, but the house will be interested to hear that this is one of those not too common occurrences in which the present administration is following the same procedure as that followed in the 1951 census of Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: That is not right.

The hon. member went on to qualify it and said:

The present system of appointing a number of commissioners for each electoral district was one with which I had no association whatever.

The reason for that was that only one was appointed at that time rather than four. I am pointing out that in this relationship there was a good reason why it could not have been the same. One of the reasons was that at that time Liberal candidates had the unhappy faculty of getting elected most of the time and there were not so many candidates in the position in which we find some of them today.

We find that questions were asked and raised on three or four occasions. The hon. member for Port Arthur raised the matter on March 29. It was raised again on April 16 by the hon. member for Kootenay West. The question raised, and it has been confused, is that now there are four commissioners who are not really census takers but are responsible for the appointment of the census takers, and they will be in complete charge in a particular area, and they will be responsible for that area.

I should like to take a look at my own particular area by way of illustration. In fact, let us look at two areas with which I am quite familiar, namely my own riding of Timiskaming and the electoral district of Timmins. I hold in my hand a release of the list of census commissioners appointed, to be released at 8.00 a.m. on April 11, 1961. On page 16 we find reference to Timiskaming and the first commissioner is stated as being Mr. C. Foster Rice, Haileybury, Ontario. Mr. C. Foster Rice was the Conservative candidate in the last two federal elections. He is very interested in politics in my area and he is capable of operating a political machine, as he has proved on several occasions. By no stretch of the imagination is he politically disinterested in the results of the census or in any other results in the riding of Timiskaming.

Reference is then made to Mr. James Aubrey Waterhouse, Elk Lake. Mr. Waterhouse has been Conservative organizer in that area for many years. He has great capabilities. I can visit Mr. Waterhouse before an election and find out within three votes how many votes I am going to get and how many votes all the other candidates are going to get. He knows exactly where they stand. He is by no means a disinterested political observer in my area.

Mr. Chambers: He knows the district pretty well.

Mr. Peters: He knows the district inside and out, and after he has finished this job he will know what everybody in that area earns, what they own and many other particulars.

Then there is Mr. George M. Hodgson of Englehart to whom reference is also made. I suggest the reason his name is there is that his wife is the president of the Timiskaming riding Conservative association. By no stretch of the imagination is he a disinterested and impartial observer of the political or economic scene in the riding of Timiskaming. Mr. James R. McDougall of Kirkland Lake who is mentioned next is and has been for many years connected with politics in an active way and cannot be declared to be an impartial observer of the political scene.

An hon. Member: Did you recommend him?

Mr. Peters: Obviously I did not recommend him. If I had been asked to do this I would have recommended people who are as impartial as possible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: Let hon. members not laugh because this is no laughing matter as far as I am concerned. The people of my riding are to be asked all these questions and I take violent exception to these political appointments being made for the obtaining of this information. I would suggest to anybody in Timiskaming who has any political sense at all that they do not answer any of these questions because the information will be used against them in a political way in the future. This information is advantageous to a political party for political reasons and there is not going to be the secrecy there should be with regard to the answers to the questions that are asked on this page. They are quite detailed and particular questions.

I suggest that no one should laugh at this matter. People of the greatest impartiality are required because it is essential that the answers to the questions be completely honest. Conservative members can laugh all they like. Canadians are going to have to spend a lot of money to conduct this census and I am sure they want to get the most impartial, accurate and complete picture possible. I suggest that anyone who gives information of this sort to some of these political hacks is stupid, and I do not believe the people of Timiskaming are stupid.

Let us take the riding of Timmins with which I am fairly familiar. The first names here are Mrs. Hilda Weir of Matheson and Mr. Charlie Shields of South Porcupine. I will not say anything about Mrs. Weir. If she had been listed under her husband's name I might have known her but I do not know her by her own first name and therefore am not going to comment. Mr. Charles M. Shields has been mayor of South Porcupine and a staunch Conservative for many years. He is in a position to know almost everybody in the area personally. He has been there for many years, and while I am not prepared to say that he has been closely enough connected with the operations of the Conservative party in that area to cause me much grief I am not quite sure that the same thing would be true of the hon. member for Timmins.

Mr. Thomas Gregory Carswell of Timmins is also a well known and outspoken Conservative. He has attended Conservative conventions in that area for many years. His family has been closely connected with the nomination of candidates and in my opinion he is in a position to make political use of this appointment.

The last name in area D is Mr. J. Emile Brunette. Again, who could be appointed from the Conservative party who would be closer to the political scene than J. Emile Brunette? He was not always a Conservative. He could have had this appointment as a Liberal because he ran as Liberal candidate several times and as the mayor of Timmins for several years was well known as a Liberal. However, in recent times of changing environment in the town of Timmins he became a Conservative and ran as a Conservative candidate in the last election against the sitting member for Timmins. Perhaps he might have been elected as a Liberal but after a person changes his party it is very difficult for him to be elected.

Each of these appointments has been a political one. I do not know what the government thinks about it. I do not know why the government should have done this. It is interesting to note that Mr. Grosart was in my area and disrupted the town council, probably resulting in the resignation of the mayor of the town. Certainly there are going to be some other changes. Mr. Grosart made several important statements, but I suggest that the reason he was there was to talk to these people about the appointments that were to be made.

I suggest that if you check the Toronto papers you will find that in the last few days there has been speculation that there can be no by-elections in Ontario this year because the whole Conservative machine will be engaged in conducting the census and will not have the time to run by-elections. This is true in my part of the country although we do not need a by-election. Certainly looking at this list it is evident that the whole hierarchy of the Conservative party is engaged in the census.

Mr. Charlton: No, there are many more than that.

Mr. Peters: I do not think so. In my riding we have the president, the candidate and two of the regional directors. There are only about four others and I presume they will be compensated by being appointed to take part in conducting the census. We will have the whole hierarchy in the area participating.

I am not questioning the ability of these people because they all have proven ability. All I am questioning is how you can obtain impartiality when you have people going around taking the census and politicking at the same time. Goodness knows, they are no different from us. We do not visit a dozen or two dozen homes without somebody inquiring about the situation in relation to the price of wheat or whatever the matter may happen to be.

These people will be politicking more than they will be taking the census. I say it is damned irresponsible of the government to try to conduct the census through the use of a political party machine. I agree entirely with the member for York-Scarborough that this is irresponsible. I do not think there could be anything more irresponsible than to use a political machine for this job. I would much rather have civil servants do the job. However, I think there are enough capable people who are sufficiently impartial that they would have no reason to divulge or to use the information obtained through this form. There are many people in my area who are impartial, even, surprisingly and unfortunately, with regard to politics. They are responsible people and they would be in a position to conduct the census. I am thinking of teachers who will not be engaged after the end of June, university students and other people who are unemployed.

Mr. Charlton: They are not unemployed.

Mr. Peters: That is perhaps true. I stand corrected. They are not unemployed but they are not working at their normal jobs and are available to do this type of work. Many of the questions asked are very technical and complicated and teachers would probably have more success in having them answered than the plain ordinary politicians who will be conducting this survey in the ridings of Timiskaming and Timmins. If we are to be expected to permit these things to be done, then we are going to have to be given some assurance that there will be impartiality.

How many of my farmers are going to be asked a lot of pertinent questions about their farming operations? How many of them are going to like it if they know a political candidate is going to see all these figures and is going to know how they stand in relation to their business? We do not know, and it is just an assumption that the census is going to be completed as it has been completed in the past. I am strongly advocating, Mr. Chairman, that not only the people of Timiskaming but the people of Canada take a very close look at this matter before they answer any of these questions that are of a technical nature which have a bearing on their business or occupation. These answers could be used and will be used against them or for them, or at least if any political candidate wishes to use them they will be used because the answers will be observed by a political candidate.

I believe this government should be asked these questions which I put to this minister of the government through you, Mr. Chairman. Will you publish all this information? Will you take the names of the people and publish the information on a riding basis so that I can see what John Smith owns or how many cows John Smith has? Will you publish this so everyone can see this information? If you answer that you will not, then I suggest you have no right, in all decency, to allow this information to be seen and to be examined by people who are dedicated to a political party. I do not believe this is an unreasonable stand. I think we have a right to some impartiality in the commissioners. We are well aware of the fact that at the bottom level, that is the level at which the information is secured, there will be people who are interested in politics. I have no objection to that. However, I have great objection, Mr. Chairman, to this being done by those people who are in a position to use this material for political purposes.

I believe the Canadian people, and certainly the newspapers of this country, should be violently upset about this. The newspapers should request some type of protection for the Canadian people. Some of this information does not even appear in income tax forms. If it is going to be asked for, then the government will have to respect the secrecy. There should be an assurance given to the people that the government is not going to secure this information through the people it has appointed. I have suggested that the four commissioners appointed in my area are all political people, people who are not only conscious of politics—as we wish everybody to be —but are actively engaged in working with one political party. They have been appointed and are being paid as political patronage. This is wrong. I do not believe this situation is conducive to the judicious handling of the census and will not result in the full and reasonable disclosure of the business of each and every one of the Canadian people.

If there is to be impartiality, then I am sure the minister will get up and say he is sorry, that he did not go around and collect these people, but that the national organizer of his party did. He will say he disagrees with this practice and it should not be part of the political campaign for the next election, as it so obviously is. If the minister believes in obtaining these figures in an impartial manner, then I am sure he is going to stand up and say he disagrees with the appointment of these people if it can be proved that these facts are true.

Mr. Hees: I think we have just heard one of the most irresponsible statements heard in this chamber for a long time. This is the kind of speech you expect to hear in a place other than the parliament of Canada. I am rather shocked that the hon. member should have delivered such a speech. According to the hon. gentleman, you cannot trust anybody in his riding but him.

The people who have been chosen to carry out this most important task of taking the census are very highly respected people in all parts of the country, otherwise they would not have been chosen. They have been chosen on the basis, first of all of a good education; professional or business experience in a supervisory capacity; knowledge of the district; tact; good judgment and ability to deal with the people.

The hon. member has spoken about the matter of secrecy. If we can believe what he says, the information that these census takers have been gathering will be used only for their own information, for their own, personal gain. This is one of the most ridiculous statements I have ever heard, and I have heard quite a few. This matter of secrecy is dealt with in the Statistics Act. I should like to quote from section 15 of that act, as follows:

No individual return and no part of an individual return made, and no answer to any question put, for the purposes of this act, shall, ... be published ...

It has been mentioned, too, that the census taker takes an oath of secrecy. An oath of secrecy is a very serious matter. It is not something people take lightly. The people who have been chosen are serious and respectable people, and when they take an oath of secrecy they are doing so in a very serious way.

I should like to mention the penalties that are imposed on any of those who are census takers and who break these regulations so far as secrecy is concerned. The penalties are outlined in section 34 of the Statistics Act as follows:

Every person employed in the execution of any duty under this act or any regulation who,

(a) after having taken the prescribed oath, deserts from his duty, or wilfully makes any false declaration, statement or return touching any such matter;

(b) in the pretended performance of his duties thereunder, obtains or seeks to obtain information that he is not duly authorized to obtain; or

(c) fails to keep inviolate the secrecy of the information gathered or entered on the schedules and forms, and who, except as allowed by this act and the regulations, divulges the contents of any schedule or form filled in, in pursuance of this act or any regulation, or any information furnished in pursuance of this act or any regulation; is guilty of an offence and is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding three hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

I think I have outlined very clearly the qualifications of these people. I think I have made it clear that they have been chosen with great care. They are very highly respected people in their communities. They are given a very strict code of ethics to guide them in the performance of their duty. If any of them should not perform that duty properly, there are penalties prescribed. As I say, they are all required to take an oath of secrecy. People of the calibre of those who have been chosen to carry out this important task take an oath of secrecy as a serious matter.

I do not believe I have to deal with this matter any further, Mr. Chairman. I think the remarks of the hon. member were in extremely poor taste. I think the hon. member is casting a reflection, in a completely unjustified way, on the very fine people across this country who are going to be carrying out a very important task indeed. I can assure the hon. member and the people of Canada that in my view this census will be taken well and none of the things which dwell in his imagination will take place.

If there is any instance of anything of this kind taking place, there are very definite rules, regulations and penalties prescribed for them. I very much hope that none of these penalties will be needed. I do not think they will.

I hope we will not again hear this kind of speech from the hon. member or any other hon. member. The hon. member's remarks were derogatory and unfair to those people who are chosen to carry out such an important task in the future.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make it very clear that I have no reason to cast any aspersions on any of these people.

An hon. Member: Then don't do it.

Mr. Ricard: Shut up then.

Mr. Peters: If the aspersion is that they belong to a political party and are very actively engaged in that political party, then I make it.

Mr. McGee: You made a specific allegation that these people will break their oath. The record will show that.

Mr. Peters: I certainly make no allegation that they will break their oath.

Mr. Hees: You did.

Mr. Peters: I said they would use this information and obviously they will. They will have to use it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: Let us not split hairs, Mr. Chairman. Let us make it really clear. I am not saying they are going to assemble all this information and use it as a report, or anything of that nature.

This is exactly what I am saying, that through this they are going to gain knowledge of certain things that many people would not tell them under other circumstances. If I am making any allegation, it is against the political party's organization that will set up this type of census machine.

My allegation is not against these people. I know many of them. I agree entirely with the minister that they are highly qualified, very capable people and they have integrity. I know all the people I mentioned in my riding and I have great respect for their ability. I also know that the information they get will be of some assistance to them, as it would be to anybody else, as even the published section of this document will be of value to each and every hon. member of this committee who takes the trouble to read the census in its general form.

I want to make it very clear that I do not cast aspersions on these people, but only on the system of appointment which allows only one political party to be chosen in an area, and because this is the criterion of choice in that particular area.

Mr. Hodgson: It is probably because nobody in the C.C.F. qualifies.

Mr. Peters: I do not suggest that supporters of the C.C.F. be chosen either. I think there are many people who could be chosen. I have outlined one category of people who could be chosen for this work, which would not result in this type of action.

On previous occasions when the census was taken in my area, this was done. I very seldom, if ever, have to give credit to the Liberal party for being politically impartial; but so far as I know, this was done in the last census.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: You can say that again.

Mr. Peters: This was done in the last census in my particular area. I know several of the people who were closely concerned with it. I do not know their political backgrounds, and I do not think this was the reason it was done. In spite of the assurance the minister has given, I still think some consideration should be given to this matter, and this census should not be one of the government's political patronage machines. This government has an excellent record of disposing of patronage. It has disposed of political patronage in many, many fields—I say this in all fairness—in which people previously enjoyed political patronage. I think this government is hurting itself as well as the operation of this census taking in pointing out to all the people across the country that political patronage is the basis upon which appointments are being made on this occasion.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words, just to clear the record, on the point the hon. member raised. The hon. member made specific allegations concerning certain persons in his district who have been appointed to these posts. I suggest to the hon. member—and perhaps some hon. members in this committee can give me guidance in this—that if he made that type of statement against these people outside the house, it would be libelous.

The minister read the specific terms of the oath, and the hon. member alleged that these people would take certain action with the information they obtained, which would be completely contrary to that oath. The hon. member has indulged in character assassination of individuals in his constituency and census takers across this country.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the remarks of the hon. member, I note that this kind of statement was made two or three days ago in this chamber by the same hon. member with probably no greater justification than today. I am quite happy to await the result of the record of the discussion today to ascertain what the situation is.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a few words. I want to support a statement made by the hon. member for Timiskaming. From experience in my own constituency I can say that in the appointment of census commissioners during the last election by that government there were members of two different political parties. Also, members of all parties were appointed, so far as I can recollect, as census enumerators. I think they were quite fair in that respect.

We have discovered the reason why no C.C.F. members have been appointed. The hon. member for the Ontario riding of Victoria frankly said that the government does not think they are qualified. I do not know whether the same applies to the Liberals. We can say definitely that the government does not think any of the C.C.F. party in Canada qualify to act as census commissioners. We had that fact established from the words of the hon. member.

Mr. Hodgson: I did not say any such thing. I did not mention the government, or any government.

Mr. Herridge: You said "we".

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, if I may clear up this matter, as I heard it the hon. member for the Ontario riding of Victoria, said, "Probably no C.C.F. qualify".

Mr. Herridge: No, he said "we".

Mr. Hodgson: I did not; I said "probably".

Mr. Herridge: I may have misheard, Mr. Chairman. However, in my constituency the census commissioners are all Conservatives, and they are excellent people; I know them all. But my point was this. First of all we have among Conservatives—who have brought this to my attention as well as others—and among members of other parties, persons who are capable, qualified and who could very well do with this $1,200 for six week's work.

This is our argument. It is not whether they should be Conservative, or what their politics should be. For instance, in my constituency two of the gentlemen appointed—they are excellent persons; I know them well; they are highly respected—are members of one of the most successful legal firms in the district. But there are, shall I say qualified and competent Conservatives who would just love to have the opportunity to supplement their income, which in many cases is very small at the present time, by $1,200 for six week's work.

As the hon. member for Timiskaming said, the government can be given credit in many quarters for its opposition to the practice of patronage. The former minister of public works was an excellent example. One knows the pressure which is exerted. We are all human, and after a party has been out of power for 20 years it is quite human to get your own friends into these positions where possible.

Under normal circumstances this would possibly not draw so much criticism, but under the present circumstances, when there are people who need this extra bit of work both as census commissioners and census enumerators, I say we have to look at it as Canadians and not as partisans.

My concluding words are that I do hope the census commissioners will be instructed to appoint as enumerators capable, competent persons, regardless of politics, who need this extra income during these very difficult times.

Mr. Thomas: I think this is an opportune time for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to assure the members of this committee and thus the people of Canada that the information to be gathered during the course of the census will not and cannot be used for the purpose of computing income tax. There have been some fears expressed along those lines by the people in my area and I believe that any assurance which can be given by the minister and by the government, and strongly emphasized throughout this country, would have the effect of reassuring the people when the census enumerators come around to gather information.

Mr. Hees: I am glad to assure the hon. member and other members of this committee that the information deriving from the taking of the census cannot be used for income tax purposes or for the enforcement of any law or bylaw. This information is strictly for use of the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have one question to ask. Is it not true that recourse is had to this information for the purpose of ascertaining the date of birth for the purpose of old age pension payments, for example, if no other means is available?

Mr. Hees: I am advised that individuals can have access to the record of their birth date, but nobody else.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the minister will not mind my correcting him by saying that where an individual applies, say, for an old age pension and there is some dispute as to age, the old age security division of the Department of National Health and Welfare exercises the right which it has under the statute, on assigned authority, to examine the records of the bureau for the purpose of obtaining information as to the age of the applicant.

Mr. Hees: I think that is, in effect, what I said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister must not resent my helping him.

Mr. Hees: I always welcome help from the hon. member for Essex East. Information as to a person's own birth date can be given to him or to somebody else on his signature.

Item agreed to.

National energy board—
401. Administration, $544,970.

Mr. Thomas: On item 401, I have recommended action on other occasions to permit the amendment of the National Energy Board Act by incorporating in it section 273 of the Railway Act. When the National Energy Board Act was passed in 1959, section 273 of the Railway Act was omitted. The National Energy Board Act includes sections 207 to 246 and section 248 of the Railway Act but section 273 was omitted. The sections of the Railway Act which were included in the National Energy Board Act deal with the acquisition and expropriation of land for purposes of right of way.

The amendment would make pipe lines at present under federal charter subject to provincial drainage laws in the same way as pipe lines which operate under provincial charter. Pipe lines involved in municipal drainage schemes would be treated like those of any other property owner, being subject to assessment and so on. Their owners would enjoy the right of appeal to the courts if they wish to have such assessments adjusted. Owners of pipe lines would be made responsible for any added cost to a municipal drainage scheme caused by their presence or operations.

The provisions which are requested to be incorporated in the Railway Act would be of great assistance to individual farmers and municipal drainage schemes especially in the area of southwestern Ontario which I represent. This proposal to include section 273 of the Railway Act in the National Energy Board Act came to me from the drainage engineering firm of Archibald, Gray and McKay of London on behalf of the township of Adelaide. This request has been endorsed by the association of Ontario land surveyors, by the Middlesex county council, by the Ontario minister of highways acting in his capacity as chairman of the special committee of the Ontario legislature which was set up to inquire into expropriation proceedings for land in Ontario, by the township of East Williams, by the Ontario federation of agriculture and by the township of London, Middlesex county.

I intend to let one or two of these endorsers argue the case for me. The association of Ontario land suveyors at its meeting held in Hamilton on February 15, 16 and 17, 1960 passed a resolution endorsing this proposal. May I say that this association is an important body whose members undertake the engineering in connection with most of the drainage work carried on in the province of Ontario. I intend to read an excerpt from the report of this annual meeting. It refers to a question which is the second of a series of questions placed before the meeting for endorsation by the drainage committee of the association. The excerpt reads as follows:

Mr. Stidwell: The second question is rather involved, and I shall try to explain the question before I read it. Under subsection 22 of section 8 of the Municipal Drainage Act, public utilities are responsible for the increased cost of drainage work caused by the construction and operation of such public utilities. There is some doubt as to the application of this subsection where a public utility holds a dominion charter. Railways were made responsible for the increased cost of a drain caused by the operation of the railway company by an amendment to the Railway Act early in the twentieth century—see section 273 of the Railway Act. Recently we have had a number of oil pipe lines and gas pipe lines constructed across our province, and a number of these pipe line companies operate under a dominion charter. So we are up against the problem: are these companies responsible for the additional costs of drainage work caused by their operations? Certain sections of the Railway Act were incorporated in the Pipe Lines Act, but this all important section 273, which made the railway companies liable for the increased cost in drainage work, was omitted. Last fall the National Energy Board Act was passed, and section 71, subsection 1 of that act, incorporates sections 207-246, and also section 248, of the Railway Act but this all important section 273 was left out.

The question now is: "Should section 71, subsection 1, of the National Energy Board Act be amended by the addition of section 273 of the Railway Act to read—'Sections 207-246, 248 and 273 of the Railway Act'; in other words should these pipe line companies be responsible for the increased costs to drainage work caused by their operation?" The committee's answer to this question is: "Yes". And we would recommend that this association go on record as being in favour of this amendment to the existing legislation. I move the adoption of the committee's answer to this report with this request.

Later that report was adopted at the annual meeting of the Ontario association of land surveyors.

In addition to that I would like to read a letter directed to the former minister of trade and commerce, now Minister of Veterans Affairs, written by Honourable F. M. Cass, the minister of highways for Ontario. This letter is dated August 22, 1960 and reads as follows:

At the last session of the legislature of Ontario a select committee was appointed to investigate and inquire into the laws of expropriation in this province. I have had the privilege of being appointed chairman of the select committee and it is in that capacity that I wish to bring to your attention a problem which was placed before the select committee.

I am advised that a submission has been made to you by W. H. A. Thomas, Esq. the member of parliament for Middlesex West, requesting that the National Energy Board Act be amended so as to make section 273 of the Railway Act of Canada applicable to pipe line companies incorporated under the provisions of federal legislation. As you are probably already aware, the above mentioned section of the Railway Act would make the pipe line companies responsible for any interference with drainage in the provinces as are any railways, public utilities or other such bodies; the problem would appear to be so reasonable that one would almost think that the omission was accidental rather than intentional. The interference which may be created in both municipal and provincial drainage schemes by the construction of a pipe line is very serious and can in certain circumstances cause great expense to both local land owners and the ratepayers of the province.

On behalf of the select committee may I urgently request that this proposed amendment receive your favourable consideration and, ultimately, submission to parliament for its consideration.

We have the anomalous situation in Middlesex West of four pipe lines crossing the riding, three operating under Ontario provincial charter and one under national charter. In respect of the three, when a farm or municipal drain has to be carried across the pipe line the pipe line company is compelled to pay the cost of such crossing. However, in respect of the fourth, which operates under federal charter, the pipe line company does not have to pay for the crossing. The practice of the national energy board has been to award these crossing permits with the expense to be borne by the municipal drainage authority. I should mention that costs of drainage crossings have run as high as $7,000 to $8,000 each. I would suggest that it is unreasonable to have pipe lines in one area operating under similar conditions treated in different ways.

Without taking any more time I would urge upon the minister the necessity for expedition in the consideration which is now being given this matter by the national energy board, and would suggest that an amendment be made to the National Energy Board Act incorporating section 273 of the Railway Act.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member that I will report his suggestions to the energy board members, two of whom are sitting with me now, and that I will give more attention to this matter than is being given to it at the present time.

Supply—Trade and Commerce

Mr. Chairman, may I also take this opportunity of seeking permission to place on the records of Hansard a table showing the comparative sales of salted cod which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twilingate requested earlier this afternoon?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful to the minister for having this prepared so expeditiously and for his courtesy in letting me have an extra copy of it. I am sure it will be very helpful.

The Chairman: Does the committee consent to having this document printed at this point in the proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The table above referred to is as follows:]

Stocks of salted cod as of March 31st, 1961, are as follows:

wet salted cod	14,485,000 lbs.
dried salted cod	14,919,000 lbs.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a moment of the committee's time to say a word about the energy board itself. I should like to congratulate the members of that board and the chairman, as well as its staff, for the manner in which they have carried out their function since the board's establishment. Their success is certainly a great credit to themselves and to the system which was introduced in the establishing of the National Energy Board Act. I know that all hon. members of the committee, as well as members of the petroleum industry and consumer alike, agree that this has been a very successful operation.

I am sure the minister is aware that in a very short time the term of office of the present chairman of the board will expire. I believe that office of the present incumbent carries a two year term. I do not suggest that the other members of the board are not capable of replacing the present chairman but, in the interest of the board and in view of the chairman's past experience, I suggest it would be desirable that the government negotiate with the province of Alberta so that Mr. McKinnon's appointment can be extended for another two year period. I realize that there are difficulties in this connection but I am sure the members of the board would be the first to concur that this would be a good step.

I would like to say a word about the national oil and gas policy which is administered by the board. I had the privilege in 1957 of expressing in this house the hope that I would some day see the establishment of a national oil and gas policy, and the development of a program which would encourage the industry to voluntarily correct its own problems by increasing the domestic and foreign markets for Canadian crude oil. This government's administration in this regard adopted the lesser of two severe policies, on the one hand to take no action at all and allow the industry to find its own level, or to establish fairly severe control for imports of oil. While I have always advocated the eventual construction of a pipe line, I nevertheless agree that the course followed by the board in introducing a voluntary program is more appropriately suited to the present need. As has been pointed out, this program will provide a level of production, in terms of barrels that the construction of a pipe line would produce in the two year period yet to elapse.

What I do ask the minister and the chairman of the energy board, however, is that when they are making assessments in the future for targets beyond 1963, they make the calculations well in advance based on the returns of oil company refineries. We should keep in mind the factor of growth which is going to be substantial; for I am inclined to believe that while the present policy has been a sound one the targets were perhaps a bit low. Nevertheless there is no question that the policy as such has provided tremendous benefits to the industry, first of all by providing orderly regulation of oil production in the producing areas by establishing, of course, firm contracts for the marketing of oil not only in Canada but in terms of United States markets as well.

It has been said in this house and outside that to some degree this policy is going to be dependent on our success in moving oil into the United States. I hope that this is not entirely true, but quite obviously if the policy is to be successful it will have to work on the assumption that we are going to be able to sell more oil in the Ontario market and thus replace crude oil from foreign sources. I am happy to be able to say that indications are that the Ontario market has shown the largest increase we have seen for some time, an increase of 20,000 barrels a day over the same period one year ago.

What is also particularly significant is that many people who said that this policy could not work now agree that it is not only going to work but it has already proved successful in terms of total production. The first six months indicate there is no doubt that the target will be reached. In fact we are not too far off the total target for the year. Therefore, I say to the minister that he and his colleagues should be congratulated on introducing a policy which in the long run is going to assist the industry. I say to him that in making assessments for the future, in so far as targets are concerned, we must be absolutely certain that we relate the total targets to the development of the industry and that we do not in any way underestimate this development and thus make the targets for the future too low.

The other point I should like to make is that there are a number of areas which concern the government's relation to the petroleum and natural gas industry. In the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys we have a very effective geological survey. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources administers legislation and regulations relating to Canadian oil and gas. I will argue, as I have done before, that in this parliament we should attempt to put all of these matters having to do with hydrocarbons, in fact all of the energy sources, under one department and one administration to avoid duplication of effort and to be able to build up a staff which can adequately look after the problems related to the industry, because I know some of the difficulties in obtaining staff for the national energy board and, of course, for the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I would hope that some day we shall see the national energy board having authority over the Canada oil and gas regulations; for it would only seem logical that this phase of the oil development program should come under one particular division.

I wish to make it very clear that I am not suggesting any minister of the crown have the responsibility for all of this; I am merely saying that we should give some thought to taking all the segments of the petroleum and gas industry and putting them under a single responsibility, as has been done in a great many countries similar to Canada.

Finally, may I say to the minister and to the board that I am certain when the minister expresses his belief that this policy could work he should nevertheless emphasize that if the targets are not reached the government will have no other course but to, as I understand it, implement section 87 of the energy board authority. This is indeed assurance enough to the petroleum industry and the people of Canada as a whole that the government intends to make its policy work and in this we congratulate the minister and wish him every success.

Mr. Broome: I wish to take about one minute to reinforce many of the points made by the hon. member for Calgary South and also to say how much we owe the minister for having taken a firm stand in regard to quotas set for the oil and gas industry. I think the results that have been produced occurred only because the industry knew that the minister was not fooling and that they were going to reach those targets or quotas would be imposed. It was only when they came to that conclusion that they started to give the co-operation that has been evident and has resulted in such a major increase in oil production in Canada.

The minister deserves the highest credit for having made the position of the government crystal clear in this regard and for having gained the co-operation of the industry to the end that we would get a fair share of our own market and have exports to compensate in some small way for the imports which we are accepting.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. We shall now turn to the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

(Translation):

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, on April 21, I think it was, I was just on the point of quoting an excerpt from the fifth volume pubished by the Societe historique de Saint-Boniface when the chairman called it five o'clock.

I am speaking in French tonight because the other day, the brief remarks I made in English were ascribed to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) and since the hon. member speaks only one language, I do not think there will be any mistake this time.

The excerpt I wanted to quote the other day—it is on page 29 of volume 5 which I have just mentioned—was from a letter written by Msgr. Tache, then bishop of St. Boniface. In that letter, Bishop Tache refers to the building which had been constructed before 1846 for the reception of the Grey Nuns. Here is what Bishop Tache had to say:

The deeply Christian families of St. Boniface find satisfaction in the fact that their daughters enjoy educational facilities similar to those available to their sons.

[Mr. Broome.]

The Sisters of Charity, or Grey Nuns, operate a school for girls in St. Boniface; by a special Providence, those devoted nuns were able to erect a large and beautiful building entirely for educational purposes.

They have a boarding school and a day school, and they train teachers in their normal school; 18 nuns are full-time teachers and 300 children attend the classes.

Our laws on education, so sound and in keeping with the real sense of freedom, promote the Christian education of our young people.

This is what Bishop Tache could say in 1888 about our education laws. Unfortunately, the situation has changed a great deal since 1890, but I believe that one day the education system in Manitoba will be restored to what it was in 1888.

Referring in his letter to charitable works, Bishop Tache mentioned this:

Charitable activities cannot be wanting wherever there are Sisters of Charity.

The old building, birthplace of those organizations in St. Boniface, is still the same one which was erected by Msgr. Provencher. It is Vicarial House in which the novitiate is located and around which eventually were built an orphanage, a home for disabled women and a hospital.

Now, this house, already described as an old one in 1888 by Bishop Tache, is I believe the oldest house in western Canada. It is located on Tache street in St. Boniface.

I am happy to learn that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is giving earnest attention to this historic building. I understand certain amounts will be voted for its preservation.

The house has been entrusted to a museum committee in St. Boniface. I am not sure, but I also think that the city of St. Boniface is prepared to vote a substantial amount for the conversion of this house into a museum, and for its maintenance.

I hope the government of the province of Manitoba will do likewise so as to help preserve this historic building.

I believe that monuments and museums are important to keep alive the history of a nation.

In my view, the history of the province of Manitoba ranks with that of any other area in America. We remember that La Verendrye in 1735, had already travelled over most of the territory of the prairies. We know that settlers who came over from Scotland in 1812, 1813 and 1815 developed that area.

Manitoba has many historians, for example, Father Dugas, one Mr. Tasse, Alexander Ross, Joseph James Hargrave, Donald Gunn, Alexander Begg, George Bryce, R. B. Hill, F. H. Schofield, Miss Margaret McWilliams and Mr. W. L. Morton, a professor at the university.

Apart from the historical society of St. Boniface, I think there is in Winnipeg an historical society which also has been interested in the history of the province of Manitoba.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is most important for the citizens of the province of Manitoba, as well as for all Canadians, to have some knowledge of the history of the province of Manitoba. In fact, if the history of that province were better known to Canadians, it would be easier to maintain harmony in this country.

When those hardy Scotch pioneers came to Canada, they stopped at York Factory, in the fall of 1811. They were able to spend the winter there before proceeding on their trip to the Red river which they reached only the following autumn.

Since winter was too cold and food was lacking, they had to establish quarters 70 miles south of Red river, in the village of Pembina, where the population was almost exclusively French Metis. In order to survive, those Scotch settlers had, on three occasions, to seek shelter with those French Metis of Pembina. However, one year there was a shortage of food even in that village and all the settlers, men, women and children alike, had to make for the prairies, in the snow, so as to try to find a group of Metis hunters who might provide them with shelter and food.

That is what those pioneers did.

I might add that one year there was so much snow that horses could not be used on the prairies, the buffaloes had wandered away and the people of Pembina village could not survive. They, in turn, had to seek food from the Scotch pioneers who, having become farmers, had managed to keep enough wheat and flour to save the other settlement from starvation.

This lesson from history proves that people need one another and that if the descendants of those Scotch pioneers are still living today, it is thanks to the help their forefathers received from the people of those villages who numbered about 500 in 1821. It is true that the Scottish pioneers were somewhat less numerous but, by helping one another they managed to beat the great poverty and depression that prevailed in those days.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to dwell overlong on that subject. I simply wish to thank the minister for what he has already done and urge him to solve the problem, to try to obtain for the citizens of St. Boniface that house where we may preserve, before they are all lost, the historical records we now have in our possession.

Mr. Chairman, while there have been many historians of that period it may be pointed out also that there was a poet by the name of Pierre Falcon, who once lived in Pembina and who later moved to a place called While Horse Plains, which in 1824 became St. François-Xavier.

That poet wrote songs on all the great historic events that took place in the province at that time. I therefore feel that someday we might consider erecting a monument to that first poet of western Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join the hon. member for St. Boniface in his appeal to the minister for the aid of the historic sites and monuments board and the other facilities of his department in the preservation of the relics of the early history of the Canadian west before it was even Canadian. I do so with a certain amount of local pride. As an old schoolboy of Tache high school in St. Boniface, I know these places very well. I know, I think, every alley and every street in that oldest city west of the lakes. There is so much there that is worth preserving and that is a monument of the fact that, after some initial difficulty, we have developed in that community a bonne entente which has not only been very satisfactory in that community but which has resulted in the production from that community of some of the most talented people in the French language in all Canada today.

Indeed, I would go so far as to say, if it would not be regarded as too boastful coming from one who spent 30 years of his life in Manitoba, that perhaps the French speaking inhabitants of Manitoba, in proportion to their numbers in this generation, have produced a disproportionately large number of remarkable and distinguished people in the arts and letters of this country. Of course, one thinks particularly of Gabrielle Roy, of Gisele MacKenzie, in another field, and of her brother who is now distinguishing himself as well. One could go on, of course, and add to this list.

Mr. Matthews: Get down to the P's.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid that I would not be able to qualify on the grounds of racial origin, but that does not alter the fact that it is, for me, a matter of local pride.

While I am on my feet, I should like to remind the new minister of something of which I reminded his predecessor without any success. I can say, sir, that I should have liked to do this when the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria was not in the chamber, but he is here. I should like to go on and remind hon. members that the very beginning of our whole country was in the constituency that I represent. It does seem to me that the time has come to commemorate, in a proper way, the landfall of the discoverer of Canada, John Cabot, at Cape Bonavista, on St. John's day in 1497. I suggest to the minister it would also be most appropriate to commemorate the fact that that later explorer of Canada, that mariner from St. Malo, Jacques Cartier, following a generation later in the wake of John Cabot, made his first landfall at Cape Bonavista. Before he went to Gaspe and long before he went to Quebec, Cartier trod the soil of Newfoundland.

This fact should be commemorated as part of our history, as is the case in any part of this country where the historic sites and monuments board or the historic section of the national parks board, commemorate these things. It not only has a cultural value, but it also has a very practical, hard material value. The commemoration of these ancient monuments is one of the greatest of the many current attractions in this country. The more we mark these sites, the more we advertise them, the more we can hope to make our country interesting and attractive, not merely to our own people who travel about but also to those who come to visit us from other countries.

I might point out to the minister that since a national park was established in Newfoundland by the previous administration, the present government has made great improvements there for which I am grateful. I would emphasize to the minister the fact that, in a sense, this gratitude is a lively anticipation of future improvements because only the surface has been scratched. This national park has resulted in the completion of the road right across the whole of Newfoundland. Gander, on one side of that park, is the crossroads of the whole world and Bonavista, on the other side of the park, is the site of the beginning of the history of North America. What would be more fitting than that tours should be arranged for those people who are held up in Gander. It is only 100 miles across the park to Bonavista where one finds the most beautiful scenery, I was going to say in all North America, but at any rate east of the rockies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: If any hon. member doubts the complete accuracy of that statement, let him go and see for himself. If he is so blind as to disagree with me, then I shall have to assume that each of us has not the same appreciation of beauty. I do not believe that many would disagree if they had that experience. I admit the road is not the best in the world. Indeed, I can assure the minister that it is not, but that, too, will be taken care of in time.

I understand the Italian government is interested in this project. We in this country should never forget that in recent times among the most productive and most useful of our groups of new citizens have been those from Italy, or that the man who found Canada in the first place, the man who started Canada as an extension of Europe, was Giovanni Caboto, of Venice and Bristol.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Shall vote 279 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I did have one or two other things I wanted to say on a rather different subject, but I wonder whether the minister would first like to make some observations about the points raised by myself and the hon. member for St. Boniface.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, we have had several speakers on the first item. At this time, if it meets the wishes of the committee, we might allow all hon. members to make their presentations and then I will make a general reply.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I do not think I have anything more that you could properly call a speech. I do want to ask the minister one or two questions on the administrative item, but I think perhaps I should desist from doing that until any other hon. member who wishes to speak in a general way has had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. English: Mr. Chairman, I listened with close attention this afternoon to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier) and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

The latter referred to Jacques Cartier and suggested that he first landed in Newfoundland. At first I had some doubts, but having later done some research in my office, I have found that he actually did set foot in Newfoundland, although the exact spot is not mentioned.

The French explorer Jacques Cartier made his first trip to Canada in April 1534. We find in his memoirs the first fragments of Canadian history. After a brief stop for fresh water somewhere along the north shore of the St. Lawrence—and I am prepared to believe the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, because I seem to have read somewhere that it might have been in Newfoundland—he sailed in a southwesterly direction, along the Magdalen islands and Prince Edward Island, and finally stopped on the shores of the Baie de Chaleur, though historians have never determined the exact location. The presence of seemingly hostile Indians prevented him from landing, however, and Cartier's narrative indicates that his ships turned back toward the north on July 12. On July 24, they entered another deep bay, and Cartier thought it was the basin through which the St. Lawrence flowed into the sea; he thought it was the road to Cathay. Having gone ashore to explore the area, he realized his mistake. He now felt certain he had just discovered a new continent. So he had his men build a wooden cross 30 feet high, bearing a shield with an engraved fleur-de-lis and the words "Vive le roi de France" written in large gothic script. Here is how Cartier himself describes the scene in the French language of the time:

> On the XXIII day of said month, we built a cross 30 feet in height, which was constructed in the presence of a large number of them on the cape at the entrance to the said cove. Under the cross-arm of that cross we put a shield in relief bearing three fleurs-de-lis, and on the cross we put a wooden sign bearing the words LONG LIVE THE KING OF FRANCE. And the said cross we set up on the said cape before them while they watched us make it and set it up. After it was raised, we all fell to our knees with clasped hands adoring it in their presence, and making signs at them, looking at the cross and pointing to the sky, to signify to them that said cross was the sign of our redemption, at what they expressed much admiration, turning to look at the said cross.

It is regrettable that that cross was not made of material more durable than wood, because, soon after, it was destroyed by the elements. The actual location where that cross was erected is not known even today. It is however admitted by all historians that it was on the shores of what we now call the bay of Gaspe. The place which seems to best meet the descriptions of this event and on which many of our earlier historians agree, is now called Peninsula point, a small headland with sandy beaches which juts out at the mouth of the bay of Gaspe. Any navigator would probably choose this place to rest before venturing further into these unknown and unexplored lands.

The erection of this cross is a memorable event. To all those who want to keep an historical souvenir of this country's origins and who hope to see the writing of a history enriched with glorious events, Cartier's gesture marks a starting point. The great cross set up by the French navigator when he discovered our country was soon buried in the sand, but the memory of the moving ceremony that took place in the imposing scenery of the verdant forest under a blue sky will always remain vivid in the minds of Canadians. It was one of the most sublime moments of all our history. And in a developing country such as ours, it is an inheritance that all generations must cherish jealously.

We should not be ashamed to show devotion for our origins, because a nation is not founded only on material things. And to forget those gestures of the past, or still to deprive Canadians of this worthy heritage of history, is to hold our birthright in contempt.

In the years between 1534 and 1625, when France was trying to colonize this new land, the bay of Gaspe was often mentioned in the memoirs and writings of the time as a mooring place for ships from foreign countries.

After their hazardous crossing of the Atlantic in their frail crafts, the captains of yore headed for the bay of Gaspe, where the crew traded various items with the Indians for food and water.

Once the crew was rested, the ship weighed anchor and, from Gaspe headed for Quebec or Montreal.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. member tell us where he got his information?

Mr. English: These are facts I picked up in various books and also obtained from historians who were doing research work in Gaspe, and they let me have reports on well established facts. That is why I dare quote them, because I want to inform the house as accurately as possible of some details which sometimes are rather complex and difficult to establish. Of course, I want to avoid errors. I am therefore quoting, if I may, details gathered here and there.

Thus, in the very beginning of our history, Gaspe constantly played an important part in the first attempts at colonization of this new continent.

Indeed, it has been mentioned that the greatest naval battle of our history was fought in the bay of Gaspe. That same battle had forced Champlain to surrender Quebec to the British, in 1629, and certainly did contribute to change the course of Canadian history.

Mr. Chairman, there are several other historic events connected with the Gaspe peninsula.

Alas, that part of our homeland, which is legendary and basic to our history, has been too much neglected until today.

I very well remember that at the little rural school I attended as a boy, we used to study Canadian history in a textbook in which could be found the following words written under a photo:

Gaspe, Jacques Cartier. Cartier plants a cross.

There was also this inscription:

Long live the King of France.

What I find strange today is the fact that we are questioning the actual place where Cartier landed.

Mr. Chairman, all those who have studied their history and who want to recognize that part of their province for what it is really worth, admit that it was actually in Gaspe that Jacques Cartier landed.

There are also several other historic facts I should like to point out. Among those, there is the one where it is said that later, in the course of our history, the British army, under General Wolfe, encamped at Gaspe before capturing Quebec for the second time in 1759. On September 4, 1758, Wolfe arrived there with seven ships and three infantry regiments numbering 1,500 men. Those soldiers settled on the wide and triangular belts of sand of Peninsula point: the historic site where, in all likelihood, Cartier landed in 1534.

The proof of this occupancy is provided by a painting of Captain Hervey Smith who served as aide-de-camp to General Wolfe on that trip. The painting shows the exact location of buildings in that group, including the two-storey building known as the Customs house, where Wolfe lived during his stay in Gaspe. An important historical fact is that the location of General Wolfe's house was determined accurately by the late Fred Richmond, of Gaspe, who discovered the remains of a fireplace at the exact spot indicated on Captain Smith's painting.

Several of the relics buried at that place indicate that the station was inhabited in the past by French traders. A coin found on the site of the "Maison des Douanes" was a gold piece clearly bearing the date 1693. Three two-sou pieces from 1629, or even from 1575, were also found on this spot.

Mr. Chairman, I could relate many other legendary facts, but I would not want to take too much of the time of the house. I might have another opportunity to speak on it at length.

But, as a son of Gaspe, and as the representative of Gaspe, I am proud of this part of our province.

And I also take pride in proclaiming in this house that Gaspe has made a major contribution to our history.

When, every summer, I see many tourists come to visit the Gaspe peninsula, to see for themselves what they have learned in their history books, who are filled with admiration by the scenic beauty of a site such as Perce, I wonder if each and everyone of us, rising above political considerations, should not acknowledge at least inwardly, if we do not want to express this feeling outwardly, that we have too long neglected and ignored that part of our province which is called Gaspe.

To think that after all these years, we do not even have a historic park in Gaspe that displays all these marvels.

Every summer, I meet people in my riding, members of the Catholic clergy, the bishop of Gaspe, Protestant ministers, and I am glad to note that there exists full cooperation between these various groups.

In my part of the country there is no class, racial or religious discrimination.

The town of Gaspe has a population equally comprised of French and English Canadians. The parish of Douglastown is entirely Irish. Not a word of French is heard there. The parish of Barachois is also English speaking.

And yet, each and everyone of us is working in harmony, because we are all proud of our history, and our hearts are filled with love for the Gaspe peninsula, our province and our beloved country, Canada.

Mr. Chairman, that is why—no matter what may be thought by those who feel I am delaying the adoption of the estimates—I considered it my duty to express the voice of Gaspe for in 1957, the people of that area put their confidence in me, regardless of political considerations, because they examined my record and knew my attachment for the Gaspe land. The confidence they put in me indicates that they wanted me to come here to Ottawa, not only to listen to debates, but to uphold their rights and work in the interest of that part of the population which was unfortunately so long ignored by every political administration.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that what I am saying now will not be in vain but that it will bring results. My duty as a member is not to come to this House of Commons and accept everything without saying a word; I feel I am entitled to obtain for that part of the Gaspe peninsula what it has a right to expect.

The population of the Gaspe peninsula has always contributed to the progress of Canada. People in my riding have always contributed money and taxes toward the development of our country, but I would like to see part of this money used for the development of this part of Quebec which is assuredly one of the most beautiful in Quebec and even in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, if we are rightly asking for a historic park in the Gaspe peninsula it is not because the humble member for Gaspe requests it but because the history of our country demands it.

I hope that the request I am making tonight will be granted. I know the devotion to duty of the minister and I am convinced that he will do all he can. I hope I may never receive an answer such as was given to me once to the effect that it was not sure that Cartier had landed in Gaspe. If the person who sent me this letter would care to meet me, I would gladly give him a lesson in history. If that is the reason advanced for not accepting to plan a historic site in Gaspe, I do not accept it. If some one answers that it is not certain that Cartier ever landed at Gaspe, I do not accept that. It is my privilege not to do so.

If you only knew how many hours and how many years I have spent studying Gaspesia and its history. I have been a professor in Quebec for ten years and I like to think that the history I taught my pupils was not false history, as some people claim. Anyhow unless I am given proof to the contrary, I am going to continue to teach that splendid history.

Mr. Chairman, I want to apologize, perhaps I have been a bit too long. No matter how long my political career might last, how many years or days I might spend here in Ottawa, I would like people to say after I am gone, after I have left Ottawa, that at least I have made known my Gaspesia, that I have claimed what it has a right to expect from our government and that I have accomplished my duty. That is the only reward I am expecting from politics.

I do hope that an agreement be reached, so that all the hon. members, whatever their party, may come down into this small section of my province and visit an historic park that would remind them of the feats of arms of our history.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. member permit me a question? He said that in his opinion Gaspe had been neglected. Could he tell us if it is true that for many years he was a deputy minister in the Union Nationale government?

Mr. English: Mr. Chairman, I am glad that question was put to me. I am not in the habit of indulging in petty politics or trying to make political capital with such a matter. I leave such pettiness to the hon. member who asked the question.

But since he has started the ball rolling, it is a pleasure for me to reply.

I was a deputy minister in the Union National government. As a matter of fact, I was a candidate in 1935; I was then 24.

If you insist on having my pedigree, I shall be pleased to oblige. I was secretary to the minister of mines and fisheries, from 1936 to 1939. I was appointed deputy minister in 1953.

When first I went into politics, there were no paved roads, no cars, no electricity. Thanks to the Union Nationale government, we now have paved roads and electricity; we now have hospitals and schools. Those were the things with which I busied myself while I was deputy minister.

(Text):

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, I am prompted to participate in this discussion for the second time by the speech of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who had some interesting remarks to make about John Cabot and where he landed. I noticed that some objections were made by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria.

Mr. Pickersgill: But they are not on the record.

Mr. McGee: I am sure the hon. member will place that view on the record at the earliest opportunity. I was going to offer in a friendly way the suggestion that perhaps the controversy between the two hon. members is really beside the point after all because I hold in my hand le magazine Maclean of April, 1961 which contains an article by Gustave Lanctot entitled "Les Irlandais au Canada 600 ans avant Colomb", which roughly translated means the Irish arrived in Canada 600 years before Columbus. In any event, Mr. Chairman, I will not go into any more detail with regard to the authenticity of the documentation in this article except to say, more in sorrow than in anger, to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria that their discussion and disagreement are perhaps after all quite beside the point.

Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot allow that to pass because I suspect that the hon. gentleman's pride of race will take somewhat of a bump when I tell him that there is a good deal of support for Mr. Lanctot's contention. The hon. gentleman will recall that when the Norsemen went to Iceland they did not feel it was worth while taking women on the whole voyage and they picked their women up in Ireland on the way, and it was no doubt the descendants of some of those women who came to this continent with Lief Ericsson about the year 1,000, and no doubt that is the argument that Mr. Lanctot is making. But I think perhaps if they did and if any of the descendants of those people were still here, which they are not, and they had to submit to the census that we were talking about earlier this afternoon, they would have to admit, if they told the truth in giving their racial origin, it would be not Irish but Norse, because of the paternal line.

This gives me an opportunity, sir, to cite an authority to the hon. member for Gaspe who I think accepted my word for it even before I got the authority. I have here an authority who I think the hon. gentleman will wish to bow to at once. I have in my hand the Handbook Gazeteer and Almanac of Newfoundland for the year 1941, edited by J. R. Smallwood.

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Pickersgill: An author. I read:

> Catalina. Population 882. Third largest settlement in Trinity bay. In 1534 Jacques Cartier spent 10 days here.

An hon. Member: What for?

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question. Is this the only authority he has for his contention?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is the only one I have in my hand but I am sure the hon. gentleman would not contest the fact because, with his wide knowledge of the history of Newfoundland, he will know that this was simply a secondary source and that there is a primary source in Cartier's own account of his voyage.

Mr. Winch: May I ask one question. Important as this is, what has it to do with the estimates now before us?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is of the greatest possible importance. I am sure the hon. gentleman was asking his question with his usual solemnity. Perhaps the hon. gentleman may not have heard the original observation on which all this was based, namely that it is of the utmost importance that we should preserve the great relics of our history, and so far as the nation is concerned, it is the responsibility of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to do that. As I suggested just before dinner, not only is this a very good thing to do from the point of view of the preservation of our history and of our culture but it is also in a very hard material way a very good investment. I am sure the Minister of Forestry who is listening to me will agree, that every time we mark one of those ancient monuments it becomes another attraction for visitors, not only people who travel about the country but visitors to our country from other countries.

Mr. Winch: I most certainly agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate but what I was wondering about was whether we in the House of Commons can decide where Cartier landed. I do not think we can.

Mr. Pickersgill: He decided that.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, now that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has relinquished the floor—

Mr. Pickersgill: I was merely answering questions.

Mr. Crouse: —I can commence my remarks by saying that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources under its young and energetic minister is beginning to play a more important role throughout all parts of Canada than it ever has before. This development is taking place throughout every province of Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and has made its impression upon my own riding of Queens-Lunenburg in Nova Scotia.

I should first like to join with my colleagues, as well as with members of the opposition, in extending congratulations to the minister upon his appointment to this portfolio. The former minister plotted a firm course to be followed, but I am pleased to note that the present minister has taken a keen interest in all matters pertaining to his department and its administration, and is making further improvements upon the good plans established by his predecessor.

Previous speakers have pointed out the fact that Canada is showing a substantial deficit in her tourist trade with the United States, and it is to the Canadian government travel bureau branch of the department and the national parks branch that I shall direct most of my remarks. As a Nova Scotian I am fully aware of the impact made upon our economy by the tourist industry, and of the necessity of attracting to Canada and to our particular area a larger number of tourists.

A study of the tourist survey of Nova Scotia as carried out by the Nova Scotia travel bureau in 1960, indicates that the tourist industry is big business, especially in our province. It gives some idea of the factors which influenced tourists to visit Nova Scotia. According to the survey, tourist booklets influence over 52 per cent while magazine and newspaper advertising were effective in encouraging another 35 per cent to visit Nova Scotia. These figures would indicate that tourists will come to your area if you intelligently and carefully promote the beauty spots and historic sites which are to be seen during a visit, and the quality of the hotel and motel accommodations and the variety of sites to be seen will determine the length of their stay.

On February 8, 1961, the hon. E. A. Manson, minister of trade and industry in Nova Scotia stated:

> In 1960 Nova Scotia's tourist industry achieved new records, both in the number of visitors to the province and in the amount of money they spent.
> After studies extending back over four years and intensified in 1960, a revised and corrected system of gathering tourist statistics shows that the number of visitors to Nova Scotia during the four summer months of 1960 totalled 586,111, and their estimated expenditures were $48,328,733.

He further stated:

> Canadian and American averages obtained from the 1960 registration card inquiries for the "Order of the Good Time", weighted on the basis of 73 per cent Canadian and 27 per cent American traffic, has led to the conclusion that the value of spending by tourists from other Canadian provinces this year was $30,773,902 and by American visitors, $17,554,830.
> Mr. Manson said that Nova Scotia was fortunate in having tourist statistics reaching back, with an interruption during the war years, to 1922. There could be no doubt that the long term trend in Nova Scotia's tourist traffic was sharply upward.

This, of course, is most encouraging.

I was especially pleased to note the minister's comments on the resources for tomorrow conference scheduled to take place in Montreal next October and the fact that water pollution will be a subject for discussion. When we consider the effect of polluted water upon the health of our people and its destructive power in the salmon and inland fisheries as well as the partial destruction of the shellfish industry along our coast especially near the mouths of our rivers, only then do we realize the importance of the legislation introduced by the government to provide assistance to municipalities for the construction of sewage disposal facilities. This is a great forward step, one that was long overdue, and in view of the importance of our inland fisheries as a tourist attraction I hope it will be possible for federal and provincial fishery conservation officers, as well as municipal wardens and industrial leaders, to attend this conference and outline any further ideas they may have on this important problem.

In the last decade Canadians have spent twice as much money travelling in the United States and abroad compared with the money spent in Canada by Americans and tourists from foreign lands. Our Canadian tourist deficit is an important part of our over-all balance of payments deficit. For a long time the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has been promoting the slogan, "buy Canadian". I think the time has come to adopt another slogan, "Sell Canadian"—"Sell Canada". In view of the benefits that accrue from the tourist industry, not only to private industry but to the federal and provincial governments as well, I believe that government has a responsibility to promote tourism on a national level. These efforts would pay a sizeable dividend in that the expenditures of tourists from other countries would materially benefit our balance of payments position.

Why do Canadians want to visit the United States, the United Kingdom or, for that matter, Paris? I submit that one reason is to visit the historic sites they have previously only seen in pictures or heard about in song or story. Here is a challenge to the new Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to renew in greater number the historic sites and national parks throughout Canada and especially those in Nova Scotia for the benefit of foreign as well as Canadian tourists. At the present time a start has been made in Nova Scotia with the national park in Cape Breton. It is undoubtedly one of the beauty spots of Canada providing every facility for the visiting tourist. However, I believe there is room in Nova Scotia for another national park and for further development of historic sites, and I believe that some of this should be along the south shore of Nova Scotia.

It is my understanding that the minister plans to visit Nova Scotia this summer and I would welcome the opportunity to show him some of the areas worth developing in my riding. Time will not permit me to mention all the historic sites but we could start at Port Mouton in Queen's county. Here we would see where the French explorer De-Monts first landed at this port in 1604 and established a settlement prior to sailing up the bay of Fundy to Annapolis. We are told that the port received its name because a sheep jumped overboard and was nearly drowned before it was rescued.

In the same year DeMonts entered another harbour which he named Port Rossignol and which retained that name until the new England settlers came in 1759 and 1760 and renamed it Liverpool after the same port in England. During the war of 1812 between the United States and Great Britain, Liverpool became famous as the home of the privateers operating under letters of marque that were granted by the government. One of the earlier privateer owners was a member of the Nova Scotia house of assembly. His name was Mr. Simeon Perkins. On our tour we could visit his home recently restored through the efforts of the historical society of Liverpool and the provincial government.

Another site worth visiting would be fort Point at Liverpool which was originally called fort Morris. It was here in 1773 that Simeon Perkins really distinguished himself. The fort was captured by an American privateer when the British garrison was asleep. Simeon Perkins organized the militia, captured the captain of the American privateer and worked out an agreement whereby he regained control of the fort in exchange for the captain.

Leaving Liverpool we travel along the south shore to Petite Riviere and cape Lahave near the mouth of the Lahave river. DeMonts and Champlain in 1604 named it Cap de la Have. In 1632 Isaac DeRazilly fortified it and brought in settlers and in 1670 it was captured by the English and resurrendered to the French. In 1720 Sir William Phips thought of Lahave as a government seat, so we readily see the importance attached to this area in that day.

Travelling through Bridgewater, a town of rare beauty on the Lahave river, with outstanding shopping and tourist accommodations, we next visit Lunenburg, the home of the Bluenose. This famous ship made international racing history and many American tourists come to this town to see the shipbuilding yards where this ship was built. Not only was the Bluenose constructed there but also there was recently constructed for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer a replica of the Bounty which was made famous in the book, "Mutiny on the Bounty". Here too we can see the site of the old blockhouse built in 1773 by the Hanoverian settlers as a protection from the Indians on what is now called blockhouse hill. At the present the local Lions club is actively interested in restoring this blockhouse and I would urge the minister to give earnest consideration to the restoration of this national historic site as well as those I have previously mentioned.

I am certain the minister will find very few places in Canada as storied and as interesting as Lunenburg county. Near Lunenburg town is a place called the Ovens that has long been an attraction to tourists. They are deep caverns worn in the sides of the rocky cliffs, the largest of which is about 18 feet in height and 40 or more feet in depth. The sea is never still and rushes into these caverns making a noise like the report of a heavy cannon. Huge gold discoveries were made here in 1861 and many claims were staked.

In Lunenburg county you will also find the towns of Mahone Bay and Chester and along the coast separating these two towns there are over 300 islands. One of these is widely known as Oak island, famous for the treasures supposed to have been buried there by the famous pirate, Captain Kidd. It was also in Mahone Bay in the year 1813 that the American privateer, Young Teazer, pursued by a man of war, was blown up by a deserter from the British service. It is rumoured to this day that on a foggy night this ship, with its sails flapping in the breeze, can still be seen on the horizon. It is called "the ghost of the flying Dutchman".

At Chester, Nova Scotia, American tourists have already established a large tourist colony due to the fact that the scenery in this area could safely be classed among the most beautiful in the world. Farther along the coast we come to Blandford, first settled by the Irish around 1809. This peninsula is famous for its sandy beaches and its high rise of land called "aspotogan", an old Micmac Indian name, which is approximately 500 feet above sea level and is a landmark for navigators. This area would be exceptionally well suited for a second national park and I hope the minister and his officials will take a careful look at the Blandford district as well as others I have mentioned during our tour of this area. I might add that the minister's visit will be very much improved over any that might have been made in the years when this country was under Liberal rule for I know of no road in Canada that was in worse state than was the Blandford road during those years. However, as a result of the roads to resources program, I am pleased to state that the Blandford road has been under construction, and in a few years it will stand as a monument to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and his program.

From these remarks hon. members can readily see the many attractions and points of interest my riding in Nova Scotia offers the tourist. At the moment we have a Canadian government travel bureau or tourist office in New York City, one in Chicago and one opening in San Francisco. My riding alone offers points of interest to English, French, German, Swiss, Scots and Irish, to mention a few, and in this day of jet travel I believe our efforts to encourage tourists should no longer be directed only toward the United States. With London only six hours away by jet and Paris only seven hours from Halifax, I believe we should give some thought to opening a Canadian government travel bureau at least in London and Paris. These places mark the home of our two great cultures which supplied Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific with its settlers, its traditions, its customs and languages.

Our bilingual country offers hospitality to the English or European tourist that cannot be found in the United States or many other countries. We are more accustomed to dealing with this type of tourist, and we do not look upon them as foreigners but appreciate them for what they are. By establishing our historic sites and giving them proper publicity, there is every reason to expect United Kingdom and European tourists to visit Nova Scotia, the province in which the French, English, Scottish and German settlers first landed, as well as other parts of Canada.

Recently we noticed an article in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald under the heading, "Nova Scotia businessmen find plums aplenty; They've got London talking". The article reads in part:

> Nova Scotia businessmen stuck their thumbs into the British business pie this week and pulled out more plums than they had expected.
> With less than half the time elapsed before the Halifax-Amherst trade group returns to Canada, many members of the mission feel they have done more than twice as much as they had hoped.
> "When you get London talking you've really done something," said Atlantic provinces agent-general Watson Jamer, "and the Canadian businessmen have done just that".
> "There's hardly a business in town that isn't aware Nova Scotia is here," he said.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if we can get these people interested in business, then we can interest them in visiting this country. However, it is up to us to stimulate the interest of these people in visiting the places where their countrymen established settlements in the new world. By so doing we not only strengthen our tourist industry, but we show these tourists a way of life. We want our United States friends and our friends from overseas to see us and become acquainted with the freedom we enjoy as Canadians. We want them to see our institutions of government. In this way, they will acquire a feeling for the spirit of democracy which is of vital importance to all of us and to the peace of the entire world.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): At the outset of my remarks, I should like to say I have no intention of entering into a controversy with my very good friend, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who claimed that John Cabot landed at some particular place. We then had an Irishman from Toronto claiming he landed in another place. My views on this matter have been put on the record and I have not changed them since.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity of making a few remarks during the discussion of the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources because the economy of my constituency, or a large part of it, is wrapped up in what this department may or may not do, especially in Cape Breton Highlands national park. Like other hon. members of the committee, I should like to express my sincerest congratulations to the new minister upon his appointment. I have no doubt, despite the views that have been expressed to the contrary by the all-wise sage from Port Arthur, he will perform his duties well.

The background of the new minister indicates an awareness of the social problems of our society, and this is indicated by his work during his lifetime. During his early years his abilities and talents were made available, through the Salvation Army, to the inmates of Montreal's Bordeaux jail and St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. He also performed similar services in Toronto. Later, he served with distinction in the Royal Canadian Air Force and was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross. His career in politics, including his activities as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and now as Minister of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, indicates that he has devoted his life to doing good for his fellowmen. I have no doubt his work as minister of this department will be such that, in the future, we will all be as proud of him as we have been in the past.

Having made that statement, I should like now to bring to the attention of the minister the wage rates that are paid to workers in the Cape Breton park. I brought this matter to the attention of the previous minister, and also to the committee, on several occasions. I should like to report that we have made some small progress. The labour rate at this park is now $1.05 an hour compared with 85 cents an hour before this government came into office. However, as I pointed out on another occasion, this rate is certainly not in keeping with the rates that are paid in the majority of the national parks throughout Canada. It is certainly not a proper wage rate.

As we are all aware, government employee wage surveys are conducted by the Department of Labour at the request of the employing department. I should like to suggest to the minister that the time is past due when a request for another survey should be made. I would renew my request that when this survey is made consideration be given to the different wage rates that are in effect throughout Cape Breton island and that it be not restricted to the area immediately surrounding the park.

I should like to commend the government, the previous minister and the present minister, for the activities that have been carried out in the park in recent years. The winter works program and the extra work projects that have been carried out in the park have provided a level of employment to my constituents such as they had never experienced in this area previously. I join with my colleague, the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, who remarked the other day in the house that the area concerned has been more prosperous because of the greater amount of work that has been carried out.

In support of this statement, I should like to put on the record the amounts expended in wages at the Cape Breton Highlands national park for the years 1953 to 1960-61. These totals include the salaries of civil servants, prevailing rate employees, and employees on construction work. The years and the amounts expended are in tabulated form, as follows:

1956-57	328,934
1957-58	409,878

This, of course, is completely separate and apart from expenditures made on highway construction in the park. This work which has been carried out means so much to my constituents that I trust it will be continued at a similar rate and expanded to a greater degree if at all possible. I suggest to the minister that this be done.

At the present time great strides are being made in the construction of a large camping ground in the Ingonish area, which I may say is urgently needed to eliminate overcrowding which occurs every year during the tourist season. There is certainly room for further great expansion in this park in many fields.

I must say that of the few recommendations in the recent Rand report with which I agree, two are the recommendations concerning the expansion and development of the Cape Breton Highlands national park, and also the one relating to Fort Louisbourg in the constituency of my colleague from Inverness-Richmond who has been devoting himself so strenuously in this regard.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

May I also bring to the attention of the minister the matter of reforestation within the confines of the park. Over a period of years a large portion of the park has been burned over, unfortunately, due to forest fires. I would urge that the minister give consideration to the matter of beautifying the park in the areas where this has occurred.

I realize that the government has in effect a program of financial assistance to the provinces for the purposes of reforestation of vacant crown lands, and in view of this I see no reason why some arrangement could not be worked out in an area such as the park, where it is totally owned by the federal government.

Just recently I brought to the attention of the Minister of Forestry the question of reforestation in Cape Breton. I also brought this to the attention of the Prime Minister, with the thought in mind that, should we eventually have to face the prospect of mine closures, I felt there was no reason why a corps of a couple of hundred of men could not be occupied for a period of up to, say, two years in this type of work.

A program of this nature has been carried out with great success in Great Britain, and I urge the minister to see whether some mutual arrangement could be made whereby this could be carried out in the area I have mentioned.

Another point I should like to draw to the attention of the minister is one that I have discussed with the previous minister and his departmental officials for quite a period of time. That is the question of the historic site at Englishtown and, to be more explicit, Port Dauphin.

At the present time a cairn is located there with the following inscription:

> Settled in 1629 by Capt. Charles Daniel and site of an early Jesuit mission selected in 1713 as a naval base and one of the principal places in Isle Royale, named Port Dauphin and strongly fortified. Its importance declined with the choice in 1719 of Louisburg as the capital.

In fact Englishtown is the site of the first permanent white settlement in all Cape Breton and, I am informed, of the first Jesuit mission on the North American continent.

In 1629 a French fort was built at the mouth of Ste. Anne's bay by Captain Daniel of Dieppe. Jesuit priests named the settlement Sainte Anne, in honour of Queen Anne of Austria, the mother of Louis XIV. In 1713 a new fort was built and the place was renamed Fort Dauphin.

I would urge the minister and his departmental officials, to give consideration to the establishment in this area of a national historic park. The historic sites and monuments board, which I understand advise the minister on the importance of proposed historic sites, have considered this subject on several occasions but have not come to any conclusive decision.

The previous minister advised me that he wished to have the full assurance of the board that Fort Dauphin is of sufficient importance in the broad history of the nation to warrant, in addition to the bronze tablet and cairn already erected there, the establishment of a national historic park.

I understand that this proposition is to appear on the agenda of the board when they hold their meeting next month. I do hope the matter will be gone into very thoroughly at that time and that we will have a favourable decision.

Let me now turn to the question of a new clubhouse for the golf course at the national park. We are fortunate in having one of the finest golf courses in Canada and I only wish I could say that the clubhouse was in keeping with the course.

I brought this question to the attention of the previous minister and, while I realize that tremendous work has been done in the park and that this new construction is receiving every consideration, we have not as yet been successful in having this consideration become a reality.

I would once again urge the minister to go into this matter most thoroughly, and I shall appreciate the opportunity, if he visits the national park this coming summer—and we will certainly welcome him—of taking him on a personal inspection of the clubhouse. I do not think he will be very proud of it.

On a number of occasions I brought to the attention of the previous minister and the department the matter of the restoration of the original Hydrofoil craft, HD4, which was the brainchild of the late Alexander Graham Bell and was the subject of one of his many experiments.

My appeal on those occasions was, of course, for the preservation, restoration and display of this craft. As a result we were very fortunate in that the department made the necessary arrangements and had this relic transported across the Bras d'Or lakes to the locale of the present Bell museum.

However, as yet there is no visible evidence that the restoration will take place, or any evidence of a shelter being constructed so that this craft can be displayed to the many thousands of visitors who visit the museum annually.

I would like the minister to advise me just how soon we can look forward to action being taken along the lines I have suggested, and explain further the reason for the delay. I shall be interested in being provided with any information he has on this project, as it is one well worthy of consideration, mainly because of the fact that it is one of the few objects of this magnitude with which this great man experimented.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to proceed to another subject, and that is the matter of the provision of ski trails at the Cape Breton Highlands national park.

I was pleased to note in the speech from the throne that this government indicated it was interested in the promotion of physical fitness. With this in mind I should like to once again bring to the attention of the minister, as I did to his predecessor, the tremendous benefits which would be derived by having proper ski facilities at the Cape Breton Highlands national park.

I have indicated to the minister in the past just how suitable certain areas of the park, such as South Harbour mountain and several others, would be for the promotion of skiing. It is a sad thing that the tremendous facilities we have available in the park are available only for the short summer season.

Here is an opportunity where great benefit could be derived by the economy of Cape Breton in the introduction of tourist trade during the winter months in the participation of this sport. I can also envisage the labour force that would be needed to prepare these facilities.

There is no doubt at all in my mind that facilities would be provided by the people in the area for the housing accommodation of those interested, should the government take the initiative in establishing the trails and tows.

I understand it has been suggested by departmental officials that there was no object in providing a skiing area since there would be no tourist accommodation available to people who wished to participate in this sport. It is also my understanding that resort owners in the Ingonish area have not taken too kindly to this view, as I feel quite sure they want all the business they can obtain, especially in the winter. Accommodation facilities are there now.

There are a great number of benefits to be derived besides the physical fitness aspect of the proposition. Apart from the money that would be spent on local labour to cut trails and make the necessary skiing facilities, money would also be spent on gasoline, accommodation and meals by visitors to the park who wished to engage in this sport.

It is quite true that large returns could not be expected immediately, but I am sure immediate steps to provide these facilities would reap great rewards in the future.

It is a well known fact that in this part of Nova Scotia there is always more snowfall than anywhere else. Experts in this field have advised me that we have a great potential for this sport in the Cape Breton Highlands national park, so I leave these thoughts with the minister for his consideration. We have the snow, we have the scenery, we have the terrain and we have the interest. All that is needed now is more activity on the part of the department to bring these thoughts into reality. We have excellent highways leading to the park and, indeed, throughout Cape Breton Island as a result of the wonderful co-operation between the Stanfield government of Nova Scotia and this government in the past few years in connection with the roads to resources program. There are also many more highway projects which have been agreed upon by both governments but which are yet to be carried out.

I commend the government on this legislation. It was only this week that ceremonies were held in Cape Breton in connection with the completion of the steel structure of the new bridge across the Bras d'Or lakes. This bridge, costing more than $5 million, was brought about as a result of an agreement between the government of Nova Scotia and the federal government, the federal government paying 90 per cent of the cost and the provincial government paying 10 per cent. When this new bridge, the Robert L. Stanfield bridge, is officially opened in a few months, I suggest that we shall see a greater influx of visitors to the Cape Breton park than ever before and, believe me, their number has been growing enormously every year over the past few years. This in itself is reason enough why the department should develop the park to the greatest possible extent.

Before I resume my seat, may I wish the minister well. I look forward to his visit to the park and I also look forward to seeing some activity along the lines of the proposals I have made. When he replies I trust that he will comment on some of the items I have brought to his attention.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up too much of the time of the house, but I do wish to set the record straight.

First, I should like to congratulate the new Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Dinsdale). He is endowed with fine qualities, is congenial and is a hard worker. I have seen him at work in several committees, and it was always a pleasure to work with him. I wish him every success in his new department.

In the remarks he made on April 21, the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm

(Mr. Pigeon) said something that must be corrected, because it does not represent the facts exactly as they are.

After a previous question, he asked the minister what was the language taught to the Eskimos, in addition to their own Eskimo language. The minister replied that for a number of reasons, mainly of an economic nature, it was the English language.

So far so good. Mind you, Mr. Chairman, I am not criticizing the minister I know how difficult these things are. In fact, we cannot always do as we wish very often, our actions are dictated by economic factors, even if we do not exactly like it.

Following that reply, the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm said this:

> Mr. Chairman, may I add that that situation was created and has existed since 1949, in other words, under the Liberal administration of which the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), as minister of transport, was a member, as was Mr. Jean Lesage, the present premier of Quebec, as minister of northern affairs and national resources and who was therefore chiefly responsible for that situation.

Mr. Chairman, the language taught in northern Canada has always been a problem, and that problem cannot be settled by the present minister any more than it could be by the former minister. Mind you, if the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm was trying to make political capital out of it, I would be the last to blame him.

In fact, I think it is fair and resonable that an hon. member should try to make political capital even in this house. But one must also be generous to abstain from imputing motives to those who are being criticized.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm did not say exactly that the intentions of the Liberal predecessor of the present minister were bad, but he got around the difficulty and implied that the minister did not go too much out of his way and did not try to improve the situation.

Well, we find—and I say so for the benefit of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm—in the budget discussion on Monday, March 28, 1955, a statement made by the then minister of northern affairs and national resources, Mr. Jean Lesage.

> Those projects were discussed at length with bishop Marsh, of the Church of England, and Msgr. Trocellier, of the Catholic church. Both agreed that it is the best program likely to meet the needs in the north and to cope with the difficulties which became greater these last few years because of inadequate school facilities for the children of both religions in the different localities.

We realize, in the light of that text, that the then minister intended to improve the situation.

I am convinced that, even if the present minister does not have much success in this regard, it is not from a lack of good will. In fact, he is one of the hon. members who have always displayed much good will.

Mr. Chairman, I only wanted to stress this: when one makes political hay one must do it carefully so as not to belittle in any way those who used to be in power and who had intended to do right.

(Text):

Mr. Legere: As I rise to take part in this debate on the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources I do so in the spirit of co-operation and in support of what previous members from Nova Scotia have advocated for the betterment of our province so appropriately known as the ocean's playground. I am proud to be from this peninsula—the most weather beaten province of the dominion—one that has stood the test of time. What Nova Scotia lacks in size is more than made up in rugged scenic beauty that so invitingly attracts tourists from other lands.

I was delighted when an invitation was extended to the minister to visit Cape Breton and the Cabot trail. Mention, and rightly so, was made of historical Louisburg. Interesting and varied relics recall here part of Canada's history in its early days and attest to the truth of the fight for supremacy in Canada by two great races. One relives the days of the pioneers' privation and hardships and sees today that all of this was not in vain.

However, in the same spirit that prompted previous Nova Scotia members, and not forgetting that my people think also in terms of equal distribution, and in the knowledge that a fair appraisal cannot be given before all is seen and explored, I open wide to the minister the constituency doors of Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare. Do come on in and browse around and enjoy here the pause that refreshes. I ask him to enter, and I am sure that once he browses around he will indeed find the pause that refreshes.

I need not point out historical facts and events relating to my area of southwestern Nova Scotia. This has been done admirably by the town fathers of Shelburne town. Clare's yearly and colourful Acadian festival vividly succeeds in this historial revival.

(Translation):

At this point in my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I would like, with your permission, to pay homage to my friends the Acadians of Baie Ste. Marie. I would like to tell them the high regard in which their yearly festival is held, showing as it does that if they have not entirely forgotten, they have at least forgiven, thus giving a magnificent example to the rest of the world.

(Text):

This year from July 23 to July 29 the Yarmouth "bicenturama" will, after its celebration, leave no doubt in the minds of the visitors fortunate enough to attend, why Yarmouth is called the gateway to the maritimes, and convince those who come to view that they should stay longer than they planned.

We also have natural attractions; nature has seen and still sees to that. We have plenty of trout filled lakes, winding highways and byways, scenery that is rugged and as eye catching as any sea lashed coast in the world, a marine life second to none in the world—in reality a nimrod's delight—a wild life that continues to test and try the skill of sportsmen, amateur and professional. The giant tuna lurks in our waters and still challenges sportsmen from all over the world. Schooling pollock gather close to our shore, frolic and swish in playful fashion at the edge of a turbulent riptide. Oftentimes they seek still waters and in so doing whet the exuberance of youth and stimulate the fading eagerness of the aged.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to believe that the minister agrees that such a setting and tourist attraction should be enhanced by the establishment of a national park. In the nature of suggestion, and wishing to forsake any idea of dictating, I would like to see a marine life display implemented within the confines of a national park. I can assure the minister that our sea coast lends itself admirably well toward this combination of nature's attractions, housed within the sanctuary of a park, to entice greater numbers of tourists to sojourn where perhaps they only intended to linger. At this moment I cannot foresee such a national park housing a marine life display without the presence of the lordly lobster, unconcerned in his migration, taunted by the silvery haddock, shadowed by the silent cod, fearful of the grey seal's acrobatics, and attempting to capture the elusive pollock, all of this viewed by the motionless and almost unseen halibut.

Mr. Chairman, I have indicated what nature has provided us in southwestern Nova Scotia, and I anticipate that the minister will do his share. I should like to indicate what the people there have done for themselves. In the provision of tourist facilities, they have set up many roadside tables, trailer campsites, have built motels and renovated hotels. I am sure that the minister will be most helpful in seeing that these are continually filled to capacity.

I would also like to point out in conclusion that accompanied by what the minister will give us, what our people have provided is the friendly and warm hospitality of a people ambitious to forge ahead and prosper.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak for a few minutes in support of my distinguished friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, in respect of the arguments he advanced regarding an appropriate monument to mark the landfall of John Cabot, or John Caboto, depending on the part of the country you hail from.

I would suggest that, by and large, it is time that the government of Canada, with the research, knowledge and advice of its experts, should adjudicate on this controversy, deciding once and for all where the landfall of John Cabot actually was because, in essence, Cabot is the only discoverer of Canada. There are hon. gentlemen sitting in other parts of the house who would debate this subject and who would advance arguments in favour of Jacques Cartier, but I will compromise with those gentlemen, who are welcome to their historical traditions and opinions, by recommending the establishment of a discovery day for Canada and recognition of Jacques Cartier and John Cabot as the co-discoverers. I think hon. members will agree that half a loaf is better than none at all. I do believe, however, that we should honour the day on which these early navigators and adventurers discovered this then unknown land. I think that historic day should be marked appropriately.

The traditional landfall of John Cabot is cape Bonavista, which is in the constituency of my hon. friend opposite. There is substantial historical evidence to support this contention, and I do feel that it at least warrants study and earnest consideration by the historic sites and monuments board. I believe that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, with the enthusiasm, vigour and earnestness he brings to that department, will see to it that the proper study and attention are given to this subject.

There are those individuals who will say that John Cabot landed at Cape Breton in 1497, but in actual fact the argument in support of that is less than 50 years old. All that one has in support of that argument is a map supposedly drawn or drafted by the son of John Cabot, John Sebastian Cabot. There is at the present time, however, a very earnest study being made of this subject by learned scholars and historians. One learned historian at the university of Miami in the United States has substantial evidence to support the theory that John Cabot did in fact land at Cape Breton, but that several years before his landfall there he had in fact visited the island of Newfoundland. I am sure that in arguing today in support of the Newfoundland landfall the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate advanced the argument that the name "Bonavista" is derived from the fact that when Cabot, the Genoese navigator and adventurer, sighted the first landfall he is alleged to have said, "O Buena vista", which means "O happy sight". I am sure my learned friend from Bonavista-Twillingate probably said the same thing in 1953—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. McGrath: —because it has in fact been a happy sight for him. But I do believe that this site should be marked. I think there is substantial evidence to support the cape Bonavista landfall.

In the vicinity of cape Bonavista there is being developed—it is practically completed—a national park called Terra Nova park. It will certainly supplement the development of this park if consideration were to be given to erecting a monument on cape Bonavista to mark the landfall of what I think and what many people today are coming around to believe was the first landfall of Cabot in what is now known as Canada. In that respect, Mr. Chairman, one would wonder, whether John Cabot landed at cape Bonavista in 1494 or in Cape Breton in 1497, what would go through the mind of this Genoese navigator from Bristol if he were to return to the scene of his triumph some 450 years later? One would wonder what he would find. Well, I have no doubt that the old mariner would be much impressed with what he would find. Perhaps amongst the least significant things he would find would be the fact that there was one who had followed in his footsteps some 450 years later. Perhaps they had a little in common in that Cabot was an adventurer and a navigator from Genoa sailing out of Bristol and Pickersgill was a navigator, and a landlocked navigator sailing out of Manitoba in a prairie schooner.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I wish to make a correction so that the minister will not be misinformed. I should like to advise him not to lose too much sleep about all these markers and monuments because there already is a monument, a cairn, and bust of John Cabot on the northern tip of Cape Breton island, marking the spot where Cabot landed, erected there by the Cape Breton historical society.

Mr. Batten: That was the second time.

Mr. Macquarrie: It gives me the greatest pleasure to congratulate a long time friend of mine, the present minister, who is adding so greatly to the cabinet by his heading of this important department. He is a man who, while aggressive and able, is also agreeable and is entertained in high regard by hon. members in this house. I look forward to great things from the new minister; among those a greater impetus in the program with respect to the international peace garden between Manitoba and North Dakota in the riding of Brandon-Souris.

I heard my colleagues from the province of Nova Scotia inviting the minister to come down and visit them. One member wants him to go skiing in Cape Breton and another member wants him to come across the south shore. It was suggested that he might go to the places that Cabot visited, although there is some difference of opinion as to what those actually were. Before he was minister I was fortunate enough to have the hon. gentleman come to Prince Edward Island and he was good enough to launch my campaign in 1956. I look forward to his return. If he returns he will find that in the years since 1956 because of certain changes which have taken place in Ottawa and in Charlottetown that Prince Edward Island generally is an even more beautiful place than it was at that time.

I listened to the learned and hon. gentlemen discuss history tonight. I am not going away back into historical researches; I am going to talk only about the tourist business. In Prince Edward Island, of course, we consider that Jacques Cartier was our first tourist. I go back only as far as 1534 when that great man was in our province. He stopped there and he said it was not only the fairest land that he had ever seen but indeed one could not conceive of a fairer. He referred to certain other parts of what is now Canada as probably being the land that God gave to Cain, but he did not say that about Prince Edward Island. He was our first and one of our most appreciative visitors from Europe.

The department which the minister heads has contributed in no small measure to the improvement in our economy and indeed in our spirits in Prince Edward Island, which I mentioned just a moment ago. The roads to resources program has stimulated the greatest highway construction program that Prince Edward Island has ever known in its long history. We are proud of the fact that—I hope my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria will not take exception to this—the Prince Edward Island national park tops all other parks in Canada in the increase in tourists in the last year. We had over 412,000 people come to that beautiful park on the north side of Prince Edward Island and the north side of Queens county. For many years the national park stood there. A program of development was seemingly much retarded. It is only in recent years that great development programs have been proceeded with.

I can say that while the number of visitors to the province of Prince Edward Island is increasing, the province is able to look after them well and they will be welcomed. We will do an even better job if the Minister of Public Works will construct a causeway because they will come to us so much more quickly. Perhaps this is not the time to go into that matter, nor is this the department under which to discuss it.

I think the minister can look with satisfaction upon the results in my province of the campsite program. We have had many new developments on some beautiful sites. It is said, of course, that the whole of Prince Edward Island could be a park, but new sites have been developed. I think this is a splendid program and I would commend to the minister, lest he think that I am incapable of suggesting that there are areas within his department capable of being improved, that perhaps the campsite program might easily be geared to the roads to resources program and not exclusively to the trans-Canada highway.

I do not know how many hon. members know that much of the increase in tourist activity in recent years in the Atlantic provinces stems from the excellent and special program of the Canadian government travel bureau. The recent setting aside of $300,000 for special advertising in the eastern states, with emphasis upon the Atlantic provinces, has borne great fruit. I think the suggestion that has been offered by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg for a heavier concentration of activity in this connection in the United Kingdom is a good one. We rejoice in the Atlantic provinces that just a year ago Halifax was linked in direct T.C.A. contact with the United Kingdom. This will prevent the unfortunate tendency that sometimes prevails when visitors from the United Kingdom and Europe make a visit to Canada. Often they started in Montreal and moved westward. This is now no longer necessary.

A special project of much interest to me is the Fort Amherst historic park. Prince Edward Island has an interesting history under French occupation and then early days as an English colony and many years as a province in confederation. The site of Port Lajoie and Fort Amherst is specially suited for a park. I commend them for developing it. I realize that these projects have a great archaeological historical development and much study, but I would suggest that even though the site has lain there for a couple of centuries without development that perhaps even though it is an historic spot, a little speed would not be amiss in the development of that project on the south side of Prince Edward Island.

I was almost tempted to follow the line of some of the learned speakers who have preceded me and I think it is commendable we have given some time to a discussion and appraisal of, and perhaps even disagreement over, our historic sites. Many Nova Scotians have spoken tonight. I should like to put on the record the words of one of the greatest Nova Scotians who began as a Liberal and ended, I think you might say, as a Conservative. I refer not to the great Sir Robert Borden who did the same thing but to an earlier man, Joseph Howe, who said:

> A wise nation preserves its records, gathers up its muniments, decorates the tombs of its illustrious dead, repairs its great public structures, and fosters national pride and love of country, by perpetual reference to the sacrifices and glories of the past.

We have done so tonight. We have gone back to Cabot, Jacques Cartier, Leif Ericsson and Eric the Red. I can only say that very soon in Prince Edward Island we are going back in a similar way to 1864. I have the honour of representing the city of Charlottetown where confederation was born and I know that the minister, with his great historic knowledge, with his imaginative view of a developing Canadianism, will want to play a major part in the celebrations that will take place in the capital of the province of Prince Edward Island in 1964. We are not unaware nor unappreciative of the fact that a great building is to be constructed in honour and commemoration of this event, that the various provinces of Canada are signifying their interest in and appreciation of the event and that the dominion government through the Prime Minister has pledged its support for this great and happy celebration to which all of our people look forward.

I hope that when the minister is through travelling in Nova Scotia—my colleagues there are going to keep him busy because they are suggesting national parks here and there—he will come to Prince Edward Island for a rest. Our province is small. I can show him in a couple of days all the places where we want new parks and then he can have a rest. I wish him well in his endeavours and to show how kindly I am in my regard I will terminate my remarks at this juncture.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I want to offer my congratulations to the minister as this is the first opportunity I have had to do so since his appointment to this high office. We have much in common with our backgrounds in Manitoba. There is a saying among Canadians of Icelandic descent that we must all be cousins because our population is so small, and I am sure that his wife and I are perhaps cousins.

My point in rising is to ask whether there is anything in the estimates with relation to what is called a civic centre appropriation in Banff, Alberta. When the minister has a chance to reply perhaps he would give us that information. I have tried to look through the estimates and I do not find anything specifically along this line.

It is a very healthy thing that people in Canada occasionally advance to members of the opposition suggestions that certain things should be queried. That is very desirable and I must confess that this information came to me in that way. The minister was in the opposition at one time and he knows the value of this kind of query. Before the first item is passed, would the minister indicate whether or not my information from an outside source is correct that there is in the estimates $350,000 for a civic centre in Banff? If so, what are the reasons for it? I do not want to quarrel with the member in whose constituency Banff lies, but is this something that can be applied as a national policy across the board if other centres have the same justification?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, when I last spoke on these estimates I indicated there were two other sectors of the northern economy that I wanted to cover before the first item was passed. On April 21 I dealt with the question of the political development of the Yukon particularly and now I want to deal with the material and resource development of the north.

While I have been very interested in the remarks maritime members have made tonight concerning the development of national parks, tourism and the like, I believe the committee is glossing over the main activity of the department in the development of what constitutes 40 per cent of the territory of our nation. The material and resource development of the northern portions of Canada are most important to the future national economic growth of this country. These regions are rich beyond measure in natural resources, in mineral products for which demand is growing throughout the whole world day by day. Rare minerals are being required in ever-increasing quantities by those engaged in the race for outer space.

For the purpose of organizing the efficient search for and development of the mineral resources of the north, one of the most vital sectors in which the department should be interesting itself, and I am sure the minister is aware of this, is the field of research. I have spoken on previous occasions in the house this session about the need for northern research. The need of a co-ordinated research program in the north is very vital to research development which ultimately will benefit the whole nation.

The need of research in the field of transportation is one of the most vital sectors on which the department should be focusing its attention. One of the more urgent requirements is a complete assessment of the transportation needs of the Mackenzie river watershed in the Northwest Territories. Transportation problems in this area are rapidly developing to a point where they are going to cause real difficulties from the point of view of the requirements of the area. The research efforts of the federal departments should be directed toward the field of communication and navigation systems in the north generally, particularly telephone and telegraph communications, railroads and radio. New methods of transportation and new methods of communication are vital to orderly development in these northern regions.

The development of new types of transportation vehicles such as the Letourneau Monster, is one early result of scientific ingenuity in this field. I believe there are even more startling vehicles and modes of transportation on the drawing boards today. There should be some co-ordination of effort in the gathering of information on the manufacturing of tires and equipment, information now available in the armed forces, information which has been garnered by soldiers, airmen and naval personnel who have had experience in these regions. There should be co-ordination of information which has been gathered by research agencies, engine manufacturers and the like; research in the field of transportation systems, economic routes and load analyses. I believe the department should take the lead here in co-ordinating the efforts of the Department of Transport, the armed forces, the railroad industries and of transportation consultants generally.

In other words, there should be research, first in the selection and integration of existing forms of travel in the north, on land, sea, air, rail and pipe line. It is not inconceivable that the oil resources of the north will perhaps one day be transported by means of some sort of plastic pipe line. The British have made great strides in this field by towing a sort of plastic sausage in which oil products are carried behind a submarine. The efforts of the Department of Transport and those of the Department of National Defence should be co-ordinated and related in this field. There should be research into the climate, terrain, exploration methods, survey methods. There should be research into soil mechanics and terradynamics, power generation, atomic power, hydro, thermal and diesel.

It is interesting to note that progress has been made by the Soviet union in the field of research in these sectors. I should like to quote from the Soviet news bulletin, which is undated but of recent vintage, an article concerned with northern research. I quote:

> Gordon Robertson, Canada's deputy minister of northern affairs and national resources in his speech to parliament said that "the U.S.S.R. is ahead of Canada in the development of the northern regions, and it is high time for us to admit it. Soviet union engages in vast research work in the north. U.S.S.R. has done more in this respect than all the countries of the world put together." The symposium on the problems of development of Canada's northwestern regions of 1958, stressed the need of assimilating from the Russians the principle of planning in solving the questions of development of the northern areas.

The article continues in a like vein. I believe we have a good deal to learn from the Russian efforts in the north. At the risk of being quoted in the Soviet news bulletin, I would suggest that it might prove useful if the minister were to arrange for the freest possible exchange of information between the officials of his department and those engaged in similar efforts in the Soviet union. I think we could learn a good deal from the efforts of the Soviet union, and I am sure they could learn a good deal from our own efforts in the north.

One of the newest institutes of an academic nature to make its entry into the field has been the Boreal institute of the university of Alberta. The object of this recently formed institute is to do research along the same lines as that of the Arctic institute which has its headquarters, as the minister knows, in Montreal. One of the objects of the Boreal institute, which incidentally is prepared to make a go of it on an initial capital of $10,000, is to provide an information centre, training and inspection, and to undertake, co-ordinate and administer research in the north. I have a statement of the objectives of the Boreal institute which I shall be glad to pass along to the minister if he has not a copy of it, as I suspect he has. Institutes like these are very deserving of the support of the federal government by way of grants to further this very necessary and vital work to the future economic benefit of Canada.

When we were last discussing these estimates, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont asked me a question which can be found at page 3882 of Hansard for April 21. He asked me if I was aware of the fact that other federal government departments had made substantial expenditures in our northern areas. I have requested the officials of the department of northern affairs to obtain for me some statistics in this regard. While they are not lengthy, I do not wish to bore the committee by reading them now. I would ask permission, at this stage, Mr. Chairman, to have these statistics which have been provided by the officials of the northern affairs department printed in Hansard.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Would the hon. member give the source of his statistics?

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, I did. They were prepared by the officials of the department of northern affairs.

Mr. Pickersgill: What are they about?

Mr. Nielsen: They show the expenditures of all federal government departments in the Yukon and Northwest Territories from 1952 to date. There are other expenditures of the department itself in the Yukon and Northwest Territories covering this period.

Mr. Benidickson: Is it about a page in length?

Mr. Nielsen: I have four pages of statistics here.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Has the hon. member unanimous consent to have these statistics printed in Hansard at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: I want to turn for just a moment to the material concerning resources development in the Yukon and Northwest Territories and the expenditures on the development of roads and bridges in those two areas. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources during the years 1952 and 1957 spent the sum of $2.5 million in the Yukon and $1,150,000 in the Northwest Territories for these objects. During the period 1957-1962 over $16 million was spent in the Yukon Territory and $20 million in the Northwest Territories, so it can readily be seen that the comparison between the two periods is quite startling.

The point I wish to make in connection with these expenditures is simply this, that whereas from reaching a point six years ago where virtually no development was taking place in these northern regions—which development, I submit to the hon. member and his colleagues opposite, is very, very beneficial to the future economy of this nation—there is now a substantial development taking place.

The Leader of the Opposition and other hon. members opposite have very often taken issue with the northern development policies of this government. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo last Friday became quite emotional on this point and said that all these plans had been laid by the previous administration.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres has said this in the past, as has the Leader of the Opposition. These hon. members have said that all the plans were laid by the previous administration and all that was being done was that this government was carrying them into effect. In effect they were saying, "These were our plans. We should get the credit for this. We are all for this road development program. We are all for the blossoming forth of the north as a resource reservoir for the nation.

I think these gentlemen should get together with the leader of their party, for I can recall that on several occasions in 1958 their leader ridiculed the plans of the government with regard to northern development. These hon. members ridiculed speeches which our Prime Minister was making across the country and which the Leader of the Opposition was ridiculing just as fast as he followed the Prime Minister's campaign trail across the country.

In Swift Current, on February 27, 1958, the Leader of the Opposition classed these roads as "roads from igloo to igloo". This is the famous "igloo to igloo" statement.

I am sure the Leader of the Opposition, as well as all hon. members opposite, will be happy to know that this particular road which was classed as one from igloo to igloo is now approaching the site of the first oil well which was brought in in the Yukon Territory in 1959; and another oil well is being drilled now in the same area.

I am sure, too, that the same critics of this road program will be happy to know that as a direct result of this program there has been discovered on the boundary of the Yukon-Northwest Territories, at a place called Flat river, the world's largest known tungsten deposit, a deposit which it is anticipated will be sufficient to supply the whole of the considerable United States' demands for tungsten, a very strategic metal in these days of space achievement and space striving.

I can recall another statement having been made by the Leader of the Opposition. This was in Vancouver on September 27, 1958, when he said:

> Diefenbaker's promise of a billion dollar public works program in the Arctic is the phoniest promise ever made in Canadian history.

I think the statistics I have tabled will show that, far from being the phoniest promise in Canadian history, it has proved to be the most realistic achievement of any government in Canadian history.

Contrast it with an average annual expenditure of all federal government departments, for the period 1952 to 1957, of $46 million in the Northwest Territories and $36 million in the Yukon Territory. In the same period of years, 1957 to 1962, in the Northwest Territories $156 million will be expended; and in the Yukon Territory, $79,916,888, which is almost $80 million. Therefore when I said that all federal departments had increased their expenditures fivefold, I was not too far out in my estimation.

I wish to deal for a moment with the minister's announcement yesterday of the assistance program which his department is planning in the construction and maintenance of access roads to stimulate exploration, prospecting and development of the mineral resources of the north.

This is a very necessary policy which the government has very wisely adopted. This should be contrasted with the policy of the previous government, which was, "You show us that you have a resource; show us that you have an ore body that is worthy of development and we will build the road. There will be no assistance in road building until you can prove to our satisfaction that you have an ore body that has been proven."

Mr. Chairman, this is putting the cart before the horse, because in order to develop the resources of this vast area in the north there must be a stimulus given to exploration and prospecting. The only way that stimulus will come about is for the government to be interested financially in the field of resource exploration.

Before I leave the subject of roads, Mr. Chairman, I should like to remind the minister that he has a study under way concerning the all-weather maintenance of the Haines cut-off. I should like the minister to comment at some stage during the discussion of his estimates on the results of this survey, if they are yet available, because I believe the maintenance of the Haines cut-off as an all-weather road is essential to efficient resource development in the Yukon territory.

I should also very urgently press the minister to consider carrying out an engineering survey, and an economic survey which should perhaps precede the engineering survey, of a highway link between Carcross and Skagway. This has been discussed by many organizations in the Pacific northwest, not only in the Yukon, as an essential link in order to effectively develop the resources of the area.

The other matter I wish to discuss before I leave the subject of resources generally is that of changes in the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act. As the minister has explained in the house on more than one occasion, the Canada mining regulations which were recently passed do not apply to the Yukon territory.

I well recall reading about the effort that was made by the previous administration to alter the Yukon Quartz Mining Act so as to include the power to make regulations under that act. The member for the Yukon at the time—the Liberal member for the Yukon at the time, I may say—moved that the bill which was introduced by Mr. Lesage not be read a second time. He was supported in that motion by the now Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I urge the minister, in considering any alterations to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act, to have the fullest and most complete discussions with the mining fraternity and the mining industry in the Yukon territory. Also, the Yukon legislative council, which speaks for the people there, as their own local legislature, is a competent body capable of assessing the effect of any contemplated changes in this legislation. It would be a very sad thing indeed if any move were made to alter these two existing pieces of legislation which now guarantee to the mining people in the Yukon territory a set of rules which they understand and to which they adhere in their efforts to develop mineral resources.

I want to say a brief word about tourism in the north and to commend the department for the large support which it is giving to the Klondike festival at Dawson city, a project which is being organized by the Klondike festival foundation at Dawson city, the main planning being directed by Mr. Tom Patterson who was the founder of the Stratford festival. The date of the Klondike festival has been set for 1962 and it is expected the event will double or triple tourist travel in this area of Canada.

I should like the minister to bring the committee up to date concerning the plans which have been evolved for the establishment of a national park in the Yukon territory. I know the department had plans and I know that the idea was submitted to the Yukon legislative council and has been considered by them, but I am not aware of the recent departmental thinking along these lines.

I feel, too, that the minister and his department should take the lead in the formation of a public utilities commission in the Yukon territory. I am not aware whether there is a public utilities commission in the Northwest Territories but I can tell the minister that there is no such commission in the Yukon. This has brought about a situation where there is a possibility of rates which are abusive being charged by public utilities in the area. I am not suggesting that this is the case at the moment. The rates charged by the electrical utility in Whitehorse have, indeed, been reduced recently but it is possible that if the minister were to use his good offices to encourage the establishment of a utilities commission a much greater control could be exercised in this regard.

Another area in which I feel the time has long passed for action concerns the establishment of a securities commission in the Yukon Territory so that these fly by night promoters will be precluded from forming spurious companies and selling spurious stock to unsuspecting buyers on the basis of resource developments in the north. I am sure all hon. members have heard of the famous Mr. Caldough who was extradited from England and who is now in Vancouver charged with fraud arising from the sale of spurious stock. It is interesting to note that Mr. Caldough's basis for the sale of these stocks was property in the oil development areas of the Yukon Territory. This is a very great omission in the Yukon. I think this is the only area in Canada which is now without the protection I have suggested.

These remarks conclude what I have to say concerning resource development in the north, and I am left with only one sector to cover. I should like to do this before the first item passes. It deals with human development. At the pleasure of the committee I will speak at another time on this item, or I can proceed now. I shall be about another 15 minutes.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member for Yukon always makes a useful contribution to our debates and I think this is the appropriate time to ask him a question. I did not do so while he was speaking. As I understood him, he began by saying, as the burden of his argument, that the new government was doing things in the policy field different from those which had been done by the previous government. In support of that contention I think he referred simply to the fact that certain items of expenditure have been greater since the new government took office. I wonder if the hon. member would indicate to us what new policies have been introduced since the change of administration irrespective of expenditure on old policies such as he was discussing?

Mr. Nielsen: I should be very glad to do that. There are two important sectors, and the first one is this. Our future in the north is bound to be a mining future. I think that is agreed. The policy of the previous government with respect to development roads was this; "You prove to us that you have an ore body capable of being developed, and we shall assist you in building a road." That policy has been reversed and the government is now building roads into potential resource areas without requiring any evidence of there being proven ore bodies there. It is doing this in order to develop the area generally. It is taking a gamble, whereas the previous government was certainly not taking any risk. The point I make is that the gamble has paid off, and paid off very substantially.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member has not said where. What about the Pine Point railway proposition?

Mr. Nielsen: Well, that was, of course, a proposition which was thought of by the previous administration and it is now being built by this government.

Mr. Benidickson: It is not started yet and we have unemployment.

Mr. Nielsen: There is no difference in basic policy there, because there are proven resources already in that area. But the hon. member asked me a specific question concerning a difference in policy. This difference is very real and it is producing real results because whereas formerly there was nothing spent by the previous administration on speculative roads, which is what they are, the country is now being opened up on a large scale. Of course, this government would have been in very serious trouble if this policy had not paid off. The point is that it has paid off as anyone with faith in the north would realize it must pay off. I am happy to say that whereas Canada did not produce an ounce of tungsten, for instance, except in very special circumstances during the war, a new tungsten mine will open up in the Northwest Territories in 1962 which will be the world's largest single supplier of this product. This mine was discovered as a direct result of the policy of road building to which I have referred.

With the permission of the committee I will pass very briefly to the last section of my remarks. I want to cover the sector of human development in the north. When the statistics which I have put on record in Hansard are read by hon. members it will be realized that in the field of education very substantial increases have been made in the grants for the establishment of schools and for participation in educational developments in the north generally. I am very happy to see that this educational assistance has been extended with federal concurrence to the field of separate schools in the north as well.

Great strides have been made in the field of housing. Just how great they are can best be realized if I tell the members of the committee that before 1957 not one single dwelling unit had been constructed in the Yukon territory under the provisions of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, not because the people were not there to build them but because the terms of legislation were unworkable. In 1958 there was one building, in 1959 there were 16 buildings, and in 1960 there were 32 buildings. There are some 50 to 60 buildings under construction at the present time. These figures point out very dramatically the strides that have been made in this regard.

Mr. Benidickson: There has been a 1 per cent increase in interest to the purchaser since the former administration.

Mr. Nielsen: I am not an expert on interest rates as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is, and I should not like to get into an argument with him regarding rates of interest. I do know that where none were built before, we have now 50 units a year going up in that area.

The other matter on which I should like to have the minister give me current information, has regard to the scheme for the development of lot 19 at Whitehorse, and the establishment of a home builders' loan fund for the people of the Yukon territory who desire to build their own homes.

There are one or two other very brief items I should like to draw to the minister's attention. The first is a matter which I have been asked to present by the miners of the Yukon territory concerning the question of income tax and workmen's compensation. Recently the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers of the Yukon, local 924, made a certain submission to the Yukon legislative council concerning the reduction in income tax, or rather an increase in the basic exemption allowed under taxing legislation. These submissions resulted in a motion made in the Yukon legislative council during their last session to the effect that all bona fide residents of the Yukon in the single category, not otherwise subsidized by the federal government, be given an additional tax exemption of $500; and second, that all bona fide residents of the Yukon in the married category, not otherwise subsidized by the federal government be given an additional exemption of $1,000 on their tax; and third, that all bona fide residents of the Yukon building their own private residences be allowed to depreciate these homes as a deductible item in respect of their tax.

I know this matter has been presented to this house under the previous administration. The reason advanced in support of this contention, which I am very grateful to learn is favoured by the deputy minister of the department, can best be summed up from the journals. It is set forth as follows:

—that to encourage people to stay in the Yukon, to create the permanency of settlement necessary to the full development of the north, certain inequalities in living costs as well as housing facilities will need to be adjusted. The large mining companies recognize this fact and to an extent subsidize housing for their employees. The federal government also recognizes this added cost of living in the Yukon and subsidizes their employees by virtue of the isolated post allowance.

Then follows the resolution. I put this forward again for the minister's consideration, and perhaps the treasury board will take another look at the problem. I understand they have been the stumbling block in the past.

The question of workmen's compensation is a local problem but it is under the minister's jurisdiction in the sense that, as he knows, the same board that handles Yukon compensation cases handles the Northwest Territories compensation cases. For a long time the labour element in my constituency have been advocating a separate board for the Yukon territory so that claimants can be more expeditiously and fairly dealt with by a board which could assess claims on the spot.

I realize the committee has been very fair with me in allowing me to go over my allotted time in covering this rather large field. I should not have thought I would impose upon the committee to the extent I have, but had the hon. member for Mackenzie River been with us during the discussion of these estimates I perhaps would not have taken so much time. I have tried to be as non-partisan as I know he would have been, and I am sure he would support me in the submissions I have made concerning the Nothwest Territories in particular and the north generally. I should like to thank the committee for its courtesy.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Yukon for his statement and would ask him if I am right or wrong in assessing his statement when I say that he has suggested the difference between the former administration and the present administration is that the present administration would build a road irrespective of the economic report, on the grounds of providing additional employment without regard to the existence of a mine at the end of the road, or whether the project promised success or not. Is that what the hon. member has said?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I have said quite the contrary of that. I said the former administration insisted upon knowing there was a mine at the other end of the road before it would even undertake to invest a penny in the project. For instance, I know that a submission was made to the former administration for building a winter road to the oil fields at Eagle Plain in the Yukon. This request was rejected because it was not in conformity with the policy of the former administration. In contrast to that policy the government is building a highway into this area which will carry all-weather traffic.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Chairman, I think you will agree that this has been a wide ranging discussion. As I pointed out in the brief opening statement, the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources covers a wide range of fields. On the whole the discussion has been carried on a positive note, for which I should like to express my thanks to all hon. members who have contributed to the discussion in presenting many useful ideas during the course of the debate.

I am not going to take up the time of the committee by answering each point, but I assure hon. members that every point that has been raised during the course of this rather wide ranging discussion will be answered in the form of a letter.

One of the recurring items in the discussion, and this is of course inevitable, has been the question regarding who is responsible for the present pace of modern development. I do not intend to become involved in this subject tonight, other than by underlying the fact that, as the new Minister of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, during the course of an extensive tour of all parts of the Arctic, which concluded last week end with a trip to the eastern Arctic ranging from Cambridge bay to Frobisher bay, I was tremendously impressed by the rapid pace of development and progress of Canada's Arctic. I think I should merely say that what I have seen has demonstrated to me, more effectively and dramatically than ever before, that Canada is a northern nation, with a northern economy and a northern destiny.

Fortunately, Mr. Chairman, a good many of the queries raised during the discussion have already been answered by the various hon. members who have spoken, and I refer particularly to the hon. member for the Yukon.

There was one particularly critical note during the discussion, and I should like to refer to it briefly in passing. I do so very kindly, because I am a teacher myself and I understand that when my hon. friend from Port Arthur made his references there was nothing personal involved. He is just one of those petulant pedagogues who view the scene from Mount Olympus which gives rise to the statement from time to time that those who can, do; those who cannot, teach. I do not agree with that statement because, being a member of the teaching profession myself, I know there are many in this profession who have made outstanding contributions in a practical and positive way as well as their contribution to the academic world.

Perhaps I have some helpful advice for the hon. member here this evening. I know there is nothing malicious or personal in his statements because in the current issue of Maclean's magazine he makes precisely the same statements regarding the group to which he belongs. I quote from page 26 the following words:

> Fisher's own party has not been immune to his critical darts. Shortly after the C.C.F. and the Canadian Labour Congress got their new party project under way, Fisher calmly told the Ontario convention of the C.C.F. that the party's tactics had been stupid and its strategy bad.

I do not think the remarks in reference to myself were as pointed as these observations. The article goes on to point out the difficulty, and it is here where I wish to be helpful. I go on to quote the hon. member as follows:

> All my life I've been searching for someone to look up to but my experience has always been to move from respect, almost awe, through understanding to a mild jeer. In the army, I thought I was involved in a great purpose, and then I realized that rank had almost no relation to ability. At university, I ended up completely disrespectful of most professors.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, far be it from me to rise on a point of order, and I appreciate this publicity but as to its relevancy to the department I should like an explanation from the minister before he continues.

Mr. Dinsdale: I shall come to that point in one moment. I continue with the quotation:

> When I came to Ottawa, I thought I would at last find giants before whom I could stand in perennial respect. But I found no permanent idols here.

Therefore, if I could quote scripture, he has discovered that all his idols have feet of clay, which is the case in most human circumstances. But here is where I wish to be helpful, and here is where I become quite germane to the discussion under way. The hon. member was kind enough to make reference to a very important conference, namely the resources for tomorrow conference, which is scheduled for Montreal next October. I believe his was the only reference to the conference, and it provides me with an opportunity during the present discussion to underline the importance and the significance of the conference. He pointed out the fact that there had been a lack of suitable publicity. I hope this is not true because we have been successful in getting together a most qualified secretariat headed by a man of established reputation in the resources development field which for the past several months have been working early and late, in season and out of season, in order to get this conference under way. If there has been any neglect regarding publicity I think it might be on the part of hon. members themselves.

This parliament has a very important function and role to play in the promotion of the resources for tomorrow conference. There is no partisanship in this conference. It comes from the realization that the time is long past due when Canadians should get together the best brains, the people most qualified, and give serious consideration to the future development of our renewable resources.

The secretariat responsible for organizing the conference have issued bulletins which have been placed in the hands of all hon. members and if, as the hon. member for Port Arthur suggests, there are local publicity media in his constituency which have not heard of the conference I think it is easy to conclude where the difficulty lies. To the best of our ability and with all the means at our disposal we must all do our best to make this conference an outstanding success.

There is another point about the conference that I should like to mention. This is a co-operative venture between the federal and provincial governments. In planning for this conference there was no suggestion of precedence of one governmental level. It is a partnership among all levels of government. Those sitting on the steering committee are actually representative of the provincial and federal authorities, but also the municipal bodies have a responsibility in assisting in the promotion of this conference. There is no thought of a federal and a provincial conflict in this conference; it is a complete partnership all down the line, and this is exactly the way we want it to continue. Therefore, if my hon. friend is looking for a cause to pursue, looking for an idol, is in pursuit of the summum bonum, or the holy grail, there is something that he can give his attention to and in so doing make a contribution that will redound to posterity.

There was also some observation to the effect that nothing very much is going on in the north. I will not labour that point at all because what has been said in discussion already has more than refuted this point, but here is a field in which the hon. member for Port Arthur might be able to make an outstanding contribution. He is an educationist of some considerable repute. One of the programs that we are proudest of in the north is our rapid progress in education. Just three years ago 16 per cent of our own Eskimo children were in schools. Today that percentage has reached the 60 per cent level and we hope that within the next four years every Eskimo child will have the advantage of an education similar to that of any other Canadian child.

If as the hon. member for Port Arthur has indicated he does not feel he is making a worth-while contribution in the house, I should like to suggest that there is tremendous scope in our educational program in the north, and we would be glad to welcome him into our program when he retires from this honourable house. I am sure he would find that in the north there is a real challenge that would test the mettle of the best of us.

There was another suggestion that the work of the committee on mines, forests and waters has been an exercise in futility and that nothing ever emerges from the committee. I should like to recite briefly the recommendations that have already been implemented during the past three years as a result of the deliberations of the committee. Water problems have been dealt with. There were 11 main recommendations and all except one have been implemented. The Nelson river system study that was recommended is in process at the present time. The idea of a long distance national power grid is under active study at the moment. The field of water pollution and abatement has been dealt with in legislation that was passed in the house last fall. Various water development programs such as the upper Thames program, the Parkhill dam and Ausable river conservation program are in process, and just the other day it was my privilege to announce co-operation with other authorities in the metro Toronto conservation plan.

The new forestry department which was recommended by the committee is now a fact. Travel bureau activities have been expanded, as has been indicated by various speakers during the course of the debate, and this year we are opening a new office in San Francisco. The productivity council, of course, was also an idea that came out of the deliberations of this important committee.

I could go on with other points. There is just one more I should like to mention. The hon. member for Port Arthur quoted from our official bulletin to the effect that morale was in a rather low state in the Mackenzie delta region, but he did not complete the quotation. It is quite true that this has been one of our most difficult areas because of the lack of resources but it is also one of the most encouraging areas for economic development at the present time, and if he had been completely objective academically in his presentation to the house he would have read the final sentence which is in these words:

> As a result, a program of improved resource harvesting will be started during 1960 leading to a more effective use of fish and sea mammals, the production of locally produced dog food, a logging program for housing, and the development of handicrafts and fur garments for commercial sale in the south.

This program is under way at the present time. I had the opportunity of seeing it in operation when I was in this area during the Easter recess.

Perhaps I might refer briefly to some of the other points raised. I could spend a long time dealing with the points raised by the hon. member for Yukon. He is most knowledgeable in this field and many times I go to him for advice and information when we are considering the problems of the north. There are just a few references I should perhaps make. He raised a query about a statement I was supposed to have made on the prospects of a new province north of the 60th parallel. I should merely like to say that I agree entirely with the view he expressed. This depends wholly on the increase in population and on the rapidity of development of the economy of the north. I say that from experience because my own province of Manitoba was carved out of the Northwest Territories and had to await the influx of population after the construction of the C.P.R. and the resultant economic development before it could be declared a separate province within confederation. We are anticipating the same process in the north. How long or how short it will be will depend entirely on the rate of progress and development of that important territory.

Mr. Nielsen: Before the minister leaves that point, may I say that he was fixed by the C.B.C. with a statement to the effect that he was advocating the joinder of the Mackenzie river district and the Yukon as a province. That is the point that has to be cleared up.

Mr. Dinsdale: From the standpoint of history and tradition and all other considerations that would be quite impossible because the Yukon is the Yukon and the Northwest Territories are the Northwest Territories and never the twain shall meet in interprovincial co-operation. Having been down north, as they say, I am quite aware of that. The hon. member made some reference to the Haines cut-off. I am happy to report that the study has been completed and will be in the hands of the interdepartmental committee very shortly. I also want to assure him that so far as any changes in the quartz mining regulations pertaining to the Yukon Territory are concerned none will be contemplated without the closest consultation with those who are connected with mining activities in the Yukon. Changes would only be made on the recommendation of those who are familiar with the situation there.

The question of a national park for the Yukon, as the hon. member no doubt knows, has been referred to the Yukon territorial council and the decision is now within the hands of the members of that governing body. I think I shall leave his other points to be dealt with by correspondence and in personal discussion. I do express my appreciation to the hon. member for having brought these matters to my attention.

The hon. member for Kootenay West made some very pertinent points. I want to thank him for his kindly references to myself and I merely wish to say that we are interested in that favourite project of his, the S.S. Moyie, and are seeking ways and means to preserve this historic old relic. I could refer to other matters raised by the hon. member. We could continue our pleasant discussion as to who established sovereignty in the north but we can also carry that on in personal conversation.

I was very interested in the comments made by the maritime members who were most energetic and enthusiastic in presenting the viewpoint of that important part of Canada. If I were to refer to the remarks of each hon. member I am sure it would take more time than I have at my disposal tonight. I am fully aware that the maritime provinces have rich resources both from the standpoint of tourism and the standpoint of national parks and historic sites. We have various projects under way at the moment. That is my reason for making a tour of the maritimes this summer. There are so many new projects to be opened that I am going to spend at least a week touring the maritimes and officially opening the various projects that have been under way. I am sure that once these hon. members get me on site there we can deal with these matters personally and I do not need to take the time of the committee tonight dealing with them specifically.

Mr. McCleave: Would the minister permit a question at this point? Undoubtedly he will be visiting the most famous and popular part of his historical empire, the Halifax citadel. Can he say how much will be spent on renovations there in the current fiscal year?

Mr. Dinsdale: There has been $1 million expended up to the present time and I believe there is an additional $150,000 earmarked for that site during the current fiscal year.

The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador referred to the special position of the Eskimos in Labrador and I wish to assure him that I hope to come to grips with that problem just as quickly as possible. We have had conversations on this matter and I fully appreciate its urgency. I might also refer to what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said with respect to Terra Nova park. I shall be in Terra Nova during the tour and will see these things for myself at that time.

The hon. member for Nipissing spent some time discussing the tourist industry. I merely want to say in passing that we have no reason to be pessimistic about progress in tourism in Canada. Just two weeks ago I received the official statistics for the past tourist season and they indicated that, for the first time, the tourist industry became the second largest dollar earner in the Canadian economy. For the first time, the tourist industry was ahead of wheat. Newsprint was first, tourist receipts second and wheat third. Progress is being made so rapidly in this industry that I am convinced it will not be long until tourism will occupy first position. I believe the maritime provinces will be the area where this will occur first.

As a final word on this subject of tourism, I should like to say that the expenditure of the tourist dollar in Canada has been going up. It is true that Canadians have been expending an increasing amount of money in the United States as well. We cannot compare the two and say that the deficit has been increasing. This is a relative thing, and if measured in these terms, we have every reason to be optimistic.

I shall not enter the discussion about Cabot and where he first landed or who has priority in that respect. I will just make this comment, that after hearing the Irishman in full flight tonight, I can only conclude that the sweetest recollections of life are memories of things forgotten. This is the only comment I wish to make on this important subject here tonight.

Having covered these few points, Mr. Chairman, I shall let the matter rest. If there are any further questions, I am sure hon. members can raise them as we proceed to the various items in the estimates.

Mr. Benidickson: I have already indicated my high personal regard for the minister, who is a new minister. However, I must tell the leader of the house that we could not pass this item on the basis of the statement made by the minister that everyone would receive a letter with respect to the item he has raised in the debate on the estimates of this department. That is not the way we do business here. There are 265 members and each of us raises problems in which the other is interested as these problems are raised. When a question is raised in committee of supply and is replied to by letter, that does not satisfy the other 264 members of this committee.

We are getting very close to the hour of adjournment, and I want to suggest to the minister that he review, as ministers traditionally have at this stage, the problems raised and where occasion justifies he should reply as he did effusively to one of his colleagues, the hon. member for Yukon. Admittedly, this hon. member has a great interest in northern affairs. However, I think the minister should analyse, as ministers traditionally have, the questions that have been raised in the debate, not only today but on previous occasions. I do not care about the holy grails or anything else about which the minister was talking. I think a letter to one member of parliament is not satisfactory in most cases because all of us were aware of the question when it was raised initially and are interested in these problems. We do not know about them if the answer is simply made by letter from the minister after the administration item is carried.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: Does the hon. member's recollection go back to occasions when I was on the other side of the house asking questions of ministers who did not traditionally either reply to me in the house verbally or send me a letter?

Mr. Benidickson: Apparently I have the floor. The leader of the house was a very active, observant and critical member when he was in opposition. If he did not get a reply on any particular occasion, I cannot believe that he would not repeat the question in the future. My direct answer to the minister is no, I do not recall. If the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre at that time had pursued his request, then I cannot believe that parliamentary procedure did not give him the opportunity to get the information to which he was entitled. That is my point here tonight. I have great respect for the new minister, and I do not think this phrase is adequate in parliament, everyone will get a letter.

I believe in some cases when members raise certain points of local and minor consequence, they would be satisfied to get a letter, just as I am on occasion. However, this is not the general way of dealing with the administration item of the department, and I hope the minister will review the debate and check the problems that have been raised. If the minister replies, as ministers traditionally have, then those of us who are interested in the information will get it through the committee of supply. If a reply were made by letter from the minister the other 264 members would not receive the information.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member will recall my final statement. If there are any further questions, we shall be glad to deal with them during the course of the discussion. My suggestion with regard to the letters related to dealing with minor points. The reason I raised it was when I was in opposition it was a practice that was followed regularly in order to save time. We do not want to short-circuit the discussion. We will be quite happy to deal with matters of substance in verbal replies.

Mr. Fisher: May I call it 10.30 o'clock?

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the house leader could give us a preview of what the government is looking forward to next week.

Mr. Churchill: I am sure the opposition is looking forward to next week with the same interest. Tomorrow we will continue, and I presume complete, the estimates of this very interesting and important Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. We will then continue with the estimates of the Department of Fisheries.

For next week, Monday and Tuesday will be a supply motion. I think it is No. 5 in the list of supply motions. For the balance of the week, so that hon. members may make the necessary preparations, it is likely that on the estimates side the following departments will be before the house, national revenue, justice, mines and technical surveys, and forestry. However, I will give a more precise outline tomorrow of the order in which those estimates will come.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister think that is enough estimates?

Mr. Churchill: With the desire of the house to complete early in June, I feel sure I should add another department to that list.

Mr. Benidickson: Veterans affairs.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I could ask the house leader if he has any report about the railway situation?

Mr. Churchill: No. I have just heard rumours; I have no official report.

At 10:35 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

AVERAGE PRICES, 1960, FOR AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Question No. 114—Mr. Boulanger:

What was the average price obtained by farmers in Canada, for the whole year of 1960, for wheat, barley, oats, flaxseed, hogs, and eggs?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture):

AVERAGE WEIGHTED CANADIAN FARM PRICE

Year	Product	Unit	Price
1960	Eggs	doz.	$ .298
1960	Hogs	cwt.	22.71
1959–60[1]	Flaxseed	bu.	3.07
1959–60	Oats for grain
	eastern Canada	bu.	.78
	western Canada	bu.	.63
	Canada	bu.	.68
1959–60	Wheat
	eastern Canada	bu.	1.59
	western Canada[2]	bu.	1.19
	Canada	bu.	1.20
1959–60	Barley
	eastern Canada	bu.	1.01
	Canada	bu.	.72

[1] Crop year, August 1 to July 31. Since only about one half the 1960 flaxseed crop has been marketed and since only the initial payment has been made on the 1960 crop of wheat, oats and barley data for the 1959–60 crop year has been listed.

[2] Includes initial and interm payments. Some further payments may be made by the Canadian wheat board on the 1959 crop.

The average farm price for eggs are Department of Agriculture figures while the average farm prices for wheat, barley, oats, flaxseed and hogs are dominion bureau of statistics figures.

Questions

OUTSIDE PRINTING CONTRACTS

Question No. 202—Mr. Pitman:

1. Have the facilities of the Queen's printer been operating at full capacity from January to March 1961?
2. If not, what are the reasons?
3. How many contracts for printing have been let out during the period January to March 1961?
4. What is the total value of these contracts?

Answer by: Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State):

1. Yes.
2. N/A.
3. 1,409.
4. $1,528,254.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 5, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

SASKATCHEWAN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ROYAL ASSENT TO PROVINCIAL BILL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table two copies of order in council P.C. 1961-675, dated May 5, in which His Excellency the Governor General by and with the advice of Her Majesty the Queen's privy council for Canada declares his assent to Bill No. 56 of the legislature of Saskatchewan passed during the present year and which was reserved by the lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan for the signification of the pleasure of the Governor General in accordance with the terms of the British North America Act.

In view of the importance of the constitutional issue involved, and with the leave of the house, I should like to place on the record the text of this order in council. It is a relatively short one. Leaving out the preliminaries and commencing with the preamble it reads as follows:

Whereas Bill No. 56 entitled "The Mineral Contracts Alteration Act, 1961" passed by the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan at the first session of the fourteenth legislature of the province of Saskatchewan, was reserved on the 8th day of April, 1961, by his honour the lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan for the signification of the pleasure of the Governor General;

And whereas the lieutenant governor, in transmitting the bill, gave as his reasons for reserving it

(a) that the bill, in his view, was ultra vires the legislature, and

(b) that the bill was not in the national interest;

And whereas it is the established policy in these matters to consider first the question of whether the bill is within the competence of the legislature to enact and second the question of whether it is in conflict with national policy or interest, and if these two questions be resolved favourably, to recommend that assent be given unless the bill is otherwise objectionable;

And whereas the Minister of Justice has examined the bill and has considered the reasons given by his honour the lieutenant governor for the reservation thereof, and he is of the opinion, with respect to the first question, that the bill is within the competence of the legislature to enact; that, with respect to the second question, the minister has considered the authorities and precedents, and is of the opinion that the expression "conflict with national policy or interest" does not relate solely to a difference of principle or point of view, but must include matters of practical or physical effect, and that in this sense the bill is not in conflict with national policy or interest;

And whereas the question of whether the bill is otherwise objectionable, being a matter that involves considerations other than legal, has been considered by His Excellency's advisers as a whole, and the conclusion has been reached that the nature of the bill is not such as to warrant departure from the normal course of recommending assent;

Wherefore His Excellency the Governor General, by and with the advice of the Queen's privy council for Canada, is pleased hereby to declare his assent to the said bill.

The house will recall that Hon. Frank Bastedo, lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan, reserved this bill, and did so without instructions from or consultation with the federal government. I have no hesitation in saying that had there been such consultation my colleagues and I would have recommended to the Governor General that the lieutenant governor be instructed not to reserve the bill.

I should call your attention, sir, and that of the house to the fact that in 1882 the governor general in council, in a minute of council transmitted to the lieutenant governors of each province, noted:

The lieutenant governor is not warranted in reserving any measure for the assent of the governor general on the advice of his ministers. He should do so in his capacity of a dominion officer only, and on instructions from the Governor General. It is only in a case of extreme necessity that a lieutenant governor should without such instructions exercise his discretion as a dominion officer in reserving a bill. In fact, with facility of communication between the dominion and provincial governments such a necessity can seldom if ever arise.

That was in 1882. In view of the development of communications since, it is evident that nowadays there should be ample opportunity for lieutenant governors to confer with the federal government before reserving a bill. I should point out that while no formal instructions have yet been given to lieutenant governors to reserve a bill unless upon specific instructions, my colleagues and I are now considering whether such formal instructions should be given.

In so far as the substance and other aspects of the bill in question are concerned, they are properly, of course, the concern of the governor general in council; and I feel that instead of going into detail, if there is any discussion to take place on this matter it might well be postponed until the estimates of the privy council are before the house unless naturally, in the meantime, opportunity arises for discussion.

Royal Assent to Provincial Bill

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think the house has listened with great interest to the words of the Prime Minister and to the decision of the government. I feel that the government has made a correct decision, and I am certain that it will receive the approval of the people of Saskatchewan in general.

The Prime Minister made it clear this morning, as he has done on former occasions, that in reserving Bill No. 56 the lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan did so without instructions from the Governor General or the governor in council, and without consultation.

The Prime Minister has also made it abundantly clear, and with this I very much agree, that this is an extraordinary procedure and he has pointed out that, although it may conceivably have been within the letter of the law, the precedents make this kind of action unwarranted. I feel that the lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan has exceeded the prerogatives of his office—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine his comments on the matter, to the factual statements of policy in the same way the Prime Minister did and not to express opinions with respect to the conduct of Her Majesty's representative in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order that you have raised, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that on other occasions you have been even stricter in your rulings and that any reference to a lieutenant governor, his office or how he carried out his office was considered out of order. The Prime Minister has indicated that this whole question will be the subject of a debate in the house on a future occasion, and at that time I shall endeavour once again to put my views before the house and indicate that in my view he should resign.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will have to abide by the rules of the house with respect to commenting on the conduct of the representative of Her Majesty except as such conduct is necessarily involved in a factual way in the statements of policy that have been made, but that is a problem that we can meet when it arises.

Mr. Argue: If he does wrong, where do we go from there?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

UNITED NATIONS

RUANDA-URUNDI—APPOINTMENT OF CANADIAN MEMBER OF SPECIAL COMMISSION

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce the appointment of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) to the special United Nations commission of judicial review for the Belgian trust territory of Ruanda-Urundi.

The territory is a small, densely populated area lying landlocked in equatorial Africa between the republic of the Congo—Leopoldville—to the west, Uganda to the north and Tanganyika to the east and south. A former German colony, since 1919 it has been administered by Belgium, first as a mandate of the league of nations and subsequently as a trust territory of the United Nations.

On April 21 the general assembly adopted by a large majority, which included Canada, a resolution giving Belgium specific directives in respect of the administration of the territory and its evolution to independence. The resolution also contained a provision for the implementation of a general amnesty and the establishment of a special three nation commission to review a number of cases of persons convicted of grave crimes with a view to securing their release from prison or return from exile. Canada, together with Brazil and Tunisia, was elected to serve on this commission, which is expected to leave this month on a journey of approximately three weeks to Belgium and Ruanda-Urundi and to submit a report to the United Nations prior to legislative elections in the territory scheduled for August of this year. The costs of the commission will, of course, be borne by the United Nations.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Charlevoix is well qualified to take this assignment. He has broad legal and political experience, and has concerned himself particularly with international affairs. In 1958 he was a member of the Canadian delegation to the NATO parliamentary association meeting in London, and during the fifteenth session of the United Nations general assembly which has just been completed he served as Canadian representative both in the legal committee and also in the trusteeship committee, which has been considering the Ruanda-Urundi item. This hon. member has made a splendid contribution to the work of the United Nations during its last session.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have no comment to make about an assignment given to an hon. member of the house, but I would simply point out to the minister that he has a parliamentary secretary who does not seem to be overly occupied when he is in the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When a parliamentary secretary appointed for the purpose of assisting the minister is provided with remuneration for the discharge of his heavy responsibilities it would seem to me that assignments of this kind should not pass by the parliamentary secretary, as he is apparently not overly occupied.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the information on this important question given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I think it demonstrates what can be done in the spirit of conciliation when people are willing to achieve good ends through negotiation and apply the principles of common sense, having in mind the welfare of all people. We wish the officials representing this country and the mission concerned every success in all they are attempting to undertake in connection with this matter.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SETTLEMENT OF RAILWAY STRIKE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Is the Prime Minister or Minister of Labour not going to make a statement on motions in connection with the settlement of the threatened railway strike?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Laurier will have to leave to the government the decision as to what statement will be made by the government.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Prime Minister if he has any comment to make on the settlement of the strike between the railways and the members of the Canadian brotherhood of railway workers?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I expressed the hope the other day that there would not be a strike. Negotiations have continued from time to time since legislation was passed in December, intermittently it is true but in the last few days more regularly, and as a result of the process of negotiation there will not be a strike.

Mr. Chevrier: In asking a supplementary question of the Prime Minister, may I preface it by saying that we too on this side of the house are delighted that there has been—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: —a settlement of this dispute on the terms that we recommended in the house some months ago.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour whether any arrangement has been made between the government and the railways in connection with the funds with which these increases will be met?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when the government is in a position to do so it will bring before the house, as I have already pointed out, such legislation as may be acceptable to the government in conformity with some parts, not all, of the recommendations made by the MacPherson commission.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a further question.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member to permit a supplementary question from the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the settlement and in view of the statement he has just made, the Freight Rates Reduction Act will be maintained; that is, that there will be no increase in freight rates, and if so for what period of time?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The resolution in respect of the matter referred to by the hon. member is on the order paper.

Mr. Argue: Is it correct to say that the increased wage rates will be paid out of railway revenues, and not by the public of Canada?

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I have a supplementary question that I should like to ask of the Prime Minister. In view of the settlement which is based upon terms strongly advocated in this house by the Liberal opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —may I ask the Prime Minister now what disposition is going to be made for those thousands of railway workers who were laid off as a result of the dispute which this government was unable to settle six months ago.

Mr. Argue: There has been no strike.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to prevent the Prime Minister from answering, but may I comment first on the question which is really a controversial statement introduced as a question and not a search for information.

Labour Conditions

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is highly improper.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen opposite, in spite of all their talk about the rights of parliament, are trying to prevent us from expressing our opinions. I ask the Prime Minister—

Mr. Harkness: You are infringing on our rights every day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of National Defence now offers his two cents worth.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to speak to the point of order I shall be glad to elaborate what I had in mind. He was asking first about a matter of policy which the government has already indicated will be announced in due course. The first part of his question as well as the last part were expressions of opinion. On that account I considered that he had overstepped the bounds of propriety at this time and that he should reserve comment of that kind for debate.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member for Essex East is constantly flouting your authority, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, Your Honour does not catch all these observations made by responsible ministers. The observation just now made by a neophyte, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) is one to which Your Honour's attention should be directed.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to raise this as a matter of privilege I will hear him. Otherwise it is irregular to comment on it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What the Minister of Public Works says, Mr. Speaker, really does not need to be dignified by raising it to a question of privilege. The question which I was asking, and which I submit is in order, is what is going to happen—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member would indicate why he submits that it is in order I might modify my view. He is entitled to comment on the ruling I have made, but I wish he would confine himself now to the relevant matter, namely the reasons why his question would be in order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Many hundreds of men have been laid off by the Canadian Pacific Railway and by the Canadian National Railways, and I want to know from the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is dealing with the substance of the controversy rather than the principle which to my mind is involved in the way in which he has chosen to bring this matter before the house. I recognize the hon. member for Middlesex West.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will sit down for the Speaker and not for anyone else.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has not finished his comments in dealing with the point of order, I will hear him. However, I hope I shall not be obliged again to ask him not to deal with the substance of the question and thereby make his point as a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am asking the Prime Minister a question about the settlement. I am surely entitled to ask what are the consequences of the settlement. That is the nature of my question.

I ask the Prime Minister now this question. As a result of the settlement of this particular issue between the railways and the railway workers, can the Prime Minister say what steps will be taken under the act passed in this house, to see to it that those laid off will be reinstated?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the obvious annoyance of the hon. gentleman is apparent over the settlement announced this morning.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I ask the Prime Minister to answer the question. I now rise on a question of privilege. The right hon. gentleman—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the floor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: These questions of privilege that are not questions of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If a question of privilege arises out of what the Prime Minister has said to this point I think the hon. member for Essex East would be entitled to the floor, and I will hear what question of privilege he feels arises.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister said that I was obviously annoyed over the fact that a settlement had taken place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I heard what the Prime Minister said, and in my view a question of privilege does not arise. I will go this far with the hon. member for Essex East and say it was not an appropriate answer to the question which he addressed, in that it expressed extraneous opinions. As there is in my view no matter of privilege arising from what the Prime Minister has said, I will hear the Prime Minister.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; the hon. member has raised a question of privilege, and it has been disposed of.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not even argued the point.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member indicated that the point arose out of what the Prime Minister had said, and I have indicated that I see no question of privilege in what the Prime Minister said. However, I did express the view that it was not an appropriate answer to the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I referred to any extraneous matters I did so because of the gratuitous statements made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Deal with the question asked.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would say this. Legislation was passed by this house last December. It was undertaken that those who had been laid off by reason of the fact that a strike had been threatened should be reinstated. Parliament passed that legislation and the provision is embodied in section 4 of the act, which reads:

> Every railway company shall reinstate every employee who was laid off since the 1st day of November, 1960, by reason of a curtailment or discontinuance of any of the operations of the company in anticipation of a strike by the employees of the company.

That is the law of the land which was passed by parliament. I notice that in his first statement the hon. gentleman started by saying that thousands were laid off. He got down to hundreds in his second question, and I simply say in answer to him that the law of the land must at all times be enforced.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course, but that is not the question.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should recognize the hon. member for Middlesex West who was good enough to defer his question.

[Later:]

Mr. Chevrier: May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. His colleague the Minister of Labour is reported to have said last night or this morning in reference to the settlement of this strike, that he did not know where the money which would provide for the settlement is to come from. I think I am entitled to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that this is an important matter arising as it does following the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation, and in the light of the deficit of the Canadian National Railways for last year and the estimated deficit for 1961, he will give some indication of how the funds will be provided by parliament, if that is the way it is going to be done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not for me to add anything. I hope that following the settlement arrangements will be made by the company, as I am sure they will, to make the payments and discharge the responsibilities which they undertook as a result of the settlement made between the companies and the employees.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Could I ask the Prime Minister to give the house an assurance that no prior undertaking of any description was given to the railway companies before the settlement was reached yesterday?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say with the greatest joviality to the hon. gentleman that the experiences he used to have when he was a member of the government of a former day are not being repeated by this government.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the Prime Minister could now give a categorical answer to a simple, straightforward question.

WATER RESOURCES

ONTARIO—AGREEMENT RESPECTING CONSTRUCTION OF PARKHILL DAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): My question is directed to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Can the minister inform the house whether any progress has been made in arranging with the province of Ontario and the Ausable valley conservation authority for the construction of the Parkhill dam? If so, what is the present status of the negotiations?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I thank the hon. member for his question, and I am happy to inform him that the formal agreement will be signed next Wednesday at Parkhill.

POWER

INQUIRY AS TO ALTERNATIVE FINANCIAL PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Representing the interests and concern of hon. members in all parties, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question in a strictly non-partisan spirit. Has the government given any consideration to proposals alternative to those presented by Premier Bennett to the Minister of Finance during the discussions in Victoria on March 24 and 25 with respect to the financing of Columbia river development? If so, is the minister in a position to inform the house of the nature of these alternative proposals?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I did inform the house of those alternative proposals on March 27 when I made a report to the house following my discussions at Victoria with Premier Bennett. I then reported that the premier had put forward two alternative proposals and that the federal government had previously put forward a proposal, and that these three proposals had been discussed fully, frankly and in a cordial spirit in the talks I had with Premier Bennett. The three proposals are set forth in detail in Hansard of March 27 at pages 3400, 3401 and 3402. This subject of the financing of the Columbia river development has, of course, continued to receive consideration on the part of the government.

Mr. Herridge: Apparently no further proposals have come forward. I should like to ask the minister if he would care to comment on a speech made by the leader of the Liberal party in British Columbia at Vancouver a year or two ago—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has put himself out of court by his introduction. He may have a question to ask, but it is certainly not the administrative responsibility of the minister to comment on speeches made by politicians elsewhere.

Mr. Herridge: I apologize but the hon. member for Essex East has made several comments of a similar kind. My question is, has the federal government given consideration to expropriation in connection with the Columbia river project, presumably through an amendment to the British North America Act?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Speaker; and if anybody in British Columbia said that he evidently does not know what he is talking about.

HARBOURS

GROS-CACOUNA, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO RESOLUTION RESPECTING DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister inform the house if he has received a resolution from the city of Riviere du Loup regarding port development at Gros-Cacouna and, if so, will he say when the city can expect an answer?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): The hon. member for that riding has been in constant touch with me over the past year in connection with that project. I can assure the hon. member for Levis that it is under constant consideration. I do not know whether we have received a resolution in the last day or two, but I shall be very happy to inform the hon. member if such is the case.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): In the absence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and of the parliamentary secretary I wonder if I could place this question on the order paper. It could then be taken as notice. Has the minister yet received a reply from the attorney general of the province of British Columbia with respect to certain resolutions from Indian bands asking that section 96A(2) of the Indian Act be brought into force on the reservations concerned. Might I also inquire whether the minister can announce what action will be taken as a result of the amendment by the British Columbia legislature of the provincial liquor act in so far as its application to Indians is concerned.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question will be taken as notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EARLY ANNOUNCEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Does the minister not think that plans for the next winter works program should be made known to the municipalities now? If so, does the government intend to take immediate steps in this regard?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the government is always looking at the situation. The government instituted this winter works program and co-operated with the provinces in respect to any announcements which are made as to the time it will be started.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the continuing unemployment has the government given any consideration to a summer works program along the same lines?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, the measures this government has taken since this session commenced on November 17 last are taking effect now, and work will be provided the year round.

Mr. Chevrier: With 700,000 people out of work?

Mr. Starr: Don't say that with such glee.

Mr. Chevrier: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I did not say that with glee, I said it with accuracy. The government's policies are not producing the results the minister has said they would.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO MEETINGS TO BE ATTENDED BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, while the Prime Minister is calming down may I ask his more serene colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if he can give the house any intimation of the nature of the meetings which he is about to attend. I refer to the NATO meeting and the 14 power Geneva conference. As the minister is leaving tonight may I say to him, in that spirit of good will which now characterizes this particular phase of our discussions, that I am sure the house wishes the minister a successful assignment, and bon voyage. We all hope that these meetings will contribute to the peace of the world.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to the hon. member for Essex East for extending these good wishes to me on this trip to Europe.

The NATO meeting is the annual spring meeting of the organization which is attended only by the foreign ministers, and not by the ministers of finance and national defence, as is the case with the December meeting each year. The agenda for these meetings is never made public, but I believe there will be discussions on the present international situation, particularly concerning those parts of the globe in which there is great tension at the present time. Furthermore, there will probably be discussions on long term planning for the NATO organization.

With regard to the Geneva conference, the purpose is to deal exclusively with the situation in Laos. Canada's representatives are attending that conference because Canada is a member of the international supervisory commission, so that our interests will be to further whatever steps will make it possible for that commission to prevent further trouble in that unhappy country and to help bring about a permanent solution under which Laos will be a neutral state unaffected by the cold war.

CUBA—REQUEST FOR TRANSPORTATION FOR CANADIAN MISSIONARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Is the government considering making its transport facilities available to all Canadian missionaries presently in Cuba who would like to come back to Canada?

(Text):

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are deeply concerned about the action which is said to have been taken by Cuban authorities against Canadian Catholic priests and nuns in Cuba. The Canadian embassy in Havana is in touch with members of the Canadian religious community there, and the Department of External Affairs is consulting with the Catholic authorities in Canada regarding the action which may be required to assist these missionaries.

It should be recalled that these Canadian missionaries went to Cuba for idealistic and disinterested purposes, and over the years, have won the respect and affection of the people among whom they have worked. In view of the services they have rendered it is our hope that the Cuban government will take all necessary measures to ensure their safety and the protection of their property. The Cuban government is well aware of the importance attached by the Canadian government to securing fair and equitable treatment for Canadian priests and nuns in Cuba. We cannot but regret that the decision of the Cuban government may endanger one of the most valuable ties established between Canada and Cuba. We will certainly do everything we can to assist; at the moment I think it would be unwise for me to go any further.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SUCCESSFUL FLIGHT OF UNITED STATES ASTRONAUT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Would the Prime Minister care to comment on the successful space flight of the United States astronaut Alan Shepard this morning?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that in asking the question the hon. member intended to give me the opportunity to join with him and all other hon. members in congratulating the astronaut and also the United States of America on this outstanding achievement.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REQUEST FOR EMBARGO ON IMPORTATION OF RADAR DETECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, of which I have sent him notice. It has been reported that in the United States a device is on the market which sells for $40, and which can be installed in an automobile, the function of which is to spot police radar installations. In view of the fact that such a device could easily outwit law enforcement in regard to traffic in Canada, could the minister indicate to the house whether the government would consider—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member's question relates, as it appears, to law enforcement, particularly with respect to speeding and other highway offences, it seems to me he is asking the question of the wrong government.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I think your point of view has not been well taken because the hon. member has not completed his question. I understand he is suggesting the imposition of an embargo in respect of this device, and this would be within the jurisdiction of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member feels that this device is of such consequence that there is some urgency about the matter I am willing to allow him to proceed.

Mr. Badanai: Could the minister indicate to the house whether the government would consider imposing an embargo on such a gadget designed to circumvent efforts of the police to control highway accidents?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I received this question just before I came into the house. I know nothing about the matter, but it would appear to me that perhaps the hon. member attaches too much importance to rumours which appear in the press from time to time, and expresses too little confidence in the ability of police forces to deal with such a situation. If the dire consequences to which he has referred should arise, I am sure the competent governments will take whatever action is necessary.

Mr. Badanai: There is no rumour about it.

TRADE

GRAIN—INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACT FOR SALE TO CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Yesterday in this house an attack was made on the China trade agreement for—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Pascoe: There was an attack made in this regard because the agreement does not tie Canada to a definite contract as to the amount and price of the wheat to be delivered during the next three years.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not entitled to ask a question in pursuance of a debate. If he has a question to ask which seeks information of the government, would he please put his question.

Mr. Pascoe: Would the minister inform the house that if a definite contract was signed, as advocated by the hon. member for Assiniboia, there would be no opportunity to obtain a better price should wheat prices increase within the next three years?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is attempting to revive a debate rather than acquire information.

[Later:]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can he inform the house whether there was a definite agreement signed with China for the purchase of wheat and barley?

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I suggest that the question that is now being asked opens up the very controversy that was raised by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and on which you commented that this was a method of reviving the debate of yesterday. I do not object to this debate being revived, but I do say that if it is revived all members should be given the opportunity to comment.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): On the point of order, I asked the minister whether an agreement had been signed, and he can answer yes or no. I cannot see where any debate should arise out of a question such as this.

Mr. Speaker: There was no reference to the debate. The hon. member for Assiniboia takes exception that it is a follow-up of a controversy that arose yesterday, but the question in itself is quite in order. Since the hon. member has not attempted to bring in the controversy the question of fact might be answered, I think.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to answer the hon. member by reading one or two of the statements I made on my return from Hong Kong.

Mr. Hellyer: They are already on the record; why bother?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This sentence may be found at page 4205 of Hansard, column 1, third paragraph:

> Because of the quantities of grain involved and other factors, the Canadian government felt there should be an over-all agreement to facilitate orderly marketing.
> I am now pleased to report that a long term agreement has been signed.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege, if I may, concerning what was said in the house yesterday afternoon. It was brought to my attention this morning by the hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member proceeds, was he present when the matter which he raises was brought up?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It was brought to my attention this morning by the hon. member for Acadia that I was accused in the house yesterday of misleading—perhaps I had better read the words of the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Some hon. Members: What page?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Page 4335 of Hansard. The hon. member said:

> The minister later on called it "a sale of this order". I think this was a carefully worded statement, and I think it was carefully designed to mislead.

An hon. Member: Did you expect any better?

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, this very question was raised on a point of order yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the hon. minister has completed his statement, but perhaps a point of order would intervene if this matter had been raised yesterday on behalf of the minister. Will the hon. member for Assiniboia give me the citation.

Mr. Argue: I have the copy of Hansard before me but I am unable to give it to you, sir, without having the opportunity to look it up, but I remember quite clearly what happened. I was accused of saying that the—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member proceeds, if he asserts that the point of order was raised and disposed of, that would perhaps have a bearing on my ruling, and I should be glad to have the reference.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Perhaps I can bring some light to the hon. member for Assiniboia by reading the selections from Hansard where the point was discussed. They consist of only two paragraphs. This is to be found at page 4335 of Hansard. After the hon. member for Assiniboia had made this charge the following took place:

> Mr. Chambers: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The Minister of Agriculture is not present, and it is not within the rules of this house for an hon. member to say that another hon. member of this house deliberately designed something in order to mislead.
> Mr. Pickersgill: He did not say that.
> Mr. Argue: If the hon. member is right, if that is what I said, I apologize. I did not mean to put in the word "deliberately". But if the minister had meant it to be deliberate he could not have done a better job. I will say I think this statement misled the house.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order, I was accused yesterday of having said that the minister deliberately misled the house. I said at that time that if I had used the words "deliberately misled the house", and I find I did not use them, I was quite prepared to withdraw that accusation and to say that all that had been done was that the government had made a misleading statement but with the word "deliberately" taken out. I suggest that the minister, by referring to the discussion of yesterday, is attempting by a method not within the rules of the house to revive a debate. If that debate is going to be revived and if the minister is going to make argumentative statements, I feel I have a right to reply.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now departing from the point of order. His point was that this matter had been disposed of, but there was no ruling. There was some discussion, as is apparent from a review of the text, but as the Minister of Agriculture was not present at the time and the statement related to him I think he is in order in raising the matter today to make certain that he has not been accused of deliberately planning to mislead the house.

Mr. Argue: The accusation was never made.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister has finished his complaint about this matter we might proceed. If not, I will hear him out.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I was going on to point out that the hon. member for Assiniboia went on to say:

I will say I think this statement misled the house.

Then the hon. member for Greenwood said "No", and the hon. member for Assiniboia continued:

I should say it was put in a misleading manner. It certainly misled the country. It misled no less a person than the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool.

This is my question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. At no time did I mislead the house in any way whatsoever in connection with this agreement. In my statement to the house I said that there had been a long term agreement signed, and I pointed out that under that agreement we had committed ourselves to provide up to six million tons of barley, wheat and flour.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the minister is getting away from the question of privilege. He is now endeavouring to justify his opinion that he did not mislead the house. The minister was accused of deliberately misleading the house and whether the hon. member for Assiniboia withdrew that statement, which he should do—

Mr. Argue: I did.

Mr. Speaker: If I have his assurance now that he did intend—

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, Hansard shows that I did not use the word "deliberately". Hon. members suggest that I did and I hasten to say, as I did yesterday, that if I had used the word "deliberately" I would immediately withdraw it. I do not know how many times a man has to withdraw a statement he never made.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to differ with the hon. member for Assiniboia, but it is clear from what he first said that he imputed a calculated misleading of the house, which is a deliberate misleading of the house. As he has now indicated that he did not at any time intend to impute deliberate misleading, I trust that the minister will be satisfied.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Leaving out the question of the word "deliberately" entirely, if an hon. member stands up and says that I as minister misled the house, have I no question of privilege on that score? I say I did not mislead the house, deliberately or otherwise.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the minister's feelings but it has been decided from time to time, almost invariably, I think, when the issue has arisen before, that no question of privilege is raised when it is said of another member that his statement has misled the house or that he has misled the house. The whole issue in such a question of privilege is intention, and it has been made clear that there was no imputation of intention.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I refer to page 4335 of Hansard of yesterday and I point out that it appears that Hansard has been deliberately changed. In the printed report the hon. member for Assiniboia is reported as having said, in the last sentence of the first paragraph on the righthand side of the page:

I do not know why the government signed this agreement, and I should like an explanation—

Then my remarks appear as follows:

In other words, you think they should not have signed it?

I distinctly heard the hon. member for Assiniboia say "I do not know why the government signed this lopsided agreement". I went to the Hansard office and checked the record because I wanted to know whether my question appeared therein. The word "lopsided" was in the record when I saw it in the editor's office. The word "lopsided" has been left out and the whole meaning of the particular sentence has been changed. I say the word should be included in the record, because he definitely used the word. I heard him and I checked the record to prove it.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why there should be any shame. I want to answer this accusation, and I think I have a right to answer it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has been accused of a rather serious offence of altering the text of Hansard, and he must be heard.

Mr. Argue: I do not know how I can make it clear. I say first of all that I did not alter Hansard and, second, whether or not it was in this particular context, I do remember using the word "lopsided". I assert that I never changed Hansard and did not take out the word. What I said yesterday was that it was a lopsided agreement. When the government of Canada says it will keep the wheat on hand and make further arrangements later, that is a lopsided agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

WITHHOLDING OF BENEFITS DUE TO ABSENCE FROM AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Do the unemployment insurance commission regulations stipulate that unemployed persons drawing benefits must acquire clearance from the local unemployment insurance office before going out of the area for a day to seek work, or for any other reason?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I imagine this pertains to the situation which developed following the visit to Ottawa by the unemployed delegation. This has been brought to my attention, and I advised the hon. member for Niagara Falls yesterday that I had turned the matter over to the unemployment insurance commission to see whether there is anything in the act which would permit the disallowance of any penalty for being away on that day when they were supposed to report to the unemployment insurance office.

Mr. McMillan: I have a supplementary question. Without reference to the unemployed who came to Ottawa, how long can a man be out of his area and still receive unemployment insurance benefits if he is entitled to them?

Mr. Starr: I will get that answer from the unemployment insurance commission when they reply to my inquiry regarding the other matter.

PUBLIC WORKS

PORT RENFREW, B.C.—REQUEST FOR CONSTRUCTION OF BREAKWATER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works without notice. Has the minister received a brief from responsible industrial and other organizations on Vancouver island regarding the great need to built a breakwater at Port Renfrew, in San Juan bay? If so, can the minister indicate what action is contemplated in this regard?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, Mr. George Chatterton has been taking up this matter with me for some time and, as I explained to the house yesterday in answer to the question by the hon. member for Vancouver East, we are very glad to know that other parties, now that a by-election is pending, are starting to take an interest in this matter.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If there is some uncertainty about what the minister said, perhaps a supplementary question should be permitted.

Mr. Howard: My supplementary question is this. Who is this George—what was the name the minister referred to?

Mr. Walker: The next member of parliament for that constituency.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ROYAL COMMISSION—STATEMENT AS TO FRENCH SPEAKING MEMBER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning the hon. member for St. Henry (Mr. Pit Lessard) asked me whether I was aware that no French-speaking representative was on the advisory committee of the Glassco commission, and if so, whether we would see that the situation was corrected.

Having inquired from the appropriate authorities, I am able to answer my hon. colleague as follows.

I must first inform him that within the Glassco commission, there are no less than ten advisory committees. Further, with the addition of Mr. Wilbrod Bherer, chairman of the Quebec Catholic school board, and Mr. Jean-Claude Lessard, chairman of the Quebec hydroelectric commission, both of whom have been appointed on the so-called "public service personnel advisory committee", French-speaking Canadians are represented on each and every committee of that commission. The only reason why the names of those two members were not mentioned in the first report of the commission is that, at the time of its publication, they had not yet indicated their acceptance.

TELEVISION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question arising out of an answer given by the Minister of Transport on Wednesday to a question of mine regarding the revised application of the Saskatoon television station. In view of the fact that this revised application has been forwarded to the board of broadcast governors —perhaps the minister will take the question as notice and answer it later—can he say whether the other party interested will have the opportunity to be heard before any final decision is made by the government?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that has been referred to the board of broadcast governors. I have no knowledge of it, but I will make inquiries and give a reply at the first opportunity.

FINANCE

AUTOMOBILES—REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF EXCISE TAX

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance based in part on a portion of the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday with respect to the Bladen report. The Prime Minister said, as found on page 4321 of Hansard:

> I should consider that it is mainly concerned with fiscal matters and the like.

Will the Minister of Finance take into consideration this report of Professor Bladen before presenting his budget, and will he give the house the assurance that he will at least take steps to abolish the excise tax on automobiles?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will take the trouble to consult the terms of reference of the royal commission in question he will see there precisely what the Prime Minister had in mind in he statement he made yesterday. As to the other matters which the hon. member has chosen to drag into his question, may I say to him that as he was a minister of a government for many years I do not know why the physician does not direct his counsel to himself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You have not answered my question. You do not want to do anything about the automobile industry.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

279. Departmental administration including Canada's share of the expenses of the "resources for tomorrow" conference, $1,105,390.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, just before closing last night the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River raised a point as to whether the members of the committee were not getting rather short shrift from the minister, in that his replies to questions raised earlier in the discussion were to be given in letter form rather than rebutted or answered in this forum. I think the member for Kenora-Rainy River, and other members, might have support for their argument in that the minister, seemed to take such an inordinate time to reply to the hon. member for Port Arthur. I make no claim that the points I raised had any particular priority or importance over those raised by any other hon. member.

I think the minister's reaction, despite the fact that he credited me with not being personal, was for that very reason. He thought my criticism was personal. Perhaps I should have made it clear that in my comments on the minister I was really questioning or blaming the Prime Minister in the selection of a minister. It seems to be a ritual here, and I suppose a very nice ritual, that when a man takes over a portfolio everybody is appropriately sweet and nice.

I should like to assure the minister that to me he ranks with Abou Ben Adhem in the sense that I am sure he leads all the rest in those fine qualities of charity, industry, humanity and all the rest. But despite all this I honestly feel that in the serried ranks behind the Prime Minister there might possibly have been found—I do not want to be invidious and select a few names—a man who could have given this particular department more dynamic drive. If this is unfair or unkind, well, so be it.

I should like to assure the minister that my remarks were no reflection upon his industry or his capacity in the past. I am sorry that, from the length of the reply he made, there would seem to be an indication that my remarks touched on a sensitive nerve, and that he took the opportunity while talking about petulant pedagogues—although he did take a bit of a cut at himself—to attack the teaching profession. I should like to point out to the minister that I do not think of myself as a teacher at the present time. I happen to be a politician and will be until this particular parliament dissolves. Then if I want to go back to teaching—

Mr. Dinsdale: You are still in an ivory tower.

Mr. Fisher: No; my criticisms were made not as a teacher but as a politician, and they stand in that position. In a sense he rebutted a few of the points I made. For example, in so far as the resources for tomorrow conference is concerned, the minister started with an inaccuracy. I was not the only hon. member who referred to the resources for tomorrow conference. I would give him the hon. member for Kootenay West, who talked quite a bit about his views on the matter. The minister then said that I should go forth and carry the word about the resources for tomorrow conference. I suggest to him that there were a great many members speaking in this debate.

Mr. Dinsdale: I used the plural, and I included all members in that challenge.

Mr. Fisher: I point out that at least two members of this group have done their best to publicize this conference. I further point out that I gave several speeches in my own constituency to groups of professional foresters last year, and I can assure the minister that those foresters had not heard about the conference previously and those meetings were well reported by newspaper, radio and television. I believe the area I represent, in the main, knows probably more about this conference, which I consider very important, than other areas.

I come back to the point I made that if in April, 1961, the editor of a prominent business magazine had never heard of the resources for tomorrow conference, there is a fault somewhere in the publicizing of it. One of the points made was that this was an integrated undertaking and was not the sole responsibility of the minister. I quite agree, but I should like to point out to him that we have the minister of lands and forests in Ontario who, I understand, is on the committee. I have many criticisms of Mr. Spooner, but I recognize that he is an able, I might even say crafty, person. In so far as the minister for Manitoba is concerned, who I believe is Mr. Gurney Evans, I would say he is as qualified a cabinet minister as we have in all the provinces. I have already made my bow to the contributions made by Mr. Levesque who, I think, is doing a grand job in this particular context.

It is for this very reason, when I look at three men with this much ability, that I want to see the federal government take a stronger role. I want to see a strong man in there to make sure we get something from the conference. This is the challenge I put to the minister. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there is a common view in this house that if there is a weak minister in one department the opposition should be joyful. I have never looked at it that way. Despite the fact that we may be here as opposition members, I want to see whatever government is in power give good administration, with lots of dynamic force and lots of drive. This has been the basis of my objection, and I reiterate my disappointment.

In so far as the part of this department which I thought was of most importance is concerned, it has been removed now and has its own substance in the Department of Forestry. I should like to come back to what I felt was the key point of my criticisms, and I believe the minister suggested that I said there was nothing going on in the north. I indicated nothing of the kind. My point was that there was not enough going on in the south. I point out to the minister that he is the minister not only of northern affairs but of national resources. I point out to him that he can be pictured with all the Eskimo and Indian children in the world in his loving embrace, or watching what they are doing, but his department has other responsibilities as well.

I suggest to him that he read a brief—if he has not a copy of it I will send it to him—written by C. M. Campbell of Vancouver, British Columbia entitled "Canada: A Nation of Economic Liars". Mr. Campbell is a mining engineer who has been spending many years trying to convince Canadians that they talk too much about their unlimited resources and do not look closely enough at the realities of the situation. I pointed out one reality to the minister in my own area. He has, in his department, a map showing a road projected from somewhere north of lake Nipigon and running up toward Churchill in a certain direction. I know that road is not projected at the present time but is only presented as a preliminary idea in relation to a survey of that area.

In my own area, which contains 40,000 square miles, we want roads. We want the federal government to take the lead in the roads to resources program. However, in addition we still have this southern perimeter that has not been developed with the appropriate roads. The minister suggested that I said there was nothing going on in the north and this was a criticism, but my point was that the minister has a responsibility to keep his eyes on the south, too.

I should like to point out something that may give point to this criticism. There is a story in Time magazine for April 14, 1961, which I should like to put on the record, Mr. Chairman. It reads:

> Canada's energetic trade and commerce minister George Hees is not the man to bury himself in his own office, unaware of what goes on around him. His latest interest is the national parks. Travelling to lake Louise to inaugurate a new ski lift, Hees schussed down a slope, slued to a stop, and announced that he intended to speak to northern affairs and national resources minister Walter Dinsdale about opening up the parks for skiers.
> "I have skied in a number of places in Europe and Canada, but this is the finest skiing I have had anywhere," said Hees amiably. "It's ridiculous for Canadians to be going to Aspen, Sun Valley and Squaw Valley when they have skiing like this at their back door."
> Dinsdale just as amiably agreed that his cabinet man might have something. Added Dinsdale "I have got to get around and see the parks. I haven't seen any of them yet."

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, in reference to that quotation may I say that I was never interviewed by any members of the press. That quotation is purely fictitious.

Mr. Fisher: I am glad to get that denial. Is the minister suggesting that he has been around to all the national parks?

Mr. Dinsdale: I have visited most of the national parks. This applies patricularly to the west. I shall visit the maritime parks as soon as the house rises.

Mr. Fisher: I am very much interested to have this comment. However, I will go on with the story:

> Staff members of the national parks branch were less agreeable. Said one: "Private interests naturally are always putting pressure on the national parks system. Hees was going along. He is quite uninformed. Draw a 200 mile circle around Banff, and see what population it takes in. Your prospects aren't really outstanding." The six western ski developments operated by the parks branch are all at less than capacity.

What I should like to point out to the minister is this. The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria and another member from Nova Scotia pointed out the possibility of developing skiing in the maritimes. We have evidence that the national parks branch is interested in this field. I thought if the minister was giving a real review of his department, he would go into this question. I think it is an important one. Here we find that one of his own cabinet ministers is misinformed, according to this story. I do not want to put too much credence in this particular bible; I refer to Time magazine. I think this is an indication that the minister has been less than candid. He certainly has not given us a discursive or full account of his responsibility. He seemed to want to fasten upon the hon. member for Port Arthur instead of giving us some indication of what is going on in his department.

I should like to turn to another matter with regard to which I think he was wrong. In his comments directed to me he implied that I had suggested that the mines, forests and waters committee was ignored by the department. What I asked for was some indication that their recommendations had been followed. I should like to have action. It was not only last year but the year previous and the one previous to that, that this committee made recommendations.

I have gone through the annual report. The minister has his deputy minister right there with him, and he can tell him. I cannot find in the annual report any indication that the committee really had any effect at all upon the department. I know it did with regard to the forestry branch, but what about the museum and some of the recommendations there? What about other aspects of this fairly large department? I should like to know what the result has been. I think this assembly deserves this information in an itemized account. What was the detailed reaction to the recommendations of the committee?

I think the minister misinterpreted completely the approach I was taking. I thought this was a good committee, although when it was considering this department I thought it perhaps proceeded a bit too much to the north. However, I credit this procedure to the zeal of the hon. member for Yukon. In connection with this particular matter I might point out that the hon. member for Yukon has made the point a number of times that representation of the north in a parliamentary sense is inadequate. I point out to him and remind the minister—because I am sure he is interested in this point—that there are a number of constituencies in Canada proper which in population and area are comparable —when you realize that population is considered to be the most important factor in determining a constituency—to anything we have in Yukon or Mackenzie River. I know the area sizes. I should like to give the hon. member an example.

Mr. Nielsen: I wonder whether the hon. member would mind my pointing out that I made no suggestion that representation in the north was inadequate. I pointed out that there was absolutely no representation in the Keewatin and Franklin districts of the north. That was my point.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to point out to the hon. member that parts of the constituency of Saguenay, the constituency of Churchill, the constituency of Port Arthur, and there is also one in Saskatchewan, in effect have no representation because of the population and where it is located. I have an area from Fort Severn in the northwest corner through to the tip of James bay and almost all the way to the C.N.R. railway line which it is almost impossible for me to cover as a member of parliament. I raise this matter here in order to indicate that the problem of the Arctic in terms of representation also has a parallel in the south.

Mr. Nielsen: But the people in those areas have a vote. The people to whom I refer have no vote.

Mr. Fisher: There were these same difficulties in Fort Severn. This was not the case in the last election. My emphasis here again is this. The minister is the minister of national resources. As minister of national resources he has a real challenge in the resources for tomorrow conference, namely to give an indication and a lead to the various provincial legislatures; to lead, to persuade, to push, to get them moving in some kind of integrated plan of developing our resouces.

In relation to the resources for tomorrow conference, I should like to add that here there a tremendous emphasis on expertise. I should like to hear from the minister how it is planned to popularize the conference. A number of television programs have been set up. Arrangements have been made with the C.B.C. and the private stations to bring to the people what is being said there. Is an attempt going to be made to focus upon the provincial politicians who will be there in order to get from them some expression of opinion on how we are getting along on renewable resources? These are some of the things on which I should have appreciated comment much more than I appreciated having put on the record of the house some comments from an article that I had not read and for which I was not responsible.

Another point I should like to make to the minister in relation to this department is this. A number of years ago we had from the Massey commission recommendations that affected his department. Later on we had some consideration given to this problem by the mines, forest and waters committee. The minister has within his department what I might call some cultural branches. We know that the museum staff situation still has not been cleared up completely. At least we have not the balance in terms of language which hon. members from French Canada are talking about. When are we going to get changes in that branch to give us that balance? The minister did not talk about that matter at all. These are questions that I should like to hear answered in a situation such as this.

I do not want to take an inordinate amount of time. I suggest to the minister that in the future on his estimates he might consider being a bit more discursive and going into more detail. I think we would all appreciate that procedure much more than having a letter. I received a letter last year after these particular estimates were through. It stated that cost benefits analyses were going to be a definite part of the resources for tomorrow conference. This delighted me, because I think you cannot really look at resources without doing that kind of thing. But from following the conference and the way in which the matter was developing I know that the cost benefit analysis part of it almost slipped out of the proceedings altogether. I should have appreciated it much more if that very important statement by the former minister had been made in this house rather than in a letter to me.

In conclusion I should like to wish the minister all the best in his new portfolio. I do not think this parliament is going to last long enough for me to have the opportunity, but if I can in all honesty eat my own words, in so far as they have been critical, I give the hon. gentleman the assurance as fairly as I can that I shall be here to do it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before this love feast between the hon. member for Port Arthur and the minister continues, I think I should protest on behalf of parliament against the offer which the minister made last night to the hon. member for Port Arthur, an offer which I think is absolutely outrageous. At the bottom of page 4391 of Hansard and on the following page I read these words:

> If, as the hon. member for Port Arthur has indicated he does not feel he is making a worth while contribution in the house, I should like to suggest that there is tremendous scope in our educational program in the north and we would be glad to welcome him into our program when he retires from this honourable house.

Mr. Chairman, these posts in the north are supposed to be awarded by the civil service commission after competition on the basis of merit, and I think it is simply outrageous for a minister of the crown to seek to silence a timid member like the hon. member for Port Arthur by an offer which is an offer to break the law and which, in addition, probably comes close to an attempt at bribery.

Mr. Small: I presume the hon. member is talking from experience when he says that applicants for these posts have to come before the civil service commission before they can be appointed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope so. I once appeared before a board myself, and I hope its decision was made on merit.

Mr. McCleave: I wonder if I could ask the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate whether he would advocate that the hon. member for Port Arthur should serve his apprenticeship to the hon. member for Essex East. That is one way to get into the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How about asking the hon. member for Essex East whether he wants the hon. gentleman as an apprentice?

Mr. Pickersgill: I indicated earlier to the minister that there were a number of questions that I wished to raise, and I think I shall raise them one by one and give the minister an opportunity to reply to them so that we shall not get mixed up. The first question—and it will not surprise the minister—is one which I approached originally by means of a question on the order paper last Thursday, when I asked the hon. gentleman, as reported at page 4047 of Hansard:

I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether his department has recently transferred its advertising account to a new advertising agency.

An hon. member suggested that the question be placed on the order paper. I thought that was a good suggestion, and subsequently I did place it on the order paper. In the meantime, however, the minister did me the courtesy to give me the following reply:

So far as I am aware, several agencies are handling the advertising account of the department. Those agencies have not been changed recently.

I then asked the minister whether he was aware that a story to this effect had appeared that day in the Winnipeg Free Press. Well, the story which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press that same day read as follows under the heading "Government Job for New Ad Firm":

The new federal minister of northern affairs has farmed out his department's entire national classified advertising account to an agency in his home town which went on a full-time basis, as an advertising agency, only last Friday.

The agency is the J. B. Neill advertising agency, operated by J. Barry Neill, formerly the owner of Barry Neill's clothing store.

Mr. Neill was active in the Young Progressive Conservative organization in Brandon.

All the classified advertising for the department headed by Hon. Walter Dinsdale, including national advertisements for northern teachers and other workers——is now being handled by a one man staff from a shared office in Brandon.

Too bad the hon. member for Port Arthur is not here to hear this.

In Ottawa, the northern affairs department said Wednesday that the total classified advertising budget of their department in 1960 was $15,000.

Up until last Friday, the proprietor of the agency owned and operated a clothing store. He had a part-time advertising agency, covering some local accounts.

Friday the store was sold, and the agency became a full-time job for the proprietor. It operates from a shared office in a Brandon building, and the department of northern affairs account is the only national account in its files.

The proprietor of the agency said he and his secretary had no trouble handling the northern affairs account, even though it meant placing advertisements in papers across Canada, and some foreign advertising work.

The department of northern affairs pays a standard 15 per cent commission to the agency which handles its advertising.

Mr. Benidickson: Was this the civil service commission?

Mr. Pickersgill: I also have here an article from the Brandon Daily Sun of the following day. This is headed "City Man gets Government Contract" and it reads:

The head of a one man advertising agency here has confirmed reports that he has received an account from the northern affairs department.

J. B. Neill, a former member of the Brandon city council, said he had been handling the advertising account since early January.

Mr. Neill, former owner of Barry Neill's men's wear store—

I do not think I need to read all this. It is information of the same kind that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press, and I shall not repeat it.

An hon. Member: Not a good paper.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Brandon Sun has never been a paper notorious for the support of any political party except the party of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Dinsdale: No, that is wrong. It is very fair and impartial.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not say it is not, though it is hard for me to understand how a paper which is fair and impartial could support hon. members on that side of the house. But I made no reflection on the paper, unless it is a reflection to say that a paper supports hon. gentlemen opposite. I have been acquainted in a general way with the Brandon Sun for about 45 years, and during all that time it has supported the Conservative party as far as I know. According to this story, Mr. Neill said he had made no representations to obtain the account. It just mysteriously reached him, apparently. Perhaps I may continue the quotation:

He said northern affairs minister Dinsdale, who represents Brandon-Souris riding in the commons, had approached him informally about taking the account last December.

The account was awarded the following month. Mr. Neill said he was notified that he was getting it in a letter from the purchasing division of the northern affairs department. Mr. Neill estimated total billings expected annually from the account will amount to anywhere from $10,000 to $25,000. His commission is 15 per cent of this.

He said the account was handled last year by Cooper Advertising of Saskatoon, but "account switches are very routine in the advertising business".

Well, it does seem to me that a government which has cast about it a mantle of righteousness should hardly be found in a situation of this kind. We remember very well the propaganda which the present Secretary of State for External Affairs used to circulate around the country, when he held his previous portfolio, to the effect that the Tories had abolished patronage, and the exhibition he made at that time.

While it may be that the handing out of an account which will only amount to $10,000 or $15,000 is not a very big thing—I would not assert for one minute that it was—it still has important implications. It is considered a big thing when $10,000 a year is paid to members of parliament for a whole year's work, but apparently it is a very small thing when it is incidental to some advertising man who has gone into business full-time only since last Friday.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is wrong.

Mr. Pickersgill: Whether it is wrong or right, two very reputable newspapers report that he has sold his store and that he went into business full time last Friday; that would have been a week ago Friday.

What I found strange was the answer given by the minister to my first question. The minister said that in so far as he was aware, several agencies were handling the advertising accounts of the department, and that these agencies had not been changed recently. I am not suggesting that statement was not correct, because I suppose one can interpret the word "recently" in as sophistical a way as one likes, but I should have thought most ministers with experience would have assumed, since they had only been in the portfolio for a very short time, that any change of this kind, particularly in their home town, would be the kind of thing about which there would be a certain amount of interest.

It does seem to me, to put it in the most polite way I can, that in the answer of the minister given the other day in the house I will not say that he misled the house, but I would say his answer was disingenuous. It was not the kind of simple, straightforward answer we expect from a minister who prides himself on being simple and straightforward.

I do not know if this is part of the government's new campaign to aid small business. I do not know about the Cooper advertising agency, if that is the agency that had this business before, but perhaps it had become too big; perhaps it was not right politically, or perhaps because it was in Saskatchewan the minister thought, being from Manitoba instead of Saskatchewan, there should be a switch.

It does seem to me that this is a rather extraordinary performance. After all, if all that is required to place these advertisements is a stenographer with spare time, or someone in the clothing business, I wonder why someone in the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources could not send them directly to the newspapers and thereby save the taxpayers the commission. It does not seem to me it is necessary to follow this procedure if it is as simple as suggested. If the advertising agency is designing the advertisements, wording them and earning something through its efforts, that is another question; but I cannot imagine that the agency would illustrate the advertisements with pictures of the schools in the north where teachers are required, and that sort of thing. It seems to me this is purely a routine matter and I suggest that the committee is entitled to some explanation from the minister regarding this transaction.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I have listened very carefully to the words of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. He is a man with long experience in this house, as well as in the civil service, and I am sure the exposé he has just made, with all the infinite details and ramifications, indicates that when he was a responsible minister of the crown and also an official of the government, he was a master of intrigue. He has presented in his exposé many new angles which, in my innocence, I had never even considered. I am interested to discover the source of the hon. member's information in respect of the particular problems he has raised.

Mr. Pickersgill: The source of my information is the press of Canada.

Mr. Dinsdale: I understand this information comes from that reputable paper, the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Benidickson: And the Brandon Sun.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, with the support of that other reputable paper, the Brandon Sun, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has indicated.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has queried the accuracy of the reply I made to a question he asked in the house the other morning. I hope he has noticed that I said at that time that so far as I was aware there had been no change made recently in the advertising contracts of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I also went on to say that these contracts were of various types, the largest involved being those in respect of the tourist bureau, and that comes under my responsibility. The hon. member's question was worded in such a way as to give no particular indication of the advertising to which he referred.

I am happy to be able to assure him that when I gave my reply the information contained therein represented my knowledge of this subject at that time. There was no sinister intrigue involved, as he has implied.

In reference to the larger contracts, which amount to some $1,500,000, perhaps I should give this interesting piece of information. For some 15 years this total contract was held by one company, the Cockfield Brown Company. That company, I am sure, is not unknown to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate because of its close association with the party he represents in this house. I should like to inform the hon. member that the department of government looking after this large tourist bureau contract in 1957 divided that advertising business on an equitable basis among a series of companies so that everyone could be treated fairly in Canada. I am surprised that the hon. member has made such a mountain out of this molehill.

Last evening reference was made to a matter raised by the hon. member for St. Boniface, who had made representations on behalf of the Grey Nuns' hospital as a suitable historic site, and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate took pride in claiming his early affinity with the province of Manitoba. Since he abandoned that province it seems he resents the possibility of any service being provided by a reputable representative of the province. If the business in question had gone to someone in Bonavista-Twillingate I suppose he would not have raised an issue.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not advise the minister to pursue that line.

Mr. Dinsdale: I suppose if the business had gone to some of the so called reputable companies that had been associated with this advertising under the former administration he would not have protested. The agency to which he has referred has been in operation for some four years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since June 21, 1957.

Mr. Dinsdale: That company is owned and operated by a young man who has been named in this house this morning. He is an outstanding citizen of the city of Brandon, formerly an alderman, who has performed outstanding services for that community. He has handled large contracts in the advertising field, and when the classified advertising business became available in the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources it came to that department's attention that this agency was interested, and that individual was asked to apply. The reason I did not know whether there had been any change when I answered the question was that I had not particularly kept in contact with this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: You should always keep in touch with your constituents.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am delighted to know that, following a very thorough investigation by the departmental officials, this young man was considered qualified to handle this particular aspect of advertising.

There were one or two misstatements in the newspaper account on which the hon. member has based his explanations this morning. I have already referred to the first when I reported that the agency had been in operation for some four years. Mr. Neill, who was formerly associated with Neill's clothing store, has been dissociated from that business for the period he has been operating the advertising agency. There is no cost to the crown in this operation whatsoever. The 15 per cent service charge is paid by the media which receive the advertising. That is the story straight and simple. The hon. member wanted it straight and simple, without any of the interesting and sinister overtones that he imputed, and I am happy to present it in this way.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I can ask one question. Before I do so I might point out I made no accusations whatsoever. I suggested nothing sinister. All I did was put on the record of the house what was in two reputable newspapers in Manitoba. I have no information whatsoever about this matter except what I read in the public press. It seemed to me that it was a matter of sufficient interest to the people of Manitoba and to the press—and I might say I have had several letters about it since the matter was first raised here, which would suggest that there is some interest in this matter—to bring up in this committee. But the minister, in his simple, straightforward explanation, has said something that I must answer; or perhaps I should not say this; perhaps charity is called for in a case of this kind. I will just read what Mr. Neill said, according to the Brandon Sun. I point out to the minister that this is according to the Brandon Sun and not the Winnipeg Free Press.

> Mr. Neill said he had made no representations to obtain the account.
> He said northern affairs minister Dinsdale, who represents Brandon-Souris riding in the commons, had approached him informally about taking the account last December.

I should like to ask the minister whether what Mr. Neill said is the truth.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, when I mentioned the fact that this account was available he indicated that he was interested, and that interest was communicated to the officials of the department.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I have nothing more to say about this matter, sir, but I should like to ask the minister about another matter that has relationship to Manitoba. Some considerable time ago a motion was passed by this house for the correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of Manitoba with respect to a very big matter indeed in the affairs of that province. I refer to the Red river floodway, about which, before certain events happened four years ago, the people who compose the present government, including their leader, made very large promises indeed which there seems to be a good deal of evidence to indicate they are very reluctant to keep. There has been a good deal of pressure in the legislature of Manitoba, and I could read from the Hansard of Manitoba to show this, to have this correspondence produced in that legislature.

On every occasion on which this matter has been brought up the premier of Manitoba has asserted that he could never get the consent of the government of Canada to its production in that house. Over a long period, under the hon. gentleman's predecessor, we had a very similar answer given here, but I must say it is to the credit of the minister that he has taken a rather different attitude toward the matter. He told the house the other day that he had secured the approval of the government of Manitoba to the production of this correspondence. I took it from that that it was the intention of the government to produce it.

I have not had time to check whether the correspondence has been tabled today, but I have checked Votes and Proceedings for the last fews days and there is no record to indicate that it was tabled up until last night. The minister ought to make an effort to make the correspondence available to us at once, during the lunch hour today, so that when his estimates are continued this afternoon we shall have an opportunity to examine the correspondence and ask any questions we wish to about it.

This is a matter of the gravest concern to the government of Manitoba and to the people of that province who have been badly enough treated, as the minister knows well, by the present government in the federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements, and who are in all the greater need of the financial assistance they were led to expect they would get from the present government.

I hope the minister will see that this correspondence is made available to us by 2.30 this afternoon so that it can be examined while his estimates are being discussed. We had in the case of his predecessor, and we have had in the case of some other members of the government, examples of careful efforts to suppress information in this way until the estimates of the department were completed, with the material being produced immediately after. I would not expect the minister to behave in this fashion, and I hope he will accede to my request in this matter.

Mr. Dinsdale: On this particular point, I have been giving very active consideration to the question of tabling these documents, and I have been following the questioning by the hon. member in the house. I have been trying to push the matter forward as quickly as possible. I now discover that because it is a matter for interdepartmental consideration, I shall have to have clearance with the other departments concerned. So far as I am concerned the documents are waiting to be tabled. The hon. member will understand these problems, but this is the cause of the present delay.

With reference to the activities of the present Manitoba provincial administration in this regard, I should like to remind the hon. member that the only answer the previous administration had to this very urgent problem in Manitoba—those of us who lived through the flood of 1950 will never forget the serious threat it was—was, like King Canute, to order the waves to recede. There is positive action going forward, I can assure you, sir and the hon. member, with the Manitoba government at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since it is now one o'clock I hope Your Honour will see me at 2.30, because I should like to make a few observations about the kind of action there has been on this project in the last four years.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, at the time we adjourned for lunch the minister had just made one or two observations which really had nothing to do with the present and which I was rather surprised that this young and dynamic minister should make. When the present minister was appointed I thought we would have an end of these tiresome excuses we get from the government to the effect that because something was not done in the early fifties it should not be done in the sixties. That is the normal pattern of the government. When we ask hon. gentlemen why they have not kept their promises they say that Mr. King did not do that in 1946 or Mr. St. Laurent did not do it in 1952 or Mr. Douglas Campbell did not do it in 1950 as though that had any relation whatsoever to the undertakings these gentlemen opposite gave to the people of Canada, the promissory notes they signed which they refuse to pay. Whatever sins of omission—

Mr. Montgomery: What a waste of time. You are just wasting time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Montgomery: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, when we have to sit here hour after hour and take scoldings from the hon. member such as he is giving us now, it is about time we called him to order because he is not being relevant.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton sat over here when the greatest filibuster in this country in modern times took place, and I do not recall the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton raising any points of order at that time about the fact that the opposition, which was quite considerably larger then than it is now, talked for hours and hours and days and days—with the most tiresome repetition.

Mr. Montgomery: All we are hearing today is purely repetition.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was anything but repetition to them at that time.

Mr. Montgomery: That is all we are hearing.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Are you attempting to make up for it?

Mr. Hicks: Turn the other cheek.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have turned both of them.

The Chairman: Order. I think we should come back to the discussion of item No. 279.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was simply doing what I think Your Honour himself decided was quite within the rules when you were acting for the Speaker in the chair, that if an argument had been introduced by some other hon. member and allowed by the Chair a reply should be allowed. I simply trying to point out to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, who has recently become a member of the cabinet, that if he wants to get ahead in the government of Canada, and heaven knows there is lots of room at the top—

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): He should not take lessons from you.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, I have quite a lot of experience in this regard.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): You certainly have.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, the hon. member for Calgary South, who belongs to the kindergarten in this house—

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): You are its chairman and you have been for some time.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman, who is very vociferous in the house—

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Get to the point.

Mr. Pickersgill: —is as usual—

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): You are fumbling.

Mr. Pickersgill: —making his speech when someone else is making his. I do not object to that at all but I do not think it is adding up to very much.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): What is your subject?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly hon. gentlemen opposite do not like this very much.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): You have not said anything yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I was saying to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris was that if he hoped to get to the top in this government, where there is plenty of room, I might add, I would strongly advise him to deal with the problems of 1961 and 1962 and not to waste his time making excuses for his lack of action and for the lack of action of his colleagues because of something that happened some time during the fifties. I think the people of Canada are growing very weary of that tiresome kind of argument.

Since the hon. gentleman has chosen to pervert the record of the fifties, and since he has said that the people of Winnipeg will never forget what happened in the fifties, may I say that I hope they do not. I hope they never forget about the greatest generosity that has ever been shown to any people in Canada at any time, which was shown by the people of Canada under the leadership of the St. Laurent government in the disaster fund of that time. Complete restitution was made to everybody of their losses and a considerable amount was left over to remain as a disaster fund which has been very helpful to other parts of Canada. I do not believe my right hon. friend Mr. St. Laurent, or any of his colleagues, have any need to be ashamed or have anything to apologize for in connection with what happened with respect to the relief of the suffering caused by the Winnipeg flood or with respect to the study of the problem of preventing such a thing again.

I call to witness no better witness on this subject than the premier of Manitoba who, speaking in the legislature on March 15 of this year, had this to say about what was done after the flood. He was speaking in reply to a member of the opposition and he said:

> Do they not know that the engineering aspect of this matter was thoroughly and I think authoritatively, laid down by the investigation of the Red river basin committee that swung into action about 1954.

This is the premier saying the committee swung into action in 1954. The premier is talking about a committee set up jointly by the government of Mr. St. Laurent and the government of Mr. Douglas Campbell. He describes the study as one which was done thoroughly and authoritatively. I continue the quotation:

> And they investigated from an engineering standpoint the various methods that were open for the protection of this greater Winnipeg area.

There is no doubt whatever that this was a very thorough engineering investigation. There is no doubt whatever that to the government of Canada and to the government of Manitoba a very serious engineering problem was posed because here was a tremendous expenditure for engineering works that would have no productive advantage whatever. They would be insurance, insurance against a flood happening every so often, perhaps once in half a century and maybe not even that often. Anybody who knows anything about insurance knows that this is a very big and serious problem, to spend tens of millions of dollars to try to avert a contingency that may not arise for a couple of generations. This is the nature of the problem, and it is not an easy problem for anyone to decide.

Hon. gentlemen who are now sitting on the treasury benches thought it was a very easy problem. Of course, they were rather profuse in the promises they made before 1957. They were going to cure everything in the country; they were going to build the Chignecto canal, build a causeway to Prince Edward Island, which they are still studying, and all sorts of other things all over the country. One of the things they were going to do was to make Winnipeg floodproof for all time to come. This year, they finally got the promise into the speech from the throne.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I wonder if I may ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Can the hon. gentleman tell me what percentage of the money that was contributed to the Winnipeg flood disaster was voluntary and what part of this money came from the then Liberal government?

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, I am sure that in the excellent accounts that were kept at that time, which I do not pretend to carry in my head, the hon. gentleman will be able to find that information. According to the rules of the house, even the government is not expected to provide published information in answer to questions. As a member of the opposition—

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Then, the hon. member could perhaps tell me—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could finish my answer to this question and then I will answer the hon. gentleman's next question. As a member of the opposition, and not having access to the same research facilities as hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches have, I do not know offhand what the answer is. However, I do not think it has the slightest degree of relevance to the subject we are discussing. Has the hon. member another question he wishes to ask?

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I think it has some relevance because the hon. member talks about the great amount of money left over from the contributions made by the St. Laurent government. However, I believe that the greatest amount of the money was given voluntarily and the amount that remained was put to other uses because it was voluntary and could be used for other disaster areas in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is quite right, and that is what I said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes; if hon. gentlemen will look at the record—I give an undertaking that even if there are some grammatical errors I will not change them, so we will be able to look at it just the way it is being taken down, however lopsided it may be—he will see that what I said was, under the leadership given by the St. Laurent government the people of Canada subscribed in the most generous way I can remember to the relief of this disaster. These contributions were used and there was a great deal of money left over which was set aside as a national disaster fund. Perhaps I could clear up this point for the hon. member for Lisgar. If this money had been contributed out of the treasury, there would not have been any left over, of course. It was because it was in large part a voluntary contribution that some special legislative disposition had to be made. I do not want to denature the record in any way.

What I want to say is, so far as that situation was concerned, so far as the relief of the flood victims was concerned, it was never more complete in the history of Canada than it was in that case. So far as the studies of how to prevent such a situation in the future are concerned, we have Mr. Roblin's own word for it in the provincial legislature this year that the most authoritative and thorough studies were initiated by the previous provincial government and the previous federal government. The suggestion of the minister that there was some neglect by his predecessors in this matter falls completely to the ground. Mr. Roblin has been premier of Manitoba now for three years, and he has certainly been trying to screw some money out of the federal government for this project every year. He is becoming increasingly embarrassed about this as he is about other aspects of his relationships with the federal government.

There are many of us who are beginning to feel rather sorry for Mr. Roblin. I have no doubt that he feels very sorry himself that he ever coined that slogan which I am afraid will never be forgotten, "As Dief did Duff will do." If Mr. Roblin could change it, I think he would say, "As Dief did Duff won't do", if he wanted to make any appeal to the people of Manitoba today. I am not here, of course, to appeal for charity for Mr. Roblin. All I am doing is trying to get this correspondence which has been held up deliberately by this government now for three years, and which the minister gave a very lame excuse for not producing earlier today. I hope he is going to produce it now.

As I say, for three years this correspondence has been held up. Nothing has happened. The legislature has now prorogued for this year, and if anything further is going to be done in co-operation with the federal government there will have to be another session of the legislature for that purpose. As I say, nobody in Manitoba can understand the reason for the delay or what is holding it up. I daresay some of us here with some experience with this government could give the answer. Probably the answer is to be found in a seven letter world starting with "f" and ending with "g". I leave hon. gentlemen opposite to fill in the blanks.

The Chairman: Shall vote 279 carry?

Mr. Dinsdale: Just before the vote carries I should like to make some passing references on the subject that has just been discussed at some length by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. As I explained in my reply this morning, the reason for the delay in tabling the documents has arisen from their interdepartmental nature. Just to demonstrate the desire of my department to be as helpful and co-operative as possible, may I say that I am quite happy to table at this time, if it is the wish of the committee, the documents which come directly under my purview. Where there is interdepartmental involvement, the hon. member will understand that I have no right to table those documents at this time. However, I shall be happy to let him see the documents which I am sure will ease the problem that has been discussed at some length here today.

It seems to me that we are becoming deeply involved in history during the consideration of these estimates and I feel that it is high time that we should move on to present activities and anticipated future activities. I am not going to pose as an authority on history but there has come to my attention something which I think should be brought before the committee in reference to a historical discussion that took place here last night. It has to do with the highly controversial question as to who first came to Canada's shores. Let me quote from the authorities. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate last night was referred to as the "land-locked mariner from Manitoba". I think that was a more accurate description than the member who made it at that time realized because, on looking into the record of an important voyage of discovery—a record that was made in Sir John Barrow's book entitled "Voyages into the Arctic Region", I find that in 1776 a certain Lieutenant Pickersgill, in command of His Majesty's brig the Lion was directed to proceed to Davis strait for the protection of the British whale fishers—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Dinsdale: —and then to continue up the strait and explore the coast of Baffin bay. Barrow records the fact that Pickersgill eventually anchored the Lion in a place to which he gave the name "Musquito Cove".

In case the hon. member's colleague from Essex East should feel neglected, I might also remind the committee that the first of these northern explorers, the privateer Captain Frobisher, bore the christian name of "Martin". That is the contribution I should like to make to this historical discussion. I could add—

Mr. Pickersgill: You could add more about Pickersgill.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You could add more about Martin.

An hon. Member: Roll in another barrel.

Mr. Dinsdale: I might say that the descendants of the said Lieutenant Pickersgill have been all at sea ever since.

We have a little bit more time at our disposal at the moment and perhaps, because it seems to be the wish of the members of the committee, I might give answers to some of the specific questions that were raised last evening.

I would reply to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg and inform him that one of the subjects he raised, namely the possibility of the blockhouse hill in his constituency being recognized as a historic site, will be considered on the May agenda of the national historic sites and monuments board.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River inquired about progress on the civic centre at Banff national park. I am happy to inform him—and unfortunately he is not in the chamber—that tenders have been asked for in connection with this project and we hope that it will be under way just as quickly as possible. He also inquired whether it was established policy in national parks to assist in the construction of centres of this kind. I should merely like to remind him that Banff is almost a unique community in the national parks system. In fact, so far as I know, there are only two such communities where there is all year round residence. Therefore, this instance might be regarded as almost unique.

The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria made reference to Englishtown. I can assure him that this question will be on the May agenda of the historic sites and monuments board. He will also be interested to know that the HD4 Hydrofoil will be provided with a suitable shelter in the fiscal year 1962-63 according to present plans.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare brought to the attention of the committee some interesting recommendations. I think he is aware of the fact that there is at Yarmouth already a monument to shipbuilding.

I should like to refer back to one matter in particular referred to by the hon. member for Athabasca. I refer to the question of representation by the R.C.M.P. on the Northwest Territories council. I assure him that the contribution made by the R.C.M.P. to the development of the north down through the years is fully recognized by the department of northern affairs. Any change in the membership of the Northwest Territories council is merely in line with the policy to proceed to an autonomous position in the territories just as quickly as circumstances allow. We like to feel that the territories are independent in their governmental function as far as is possible under the present arrangement.

For some number of years on the Northwest Territories council, where there were formerly representatives from the various departments of government, we have been and are now following the policy of bringing in private citizens. In fact, now there are elected members as well as appointed representatives. The Department of National Defence is no longer represented. Neither is there direct representation from the R.C.M.P. However, let me repeat that the continuing contribution of the R.C.M.P. is full recognized.

The hon. member for Athabasca will also be interested to know that the road construction program in Wood Buffalo national park is proceeding according to schedule. By next year we shall have completed the road from Fort Smith through to the western boundary of Wood Buffalo national park. All that will remain for the continuous highway between Vermilion and Fort Smith will be a road built by the provincial government to the boundary of the park. I might also add that the total cost of this project will be $2,340,000.

Those are some specific answers to specific questions. The committee is in a congenial mood this afternoon and I am sure we can proceed to consider further items of the estimates.

Mr. Nixon: I understood the minister to say that some of the applications for preserving historic sites in Canada are to be dealt with next month. If that is the case, I wonder whether the minister would take a personal look at the old stone house in Sault Ste. Marie and see whether something could not be done to preserve that building as a historic site. It was built in 1812 or 1814 and it is, I believe, the oldest stone building in Ontario north of Toronto.

Mr. Dinsdale: As the hon. member has suggested, the historic sites and monuments board will be meeting toward the end of the present month. I shall be happy to look into this question but I should like to remind the hon. member that the basic criterion for having any historic site considered as a national historic site is, of course, the national aspect. It must have national significance. There are many other historic sites which deserve to be commemorated and such commemoration has been undertaken in the past, sometimes by provincial governments and at other times by local bodies. Subject to that reservation I shall be happy to look into the matter.

Mr. Garland: On several occasions I have raised the question of the proposed United States legislation regarding duty free goods which United States citizens are to be allowed to take back from Canada. I wonder if the minister has anything to say in this regard.

Mr. Dinsdale: I can assure the hon. member that I have been following this question very closely since it first came under discussion in the house. As he is no doubt aware, the matter is before congress at the present time and to make certain that Canada's viewpoint on this question is in no way misunderstood by the legislators in the United States, I once again, only recently, pointed out through our Department of External Affairs the importance of this subject to Canada and in particular to the Canadian tourist industry.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Could I ask the minister to take a good look at the posibility of having Nellie McClung's home in the town of Manitou, Manitoba made a historic site? This great Canadian woman lived in this house which has been kept in a good state of preservation during the years when she did much of her writing and it seems to me the people of Manitoba would be very pleased if the minister would have this considered as a historic site.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the hon. member for Lisgar is very anxious to commemorate the home of one leading Liberal in Manitoba, may I ask if he would also suggest that the home of the Hon. Thomas Greenaway in Crystal City should also be considered.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I did not know it was in order to direct such a question to an ordinary backbencher but I would think that though Mr. Thomas Greenaway is probably one of our better known Manitoba citizens his work is hardly of such a national nature that his home should be enshrined as a national historic site. I would suggest, however, that the hon. member might perhaps consider the home of the Hon. Robert Rogers.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it still there?

Mr. Fisher: There is a tolerance and liberality about the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that I wish I could share, but I cannot reach it. He put on the record his case from the Brandon Sun and the Winnipeg Free Press and, frankly he is so tolerant I cannot understand his reasoning. I did not know anything about the case before he put it so clearly and it seems to me the minister's answers were inadequate.

I should like to remind the minister that several years ago we had a hassle over the Riding Mountain national park situation. I can remember that there were charges and counter-charges of patronage, and the discussion did not simmer down until the hon. member for Brandon-Souris came in with his soft, susurrus voice and settled it all; we really did not believe that patronage could rear its ugly head at the park if the hon. member had any connection with the affair. I do not think that the passage of these estimates has been marked, so far, with blood and fire, but I might ask the minister to give us some further explanations. I will put a few direct questions to him. Was Mr. Neill a member of his party organization at any time? Was Mr. Neill by any chance a census enumerator? Did Mr. Neill have any great interest in advertising before? I tried looking through directories of firms in the west—a very inadequate source to look at, I admit—but I could not find any indication that this man had been long in the business. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is not suspicious at all, but for me there is something coincidental about this business starting up in 1957 in relation to this contract and the minister taking over his portfolio. If the minister were to tell me point blank that Conservatives rank first—and we had some indication of this in connection with the census matter—that would be fine, but I did not realize this applied to such things as advertising contracts.

There is no point in the minister giving to me the same answer he gave to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate because Cockfield Brown means nought to me though it may mean a great deal to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I believe there is a C.C.F. advertising concern out in Regina but whether it has had any jobs I cannot say. I do not want it to have this job. I would simply like to know if it is a fact that we have here a Conservative who, on the government coming into power, became an advertising agent; and then, when the present minister became minister of northern affairs —an old hometown boy and all that—he was given this contract. Is it as simple as that? Was the contract put out to tender? Did a number of Conservatives bid for it? For all I know there may be a whole bunch of Conservative advertising men in Brandon. I think the minister should give us a more detailed explanation because I am just not as tolerant and liberal today as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am sorry that my learned friend did not grasp the full import of the reply I gave to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I thought I had made a complete explanation. The hon. member has gone back into history with reference to Riding Mountain national park and I assure him the reason that particular subject ceased to come under discussion in the house was because the difficulty was straightened out, as he well knows.

Regarding the advertising accounts, I understand that tenders are not involved in the advertising accounts of government departments, particularly with reference to the classified type which has come under discussion today. I would reiterate that it is the publicity media, whether it be the press, magazines, radio, or television, which pays the service charge on these particular advertisement items. There is no charge to the crown whatsoever.

So far as the qualifications of the manager of the Neill Advertising Agency in Brandon is concerned, I would repeat that he is a very reputable businessman who, at a remarkably young age, has shown considerable enterprise not only in the business world but also in public service.

Mr. Pickersgill: And in the political world.

Mr. Dinsdale: He has been active in the past in the Young Progressive Conservatives' Association, which I think demonstrates he is a man of considerable discernment and wisdom. While checking further regarding his credentials—this is something I did not know before—I found he is accredited to a reputable advertising agency in Canada.

Mr. Fisher: I am pleased to find this candour at last. It is of assistance. I think the people of Canada will be pleased to know that it is a help to be a young Conservative or a Progressive Conservative if it is desired to acquire these advertising contracts. These are facts of life which are sometimes denied. I am not complaining about this at all but now we know that if one wants an advertising contract with the minister's department it helps if one is a Conservative.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that Mr. Neill's advertising agency is the only one in the city of Brandon, and if there were an advertising agency operated by a C.C.F. supporter we would be pleased to consider him.

Mr. Fisher: What advantage does the city of Brandon have which flows from the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources? I am sure the minister made his offer in respect of all of Canada, but does he intend that all those individuals should line up to see him about an advertising agency? There is an advertising agency in Port Arthur which is run by a Conservative, and I am wondering whether he would be a fair candidate. I suggest that we should let him know about this situation.

I would like to ask the minister a question about something else. I realize he is just getting into his job, and I am sure he is reviewing these things, but the Massey commission made a number of recommendations in relation to certain agencies under the control of the minister's department. I wonder whether the minister would care to comment regarding the steps which have been taken to implement these recommendations, and perhaps comment about those which he does not intend to implement at all. I am not interested in the war museum particularly but much more in regard to situations such as the one discovered in Newfoundland by Mr. Smallwood who said the federal government should be stopped from shanghaiing relics for monuments from the sacred soil of Newfoundland. I believe the Massey commission made certain recommendations in regard to both national relics and monuments, and those bearing a relationship to the United States, and I would like to know what the minister has done in this regard. As far as I am aware there has been no legislation introduced in this house bearing on that subject.

I would also like to ask the minister about the part French Canadians play in the structure of the national museum? We all remember the unfortunate affair involving the separation of Dr. Rousseau. I understand he is now over in Europe carrying out some kind of task. The minister is probably aware that Dr. Rousseau was separated from his rather important job in the department, and I am wondering what has been done in this regard. The Prime Minister is always talking about our bicultural and bilingual country, but it is sometimes difficult to appreciate that our French Canadian representatives have a share in the upper management of these particularly cultural assets, such as the national museum. I wonder whether the minister could let us know what he is doing in regard to seeing that this balance is redressed.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I see my hon. friend is continuing to play his role as a pedagogue in assigning certain research programs to me this afternoon. I assure him I am vitally interested in the recommendations of the Massey commission with respect to many matters, particularly those which come within the purview of my department.

He will remember that one of the recommendations had to do with the protection of archaeological sites in Canada, and the artifacts from those sites. Up until quite recently many of these irreplaceable archaeological treasures had been lost to Canada by reason of uncontrolled development and exploitation. We have been very active in the protection of these sites, mainly through encouragement in the training of Canadian anthropologists. This is something which cannot be resolved overnight by this method; that is, by ensuring that there are a sufficient number of qualified Canadian professional personnel to take care of this important work.

One of the difficulties in finding suitable bilingual staff for our museums arises from the fact we do not have a sufficiently large number of Canadians with the necessary professional training who possess bilingual ability. I am happy to say that we have made certain progress in this regard. The national museum staff includes 21 members who speak French fluently, of whom four are professional scientists. A number of other staff members have a working knowledge of the French language, but great difficulty has been found in filling some of the highly specialized positions at the museum with staff who are bilingual and it has been necessary in some cases to find applicants from outside Canada. We are quite confident that, with the encouragement which has been given to training Canadians, this difficulty will be resolved within a comparatively short time.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister a few questions in regard to the item covering museums. I would like to know whether Dr. Rousseau has been replaced by a French speaking employee at the museum.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, there has been no permanent replacement found as yet. This is the human history side of the museum's activities and the director of the museum, Dr. Russell, is serving in an acting capacity until such time as a suitable candidate is found.

Mr. Deschatelets: Do I understand from the minister's remarks that he expects to choose a French speaking candidate for this position?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, we are seeking very diligently for the right sort of candidate, and if we find a French speaking candidate with the necessary qualifications we shall be happy to consider him.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question in relation to national parks, and the matter of skiing. I would like to know what representations have been made in the past by the Canadian ski patrol association in respect of extending its activities into national park areas or, if not extending their activities into that field, perhaps in helping to standardize safety patrol procedures which may be carried out at present by national parks personnel.

In saying this I am not suggesting any criticism of what the parks may be doing—I do not know what they are doing—but I should like to know whether in this rather fairly rapidly growing safety movement in the field of skiing, and skiing is the fastest growing sport we have that relates to tourism, there is any liaison established between the parks and the skiing patrol association and, of course, the C.A.S.A. itself, which is in a sense the parent organization of the Canadian ski patrol.

I have one last question in relation to historic sites and monuments that I should like to put to the minister. A group of the citizens of Fort William have become enthusiastic about re-creating the old Fort William. A committee has been organized, I think it is called the committee to restore the old fort, and it has sent letters to a number of people, including the members for Fort William and Port Arthur and also the Prime Minister. Having regard to our present budgetary position, I was somewhat amazed at the very optimistic reply the Prime Minister gave to this association, indicating that there is an excellent chance that government support of a very substantial kind will be available to renovate this fort or to create the old fort anew. Since the scale of expenditure to recreate the fort would be in the nature of several hundred thousand dollars and since, as I said, the Prime Minister was, in the letter I read, fairly optimistic about it, can the minister indicate whether this whole question has been brought to the attention of his department, and whether the Fort William fort is one of the projects that is being appraised or analysed at the present time?

Mr. Dinsdale: I am very pleased to see the interest of the hon. member in the matter of skiing development in our national parks. Obviously he has caught the enthusiasm of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this respect. I do not know whether he himself is personally a skier, but I can assure him that one of the activities we regard as highly suitable to the fundamental purpose of the national parks is that of winter skiing. Boating, hiking, swimming, and all those activities which are closely associated with the enjoyment of nature are the type of recreational activities we like to encourage.

In the mountain parks, of course, the skiing development has gone on much more rapidly than in other areas. I am happy to inform the hon. member that in Riding Mountain national park there is a ski site under development at the present time. I think perhaps there is a slight misunderstanding. The national parks branch as such does not actually participate in the skiing operation itself. It provides the site and develops it and then it is turned over to private enterprise to operate as a recreational feature.

In regard to the safety patrol group, I can assure the hon. member also that wherever there is skiing activity in our national parks the skiers themselves see to it that they have close liaison with the ski patrol.

With respect to the other question, the old Fort William site has been very thoroughly examined and investigated by the historic sites and monument board. As the hon. member knows, this board is made up of outstanding historians in Canada, including men of the stature of Dr. Creighton. They are selected to advise the government on the historic facts surrounding those various sites.

The difficulty in connection with Fort William—and I believe this information has been communicated to the hon. member—arises from the fact that the original site is no longer available. We cannot have the historic site, of course, if it is no longer available. That has been the fundamental difficulty in connection with the development of this historic site.

Mr. Fisher: I have one further question to ask the minister. It relates to a private member's public bill on the order paper at the present time. Since the minister heads the department responsible for this whole question of historic sites and monuments, I wonder whether he has given any consideration to helping the hon. member for Brantford, or helping to sponsor as a government measure, relating to the idea of creating a national holiday of the birthday anniversary of Sir John A. Macdonald? Has any consideration been given to that matter by this particular committee? I know it is an abstract thing rather than something concrete, but after all the creation of a day every year as an annual holiday would be a monument, I am sure the minister would agree. I should like to know whether he has given any consideration to it?

Mr. Dinsdale: Oh, Mr. Chairman, although my department ranges far and wide, and although the hon. member does not think I do anything, let me say that despite the fact that we are a busy department, this is one function that does not come under my purview. The question that he has raised would be regarded more as a historic institution than a historic site. I mean that in a sociological sense, because it is certainly true that Sir John A. as the founder of this nation, as the man who first established the national policy which made this country great, should be commemorated in this way. The present government is carrying on this national policy and moving Canada forward from strength to strength and I am sure we appreciate the hon. member's recognition of the fact.

Mr. Pickersgill: If we can get back once again into the twentieth century, sir, I should like to ask the minister whether Fort Rodd in Victoria has been taken over by the historic sites and monuments board? Can he tell me at the same time on what date this request was first made or the matter was first brought to the attention of the historic sites and monuments board, and on what date they made their decision?

Mr. Dinsdale: I have not the specific dates referred to by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. He himself implied just a few moments ago in a reply that he did not carry these detailed statistics around in his head, and neither do I. But I do assure him that Fort Rodd has been taken over by the historic sites and monuments board, and it has been recognized by that board as a national historic site.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps during the course of the passage of the estimates the minister can get the information and give me the date on which the matter was first brought to the attention of the historic sites and monuments board and the date on which the decision was made. I should really like to have that information later on but I am not pressing for it immediately.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I have before me some figures on several items of the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. One of them relates to travelling and removals. The figures in 1957 were $625,854. The estimate for this year is twice that, $1,273,968. I should like the minister to tell us if he will the reason for this and also for the increase in telephones and telegraphs which in 1957 amounted to $40,869. The figures are over three times that in the estimates for 1961-62, $127,811.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, as was pointed out several times during the course of this discussion, there has been a great increase in activity in the north during the past two years, and the increase in expenditures to which the hon. member has referred is related directly to this tremendous upsurge of northern development. Transportation is one of the major difficulties in northern Canada, as the hon. member will appreciate. Northern Canada constitutes 40 per cent of our total land area; it is rich in minerals and resources of all kinds, including human resources. This increased cost is merely a reflection of the increased activity and the same applies, of course, to the cost of telephones, telegrams and so on. There was a time not long ago when such communication was quite impossible, and this is all evidence of the tremendous development taking place in the north.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have had a few minutes to look at this correspondence with the Manitoba government which the minister explained was incomplete, although I must say I have not been able to peruse it very carefully. I think the minister owes the committee a better explanation of the delay of the government in dealing with the Winnipeg floodway than simply to read about Lieutenant Richard Pickersgill who went to Baffin land in the late eighteenth century. I have here, for example, a letter written by Mr. Roblin, the premier of Manitoba, on February 4, 1960; not 1961, but 1960. The letter was addressed to the minister's predecessor, of course, who may have been absorbed with visions at that time that did not embrace the Red river. The second paragraph reads as follows:

I am naturally pleased to have this advice—

The advice referred to was that contained in the previous paragraph, that a member of the water resources branch had been appointed to consult with the officials of Manitoba.

—and I hope that the necessary approval will be forthcoming in time to allow us to take advantage of the coming construction season.

That was the construction season of 1960. February 4, 1960 happened to be the same day, of course, that the Minister of Labour was on the air on "The Nation's Business" telling us that the recession was over, and it may be that in February 1960 the government did not think it was important to have work in Manitoba in the summer of 1960. However, before the summer of 1960 was over even the most obtuse members of the government must have been convinced that any project that would supply more work would have been a useful thing to undertake. But Mr. Roblin, of course, did not get any construction under way. He did not get any approvals in 1960.

Then there are some other bits and pieces of correspondence involving other departments that would have to be fitted into the jigsaw puzzle but those departments have not yet seen fit to bring down their correspondence. However, I have here a letter which it is not possible for me to understand fully because the letter in reply to which this letter is written to the present minister by the minister of agriculure of Manitoba is not here. The letter is dated January 3, 1961, and it makes certain proposals with respect to getting on with the floodway. I gather that the minister of agriculture of Manitoba has ministerial responsibility for this project which the Manitoba government seems to want to carry out but in which the federal government seems very reluctant to take any part notwithstanding its promises of 1957 and 1958. Let me read the last paragraph of Mr. Hutton's pathetic appeal in January of 1961 when unemployment had reached the highest peak it had reached since the thirties. Mr. Hutton wrote as follows:

I would request your early consideration of the above proposal, your advice as to whether it meets your approval and if so, assurance that your government would be prepared to include the cost of the above services as part of the shareable costs of the floodway project.

I draw attention to these words, and point out this is from a Tory government, a very friendly government, one supposes. This was in January of this year.

I am sure you realize that it is imperative that this project get under way as quickly as possible but that before doing so the very considerable amount of planning and design work must be undertaken. Your earliest possible consideration and advice in respect to this matter would therefore be appreciated.

That was on January 3 of this year. I look at the calendar and see it is the 5th of May. The record is not quite equal to that of the Minister of Finance with respect to depressed areas but very nearly so. Four months have gone by and there has been no answer. I assume there has been no answer because if there had been one I assume it would have been produced with the correspondence. If this is the way the government treats a friendly Tory government, you can imagine the way it treats governments that do not have the advantage of having in them young Conservatives, as the hon. member for Port Arthur pointed out. I think the minister should tell us what has happened with respect to this floodway.

Mr. Churchill: Are you going to run in Manitoba in the next election?

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is too bad, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate ever forsook Manitoba.

Mr. Churchill: Not too bad for Manitoba though.

Mr. Dinsdale: We would have a wonderful advocate had he not shaken the dust of that province from his feet and sought fame and fortune in eastern Canada. In reading the letter he has been rather selective.

Mr. Pickersgill: I read just the last paragraph and I said so.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think that reading just the last paragraph did not give the full purport of the document. Actually what the minister of agriculture of Manitoba was discussing was the idea of setting up a joint committee to consider the engineering problems with respect to the floodway development. I am happy to assure the hon. member that that committee is operating and busily engaged in working on the necessary details.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister tell us what the division of costs is going to be for this project?

Mr. Dinsdale: As I have intimated when questioned on this point on earlier occasions, this is a subject that is under negotiation and it is one of the reserved items in the documents.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Manitoba government cannot proceed unless they do what Mr. Roblin, I thought rather foolishly, threatened to do on one occasion, pay for it themselves. He did not know with whom he was dealing when he made that remark, and I suspect it was a bad day for Manitoba when he made it. The question of the division of costs has been discussed for two years. It has been discussed in the legislature and, judging from the debates which I have read and some of which I had in my hand a few moments ago but sent to the Hansard office, Mr. Roblin has been red-faced and embarrassed over this matter because his friends were not coming across. It seems to me that surely this is not such an insuperable problem. Surely the government can make up its mind about a question of this sort if indeed it ever intends to do anything about it, which a lot of us suspect it does not.

Mr. Fisher: There is one point about which I have not asked the minister. I do not think it is a particularly delicate one, but several months ago I noticed in the Manchester Guardian a news story to the effect that the bishop of the Arctic was in Britain recruiting young men in particular to work in the Arctic. I am sorry I do not have the quotation here. I could not find it in my file. However, I think it is fair to say that the gist of it was that it was extremely difficult to obtain within Canada itself the kind of people to carry on the many necessary chores, not particularly in religious work, although that was involved, but in teaching and other fields. Can the minister indicate to me as someone who does not know very much about the matter whether it is a fact that the Anglican schools are having great difficulty in securing teachers and that they have to recruit from outside of Canada in order to keep the facilities operating?

I should like to know also, if this should be the case, if these schools in the north run by the Anglican church are being staffed by people from England? Is any consideration being given to giving some kind of assistance so that Canadian teachers can be put in these schools?

Mr. Dinsdale: In reply to this question I shall have to correct a misunderstanding. The schools in the Arctic are federal schools; they are not church schools as such. The churches have the responsibility of operating the residential hostels, which are a very important adjunct to our school operation because of the distances involved. They are federal government schools, and are operated as such.

In so far as the problem of staffing the schools in the north is concerned, I shall be quite frank and say there is some difficulty in getting suitable candidates as teachers. It was because of this situation that I suggested the hon. member might be interested in going north. I assure him, in reply to what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said, that should he indicate his desire to go north his application would be duly processed by the civil service. It is done in that manner so that we can get the best possible candidates.

While it is difficult to get suitable candidates, I might also add that I am informed each and every teacher in the federal schools in the Arctic is a Canadian. I am very happy to inform the committee that with the growing interest in the north, more and more of our young men and young women are willing to come forward and pioneer in this new frontier.

Mr. Fisher: In so far as this point is concerned, one of the reasons for my misunderstanding was probably the explanation the minister gave some time ago in connection with the difficulties of teaching French in northern Quebec and Labrador. The minister's answer seemed to stress the Anglican religion of the people, and I assumed this meant the framework of the school system still had a religious bias or religious foundation. I quite clearly gained the impression from the reported remarks of the bishop of the Arctic that he was recruiting for more than just members of the clergy to go into the north.

Mr. Dinsdale: No, Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member that he was recruiting missionaries for work in the north. It is unfortunate the wrong impression was left or created by the reply to the question the other morning. The denominational aspects in our Arctic schools enter in in relation to the selection of teachers. Where there is a greater percentage of Anglican adherents, the teacher is from the Anglican faith. Where there is a substantial majority of the Roman Catholic faith, the teacher is of the Roman Catholic faith.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister to clarify his statement. The minister is talking about schools in the Arctic. The question was asked in relation to Eskimo schools in the province of Quebec. The minister is not suggesting that his department is running schools in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, Mr. Chairman. If the hon. gentleman will examine his map of Canada, he will find there is an area of the Arctic in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not my question at all. I asked if the department of northern affairs is conducting any schools in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes. It has been pointed out to me, Mr. Chairman, that there are eleven Eskimo schools operated by the department of northern affairs in northern Quebec.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are, of course, none in the province of Newfoundland?

Mr. Dinsdale: No, Mr. Chairman, the situation in Newfoundland is quite distinct. As the hon. member knows, I would imagine, under the terms of confederation there is no differentiation between the various residents of the province of Newfoundland. The Indians and Eskimos are completely integrated into the population.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not want to lead the minister down the garden path. The minister, I think, knows there is no differentiation between the Eskimo and other people of Canada, but only between the Indians and the other people of Canada. The only people who have any special status in any part of Canada are the Indians. It is not because of any special status that anything is being done for the Eskimos, it is because of their remoteness. Most of them, I suppose, before confederation was completed in 1949, lived in the Northwest Territories, not in the provinces. There was no appreciable number of Eskimos in the provinces except in northern Manitoba and Quebec. It may well be that with the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, the majority of the Eskimos, or a considerable proportion of them, are now in the provinces.

I noticed the undertaking the minister gave to my colleague from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador the other day. It does seem to me that there should be equal treatment for the Eskimos in all parts of Canada. It is true that, with respect to the Indians, when confederation was completed in 1949 it was decided not to bring the Indians of Newfoundland under the Indian Act. I think that was a wise decision. Perhaps a mistake was made at that time, which I hope is going to be repaired in time, in that notwithstanding the fact these Indians were not going to come under the Indian Act, they were not, as they should be, treated just as well by the federal government as are other Indians in other parts of Canada. However, I know that is not the minister's responsibility.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Deschatelets: I should like to add a few words on this problem, Mr. Chairman. In 1955, I believe, the present minister was a member of the special committee on estimates. It is reported that when we came to the question of education of the Eskimos, Mr. Lesage, the then minister of northern affairs, told the committee he had been in touch with the representatives of both the churches concerned in Canada. Does the minister not feel it would be wise to consult with these authorities before making any plans to educate these Eskimos, and to consult with the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches as Mr. Lesage did in 1955?

Mr. Dinsdale: I am informed that the closest possible consultation continues between the department of northern affairs and the bishops of the respective Anglican and Roman Catholic churches.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is just one question I should like to ask the minister. Could he say what government was in office in Quebec when these Eskimo schools were established there?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Lesage was minister at the time.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am just trying to discover the date when these schools were opened. It was 1949.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can answer the question for the minister. If the schools were established in 1949, Mr. Lesage was not a member of the government of Canada. However, Mr. Maurice Duplessis was the premier of Quebec, and that great champion of provincial autonomy permitted the federal government to establish these schools in the province of Quebec. It does seem to me that little bit of history ought to be put on the record.

Mr. Fisher: I know the minister said that the schools in the north are federal schools. He also gave the impression that, in essence, these denominational schools, as he called them I think, in Quebec, were sectarian schools. What I want to know is this. As the educational system develops and as we get into the ambitions of the department as expressed in the annual report to give these Indian children more extensive education at a higher level, for example, as to these technical schools and trade institutes, are they going to continue within the sectarian framework or are they going to be more like, let us say, the schools to which we are accustomed in Manitoba or Ontario?

Mr. Dinsdale: I think I should point out that the school situation in the north is rather the result of a historical development. The church missionaries were pioneers in the north. Both the Roman Catholic church and the Anglican church missionaries were the first to bring education to our northern Canadians. They had established certain priorities in this regard. When the decision was made to provide adequate education for all the young people of Canada's northland, the outstanding contribution of the churches in the north had to be taken into consideration. That is the reason for the denominational criterion with respect to the hiring of teachers.

So far as the vocational schools are concerned, I am happy to inform members that in schools of this type catering to children of the high school level and the teen-age group, we are hoping to move them forward to a completely integrated school. This objective has already been accomplished at Yellowknife. I trust that the hon. member can travel down north on some occasion and I think he will be impressed with the educational program at the Sir John Franklin school at Yellowknife where we have a complete integrated educational program with Indians, Eskimos and white children working side by side as Canadians.

Mr. Fisher: The minister may remember that one of the recommendations of the parliamentary committee on mines, forests and waters was that arrangements be made to take members of parliament on tours to see these facilities. I am afraid I am not in a position to do this on my own funds. I would have to be, in essence, a freeloader if I were going to do it.

I should like to get back to what the minister has explained and again this is a matter of curiosity. The position in relation to the schools is this. The minister says that we are carrying on historic tradition. However, in essence it is substantiating in religion a status quo. I think he would agree with that statement. I just want to put this question. With regard to education has there been any other denomination or sect interested in proselytizing or doing missionary work in the north? Have they been interested in the present school set-up or have they been critical of it?

Mr. Dinsdale: As I indicated just a few minutes ago, the two pioneer churches in the north have been the Anglican church and the Roman Catholic church. No other denomination has expressed any interest in educational programs in the north.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I recognize the hon. member for Scarborough.

Mr. McGee: I have been trying to catch your eye, Mr. Chairman, for quite some time now in order to ask the hon. member for Port Arthur, and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who has been monopolizing the time of the committee here this afternoon, whether they could not pep up their delivery a little bit. I noticed a group of students were falling asleep and the guard was having a difficult time keeping them awake. It was only when the minister started to make his incisive remarks that this tendency was restrained in any way.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will endeavour to oblige the hon. member for York-Scarborough and disturb his own slumbers by reading a little bit of an extract from the May 10, 1960 issue of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald which is rapidly becoming my favourite newspaper. May 10, 1960 was 370 or rather—I am doing my arithmetic the wrong way—360 days ago. Certain events which had not come to an end were then transpiring in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. McCleave: It was 370 days ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was I right the first time?

Mr. McCleave: Yes, you were right the first time. Then you made the usual unfortunate mistake of changing it.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, I will leave the arithmetic to the senior member for Halifax or the taller member for Halifax who really does not have much else to keep him occupied since the divorce committee ceased its operations.

Mr. McCleave: I am keeping you honest; and that is quite a job.

Mr. Pickersgill: This item is headed: "Nowlan Promises Big Power-Net Spending." It is under dateline of Annapolis Royal and it reads as follows:

> National Revenue Minister George Nowlan said here Monday night that the federal government planned to spend a large amount this year on the development of power between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.
> Mr. Nowlan was one—

There is a good deal about where he was speaking and so on. I will spare the minister any embarrassment by failing to identify that. Mr. Nowlan went on to speak about many things that have happened or which he asserted had happened down there and then he went on to say this:

> This year, ... it was proposed to spend a large amount on the power pooling project. This would reduce the cost of thermo-power development to less than seven cents per kilowatt.

When we get to the appropriate item—and I am just serving notice on the minister now so that his officials will have a chance to be prepared—I think the committee would be interested in a full report of what has happened in the years since this statement was made and particularly the extent to which the cost of power has been reduced.

Mr. Dinsdale: Before this item passes I should like to expand the reply I made to the hon. member for Port Arthur and indicate that the information I gave applied to the Northwest Territories. The Yukon Territory again is another situation. So far as the Indian population is concerned in the Yukon Territory, the hon. member for the Yukon informs me that the Baptist denomination has been very active there.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall item 279 carry?

Mr. Garland: I should like to ask the minister a question in order to get an explanation. If I heard him correctly, on two occasions, I think—once since lunch and once before lunch—he indicated that the advertising contracted for by the government and paid for by the government, in respect to that 15 per cent slice off the top to the agency was at no cost to the government. How does he support an argument of that kind, where it is contracted for by the government and paid by the government?

Mr. Dinsdale: I am informed that this is normal procedure in advertising agencies. Businesses of all kinds and government departments, rather than involve their own personnel in placing these advertisements seek the services of qualified representatives or agencies which have experience in the field. They find that a much more efficient operation can be carried out. The amount of business that is handled by these agencies is in various sums which do not involve any profit so far as the company or the organization or the government placing the advertisement are concerned. They merely indicate that these advertisements are to be placed. The firm or the agency concerned does all the necessary work and the percentage is added to the cost of the medium involved in the advertising. The medium pays a 15 per cent service charge.

Mr. Garland: I am well aware of the mechanics of it but surely the minister is not suggesting that this can be done at no cost to the advertiser. Surely this is a built-in part of the rate which a particular medium might be charging. To suggest that a 15 per cent slice off the top is not paid in the end by the government is, I think, unrealistic.

Mr. Dinsdale: If the hon. member would consult any reputable advertising agency he would find that this is the practice.

Mr. Pickersgill: The money comes out of the treasury just the same.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Dinsdale: No. If the government or a company were to place their advertisements directly with the various media it would cost them precisely the same as it would to use the services of an advertising agency.

Mr. Garland: It is a thin argument, when these lush contracts are passed out to the political friends of the minister, to say that it is done at no cost to the federal treasury.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think the only way to put this point across would be to ask the hon. member to approach any advertising agency. I think it would inform him that it is the publicity medium which pays the 15 per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not sure whether the minister qualified one statement which he made—a statement which devastated me—to the effect that only two churches had shown any interest in education in the north, namely the Roman Catholic church and the Anglican church. The Presbyterian church has always prided itself on its interest in education, and to be left in outer darkness is a shattering experience. I wonder if the minister could qualify his statement.

Mr. Dinsdale: The Presbyterian church has, of course, been a pioneer in the field of education for many years, even for centuries, but as far as the Northwest Territories are concerned the only two denominations which have been active are the Anglican church and the Roman Catholic church. In the Yukon Territory, going back to the days of the gold rush, I imagine, representatives of the Baptist church have been active among the Indian population. We have two problems in this regard, responsibility for Indian education and responsibility for Eskimo education. I am referring to the Eskimo population. As far as I know there has been no direct participation by the Presbyterian church but I would, of course, agree, that indirectly through various voluntary groups which are now working in northern Canada—the Canadian-Eskimo-Indian committee for example which brings together representatives from the women's institutes and various other groups in Canada—there is a genuine interest being shown in all problems with respect to the human resources in our north.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I can throw a little light on this question. While what the minister has said is correct, referring to the Northwest Territories as "the north" is using the word "north" in a restricted sense. I was the superintendent general of Indian affairs for three years. I think many people regard northern Ontario and the northern part of the provinces as being the north, as well as the Northwest Territories, and in both those areas the Presbyterian church and the United Church of Canada have been very active and they have a considerable number of schools there, as well as the Anglican church and the Catholic church.

Mr. Garland: Last year officials of the department visited the United Kingdom and western Europe in an attempt to assess the tourist potential there in the light of the growing economic strength of those countries. Would the minister now comment on the result of this examination and tell us what is being done to encourage tourist traffic from western Europe?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes. I am glad the hon. member for Nipissing asked this question, because we are pleased with the results of that visit. It was a fact finding trip and I have had reports on the results.

The various Canadian transportation companies have been active in Europe for several years, now—the railways and T.C.A.—and it was found that they are doing an outstanding job in representing Canada. However, strong recommendations were made as a result of the trip that there should be some direct representation of the Canadian government travel bureau in the United Kingdom to serve that market as well as the European market generally.

This whole matter is under very active consideration. We are hoping that at the next tourist convention sponsored by the Canadian government tourist bureau the guest speaker will be one of the leading figures from the tourist industry in the United Kingdom. It is apparent that the best market for increased travel to Canada exists in the United Kingdom, West Germany, the Netherlands, France and Switzerland, to give some specific information which has been brought to my attention as a result of the visit. In all those countries the standard of living has risen remarkably. Foreign exchange restrictions have been lessened or eliminated, and the economies are buoyant. The best possibility for an immediate increase in tourist traffic to Canada is in the United Kingdom. All in all, we can conclude that the tour was successful. The information derived will provide the basis of constructive activity along these lines.

Mr. Garland: I have understood the minister correctly, the government, as a result of this trip or survey last year, has not taken any specific action.

Mr. Dinsdale: There is nothing before parliament at the present time but we are optimistic that we shall have something to present to the house next year.

Mr. Southam: I should like to associate myself with other hon. members, on behalf of my constituents, and myself, in congratulating the minister upon his appointment to his new office as the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The constituency of Moose Mountain is, of course, in close proximity to that of Brandon-Souris, and this is another reason for wishing the hon. gentleman well in his new post.

Before this item passes I should like to ask the minister a question, and my question is this. Last year I made a discourse in this chamber at some length on the circumstances as far as national parks are concerned. I pointed out that the great central province of Saskatchewan has only one national park whereas some of the neighbouring provinces such as Alberta, and British Columbia have four each. I also pointed out that while the national park of Waskesiu in the northern part of our province is a very fine one it is far distant from the main centres of population. I am wondering whether the department has given any consideration to the expansion of its national park program in the province from which I come.

I should like to direct the minister's attention to another question and it has to do with the possibility of designating Cannington manor as a historic site. This is a building of an unusual and distinctive type which was put up, I think, in the eighteenth century by English people who established there what might be called a piece of old England. It is equipped with stables, a race track and other adjuncts to elegant English country life; for instance, the sport of hunting was practised around the manor and continued for some time. I thought I should like to bring this matter to the attention of the minister and to ask whether his officials could not consider the possibility of establishing this building as a historic site.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am aware of both the issues referred to by my neighbour across the border in Saskatchewan, and I know of his continuing interest in these matters.

With reference to national parks, I can assure hon. members that the department is always happy to consider suggestions for the expansion of our national parks system. However, one of the basic problems in this regard is that any area to be considered as a national park must be made available by provincial authorities, free of encumbrances. This information is perhaps pertinent to some of the comments made by hon. members from the maritimes. Various suggestions are put forward from time to time regarding areas which might be suitable for national parks, but my department can take no action until the provincial government has first indicated it is willing to turn over the lands for national park purposes. On that basis we are happy to hear representations at any time.

In regard to the Cannington manor, which is a replica of an old English estate in the heart of the prairies going back to the early days of settlement, again this would have to be cleared by the historic sites and monuments board, to determine whether it meets the necessary criteria enabling it to be established as a national historic site. If hon. members can persuade that board in this regard we will be agreeable to taking the necessary steps.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the minister referred to an overseas delegation in regard to Canada's tourist industry. In this field we have received quite a number of publications originating with this department. I wonder whether the minister could tell me how many of these tourist industry pamphlets are printed in French only, how many in English only, and how many in both French and English?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I am informed that up to the present date the activities of the Canadian government travel bureau have been restricted almost to the United States market except for that delegation which was sent to Europe last year. Our operations have been carried out through the offices in New York and Chicago. This year, as the hon. member knows, we are going to open a tourist bureau on the west coast of the United States at San Francisco.

Because of this situation, the only demand for tourist publications is received from English speaking areas and pamphlets are designed entirely to serve that market. Of course, when we actively seek to attract European tourists, and if and when we establish a travel bureau in Europe, we will have to consider the problem of cultivating tourists from France and other parts of the continent by the use of multi-language pamphlets and programs.

Mr. Caron: Does the minister not think that in order to attract Belgians, French, Swiss and perhaps individuals from West Germany, it should be much more effective if our publications were printed in French? I can furnish the minister with a number of bilingual publications, and I suggest our own publications could be printed in both English and French without the loss of any advantage, and without an increase in volume of paper. Perhaps the pamphlets I have would be of assistance to the minister in his consideration regarding the printing of this type of publication in both languages.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, as I have indicated, when we begin to work directly with a view to acquiring tourists from Europe we will be faced with the necessity of having bilingual publications, or perhaps trilingual publications. We will be then attempting to cultivate this market in Europe and will have to do so by using the different languages, but up until the present time our operation has been restricted exclusively to the United States market.

Mr. Caron: Does the minister intend to wait until he has an establishment in Europe before making these publications bilingual? I would suggest there is another consideration involved, and that is, if these publications were printed in French and English the people around the world would realize that Canada is in fact a bilingual country. These people might otherwise think, when they see our publications, that bilingualism in Canada exists only in text books and nowhere else.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, this branch operates on a limited budget, and the main interest has been to stimulate the tourist industry in the United States. Many developments are taking place in regard to our tourist promotional program, and I would suggest that as we approach Canada's centennial we will have to considerably broaden the scope of our activity in order to ensure that the true nature of Canada is presented, and our bicultural and bilingual aspects will have to be conveyed to the potential touring public, particularly from Europe. I do not know whether there would be any particular advantage in presenting the bilingual aspect to the United States tourists, but that is something I shall have to consider further.

Mr. Caron: I would suggest that the advantage involved here would be that of presenting a true picture of Canada to these people from outside, so that they should know there are a number of French speaking Canadians in this country. Regarding the limited budget, to which the minister referred, I should suggest that one of the pamphlets I have in my office contains only one page of pictures and could have been printed in French as well as in English with the addition of one sheet, and the inclusion of French captions under the pictures appearing on that page, with very little cost because of the very small increase in the amount of paper and practically no increase in the amount of ink. This could have been done at no extra cost if someone had only thought about it.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: I would like to put a supplementary question to the minister.

At the time Mr. Lesage was heading the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, were the Canadian government travel bureau publications issued in both English and French, even when intended for the United States? To follow up the question put by the hon. member for Hull, was the literature issued at that time in the United States by the Canadian government travel bureau bilingual or unilingual?

(Text):

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, these publications have always been printed in one language.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: The question just raised is a purely political one and can hardly improve the situation. I would therefore point out to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) that even if mistakes were made in the past, that is no justification for future governments repeating the same mistakes. On the other hand, if the question raised by the hon. member was merely intended to compare past activities to present activities, he was wrong. We want improvements for the future, even if we have to get them through the present government.

Mr. Pigeon: I do not object to what the hon. member for Hull has just said. On the contrary, I favour his suggestion. I feel sure the minister and the officials of his department will consider the question and try to see that Canada be known throughout the world as a bi-ethnic country.

Mr. Caron: Then, how does Mr. Lesage come into the picture?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Lesage has been derelict in his duty.

Mr. Caron: I am prepared to admit that.

(Text):

The Chairman: Order. Shall vote 279 carry?

Item agreed to.

281. Contributions to the provinces, pursuant to agreements entered into with the approval of the governor in council, by Canada with the provinces, of amounts equal to one half of the amounts confirmed by the provinces as having been spent by them for campground and picnic area developments, $1,700,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: I understand that item 281 deals with contributions to the provinces on a 50 per cent basis for campground and picnic area developments.

Mr. Chairman, in the last elections, several of our Conservative friends from Quebec denounced all these joint programs as being interference with the autonomy of the provinces. Just recently, the leader of the opposition in Quebec also denounced those programs. So that our Conservative friends from Quebec may clearly indicate whether or not they agree with the policy of the Union Nationale, I see no better way than to call for a vote on the item when the hon. members have completed their remarks. I therefore ask that a vote be taken.

(Text):

Mr. Denis: I should like to ask the minister a question on this item of $1,700,000. If I understand aright, this has to do with a joint agreement between the dominion government and the provinces. I think the federal government pays one half of the amount of the contribution. Since the inception of this scheme, how much money has been spent by this government and what provinces have entered the joint agreement, including the province of Quebec?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, this program has been operating since 1958. I believe the hon. member has asked for the total spent since that time. As illustrated in tabular form, up to the end of 1960 the totals were as follows:

Province	Amount
British Columbia	$ 1,028,468.11
Alberta	588,830.17
Saskatchewan	443,319.14
Manitoba	373,200.96
Ontario	2,074,849.57
New Brunswick	115,378.07
Nova Scotia	60,402.95
Prince Edward Island	2,120.00
Newfoundland	54,345.77

Mr. Denis: What about Quebec?

Mr. Dinsdale: Quebec did not enter the program until the current year. There has been an expenditure on the winter works program of $9,915. There has been no expenditure under the trans-Canada highway program.

Item agreed to: Yeas, 53; nays, nil.

282. Contributions to the provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources in accordance with agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces, $12,000,000.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, I should like, if I may, to ask the minister whether he would consider a road into Labrador. I have in mind the announcement which he made in the house on Wednesday, part of which said in effect that where there are two companies operating in the northland the federal government would build a road to that area and pay 100 per cent of the cost. I should like to call his attention to the fact that in Carol lake and lake Wabush, which is one area in Labrador, there are two big mining developments. I would be very happy indeed if the minister would tell us that he is going to build a road from, say, the north shore of the St. Lawrence into that area, or from Goose Bay into that area, which would make me happier still.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, the roads to resources program applies, of course, only to the provinces. The announcement I made the other day concerned our access road program in the territories where the federal government has exclusive responsibility. Under the roads to resources program we accept recommendations from the provincial governments and these recommendations are processed for the necessary criteria pertaining to roads to resources. We are happy to entertain any recommendation by the provincial governments.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, at the end of the discussion of this item I should like you to call the yeas and nays because this important item relates to a large amount of money, namely $12 million.

I should like to know first from the minister how much money has been spent by the government under this kind of subvention to the provinces? I should like to have a breakdown of the amount by provinces up to the present time.

The minister knows that since the inception of this agreement the province of Quebec has always refused to enter into an agreement with the federal government because the premier of the province held that it was an encroachment on provincial autonomy. I know that all the Conservative members from Quebec and even the Conservative ministers from that province campaigned in the provincial elections on behalf of Maurice Duplessis who always objected to these agreements. I should like to know how they could tell the people of Quebec that this was an encroachment on the autonomy of that province and then come into this house and say they were in favour of this encroachment on the autonomy of the province of Quebec. If they do not want this item to pass because it is an encroachment on the autonomy of Quebec, I wonder why they would vote for it? If they do not approve of the previous governments of the province of Quebec they should say so.

Every time we come to items of this kind we never hear from these Conservative members from the province of Quebec. They are very brave when they are talking to a Conservative meeting in the province of Quebec. I even heard the hon. member for Chapleau say over the radio that under this administration millions of dollars had been given through him for the development of access roads. Nevertheless, when a meeting is held by Mr. Talbot of the Union Nationale the hon. member is beside Mr. Talbot and denouncing agreements of this kind. I should like to know whether their stand is "Yes" here and "No" in Quebec or vice versa. On what side of the fence do they stand? At the end of the discussion of this item I should like the yeas and nays to be called. I would ask the minister to give us the amounts of money by provinces spent under this program.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words because the hon. member for St. Denis mentioned the fact that in a radio broadcast recently I said that large amounts of money had been spent and most of it, I am glad to say, in the north in the riding of Chapleau on the roads to resources program which is under discussion now. He implied that members of the Conservative party campaigned for the provincial party in the last election. I wish to say that we are discussing federal matters here. As far as I am concerned, I have said that these amounts are being spent and there is no question in my mind that they will help in the development of the north country. I do not think we should mix provincial matters with federal matters and I will be glad to vote in favour of this item.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, with reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Martel), I must say that the province of Quebec must necessarily be included in this discussion, since the expenditures involved in this item could not be made unless the province of Quebec agrees to share half the cost. A matter of principle is involved. Therefore, if you say that this constitutes an infringement upon autonomy and if, at your meetings in the province of Quebec, you denounce this item, I wonder why you vote in favour of it in this house. Either you change your mind, or—

Mr. Martel: We are not here to discuss provincial politics.

Mr. Denis: There is not one law for one's friends and another for one's foes.

I am unable to understand, Mr. Chairman, how these people can boast to their constituents that they are the protectors of autonomy.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. If the hon. member for Chapleau had presented his case in the form of a point of order I would be inclined to agree that the debate on this item has strayed from the point which is the subject of inquiry from the minister and I would have to ask the hon. member for St. Denis to restrict his references to another arena which has no jurisdiction as far as this expenditure is concerned.

Mr. Denis: May I have the breakdown I requested?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes. Would the hon. member be satisfied with round figures?

Mr. Denis: Yes.

Mr. Dinsdale: These figures are up until the end of 1960: British Columbia, $2,200,000; Alberta, $2,300,000; Saskatchewan, $2,600,000; Manitoba, $1,700,000; Ontario, $1,300,000; Quebec, nil; New Brunswick, $1,200,000; Nova Scotia, almost $3 million; Prince Edward Island, $1,700,000, and Newfoundland almost $516,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I find that the Quebec Tories cost the province a lot of money.

Mr. Ricard: That might be a lesson for Mr. Lesage, who was against those subsidies but finally accepted them.

(Text):

Mr. Denis: May I say we were never opposed to these agreements. Premier Lesage hoped for the disappearance of these joint agreements little by little but would not refuse our share while they existed.

(Translation):

We shall accept all that the federal government gives the provinces. We shall have our share in the amounts of money distributed throughout the country. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) has paid his taxes; well he is entitled to his share of the amounts being spent under this item. Surely, he did not fail to notice the millions that were spent to the benefit of other provinces while the province of Quebec lagged behind during the time when the Union Nationale ruled the destinies of the province.

Mr. Martel: Your attitude shows you to favour centralization of power.

Mr. Denis: Just vote against this item if it is contrary to your principles.

(Text):

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister give the committee a list of the projects approved under this program in the current year for the province of New Brunswick?

Mr. Dinsdale: It is quite a long list, and I am happy to give it to the hon. member. The roads are as follows: the Juniper-Napadogan road, the Plaster Rock-Renous road, the Doaktown-Chipman road, the Blue River road, the Maces Bay road, the Saint John-Mispec road, the north central New Brunswick resources roads, the Boiestown or Doaktown to Plaster Rock road, the Kingston peninsula loop, the Bayfield-Mates Corner road, the Grand Lake road, the Salmon river bridge, the cape Bald loop, the Shediac bay loop, the Buctouche bay loop, the Richibucto loop and the St. Croix river road. These are the projects that have been approved.

Mr. Robichaud: Has the minister received a request covering a road to Miscou island, including a bridge linking Shippigan island and Miscou, and what action has been taken on this project?

Mr. Dinsdale: I understand there have been requests for two additional road projects including the one mentioned by the hon. member, the other being a mining development road into the Heath Steel Company development. These two are under consideration at the moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask the minister whether he was right in giving the figure for Nova Scotia which seemed almost astronomical compared with the other provinces? I think all the other provinces were under $2 million and Nova Scotia was over $3 million. I just wondered whether the figure he gave was correct and, if so, where these roads are.

Mr. Dinsdale: I now have a more up-to-date report. The first report was to the end of December, 1960, and the one I have in my hands now is to the end of January, 1961. The figure given for Nova Scotia is $3,032,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is higher than any other province.

Mr. Dinsdale: No, Alberta is higher with $3,200,000. Those are the two highest provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: But it is higher than Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario or British Columbia?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, but so there will be no misunderstanding I should point out that every province is in identically the same position. Our total contribution is $7½ million to be matched by a similar contribution from the province. The figure merely indicates that Nova Scotia has been more active.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister can tell me about a road in which I am particularly interested, that from Gypsumville to Grand Rapids? Has that road been finished and is it intended to continue it farther north to Thompson?

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe the hon. member is referring to Manitoba again and discussing the Manitoba roads to resources program.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the item under discussion.

Mr. Dinsdale: The road from Gypsumville, I understand, was officially opened at Christmas. I understand that it represents the longest piece of road developed in the shortest space of time in Canadian history. It is now proceeding to Thompson and when it gets to Thompson we will be only 200 miles from the port of Churchill.

Mr. Peters: I believe in the original agreement with the province of Ontario in connection with the roads to resources program there were eight projects listed at a total cost of $8,360,000. Would the minister tell us how many of those roads have been completed under this program and the cost?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I have that information. The Savant lake south road: there has been no activity on this road to date. The Foyelet to Chapleau road: 23 miles have been cleared. The Minaki south road: 15 miles have been cleared out of a total of 15 miles. The Nakina northerly road, a total distance of 50 miles: I have not got the report of the work completed, but there has been a total of $429,268 paid out on that project. Goldpines to Uchi lake; there has been no activity on that project. Port Arthur north, a total distance of 70 miles: 28 miles have been cleared.

Mr. Peters: What has happened in connection with the Campbell mine to Red lake road and No. 8 northern service? This was a very short road of about two miles.

Mr. Dinsdale: According to my records here, Mr. Chairman, the Campbell to Red lake road is not part of the roads to resources agreement. I believe the hon. member is referring to the road that was discussed by the hon. member for Port Arthur last night. This road is described in the agreement between the federal government and the government of Ontario, the form of road to be agreed upon after completion of photographic and magnetometer surveys. In addition, some geological reconnaissance will be carried out. I am happy to inform the hon. member that the major portion of the preliminary work has been completed. All the aeromagnetic work is completed and maps have been published. About 60 per cent of the ground geological work has been completed, and the balance will be done this year. It is expected that a detailed road location can commence later during the current year, and it is hoped the actual construction will commence in 1962.

Mr. Peters: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Can the minister tell us if there are any negotiations currently under way to extend other roads in other areas not included in the roads to resources program? In other words, are there negotiations taking place between the provincial and federal governments to extend these roads into other areas beyond those initially projected in the province of Ontario? I am thinking, for instance, of a road from Gowganda to either the Chapleau or Sudbury area. Another road that has been mentioned on a number of occasions is a road north from Cochrane to Moosonee and also one north from Kapuskasing to serve the area north of Kapuskasing.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, the roads I have outlined are the complete projects under the present agreement. There are no further negotiations taking place at the present time.

Mr. Habel: I wish to follow the hon. member for Timiskaming because he referred to certain roads in my riding. I do not believe the population of Cochrane are so anxious to know about new roads from Timmins to Kapuskasing or Kapuskasing to Moosonee. They are anxious to learn about a road that would connect the northwestern part of Quebec with the northeastern part of Ontario. I wonder if the minister could tell me if there are any suggestions from the provincial governments concerning the possibility of opening up that area, 52 miles in length, between northwestern Quebec and La Reine and Cochrane. This would be the road in which the population of that district would be interested. They want this road as a tourist road, as a road to resources and also as a necessary road in case of attack on this country.

After all, the northern part of the province is quite a distance from Toronto and some 300 miles north of North Bay. The only real outlet we would have in case of attack would be to the west to Port Arthur and Fort William or east into Quebec province. This road would be a most important one to the population of my riding, and the one in which they would be most interested.

Mr. Dinsdale: I can inform the hon. member that we have received no representations concerning this road.

Mr. Herridge: I am very interested in this item because I am interested in these roads to resources. I might say that I have been interested in some hot springs for 50 years, the Nakusp hot springs which are nine miles northeast of Nakusp. I have been a commissioner of the park committee that has been formed since 1925, but we have no road to these hot springs. They are equal to radium springs. About 70,000 gallons of water come out of the ground every 24 hours at a temperature of about 134. We have two others very similar within a distance of 40 miles. There are magnificent opportunities for bathing and the establishment of a resort. Over 35 miles of the finest brook trout fishing in Canada, as well as magnificent scenery, can be found there.

For years, the people have either walked or rode a horse over the nine mile trail to these springs. Prior to the second world war there would be anywhere from 600 to 800 people visiting these springs annually, enjoying the baths, the fishing and the scenery. People seem to have gotten out of the habit of riding and walking since the second world war, so the numbers that come now are very reduced. We have been very interested in getting a road built over the nine miles required to service these magnificent hot springs.

I want to ask the minister three questions. I have tried to explain briefly the type of natural resource this is. Does the government contribute to the construction of roads to this type of natural resource if a province makes application? Has the government of British Columbia made application for assistance in building a road to these hot springs? Can the minister go through the list of projects that have been undertaken in British Columbia?

Mr. Dinsdale: In response to the first question may I say this. The federal government accepts recommendations from the provincial government for resource roads. The answer to the second question is this. The provincial government made no representations concerning the road referred to. As a matter of fact, I think the only road project in the province of British Columbia in the roads to resources program is the Stewart-Cassiar road. They have put the whole amount of money available into one project.

Mr. Herridge: I want to thank the minister for that information. It will brew a good storm in the Kootenays.

Mr. Martel: I wish to add a few words to those of the hon. member for Cochrane with regard to the road suggested for northern Ontario to connect northeastern Ontario with northwestern Quebec. Some work has been done in that respect by—and the hon. member may correct me if I am wrong—the northern Ontario development association. There have been meetings with the Abitibi chamber of commerce and also the chamber of commerce of La Sarre. Our people in Quebec are also greatly interested in that road. I believe as well that some work has been done for that purpose, namely to build that road. Of course the suggestion will have to come from the Ontario government because on the Quebec side the road goes to the border. It all depends on what road will be chosen. However, it will be only a matter of few miles, possibly five miles at the most, depending on where this road will go.

I think it would be well for the minister if he would inquire whether his department has received representations from the northern Ontario development association in that respect with regard to this project about which we have been talking in our district for over 30 years, I would say. I think it is a worth-while project that would come under the roads to resources program of northeastern Ontario. Of course it all depends on the Ontario government.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have had no direct representations and my officials tell me neither have they. As the hon. member suggests, the initial approach should be made to the provincial authorities.

The Acting Chairman: Is the committee ready for the division on vote 282?

Mr. Peters: Before the division is taken, may I ask the minister what has been the final arrangement made by his department with the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys in relation to the magnetometer survey that was carried out in the case to which reference was made? I have not the final correspondence; it goes only up to a certain date. At that time negotiations were being undertaken with the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, I believe, to conduct an air survey under this department. Was that how it was conducted?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes. This survey is done by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys on our behalf.

The Acting Chairman: Is the committee ready for the division?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Item agreed to: Yeas, 56; nays, nil.

National parks branch—

283. Branch administration, $268,584.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall vote 283 carry?

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

The Acting Chairman: Shall vote 283 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman; I think perhaps we ought to call it five o'clock.

An hon. Member: No; there are still two or three minutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: All right. I have plenty of material. Perhaps the minister would like to take time first, if this is the appropriate item under which to do it, to complete his answer about Fort Rodd, if he is ready to answer on that subject. If not, I could go on. Perhaps it would be useful for the minister to have this knowledge so that, when we come back to the estimates, he may be prepared. When he comes back to the estimates I should like the minister to tell us for what reason a man named Doucette of Rustico, Prince Edward Island, was laid off from the national park there, who was taken on in his place, and any other attendant details he can give about this transaction which I believe is rather notorious in the community.

I also have a question here about another matter. It is really a supplementary question to one which was asked the other day by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi who is unable to be here this afternoon and who wanted me to raise the matter further. The minister will recall that it was question No. 228 which he answered on March 29, with respect to the laying off of a crew and its replacement by another crew of persons in Cape Breton Highlands national park. The minister stated that an interim reply to some inquiries he had made had been sent on March 18 and that he had asked for further information on the matter in order to determine that the rotational policy had been equitably followed. If the minister, when we come together again, could give us that further information it would be helpful.

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): It being five o'clock and in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15, it is my duty to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day, or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day, reported and concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15 as provisionally amended.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING COMPULSORY ENFRANCHISEMENT

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-24, an act to amend the Indian Act (Section 112 repealed).—Mr. Howard.

Mr. Howard: I wonder whether this order might stand.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to raise a point of order with respect to this bill which has been on the order paper since November 21, 1960. If these bills are allowed to stand on the order paper they interfere with the possibility of other hon. members proceeding with their bills. It seems to me the hon. gentleman should either proceed or allow the bill to go to the bottom of the list, if indeed it would be possible, in view of the action already taken by this house this session, for the hon. member to proceed with this particular bill.

Mr. Speaker: Under the rules the hon. member has the option of proceeding or having the bill dropped unless it is requested by the government that the bill stand.

Mr. Broome: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate the intent of this bill has, I believe, already been dealt with by the house. I think it should be withdrawn.

Mr. Howard: I have requested that it be allowed to stand, but if that is not the desire of the government—and I should like to know that first—

Mr. Speaker: I have heard no request from the government that it should stand.

Mr. Howard: On the point of order which has been raised—and I am speaking now about our procedure, not about the bill itself—may I suggest that the observations made were based on a statement made by the Minister of National Revenue on April 21. I believe he was then acting leader of the house. The hon. gentleman dealt with this question on that occasion and at page 3908 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

> I admit there may be an occasion—such as that when an hon. member is sick, is unavoidably prevented from coming to this House of Commons, is away in his own constituency or is on other business—when some consideration might be given to that particular case.

Well, I am sick, Mr. Speaker. I am sick of this government trying to interfere in the affiairs of private members.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena is taking advantage of the Chair by raising that as a point of order. The rule requires the hon. member either to proceed or to drop this bill.

Mr. Howard: Well, in that case, with consent, I should like to move that order No. 1 be discharged and the bill withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give the hon. member leave to withdraw his bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

CANADA FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT DISCRIMINATION BECAUSE OF AGE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-25, to amend the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act (age discrimination).

He said: My remarks in connection with this particular bill will be brief. The Fair Employment Practices Act has been on the statute books for some years. It prohibits discrimination with regard to the employment of employees, among other things in so far as membership in trade unions is concerned. The act provides that discrimination shall not be practised on the basis of race, national origin, colour or religion.

What this bill seems to do is to add the further provision that discrimination shall not be practised because of the age of the prospective employee or of the employee unless age is considered to be a bona fide occupational factor. The bill seeks to deal at the present time with the question of membership in unions and the proposed amendment would merely add another provision in respect to age unless, as I say, that is a bona fide occupational factor. There are, in addition, those other matters such as race, national origin, colour and religion with which the act is already concerned.

I think we are all aware that discrimination has existed and exists right now among employers with regard to the age of individuals employed. We have all heard cases where a person of 40 years of age, or 45 or 50—the age varies with the industry and the circumstances—has been unable to gain employment because he is considered to be too old. In some instances the reason is given that an older person becomes less efficient and tends to slow down on the job. Another reason given, and I think it is the most prevalent, arises from the growth of pension plans in industry. A number of industries find that it is difficult to fit an older worker into a pension plan because by the time he reaches the normal retirement age in that industry he will not have put in enough service to qualify for a pension, or, in other words, the contributions to the pension fund made by himself, or on his behalf by the employer, or jointly, would not be sufficient to qualify him for a pension, or at any rate for an adequate pension.

We have advocated, of course, on other occasions and in other circumstances that a portable pension system should be instituted so as to allow a worker to take his pension plan with him when he moves from one job to another, thus enabling him to work in a number of different industries over a period of years. But that is another subject and I think it would not be proper except in a general way to debate that during the discussion of this particular bill.

Unfortunately these pension barriers, along with other factors, deprive people of the right to gainful employment, for no real valid, sensible or sound reason. This bill seeks to overcome that particular situation. There are a number of other places in the world where such anti-discrimination laws exist but I do not think it is necessary for me to list the states which have this legislation on their statute books or to recount the experiences they have had in those places. Nevertheless, the material is on the files and the experience of anti-discrimination legislation may be consulted.

In support of my statement that discrimination does exist and of my contention that changes should be made I should like to qoute from the remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) as contained in a booklet published in 1960 by the Queen's printer entitled "Speaking Out about the Older Worker Problem". This is a publication containing some 26 pages. It deals extensively with the problem of the older workers from a variety of viewpoints. Within its pages, as I said, is a statement by the Minister of Labour, who has this to say as reported on pages 7 and 8 of the booklet:

> Justice, and freedom of opportunity to every individual, as spelled out by the United Nations, was adopted by 58 countries, including Canada, in the universal declaration of human rights, in December 1948. Is it justice and freedom of opportunity to raise obstacles to employment against any segment of society, for any reason, including age? Should not all individuals have an equal right to jobs which they are capable of doing whether they are 20 or 70 years of age?

The second paragraph I wish to read from page 8 is as follows:

> In the Department of Labour and the national employment service we contend that applicants for jobs should be hired on the basis of character, ability and qualifications needed for the particular job, and that age should not be a factor. It is because many persons in their forties or fifties are turned down for jobs simply because of age—even though fully qualified—that we have the social and economic problem of the older worker.

Mr. Speaker, these words of the Minister of Labour add weight, if that is necessary, to the reasons why this particular bill should be endorsed by all hon. members and placed on the statute books of our country.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member will permit a question before he resumes his seat? I appreciate that during second reading of a bill is not the appropriate time to ask for clarification of a particular clause, but perhaps if I phrase my question carefully it will be in order. I wonder whether the hon. member could expand on the principles which give rise to clause 6?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to do so if I can avoid becoming involved in the technicalities. A union will occasionally select a name which embodies a reference to age, such as "old" or "young". Clause 6 prevents anyone from presuming that such an inclusion in the name is an indication of a prejudice. This phraseology was adopted from similar types of legislation to prevent any possibility of such a thing happening.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member give us an example of the type of association he has in mind?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I do not have any association in mind. These words were taken from the phraseology used in similar legislation in other jurisdictions. Apparently individuals had been faced with this peculiar situation and adopted this method of solving the problem, so as to prevent any implication of a restriction as to age. Perhaps as an illustration I could suggest that, if a group of employees working in a home for the aged called themselves the national union of employees for the home for the aged, there would be no possibility of discrimination because of the name itself under legislation based on this bill.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, so far as this bill serves to draw attention to the plight of the older workers it has a useful purpose. However, as in many circumstances where we are dealing with prejudice, it is very difficult to draft legislation to prevent it. I suggest that we must educate the general public as to the usefulness of older workers.

As has been mentioned on numerous occasions, there are many prejudices in Canada and elsewhere throughout the world relating to the usefulness of persons who have reached a certain age. I hope this discussion today will put forward a case for the older worker. The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) on several occasions has presented this case for the older worker. He did so last year during a very forthright discussion regarding the whole problem.

There are two main problems facing the older worker. The first is an economic problem, and the second can be classed as a prejudicial problem. In many institutions employers hesitate to hire individuals who will shortly be entitled to retirement and drawing pensions, or other retirement allowances, for the obvious economic reasons. Second, even though an individual may offer to work without the benefit of a retirement plan, he would be in a very difficult position. Many older people on occasion will volunteer, because they realize that they will not be working for a very long period of time, to waive their pension rights. This proposal has never been acceptable because it would result in different treatment from different employers. This type of offer made by older workers, to get around the difficulty, has met with little success.

Regarding the problem of prejudice facing older people, I would suggest there is a feeling among employers, in regard to giving jobs to older people, that they are not as efficient as younger people. I would suggest this is not always true. We should first consider what the prejudices are that an older worker must face. I shall attempt to list several of them which I feel are among the foremost. The first, is that when workers grow older their ability to learn decreases and therefore it is more difficult to train them in newer industrial and technological techniques. Second, a man over 40 is presumed not to be as productive as he was at 20. Third, the frequency of illness increases with age and there is more absenteeism among older workers than among younger workers. Fourth, physical deterioration is synonomous with age and therefore older people are accident prone. Finally, age has a direct bearing on insurance rates, and the cost of pension plans increases with each new participant over 40 years of age.

Those prejudices I have outlined represent the beliefs of a considerable number of employers, although it is generally accepted that these are not true statements of the facts. These beliefs are not necessarily accurate in respect of individuals 40 years and older, but are myths regarding older workers.

Mr. Speaker, I received a mimeographed letter last year, as I imagine all hon. members did, from a Mr. George D. Glassford of 132 Central Park boulevard north, Oshawa, Ontario, dated March 7, 1960. This gentleman set forth his particular problem in this letter, and I should like to read two paragraphs. They are as follows:

> Business, big and small, American or Canadian controlled; governments, federal, provincial and municipal, are all tarred with the same brush.
> They'll deny it emphatically—show examples where the statement is wrong—but the pitifully few examples they can show have resulted from pressure—executive, customer, or political—in each individual case. Rarely is one ever turned down because of age, as such. That would never do. The reasons are many and varied and often far fetched. I should know. I've been getting them for 15 months.

This letter was written by a man who states that he is almost 60 and was born in Canada. He had service in the first war. He goes through a long list of jobs that he has held but he says his difficulty now is his age. His letter points up the problem but I do not think it points up the answer and I do not think it necessarily points to the bill that we are discussing.

This writer says that age is never given to him as the real reason for not employing him. He says he receives these other reasons which are varied, but employers never come up with the statement that it is really his age which is causing the difficulty. In such a situation the provisions of Bill No. C-25 would not help very much, because it would still remain possible for an employer to use the same reasons that he is using now and never mention age. To this extent I am not sure that the bill would actually accomplish the purpose the hon. member has in mind.

When I was looking up my notes on this bill in anticipation of speaking I went through a file I have of people who write to me looking for employment. I am not going to quote those letters directly but I have extracted statements from them over a period of the last two years which illustrate this particular problem. One letter says, "Everywhere I go I am told I am too old". Then, in brackets he says, " I am 56 years old". Another letter says, "At my age, 52, positions are hard to obtain". Another letter contains this sentence, "I am 57 years old and have still got six children to support, some of which are still going to school. Now, at 57 years old, I find it very hard to get work". In another letter dated July of last year I find this sentence, "Now, what am I to do at 54 years old to find a job?" These are four extracts that I took from those letters. I do not receive a great many letters asking for employment, but from that number I managed to select four letters, the writers of which definitely stated their real problem was age and nothing else.

Mr. Howard: May I interrupt on a point of order. I understand that when referring to letters it is the practice to identify their source. I wonder whether the hon. member is going to do that?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member was to quote from a letter the point might be taken, but as I understood the reference it was to the letters and their contents in general terms.

Mr. Howard: I understood that the hon. member who has the floor was reading a letter; although I may be mistaken.

Mr. Aiken: In introducing these particular comments I said they were comments taken from correspondence and indicated the type of letter I had received. I did not purport to quote any particular person or letter but I did take the odd extract out of letters which referred particularly to the problem of age.

As I said in the beginning, the idea is good; the problem is real. I am hopeful that we can come to some conclusion on what can be done to assist older workers. A great many studies have been undertaken and all of them do agree that the problem is there and that the older worker is much more efficient and able to carry on a job than the general public believe. Thank you.

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on this bill I find myself in substantial agreement with what has just been said by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. I was rather surprised at the introductory remarks of the mover of the bill, the hon. member for Skeena, but he did not deal with one of the aspects raised by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, namely we all recognize that the subject matter of the bill presents a problem. The hon. member for Skeena did not deal at any length with how he felt this particular bill would overcome the problem.

Mr. Howard: I will do that when I close the debate.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should think that would be the first consideration we should want to have before us. Before we undertook to enact any such measure we should want to be sure that it was going to have the desired effect. It seems a rather odd time to do it at the end of the debate when hon. members would not have the benefit of the views of the hon. member for Skeena on the subject.

It does seem to me that this bill not only would not overcome the problem with which we have to deal but in fact it perhaps might raise a lot of other problems. For instance, many firms have a pension plan which, as has been pointed out, is designed to provide a man with a retirement income on which he may retire at age 65. As I see it, under the terms of this bill, if a company had a pension plan of that nature and expected its employees to retire at age 65, then that would be discriminatory if the employee declined to resign at 65. He would perhaps feel within his rights to stay there until he was 85 or so long as he was able to work. That aspect of the matter would certainly have to be taken into consideration.

Then again, I think a firm would have many legitimate reasons for wanting a person of a certain age for a particular job. In the explanatory note of this bill I see that the mover has said:

> The chief purpose of this bill is to add age discrimination to the list of prohibited employment practices unless age is a bona fide occupational qualification.

I do not know exactly what the definition of a bona fide occupational qualification would be.

Then, the hon. member goes on to say:

> A secondary purpose is to prohibit the employer from including in an employment application form, advertisement or written or oral inquiry, a question or request for particulars as to the applicant's —race, national origin, colour, religion or age unless by reason of a bona fide occupational qualification.

It seems to me that a firm would have to take into consideration the average age of its staff. For instance, in the case of a small firm, it might have a small office staff of half a dozen employees, three or four of whom may be getting on toward retirement age. Of course, if that firm was looking to the future it certainly would not want to hire another person who was getting on toward retirement age; it would be looking for someone who would be with the firm for a number of years and would then have the training to carry on. It seems to me that in a case of that kind a firm would have a legitimate reason. Whether it would come within the terms of a bona fide occupational qualification, I do not know. It certainly would not be a good idea if that could be said to be a bona fide occupational qualification. An older person could very well do the job and therefore it could hardly be said to be a bona fide occupational qualification.

For that reason I believe that this particular amendment to prevent discrimination against older workers, with the principle of which I agree, would not in fact overcome the problem. I believe that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) has already taken some very constructive action with regard to the matter. I know that about two years ago I received at my office in my firm in Vancouver a letter sent out by the Minister of Labour in which he drew the attention of many thousands of employers across the country to the problem. I have a copy here and I believe it had a very good effect on firms. As a result of this letter and other actions he has taken, such as setting up a small group under the civilian rehabilitation branch of the Department of Labour to deal with this specific subject, in my opinion he has done a great deal to help to alleviate the situation.

There have been reports that employers have paid attention to the requests of the Department of Labour to try to take some measures to overcome the problem. I notice it is reported that several employers have initiated special savings plans by payroll deduction for new employees who may be too old to enter a pension plan. That was one of the difficulties, and if that scheme could be expanded it would, of course, do a great deal to overcome the problem.

A number of publications have been issued by the Department of Labour and other branches of the government, and I think it might be a good idea to put some of them on the record so that people who are interested in the subject will be able to look at some of the information that has been collected. The following publications have been made available from 1957 to the present time: Pension Plans and the Employment of Older Workers, 1957, sponsored by the interdepartmental committee on older workers and published by the Department of Labour; Research on the Problem of the Employment of the Older Worker, 1958, by Professor S. D. Clark, University of Toronto, sponsored and published by the economics and research branch, Department of Labour; The Aging Worker in the Canadian Economy, 1959, published by the economics and research branch, Department of Labour; Age and Performance in Retail Trade, 1959, published by the economics and research branch, Department of Labour; The Employability of the Older Worker, 1959, by Professor S. D. Clark, University of Toronto, sponsored and published by the economics and research branch, Department of Labour.

There are others here but I think that is a pretty good list for anyone who is interested in the subject. As I said at the commencement of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, while I am certainly not unsympathetic to the stated purpose of the bill which is to prevent discrimination against older workers, I am in no way convinced that the bill will do anything in that regard at all. In fact, I feel very strongly that not only will it not end any problems but it will raise many new ones.

As was so very well pointed out by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), there are very few instances where a man is told that he is being rejected on account of his age, and it would be most difficult to prove discrimination in that regard. Therefore I think the approach that the Minister of Labour has taken and the very active educational campaign he has carried on are a much more satisfactory solution, and I believe that if all members get behind the minister's program and support him in his efforts to try to encourage employers throughout the country to employ older workers we will be doing a more constructive job than we would by passing this bill.

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to say a few words with respect to this private member's bill and in commencing my remarks I want to say that, like most hon. members, I am in agreement with the principle of the bill. However, I have reservations as to whether or not Bill No. C-25 would be effective in practice.

Hon. members well realize that in 1953 parliament passed the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. Section 4 of that act sets out certain employment practices that are prohibited including discrimination on the ground of race, national origin, colour or religion. This bill attempts to add the word "age" to the prohibitions. I am wondering what would be the effect of adding "age" to this section. Would it mean that certain employers, as stated by a previous speaker, would be obligated to continue employees in employment regardless of whether they had reached age 65 or the pensionable age? I suggest in any case that the bill before us would certainly need further amendment to remove that factor.

Another thing that concerns me is whether or not the words "occupational qualification" should be defined in the bill. Everyone has a general idea of the meaning but as the main act covers such a variety of occupations including working on railways, canals, aerodromes, air transportation, banking, broadcasting and practically every type of national employment it would require a huge list of regulations to set out the various occupational qualifications for each particular type of employment which would be affected by the main act. Consequently it would be most difficult, if not impossible, for the director to formulate regulations.

I think the only way to overcome the problem that Canada faces with reference to the plight of people in middle age who become unemployed is for the government and industry to conduct an educational program in a more strenuous manner. The last speaker mentioned certain publications issued by the Department of Labour. I hope the department will continue the distribution of this literature and will accelerate its efforts in that regard. I understand that the radio labour program, "Canada at Work", has mentioned this subject on many broadcasts and I commend the program for doing so. However, education of the people is not going to solve the problem. I suggest that more action on the part of the federal government might be welcomed at this time.

I might mention, for example, the Department of National Defence. All of us have constituents and friends in the permanent forces. Too many of them are compelled to retire on pension at ages when they are still capable of performing adequate service to the crown. I do not suggest that a man in the infantry who is on active training in peacetime can continue to give good service as an officer, non-commissioned officer or other rank beyond the age of 50 but surely it should be possible for the defence department to absorb some of these people in work where less strenuous exercise is involved and to keep them so employed.

At the present time large numbers of military people are retired daily, and a great many of them are entitled to veterans' preference because they stayed in the forces after the end of hostilities. Although national defence no longer employs them, under the Civil Service Act they are entitled to preference if they served overseas and the civil service commission has no choice but to offer them further employment in the government service. In many instances, civil servant applicants who are well qualified are displaced. I make this suggestion to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) because I think it is very closely related to the problem of the older worker today.

Another step which perhaps might correct the situation better than this bill would be the introduction by industry, with government assistance and co-operation, of what are known as portable pensions. I am quite certain, Mr. Speaker, that portable pensions would play a part in solving the occupational problems of people who are unemployed at age 45 and over.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I am in agreement with the principle of this bill. However, I do not see how it would be possible to properly police the measure, and if laws cannot be enforced they should not be put on the statute books. To reiterate what I have just said, I feel that the government should take a close and serious look at the problems created by early retirement from the Department of National Defence. If necessary, perhaps the government should also give serious consideration to the plight of people over 40 who are unemployed because of the fact their jobs have disappeared as a result of automation. It might be possible to give some sort of statutory preference to these citizens who could be trained under the vocational training scheme to take up occupations which would lead to employment with the government.

I want to commend the hon. member for introducing this bill because it gives parliament an opportunity to discuss this serious problem, a problem for which every elected representative in all levels of government has a responsibility in order that this social injustice will be eliminated once and for all in Canada.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I, like the previous speakers, am in favour of the principle of the bill. I will try to point out what I feel to be the intent of the sponsor of this bill, and the fact that I believe he would have been better advised to introduce a separate bill instead of amending the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. I am in agreement with the thoughts which have been expressed that the government might do more with regard to their own advertising for recruits for the civil service. If they were to put in big letters the information that no age qualifications are necessary for the job, that might help. If ages are ever requested, candidates should only be asked whether they are over 18 and under 65.

I believe other speakers have pointed out that the Department of Labour and the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) have conducted intensive campaigns to educate industry to the advantages of employing older workers. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) mentioned certain of the objections to employing older workers. It has been shown that these are really prejudices which have no foundation in fact. The older worker can be quite as productive as the younger worker because in our industry today we are machine operators rather than pick and shovel operators. There would be less rather than more absenteeism because the older workers are more dependable. In many cases, the older worker is the best bet for the employer.

In considering this proposal to amend the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, our attention should be directed to the nature and purposes of the existing legislation which forbids refusal of employment to a person because of his race, national origin, colour or religion. In endorsing the democratic principle of equality of opportunity in employment, the law prevents denial of the essential oneness of the human family in respect of the right of the individual to seek and find work. The question arising from the proposed amendment is whether or not it should be added as an additional factor to these factors which, by law, are eliminated as obstacles to employment. This proposal is, therefore, timely because it reminds us that there is discrimination in regard to age. I feel, however, that an amendment to the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act does not accomplish our purpose of eliminating this particular discrimination.

It is relatively easy to determine whether there is discrimination with regard to race, national origin, colour or religion. It is not so easy, in fact it would be almost impossible under certain circumstances, to determine whether there is discrimination because of age. For example, if a man of 45 is hired, is another applicant of 46 being discriminated against? Age is a common factor; it is common to everyone. As this act now stands on the statute books, it prevents discrimination because of factors which can be readily determined. In the present act the basis of the legislative provisions relates to race, national origin, colour and religion. Equal employment opportunities for the members of minority racial or religious groups is quite a different consideration from safeguarding the employment opportunities of age groups.

[Mr. Broome (Vancouver South).]

If it is the intention of this amendment to protect the older worker, it fails in its purpose because there is nothing in it which restricts the protection to the older worker. As the proposal now stands, a young person could complain and dislodge an older person from employment, regardless of other practical or economic considerations. There is only one clause in this bill, and if this amendment were to carry it would add age to the other grounds upon which discrimination should not be practised. The clause, in part, would say that there shall be no discrimination because of race, national origin, colour, religion or age unless age is a bona fide occupational qualification. In my opinion, this weakens the principle of the bill as it now exists. Therefore I say that it would be much better if the hon. member for Skeena would not try to accomplish his purpose by amending this present statute and that he should rather bring in a bill which would cover discrimination with regard to age and which might bring in other points such as the portability of pensions or other factors which discriminate against the employment of older people. There is already in Canada and in many other countries of the world legislation which permits distinctions in work in relation to age particularly in connection with night work and underground work which is prohibited for minors. It would appear that there is discrimination on the basis of age, and age being the general and universal factor it is, one must secure a method other than that which is proposed in order to eliminate this discrimination.

There is in Canada, as well as in some other countries, an active program through such agencies as the national employment service encouraging employers to employ the older worker. Education and encouragement would appear to be by far the better way of dealing with the problem rather than through legislation unless that legislation can be so worded as to make it clear cut and not subject to wrong interpretation.

It might be interesting, Mr. Speaker, to look at the experience of other countries and even other provinces of Canada with regard to legislation dealing with discrimination. The I.L.O. committee on discrimination in the field of employment and occupation in 1957 considered this question of discrimination because of age. A vote on the inclusion of age as a basis was rejected by a vote of 109 to 206 with 67 abstentions. In Canada, none of those provinces with fair employment practices legislation includes age as a basis for discrimination. To the knowledge of the Department of Labour, no country in the world has positive legislation at the national level which makes age a basis for discrimination in fair employment practices legislation.

I understand that in the United States there are some 10 states which have on their statute books legislation relating to the employment of older workers. In six of these states such a provision is included in the state's fair employment practices act. Here is an interesting point. How do these states define age? Massachusetts defines age as from 45 to 65; Pennsylvania defines age as between 40 and 62; the Connecticut and Wisconsin acts refer to persons 40 and 65 and the Oregon act to those between 25 and 65. Rhode Island's prohibition is in a separate act which defines age to mean between 45 and 65.

From the references I have given I think it will be clear to all hon. members and, I hope, to the sponsor of the bill, that discrimination with regard to age is something that is almost impossible to define by statute. It is like trying to bring in legislation to outlaw evil. That is not to say that we should not try to do something about this matter. However, I believe the methods now being used—I refer to the method of education; the method of persuasion now being used by the Department of Labour; the letters from the minister mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway—will have gradually better and more beneficial results.

I think it is rather difficult for members of parliament, so many of whom are professional people whose highest earnings may start at age 60, to understand the plight of the worker who, through the closure of a plant or through technological changes, is thrown out of a job after the age of 45. These men in many cases are not even given the benefit of an interview. They are rejected on the basis of age. This is not right. It is not even good management on the part of the managers of industrial enterprises to take this stand. Therefore, as I say, the idea of this bill is good, but it should be in the form of a separate bill. Therefore, although I am not talking out this bill, I now move the adjournment of this debate.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McCleave: Will the house leader inform the house of the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: I should like to make a motion. I move, seconded by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois):

Business of the House

That on Saturday, May 6, 1961, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the session the order of business and procedure shall be as for Thursday, a government day.

Mr. Howard: You would even steal that extra hour away.

Mr. Speaker: Has the house leader leave to revert to motions?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, in our opinion he has neither leave to revert to motions nor leave to make the motion which he is now making and, if I am allowed to do so, I will give the reasons why. We attempted to submit to the government, when this matter was under consideration at an earlier date, a program which we thought was a reasonable one. But we were forced by the government to sit on Saturdays. Now, without the consent of the house, the house leader is making this motion. Under no consideration will the opposition consent to that motion being made now.

Mr. Churchill: There was no forcing on the part of the government. The suggestion with regard to sitting on Saturday was agreed to by the house. Lack of agreement to this motion does not prevent the sitting of the house on Saturday in accordance with the motion passed by the house and recorded in Votes and Proceedings for Monday, April 24, at page 468.

Mr. Chevrier: The house rules are quite clear to the effect that the house cannot sit on Saturday unless there is a motion similar to the one which the house leader has made. I, on behalf of the opposition, am not consenting to that motion not only because of what I have said but also because of the statement put on the record by the Prime Minister at page 3928 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The house leader has submitted a motion which, in my view, could not be made at this stage in our proceedings and perhaps could not be made in any event without notice or unanimous consent of the house. In order to found a motion at this stage, I think unanimous consent to revert to motions would be the first step. Without that consent, which I take it is not available, I am sorry to say that I cannot entertain the motion. Unless there is some discussion of the business for tomorrow I shall announce the adjournment of the house.

It being three minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

TRAVELLING EXPENSES, THE MINISTRY

Question No. 207—Mr. Regier:

What were the travelling expenses paid for by the government in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, for each of the ministers of the federal cabinet?

HOUSE CONSTRUCTION, JACKPINE RIDGE, MAN.

Question No. 209—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Does the government intend to build houses at the radar station on Jackpine Ridge between Fairford and St. Martin, Manitoba?

2. If so, how many houses will be built, and have tenders been called for their construction?

3. If tenders have been called, have any contracts been let, and, if so, to whom?

4. On what date is construction expected to start on this project?

5. Are any commercial buildings to be built at this site?

6. If so, have tenders been called, and for what buildings?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes.

2. It is planned to construct 90 transportable type housing units for this site but tenders have not yet been called for the construction of these units.

3. Answered by 2.

4. It is expected that tenders will be called by Defence Construction Limited for the construction of these houses in the fall of 1961. However, tenders have already been called for the installation of the foundations and services for these units. The closing date of this tender call is May 19, 1961.

5. No.

6. Not applicable.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

279. Departmental administration including Canada's share of the expenses of the "resources for tomorrow" conference, $1,105,390.

280. Northern co-ordination and research including a grant of $10,000 to the Arctic institute of North America, and an amount of $5,000 for grants in aid of northern research subject to approval by the treasury board, $141,450.

281. Contributions to the provinces, pursuant to agreements entered into with the approval of the governor in council, by Canada with the provinces, of amounts equal to one half of the amounts confirmed by the provinces as having been spent by them for campground and picnic area developments, $1,700,000.

282. Contributions to the provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources in accordance with agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces, $12,000,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, May 6, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR TODAY'S SITTING

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which relates to today's order paper. The order paper contains nothing definite beyond routine proceedings. Because of the failure of the government to have any sense of responsibility as to what it was doing in this regard I think we should have an order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the matter is one for the house to consider but not as a question of privilege.

Mr. Howard: Then, Mr. Speaker, based on a question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It will have to be considered in its proper time and place.

On the order: Motions.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I should like at this stage to suggest that we determine now the order of business for this day.

The situation is as follows. On April 24 the house determined to sit on Saturdays. According to the custom and practice of the house it is normal, either at the time Saturday is selected as an extra sitting day or subsequently, to present a motion setting forth the routine of business for that day. I suggested at six o'clock last night that the order of business and procedure be as for Thursday, a government day, which would have permitted the officials of the house to draw up the order paper with the proper order of business on it. I was under the impression that as the motion was merely a routine one it did not require 48 hours notice, and due to oversight such notice was not given.

When I sought to present the motion yesterday the house was not agreeable to reverting to motions or to accepting the motion I placed before it. However, in view of the fact that the house has determined to sit on Saturday and is now sitting on Saturday, perhaps we could determine by agreement that this shall be a government day with the business and procedure being the same as for Thursday. If the house is agreeable and will give consent I will make the motion now that I put forward last evening, but I should like to be sure that consent is available.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members have noticed, the orders of the day this morning are a complete blank. There is therefore nothing on the order paper and there are no orders of the day. I say without hesitation, as I said last night, that we will not give our consent to the motion which the leader of the house is now making. I gave some reasons last night. I do not intend to go into them now, but we did make a very reasonable proposal to the government when the whole matter of the house sitting in the morning and later at night was discussed on April 24. Although our proposal was a very generous one, it was not accepted. On the other hand, what did take place was that we were faced with the arrogant attitude of the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If hon. members object I certainly will have to call the hon. member for Laurier to order. He has been given the floor to consent or not consent to a motion proposed by the house leader, and all he is entitled to say is that he does or does not consent.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I am entitled to give a further explanation.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Not at this time. The hon. member may have his opportunity to discuss what he wishes to discuss, but the house leader has asked for the consent of the house to make a motion and it is not a debatable matter. It is a question of giving consent or not. I take it that consent is not given; therefore we pass to the next order of business.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, you have allowed the leader of the house to make an explanation of the ridiculous position in which the government finds itself now because it did not give notice of the motion, and I think in fairness to the opposition I should be allowed to make a short, similar statement as to the position in which the government finds itself because it failed to observe the ordinary rules of the house by giving 48 hours' notice of the motion that the minister attempted to make last night and is making now.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will recall the course of events, I have allowed him to make a longer statement than was made by the house leader. Objection is now taken, as it could have been taken at the time the house leader was speaking if any member had so desired. I think the hon. member has been allowed to make a comparable statement, and he should now observe the rules.

Mr. Chevrier: If I am not going to be allowed to proceed further I will abide by Your Honour's wishes, but I repeat that we will not go along with the suggestion of the house leader.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we do not agree with the suggestion of the house leader and the motion he proposes to move respecting the business for today. We are willing to agree to proceed if the order of business is the same as on Friday. This would permit private members who have been nipped in the bud by the process of time to blossom forth on the various resolutions.

STANDING ORDERS

REQUEST FOR LEAVE TO MOVE CONCURRENCE IN TENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. N. L. Spencer (Essex West): I should like, on behalf of the hon. member for York-Humber, to move concurrence in the tenth report of the standing committee on standing orders.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Essex West leave to move a motion in the name of the hon. member for York-Humber?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. lady should be here to move her own motion.

Mr. Speaker: In the absence of consent of the house I would not entertain a motion from the hon. member for Essex West. I refer, in support of that ruling, to citation 188 of Beauchesne's fourth edition and also to Bourinot's fourth edition, page 299, which make it clear that, except in very formal matters, the mover must be present. Another exception, of course, would be on government motions where one minister is allowed to move for another.

Mr. Spencer: May I say this, Mr. Speaker. While I agree with your ruling—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that this matter has been disposed of by the decision of the Chair. Since the hon. member for Laurier was not allowed to proceed, there is no unanimous consent for the hon. gentleman to proceed, either.

An hon. Member: Let the Speaker determine.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Pickersgill: He has.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure as to what the hon. gentleman wishes to proceed with, but I shall bear in mind that there is no consent to proceed with anything.

Mr. Spencer: I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would not deny me the right to bring to the attention of the house the nature of the report in respect of which I have asked leave to move concurrence.

Mr. Speaker: Since I have ruled that the hon. member is not entitled to move concurrence in the report, he is not entitled to speak to it.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF ALLOWANCES AND INCOME CEILINGS, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952, to increase the monthly rates of allowances and permissible income ceilings; to allow for further exemptions in property and income; to modify certain conditions of service eligibility; to allow for administrative and organizational changes within the board and to provide for certain further changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR TODAY'S SITTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Speaker: We have reached orders of the day, and the rules of the house do not determine what the precedence is for the day. I am in the position of not being able to call an order without the direction of the house or resolving the problem which is now raised, since it is my duty to call an order of the day.

If I might indicate the situation, which I think hon. members probably appreciate, may I point out that standing order 15 settles the business of the house. Subsection 2 of standing order 15 settles the daily routine for every day, and we have passed through that procedure. Then it gives the orders of the day. They are settled from Monday to Friday by standing order 15, but no provision is made for Saturday. By order made on Monday, April 24, the house has decided to sit today and every Saturday until the end of the session without specifying the order of business. I refer to Votes and Proceedings for Monday, April 24, page 467, where an order was made for the house to sit on Saturday from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. and from 2.30 p.m. to 6 p.m.

On the order paper, without precedence being assigned to them, are the orders the house has appointed for consideration today and every day, namely government orders, public bills and orders, notices of motions for production of papers, private bills and starred questions. They are printed on the order paper and, as I say, have all been ordered by the house for consideration today or any day the house meets.

The problem that arises, of course, is what the precedence is among these orders. As the order paper indicates, I have not taken the responsibility of determining what precedence should be given to the orders, but have simply caused them to be printed in the order in which they appeared on Friday, the last sitting day.

I raise this matter as a point of order for disposition with the assistance of the house, and I suggest two approaches to the problem. First, as the house has ordered no business for today, and as it has ordered certain hours of sitting, I think the presumption is that the house intends to do some business. I think the question as to the precedence of the business should be resolved in a way which is permissible under the rules. In other words, I think the solution should be one in favour of carrying out the orders of the house in so far as they have been made.

The problem is that the order did not go quite far enough. There are two approaches to this question, and I suggest them for the consideration of the house. One is this. In the absence of any rule, our standing order No. 1 refers us to the procedure of the parliament of the United Kingdom, and hon. members may find some indication by that means. I have made some inquiry on my own initiative, and I refer the house to Campion's "Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons", page 132, which does not go very far but is as follows:

> On Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday the house meets at half past two and adjourns normally at half past ten, or later. (S.O. No. 1). On Friday the corresponding hours are eleven a.m. and half past four p.m. (S.O.s No. 1 and 2). These hours were last fixed by amendments to standing orders made in 1947.
> The house seldom sits on Saturday and only in case of grave emergency on Sunday. Unless otherwise fixed, the hour for meeting on Saturday follows the rule for Friday. There is no prescribed hour for a Sunday sitting.

That does not deal with the business to be done other than by inference.

The other approach is that the house is the master of its own proceedings. In circumstances where direction is necessary, it has the power to deal with procedural problems that arise.

Having said that, I am not disposed to make any decision but to ask for consideration of the point of order which arises. Perhaps I should hear the pro and the con in the usual order, and I will first hear the house leader.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was just on the point of putting a motion before the house, but if you wish first a discussion of the point of order I should like to say this. The house definitely decided that it would sit on this day, and decided it would do so for the purpose of conducting business—

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Carter: Oh, no.

Mr. Churchill: —otherwise it would be simply ridiculous for the house to assemble—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely what it was, ridiculous.

Mr. Churchill: —without an order of business. I think the printing of the order paper could have been somewhat more skilfully done, if I may use that phrase, because the precedents in all the authorities—and they are abundant—with regard to parliamentary procedure indicate that the orders of the day mean the business and procedure of the house.

As you have already pointed out, Mr. Speaker, the business before the house consists of government orders, public bills and orders and various items such as that and, I would have thought, should normally have followed just after that established heading "Orders of the Day", which simply means the proceedings or the business that is before the house.

It is obvious that the house is here for a definite purpose. If hon. members would look at the discussion on April 24 they will see it was decided that Saturday be a day for parliament to sit for the express purpose, as was expressed during the course of that debate, to conclude the business of the house—by that we meant the legislation and the estimates—as quickly as reasonably possible, because I doubt whether any hon. member of the house wishes to sit through July and August. Consequently Saturday was added as a sitting day in addition to the extension of the sitting hours.

As you have pointed out, Mr. Speaker, we have simply to determine what business shall be taken up of the multitude of matters on the order paper. It is within the competence of the house to determine that. As a matter of fact I would be inclined to go so far as to say it is within the competence of the Speaker to determine that, if authorities which I have been looking at are considered. However, perhaps there is not time to go into some of those problems here today.

It is quite obvious that the house, which is master of its own actions and procedure, can at this stage determine what business it shall go on with. I am in a position to make a motion to this effect.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister would permit me to interrupt in order that the matter under discussion may be determined. As the minister has indicated that he proposes to initiate a motion, I invite him to move his motion. The order of the motion can then be discussed by the house and the matter determined in that way.

Mr. Churchill: I therefore move, seconded by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness):

That the house do now proceed to government orders.

Mr. Speaker: Before putting this motion before the house I will, of course, hear hon. members. As the hon. minister, who moves the motion, was dealing with the point of order generally, perhaps he would conclude and then I shall hear other hon. members.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order may I be allowed first of all—

An hon. Member: On the motion.

Mr. Chevrier: No, there is a point of order that has arisen, and I think I am entitled to speak on the point of order and then on the motion, and unless I am interrupted by Your Honour I propose to do both.

Mr. Speaker: This first point of order is whether this motion is acceptable. Perhaps the hon. member should first address himself to that, and if other points which I indicated might arise follow, they can be discussed in sequence.

Mr. Chevrier: Then I ask to be heard, sir, on the point of order. It arises out of the situation in which the government has allowed itself to be placed. Your Honour has been good enough to suggest that under standing order No. 1 a reference is made to the British parliament when nothing is contained in our rules to cover a situation such as this. Your Honour has been good enough to refer to Campion, but I think Your Honour has also stated there is nothing there which could enlighten us.

Your Honour has also said that the house is master of its own proceedings. That is true, but I submit it is master of its own proceedings within and in accordance with the rules of the house only. The house leader has said that the house decided on an earlier occasion that it would sit this day for the purpose of conducting business. I challenge that statement. The house made no such decision. The house simply made the decision on April 24 that it would sit on Saturdays, without determining, as it should have been determined on that occasion, what the business would be on Saturday, as it has been the custom of the house to determine in the past, namely by making the motion which the house leader attempted to make last night, and by saying that standing order No. 56 (1) is suspended in relation thereto.

The house leader has said that the printing has not been too skilfully done. Well, the printing was done in accordance with the decision of the house. If the motion made last night by the house leader had passed, of course the orders of the day would have contained what we now find on page 4. The printing could not have been other than it is now. It has been stated that the business should be as it now appears at page 4. I cannot agree with that statement, because page 4 does not come into effect until the required rules of the house have been complied with.

Finally, the house leader has said this matter is within the competence of the Speaker. I say to you respectfully, and I am sure you, sir, are of the same view, that the Speaker, while he interprets the rules of the house, is also himself bound by and subject to the rules of the house. He is the one who applies the rules, and in applying the rules he must make sure that in a motion such as this, 48 hours' notice is given. Otherwise the rights of the members of parliament will have been interfered with.

That 48 hours' notice was not given last night and it cannot be given until next week. It cannot be given with reference to the motion which is now before Your Honour; therefore the rules have not been complied with. So it would seem to us that the government, and particularly the Prime Minister by his partisan tactics on April 24, by his refusal to entertain a generous offer of cooperation from this side of the house and by his lack of knowledge of the rules of the house, has made a farce of our proceedings today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, I think I should check the hon. member to indicate that we are debating a point of order, and that does not give an opportunity for the usual type of debate. The only matter that is relevant on the discussion of a point of order is the technical point itself.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I pass on on then to another point and it is this. There is nothing before the house. How can you, as the Speaker of the house, entertain any motion at this time. Last night the house leader at least asked that we revert to motions. He did not get consent and Your Honour refused to entertain his motion. I say the position is the same this morning.

An hon. Member: It is not.

Mr. Chevrier: He has not asked for unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions. Therefore I submit to you with deference that Your Honour is not competent to receive a motion of this nature at this time. In fact it is too late now for that purpose because we have gone beyond the time when motions are called.

Need I recall to Your Honour the decision which was made on May 2 when the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) moved in this house, in accordance with notice he gave orally, that the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance and the statement of accounts for the year 1960 be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce for study. Your Honour ruled on that occasion that could not be done, and Your Honour gave quite a lengthy decision after having gone into this matter very carefully. If the hon. member for Essex East was not allowed, because of the rules of the house, to move that motion, as was the case on that occasion, surely the minister is in no better position. In fact the minister is in a far worse position than was the hon. member for Essex East, because at least the hon. member for Essex East had given notice.

I say in conclusion that the motion of the hon. gentleman falls to the ground on three points; first, because 48 hours' notice has not been given; second, because there is nothing before the house, and Your Honour cannot entertain it; and finally because, in order for Your Honour to entertain it, which I submit Your Honour is not competent to do, leave should have been asked to revert to motions. It is now too late for that.

My friend the hon. member for Ottawa West also informs me that the Prime Minister gave an undertaking on April 24 in connection with the business, so that on that further count the motion of the house leader falls to the ground. I submit with deference to Your Honour that Your Honour cannot even entertain it at this time.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this group approaches this question strictly from an objective and non-partisan point of view. We deny the validity or the right of the minister to move the motion on the same grounds as explained at some length by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and I am not going to take the time of the house to repeat them. I have stated our position. We are willing to sit today if today is considered as a Friday. We think that is a fair arrangement. It means some concession on the part of the government, but we are willing to do that because we think it is a fair compromise, and if there is a spirit of co-operation we think it will meet the situation.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the key to the resolution of the point of order which has been raised lies in what you said prior to the introduction of the motion by my colleague the house leader. In the first place the house has already decided that it should sit today, and we are engaged now in sitting pursuant to an order of the house. In the second place, the house has made an extensive series of orders appointing for the consideration of the house today those various matters appearing on the order paper at pages 4 to 10 and following. There can be no question but that the house has appointed for consideration today every one of these items of business.

In the face of these two firm decisions of the house, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the matter is completely covered by the decisions made. The only question before the house at this moment, therefore, is to determine the order or the sequence in which these various matters appointed for hearing today should be taken up. This point does not appear to be seriously questioned by the hon. member for Laurier, but he raises two points, and may I deal with them.

First of all he says that we are not now on the item of motions on page 2 of the order paper, and therefore the house is not in a position to make a decision, or to entertain any resolution, with respect to the sequence in which the various matters appointed for consideration today should be proceeded with. If that position were given effect it would reduce the house to a nullity and impotence.

Mr. McIlraith: That is what you are doing.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is actually what you did.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are here pursuant to a decision of the house. We have before us not one or two matters but many matters appointed for consideration today. There can be no escape from that decision; and the house, to give effect to its own decision, which must be the intent of parliament at all times, must then decide simply the sequence in which these measures shall be taken up. That is what the motion introduced by my colleague the house leader purports to do. It does that and no more than that, and it does it, Mr. Speaker, in necessary pursuance and in necessary fulfilment of the decisions taken by this house.

The other point raised by the hon. member for Laurier concerns the fact that 48 hours' notice has not been given. He says in effect that this matter was introduced last night and was not permitted to be proceeded with partly because at that time there was no agreement to revert to motions and partly because 48 hours' notice was not given. I think I have dealt with the first matter, Mr. Speaker, but I draw attention to the fact that the motion now submitted to the house is not the same motion as was put before the house last night.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question. Does he now maintain that the motion before the house, or about to be put, is one which does not require 48 hours' notice?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, I am coming to that. Without dealing with the point or giving ground to the hon. member on the question of not giving 48 hours' notice of the motion which was put before the house at six o'clock last night, the fact is that in the situation we find ourselves now the motion offered by my colleague the house leader does not require 48 hours' notice, because it is a routine proceeding designed to give effect to the decisions of the house with respect to the business of today. That business has already been determined by the house.

As to what shall come before the house—

Mr. Chevrier: No, it has not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —we have all these matters of business before us, and the only question requiring decision by the house at this moment is the selection of the particular matter to be taken first. It is simply a question of the sequence in which the business appointed for this day shall be taken up; it is not a question of introducing into today's proceedings questions which have not already been appointed for hearing today. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say the motion now before the house is not such a motion as requires 48 hours' notice. It is a routine proceeding simply related to the order in which business appointed for this day shall be taken up.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there are two matters that I think call for comment. I will not follow the hon. member for Laurier in his debating comments; I do not think they were proper to be raised on the discussion of the point of order, and I shall confine myself to the discussion of the point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: That will be new.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But I do take up the reference made by, I think it was, the hon. member for Ottawa West, or the hon. member for Laurier, that the Prime Minister had given some undertaking in regard to the business to be brought before the house today. On the occasion in question, namely the debate on April 24, 1961, the Prime Minister did make certain suggestions in regard to the business of the day. He indicated that if the house were prepared to agree it could be made a matter of consent that on Saturdays the house should consider supply.

Mr. McIlraith: Another commitment that means nothing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The remarks of the Prime Minister are to be found at page 3928 of Hansard. It is perfectly clear that the Prime Minister's remarks do not bear the interpretation put upon them by the hon. member for Ottawa West, and it was not an undertaking at all; it was a proposal. You will see, Mr. Speaker, at page 3928 of Hansard, first column, the Prime Minister said:

> Let me go on from there. I think Saturdays could well be set aside, if the house agrees, for dealing with the supply of various departments.

Mr. Chevrier: Why don't you read it all?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He spoke about the spirit of co-operation shown by the members of the opposition, and then he said:

> I would not want to see controversial matters dealt with on Saturdays because I would want to be assured that as many hon. members as possible would be present, not only from the opposition but on the government side. In any event, I think we could get together when controversial matters are to be discussed.

That was the tone in which the Prime Minister spoke. He was proposing that the house should agree that on Saturdays business might be confined to committee of supply; but the house has not reached such an agreement. We on our part are prepared to renew that proposal if it should meet with the approval of the house.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, concerning the suggestion offered by the hon. member for Kootenay West that the house should follow the order of business as on a Friday, this would be entirely acceptable to the government. Perhaps it might commend itself to the official opposition, but that would be—

Mr. Chevrier: No, sir; entirely unacceptable.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —for them to say. I think we have shown that we have business to do, important business of the country to be transacted. Surely it is the wish of hon.

members not to make a nullity out of today's proceeding, but to make effective use of this day for the discharge of important and essential public business.

What could be the result, Mr. Speaker? It does not mean that the business will not be done; it simply means that if hon. members opposite were correct the house, although it has met pursuant to its own decision and although it has much business before it pursuant to a number of its own decisions, would, in their view, be under obligation now to disperse without doing any of that business it has met here to transact. The result then would be that this time would be wasted after we have met, after we are here and ready to proceed with the business, and that the session would extend one day longer, whenever that may be, July, August or whenever it may be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, surely we are all serious persons in this house. We are here to transact the business of parliament on behalf of the country, and surely that business appointed to be heard today, no one being taken by surprise as to that business, will commend itself to all hon. members who have an equal sense of responsibility in relation to the discharge of the country's business. Our duty now is to proceed with the business that has been appointed for this day.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with all the points that have been raised by the Minister of Finance. First of all, the minister argues that the business for today under orders of the day had already been appointed by the house. If that contention is correct, any motion to this effect would be completely superfluous. In this parliament, including this session, we have sat for many days, and never before on orders of the day has it been necessary to make any motion in order to get on with the business of the house. If the house, as the minister contended, had set down the business for today, Your Honour and the officials of the house would have indicated it on the order paper. The fact that you did not indicate it on the order paper is itself the completest evidence of the fallacy of the minister's argument. The business would be there and there could be no question of any motion being required. Therefore it seems to me that the Minister of Finance has completely demolished the very argument he set out to support.

The minister went on to take exception to the important technical points raised by the opposition, even though we were met with technical points when we offered co-operation on the 24th of April. I refer to the technical point that there must be 48 hours' notice, the technical point that the time for moving a motion has now passed and that the Minister of Veterans Affairs did not attempt to move this motion at that time. There is no provision anywhere in our rules for moving any kind of motion when we have reached orders of the day. Therefore it seems to me that since there is no such provision and, as Your Honour has said, though the house is master of its procedure, it could not be done without unanimous consent, as has always been recognized in cases of this sort where an exception is required or desired to be made.

The Minister of Finance has also said that various orders of the house have been made at different times for the business to be carried on today. That, sir, is to render a nullity a solemn assurance or what we took to be a solemn assurance by the Prime Minister. Perhaps Your Honour will think we were very foolish to take any undertaking by the Prime Minister as an assurance—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): On a point of order—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am speaking on the point of order.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is speaking on the point of order.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Surely he has no business making a direct attack on the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: I have already indicated that the matter that is relevant to the discussion is the technical problem of procedure and not the conduct of hon. members, and I think the hon. member should bear that in mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to read the words that the Prime Minister used on Monday, April 24, with respect to the sittings on Saturdays. The Prime Minister said—

An hon. Member: What page?

Mr. Pickersgill: Page 3928, the same page from which the Minister of Finance read and to which he failed to give the reference when the hon. member for Ottawa West asked for it. I am going to read rather more than the Minister of Finance read. The Prime Minister said:

> Let me go on from there. They pose today—
> The members on this side of the house.
> —as lovers of parliament. I think Saturdays could well be set aside, if the house agrees, for dealing with the supply of various departments. There will be that fine spirit of co-operation of which hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken. On Saturdays various departments could be dealt with. I would not want to see controversial measures dealt with on Saturdays—

I emphasize that. The Prime Minister said:

I would not want to see controversial measures dealt with on Saturdays—

The business under government orders is controversial, sir, and the business under government orders was not announced for today. In fact the house leader, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, announced several times that what we would be taking up today would be supply, and the hon. members surely were entitled to rely both on the assurance of the Prime Minister and the secondary assurance of the house leader that supply would be taken today.

Many hon. members had made other business engagements before they knew the house was going to sit this Saturday, and they are not here to take part in the debates. If we are to have any spirit of confidence, any reliance at all, any possibility of carrying on our procedure in a proper way, surely we should be able to rely on the undertaking of the Prime Minister when he said:

I would not want to see controversial measures dealt with on Saturdays—

I go on to give the rest of it.

—because I would want to be assured that as many hon. members as possible would be present, not only from the opposition but on the government side.

That is an undertaking, Mr. Speaker. Of course the Minister of Finance said it was not an undertaking, but we regarded it as an undertaking that what would be called on Saturdays would be supply.

Mr. Aiken: That is what he is trying to do.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will come to that. If the hon. member can just possess his soul in patience, I will come to that point too.

Mr. Aiken: You are arguing against your own case.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister went on to say:

In any event, I think we could get together when controversial matters are to be discussed.

So far as I know, no attempt whatever has been made from the government side to do that.

I think a step forward has been made today in this regard.

That is what the Prime Minister said, but apparently it was not a step. It was not even a half step; it was just another "boob".

On Saturdays we could deal with supply in respect of which, by agreement among the leader of the government in the house, the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Kootenay West, they would have no difficulty in getting together and reaching the fullest agreement.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

To the best of my knowledge no attempt was made to do that.

These matters could be discussed on Saturday without in any way depreciating the opportunity of the opposition, including the hon. member for Essex East . . . to fully discuss matters as they arise.

It seems to me, sir, that when you take that statement of the Prime Minister and the announcements made repeatedly this week by the house leader that supply would be taken today, it would certainly be a breach of good faith for the government to attempt to enter upon anything except supply today. It seems to me that not only would it be a breach of good faith, but there is a clear indication that the house did not consciously appoint these orders for consideration on Saturday. They appointed them for consideration on ordinary sitting days, and the specific exception made by the Prime Minister as the real leader of the house, as an officer of the house, should be sacred.

With respect to the question of supply, I might point out to Your Honour that there are important precedents in 1917 and 1918 with which Your Honour is familiar, and into which I do not intend to go unless it seems to be necessary. But I would point out that for the house to attempt to go into supply today without question put, as suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay West, would be an abridgement of the most ancient right of parliament, the right to express grievances before entering into supply.

If, as was done last year when we sat on Saturdays—and I have the reference here—a motion had been made specifically providing that the rules should be the same as on Thursdays, and the house had agreed to that, we could complain but we could take no exception; it would be the rule of the house. But for the government to attempt today without question put to have the Speaker leave the chair without putting the question would be an attack upon the most ancient and fundamental right of parliament, the right to express grievances before entering upon supply.

Therefore I contend that, because of the ignorance of the rules exhibited by hon. gentlemen opposite, their carelessness in this matter and their eagerness to score a partisan advantage on April 24, no business whatever has been prescribed for today, and that Your Honour was completely correct in authorizing, as you did, the production of a blank order paper.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, you drew attention to the first rule in our standing orders, which provides as follows:

In all cases not provided for hereafter or by sessional or other orders, the usages and customs of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom . . . as in force at the time shall be followed so far as they may be applicable to this house.

I do not know, sir, whether any changes have been made since this edition of May, but I am quoting from Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, thirteenth edition, which deals with Saturday sittings:

A Saturday sitting may be obtained upon the motion of a minister of the crown, that the house shall sit on that day, or by the appointment of an order of the day, or of other matter of business for an ensuing Saturday, or by a motion made on a Friday, that the house at its rising do adjourn till the morrow. Such sittings are occasionally held subject to the standing orders which regulate the Friday sittings, or to an order that, as soon as government business is concluded, the adjournment of the house shall take place without question put.

On April 24, following a suggestion by the hon. member for Port Arthur, this house decided to sit on Saturday. Everybody in this house so decided. We are bound to come here and sit. For what are we gathered here, as members from different parts of the country, if it is not to do government business? Who is apparently taking advantage of any omission, if there is any omission, but the members of the Liberal party? I say that the procedure which should be followed is regulated by what happens in the United Kingdom parliament.

Mr. Speaker: What is the reference?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Sir Erskine May.

Mr. Speaker: What page?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Page 260. The hon. member for Kootenay West has made what I submit is a very reasonable suggestion, that we follow the procedure laid down for Friday in our rules, which provides for government orders to be considered as the first business. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said that we cannot go into supply, although that is one of the items of busines laid down here amongst government orders. Does the hon. member believe we do not wish to follow the statement made by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Finance said you did not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said that offer still stood.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The Prime Minister made a very elaborate statement which should assure the members of the opposition that we have no intention of introducing anything of a controversial nature. We intend to go on with supply. In addition, the hon. member knows that when a motion for supply is made to take up some new department, that is the time a motion of want of confidence is made and grievances are considered. When we have been discussing a department and there is an item on the order paper, "House again in committee of supply", it is not necessary to put a motion to the house because the house can go into committee of supply without a motion being put.

Mr. Chevrier: The cat is out of the bag now.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I submit that the suggestion which has been made by the hon. member for Kootenay West is one that should apply automatically. The government has the right, ordinarily, when government orders are called to decide the order of business that should be followed. The government has already given a clear indication through the statement of the Prime Minister that we shall go on with supply. I submit therefore, sir, it is in order for us now to proceed to the item, government orders, and to proceed with supply.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a reference, sir, on the precise point.

Mr. Speaker: I do not propose to deal with the question of going into supply, because that is not in issue at this moment. I have allowed discussion on it, and if that question should arise later it can be dealt with later. It does not arise at this time.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): If I may be permitted to speak for a few minutes on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like our position to be very clearly understood. We feel very strongly, sir, that in order to ensure the efficient operation of the House of Commons there must be the strictest possible adherence to the standing orders and customs of the house. A reading of our standing orders, of course, makes it exceptionally clear that if a situation arises in the house which is not covered by our standing orders or customs, then we should refer to and be governed by the standing orders and customs of the mother of parliaments in Great Britain.

It has already been made clear, sir, that our standing orders and customs in this Canadian House of Commons give us no indication as to how to proceed. As you, sir, have rightly pointed out in your quotation, if the United Kingdom parliament sits on a Saturday without any prior order of precedence under standing orders, then automatically the business on Saturday follows the precedence of business on Friday. We submit, therefore, that since under our standing orders there is no order, precedent or custom for a motion such as the house leader has sought to move then you, sir, are faced with two alternatives. Unless there is unanimous consent to accept the motion, which has not yet been accepted, then it cannot be accepted. Second, there being no standing order, custom or precedent for this situation, then according to our standing orders it is your duty to proceed with the business of the house on this Saturday in accordance with the customs and precedents of the United Kingdom parliament, which means we would follow the order of business for Friday.

If these courses are not followed, sir, then we most respectfully submit there is only one motion that can be accepted in this house, namely that we stand adjourned until 11 o'clock on Monday morning. We want to say this. By order of the house we are meeting on Saturday. We are now in session; therefore we sincerely hope, since we are meeting and since there is business to be done, a decision will be made by you, sir, as the authority in this house, that we now proceed in accordance with the customs of the United Kingdom parliament and conduct our business. Failing such a ruling, then, sir, you should accept the motion that we do now adjourn.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like now to address you, sir, on the precise points raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the Solicitor General.

Mr. Aiken: On a point of order—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. Aiken: I should like to raise this, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: You cannot have two points of order at the same time.

Mr. Aiken: I am going to raise the issue of whether the hon. member can speak three or four times to a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's point is not very well taken. It is within the discretion of the Chair to hear such members as the Chair feels might contribute to the solution of the point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I assure Your Honour that I have no intention of introducing any new matter or any new argument whatever. I was merely seeking to draw Your Honour's attention, and the attention of the house, to a question which arose on this precise point on September 17, 1917. A motion was made by the hon. gentleman who was leading the house that there should be sittings on Saturdays and that the rules should be the same as for Friday. Perhaps the motion should be read, Mr. Speaker. The motion that was made at that time was as follows:

[Mr. Winch.]

That on and after Saturday the seventh of July, proximo, and on Saturdays until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon and the order of precedence on Saturdays shall be the same as on Fridays.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Did he not start off by saying that this was taken from the Votes and Proceedings of September 17.

Mr. Pickersgill: September 17, 1917.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Now the hon. member is speaking of the motion made in July, is he not?

Mr. Pickersgill: This was Monday, September 17, 1917.

Mr. Speaker: On Saturday the hon. member for St. John raised a point of order that the order of the house of the 22nd June made upon the motion of the Prime Minister—"That on and after Saturday the seventh of July, proximo, and on Saturdays until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon, and the order of precedence on Saturdays shall be the same as on Fridays"—

On that occasion the Speaker ruled that notwithstanding the language of that order, the rules with respect to Friday did not apply to Saturday.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member let me have the volume from which he was quoting?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): At this time I should like to deal only with the question of the order of business for Saturday where no order of the house is made. While this may be a flimsy hook on which to hang one's hat in the absence of anything else, I draw Your Honour's attention to Beauchesne's fourth edition, page 381, where it deals with forms and formulae with regard to certain motions. Under form No. 36 we find the following:

That on Saturday the ....., and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the Session, the House shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Fridays.

I submit that implicit in that language is the understanding that unless the house orders otherwise the order of precedence for Saturday shall be the same as that on Friday. If I may, I connect this with Your Honour's reference to Campion in the British house, where reference is also made to Friday. In the absence of any other order, Mr. Speaker, I think your ruling should be that the business for today should be carried on as if it were a Friday.

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Speaking to the point of order, may I say that it is a matter of extreme gratification to me this morning that none of my constituents are sitting in the galleries.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is beginning in a vein rather different from a discussion of the point of order. Unless he has some assistance for me I think I had better deal with the matter on the evidence I have already had.

Mr. Brunsden: My point of assistance, Mr. Speaker, if I may humbly state it, is this. A few days ago we debated whether or not we would sit on Saturdays. I personally should prefer not to sit on Saturdays. I should prefer to have Saturdays in my office. However, it was decided to sit on Saturdays. What has happened? We have been here now for one hour and 20 minutes and we have had a spectacle of obstruction—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a reflection on the house.

An hon. Member: That is exactly what it has been.

Mr. Pickersgill: Whose fault is it?

Mr. Speaker: A difficult problem is presented here, as I think hon. members will appreciate, and to it I have been giving my best judgment. I think I have sufficiently cleared my views now, with the assistance of a number of members, and I thank them for the contribution they have made to the solution of the problem. As I say, I think I have cleared my mind sufficiently that I am prepared to rule. Of course the house is free to accept or reject my judgment as it sees fit.

I have come to this conclusion. The house has ordered a sitting today and it has ordered business for today. Therefore it is my duty to interpret the rules in a way which does not lead to a denial of those two orders. To my mind it would be an absurdity to convene and then, because of some error, do no business.

It is not my business to commend or otherwise; I simply am obliged to deal with the situation with which we are faced. Because of a deficiency, shall we say, in the order of the business of the house, a problem arises which calls for a solution that at least makes sense. It seems to me that any solution which left the house suspended, with no business at all to do, would not make sense.

It has been proposed to meet the difficulty by a motion, and I have been concerned to ascertain whether that motion could be entertained. It is not a motion under standing order 41 which requires 48 hours' notice, in my judgment, because it is a motion to order the business of the house. It is not a bill or a resolution that requires 48 hours' notice. It is a motion with respect to the business of the house; it is a motion to make an order of the house, which order can be made without notice. Furthermore, we have not yet entered upon orders of the day, for the good reason that I was not prepared to call an order of the day until I had the advice of the house. We are therefore on routine proceedings, and there are motions relating to the business of the house that can be made on routine proceedings.

The point has been taken that the motion should have been made when motions were being dealt with—and I think it should have been made at that time—rather than after we had passed from motions to government notices of motions. However, if the matter were pressed or considered further I think some ground might be found for entertaining the motion. I therefore do not discard the possibility of a motion without notice on routine proceedings. However, I propose to reject the motion and to deal with the problem that confronts us on the basis of the order paper itself.

We have an order paper which follows the order of Friday. I think some help is to be found in the precedents that were cited from the United Kingdom. I have not had time to investigate them fully, but the citation that was given by the Solicitor General from May's thirteenth edition is carried forward into the sixteenth edition of May at page 321, where it is stated as follows:

> In view of the terms of S. O. No. 3 a sitting on Saturday or Sunday (except in the case of the demise of the crown) can only be secured by a resolution of the house, made normally by a minister of the crown at the commencement of public business. As a sitting on either of these days is not subject to any rules of the house regulating the hours of meeting, interruption, and adjournment, such matters have been provided for in the resolution appointing a Saturday sitting—

That is one way, and that is the way in which we have dealt with the matter here in the past. Then it goes on to state as follows:

> —and such sittings have been held under the limiting conditions formerly applying to Friday sittings—

I suggest to the house that as the house has not appointed the order, the solution of the difficulty is to continue with the order that was last before the house, and that is the order of Friday.

Therefore my ruling is, in accordance with the order paper which has been printed, that the first item appearing on the order paper be called first. I would ask the Clerk to call the first item on the order paper, which is No. 1 under government orders.

INCOME TAX

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND NORWAY FOR THE AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-48, an act to implement a convention between Canada and Norway for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income.—The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Stand.

Order stands.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS

PROVISION FOR FURNISHING FINANCIAL AND OTHER STATISTICS

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-70, an act to provide for the furnishing of financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of corporations and labour unions carrying on activities within Canada.—The Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Stand.

Order stands.

AGRICULTURE

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS RESPECTING MARGINAL LANDS, RURAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES, ETC.

On the order:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Minister of Agriculture for the second reading of Bill C-77, an act to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, or at least to ask for the guidance of the house. We are quite prepared to go ahead now with the legislation referred to in this item, No. 3. On the other hand, if the house prefers to revert to what it was doing yesterday at five o'clock, governed by rule No. 7 under the business being interrupted, and wishes to go on in supply dealing with the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, that is quite agreeable to us.

Mr. Robichaud: That is against the rules.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I reiterate the position which I took earlier. This legislation is certainly in the category of that mentioned by the Prime Minister when he spoke in the debate as reported at page 3928 of Hansard of April 24. In effect the Prime Minister said that nothing contentious would be taken up on Saturdays.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I need not repeat what was said at the time by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the Minister of Finance, or the interjection made by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). Therefore I submit that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. Speaker: It is not really a point of order; it is a matter of decision by the government whether it wishes to proceed with this matter, having regard to the circumstances, or what it should proceed with.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I ask precisely what you said earlier in determining the point of order on the motion which you ruled to be out of order. Would you clarify this point as to the relationship of the decision you made to the business that was before the house on Friday? When I spoke earlier on the point of order I made it quite clear that as far as the government is concerned we are perfectly content to go on with supply today. As the words of the Prime Minister indicated, this was the proposal of the government, that if the house were agreeable and were in committee of supply on Friday, that would be the business with which the government would wish to proceed on Saturday.

That is the position. If the house is agreeable to going into committee of supply on Saturday, that would be the business with which the government would wish to proceed; in other words, item No. 10 on the order paper. However, I gather there is some objection by hon. members opposite. If your ruling is that we should continue with Friday's business, then item No. 10 is the item to be considered.

Mr. Speaker: It is perhaps irregular to advise, because the point is raised in anticipation—

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could say a word before your advice is given. It seems to me you did say earlier, before giving your previous ruling and when I sought to make some additional argument on this point, that there would be an opportunity later to argue this point. I am not seeking to argue it now, but I trust that is Your Honour's disposition.

Mr. Speaker: The government is quite within its rights to stand its own orders, as it is doing, or to move that the house proceed to another order and go to the supply order which was the business indicated earlier in the week. Although the point has not yet arisen, I think I should say my view is that a supply motion would be debatable on Saturday, because the rules only permit supply motions to be made without debate on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In that event, Mr. Speaker, as it has been announced by the house leader that there will be a supply motion on Monday, at which time any grievance which is properly raised can be debated, and as we would like to make some use of this day the house has met, the government suggests that we proceed—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should point out to the Minister of Finance that the house would have to give unanimous consent to achieve the objective which has been stated by several hon. members. If the house is prepared to give unanimous consent to proceed in committee of supply without debate, in view of the order for Monday, we have reached the point where this would not be a concession other than in accordance with anticipated business.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, there is not unanimous consent to giving up our rights.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Blocking again.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Lacking that unanimous consent, the offer the Prime Minister made on April 24 is not accepted by the official opposition; therefore we will proceed with item No. 3.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights of hon. members with respect to the statement made by the Prime Minister. I think in order to save the time of the house and clarify the matter, the simplest way would be for me to read a motion, which Your Honour can consider one way or the other. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith):

That in the opinion of this house the attempt of the government, notwithstanding the undertaking given by the Prime Minister as leader of the house—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Churchill: Completely out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: If it is a question of privilege of course it can be raised at any time, but the hon. member who wishes to move a motion should indicate in concise terms his point of privilege before he enters into discussion, so it can be determined whether it is a prima facie question of privilege. If there is a genuine question of privilege I think hon. members would agree that it is properly raised at any time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will hear the minister on the point of order. I am not sure what the point of order is.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has risen on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: If the point of order relates to the hon. member's wish to raise a question of privilege, I should hear the point of order before the hon. member proceeds.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the observation I wished to make was this. The Clerk has called item No. 3 on the order paper. I indicated that it would be the intention of the government, under the circumstances, to proceed with item No. 3. Surely it is item No. 3 which is before us, and the Minister of Agriculture has the floor.

Mr. Speaker: I have been advised that when this matter was last before the house the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Pascoe) had the floor. Until the hon. member has risen and been recognized there is opportunity to raise a question of privilege which is relevant to the current proceedings. Such a question of privilege should be raised and dealt with at the time it arises, if it is relevant. As I have not yet recognized the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre I will hear the hon. member at least to determine whether there is a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, if you find there is a question of privilege here, I wish to found a motion upon it.

Mr. Churchill: No, state the question of privilege first.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am going to state my question of privilege first. It was so obvious that I thought I might save the time of the house by simply making the motion. Since I am not allowed to do that, I will accept Your Honour's advice and state the point very precisely in the words of the Prime Minister, to which I hope hon. gentlemen will listen.

An hon. Member: Get on with it.

Mr. Pickersgill: My question of privilege is that the Prime Minister said on April 24:

On Saturdays various departments could be dealt with.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

I would not want to see controversial measures dealt with on Saturdays because I would want to be assured that as many hon. members as possible would be present—

He went on later to say:

These matters—

That is supply:

—could be discussed on Saturdays without in any way depreciating the opportunity of the opposition, including the hon. member for Essex East—

He specifically mentioned the hon. member for Essex East who, I may point out, is not in the house at the present time because he was assured by the Prime Minister that he need not be here on Saturday to debate controversial matters—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In effect the hon. member is asserting that the statement made by the Prime Minister in debate governs the proceedings today. I think it is clear that it does not govern it. The house is not bound by that statement. While it is not a breach of the privileges of the house to proceed as is now being done regardless of what has been stated, it may be a matter for debate. To my mind, this does not raise a question of the privileges of the house. If it did, the house would be bound by the indication made by the Prime Minister, and we would necessarily go into supply.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order which Your Honour has raised, I would draw to Your Honour's attention the fact that you made a ruling on Tuesday with respect to a motion attempted to be moved by my hon. friend from Essex East, that the house leader had certain responsibilities and certain rights in this house and was an officer of the house. We have a courtesy house leader in the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, but the leader of the house is the Prime Minister. It was in his capacity as leader of the house, while moving the motion, that this undertaking, or what we consider a solemn undertaking, was given to the house. Of course it is no doubt technically true that if the government wants to, it can break the Prime Minister's undertaking and refuse to regard this as an obligation and we would have no recourse.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid I cannot agree with the hon. member that the government is now in a position, in the situation which has developed with respect to the orders, to do other than it is doing, and I cannot see a question of privilege on which the hon. member can found a motion. I recognize the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, arising out of what I understood to be the latter part of Your Honour's remarks—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre defer his remarks? Is the hon. member for Ottawa West arising in respect of my decision?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask for clarification in respect of the latter part of your decision. If I understood you correctly, and I should like to be corrected in this as it was delivered fairly quickly, you said that the government was not in a position to call other orders. I should like to draw your attention to the fact that under government orders, at page 5 of today's order paper, appears item No. 10, "House again in committee of supply", and I would suggest the house is in a position to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I think it is desirable that we have recorded in Hansard the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite supporting the government who continue to trample on the rights of hon. members, as they have been doing just now. This whole situation, I would point out to those hon. members, has been brought about by the government's failure to bring forward, as we have looked for since April 24, the required motion. But the point I rose to deal with is this. I wanted to take the liberty of pointing out to you, sir, that if I heard you correctly, item No. 10 on today's order paper was the item the government agreed to call, but I suggest that what disposition will be made of that cannot be determined in advance but is something that has to be done at the time.

Mr. Speaker: That is true. I have perhaps improperly indicated in advance that in my view the supply motion, if called, would be debatable. That was really the significance of the last statement in my decision with respect to the matter of privilege. I did not intend to indicate that the government was bound to stop at this item No. 3.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out, I was concerned by one point. It is quite true that you indicated that the supply motion, if it was called today, would be debatable, but I do not want to see the point arise where Your Honour is left in the position of saying that if the motion is to be debated, the government cannot call it. That is the position I raise, and I think it is a proper point to raise, because I think it is a very significant right to hon. members that the Speaker must not be put in the position where it can be argued or suggested that because a certain item of business is going to have certain consequences when it is called, it ought not to be called. I think Your Honour would agree with me in this.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may be allowed to say a word or two. I do believe that at least the majority of hon. members of this house would like order No. 10 called in order that we might go forward today with the business which was left yesterday. However, Your Honour did say that if this motion were called it would be debatable. It does seem to me that if the business for Saturday is to be the same as the business for Friday, and that the rules for Friday should apply today, a motion to go into supply on Friday is not debatable and therefore a motion to go into supply on Saturday should not be debatable. Therefore, if we do, as I hope we will, call item No. 10, we could consider the estimates without having a supply motion put.

Mr. Speaker: It is evident that if one makes one error it is easy to get into a second. Perhaps I should not have expressed a view about the supply motion in advance, but it seemed to be relevant to a solution of our difficulties, and I did, express that view. I have no intention of saying that it is not possible to call the item, and that it is then within the discretion of hon. members of the house to debate it or not. All I am saying at the moment is that I cannot find a question of privilege in the matter raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Order No. 3 has been called and we are now free to proceed with that matter in the absence of a change by the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate the opportunity, as the hon. member for Ottawa West was given, of commenting on the use of the word "alternative" in your judgment, because it seems to me there is a clear alternative open to the government whereby it could do its part in keeping the undertaking of the Prime Minister to call supply today. That is to call item No. 10 on today's order paper and take the consequences. Then they would be keeping the Prime Minister's word and not evading it, which is what the government is now seeking to do.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to the terms used concerning the Prime Minister, and the complete irresponsibility with which they have been used in respect of his statement of April 24. The statements made by the hon. members of the opposition with regard to what the Prime Minister said are not correct. The Prime Minister made no firm undertaking that supply only would be considered on Saturday. He spoke in these terms of members of the opposition, as reported at page 3928 of Hansard of April 24, 1961:

> They pose today as lovers of parliament.

Those are his words, and the hon. members of the opposition are certainly showing themselves as obstructionists today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: You should talk about obstructionists.

Mr. Churchill: The Prime Minister on that occasion went on to say:

> I think Saturdays could well be set aside, if the house agrees, for dealing with the supply of various departments.

That same offer was made earlier today by the Acting Prime Minister but there was no co-operation on the other side. The Prime Minister then is recorded as having said the following:

> There will be that fine spirit of co-operation of which hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken.

None of that spirit has been shown by them today. The Prime Minister then is reported to have said the following:

> On Saturdays various departments could be dealt with. I would not want to see controversial measures dealt with on Saturdays—

Hon. members opposite are pretending that a supply motion is not controversial, yet they have called three votes one way or another on the estimates.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. minister rose on a question of privilege, and I have allowed him some leeway.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a question of privilege, to take issue with what has been said by the house leader, who referred to our tactics as obstructionist.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps the minister would like to modify the word "obstructionist". I will give him the opportunity to do so. As far as the question of privilege arising out of the intervention of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is concerned, I have disposed of that. Really the discussion is continuing on that basis, and I would ask hon. members to desist.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a question of privilege. We have been charged by the house leader and another hon. member with using obstructionist tactics. What we have been doing is supporting the rules of this house and asserting the rights of parliament. I ask you, sir, to invite the house leader and the hon. member for Calgary South to amend their language when they direct their attacks on us as obstructionists. On the contrary, what we have done is to say that the government is not abiding by the rules of the house. In effect, what the government has done—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the debate is likely to continue if it is allowed to; therefore I shall only give the house leader the opportunity, which the hon. member has suggested, to modify the word "obstructionist", if he wishes to do so, and then proceed to the next business.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, if the word "obstruction" is objectionable—I do not think it is contrary to the rules—to hon. members on the other side I would substitute "delaying tactics". On my point of privilege which arises from the statement of the hon. member who said the government is not acting in accordance with the rules, I say, sir, we are acting in accordance with the rules laid down by Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: On the contrary, you are not.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Item No. 3 has been called, and we shall proceed with that unless there is some modification made. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I am still on the question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member is rising on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, that has been disposed of; it is not open for further discussion unless the hon. member for Laurier has a new matter, and even then I think I would not see him until the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre had been heard.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I ask to be heard on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will have to defer his question of privilege until he can get the floor.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask Your Honour a question. Is Your Honour ruling that I cannot at this stage rise on a question of privilege as, in accordance with the rules of the house, I submit with deference I have the right to do?

Mr. Speaker: That is my ruling, and in order to explain it to the hon. member I will say this. One question of privilege intervened and prevented the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre from taking the floor. That has been disposed of. I refer to a citation in Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, fourth edition, at page 303, as follows:

> It is the practice in the House of Commons to bring up a question of privilege after prayers, and before the house has taken up the orders of the day. Only in very aggravated cases, requiring the immediate interposition of the house, will any business be suddenly interrupted.

The reason I allowed the item of the business of the house, which has just been called, to be interrupted is that the alleged question of privilege related to the calling of this item in view of what had been said earlier. That matter has been disposed of. If the hon. member asserts that his question of privilege relates to the immediate transaction, which is my seeing the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, then perhaps I should hear what his alleged question of privilege is; otherwise it is not relevant, and I leave it to him to determine whether or not he falls within that category.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank Your Honour for the manner in which you have dealt with the point which I attempted to raise. First I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that, notwithstanding what has taken place, you allowed the house leader to raise a question of privilege. I do not think the question of privilege has been satisfied by the amendment which the house leader has made. We have risen in this house today since the beginning of the sitting in order to defend and assert the rights of parliament; we have risen in this house, sir, in order to make quite sure that on a future occasion a situation such as this will not arise again.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's duty is to indicate wherein there is a new matter of privilege which requires immediate disposition. Unless he can do that I shall have to ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Chevrier: It is the insinuation made by the house leader in his substitution of the words "delaying tactics" for the word "obstructionist", which is the new question of privilege. I say we have not delayed the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has heard, as have other hon. members, the expression "delaying tactics" used from time to time. To my mind it does not raise a question of privilege and should not be advanced as such, certainly at this time. Therefore I cannot find a prima facie matter of privilege in what the hon. member for Laurier is asserting, and I must proceed with the proper order of business, which is to hear the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, sir—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, I shall have to ask the hon. member for Laurier to resume his seat.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me the floor after eight attempts to break through the delaying tactics of the Liberal members of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member has not referred to the rules of order today; I am sure everybody else has. But might I remind him that it is quite irrelevant to make statements of that kind, and if they are provocative they only involve the house in controversy which is quite out of order.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Speaker, I just want to point out that I have been waiting for two hours—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. The hon. gentleman has stated that he has been waiting for two hours. The hon. gentleman surely did not have any privy knowledge that this matter was being called, and I am asking the Acting Prime Minister if he did.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Really the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is rising to contradict, not on a point of order. I trust the hon. member will allow the procedure to take its course in accordance with the rules.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir; I am raising a question of privilege. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre has just made the statement to Your Honour that for the last two hours he knew this order was to be called. I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether there was some secret understanding that this order would be called.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pascoe: If I may answer the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I adjourned this debate; therefore I was prepared to start in, no matter when it came up.

I was amazed this morning at the suggestion from the Liberal members that the bill before us was controversial. I would have thought that because of its importance to agriculture it would have received the unanimous support of all hon. members. As a western member and representing one of the best farming areas in all Canada, I am happy to have the opportunity to support Bill No. C-77, to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada.

Other members have spoken on this measure and have outlined its general principles. I need not repeat those statements, but I do wish to reiterate their remarks about our very able and energetic Minister of Agriculture and add to the congratulations extended to him for the good work he is doing on behalf of agriculture and Canadian farmers. The recent announcement by the minister of the three year agreement with China for the sale of grain to the value of $425,600,000 emphasizes that these congratulations are merited. As he stated, these sales of grain will be of great benefit to the Canadian economy through increased farm income and higher employment.

All Canada welcomes this announcement. I should like to draw these remarks to the attention of the hon. member for Assiniboia. I was amazed at his attack in the house on this agreement. I asked him at that time if he was speaking for the New party or personally and he did not answer me. Perhaps he will answer later.

In extending congratulations to the Minister of Agriculture I do not want to minimize in any way the fine work of his predecessor in initiating long range government farm policies that are now beginning to have a very noticeable effect. In Bill No. C-77 the present minister is continuing these long range measures of the government.

One of the valuable contributions the minister is making toward greater understanding of the government's farm policy is the heavy program of personal visits to all parts of Canada that he has undertaken. He has had great success in explaining what the government is attempting to do, and is doing for the farmers. I know the farmers in my area appreciate the minister's very clear outline of the policies of his department. One of his first public addresses after assuming his new portfolio was in Moose Jaw, where he spoke to 200 or more practical farmers and a large number of businessmen. The theme of his address was along the lines of what is contained in Bill No. C-77, the need for the active interest and co-operation of businessmen and all non-farm groups to help to bolster farm income for the benefit of all segments of the economy.

As I said, his Moose Jaw address was one of the minister's first speeches outlining his ideas as to what must be done for agriculture. It was one of his first direct references to the legislation respecting agricultural rehabilitation and development envisaged by the bill before us. When the bill is passed it will embody the minister's great hope of having the federal government, the provincial governments and all interested groups and individuals work together to improve the income position of Canadian farmers, for the benefit of all.

I have had considerable correspondence with farmers in my constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre since the minister's address in Moose Jaw. These letters show that the farmers in my area, a predominantly wheat growing district, are thinking very seriously about their situation. I believe they see what the federal government is doing for them, and understand what is involved in Bill No. C-77. I received a letter recently from a prominent farmer in my constituency, and I took the liberty of sending his comments to the minister. I think they will encourage the minister to continue along the lines the government is now following.

The writer of the letter is Mr. Wilfred McKenzie of Belbeck, Saskatchewan, which is north of Moose Jaw. Mr. McKenzie has always taken a very active interest in farm programs. He succeeded me as chairman of the agricultural committee of the Moose Jaw chamber of commerce, and in this position is a direct link between the farmers and the city businessmen. In his letter Mr. McKenzie made these comments, among others:

> It would appear that the problems of agriculture are not getting any less, but I am wondering if the time is not fast approaching when almost everything else but agriculture will be the problem. It could be that agriculture has probably stayed the closest to the right perspective and most everything else has been on the rampage and will find it the more difficult to level out. I would think that so far as the world economy is concerned agriculture has been more in line, with the result the adjustment may eventually fall the hardest on industry.
> If agriculture would hold the line and not try to go forward at this time, it might not be too long before it will be the front line and also the line that Canada will badly need to fall back on, especially for the labour force. It might be a good idea if we all took a long look backward and then look forward with a realistic view dominating our idealistic view.

I think these views support the principle of Bill No. C-77. They are the views of a very practical farmer. I am glad to have the opportunity to bring them to the attention of the minister and the members of the house. I was impressed by Mr. McKenzie's proposal that we look forward. This forward look is exactly what the A.R.D.A., when passed, will undertake.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pascoe: When the debate on Bill No. C-77 was adjourned at one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was referring to a letter from Mr. McKenzie in my constituency who stated that a realistic, forward look should be taken at agriculture. I want to emphasize my earlier statement that this bill will help us take that realistic, forward look. If such a look had been taken by the former government, if the Liberals had looked ahead realistically during the 22 years they were in power, they would not have left so many farm problems on the doorstep of this government, problems which this government is solving and which this legislation will help to solve.

I have received comments from other farmers in the same vein as the views expressed by Mr. McKenzie. In this connection, there is an interesting report in the Nokomis Times of March 1 relating to an agricultural meeting in Strasbourg in my constituency, attended by a large, representative group of farmers. The subject of the main address was, "What's New in Agriculture". The speaker emphasized the growing impact of science on farm practices. He said that while many farmers are putting new knowledge into practice and profiting thereby, others have been slow to take advantage of this new knowledge. To make the best use of their acreage and the most profit from crops, livestock and other ventures, he stated, farmers must keep posted on new developments. The speaker expressed the hope that farmers would make the widest possible use of all available information and advice to reduce farm waste to a minimum and thus improve production efficiency.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If I understood the hon. gentleman correctly, he is quoting from two letters he has received. I believe it is in order for him to table those letters if he proposes to quote extensively from them as he appears to be doing.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Speaker, one is a letter and one is a quotation from a newspaper. I could table both if that is Your Honour's wish.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member quotes a letter, it is customary to put it in the possession of the house and indicate the name of the author.

Mr. Pascoe: I have indicated the name of the author. I would be pleased to table the letter. I should like to conclude my reference to this newspaper report. The speaker warned that prairie soils are showing evidence of depleted soil fertility. Here is one of his direct statements:

> Improper use of our land has ruined or seriously damaged an estimated 13 million acres.

This bill, No. C-77, Mr. Speaker, is an answer to this serious problem. It is interesting to note that it was a Conservative government that took the first step along the lines of the provisions contained in this bill. This fact is indicated in an article in the Lumsden weekly from my constituency under the heading "How federal rehabilitation efforts have aided agriculture in the past and will provide further assistance in the future". I quote from that article:

> Thirty years ago a worried federal government undertook a rather drastic course of action to assist agriculture in western Canada to fight its way out of a depression that was aggravated by drought, erosion, insects and disease.
> Today, another government stands on the threshold of yet another program of assistance to agriculture—and there are similarities.
> The first program introduced through the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, took direct action toward rehabilitating thousands of desolated acres in the west. It also worked indirectly, teaching by example at many experimental farms and substations.

The article states, at another point:

> Vigorous rehabilitation measures changed the picture.

The article then concludes as follows:

> In the same way, the new redevelopment program about to be launched will undoubtedly move agriculture up several more rungs in the ladder of success.

I think I should add to the article this statement made by the Minister of Agriculture when he moved the resolution preceding this measure on January 25. Here is what he said at that time as reported on page 1403 of Hansard:

> Mr. Chairman, in moving the adoption of this resolution I do so with the full realization that it will constitute a major step forward in fulfilling our national agricultural program presented to the house on August 30, 1958, by the Prime Minister.

I want to commend the minister and his department for the production of this little pamphlet "ARDA". I should like to draw the attention of the house to the outline on the back page which refers to the percentage of farms, by provinces, having an annual potential production of less than $1,200. For Canada as a whole, this outline shows 21 per cent of the farmers have an annual income of less than $1,200. Saskatchewan has the best record with only 4 per cent of its farmers with annual incomes of less than $1,200.

I should also like to put on record a statement by the minister under the heading "Reduction of Farms Not Purpose of A.R.D.A." Here is his statement:

> It is not the purpose of A.R.D.A. to reduce the number of farms . . . A.R.D.A. is designed, rather, to help by various means to improve the income and standard of living of the smaller and more marginal farms, and in that way help improve the over-all position of agriculture.

In an address to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture the minister suggested that everyone associated with the farming business should dedicate the next few years to an objective assessment of where we stand and where we are going. That is what the federal government is attempting to do by this legislation.

Marginal Lands Development

I have here a clipping from the Western Producer of January 26, 1961, reporting a statement by Dr. H. H. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Dr. Hannam says that the federation for years has been urging the type of program envisaged in this bill. He added that farmers will be faced with a major challenge to their imagination when the act comes into effect, because it will open up broad opportunities for action in the fields of soil and water conservation, land use development and rural economic development in general. He concluded that farmers will have a responsibility along with governments to see that the legislation is used effectively and extensively.

In this regard there are some interesting statements in volume No. 8 of the proceedings of the special committee of the other place on land use in Canada, April 26 and April 27. As found at page 204, Mr. Ross Hill, executive director of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture states:

> I wish to point out that whatever a farmer produces comes from the land in some form, and therefore all the social and economic changes through the years have been dependent on the manner in which our land resources have been managed. There is every reason to believe that even greater emphasis will be placed on land use and land values in the future, because of the evolution which has taken place in our industry.

As found at page 209 Dr. C. C. Spence, economics division, Canadian Department of Agriculture, Edmonton, Alberta, under the heading of "Irrigation in Canada and its Impact on Agriculture" states:

> From the irrigation experience in Canada as related it is obvious that any estimates as to the acreage which should be developed in irrigation and its location in the future could be very far off without careful and co-ordinating studies of water supply, engineering, efficiency in use of water, land, climate, markets and even human attitudes.

These statements repeat what has already been said about the realistic forward look for agriculture that the minister proposes to undertake under the terms of this bill. I wish to emphasize the need for co-operation from the provincial governments in this rehabilitation program; and because I come from Saskatchewan I make this appeal for co-operation directly to the Saskatchewan government. As the minister has pointed out, one of the key points in this legislation will be the widest possible participation not only by farmers but by every group in our rural communities. Agricultural rehabilitation and development calls for the combined enterprise of governments, groups and individuals. This bill will help farmers help themselves. It will also bring other segments of our economy into the battle for a more stabilized agricultural industry. The farmers need and will welcome this co-ordinated help.

If I may conclude with another brief reference to the China wheat deal which is part and parcel of the better days for agriculture envisaged by the bill, I wish to assure the Minister of Agriculture that I have already received from constituents letters commending him on his efforts to sell more wheat than has been sold in many years, with the prospects of still greater sales. Again may I say that I am happy to support this bill.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time in order to add a few words to the discussion which has already been lengthy on this A.R.D.A. bill. I do so at this time because I have 6,000 farmers in my riding. I have heard words of commendation from every source, from groups and from individual farmers, by correspondence, as to the high regard they have for this bill which we hope will soon be enacted.

I now wish to take up one or two points which this bill seeks to accomplish. The first objective is to get at marginal and low productivity land. What is envisaged is to have an instrument of human making to get at, in an economic and physical way, the adjustments to which marginal and low productivity land are subject and which often take so many years to work out. During that long waiting period when these adjustments are working out, the farmers are run through the wringer because of low income and because of the lack of any policy to assist them to make an adjustment.

This bill seeks to provide the farmers with an act which will assist them in making these adjustments. In other words, as was stated by the hon. member who has just spoken, it will assist the farmer to help himself. I wish to say that, judging from previous experience, we shall have some difficulties in administering this act. There will be many discussions among the farmers on the question of marginal lands, for example. Let us take a moment in order to discuss that matter. What do we mean by marginal land? For what reason is it marginal? It may be marginal because it is of low productivity, or because of the frost free period of the locality in which the land is situated. It may be marginal because of the lack of rainfall or because of the location of the land. You might also add that it may be marginal because of the type of managerial policy of the person who is operating it. You can now add up the items in that list. All of them add up to what we mean in economic terms as the causes of marginal land.

If a piece of land is marginal in its present use, the thought behind this legislation is to see what can be done to improve its productivity and use, and at the same time take care of the farmers who are at present engaged in farming such land.

What is needed is the development of income and employment opportunities for rural and agricultural people. In many areas the size of the business unit is too small. Where possible we should combine some of these units and change the type of use to a more extensive one, or it may go the other way, to a more intensified type of use. In this way by planning and by a program of action we could bring about a higher income for farmers and a more profitable use of the land.

In addition to that it should be pointed out that you cannot isolate any one problem in an area, treat it by itself and completely neglect all the other. You have to think about new industries, supplementary industries and the development of other means of earning an income, or at least a supplementary income, for those farmers who are operating on small units.

At Fort MacLeod we have just completed one of the finest pieces of industrial development that I think has come about in southwestern Alberta in the past decade or more. The old airport there was sold to the town of Fort MacLeod and they have set about to develop industry and move industries into each of the hangars. At the present time a new industry has moved in from Estevan, Saskatchewan, and is employing approximately 65 people. Another is moving in to start up a plywood plant which will employ 50 people. This industry will be shipping raw materials in from the Crowsnest pass and eastern British Columbia. There are two other industries which I do not care to mention, which are seriously considering moving in.

The present situation is that this town has within the last three months increased its population by at least 500 people, and it may even increase it by 1,000 people. This has been done by developing supplementary industries which might have gone by the board had the authorities not moved in the right direction.

It is this type of planning which must be done by local communities. This type of planning has already been done by the people of Fort MacLeod, who have demonstrated that it can be done.

We are now in the midst of undertaking a similar transfer of the Claresholm airport to the town of Claresholm or perhaps to the municipal district of Willow Creek if arrangements can be made. In other words, in all these communities we are hoping to obtain local development and at the same time assist marginal farmers and low income farmers to supplement their incomes.

There is one other point I should like to mention in connection with this broad, general program introduced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton). I refer to the conservation of soil and water. One has only to study the history of China to see that down through the ages the loss of soil there has almost ruined certain sections of the country. We also find in that study that these people have made efforts over past hundreds of years to maintain the fertility of their soil. They have put organic matter back into the soil; they have never lost an opportunity to add fertility or to till the soil in such a manner as to maintain its fertility. However, in spite of their efforts they have suffered a tremendous amount of soil erosion and in many, many cases the loss of a high percentage of the topsoil.

One has only to go to the prairie provinces to see this illustrated. One has only to look at the farmers who are farming land up and down these hills, and then take another look at these areas following a heavy rainfall. You find that the hillsides have been gullied and tremendous quantities of topsoil have been washed off, never to be returned. It is plowing on the contour, farming these lands on the contour, the seeding of grasses, rotation of crops, restoration of fibre and the fertility of the soil which are problems with which the practical farmer must grapple. These are the problems to which this particular program must give attention and assist the farmer to overcome.

In other words, it often happens that the financial resources of an individual farmer are insufficient for him to do the things he would like to do. It is therefore hoped that this program will come in time and give every possible assistance to help bring about adjustments in the farming pattern of the land. This program will cost in the neighbourhood of $300 million to $600 million spread over the next decade. I wish to say that it is the best way in which this or any other government could spend money in helping to bring about these land use adjustments in agriculture; that is, to maintain the fertility of the soil and the economic use of the water that falls as related to the production of food, which of course is of tremendous interest to us all.

If a country loses the fertility of its soils—and one has only to study what has happened in the past ages where the fertility of soil has been lost—you will find the people in the affected areas perish. This has been the pattern in the past.

Marginal Lands Development

Therefore we in Canada must take a hard look at what we are doing with our soils. I have only to refer to the experience of farmers in my area, and in fact to my experience on our own farm, which has been farmed for some 40 or 50 years, to illustrate my point. The fertility of the soil is going down; hilltops become more exposed, rocks are showing and the productivity of the land at those spots is becoming depleted.

In other words, unless we change our methods and assist farmers to change their methods in order to bring about a better use of soil and a better use of our resources, the day will come when we will have no topsoil and everybody in society will suffer. Therefore this legislation strikes right at the very heart of everybody's vested interests in that it deals with maintaining the fertility of the soil.

Changes will be needed in this legislation as time goes by. It will need amendments and it will go through a process of evolution based on experience. But there is nothing wrong with that; that is the very thing that should happen.

I should like to refer to an article appearing in the Ottawa Journal of Thursday, May 4, 1961 under the heading "Mr. Pearson hides his light under 275,800,000 bushels". This was an editorial which appeared in that edition of the paper regarding the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture in the house concerning the sale of wheat to China. I should like to say that I was present at the time and I consider the minister's statement to be one of the most profound I have heard in many years. Speaking on behalf of the farmers, particularly in my area, I may say they are exuberant over this announcement.

I was very much disturbed by the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and I should have thought he in turn would have lent his wholehearted support to this move and refrained from casting doubt for political purposes.

When one travels around the country one is impressed with the fact that this wheat agreement is of tremendous significance and usefulness to Canada's wheat trade and to the present economic situation generally. Whether one views this move in terms of agriculture, prairie farm conditions, railway freight or port activity, unemployment, or even a general boom in business, this projected sale will be of tremendous benefit to Canada's economy as a whole. I want to compliment the Minister of Agriculture in this regard on behalf of the 6,000 farmers in my riding who are so well pleased with what has been accomplished.

In conclusion, I should like to suggest that the bill now before us should receive the heartiest endorsation by this house because the people want this A.R.D.A. legislation and it is needed for the future national development of Canada.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had of speaking on a Saturday afternoon in this session, and I must say that I find it delightful. I rise at this time to make a few remarks in explanation of several matters involved in our program of rehabilitation of agricultural land as it affects the area in my constituency.

The members of my party feel very pleased with this bill, as I am sure the minister does. The majority of hon. members in the opposition seem to feel the proposed bill is good, although they have perhaps not directly said so. We feel this is the logical continuation of agricultural programs such as the Agricultural Stabilization Act and the Farm Credit Act as well as perhaps the Crop Insurance Act.

As one hon. member of the opposition has said, this measure will not cure unemployment at the present time. Of course, it will not be of tremendous immediate value in regard to unemployment, and I doubt if it was designed for that purpose. However, in the long term view there is no question that it will be of benefit to our employment situation. It will have a tremendous effect on planning for the future of Canadians. This bill has been designed with a view to finding alternative uses for land which is submarginal or of low productivity in order to improve the economic role of those individuals on the land.

In my own constituency there are three great valleys, the Okanagan, the Kettle and the Similkameen. The Kettle valley is referred to as the sunshine valley in the Grand Forks area. One often wonders how far the government should go in respect of a project of this nature, and how much the progress should depend upon self-help. I have always advocated the principle that the government should not interfere too much, and I hope that this proposed act will be interpreted in that fashion. I hope the results of this measure will develop through co-operation between the governments and farm organizations. I would suggest that the farmers' problems should be forwarded to the government organizations for complete consideration before any drastic action is taken. This is my understanding of how it will be carried out.

In my area there has existed a great amount of what I term self-help. We have tackled our problem with hammer and tongs. We originally had a large ranching area but as a result of irrigation the area has developed to the point that it is now referred to as the garden of Eden. We have had many problems which have been resolved through our own efforts. I was pleased that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt) mentioned that which constitutes marginal land, and explained why this land which was previously good land has now lost its value. In our area there have been many causes in this respect, particularly regarding the fruit industry. One change has come about because of the change in consumer tastes. This change necessitated a change in the industry. This in itself presents a problem because in the fruit growing business one does not plant and harvest annually. As an example of this, let me point out that apple trees are planted and following a period of some ten years the fruit is harvested. The period of time involved in this process in respect of soft fruit is perhaps less, but this is the type of situation individuals in a fruit growing area must overcome.

In the Okanagan valley an attempt had been made to grow tobacco. In Oxford county there existed submarginal land and, it was wondered how the farmers would survive. Tobacco growing was introduced and it is significant that in that area today, since tobacco has become a crop, the farmers have taken tremendous strides forward. I understand the value of the tobacco crop in this area will run as high as $115 million this year. A tremendous portion of this money will return to the farmers. I cite this as an example of new usage of land.

Many things other than the change in consumer tastes have forced changes, such as the increase in competition for existing markets. This increase in competition has had a great effect upon the vegetable and fruit growing markets of the Okanagan. Shippers in the Okanagan are also faced with very high freight rates as a result of the distance to their markets. As a result of this distance the quality of our fruit has had to be improved, as of course it has, in order that the growers could survive in present day competitions for these markets in Canada.

Much of the land has been changed in regard to use in the Okanagan valley which, because of its climate and location, lends itself to the tourist industry. Some of the better growing land there has now been used for the establishment of motor courts. For my part I regret seeing this land turned into motor court areas. I have always felt that submarginal land should be used for this purpose rather than the fertile fruit growing land.

I would like to mention two other crops developed in my area. The first is the grape crop which, in the Okanagan valley and elsewhere in that area, is coming into being.

Wineries are being developed and are progressing successfully, and there are additional plans in existence to further this operation. I hope this experiment will be successful because there has been a lot of time and money invested.

The other crop I wish to mention is the tomato crop. There has been a decline in the growing of tomatoes in my area, and again there are many reasons for this decline. I would suggest the first reason is the increase in competition. I might say that up until 1956 we enjoyed rather a good tariff. For some reason or other, in 1956 the tariff was removed from tomatoes and consequently since that time we have suffered heavily as a result of paste and all forms of tomato goods being imported into Canada. I am not asking that the tariff be restored but consideration should be given to this and if the industry asks for it I will go after it.

I might mention the dominion experimental farm at Summerland, since this has to do with conservation and better use of soil. The farm at Summerland has done more than its fair share, as far as my area is concerned. This is particularly true when one considers the recent development of a new strain of tomatoes that will meet competition. They stand up well, can well and give a higher yield per acre.

As far as fruit is concerned, the experimental farm has been a leader all down the line in the development of new and suitable varieties for the Okanagan. This is also true in connection with pest control. Here they have been a leader and the growers of fruit throughout the valley take off their hats to those people who make up the staff of the dominion experimental farm. They are a devoted crew. I know that the thanks of the whole of the Okanagan goes out to them.

I said I had several main points that I wanted to bring up apart from the generalities I have just mentioned. My main points today are more or less twofold. They arise out of clause 4 of the bill. I do not know how far one can go in discussing this but let me say that we may expect the development and conservation of water supplies for agricultural purposes, soil improvement and conservation. We have had the problem of water supply for many years. The Okanagan and other valleys, apart from ranching, were of little use for agriculture until the advent of the irrigation system. We have had many irrigation projects. It is worth noting that as time has gone on replacement has had to take place in quite a number of irrigation systems. This is an expensive item. Consequently, I should like to see the government help in one way or another under this conservation bill in the use of water for farm irrigation purposes. There is no question but that the land itself cannot stand the additional charges occasioned by the replacement of all the major pipe lines and the control systems which have to go with them. This puts far too great a charge on the land.

As to the second point, soil improvement and conservation, I am looking mainly at conservation here. We have three valleys, namely the Similkameen through which the Similkameen river flows, the Okanagan, through which the Okanagan system flows, and the Kettle valley, which has the Kettle river. On the Okanagan river the provincial government, in conjunction with the federal government, on a 50-50 basis, has developed the Okanagan by water steps and by a damming system, and they have now so confined the river that there is very little overflowing and very little danger of flooding. Consequently, they have made it much easier for the farmers and ranchers situated along the river to plan ahead. They have also reclaimed many acres which are going to provide another source of land usage in the Okanagan, although they have not yet been put on the market. Of course, this will have a great benefit so far as the valley is concerned.

My reason for mentioning the Okanagan is that it did not require this legislation to do this work. This was a logical development. Action was taken, and more is planned. The Okanagan river itself is a smooth flowing system. It rises in the Okanagan lakes and, compared with other rivers, there is very little drop before it passes from Canada at Osoyoos into the United States across the border. It forms part of the Columbia system. On the other hand, in so far as erosion and soil conservation are concerned, the two rivers about which I should like to say something are first the Similkameen and second the Kettle, although not necessarily in that order. To my mind these two rivers are worth watching. Compared with the Okanagan, these rivers have a high rate of flow. In the spring they flow out to such an extent that the river becomes a danger to the lands along the banks. Each year some of the arable farmland disappears. Some farmers along the river banks have suffered grievously. They have lost everything. In other words, the river will take a swing and create havoc. If at all possible, we should have some form of control, some form of diking, or a dam, which will keep the river in a better temper.

Representations have been made by the United States counterparts on the Columbia river development. They have asked that the Similkameen be controlled. They have their reasons for that. Of course, they would like to put in power dams south of the border. A dam on the river would flood a considerable area in this part of Canada. To provide an even flow it is suggested that further dams should be erected. Just what effect this would have in Canada I do not know. I do not want to see any of our land flooded. I feel any control would have to be done by a series of stages up the river.

This is a river in which the government ought to be interested, particularly the Department of Veterans Affairs. There is a Veterans' Land Act project at Cawston which has a pumping station situated on the bank of the Similkameen and each year when the water is high there is a good cause for fear. Without water, as hon. members know, we will lose our trees. There is no question about it, the rainfall is not sufficient there. We must have irrigation. Therefore, I say the farmers look upon the recurrence of flooding with a great deal of fear.

Just recently I received another letter from the Cawston board of trade asking that I look into this and see whether something could not be done. If and when this legislation is enacted I ask that an inspection and a report be made on the river.

These are just two phases of various aspects of power, irrigation and control of the river, and we welcome any assistance which will aid the farmer along the way.

The same thing applies to the Kettle river. The Kettle has a more even temperament, a more even flow, than the Similkameen, but still it has the habit of taking great bites out of the land, and to my mind this is something which should be controlled. I need only say that in these mountain valleys it is important if possible to preserve that which we have. Soil is one thing, and I feel that we should go all out if possible and in the general interest do everything that we can to preserve our arable land.

When this legislation is passed I would ask that a survey be made of the Kettle river and all of its facets. We should decide whether it is possible to go ahead with some form or measure of control on this river to the end that we shall provide a better deal for all the farmers in the valley itself.

I was rather glad to hear the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Pascoe) refer to the question of co-operation between governments. I know that when he spoke that way he also meant farm government, in other words, all farm organizations. This is essential, of course, and it is stated quite clearly in the provisions of the bill that the federal government is not going to do it by itself but in conjunction with the provincial governments which, of course, is the way it should be done. As I mentioned in the earlier part of my speech, it is absolutely essential that we do not get too much government control but that, bearing in mind conservation and control of land use, all these various departments should work together in what are considered the best interests of all so that as a result we will have better use of our lands.

(Translation):

Mr. Aristide Rompre (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty in the circumstances to join previous speakers in expressing my great satisfaction to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) for Bill No. C-77 now under discussion. The purpose of this bill is to empower the government to implement, in co-operation with the provinces, a policy for the rehabilitation of lands that are marginal or of low productivity.

When I spoke for the first time in this house during the budget debate, on June 26, 1958, I felt it was of great importance to bring this problem to the government's attention. In fact, as reported on page 1665 of Hansard in volume II for the session of 1958 I said this:

> There are in my constituency a few communities where farms are not favoured with a loamy and very productive soil. Although I am no expert in this field, I nevertheless wish to refer to some suggestions made to me by several owners of such farms, to the effect that a grant for the claying of their land would be of great help since it would contribute to increase productivity and help them derive a better income from this land.

And I went on to say:

> There is in Portneuf a provincial forestry school where, each year, sons of farmers follow seasonal classes. I feel that it would be wise to encourage by grants the reforestation of some parts of the unproductive farms, as this would create a substantial asset for the coming generation.

May I also bring to the attention of the minister, in order to stress the importance of this legislation, extracts from a lecture delivered before the chamber of commerce and the Kiwanis club of the constituency of Portneuf by Mr. Armand Fafard, forestry engineer with the forestry information bureau of the Quebec department of lands and forests. His duties are to visit the farms and farm woodlots where farmers wish to practice reforestation and to give farmers valuable advice about reforestation schemes or a more economical operation of farm woodlots.

In these circumstances I want to commend Mr. Fafard for the wonderful job he has done in the constituency of Portneuf where quite a number of farm plots call for rehabilitation through reforestation.

According to statistics I obtained from Mr. Fafard, 309 farm owners have planted 1,270,925 seedlings since 1946. This month 114 farm owners of that constituency will be planting 315,000 seedlings.

I should like to add that a few communities in my riding have taken a special interest in this reforestation policy and to mention the most important of them. For example, in the parish of Notre-Dame-des-Anges, since 1946, 351,500 seedlings were planted on 108 plantations; in St. Basile, 177,355 seedlings were planted, on 115 plantations; in Pont Rouge, 165,100 seedlings, on 82 plantations; in St. Raymond, 103,050 seedlings on 48 plantations, and in St. Ubald, where I live, 109,975 seedlings on 72 plantations. May I add that most of the communities in my riding have taken advantage of this policy.

I would also like to quote a few of the statements made by Mr. Fafard in a speech delivered before the members of the Kiwanis club and of the chamber of commerce.

The function of that office—the one referred to—which could also be called a forestry publicity service, is to encourage all woodlot owners to operate their woodlots successfully, to make owners more aware of the importance of the forest in the national, regional and domestic economy, to make them love and respect trees, to convince them that the forest, like farming land, must be attended to and improved, so that its products may gain in volume and value; in a word, its function is to teach the woodlot farmer about forestry, to provide him with such technical assistance he may need in the development of his woodlot or maple bush, in his reforestration operations and also in marketing his wood products.

And further:

We believe that, in the near future, the area of private woodlots will be extended considerably, because large areas, formerly used for agriculture, are no longer considered profitable. On these pieces of land, the natural growth is rather good when there are seed-trees in close proximity. Elsewhere, reforestation is a must.

I could thus go on reading these extracts to prove how important it is to concern ourselves with this problem of the reforestation of our farms.

Here are a few excerpts, Mr. Speaker, from an interview given by Mr. Fafard following his conference. The questions were put by an expert in the field:

Mr. Maheux: Mr. Fafard are farmers generally interested in rehabilitating areas of their farms which have become marginal?

Mr. Fafard: There is no doubt about it judging by the applications. There are more of them from year to year. Are you aware that since 1942 the "Bureau des Renseignements forestiers" (Forest Information Bureau) has dealt with more than 7,000 reforestation projects and that over 15 million young trees have been planted on farms?

Mr. Maheux: A very good start. In your opinion, Mr. Fafard, is the demand for plants going to level off or increase over several years?

Mr. Fafard: I am sure it will. Agriculture is changing and many marginal lands will be given up. Non-productive land is a liability to the province. As a case in point, Mr. Maheux, may I say that sometimes the soil is so exhausted that reforestation cannot be planned before it has been regenerated?

Mr. Maheux: Are those who have done reforestation since 1952 satisfied?

Mr. Fafard: I would say that people who have done reforestation some 15 or 20 years ago are our best boosters. Their neighbours, convinced by that successful planting, now also want to make all of their plots of land productive.

Mr. Maheux: Incidentally, Mr. Fafard, are planters really aware that reforestation is a long term investment?

Mr. Fafard: Certainly, and we congratulate them on providing for the future of those who will replace them. Besides, most of them are proud to show us around their plantation.

Mr. Speaker, like Mr. Fafard, I should also like to congratulate those who took to reforestation in the Portneuf riding, as several of them are over 60 years old and will certainly not see the results of their planting. On the other hand, they are citizens who have the next generation in mind and who will be quite delighted to hand down such a legacy to their successors.

I believe this policy will serve a double purpose in my riding because, in the light of a statement made by the chairman of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, there will be a growing demand for raw materials in this field in the future. In fact, at the 47th annual convention of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, Mr. R. M. Fowler stated:

In his report to the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association meeting in Montreal at their 47th annual convention, the chairman of the association, Mr. R. M. Fowler, pointed out that productivity, in the pulp and paper industry, the largest export industry in Canada, had gone up almost 50 per cent since 1949.

Canadian production potential, last year, was 90,000 tons more than in 1959. In 1959 and 1958, the increase in production had reached 282,000 and 483,000 tons respectively.

Mr. Speaker, this is an industry which is very important to the economy of my riding, where many pulp and paper companies are located. Among them, there is the Building Products Ltd. at Pont-Rouge, whose workers are now on strike. Here may I express my sympathy to those workers, as they have been on strike since September.

There is also the Donnacona Paper Corporation, at Donnacona, the J. Ford and Co., at Portneuf, the St. Raymond Paper, at Chute-Panet, the World Plywood Veneer, at St. Casimir, and the Precision Panels Inc., at St. Basile. The yearly payrolls of those industries in Portneuf county amount to $6,796,000.

In the lumber industry, the payroll amounts to $449,575.

In addition, the coal industry also contributes to the economy of Portneuf county.

It is therefore very important that we take some interest in those industries, because we can expect increased production in this field. If we want the economy to remain buoyant and if we want those companies to be in a position to obtain their materials from their present suppliers, we have to take an interest in the development of those industries.

I am glad to have had an opportunity to participate in this debate and I trust the people of Portneuf constituency will derive benefits from this bill.

For the information of Quebec farmers, I want to point out that many of them may not be aware of the existence of a provincial act which provides protection for those who engage in reforestation against any increase in municipal taxes. Here are a few excerpts of a pamphlet dealing with section 164 of this act:

I. Who can benefit from section 164?

A person who plants a few hundred or a few thousand trees on his woodlot to complement natural regeneration; or a person who reforests a fraction of an acre of cleared land runs little risk of having his assessment raised as a result of his reforestation activities. On the other hand, any person planning to reforest cleared land over an area of an acre or more should avail himself of section 164. Assessors may, in preparing an assessment roll, ignore the fact that a portion of the property to be assessed is now covered with seedlings; however, there is no guarantee that they will in 10, 15 or 25 years hence, fail to take into account the promising stand that has grown from those seedlings. It is therefore wise to look to the future.

II. What is required to enjoy the benefits of section 164?

A land owner who decides to reforest a particular area of his property need only, to avail himself of section 164, send notice in writing, before starting the work, to the secretary-treasurer of the municipality wherein is located the cadastral lot on which he plans to carry out reforestation, to the effect that he plans to reforest so many acres on the said lot and wishes to avail himself of section 164 of the Forests and Lands Act.

It is therefore most important that those interested in reforestation be aware of the benefits available under the act.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. members for allowing me to make these few remarks, and I again thank the minister for introducing a bill which will certainly benefit the citizens of the constituency of Portneuf.

(Text):

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this has been an interesting and useful debate. Indeed, during this session no more important legislation will be debated than this bill introduced by my distinguished constituent, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton). For eastern Ontario, sir, and for my own county of Carleton in particular, this bill will be of basic and long range significance. I believe it will exert a profound influence upon our whole agricultural future.

For many years, I have believed, and in many speeches I have said, that fundamental to any long range, rational approach to the relief of agricultural problems is the institution of a genuine national soil and water conservation program. Accordingly, sir, I welcome wholeheartedly this measure designed for the achievement of such a program.

Essential to the success of any such program is that it be a genuinely co-operative effort of government—federal, provincial and municipal—community organizations, groups and individuals. That co-operation this legislation, as I understand it, will seek to achieve.

Under this bill three types of projects are contemplated. First, there are projects for the alternative use of farm lands which are submarginal, marginal or of low productivity. This development of alternative uses may include the encouragement of farm woodlots, tree farming, county forests, and reversion into crown lands. By providing for more effective utilization of marginal farm lands these projects in the long range will provide new sources of income for people in the area and to the extent that they remove marginal lands from farm use will help to reduce farm surpluses.

In the December, 1960 news bulletin of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture I was interested to see quoted with approval an extract from a speech made as long ago as 1951 by one of the finest citizens eastern Ontario has ever produced. I refer to the late hon. member for Lanark, Dr. W. G. Blair, whose untimely death cut off his career at the threshold of its greatest opportunity. These were the words of Dr. Blair:

With the per unit margin of profit growing smaller with each passing month, soon none but the best farms will be able to provide a decent standard of living for a farm family. With the demand for lumber growing each year, and with our forest reserves being cut rapidly, now would appear to be the ideal time to urge upon the proper authorities the need for reforesting all marginal and submarginal land that is now under cultivation. This would assure wood products for generations to come, and should provide a natural coverage to control the water level and spring run-off.

Those words of Dr. Blair quoted with approval by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture were prophetic, demonstrating as they did Dr. Blair's vigorous support for conservation, reforestation and intelligent land use.

The second type of project under this particular legislation contemplates the development of new income and employment opportunities for rural areas. With very great interest I have read the evidence taken before the Senate committee on land use. That is a committee which has done a most excellent job. I refer to the evidence regarding the success in many parts of the United States of the rural rehabilitation program in attracting local industry, developing recreational facilities, extending technical training, and encouraging a genuine community effort of self-help. The emulation of that effort in eastern Ontario would be most helpful. What has been done in so many United States communities, we can do in eastern Ontario and elsewhere in Canada.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, this legislation contemplates joint projects with the provinces for the development and conservation of our water and soil resources. The introduction by the government of the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was an act of great constructive statesmanship. Under it large sums of public money have been expended to the great advantage of our western farmers and to the advantage of all Canada. In the maritimes, the Maritime Marshland Reclamation Act has been showing excellent results. In many of the valleys of old Ontario simply superlative conservation work is being done. This legislation heralds the placing of these programs of soil and water conservation on a truly national basis.

However, I believe it would be unfortunate if the house were to treat these projects as isolated ones insulated from other aspects of agricultural policy. In fact, the projects now proposed are an integral part of the whole agricultural program related directly to the fundamental issue of price stabilization, the problem of disposal of farm surpluses, the extension of adequate farm credit facilities and the provision of crop insurance.

Mr. Speaker, the objective of agricultural policy must be to establish and retain family-owned, family-sized farm units, but units of such size and efficiency that will enable the farm family to earn an income equivalent to that earned by those in other comparable vocations with comparable investment.

During the past 15 years, agriculture has experienced a virtual revolution in technology, farm methods and techniques. Agricultural scientists today are in general agreement that mechanization and other technological advances have rendered obsolete the traditional 100-acre unit of eastern Ontario except for highly specialized production. As one observes the extent of abandonment of farm lands in eastern Ontario—or the partial abandonment with owners running a few stockers and grazers and gaining their principal income from "off-farm" employment—the opinion of the technical agriculturalists appears to be confirmed. Yet there are still many small farm units in my county of Carleton which, under intensive cultivation and efficient management, are producing for their owners satisfactory returns and which give indication of continuing to do so.

In any consideration of agricultural policy we must never lose sight of the fact that the family-owned, family-operated farm is a social institution. Such a farm has a threefold significance. It is a business venture; it is a home; it is a way of life. Let it never be forgotten that the integrity of the farm home has been a basic reason for the strength of our Canadian nationhood.

In that most valuable study of Canadian agriculture entitled "Progress and Prospects of Canadian Agriculture" prepared by Dr. W. M. Drummond and Mr. William Mackenzie for the royal commission on economic prospects, there is at page 316 a discussion of the net income per farm by provinces, the study of which I would commend to all hon. members. The table appearing at that page shows that the 1951-55 average net farm income was $2,772, a very meagre return indeed for the farm family upon the invested capital and labour involved. This figure varies from a low of $963 in Nova Scotia to a high of $3,758 in Saskatchewan.

I confess that I was somewhat taken aback by the table which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) placed on Hansard at page 1403 in presenting the resolution preceding the introduction of this bill. The table indicated that, according to the economic classification of farms in the 1956 census, 21 per cent of Canadian farms produced less than $1,200 worth of produce annually; that out of a total of 575,015 farms 120,242 produced less than $1,200. This is subsistence farming at its worst.

What unfortunately has happened in the older sections of Canada is that many farmers have made their living out of depreciation; depreciation of their soil resources, their buildings, their fences. Depreciation of their capital assets generally has provided the profit from which the farmers survived.

Marginal Lands Development

Many more farmers close to the urban areas above become increasingly dependent upon off-farm employment and earnings. On such a basis a healthy farm industry cannot be founded.

As a nation Canada has been the most profligate of all countries in her treatment of her greatest natural asset, the upper six inches of our soil. The depredations made upon those upper six inches is little short of appalling. We now see where that profligacy is leading us. We now recognize that we cannot afford longer to be so profligate with this greatest of all our natural assets, and this legislation constitutes an intelligent and courageous advance in meeting the problem of soil and water conservation.

Throughout Canada the last 15 years have brought about a major reorganization of farm businesses, including a reduction in the number of farms and an enlargement of the average size of farm. This process of consolidation has meant an increase in the need for capital for additional machines and larger inventories of producing livestock.

Technological processes have increased production per acre and per animal. The adjustment of agricultural production to the use of mechanical power and the application of new techniques of production has taken place with really astonishing rapidity, and has not only increased the volume of production per acre and per animal but has brought about a reduction in the labour force to only 70 per cent of the pre-war level.

A statistical analysis of farming in my own county of Carleton is both interesting and relevant. In 1951 there were 3,104 farms in the county of Carleton having a total acreage of 473,644 acres. By 1956, the latest date for which census statistics are available, the number of farms had declined to 2,743 with a total acreage of 444,509 acres. So in just five years 361 families had left the farm and 29,135 acres had been taken out of agricultural production. That trend has unfortunately continued at an accelerated pace.

In 1951 the average area per farm in Carleton county was 152.6 acres. By 1956 consolidation of holdings had raised the average acreage to 162.1 acres.

The statistics of the sizes of Carleton county farms are interesting. Of the 2,743 farms in 1956 there were 800 farms of less than 70 acres; these would be mostly market gardens supplying the city of Ottawa. There were 1,120 farms of between 70 and 130 acres; 679 farms of between 130 and 240 acres; 116 farms of between 240 acres and 400 acres; 24 farms of between 400 and 760 acres, and four farms of over 760 acres.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

Mr. Speaker, the government of Ontario has recently published a most excellent booklet called "An economic survey of the eastern Ontario region", that region which we who live in it know colloquially as the golden triangle. To all hon. members I commend the reading of this interesting publication from which I have drawn my statistics, covering as it does the area from Kingston on the St. Lawrence through to the Quebec boundary and up the Ottawa river from the riding of my hon. friend from Glengarry-Prescott (Mr. Villeneuve) to the most northerly section of the riding of Renfrew North.

For eastern Ontario there is another aspect of this legislation to which I should draw attention. I believe this proposed legislation should have an especially profound effect in the national capital region. One of the objectives of the national capital plan has been to provide a balanced urban-rural development in this area on both sides of the Ottawa river. The acquiring of the Gatineau park on the Quebec shore and the institution of a green belt on the Ontario side are basically designed for that purpose.

Within the green belt it is essential that proper conservation techniques should be employed; measures of the type envisaged by this legislation, reforestation of the submarginal lands, control of erosion, control of water resources, scientific development and utilization of the productive lands. This is essential, and it is essential now, unless the green belt is to become a weed belt, which the people of Canada would never tolerate.

Outside the green belt, in Carleton and in the constituency of my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Tardif), the provisions of this legislation have special significance. A balanced rural development, with new population concentrated into properly planned hamlets, is essential to the nation's capital.

The gradual taking out of production of marginal and submarginal lands, their reforestation, the control of the rivers and creeks, the control of spring run-off and conservation of our water resources, the prevention of pollution—these essential features can be achieved under this legislation with the co-operation of the provinces and the municipalities.

The more productive lands will be freed from the depressing effects of surpluses; they will have greater stability of income, greater opportunity for capital improvement of soil resources through drainage and improved cultivation, for improvement of farm buildings and fences.

In this generally rich agricultural area of eastern Ontario I can foresee this legislation meaning a general "face-lift" so that Ottawa, which is the shire town, the county town of Carleton, as well as being the nation's capital, will be surrounded by a balanced, profitable agricultural development.

Mr. Speaker, the true need of agriculture is not some gaudy panacea; it is not some cure-all. It is the establishment of positive objectives for agriculture, the acceptance of equity for agricultural producers as a fundamental right and the recognition that this must be achieved by progressive steps, deliberately taken, based upon sensible, rational, social and economic principles.

As I searched for a way to express to the house my deep conviction on this subject there came to my mind a speech made 18 years ago by a great Canadian, a leader of my party, a man whose dedication to the cause of agriculture has been the abiding crusade, the overwhelming ambition, of his life. These are the words of John Bracken spoken to the Holstein-Friesian breeders' association on February 3, 1943:

> It is not foreordained that farmers as a class shall work for less pay than anybody else; > or have their children receive, in many areas, only one quarter of the chance of a secondary education or one tenth of the chance of a university education that other children get;
> or see their wives forced by economic circumstances into lives of toil, often 12 but sometimes 14 hours a day, all too often Sundays and holidays included.

Fortunately, these statistics have improved in the past 18 years, particularly since 1957. I continue:

> These things are not inevitable, and they are not creditable to Canada.
> There is no just reason why any farm people in Canada should be forced into the position of poor relations of the rest of society.
> No one in urban life that I know of wants to see an inferior economic status fastened upon rural people. No one deliberately plans to keep rural people at these disadvantages.
> Farmers don't want handouts from the state. They want markets at fair prices for what they produce. Failing that, they want—and have every justification for expecting—a fair relationship to exist between the prices of what they sell and the prices of what they buy and have to pay for, including labour. They want a square deal. They ask for no more than that; and society cannot, in decency, give them less.

Sir, these words of this outstanding Canadian come ringing back to me 18 years later, for they express more adequately than any words of my own could, my attitude toward agricultural policy. They express the basic objective of this government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question. The hon. gentleman I think said, "The words echoed in my mind". Would the hon. gentleman assure us they were not his words originally?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I can give the hon. member my fullest assurance in relation to that, although I may have played some part at the time in regard to the policy that was then being initiated.

This government is erecting an edifice of balanced, co-ordinated farm policy designed to cure the situations described by Mr. Bracken. It has four cornerstones; each cornerstone is a legislative advance achieved since 1957. Basic is price stabilization, provided by the agricultural products stabilization act, designed to prevent violent fluctuations in price. On the second corner is the Farm Credit Act, a major advance from the old farm loan board; and on the third, the Crop Insurance Act; and now with this agricultural rehabilitation and development bill the fourth cornerstone is laid and the edifice of a balanced agricultural policy may be proceeded with.

Mr. Speaker, it was fluid milk at 80 cents a hundred which drove me from the farm and which educated me in the law. The memories of farm prices at those disaster levels made me resolve that if ever it was my privilege to serve my fellow citizens, my first dedication would be to an attempt to bring to the farmers of my native historic Carleton a position of social and economic equality with those in other callings. I proclaim that as the first principle of my political creed, and because this bill is a major step toward the achievement of that aim—that principle—it has my enthusiastic support.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, it is not my custom to participate in every agricultural debate in this house, but it is a pleasure for me to say a few words, and they shall be few because I do not make a positive correlation between the length of my remarks and the intensity of my support for any legislation.

I should like to say that this bill commends itself most enthusiastically to my judgment, and I would like to compliment the minister for his initiative in bringing it forward. This is my first opportunity to speak in regard to agriculture since he assumed that important portfolio, but I can say since he has taken on these duties he has been twice in the province of Prince Edward Island and has been well received there, and is highly regarded for his actions and utterances therein.

I am not a farmer, as nearly all preceding speakers this afternoon have been, but since I represent some of the best farmers in the business I feel emboldened to make a comment or two.

An hon. Member: Tut, tut, tut, tut.

Mr. Macquarrie: While in the city of Charlottetown not long ago I had the opportunity of attending a Rotary club luncheon in honour of the Prince Edward Island winners of outstanding prizes at the royal winter fair, and it was stated there that never in the history of a province had there been so many winners.

Following the example of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill)—and I follow his example in so many things—I am emboldened to speak in regard to this agricultural field. Similarly, as the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), whose eloquence and experience far surpasses mine, I have been especially moved by this bill because it is one of those fundamental pieces of legislation which deals not merely with an institution or an ad hoc situation, but with something very vital and fundamental not only to our way of life but indeed to life itself. I can remember as a small boy hearing the member of parliament for Queens county, the late Mr. Myers, make a speech, and I have never forgotten his words. He said the whole of life, and all that life has become, depends entirely upon the top six inches of the soil covering the earth. Surely the farmer and the agriculturist must be the first citizen of us all in terms of importance. Surely it is an ancient and honourable industry.

A writer who has always impressed me by the depth of his thought and the width of his vision was Louis Bromfield, who was always so concerned with the way we North Americans denuded the great resources which were found on this continent, and how we mined the soil so often instead of working it properly, and how the riches, which were here when the settlers from Europe came, have so often been diminished and indeed denuded.

No one from my province, so far as I know, has participated in this debate but, because Prince Edward Island is called the million acre farm, and I think quite rightly, I am happy to say that this bill will be most meaningful and helpful to that province which is known as the garden province. The hon. member for Carleton in his reticent modesty, or modest reticence, referred to that area he called the golden triangle, but I might say that our area has often been called the fertile crescent of Prince Edward Island.

When the hon. minister and his expert officials continue their study of the resources involved in this vast frontal attack which they have embarked upon, they will find that much of the work has already been done in Prince Edward Island. A great scholar, Dr. A. H. Clark has published a book entitled "Three Centuries and the Island", and has gone back in the geographical, historical, sociological and economic situations for three centuries. As is stated in the dust jacket of the book, he went back to a time before the potato was born. That is a fairly long time. The book includes tremendously accurate and comprehensive sets of statistics which I would commend to the experts of the minister's department who will be carrying on statistical studies in relation to this legislation.

Prince Edward Island, like the area mentioned by the hon. member who has just spoken, has long been a region of small farms and independent farmers. We have always had limited acreage, and if it were not for the fact that we were able to produce excellent crops such as the potato—the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery) is not in the house so perhaps I will affirm that the Prince Edward Island potato is the outstanding potato of any on the market—we might have suffered from some of those things the hon. member has just mentioned.

We have not suffered from a decline in farm income as the recent statistics indicate, but there has been a steady departure from farms. Although the province of Prince Edward Island, in recent years has had an increase in population, it is not as populous now as it was in the 1890's. The 1891 census showed a population of 105,000 people. It is only recently that we have again reached the 100,000 mark. This arises from the departure from the farms of many of our young people. My colleague the Minister of Fisheries once said that the polling district in which he lives has now as many people on the voter's list as were qualified to vote in the days before the women of the country were given the franchise. The number of our abandoned and vacant farms is, I think, the most fundamental problem in our province. It is fundamental not only in agricultural terms but in human terms, because it indicates the constant export of our greatest resource, our young people, to other parts of the continent. For a long time, as everyone knows, the maritime provinces contributed to the great intellectual development of New England and there are very few maritime families that do not have a branch or two in New England, that intellectual heart of the republic. In the maritimes we are now contributing to the growth of Toronto. Probably this is one of the reasons why this city is developing so rapidly and reaching a degree of acceptance that it did not have in years gone by.

The future of agriculture in Prince Edward Island will be brightened by what this bill foretells. We must have not so much more specialization but greater diversification. Vacant farms must be brought into productivity. A wider range of agricultural commodities must be developed. Within the last two or three years we have been developing with great success tobacco crops in the eastern portion of our province. This offers new vistas. This is also true of activities in the small fruits field, and certainly in reforestation. In the early days, as Professor Clark points out, there were great stands of pine in Prince Edward Island. It was a heavily forested province. It has not been denuded of trees nor has it suffered from unwise cutting down of forests which has caused erosion in so many parts of Canada, but nevertheless there are areas which might now be turned to profitable forest production.

I may say to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) that, when he starts his activity, which is a co-operative venture, he will find few provinces better prepared in a legislative way than the province of Prince Edward Island. In that province we already have an exhaustive plan for a comprehensive resources survey, an economic development program which will dovetail magnificently with this A.R.D.A. bill.

I should like to particularize; I should like to be specific, as was the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), but at this stage I will say only generally that in the A.R.D.A. bill we have but one more of those pieces of legislation which will do a great deal to bring not only material gain to the maritime provinces but an uplift in spirit, because agriculture in the maritime provinces needs this. For instance we are today importing things which we should be exporting. Leadership, mobilization of ability from the dominion authority, co-operation with the provincial governments, will fit in with the new spirit that prevails in our eastern seaboard provinces and will bring to our major and ancient industry a new feeling of confidence which we hope will be reflected in an increase in population, in an increased diversity to our income. It is another forward step, and there have been a great many in the last four years, to bridge that gap which too long has existed in economic standards between the maritime provinces and the rest of Canada.

Because I firmly believe that this is one of the most imaginative steps that has been taken by the government, I heartily endorse this A.R.D.A. bill and commend the minister on his vision and initiative in bringing it forward.

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, it may not be unfitting for one from the far west to follow the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), who gave us a picture of his local agricultural situation, and the hon. member for Queens, to say something about agriculture in western Canada as applied to this particular bill.

Let me say at the outset, sir, that the only governments that ever have shown any initiative or interest in soil and water conservation have been Conservative governments.

Mr. McIlraith: What about water conservation on the eastern slope of the Rockies?

Mr. Brunsden: I repeat the statement, sir, the only governments that ever have shown any interest in water and soil conservation—and I am speaking now particularly of the west—have been Conservative governments, of which this is one.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Brunsden: I go back to the days of the 1930's—

Mr. McIlraith: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Brunsden: Will you help me by waiting until I conclude my remarks.

Mr. McIlraith: It is relevant.

Mr. Brunsden: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: My question is, will the hon. member tell the house what government it was that passed the measure having to do with water conservation on the east slope of the Rockies?

Mr. Brunsden: The Prairie Farm Rehabilition Act was Conservative policy.

Mr. Argue: Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. Brunsden: That is not water conservation. I am sorry, but the hon. member for Assiniboia is confused. He is confusing water and soil conservation, with crop relief. The only governments that have shown any interest in water and soil conservation have been Conservative governments and this is a statement that cannot be challenged.

Mr. Pickersgill: I challenge it right now. I hope the hon. gentleman does not get very near Mr. Gardiner for some time, after making that statement.

Mr. Brunsden: Believe me, sir, I live in the province of Alberta and I remember when the government under the leadership of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was formed. He introduced the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. It was his own initiative; it was established by him and his government, and it has continued to this day.

With regard to the comment made by my friend from Bonavista-Twillingate, let me say that Mr. Gardiner made a very fine political vehicle out of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act for a good many years. In the west we are concerned with this bill. We think it is long overdue. We would have liked to see it many years ago. We now have it. It means a great deal to us. There are large areas in western Canada—and I think no one realizes this more than the Minister of Agriculture—which, by reason of deficient rainfall and certain other natural impoverishments, simply cannot continue on a crop production basis.

My hon. friend from Queens talked about trees; my hon. friend from Carleton talked about market gardening in the Ottawa area. They have their problems. Our problem is that of tremendous tracts of land without too sound a basis. Our objective must be changed. We must bring about some reforms. We must convert large areas now devoted to the plow, the seed drill and the binder or reaper, to natural grass as was the case many years ago.

I have said in the house before that a large section of western Canada lies within what we call the Palliser triangle, an area of very limited rainfall. Last week I was in my constituency on official business and what did I find? I found that we have had no rainfall and very little snowfall. Each year for the last four years we have had less and less precipitation, and I hope the minister will appreciate in relation to the bill before us, that each year for the last four years we have moved more and more toward the drought conditions of the thirties.

As far as I am concerned as a resident of western Canada, as one who has spent his adult life in Alberta, I feel that a very grave emergency is arising. I am delighted that finally, for the first time in the history of Canada, we are to have a comprehensive program which seeks to alleviate and control the problem we face in the prairie provinces.

I have spoken before of the diminishing water supply in western Canada. We are building the South Saskatchewan dam and I think one of the reasons it is being rushed to completion is the small supply of domestic water in the towns and villages of Saskatchewan. This reduced supply of domestic water comes about by virtue of the fact that each year the run-off from the eastern shed of the Rockies is less and less. That is true of my district. I live in an area which has 200,000 irrigated acres and we have witnessed with alarm the receding water supply. We need water conservation and this bill promises it to us. I should like to commend the minister and to say to him and through him to the government which I am proud to support, that this is one of the most progressive steps, agriculturally, that has been taken by any government in the history of Canada.

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks on the bill I should first like to express my congratulations to the minister for all he has done on behalf of agriculture since he took over the portfolio. I am sure that the farmers of Canada appreciate the great effort he is putting into his work. This farm rehabilitation program is something that should have been thought about many years ago. I have farmed for upward of 23 years and when I first started in 1937 we had a Liberal government which never gave any thought to such a program. I remember the year 1938 when wheat was 40 cents a bushel and cattle four or five cents a pound. I remember the years of the drought with the dust flying across the country. What did the Liberals do to rectify that situation? Absolutely nothing. A horrible war began and took the Liberals off the hook.

Today we have a very important piece of legislation before the house, and when I go home and tell my farmers how the obstructionists of the Liberal party this morning delayed consideration of this bill by the house today, I do not know what those farmers will say.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not intended to come forward today.

Mr. Smallwood: I thought that was a terrible thing to do in respect of very important legislation like this. They have sat in their seats today. Not one of them has risen to say a word about the bill. They cannot make political hay out of it so they have not a word to say. They just sit there in their seats.

The government realizes the importance of agriculture and has brought in a great deal of legislation to help the industry. I remember when they brought in advances on wheat. Our Liberal friends said that it could not be done, that it was a terrible thing, that it could not be worked out. It has proved successful. The government introduced acreage payments to help the farmers. The Social Crediters in the Alberta legislature cried for two days for a two-price system. They do not know what a two-price system is because that was a two-price system. Our farmers were paid $42 million and we consumed 50 million bushels of wheat which means almost 90 cents a bushel. We distributed that sum to the farmers on an acreage basis but we are criticized by people for doing so.

The Department of Agriculture now handles the sale of wheat and has made a great effort to expand our sales. Just recently a big sale was made to red China which is going to bring a lot of currency into our country and develop the industry. The western farmer would like to save his money but he will spend that money and it will return to Ontario where industry is located.

The Liberals had a great circus last January at the Ottawa coliseum and they said they would recognize red China, but what did the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) say about this sale of wheat?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have been following the hon. member with interest but I fail to see how what he is saying or has been saying for some time is connected with the bill.

Mr. Argue: A Tory filibuster.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, the bill is relevant to what we have done for agriculture. The South Saskatchewan dam is in line with the bill from the point of view of water conservation. We have brought in crop insurance. I would say to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton), and I trust he will heed what I am saying, that I hope he will pick the best men he can possibly find to administer this legislation and not make use of political patronage as the previous government did under Jimmy Gardiner in trying to spread their political views among the farmers. I hope we will not do that. I am sure we have not and will not because we simply want to help the farmers. That is the main idea of the government.

This program will be of great assistance to the farm families. The government has always taken a great interest in farm families. A farm family is rather hard to define but I would say it is the family that believes that farming is a way of life and a wonderful education for young people. Some of our great men were farm boys and benefited from the education they received.

This bill refers to the development of alternative economic uses for marginal agricultural land. Examples of this are the encouragement of farm woodlots, of tree farming, of county forests, of reversion into crown lands, recreational areas and so on in eastern Canada. Last year, Mr. Speaker, I was fortunate enough to be able to travel through eastern Canada. I saw these small farms at that time which consisted of a few acres under cultivation and on which there was a milk cow. The farmer was trying to raise a family on the income derived from these farms. I noticed the same situation in parts of Quebec and New Brunswick. I feel that this bill will be of great assistance to these farmers because they will be able to start in the wood business and in the production of pulpwood. I admit that it will take years to see any results from this program. At least it is a start toward assisting these farmers to earn a livelihood for their families.

The conversion to grass of marginal cropping land in western Canada by means of the community pasture technique and encouraging wildlife habitat areas, recreation development and crop diversification are other examples. In certain parts of the west there is land being farmed which should be turned over to grass for the production of cattle. This step could be taken under this act with the assistance of the government. Some of this land has been farmed for years, and this year, particularly in my part of Alberta, we have noticed that the water level has dropped drastically. Many people who have cattle are already concerned about water and pasture. If we do not get our June rains, some of these people are going to be in dire circumstances. It is comforting to realize that under this act a program for water conservation could be developed.

Just recently the P.F.R.A. organization has moved into our area. The farmers are now able to obtain dams and dugouts, so there is going to be an abundance of water for the cattle. This government changed the farm loan board to the farm credit corporation, and this move is working out very well. The young farmer is able to get a start through the credit provided by this organization, and those farmers already established can expand their operations into an economic unit.

These community pastures are very important. There are a few of them being organized in Alberta. I am very interested in a tract of land in my constituency which was purchased by the previous government to add to the Wainwright army camp. This land is used for army manoeuvres for only two or three weeks during the year. I would be interested in having the Department of Agriculture investigate the possibility of making better use of that land by turning it into a community pasture. Many of our farmers are short of pasture land and, therefore, have had to reduce the size of their herds. They are going to find it very difficult to finance their operations if they cannot keep cattle on their farms.

I do not think I should take up much more of the time of the house, but I should like to express my thanks to the minister for all the work he has done in connection with this measure.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise really for the purpose of asking a question of the minister before he closes the debate. I think everyone, no matter how non-rural his constituency may be, is greatly impressed with a measure of this kind which is designed to improve the conditions of life in that part of our community which we all know means so much to the whole life of the state. I was once, before I was sent about my business, a representative of a rural constituency containing some of the most beautiful farmland in Ontario. I got to know something about farming and realized the great distress and difficulties which even in good areas have arisen and which have been so clearly exposed today by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell).

The question I want to ask the minister is this. It is in connection with the other activities which the measure contemplates, and which we all hope will be highly successful. Will there be regard for the increasing need of education which will arise to the extent that the measure succeeds in its aims? When I say "education", I do not mean merely technical education but education in its broader aspects because it is well known that we all look to the country for leaders in the professions, in business and politics. I am thinking of a broader education, not merely technical education, which those in the country and who can have such an influence on our whole way of life, should have. I am quite satisfied the minister, with his own background in the teaching profession, would be the last one to be careless about this or to ignore it.

I raise the question merely because I should like to have the matter mentioned. Those of us who have even a tincture of Scottish blood in us like to look back to Scotland where, in the poorest country homes education was cherished and from the most unlikely surroundings the most distinguished people arose to guide and assist the life of the state.

Mr. G. D. Clancy (Yorkton): I wish to take a small part in this debate. I should like to sincerely pay a compliment to our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) whom I have known for many years. I know that this type of legislation is not only very dear to his heart but is something upon which he has spent a good many years. I was very surprised this morning to hear the official opposition state this was a controversial measure. I cannot understand how the principle of the bill can be controversial in any part of Canada. There could be controversy over details, but certainly not on the general principle of the bill.

This measure, as has been said before in this house, is long overdue. It is a bold step and it is being taken without any hope of political kudos in the immediate future. It is a long term measure. As the minister has said, the implementation of the bill will involve the co-operation of every level of government, municipal, provincial and federal. As a member from a constituency which has a very wide range of problems, I think I can speak for my constituents when I say that we welcome this legislation.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. F. J. W. Fane (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I, like the other members who have spoken, feel that I must first congratulate the minister upon the introduction of this Bill No. C-77. During the six months during which he has taken over the Department of Agriculture he has been untiring in his efforts on behalf of the farmers of Canada. He has travelled the country over and has obtained the opinions of farmers of all kinds throughout Canada with regard to this bill. Consequently he has a wide and accurate knowledge of the good this bill will do.

At this time I feel that I should thank the minister for giving me the opportunity of being host to him in my constituency at the town of Andrew in January of this year when he was on his tour of all the provinces of Canada. He made a very good impression on the farmers in my area and he was very well received. His reception was much different from that of his predecessor once removed, in 1957, in that same town of Andrew. I am speaking now of Right Hon. James Garfield Gardiner who, when he was Liberal minister of agriculture, addressed a meeting in the same hall in which the present Minister of Agriculture spoke.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have been listening to the hon. member's line of argument and it seems to me that it is somewhat removed from the principle in the bill. Perhaps he could come back to that matter.

Mr. Fane: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I will return to the bill. I was just building up to it. As a matter of fact, I was just about to say that the minister was also to be congratulated on the sale of grain to the people of mainland China. That is a step very much in the right direction. It will in time acquaint those people more fully with our way of life. Perhaps as a result they will be less of a problem to us in the future.

I wish to say that the constituency of Vegreville which I represent is amost entirely an agricultural one. It was settled first some 90 years ago or thereabouts. At that time the farmers who settled there had no thought that in the future their land would not be so productive as it was then. At that time a farmer could sow his grain and be sure of a crop. Conditions have changed.

As the son of one of the earliest farmers in that area, I can say that I have seen our most productive land become not so productive. The reason for that change is not that the farmers mine their land. You will find that almost invariably the farmer loves his land. He is proud to have possession of the land and to be able to produce from it. However, over the years the climate has changed and the fertility of the soil is becoming less apparent. Fertilizers are required. There is also not so much rain or snow in that country at the times when it is expected. As a result, family farms are not so productive.

This government has always been an exponent of the family farm as opposed to the integrated farms which are just big business farming. As I said, I have seen our area develop from one of great fertility to one which, while it is still very fertile, requires some renovation or rehabilitation. That is where this bill, No. C-77, will be of great assistance. Even the grass land in our country does not produce grass of the same quality as that which it produced 60, 50 or even 40 years ago.

This bill provides for the alternative use of farm lands. I know that matter has been mentioned many times in this debate. The alternative use of farm land means the development of alternative and economic uses of our marginal agricultural land. That is something that most farmers have on their farms in some measure. I refer to marginal areas. Just outside the town of Vegreville in my constituency, an experimental substation is established for experimenting with a submarginal soil in our area called solonetz soil. It is doing very good work. It was established some six or seven years ago and uses have been established for soil that previously was useless.

I may say that this bill also provides that reduction of the number of farms is not an object of this project. If the number is reduced, the farms cannot be called family farms any longer and they will become big businesses. On behalf of the people in my constituency of Vegreville I wish to say that I am pleased to see the Minister of Agriculture bringing this bill forward and I support it very strongly.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Cumberland.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I am next door to Cumberland; hence you are not too far out in the designation of the constituency.

I should just like to say a few words on the bill now before the house to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada. I commend the minister for this bill. The reason I am speaking on this matter is because I believe it will be of the utmost importance to the province of Nova Scotia and especially to my constituency, the county of Pictou. As was pointed out in the statistics, 61 per cent of the farmers in the province of Nova Scotia earn under $1,200 per year. This is the highest percentage, next to Newfoundland.

This bill is a wide and most general one. It will take some time, as was pointed out by the minister, to get it working. One of the most important things about it, as I see it, is that it enables the minister to enter into agreements with provincial governments or agencies to undertake jointly with these governments and agencies the provisions of the bill. That is most important. It shows a spirit of co-operation in the Department of Agriculture which I believe wlil go through this country. Indeed, the minister himself is exemplifying this spirit.

Last week the minister was in the neighbouring constituency of Colchester-Hants which is represented by my good friend on my left. The minister was attending the closing exercises of the agricultural college, which is no doubt one of the best in this country. He met with some of the farm groups in the province of Nova Scotia and he accompanied the provincial minister of agriculture, the Hon. E. D. Haliburton, who is doing as terrific a job in the province of Nova Scotia as the minister is doing here in Ottawa.

The reason I point out that the provisions of this bill are important to my constituency is that there are many vacant farms throughout the county of Pictou. For example, there are vacant farms in Lansdowne, Gairloch and throughout that area. Steps have been taken in the last few years by various individuals and some companies to grow Christmas trees in these areas. This has become quite an industry and some of these vacant farms are also growing blueberries.

I believe this bill and the A.R.D.A. program will assist with regard to many of these vacant farms, particularly in Lansdowne and Gairloch. This program will help in the growing of trees in these areas and I believe it will put new life into the agriculture of the county.

There is another area where there is a vacant farm which was owned and operated by my grandfather, the late Daniel Cameron, at Elgin, above the village of Hopewell. That was a good farm. I believe this program will be of great benefit to the Elgin area.

My late grandfather was a justice of the peace and forest ranger in the area for some while until politics stepped in. He was known as a Tory, which in those days was not the party in favour, and he was removed. Perhaps the job did not pay too much. However, that is one thing I remember from the things he told me when I was growing up; he was on the opposite side of those who were in power at that time. That probably had something to do with my attempting to come to Ottawa on the right side of the house.

I should just say that I believe this bill is an important one. As was pointed out by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), it is a means of meeting the small farm problem. The government has under consideration ways and means to improve the standard of living of farmers on small farms by better land use and improvements for small farm units.

These farms are important, and I believe this program will have a terrific impact on the province of Nova Scotia. I agree with what many hon. members have said today about this bill and I commend the minister for introducing it.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, while we are not in the position of congratulating the minister on the excellent job he has done in this connection, we certainly agree that the work which is outlined particularly in the ARDA pamphlet, is an indication that organizations across the country, the provinces and indeed all those who are interested in conservation, will be asked to give it some assistance.

We question the publication of this pamphlet prior to the passing of the bill, particularly in light of what was said about it when this matter was raised. That is, if the avowed purpose of publishing this pamphlet was to ask for additional information from farm organizations, provincial governments and others, it would have been advantageous to refer back this matter, after these questions had been asked of these various organizations, to the agricultural committee so that consideration could be given to those answers.

Unless the minister is prepared to bring in amendments which will put into effect some of the suggestions which have been made by the various organizations, I suggest that the minister, to say the least and to put it in the mildest manner, used poor judgment in presenting this as an application of the bill prior to the time it was put into effect.

In many parts of Canada this rehabilitation program, particularly for agricultural land, is of the utmost importance and necessity. Even in farming areas such as those in northern Ontario, which in many cases are less than 50 years old, we find we have already done many of the things that scientists in the agricultural field say we should not do. One of these, of course, is that we have eliminated all the reserves for water conservation in the agricultural areas and we are now experiencing a terrific run-off of our topsoil in many parts of this area. This is unusual because of the fact that it is a very new area. This is an area which has not yet been completely developed, and we are already experiencing many of the problems which have developed in other parts of the country.

I notice that we are going to ask a number of other organizations to be brought into the working of this bill. We have the stabilization act, the Farm Credit Act and the Crop Insurance Act. Much of this legislation can be utilized in this connection. I should point out that some of these measures apply very little in some areas, particularly in those areas where conservation is very badly needed.

Mr. Argue: Five o'clock.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order under which I seek instruction. I understand that this being Saturday, on your ruling we are now operating under the order of precedence applicable on Friday, which means that between five o'clock and six o'clock we will be concerned with private bills and orders. May I ask your instructions on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: That was not the substance of my earlier decision on the question of which item on the order paper should be taken first. It was that we proceed with the first item on the order paper, the order paper having been carried forward with the items in the same sequence and order that they were in at the adjournment on Friday.

I certainly did not intend to indicate that the rules specifically applicable to Friday are applicable to today. I simply had to decide which item should be called first today. I made the decision on the basis of the order paper as it was on Friday. It does not follow from that that the rules applicable to Friday also apply to today's proceedings.

To make the matter clear perhaps I should indicate to the hon. member and the house that standing order 15, which provides for the consideration of private and public bills between five o'clock and six o'clock, makes that provision specifically, with respect to Monday on page 9, and with respect to Friday on page 11, but not to any other day.

Mr. Winch: This is Saturday and I understood Your Honour to say this afternoon that we were following the procedure of the United Kingdom parliament, which is that the procedure of Friday shall be the procedure of Saturday.

Does that mean that we should now be dealing with private members' bills?

Mr. Speaker: No. The decision made earlier today had to do with which order should be called first today and that was determined in reference to the order paper as it was left on Friday night. There are a number of specific rules relating to Friday and other named days which apply only to those days unless by an express order of the house. The situation now is that today the order of precedence of business has not been provided for nor is it governed by any specific rules. It is not a government day nor is it a private members' day. We have settled precedence of business by taking the orders appearing in the order paper in sequence beginning with the first order; that being a government order, it followed that we should proceed with government orders. However I did not intend to imply that specific standing orders about the business of the house for Friday should be taken as applying to today.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, as a member from the province of Quebec, it gives me great pleasure—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I interrupted the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), as a point of order intervened when the hon. member for Timiskaming had the floor.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two on this point of order. I should like to direct your attention to Beauchesne's fourth edition where the business for Saturday is set out at page 381 under form No. 36, which reads as follows:

> That on Saturday the ....., and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the session, the house shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Fridays.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is referring to a draft form of order which unfortunately the house has not passed, so it really has no bearing on the problem. If the hon. member wishes to continue in the debate he may do so.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: Thank you Mr. Speaker. I was therefore saying that, as a member from the province of Quebec, it give me great pleasure to support the motion of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) for second reading of Bill C-77.

In describing myself as a member from the province of Quebec, I do not intend to infer that I do not regard myself as a member for the other provinces of Canada. However, our Liberal opponents often make it a point to accuse the members from Quebec of not supporting the principle of certain bills coming under the joint jurisdiction of the federal and provincial governments. I know this to be a fact because I have read about it in a number of newspapers and have often heard it stated in this house. In certain remarks which were intended to be either amusing or critical, some Liberal members from Quebec and Newfoundland have suggested that the members from the province of Quebec always drag their feet when it comes to such measures, or even ignore them completely.

Mr. Speaker, when, in the past and in recent times, the members from the province of Quebec or the government of the province have opposed certain bills introduced by the federal government, it was because they had to in view of certain conditions and in the interest of their province.

The Liberals have, in the past, taken us to task for failing to take a stand on some of those bills.

It gives me pleasure to say that in this case, the members from the province of Quebec as a group support this piece of legislation.

First of all, the bill deals with something which, under the constitution, comes under the joint responsibility of the provinces and the federal government.

Of course, it concerns the disposal of part of the provincial territories, but it must be noted that this measure respects the provisions of the constitution regarding the ownership of the lands, the soil and the territory, since the federal government will not undertake any step unless there has been a previous agreement with the province concerned.

This is an example of the kind of bill introduced by a Conservative government which is respectful of the rights of the provinces, and is at the same time anxious to fulfill its duties towards the people of Canada. This is a relief after the centralizing bills of the previous era when Liberals always used to introduce measures designed to make gradual inroads upon provincial jurisdiction in certain fields, so that they might take advantage of those infringements to increase their responsibility, and then refuse to leave the taxation fields they had grabbed during the war.

The Conservative attitude is quite different. We do not deny the existence of national problems. The problem of the distribution of arable land is one of them.

Here you have this Conservative government, respecting the constitution and the jurisdiction of the provinces, introducing a bill that takes into account the constitutional framework, which must always be taken into consideration when it is a matter of legislating for the whole of Canada.

Therefore, I want to congratulate not only the Minister of Agriculture, but the whole cabinet, for their initiative in introducing this bill entitled:

Mr. Speaker, if I were allowed to make a few remarks about the implementation of this bill, I would ask the government to see to it that, when regulations are adopted in relation to this bill, they, as well as the agreements signed between the various provinces, should be flexible enough to apply to the particular problems of each province.

There is not one province where farm problems or rural establishment problems are not altogether different from those in other provinces.

In the province of Quebec, agriculture is mostly based on the family farm principle and this will create a problem, namely the avoidance of anything that would tear whole families away from their usual surroundings for the purpose of establishing them elsewhere. Certain difficulties would arise then. But I am sure that, with the wholehearted co-operation of every provincial government, the problems will be easily settled between the parties involved, through the agreements provided in this bill.

I shall not venture to discuss the problems of other provinces, because I know that my colleagues from other provinces, especially Conservative members, are qualified to do so. However, I shall endeavour to point out in particular the problems facing the government in a possible agreement with the government of the province of Quebec.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty of requesting of the premier of the province of Quebec that he refrain from playing petty politics in this field, as he appeared to indicate during the last federal-provincial conferences on fiscal matters. I know that the premier of Quebec has only recently become a convert to autonomy but he does not seem to understand it thoroughly—

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder precisely what this attack upon the premier of Quebec has to do with the legislation before us?

Mr. Speaker: If that is the argument that is being advanced it would be difficult to connect it with this bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, I am precisely dealing with a problem, or with a bill, that especially refers to fiscal agreement between the province of Quebec and the federal government. It is a case of two governments having to discuss a joint issue. This issue will arise, not only out of agreements under this bill, but also out of joint projects in general. I was precisely stating, and I say it again for the benefit of the member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), who apparently understands only half of what I am saying—incidentally I advise him to listen to the simultaneous interpretation, and this will enable him to understand what I am saying—

The Quebec premier raised that question of joint projects. Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, I am coming back to what I was saying about the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. However, I would not want to insult him. Although I am sure he is very intelligent, blessed with a quick ear, he still cannot pretend, even if he is bilingual, that he can, at one and the same time, write a letter, listen to his neighbour, talk to someone behind him and still hear the remarks I am making in French and understand them.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has recommended to me that I should use the simultaneous translation system to listen to his remarks. It so happens, sir, that I find his remarks quite as comprehensible and quite as insulting in the one language as in the other, and I have no need of crutches of the kind the hon. gentleman has recommended to me for the purpose. I would suggest that if the hon. gentleman would address himself to the legislation before the house and not to extraneous attacks upon a former distinguished member of this house whose shoe laces he is not fit to touch, it would be better for the debate.

Mr. Speaker: I think that perhaps the latter discussion on both sides is not relevant at all to the bill or to the point of order, and I would counsel the hon. member who has the floor to return to the subject matter of the bill and not to deal with personalities.

Mr. Johnson: I do not want to prolong this discussion, but if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had listened to what I said—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows the course he should follow, and I suggest he proceed with the discussion of the principle of the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, I had been speaking of joint projects when I was interrupted by a remark completely out of order.

I was saying I hope that the province of Quebec will share in those joint programs and find solutions acceptable to its people so that the federal government may be in a position to enact regulations and propose arrangements having regard to the particular position of the provinces, especially the province of Quebec.

While I am on this subject, I was saying that I wanted to make a distinction between joint programs which come under the concurrent jurisdiction of the federal and the provinces in the field of agriculture and others mentioned by the prime minister of Quebec at the tax conference last summer, when he stated that the government of Canada ought to withdraw from joint programs and leave them entirely to the provinces.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member, as I followed him, is referring to other kinds of joint agreements between the federal authority and the provincial authority in Quebec, other than those covered by this bill, it seems to me to cite what has been said with respect to those other arrangements has no relevance to the provisions of this bill although it does permit in general terms the negotiation of agreements with the provinces. I trust that he can adapt his remarks to this direction.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, thank you for your ruling. I just want to make this distinction between these two joint programs of the federal and provincial governments. I think I made my point.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I find that the bill deals with agreements which may be concluded between the federal government, through the Minister of Agriculture, and the government of any province, or any agency of the latter, in order to establish research and investigation programs with regard to the development and conservation of water supplies and the improvement and conservation of soil in that province.

Once again, I hope that the rules will be set so as to avoid any too wide interpretation which would allow the federal government or its officials to interfere in a field which is strictly under provincial jurisdiction. It is not because the Quebec government has changed since June 22 last, that we, in Quebec, are going to reverse our principles, as happened with our friends opposite.

Mr. Speaker, I shall limit my intervention to those few remarks. I shall not presume to say that I have dealt with the whole subject. I simply wanted to bring in a few ideas and more particularly to make my humble contribution to the discussion so as to show that when the federal government introduces a joint federal-provincial project, which in no way impinges upon the jurisdiction of the provincial government of Quebec, member from that province will wholeheartedly rejoice and congratulate the minister and the government.

Marginal Lands Development

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I feel I would be remiss if I did not say a few words this afternoon about Bill No. C-77. As I have sat across the house from the good Manitoban—now the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—I have often wondered how such an eminent scholar as he is ever got to Newfoundland. Being a fellow Manitoban of some years before he saw daylight there—

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not see daylight there.

Mr. Hicks: —I feel entitled to say that he made a little error this afternoon. I should like to correct this, all in fine spirit. I wish to read from the Lethbridge Herald of Tuesday, February 28, 1961:

> Twenty five years of progress.
> While we here in south Alberta are showing special interest in the resources for tomorrow conference scheduled for the coming autumn, it seems worth while to recall that just a quarter century ago one of the finest pieces of legislation in the history of the west was passed by parliament at Ottawa.
> That was the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, for which we give full credit to the late hon. Robert Weir, then minister of agriculture in the Bennett government, and a farmer of the Melfort, Saskatchewan, constituency, who brought the measure into the house at a time when the prairie west was in a parlous state due to a combination of the lowest world price for wheat in 400 years, plus drought, plus soil drifting with its black blizzards.

Our problem in the Fraser valley is not like that of a good many other places where water is in short supply. We very often have too much water and the problem is one of drainage. All hon. members will recall the floods of 1948 and 1950. Dikes were built and after they were completed in 1949 and 1950 the understanding was that the provincial government would assume the responsibility of keeping them in good condition.

During the last winter quite a number of authorities in the Fraser valley have come to the view that the dikes have greatly deteriorated. Not only have they become lower but water gets in under them and erodes the foundation and some of the dikes are falling into the river. The board of trade of Mission City has organized quite an effort to try to get the federal government to assist in putting the dikes back into shape and they are supported by several boards of trade in the Fraser valley, those of Chilliwack, Abbotsford, Hope, Langley and so on, and also by the associated boards of trade. There is great fear that if a flood does occur some spring the result will be disastrous. If such a flood should take the same form as on the last occasion the cost would be a very serious matter not only in the case of the farms, about which I am concerned, but also in the towns and other communities.

There is a $27 million dairy industry in the Fraser valley whose product is handled by the Fraser valley milk producers association, one of the largest co-operative associations in Canada. It is well organized and anything that interferes with its operations interferes with the revenue derived from the farms. The moving of stock, the flooding of pastures and the flooding of grain are very serious matters and in my view such situations could be alleviated under Bill No. C-77 which, as I said at the resolution stage, is one of the finest bills to be brought before the house in the field of agriculture.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two comments to make. I do not come from a rural constituency but I appreciate the benefit that the bill will confer upon the economy of Canada. I should like to refer to the pamphlet explaining the bill and to correct a misapprehension as to the farming situation in British Columbia. It is indicated in the pamphlet that 46 per cent of the farms in that province have an annual income of less than $1,200. It is also shown that the figures for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are higher. I suggest that the reason for this is that we have a lot of part-time farmers in British Columbia, people who have small acreages and who may also be fishermen or lumbermen. In fact, I think the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. McQuillan) would be classed as a farmer because he happens to have five acres of land around his house.

I suspect that the bill will actually apply only to these people who are legitimate farmers and who work full-time on their farms but still cannot develop a reasonable annual income. I think that the figures in the pamphlet are somewhat misleading as to the state of agriculture in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to bring about a greater measure of conservation, improved land use and an improvement in agricultural income by means of various projects. We were pleased to support the resolution which preceded the bill and we shall vote for second reading of the bill. However, the fact that the government has introduced a measure of this kind does not tell us to what extent the government hopes to use the measure or to what extent the provinces are prepared to co-operate with the federal government. It tells us absolutely nothing about the amount of money or even the proportion of money that the government will provide for these various projects.

In introducing the resolution the minister told us he wanted to place the bill on the order paper, have first reading and then he would go back and forth across the country meeting the farm organizations and provincial governments in order to discuss projects under this bill and to learn the attitude of the provinces and the farm organizations so that he would be in a position to change the bill in any way that seemed advisable. I hope that when he closes the debate he will inform us as to how many provincial governments he has interviewed, how many are interested in this measure, how many projects he thinks may be forthcoming under the measure during the present year and to what extent the federal government is prepared to put money into this measure. After all, it is not going to be good enough to have on the record a well-worded long term program unless the government is prepared to push it.

It is fine for hon. members on the other side to get up and compliment the minister and express great support for and faith in the measure, but we are not quite so confident that the government is going to use the measure to the fullest possible extent. We have had other rather bitter experiences in the house of the government introducing measures that read well, were promoted most capably and were given a tremendous amount of publicity but under which the farmers have found they got less than under the legislation replaced by these measures and the programs for which the new legislation was substituted. I refer, of course, to the old bill 237 under which the government has allowed the prices of eggs and hogs to collapse. Therefore it is necessary to have more than good phraseology, well meaning statements and complimentary remarks.

This has been a Conservative field day, almost a Conservative filibuster, although it does not bother me too much if the Conservatives want to put forward a dozen or more speakers on the same day one after the other. The main theme of these speakers has been that the minister is a great fellow, that this is a wonderful bill, that they are a fine party, that the Liberals were in power for 22 years and did nothing and that the people had to wait for a Conservative government to introduce a measure of this kind aimed at the conservation of agricultural resources.

This bill has a title. We know that the government is stuck with the title of the act before the bill has been approved by the house. They have used the title on a pamphlet. I think it was rather insulting to parliament that the government should bring out a pamphlet entitled, "Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act" before parliament had approved or the governor general had given royal assent to that act. I think this is an affront to the House of Commons. This is a rather stupid way to conduct public business. I think the government should be above this kind of back door method. I think the government should have more respect for parliament than to put out this very fine, very fancy little pamphlet.

One finds it difficult to ascertain whether the pamphlet was printed by the Department of Agriculture or whether it was done on the authority of a man by the name of Grosart, because it is about that type of job.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps it was John Fisher?

Mr. Argue: Well, it is difficult to say which one. I understand there is a little competition between those two gentlemen at the moment. They do not know which one is in control of publicity for the Tory party, whether it is the one who is paid with public funds or the one paid with other funds obtained from undisclosed sources. However, it is a very fine looking Conservative pamphlet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: There is loud applause. They know it is a Conservative pamphlet and not a government pamphlet. They know it is a very fine Conservative pamphlet, designed as an attractive piece of propaganda containing some measure of truth but a lot of propaganda. It is an insult to the House of Commons because it indicates that despite the attitude of parliament there will be an agricultural rehabilitation and development act.

Mr. Brunsden: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Mr. Brunsden: The hon. gentleman has applauded the idea of the minister getting the opinions of municipalities and provinces, and now he is referring to a pamphlet containing a very lucid explanation—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising to a point of order in respect of this question of privilege, such as you allowed earlier today.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, the hon. member said a question of privilege, sir, and I am rising on a point of order. I submit no question of privilege arises.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If it is a question of privilege, it could not arise very well or could not intervene at this time—well, it possibly could, but what the hon. member is really speaking to is a question of order in the debate. I have not heard as yet what his point is.

Mr. Brunsden: The point of order is simply this. With all due respect, the hon. member is referring to a document which explains the legislation and is calling it propaganda. It is not propaganda.

Mr. Speaker: I see no point of order there. However, I have been in some doubt as to how the hon. member connects his reference to the pamphlet to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Argue: I believe that is rather easy. The pamphlet is headed "ARDA—The agricultural rehabilitation and development act; Bill C-77, an act to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada." The minister's own statement in introducing the measure, taken from Hansard, is contained in the pamphlet. I think they are part and parcel of the same thing.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the fact that the pamphlet relates to the bill. The point about which I was in doubt was the relevance of the issuance of the pamphlet to the debate on second reading of the bill. I did not rise, myself, to stop the hon. member, but he has not made very clear the connection between the pamphlet and the principle of the bill, other than to complain about the affront to parliament in publishing the pamphlet.

Mr. Argue: I think that is a fairly important point, too.

Mr. Speaker: If it were a point, it would be a point of privilege. However, I trust the hon. member will proceed with the discussion of the bill.

Mr. Argue: I submit it is not a point of order to say that this government has held parliament in contempt. This is exactly what has been done, and it has been within the rules of the house in the past, day after day. When the Liberals were in office, opposition members held up anything they might have which they felt indicated contempt of parliament. This pamphlet has a real connection with the bill. We are being told what we are going to do. We are being told we are all rubber stamps, and no matter what we do we cannot amend the bill because the pamphlet gives the title. I feel a mistake was made, and I think it is an insult to the House of Commons.

However, Mr. Speaker, I had been saying that hon. members opposite, during this miniature Conservative filibuster, have seemed to take the attitude that under the Liberal administration nothing had been done in this field. They applauded very loudly when I made that statement as interpreting what they have been saying, and many of them made exactly the same statement. One wonders, then, what the record of the Conservative party is in the field of conservation. A Conservative government introduced the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Did they do so early in their term of office? No, they waited until the spring of 1935, almost the end of their legal term of office under the constitution. They had become so frightened of the electorate, they had become so timid, that they were apparently desperate to try to discover something that might be done which would be popular and which would be good legislation, thus saving them from the wrath of the electorate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. gentleman seeking to draw an analogy?

Mr. Argue: I was not seeking to draw an analogy and I am not certain there is an analogy. We shall learn after a certain time whether or not this government, at this time, is following for identical reasons the same course followed by the Conservative administration in 1935.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman will not be here.

Mr. Argue: I heard the hon. member for Carleton say I would not be here. I have heard that for many years, "You won't be here". I have heard a lot of things, that I will not be here or that I will not get some other place. However, I have been around a long time—

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Argue: I have heard that before, too, and I am willing to take my chances. I think they are probably as good as those of most members in this house. "These interruptions are most entertaining", the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) says, especially those from the Social Credit members from Alberta who sit with the Conservative party.

The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which was introduced by the Conservative party, was a good act. A great deal has been done under that act to assist western Canada. We believe that that act has proved itself to be a good act, and one that is worth keeping, one that should be maintained on the statute books. I feel this measure might have another title, an act to replace the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Another title might be, a bill to wipe out the record of the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner in this field. This bill may represent an effort to cover up, to make the public forget, that the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner, as minister of agriculture for Canada for many years, was very devoted to the question of agricultural conservation and rehabilitation. While he was not the minister responsible for the bill which established the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, nevertheless under his auspices as minister of agriculture a great many worth-while projects were undertaken and completed under that act.

I think any member of parliament, no matter how biased he may be in the belief that his own party is more often right than are other parties, should be prepared to state the facts; and the facts are not as they have been alleged, namely that a Liberal government did nothing in this field. The fact is that most of the conservation measures have been undertaken and completed during the course of Liberal administration. The Conservatives could not do it from the opposition so we shall not blame them entirely. If they had been in office, I am sure they would have introduced some of them.

Mr. Smallwood: Since the hon. member is seeing the leadership of the new party going to Mr. Douglas, is he trying to work his way into the Liberal party?

Mr. Argue: I am afraid I did not hear the question, Mr. Speaker. I heard one or two things about it which might suggest what it was. However, I think perhaps the facts should be placed on the record. This afternoon the Conservatives have said that the Liberals did nothing. I have here in my hand the annual report for the first year in which the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was operating. In this report I see no reference indicating water projects completed. Certain regrassing projects were undertaken. I see no record of these projects having been completed. Yet the latest annual report of the administration under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act—that of 1958-59—shows that during the period of the operation of this act 49,204 water development projects were completed, 5,400 of them during the time of this Conservative government, but as far as I am able to ascertain, none of them by a former Conservative government. Therefore, out of 49,000 projects, the Conservatives can take credit for 5,000. The Liberals were in office when 44,000 were completed.

An hon. Member: What is the point?

Mr. Argue: The point is that we have heard this afternoon a great many foolish remarks that were not true and that have no basis in fact.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member is continually looking over at the seat of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Brunsden) in referring to this particular act. I think that is whom he meant. The hon. member for Medicine Hat said that the legislation was brought in by a Conservative government and that Mr. Gardiner had used it as a good political vehicle. He never said that nothing was done.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has not raised a question of privilege. Perhaps he did not intend to do so.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member not only wants to tell me what I am saying but where to look when I am saying it.

Under the community pastures project under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act—and it is a very important development—a great deal has been done. A tremendous number of acres have been brought under the community pastures system. Land has been regrassed. There has been allocated and reserved for grass land which might otherwise have been put under the plow when it was not suitable for that purpose. The total area of land in pastures as shown at the end of this report for 1958-59 was 1,815,265 acres. Yet if one looks back at the acreage given under this project, one finds none before 1938. In other words prior to 1938 under a Conservative government not a single community pasture had been established. There are 64 community pastures today. The records show that 61 were established under the former Liberal government and that three have been established during this government's period in office.

I therefore suggest that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has proved to be a good act under which many worth-while projects have been established. I suggest that it is not accurate to say that under a Liberal administration nothing was done in this field. The fact of the matter is that members in all parts of the house, in all parties, over the years have been very much interested in conservation. John R. MacNicol, a long time Conservative member of the House of Commons, used to make this matter almost a full-time cause. Although he had little connection with the prairie areas or the agricultural areas of Canada, representing as I believe he did, a constituency in the city of Toronto, nevertheless, I think even the members of the Liberal party and the house will agree that he made an important contribution to conservation and to agricultural development.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister of agriculture of the day always said that.

Mr. Argue: Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner was prepared to give him credit for that contribution. Therefore, I do not think it should be necessary for the members on the government side of the house to try to pretend that nothing was done until this government arrived on the scene and that all of a sudden, by bringing in this bill and by printing a pamphlet and distributing it, agricultural conservation or improvement of soil productivity has become the order of the day.

When I rose, Mr. Speaker, I said that what we are really going to be interested in is to learn from the Minister of Agriculture the projects he has under way with the provinces or how many projects will be established. We wish to learn from him whether any provincial government intends to establish any projects during the present year and whether this program really will be under way and in operation during the current year. I should like to know the proportion of these projects that the federal government is prepared to finance.

I say to the government now that they had better do better under this act than they have done under the Crop Insurance Act. Twenty per cent will not do the job. Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act the federal government paid the whole shot. The provincial governments and the community pastures provided much of the land. As far as dugouts are concerned, the farmers have put up some money. It has been a smaller amount in recent years because the proportion paid by the federal government has been increased. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act, another act in the field of the maintenance of farm income about which this act has some things to say, has been paid for by the federal government and by the farmers, and under that act there was no endeavour to load the financial responsibility on the provinces.

I am not saying that the provinces have not some responsibility. I think they have some responsibility. I am not saying that the provinces should not be asked to contribute something under this act. However, I express the hope that, more in keeping with the responsibility accepted by the federal government under P.F.R.A. and under P.F.A.A., the federal government will accept the major financial responsibility and will not endeavour to foist it on either the provincial governments or the agricultural producers themselves. This act could be an excellent one. Time will tell. The administration of the measure will determine its real value, but I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite that in my judgment the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has been a good one and much has been accomplished through that act. This will need to be a very good act before it justifies replacing the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

I think the two can work together, and before we junk one we should be certain that this bill adds a great deal to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and does in fact bring about a very important extension of that act.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened rather attentively to the debate this afternoon. I could not help but wonder, until the last speaker took part in the debate, what the line of debate would have been had the item of business appointed for today, the motion—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: —by the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken), been proceeded with, and had the debate on that motion occupied three or four hours of the sitting. Had this bill come forward after that length of time, I wonder whether the content of debate on this bill would not have been sharply changed.

I am driven to the conclusion that it would have been sharply changed, because it has become apparent from the remarks of hon. gentlemen that they were using a pattern that they have developed on second reading of bills in this house; that is, the procedure of getting up and politely ignoring the part of the rules that has to do with repetition.

In any event, none of us raised a point of order about the repetitious nature of their speeches so I cannot raise it now. However, I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that the substance of their argument was repeated many times. It seemed to be that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) is a fine fellow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: I have a recollection of reading in some of the books about the origin of our parliamentary system that all hon. members were presumed to be gentlemen. Indeed, that is the basis of the development of our system. In any event, that argument was made by all hon. members who spoke.

Then they went on to say that the minister was to be congratulated for bringing in this bill. Some hon. members went so far as to congratulate the minister, in effect, for using the taxpayers' money to put out—and one hon. member later admitted this in the crossfire—what was a piece of party propaganda, namely the pamphlet describing this act which has not yet been before parliament.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That was never admitted. On the contrary, it was denied.

Mr. McIlraith: Hon. members have followed this procedure and one can only draw the conclusion that had there been other business of the house ready perhaps there would not have been such repetition in debate. This measure was debated in the resolution stage; it was debated in the second reading stage. This is the second occasion on second reading of this bill on which the remarks seem to have been unduly extended by repetitious arguments.

Perhaps it would be in order to remind some hon. members who were hard pressed for remarks, and obviously ill-prepared for discussion of this subject—for instance, the maritime hon. members—that the marshlands rehabilitation legislation at the conclusion of the war was useful and proper legislation. I think hon. members will agree, and I notice the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) nods his head in approval.

That was a piece of Liberal legislation, as was the legislation having to do with water conservation on the east slope of the Rockies. That was also useful legislation in this field. All this legislation is of a nature that has always been of interest to hon. members of the House of Commons from all parties.

I recall very distinctly the speeches—I must say they were sometimes a little repetitious in the sense that they were repeated year after year; but I only say that by way of commendation of the hon. member—of the late hon. member, Mr. MacNicol. His speeches on this subject of conservation came up each year and he always had a new facet to add to them describing one of his trips to one or other part of the country by way of illustrating the need for conservation.

Mr. Macdonnell: He seemed to know every crossroads in western Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: In any event, what I wish to point out here is that the hon. members supporting the government today have obviously been dealing with this legislation in the way they have chosen—as is their right—because of the situation that the government simply had not taken the time to organize its business and prepare legislation for submission to the house.

That has become a habit this session and I would hope that at some time between now and Monday the house leader will see fit to bring forward the necessary provisions for submission to the house so that it will be in a position to deal with the government business that the government wishes to bring forward. I should also—

Mr. Churchill: Either talk about the bill or give me the right of reply.

Mr. McIlraith: I also wish—

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand there is a rule in the house that nobody in the gallery shall make notes and I notice this being done.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I see that it is six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on Monday and Tuesday there will be a supply motion. The business for the balance of the week, subject to change if the necessity arises, will be estimates, commencing with those of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and followed by those of the Department of Fisheries. If the house makes good progress, another department will be called.

Mr. Pickersgill: I deliberately did not ask for the business because, since the government does not adhere to these statements any more, they do not seem to be useful.

Mr. Churchill: That statement is completely wrong and decidedly childish. It should be withdrawn, because the government does adhere to its order of business—

Mr. McIlraith: You said we would be dealing with estimates.

An hon. Member: Since when?

Mr. Churchill: —unless something occurs to prevent it or there is a lack of co-operation on the other side.

Mr. Speaker: The house sometimes sits beyond six o'clock to discuss the business of the house. I see that has been concluded. The house stands adjourned until 2.30 p.m. on Monday next.

It being two minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

OTTAWA—TEMPORARY GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS

Question No. 208—Mr. Regier:

1. How many temporary government buildings are there in Ottawa that are now over 10 years old?
2. Approximately how many employees are ordinarily working in these buildings?
3. Is the federal government intending, at an early date, to replace these temporary buildings?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

1. 17.

2. Approximately 12,000.

3. The intention is to vacate and demolish all these temporary buildings progressively as soon as permanent accommodation can be made available.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT PUBLICATIONS

Question No. 211—Mr. Denis:

1. How many copies of the publications: (a) Letter Perfect (b) A la lettre; have been printed and distributed to date under the authority of the postmaster general?
2. What has been the cost of such publications?
3. How many persons: (a) regularly employed by the government (b) from outside the government staff; have taken part in the preparation and drafting of these publications, and what has been the cost involved in each case?

Answer by: Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General):

1. (a) Printed, 30,000; distributed, 20,000. (b) Printed, 5,000; distributed, 3,750.

2. $3,107.14.

3. (a) Several regular government employees spent short periods, over some months, in the preparation and drafting of the publication. It is not possible to assess the time spent or the amounts of money involved in this aspect of the work.

(b) Screencraft of Ottawa—$581.74 included in No. 2).

Monday, May 8, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MEMBERS OF U.S. CABINET

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while under ordinary circumstances no mention is made of those who are in the gallery, because according to tradition there are none who occupy positions other than on the floor of the house, I think hon. members will permit me to refer to the fact that there are in the gallery today two outstanding representatives of the United States of America, members of the cabinet of President Kennedy. I refer to Hon. Orville Freeman, secretary of agriculture, and Hon. Stewart Udall, secretary of the interior.

They are here in pursuance of the course being followed by our two nations whereby there is the widest possible consultation between members of the government of Canada and members of the administration of the United States. They are here to meet their opposite numbers, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and one or two other ministers. I am sure the house will join with me in a warm welcome to them, and at the same time we wish to convey through them to the President that we are looking forward with anticipation to the visit of the President of the United States and Mrs. Kennedy next week.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): It gives me a great deal of pleasure, on behalf of our party, to associate myself and my friends with the welcome that has been expressed to our distinguished visitors by the Prime Minister. They are, indeed, very welcome and I only hope they feel as much at home in Ottawa as we always do when we go to Washington.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this group wishes to associate itself with the welcoming and kind remarks expressed by the Prime Minister and the leader of the official opposition. We trust that these gentlemen will enjoy their stay in Ottawa and learn a great deal.

STANDING ORDERS

REQUEST FOR LEAVE TO MOVE CONCURRENCE IN TENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. N. L. Spencer (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I hope the house is in a little more amiable mood this afternoon. This motion stands in the name of the chairman of the standing committee on standing orders. I am the vice chairman of that committee. I wish, on behalf of the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken), to move:

> That the tenth report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Thursday, May 4, 1961, be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent to the hon. member to move the motion as suggested?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am not rising to withhold consent but to raise a point of order with respect to the motion itself. Your Honour will recall that the hon. member for Essex East attempted to move a motion on Tuesday, May 2, as a private member of this house, and Your Honour made an extended ruling at that time, the effect of which was that these motions that appear on routine proceedings affecting the business of the house can be moved only by the house leader. You pointed out specifically to the hon. member, as reported on page 4210 of Hansard:

> The hon. member raises the question of whether a private member can do the same thing.

In other words, he raised the question of whether or not a private member could move a motion with respect to the business of the house. Your Honour went on to say:

> I think it is clear that a private member can do so if he can use the notice of motion procedure which is open to private members under our rules.

Your Honour then went on to point out that this would be, at this stage of the session, a completely ineffective procedure because the notices of motion are not even printed. It does seem that so far as the house is concerned, the hon. lady, whatever she may be in the committee, is a private member of the house; yet her notice of motion is printed under "Motions" in the routine proceedings. The point I am raising is whether it is open to one hon. member who is not the leader of the house to move a motion with respect to the business of the house, and not open to another hon. member to do so.

Mr. Spencer: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, may I say this is a somewhat different point from that which was raised on Saturday. I feel that in speaking to the point of order I should bring to your attention, sir, the fact that these motions have been made customarily by members other than the member in whose name the motion stands.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not the point.

Mr. Spencer: May I refer to the report of proceedings for February 5, 1954, when Mr. Harrison, who was chairman of the standing orders committee, presented the first report of that committee. He filed a notice of motion in his name for concurrence in that report on February 8, 1954. On February 8, 1954, Mr. Carter, for Mr. Harrison, moved concurrence in that report. This was not done by leave of the house.

In 1955 Mr. Harrison, having presented the first report of the standing orders committee on April 1, 1955, gave notice of motion for concurrence on April 4. However, on April 4 Mr. Hanna, for Mr. Harrison, moved concurrence in the report. Again Mr. Harrison, having presented the second report of the standing orders committee on May 28, 1956, and notice having been given for concurrence therein, Mr. Fairey, for Mr. Harrison, moved concurrence on June 8.

Coming to the present session or this present parliament—

Mr. Pickersgill: This is not the point at issue, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Spencer: I will come to your point in a moment. On March 6 of this year, as found at page 2667 of Hansard, the motion for concurrence which stood in the name of the hon. member for York-Humber, the chairman of the committee, was moved on that occasion by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Webb), a member of the standing committee on standing orders. The consent of the house was not asked nor was it required on that occasion. Again on March 27—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I might save the house some time by saying to the hon. member that I think it is clear that the motion for concurrence in the report of a committee has for a good many years customarily been moved in the house by the chairman of the committee. Whether that procedure is in accordance with the rules of the house or is a practice that has grown up in contravention of the rules is really the point at issue, I think. However, before dealing with that matter, may I ask whether I am correct in assuming that the house will permit the hon. member for Essex West to move the motion on behalf of the hon. member for York-Humber?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has anything further to say on the point of order other than giving instances of similar motions having been made previously, perhaps he would complete his statement and I will deal with it.

Mr. Spencer: Just on that point, Your Honour, may I say this. As I understood the point raised by the hon. member, it was that these motions should be made by the leader of the house. Am I not correct in that respect?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Spencer: All I can say, and I think all that need be said, in answer to that point, Your Honour, is that I have already given many illustrations where motions of this kind were not made by the leader of the house; nor has is it ever been the practice or the usage, as far as my research has indicated, that any such motion has ever been required to be made by the leader of the house.

May I say this also. If that were the requirement, then by analogy, motions dealing with late petitions which are to be referred to the standing committee on standing orders would normally then be made by the leader of the house. Yet the practice has been and is that they have not been made by him.

I can give many instances. Here is a motion made on April 21, 1955, with regard to Westcoast Transmission Company Limited, which was sponsored by Mr. Fairey. On this occasion Mr. Hunter moved that the late petition be referred to the standing committee on standing orders.

Again, on February 13, 1953, the sponsor of that motion was Mr. Macnaughton, who moved that the late petition be referred to the standing orders committee. In that case it was done by leave of the house, but in any event it was not done by the leader of the government.

On March 2, 1954, Mr. Hunter, who was not chairman of the standing orders committee but was chairman of another committee, moved for another sponsor, Mr. Balcolm, that a late petition relating to the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company be referred to the standing committee on standing orders.

Then we had the same thing happen in this house not very long ago. I cannot give the date, but the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) moved the reference of late petitions with which the standing orders committee dealt. These petitions are dealt with in this report. The motion referring those petitions to the standing committee on standing orders was made as stated by the hon. member for Davenport and not by the leader of the house.

As you said the other day, sir, when I believe a motion was being made by the whip, a practice and usage that has been well established in this house should not be interfered with or changed without the strongest authority. Here are authorities from 1953 up to the present time where none of those motions was made by the house leader.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think we are all indebted to my hon. friend from Essex West for the precedents he has laid down. It seems to me that all the arguments he has advanced in favour of the course that he proposes in respect of a motion moved by one private member would apply with equal validity to the motion proposed by my hon. friend from Essex East, I think on May 2.

With great respect, the point of order raised by my hon. friend for Bonavista-Twillingate does not deal with that matter at all. Perhaps it might save time if this motion were allowed to stand so that you would have time to consider the very important point of order raised by my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member for Essex West whether there is any urgency to have this report reviewed?

Mr. Spencer: Mr. Speaker, may I speak to the question of urgency. We have standing on the order paper a bill respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway for the construction of a line which will provide employment not only in the construction of the railway but also in the plant or industry this railway is intended to serve. Unless this report is concurred in that legislation now standing on the order paper, which has already been passed by the other place, cannot be dealt with in this house.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out, on the question of urgency, that it cannot be dealt with by this house until a week from tomorrow in any event.

Mr. Spencer: Mr. Speaker, may I say further, apropos the point made by the Leader of the Opposition, that I do not think the two motions are in any way analogous. The motion made by the hon. member for Essex East was an oral motion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was later put in writing.

Mr. Spencer: It was not a motion made on notice. The point in issue there was whether or not it was within the power or privileges of an ordinary hon. member for the house—which of course hon. members sitting on the other side now are, in as much as they no longer occupy the treasury benches—to make such a motion orally. That was the point, and the only point, in issue. Any comments or observations Your Honour may have made must be interpreted in terms of the fact that the hon. member was attempting to make a motion, founded on oral notice of motion. If the proper procedure had been followed, it would be coming before the house under the order of notices of motions in the names of private members. That is not what this is; it is a motion on routine proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: I think since the question of the propriety of our practice has been raised it might be well if some consideration were given to it. However, we have followed the practice which has been used today for a good many years, and I should not like to interrupt a procedure which is well established without having clear authority to do so. It may be that we have developed a practice which is contrary to the rules, so what I propose to do is to accept the motion as it has been moved, without prejudice to the point being raised again, and I will give consideration myself to whether the house has departed from the rules in accepting a motion of this kind from a private member.

I have no difficulty in distinguishing this motion from the one which was made by the hon. member for Essex East, because there the question was whether his motion could come under routine proceedings. I was disposed to think that was a handicap, an obstacle, which the hon. member had not overcome, in addition to the question of lack of notice and the other question of whether the leader of the house should move such a motion. So I do distinguish the motion which has been referred to from this motion, which can clearly be made under routine proceedings and which has been made after notice. The only question is whether the leader of the house should undertake this responsibility.

I can cite one other instance where the leader of the house does not perform this responsibility. Formal and routine motions to change the personnel of standing committees have regularly been moved in the house by a private member rising and moving that certain names be substituted for others, and the house has accepted that procedure. However, I do not wish to determine the issue finally at this time, and if hon. members wish to raise the matter further I shall be receptive to argument about it. But in the circumstances I will put the motion which has been moved by the hon. member for Essex West.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR SATURDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Saturday, May 13, 1961, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the session the order of business and procedure shall be as for Thursday, a government day.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): This motion would not have been necessary had the government been aware of the rules of the house and had the government not been asleep, as it has accused others of being, several days ago. This motion should have been moved long before Saturday—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member for Laurier proceeds on that line may I say that I do not think it is relevant to fight over again the battles of Saturday on this motion. The question before the house is whether the business next Saturday and on Saturdays after that shall be as stated in the motion. Anything anterior or ancillary to that discussion which is not necessary for the decision of the matter would, it seems to me, be beyond our scope.

Mr. Chevrier: I should first like to read the motion. It says:

That on Saturday, May 13, 1961, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the session the order of business and procedure shall be as for Thursday, a government day.

I submit, with deference, that I have the right to deal with matters that are mentioned in that motion. Any attempt to infringe the right which I claim I have to deal with the matters which are contained therein would be, I submit, an invasion of the rights of a member of parliament.

I would say at the beginning that the necessity for this motion being placed on the order paper arose out of a defect in the amendment which was passed on April 24. When the house decided at that time to hold Saturday sittings, a motion such as this should have been passed. The house then decided to sit on Saturday, but no provision was made in that order for the business to be dealt with on that day. That defect could have been corrected by the government, and only by the government. However, until today and, of course, Friday, no action was taken by the government in this respect. Your Honour's ruling of May 2 is ample proof of my statement. Therefore I say the neglect of the government resulted in the fiasco which took place on Saturday. We were faced with a blank order paper.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. With all due respect for the hon. member's point of view, as he has expressed it, it seems to me that this motion can have no bearing on what happened on Saturday, and what took place on that day is not relevant to the decision which the house has to make. The other comments which the hon. member is making seem to me to be relevant enough, but to my mind it would not be relevant to deal at length with the events of Saturday morning because this motion does not have any bearing on that particular situation.

Mr. Chevrier: May I respectfully disagree with Your Honour. When Your Honour says that this has no bearing on what happened on Saturday, this motion arises out of what took place on Saturday.

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Chevrier: Were it not for what took place on Saturday this motion would not now be on the order paper. I submit with deference that I have every right to refer to what took place on Saturday. Your Honour has said that I should not refer to it at great length. I can assure Your Honour at once that I have no intention of so doing, because we intend to move an amendment to the motion to go into supply, and I do not want to take an unnecessary part of the time of the house in dealing with this.

I repeat, I believe that because of what happened on Saturday this motion is now on the order paper. It is evidence of the mismanagement of the business of the house by the government. In order to avoid putting the house in an absurd position Your Honour was obliged to rescue the government, to rescue the situation—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: —with a ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it is at that point that I disagree with the hon. member's view of what is relevant. He is within his rights in discussing the purpose and effect of the motion, but I do not consider him to be within his rights to make, as I have said, an extended review of matters which do not fall to be determined by this motion.

Mr. Chevrier: I repeat, I have no intention of making an extended review of what took place—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, let me tell hon. members who are so sensitive that I will sit down at the request of the Chair and at the request of no one else.

I was going to say, sir, that what happened on Saturday will unquestionably be a precedent for students of parliamentary procedure to study in the future. On several occasions prior to Saturday the government made reference to urgent public business, but on Saturday we saw what the conception of that urgency and expedition was in so far as the government was concerned. We heard 12 speakers on one of the items on the order paper. All those speeches added absolutely nothing either by way of material or in any other way to the proceedings of the house. Actually they considerably delayed the business of the house.

Mr. Churchill: You are criticizing one of your own members.

Mr. Argue: I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Laurier has said there were 12 speakers. The figure on actual count is, I think, 17.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the hon. member for the correction. In any event, sir, on April 24 the Prime Minister certainly led us to believe that would deal with supply. That was clearly established—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry; the hon. member apparently does not agree with my view of what is relevant. The decisions of the house on Saturday and the debates which took place are matters of the past. They are not in issue; they are not affected by this resolution, whether it is passed or not. They may be relevant to an explanation of the effect of what is proposed here. Therefore I would ask the hon. member not to get into any discussion of the events that took place during the debate which led to the decision on Saturday.

Mr. Chevrier: May I call your attention to the fact, sir, that this motion deals with the business on Thursday. The procedure to be established for Saturday is that which is followed on Thursday, a government day. Therefore I submit to you, sir, with deference that I have the right to deal with matters which could be discussed on Thursday, and that is what I was proposing to do.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is within his rights to discuss the order of business and the precedence of business on a Thursday, but not the business that took place on any particular Thursday in the past.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order you have raised, surely it is in order on this occasion to discuss the antecedents of this motion, including the Prime Minister's statement on April 24, when he explained to the house that we should sit on Saturday to discuss, as he said then, matters which would not arouse controversy, non-controversial matters. This particular motion has no limitation of that kind. It merely states that we shall sit on Saturdays, from now on, deal with the business of the house as it is established for Thursday. But on Thursday any number of controversial matters could be discussed. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if we pass this motion we are contradicting the commitment which the Prime Minister made to the house on April 24.

Mr. Speaker: I did not intend that my ideas of the limits of debate should prevent what the Leader of the Opposition has just now mentioned. What I wished to exclude from this discussion, since it is irrelevant, was a review of the proceedings of Saturday. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that it is relevant to discuss the genesis of the extended hours and the business to be done during the extended hours.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, Mr. Speaker, without going into an extended review of what took place on Saturday, when this matter was discussed originally, there was, it seemed to me, a clear-cut understanding that we would be dealing with estimates and supply on Saturday. The Prime Minister gave that undertaking on April 24 and it was repeated in the house by the Solicitor General when he rose in his place on May 6 and said, as found on page 4453 of Hansard:

> Does the hon. member believe we do not wish to follow the statement made by the Prime Minister?

I continue:

> Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Finance said you did not.
> Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said that offer still stood.
> Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The Prime Minister made a very elaborate statement which should assure the members of the opposition that we have no intention of introducing anything of a controversial nature. We intend to go on with supply.

That was not done, notwithstanding the assurance given by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Churchill: The offer was made.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You prevented it.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will follow me I think I can make a clear distinction that is not one which will restrict him. What happened on Saturday with respect to supply is not relevant to this motion, which deals with what will be done on other Saturdays with respect to supply or whatever may be called. I do not suggest that the hon. member for Laurier should refrain from raising the statement made by the Prime Minister or any other discussion of how our business is to be ordered under the motion we have before us, but I do say that it is irrelevant to discuss what actually was done last Saturday, because that was discussed then at length and disposed of.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall do my best to follow the suggestion made by Your Honour. Notwithstanding the assurance which was given, when the Acting Prime Minister realized from comments made by Your Honour that calling a supply motion would precipitate a debate, resort was then had to the order paper, page 4, and Your Honour knows what happened after that. The failure of the government to appreciate the consequences of calling a supply order on Saturday is further indication in my view of carelessness on the part of the government bordering on contempt in dealing with the business of the house.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense.

Mr. Chevrier: As I look at this motion, Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that it is out of order and irregular.

An hon. Member: Read it again.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, you are smart; why don't you read it? I submit the motion is irregular for two reasons. First, I understand it was filed at 3:50 o'clock on the afternoon of Saturday and therefore, in accordance with the strict observance of the rule, there has not been the 48 hours' notice which is required. Then I ask this question of the government. Since this motion appears in the name of the Prime Minister, was the motion subscribed to by the Prime Minister, as it falls within the responsibility of every member of parliament to do in such instances. The hon. member for Essex East was told what the procedure was, in no uncertain terms, in a similar motion. It is the responsibility of every member of parliament when he places a motion on the order paper to see to it that it appears in his name and is subscribed to in his name. I ask the government, was this motion subscribed to in the name of the Prime Minister when he was not here but was in London, appearing on a political platform with the premier of the province of Ontario discussing the new theme for the next federal election?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Certainly the hon. member is going a bit afield and provoking a response which I shall endeavour to control, but if he will keep the proper line of debate on the motion it will be easier.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Chevrier: I think I am within my rights in putting these questions to the government. First, did the Prime Minister sign the motion, as he is required to do under the rule of the house? Second, if he did, how was it done when he was not in the city of Ottawa? He told us that Saturday would be a day when non-contentious matters such as supply would be discussed, but notwithstanding the fact that we were here on Saturday to carry on the discussion of non-contentious matters he was out of the house playing politics in the country. So I say that this motion is irregular under these two heads, and I ask Your Honour to give consideration to the two points that make the motion irregular and out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member has raised a point of order which goes to the root of the motion and whether it can be made. It has been determined that if the house is sitting on Saturday a notice of motion filed on that day is to be taken up on the following Monday. The point is not novel, as it has been dealt with by Bourinot. In his fourth edition, page 296, dealing with motions and notice he says:

> If Saturday is a sitting day the notices handed in on that day will appear on the order paper on Monday.

Therefore I think we might dispose of that point on the basis of the statement by Bourinot. As to the other question, the hon. member has presented no evidence that the requirement has not been complied with, and I think the motion might proceed.

Mr. Spencer: On the point of order Mr. Speaker, may I assist by referring you to Bourinot, page 300, where I find the following:

> Members sometimes send in notices in the names of absent members who have requested them to do so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Never the head of the government.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, on that very point, may I say that I can remember other occasions when I and other colleagues of mine have been denied the right to sign our names on notices of other members.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Everybody must be treated alike here.

Mr. Speaker: If there is nothing further to be said on the two preliminary points of order, I think I should remind the house that when the Prime Minister presents a motion of this kind he does so as leader of the house and not as a private member. I have not been satisfied that the point of order is relevant.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have made it my business to inquire in whose name—

Mr. Churchill: Where?

Mr. Chevrier: In the proper office.

Mr. Churchill: Which office?

Mr. Pearson: There is nothing secret about these matters.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister was away politicking.

Mr. Chevrier: I have made it my business to look at the original, and it was not signed by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Churchill: On whose authority?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would hon. members please give their attention to the member who has the floor?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker I was just interrupted by the house leader, who said "On whose authority?" Surely we are in parliament, and under the rules of parliament any member has a right to inquire what the circumstances are. That interruption is ridiculous. Let me assure him that I have made it my business to inquire. The motion appears in the name of the Prime Minister on the order paper today. However, I have ascertained that the notice was not signed by the Prime Minister but rather the initials of the Minister of Veterans Affairs appear on the notice of motion, which I say is irregular.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think the point is covered in citation 188, paragraph 2, of Beauchesne's fourth edition. I quote:

> A member of the government may act in behalf of a colleague in all cases—

Mr. Chevrier: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Very well:

> —including the proposal of new clauses to a bill, but with this exception, or in the case of an unopposed return, no motion can be moved save by the member in whose name the notice stands.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: Try again.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not know why the hon. member for Laurier should be so hilarious, because what I have said is exactly correct. A member of the government may act on behalf of a colleague in all cases.

Mr. Pearson: May I intervene, Mr. Speaker, merely to say that in view of the obvious discomfiture of the government, and in order to expedite business, we are willing to allow this motion to be put.

Mr. Speaker: Well, the Clerk advises me that the motion, as presented to him, was in accordance with the custom in respect of motions in the name of the house leader or the acting house leader. He took the responsibility of accepting it and putting it on the order paper. Whether or not there is any anterior irregularity, I shall not explore at the moment, in view of what has been said by the Leader of the Opposition, and shall proceed with the motion itself.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I did not think it was possible, after last Saturday, for the government to make any more blunders, but apparently they are progressing along fairly well in that direction. I listened with interest to the hon. member for Laurier dealing with the statement of the Prime Minister to the effect that nothing controversial would be dealt with on Saturday, and so on. I thought the hon. member had been here long enough to know he should not take the Prime Minister's remarks at face value.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Howard: This has happened on too many occasions for hon. members to shout "Shame".

I should like to deal specifically, Mr. Speaker, with the question of the order of business to be followed next Saturday and on subsequent Saturdays. The motion says that it shall be as for Thursday. Now, the house leader and, on one occasion, the Minister of National Revenue, made some rather impassioned comments concerning the rights of private members and the private members' hour. They said there were many hon. members who had notices of motions and bills on the order paper, and those members were entitled to deal with those matters. I draw your attention to the fact that there are some 67 items under public bills and orders, which include public bills in the hands of private members.

While public bills in the hands of private members are not allowed to come to a vote because of the embarrassing circumstances that develop therefrom, nevertheless, as I am sure members of the government would agree, the discussion on these bills affords private members an opportunity of expressing opinions on specific subject matters. Undoubtedly the government is influenced by these expressions of opinion and, undoubtedly, in subsequent years legislation is introduced covering these subjects. In this way a private member, whether he be on the government side or the opposition side, has an opportunity of expressing his point of view and eventually seeing that point of view come to fruition in legislative form. We have had a number of experiences of this kind.

When it was proposed to sit on Saturday, I think practically every member in the house was in agreement that we should have Saturday sittings. In fact, it was the hon. member for Port Arthur who moved that motion, and I seconded it. We did not hear too much objection from members, other than those who occupy the front benches to my left. Theirs was a sort of weak objection after the event. In view of the contribution that private members can make by discussing public bills, and as a sort of recognition by the government of the fact that the majority of members in this house were agreeable to sitting on Saturday, I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting the word "Thursday" and substituting therefor the word "Friday".

In this way some of the rights and opportunities of private members in this house could be properly recognized.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Howard) which was negatived on the following division:

FISHERIES

ALTERATION OF LOBSTER SEASON IN CERTAIN DISTRICTS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, on April 24 I announced that due to the late season and ice conditions in certain parts of the maritime provinces it was necessary to delay the opening of the lobster fishing season in districts 7-A and 7-B. Due to the persistence of these conditions it is now found necessary to further delay the opening of the season in those two districts from May 10 to May 16.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

OLD CUSTOMS BUILDING, WINNIPEG—DEMOLITION

Motion No. 99—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the Department of Agriculture, the Canadian wheat board, and any individual or company, since January 1, 1961, in connection with the demolition of the old customs building situated at the corner of Main and McDermot avenue in Winnipeg.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): May I request that this motion stand.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): On a point of order, I do not complain that it is not in order to ask that the motion should stand, but I would point out that it has been on the order paper now since April 11. Almost a month has gone by, and it would appear to me that it is time the motion was put to the house.

Mr. Jorgenson: The minister was here to deal with this question, but I am sure the hon. member will realize that with all the visitors the hon. gentleman has there are appointments he must keep.

Motion stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS TO CANADIAN WOODSMEN IN U.S.

Motion No. 117—Mr. Racine:

For a copy of all correspondence or telegrams exchanged since May 22, 1959, between the authorities of the states of Maine and New Hampshire and the government, with a view to having the unemployment benefits extended to Canadians employed as forestry workers in American territory.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): This motion is acceptable subject to the consent of the states of Maine and New Hampshire.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree to the motion subject to the limitation expressed by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

C.M.H.C.—DIRECT LOANS TO BUILDERS

Motion No. 120—Mr. Hellyer:

For a copy of all telegrams received by the federal government between July 1, 1960, and April 5, 1961, requesting the continuation of the government's policy to have Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation make direct loans to builders.

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): There is no objection to this motion.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Pickersgill, seconded by Mr. Carter, for Mr. Hellyer—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Is there any objection to the hon. member moving the motion? I am unable to ascertain from the sounds I hear whether there is consent. Is the house agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL WITHOUT STATUTORY AUTHORITY

Motion No. 121—Mr. Regier:

For a copy of all orders in council passed between July 1, 1957, and the present day, for which no statutory authority existed.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he can give the house his assurance that the budget will be brought down before the date of the forthcoming by-elections?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I forget for the moment the date of the by-elections.

Mr. Pearson: May 29.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think that has any relevance at all to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. I think he realizes that himself.

Mr. Pearson: Then will the Minister of Finance give the house an assurance that the budget will be brought down during the month of May?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Whenever it comes down I am sure it will be soon enough for the official opposition.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister arising out of a news report that the United States is prepared to lend to India $1 billion during the next two years if Canada, the United Kingdom, West Germany and Japan would match a loan of that kind. In view of a further report that India's five year plan is in trouble, is Canada giving any consideration to participating in making this or any other loan to India?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Canada has been of great assistance to India under her foreign aid plans during the years. In so far as this specific question is concerned, that is a matter of government policy and it will not be announced by reason of a question asked on orders.

Mr. Argue: My question was this. Is the loan under consideration now?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The same answer applies to the subsequent question.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Can the Prime Minister say whether or not it is a fact, as reported in the New York Times yesterday, that Canada is being pressed by the government of the United States to increase her assistance to India to help that country in its third five year plan?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not read the New York Times article in question, but I am sure the hon. gentleman would be the last to suggest that Canada should act under pressure from any other country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps the Prime Minister would be good enough to answer my question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The question was, has Canada been pressed by the government of the United States along the lines I have indicated?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought the answer I gave was so complete that even the hon. gentleman would understand it.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a supplementary question. Will the Prime Minister deny reports that the Canadian government has rejected a request to participate in this loan to India?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That question is like the old, old, hoary one; "Have you stopped beating your wife?"

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether he has any information regarding the situation in Laos?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have a statement with regard to Laos, which I think I will make tomorrow rather than today.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Queens asked a question in regard to Laos. I said I would answer it tomorrow. I now seem to have had the full report before me when I was asked the question, naturally expecting that some hon. gentleman opposite would be asking it.

On May 3 the Secretary of State for External Affairs informed the house that the commission had agreed on a report to the co-chairmen and was now ready to proceed to Laos to undertake its tasks of verification and supervision. On May 6 a message from the United Kingdom and Soviet governments, in their capacity as co-chairmen, was delivered to the international supervisory commission for Laos in New Delhi. In this message the co-chairmen indicated their agreement with the recommendation of the commission that it should proceed to Laos immediately after the belligerent parties had ceased fire. The co-chairmen considered that the basic task of the commission at present should be to fix the cease fire in accordance with the understanding reached between the belligerent parties, and to supervise and control it.

I am informed that the commission left New Delhi yesterday en route to Laos, and is expected to arrive shortly. Eleven officers, six non-commissioned officers and two communications technicians from Canada have left for Asia. Additional Canadian military and civilian personnel required in connection with the commission's task will be available if necessary. Those to whom I have referred left Vancouver last night by air on their way to Saigon.

Incidentally, the government has received no intimation that there have been any serious violations of the de facto cease fire which has existed in Laos since Thursday, May 4.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether it has yet been determined what functions other than the termination of the cease fire will be exercised by the international supervisory commission, and has Canada indicated its intention to be confined only to that particular assignment?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have no information that any determination of either question has been made.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—INTERVENTION FOR RELEASE OF KATANGA PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Will Canada support the request of Great Britain, made to the United Nations organization, to intervene immediately with the central government of the Congo to secure the release of President Tshombe of Katanga?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I know of no such request on the part of the United Kingdom to the United Nations. However, I think the question makes it desirable that some reference be made to the alleged arrest of Mr. Tshombe, president of Katanga province. Canada believes that the Congolese must be allowed to organize and regulate their own affairs. If, in fact, criminal charges have been laid against Mr. Tshombe I am sure members on all sides of the house would hope that the trial would be conducted justly, fairly and without undue delay.

CONGO—INQUIRY AS TO PROTECTION OF CANADIAN FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is he able to bring the house up to date as to the situation with respect to our Canadian forces in the Congo, in view of recent developments whereby other forces in the United Nations command have been slaughtered? I refer, of course, to troops of Ghana and a number of white officers. What are the orders to our Canadian forces, who are there on the authority of the government and the House of Commons, as to what they should do under such circumstances, and what equipment do they have for their own defence?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I can understand the concern of the hon. member and members generally throughout the house with regard to recent events in the Congo. However, this is not a question that can be answered off the cuff, and I will give the hon. member a full and complete answer tomorrow.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

REPORTED CANCELLATION OF PARADE BECAUSE OF ANTICIPATED RAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Never did I think an occasion would arise when I would consider it my duty to query him in this way; I do so more in sorrow than in anger.

In view of the unprecedented cancellation yesterday of a parade by units of the Royal Canadian Navy to the cenotaph in Ottawa to commemorate the battle of the Atlantic owing to the possibility of showers, which did not occur, would the minister inform the house whether this represents a change of policy and whether, in future, units of the armed forces of Canada will not be permitted to take part in these commemorative parades should inclement weather be threatened?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): There is no change in policy; neither, indeed, is any policy involved in this particular matter. Briefly, the circumstances were these. This parade had been ordered, and a decision had to be made by 7.30 in the morning whether to go ahead with it or not. The parade to the cenotaph was to be followed by a church parade to First Baptist church for the Protestants and to St. Joseph's church, I believe it was, for the Roman Catholics. If a very heavy storm should come on at the time of the parade it was not thought desirable to have men sit in their wet and cold garments for an hour or more inside the churches involved, and the time which would be involved in this parade.

A decision had to be made by 7.30 in the morning. The naval authorities at that time were advised by the meteorological people that very heavy storms would be taking place in Ottawa between ten and eleven o'clock. On the basis of that meteorological report the decision was made to cancel the part of the parade dealing with the laying of the wreath at the cenotaph, and the wreath was actually laid by myself subsequent to the church service.

Mr. Herridge: Does the minister not know that under similar threatening weather the command at Halifax did not think of the comfort of the units but considered it their duty for them to be present?

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member may, if he wishes, challenge the judgment of the people who were responsible for ordering this parade to take place or not to take place, but it was purely a matter of judgment on their part, taking all the factors into consideration, and I do not think he is in any position really to question it.

Mr. Winch: I have a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: I think the time of the house has been taken up sufficiently with this episode.

INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACTS FOR SUBMARINE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production arising out of a news report in the Financial Post of May 6. Can the minister inform the house whether there is any truth in the statement that the government has decided to order six conventional submarines for the Royal Canadian Navy? If so, what is the amount of the contract?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): No, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—FORMATION OF JOINT U.S.-CANADA COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Have representations been made recently by the state department of the United States to the Canadian government with a view to initiating discussions on the possibility of a joint survey of the Richelieu river canal project, as announced by Senator Aiken of the United States Senate a short time ago?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I will take the hon. member's question as notice.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question supplementary to that which was asked by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres. Is the Prime Minister aware that a sum of money has been set aside by the United States authorizing the United States corps of engineers to make a survey of the Champlain-Richelieu cut-off up to the United States boundary line? Does the Canadian government intend to set aside a similar sum of money for a like purpose on the Canadian side?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As to the first part of the question, I can say I have no such information. As to the second part, I can only add that when and if any decision is made in this regard the house will be made aware thereof. As the hon. gentleman knows, this matter has been asked for by the people concerned for a period of, I think, 70, 80 or 90 years. During the period from 1935 to 1957 there were requests for this, and I hope the hon. gentleman took the same interest in the matter then as he does now.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, in view of that contribution by the Prime Minister I think I should be allowed to say—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but—

Some hon. Members: Question only.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry; I cannot hear the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Chevrier: I was going to ask the Prime Minister a question, and it is this. Did the Prime Minister know or realize that during the time he mentioned, namely 1935 to 1957, the international joint commission had made a decision that until the St. Lawrence seaway had been completed the Champlain-Richelieu cut-off should not be considered? Is he aware of that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the St. Lawrence seaway did not start until long after 1935. During that period the hon. gentleman and those surrounding him did not show the interest in this project that they are showing today.

[Mr. Cardin.]

SOULANGES CANAL—REPRESENTATION BY CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. On May 3, 1961, I asked him:

> May I ask a supplementary question? Since the discussions were started between the two governments, have any industrial corporations approached the government with a view to locating plants in the area set aside by the minister?

The minister replied:

> Not directly, Mr. Speaker, but a number of chambers of commerce in the area have made representations to have this federal government property set aside so they may have time to approach various industries with a view to bringing industrial construction into the area.

Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand the resolutions adopted by every chamber of commerce in Soulanges riding, and I notice that not one of them recommends that any portion of the canal be set aside. On the contrary, they favour the complete transfer of the property to the government of the province of Quebec.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may have been coming to his question but it seemed to me he was entering into a controversy over the statements made in the answer.

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I had to lay the premise of my question before putting it, and that is what I have done. I come now to the question. Could the minister tell the house what chamber of commerce of which he spoke has made representations—and here I quote his own words:

> To have this federal government property set aside so they may have time to approach various industries with a view to bringing industrial construction into the area?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall check my files and give the names of those chambers of commerce.

THE CENSUS

INQUIRY AS TO METHOD OF CHOOSING ENUMERATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. My question is occasioned by the very detailed story in today's Globe and Mail by Stanley Westall of how the Toronto census takers are picked. I should like to know whether the secretaries of the local Progressive Conservative riding associations outside of Toronto have a task similar to those in Toronto in getting applicants for these census jobs.

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. gentleman's question is based upon the false premise that the details given by Mr. Westall are accurate.

Mr. Fisher: I have a supplementary question. Has any consideration been given by the government to enabling many of the unemployed business, professional and clerical workers registered in Toronto to obtain these positions?

Mr. Morris: This question is not at all different from that asked on several occasions in the past and answered as I answer it now. The commissioners appointed to conduct the 1961 census of Canada are responsible for the appointment of the enumerators. Any person desirous of being retained in that work should get in touch with the commissioners.

Mr. Winch: Should they start all over again in Vancouver East?

Mr. Peters: I will tell you how they pick them in Timiskaming.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED CLOSING OF U.S. RADAR SITES ON EAST COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the report in Friday's Gazette that the United States plans to close some of its radar sites on the eastern Canadian seaboard, would the minister wish to comment and add further information?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, constant changes and improvements are being made in defence installations, and there have been negotiations going on for some very considerable time between Canada and the United States in regard to relocation of certain radar sites. Until these negotiations have come to a conclusion I will not be in a position to make any further statement.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

CHINA—CONVEYANCE OF GRAIN IN CANADIAN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture, and in his absence I will direct it to the parliamentary secretary. Arising out of the wheat deal with red China, can the minister indicate to the house whether any of the 276 million bushels of wheat and barley will be carried to China in Canadian ships?

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): I will take the question as notice.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

RESOLUTIONS REQUESTING BRINGING INTO FORCE OF SECTION 96A OF ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether she is in a position to answer the question which I posed on Friday last dealing with the liquor question as it relates to Indians.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The answer to the first part of the hon. member's question is yes, but no objection having been received from the lieutenant governor to the request of the band councils concerned it is being recommended to the governor in council that these referenda be proceeded with to ascertain whether or not the Indians concerned desire to have liquor on their reserves in accordance with the laws of the province. Recent amendments to section 75 of the British Columbia government liquor act are being brought to the attention of the Department of Justice for appropriate study.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT ON BORDER CROSSINGS BY UNDESIRABLE PERSONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to the question put on Thursday, May 4, by the hon. member for Trinity. Any person seeking temporary admission to Canada, unless of course he is a Canadian citizen or a person with Canadian domicile, must satisfy the examining immigration officer at the port of entry that he is a bona fide non-immigrant as defined in section 7 of the Immigration Act. Where doubt exists admission would be refused. The department has no control over admissions to the United States.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I might add that in 1960 immigration statistics show that almost 60 million persons, mainly United States visitors and returning Canadians, came into Canada across the international boundary. The hon. member will appreciate the impossibility of minutely examining this entire volume of traffic and the possibility that some persons in the categories mentioned may escape detection.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PICTOU, N.S.—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF WORK FOR SHIPYARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia on Thursday last of the right hon. Prime Minister, and which I took as notice at that time, I wish to state that from the month of November last the hon. member for Pictou has been pressing for work for his riding and especially for Ferguson Limited.

On the recommendation of the maritime commission, on December 21 the Royal Canadian Navy looplayer Bluethroat was allocated to Ferguson for refit at a cost of $75,000. It left the yard on May 3 last. One standard diving tender was, on recommendation of the maritime commission, allocated to this yard at a cost of approximately $350,000, and is to be completed by November, 1961. Under tender from the Department of Transport there is one pilot boat to cost $200,000, which is to be completed in the fall of 1961. Under tender from the Department of Public Works there is one eight foot Inch dredge with an approximate cost of $100,000 which is to be completed in the fall of 1961. We are expecting a recommendation from the maritime commission soon for the allocation of another refit job worth about $100,000.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—FURTHER MEETINGS OF LABOUR, MANAGEMENT AND GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Can the minister report to the house whether any further action has been taken by the government to avert the closing of three coal mines in Cape Breton; and can he report to the house whether there have been any further meetings of the federal-provincial-U.M.W. committee dealing with this question?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that I understand the premier of Nova Scotia is working on a meeting with the government to be held very soon now.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister inform the house whether there has been any postponement in the dates of the scheduled closing down of these mines, particularly the one which is to close down at the end of the month?

Mr. Comtois: No, Mr. Speaker.

TELEVISION

SASKATOON—RECOMMENDATION OF BOARD OF GOVERNORS RESPECTING LOCATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of National Revenue is in a position to answer the question I asked Friday about a television application in southwestern Saskatchewan.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I have a report on the matter, but I did not bring it with me. I will answer the question tomorrow.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO REQUESTS FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Acting Minister of Justice. Would the minister inform the house whether the Minister of Justice has received any requests for assistance from the provincial government or any municipal authority in dealing with the recent unfortunate incidents in the Kootenays. If so, what has been the government's response to these requests?

Hon. W. J. Browne (Acting Minister of Justice): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The answer to the first part of his question is no; no requests have been received by the Department of Justice up to the present time. Therefore the second part of the question does not apply.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—DEPLETION OF FUND AND DENIAL OF BENEFITS

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in the early days of the present session, and particularly in the period prior to the Christmas recess, this government sought to introduce and succeeded in introducing a series of legislative measures which were mentioned in the speech from the throne, and which were directed primarily toward relieving the complex problems which the country is facing in this period of uncertainty and confusion.

The official opposition co-operated fully with the government and went so far as to waive the debate on the speech from the throne in order to enable the house to receive and discuss the government's proposals with a minimum of delay. The co-operation of the opposition was such that the specific proposals introduced by the government to deal with unemployment and the other economic problems were passed with a minimum of discussion. The co-operation was such that on the last sitting day before the adjournment for the Christmas recess, the house leader was in a position to state that the house, in the short period of 25 sitting days, had already dealt with five pieces of legislation, as well as the budget. The nature of this budget is well known to the country, and it has been said that it raised more questions than it answered.

Today, Mr. Speaker, is the 100th sitting day of the present session. One would be inclined to believe that in that period of close to six months, in 100 full sitting days, the government would have been in a position to introduce a piece of legislation which would have been directed toward correcting one of the best examples of maladministration and mismanagement by the government of the day. I realize that some of the members of the government are showing signs of anxiety, signs of uneasiness, which I can well understand, because at this very moment they are asking themselves, what amendment will the opposition present to this supply motion?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: Well, Mr. Speaker, some hon. gentlemen opposite are laughing. Perhaps they are relieved. The subject of the amendment to the supply motion is one of grave concern to the entire population of our country. In this period of unprecedented indecision we have a government which has accepted the principle of responsibility, a government whose Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) when he sat on the opposition side showed such ardour for responsible government but who now rejects some of the responsibility which he so earnestly attributed to his predecessor. In the course of the present session, we have had numerous illustrations of the Minister of Finance shrinking away from his responsibility and from his part in responsible government. This is the same hon. member who, only five years ago, gave this house such impassioned lectures on the principles of responsible government, but who is now rejecting categorically any suggestions that he has responsibility for certain policies. He insists that he has no role in the matter at all.

The amendment which I intend to introduce at the conclusion of my remarks will concern not only the Minister of Finance but also another member of the government who, I notice, seems very anxious to be relieved of the anxiety facing him at the moment. I want to state now the subject which I intend to develop in more detail in initiating the debate on the amendment to this supply motion.

The employers and employees of this country are up in arms. They are not satisfied with the present administration's application of the Unemployment Insurance Act and regulations. The rapid and continuous depletion of the unemployment insurance fund is—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister is always rising on a point of order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With very good reason, too.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, the minister is always interrupting members.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Here is the pot calling the kettle black, the terrible tempered Mr. Bang from Laurier.

The hon. member who has the floor began by raising as a grievance, apparently, something in relation to the question of responsible government and whatever part the Minister of Finance was thought to have played in that issue. Now he is going on to a second question. It is a rule of this house, Mr. Speaker, that before any member, in such a debate, may pass on to a second grievance all hon. members who wish to be heard on the first grievance are entitled to be heard. The hon. member having chosen to raise this question as a grievance, I claim my right as a member of this house to speak in reply to it. The hon. member is choosing now to run away from that grievance and raise a second question. This has been typical of the tactics of the opposition in these supply motions during the present session.

On the last two supply motions, Mr. Speaker, which were on March 20 and April 24, you had occasion to make a ruling under just such circumstances to try to curb the excesses of the opposition and the way in which they are seeking to ride roughshod over the rules of this house. The rights of other hon. members are at stake. The hon. member who has the floor on such a motion is not the only member who has rights in such a situation. He having chosen to make an attack in relation to this question of responsible government, and the relationship of at least one member of the government to that issue, I claim the right to discuss that subject before another grievance is raised in the house by anyone.

Mr. Robichaud: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect to the Minister of Finance, may I say it is true that the hon. member who was initiating a grievance used at first what has been fittingly described in the past as a scattergun. I do not think he came down definitely enough in his aim on any particular subject to say that he was introducing a grievance. It is true that he did connect the Minister of Finance with some issue of responsible government, but what issue I was not able to determine.

As I understood him, he now has raised as a grievance the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Finance sticks his neck out on these subjects.

Mr. Robichaud: I thought I made it clear in my remarks that the amendment which I intended to introduce this afternoon had something to do with the responsibility of the Minister of Finance and the responsibility of another member of government. The amendment has to do with the application of the Unemployment Insurance Act and regulations.

As I have said, the rapid and continuous depletion of the employment insurance fund is one of the most urgent problems which this government is called upon to face in this session. We understand this problem will require an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The policies of the present government since taking office, and the actions of the government, have resulted in practically wiping out a fund over $920 million built up under a Liberal administration. The unemployment insurance fund, we all know, consists of moneys contributed by the employees, by the employers and by the government. These moneys are held in trust by the government and used for the payment of benefits to the unemployed.

When the act was introduced in 1940 by a Liberal government, it was introduced as an act to establish an unemployment insurance commission, to provide for insurance against unemployment, to establish an employment service, and for other purposes related thereto. Since its introduction in 1940 this act has been amended on various occasions such as in 1955, 1956, 1957 and more recently, 1959. Notwithstanding the amendments to the act or to these regulations the principle remained the same. It consisted of a fund contributed by employers, employees and the government for the payment of benefits to the unemployed. When the act was introduced in 1940, the mover of the resolution had this to say. As reported at page 1650 of Hansard of July 16, 1940, these are the words of Mr. McLarty, the then minister of labour:

> This done, it will be recorded of the present generation that at a time when we were bending every effort and endeavour to overcoming the enemy at our gate we were not unconscious of our duty and our obligation to promote the welfare and happiness of our own people.

On July 19, speaking on the second reading of this bill, the then hon. member for Essex East as reported at page 1779 of Hansard of that year, had this to say about this bill:

> I conclude by saying to the Minister of Labour, coming as he does and as I do from an area in which there is unemployment for many months of the year because of the type of industry that predominates in the community, he will have done nothing in his public life greater than to create this measure when he is able to say at the conclusion of this session, as I hope he will be able to say, to his people and to all the people throughout the country that one further great reform for a harassed group of our population has finally been realized.

It was realized, Mr. Speaker, again by a Liberal government.

In 1959, the present government saw fit to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. As a result of the amendments introduced at that time the employees were estimated to derive additional benefits amounting to approximately $20 million per year. At the same time contributions by both employers and employees were increased by approximately 30 per cent. By such a move employers and employees were called upon to contribute yearly an additional $80 million or $90 million while the government's contribution remained at the same level or proportion. As a result of lack of policy by the present government that fund which was built up to $900 million under a Liberal government was being almost completely wiped out in less than four years of Conservative administration.

In addressing this house on April 4 of last year, I warned the government that, at the present rate of Canada's unemployment, the unemployment insurance fund would be just about wiped out by March 31, 1962. Mr. Speaker, I was a good conservative in my estimate at that time. I was accused at the time of being a prophet of doom and gloom. However, the fact remains that a fund which had been depleted by almost $600 million since the present government took office in 1957 up to April of 1960, has now, a year later, reached an additional sum of $140 million, and to this will be added a further deficit of approximately $40 million when the figures for the month of April are made public. At the present rate the balance in the fund will be in the vicinity of $95 million to $100 million at the end of May and it will be even lower on the last day of June of this year.

While this fund has been going down over the last four years—and we must admit that it will be practically wiped out by this time next year—what action has the government been taking to safeguard this fund which was designed to be stable and self-perpetuating? Sessional paper No. 83 which was tabled on December 21, 1960, the very day on which the house took recess for the Christmas season, reports on the conclusions arrived at by the unemployment insurance advisory committee resulting from their meeting of October 27, 1960. I quote the conclusions arrived at as found at page 6 of sessional paper No. 83, tabled in this house on Wednesday, December 21, 1960:

> As hereinbefore stated the fund will probably be reduced at March 31, 1961, to under $150 million and by the end of the seasonal benefit payments, say at May 31st, 1961, will be not more than $85 million.
> The committee finds no grounds upon which to modify the recommendations contained in its reports of July 8, 1958, and July 27, 1960 and respectfully and urgently repeats its previous recommendations regarding increasing the government's contribution and also replenishing the fund by a grant as recommended in the July, 1960 report. The committee expressed confidence that the government will take suitable action.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, five months have passed since the government was handed this recommendation and as yet no action has been taken. The government has failed to justify the confidence expressed by members of the advisory committee. What are the main reasons for this constant depletion of the fund which had proved to be so secure and so sound under the previous Liberal administration? I know that some will try to blame the inclusion or the admission of fishermen under the unemployment insurance benefits. May I say that this is not the reason; this is not the case. I want to remind those who are blaming the fishermen for the depletion of the fund that they had better revise their conclusions. In fact, the unemployment insurance advisory committee itself in its report referred to earlier, suggested that the loss to the fund by extending benefits to fishermen should be paid from sources other than regular contributions.

I will not undertake at this time to review or refute the recommendation made by the advisory committee so far as benefits to fishermen are concerned. However, what I want to make clear is the fact that a fisherman well earns and well deserves his unemployment insurance benefits. The majority of our fishermen on the east coast, with the exception of those in some sections of Nova Scotia and those in very few areas of Newfoundland, are engaged in fishing for a period of six months to seven months per year. During that period the majority of them work from 18 hours to 20 hours per day, and in most cases six days a week. When, as happens in my own constituency of Gloucester, the dragger fishermen leave the wharf after midnight on Sunday and do not return before the following Friday or Saturday, and when during this period their diesel motors have been running for 24 hours a day, when winter comes or when the month of November or December is reached, these men deserve to return to their families and draw their unemployment insurance benefits during the winter months. I challenge any hon. member of this house to get up and deny the right of these brave men to share in the scheme of this insurance against unemployment. When the season of storms is raging, when heavy sheets of ice are covering our harbours and inlets we cannot expect these men to remain at their usual occupations or to carry on with their fishing operations.

At this very late date, May 8, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean), rose in this house and announced a further delay in the opening date of the lobster season. Why? For the very reason which I have just mentioned, because when here in Ottawa tulips are blooming in front of the parliament buildings, our fishermen of northern New Brunswick, of some sections of Prince Edward Island and the Gaspe coast are waiting anxiously for the ice to move out before they can go to sea and set their fishing gear. Those men deserve to share in the unemployment insurance benefits, and they cannot be blamed for the depletion of the fund which has taken place in the last four years.

It is true—and the reports of the advisory committee make reference to it—that they have contributed to the maximum amount of $10 million in a full year in draining the unemployment insurance fund. In fact in the first three years when the fishermen were drawing benefits, they contributed approximately $23 million to the fund's loss. If other means have to be found to finance the fishermen's share of the benefits, it is the duty of the government to come up with a satisfactory solution.

Neither am I prepared to accept the interpretation which the unemployment insurance commission today is imposing on certain fishermen with regard to contributions and benefits, particularly for the year 1959. I know of certain fishermen who have contributed to unemployment insurance stamps for the period they were engaged in fishing operations during the summer and fall of 1959. At the close of the season, in October or November, the fish buyer purchased the necessary stamps to be used in payment of contributions, in accordance with instructions received from officials of the commission. The insurance stamps were affixed in the fisherman's unemployment insurance book by the dealer, as the employer of the fisherman, or the buyer of his fish, on the basis of the gross value of his landings less the required 25 per cent to be deducted for expenses.

I know of instances where a number of fishermen were awarded certain benefits during the winter of 1960 based on their earnings during the fishing season of 1959, and only a few months ago, during the winter months of 1961 they were forced to pay back 50 per cent or more of the benefits they had received during the previous winter months.

If a fisherman is idle during the winter months it is because he cannot carry on his fishing operations, because he is prevented from doing so by ice conditions or other factors beyond his control.

The gallantry and courage of our fishermen must be recognized by every hon. member of this house. I am sure that none of us has forgotten the tragedy of the Escuminac fishermen in June, 1959, or the loss of a number of lives off the southern Nova Scotia coast only a month or so ago.

In fact, on this very day at 9 p.m. an investiture will take place in Fredericton by His Excellency the Governor General for the Escuminac fishermen. These fishermen will receive the British Empire medal for gallantry and bravery shown toward their fellow fishermen during the storm of June, 1959.

This is why I ask the question at this time, who is responsible for the depletion of the unemployment insurance fund, if not the present government? Who is responsible for a loss of close to $28 million from October, 1958 to September, 1960, a period of two years?

The unemployment insurance fund account consists of the funds contributed by employees, employers and the government. This fund is held in trust and used for the payment of benefits to the unemployed. The governing statute provides that these funds shall be invested in government of Canada direct or guaranteed securities only.

Who is responsible for the investments of the unemployment insurance fund, if not the governor of the Bank of Canada together with two other representatives appointed, one by the Minister of Finance and the other by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr)? The facts are that by the end of March, 1958—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Robichaud: Certainly.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of which minister of finance is the hon. member speaking? I think he must be aware that the appointments were made by my predecessors.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the point. The minister is responsible.

Mr. Robichaud: Is the Minister of Finance again shirking his responsibility? Is he not responsible for the appointments being made and for the job that is being done?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister approached this whole thing with a dreadful display of financial incapacity.

Mr. Robichaud: At the end of March, 1958, approximately $400 million of the money in the fund was invested in government victory bonds. Why was there this surprising transaction in February, 1958, when the fund, which was already jeopardized, was used to purchase $15 million of a new long term bond issued by the Canadian National Railways at a time when this issue was experiencing very serious difficulty in the market?

Then, in July, 1958, came the famous conversion loan. Why did the unemployment insurance fund convert all its victory bond holdings, taking in exchange $89.7 million of the conversion loan maturing in 1961, $63 million of the 1965 issue and $154 million of the 1972 issue?

This fund was being managed not for the welfare and security of its beneficiaries, the unemployed of this country, the workers of this country, but to facilitate government debt management operations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is as untrue as anything could be.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is wholly accurate.

Mr. Pearson: The facts show it to be true.

Mr. Robichaud: Loss after loss accumulated to the unemployment insurance fund. The impact on the fund has been so obvious that from April 1, 1959, a system of advances to the fund had to be adopted by the government in order to avoid further sales of securities at such excessive losses to the fund.

As a result of such transactions, as a result of this mismanagement for which the government must share the responsibility, the unemployment insurance fund, from the time this government took office, has been deprived of close to $70 million, three times as much as was lost through payment of benefits to fishermen.

The Minister of Finance cannot deny this. In the report—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He does.

Mr. Robichaud: —tabled on December 21 last we find a table showing month by month the losses to the fund from the sale of securities. I will not put all those figures on the record; there are too many. I mention in particular, however, that in some months losses have reached millions of dollars. I quote from this table, "Unemployment insurance fund selected figures taken from commission's monthly report", to illustrate my point. In 1958, in the month of November, $1,597,000 lost; in December, $3,169,000 lost; in February, 1959, $2,230,000; in March, $4,526,000. Later on, in 1959, in the month of December, $1,465,000. In 1960, in February, $3,209,000; in March, $2,825,000; June, $3,631,000; August, $1,393,000. And so on. The total losses exceed $28 million.

Surely, even if the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his colleagues brag about the magnitude of the drain on the fund this does not justify the government in showing a reckless disregard for the resting trust laid upon it to protect the integrity of a fund which is the property of the employers and of the workers of this country.

It may be of some interest to members of this house and to the country to note while the fund is being continuously depleted, its revenues are increasing at the rate of $7 million to $8 million a month. In fact, for the 12 months ending September 30, 1960, revenues were $94 million above the previous year.

I have mentioned two causes which have contributed to some extent to the depletion of the unemployment insurance fund. These, totalling an amount in the vicinity of $100 million, represent but a minor portion of the fantastic reduction of over $700 million in less than four years. The main factor contributing to this depletion is, by far, the ever increasing number of unemployed which factor is responsible for this great drain and for this heavy load of payments during the last four years.

I cannot understand a party or a government which takes pride in increasing unemployment insurance benefits from $231 million to $415 million in one single year. This is, however, exactly what the present government is doing today in its pamphlet listing the records and accomplishment of the present administration.

The purpose of this fund is to pay benefits to an insured person when a specified contingency occurs. No insurance fund, no insurance of any kind, can exist under such a pressure as has been exerted on the unemployment insurance fund during the last four years. The plight of the unemployment insurance fund is a serious reminder that a country with 18 million people cannot afford to have three quarters of a million or more of its workers idle, producing nothing and acting only as a drain on the whole economy of the country. The man who draws unemployment insurance benefits of $25 or $30 a week is contributing very little to the gross national product of the country.

Year in and year out, unemployment may have become part of our Canadian way of life, but at no time in our history has it reached the high rate which is becoming an inevitable and established fact under a Conservative administration. How can a fund subsist with 869,000 claimants in February 1958, with 795,000 in the same month of 1959, with 823,000 in March of 1960 and 837,000 in March of this year?

Those same hundreds of thousands of claimants for unemployment insurance benefits are men without work and men seeking work. With very few exceptions, those same men or women would rather earn their living and that of their families by working by the sweat of their brows than remain idle at home with a mere $25 or $30 a week as their only source of revenue.

I agree, and I am the first one to admit, that there have been abuses, that there have been cases of fraud in connection with unemployment insurance benefits. It is the duty of the commission to take necessary steps to prevent such abuses and to take action against those who have been illegally receiving payments for unearned contributions. This does not mean, however, that qualified workers, men who for years have been accepted for benefits, should all at once be disqualified in order to salvage the perilous rate of the unemployment insurance fund.

Why should carpenters, painters and other types of workers be, all at once, automatically disqualified and deprived of benefits formerly awarded to them under similar conditions, as was done in February and March of this year. Why must a carpenter hired for a period of 14 to 18 weeks, to build a new home at a fixed rate of $10 or $12 a day, be deprived of his benefits if he becomes idle for a certain period during the winter months?

I know the minister will come back and tell the house that the unemployment insurance commission had no alternative in such cases. The minister will tell us that such decisions were reached following a ruling of the umpire appointed under provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act as the final authority for deciding on questions of insurability, and that the commission is obliged to follow his interpretation.

I will ask the minister why has it taken the commission 20 years to obtain a new ruling on section 27(p) of the act which reads as follows:

—employment of a casual nature otherwise than for the purpose of the employer's trade or business;

Why should a widow who wants to have a new house built or her old house repaired or painted be denied the right to purchase unemployment insurance stamps for her employees? Why should a veteran who contracts to have a new home built under the Veterans' Land Act be prevented from giving his employees unemployment insurance stamps when he himself supervises the construction?

The widow in question needs a home to provide shelter for herself and her children, and her main interest or business is to remain in that home to look after her children. The veteran, whether employed as a civil servant or as a clerk, is not interested in hiring employees for his business or trade, but he is keenly interested in providing his wife and family with a new home.

Hundreds of cases have been brought to my attention in the last few months in which carpenters, labourers, and others have been deprived of their unemployment insurance benefits on the ground that they had been engaged in employment of a casual nature otherwise than for the purpose of the employer's trade or business. I ask again, why did it take the commission 20 years to arrive at such an arbitrary interpretation of the act?

The same employees who are being deprived for their benefits are being told, "Oh, yes, you can qualify for benefits if you are engaged as a carpenter or a painter, but what you have to do is to work for a building contractor who is licensed with the unemployment insurance commission and who is qualified to purchase stamps".

Is the minister aware of the effect of such a decision in rural areas where in many instances building contractors do not even exist? This means that an individual who wants to repair his house or build a new one must approach an outside contractor to do the job; that is, if he wants his workers to qualify for benefits. In many instances, this contractor will come in with his own men who also will be outsiders. I ask the minister, is this the kind of fair play promised by the Prime Minister in his bill of rights?

This house has been sitting for over five months, and the minister has known of this new interpretation of the act for some time. If there was no alternative, what has prevented the minister from introducing an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act which would have resulted in justice for thousands of workers who are now being deprived of benefits for which they normally would have qualified for a number of years? What did the minister do? Instead of taking action to protect the claimants involved, instead of taking action to prevent such injustice, orders were issued on March 27 to every post office in the country to return immediately form 419C, known as "Application to purchase unemployment insurance stamps as a casual employer".

The Minister of Labour was aware of what was going on, and notwithstanding the fact this house has been sitting for the last five months, we are still waiting for the amendment to the act promised in the speech from the throne. We on this side of the house have been warning the Minister of Labour and the government as to the necessity and urgency of replenishing the unemployment insurance fund. We have also warned the minister that if he hopes to use the same method he used in 1959 he will meet with serious objections from this side of the house, and he will no doubt incur the wrath of Canadian employers and employees.

Instead of acting at once, instead of taking the necessary steps to protect the rights of thousands of workers, the minister and the government have preferred to see this large number of claimants who were being denied unemployment insurance benefits seek new assistance under the social assistance act. In doing this the government had the assurance that 50 per cent of the cost of such assistance had to be borne by the provinces and the municipalities.

If the Prime Minister, as he stated in Prince Albert on February 14, 1958, had succeeded "in defeating the problem of unemployment" the perilous position of the unemployment insurance fund would not exist today. We remember that in Brantford on February 17, 1958, he said that "the humblest of our people will not be forgotten. The people who are unemployed will not be put in the false position of being put on relief". Well, this is actually what is happening today with the new interpretation of the Unemployment Insurance Act under which claimants are being denied unemployment insurance benefits which they have earned. They have had to go and beg for social assistance, 50 per cent of which is paid by the provinces and the municipalities. Nobody has forgotten these words of the Prime Minister on a live telecast on February 18, 1958, when he said:

> As long as I am Prime Minister of this country I am not going to blame anyone for unemployment.

Again, on February 24 of the same year he said at Cornwall:

> We have acted. We are meeting unemployment. We have given young Canadians the hope. We have given them the vision.

The vision of the Prime Minister is very deceptive to the young and old of this country after four years of Conservative administration. It is very deceptive to the three quarters of a million unemployed who are depending on unemployment insurance benefits. For those workers who are without work the vision of 1958 has proved to exist only in the imagination of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Skoreyko: May I ask the hon. member a question. What is the source of this figure of three quarters of a million?

Mr. Robichaud: The hon. member must have been asleep. I have said that the claimants for unemployment insurance benefits amounted to 837,000 in March. This is still away above three quarters of a million. The figure was 869,000 three years ago and 823,000 last year.

Mr. Ricard: You are happy about it, too.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Order.

Mr. Robichaud: That is the only kind of remark we can expect from the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot.

Mr. Ricard: You are very happy about it.

Mr. Robichaud: The fact remains that the main reason for the present situation of the unemployment insurance fund is the large number of claimants, which figure has increased by at least 75 per cent to 80 per cent since the present government took office. In other words, if the present government had listened to the constructive suggestions made in this house by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and other opposition members, such a situation would not exist today.

The unemployment insurance fund is being depleted; it is being wiped out at an alarming rate and this government sits idle, refusing to take adequate measures to bring it back to the stable and self-perpetuating status it maintained under a Liberal administration. The measures introduced thus far by the government, designed to curb unemployment have proven insufficient and ineffective, and have failed even to bring to a standstill the alarming process of shrinking of the unemployment insurance fund.

Again I ask how can the unemployment insurance fund subsist when in the Atlantic provinces over 15 per cent to 20 per cent of the labour force is without work? How can it subsist when, as in my own constituency of Gloucester, as of mid-March, the number of unemployed totalled 8,150, representing 55 per cent of our labour force? If the hon. member wishes to know where I obtained these figures, may I say I happen to have the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of Friday, May 5, which carries this headline:

> 8,150 persons unemployed in Gloucester in mid-March—
> $3,783,063 paid in unemployment insurance benefits during year.

Oh, I know the minister will say that most of those applicants for unemployment insurance benefits are fishermen. Well, I ask the minister to read the article and he will find out that this figure includes 750 fishermen and 270 peat moss workers. The minister can take a thousand from the 8,150, if he wants to; he can take off the number of fishermen who are claiming benefits, but the fact will still remain that 50 per cent of the labour force of Gloucester county are unemployed today.

In Gloucester county we have vast possibilities. We have our primary industries of agriculture, lumbering and fishing. We also have one of the largest mineral deposits on this continent. If this government has the intention of protecting and expanding our economy I would ask them to take a good look at our possibilities. I would ask the government to divert part of its northern vision to those areas of New Brunswick where we also have the natural resources which, if brought into production, would add substantially to the general economy of the country and would reduce the number of claimants for unemployment insurance benefits.

Such halfway measures as have been introduced so far this session are not the kind of incentives which are needed to stimulate our economy and to bring the economy of the Atlantic provinces into line with that of other areas of the country. Such measures as the double depreciation scheme, which in the first five months of operation has not produced one single new job, cannot be considered as very effective in stimulating new industries in areas worst affected by present conditions of uncertainty, idleness and confusion.

Enacted in 1940 and coming into operation on July 1, 1941, the Unemployment Insurance Act remains one of the major items of social security legislation in Canada. It embraces almost 75 per cent of our labour force representing over 4 million wage and salary earners to whom has been paid to date well over $3½ billion in benefits. It is a compulsory form of insurance established by the state to afford protection against unemployment if and as long as the insured worker can satisfy certain conditions. In recent years the unemployment insurance fund has become a source of temptation for a government ready for expedients but unprepared and unwilling for fundamental action on its part to assume its share of responsibility.

I therefore move, second by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine):

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"This house regrets the failure of the government to ensure sound administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act, resulting in the depletion of the financial resources of the fund and new arbitrary administrative procedures which deny benefits to casual employees."

Mr. Speaker: Unless any hon. member wishes to comment, I shall put the amendment before the house.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in my view the amendment placed before the house by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) is a very timely one. I think the fact of the matter is that the unemployment insurance fund has been subjected to pilfering almost to the point of being rendered bankrupt and non-existent. The fact of the matter is that the government, because of its failure to adopt a full employment policy, has made use of the fund for a purpose which was never intended when the act was placed before parliament in 1940.

As I understand the purpose of the Unemployment Insurance Act and the unemployment insurance fund it is to provide by way of an insurance measure a sum of money, a fund, credited to the account of an individual and available to that person should he become unemployed under certain circumstances in the future. The purpose of the fund was to take care of that period of time which would ordinarily elapse between the worker losing his present employment and acquiring a new job. The purpose of the Unemployment Insurance Act was really to take care of frictional unemployment. Its purpose was to take care of a minimum amount of unemployment and it was designed to provide certain income protection in what was by and large an economy of full employment.

The fund and the plan worked very well as long as we had relatively stable employment, but the fund became endangered and suffered tremendous losses the moment the government failed to maintain something approaching full employment. The government has gone to the country in a couple of elections on a full employment policy. It has pledged to the people of Canada that it would bring about full employment, that it would maintain full employment, but the unemployment insurance fund is a statistical record of the absolute failure of the government.

In December, 1956, the fund stood at $934 million. That amount had dropped to $874 million by March 31, 1957, and it has been on the way down at a very alarming rate ever since. On March 31, 1958, the fund stood at $744 million. On March 31, 1959, the amount was $499 million, on March 31, 1960, $365 million and on March 31, 1961, $185 million. It is very apparent that unless there is a tremendous improvement in employment in Canada or extraordinary steps are taken by the government the fund will be bankrupt and non-existent in a very short while. The state of the fund demonstrates to all the colossal failure of the government to provide anything approaching a full employment policy.

The government has given a number of excuses why it has been unable to provide full employment. In his baby budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) said that one of the reasons for so much unemployment was that so many babies were born in Canada during the war. I have said on other occasions that I have never heard the excuse used before that there are too many babies born in Canada from the standpoint of full employment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I took the opposite view.

Mr. Argue: I have never before heard the love life of the Canadian people blamed for widespread unemployment. We used to hear from hon. members opposite that there was too much immigration and that this was the cause of unemployment, that if we could just cut off the flow of immigrants the whole question would be solved. The government has reduced the flow of immigrants into our country and the amount of unemployment has gone up at the very same time.

Apparently hon. gentlemen opposite are now following the philosophy that if they can just make it more difficult for people to get money out of the fund this will save it. If they stop payments out of the fund I suppose they will protect it, but I think hon. gentlemen will be making a mistake if they apply some of the means of saving the fund that have been suggested.

I want to support the protest that has been made relating to the new interpretation of the act so far as paragraph (p) of section 27 is concerned. Under this new interpretation many carpenters, many artisans, have been denied unemployment insurance benefits because they have not been working for contractors but for individuals. According to this new interpretation they are not eligible for unemployment insurance benfits, even though stamps have been placed in their books.

The government adopted a winter works program which I think has been of some help. It would seem to me that part and parcel of a winter works program—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Limited help.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) says "limited help". It was not unlimited help, but I think it was of some help. If this program is to work at all, then surely the government should not be allowed to deny, through interpretation of the Unemployment Insurance Act, unemployment insurance benefits to carpenters and others who are engaged in the construction industry but who have not been employed by contractors.

I suggested earlier that what is needed now is not just a winter works program but a summer works program. Apparently there is going to be widespread unemployment during this summer. This particular feature, which has been so rigidly interpreted by this new ruling, is causing very great hardship among carpenters and others. I have received a number of letters protesting this new regulation. I want to tell the minister that in our judgment, if this is to be the interpretation of this particular section of the act, an amendment should be introduced to restore the benefits to persons from whom those benefits have now been taken.

Mr. Starr: May I ask a question at this point? Is the hon. member saying that anyone who wishes to buy stamps should be able to do so without being registered as an employer?

Mr. Argue: I am not saying that at all.

Mr. Starr: That is the only way it could be done.

Mr. Argue: I am saying that the new interpretation is too rigid. It is causing undue hardship and it is discriminatory against people who are bona fide workers and who, in our judgment, should be covered by this act as they have been covered in the past.

Mr. Starr: May I ask another question?

Mr. Argue: The minister can make his speech—

Mr. Starr: I just want to ask a question.

Mr. Argue: The minister can make his speech at a later time—

Mr. Starr: I just want to ask a question.

Mr. Argue: I know the minister is the fidgety type who finds it difficult to sit still. When he knows he has not a case he jumps up more frequently.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member does not have a case; that is his problem.

Mr. Argue: I think the case is very good.

Mr. Starr: I do not think the hon. member knows what he is talking about in connection with this question.

Mr. Argue: The minister can make all the statements—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order; if we have fewer interruptions we shall get along faster.

Mr. Argue: I am suggesting that the minister should introduce amendments to the act which would make it possible for those who have been denied benefits to receive them in the future. Those benefits have been available to others in the past. The minister can take the attitude, if he likes, that these people should never be paid. We suggest that they should be paid.

The fund is in a bad way largely because the government has failed to provide full employment, not because of certain misuses of the fund which may exist. This is not the main reason the fund has gone down. Surely all the abuses of the fund about which we have heard did not originate during the period of the Conservative government. It is strange in my opinion that the Canadian people, under a former administration, did not appear to be abusing the fund. If one listens to some hon. gentlemen opposite, one hears that the fund is being raided now by countless people who are abusing it, who have no right to benefits. It is strange that under a Conservative government the people of Canada appear to have lost their morality, according to hon. members opposite, and want to pilfer the fund.

In years gone by, what was the complaint? The complaint from a great many insured workers was that the fund was being built up very rapidly, and that steps should be taken to lower the contributions because the fund was going up and up. Under the Conservative government, the fund has been going down very rapidly. Except for the steps taken in 1959 to increase the contributions by some 30 per cent, when the benefits were increased by only 10 per cent, the fund has continued to go down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The benefits were never increased.

Mr. Argue: There was some slight increase.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Essex East can make his speech when the time comes. The hon. member takes the attitude that the Tories can never do anything right; that they are always wrong in every detail. I think the hon. member for Essex East would make a much stronger case if he were prepared to admit that sometimes hon. gentlemen opposite do introduce certain improvements to certain legislation. The hon. member can deny my statement, but the Canadian Labour Congress made this comparison and said benefits were increased 10 per cent, while contributions from the workers were increased some 30 per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Canadian Labour Congress made no such statement; I am surprised.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Essex East is an authority on a lot of things but he is not an authority in this case because he is wrong in the statement he has made.

This is not the only way in which the government has brought about a reduction in the fund. There has been mismanagement of the securities in the fund. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) pointed out that the amount of money that had been lost from this fund by this means totalled some $21 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, over $70 million.

Mr. Argue: Over $70 million; this represents the amount that has been lost from the fund because of the forced sale of government securities at fire sale prices. We know that at the time of the conversion loan the Minister of Finance twisted the arms of those who have something to do with investments by the unemployment insurance commission.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Argue: They purchased the reconversion bonds and the fund has been losing money ever since because of the action taken by the government and because of a very depressed bond market at the present time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A shocking misstatement; perversion of the truth.

Mr. Argue: I heard that. I suggest that $70 million is pretty expensive, and the fund is down to less than $200 million at the present time. The basic reason that the fund is almost bankrupt is the complete failure of the government to provide anything approaching a full employment policy. If this government maintains its present policy, if it continues in its failure to meet the unemployment situation, it will be only a matter of months until the fund will be completely bankrupt.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has been out politicking recently. He was in southwestern Ontario on Saturday when a motion was filed in the government's name but wound up appearing on the order paper in the Prime Minister's name.

Mr. More: You were in Regina.

Mr. Argue: I was here Saturday, and I made a few speeches. The Prime Minister was in southwestern Ontario and he was launching something. I am not sure what it was but the press suggests that an election may not be far away because Mr. Frost was with him, and if the Prime Minister is to get any support from the country he will have to lean very heavily on the premier of Ontario. However, the Prime Minister told us that the reason Conservative support in the country was not so good was that the story was not being told of all the government's wonderful legislation; according to him the reason was just a failure to get the story across.

May I say this. The Prime Minister had a northern vision in the last election. The public knows what happened as a result of that vision in the last election. We have had more unemployment than we have had at any time since the 1930's and the unemployment insurance fund is almost depleted. Yet the Prime Minister's answer to this sorry state of affairs is another vision.

I have here a newspaper article which states, in part, "P.M. sets election theme of a new Canada." It was not enough that he had one vision that turned into a nightmare; he is going to have another one. The people of the country cannot afford a second dose of the vision. We cannot afford to keep in office any longer a government that fails to provide full employment and bankrupts the unemployment insurance fund.

We have before us an amendment that we are prepared to support but we should like to move a subamendment. In this subamendment I have pleasure in suggesting that the honourable thing for the government to do is to reimburse the unemployment insurance fund to the extent of the drain that has been brought about by reason of abnormal unemployment with this administration in office. This we suggest is a reasonable thing to do.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is the only thing to do.

Mr. Argue: The unemployment insurance fund was established in the first place not as a substitute for full employment but as part of a full employment policy to take care of the 1 per cent, 2 per cent or up to 3 per cent of the labour force that might happen to be unemployed at any given time. In order to maintain the fund, in order to maintain intact the contributions that have been placed in the fund in good faith, we are suggesting that the government should consider reimbursing the fund from the public treasury by the amount that has been lost from excessive unemployment. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin):

That the amendment be amended by deleting the period after the word "employees" and adding thereto the following words:

"and its failure to give consideration to the reimbursement of the fund from the public treasury for the excessive depletion it has suffered as a consequence of the recent abnormal unemployment".

I point out that the subamendment has been carefully drafted so that it should not be interpreted as being a direction to the government to pay funds from the national treasury, something which a private member cannot move; rather, it expresses an opinion of the house, namely that the government should give consideration to the reimbursement of this fund from the public treasury for the excessive depletion it has suffered as a consequence of the recent abnormal unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Unless any hon. member wishes to comment on the proposed amendment to the amendment, I shall place it before the house.

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in the remarks of the last two speakers, speaking as they were for their parties, we have seen once more a demonstration of the complete irresponsibility of the opposition in this house—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): —and of their absolute failure to do anything —in fact their determination to do absolutely nothing—to assist in the solving of any problems that might be facing this country. Rather, they take their stand, as they have done in the past, in condemning whatever is done without any regard to what might be done to help the situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman has said that opposition groups have taken a position this afternoon only for the purpose of expressing their opposition and not of furthering the interests of the country.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what the hon. member has said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that continual interrupter, says "That is true".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Those are unparliamentary words on the part of both the hon. member and the minister and this unintelligent laughter only confirms what I have said.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) allow me to secure a better hearing of his important point of order? I hope hon. members will not interrupt. I am sure all hon. members want to know what the difficulty is.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, it is contrary to our practice for any hon. member to impute motives. If we in this particular Liberal party take a position and it does not satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite, that does not mean to say that we are not acting in the national interest as we see it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman has made a statement that he should withdraw. It was the kind of statement which was made the other day by the Prime Minister and which should have been withdrawn. Hon. gentlemen opposite continually do this sort of thing.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member indicate specifically the imputation which he feels is objectionable.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Obviously Your Honour was preoccupied at the time it was made. The hon. gentleman said that once again the opposition had indicated its irresponsible attitude toward public matters.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) say "hear, hear". The Secretary of State who is acting responsibly is silent. These gentlemen who hold responsible positions on the government side continue to applaud this remark of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. It is not open to any hon. member to make such imputations. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the Minister of Labour to act as a mature and sophisticated member.

Mr. Starr: You make me laugh.

Mr. Speaker: It is contrary to the rules of the house to make offensive statements about any hon. member or to impute to any hon. member improper motives. There was a general allegation of irresponsibility directed to the opposite side of politics or the opposite side of the house, as I heard the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne), and of motives which perhaps are not desirable but there was no imputation of any immorality and I do not think the remarks go as far as the hon. member suggests they do.

If the hon. member for Essex East were concerned personally and had been named, I would give the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway an opportunity to modify what he said. However, as it was a general allegation I think it is unnecessary to do that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should point out that the hon. gentleman did refer to two hon. members. He referred particularly to the last two speakers, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). Then the hon. member made a general comment of an umbrella kind which would include others.

I say to you, sir, with great respect, that those were improper words and should not be allowed to rest without being challenged by the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; I cannot agree with the hon. member. Will the hon. member continue.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to clear up this matter at once. I was not insinuating that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) or the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) are any more irresponsible than other hon. members of the opposition.

If there were any unintentional slight on those hon. members I would certainly be prepared to modify that.

We have heard a barrage of complaints about the unemployment insurance fund being depleted. I think this is a serious problem facing the country and the government, and the government has recognized that by indicating its intention to bring forward at this session of parliament amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They should have been brought in months ago.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should think the fact that the government has stated its intention well in advance of bringing forward legislation gives the opposition and anybody who is willing to contribute to the solution of the problem an opportunity to bring forward suggestions as to how it should be done.

However, as usual the opposition have failed to take that up; they have failed completely to offer any suggestions except the one suggestion that they make on all problems that face Canada, that we should print some more money and pay it out of the federal treasury. That seems to solve everything in their view. Perhaps if we make a few more printing presses and print money faster we will be able to solve all problems on the basis upon which they want to solve them.

Then they turn around and tell us that the fund is going down very quickly; it is going to be bankrupt and we are going to face very dire consequences. Immediately they get past that point they complain, not that we are paying out too much money but that we are not paying out enough. They tell us that many people are being deprived of their right to draw from the fund and all kinds of people are being deprived of proper benefit.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I am not suggesting more people should not be covered by the act and should benefit, but I hope I have enough responsibility to offer some suggestion as to how this can be brought about other than by printing more money.

Mr. Pickersgill: Provide more employment. Give them the work the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) promised.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Yes, we had some great suggestions for creating employment in this country from the opposition, but—

Mr. Pickersgill: We had wonderful ones from the Prime Minister in 1958.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): —I suggest that if all the working people are to be covered by the act, it must be put on a proper, paying basis. Unemployment insurance has been the greatest protection the working man has enjoyed not only in this country but throughout the world.

Many of the people who have studied this subject in great detail have come to the conclusion that unemployment does occur from time to time in all countries of the world, and it has occurred for the past 600 years. We are not likely to stop it overnight.

I notice that in a publication by Louis Pink entitled "Freedom from fear" it is said:

> After 60 years of experience, Great Britain has decided that their unemployment insurance system must remain the major method of meeting unemployment.

I could go on to quote many other statements in this regard. My very strong feeling is that if the Unemployment Insurance Act is amended along lines which will provide adequate protection for the unemployed of this country, it will at the same time do a great deal to alleviate unemployment.

Some time ago I gave notice of a motion to the house in connection with amendments which I felt should be made to the Unemployment Insurance Act, but because of the business of the house it was not possible to bring that motion forward.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank goodness for that.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to suggest to the government that these amendments to the act be considered. The resolution I placed on the order paper under date of January 31 was as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to amending the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide for recognition of the principle that every employable person in the labour force is entitled either to a job or to adequate compensation by including the following provisions:
> (a) The act should be renamed the unemployment compensation act.
> (b) Every person in the labour force who is employed under a contract of service should contribute to the fund regardless of income or occupation.
> (c) Every insured person in the labour force—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member goes any further, while I do not like to circumscribe his contribution to the debate I feel that if he is allowed to present his resolution as relevant it will be relevant to debate the propositions which are contained in it, thereby enlarging the scope of this debate very substantially.

At the present time the grievance expressed in the amendment concerns the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act and the results of that administration. This has been extended to a complaint about the failure of the government to consider the reimbursement of the fund. So that only in so far as the hon. member's proposals are relevant to the administration and the reimbursement of the fund would I consider it proper for him to continue.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I think the fact that the government has announced its intention to bring forward amendments to the act indicates that in order to be able to administer the act properly it does require amendment. The situation which has arisen at the present time makes it impossible to administer it properly, and with the paying out within the terms of the act that is being done, nothing could happen to the fund but its depletion.

It then becomes a question of how the fund should be built up. The opposition have suggested, as I say, that the federal government should simply contribute a large amount of money to reimburse the fund. I am suggesting that if the act is changed in a proper way, that will not be necessary.

I think it is unsound for the federal government to just pay a huge sum of money into the fund. I think this act must be put on a proper, paying basis. If it is ever going to be administered properly by anybody, it has to be on a sound and paying basis. That is the reason I suggest these amendments to the act, because I believe many people now drawing out of the fund should not be drawing out of it, and many people who should be able to qualify to draw out of the fund are not now qualified to draw out of it, nor do they pay into it.

With your concurrence, Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue putting these suggested amendments before the house. I think you will find they are relevant to what has been suggested by the opposition. They would provide a much better means of administering the act and putting it on a sound basis than has been suggested by the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: I am asking the hon. member to use his own discretion about what parts of his own resolution are relevant rather than putting in all of his proposals.

I admit there may be some relevance in some of his proposals, but others would bring about a quite broad extension of this debate, which would be quite unwarranted.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have heard suggestions by the hon. member for Gloucester about fishermen. There have been a great many protests throughout the country about fishermen drawing from this fund when they are certain to be unemployed during the winter months.

Mr. Pickersgill: They are not certain to be unemployed.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): That has been a complaint made about many of the seasonal industries, that there really is not a risk of insurance when they are certain to be unemployed. I have not supported that view. I have at all times felt that these benefits should apply to every person in this country who is ready, willing and able to work. They should be covered by the act. This, of course, has not been done up to the present time, for various reasons.

There are some groups, such as civil servants, which are not included under the act. I believe they should be. It is argued that these people are in permanent employment but that has not turned out to be the case on all occasions. I notice that in a television program a couple of months ago it was stated that a number of employees of the city of Ottawa had been laid off. They were not liable for benefit because it had been presumed they were in permanent employment.

In the case of civil servants, both federal and provincial, there are many temporary employees. The provinces can use their discretion as to which of their employees shall be subject to the provisions of the act and, of course, they follow the policy of insuring those people who are temporary employees and who are almost certain to draw benefit at one time or another. I feel, therefore, that these classes of employees are not bearing their share of the cost of unemployment insurance. Either no civil servants should be covered or all of them should be covered. As I have said before, I believe this applies not only to civil servants but to all those employed under contract of service.

I firmly believe that those who are going to benefit from the act should be the ones who are required to contribute to it. That does not appear to be the policy of the opposition. If the federal government is going to contribute huge sums to the unemployment insurance fund, as they suggest, we would be taking the money out of general taxation. Among those contributing to its payment would then be persons in receipt of old age pensions and elderly people who could not possibly receive any benefit from the fund and who therefore, I submit, have no reason to be paying into it. A solution such as is suggested by the opposition would obviously require a higher level of taxation. I submit that we have to amend the act in such a way as to protect those who need protection and provide for them for as long as they need such assistance without regard to the number of contributions they have made to the fund.

There has been a good deal of talk in the country about returning to insurance principles in this act. However, as I pointed out on a previous occasion, everyone has a different idea as to what constitutes insurance principles. I pointed out that in the case of fire insurance, for example, if a person's house burns down he receives the entire amount that is necessary to rebuild the house or to build another. In the case of unemployment insurance, however, this principle does not apply because a person only receives benefit in direct relationship to what he has paid into the fund. I do not believe that the individual in this country is in any position to accept a risk of that sort himself. For these reasons I believe contributions must be spread over the entire labour force. I disagree with the views which have been expressed by the opposition. If we go beyond spreading the cost among the labour force, we begin to spread it among the entire population of the country. It seems to me that the people who are in a position to pay into the fund are the people who are gainfully employed.

Some suggestion has been made that proper protection has not been provided by the government for the people who are paying contributions. I suggest that this is no fault of the government but that it follows from the terms of the act itself. People are drawing money out of the fund who should not be drawing it out, but although there have been many fraudulent claims, as we would all agree, I do not think this represents the serious problem which some people make it out to be.

However, I do believe there are many married women drawing money out of the fund who have absolutely no need to do so. It is very difficult to establish whether or not married women are actually looking for jobs. This is one of the things which, in my view, is helping to drain the fund. Certainly, it is beyond the ability of government to control this practice by way of administration; an amendment of the act is required in order to deal with things of this nature.

Another cause of huge drains on the fund is the action of people who retire at the age of 65 and who then feel qualified to draw from the fund for 52 weeks. Though they only represent 3 per cent of the claims on the fund they are responsible for 10 per cent of the money paid out.

Then again, because of the unemployment situation, the government decided to extend, for a month at either end, the seasonal benefits. Some might wish to criticize the government for making this decision but personally I feel that it should have been made, that it was properly made, and that the contribution which the government makes to the fund even under the present financial arrangements is more than adequate to cover the administration of the fund and anything paid out in seasonal benefits. For this reason I feel criticism of the government on this ground is unjustified.

May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock, there being a supply motion today.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at six o'clock I had been dealing in general terms with the amendment and subamendment moved by the two opposition parties condemning the government's administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act, and indicating I felt that this condemnation was entirely without foundation. I believe there are many reasons why it is without foundation, but I do not think we can find a better authority for this statement than the hon. member for Gloucester who moved the amendment, because, in the course of his own remarks, he indicated that in his view the reason that the unemployment insurance fund had been depleted was that there was a high number of claimants drawing benefits from the fund. With that statement I certainly agree. He did not blame the condition of the fund on the high unemployment particularly, as the subamendment does; he simply blamed it on the high number of claimants drawing from the fund. I think this is an accurate statement and a complete denial of the amendment which he subsequently moved.

I believe, as I had started to indicate before the dinner recess, that there are a number of reasons why there are a high number of claimants under the act. We have the case of married women. It was pointed out by Dr. Warren James that 85 per cent of the married women were at one time or another claimants under the fund, and that in most instances when they did go on unemployment insurance they exhausted the entire amount of their benefits and that it was very difficult indeed to establish whether those women were desirous of finding work or were in fact, ready, willing and able to work. In most instances it was also shown that they had husbands who were working full-time and for that reason there really was not any necessity for their drawing funds under the act.

As I pointed out, those who retired at age 65 and drew benefits for a year were responsible for 3 per cent of the claims under the act but drew 10 per cent of the total benefits paid out under the act. I indicated the action the government had taken to increase the amount of benefit under the act and also to extend the seasonal benefit period. This was done because of the unemployment situation. These are some of the things that have led to the depletion of the unemployment insurance fund. However, it is quite clear from a consideration of those facts that the administration of the act itself has absolutely nothing to do with its depletion. Therefore, as I have said, on his own words, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gloucester falls to the ground. It is absolutely and completely without any substantiation.

The hon. member did complain about losses suffered by the investment committee, but he did not put that forward as a major cause of the unemployment insurance fund being depleted. He also neglected to point out that while some losses had been incurred in the investments there never at any time was an over-all loss to the fund from investment of the unemployment insurance funds. There never has been a year when there has not been a substantial profit made from the investments in securities made by the unemployment insurance investment committee, and I am sure no one would want to hold the investment committee responsible for an error in judgment in sustaining a loss on one particular transaction. No investment committee in this country is infallible and I do not suppose we are ever likely to have one that is. However, I believe, over all, the investment policy has proved to be a sound one and has worked to the benefit of the fund.

The solution proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia is to condemn the government for failure to give consideration to the reimbursement of the fund from the public treasury. Well, I do not know how he is in a position to say to what the government has or has not given consideration. Perhaps he knows more about what the cabinet considers than the rest of us do, but I have not known the cabinet to make public those things which they are considering or are not considering unless they have made a specific decision on it and have said they have considered it and rejected it, and I know of no such statement being made by the government. Therefore, I fail to see how he is in a position to condemn the government for failure to give consideration to this measure.

The hon. member might want to condemn them for not doing it. If that is so, I quite agree with the government if it is their decision not to reimburse the fund from public moneys because I do not believe it should be done. If, as I have said, the depletion of the fund has been brought about by people drawing from it who should not be drawing from it, it is not in a sound position and the pumping of public money into it will do absolutely nothing to correct the situation. It would continue in the same way it has in the past. If we put $100 million into it, it would simply be drawn off by people who should not be drawing benefits from the fund. For this reason I believe there must be far more substantial amendments to the act.

The hon. member for Gloucester raised several points, one of which I started to deal with earlier, namely the question of seasonal employees drawing benefits from the fund. He was of the view that they should continue to draw from the fund, and I have taken the same view. I believe all people should draw from it but I also take the view that they should all contribute. Of course, this is where the difficulty arises at the present time. I pointed out that in the instance of the civil service, only those who draw from the fund are registered under it. Those who are employed steadily do not pay into the fund. It is perfectly obvious that if this fund is to be sustained at all it has to be done on a proper basis with everybody who is gainfully employed contributing to the fund.

The other question that arises in regard to seasonal employees is that there is no limitation placed on the amount of earnings they can have in a year. Therefore, in actual fact, we may have a seasonal employee who pays into the fund for eight months and then draws benefits for four months although he may have earned in that eight months more than another man who has worked for the entire 12 months and has been forced to pay into the fund for 12 months. I believe this is a very unfair and unsound situation. For this reason I believe some limitation must be placed on the amount of earnings that a person can have in a year and still draw benefits from the fund. I do not suggest this in the form of a means test, because what I consider to be a means test would deal with assets. I do not believe we should take into consideration anything that a man has, such as a house, and so on.

I believe my suggestion would help a great deal those people who are now meeting a means test. It would help to overcome that problem if everybody was covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act and was paid benefits for so long as he was out of work regardless of the amount of contribution he had paid into the fund. Because we already look after these people in one way or another at the present time, I suggest that there would be no greater cost involved in that if a person's benefits expire today he then goes on unemployment assistance or some other form of relief under which he has to meet a means test. I do not believe that should be the case in this country. I believe every person is entitled either to a job or to adequate compensation if he is out of work through no fault of his own and provided he is ready, willing and able to accept a job.

In order to accomplish this end and keep the cost at a reasonable level, I believe there must be certain limitations placed upon the act. I believe that a person who has earned $4,000 or over in a particular year has no need to draw benefits from the fund in that year although if the same person were out of work in the following year there would be no limitation on the amount he could draw. He would be able to draw for the entire year if he were out of work but I do not think a person who has had an income in excess of $4,000 in a year needs to benefit under the Unemployment Insurance Act in that year.

Neither do I believe that married women whose husbands are working full-time and are adequately able to support them have any need to draw from the fund. Again, I noticed in the unemployment statistics a short while ago that almost half of the unemployed in the country were between 14 and 19 years of age. I believe adequate provision is made by the federal government for training these people if they are unable to find employment. If they have not got the proper skills to find employment, I believe the place for them is in school and I do not think they should be on the labour market or benefiting under the Unemployment Insurance Act. As long as they are living at home with parents who are adequately able to provide for them, having in mind that the government is making provision for them to take vocational training or whatever other kind of training may be necessary to fit them for a job, I believe that is what they should be doing instead of drawing on the unemployment insurance fund with no action being taken to ensure that they will ever be able to earn a living for themselves.

I also believe the act in general needs to be tightened up because I think there is a good deal of collusion between employers and employees with respect to people quitting their jobs when there is no need to do so and then drawing unemployment insurance. I believe there should be severe penalties imposed on any employee or employer acting separately or in collusion to defraud the fund. Again, I find that when I ask people why they felt they were entitled to do certain things under the Unemployment Insurance Act the answer I often get is that everybody else is doing it and it is all right in their opinion and they feel they would be foolish not to draw benefits, although in my view they are not entitled to draw them. They seem to come within the terms of the act. Those things which constitute fraud upon the fund should be clearly set out and there should be severe penalties imposed on those people who do attempt to defraud the fund.

I see that my time is drawing to a close. I do wish to emphasize that the negative attitude perpetually taken by members of the opposition in the house is not going to solve any of the problems of the country. It is no use condemning perpetually. They always seem to be against something. I have not heard a helpful suggestion come from them during the whole time I have been here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is ridiculous.

Mr. Pickersgill: That statement is false.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Now that the government has announced its intention to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act—

Mr. Pickersgill: When?

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): —I hope we will hear some helpful contributions from the opposition instead of the torrent of abuse to which we are constantly subjected. I hope they will try in some way to accept their responsibilities as members of the house and will make reasonable and helpful suggestions rather than merely condemning.

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the matter now being discussed, and I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), particularly his reference to unemployment insurance for fishermen. From time to time one hears the criticism that unemployment insurance for fishermen is the reason or a reason why the unemployment insurance fund is being depleted. Surprisingly enough, some of these criticisms are made by representatives of commercial interests who in Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces as a whole have a captive market. However, I do not think these opinions are shared by any hon. member of the house.

I certainly do not agree with the speaker who preceded me, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne), in his suggestion that hon. members on this side of the house are other than responsible and constructive in their criticism, but I noticed that he too subscribed to the idea of unemployment insurance for fishermen. The fact is that unemployment insurance for fishermen was a very constructive step that was taken in order to assist the fishermen, a class of workers who seriously need and deserve unemployment insurance. It has proved to be a real blessing to the fishermen themselves and I am quite sure that indirectly it has made a contribution to steadying the economy of the Atlantic provinces as well as having made a contribution to the economy of Canada as a whole.

In discussing the matter of the administration of the unemployment insurance fund, I should like to say at the outset that I make a distinction between abuses involving the drawing of unemployment insurance unfairly and unnecessary hardship caused to a class of workers who suffer under the administration of the act because, rightly or wrongly, there are many instances where workers such as carpenters, handymen, artisans and others who are employed by individuals find that at the end of their working period they do not qualify for unemployment insurance. In that connection I should like to read a letter from a constituent of mine which sets forth his own experience and in doing so tells the story very well as to what has happened to those men who depend upon casual labour for their livelihood and who find that such work is not insurable. The letter is from Roland J. Menchenton of Norris Arm North Side in the constituency of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. The letter was written early in January and reads as follows:

> I am going to state what happened to us this past summer. Myself, Bennet White and William Freake, all of Norris Arm North, was employed at Grand Falls this past summer. Myself and Mr. William Freake built a house for Mr. Robert Malloy, No. 9 Station Road, Grand Falls. We received $1.75 per hour and received ten unemployment stamps for this job. We then went to work for Mr. John Malloy, same address, for three weeks. After job was completed we were informed by the unemployment insurance commission that there was a new law in effect which stated that no person outside of a bona fide contractor or employer could buy stamps. Result was we did not get any. We then went to work with Mr. George Peercey and worked with him six weeks with the same result. We also worked with Mr. Robert Piercey (both of Grand Falls) for three weeks and were told that it was not insurable work under the new law. Result was after working since middle of June until December 20 we were unable to qualify for regular insurance and did not have the required stamps for seasonal benefit.
> Now, sir, one half of the work done in the town of Grand Falls is done by men like ourselves, two or three men on a job. And now we are denied the privilege of buying stamps. Now what, may I ask, is going to happen to the hundreds of workers like ourselves who find employment in this way? Do we after working steady for 25 or 30 weeks have to spend the few dollars we have managed to save or as in the case of the majority fall back on able bodied relief. To my mind there could have been a law made to offset the illegal claims made on the unemployment insurance commission without taking away the rights and privileges of the honest workers who try to earn a livelihood without being a burden on the government in the form of able bodied relief.

I think the quotations from that letter depict one of the problems which faces workers who depend upon short term employment. It is causing a great deal of unrest and a great deal of hardship in the long run, and is one reason why we are making these criticisms at this time. The hon. member who preceded me charged us on this side of the house with criticizing only and making no constructive suggestions. I, of course, deny that allegation. However, I have yet to find a constructive suggestion made by those on this side which has been listened to by hon. members on the other side.

The suggestion which I would make now is that an amendment be made to this act which would permit the act to be applied in the way in which it was originally intended to be applied, that is to give assistance where assistance is needed. This act should be insurance against unemployment for all people out of work who want to work, who do not try to avoid work. This was the real motive behind the passing of the act. Apart from being of help in a practical way to those who are out of work, this insurance principle has the additional advantage of cushioning periods of recession and unemployment such as the one through which we are going at the present time. Undoubtedly a tightening up of the act, a restriction in its application, is a denial of the very principles upon which the act was founded.

I do hope the suggestions we are making now that the act be applied fairly to those deserving of assistance, those who are out of work through no fault of their own and who should be insurable, will be given careful consideration by those who sit opposite.

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, once again we find the opposition introducing an amendment to a motion to go into supply under a guise that is purposely designed to permit them to make an attack on government policy with regard to employment in this country. There is little that can be said by way of commendation of this particular amendment. I believe hon. members of the opposition find themselves on the horns of a dilemma. In one breath they criticize and attack the government for its administration of the fund, and the resultant depletion of the fund, and in the next breath they attack the government for taking measures to restrict abuses being made of the fund. They cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. They place themselves in a directly contradictory position.

For three years now, the members of the opposition have been talking in terms of depression and recession. Both in this house and throughout the country, they have decried the fact that we have unemployment. They have used unemployment as the basis for introducing amendment after amendment, and on occasion they have even attempted to adjourn the business of this house to discuss unemployment as a matter of urgent public importance. Time and time again, they have talked in terms of hundreds of thousands being unemployed. As a matter of fact, on one occasion, they even referred to one million. Now they come along and ask what has happened to the fund. One sometimes wonders, when observing them in action, what they are thinking. They make no suggestions about what we should do or what should be done. They have not suggested the things we have not done. On the one hand, they accuse us of doing nothing in the face of high unemployment, and on the other hand they say the fund should not have been used to alleviate the problems created by unemployment or the hardships that result from unemployment.

They suggest the fund should not be used for the purpose for which we presume it was intended. One wonders how they are going to get out of this dilemma. They refer to $900 million being in the fund in 1957. One wonders, Mr. Speaker, if the establishment of the unemployment insurance fund in this country was nothing more than a piece of Liberal party window dressing. In the first instance, they say unemployment is high. If they say unemployment is high, then they must admit that the fund which was intended to deal with unemployment was used in the way in which it was intended to be used. They do not accuse us of wasting the fund for if they did, they would then definitely be saying that the fund should not be used for any purpose whatever. The one argument destroys the other. If the opposition protests against what I am saying this evening, then they are saying that the passage of the act itself was nothing more than a pure farce, a simple device for window dressing and never intended for anything other than political propaganda.

The action we have taken in respect of the fund, Mr. Speaker, is similar to the action now being taken in the United States under parallel circumstances. At the time of the recession, we extended seasonal benefits. We made the formula more flexible. We brought married women under the act so that there would not be any discrimination and to assist in increasing family income. As the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) pointed out, we brought fishermen under the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Gloucester pointed out nothing of the kind. Everyone in this house ought to know that fishermen were brought under the Unemployment Insurance Act by the previous government.

Mr. Starr: That is not so. You were sitting over there when it was done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows that this is not a question of privilege but rather a question of disagreement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister speaks on a matter of which he should know something.

Mr. Thrasher: This may be a matter of debate, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not a matter of debate; it is a matter of fact.

Mr. Thrasher: Perhaps the hon. member will have an opportunity to speak when I have finished.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say that the statement of the hon. gentleman is false.

An hon. Member: Stand up.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will do so. Mr. Speaker, I say that the statement made by the hon. gentleman is false and that it should be withdrawn.

Mr. Thrasher: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. The hon. gentleman says I made a statement which was false. I deny that my statement was false and ask that he withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must indicate to the parliamentary secretary that it may not have been the proper time for the hon. member to disagree, but there is nothing unparliamentary in saying that a statement is false unless there is an intimation that the hon. member is deliberately making a false statement, and that was not the case.

Mr. Thrasher: I think the record will speak for itself.

Mr. Pickersgill: It will have to do so.

Mr. Thrasher: I am quite prepared to accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robichaud: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Thrasher: Yes.

Mr. Robichaud: Can he tell the house when legislation relating to unemployment insurance for fishermen was introduced in this house and passed?

Mr. Thrasher: Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question, of course, is a matter of record.

Mr. Robichaud: Answer it then.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the parliamentary secretary not know?

Mr. Thrasher: It was put into effect by this government.

Mr. Robichaud: When did the fishermen start paying?

An hon. Member: Look it up.

Mr. Robichaud: You look it up.

Mr. Thrasher: I have done so. We have amended the act since we have come into power. We have increased the contributions as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate now says. We extended the period of benefits, as is being done today in the United States. We have added two new classes. We have used the fund since coming into power for the purpose for which it was intended.

Hon. gentlemen sitting opposite have often stated in this house that unemployment insurance was designed as a cushion against unemployment. Would they now deny us the right to pay out these benefits when we have a period of high unemployment? What single measure taken by this government would they now have us retract? Would they now ask us not to extend the benefits to married women in order, as was done, to avoid discrimination that existed under the act when they were in power? Would hon. gentlemen now ask us to take fishermen out of the act?

Mr. Pickersgill: Who asked to have fishermen taken out of the act?

Mr. Thrasher: Would they now, Mr. Speaker, ask us to reduce the period of seasonal benefits?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who asked that?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, who asked that?

An hon. Member: The Liberals.

Mr. Starr: You have not asked for anything.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are contradicting your own assistant.

Mr. Thrasher: Hon. gentlemen opposite have criticized the government on many occasions but never did they criticize the depletion of the fund, nor do they make any recommendation which would have the effect of curtailing benefits. Yet they now rise in their places and in ominous tones ask what has happened to the fund. When you hear them speaking here today, Mr. Speaker, you wonder whether they are aware of the fact that a recession existed in this country, yet on other occasions they talked about nothing else.

In the speech from the throne at the opening of the present session of parliament it was suggested that amendments would be made to the act this session. Amendments will be made to the act at this session. An interdepartmental committee has been studying the act as well as various recommendations of the advisory committee for several months. Recommendations have been made for amendments and they are being studied, Mr. Speaker; but these are matters of government policy and when decisions are made in respect to them, they will be brought before the house in the form of legislation.

The hon. member for Gloucester reaches the heights of absurdity when he talks about employment and says that this government has done nothing. Let me tell him this. At this session of parliament we lowered the down payment on a $10,000 home from $1,000 to $500. We have lowered the down payment on a $11,000 from $1,100 to $550. We have lowered the down payment on a $12,000 home from $1,200 to $600.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising to a point of order. I do not wish in any way to restrain the hon. gentleman from reading his essay, but I trust that Your Honour is noticing that what he is saying has nothing whatever to do with the Unemployment Insurance Act. I merely draw the matter to Your Honour's attention so that we on this side of the house will be assured of the same freedom of debate as that in which the hon. gentleman is now indulging.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. gentleman wishes to speak on the point of order I will hear him.

Mr. Thrasher: When the hon. member for Gloucester introduced his amendment he made an attack on the government's employment policy. He made an almost continuous attack on the policies of this government on employment and the action we have taken. As a matter of fact, he said we had done nothing. If we had done nothing, hon. gentlemen should not mind listening to me when I am indicating what we have done.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not object.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member is the one who is introducing new matters.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course, the debate is restricted to the subject matter of the amendment and the subamendment. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate objects—

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member must realize that he must restrict his remarks. He may make passing reference to arguments put forward by another hon. member, but I must ask him to make his remarks relevant to the amendment before the house. It will not be sufficient for him to have the permission of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to be irrelevant.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not trying to restrict the parliamentary secretary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, no: we will reply on the new matters.

[Mr. Thrasher.]

An hon. Member: You might restrict yourself.

Mr. Thrasher: In view of your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to confine my remarks to the amendment and the subamendment. In answer to the hon. member for Gloucester, suffice it to say that we have at this session taken 23 separate measures to combat the problem of unemployment. We have taken measures in the fields of housing, municipal aid, aid to universities in the construction of residences, measures to double—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry but I must interrupt the hon. member. I am sure this enumeration has nothing to do with the amendment before the house which reads as follows:

> This house regrets the failure of the government to ensure sound administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act, resulting in the depletion of the financial resources of the fund and new arbitrary administrative procedures which deny benefits to casual employees.

Nor does it have anything to do with the subamendment which is in the following words:

> "and its failure to give consideration to the reimbursement of the fund from the public treasury for the excessive depletion it has suffered as a consequence of the recent abnormal unemployment".

I think the parliamentary secretary will realize that the enumeration of the measures to which he is now referring has nothing directly to do with this matter. Unless the parliamentary secretary puts forward an argument which is related to the subject matter of the amendment or the subamendment, it would be out of order.

Mr. Benidickson: But he is sticking to his essay.

Mr. Thrasher: Mr. Speaker, my only purpose in introducing the subject I did introduce was because the hon. member for Gloucester, in speaking in support of his amendment, devoted practically the whole of his speech to making an attack upon the government for its failure to cope properly with the employment situation in this country.

An hon. Member: He did write the speech himself.

Mr. Thrasher: In so doing the hon. member introduced an amendment which in a sense was restrictive. However, in my opinion, in a broader sense it could provide room for a great deal of latitude in the debate on this particular matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I point out to the parliamentary secretary who has the floor that it would assist the Chair if he would say whether he intends to reply to argument put forward by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). If the parliamentary secretary would indicate that this is what he is doing, it would certainly help the Chair to determine whether the answer is in accordance with the argument put forward. If it is only a passing reference, I suggest it would be in order.

Mr. Thrasher: Mr. Speaker, I intended to restrict what I was going to say on this subject to nothing more than a passing reference, in view of the ruling you gave previously, in reply to the hon. member for Gloucester.

Had the members of the opposition, on the occasion when each of these measures was announced by the government, risen and said they were good measures; had the hon. members sitting opposite said on the occasion of the amendments to the National Housing Act, "These are good measures; they will stimulate the construction of housing in this country—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, are we now reviving debates which have already been concluded in this house? This is being done by the parliamentary secretary, and members of the opposition are not allowed to do it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think I made myself clear previously. I must warn the parliamentary secretary that to my mind he is not being relevant in discussing the subject matter of a debate which took place on the occasion of the introduction of amendments to the National Housing Act.

Mr. Thrasher: Mr. Speaker, I will try to abide by your ruling. I do not wish to do anything other than abide by the ruling of the Chair.

Suffice it to say that if hon. gentlemen opposite had acted in a contrary fashion when these measures were introduced to the house; had they encouraged their constituents and constituencies to take advantage of them, we could have said, "They are Canadians; they are interested in the economic problems of this country".

Mr. Benidickson: Which constituencies?

An hon. Member: You are out of order.

Mr. Thrasher: I wish to deal now with the second half of the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Gloucester. I have here a draft statement which was prepared by the unemployment insurance commission in connection with the changes that were made. Perhaps in the interests of clarity, and so there will be no misunderstanding, I should read the statement at this time:

Recently there had been complaints regarding the cancellation of stamps purchased by registered and non-registered employers alike and also regarding the withdrawal of the privilege to certain employers, who are not required to register with the unemployment insurance commission, to purchase unemployment insurance stamps.

These complaints stem from the fact that employers have been insuring persons who are not properly insurable. These persons fall into two main categories. First, those whose employment was not under a contract of service; and second, those who were employed on a casual basis for other than the employer's trade or business.

Referring to the first group, Mr. Speaker, section 25 (a) of the Unemployment Insurance Act provides that employment is insurable when it is:

—employment in Canada, by one or more employers, under any express or implied contract of service or apprenticeship, written or oral, whether the earnings of the employed person are received from the employer or some other person and whether the earnings are reckoned by time or by the piece, or partly by time and partly by the piece, or otherwise.

The statement continues:

The civil code of Quebec does not use the expression "contract of service" but the arrangement is much the same as what the civil code calls "lease and hire of personal services" as distinguished from "work done by estimate and contract".

The contract of service is an agreement, written or oral, under which the relationship between the employer and the employed person is substantially that of master and servant. The essentials in such a contract are that one person engaging the services of another must have the right to:

(a) tell him not only what result he, the employer, wants produced but also the time when, the place where, and the precise way in which the work is to be done;

(b) require that the worker do the work personally, unlike an independent contractor who can and often does delegate it to a substitute or employee of his own;

(c) to terminate the worker's services at any time. Likewise the employee may quit his employment without being compelled to specific performance of his contract.

The significant factor of a contract of service is the right of the hirer to control the hired. It will be seen at once that without such a control an employed person would be more or less his own boss and when it came to the payment of benefit the question of whether he was unemployed or not would be difficult, if not impossible, to determine.

The unemployment insurance commission found that many persons were being insured as employees when in fact they were independent contractors, partners, members of family undertakings, joint entrepreneurs, co-adventurers and such like.

With respect to casual employment the statement reads:

Referring to the second group, section 27 (p) of the Unemployment Insurance Act specifically excludes from insurability "employment of a casual nature otherwise than for the employer's trade or business".

In the early days of its existence the commission, by an administrative ruling, defined casual employment as employment of not more than ten days' duration within a 30-day period. This was later reduced to employment of not more than six days' duration in a 30-day period. Thus employment of a duration of more than ten days—and later, more than six days—was determined insurable.

The commission through a regulation authorized employers of such casual help to purchase stamps on making application to the post office, thus waiving the necessity for the employer to first register with the commission.

On February 3, 1961, the umpire, who is the final authority in the interpretation of the Unemployment Insurance Act, ruled that any casual employment of a non-continuing nature, when performed for other than an employer's trade or business, was not insurable. This of course nullified the commission's administrative ruling and at the same time did away with the necessity for providing for the purchase of stamps on application at post offices by non-registered employers.

It should be pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that this ruling is the same as that which is applied to the workmen's compensation acts of the provinces of Ontario and British Columbia, as well as in Great Britain.

The statement continues:

Unfortunately, the facts concerning these two types of employment are not determinable in the vast majority of cases until audits are carried out or claims filed or investigations made. Once the facts come to light the commission has no option but to cancel the contributions erroneously made and adjust any benefits paid on the basis of these contributions.

However, in view of the fact that special instructions to offices of the commission regarding contract of service were issued on September 27, 1960, and the umpire's decision regarding casual employment was handed down only on February 3, 1961, no overpayment of benefit will be established in relation to contributions made in cases involving either of these factors prior to the two respective dates mentioned, provided, of course, the commission is satisfied there was no misrepresentation.

I might add, in addition to what the statement contained, that audits and investigations of casual purchases of stamps have revealed that fraud was rampant. Purchases were made where no work was done at all. Stamps were being purchased in excess of the actual employment period and exchanges of labour, whereby A employed B for a period, then B employed A in turn until both had sufficient contributions to qualify for benefit were not uncommon.

In reply to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) who made some glib references to a full employment policy when speaking in this debate earlier, it is true, of course, that he made full use of his time to attack the government on its employment policies. I do not propose to deal at any length with what he said but I should like to refer to the full employment policy of the socialist group who sit, Mr. Speaker, on your immediate left. Full employment must mean something or it means nothing at all. In the sense in which the group who sit over in that corner mean it, it means nothing less than regimentation. You can guarantee employment in this country through the use of socialist methods; you can do it if you want to fix wages; you can do it if you want to fix prices.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Would the hon. member not agree that the welfare which the unemployed have to seek now is a form of regimentation which we could well do without?

Mr. Thrasher: I am not sure I understand who the hon. member is referring to—

Mr. Pickersgill: He is talking about the people you have driven on relief.

Mr. Thrasher: It is not my hope, and I think it is not the hope of the Canadian people that we in this country shall ever live under a totalitarian system such as hon. members in that party rave so much about. In order to make their system work we are bound to have total regimentation. We are bound to have to tell people where they are to work, how long they are to work and how much they are to receive for their labour. We will be bound to tell industry what products to produce and what prices they are to receive for those products; we will be bound to tell the farmers of this country what to produce on their farms and to tell them what they will receive for the fruits of their labour. I call this totalitarianism.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): This is all your idea, so call it what you like.

Mr. Thrasher: Despite what the hon. member had to say, I do not want to live, nor do the people of Canada, under a system such as he and his friends expound.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Thrasher). His remarks are similar to those we have been hearing for a long time, from the other side. He accuses us of harping on depression and recession for the last three years. I confess it is something to which we can reasonably refer to from time to time. If the parliamentary secretary does not realize that things are not going too well in this country, I would advise him to pay a visit to his constituency once in a while.

He also indicated that we, on this side of the house, have made no suggestions to find jobs for the unemployed, which, naturally, would have helped bolster, if not to replenish, the unemployment insurance fund.

Well, I remember that, one day, in this house, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), did make several suggestions; so did the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary was here at the time. It would be a good thing for him, perhaps, to refer to the debates concerned.

He accused us, among other things, of saying that, these last few years the unemployment insurance fund should not have been used for the purposes for which it was set up. We, on this side of the house, have never made any such claim. Naturally, we believe that the unemployed should get benefits, but the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) rather adequately emphasized that, if the unemployed had had jobs, the unemployment insurance fund could have remained at a reasonable level.

Furthermore, the parliamentary secretary said that we came out against the extension of seasonal benefits. I do not recall hearing the hon. member for Gloucester making such a statement. To put it briefly, the parliamentary secretary sought to attribute to his government some merits that we, on this side of the house, do not recognize. I would advise him rather to refer to the booklet entitled Employers Handbook for Fishermen, 1957, second edition, in which he will read the following, in paragraph 2 of page 1:

(Text):

Effective April 1, 1957, employment in fishing became insurable under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

(Translation):

If the fishermen began to contribute to the unemployment insurance fund as of April 1st, 1957, and if we consider, on the other hand, that the election took place on June 10—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Could the hon. member repeat his reference, because the parliamentary secretary still does not understand?

Mr. Racine: Certainly, I shall repeat it for the benefit of the parliamentary secretary. With regard to fishermen, I should like to refer to the publication entitled "The Employer's Handbook for Fishermen", second edition, published in 1957. The second paragraph reads as follows:

(Text):

Effective April 1, 1957, employment in fishing became insurable under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

(Translation):

Now, if the fishermen started paying contributions on the first of April, while the elections took place on June 10 and the Tory government actually took over on the 22nd, I fail to understand how this government can claim any credit for the fishermen's unemployment insurance.

Mr. Deschatelets: I think it should be said all over again, because the parliamentary secretary is still in the dark.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Speaker, I should like, first of all, to congratulate the hon. member for Gloucester for the constructive and brilliant way with which he dealt with unemployment insurance problems. I am sure that he has made it clear to a good many citizens that persons who are concerned over the situation of the unemployment insurance fund can still be found in this house.

He also made it clear to others who are deprived of unemployment benefits as a result of amendments to the act that there are still people here in this house who want to cooperate so that the government may review those amendments that we consider intolerable.

In fact, the hon. member for Gloucester introduced the following amendment:

This house regrets the failure of the government to ensure sound administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act, resulting in the depletion of the financial resources of the fund and new arbitrary administrative procedures which deny benefits to casual employees.

I believe that the hon. member for Gloucester has adequately dealt with the position of the fund.

As for me, I would especially like to deal with the arbitrary procedures which deny benefits to casual employees.

Therefore, I should like to refer to Hansard for February 9, 1961, on page 1050. On that occasion I put the following question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr):

I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the many complaints voiced by unemployed who are no longer drawing unemployment insurance benefits because of the new interpretation given to the service contract, does the minister intend to issue further instructions in order to remedy a situation that has become impossible?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me notice that he would ask this question. I immediately contacted the unemployment insurance commission, and they advise me that there is no new interpretation of the regulations with regard to the contract of service. The difference now is, so they tell me, that the regulations are being enforced.

A little later, as it can be seen on the same page, I asked the following supplementary question:

Unemployment Insurance

Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer just given by the Minister of Labour I would like to ask him whether he is aware that the enforcement of the instructions now contained in pamphlet 13, where the commission defines "service contract", is detrimental to the campaign for winter works, particularly in the renovation and home construction field.

Mr. Starr: I am not aware that it is having the effect which the hon. member says it is.

Mr. Speaker, those questions and answers were given on February 9, 1961 but if you refer to the L'Action Catholique of January 13, 1961, you will find the following item:

Details given by the unemployment insurance commission.

In order to spare the people of Canada some of the difficulties which now prevail throughout the country, the unemployment insurance commission wishes to caution people regarding the eligibility to insurance benefits of casual and family employment.

In view of recent decisions, the unemployment insurance commission arbitrator, Mr. Justice J. D. Kearney, has issued new interpretations concerning the eligibility of workers holding family and casual jobs.

Family employment: In most family concerns, where some or all the employees are related to the owner, there is no real master-servant relationship. This form of enterprise rather suggests that the family relationship supersedes or annuls the service contract. In many other cases, the several members of the family are working toward a common objective, and the profit is shared according to certain needs or as the owner sees fit.

Mr. Chairman, I come to the part dealing specifically with circular No. 13:

Casual employment: Again in that classification, the majority of employees are not insurable since a service contract does not exist within meaning of the unemployment insurance act.

I am now talking about casual employment.

For a service contract to exist, the casual employer must be in a position to control and supervise the technical performance of the work to be carried out by the employed. Since most of casual employees work alone, the fact that the salary is paid hourly, per unit of work, or according to contract is of no importance, those employees are considered as working for themselves and their employment is not insurable.

Before entering contributions in unemployment insurance stamp books of people holding casual or family employment, employers should inquire at their local office, to prevent possible cancellation of those stamps later on.

Well, the ruling of the U.I.C. arbitrator, Mr. Justice J. D. Kearney, is rather at variance with the answer given by the minister to the question I put to him on February 9, since Mr. Justice Kearney himself agrees that since September 27, the date shown on bulletin No 13, the unemployment insurance commission has issued new interpretations concerning the eligibility of casual employees. Therefore, if the letter of the act was not changed, its interpretation at least was changed, and that is the important thing in the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Speaker, this circular letter No. 13, which was issued September 27, 1960, applies retroactively to the year 1960. The pamphlet deals with the service contract and, among other things, includes the following definition:

Employment in Canada, by one or more employers, under a service or apprenticeship contract, whether explicit or implicit, written or oral, whether the earnings of the employee are received from the employer or someone else, and whether calculated by the hour or by the piece, or partly by the hour and partly by the piece, or otherwise.

But, more interesting still is the type of questions asked by certain officers of unemployment insurance offices in order to determine whether there is a service contract or not between the employer and the employee. Here, for instance, is the series of questions that are asked:

Starting date?
Termination date?
Where was the above-mentioned person employed by you?
Was he paid certain wages or hired on contract?
If wages, state if hourly, daily or weekly?
What salary were you paying him?
Who fixed his salary?
What is your main occupation?
What did he do for you?
What was your reason for hiring him?
In what capacity was he employed?
What experience did you have in the type of work he performed for you?
Were you present on site at the time the work was done?
Were you working yourself?
Who kept his time record?
Have you kept track of his time?
What were the agreed working hours?

Mr. Speaker, all those questions may deprive a worker from qualifying for the contributions provided under the Unemployment Insurance Act. For instance, I have already mentioned in the house that when an individual is hired to build a house, it is ridiculous for unemployment insurance officers to ask him the purpose of his employment. It is obvious that he was employed to build the house.

Another question is: "What knowledge did you have of the type of work he performed for you?" Again I ask, must one be a carpenter to hire carpenters to build a house and to affix the appropriate unemployment insurance stamps in their books?

This is also true of the following question:

Did you remain on the premises while the work was being performed?

That is another question that can lead to confusion and deprive some workers of contributions to which they are entitled. It is well known that if a person who hires a carpenter is not qualified to supervise his work and knows nothing about carpentry, he will seldom remain on the premises to tell a qualified worker what he should do.

In a number of constituencies, hundreds of unemployed people are deprived of benefits they should receive, merely because officers of the commission have been instructed to give a new interpretation to the term "work contract". Personally, I know of many families which are suffering real hardship and have to depend on relief.

Following that new interpretation, the unemployment insurance commission people are always bringing up the same argument, namely that the employer must have enough authority for giving orders and enough competence for directing the work of one or several employees. That is a false interpretation which is subject to contradiction every day. As a matter of fact, few employers know more than their employees. A contractor is not necessarily a carpenter, bricklayer, electrician, stonemason, etc., but he employs qualified people in those various trades. Yet, those employees are eventually entitled to benefits, because they have been working for a contractor. An industrialist often knows little or nothing about the complex structure of his business. Yet, all his employees are entitled to unemployment insurance.

Many a citizen retains the services of tradesmen for certain casual repairs or extensions to their properties. Working conditions are agreed upon verbally. But, since circular No. 13 has been in force, no such employee or worker qualifies for unemployment insurance benefits.

In my riding, as in many others, all trades people and labourers who work for employers other than registered contractors are struck from the list of those qualified to receive benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Finally, it seems that, in order to replenish the unemployment insurance fund, officials are creating misery and desolation among our working population. That is the greatest shame at this time, and we will certainly not give up fighting for our workers.

If clause 25 of the Unemployment Insurance Act under its present form can be so fantastically interpreted, it should be better defined, so as not to deprive an honest worker of unemployment insurance benefits, to which he was formerly entitled.

To my mind, this is not a question of politics, but a matter of justice, and the workers are now aware of the extent to which they are being slighted.

If it had only been a matter of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act it would not have been so bad. But, on the contrary, the amendment was made retroactive, so that employers, who had honestly and legally affixed unemployment insurance stamps in their workers' books, and the workers themselves, who had legally and honestly paid their contributions, are being deprived of benefits, because of the attitude of the unemployment insurance commission.

Yet, those employers and employees have made those contributions and that is not all. Those employees applied to the unemployment insurance office after September 26, 1960, with the impression that they were entitled to draw benefits, as they were indeed under the act. Today, they find themselves in an impossible situation as a result of the retroactivity decreed in circular No. 13.

As I was saying that amendment may have been introduced in order to protect the unemployment insurance fund, and we have every reason to believe that this was the original purpose. But it seems to me the government or the unemployment insurance commission should have considered the consequences that this new rule might have, not only on the unemployment insurance fund itself but also on the administration of the act in relation to both employees and employers.

In addition to what I have just mentioned, that circular eliminates almost all cases of insurability for casual and seasonal jobs. In the past, unemployment insurance officials used to make rulings on the insurability of jobs, while today they have to enquire whether or not there is a service contract. Employers are dissatisfied with such a procedure, in so far as the supervision of certain jobs is concerned, such as the building of private homes, logging operations, etc.

Of course, the workers too are dissatisfied, particularly the many labourers in rural areas who were formerly employed in housing construction and were paid hourly wages. They are being deprived of their rights and are being discriminated against if you compare their situation to that of employees working for contractors. In fact, those who cannot find a job with a contractor will have no protection whatsoever in view of the interpretation given to section 25 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Such an interpretation is a serious impediment to the carrying out of certain repair jobs during the summer season, because in the case of repairs to private homes, the employment of workers and carpenters is not covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I listened closely to the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Gloucester. He mentioned, among other things, that the poor condition of the unemployment insurance fund was due in part to poor management and to speculation on certain bonds. It is unfortunate that the money in the fund, most of which, that is to say 80 per cent, had been contributed by the employers and employees, was endangered through poor investments. The hon. member for Gloucester also emphasized the need to replenish the unemployment insurance fund. He particularly urged the government to provide work for the unemployed. I think that is the best way of avoiding the payment of benefits, and those who find a job will only feel the better for it.

I was reading this afternoon on page 1403 of Hansard for January 25, 1961, a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) in which be quoted the Prime Minister as saying—this was on August 30, 1958—that legislation would be introduced to extend the period of entitlement to unemployment insurance benefits and make such benefits available to certain classes of farm workers.

Mr. Speaker, that is another vision that will have to be set aside, because as long as certain workers and labourers are denied unemployment insurance benefits, it is silly to believe that the Prime Minister would now consider extending them to certain classes of farm workers.

The hon. parliamentary secretary told us a few moments ago that certain provisions had been adopted with regard to unemployment insurance which, in his opinion, were designed to favour the workers. He mentioned, among others, the extension of the unemployment insurance benefits period. Of course, Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house, cannot blame the government for extending the period of unemployment insurance benefits, especially at a time when there are so many unemployed in this country. But it was not a measure designed to provide work to Canadian workers; it was rather designed to put a poultice on a peg leg, since all it does is to provide, certain workers for a certain period with the opportunity to receive unemployment insurance benefits. Unfortunately no later than May 15 those who are now favoured by extension of the benefits period will find themselves in the same position as those who cannot get them any more because of the service contract amendment.

It is true that certain amendments have been made to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Among others according to the pamphlet published by the unemployment insurance commission and bearing No. UIC 651 E (10-59) we see, for instance, that in 1959, amendments to the act were made concerning woodsmen. Well, these new regulations, I believe, have been quite prejudicial to woodsmen. For instance, the amendment to the regulations causes a more widespread use of power saws, which results in a larger weekly production than before. Among other things, the unemployment insurance commission mentioned in this pamphlet that starting in 1959, woodsmen would have to cut 12 cords of wood instead of eight to be entitled to unemployment insurance weekly benefits. That is an 80 per cent increase. Indeed, this is not, at least in my opinion, an improvement in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Another amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act was the one brought about by Bill No. C-43 which increased employee and employer contributions. Again, that certainly was no way to help workers, since 75 per cent of the 100 odd million dollars we wanted to add to the unemployment insurance fund through contributions from employees and employers remain in the unemployment insurance fund. Therefore the instructions in form 13, as well as the new rules with regard to woodsmen and the rate increase, are certainly not changes in the unemployment insurance act that will be of help to our workers.

About those various laws, I cannot help referring to someone who is no longer in the house; I mean the former member for Restigouche-Madawaska, who stated here, last February, that his government had done nothing against unemployment, and had been content to introduce legislation which only contributed to deplete the unemployment insurance fund. As we may see in Le Devoir of February 20, 1960, the former member for Restigouche-Madawaska stated as follows:

I maintain, in all humility, that if we had only done half of what we had promised, there would be no unemployment now in the maritimes he said.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the unemployment picture is right now in the county of Restigouche-Madawaska. But I wonder if the former member is making the same type of speeches there now as he used to when he was sitting in this house. I would be very happy to follow it up in the press.

Mr. Tremblay: Tell us something about Mr. Lesage.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Roberval, who often butts in, is hoping to draw me into discussing a subject which lies entirely outside the scope of this debate. I am certain that standing orders would not allow me to praise the Liberal administration of Quebec in this house. Moreover, I know that you would direct me to go on dealing with the matter now at hand. Therefore, I shall leave the hon. member for Roberval to his own particular dreams.

Mr. Tremblay: What you are now reading is a speech written by Mr. Lamontagne.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Roberval has just paid me an undeserved compliment. I do not think—

Mr. Tremblay: Read; go ahead, read on.

Mr. Racine: I think the speech I am now giving is not one of which an economist would be glad of. I thank the hon. member; it is perhaps the kindest word he has had on my behalf.

Mr. Speaker, in the various amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act with regard to instructions in form 13, in respect of the new rules for woodsmen and the increase of the unemployment insurance rate, I think we are right when we say that the old Tory spirit is bobbing up again. If we refer to the 1946 debate, at a time when the Unemployment Insurance Act was introduced, we may rightly think, when reading the relevant pages of Hansard, that Conservatives never showed themselves entirely well disposed with regard to the unemployment insurance legislation. That is what leads me to think that today, with all those limitations placed on the Unemployment Insurance Act, that hoary Tory philosophy is bobbing up again. For their own good, but most of all for the good of the unemployed—because I sincerely and honestly believe it is to them that our thoughts should go—the Conservatives should reconsider their policy concerning the Unemployment Insurance Act.

(Text):

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, tonight we have seen something which I could classify as nothing less than a disgusting exhibition. The parliamentary secretary, in his desperation to find some scapegoat to blame for the position in which the government finds itself at the moment, proceeded to build up a straw man, in fact a strawbogeyman, a pure figment of his own imagination, and then knock it down.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, he had it written out.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): It was still a product of his imagination or the imagination of someone else. I find it difficult to understand that particular type of exhibition. I feel sure the hon. member does not even believe this attack he made on me and the rest of my party in this corner. If he does believe it, I am afraid that I have given the hon. gentleman far too much credit for intelligence. I feel that, in his search for a whipping boy, he has done a disservice to this house and to the country because he has done exactly what the communists are trying to do throughout the world today. They are trying to make us believe there is only one choice, either the chaos that we are debating here tonight or the regimentation that one finds under communist regimes. We can only choose between the two.

I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that we in the C.C.F. and new party repudiate this idea. We maintain that this problem can be cured while we maintain our political freedom. In order to cure these difficulties we must show more interest in coping with these problems than has been demonstrated by either the present Tory government or the Liberal governments of the past.

What is the situation with which we are faced here tonight? The parliamentary secretary says that the opposition finds itself in a dilemma. I should like to remind him that it is not the opposition that is going to have to answer to the Canadian people for the situation in which we find ourselves now. It is the government that is going to have to answer, and only the government.

What are the facts? They have been placed on the record today, and I think probably we could sum them up. When this government took office there was in the neighbourhood of $950 million in the unemployment insurance fund. Halfway through the government's term of office we find that contributions to the fund have been increased by 30 per cent but still the size of the fund has shrunk to $185 million as of the latest count. The government can accuse the opposition of gloom and doom or this and that, but these are the cold, hard facts. We cannot get around them. During this government's term of office, in spite of this 30 per cent increase in the contributions into the fund, we find that the fund has shrunk from $950 million to $185 million.

Mr. Spencer: What about the increased benefits?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I do not care what the increase is in benefits. These are the facts, and you cannot get around them.

In my opinion, these facts point out one thing which should be clear to each and every member. Surely, this is something hon. members must have realized some place along the way in their daily lives. So long as you pay more out of a fund than you pay into that fund you are eventually going to go broke. This is the very simple situation with which we are faced today. The parliamentary secretary listed three of the measures which the government had introduced, and then he was cut off. He said, however, that there were some 23 measures which this government had adopted during this session to aid employment and provide jobs. This statement still does not meet the point because if there were 23 measures or 63 or 6,300, the fact still remains that the unemployment insurance fund is almost bankrupt.

How did we get into this situation? The parliamentary secretary listed some of the reasons. The unemployment insurance fund was extended to take in new fields. Of course, he very carefully avoided mentioning the fact that no precaution was taken at that time to provide for these new fields. The extension of the benefits has gone over a longer period; they have been extended to 52 weeks. Again no provision was made at the time to put the fund on any kind of actuarial basis. Oh, no; the government could not wait for that. It was too good a vote catcher. They had to use it. At the time that amendment went through I can recall speaking in this house and warning the government then that if this was done and the proper precautions were not taken, in a very short period of time this fund would be completely depleted. I can still recall the question asked by some hon. member on the government side who said, "Are you against extending unemployment insurance?"

Many other factors are involved. Not the least of these is the situation that has been brought about by the Liberals and then continued by the Tories which has permeated our whole society on this matter of the unemployment insurance fund. There is no insurance principle about it at all. It is just a great big pork barrel. People see others drawing from it whom they feel are not qualified to do so and they say, "If they can get it, why can't I?". That is the situation that has developed across this country. But in spite of all these factors, including many smaller ones, we still cannot get around the basic problem.

This is a basic problem which the present government very stubbornly refused to recognize for a long time. Now they are very grudgingly starting to admit it. Nevertheless they are still stubbornly trying to refuse to act, and do anything about it. I refer to the fact that in the last three or four years we have had what used to be known in the old days as a depression. Of course, that is a bad word. We do not use it any more. Today it is a recession, a slow down. I do not know how many fancy names I have heard for it. Of course, the facts of the matter are that we have forgotten what the unemployment insurance fund was originally intended for. Back in the old days when the unemployment insurance fund was set up, it was for the purpose of tiding people over when they were temporarily laid off from a job which they had to go back to in the fall or in the spring. That was the purpose of the unemployment insurance fund when it started off. It was to tide people over when they were temporarily unemployed either through climatic conditions or the temporary shut-down of a plant or something of the kind.

But what do we do today with that fund that was designed for this purpose and was set up on this basis? As long as we stuck to this basis it was a very successful project. But no, the government did not do that. Now they are trying to cure this depression with this unemployment insurance fund. They take in people who were never even considered when this fund was set up on an actuarial basis. They extend it over a period of time which was never even considered when this fund was set up on a sensible basis.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that this unemployment insurance fund was never conceived of with the idea of curing a depression. It never can cure a depression and the reason we find ourselves in the present situation is that we have tried to use it for that purpose.

In trying to face this problem with which we are confronted and to do something about it I hope that the steps that this government and this house will take—and believe me the government will be obliged to take some steps and do so very shortly—will be sensible and reasonable steps and that they will not be caused by this hysteria that seems to be sweeping across this country, that all of a sudden out of the woodwork or from some place where they have been hidden for the last 20 years all these bums are coming back again. It is strange that we did not hear about them in the 40's and 50's. Where were they then? We used to have a good many of them around in the 30's. I refer to bums, people who do not want to work. For 20 years we did not hear anything about them but today they are back with us again.

I do not care where you go, you find this thing building up. I feel that this idea has been very carefully planted. I feel it is another of the attempts of this government to find a whipping boy, as was done by the parliamentary secretary; to find somebody else to blame; to try to shrug off the responsibility that is theirs and theirs alone. They are the ones who are going to be obliged to do something about it. All we hear is about chiselers, people who do not want to work. We hear about married women who work only long enough to get their stamps and so on. We hear this every day on every side.

I want to say that I am quite concerned about this deliberate propaganda campaign. Certainly there are chiselers. There are chiselers in every walk of life. But thank goodness, the percentage is small. There always will be chiselers; I suppose there always were chiselers. But with this problem as it is today, to try to pass it off with a shrug of your shoulders and say that it is only bums and chiselers that are out of work is no solution to it, and this will just get us deeper and deeper into the mess in which we find ourselves at the present time. We hear about people who turn down jobs at $45 a week. It is said that those guys simply do not want to work or they would not turn down a job at $45 a week. Why do they turn these jobs down? Did we ever stop to think of the reasons why they might have done so? The previous answer may be true in some cases, but did we ever stop to realize that maybe these people are the victims of the society in which we live, that they are the victims of the hard-sell policy under which it is unpatriotic if you do not buy what you do not need with money you do not possess in order to impress people you do not like.

Do we stop to realize that almost every normal family in this country has payments to meet which amount to more than $45 a week? They are built-in payments. Back in the 30's if you had no job, at least you could go out to the edge of town, cut yourself a cord of wood and cook yourself a meal. However, you cannot do that today. If you do not pay your gas bill, your gas is cut off. If you do not pay your water bill, your water is cut off. If you do not pay your light bill, your electricity is cut off. If you do not meet the payments on your stove or your refrigerator or on all the rest of your furniture, they come in, pick it up and take it out. If you are working for $45 a week, and that sum does not meet your payments, you are in trouble. But if you are unemployed and are on unemployment insurance when they come in, you can say, "I am sorry I cannot pay because I am unemployed"; and at least you can put off the inevitable. Maybe that is the reason why some in this country today are refusing jobs paying $45 a week or less.

I think these things should be taken into consideration. We must realize that our society has changed a great deal in the last 20 or 25 years and that we certainly cannot judge people's conduct today by the yardstick of 25 years ago. In order to get a proper look at the situation today and to try to come up with some sensible and reasonable answers to this problem we must look at these things in the light of today's conditions and then act accordingly.

(Translation):

Mr. Vincent Brassard (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in this debate. I know too well what physical and moral distress can befall the family of an unemployed. I must not evade my duty of making, whenever possible, at least a verbal contribution to the solution of a social problem of vital importance. In fact, I consider that the right to work is a fundamental human right; it is after all a right almost as fundamental as the right to breathe and to speak.

However, the philosophy of the opposition is reflected in the wording of the proposed amendment. It is obvious that this amendment and the subamendment have been introduced for political purposes, and for the purpose of spreading false ideas in the minds of the people.

If we study the wording of the amendment, for instance, we note that no mention is made of the plight of the unemployed and his family. On the contrary, the whole amendment deals with a strictly administrative problem, and merely regrets certain reported losses in the administration of the unemployment insurance fund. The mover of the amendment, in his long speech, talked merely about the important losses suffered by the unemployment insurance fund in some security operations. I was also astounded to hear particularly the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine) trying to expose certain of the technical difficulties encountered in the administration of the act and, if I remember right, doing nothing else but complaining about circular no. 13, concerning the interpretation of the term "service contract".

Mr. Speaker, I will not be long. All in all, I find that the subject matter of the amendment and of the amendment to the amendment has nothing to do with the problem. I am surprised that, especially after trying to move the adjournment of the house to discuss the important problem of unemployment, when the first opportunity arises to do so, on a supply motion, problems far removed from the point are being dealt with. I believe that when we tackle the problem of unemployment as such we must ask ourselves what are the causes of the present employment crisis. We should begin by asking ourselves if unemployment was brought about by the Liberals or by the Conservatives. We should not forget the contradictory statements of Mr. Lesage, the new Quebec premier, who, before the election of June 22, was travelling all over the province and publishing ads in the newspapers to state that unemployment was strictly the responsibility of the provincial government.

The unemployment which is now with us, Mr. Speaker, is the result of many factors. I do not claim to be an economist and to be able to explain all the details. But it can be said, at least to simplify the question, that unemployment at present coincides with automation and the growth in population.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As I said earlier this evening on a similar point of order, no one on this side of the house is in the least anxious to restrict the debate. However, I would draw your attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman is engaging in a debate on unemployment, not on the motion before the house. We would hope to have the right to reply if the debate is to take that turn.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to say anything on the point of order?

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I noticed that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) was allowed this afternoon to explain a resolution which he wanted to put before the house. Unfortunately, he could not proceed with it. In order to explain my suggestions concerning unemployment, I shall now deal with a different angle. Now, Mr. Speaker, if you do not allow me to proceed—

[Mr. Brassard (Chicoutimi).]

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I think I should say that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) was presenting his views with respect to the Unemployment Insurance Act, the administration of which is the specific subject of this motion and the amendment. I think the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) is well taken.

As I heard the hon. member—and I was here just a minute before the point was raised—he seemed to be dealing with unemployment in general terms rather than with the question of the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act and the amendment which relates to reimbursement of the fund.

I should not like to see the debate become a general one on unemployment, because that debate has already taken place in this house. With those remarks perhaps the hon. member could confine himself more particularly to the amendment.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Chicoutimi): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, I am going to try to keep strictly to the problem under discussion. I only wanted to make those few remarks in order to support any argument that I might bring forward on this subject later on.

However, with regard to the unemployment insurance commission administration, the best way of settling both the unemployment and the unemployment insurance problems would be to substitute employment insurance to unemployment insurance.

Let me explain. Employment insurance would mean that any worker in any field would have to pay a contribution, which, added to federal, provincial and municipal contributions, would help create a fund which would enable us to offer work to a good majority of those who become unemployed. I believe this is the most practical suggestion that we can make to the Minister of Labour in this occasion.

However, before I resume my seat, I want to congratulate him for the extremely progressive though long term measures he has taken up to now. I believe these measures will have a beneficial effect on our nation's economy.

(Text):

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, the unemployment insurance fund was started as an insurance for workers, to compensate them for periods of unemployment. It seems to me that in the administration of the act the government is departing a great deal from this insurance principle.

They have made it partly a relief fund. Money is taken from this fund to help people over difficult periods, when these people should be helped in other ways by the government. This has been bad administration of the fund, but it has been helpful to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). It has prevented his yearly deficits from being as high as they otherwise would be. The working people of Canada are, therefore, making contributions toward keeping people off relief rolls. In this way they have allowed the Minister of Finance to keep his bad budget showings during the last four years from being worse than they have been.

I saw an announcement some time ago that 44 claim investigators had been appointed to watch for fraudulent claims against the unemployment insurance fund, and I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) say on television that these people had been appointed and that any fraudulent claims made would result in prosecution. I have not yet heard of the results of any prosecutions which have taken place or how much money, if any, has been recovered, but I would say that the amount of money recovered is peanuts compared with the amount of money lost to the fund as a result of the fiscal policy of this government.

On May 3, the Minister of Finance reported that the amount of money to the credit of the fund as of March 31 was $185.4 million. This amount does not take into account the market value of $248.3 million worth of securities held in the portfolio. It means that the unemployment insurance fund is borrowing money against these bonds. It is hypothecating these bonds and borrowing money, so the real value of the unemployment insurance fund does not begin to equal the amount of bonds they hold. Back in 1959 we could not go to the bank and borrow money against these same bonds. The banks would not lend us money at that time. The market value of these bonds is less by $30.3 million in unpledged securities and by about $8.2 million in respect to pledged securities, being $38.5 million in all so that at the present time the market value of the unemployment insurance fund account is about $38.5 million below the amount of $185.4 million which the minister told us on May 3 was in the account as of March 31 last.

The advisory committee reported that during 1958 and 1959 they had taken a loss through the sale of bonds to the extent of $27.7 million. When one adds this to the depreciation in the present holdings of $38.5 million, the result is a potential loss of $66.2 million through bad investments on the part of those charged with responsibility for the unemployment insurance account.

The Minister of Finance has told us that in discussing this question we are talking from hindsight. I know I criticized the conversion loan at the time. The portfolio of the fund was filled with bonds of the conversion loan. At that time interest rates went up by 50 per cent if the longer term conversion loans were bought. I said that interest rates would go up and that therefore bonds would go down in respect to all maturities at that time. I said this would happen in connection with the provinces and the municipalities.

This whole matter of extra debt and high interest rates is closely associated with the unemployment insurance fund or, indeed, with any other fund which holds government of Canada bonds. Debt has a lot to do with it. The extra interest on our aggregate debt at the end of this current fiscal year will be some $800 million since this government has come into power and not once have they paid the interest on the interest. When the government has to borrow, interest rates move upwards and at the same time the value of the securities held by the unemployment insurance commission goes down. In order to meet this debt the Minister of Finance has borrowed money and he has paid high interest rates. The rates have been getting higher and higher. This has been done at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada and at the expense of such funds as the unemployment insurance fund, the army benevolent fund and other similar funds under the control of this government. After all, these funds are trust funds. They belong to the working people and to the poor people of Canada and I do not think the fiscal policy of the government should be such as to put them in jeopardy. When the bond market goes down, interest rates go up and the value of holdings in the unemployment insurance fund decreases. I know that the Minister of Finance had this to say as reported on page 2267 of Hansard of February 21:

> As long as the present government is in office you may be sure it is not going to pay one cent more interest on the moneys it has to borrow than is strictly necessary.

The Minister of Finance has accused us of talking from hindsight. I say that he certainly has not shown much foresight and, indeed, he has not shown much hindsight, either, because when he has borrowed money he has paid higher interest rates and that has certainly shoved down the value of these bonds.

I see it is almost ten o'clock. I do not wish to take up the time of the house much longer but I do want to say that on July 1, 1957, at about the time this government came into power, there was $862 million in this fund. Today, with the securities at market value, it amounts to about $146 million. The fund is down by $716 million, and that is a lot of money.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. gentleman call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: The business for tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, will be the continuation of this debate.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

HOGS—DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

Question No. 195—Mr. Pitman:

1. How many farmers in Canada received deficiency payments for hogs between April 1, 1960, and March 31, 1961?
2. How many farmers in Ontario received deficiency payments for hogs between April 1, 1960, and March 31, 1961?
3. Did any farmers receive deficiency payments for hogs in Peterborough county between April 1, 1960, and March 31, 1961?
4. (a) What are the names and addresses of these farmers? (b) how much did each receive?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture):

1. No hog deficiency payments have been made for the period April 1, 1960 to March 31, 1961.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Answered by No. 1.

GRADE 1 BACON EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Question No. 203—Mr. Pitman:

1. How much grade 1 bacon was produced in Canada during 1960?
2. How much grade 1 bacon was exported to the United States during 1960?
3. How much grade 1 bacon has been exported to the United States, January to March 1961?
4. How much grade 1 bacon has been imported from the United States, January to March 1961?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture):

1. There are no official bacon grades and no statistics indicating quantities of various qualities of bacon produced. Total pork produced in 1960 was 875,000,000 lbs. (trimmed carcass basis).

2. There are no specific figures for bacon but the quantity of pork exported to the United States during 1960 was 41,482,000 lbs.

3. There are no specific figures for bacon but the quantity of pork exported to the United States, January to March 1961, was 9,006,000 lbs.

4. There are no specific figures for bacon but the quantity of pork imported from the United States, January to March 1961, was 10,759,000 lbs.

Questions

QUEBEC—REGULATION OF MOVEMENT OF HOGS

Question No. 205—Mr. Boulanger:

1. On account of the hog cholera epidemic, is the movement of hogs regulated in the province of Quebec?
2. If so: (a) what type of regulation applies? (b) what are the counties where it is imposed? (c) which are the counties where there are premises infected without any control?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture):

1. Yes.

2. (a) In all instances infected premises, adjoining farms and all farms to which hogs have been moved from infected premises are placed under quarantine. No hogs may be moved from such premises, without a permit, until the quarantine is lifted.

(b) In addition, there is a restriction on the inward and outward movement of hogs in an area comprising the counties of Bagot, Drummond, Nicolet and Yamaska.

(c) All counties are under the controls specified in (a). In addition to the counties listed in (b), there were infected premises during the month of April in the following counties: Arthabaska, Compton, Iberville, Joliette, Lotbiniere, Maskinonge, Napierville, Richmond, Rouville, St. Hyacinthe, St. Maurice, Shefford, Stanstead, Terrebonne.

HOG CHOLERA EPIDEMIC

Question No. 206—Mr. Boulanger:

1. Is there still a hog cholera epidemic in the country?
2. If so, since September 1960 to date for each province: (a) how many premises were infected (b) what was the number of swine slaughtered (c) amount of compensation paid (d) cost of veterinarians services (e) other costs for services in connection with the epidemic?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture):

1. Yes.

2.

	(a)	(b)	(c)
Quebec	320	43,911	$1,208,810
Ontario	10	2,442	72,224
New Brunswick	3	35	1,078
Nova Scotia ...	1	32	826
P. E. I.	1	180	4,926

(d) No veterinarians other than departmental officers employed on a continuing basis have been engaged for the eradication program.

(e) The only cost for services, apart from salaries and expenses of departmental officers, has been $12,962.76 for hog cholera serum.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 9, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF FOURTH MEETING OF CANADA-U.S. INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first I want to refer to the fact that you have tabled in the house and distributed to hon. members copies of the Canadian delegation's report on the fourth meeting of the Canada-U.S.A. interparliamentary group. I think the house will agree that this group has made a unique contribution to Canada-United States relations as well as to a wide knowledge of international affairs. Under the circumstances, and as in the past, if the house would agree, the report might be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable to the suggestion made by the Prime Minister that the document to which he referred be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of the report referred to above, see appendix.]

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—STATEMENT AS TO PROTECTION OF CANADIAN FORCES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Vancouver East asked me a question yesterday regarding Canadian troops in the Congo. Since the answer is of some length I think it would be appropriate for me to give it at this time. His question arose in the light of the recent tragic loss of life among the Ghanaian contingent, and he asked for information about the position of Canadian troops and their capacity for self defence.

Canadian military personnel in the Congo are assigned to the United Nations and are under the authority of the United Nations Congo command. It is the United Nations command which has direct responsibility for the safety of United Nations troops, as well as for their effectiveness in carrying out their tasks.

On the question of self-defence, United Nations troops in the Congo are still under basically the same orders as those issued by the first United Nations commander, General Von Horn. These orders provided, in general, that members of the United Nations forces are authorized to use their weapons in self defence and to maintain positions which are considered tactically essential to the United Nations operations. These orders have been reinforced and given more detailed interpretation by the current commander, General McEoin.

In the light of the special difficulties and dangers faced by this non-combatant peacekeeping United Nations operation, Canadian members of the force have been given specific instructions by their Canadian commanding officer, derived from instructions issued by the United Nations commander. In essence the orders to Canadian troops provide that they may use their weapons for defence in certain clearly defined circumstances. Resort to force is, of course, to be used only if normal discussion or negotiation has proved impossible or unavailing.

The Canadian contingent in the Congo consists of technical and support personnel, mainly signallers. They are deployed at the U.N. headquarters signals centre in Leopoldville and in small detachments which operate communications at regional centres throughout the Congo. In Leopoldville the Canadian soldiers are responsible for the defence of their own building. The grounds around the building are guarded by line troops from other contingents in the U.N. force. At the regional centres the Canadian signals detachments are stationed within U.N.-garrisoned areas.

Despite their technical role, the Canadian troops in the Congo, because of the risks which have become evident in the situation there, have over the past few months been supplied with heavier weapons in addition to those with which they were equipped when they first went to the Congo.

I hope the house will agree that the Canadian troops which are participating in this Congo operation have been given reasonable authority and means with which to meet the dangers inherent in that operation.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I believe that all hon. members will have heard with satisfaction the statement made by the Prime Minister. All hon. members must be extremely proud of the way in which Canadian forces are serving their country and peace in the Congo in circumstances of unprecedented difficulty which make the qualities of discipline which they possess even more important than they are ordinarily.

While we pay tribute to their devotion and to their discipline it is surely essential, as the Prime Minister has indicated, that there should be no doubt that they have both the authority and the facilities with which to defend themselves against unprovoked assault. It may not be easy to lay down, in the words of the Prime Minister, the clearly defined circumstances which would justify the use of defensive weapons, but I am sure every effort will be made by the United Nations to make sure that in the attempt to do that the safety and security of those concerned is the first consideration.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the Prime Minister has taken the earliest opportunity to give to the house a statement on the question I asked him yesterday relative to the position of our Canadian forces in the Congo. I think it is important for all of us to recognize the fact that there is a difficult situation existing in the Congo, as there has been for some time.

As a result of representations made in the security council of the United Nations, Canada was asked, and immediately complied with the request, for certain men, in particular those who spoke French, to undertake certain responsibilities in the Congo. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, a number of difficulties have arisen, some of them of such a serious nature that there have been, I would say, most embarrassing attacks—without reply by the Canadians, for which fact they are to be honoured—but of recent days particular attacks on the U.N. forces of such a nature that they have led to a number of deaths.

We appreciate the statement which has been made by the Prime Minister. We hope he can perhaps enlarge on the statement, if not now then in the question period, as to exactly what is meant by what he said a few moments ago to the effect that instructions have been issued to our Canadian peace forces in the Congo to defend themselves under what he termed "clearly defined circumstances". I think, sir, that as Canada has met the requests of the United Nations in every respect, this house is entitled to know what the Prime Minister meant by "clearly defined circumstances". Because of what has happened to the troops of Ghana and, as we understand from the press, a number of white officers, I think we should know what equipment is now being supplied to Canadians.

[Mr. Pearson.]

In conclusion, I think it is imperative that the statement made a few moments ago by the Prime Minister should be enlarged so we may know whether any consultations have taken place between the government and the United Nations as to instructions through the secretary general of the United Nations to the command in the Congo concerning the arrest of those who have committed the slaughter of those who were trying to help, and what charges should be laid against them.

I think Canada has the right to ask for answers to the questions I have just outlined. Perhaps the Prime Minister would now, or later in the question period, elaborate on the points I have just raised.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made under motions a few minutes ago and my observations in regard to it I should like to ask, in the light of the fact that Canada's forces in the Congo, although in uniform, are a police force under the command of the United Nations, whether the Prime Minister would not give the house more definite information as to the nature of the arms carried by Canadians in the Congo. Would the right hon. gentleman tell us what he meant by saying that these arms could be used under "clearly defined circumstances"? Might we be told, further, whether any representations have been made to the United Nations, and through that organization to the commander in the Congo, as to the action to be taken with regard to those in the Congo who have apparently not understood, or object to, the efforts of Canada and the United Nations to make peace in that troubled area of the world?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as the second question is concerned with reference to the grounds which have to be established before United Nations troops are entitled to respond with force, the circumstances that are to be taken into consideration are as follows: they have the right to resist attempts to disarm them; to resist attempts to arrest or abduct any United Nations personnel, military or civilian; to resist attempts to prevent them by force from carrying out their responsibilities as ordered by their commanders; and, in addition, to use weapons in defence of positions they have been ordered to hold.

As to the first question, notice of a similar question was sent to me by the hon. member for Davenport. He wishes to know, as does the hon. member for Vancouver East, the nature of the arms which are issued or available to United Nations troops. Originally the Canadian contingent was equipped with pistols and sub-machine guns. They now have as well a quantity of semi-automatic rifles, six light machine guns and two 3.5 inch rocket launchers. Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the third question was.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can put that question again in this way, in the hope that I am not making an erroneous comment. In view of what the United Nations wants and is trying to do in the Congo—Mr. Hammarskjold is doing a magnificent job in this regard—and since Canada is taking a part in the maintenance of peace in order to bring about a democratic state there; and in view of the unfortunate situation that United Nations representatives in uniform are being shot down, I should like to ask if this government has in any way taken up this matter with the United Nations in order to have United Nations action—because it is wrong to have a tour de force without force—and in the circumstances to bring to trial those who have done what has been done in opposition to the United Nations. On what basis have representations been made in order to bring to trial those individuals responsible for this criminal attitude, and what charges will be laid? Has any attitude been taken by this government on this most important matter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, naturally discussions have been taking place in this regard, but when the hon. gentleman speaks of enforcing the law against those who break the law he should have some regard to the tremendous areas in the Congo and the virtual impossibility of enforcing the law against individuals.

In that connection I should amend an answer I gave yesterday with respect to Mr. Tshombe. I am now informed that the United Kingdom government did convey a message to the United Nations calling for the release from detention of Mr. Tshombe. I did not have this information yesterday. However, since the United Kingdom government sent this message the situation has altered, and I can only again express the hope that this trial will be proceeded with justly and fairly and with full recognition of the rights of an accused to a fair trial.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING SMALL HOLDINGS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, some time ago I informed the house that the government was completing its study of the possibility of reducing the small holding acreage requirement under the Veterans' Land Act below the present minimum of two acres.

The government has now approved the principle that financial assistance for the establishment of a veteran on a small holding shall be made available where the land area is at least one half an acre in extent. The necessary amendment to the Veterans' Land Act regulations is in course of preparation and will set the effective date of the proposed change.

An additional amendment to the regulations will be made to provide that a veteran who has already been established on a small holding shall be permitted, where it is possible, to dispose of his land to the extent that it exceeds one half an acre. It is expected that it will be possible to grant this permission in the majority of cases.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but rise and express the great pleasure of this group on the announcement just made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs that the government has approved in principle financial assistance to those desiring to obtain small holdings under the Veterans' Land Act by reducing the acreage requirement to half an acre. This will be a very welcome announcement to thousands of veterans in Canada who up to this time have been denied an opportunity to obtain a small holding because of the difficulty in meeting the former acreage requirement.

I was very pleased also to hear the minister say that arrangements are being made for veterans who are already settled to dispose of any surplus acreage above that amount.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FURTHER LEGISLATION TO BE BROUGHT DOWN THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can inform the house when certain legislation which has been forecast will be added to the order paper, which has not been substantially changed for six weeks.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the fact that the order paper has not been substantially changed for six weeks in no way implies that the house has not been working full time. When the business on the order paper is cleared away, or nearly so, then will be the time to give effect to the adding of further items.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—REPORTED STATEMENT IN OSLO BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister would care to make any comment on press reports of statements being made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) in Oslo to the effect that the United States should take no unilateral action in Cuba.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have not seen the full text of the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but what he is reported to have said is quite consistent and consonant with what I said in the House of Commons on April 19. As to armed intervention, there has never been any doubt as to the Canadian attitude. As I indicated then, Canada has no thought of intervening.

The rest of the statement was apparently concerned with the question of possible negotiation. Naturally, in view of the support we have at all times given for the settlement of disputes between nations by peaceful means, we would hope that a basis could be found for negotiation, although certainly the present circumstances do not lead one to be too optimistic in that regard.

Mr. Argue: Is there any thought that this particular issue and these particular differences might be taken up by the United Nations?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Differences do get taken up there from time to time.

Mr. Argue: Would Canada support such an action?

CUBA—INQUIRY AS TO TO CANADIANS BEING HELD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell the house whether there are Canadian citizens who are still being held by the Cuban authorities?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian embassy in Cuba has been doing everything possible to secure exit permits and transportation for Canadians who desire to leave Cuba. It is hoped that a number of Canadian priests and nuns whose work in Cuba must now be discontinued will be able to return to Canada.

In that connection I might point out that over the week end there was a serious deterioration in the situation in Colon, where many Canadian nuns are stationed. Representations were made by the Canadian ambassador and Premier Castro, who is taking a personal interest in the matter, has sent a personal representative to look into the question. I believe it can now be said that Premier Castro has undertaken to ensure the safety and welfare of the Canadians concerned. His personal representative is endeavouring to ascertain what action can be taken immediately.

In that connection I should point out that Father Paul Emile Chenard, a Canadian priest who has been under arrest since the middle of April, has now been released from prison and is safe and well. There is just one other Canadian under arrest, John Darling, and the Canadian embassy in Havana is continuing to make representations on his behalf to the Cuban foreign ministry.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Can the Prime Minister say whether the Canadian government through its spokesman, the Canadian ambassador in Cuba, has made representations with regard to the designation by Premier Castro of priests and nuns from this and other countries as scoundrels? Can the Prime Minister say, too, whether there has been any confiscation of properties in Cuba owned by Canadian religious bodies?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As to the latter part of the hon. gentleman's question or remarks, I might say we have no information in that regard that would lead us to believe that there has been any confiscation. As to the earlier part of his question, the hon. gentleman may rest assured that the fullest representations are being made by the Canadian ambassador in Cuba, and I am glad today to be able to report that the representations made by Canada have been so successful.

SHIPPING

BAY OF CHALEUR—REQUEST FOR ICEBREAKER ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Is the minister in a position to inform us of the action taken by his department to dispatch ice-breakers to the Chaleur bay area so as to hasten the opening of Caraquet and Shippigan harbours where fishermen are anxiously waiting for the break up in order to begin their new fishing season?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, representations were received on March 24 from those two municipalities. At that time the ice was too thick and it was impossible for the department ice-breakers to break it.

Since then the ice-breaker McLean has kept on working in Chaleur bay, using a helicopter to keep a constant watch on the ice floes that have formed in the two harbours in question.

As soon as the ice is thin enough to be broken by our ice-breakers, this will be done immediately; this should take place early next week.

BRIDGES

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL—CONSTRUCTION OF APPROACHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister indicate to the house if the plans for the Champlain bridge approaches are completed and, if not, what is the cause of the delay?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I will inquire about that, Mr. Speaker, and I will give an answer to the question tomorrow morning.

Mr. Lessard: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it a fact that the government is waiting for the Montreal city authorities to decide where the east-west express highway will pass before deciding on the site for the Champlain bridge approaches?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, the officers of my department are discussing the matter with those of the city of Montreal. I know the discussions have been going on for some time, but I am unable to say how the matter stands now. I will find out and give an answer tomorrow.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS CF-100 PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is it a fact, as reported by the Canadian Press, that the R.C.A.F. CF-100 jet interceptors being withdrawn from disbanded air defence squadrons will be turned over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for sale as scrap?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the CF-100's which will be surplus to establishment as a result of the disbanding of the four squadrons will have removed from them all parts that can be used for the purpose of making repairs on the other CF-100's which we will still hold. What is left after that, and to a large extent it will be the air frame, which has no practical value or use, as such, will then be turned over as scrap for disposal by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Mr. Hellyer: In view of the obvious inference, can the minister say what plans he has for replacing the obsolete CF-100's being used by the five continuing squadrons?

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member well knows that I am not going to make a statement of major government equipment policy in answer to a question at this period of our proceedings.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is there a policy?

HOUSING

TRAIL, B.C.—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN URBAN RENEWAL PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the anxiety of the Trail city council to proceed with its urban renewal development program as soon as possible, would the minister inform the house when he expects a decision will be made as to the acceptance of this program by the federal government?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs made inquiries last week on behalf of the city of Trail. Recently the city submitted to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation an application for a federal contribution toward the cost of acquiring and clearing a blighted area of approximately 14.4 acres. It is proposed that approximately 40 per cent of the cleared land be used to provide a right of way for the relocation of a provincial highway into Trail, and thus we have our difficulty.

It will therefore be necessary for the corporation to discuss with the city and the province the basis on which this land will be made available to the department of highways. I trust that these negotiations may soon be concluded so the corporation may make the appropriate recommendations to me. I should also like to assure the hon. member that this application will receive the most careful and sympathetic consideration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Herridge: I presume the minister thought that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was inquiring on my behalf?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I thought he was to make a speech last week in Trail.

AIR TRANSPORT

FEDERAL POLICY RESPECTING REGIONAL AIR CARRIERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the government come to a decision with reference to a policy concerning regional air carriers? If so, does the minister anticipate making a statement on that subject in the near future?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I believe I said earlier in the house, the air transport board has made a complete review of all the regional carriers east of the lakehead, and it is anticipated that a decision on the various requests before the board should come within a very few days.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister say whether the application of Canadian Pacific Airlines for additional trancontinental air routes will be submitted to the air transport board for determination?

Mr. Balcer: Again, Mr. Speaker, I think I have said in the house before that all applications for internal air transportation have to come before the air transport board. So far as C.P.A. is concerned, when C.P.A. was granted a transcontinental flight across Canada about two years ago the air transport board said at the time that two years hence a review of the situation on the transcontinental route would be made by the board.

TELEVISION

SASKATOON—RECOMMENDATION OF BOARD OF GOVERNORS RESPECTING LOCATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred to a question he had asked previously of my colleague the Minister of Transport and myself respecting an application for a television satellite station in Saskatchewan. I am advised by the board of broadcast governors that the board has recommended to the governor in council approval of a satellite licence to A. A. Murphy and Sons Limited of Saskatoon. I am also advised that written representations have been received by the governor in council objecting to this decision, and the matter has not yet been considered by the government.

While I am on my feet, may I say I have had an inquiry from the hon. member for Moose Mountain respecting another application for a satellite station. This matter will be given consideration and a decision arrived at in the near future.

TRADE

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he expects to leave for London to discuss the uranium contract with the British government?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with the high commissioner's office here about arranging a meeting between ourselves and our opposite numbers in the British government. The best arrangement it has been possible to work out is that as Sir Roger Makins will be visiting Canada on June 12, discussions on this important matter will be carried on then.

CIVIL DEFENCE

EXERCISE TOCSIN—COST OF SPECIAL TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, and I regret that I was unable to give him longer notice. With reference to the Canadian National Railways special train which evacuated government personnel in exercise Tocsin last Friday, can the Prime Minister inform the house whether the cost of this special train was paid for entirely by the Canadian National?

Mr. Speaker: Order; I think without notice the hon. member is a little optimistic in expecting this statistical information. I suggest that he put his question on the order paper.

[Later:]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the importance which he placed on the statement made in the house last week concerning operation Tocsin which, for the first time—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question about Tocsin would he please ask it.

Mr. Winch: I am just trying to lay a basis for the importance the Prime Minister based on it. In view of operation Tocsin finding gaps in civil defence, has the Prime Minister given any consideration to an allocation of time to discuss this matter of civil defence and the results of the exercise from a federal, provincial and observer's point of view?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The exercise was a most important one, and one of the purposes as stated was to assure that every element in our civil defence should receive proper attention.

Mr. Argue: Including observers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the province of the hon. gentleman, apparently the ministers did not participate, but in other parts of the country the provincial ministers did. When reports from the various parts of the country have been received and collated, then I will be in a position to make a report to the house. Consideration can then be given to the other parts of the hon. member's question.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want any misunderstanding over the province to which I referred a moment ago. It was in consequence of an interruption on the part of the hon. member for Assiniboia that I made the statement in question as to participation.

Mr. Argue: Speaking on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the Prime Minister referred to "my province". I think he should have said "our province".

Mr. Diefenbaker: That correction is accepted. However, the government of his province is the one to which I referred.

Mr. Argue: Your government.

An hon. Member: His government of our province.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

WITHHOLDING OF BENEFITS DUE TO ABSENCE FROM AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour which has to do with two related matters to which I directed his attention last week. Is it necessary for the unemployed who have drawn benefits to clear with the local unemployment insurance office before leaving their area for a day or so? Will any of the unemployed who took part in the recent trip to Ottawa to see the government be penalized in any respect, for instance by the withholding of benefits?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The other day the hon. member for Welland asked me a question which read as follows:

> I have a supplementary question. Without reference to the unemployed who came to Ottawa, how long can a man be out of his area and still receive unemployment insurance benefits if he is entitled to them?

I referred this question to the unemployment insurance commission and have received this answer: This depends entirely on the reason for the claimant's absence and whether or not he maintains his availability for work. Because of these factors no categorical answer can be given, each case being decided on its own merits.

Mr. McMillan: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware of the fact that several unemployed have received letters to the effect that $8 will be deducted from their allowances for being away on that date?

Mr. Starr: Several of them have communicated with me, and I have turned over their letters to the unemployment insurance commission. I am awaiting the decision and reply of the commission.

AGRICULTURE

TURKEYS—REPORTED CHANGE IN QUOTA RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

(Text):

Is it the government's intention, as reported in some newspapers, to put an end to the quota restrictions on turkeys imported from the United States?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I have not seen the article in question in the newspaper. However, the announcement I made in the house that there is no intention of changing the quota still stands.

SOYBEANS—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In view of the remark of the Prime Minister with regard to an election perhaps I might ask the Minister of Agriculture, who of course is not concerned with elections, whether he has any reply to make to the representations made by the Ontario soybean growers' marketing board for an improvement in the floor price. They asked for $2.50, and I hope the minister will be able to accede to that request.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Government policy in respect of this type of subject is announced at a time suitable for such announcement to be made.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—INVESTIGATION INTO DAMAGE TO MAIL BOXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Would the minister please advise whether the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have completed their investigation into the damaging of mail boxes in sites 58 and 59, Nagle's Hill-Higgins' Line, St. John's, Newfoundland?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): It has not been completed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Tucker: May I ask a supplementary question. How long does the minister think it will be before he receives a report?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I suggest that the hon. member refer that question to the Minister of Justice. It is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police investigation, not ours.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member might put his question on the order paper, since it does not seem to be one of sufficient urgency or importance.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPAIR OF FLOOD DAMAGE IN FRASER CANYON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Some time ago I asked the minister whose responsibility it was to repair the trans-Canada highway flood damage in the Fraser canyon of British Columbia. I would appreciate that information.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I regret overlooking an answer to the hon. member. The highway had been completed in this area in accordance with the trans-Canada highway agreement. This being the case, the maintenance of the highway then becomes the responsibility of the province. Having regard to the fact that the damage in this instance was caused by excessive rainfall, we must look to the province for the completion of repairs to the highway. The federal government has no responsibility.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

CANADA GAZETTE

INQUIRY AS TO ACCURACY OF ANNOUNCEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State. Can the minister assure the house that al announcements published in The Canada Gazette by any department of government are correct?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is taking in a lot of territory. I am afraid he might not get a complete answer if he asked this question every day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE DATE OF GENERAL ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question, Mr. Speaker, based upon nothing other than the pleasant state of euphoria that seems to have settled over the government recently. I wonder if the Prime Minister would tell us whether he has given serious consideration to initiating a federal general election on September 25 or October 2, 1961?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think that with the addition of those two dates, the opposition has pretty well covered every date in the year.

TRANSPORT

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—FORMATION OF JOINT U.S.-CANADA COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I wonder if the Prime Minister would be in a position to answer today a question I asked yesterday concerning whether or not the government had any representations from the state department—

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman asked whether representations had recently been made by the United States state department regarding the possibilities of a joint survey of the Richelieu river canal project. A note on this subject was received from the United States embassy on May 4, and its contents are now being considered and studied by departmental officials.

Mr. Cardin: Would the Prime Minister consider tabling this correspondence?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that notes that pass between governments are not tabled in that way.

SPRINGHILL, N.S.—REQUEST FOR MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Transport whether he has yet had a reply from the Canadian National Railways with respect to the suggestion that they take over the 4 mile spur line from their line into Springhill, Nova Scotia, about which the minister was asked on February 17?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I will have to inquire again, Mr. Speaker.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSION WITH PREMIER BENNETT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice. Could the minister tell us how he got on with his discussion of the Columbia matter during the course of exercise Tocsin?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): To my regret, Mr. Speaker, and to my considerable surprise—and contrary to expectations—Premier Bennett was not at the emergency headquarters in Nanaimo. I understand he was not in the province of British Columbia at the time. Therefore I was not able to have any discussion with him.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, May 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Robichaud, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Argue.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—DEPLETION OF FUND AND DENIAL OF BENEFITS

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, last night at ten o'clock, when the house rose, I was discussing the amount of money in the unemployment insurance account. Last night I said that on July 1, 1957, just after the election, there was $862 million in that account. Today, with bonds and securities at market value, there is $146 million left in that account. It is down by $716 million.

I said that was a great deal of money. It is within $100 million of the extra interest that this government has saddled on the people of Canada. Together these two amounts total $1,500 million. That is just a fraction of what this government has done to the people of Canada with practically nothing to show for it. It has dropped this account by $716 million in something less than four years. By next July, when the four years are up, that fund will be down to $100 million or less, according to the unemployment insurance advisory committee, and they say most likely to $85 million.

In this $716 million depletion there is an amount of $66.2 million of actual loss from selling bonds at less than they paid for them and bonds held and priced at the present market value. The unemployment insurance coverage has been extended. The base has been broadened. But since the insurance aspect of this account has largely been forgotten by this government, it has assumed obligations in respect to unemployed people that properly belong to the government and not to the fund. Because of this situation the Minister of Finance has been able to shove some of the legitimate costs of government into that fund. As bad as they have been, his budgets would have been a great deal worse and he would have had larger deficits if the money in this fund had not been available.

The fiscal policy of the government has, through high interest rates, stagnated our economy. According to the press Mr. Coyne said that interest rates depended upon government and other requirements. Money is a commodity; and as with any other commodity, its price or the interest rates depend upon supply and demand. The Minister of Finance has certainly supplied the demand. I do not think there is much hope for an increase in the value of the bonds and other securities held in the unemployment insurance account, with the Minister of Finance on the sideline. You would almost think he is afraid to bring down his budget and show what a big deficit we had last year and what a big one we are going to have this year. At the same time we know that he will be requiring a great deal of extra money. It would seem that the minister's mind is in a state of turmoil, and that the budget will be based upon the political climate immediately ahead. I think he should adapt his budget to the needs of our country instead of to any political considerations.

If the unemployment insurance account is any indication of high finance by this government, the minister might better bring down his budget now and not have it embellished with any propaganda. The government lost over $65 million in the unemployment insurance account. Much of this amount was lost in the conversion loan issues. It does not matter whether you say that the conversion loan gave people bigger and better jobs, as the Prime Minister said it would. It does not matter whether you try to make the people believe that they got cheaper money, that provinces and municipalities got money at a cheaper rate, as the government said they would. I think it all comes down to this point. You cannot make the working people of Canada or the taxpayers of Canada believe that the loss of this $65 million was good for them.

This loss has come about because of the fiscal policy of the government. We on this side of the house at various times in 1960, as well as the unemployment insurance advisory committee, advised the government that something should be done about this dangerous situation of the unemployment insurance fund. The speech from the throne also recognized this fact. Last November in the speech from the throne it was forecast that legislation would be brought down to replenish this fund. What has been done? We have been sitting here for over 100 days and nothing has been done. The fund has been forced to incur new losses through the sale of securities in order to meet the demands on it with regard to benefit payments.

There is obviously only one reason to explain the government's delay. In spite of the fact that the unemployment insurance advisory committee has advised that the government should take certain specific and concrete steps, and in spite of the existing emergency, after all these months the government have done nothing. They have not made up their minds. We do not know whether they are going to accept the recommendations of the advisory committee or whether they have an alternative plan.

I challenge the government at this time and I challenge the minister to deny that no amendments of the bill are ready to present to this house. I do not think they have any at this time. I ask the minister to tell the house when he intends to introduce this urgent legislation, and to give a definite understanding that the present session will not come to an end with nothing being done with respect to this fund.

I want to repeat that the government is facing an urgent situation. The fund is still forced to unload its securities at a loss. The fund is also forced to hypothecate some of these securities and borrow money from the Minister of Finance. I do not know what interest he charges. This process is bound to come to an end. They will soon have no bonds to sell and the unemployment insurance fund will soon have no bonds to hypothecate. Then, in the absence of new legislation, the fund will have to interrupt the payment of benefits to those who become unemployed, unless the fund is replenished. This would certainly be a catastrophe. There is, I know, one course which is open to the government, but it is an irregular and most unusual one. That would be to have recourse to governor general's warrants.

For all these reasons I ask the minister to present these amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act early this coming week. This is not an unreasonable request on the part of the opposition. I think the government should long since have made up their minds as to what they are going to do, and should have presented this legislation to the house. If the minister does not comply with this request, we on this side of the house, hon. members in all parts of the house and the people of Canada will know that this government does not know where it is going. This is just another indication and example of indecision, procrastination and inaction on the part of this government, and we have seen many such examples in the past.

I think this loss of over $65 million in the unemployment insurance fund is a serious matter. I do not know whether it has ever happened before in Canada. Certainly I do not know of any other instance where a government had control of the working people's money and lost it by bad investment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And mismanagement.

Mr. McMillan: The unemployment insurance committee got out a special report on October 27, 1960. It is easy to read that report. I have it here. It can be read in half an hour. The government kept it for six weeks and presented it to the house in the dying hours of the last day of the session before Christmas.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They did that twice.

Mr. McMillan: They did not want the people of Canada to know about this report before Christmas. The unemployment insurance advisory committee had this to say:

> It is not safe to estimate that the fund will have a balance of greater than $140 million to $150 million by the end of March, 1961.

They were right, because that fund has $146 million in it at the present time. In addition, they said that because of heavy seasonal benefits during April and May of this year the fund would possibly be as low as $85 million, a most unsafe level. The advisory committee called attention to two main items which created the major drains on the fund. They are first, the extension of the seasonal benefit period, and second, the drain on the fund caused by the extension of the coverage to the fishing industry. They state in their report that it is difficult to cover the fishing industry, since in most cases there is no contract of service, and therefore the control provisions necessary to administer the act in connection with this industry are of little value.

The loss to the fund in respect to the fishing industry is $23 million over three years. Since part of this amount was included in the $119 million depletion, they consider that the fund in respect to the depletion caused by that industry should be replenished by $12 million. This makes a total of $131 million which they recommend the government should have put into the fund last summer or fall.

We think the fund should be on a good, sound basis. The higher rates of contribution came into effect in September, 1959, and the increases agreed fairly closely with the predictions of the actuary. However, this has been offset by greater unemployment and greater claims on the fund, and the fund has gone down.

In connection with this the committee made three or four recommendations which, if and when they are presented to this house, I think will be given favourable consideration. The first is that there should be two classes at the top of the earnings range. Also there should be a readjustment and consolidation of the lower classes of earnings, and a revision of the rates of allowable earnings. They recommend that we should eliminate the wage ceiling of $4,800 and fix a higher wage ceiling to suit present conditions.

I remember what was said in the house when it was decided to cover fishermen. Last night I heard the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour claim credit for his party for covering fishermen. I recall very well that at the time they were covered Mr. Harris said in the house that money should be voted from the consolidated revenue fund to meet the losses incurred because they were being covered. I hope the hon. member has now learned the truth about it and that he will not rise in the house and condemn the former government for covering fishermen. After all, it has only cost the fund about $10 million a year to give this coverage to the fishing industry, and this is a small amount when you consider the total $716 million depletion in this fund.

Certainly the loss to the fund of $66 million would more than compensate for the loss incurred in this respect over six years. If and when amendments are brought before the house—and I sincerely hope they are brought before the house this year—we on this side will pass comments on them and make suggestions. We do not know what the government are going to do, but I should like them to bring legislation forward now and not be influenced by any by-elections which lie ahead, or by any other political considerations. I would appeal to the government; let them cease losing money out of the fund; let them cease playing politics with money that belongs to the workers of Canada.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, basically what I have in mind to say on this important matter which is now before us can be said in a very few minutes and a very few sentences.

This matter of unemployment insurance is of the utmost importance to the constituency of Vancouver East. The riding of Vancouver East is a working class, residential riding. Over the past few months the workers in that constituency have been hit very, very hard by unemployment. Therefore there is a great and grave concern for all matters concerning unemployment insurance, the act itself and the regulations made thereunder.

Bluntly, I am greatly disappointed that this issue is being discussed on a political basis, that the government and the official opposition are blaming each other for what has occurred. This matter is of such importance that it should not raise political considerations of credit or discredit; it is a matter which directly affects those who are unemployed and require assistance. It must be said that unemployment insurance is not a charity. It is assistance to those who are unemployed and, under the existing law, it is available as a right because of the provisions of the law and because of the contributions made by the federal government, the employers and the employees. Since it is a right, it should not come within the realm of political discussion such as we have heard.

It is a fact that in the past two or three years the unemployment insurance fund has dropped sharply from close to a billion dollars to its present unprecedented low state. Personally I have only one approach to this matter. My concern is not with who is responsible for what has happened or with praising or condemning the official opposition. My concern is to draw one fact to the attention of the government, which has the authority to act. It is this. The unemployed who are willing to work and available to work must be assured that there is sufficient money in the fund to take care of them if they are not able to obtain employment.

So, regardless of the mistakes of the past, and no matter whether the Minister of Finance has betrayed the people in connection with his bond issues, making them worth less than they were at the time of purchase, there seems to me to be only one matter of importance to discuss. If this government, with its authority and ability to bring forward legislation, is not able to supply employment to those who are able and willing to work, then there must be sufficient money in the unemployment insurance fund to take care of those who cannot find jobs. That is the responsibility of the government, and that is the only thing with which I am now concerned as the representative of Vancouver East, where there have been so many unemployed in the past and where there are so many unemployed at the present time.

This is not simply a request. I do not like the word "demand", but I say this is a demand that the government accept its responsibilities, since this is clearly a responsibility of an administration which has made certain changes in the law in the past and under whose direction since 1957 we have come from a high point to a unprecedented low. I say that because of the trust placed in this government by the workers in 1957 and 1958, particularly in 1958, the government now has a duty to build up the fund so that in conditions of unemployment—and I think these, unfortunately, are a foregone conclusion—there are the facilities and the finances to tide these people over on a decent and reasonable basis until jobs are available.

One could speak, for half an hour, an hour, or longer on this issue of unemployment insurance, but I do not think anyone, regardless of how long he spoke, could put the issue more clearly. In a few moments, therefore, I intend to resume my seat. I will simply repeat that if these men cannot secure employment, after the promises that have been made them, it is up to the government, through financing and through legislation, to ensure to all the unemployed of Canada that the money is available to care for them on the best possible, reasonable actuarial basis.

On this note I intend to resume my seat, anticipating that the government will announce today or in the immediate future plans which will meet these requirements. If it should fail to do so, then it will have to accept responsibility for betraying the trust of those who voted for it and who sent over 200 of its supporters here at the last election.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I have had the opportunity, today and yesterday, of listening to hon. members speaking on this motion to go into supply and on the amendment and the subamendment which have been submitted.

It seems to me that the main charge which most opposition speakers have laid against the government is that there has been mismanagement of the fund and mismanagement of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I want to say here and now there has been no mismanagement of the fund; there has been no mismanagement of the Unemployment Insurance Act. In the past, when bonds held by the unemployment insurance commission were sold, prior to the time this government took office, there were always losses on the sale of bonds.

An hon. Member: Profits.

Mr. Starr: There were losses of the sale of bonds during that period of time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): These were forced losses; that is the difference.

Mr. Starr: As far as the act itself is concerned, the act was passed by parliament, and the amendments which have been introduced to that act have also been passed by parliament. I want to say that at no time, to my knowledge, has there been any mismanagement on the part of the administration of the unemployment insurance commission. They have always endeavoured to adhere strictly to the letter of the act and, as I said, that act was passed and approved by parliament itself.

It was interesting to hear the hon. member for Welland observe last evening, in effect, that the unemployment insurance fund had been used as a relief fund, intimating that people who should not be doing so were drawing unemployment insurance. The suggestion was that they should be taken care of in some other way, in other words that they should be on welfare relief. That is not the way this government has looked at this situation. The unemployment insurance fund is a matter of deep concern to this government, and that is evident from the fact that in the speech from the throne it was stated that amendments would be brought in to strengthen and build up the fund.

I am sorry to disappoint the hon. member for Welland, who may have thought, as he intimated, that this government did not intend to bring about any amendments to the act. These amendments are now being worked on. This is a difficult problem which has to be gone into in every detail, and entails a great deal of study. We will be bringing in these amendments, as we have said, because the state of the fund is of more concern to the government than to any member of the opposition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: I have listened to the hon. members of the opposition with the hope, because of the impression they have created as to their interest in the fund, that as responsible members of parliament they would come forward with their own suggestions regarding what could be done to strengthen the fund. The only suggestions I have heard from those hon. members is that we should enlarge the scope of the fund, that we should pay out more money to casual employees, and possibly take money from the federal treasury to replenish the fund without endeavouring to bring it back within the insurance principles under which it was set up originally.

When we took office in 1957 it was quite evident that unemployment was on the rise, and that the former government had been warned by the economists that this unemployment situation was in the offing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, would the minister permit a question in this regard? He said the former government had been warned, and I wonder whether the minister could say when he discovered that the former government was warned.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, there was ample evidence of that when the Prime Minister produced the report which had been handed to that former government in the early part of 1957 but which was hidden at all times by the former government because it did not want to act upon it.

The fund was built up to some $940 million. It was the purpose originally to build up the fund. When I came into this house as a member in 1952 I had the opportunity of serving on the standing committee on industrial relations, and many times as a member of the opposition in that standing committee I urged the government to enlarge the scope of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I pointed out that the fund had been built up to close to $1 billion and that the people themselves should receive some benefit as a result.

We were told time and time again that the purpose of building up that fund was to take care of any unemployment situation that might arise. When we ascertained that unemployment was on the rise we felt, as a government with humanitarian instincts, that we should do something in the way of providing for individuals who found themselves unemployed for a certain period of time. To alleviate the unemployment situation we brought in amendments to the act, providing higher benefits by the establishment of two higher categories.

Up until that time the Unemployment Insurance Act provided for a maximum benefit of $30 per week. We established two new categories which provided for $33 per week and $36 per week, related to the contributions made by the employees, for a total period of 104 weeks. We felt we would give incentive to individuals to work by raising the allowable earnings, and we did so to the extent of 50 per cent of the benefits. In other words, a person receiving the highest benefit of $36 per week was entitled to earn $18 through part time employment during that week without any infringement upon his benefit. The individual was given the opportunity of receiving a total of $54 a week in the highest category.

The former government had cut down the period of benefits to 36 weeks. We decided to raise this period to 52 weeks. In the United States the federal government is going to increase the unemployment benefit period by 13 weeks, which means that the longest period an individual in the United States can draw unemployment insurance is 39 weeks. In comparison, an individual in Canada can regularly draw benefits, providing the individual qualifies, for 52 weeks and, with the addition of seasonal benefits, for a total period of 76 weeks.

Under the former administration married women came under the regulations but not under the act, and did not receive the same privileges as male employees. We remedied that situation by bringing married women under the act, providing them with the same benefits and opportunities as male employees. We also brought fishermen under the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: On what date?

Mr. Starr: Fishermen commenced to receive benefits under the act on December 1. Under the former administration they would have commenced to receive benefits on January 1. They in fact began to receive these benefits one month earlier than they would have.

This government gave consideration, at the same time, to seasonal benefits, which were available from January 1 to April 15. We had always in opposition advocated that these seasonal benefits should be extended from January 1 to May 15, giving an extra four weeks' benefit. However, this government went further even than that. The allowable period for seasonal benefits is now from December 1 to May 15, representing an increase of two months. In 1958 we further extended that period, in respect of one year only, by the addition of six weeks.

Regular benefits are based on the formula of two contributions for one benefit. Seasonal benefits were based on the same formula. We changed that formula in order to make it easier for individuals to qualify in respect of seasonal benefits. We changed the two for one formula and extended the seasonal benefits, so an individual can now draw five benefits for every six contributions. All these benefits, which are in effect now, were designed to benefit the working men and women of this country. I submit they have been of tremendous help to the individuals in this country who have been unemployed.

The hon. member for Assiniboia—and I need not remind hon. members that he is an aspirant for the leadership of the New party, which is supposed to represent the working force of this country—yesterday charged that this government had pilfered the fund by doing the things it had done, and suggested that as the only reason the fund is at its present level. He charged that this government had pilfered the fund in order to bring forward these unemployment insurance benefits to which I have referred.

In view of this charge I am doubtful whether that hon. member is working on behalf of the working force, or whether he would be willing to do the things this government has done to the benefit of that working force. It has been suggested that we should protect the fund. No one has yet suggested what method in his opinion should be implemented to protect the fund and how it should be done.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): By not imposing an obligation to sell government securities at a loss.

Mr. Starr: Speakers on that side of the house have all said so far that whatever action the government will endeavour to implement by way of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act they will resist vigorously. That has been their position so far in this debate. "Whatever you try to do we will resist it vigorously".

Mr. Robichaud: Provide work and the fund will be sound.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) says "provide work". If the Speaker would permit me to go beyond the scope of the amendment I would be only too glad to list item by item and in detail the 23 measures that the government has taken since November 23 to provide work, measures that are taking effect now and will continue to take effect. However, I am afraid the Speaker would not permit me to go beyond the scope of the amendment.

Mr. Ricard: More people are working now than ever before.

Mr. Starr: The charge has been made that the government has failed to act on the recommendations contained in the report of the unemployment insurance advisory committee. What part do hon. members advocate that we should implement? The part respecting fishermen? The hon. member for Gloucester says that nothing should be done in that regard and I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) would not be in favour of doing anything about it. What part of that report should be implemented? I am anxious to hear that. I am anxious to hear what responsibility members of the opposition have, whether they are prepared to say, "Here are our recommendations. This is what you should do. You should carry out all of it or just part." No one has said yet what part of these recommendations should be implemented.

At this point I will just mention in passing the matter of contracts of service and casual employment, and I will deal with it in more detail later. The hon. member for Gloucester has brought this matter to the attention of the house on a number of occasions. I want to point out to him that those persons who have employed people to fix their verandas or to paint the exteriors of their houses are not employers in the sense that they are registered as employers in the national employment service offices. They have been able to purchase unemployment insurance stamps without any check at the post offices throughout the country. No auditor from the unemployment insurance commission has been able to check on the validity of these purchases and the validity of the stamps that have been put into the books of those employed by such people because these people have no records. They have no payrolls. Nothing is kept. This has been a haphazard type of thing that had to be rectified.

Mr. Robichaud: Not in all cases.

Mr. Starr: When the hon. member for Gloucester drew the attention of the unemployment insurance commission to a case he was advised that the appeal with respect to that case would be heard by the commission. He was advised that he had the opportunity to appear in order to speak on behalf of the people involved. He refused to do so.

Mr. Robichaud: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister's statement should be corrected because in only one instance was I asked by the unemployment insurance commission to attend an appeal and as I was 800 miles away from Ottawa I simply could not be there.

Mr. Starr: I referred to only one instance and if I said that the hon. member refused to do so I will withdraw that and modify it by saying that he did not appear.

Mr. Robichaud: That is more like it.

Mr. Starr: We are now in the second day of discussion of another of those weak-kneed, wishy-washy, futile and frustrating amendments of Her Majesty's loyal Liberal opposition, and one minute's study of this amendment will reveal that it means absolutely nothing. I think this is another step, Mr. Speaker, and a backward one at that, in the constant effort to convince the country that disaster is inevitable unless a Liberal administration is installed. Personally I cannot think of a more inevitable way to ensure disaster in this country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You do not believe that.

Mr. Starr: I certainly do.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, no, you do not.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, if the criterion is the negative, destructive and barren way in which they have approached every single measure brought forward by the government since November 17, I submit this country has little hope of anything from the Liberal party in the future. I am only guessing, Mr. Speaker, but from the notes that are being written on the desk of the hon. member for Essex East I think that in a little while we will once again be treated to the posturing and viewing with alarm of the hon. and doom-ridden member for Essex East. I think he will trot out all the arguments he has trotted out in the past, which are nothing but a tossed salad of verbiage so very dear to his heart—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Repeat that. It is a good epigram.

Mr. Starr: —about mismanagement of the fund, which is his favourite topic.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): One of the most disgraceful episodes of the government.

Mr. Starr: He will talk about mismanagement by the investment committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Forced on it by the government's financial policy and conditions of unemployment.

Mr. Starr: Incidentally, all but one member of that committee were appointed by the former government.

Mr. Pickersgill: What does that prove?

Mr. Robichaud: They are responsible to the present government.

Mr. Starr: If they were responsible when the Liberal government was in power, they are certainly the same people and are just as responsible now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister a question? Will he tell us of any incident under the former government where the investment committee was ever faced with the problem that faced it under this government involving as it did a conflict of interests because of the bond conversion policy of the present government?

Mr. Starr: The investment committee certainly has had to sell more bonds because we know that the fund is depleted and the only way it could be developed to the point where it is was by the sale of these bonds that were held.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the trust fund?

Mr. Starr: Losses were also incurred in previous years when bonds were sold. I am sure that when the hon. member for Essex East rises to speak he will begin wheeling and dealing in his usual fashion and will come out with his statistics involving millions and tens of millions of dollars. I would not advise anyone to try to check the figures produced by the hon. member for Essex East from time to time. This is the 101st day of the session and up to now the government has brought in some 23 measures to combat unemployment and to stabilize the economy. During the whole session practically all of the actions of the government have been directed toward that end. Every one of these positive and beneficial measures has been strenuously opposed by members of the opposition.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not true.

Mr. Starr: In the end, of course, they voted for them when a vote was forced.

Let us look at Hansard and see what these spokesmen for the Liberal party particularly have had to say about the measures we have introduced. Let us look at the amendment, Mr. Speaker, which they have placed before this house. It reads:

> This house regrets the failure of the government to ensure sound administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act, resulting in the depletion of the financial resources of the fund and new arbitrary administrative procedures which deny benefits to casual employees.

This is the whole of the amendment. I submit to you, sir, this amendment demands close scrutiny. In the first place, since the amendment was put forward by a supposedly responsible opposition, it shows an alarming ignorance of the structure of the administration and of the Unemployment Insurance Act itself. In so far as the administration of the fund is concerned, as I have pointed out earlier it is the same administration as has always been there. The investment committee is the same, with the addition of only one new member. The structure is the same. The fund is administered by a commission, as it has always been, and there is nothing new in the administration.

What does this amendment actually mean, Mr. Speaker? The amendment says, in effect, when you clear away all the verbiage, that the fund has been depleted and the government is to blame; that is the sum of the amendment. At the same time, this peculiarly contradictory amendment accuses us of taking steps to prevent the depletion of the fund by denying benefits to casual employees. The hon. member for Gloucester claimed yesterday this is something new. I can only say that if those who framed this amendment had even a nodding acquaintance with this act they would know that casual employment is specifically excepted from eligibility for insurance under this act.

I refer to section 27, paragraph (p), which reads as follows:

> Excepted employment is
> (p) employment of a casual nature otherwise than for the purpose of the employer's trade or business;

I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that this section has been a part of the act ever since the act came into being. Now, all of a sudden the opposition discovers it and says, this is something new. The interpretation of this section, of course, is left to the commission; that is their business. The minister has no jurisdiction. The last recourse in this respect is the umpire. A recent decision of the umpire, and not the first of its kind I might point out, has confirmed the commission's interpretation of this section. I submit to you, therefore, that any suggestion that some new and sinister device has been introduced to deprive casual employees of benefits falls immediately by the wayside. I will go this far, Mr. Speaker, and say the act is now being enforced as perhaps was not the case in the past in respect of this matter. The enforcement is being applied without any partisan basis.

This is all that is in the amendment. It is contradictory as my parliamentary secretary pointed out last night. The amendment says that we have depleted the fund and then suggests that we should go against the provisions of the act by making benefits available for casual labour. This amendment may meet the requirements of the rules, but it certainly does not meet the requirements of common sense. I say this amendment is another calculated effort by the opposition to spread doom and gloom. How different is the situation in the United States from the one here. The outlook of the people is different, and there is no talk of gloom and disaster in that country. They are now saying they are on their way out of the recession; that is the talk in the United States. No one is going around spreading this philosophy of doom and gloom. They have faith in their country, and they are not trying to bring down the economy by spreading this sort of thing.

I should like to say this, Mr. Speaker. In yesterday's Toronto daily Star there appeared a headline on the business page which said: "U.S. Hope Soars Recession Over." There is no gloom and doom there. Then, the article goes on to say this:

> Rising automobile sales, increased steel production, a decline in unemployment, an improvement in sales of major appliances, a gain in manufacturers' new orders and sales, and an increase in instalment credit were in evidence.

These signs of a pick-up in the economy of the United States are being reflected here. When I was in Washington recently I did not solicit this information but I was told that even though we had gone into the recession earlier than the United States, there was every evidence they could see that we were coming out of that recession sooner than the United States. I mention this because it relates directly to the subamendment moved by the group to your immediate left, Mr. Speaker. They accuse the government of failing to give consideration to the reimbursement of the fund from the public treasury to take care of the excessive depletion it has suffered as a consequence of the recent abnormal unemployment.

In the first place I would submit, knowing that you have accepted this amendment, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment is not in accordance with the facts. The government has given consideration and is giving consideration to this matter as well as to other matters relating to the fund and the employment situation in general. There is plenty of evidence to that effect. As was pointed out by my parliamentary secretary last night, these are matters of policy which will be announced when decisions have been confirmed. I find it difficult to believe this amendment means what it says. Hon. members are criticizing the government for failing to give consideration, and this is hardly a motion of substance. What it means, if it means anything, is that they are telling the government to reimburse the fund from the public treasury. I am not arguing the point of order because you, sir, have accepted the subamendment, and I merely wish to deal with the meaning of this subamendment in the way which is open to me to reply to it.

I can only say that consideration is being given, in so far as the first part of the subamendment is concerned. In so far as the second part of the subamendment is concerned, there is a reference to the recent abnormal unemployment. This is just another means of getting back to the same old record. The hon. member for Gloucester said last night that the real reason for the depletion of the fund was the fact that people were unemployed. I think he repeated that this afternoon in his interjection. Then we listened to the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) who criticized us for taking money from the fund in order to help people over difficult times. Let me ask this question. What does he think the fund is for? At the beginning of my remarks this afternoon I said that the fund was to help people, to tide them over a period of unemployment. We make and have made no distinction between those whom we feel are or are not entitled. The people who are drawing unemployment insurance are, in our estimation, entitled to it. Certainly we do not feel that they should be pushed aside out of the unemployment insurance fund and required to go on relief, as the hon. member suggested—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is just what you have been doing.

Mr. Starr: —and as the hon. member for Welland stated should be done. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Welland placed himself in the position of talking against his own party's amendment which criticized us for denying benefits to casual employees. However, this is typical of the confusion that exists in the ranks of the Liberal members in this house.

In both the amendment and the subamendment mention was made of the depletion of the fund. Surely no one would imagine that the government is not aware of this fact—certainly we are aware of it—or that the government is not giving close care and attention to this matter. We mentioned it in the throne speech when it was read on November 17.

Mr. Pickersgill: And that is the last we heard of it.

Mr. Starr: Depletion of the fund is dealt with in the last report of the unemployment insurance advisory committee covering the fiscal period ending March 31. That report points to the extension of seasonal benefits as one of the major drains on the fund. This was done, Mr. Speaker. We extended these seasonal benefits. It was necessary to take this action at the time, as the committee itself recognizes when in its report it goes on to say this:

> This large sum has been distributed in relatively small amounts. It has been the means of relieving economic distress, through unemployment, of millions of individuals and their families.

The unemployment insurance advisory committee does not criticize the government for delivering economic distress. It is left for the opposition to do that. The committee merely points out that this is what has been done and it makes certain recommendations. Those recommendations are under consideration by the government. Certainly there has not been from the opposition any indication as to whether the government should adopt all of these recommendations or part of them. The results of that consideration which the government is now giving to those recommendations and others will be evident when the amendments to the act are brought down in this house.

There is also mention of the cost of benefits for fishermen. The hon. member for Gloucester has carefully studied that section of the report, I am sure; yet there was from him no suggestion that fishermen should not be eligible to receive benefits, and I repeat that statement. Earlier in my remarks I said —and I repeat it—that he has not said anything about that matter. He has not said that they should not be included under the act.

Mr. Robichaud: What I said is on the record.

Mr. Starr: Yes, but the hon. member also said that we should adopt the recommendations of the unemployment advisory committee, and that is one of the major points of the recommendations.

An hon. Member: He nailed you there.

Mr. Starr: We have not heard from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) as yet. I will wait with interest to find out whether such a suggestion is forthcoming from him as to whether we should implement the report of the unemployment insurance advisory committee or part of it; and if so, what part. As a matter of fact, a careful study of the report of the advisory committee leads to only one conclusion, namely that the situation cannot be met simply by merely appropriating money through parliament to meet the payments from the fund. It is evident that what is required is a careful review of the act, something which we are undertaking with the officials of the unemployment insurance commission and with others, with a view to incorporating amendments that will restore the full effectiveness of the scheme.

This is the government's responsibility. This is what the government has been doing. It is not, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, something that can be done overnight. I should like to get it done as quickly as possible. I know that by nature I am an impatient person but I find that in this case this thing cannot be done overnight or in a hurry. It must be done carefully. A great many factors must be weighed in making the decisions with respect to the amendments to this act and they must be given careful study. This is matter of government policy and it is not to be decided, I submit, at a time or in a way determined by the opposition. I may say that it is generally recognized that the greatest single drain on the fund has been the seasonal benefit provision under the act. This was introduced by the former government in 1950. We extended it by two months. We changed the formula. I believe that the amendment at that time was piloted through by the hon. member for Essex East,—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Starr: —who was then acting on behalf of the then minister of labour.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We never had unemployment as this government has had it.

Mr. Ricard: You mean horses were on the payroll?

Mr. Starr: In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I feel that it ill behooves hon. members opposite at this time to talk and act as though they had never heard of these things. We extended this provision; and I am not worried about saying that. I think we did a great deal of good by it. We helped people through a trying period. We did it when hardships were in prospect as the result of a continent wide recession, not one just confined to Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Twelve per cent in this country; 8 per cent in the United States.

Mr. Starr: Now they tell us we should further extend the act by including casual labour. The hon. member for Essex East just interjected percentages. I wonder whether he has studied—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, the minister has unlimited time. He is the minister replying.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there is no objection, the minister may continue.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let the minister continue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But not to an unlimited extent.

An hon. Member: Stick together, boys.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member for Essex East just interjected percentages. I did not catch the full impact of those percentages.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said—

Mr. Starr: It does not matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What I said was that in Canada—

Mr. Starr: It does not matter. I wish to point out to the hon. member that, in those states on the borders of Canada having the same climatic conditions as we have here in Canada, the percentage of unemployment is far greater than is the national average in this country and more than double what it is in Ontario.

Mr. Ricard: Under a good Conservative government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us not worry about that. Let us do something here at home.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: If the hon. member would permit me to take the time of the house in order to go into detail and to enumerate and discuss in full detail the measures this government has taken since November 17, I should be only too glad to put them on the record since he has now made the remark "let us go ahead and do something about it" and has asked what the government has done.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We know what you have done, and you have done very little. It is a disgrace.

Mr. Starr: I will confine myself to the amendments. Both these amendments are designed to bring forward the question of unemployment, and at the same time deprive the government of the opportunity of saying what is being done about it, as I said a moment ago.

The C.C.F. subamendment talks about "abnormal unemployment". These are the words you will find in their subamendment. Any substantial unemployment is abnormal as far as this government is concerned, and we are taking the most far-reaching steps ever taken in the economic history of this country by any government since confederation to deal with it.

As an example, in the present fiscal year we are providing for expenditures of more than $742 million in government acquisition and construction to help the economic situation. I submit this will help to deal with abnormal unemployment. I am directing my remarks only to the words which appear in the subamendment.

There are other encouraging items in the daily press which will have their effect on abnormal unemployment as referred to in the subamendment. Again, from last night's Toronto Daily Star which as all hon. members know makes a habit of stressing the brighter side of the news as far as this government is concerned, there is an article which says:

> From Vancouver—a $76 million copper order from Japan for British Columbia.

This will have an effect on abnormal unemployment.

Mr. Winch: Starting when?

Mr. Starr: I have not the details here, but I shall be glad to get them for the hon. member.

Mr. Winch: It will not be in operation for 14 months.

Mr. Starr: That is fine; that may be so. It is for the future. But surely the hon. member would not discount that.

Mr. Winch: No, I accept it willingly, but you are talking about the subamendment and the abnormal unemployment situation which now exists.

Mr. Starr: I am talking about the abnormal unemployment situation as it may exist at the moment. These things will help to alleviate that situation.

Mr. Argue: You mean that unemployment will still be here 14 months from now?

Mr. Starr: Other things will also help the situation now. This news story also refers to more than $200 million in long term contracts for British Columbia mining products. This, too, will have beneficial results in so far as abnormal unemployment is concerned.

Let me say that the shipping employment provided under the tremendous wheat sale to China will help to eat into the "abnormal unemployment" mentioned in the subamendment. I am still dealing with the matter of abnormal unemployment referred to in the C.C.F. subamendment.

From last night's Citizen, another purveyor of the bright side of the news, we have this item, which will have an effect on abnormal unemployment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rose on a point of order a few moments ago to point out that the minister had the undoubted right to speak as long as he wishes. I think Your Honour recognizes that he has this right under standing order 31.

Therefore even my intervention now is not taking away from his time. But since hon. members on this side of the house would like an opportunity to reply to the minister's arguments, I wonder whether the reading of newspaper clippings or stories which really have no relation to the motion is quite relevant. So long as Your Honour is willing to give the same indulgence to other hon. members, as I have indicated two or three times before, we on this side of the house are quite happy.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I am not reading newspaper clippings; I am referring to news stories which have recently appeared in newspapers and which I submit will have an effect upon the charge made in the C.C.F. subamendment when they speak about abnormal unemployment. Those words are in the subamendment.

This is the charge being made against the government, and I want to say that all is not doom and gloom; there is a brighter side. It is not something that we, the government, are putting forward and trying to ram down their throats, but rather it is a disinterested viewpoint of what is being done in Canada and what is happening to help this situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I cannot accept the view that because the subamendment contains the words "recent abnormal unemployment" it is permissible to discuss unemployment.

I may say that in my view relevancy may sometimes be more a method of speaking than the choosing of the subject for a speech. I think the hon. minister was not always relating his remarks to either the amendment or the subamendment.

The subamendment, in fact, deals with the suggestion that the government should have considered the reimbursement of the fund from the public treasury because of its excessive depletion.

Abnormal unemployment would be only a cause of the depletion of the fund, and really the subject matter of the subamendment is restricted to the reimbursement of the fund from the public treasury because of its excessive depletion.

Therefore if I think in some ways unemployment could be related to the subject matter of the amendment or the subamendment, I do not think it would be related in the way the minister has proceeded up to this time. In fact, I would say unemployment has also very little to do with the main amendment, because the main amendment concerns only the matter of the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Maybe, it excludes unemployment.

Mr. Starr: I will abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I had many other things to mention which are happening in this country and will take care of abnormal unemployment. Therefore there is no necessity for us to be steeped in doom and gloom; rather, I think there are indications of a brighter side in our economy for the future.

There has been an indication of this from even the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). The leader of the Liberal party changed his outlook a few weeks ago. He now feels that an upsurge in the economy is just around the corner. But he is guarded in this respect, because he says, "Of course, it will not be because of anything this government has done".

Mr. Pickersgill: That is certainly right.

Mr. Starr: I ask this, Mr. Speaker. Is it because of the gloomy predictions of the opposition that the economy is on the upturn? No, certainly not. It is because of the actions of this government; it is because the actions of certain people in this country who have faith and hope in this country are bringing it out of the recession. This will come about regardless of the doom and gloom the Liberal party is spreading around in the hope it will have the desired effect, which is to bring the economy down.

Even the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin)—that great prophet of good times and good cheer—said this in his usual buoyant and optimistic way:

I would hope it is an indication that forces of growth are present that might lead to an end of the recession—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They were very good words.

Mr. Starr: He, too, can now see that the actions of this government and the measures which have been taken by this government are bringing about results and will bring about greater results in the months and years ahead.

The hon. member has no alternative but to turn around and admit it, as he has done in the past. I hope he will do so in the future, because I think the future of this country and its economy is much greater than he or I.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I agree, because we will have a new government pretty soon.

Mr. Robichaud: Not a new vision, but a new government.

Mr. Ricard: You hope.

Mr. Starr: I should say, Mr. Speaker, that no government has ever worked as hard as the present government to bring about this buoyancy in our economy.

Mr. Pickersgill: Eighteen hours a day.

Mr. Starr: There are more people working today than ever before. Those same people are earning more, spending more and saving more money than ever before in the history of this country. I will say, as did my colleague the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) that there are 500,000 more Canadians working today than there were when the Liberals were put out of office.

I would also point out to hon. members opposite that you cannot deal with unemployment in terms of actuarial considerations alone. We are dealing with men and women, Canadian citizens bringing up their children, sending their children to school. These are the people with whom we are dealing and we are very conscious of it. If I must choose between actuarial considerations and the alleviation of misery for Canadians, my decision will always be in favour of those Canadians.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I know it is going to be a bitter disappointment to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) that his prognostication as to who would follow him has turned out to be wrong, and instead of listening to the eloquence of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) he is going to listen to the faltering words of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Starr: I am disappointed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the minister is disappointed, but I hope his disappointment will not be too long sustained. Before I deal with some of the things the minister said, I want to refer to an exceedingly naive observation made last evening by the parliamentary secretary to the minister (Mr. Thrasher) at the very opening of his remarks, because these words appear most strange to me after all the resounding declarations about the rights of parliament and especially the rights of the opposition which we used to hear from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). Said the parliamentary secretary as reported at page 4522 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, once again we find the opposition introducing an amendment to a motion to go into supply under a guise that is purposely designed to permit them to make an attack on government policy—

Some hon. Members: Read on.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be happy to read on. It continues:

—on government policy with regard to employment in this country.

An hon. Member: Nothing to do with the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: What, may I ask, does the hon. gentleman think parliament is for? What does he think an opposition is for? Does he think that we on this side of the house, like the hon. gentleman and those around him, are a lot of rubber stamps or "yes" men or trained seals? Did the hon. gentleman wish to intervene?

Mr. Thrasher: I was wondering whether the hon. gentleman wished to have an answer to the question he just posed?

Mr. Pickersgill: My question was a purely rhetorical one and I leave the hon. gentleman to make any kind of answer that his essay writer is able to think up for him.

The Minister of Labour suggested that there was a contradiction in the amendment moved by the official opposition. Perhaps I might deal with that point before going on to deal with the other points made by the hon. gentleman. There is no contradiction. The plain fact is that there is a historical evolution. As the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) pointed out last night, the government in 1958 amended the act to provide for very greatly increased disbursements from the fund without making any provision for the replenishment of the fund. We condemned them at that time. We said that was an unsound policy, and we have repeated it on every occasion since. If the government had listened to us then, the fund would not now be in the precarious state in which it finds itself at the present time.

An hon. Member: They got their benefits increased.

Mr. Pickersgill: We did not oppose those benefits at any time. We oppose the conditions which brought about the increase in winter unemployment, dragging on into June of one year. We did not oppose the benefits, having regard to those conditions. But, we said, you have to be provident; you have to provide the money out of which to pay those benefits; you have no right to take money out of this actuarial fund by these unactuarial additions to it. That is our whole point. We have no objection to any of these benefits. Indeed, we are opposed altogether to driving people off the fund and putting them on relief.

But what happened? Last fall the condition of this fund began to worry the government. It should have worried them three years ago but at last they woke up to the fact that the position was serious. What did they do? In the guise of following strict insurance principles they looked around for the loopholes to get people off the fund and throw them on to relief. My hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Racine) and my hon. friend from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Granger) all pointed out last night that this is what happened. Work of a certain type was called casual employment. The work of carpenters employed by householders without there being a middleman was deemed to be outside the provisions of the act. Surely this is one of the last actions which one could have expected from a government which was urging us to "do it now" and encourage winter employment.

This decision had the result of discouraging employment. That is what they did, and that is what they are doing. Why? Because they are in a panic about the state of the fund. They did not take action of this kind in 1958 or in 1959. It was only in 1960 that this interpretation was introduced. Of course, when the case got to the umpire, the umpire had no choice but to make a strict interpretation. But there was never any need for it to have been taken before the umpire. It never should have been taken to the umpire, and since it was taken to the umpire—and the decision was made on February 3—the government should have had its bill in on February 4 or February 5 to correct the situation and see that protection continued to be given to those people who were working in good faith believing that the law which had been on the statute books since 1941 would continue to be administered in the same way as in the past.

There is no contradiction at all involved in the amendment. We are concerned about the depletion of the fund. Everyone is concerned about that, but the way in which to avoid the further depletion of the fund is not to cut off from benefit a group of people who have always been insured in the past. The way to deal with the situation is to find a sensible and stable means of replenishing the fund. But much more important even than that, is to get back to the kind of full employment we had in this country from 1945 to 1957. In all those years nobody worried about the state of the unemployment insurance fund. Nobody had any need to worry about it.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does the hon. gentleman seriously ask us to believe that he and his colleagues were responsible for the fact that unemployment was less in those years?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the hon. gentleman did not protest five minutes ago when the Minister of Labour was claiming that the present government was responsible for the end of a recession which has not yet come. Oh no. He is only too happy to let his colleague claim that. But when we suggest that Mr. Mackenzie King in 1945 appealed to the people of this country to put his government back in power on a policy of full employment, and that for 12 years afterwards there was full employment, and that there is some connection between those two facts, the hon. gentleman rises to object. As Mr. St. Laurent used to say, maybe it is a coincidence. But it has just so happened that ever since 1896 every time there has been a Liberal government in this country, the nation has grown and developed, and every time there has been a Tory government there has been stagnation. That is a historical truth.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I will take my 40 minutes and then the hon. gentleman can ask his question.

The minister said in the course of his remarks that the previous government had been warned in 1957 that the unemployment situation was coming. The minister chose to refer to this subject and I am sure Your Honour will not restrict me from doing the same. I asked him when the government had received that warning and he dodged the question. I know very well why he dodged it: because he remembered that on December 10, 1957, just six months after he came into office he said that there is hardly an economist or a student of the situation who does not feel that the unemployment situation is merely temporary and that, given a brief breathing pause, the natural buoyancy of the economy will assert itself. That is what the minister had to say on December 10. Was the minister that inept or blind?

Both Mr. Harris and the leader of the opposition had been warned in June that the unemployment situation was coming, but what did this collection of brilliant statesmen who had been in office six months have to say about this? After six months in office they had this to say, and I think it is worth repeating; "There is hardly an economist or a student of the situation who does not feel that the unemployment situation is merely temporary and that, given a brief breathing pause, the natural buoyancy of the economy will assert itself". A month and ten days later the Prime Minister had that apocalyptic vision in this house on January 20, 1958 and put forward carefully selected extracts from a document which, by all the conventions of our British parliamentary institution should never have been used in the way he used it, and created an impression which was totally out of accord with the facts, and out of accord with what the Minister of Labour had said a month before.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Is it still hurting?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not suggesting the unemployment situation is hurting the Liberal party today, but it is hurting that party which has been in power for four of the longest years we have experienced in Canada in recent times.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think I should remind the hon. member that I do not object to his answering arguments or statements made by the minister or other speakers, but I suggest that his answer should be short rather than of a type which would detract from the subject of the amendment. I indicated before it is my view that the unemployment situation cannot be the subject matter of the amendment because there is reference only to the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: I promise you, sir, that I will not take any longer in respect of any of these themes than did the minister himself.

The minister complained in the same vein as did the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) and the parliamentary secretary. I will not take as much time as they did.

An hon. Member: It will seem like it though.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it will seem like a lot longer to the hon. member before I am finished, though it will not take me longer.

I should like to ask the minister what he means by gloom and doom. I am going to ask him whether he means by gloom and doom that which is indicated in this statement:

> We on this side of the house hope that the government will act because there is no depression in other countries of the world. In Britain there is no such thing as serious unemployment today, the unemployment in Britain being less than half of our unemployment with a population several times greater than ours. The same condition prevails in West Germany and in other private enterprise countries.

Is that doom and gloom?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There is no word there decrying the Canadian conditions.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, yes, the statement is that there is no other country in the world with such serious unemployment as we have in Canada. That is what is said here. I continue:

> We do not believe in preaching pessimism; we do not want to see the condition of affairs brought about which will create panic; but we are asking the government to act now—
> —this is not something new that has come to the attention of the government. It has been mounting for the last several years.

Is that, or is it not, doom and gloom?

Mr. Ricard: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let me read this:

> The government does not even recognize that there is serious unemployment. Unless they do recognize that fact they cannot achieve in their minds any actuality of a solution for the problem.

What a wonderfully accurate description of this government that is. I continue:

> I was reading Edmund Burke the other night and I saw something that is quite fitting. He said: We can never walk surely but by being sensible of our blindness.

Is this government sensible of its own blindness? I read further:

> How applicable that is to this government which is so insensible to its blindness, to its own postponing and procrastinating. It is ready to promise action some time in the future.

Mr. Chambers: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, under the rules I believe the hon. member has an obligation to name the author of this excellent indictment of the previous government.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would like the name of the author of these words regarding doom and gloom, I will identify that author in this way; he is also the author of these words which were delivered on a television program on April 12, 1961—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Pickersgill: They do not like this, Mr. Speaker, and I told you they would not.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers), any hon. member quoting from a document in this house is obliged to identify directly the document and the author from which he quotes and, if the hon. member is quoting from Hansard, as I believe he is, I would ask that he give us the page, the date and the author.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am going to save the time of the house by reading just one or two extracts from this—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, with all respect, I would ask you to enforce the rules of the house in this regard.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I would also suggest it is a rule of the house that a member may read anything in the house if he makes the words his own, and I make these words my own, sir.

Mr. Ricard: You accept the words "doom and gloom" as your own?

Mr. Pickersgill: In this regard I would like to point out what that hon. gentleman said, and I will read his words.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will realize he cannot have it both ways. He cannot assume the words as his own while at the same time referring to what someone else said. We are all apparently curious to have the individual identified.

Mr. Pickersgill: The gentleman who said that, sir, was then a private member sitting on this side of the house from the constituency of Prince Albert, and is today the Prime Minister of this country. Those words of doom and gloom were uttered during the one period of temporary seasonal unemployment of a serious character during that period.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know that the hon. gentlemen do not like their leader's record exposed to the public, but would rather only have his visions exposed. They do not want to see their leader in the rags and tatters of another day. Their leader needs a new suit now, and needs one a great deal more than the country does. What this country needs is a new government. I would draw your attention to the words which were then expressed in that kind of statement to which, when we were on the other side, we took no exception. We did not say they were unparliamentary or unpatriotic.

Mr. Martineau: What did Mr. St. Laurent say?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. St. Laurent believed in free speech. He believed in respect for freedom.

Mr. Thrasher: Tell us about his relations with the C.B.C.

Mr. Pickersgill: He believed in respect for all members of the house and he showed respect for all members of the house—

Mr. Thrasher: Tell us about his relations with the C.B.C.

Mr. Pickersgill: —something that those of us who remember him here will never forget.

An hon. Member: Tell us about black Friday.

Mr. Pallett: Who was the prime minister during the pipe-line debate?

Mr. Pickersgill: If I had been responsible for blank Saturday I do not think I would be too keen to talk about black Friday. But I come to something that is rather more serious. Here is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said on the air:

> I refer, of course, to those who for political purposes—

He was referring to his opponents in this house in his usual courteous fashion.

> —downgrade the credit and prestige of Canada abroad—

Just listen to these words.

> —spreading the vicious propaganda of doom and gloom.

That referred to statements precisely like the speeches the right hon. gentleman made when he was not yet right honourable.

Mr. Pallett: If you live to be 100 you could not measure up to his speeches.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I can look at his speeches and read them, and I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite always object when any of the Prime Minister's old speeches are read in the house. Their quality does not seem to be very durable. Perhaps that is why we always have to have something new.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I wish you would make a few speeches like the one by the Prime Minister from which you just quoted.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was neither shocked nor surprised last night when the parliamentary secretary did what has been done in the Tory propaganda over and over again, and he was supported in this, which I thought was rather more serious, by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). If I may have the attention of the Minister of Labour, I should like to point out that last night his parliamentary secretary made the categorical statement that fishermen were brought under unemployment insurance by the present government and the Minister of Labour echoed those words and said that was correct.

I have the reference right here. I have in my hand chapter 50 of the statutes of 1956, assented to on August 14, 1956, some considerable time before hon. gentlemen were on the treasury benches over there. Chapter 50 added to the Unemployment Insurance Act an amendment to section 29 in the following terms:

> Notwithstanding anything in this act, the regulations made with the approval of the governor in council under section 26 for including employment in fishing in insurable employment may, for all purposes of this act, provide for—

I do not think I need take the time to read the provisions. It does seem to me that a parliamentary secretary and a minister speaking in the house about their own department, about an act which the minister is responsible for administering, should know the truth about that act, and you could not have any better evidence of maladministration than evidence that the head of the department and his principal assistant are ignorant about the contents of the legislation. Either they are ignorant of the facts or a worse interpretation has to be put upon it and, as that would be unparliamentary, I will not do it. However, I will say, because it is not unparliamentary to say it, that the iteration and reiteration of this untruth, this false statement in the Tory propaganda, is characteristic of the propaganda of hon. gentlemen opposite in the constituencies. It does not seem to me that hon. gentlemen have gained very much by making that kind of claim.

The minister wanted to know what my views were about whether fishermen should be continued under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I do not think anyone else in the house needs to know what my views are on this subject.

An hon. Member: What is that?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think anyone else in the house needs to know what my views are on this subject. I was a member of the government that put that provision into the act and I will fight to the very limit of my capabilities to keep it there. I must say I am shocked by the apparent undercurrent of opposition to the coverage of fishermen under the act. As the hon. member for Gloucester said yesterday, these people are engaged in the most ancient industry of our country. I do not know of any group of people who are more deserving of protection similar to that given to other people and who were denied it for so long on technical grounds, and I say that once we have found some means of providing this protection it should be continued.

I know that quite an argument can be made for an alternative scheme, and that is fine if you are not a fisherman. But the fishermen, as the hon. member for Gloucester pointed out, are for the most part engaged in a seasonal occupation in most regions of Canada. There are a few areas where you can fish the whole year round but they are very few. The fishermen want to be under unemployment insurance and they want to get their stamps for their fish. Why? So that when other jobs are available they can get stamps for their other work and thus have coverage like other people. If they were under some other scheme they would not be able to take jobs during the part of the year that they cannot fish and get the coverage that other Canadians have. They would have to pay for their stamps but they would get no insurance, which would not be fair.

A great many of these people want to be able to take jobs in the winter time. It is true that most of them have not been able to take jobs over the last four years but that is not their fault. That is because jobs were not available. The hon. member for Gloucester gave the figures yesterday and they do not need to be repeated, but out of the tremendous drop in the fund of hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars it is estimated that the drain of fishermen on the fund has been something like $23 million. That is not a very considerable amount.

But I will say this about the fund itself, and I think I betray no secrets in doing so. When this matter was considered at the time the addition was made to the act it was decided, after deliberation, that there first should be a year or two of operation under the act to see how it worked and it was also under consideration that if in fact, as seemed likely, fishermen's insurance would not be actuarially sound just as insurance in the case of other seasonal workers was not actuarially sound, provision should then be made in some other way to meet the deficit so that these groups of people would not be a charge upon the fund itself and upon those who contributed to the fund who were doing so on what was a reasonable actuarial basis. It seems to me that is a reasonable position to take.

The question then is, how should the replenishment be done? I listened to the very interesting speech, except for the beginning and end which I must say I did not think very much of, made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) who suggested that the fund should be replenished by an additional contribution or tax collected from all employed persons but not from those who have private incomes or from pensioners or retired people.

It does not seem to me, sir, that this segregation of one section of the population, however large it may be, makes much sense. It does seem to me that if we decided, as we decided when we first put seasonal workers under unemployment insurance, that we were going to use the Unemployment Insurance Act as a vehicle not merely for pure insurance of the actuarially sound cases but also to deal with the other related social problem of seasonal unemployment that has to be dealt with—I quite agree with the minister it must be dealt with humanely but our complaint is it has not been dealt with humanely enough —those groups covered by the act who are not covered in an actuarial way should be covered by the treasury, by all of us, by the community.

That is the position that the hon. member for Essex East took three years ago. It is the position that was taken by the former government when it was in office. It seems to me that, notwithstanding the repudiation of that position by the minister today, it is the only right and proper position to take in this matter.

I was astonished, sir, to hear the minister say that he had found that officials in the United States regarded conditions in Canada as being so much better than they were in the United States. This, of course, is not the truth. The statistics that are published by the dominion bureau of statistics and the corresponding United States statistics show that that statement is not accurate and is very far indeed from being accurate.

The minister talked about the optimism he found in the United States, and contrasted it with the gloom and doom he found in his own country where, apparently, the only people who are listened to by the minister and his colleagues are Liberals. It seemed to me that perhaps the minister was getting us ready for another "Follow John" campaign. However, this time there is a difference and the "John" we are to follow is not here in Ottawa but in Washington. I do not believe the notion that we should just let the United States solve its problems and hope that ours will be solved in the wash, is going to satisfy the Canadian people. The Canadian people want action from their government, as the right hon. gentleman pointed out in 1955, and they want action now.

The minister referred to the fact there was a mention in the speech from the throne of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The speech from the throne was delivered almost six months ago, and the report of the unemployment insurance advisory committee was, I gather, received about that time or even before that time. At any rate, the problem was certainly known when this announcement was made in the speech from the throne. A serious change had been made in the administration of the act adversely affecting thousands of Canadians who want to work as carpenters or in other forms of casual labour. These people want to follow the advice of the minister, and "do it now". They felt they had covered themselves, having bought stamps and having taken advantage of the employment offer, only to find they were cut off from benefits because of this rigorous interpretation. I say that the minister should have introduced amendments to this legislation when that decision was made.

Mr. Pearson: It is not ready yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not ready yet; as a matter of fact, I doubt if one word has been put down on the first draft of the bill. Of course, they do not know when this legislation will be introduced, just as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) does not know what he is going to put in his budget. Perhaps they will not be able to decide what they can do about any of these things until the by-elections are over.

The minister talked about the 23 measures the government had brought in this year. He made a statement which is not in accord with the Hansard record, perhaps that is the best way of putting it, about the attitude of this party toward those measures. As a matter of fact, we shocked and annoyed the government by omitting the debate on the address so we could get on with the government's legislation. In most cases, we only made one or two speeches on these bills in order to get them through and give them a chance to work. We did not think much of some of them, but we said, give them a chance. What did hon. gentlemen on the government side of the house do? They talked and talked, just as they did last Saturday afternoon, saying what a good fellow the minister was and how lucky we were to have "John" at the head of the government. They filibustered their legislation. Why was this done? It was done because the government's legislation is not ready yet. We have had nothing put on the order paper for six weeks except purely routine matters. We are supposed to be hastening toward the end of the session. We are asked to take estimates all week because the government cannot make up its mind what to do about the Unemployment Insurance Act or any other important measure that should be before this house.

Mr. Nowlan: That is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) would perhaps understand me if I were to say that the government should put up or—well, the minister knows the rest. Let us see this action. Let us see this new vision of the new Canada that was unfolded at London while the rest of us were asked to do the nation's business and the leader of the government was politicking down at London.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. member contend that was cheap? It was a pretty cheap thing for the Prime Minister to do.

Mr. Lambert: What you are saying is cheap.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was a pretty cheap thing for the Prime Minister to do. He is the head of the government, and he insisted on the rest of us being here. Where was he? He was politicking, emitting some hot air without any substance. If he had gone down to London and told them what was going to be done about the Unemployment Insurance Act, or told them what was going to be done about the fund or dealt with some of the problems of the country—

Mr. Starr: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Starr: Would the hon. member advise the house where the leader of his party was and where the hon. member for Essex East was on Saturday?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be very happy to do so. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) had an engagement which he had made before the Prime Minister forced this rule on the house which we opposed—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say I am very glad the Leader of the Opposition was spared these 17 Tory speeches which bored the rest of us all day Saturday.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. More: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the hon. member has made an accusation that the Prime Minister forced Saturday sittings on this house. The amendment for Saturday sittings was introduced by a member of the C.C.F. party and the leader of the Liberals at that time did not know what to do. The house almost unanimously adopted that amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; I think this discussion is entirely out of order. I think we should return now to a discussion of the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, I think that is a very sound idea. My time has nearly expired, and I want to say a word about the subamendment.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): On the question of privilege that was raised—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, may I say that question of privilege was disposed of.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can hardly decide in advance whether or not the hon. member's question of privilege is to be accepted.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): In so far as the question of privilege is concerned, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said that Saturday sittings were forced on the house by the Prime Minister. I believe that statement should be withdrawn. It is entirely false and inaccurate, as was pointed out earlier. He should be required to withdraw.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no question of privilege, but I will happily amend the statement. I will say that the 200 sheep followed the Prime Minister and the rest of us had to submit to it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then, the Prime Minister did not do us the courtesy of being here himself. I have amended the statement, and I hope that will satisfy the sensibilities of hon. gentlemen opposite.

I want to go back to the amendment, because it does seem to me that no one in this party will have an opportunity to speak again before the division. I may say that we in the official opposition are heartily in accord with the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). In fact, the hon. member for Essex East began to urge this course in 1958, and he has been consistently urging it as have the rest of us who have spoken on this matter ever since that time. It is the only right and proper way of dealing with this situation so long as there is abnormal unemployment. We, therefore, intend to vote for this sub-amendment.

I am not saying that nearly all the administration—

An hon. Member: Are you for Douglas or for Argue?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could let this debate behind me go on for a minute or so.

Mr. Pearson: Why do they not keep order?

Mr. Peters: Why does not the hon. member rise in his place and make a speech?

Mr. Lambert: If I did so, I would treat the subject a little bit more logically.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has the floor and I would ask all hon. members to please allow him to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was saying that it seems to me quite important that we should take action and do so promptly and that this house should be given adequate time in which to consider the proposals of the government with respect to the replenishment of this fund and with respect to these abuses that hon. gentlemen opposite now assert they find in the administration of the act. Indeed, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway himself said that the act now was in such a mess it could not be enforced by anybody. I suggest that we should have these amendments before us at once.

Hon. gentlemen complain about the lack of suggestions from the opposition; that has been a constant refrain. They complain about lack of suggestions from the opposition. There has been no lack of suggestions from the opposition either about this matter—a good many have been made right in this debate—or about the problem of unemployment about which the minister spoke. The minister referred to these measures and I remind the minister, since he referred to them first, that the vocational training proposals which were brought in last November were recommended by my friend the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) in 1958.

Mr. Starr: I was not allowed to speak about them.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister says he was not allowed to speak about them.

Mr. Starr: Not about those things.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am confining myself to points raised by the minister and am raising no new matter whatsoever. The minister says the government received no suggestions from the opposition. Rather than give my views which some might regard as partial or biased I should like to read from the revised Canadian Annual Review for 1960, a publication which we have missed since 1939 and which all of us should be happy to see revived again because it is obviously a great contribution to our knowledge of affairs in this country. I should like to read from the Canadian Annual Review's summary on this very question of suggestions—and that is what makes it relevant—what the Globe and Mail said. They quote from the Globe and Mail.

An hon. Member: What is the page number?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is on page 20 of this volume. The Globe and Mail of August 12, 1960 said:

> It might have been assumed that the Diefenbaker government, with its huge majority, would have guided and controlled the proceedings in parliament. It did nothing of the kind. Instead, the initiative rested throughout with the opposition and the private members... In all the debates too, it was the opposition speakers who seemed to have most of the ideas. The cabinet provided little leadership. Its members gave the impression of men baffled by the problems which confronted them, unsure of their course, anxious to put off action in the hope that something would turn up.

Mr. Ricard: Who wrote that? A friend of yours?

Mr. Pickersgill: As far as the Unemployment Insurance Act is concerned, nothing has yet turned up.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this afternoon of speaking on this amendment of welcoming the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) back to the house and of expressing the hope that he has something to say on this important matter. It seems to me that this is the fifth or sixth time that we have discussed this matter of unemployment either in this manner or in others. Yet we are continually hearing the charge that the opposition has nothing further to offer. The reason this happens I believe is simply explained. It was explained quite simply by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) last night and I should like to refer to that matter. But before doing so, I should like to say what we think about the fund itself.

We in the C.C.F. believe, as our amendment states, that the fund itself is an insurance fund set up and contributed to by the employee through his contribution and through the wage factor that is a contribution of the employer. We believe that the government assumed the responsibility of administering the fund and also of making a contribution to that fund. We believe that the fund itself is an insurance factor, that it must be run as an insurance fund, and that it should be for the use of that 1 per cent to 3 per cent of the Canadian people who, through no fault of their own, through normal unemployment can expect to be unemployed. This is the reason why the fund was established. It was not established for the maintenance of the Canadian economy in conditions of recession or unemployment.

By many of those who have spoken statements have been made to the effect that over the years the unemployment insurance fund in this country and those in other countries have been established to carry people over periods of unemployment and that they have been a vital necessity in alleviating the suffering and the other ills that affect those who find themselves unemployed through no fault of their own. This is our understanding of what the unemployment insurance fund is.

If anyone wants to know what is the difference between the three political parties with regard to the unemployment insurance fund, all he needs to do is to examine the record of the proceedings of the industrial relations committee of two years ago when the last amendments were made to the act. If he does so, he will easily be able to ascertain what is the attitude of each of the parties toward unemployment insurance.

The Conservative government has made to the act many amendments that have been advantageous. It is quite true that they brought in extensions to the period of benefits, increasing it from 32 weeks to 52 weeks. This action has been appreciated. It is also true that they extended the seasonal benefits, an action that has also been appreciated. However, in speaking of seasonal benefits, it should also be noted that these are still tied to contributions. Although you can extend them as far as you wish at either end, the contribution period is limited and will cover only a specific period of time in any event. Hence to extend it may mean that a person gets the benefits earlier but it does not necessarily mean that he gets any more unless his regular benefits have disappeared at a particular period during the seasonal benefit period.

It is also true that more people were added when the last amendments were made to the Unemployment Insurance Act. But these categories were high rate employees. They were people in the higher wage brackets. They were not such people as those who are coming into the employment market at the present time. They were not those who were in the casual labour class; they were not those that are immediately affected by seasonal unemployment. Rather they were the category of people who seldom, if ever, are unemployed; and if they are unemployed, they have skills that will enable them to take employment in fields other than the one in which they are highly skilled. They still have a good advantage in obtaining employment, if any employment at all is available. So these people did contribute and were not going to be entitled to any additional benefits.

We say the amendment should be amended by adding the following words:

—and its failure to give consideration to the reimbursement of the fund from the public treasury for the excessive depletion it has suffered as a consequence of the recent abnormal unemployment.

Because of seasonal employment conditions in Canada we believe that 1 per cent to 3 per cent unemployment may be expected. It certainly is not welcomed; it is not wanted; but we anticipate that from time to time there will be a slight seasonal unemployment situation in the region of 1 per cent to 3 per cent. Anything over this will be caused, or is likely to be caused by other reasons which do not come under the conditions for which the fund was set up.

We have suggested that anything over this figure must be compensated by the federal treasury because the federal government is responsible for the employment situation. I have not heard the minister say he is not responsible for the employment situation. We believe that in those fields where unemployment is greater than the minimum amount, the federal government must make contributions to maintain the unemployment insurance fund.

At the present time this is not being done. If another season passes and this situation prevails, we will either have to find new ways of adding money through contributions or the fund will no longer have any money in it.

Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) made quite a long speech. I see him today sitting in a position that would indicate he may be the assistant to the assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). If so, I wonder whether what he said is a reflection of this government's attitude.

The hon. member pointed out in his speech:

—we have seen once more a demonstration of the complete irresponsibility of the opposition in this house . . . and of their absolute failure to do anything—in fact their determination to do absolutely nothing—to assist in the solving of any problems that might be facing this country.

Our suggestion that we take from the treasury that amount of money which will be calculated on the excess of unemployment over what could be considered to be the original interpretation of the amount of unemployment and put this money back into the fund certainly would not be doing nothing, I suggest, to solve this particular problem.

The hon. member goes on:

> We have heard a barrage of complaints about the unemployment insurance fund being depleted. I think this is a serious problem facing the country and the government has recognized that by indicating its intention to bring forward at this session of parliament amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Here the hon. member is not denying that this is a fact; he is saying the government is going to do something about it. Then he blames the opposition in these words:

> —they have failed completely to offer any suggestions except the one suggestion that they make on all problems that face Canada, that we should print some more money and pay it out of the federal treasury.

I have not heard that suggestion since the Social Credit party left this house. While it is true the hon. member may hear some of these suggestions from hon. members from Alberta in the backbench Conservative ranks, I have not heard it put forward as a solution for replenishing the insurance fund which has been depleted.

The hon. member goes on to say:

> Perhaps if we make a few more printing presses and print money faster we will be able to solve all problems on the basis upon which they want to solve them.

I am not sure who he is talking about there, because I have not heard these suggestions. However, I would suggest he has heard them from some of the backbenchers who follow very closely the Social Credit philosophy. The hon. member goes on to say:

> I am not suggesting more people should not be covered by the act and should benefit, but I hope I have enough responsibility to offer some suggestion as to how this can be brought about other than by printing more money.

I hope he has too. I want to read some of the suggestions he has made. One is:

> The act should be renamed the unemployment compensation act.

I do not understand just what advantage that would have. Then the hon. member suggests:

> Every person in the labour force who is employed under a contract of service should contribute to the fund regardless of income or occupation.

Here we have the solution of the Conservative party for solving the depletion of the unemployment insurance fund. They say, "Throw everybody into it. Let us no longer make it an insurance fund. Let us not have any risk involved in it at all. Let us throw everybody in, particularly those who could not be unemployed".

I suggest these people under a contract of service are the armed services, and certainly the civil service, because the hon. member goes on to mention the civil service. These are people who are not normally unemployed at all. They say, "Throw everyone into the unemployment insurance fund". This was the suggestion made by many hon. members in the industrial relations committee when the act was before that committee on a previous occasion. They said, "Throw everybody into it. They cannot possibly benefit from it, but we will get from them all the contributions we can".

What did they say about the Liberal government when they built up a huge fund? They said, "This is not fair; it is not in keeping with the insurance principle. This is not the way to do it". Now, when we find we have much greater unemployment, unemployment that really is not of a casual nature and which is draining the fund, they say, "Let us throw in a lot of people who could not possibly qualify for the benefits of this fund. Let us collect from them; let us collect from people who cannot possibly get any benefits".

This seems to be the solution put forward by these hon. members, and what is more dishonest than asking people to pay into an insurance plan who could not possibly receive any benefit out of it. No wonder the hon. member is honest enough to say, before he suggests this, that the name of the act should be changed. He says, "We will not call it an insurance plan any longer; we will rename the act the unemployment compensation act".

That is exactly what it will be. These people who are employed will be compensating the government and helping it maintain those people who are unemployed. This is not my interpretation of what an unemployment insurance act should be. This is not the interpretation I take from similar acts in other countries, where they consider the unemployment insurance principle to be a very important one for alleviating temporary, seasonal and casual unemployment which is not a major catastrophe, in an economic sense, in terms of having a large segment of the population unemployed, not through seasonal lay-offs but because of an economic condition which does not provide work for those who seek work.

The hon. member goes on:

> This has been extended to a complaint about the failure of the government to consider the reimbursement of the fund.

Why should not the government reimburse the fund? The situation is of the government's making, and I do not suggest it would be done only by a Conservative government. It would probably have been done by a Liberal government. It certainly would not be done by a C.C.F. government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: There will never be such a thing.

Mr. Kucherepa: That could never happen.

Mr. Peters: If the hon. member wants to make a speech I will be quite happy to curtail my remarks so that he can rise and make it. He never makes a speech except from his seat, and it sounds like it.

The new expert on the unemployment insurance fund, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, goes on to say:

> The situation which has arisen at the present time makes it impossible to administer it properly, and with the paying out within the terms of the act that is being done, nothing could happen to the fund but its depletion.

I do not want to go into all the financial charges that have been made, because I am inclined to believe the minister who said this afternoon that there would have been little difference in the financial arrangements no matter what government had been in power, because there had been only one change in the staff which administers this act. I presume the minister meant the administration of the financial aspects of it. While it certainly has not been advantageous it is not necessarily the responsibility of this government.

The hon. member points out:

> The situation which has arisen at the present time makes it impossible to administer it properly—

Again, what he is saying is that you cannot administer the Unemployment Insurance Act properly if you have not more money going into it than is going out of it, and because we have not made the arrangements which he is suggesting by bringing in all the people who could not possibly find themselves in the position of being unemployed, we are not properly arranging matters. The fund is being depleted at the present time precisely because we are carrying people it was not anticipated would be carried when the act was passed. It was not contemplated that they would be carried, because at that time the people believed it was an insurance fund to cover only a limited amount of unemployment of casual or very short duration. The hon. member goes on to say:

> It then becomes a question of how the fund could be built up. The opposition has suggested, as I say, that the federal government should simply contribute a large amount of money to reimburse the fund.

That is not altogether true. The part of the opposition to which I belong, the efficient opposition, does say this, but I do not believe the official opposition has made any such statement that the government should put in the full amount needed.

An hon. Member: We have said that since 1958.

Mr. Peters: In that case I stand corrected. I should only try to speak for that part of the opposition which I represent. The hon. member went on to say:

> Many people now drawing out of the fund should not be drawing out of it, and many people who should be able to qualify to draw out of the fund are not now qualified to draw out of it, nor do they pay into it.

Good heavens, why should they draw out of it if they do not pay into it? This is an insurance fund, not a charity organization. It is not a dole. If they do not pay into it, why should they draw out? Sometimes we hear complaints from people who pay into it but who are nevertheless not eligible to draw out of the fund, and these are justifiable complaints. I hear occasionally suggestions from my constituents that because they have paid into the fund for many years and received no benefits from it they should be entitled to pay at a reduced rate as one does in the case of car insurance when there have been no claims. There is some merit in that idea.

As to that statement by the hon. member that many people who should be able to qualify to draw out of the fund are not now qualified to draw out of it, I hope that is not the impression which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) holds. I hope the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is speaking for himself, because this suggestion would mean the end of the fund and would put many people on the dole. There used to be a dole. That is how it was done in days gone by. Money was contributed by the federal government and they paid workers during the depression 20 cents a day to build airports all over the country; those engaged on building roads received a packet of tobacco once a week. This was a contribution by the federal government.

We are suggesting now that the government should make a much more substantial contribution in the form of a payment to the fund to compensate only for that portion of the outgoing which was not anticipated when the fund was set up originally on an actuarial basis. Present economic conditions—the recession, the depression, call it what you will—which now exist, are not the responsibility of the unemployed people of Canada but the responsibility of the government and, in a way, of the people as a whole because everyone in this country, really, in the last analysis, constitutes the government and should take the responsibility of replenishing the fund. As the head of the insurance branch indicated two years ago, approximately $500,000 would be considered a safe and sensible sum, though, of course, conditions have changed since then.

The suggestions to which I have referred are not the only suggestions which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway made. It would appear to me that the hon. member had done considerable research and that he might even have consulted with the Minister of Labour before taking part in the debate. I should like to know whether the government approves the suggestion. The hon. member goes on to say:

> There are some groups, such as civil servants, who are not included under the act. I believe they should be.

I have already pointed out that this was the consensus of opinion among many members of the Conservative party on the industrial relations committee when the act was revised on an earlier occasion. The hon. member continues:

> The provinces can use their discretion as to which of their employees shall be subject to the provisions of the act and, of course, they follow the policy of insuring those people who are temporary employees and who are almost certain to draw benefit at one time or another. I feel, therefore, that these classes of employees are not bearing their share of the cost of unemployment insurance.

Well, if they are not, the hon. member should report them to the commission and I am sure they will cease to get the benefits.

Mr. Thrasher: The hon. member has completely missed the point.

Mr. Peters: You cannot sort them out, and the hon. member is either talking from ignorance of the situation or he is talking out of both sides of his mouth in discussing civil servants and their position with regard to the fund. If they are all going to be in it, that is okay. That is the suggestion the hon. member makes. But if he is going to suggest that we should let the temporary ones be permanent and still not draw benefits, then I think even his colleagues would disagree with him.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been quoting from the remarks I made in this debate, taking them out of context and completely misinterpreting them. Now they are becoming confused with the comments which the hon. member himself is making. I think he should be required to make his own speeech.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member thinks he is being misinterpreted I will give him an opportunity to speak later on.

Mr. Peters: Well, this speech lends itself to misinterpretation. I hope I am not doing that—

An hon. Member: Make your own speech.

Mr. Peters: It is more fun rehashing this one, because these are new ideas and they are ideas which are being put forward by a backbencher in the Conservative party. I should like to know what is the position of the government with regard to them. Is the government going to adopt these views, or throw them out? Many of them, I submit, should be throw out but some of them may be of consequence and deserving of consideration by the government. It is for this reason I wish to refer to them.

Mr. Broome: Why not try to put forward some constructive ideas, too?

Mr. Peters: I presume that in discussing these matters we are raising constructive arguments. They are either worthy of some consideration or of no consideration. If they warrant no consideration, then, in bringing them to the attention of the house, we are helping to make sure that that is exactly what they will get. If they warrant some constructive consideration, they may receive that also. The hon. member goes on to say:

> If the federal government is going to contribute huge sums to the unemployment insurance fund, as they suggest, we would be taking the money out of general taxation. Among those contributing to its payment would then be persons in receipt of old age pensions and elderly people who could not possibly receive any benefit from the fund and who therefore, I submit, have no reason to be paying into it.

If they are paying into the fund apparently they are employed, and because they are receiving an old age pension they should not be prevented from receiving the benefits. Presumably they are receiving the old age pension because they have reached the age of 70.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member should not be permitted to twist my words as he has been doing since he started.

Mr. Speaker: I take it the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) is referring to the viewpoint expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) and endeavouring to counter that viewpoint in the debate. If he is improperly quoting the hon. member, that would be ground for complaint. However, as I have indicated, the hon. member will have the opportunity of correcting any misinterpretation of his speech, to which he takes exception, at the end of the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): If the hon. member wishes to quote my remarks from Hansard and gives the reference, I have no objection, but I do not believe he should be allowed to give his interpretation of what I said and use that for his own purposes. I presume he has been quoting from Hansard, as he has held a copy in his hand and has purported to read from it, but he should not be allowed to make these twisted statements in portraying what I actually said.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is quoting he should give the reference and should of course use the exact words. I think the point is well taken in this regard. There has been some doubt when the hon. member was quoting and when he was not quoting.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I hope I have quoted the exact wording. I did not indicate where I was quoting when I commenced, but I am sure the hon. member will have little difficulty in finding his remarks. They appear at page 4518 of Hansard for May 8, 1961.

I was commenting on his statement—

Mr. Drysdale: You should say "I am quoting"—

Mr. Peters: I am not quoting. Mr. Speaker, I will use the quotation again. It appears in Hansard at page 4518 as I have indicated. He is reported there as saying:

> Among those contributing to its payments would then be persons in receipt of old age pensions and elderly people who could not possibly receive any benefit from the fund and who therefore, I submit have no reason to be paying into it.

What he is saying is that if an individual is receiving the old age pension, that individual should not be working. However, I suggest that an individual who is working, whether receiving the old age pension or not, must make contributions to this fund by law, and having made contributions, is entitled to receive the benefit. I do not feel that the old age pension has any relation to the unemployment insurance fund. Old age pensions are social benefits given to individuals who have reached the age of 70 years regardless of whether or not they are capable of working.

The hon. member then is reported as follows:

> I submit that we have to amend the act in such a way as to protect those who need protection and provide for them for as long as they need such assistance without regard to the number of contributions they have made to the fund.

I do not understand that statement at all. The hon. member suggests that we should not relate the benefit period to the amount of contribution. In that event any Tom, Dick or Harry, such as a young chap out of school who works for perhaps one week and then not again for the rest of his life would be able to benefit under this fund even though he has made no further contribution to it. Is that what the hon. member is suggesting? If it is, I think it is a ridiculous suggestion. If this is what is meant by amendments proposed to this act we will be here much later than June or July because I will never agree to that type of change.

Mr. Drysdale: You are limited by the rules.

Mr. Peters: I am well aware what the rules and privileges are.

I would like to read one further statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, as reported at page 4518 of Hansard in the second column. That statement reads as follows:

> However, I do believe there are many married women drawing money out of the fund who have absolutely no need to do so. It is very difficult to establish whether or not married women are actually looking for jobs. This is one of the things, which in my view, is helping to drain the fund. Certainly, it is beyond the ability of government to control this practice by way of administration; an amendment of the act is required in order to deal with things of this nature.

The fact that a woman is married or not seems to me, and apparently as well to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), not to be the criterion governing whether the individual should or should not draw from the unemployment insurance fund. The hon. member would have been well advised to have listened to the Minister of Labour this afternoon. If he had I am sure he would have taken the opportunity of correcting his misinterpretation. I say that presuming that he purported to speak on behalf of the party with which he is associated.

The minister said this afternoon that the act was changed in such a way as to give equality to women, and that this government would not discriminate against women in respect of the benefits of the fund. The minister is to be congratulated on making that very fair and welcome commitment this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, before the recess I had been commenting on some of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) to solve the problems respecting the unemployment insurance fund. In that regard I should like to quote what the hon. member had to say in concluding his speech. As found on page 4521 of Hansard, he said:

> It is no use condemning perpetually. They always seem to be against something.

He was speaking of the official opposition.

> I have not heard a helpful suggestion come from them during the whole time I have been here.

I am reviewing some of the suggestions made by the hon. member in relation to the fund and what he would consider, I presume, to be solutions for the problems raised by the depletion of the reserves in the fund, which has dropped drastically since the government came into office. As I pointed out before the recess, this afternoon the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) in a very clear and concise manner answered the charge made by the hon. member in this statement, as found on page 4518 of Hansard:

> However, I do believe there are many married women drawing money out of the fund who have absolutely no need to do so.

The Minister of Labour commented on that suggestion and pointed out quite rightly that the government had established equality of opportunity for women, whether married or otherwise, in relation to the fund, and I think nothing further needs to be said about that. However, the next suggestion by the hon. member was, I think, a rather interesting one and warrants some consideration. I quote from the same page:

> Another cause of huge drains on the fund is the action of people who retire at the age of 65 and who then feel qualified to draw from the fund for 52 weeks. Though they only represent 3 per cent of the claims on the fund they are responsible for 10 per cent of the money paid out.

This seems to me to be an unusual statement. In analysing it, it is very difficult to tell whether or not the hon. member is opposed to these people retiring at 65 or is opposed to them qualifying because of the fact they have made contributions to the fund and as a result will get some benefits for a full year and will have some means of supporting themselves. This raises the problem of what happens to these people who have obtained benefits until they are 66 through this method of supplementing their income when no jobs are available to them. What happens to them between that age and the age of 70 when they are qualified to apply for assistance in another form? These people may only represent 3 per cent of the claims but apparently the hon. member wants to change the act and take away the benefit that accrues to these people who all their lives have paid into the fund and take advantage of the only opportunity they have to gain access to the benefits of the fund. I do not think they should be eliminated.

The hon. member went on to say, as found on page 4519 of Hansard:

> ...he indicated that in his view—

He is referring to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud):

> —the reason that the unemployment insurance fund had been depleted was that there was a high number of claimants drawing benefits from the fund. With that statement I certainly agree. He did not blame the condition of the fund on the high unemployment particularly, as the sub-amendment does; he simply blamed it on the high number of claimants drawing from the fund. I think this is an accurate statement and a complete denial of the amendment which he subsequently moved.

This is a very interesting statement, Mr. Speaker. What is being said is that the substantial unemployment situation did not result in the large number of claims but that the claims were coming from some other source or were being made by people who were abusing the fund. He is saying that the number of people who are abusing the fund are much more numerous than the number of unemployed, that the high rate of unemployment did not have this effect but rather that it resulted from the actions of those who abuse the fund. The hon. member went on to say:

> I believe, as I had started to indicate before the dinner recess, that there are a number of reasons why there are a high number of claimants under the act. We have the case of married women.

He went on to say:

> In most instances it was also shown that they had husbands who were working full-time and for that reason there really was not any necessity for their drawing funds under the act.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Does the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway wish to pursue the point of explanation he raised earlier?

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the eight minutes that remain I must, of course, confine myself to one aspect of this debate and that is the subject of the investment of the funds of the commission. In this short time I shall endeavour to correct some of the welter of errors and distortions which have marked many of the speeches made by opposition members in the course of this debate.

There is nothing very new in what they have said. You will find that nearly all of it was said on June 16 and 17, 1959, in this house. The provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act with regard to investment are direct and brief. Section 85 requires the Minister of Finance to invest all of the moneys to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund not required for the purposes of the act, in obligations of or guaranteed by the government of Canada. Section 20 sets up an investment committee composed of one person nominated by the Minister of Labour, who is the assistant deputy minister, one person nominated by the Minister of Finance, who is the deputy minister, and the governor of the Bank of Canada. It provides that investment transactions under section 85 shall be made only on the authorization of that investment committee.

This is the same investment committee, Mr. Speaker, with one exception, that was in office when the present government came into power. It is in relation to the duties of investment a highly competent committee and there has at no time been any interference on the part of the government with the investment activities of the investment committee.

As to the policy followed by that committee, Mr. Speaker, it has been clear from the beginning. There were two objects in view. The first was to distribute the investments among all sectors of the market, and this was particularly important when the fund grew to a substantial size. The other purpose was to earn interest. While the fund was increasing it was the policy of the investment committee to spread the portfolio more or less in equal thirds between short term, mid-term, and long term bonds. When the fund began to decline it was the policy of the investment committee to sell bonds in a manner that resulted in only moderate capital losses.

Up to March 31, 1957, the total interest earned by the fund was about $223 million, or an average yield of just under 3 per cent per annum. Throughout that period short term rates, that is, on bonds two years and under, varied between one half and three quarters of the unemployment insurance commission's actual average yield. Had the investment committee confined its portfolio to short term bonds the interest earnings of the fund would have been about 40 per cent less than they actually were; and if one adds interest earnings on interest earned the fund at March 31, 1957, would have been at least $100 million less than it was.

In managing a fund of over $800 million, it would be impossible to sell hundreds of millions of mid and long term bonds into the market and buy in their place hundreds of millions of shorts without completely disorganizing the bond market. As the fund began to decline the policy of the committee was to sell in to the market in an orderly manner those issues which from time to time yielded the smallest capital losses.

Over the past four years the capital losses have been less than $30 million, or less than one third of the gain to the fund from having built up and maintained a balanced portfolio.

It would have been impossible to expect this debate would run its course without some mention by hon. members opposite of the conversion loan. Of course, they distorted the facts there, too. Let me make four points with regard to this matter.

First, of the fifth and sixth 3 per cent victory loans maturing in 1959 and 1960, the fund had held a total of $89 million. These were converted into 3 per cent's of 1961. These bonds were sold between November 16, 1959 and March 4, 1960 at a net capital loss of $3,587,509. Had the victory loan issues been unconverted, and had the bonds still outstanding been sold subsequently at the time the 1961's were sold, there would have been a capital loss of $1,449,505 and in addition there was a cash credit adjustment on the conversion of $648,874.62, making a net over-all loss due to the conversion of just $1,489,129.38.

Second, of the seventh 3 per cent victory loan maturing in 1962, the fund held $63 million which were converted into $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent bonds of 1965. These were sold between December 9, 1959 and April 4, 1960 at a capital loss of $5,737,937.50. Had the 1962's been unconverted they would have been sold at a loss of $2,167,325. The net additional book loss arising from the conversion was thus $3,570,612.50; but there was a gain in interest earnings of $691,515.63 and a cash adjustment of $626,850, so the net loss was only $2,252,246.87.

Third, of the eighth and ninth 3 per cent victory loans the fund held $154 million and these were converted into $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent bonds of 1972. These were sold in 1958, 1959 and 1960 at a capital loss of $9,495,211.25. Had they not been converted but had been sold at the same time as the 1972's there would have been a capital loss of $8,847,947. The net additional book loss arising out of the conversion was thus $647,264.25; but there was a gain in interest of $2,093,969.77 and a cash adjustment of $319,800, so there was an over-all gain of $1,766,505.52 to the fund.

Fourth, thus the total over-all loss to the fund arising out of the conversion operation was about $1,974,870.73 out of a total holding of $306 million or about one half of 1 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order; it being 8.15 o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to section 3(d) of standing order 56, as provisionally amended, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the questions now before the house.

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF BANK OF CANADA REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss a grievance which affects every member of this house, and which indeed affects the rights of parliament, involving the obligations of members of parliament in the performance of their duties.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), a few weeks ago, tabled the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada, and that report dealt with the most fundamental questions facing Canada, particularly in so far as domestic problems are concerned. The report of the governor of the Bank of Canada deals with a number of matters and among these, of course, are the economic problems facing Canada at this time, and particularly the solutions which the governor of the Bank of Canada envisages in his program as a solution to unemployment in Canada. The key to his thinking in this regard is to be found at page 4 of that report where, in the second last paragraph he says:

> Economic developments have not been of such a character as to raise employment in step with the increase in the labour force.

The governor goes on, and I now refer to the press release which accompanied his report, to point out, among other things, that throughout the last few years unemployment trended upward on a steeper slope in Canada than in the United States. At another point he said that large scale unemployment is an indication of the failure on the part of all of us collectively to make the most effective use of the resources of modern technology and social organization at our disposal in Canada.

Then he asks what are the best measures to take and how is the cost of these measures to be shared by the various groups and individuals that make up our national community?

The Bank of Canada Act is one of the important legislative enactments of this country. It determines the authority of the governor of the Bank of Canada, and sets out the limitations on the functions of the governor of the bank. It establishes the authority of the bank in the formulation of monetary policy. The relevant sections in that connection are to be found in subsection 2, section 20; subsection 1, section 27; and subsection 3, section 18, of the Bank of Canada Act.

We are told by the government that it is anxious to expedite the public business, notwithstanding the delays for which it is essentially responsible. But we have not had from the Minister of Finance any indication of his desire to see to it that members of this house are given an opportunity of discussing the report of the Bank of Canada in the presence of the governor of the bank himself. The Minister of Finance in another context, when charged with some responsibility for monetary policy in Canada, has said that is the responsibility which exclusively resides in the office of the governor of the Bank of Canada. While he did not recite the pertinent sections of the Bank of Canada Act as his authority, the fact is that parliament has given to the governor of the Bank of Canada responsibility for the formulation of monetary policy. Thus far the statement of the Minister of Finance and the position I take and which is taken by this party are in accord.

The minister, of course, goes one step further and says that because parliament gives the governor of the Bank of Canada responsibility for the formulation of monetary policy he, the Minister of Finance, and the government of which he is a member have no responsibility whatsoever for the consequences of the exercise by the governor of the Bank of Canada of his undoubted legal power in the formulation of monetary policy. We of course take the position that the government of the day under our system of government is responsible for all policy of any emanation of the crown, whether it be through authority exercised directly by parliament or indirectly by delegation from the government to a particular official, to a crown company or to any other instrumentality whatsoever.

But having in mind the position that the government takes through the Minister of Finance that it has nothing to do with monetary policy whatsoever, a mistaken position, the government is derelict in the performance of its duty in denying to parliament the opportunity of examining in detail the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada. There can be no discharging of that responsibility merely by a budget debate, by a set series of speeches in which the Minister of Finance discusses debt management, financial policy and indirectly comments, if he wishes, on monetary policy.

There can be no excuse whatsoever, it seems to me, for the government of the day taking the position that if the authority of the governor of the Bank of Canada is exclusive in this matter parliament should be denied the right of examining the report of the Bank of Canada, particularly when it deals with matters of such fundamental concern to this nation as unemployment and economic conditions generally in our country.

Part of my grievance, sir, arises out of Your Honour's interpretation of our procedures, and I do not quarrel with that interpretation. That is not the purpose of this present intervention. But Your Honour has ruled that it is not open to a private member of the house to move to have the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada be placed before the banking and commerce committee or any other committee of the house. You have so ruled and we have abided by that ruling. In spite of this, attempts have been made through other devices to try to get the report before the banking and commerce committee.

I asked the chairman of the banking and commerce committee the other day when that committee was going to meet, obviously for the purpose of giving those of us who take this position an opportunity in that committee of asking the committee to determine on a course involving a reference to the house for the necessary authority to examine this report and, if so agreed and if need be, to examine the governor of the Bank of Canada. The chairman of the banking and commerce committee, the hon. member for York North (Mr. Cathers), said he would take notice of my question but so far we have had no indication from him when the banking and commerce committee is going to meet.

Likewise, realizing that there was a procedural difficulty and bearing in mind the assertion of the Minister of Finance that this was a responsibility which the governor of the Bank of Canada owed only to parliament and not to the government, we have sought at various times during the course of the present session to obtain from the Minister of Finance his co-operation in having the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada referred to the committee on banking and commerce. This was done on April 27 when I asked the Minister of Finance if it was the intention of the government to move to refer the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada to the standing committee on banking and commerce or to any other committee of the house. The Minister of Finance replied as found on page 4042 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, following the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, I really can see no advantage to parliament or to the public in that course.

That is the Minister of Finance who says he has no responsibility for monetary policy. This is a matter that concerns parliament, he says, and whatever authority the governor of the Bank of Canada has he has it from parliament directly and not through the government or the Minister of Finance. Yet, having taken that position, the Minister of Finance says, "I really can see no advantage to parliament or to the public in that course", as if it was the responsibility of the Minister of Finance to determine the collective judgment of parliament.

We ask the Minister of Finance and the government to let parliament decide whether it is in the public interest to take this course, and if ever there was a government that should not hesitate to accept this suggestion it is a government that has dedicated itself, according to its own admission, to the championing of the rights of parliament. Imagine a government that says it respects the rights of parliament as other governments have not and at the same time allowing this Minister of Finance to say that he sees no advantage to parliament or to the public interest in having the Bank of Canada report referred to a committee of the house, specifically the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Benidickson: A somersault from 1956 and 1957.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River says it is a somersault from 1956 and 1957. This is one further example of the way in which this government's actions are inconsistent with its professed idealism about human rights and the rights of parliament. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) believes in the rights of parliament as he says, if he really believes in the philosophy behind the bill of rights, why does he sit there next to the Minister of Finance and not give to parliament its responsibility which the Minister of Finance says belongs to it alone? In defence of my last observation the Prime Minister has a synthetic good humour displayed all over his face. The Prime Minister's conduct and that of the Minister of Finance in this and in so many other matters establish beyond doubt that there has never been a more arrogant and ineffective government than the government that now faces us.

But, Mr. Speaker, on April 27 the Deputy Speaker construed the words of the Minister of Finance as not implying that there was no advantage to parliament or to the public interest in that course. He interpreted the words of the Minister of Finance as every member of the house did and certainly as I did when he said, as found on page 4043 of Hansard:

> Unless I am mistaken, the Minister of Finance has already indicated he does not consider this suggestion to be in the public interest.

Imagine the Minister of Finance using words which Mr. Deputy Speaker interpreted as saying that the Minister of Finance is of the view that it is not in the public interest to have the annual report of the Bank of Canada referred to the banking and commerce committee for careful scrutiny. Yet we have a Minister of Finance who, in defence of freedom in this house, paraded himself from the Speaker's chair to the entrance of the house, draped in the symbol of his professed love of liberty and of the rights of a free parliament. In spite of this, he will take no step, as Minister of Finance, to allow a committee of this house to examine the most important report placed on the table of this house since this session began, a report which deals with matters in which the governor of the Bank of Canada takes issue with the position taken by the government.

This, however, does not in any way relieve the government from taking a procedural step which is in accordance with the best parliamentary traditions and is in accordance with the rights of this house, namely to examine this report by the governor of the Bank of Canada, to determine whether or not the positions which he has publicly assumed bear any relationship when they are contrasted against the policies of the government.

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Brunsden: Is he prepared to accept the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada as the official view of the opposition?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that what I want to do is to find out whether this report does offer a solution for the most important single problem in our country, about which the government is doing very little, that is the problem of unemployment. The governor of the Bank of Canada has said that this nation has the capacity to resolve the problem of unemployment. This is fact No. 1. Fact No. 2 is that we have over 700,000 people out of work. The government is not resorting to policies which the governor of the Bank of Canada believes are capable of mitigating this problem. It is because I want to examine the governor of the Bank of Canada, and so do other members of the Liberal party, to ascertain whether or not there are solutions within the context outlined by the governor of the Bank of Canada in this report and certain public speeches, that I want the report referred to a committee. I say that is the right of every hon. member in this house.

There has been some talk about the rights of parliament in connection with this matter. The Minister of Finance was pressed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) on April 27, Mr. Speaker, when he put this question to him as reported at page 4043 of Hansard:

> ...may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he considers it not to be in the public interest to refer the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada to the banking and commerce committee of this house.

Those were the words of the Leader of the Opposition, "does the minister not consider it in the public interest;" and I will read the reply of the Minister of Finance, this little man who, as I said, carried across his shoulders the symbol of the rights of a free parliament and a free people. This is what he said when speaking to this parliament made up of the elected representatives of the people:

> Mr. Speaker, this is the third time this question has been asked in the house this afternoon.

We all remember how he seemed fatigued, how irritated he was when he began this soliloquy.

> I repeat the answer I gave to the question when it was asked the first time by the hon. member for Essex East, and I simply add to that answer the observation that I think will be generally shared by all hon. members of the house and the public, namely that hon. members opposite, in either examination or cross-examination of the governor of the bank, could not do half as good a job as the senators did.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that may or may not be the case. What I am saying to the Minister of Finance is that he preferred to allow the other place in parliament, made up of ladies and gentlemen who are not elected by the people, to have the opportunity of examining a report which he denies to the elected representatives of the people in this house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Rot and drivel.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No display of histrionics on the part of my friend the Minister of Finance will justify that course or will justify the refusal by him, in the name of the government, to refer this report to the banking and commerce committee or to any other appropriate committee of this house.

This is not the whole story, Mr. Speaker. On March 21, 1961, as recorded at page 3171 of Hansard, the Leader of the Opposition asked this question:

Mr. Speaker, in view of the great interest that has been aroused by statements of the governor of the Bank of Canada I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can see any reason why the governor should not be asked to appear before the banking and commerce committee which is now in session.

The Prime Minister replied as follows:

Mr. Speaker, questions like that are for the determination of the appropriate committee and decision by such committee.

Compare that answer with the statement of the Minister of Finance that he could see no good reason why, in the public interest, that particular course should be followed.

Then, I followed with this question:

I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. In the event that the banking and commerce committee should decide to summon the governor of the bank, would the Minister of Finance, because of his relationship with the governor, provide any obstacle to acceptance on the part of the governor?

The Minister of Finance replied as follows:

The Minister of Finance does not create obstacles at any time in the way of doing anything that is proper—

Does the Minister of Finance say that this is an improper request? Does the Minister of Finance say that a request by the Liberal opposition in this house, supported by the other opposition group in this house, for an examination of this report by the banking and commerce committee is improper? If he does, let him say so right now. I dare the Minister of Finance to say that it is not in the interests of good government to examine the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada. The Prime Minister continues to laugh. The Prime Minister by that laugh indicates the real character of his bill of rights in so far as his sponsorship is concerned.

Mr. Harkness: We are laughing at your histrionics.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister's synthetic interest in parliament is now apparent. If he believes in the rights of parliament, let him now, as leader of the government, get up and say, "Of course, it is a proper thing for a report of this kind to be sent to the banking and commerce committee." Let the Prime Minister take that course. If he sits silently in his seat, we can only judge him as having used this other instrument not for the purpose really intended by enactment but for the purpose of seeking to give to the Canadian people an impression which is not justified under the circumstances.

Then, on December 8, 1960, we have the Minister of Finance intervening in a speech by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), as reported at page 610 of Hansard. The hon. member for Assiniboia said:

Since the whole question of central bank policy has been raised by those economists, would it be the intention of the government to refer the annual report of the Bank of Canada to the banking and commerce committee so that we could hear witnesses on this whole question, including the governor?

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to listen to these words of wisdom by the Minister of Finance and contrast them with some of the earlier observations he made:

Mr. Speaker, if and when suitable committees of the house are appointed for the purpose and after the receipt of the annual report of the governor, I presume then it would be a matter for decision on the part of the house. The annual report of the governor normally reaches the Minister of Finance in late March.

In the light of the statement which was made during a speech of a member of the party sitting immediately to Mr. Speaker's left, I say to the Minister of Finance that there is now a strong demand in this house by those who confront the government for the right to examine the governor and to examine his report and that, in the face of this statement made by the Minister of Finance on December 8, the government can take no other course but to accede to our request.

An hon. Member: Did you ever do that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We were never asked under these circumstances, but I will say this to my hon. friend. When a demand was made in this house—I think it was in 1956—for the right of the banking and commerce committee to examine the governor of the bank, that examination took place. The governor of the Bank of Canada appeared before the banking and commerce committee and he was interrogated by the present Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and others without any attempt on the part of the administration to restrict the governor of the Bank of Canada in the discharge of what under the laws passed by this house is his clear, legal responsibility. Not only the present governor of the Bank of Canada but Governor Towers appeared before parliamentary committees as a result of the initiative taken by the government of the day. Yet, although there is greater provocation now than there was then because of the position taken by the governor with regard to the solution of our problems, this government refuses to enable us to get over certain procedural hurdles so that this matter can be referred to the banking and commerce committee.

Because there is no opportunity of correcting our procedures and because there is no way by which a private member of this house, unaided by the government, can deal with procedural effectiveness in this regard, one has no other alternative but to rise as I am doing tonight in order to express this grievance. Having in mind what this report contains and having in mind the fact that the governor of the Bank of Canada says he has the solution to the problem of unemployment, I would suggest that there is no greater responsibility presented to us with regard to domestic problems this session than that which is involved in this particular matter.

How can the Minister of Finance take the position that he will not facilitate the members of this house to examine this report? What reason does he give? He says, "I see no advantage". He may not see any advantage. He and the governor of the Bank of Canada have obviously had their differences. I can understand his saying that he cannot see any advantage. However, in the public interest there may be a great advantage because from the governor of the Bank of Canada we may ascertain the details of the kinds of solutions which in general terms he has been expounding throughout the country and indeed which he repeats in this annual report.

It may be that in the examination of these details we shall find that the governor of the Bank of Canada has laid before the government these very details; and that will afford the government an opportunity of explaining, if that is the case, why it has not accepted the proposals of the governor of the Bank of Canada. At any rate, parliament will then not be denied the opportunity of examining carefully a document which it is not only its right to examine but which, under the Bank of Canada Act, section 20, it is its duty to examine.

If the governor of the Bank of Canada is responsible only to parliament for monetary policy, then surely the Minister of Finance cannot take the position he takes. I referred to section 20 of the Bank of Canada Act; I meant section 18 in which the business and the powers of the bank are set out clearly. The Minister of Finance says those powers are given by parliament not to the government but to the governor of the Bank of Canada. The governor of the Bank of Canada, pursuant to that act, makes his report. Yet this government denies us the right which was open to another place to determine the details of this report.

Mr. Jones: I wonder whether the hon. member would inform the house as to his precise position? Is his position that he does not know whether or not he agrees with the governor of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, if there is any other supplementary reason needed for calling the governor of the Bank of Canada before a parliamentary committee, it is to educate such hon. gentlemen as the one who has just put such a question.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the hon. member who has the floor yields it, the hon. member may not ask a question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wish to incorporate as part of my statements a comment made in the Montreal Star relating to this very matter. I refer to an editorial on May 1 in which the editor of the paper states as follows:

> Why, then, would his appearance before this committee be unwise? If Mr. Coyne is free to discuss his theories before clubs and groups across Canada, why should he not be free to discuss them before M.P.'s whose job it is to inquire into major topics of public interest? On the surface at least, the government did not try to restrain Mr. Coyne from his public speech making;—why lower the boom now,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The first part of the quotation seemed to have no reference to acts within this chamber; but as the editorial goes on, it appears that it is reflecting on acts of the government as expressed in this chamber and I would therefore ask the hon. member to refrain from reading further from it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order may I say this. I was incorporating it as my own opinion. However, that is not the point. The point is that this editorial, as I have indicated, expresses a view that the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hear the banging of a desk cover. Is the hon. member having difficulty with his desk?

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member raising a point of order?

Mr. Brunsden: Yes; I am raising a point of order. I was trying to draw from the hon. member for Essex East a little while ago a declaration as to whether he was endorsing the viewpoint of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has a point of order, will he please state it?

Mr. Denis: He has no point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, to efforts made by those who support the government to prevent an exposition—

An hon. Member: An exhibition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —of what I believe will be regarded by those who examine this situation to be on the part of the government a violation not only of the rights of parliament but of the Bank of Canada Act. The responsibility for this course will rest on the government and it will be a responsibility which the Minister of Finance alone will not have to bear. In a country where one of the government's chief functionaries takes the position, as does the governor of the Bank of Canada, that there are solutions to this most serious domestic problem of unemployment, it is shameful that parliament made up of the elected representatives of the people should be denied the opportunity of ascertaining the validity of the submissions which he makes.

We have been denied that opportunity until now. I ask the government to give us that opportunity. If they refuse, then they will stand indicted once more as thwarting positive efforts to try and deal with this serious problem of unemployment.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in my few brief remarks this evening following the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) I should just like to point out one thing. I do not believe the hon. member who has just spoken would recognize sincerity if he saw it, because if there is one thing the Canadian people realize today it is this, that no government in the history of this country has had a greater respect for the rights of parliament than this one.

Mr. Pearson: I have seen no advantage.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member likes to pretend that we have a big, massive, rolling majority. It so happens—as we all realize—that the vote of the Canadian people has placed us here. Certainly the people in my constituency in particular, and I know the people in this country in general, realize that no government has recognized more than this one what are the real rights of parliament. So no sham speech and no sham remarks such as we have heard tonight will convince me, other hon. members of this house or the people of this country, otherwise.

The second comment I should like to make is this. The hon. member for Essex East made a very interesting statement. He said that if the governor of the Bank of Canada were brought before a committee he would do just this; he would ask him specifics, all kinds of specifics. Did the hon. member not read a few of the reports of the meeting of the committee of the other place which occurred a few days ago, when hon. gentlemen of the other place asked the governor of the Bank of Canada persistently for specifics, and these were exactly what the governor of the Bank of Canada said he could not give?

As governor of the Bank of Canada he said he would not, could not and would never, at any time, I should imagine, whether it were in front of a committee of this house or before the public at large, enter into the arena of specific government policy.

I can just see what would happen if the hon. member for Essex East got the governor before such a committee—

Mr. Pickersgill: Why not let us find out?

Mr. Grafftey: —because I was a member of the labour relations committee when the hon. member for Essex East badgered the governor of the Bank of Canada in an unseemly manner to try to drag him into the arena of partisan politics.

Mr. Benidickson: Before $60 million of capital losses were established.

Mr. Grafftey: Time and time again the hon. member for Essex East tried to drag the governor of the Bank of Canada, when he was appearing before the labour relations committee, into the narrow arena of partisan politics. He simply was not successful, and everybody who sat on that committee saw this disgraceful performance.

I suggest the hon. member has already served notice to parliament and to the people of this country as to exactly what he would do if the governor came before such a committee. The hon. member would draw him once again into the arena of narrow partisan politics. Specifics would be asked for, when we have been told they cannot be asked for. I think this is a logical answer to what the hon. member for Essex East seeks.

I should also like to say this. I think all hon. members of this house and the people at large should note well one statement made by the hon. member for Essex East, who said he was speaking for his party at large. The hon. member said, and perhaps I agree with him, that the government is responsible for the policy and the acts of all emanations of the crown. This is a very interesting statement made by the hon. member for Essex East and it is one I think it would be well for us to remember in future debates on other aspects of government policy.

I can only say this. The rights of parliament are being adhered to by this government and I think all hon. members of this house realize that the governor of the Bank of Canada cannot be dragged into partisan, political debate where specifics which cannot be asked would be requested. I think this is where the test of sincerity lies.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by assuring the minister that I have no intention of denying him adequate time to reply to the particular grievance that has been raised. However, I must rise to support the grievance raised by the latest candidate for the new party leadership, namely the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I consider it—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. member permit me to point out—

An hon. Member: Don't be hasty.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that the Liberal party is indeed the "new" party.

Mr. Regier: I know that the hon. member who raised the objection is not referring to the Liberal party of the past. However, as I indicated earlier, I consider it an insult to the sovereignty of parliament when the man who is the governor of the Bank of Canada is denied the opportunity to meet with a committee of this parliament and yet has to appear before a committee of the other place. The other place, as has already been pointed out, consists of appointed people and it is not representative of the Canadian people in that its members have not been elected by the Canadian people.

To me the money supply of a country is almost identical to the blood supply in our bodies. If the bloodstream is inadequate or is diseased there is very little that can be done until this has been remedied. There is a feeling all over Canada that present monetary policy is not meeting the needs of the nation. I believe it is high time the operations of the Bank of Canada were subjected to a review by the banking and commerce committee or a specially appointed committee of this house, if the government so desires. This committee should have the chance to examine the opinions of the officials of the Bank of Canada and their reports.

The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) attempted to make a great point of the fact that the governor of the Bank of Canada is unable or would refuse to answer specific questions. I cannot buy that argument at all, because the governor of the Bank of Canada is an employee of the people of Canada and he is accountable for all his actions to the elected representatives of the people of Canada.

I should like to know what is the hidden mystery that must remain hidden at all costs at this time; why this government should refuse to reveal to the public and to the representatives of the public exactly what is happening in the field of monetary policy.

We have been told so many times by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that he is not responsible for the activities of the Bank of Canada. I deny that assertion of his; I deny it most vehemently, because the Minister of Finance, according to the terms of the Bank of Canada Act, is the sole owner of the Bank of Canada on behalf of the people of Canada. The Minister of Finance is certainly responsible for each and every activity of the Bank of Canada. However, even assuming that the minister's assumption was adequate and accurate and that the Bank of Canada is responsible not to the government but to parliament, in the same breath the minister by his actions is denying the right of parliament to examine this organization which, he claims, is responsible to parliament. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman in what way is the Bank of Canada responsible to parliament if parliament is denied the right to examine its operations? Is this bank to operate in a vacuum, in a world of its own? It is not responsible to him, he claims, and at the same time he refuses to allow it to become the responsibility of parliament.

I should like to meet with officials of the bank in the banking and commerce committee. I should like to hear their report and their opinions with regard to exactly what happened in connection with the bond conversion deal, a deal which was primarily responsable for increasing interest rates on all public indebtedness in Canada by over 2 per cent since this government took office. I should like to have the opinion of the management of the Bank of Canada in this regard. It must be remembered that an increase of 2 per cent is not a small matter; it is not a consideration to be lightly dismissed. Assuming an indebtedness on the part of public bodies of $20 million a year, an increase of 2 per cent means an added burden of $400,000 to the taxpayers of Canada. Assuming, further that over-all indebtedness in Canada including that of government runs to approximately $200 million, an increase of 2 per cent adds a burden to our cost of production and to our consumer prices of over $4 million a year. I should like to have the opportunity to ask the authorities of the Bank of Canada whether or not this bond conversion deal was really urgent and necessary at the time it was undertaken.

We now have another proposal offered by the government, namely the proposal that the government ought to dump on the money market $750 million worth of mortgage paper that it owns. If this has to be discounted at 10 per cent in order to make it marketable it may mean a loss to the Canadian taxpayer of $75 million. I should like to ask the opinion of the governor of the Bank of Canada as to what the effect might be of the government unloading on to the money market $750 million worth of securities. I should also like to ask the governor of the Bank of Canada what he thinks of a reported claim on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) as appears in the Globe and Mail of Monday last—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has departed from the grievance. The grievance has nothing to do with reported claims.

Mr. Regier: I was only attempting to support the grievance and to express my opinion as to why we ought to be able to interview the governor of the Bank of Canada. I meant to read out a statement which was made last weekend by the Prime Minister having to do with monetary policy. I was about to place that on the record and show why I would welcome the opinion of the governor of the bank with respect to it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may illustrate his reasons for thinking that the governor of the bank should be brought before a committee of the house for examination but he is not at liberty to go into all the matters that might be raised during an examination. If we allowed all those matters to be debated there would be no limit to the grievance. The grievance is a narrow and succinct matter and the hon. member must confine himself to it.

Mr. Regier: I must accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I will gladly do so though I have never heard before of our being denied the right to give reasons as to why we support an argument.

Money supply in a nation is similar to the blood supply in a human body. We do not know on any real authority whether this country can afford a further expansion of the money supply. We are being denied expert knowledge in relation to this important subject. We are being denied information as to whether or not anti-inflation measures would have to accompany any expansion of the monetary supply. We have no access to guidance as to what those measures might be and which measures would be advisable. We seem to be following a policy which, I believe, has proved to be a complete failure, namely, that a nation is able to borrow itself into eternal prosperity. This, in my books, does not add up.

I know we have lived on this particular theory ever since 1945 but I contend that no nation is able to create money by using its printing presses; money which is, therefore, worthless and inflationary. I also contend that no nation can continue to borrow itself into prosperity forever, because eventually the day of reckoning comes. I believe the government of the day may be somewhat unfortunate in that it happens to be in office at the present time when the day of reckoning is arriving at long last. I should like to have the Bank of Canada tell us whether it considers that it is inadequate to handle its basic assignment unless it is also given complete authority over credit sales as well as over currency. I should also like to ask whether in its opinion the insurance and investment houses of Canada ought not to be brought under the broad jurisdiction of the bank along with the chartered banks.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has regaled us this evening—I think that is the word—by one of his champion matinee performances. This kind of performance, on first hearing, is very impressive. The second time it is moderately impressive. The third time, less impressive; the fourth time, still less impressive, the fifth time unimpressive, the sixth and succeeding times a little difficult to listen to by reason of infinite repetition. The hon. member should vary his act a little once in a while, give a little fresh flavour to it. It would make his performance a little more interesting, if I might make that suggestion to him. The typical mood in this burlesque performance is that of synthetic indignation.

Bank of Canada Report

Mr. Speaker, you will remember the story from the public school reader of years ago about the boy who cried wolf, wolf, wolf so often that the people ceased to pay any attention to him. I think the hon. member for Essex East has long since passed that position. As a matter of fact, as a demonstration of synthetic indignation, as an attempt to whip up an issue where he well knows there is no justification for an issue or for the attacks he has made, one can say his performance tonight was of the ersatz variety.

It is interesting also that the hon. member for Essex East, apart from being the opposition critic on numerous matters such as health and welfare and—

Mr. Brunsden: Agriculture.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and agriculture, has now evidently taken the position of opposition critic on monetary policy.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. gentleman is raising a new grievance. There are other members who wish to speak on the grievance raised by the hon. member for Essex East, but apparently the grievance of the hon. gentleman, who is speaking now, has regard to the conduct of the hon. member for Essex East, and while many of us would find that subject very entertaining to speak on—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I suggest that the ordinary rules of the house should apply to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) as they are applied to other hon. members of the house, and that the minister should either speak on the grievance raised by the hon. member for Essex East or give the floor to someone who may wish to do so.

Mr. Speaker: A certain number of personal references are a part of debate, but if they are prolonged they would, of course, amount to another grievance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, so far as the point of order is concerned, obviously it is ersatz too. I might say, concerning the point raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, that he knew very well when I started to speak I was left only nine minutes by the previous speakers and he is obviously now trying to use up some of those nine minutes by raising this point of order.

Mr. Pearson: Why do you not refer to the subject?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there was a time when—

Mr. Pearson: Why do you not refrain from discussing personalities?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was a time when the expression "procrastination is the thief of time" meant something, but that, of course, was before the days of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pearson: You have four minutes left, why do you not use them?

Mr. Pickersgill: Why do you not refer to the Bank of Canada report?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada was referred to the standing committee on banking commerce once, and that was in the year 1956. There was a very good reason at that time why that report was so referred. There had been a great deal of discussion on the subject of monetary policy—

Mr. Pickersgill: There has been none, of course, this year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —which apparently influenced the minister of finance of that time after some discussion of a general nature that preceded the introduction, not at the time of introducing the motion—to bring in a motion, on his own account, to have that report referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce for study and report.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, because the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) asked for it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, there had been some discussion some time before, and the minister of finance at that time was very unhappy about what had been said to him apparently, and he brought in a motion to have that report referred to that particular committee. That is the one occasion on which this was done.

Mr. Pearson: It was done the year before.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was the one occasion when the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada was referred to a parliamentary committee.

Mr. Pearson: It was apparently done the year before.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On other occasions, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the Minister of Finance has just made a statement which is incorrect, because the governor of the Bank of Canada on that occasion in 1956 began his evidence by saying that it was a pleasure for him to be back with them again, meaning the members of the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, any honest person who reads the evidence of that occasion will realize that what the governor was referring to was an appearance, not in connection with the reference of the annual report to that committee, but in respect of an entirely different matter. He has appeared before committees before, but only on one occasion following a reference of the governor's report to that committee.

The position taken here is perfectly clear. Hon. members of the opposition are trying to disclaim any responsibility with respect to the contents of the report—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They do not want to have any responsibility for the contents of that report of the governor, but want that responsibility to be accepted by—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he accepts responsibility for—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, sit down. They are asking the government to take the responsibility for having this report referred to the committee, and the minute that is done they—

Mr. Pearson: Does the government not accept any responsibility in regard—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, you know perfectly well that they would be very quick to claim that the responsibility for the statements made in the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada was that of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If there is a matter of contradiction it should be referred to at the end of the hon. minister's statement.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The minister has referred to—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is an attempt to steal more of my time.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

An hon. Member: It is ten o'clock.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is an attempt to steal my time, and surely that is against the rules of this house.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the Minister of Finance has misrepresented the position of the opposition regarding this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a matter of personal explanation which can more appropriately be made when the minister has completed his statement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that what has taken place here is an attempt to create the impression in the mind of the public that the government is responsible for the opinions expressed by the governor of the Bank of Canada in this report, but I want to state again—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that the government does not take the responsibility for these expressions of opinion by the governor of the Bank of Canada as contained in the annual report.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nowlan: Order; the Speaker is on his feet. Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There will be neither speech or privilege, as it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker am I to have my time stolen from me this way?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What a shameful performance.

Mr. Speaker: It being ten o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to section 3 (f) of standing order 56 as provisionally amended, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on the motion now before the house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. McGee in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY

152. Departmental administration, $1,090,452.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Departmental administration—

202. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,087,947.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

387. Departmental administration, $332,439.

Proceedings reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Kucherepa: Mr. Speaker, will the acting house leader indicate the order of business for tomorrow?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, in view of what has taken place during the past 15 minutes I do not think there is any point in indicating the business for tomorrow because it will undoubtedly be disrupted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a shameful statement. The minister is replying to one of his own party members.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

REPORT OF FOURTH MEETING OF CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

General

A further meeting of the Canada-United States interparliamentary group was held in Ottawa and Quebec city from Wednesday, February 22, to Sunday, February 26, inclusive.

This was the fourth meeting of the group which continued its procedures of having informal, off the record discussions and refrained from making recommendations, leaving it to each national delegation to make such reports and recommendations to its respective legislatures as it determines.

The group met in plenary sessions on Thursday morning and Friday afternoon. Committee meetings were held on both days. Committees discussed the following subject areas:

(1) Defence co-operation and disarmament;
(2) Trade and economic matters; and
(3) Boundary matters, cultural affairs and foreign policy matters of common concern.

At the first plenary session, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Hon. Howard Green, gave a brief address of welcome. Later in the day the United States delegates visited both houses of parliament and were welcomed in the House of Commons by addresses given by the Prime Minister, Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, the Leader of the Opposition, Hon. Lester B. Pearson and the C.C.F. leader, Mr. Hazen Argue, and in the Senate by the Speaker and honourable Senators Walter M. Aseltine, W. Ross Macdonald and others. At a lunch on Friday, given by the Speaker of the House of Commons in historic room 16 in the parliament buildings, the Prime Minister, Hon. Lionel Chevrier, Senator George Aiken and Representative Cornelius E. Gallagher spoke at a ceremony to dedicate a plaque to be installed there in commemoration of the first formal meeting of Canadian and United States parliamentarians in that same room in 1943. On Friday evening the government of Canada gave a dinner for the group in the parliamentary restaurant to which all members of the Senate and House of Commons were invited. In addition, there was a lunch for the delegates given by the Speaker of the Senate and a program of lunches, receptions and tours for the wives.

On Saturday and Sunday the group visited Quebec city to see something of winter life in la belle province. The weatherman was more than co-operative. He let loose an unusually severe blizzard which disrupted all transportation and delayed the return of the delegations to their capitals until Monday.

Committee discussions

The discussion in the committees, the personnel of which is shown in Appendix A, was frank and animated, but was always carried on with complete good humour and respect for divergent views. Some differences were reconciled, others were explained and modified in the course of exchange of information and opinion. There was nothing to limit discussion other than time itself, and most of the important problems which could be said to disturb our neighbourly co-operation came up for attention. The scope of these discussions in the committees is indicated by the reports which are set out in Appendix B, in the form in which they were approved at the final plenary session and released in a joint press statement on February 24th.

Conclusions

All delegates appeared to be well satisfied with this latest interparliamentary exchange and convinced of the usefulness of this approach to joint problems and differences as well as of the soundness of the decision that two meetings of the group should be held annually, one in each country. The hope was expressed that the second meeting in 1961 could be held in Washington during the present session of congress.

It is noteworthy that in the first four meetings the change in personnel of the delegations has been such that no less than 52 members of congress and 55 members of the Canadian parliament have already participated.

The wives of most of the delegates have accompanied them. It has been well said that this more than doubles the effectiveness of the exchange in the promotion of good will and understanding.

In submitting this report we wish to express our appreciation of the co-operation and assistance of officials of the various departments of the Canadian government who have helped us with the organization of the meetings and in our preparation for the discussions.

APPENDIX B

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Committee I—Defence Co-operation and Disarmament

The committee on defence co-operation and disarmament considers that there is need for early progress in the development of a comprehensive and carefully verified system of disarmament. The committee has examined the many political and technical difficulties which must be resolved before any reduction in armaments can be achieved. Pending satisfactory progress in this direction the free world has no alternative but to assume a defence posture capable of meeting Soviet aggression whatever its character and scale. In the view of the committee it is important to recognize that the communist threat is aimed at every single part of the free world and that our continued unity is essential if it is to be countered.

The committee has discussed the collective arrangements for defence in which both countries participate. It considers that NATO and NORAD are among the principal bulwarks upon which rest the security of the United States and Canada, and the other nations of the free world. It is vital that these associations be kept strong and viable in a period when the character of the threat is changing rapidly. With respect to NORAD it considers that the development of alternative weapons systems in no way diminishes its importance. Continuing attention is necessary to ensure its adequacy in order to counter improved enemy weapons capability.

The committee believes that the maintenance of a strong industrial base in Canada is essential to North American defence. The committee notes that since its last meeting there has been real progress in advancing the Canada-United States defence production sharing program. The necessary policies and procedures have been established to provide a more equitable climate of opportunity for Canadian defence industry to participate with the United States in defence development and production. In 1959 these arrangements resulted in United States contracts in Canada of $96.3 million; in 1960 the figure was $112.7 million. On the other hand, Canadian production sharing contracts placed in the United States in 1959 amounted to $108.2 million and in 1960 increased to $196.3 million. Therefore it is recognized that there is continuing need to sustain the Canadian portion of the common defence production base through increased U.S. defence procurement in Canada. In this connection the committee observes that the long term prospects for defence production sharing would be greatly enhanced by Canadian participation in the U.S. military research and development program. Some progress has been made in this direction; further efforts in this field should be expanded. The committee agrees that continuing efforts should be made both by government and by industry in the two countries to encourage broader public understanding of the interdependent character of the common defence effort in its economic as well as its military aspects.

Committee II—Trade and Economic Matters

Trading with communist countries

The committee discussed the effects of trade with communist countries. It was pointed out that this trade might strengthen the communist economies and thereby contribute to the expansion of Soviet political influence; on the other hand, trade might keep peaceful channels open between the Soviet bloc and the west. The committee noted that Canada and the United States trade with the Soviet bloc did not loom large in their total foreign trade and that both countries traded with the bloc within the framework agreed between NATO countries. The Canadian delegation referred to the possible problem raised for Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies by the application to their trade of the United States foreign assets control regulations.

Cuban trade

With respect to trade with Cuba, the United States delegation explained that the concern expressed in the United States was a reflection of the serious view the United States had taken of the threat posed for the western hemisphere by the communist orientation of the Cuban revolution. The relatively minor value and total North American trade with Cuba was considered as well as the declared policy of preventing the bootlegging of United States goods to Cuba.

Marketing of agricultural products on a subsidized or non-subsidized basis

The committee noted the increase of productivity in the agricultural field and the desirability of pursuing domestic agricultural policies which would take into account the existence of surpluses and marketing problems. The Canadian delegation emphasized the importance of wheat exports for Canada and recalled that sales of United States agricultural commodities on special terms could disrupt and impair the growth of commercial markets for Canadian wheat abroad. In this connection the Canadian delegation expressed appreciation of the United States government's willingness to consult with Canada and to consider Canadian commercial interests. Both delegations referred to existing or possible restrictions on agricultural trade between Canada and the United States and more particularly on cheddar cheese and edible oils. They expressed the hope that these restrictions will be kept to a minimum and that trade will be rationalized between their two countries.

Oil import policies

The committee agreed on the need to maintain the oil industries of both countries in a healthy state in the face of production, exploration, and marketing issues which they largely share in common. The greatest importance was attached by the Canadian delegation to the continued access for Canadian crude oil to expanding United States markets particularly in the United States northwest. The two delegations recognized that policies pursued in each country could raise serious national and international issues for the other and agreed that Canada and the United States should work closely together in seeking rational solutions to the problems of oil production and trade.

United States investment in Canada and reciprocal tax agreement

The committee considered the changes in reciprocal tax treaties and other tax changes now before the Canadian parliament. It was stressed by Canadians that these were not designed to restrict the free movements of capital across the border nor to discourage future foreign investment but to correct adverse trade balances and to encourage greater participation by Canadian capital in Canadian growth. The advantages of dollar parity were also in mind.

Other opinions were advanced, however, that the changes might discourage American investment and restrict Canada's presently expanding economy by denying it ready money.

In any event it was agreed that reciprocal investment across the border on equal terms should be promoted at all times and should be the goal of both countries.

Committee III—Boundary Matters, Cultural Relations and Foreign Policy

1. Richelieu-Champlain waterway

The committee considered the background of the Richelieu-Champlain waterway, the facilities now available, the use which is made of it and its potential. It was agreed that it might be desirable for both countries to join in studies on the improvement of transportation, especially water routes, between United States and Canada. Mention was also made by the United States delegation that the international joint commission might be willing to undertake a study specifically related to the Hudson-Champlain waterway.

2. Niagara power

The United States delegation pointed out that electric power being generated in the United States at Niagara was being transmitted across Canadian territory for a short distance to Massena, New York. Under Canadian law, this power was taxed to the extent of three tenths mill per kilowatt. It was understood that, under Canadian law, the tax was designed to apply to power generated in Canada and not to power transmitted over Canadian territory. It was therefore agreed that this matter might well be the subject of discussions between appropriate authorities of the two countries.

3. Chicago diversion

In response to an enquiry from the Canadian delegation, the United States delegation explained that three separate diversion bills have been submitted to the House of Representatives. Further, the United States delegation expressed the view that it was much too early to predict how far these proposals might proceed in congress. The Canadian delegation pointed out, that as in the past, any further diversion at Chicago was a matter of serious concern to Canada.

4. Tourist trade

The Canadian delegation expressed some concern at the recent suggestion placed before congress that congress might consider reducing the United States' tourists' duty free entry privileges from $500 to $100. After discussion, it was understood by the committee that this idea was designed to alleviate world wide United States balances of payment difficulties and was not directed at Canada. The committee agreed that if the duty free entry allowance were reduced to $100, it might have an adverse effect on the tourist trade of both countries.

5. Effect of highways on tourist trade

In the context of expanding the Canada-United States tourist trade, there was some discussion concerning the need for all weather north-south highways in both countries. It was recognized by both delegations that highway construction in the United States was under the primary jurisdiction of the states and under the provinces in Canada, but it was hoped that the matter would be given further study.

6. Columbia river

The United States delegation pointed out that the Senate foreign relations committee would hold hearings on the Columbia river basin treaty commencing on March 8. The Canadian delegates expressed the view that in spite of expected controversy in Canada over the implementation of the treaty within Canada, the development of the Columbia river basin would proceed as contemplated by the treaty. Satisfaction was expressed by the delegates of both countries over the successful completion of negotiations which had led to the treaty. There was general agreement too that in the long run, electrical power generated by atomic energy would become increasingly significant.

7. Foreign affairs

The committee discussed the question of Chinese representation at the United Nations and considered the possible effects of the People's Republic of China securing the China seat. It was recognized that it was likely that this issue would confront the two countries at the United Nations in the near future.

Members exchanged views on the problems facing the west in its relations with the communist bloc and on the measures which might be pursued to ease tensions and contribute towards the development of better relations. The view was expressed that encouragement should be given to increasing contacts with the Soviet union through tourist travel and cultural exchanges. An assessment was made of the ideological conflict in the world.

The committee concluded its deliberations with a general discussion of foreign policy problems facing both countries. In this connection there was general agreement on the need to give continued support to the United Nations, to the latest United Nations resolution concerning intervention in the Congo and to the secretary general and to the course pursued by the United States in the security council during the last few days.

It was felt by the members generally that both countries should examine their policies in the non-military cold war to see whether the maximum benefit is being obtained from the resources available and whether the current level of effort is adequate.

In spite of the limited time accorded to the discussion of each item on the agenda, the committee was conscious of great progress toward the increase in friendly relations between the United States and Canada.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 10, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCLUDE RAPESEED UNDER GRAIN FREIGHT RATES

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-90, to amend the Railway Act (rapeseed freight rates).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to explain that the purpose of this bill is to apply to rapeseed the freight rates on grain that are applicable under the Crowsnest pass agreement. Primarily, the legislative purpose of this bill is to bring this specific legal meaning of rapeseed into accord with the meaning of rapeseed as used since 1943 by the Department of Agriculture, also the board of grain commissioners, parliament in the Canada Grain Act and the grain trade, as well as by the railways themselves by the present local grain mileage freight rates.

The secondary legislative effects are (1) to apply the Crowsnest pass rates only at the commencement of the August, 1961 season, so there can be no question under section 333 (5) of the Railway Act that the tolls on past shipments of rapeseed are affected retroactively to 1943; (2) to prevent the use of this statutory definition of rapeseed in legal argument on interpretation in other cases.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of this house.

Mr. Pearson: Why not now?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think this measure is of sufficient importance to do so now. I do not know why we could not deal with it now.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; the rules do not permit the measure to be advanced more than one stage in one day except by unanimous consent, and the mover has not given his consent.

Mr. Rapp: I do not have a bill.

STARRED QUESTIONS

D.V.A. OFFICE, PETERBOROUGH

Question No. 288—Mr. Pitman:

1. Has the Department of Veterans Affairs received any request to have a D.V.A. office opened in Peterborough?
2. If so, when, and from what source did this request come?
3. Has any decision been made by the Department of Veterans Affairs?
4. If so, what has been the decision of the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Mr. H. F. Jones (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answers to this question are as follows:

1. There already is an office of the Department of Veterans Affairs in Peterborough.

2. On April 12 representatives of the Canadian Legion spoke to the minister.

3 and 4. The request of the Legion concerned the sending of a welfare officer to Peterborough. This matter is under consideration.

SICK MARINERS FUND

Question No. 298—Mr. McWilliam:

1. What is the amount presently in the sick mariners fund, and what was the amount in this fund at the end of December 1957?
2. How many persons are presently benefiting from this fund, and what was the number that received benefits for the year 1957?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. There is no special sick mariners fund. Any payments are made out of a vote in the estimates.

2. There were 129,934 crew members on vessels paying sick mariners dues in 1957, and 141,743 crew members in 1960. These crews were all eligible for treatment.

AIRPORTS, GLOUCESTER MUNICIPALITY AND BATHURST, N.B.

Question No. 305—Mr. Habel:

1. Has the municipality of Gloucester or the town of Bathurst, made an application for the establishment of an airport in either community?
2. Has the department decided to construct an airstrip in either of these communities?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to parts 1 and 2 of this question is that the municipality of Gloucester and the town of Bathurst have submitted a joint resolution regarding the establishment of an airport in the county of Gloucester, and are being informed of the policy of the department and the terms and conditions under which cost sharing assistance for this purpose might be made available by the federal government.

Should they wish to proceed, this would then be followed by direct discussions with the department regarding this matter.

AIRPORTS, RESTIGOUCHE MUNICIPALITY AND DALHOUSIE, N.B.

Question No. 306—Mr. Habel:

1. Has the municipality of Restigouche or the town of Dalhousie in New Brunswick, made an application to the Department of Transport for the establishment of an airport in either of these communities?

2. Has the department decided to construct an airstrip in either of these municipalities?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to parts 1 and 2 of this question is that the county of Restigouche has approached the department to ascertain under what circumstances federal assistance might be provided for purposes of construction of an airport and, having learned of the department's policy with regard to cost sharing grants in this connection, it is understood that the county is now preparing more detailed cost estimates and is investigating the possibilities with a view to further discussion with the department.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS

Question No. 307—Mr. Racine:

1. Have the banks, pursuant to subsection (1) of section 19 of the Small Businesses Loans Act, reported on the loans made during the months of January, February, and March, 1961?

2. If so: (a) what is the number, and the amount of such loans for each of the said months? (b) what is the number, and the amount of such loans for each province?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 of this question is yes. It will be recalled that lendings under the new Small Businesses Loans Act commenced toward the end of January.

The answer to part 2 is as follows:

2(a) January, 7 loans; $49,210.00; February, 82 loans; $444,691.25; March, 211 loans; $1,382,445.70.

(b) Information not available.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that any minor difference between the figures I have given in answer to question 2(a) and the answer given on April 26 to question 283 may be explained with reference to a misunderstanding by two of the banks in relation to the return that was asked of them under the pressure of that time to hasten the answer to question 283, and the fact that the figures returned by three of the banks on that earlier occasion were an estimate rather than the exact figure.

The figures I have given this morning in reply to question 307 are the precise figures.

IMMIGRATION ADVERTISEMENTS ABROAD

Question No. 310—Mr. Deschatelets:

For each of the years 1958, 1959, 1960: (a) has the Department of Citizenship and Immigration caused advertisements to be made or published in foreign countries dealing with job opportunities in Canada? (b) if so: (i) in which countries were such advertisements made or published? (ii) what was the list of jobs offered? (iii) what was the cost of such advertisements?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answers to this question are as follows:

(a) Yes, only in 1959 and 1960. There is no record of any advertising of this nature being carried out by the department in 1958.

(b) (i) In the United Kingdom in 1959 and 1960.

(ii) Different lists comprising a large number of occupations were used. These are not in a form which can be given orally.

(iii) In 1959 the amount was $3,123.50; in 1960, $2,754.72.

PUBLIC SERVICE—NEW EMPLOYEES AND DISCHARGES, 1960

Question No. 311—Mr. MacRae:

1. How many new employees entered the civil service of Canada in 1960?

2. How many of these were entitled to veterans preference?

3. How many employees were discharged from the civil service during 1960 (a) for incompetence (b) for other reasons?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): The civil service commission issued 20,056 certificates of appointment during the calendar year 1960, including 1,354 covering student assistants for summer employment. This figure may be slightly in excess of the actual number of new employees, as some may have been certified more than once during the year, but it is the only available figure.

2. 2,069.

3. During the year 640 persons were dismissed for cause. "Cause" includes incompetence and abandonment of position.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS, FORT WILLIAM, 1945-60

Question No. 312—Mr. Badanai:

What is the number of loans, under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, approved in the electoral district of Fort William during each of the years 1945 to 1960 inclusive?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The information is not available.

Starred Questions

PORT CREDIT, ONT.—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF DOCKS

Question No. 313—Mr. Hellyer:

1. What is the cost of construction of docks and related facilities at Port Credit, Ontario, from July 1, 1957, to December 31, 1960?
2. What has been the cost to the federal government of maintaining and operating the docks and allied facilities at Port Credit, Ontario, from July 1, 1957, to December 31, 1960?
3. How much cargo was unloaded at the Port Credit docks in each of the three calendar years, 1958, 1959, and 1960?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

1. $568,701.84.

2. $37,825.20. This amount was paid out for "allied facilities at Port Credit" but it was not associated with the main wharf in question. The work was done to maintain the channel to the inner harbour at the mouth of the Credit river.

3. 1958—Nil; 1959—Nil; 1960—6,509 tons of rock salt.

These figures do not include cargo over private wharves.

SALES PROMOTION CONFERENCE, OTTAWA

Question No. 314—Mr. Argue:

1. How many companies sent representatives to the sales promotion conference held in Ottawa last November by the Minister of Trade and Commerce?
2. What is the name of each company, and the business in which they are engaged?
3. Are any of these companies (a) American subsidiaries (b) controlled by American companies?
4. If so: (a) which ones? (b) what is the name of the parent company? (c) what is the extent of the control?
5. Have any companies not followed through after prospective sales were initiated at the sales promotion conference or afterwards?
6. If so, which ones?
7. What sales have taken place as a result of this conference?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. 1,133.

2. It is not deemed advisable nor in the public interest to publish this list.

3. This question relates to internal matters of private companies.

4. See number 3.

5. Yes. Approximately 367.

6. It is not advisable to name these companies. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce has already intimated, he is following up these cases with the hope that further action may be stimulated.

7. Approximately 52 commodities to 22 different countries largely at this time in the category of trial orders for over $2 million.

C.N. TELEPHONE SYSTEMS, ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 315—Mr. Batten:

1. Does the Canadian National Telegraphs operate telephone systems in any areas of (a) Nova Scotia (b) New Brunswick (c) Prince Edward Island?
2. If so, what are these areas?
3. What is the population and the number of subscribers served in each area?
4. What is the total main line mileage in each system?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advise that the answer to part 1 is that Canadian National Telegraphs does not operate telephone systems in the provinces mentioned.

Parts 2, 3 and 4 are, therefore, not applicable.

FEDERAL ADVANCES TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

Question No. 316—Mr. Caron:

1. Have any advances been made by the government to the unemployment insurance commission during the fiscal year 1960-61, and since the beginning of the present fiscal year?
2. If so, what is the amount of each such advance, and the date on which it was made?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The answer to question 1 is yes. The answer to question 2 consists of a long list of dates and amounts. I could read this, but perhaps it would suffice if the information were placed in Hansard without being read.

Mr. Speaker: It consists of one page?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to have the figures printed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INTERNATIONAL AIR ROUTES—C.P.A. APPLICATIONS

Question No. 317—Mr. Ratelle:

1. Did Canadian Pacific Airlines apply to the air transport board or to the government for permission to fly a new international route or routes, or to add to its present routes the right to stop over in certain countries?

2. What were these routes with stopovers?

3. Have these applications been heard; and, if so, (a) by whom (b) what decision has been rendered?

4. Is Canadian Pacific Airlines authorized, under its bilateral air agreements or otherwise, to carry local traffic between two points in a foreign country or between several points in one foreign country to one or more points in another foreign country; and, if so, list the points?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1. Yes.

2. Canadian Pacific Airlines has applied for the following international routes—

[Mr. Speaker.]

(a) Western Canada—(Vancouver-Edmonton)—London.

(b) (Toronto-Montreal)—London (using propeller-driven aircraft only).

3. (a) This application has been heard by a special cabinet committee, and (b) no decision has yet been rendered.

4. No Canadian air line is permitted under any bilateral air agreement to carry local traffic between two points in a foreign country. In operating its overseas service, Canadian Pacific Airlines is authorized to carry traffic between the following points in foreign countries:

Mexico City-Lima (Peru)
Lima-Santiago (Chile)
Santiago-Buenos Aires (Argentina)
Tokyo-Hong Kong
Honolulu-Fiji-Auckland (New Zealand)-Sydney (Australia)
Azores-Lisbon-Rome

TRANSCONTINENTAL AIR ROUTES—C.P.A. APPLICATIONS

Question No. 318—Mr. Ratelle:

1. Did Canadian Pacific Airlines apply to the air transport board or to the government for permission to fly a new transcontinental route or routes, or to add to its present routes, the right to stop over?

2. What were these routes with stopovers?

3. Have these applications been heard; and, if so, (a) by whom (b) what decision has been rendered?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

With respect to part 1, Canadian Pacific Airlines has not applied to the air transport board for new transcontinental routes but has made general representations to the government based on a sharing of future main line traffic growth in Canada.

With respect to part 2, no specific routes or additional points have been applied for.

With respect to part 3 (a), no formal application has been heard, and (b), no decision has been rendered.

AUTAIR HELICOPTER SERVICES—AIRCRAFT EQUIPMENT

Question No. 319—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Do the regulations of the air transport board require an operator to file a statement of the aircraft equipment in its possession?

2. Did Autair Helicopter Services Limited file such a statement, and on what date?

3. What equipment did it have in its possession on that date?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. Yes. A fleet report, listing all aircraft in its possession is filed by each carrier for four specified days a year; January 15, April 15, July 15 and October 15.

2. Yes, for the last specified date, April 15.

3. 15 aircraft, as follows:

Type of aircraft	Number	Status in fleet
Bell 476	3	Owned
Bell 476-2	7	Owned
Bell 476-2A	2	Owned
Sikorsky S-55	3	Owned

AUTAIR HELICOPTER SERVICES—FINANCIAL STATEMENTS

Question No. 320—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Do the regulations of the air transport board require an operator to file a financial statement either quarterly, semi-annually, or yearly?
2. Did Autair Helicopter Services Limited file such a statement for the years 1959, 1960, and 1961?
3. Does the air transport board conduct an investigation from time to time into the affairs of licensed carriers?
4. Has it done so in the case of Autair Helicopter Services Limited, and on what date?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. All authorized licencees are required to file financial data on an annual basis and throughout the year either monthly or quarterly as defined by regulations.

2. 1959—yes.
1960—monthly filed, annual outstanding.
1961—monthly filed for January and February.

3. Yes. Periodic audit of carrier's books.

4. Yes. Last audit survey in February 1961.

AUTAIR HELICOPTER SERVICES—EQUIPMENT LEASES ABROAD

Question No. 321—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Did Autair Helicopter Services Limited apply to the air transport board for permission to lease certain equipment outside Canada?
2. If so: (a) on what date? (b) what equipment?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

The answer to part 1 is yes, on a dry lease basis.

With respect to part 2 (a) the date was April 3, 1961, and (b), the equipment was two S-55 helicopters.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST COLOURED RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Question No. 323—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the government received any complaints regarding discrimination against coloured employees of the railways, particularly as regards promotion opportunities?
2. If so, from whom have these complaints been received?
3. What reply has been made?

Starred Questions

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this question be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

INDIAN RESERVE, SARNIA—TRANSFER OF LAND TITLE

Question No. 324—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Has title to any part of the Indian reserve at Sarnia covered by the contract with Dimensional Investments Limited been given to any other person or corporation?
2. If so, for what area, and to what person or corporation?
3. If not, is consideration being given to transferring title to any part of this property, and, if so, to whom?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, 173.823 acres.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF INDIANS

Question No. 325—Mr. Howard:

How many Indians, if any, by province have been enfranchised for each of the years 1959 and 1960?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is in the form of a statistical table and I ask that it be made an order for return.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, could we have this printed in Hansard at this point as read?

Mrs. Fairclough: This is a fairly short table, and if it is desired to have it printed at this point I have no objection.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable that this statistical report be printed instead of read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editors note: The table above referred to is as follows:]

	Fiscal year 1959-60	Fiscal year 1960-61

SECTION 96(A)(2), INDIAN ACT

Question No. 326—Mr. Howard:

Since July 1, 1958, has section 96 (A) (2) of the Indian Act been declared to be in force, and, if so, what is the name of each Indian band affected, and the date upon which the said section was so declared to be in force?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this question be made an order for return. I think the answer is too long to be printed at this point.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

SARNIA INDIAN RESERVE—LAND HOLDINGS

Question No. 327—Mr. Fisher:

1. In relation to the Sarnia Indian reserve and land deals with outside agencies, do any of the Indians, including the chief, hold land individually which come within the negotiations and arrangements that have been made in the past two years?
2. If so, which Indians, and how much land does each hold?
3. Did the chief alone, or the chief for and with the band council, or the agent for the council, wire the minister asking that there be an extension of the arrangement with dimensional investments?
4. How long has the present incumbent been the chief?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. Yes.

2. The common lands of the band on the Sarnia reserve consist of only 16 acres. All the remainder of the 3,100 acres involved in this sale has been located to individual members. Particulars, including the name of the Indian locatee and the area held by each individual Indian are contained in schedule "B" of the agreement of sale which was tabled in the house on June 8, 1959, in response to notice of motion No. 106 of May 12, 1959.

3. No.

4. Since June 16, 1958.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

OLD CUSTOMS BUILDING, WINNIPEG—DEMOLITION

Motion No. 99—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the Department of Agriculture, the Canadian wheat board, and any individual or company, since January 1, 1961, in connection with the demolition of the old customs building situated at the corner of Main and McDermot avenue in Winnipeg.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I can accept this motion, subject to the usual reservation that correspondence between the department and the wheat board is considered to be privileged.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation requested by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

GRAIN SALE TO CHINA, 1961—CONTRACT

Motion No. 118—Mr. McIlraith:

For a copy of the contract between the Canadian wheat board and the China Resources Company for the sale of grain covering the period June 1, 1961, to November 30, 1961.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have to advise the house that I cannot accept this motion, because it calls for the production of documents which are considered to be privileged.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I point out that this document was referred to by the minister in his statement to the house the other day.

Motions for Papers

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to proceed with the motion, in view of what the minister has said, or is he prepared to drop it?

Mr. McIlraith: No; I would ask that the motion be put.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those against it please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

(And more than five members having risen:)

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

GRAIN SALE TO CHINA—AGREEMENT

Motion No. 119—Mr. McIlraith:

For a copy of the long term agreement signed by the Canadian wheat board and the China resources company covering the period June 1, 1961, to December 1963.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as with the last motion, I must point out that never in the past have commercial contracts of the Canadian wheat board been made public, in the interests of keeping information from our competitors. I should like to point out that at the present time Australia is competing for markets in China.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister may either accept or reject the motion, but he is not entitled to debate it. In view of the explanation, does the hon. member wish to proceed?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I wish to proceed, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to raise a point of order as to the right of the minister to refuse production. I will try to keep my remarks strictly relevant to the point of order, and to make them brief.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether any such point could arise on a motion on which the house itself will decide whether the documents are to be produced. The minister has no power to refuse production. It is the house which is to determine the issue.

Mr. McIlraith: My point is this—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a point of order I will be interested to hear what it is, but I have indicated my views on the matter.

Mr. McIlraith: My point of order has to do with whether this matter has been determined. It arises out of this. It will be seen from the form of the motion that it refers to a particular agreement which is clearly identified, and it is identified with an agreement referred to on motions on Tuesday, May 2, 1961. It will be seen that the precise language of the motion now before the house is in accordance with the precise language used in that item of business on motions on Tuesday, May 2. If Your Honour wishes any further reference to the identification of it—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: —the minister said on that occasion, as reported at page 4205 of Hansard:

> I am now pleased to report that a long term agreement has been signed. This long term agreement covers the period June 1, 1961 to December, 1963.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making the point, as I understand it, that the document, having been referred to before, must be produced and therefore the minister has no power to refuse production. But I think the hon. member has misconceived his rights under the rules and, if I may say so, if he felt the document, when referred to, ought to have been produced he should then have required its production. The issue before the house now is not the right of the minister to withhold or produce, but whether the house will order him to produce the document. Therefore to my mind the point which the hon. member makes is immaterial and is not properly taken at this time.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, certainly I have no quarrel with what you have said, except that it has not fully dealt with the point of order that I was seeking to raise, because it has anticipated the point of order in part. My point does arise out of the obligation of a minister of the crown to produce the document. The reference on that point is contained in Beauchesne, fourth edition, at page 134, citation 159, subparagraph (2), which reads:

> A minister of the crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the house, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the table. This restraint is similar to the rule of evidence in courts of law, which prevent counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence. The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested; and when the objection has been made in time, it has been generally acquiesced in.

My point is that the minister determined this matter by his action on Tuesday, May 2, on motions. It having been determined by his action then, to which no objection was taken at that time, it is not now open to the house to refuse it and what is before the house is a mere formality.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard the hon. member out but, as I rather anticipated when he began, what is now before the house is a motion which is not debatable unless it is deferred for debate under the rules. The motion prays that His Excellency the Governor General will cause to be laid before this house a copy of a certain agreement. That is the only issue before the house. The minister has indicated that he is opposed to the motion, but the matter still falls for the decision of the house. Accordingly I shall put the question.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. McIlraith) which was negatived on the following division:

Searle and Co. of Canada Ltd.; Smith Kline and French Inter-American Corp.; E. R. Squibb and Sons of Canada Ltd.; Strong Cobb of Canada Ltd.; The Upjohn Co. of Canada; Henry K. Wampole and Co. Ltd.; Warner-Chilcott Laboratories Co. Ltd.; Charles R. Will and Co. Ltd.; Winthrop Laboratories of Canada Ltd.; John Wyeth and Brother (Canada) Ltd.; and for a copy of all books, papers, records or other documents obtained by the combines investigation branch from the said pharmaceutical companies, since January 1, 1957, dealing with the investigation recently completed by the combines investigation branch which resulted in a statement of evidence being submitted to the restrictive trade practices commission regarding the selling and pricing policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of new types of drugs.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the documents asked for are clearly documents which were obtained by or prepared for the director for the purposes of an inquiry which parliament has provided, under the Combines Investigation Act, should be held in private. As I explained last week on May 3 and 4, these documents form the basis for the statement of material prepared by the director, which statement, together with the documents, is now before the commission. The commission's report will be made in due course and will contain reference to such of the documents as the commission deems appropriate, and that report will be made public.

Division

I cannot accept the motion for the production of documents which parliament has intended should be private.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I think the dealings of some of these drug manufacturers should see the light of day, and I wish the motion to be put.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Howard) which was negatived on the following division:

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—OFFER BY U.S. OF MISSILE-CARRYING SUBMARINES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he could make a statement to the house on the Canadian position in regard to the offer made by the United States to NATO forces of five submarines with Polaris nuclear missiles?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as yet we have received no official report concerning what took place at the NATO meeting. The only report we have is the press report to the effect that such matters as disarmament were given support and that the West Berlin question was discussed. As well, there was a reference to the subject matter of the point raised by the hon. gentleman.

I think the house should have a copy of the communique, and as soon as it is received I shall table it.

UNITED NATIONS

ANGOLA—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister care to say what is Canada's position at NATO with regard to Angola forced labour conditions and discrimination against the Angolans by the Portuguese?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so far as Angola is concerned, there was a resolution in the United Nations on April 20 which called upon the government of Portugal to consider urgently the introduction of measures of reform in Angola, and asked the president of the general assembly to appoint a subcommittee to examine the statements made before the general assembly concerning Angola, to receive further statements and to conduct inquiries and report to the general assembly. This resolution was sponsored by 36 Afro-Asian states. In the vote Canada supported the motion and took a stand which is very clear.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister say whether the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs will raise this question at the NATO meeting? Would the Prime Minister comment on a press report to the effect that our minister of external affairs has decided, at least for the time being, to drop the matter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have no observations to make on press reports. All I can say is that was the stand that Canada took on April 20, and our position is unchanged in that regard.

Mr. Argue: The Prime Minister cannot say whether Canada will raise this question at the NATO meeting?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think the NATO meeting has concluded. The hon. gentleman, as is frequently the case, is again somewhat late.

Mr. Argue: Could the Prime Minister explain to the house why the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not make a prepared speech on this subject?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that the hon. member is asking about something within the administrative responsibility of the minister in question. I rather think not.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CONGO—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING DEATHS OF U.N. SOLDIERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver East asked me a question as to whether the Canadian government had communicated with the United Nations regarding recent attacks involving the deaths of a number of United Nations soldiers in the Congo and whether representations had been made so that those responsible would be brought to trial.

The United Nations, without the need for any prompting or representation from member states, has undertaken an investigation of the tragic circumstances of the recent incident in which a number of Ghanaian soldiers and several officers of British and Swedish nationality were killed.

I think this is an occasion upon which to express our sympathy to the government and army of Ghana for their losses and express our admiration for the substantial and effective contribution Ghana has made to the United Nations operations in the Congo. The conduct of operations there and the difficulties encountered are matters which come to the attention of the secretary general's advisory committee on the Congo. Canada is represented on this committee, and Canadian views are expressed as the occasion requires.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. McPhillips (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could bring the house up to date on the present situation in Laos.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the international supervisory commission arrived in Laos on May 8. The commissioners and some of their advisers are in Vientiane. Representatives of India, Canada and Poland are also proceeding to Xieng Khouang, the headquarters of Souvana Phouma. As I indicated on Monday, the first task of the commission will be, and I quote from the message of the co-chairmen of the commission on May 6:

> —to fix the cease fire in accordance with the understanding of the belligerent parties in Laos and to exercise supervision and control over it.

Canada will be represented at the international conference on Laos which is being held in Geneva on May 12. It will then have an opportunity to make known its views on the supervisory arrangements which may be necessary in the future.

Inquiries of the Ministry

The same question was raised yesterday, I think it was, respecting the observance of the cease fire. There has been no change in the last two days. There is no information to substantiate press reports that some difficulty was encountered at a meeting yesterday between representatives of the two parties. The commission, of course, just arrived, and conditions in Laos are disturbed with the result that communication difficulties are bound to arise at first.

I think the hon. gentleman would have a rather full explanation if the house would agree to the printing as an appendix to Hansard of the message from the co-chairmen of the Geneva conference on Indo-China to the international commission for supervision and control in Laos, which sets forth fairly completely the situation as it is today.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable that this document be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of document referred to above, see appendix "A".]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister a question with regard to the Geneva conference which is scheduled to open on May 12. In view of the reported failure thus far to arrive at a complete cease fire in Laos, according to news received at 9 o'clock over the radio, will the Prime Minister say if Canada takes the same position as that taken by the United Kingdom and the United States, namely that there will be difficulty on the part of those countries with regard to their participation in the conference until such time as a cease fire has been determined?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman asked me a question yesterday as to whether the commission's functions other than supervision of the cease fire had been determined. In so far as the particular observation he now makes is concerned, may I say that our stand has been made very clear. After the conclusion of an agreement between the belligerent parties in Laos on questions connected with the cease fire, the commission should exercise control over the execution of this agreement. Those are the words in the document which has just been tabled as an appendix to Hansard.

Furthermore, as to the functions which the international commission for supervision and control in Laos will carry out on the completion of the first stage of the work, the determination of these functions falls within the competence of the international conference on Laos which will be held in Geneva beginning on May 12.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the Prime Minister for answering my question of yesterday, but obviously I was not clear enough in the question I asked this morning. My question this morning had to do with what would be the attitude of Canada with regard to participation in this conference on May 12 in Geneva if the cease fire has not been determined, particularly in the light of the announcement by the United Kingdom that it would not attend the conference unless a cease fire had been determined by the international supervisory commission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Canada will be represented at the opening of the conference. The stand that she will take will be announced at that time.

THE CENSUS

EGLINTON RIDING—POLITICAL AFFILIATION OF COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, based on a press report in today's Globe and Mail, and ask him whether it is true that five census commissioners appointed in the riding of Eglinton are officers of the local Progressive Conservative Association.

An hon. Member: Who do you think they would be?

Another hon. Member: Now we know.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the article in question, Mr. Speaker. I do not know about the situation raised by the question as to all the persons concerned, but I can assure him that they are all very estimable citizens.

Mr. Garland: I have a supplementary question. In view of the tens of thousands of unemployed persons in the Toronto area, does he not think that more prudent choices could have been made?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is now presenting a point of view rather than asking a question. I recognize the hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): My question is a supplementary one on this topic, but I want to go to the gentleman who is looking after the matter, namely the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would say whether any specific census district has been set up so that work or jobs are correlated with the membership drives of any Progressive Conservative riding association.

Mr. Grafftey: Supercilious nonsense.

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): No.

TRADE

GRAIN—RATE OF STERLING EXCHANGE IN SALE TO CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture in order to obtain clarification of some previous answers given by him with reference to the proposed sale of wheat and the long term agreement with communist China. In his announcement he is reported as having indicated the value of the contract as approximately $362 million. There was no reference in that statement to sterling. Later on the same day—I refer to the day of the announcement—in answer to a question on the orders of the day he is reported as having said this, as found at page 4206 of Hansard:

—as I understand it all the payments will be made in sterling.

My question is this. Will he advise the house as to what rate of exchange he used in computing the dollar value given?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice. However, I think more properly the question should go on the order paper.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Deeper and deeper secrecy.

Mr. McIlraith: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: There is no occasion for a supplementary question when the original question is taken as notice. The hon. member may ask another question in due course. I recognize the hon. member for Gloucester.

COAL

RAND REPORT—STUDY BY INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. On February 14, almost 12 weeks ago, the minister advised this house that the interdepartmental committee appointed to study the recommendations of the Rand commission was expected to complete its study within a few weeks. Is the minister now in a position to advise the house whether the report has been received by the government? Also, is the minister in a position to report to the house on its findings?

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, only a few days ago I again asked the interdepartmental committee to hasten its consideration of the Rand report, so that the recommendations may be submitted to the cabinet committee. I was given the assurance that that study was almost completed, and I hope to be in a position to make an announcement shortly.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN JUSTICE MINISTER AND U.S. INTERIOR SECRETARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice. My question is based upon the curiosity of a lot of people and a number of phone calls.

In view of a report in the Vancouver Sun yesterday that the minister was meeting with Mr. Udall, United States secretary of the interior, to discuss Canada's failure to ratify the Columbia river treaty; and in view of the fact that the United States secretary of the interior told a press conference in Ottawa yesterday, "We are champing at the bit", has the minister any information to give the house with respect to his discussions with the United States secretary of the interior on the Columbia river treaty?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to send me notice of his intention to ask this question. May I first correct a misapprehension appearing in it and state positively that Canada has not failed to ratify the Columbia river treaty.

With regard to my discussions yesterday with Mr. Udall, United States secretary of the interior, these were of course confidential, but apparently the secretary of the interior was reported as saying at a press conference that the United States is anxious to get on with the construction of the projects called for under the treaty. I can make no comment on that. The remarks of the secretary of the interior are self explanatory.

I can, however, say that this government is also anxious to see construction started at the earliest possible moment in order that the benefits of the treaty may be realized, and that the 31 million man-hours of employment on at-site construction in Canada may begin to be realized as early as possible. We hope, therefore, that British Columbia will make up its mind what it wants to do in the very near future.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the report in the Vancouver Sun yesterday that the United States was putting pressure on Canada to get cracking on the Columbia river development, would the minister inform the house of his reaction to this reported pressure?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's supplementary was covered in the original question.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, unless you rule the question out of order I should like to say that I am not aware of any pressure being applied by the government of the United States.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Is the minister in a position to give the house an assurance that the storage dams and hydro development projects under this treaty will commence in 1961?

Mr. Fulton: No, I am not in a position to give that assurance. Perhaps my hon. friend's question should be addressed to the premier of British Columbia.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question arising out of the minister's reply. If that is the case, why has the Minister of Trade and Commerce authorized a publication entitled "Industrial investment projects in Canada" which includes $458 million for hydro development and storage dam projects under the Columbia river treaty construction to begin in 1961?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is our hope—

Mr. Pickersgill: Another vision.

Mr. Hees: —that this very important construction program—something not conceived by the late lamented Liberal government—will get under way as soon as possible.

Mr. Benidickson: The record speaks for itself.

An hon. Member: It surely does.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PUBLIC RELATIONS OFFICER, HIGH COMMISSIONER TO U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him, in view of the announcement of the appointment of Mr. Jack Stepler as public relations officer to the Canadian high commissioner to the United Kingdom, whether he would announce what the salary structure and promotion steps of Mr. Stepler will be.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member should give notice of that question on the order paper in the usual way as it calls for statistical information.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—RECRUITMENT OF PERSONNEL IN U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister inform the house whether an advertisement which was carried by the Daily Telegraph in London, England, on May 6, demonstrates a policy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to recruit personnel overseas for vacancies existing in the head office and regional and district offices of the corporation in Canada?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to accept that question as notice; but as my friend the hon. member for Vancouver East probably knows, there are 20,000 to 25,000 jobs for skilled workers which are unfilled. I presume if there was an advertisement, it was in that connection.

Mr. Winch: I have the ad here.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SITTINGS OF COMMITTEES DURING LUNCHEON RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we are having morning sessions until one o'clock and the house reconvenes at 2.30, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he thinks it is conducive to the proper discharge of our duties to have committees meet from one o'clock to 2.30?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no control over the committees; they determine their own affairs. This is somewhat different from the old days.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is certainly somewhat different.

BRIDGES

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL—CONSTRUCTION OF APPROACHES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Henry put a question to me yesterday about the Champlain bridge. He asked me to tell the house whether the plans for the bridge approaches were completed and, if not, what was the cause of the delay.

In reply, I may inform him that the plans are completed.

The hon. member also asked the following supplementary question:

Is it a fact that the government is waiting for the Montreal city authorities to decide where the east-west express highway will pass before deciding on the site for the Champlain bridge approaches?

Well, the national harbours board will not wait necessarily until the lay-out of the east-west express highway is completed, but it will take into consideration the city's plans so that the bridge approaches may be connected with the express highway in question.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORTED DENIAL OF DAY'S BENEFITS TO UNEMPLOYED DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour arising from a report in the Niagara Falls Evening Review of Saturday, May 6, where it was reported that one Harry Roberts, the president of the union for the unemployed, had inquired of the local unemployment insurance commission why one day's benefit had been deducted for the day he had been in Ottawa. He said he received a cheque with a note saying "Not available while in Ottawa". Upon inquiring further he was told that the information came from the newspapers and the quotation was, "You have been getting too much publicity, I fear".

My question is, in view of this government's predilection for publicity, is the criterion now—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is entitled to ask for information but not to make debating remarks such as she was making. Perhaps the hon. member would ask her question before one o'clock.

Miss LaMarsh: —is the criterion as to whether or not one receives unemployment insurance to be whether one has publicity about his presence in an area on a day for which he is to be paid?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady has asked me a question similar to the one she asked last Thursday, as reported in Hansard at page 4322. The hon. member's question was:

Has the minister received information to the effect that notwithstanding his assurance given to members of the unemployed delegation who visited Ottawa ten days ago, they have been deprived of their unemployment insurance benefits for the day of that visit?

I advised the hon. member that I had turned over the correspondence I had received to the unemployment insurance commission. That correspondence was signed by Mr. Heinz Richter, chairman of the Welland union of unemployed. On the basis of the information I have now received from the unemployment insurance commission I am dispatching today the following answer to Mr. Richter:

I referred the question to the unemployment insurance commission who inform me that the individual cases are now being decided by the adjudicating authorities authorized under the provisions of the act. The question at issue is whether the person concerned has maintained his availability for work.

Section 54 (2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act reads in part:

"An insured person is disqualified from receiving benefit in respect of every day for which he fails to prove that he was

(a) capable of and available for work".

This is a statutory requirement that permits of no discretionary powers.

This means that a claimant must be ready, able and willing to immediately accept suitable work. The claimants concerned are unlikely to be considered as having fulfilled this requirement on the day(s) engaged in the meeting that took place in Ottawa.

It is for this reason that benefit has been withheld pending decision of the adjudicating authorities.

Miss LaMarsh: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the hon. member would mind deferring her supplementary question until after the adjournment.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Miss LaMarsh: I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that among the delegation there were between 600 and 1,000 unemployed, can the minister say, bearing in mind that there were only some 60 from the county of Welland, whether individuals from any other riding in Ontario have been deprived of their day's benefit as a result of coming to Ottawa with the delegation.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The first part of the hon. lady's statement is incorrect. As to the second part, I have had communications from three individuals. That is the extent to which this matter has been brought to my attention.

PUBLICATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has in his hands the report of the royal commission on publications and, if so, when a copy will be tabled in the house.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The Prime Minister is not holding the report of that royal commission, nor has he received it.

PIPE LINES

POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION OF OIL LINE TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Can the Prime Minister say whether any decision has been reached by the government concerning the construction of a pipe line to Montreal?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): That, as the hon. gentleman knows, is a matter of government policy, and when and if the government has an announcement to make it will be made in the house.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

REQUEST FOR INCLUSION OF HIGHWAY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Perhaps it could appear in Hansard and be taken as notice, or answered by the acting minister. Has the minister received a communication by telegram from the minister of highways of British Columbia, Mr. Gaglardi, requesting that the section of highway on Vancouver island from Nanaimo north to Port Hardy be declared as coming under the Trans-Canada Highway Act and, if so, what consideration is being given to this request.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Acting Minister of Public Works): I will bring the question to the attention of the minister, and he will advise the hon. member at the first opportunity.

[Mr. Starr.]

INDUSTRY

SHIPBUILDING—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he expects to be in a position before the end of the month to announce the government's proposals for aiding the shipbuilding industry in view of the urgency of getting shipbuilding started again.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I have already answered that question a couple of times and, as I have said, this is a matter of government policy. When there is an announcement it will be made at the proper time in the house.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION OF STUDENTS ENGAGED IN BAN THE BOMB ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he would comment on the charges given much coverage in the press that the R.C.M.P. are checking on the background of high school students active in ban the bomb movements.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I have not seen much coverage of that question in the press.

Mr. Fisher: Has the minister not seen the stories in the Montreal Star, the Toronto Star and the Toronto Telegram of yesterday expressing the reaction of one father who is complaining about the R.C.M.P. questioning his daughter, who has been active in the ban the bomb movement in Montreal?

Mr. Fulton: No. If the hon. gentleman cares to bring an individual complaint to my attention it will be investigated.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REPORT OF DR. CLARK—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he has yet completed his study of the Clark report, which deals with the old age security contributory system in the United States and, if he has, whether he expects to make an announcement in this house before May 29 next.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I have said many times, I have been studying this report very carefully. My department and other departments concerned have also been studying it. As to any announcement, that would, of course, be made in the ordinary way on the floor of the house after a decision had been reached.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO CONSISTENCY OF AMENDING BILL AND BILL OF RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Justice whether he has had an opportunity to examine Bill No. C-76, in the name of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, to see whether any of its provisions are inconsistent with the bill of rights.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): That matter was discussed when the bill to amend the Fisheries Act was before the house, and I have nothing to add to what I had to say then.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

National parks branch—

283. Branch administration, national parks and historic sites and monuments, $268,584.

Mr. Winch: Vote No. 283 has to do with the administration of the national parks branch, and includes the national parks and historic sites and monuments sections. I should like to speak for a few minutes on the aspect of historic sites and monuments. In this house in the past I have always given every support I possibly could to the establishment and maintenance of historic sites and monuments. I have also expressed the view that we are not paying sufficient attention to this question, and that we are not spending sufficient money on it. I have expressed my belief that this section does not have sufficient personnel to be able to devote sufficient care to a matter which is important now and which will be increasingly important in the years ahead with the development of Canada.

In the past I have spoken in generalities in support of the work of this section of the national parks branch, but this afternoon I should like to do something which I have not done before and particularize on a matter which is of great concern to myself and to my constituency. I should like to ask the minister and the departmental officials in charge of this branch to give consideration to the establishment of an historic site in Vancouver East. I am certain that all hon. members will realize that Vancouver is the largest city in western Canada and the third largest city in Canada and that, as a port on the Pacific coast, it is the gateway to the Pacific. As development takes place, there is no question at all that Vancouver, important as it is now to the Canadian economy, will grow in importance.

I realize that the officials of the national historic sites and monuments board are interested in the development of sites of national interest, but I suggest that no site is of interest only in a national respect but must also be of interest to provincial and local authorities. I understand that attention has been drawn to a particular historic site in Vancouver, and it happens that the site to which I have reference is situated in the constituency of Vancouver East. This site is in the northeastern section of my riding and by the grace of the fates, or by the grace of God, it is the most important historic site on the Pacific coast.

I refer to a five acre plot of land which is now being used as pasture and as a playground for children. This area of land has not been desecrated by the development of industry, the establishment of buildings, or the expansion of the exhibition board in Vancouver. The city of Vancouver began its growth on this five acre site in the northeastern section of Vancouver East. The first government administration was originally located on this site, as well as the first post office and the first customs collection office.

Perhaps I could take a few moments to give the historic background of this area and its importance not only to the city of Vancouver and the province of British Columbia but to the whole of Canada. The area is bordered by Burrard inlet. The first settlement of what is now the city of Vancouver was in this area in 1869. In the same year Mr. O. M. Hocking built the first barn, established the first float, and saw the first bridge built over Burrard inlet from this site. In 1869 Mr. Hocking was the first customs collection officer on the Pacific coast, and in that same year the first post office on the Pacific coast was established in that same area. Also at that time the first telegraph system was started on the Pacific coast, known as the Brighton telegraph company. Mr. Hocking could perhaps be regarded as a squatter at that time, because it was not until a few years later that the first blocks of land were put up for sale. It was as a result of that sale that the first post office, first customs collection office, and the first hotel, the New Brighton, were established.

I think it is significant that during the establishment of all these firsts, to which I have referred, this five acre area has not been desecrated or swallowed up by expansion or modern developments. I cannot conceive of this situation continuing very much longer unless speedy action is taken to recognize the significance of this as an historical site, and suggest that consideration be given to its development by the national authority, by the provincial authority and by the officials of the city of Vancouver itself.

I have been advised by that most fabulous man, Major J. S. Matthews, V.D., the Vancouver city archivist, that this matter has been brought to the attention of the federal department, and he feels convinced that if speedy action is taken by the authorities of the city, the province and the federal government in recognizing this area as an historic site, the citizens of Vancouver will be very interested and helpful in developing that five acre block by the reconstruction of the site as it existed in the years 1869 and 1886.

It is very fortunate that there are still in existence, and available, photographs of that area as it was in those years. I have in my hand at the moment a photograph which depicts the exact situation as it was in the years I have mentioned, so it would be quite possible to create an exact replica of the area. I am particularly interested in that site as it existed in 1886, when the first hotel on the Pacific coast was built, as well as the first post office and first customs office, as shown in this picture which I have in my hand.

The reason I am taking up the time of the committee is to bring this particular matter to the attention of the minister and to ask for early and speedy consideration of the acquisition and maintenance of this most historic site in western Canada in the northeast corner of my own constituency. I can assure the minister of the need for early action. I can also assure him that if he can give us any indication of interest in and support of this site by this branch of his department, the citizens of Vancouver in general and the citizens of the Vancouver East federal riding in particular will be glad to cooperate in any way they possibly can. I assure the minister that money will be forthcoming to establish a replica in that five acre area, which is now being used as a pasture and playground, of what was the situation in 1869 and 1886. I hope the minister can give me some assurance of his interest in this matter, and that speedy consideration will be given to the request of my constituents with respect to this historic site in the third largest city of Canada.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Chairman, this is my first opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The pleasure is all the deeper owing to the fact that his is my neighbouring constituency to the south.

I was very pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East, because I am on the same beam. I agree with everything he has said. Of course we rarely agree on other matters, but I have an historical site in the constituency of Marquette. We all know that all we have left is something to remind us of how our country was explored, how the great west was opened up to the fur trade and following that to agriculture. The west is dotted with historical sites. At some of them battles were fought with the natives. Other sites are the places where the fur trade and commerce played a great part in the development of that country.

It is pathetic, Mr. Chairman, to go in my constituency to a site which 130 years ago was the centre of the western fur trade—that was long before the settlers came—and find that all that can be seen there are sunken graves, a few stone markers, rotted crosses to mark the old cemetery where the whites and the natives were buried, and so on. You can still see very slight traces of the stone foundations and the broken up bake ovens; the lines of the stockade are still traceable.

The site I am referring to is old Fort Ellice, about which much has been written in the history of Manitoba. One hundred and thirty years ago—this was after the two rival fur trading companies had amalgamated—a fort was built five miles below the mouth of the Qu'Appelle river on the steep banks of the Assiniboine river. It was a stopping point on the cart trail between Winnipeg and Edmonton. The land belonged to the Assiniboine Indians. The purpose of the fort was to catch the Indian fur trappers and prevent them from going south to trade with the United States fur traders. Since it was on the Assiniboine, it was also a waterway from Winnipeg to the fort. At this fort 50 years ago there were many wagon trails. Trails of the Red river carts converged in various directions from Fort Ellice and to Fort Ellice, as do rail lines coming into Winnipeg. All that is left of that fort, Mr. Chairman, are just very few traces of what was once a great fur trading post.

In 1930 the municipality, with assistance from local municipalities, erected a beautiful cairn to mark the spot. It stands a few feet outside marks where the palisade once stood. The village of St. Lazare, which I am proud to say is inhabited mainly by French Canadians, is enterprising enough to have started rebuilding this fort by its own efforts. In due course I will tell the committee why. Last year they cut poles to rebuild the stockade. They want to restore the buildings and establish a museum on the spot. Through their organized efforts they wish to preserve this historic gateway to Edmonton.

I might add, Mr. Chairman, that in 1936 the historic sites and monuments board looked into the matter of Fort Ellice but no action was taken. In September, 1960 the board's fur trade committee examined Fort Ellice together with other western fur trading sites, and placed it ninth in the order of importance. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister the opinion of my constituents and of the Canadian people to the effect that anything worth preserving is of sufficient importance that it cannot be graded up or down. It is either worth preserving or it is not. True, no battles were fought, no blood was shed at this particular fort, but a battle was fought against the elements, against nature; a battle was fought to blaze trails for the fur traders; a battle was fought to blaze trails for the settlers who subsequently came to this area.

Now the area is a thriving farming community. The local people for miles around can take pride in this old site. They are prepared to do as much as possible on their own. The people of this area feel sure, Mr. Chairman, that this department, under the able leadership of a man who knows this area and knows this constituency, will give assistance. We still have photographs and plans of the old fort. The people want to restore it so that future generations will know this is the spot to which the first white man came and laid claim to the western prairies. I hope the minister will take note of this particular site. My people are very much concerned about it. As a matter of fact, so far as historical sites are concerned this is the only request I have to make.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a question, through you, to the minister concerning the highway through Riding Mountain national park. I do not know whether this subject should be dealt with under this item or under item 285.

Mr. Dinsdale: Either one.

Mr. Mandziuk: Then I shall deal with it under item 285.

Mr. McCleave: I have a few brief remarks with regard to what I described the other day as the shining jewel in the historical part of the empire of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. This concerns the Halifax citadel, easily the most popular historical site in Canada, at least from the standpoint of visitors.

I have two problems in relation thereto. First, there is some complaint that the noon gun now being fired from citadel hill, a gun which has been fired for well over a century, is now housed in a building which one editorial writer at least likens to an old barn. It is to be hoped that before the tourist season is upon us some steps can be taken to bring the gun out into the open. I can assure the minister that the men who handle this weapon in Halifax are quite accustomed to the elements and will not mind the two or three days of the year when some fog or rain may be about.

The other problem, sir, is that the gun being fired now is a rather modern weapon. There are in that area, I am told, several 24-pounders which were used back in 1812. It might be a fitting historical note if one of these old pieces were to be found and placed in operation. I commend both these problems to, I am sure, the sympathetic consideration of the minister.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I should like to say a word or two to the minister about national parks policy. If it should be in any way construed that in so doing I am saying something unkind to him, I hope that, he will understand I am suggesting that it is time to take a new look at our general policy for parks. I would like to make it clear that in no way should it be inferred that I am criticizing the officials who have the responsibility of administering the National Parks Act, who for the most part, as I am sure all hon. members agree, are a dedicated group of civil servants. They have a very difficult time in carrying out the administration of an act which I suggest in its concept is somewhat impractical and to some degree outdated.

I rise on this occasion because I do not think there is a greater number of individual problems brought to my attention, not just by the people within my own constituency but from many areas, than those which relate to the difficulties in respect of national parks and their administration. I want to say to the minister that I think we all appreciate the fact that he, perhaps more than any of the gentlemen who have held this office save his immediate predecessor, has shown a great deal of interest in improving the situation. It is because of this that I am taking advantage of this time to make suggestions to him.

May I first of all read very briefly the first principle of the National Parks Act, which states that the parks are hereby dedicated to the people of Canada for their benefit, education and enjoyment, subject to the provisions of this act and the regulations; and such parks shall be so maintained and made use of as to leave them unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations.

Now, in this rather colorful and interesting language we find the first difficulty. In fact this language produces a conflict between those people whom we might generally describe as conservationists, those people who would like to see the parks kept in their natural, raw state, and the large body of people who wish to use the parks for recreational purposes. I have a copy of a speech which the minister delivered at Jasper park, and he points out that the parks are, in fact, living museums of nature. Of course, we all agree with that statement. He went on further to say that they are to be maintained so as to leave them unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations.

Having said this, he points out the great advantages of recreation, and then said that artificial recreational facilities cannot be permitted to develop to the point where they compete with the natural attractions that draw visitors to the parks. We certainly say amen to that. This statement however points out a contradiction which makes the administration of the parks extremely difficult for the officials, because how does one decide what is too much park development? Where do you draw the line? How do you write such a line of demarcation into legislation?

This, of course, is a never ending problem with which we are faced, and upon which the Crawford report comments. In fact the Crawford report states that all of us accept the fact there has to be some development. In the opening statement the report dealing with controls describes the element by which we determine how much is enough in terms of park development. This opening statement acknowledges:

> That if there are to be visitors to the parks, then the parks cannot remain as examples of completely unspoiled nature.

In other words if we are to use the parks, if we are to have people coming from many other areas, and thus benefit our tourist trade, then we have to expect some development. If we are going to encourage people to come into our parks, especially when they are competing with other areas for the tourist dollar, then we are going to have to provide facilities which will persuade them to come back again. If we are going to promote international ski competitors throughout the world to come, we are going to have to provide facilities. If we are going to ask people to come and bring their youngsters and enjoy the natural scenic beauty of the parks, then I suggest once again we are going to have to provide more facilities for these youngsters and for the adults themselves.

I am sure hon. members can recall an alleged statement of one of our colleagues to the effect that there is not very much for honeymooners to do in one particular park in Canada. I think basically his remark was correct. I am only sorry he put this one particular group of people in this category. I argue that we can provide a great many more facilities in terms of amusement without destroying the basic concept of the parks. It is because of this I am going to suggest how we might approach the problem.

I do not for a moment want any enthusiastic conservationist to jump up and suggest that I am going to argue that we turn the parks into Coney islands, that we clutter them up with too many facilities and too many bright lights or that we destroy the natural qualities. No, Mr. Chairman; I would oppose that procedure just as much as anyone else However, I suggest that the line must be drawn. I suggest that we might take one of two courses, either by zoning the park areas, and permit a program of orderly development, and then keep the balance of the parks in their natural state.

After all, we have 42,000 square miles of parks. That is a fairly substantial area. Many of the townsites could be still further improved without in any way destroying the natural qualities of the surrounding areas. In fact if you zone many of these parks—and the ones I am most familiar with are Banff and Lake Louise—you have natural geographical divisions in which these boundaries could be readily recognized, and you would not then have this conflict with the conservationist who wished to keep the outlying areas, as I have said, in their natural state. Let me say that I would then support the conversationist on this principle. In fact I would not even permit the extension of some of the developments that have taken place in many areas which could be kept in their native state, after we had established expanded recreational areas properly zoned.

I go back to the point I made initially, namely that in those areas which we have zoned for the development of townsites, I think we are being entirely too restrictive with regard to what is permitted, and the basis on which we are prepared to allow the construction of the particular facilities.

I suggest that there is a second alternative. The first one I mentioned is by a zoning principal. The second alternative is that we might be able to carry out a grading of parks themselves; that is to say, park A in a particular province could be termed a nature museum, as the minister has described. Park B could be developed for additional recreational facilities, but not to the extent where we are going to have vast masses of people crawling all over the place and making it literally, as I have said previously, a Coney island, but still providing more facilities than we provide now. Perhaps there could be a further grade of parks. In this case we could have a clearly defined policy and not attempt to satisfy all sides of the argument because, I suggest, we are not now really satisfying any argument.

I raise this matter, Mr. Chairman, for an obvious reason. First of all I think we need to review our general concept of the park policy approach in terms of the way in which the act is written. More specifically, however, may I say this. This house is, of course, aware that Banff has been selected as the Canadian site to hold the 1968 winter games, and here we are going to have these conflicts brought into perspective when we ask the park officials to carry out a development program in order to assist us to secure the games, I am sure will offend the sensibilities of some of our officials who believe that the parks must be kept in their natural state, and we therefore have the conflict all over again.

I wish to say that we have had nothing but absolute co-operation from them up to this point, and perhaps my fears are not well founded. However, I am making this suggestion in order to avoid any possibility of difficulty. Surely we can recognize that in Banff, as an example, we already have invested some $96 million. If we are going to use that $96 million to the extent that the government of that day expected the return should be in relation to the people who would enjoy it. We must remember that these facilities, in terms of the amount I have mentioned, really are open for a season of only some three months in terms of even a quarter to half of their potential capacity, and that for the balance of the year the park is relatively vacant.

Our initial concept of bringing the games to Banff was to make Banff more than a one season proposition; to utilize the slopes and the facilities that were there to make it the outstanding winter attraction certainly of Canada if not of the North American continent. This does not mean that we need to deface to any extent what nature has made so beautiful in this area. What it in effect is asking is that we have from the parks officials and in particular from the minister some understanding of the difficulty we shall have if the present regulations continue. We shall necessarily be obliged to construct certain buildings. Obviously you are going to have to remove some trees in order to complete one or two of the jumps or downhill runs. All this is going to require a great deal of co-operation. For this reason I suggest that here is an opportunity for us to carry out one of the alternatives I have mentioned, either in terms of grading Banff as a national park or in zoning a particular area of it.

I would just close with this thought, Mr. Chairman. I have said I have every sympathy with those who wish to enjoy the vast areas that have been set aside in Canada for national parks. I myself, perhaps, would take the view of the conservationists more than the advantage that may come through the recreational facilities. But I see no conflict if the suggestion I have made is followed to any extent. If it is not followed, however, the present situation will continue; and as I suggested at the outset, I think the present situation really does not satisfy either argument.

Before taking my seat may I just say this to the minister. Through his parks department and through the Crawford report he has made a comprehensive examination of the relationship of the people within the parks area, the residents of the parks, to the government of Canada and to the people of Canada as a whole. I think for the most part the residents who live within the parks are not unhappy with the basic conclusions which Mr. Crawford reached, in which he states that they have never asked for any real form of self-government. It is recognized that the government of the day must have control over the vast sums of money spent by the federal treasury on the national parks. On the other hand there are two recommendations made suggesting a far closer liaison with the occupants of the park, and I think this is something on which we can still improve considerably.

I think in replying the minister might indicate to the committee what has been done in response to the suggestion that a line of communication be established between the elected bodies within the parks and the departmental officials carrying out the joint responsibilities; whether or not the conference suggested has been held; whether there has been collaboration on mutual problems; whether senior officials have visited the area, and so on; whether these recommendations suggested in the Crawford report have been carried out.

Finally I would ask, in terms of the whole problem, if when he replies the minister would be kind enough to indicate whether it is possible, in order to assist Banff in getting the 1968 Olympic games, to set up a committee to work with the Calgary Olympic organization so we could discuss many of the related problems we shall have prior to presenting the brief before the international Olympic board in 1963.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the hon. gentleman takes his seat I wonder whether I could ask him a question. Can the hon. gentleman elaborate at all on those incentives to honeymooners to which he referred at the beginning of his remarks?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I am sorry, but I did not hear the question. Will the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate repeat it?

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked whether the hon. gentleman would care to elaborate on those incentives for honeymooners in national parks to which he referred earlier.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, as has happened in the past, of course, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was not paying attention. I was quoting a remark made by one of our colleagues, and I think if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate comes out to Banff national park he will understand something of the amenities that are there for all of us.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. member a question. Is it not correct that he expanded fully on this theme in committee during consideration of the estimates of the tourist publicity bureau?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, if the question was whether I expanded on this matter before, the answer is no.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Chairman, the other day when I asked the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to consider preserving the home of Nellie McClung in Manitou as a national historic site, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made what I consider a rather facetious remark. He said he was glad I had proposed the name of a prominent Liberal as a national memorial.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was sincere.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): The hon. member says that was sincere. I agree, of course, that there have been some Liberals, however scarce, down through the years who merit national recognition. In proposing Nellie McClung's home as a national historic site I had no political motive in mind. As a result of this facetious interruption I failed to obtain an answer from the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and I ask that the minister give consideration to this proposal.

The Chairman: I must indicate to the hon. member that this question could be dealt with under item No. 285 later on.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, as an Albertan and a former Calgarian, and one who knows the park at Banff very intimately, I would like to associate myself with everything that has been said by the hon. member for Calgary South. I believe wholeheartedly that on the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains we have the most magnificent scenery and the most magnificent natural advantages for all types of winter sports to be found in any part of the world.

Let me say this. I shall be brief, and I direct these remarks to the minister. There is, sir, a passing of time. We are moving from the man-hour days to the days of automation, and we are extremely anxious in our particular section of the province, which is the southeast corner of Alberta, to preserve some of the machines of yesterday, the tools of yesterday, the products of man-hours of yesterday, and compare these with those which are today produced by machines.

I respectfully suggest to the minister—and he will receive a formal request from our local agencies—that there should be created across this country, as there is in Saskatoon with respect to farm machinery, facilities for the preservation of the lore of yesterday, and the day before yesterday, in museums across the country. In our part of the province we have very, very great traditions. The words "Medicine Hat" mean the throwing of a hat by a medicine man across a river. That lore should be preserved. We have the lore of the early days of grain milling in Medicine Hat. We have the days of the very early rudimentary implements. We have the days of hand tools. Today these things are passing.

Young people of today—and there are many of them in the galleries—will never know of these things unless we preserve them. I suggest that museums across the country—I am speaking particularly of my own area—would be of great benefit for the preservation of the history of Canada 50 years from now.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be of considerable interest to the people of Saskatchewan if the minister, when he replies would outline the general developments which are taking place at Waskesiu park and which have already taken place since last year's estimates were considered, and would also bring the public up to date on the developments at Emma lake following the completion of the dam there.

During the course of the summer we hope the minister will be able to visit Waskesiu. A great many Saskatoon people go to Waskesiu, as do people from other parts of Saskatchewan, and they regard it almost as their park. I am sure if the minister visited this park and talked to the people on the park grounds they would be very pleased to tell him of their problems, their plans, their hopes for the future development of this major park in Saskatchewan. I am sure the minister would find it very pleasant and delightful to walk around and meet the people there. He would get to know their problems in this way. I hope when the minister makes his reply he will be able to include within his remarks an acceptance of this invitation made on behalf of the people of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, at this point in the discussion of the administration of the parks I should also like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary South who said that a review of the National Parks Act is long over due. The Wood Buffalo national park is about 90 per cent within my constituency of Athabasca. When it comes to developing timber and prospecting in the Wood Buffalo park, because of the regulations in the act the minister's department is unable to take a realistic approach to matters affecting that park. These regulations require changes to make orderly development possible.

I am very pleased to see that appropriations have been made for putting a road in there, but that subject will come up in another debate. Under the administration item I think I am on safe ground in mentioning the hiring of summer labour. At this time, when there are literally thousands of high school and university students coming out of school and seeking employment, it is going to be very hard to place them in jobs unless we can expand several of our government departments in order to handle this type of labour. Most of these young people are high in intelligence and book learning but they lack experience in any of the skilled trades. By working in the parks they could improve their health, travel across the country and get to know it, get out into the fresh air, meet young people from other parts of Canada, and earn a few dollars to help them get through school and, after getting through school, to university. Today the family income is strained. Taxes are high and employment is relatively low. These young people, not wishing to be a burden on their families, are often forced to leave school, and then they just add to the unskilled labour force.

I implore the minister to use all his influence with the government to obtain a much larger appropriation for summer labour. I suggest that perhaps his department should co-operate with the provincial departments of health and the provincial education authorities to put summer employment on some sort of a merit basis so high school and university students could get an opportunity to work in our parks and on historic sites. If they are short of work in these parks we could undertake such projects as beautifying the right of way along the trans-Canada highway and improving the right of way along the Canadian National Railways.

If this work does not come directly under the minister's department I suggest that suitable arrangements could be made, because today we require close liaison between all departments of government. I should like to see the minister call in his colleagues the Minister of Labour, the minister of health and the Minister of Transport to find out what work has to be done in connection with these other departments. I know the whole country would be pleased to see these young people go to work as soon as they are out of school and earn the dollars which are greatly needed to help them this fall.

Mr. Payne: I should like to pass along through the hon. member for Calgary South congratulations and best wishes from the people of the Garibaldi area on the recent honour conferred on Banff national park in being chosen as Canada's candidate for an Olympic site. We wish them every success. We know full well that the hospitality of Calgary and Banff will be developed to its highest point. It is a hospitality which is already widely renowned throughout our land. We trust we may join with them in attending the Olympic winter games when they occur. We are sure this will be a fitting event to cap the celebration of Canada's centennial year. If assistance is required, we would like to offer it in any way we can.

Speaking more specifically of that beautiful coastal and mountain region known as the Garibaldi area in my riding—perhaps it is now even better known as a result of its recent competition for selection as a winter Olympic site—there are a few words, maybe words of suggestion, that I might be permitted to pass along to the minister at this time. As we are well aware, the area to which I have referred is provincial crown land and is held by the government of British Columbia as a forestry reserve. Frankly, we from the Garibaldi region together, I think, with a high proportion of those from the lower mainland of British Columbia, feel the time has come when the shadow boxing, the sparring and certain of the other interesting but futile experiences of the past could well be forgotten. The time has come when another approach should be made by the minister and his department to the government of British Columbia in a manner offering full co-operation.

The area as now delineated, known as Garibaldi park, includes much land which does not fit the requirements for park development; a rather large section is a valuable forestry reserve which should best be used in the commercial operations of forestry. I feel that a broader view, an attitude of give and take, would do a great deal to make the utility and beauty of Garibaldi park available to the public of Canada and to the vast numbers of United States tourists who visit the Pacific coast region during both winter and summer months.

One of the first suggestions I would make is that a study be undertaken of the area involved, including those great reaches which stretch into the riding of my colleague the hon. member for Fraser Valley, to see whether these might be returned to the province for use in the forest industry. A little give and take right now on such matters as park boundaries could bring into being a practical, long range development which would do much to meet the needs of the congested lower mainland and contribute in a major way to earning dollars through the tourist industry.

There is one other point I should like to make with respect to Garibaldi park. Only on Canada's Pacific coast are the people of this nation denied the facilities of a national park. I think this is something which might well be kept in mind. I plead again with the minister, and I plead likewise with the officials of the government of British Columbia, to re-enter negotiations in connection with the development of Garibaldi park as a co-operative effort, recognizing the need and usefulness of developing this great alpine area.

Before I resume my seat I should like to ask the minister whether in his reply he would care to comment on certain observations made by his predecessor before the committee on mines, forests and waters two years ago, when the present Minister of Agriculture indicated that studies were under way to bring into being a new program designed for the recreational development of certain areas such as the one I am now discussing. The thought developed at that time, before the committee was that certain limitations existed in the National Parks Act which the minister felt did not entirely meet the needs of development not only in the area of Garibaldi but in other areas of Canada as well.

In winding up my remarks I would do two things. I would ask the minister to say something respecting the progress of discussions regarding the creation and development of these recreational areas in Canada. Second, I should like to repeat the request, supported, I am sure, by people throughout the lower mainland of British Columbia, that another approach be made to the government of the province of British Columbia in a spirit of co-operation, in a final effort to bring to Canada and, certainly, to the people of my province the fruits and benefits of Garibaldi park, which is so badly needed at this time.

Mr. Stewart: I have no intention at this time of holding up the passage of the minister's estimates but I think I would be very remiss if I did not bring to the attention of the minister and of this committee a need which arises in my constituency.

I wish first of all to congratulate the minister on his appointment. This has been my first opportunity of doing so. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say to him that he brings to his post integrity, honesty and a vision of Canada as it might be and should be in the future. I think the people of Canada can be justly proud of the contribution he has made, and I am sure we all look forward with great assurance to his making a still greater contribution.

We have heard from the far east and the far west as well as from the middle west about national parks and historic sites. If antiquity lends any priority, I should like to tell the hon. members of this house that on a little island in the St. Croix river, in the year 1604, before the west was even heard of or known, Champlain and a small group of hardy settlers spent their first winter in this country, and then moved on to Annapolis Royal to establish the first white settlement on the North American continent. This little island in the river which forms the boundary line between the province of New Brunswick and the great American republic to the south is called Docket's island. It became very important when our good friends to the south attempted later to establish that the "island" in the river mentioned in the old treaty referred to the St. John river and not the St. Croix. However, the discovery of human bones on Docket's island, left from Champlain's voyage, established for all time that the boundary river referred to in the original treaty was the St. Croix. That area has had very important historical significance in the development of the maritime area.

This government has also seen fit to co-operate with the government of the province of New Brunswick in the building of a bridge connecting the state of Maine with the island of Campobello, which will bring an influx of residents and tourists to the area. There is also, in various stages of development, an investigation into the Passamaquoddy development project. I should like to refer the minister particularly to the fact that on this island of Campobello was one of the first settled areas in the maritimes, and the home of the late Franklin Delano Roosevelt is located there. I am sure all hon. members will readily recall the part that late president played during the hectic days of world war II. I feel, as I am sure all my constituents do, that the acquisition and development of this home and the formation of an historical site there would be a great attraction for tourists to the southwestern part of New Brunswick.

I commend these matters to the attention of the minister, realizing that he is anxious to develop all parts of Canada, but would assure him that in my constituency we have one of the most important locations for the development of an historical site which, if developed, would serve as an historical monument for all time.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I would like to lend my support to the remarks of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano regarding the advantage which would accrue from the establishment of a national park on the Pacific coast. I remind the minister that this is the only area in Canada where there is not a national park. I believe we should have one there.

I particularly draw the minister's attention to certain matters regarding the development of national historic sites. This subject occupies some 12 lines in the annual report of this branch, but it seems to me that perhaps a bit more emphasis should be given to the development of these historic sites. For instance, a bridge is being built over the Fraser canyon at Alexandria, to be called the Alexandria bridge. The federal government is contributing 90 per cent of the cost of constructing this bridge. At the west end of the old bridge there is a stone cairn erected to the memory of the royal engineers who built the Cariboo road. Many times I have seen tourists stop to read the inscription on this cairn. I am wondering whether, in the development of the new bridge, this cairn will be left to disintegrate at its present location.

I suggest that the preservation of historic sites must be a responsibility of the federal government, although I am not denying that this is the responsibility of governments at all levels as well.

Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a full page advertisement which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of May 5, 1961 and I would like to read the article appearing there under the heading "Renaissance at Recollet". That article reads as follows:

> The new Toronto-Dominion bank building, rising at the corner of St. James and McGill streets, has its foundations deep in the historical soil of old Montreal.
> Facing on St. James street and reaching back along McGill to Notre Dame street, the building occupies a site within the ancient limits of "the city within the walls".
> The Recollet gate, which was the western gateway to Montreal, stood where Notre Dame and McGill streets now join. This was the gateway of the explorers, the missionaries, the soldiers, the traders. It was the gateway to history.
> The gate, and the monastery that gave it its name, have long since been swallowed by time and progress.

Progress is represented by great rectangular buildings of glass and aluminum and, while they are necessary, it is my opinion that steps should be taken to protect anything which is of value in an historical or traditional sense. There exists in Vancouver an old vessel named the St. Roch, which is rotting because its maintenance is beyond the financial capacity of the city. The city did build a maritime museum as a centennial project, and it was suggested that the St. Roch should be part of that museum. I am wondering whether the St. Roch is an important part of our national fabric. If so, should one set a price on this history?

It seems to me there is room, within the field this branch of the department occupies, for expansion and for greater and wider thinking directed toward the preservation of those historic items of importance to Canada. I suggest that the minister and the officials of his department are the custodians and caretakers of these historic items and sites for our future generations, and that if an historic item is destroyed it can never be replaced no matter how much money is spent in the attempt.

I suggest, therefore, that his officials give consideration to preserving the St. Roch as an historic vessel, occupying a place in our history, in the same way that the British people have done in respect to Nelson's flagship. I do not suggest that the St. Roch occupies a similar position of importance, but when viewed within the framework of the relatively short length of this nation's history, this vessel has played an historic part in the development of the north and surely should be considered as such and perpetuated for generations to come.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, as you know, I have the honour of representing in this house the riding where you were born. That is why I am sure you will welcome my remarks, but I shall be brief.

You and I have learned, from our earliest childhood, the glorious feats of arms of our ancestors in the St. Hyacinthe area during the troubles of 1837.

We have learned too that they took an active part in the development of French civilization in Canada. You and I, as well as all those who had the opportunity of studying Canadian history, have learned the full meaning of the word native land, and we have learned to love our country.

In French Canada, gallant men have given their lives because they believed in their rights. Suffice it to recall a few names: Nelson, Chenier, Papineau, and many others who have contributed to reveal the valour of the French Canadian race.

During the years 1837 and 1838, troubles temporarily spread discord between the two races which make up Canada today. Never has there been as many people as there are today of our racial allegiance, who appreciate responsible government.

Alas, no trace of these glorious feats of arms performed by these great Canadians remains in the villages of Saint-Denis, Saint-Charles, Saint-Antoine, Saint-Marc and Saint-Eustache.

I would therefore ask the minister to have at least a monument erected in their honour to commemorate their patriotism and show future generations that it is worthwhile to have faith in one's convictions.

I am thinking at the moment, Mr. Chairman, of the coming generations. It is essential that they be taught that any set of values must be based on firm beliefs.

I hope that the minister will pay particular attention to my suggestion.

Together with the people I have the honour to represent here, I will be grateful to him to commemorate in stone the achievements of our ancestors; future generations will then have a further reason to love their country and to strive for good.

(Text):

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Vancouver South spoke for a few moments about the St. Roch. I should like to point out that this very famous vessel is berthed in my area. I hope a way will be found whereby that vessel can be saved. It needs extensive repairs, as has been pointed out. I understand that shortly the city of Vancouver will request the federal government to join with the city and perhaps with the province in some arrangement to share the cost. Certainly that vessel must not be destroyed, and must not be allowed to rot. It is just too famous a vessel to meet that fate. It is named after a Quebec town. It has the word "Ottawa" written on the bow and on the stern, and the classic letters "R.C.M.P." at various places.

I should like to turn for a few minutes to the matter of the national parks. First of all, I must indicate at the start just how disappointed we were to find that the coast area was not chosen as the Canadian site for the winter Olympics of 1968. We in that area cannot hide that disappointment, because we did everything within our power to bring to the attention of the Canadian Olympic Association the great advantages of developing either Manning or Garibaldi park. We look forward now to giving strong support to the Calgary and Banff entry. We feel sure that excellent committee will begin to set the stage for the finest winter Olympics ever held.

I listened with a great deal of interest to what the hon. member for Calgary South had to say. I share his views, and I appreciate the problems to which he has referred. It has been most rewarding for the Garibaldi association to kind of square off with the very healthy organization at Calgary. The hon. member for Calgary South always seems to back a winning horse. We found the competition most keen, but it was exceedingly healthy. Therefore we look forward to visiting the Banff area once development takes place there.

This of course gives rise to another problem which was referred to by the hon. member for Calgary South. There must be strong co-operation by the parks department. My family was in that area at Christmas time. We found, for example, that trees could not be cut at the base of the sedan chair lift because apparently the park officials did not want the public to know that there was in fact a chair lift in that area. We stayed at the Post hotel, which does lack some facilities of a first-class hotel. I do not think we are ever going to be able to get United States tourists to come to that area unless we come up with first class hotels and motels in that locality.

I do not in any way wish to urge the authorities to serve liquor in those hotels, but I simply say that today's tourists do seem to want to be able to buy liquor, and at the present time you cannot buy a drink at the Post hotel. I would ask the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, to have his officials look into the matter, because we in the coast area are frankly sick and tired of being obliged to go to United States resorts, particularly when in British Columbia and Alberta we have some of the finest ski areas in the world. So we urge that the officials of the minister's department look into these matters carefully and pay particular attention to what I thought was a most reasonable suggestion concerning the zoning of park areas in order that the conservationists may be happy, and those who want to have a place of recreation can be satisfied. I felt that was one of the really fine suggestions made during this debate this afternoon.

I was at Squaw Valley, Mr. Chairman. I thought the show was a remarkable one. It was a thrilling sight to see the representatives of the nations of the world gathered in that area, an area which had been developed within a period of four years. Reports indicate now that Squaw Valley will be enlarged. The latest report concludes by saying that all people agree on one thing more, that Squaw Valley's future is bright. The report indicates that dormitories are being operated and already this winter have been completely filled during the week ends. Under another lease agreement the ice skating arena has been in almost constant public use since the closing of the games. The Olympic centre cafeteria and recreation hall is now open to the visiting public for meals and evening dancing.

Our position, Mr. Chairman, is that we from the coast area are now supporting the Banff and Calgary group to the utmost. As I have indicated before, we want to see a magnificent development there, an area which will entice all the people from the coast and from the states of Oregon, California, Washington and Colorado to come for a visit. We would like to feel that the Canadian Pacific will advertise in the Vancouver newspapers to encourage the young people to go up there. We would like to feel that the Canadian Pacific will provide special rates to the young people in order that they can get there. We would like to feel that, with the co-operation of the parks department, dormitories may be built in order that these young people can ski in the magnificent area at a moderate cost. We feel that all this is possible if there is a new policy adopted by the minister's department in respect of the development of recreational areas in the park.

I read with a great deal of interest a report by Mr. Jack McDowall, a copy of which appeared in one of the newspapers published in the Banff area. Mr. McDowall said this:

> Now it must surely be evident that the present arrangement of the western parks is satisfying no one. The conservationists are dissatisfied because primeval nature is not being preserved. The tourist industry is being crippled, and resort operators in the parks are being maddened, by attempts to compromise with the conservationists. Commercial interests are annoyed because the main routes pass through the national parks, where there is difficulty in providing adequate service facilities. The skiers, in ever growing numbers, are becoming impatient at the lack of good Canadian ski resorts and are spending their dollars abroad. But, in fact, the National Parks Act gives the government plenty of power to rectify this situation.

When there are so many people in the lower mainland part of British Columbia interested in a fine development at Banff, we hope there will be a change of policy in order that there may be a proper development which will in turn satisfy all Canadians.

Then I wanted to refer briefly to an article which appeared in Time magazine, April 14, 1961, which quotes the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The minister is reported as saying:

> "I have skied in a number of places in Europe and Canada, but this is the finest skiing I have had anywhere," said Hees amiably. "It's ridiculous for Canadians to be going to Aspen, Sun Valley and Squaw Valley when they have skiing like this at their back door."

The important part of the article follows, where a member of the parks department is reported to have said:

> "Private interests naturally are always putting pressure on the national parks system. Hees was going along. He is quite uninformed. Draw a 200 mile circle around Banff, and see what population it takes in."

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the minister that we will never be able to establish a proper winter Olympic site with that kind of attitude on the part of the parks department. The main burden of my remarks today is the hope, and it is the hope of all of us in the Vancouver area, that we do have the co-operation of the parks department in the staging of these winter events, and that they will be something of which Canadians will be proud.

I mentioned a few minutes ago that we were disappointed because we were not awarded the site in our area. The matter should not be dismissed at that point. I realize that we cannot be awarded a booby prize, but I hope the minister and his departmental officials will arrange an early meeting with the appropriate minister in British Columbia so we can settle this age old problem of the proper development of Garibaldi. I know that ever since the hon. member for Coast-Capilano came to the house he has been advocating the development of that area. I do hope the departmental officials will pay attention to what the hon. member has said, because he has suggested a reasonable compromise. I only hope that an early meeting can be brought about between the minister of northern affairs and the proper minister in the provincial cabinet.

I noticed a report in a Vancouver newspaper in November of 1960 which read as follows:

> Recreations minister Earle C. Westwood Tuesday promised to promote early action by the province to free Garibaldi park for federal development.

Soon after the Banff area was chosen as the Canadian site for the winter Olympics, an editorial writer in a Vancouver newspaper had this to say:

> The time is ripe for powerful Ottawa action to develop Garibaldi as a national park.

The most promising federal approach would seem to be to offer a specific development plan, saying for example how many dollars would be spent in the first five years of development.

Such a plan would make it difficult for the provincial government to go on evading, as it has for seven years, federal offers to take over Garibaldi. Only last month provincial recreations minister Westwood said B.C. would never turn over Garibaldi to Ottawa without a definite federal development plan.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the minister and the members of the house must know of the tremendous effort made by the Garibaldi Olympic development association to have the site of the winter Olympics established in the coast area. I hope that enthusiasm which is there will be harnessed and that we can get on with the early development of this park. Summer is approaching, and of course it will be necessary, now that the snow is gone, to get the area cleared in order that we may get skiers up into the Garibaldi area next year. It is for this reason that I strongly urge the minister to have an early meeting with the provincial authorities.

Mr. Regnier: I was speaking the other day in connection with the oldest building we have in western Canada, in the constituency of St. Boniface. I have not heard any comment from the minister in regard to this project. I know it has been studied for many years now by his department. I think the constituents of St. Boniface would now like to have some assurance with regard to the maintenance of this building as a museum.

The Chairman: May I indicate to hon. members who have any comments or remarks to make in connection with historic sites and monuments that they might defer them until we reach items 284 and 285. We are at present on item 283, which deals with the national parks branch administration.

Mr. Regnier: I have now said all I wanted to say.

The Chairman: I well realize that fact. I was not directing my remarks to the hon. member but rather to some other prospective speakers.

Mr. McFarlane: I just want to add a few words to what has already been said here this afternoon. In my own area we have parts of three national parks. I refer to Glacier national park, Yoho national park, and Kootenay national park. In recent years we have had a great deal of development going on in the parks. However, we feel that this development can be accelerated by good access roads to the area. Over a period of years pressure has been brought on various governments to improve the access roads into these parks. I should like to recommend to the minister that he give consideration to including a road from Kindersley through my own area of Cranbrook to Kimberley and through the lake Windermere valley to the three parks I have mentioned.

I also suggest that the minister should give some consideration to creating some new parks in British Columbia so we may decentralize some of our present tourist industry. I believe that in many of our parks the accommodations are crowded during the summer months and they are unable to handle all the tourist traffic that is coming into the various segregated areas. I note by the estimates that endless improvements have been made to 16 parks in Canada. However, no mention has been made of any development for the future.

I suggest to the minister that some consideration be given to developing the Cedar valley area in the Fernie district. As I believe you will know, Mr. Chairman, this area put in for the Olympic games, but we were unsuccessful in obtaining them for the district. I have had considerable correspondence with the minister. In fact I have here a letter to the minister from our parks association in that area requesting that this consideration be given. I should just like to quote part of the letter addressed to Hon. Walter Dinsdale, Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources:

—we have equally as attractive an area at Fernie without any such facilities. We are presently beginning to get a campaign going to get a new swimming pool, and hope to hear more about a recreational grant to be given by the province of British Columbia—

That is for the development of this area. Such a development will have a twofold effect on the district of East Kootenay. First it will help to stabilize the economy of the Fernie area. As you are aware, Mr. Chairman, the coal mines in the district closed down some two years ago. Since that time we have followed all leads to bring industry there to have the area developed in order to stabilize the economy.

Second, the area has a wonderful outlook for development as a park and conservation area. In addition, many areas now included in your national parks have reached the saturation point, as is the case in parts of the three national parks which are in my own area. I realize that extension in some parts has reached the limit, and I believe our only salvation is to create more parks in British Columbia to help the economy of all parts of the province, and to assist in bringing tourists to the southern section of the province.

There is just one more point I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. I wrote to the minister some time ago about establishing forestry camps for students during the summer months. This is a situation that I think should receive some consideration from the minister. His reply read in part as follows:

No special forestry camps have been operated by the national parks service since 1939, when a number of such camps were established in the parks under the national forestry program. The national parks service, however, does employ students over 18 years of age on various forestry, trail construction and maintenance, and engineering projects in the national parks each summer. The number of students employed on such work is not fixed but varies with the requirements for maintenance and development work in the individual parks in any year.

I would ask the minister to give consideration first to reducing the age limit from 18 years to 17 years. Out in western Canada our students grow up very quickly, and a lad 17 years old is just as capable of doing a man's work as a lad 18 or 19 years old. I therefore feel we have a point there. It would certainly be apreciated by me if the minister would give our 17-year olds consideration. I noticed a number of students in the gallery today. There is no doubt that a good many students will be looking forward to this coming summer. I think it would be a wonderful move on the part of the parks department to create camps that would get the boys out of the city in the summer months and give them a good healthy education with regard to the administration and the upkeep of our national parks.

There is just one other point. I wish to express my congratulations to the Calgary Olympic development association on obtaining the Olympic games, or at least obtaining consideration, because I believe the final decision will not be made until 1963. As far as the Canadian Olympic committee is concerned, Calgary has been approved as the site for the Olympic games, and I should like to offer my congratulations. I am sure all the residents of East Kootenay would be more than pleased to contribute their share in order to make the Olympic games a success in the event that they should come to this area.

Mr. Clancy: I should like to take a few minutes to speak on historic sites under item 283. Personally I think our historic sites and monuments in Canada are a national disgrace. You flash by on the highway and you see a rather rustic sign, two posts and two garbage cans, and when you pull in from the highway you cannot read the sign anyway.

However, I should like to get back to a local problem, and I wish to speak about old Fort Pelly. In these remarks I should like to associate myself with the hon. member for Mackenzie. Two years ago old Fort Pelly was recognized as an historic monument, but that was where it ended. I should like to point out to the committee that old Fort Pelly was the boundary line between the Hudson's Bay Company on the upper Assiniboine and the Northwest Company from Montreal. Hendry first surveyed the site. The important thing about this is that it is an historic site and this is history in the making. This is a local problem, but it is history in the making. I would not claim there is anyone alive today who remembers the first log being laid at old Fort Pelly, but in the upper Assiniboine there are men who were born in that area, and there are a few left who opened up that country. I think this site is worthy of being preserved as a national monument.

I was very interested last year to learn that some of these historic sites were being preserved and restored under the winter works program. It am sure the local associations in this area and in the province would be quite willing to supply a great deal of the material if a bit of a lead were given by the particular section of the department that these matters come under. I would be willing to hazard the guess that it would not cost the federal government too much money. Just a little lead is needed, so why not make some of these projects part of the winter works program? I am sure the materials could be gathered locally and would be donated freely by the local people. It is just a matter of hiring and paying wages to a few men during the winter. We are losing a chance to pick up personal knowledge, because the day is fast approaching when these men will all be dead.

We have a Canada Council which spends millions of dollars bringing European culture to this country. I appreciate that, having been born on the prairies, where we had none. But I do think a little bit of money could be spent in preserving a portion of our own Canadian history.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, before the minister replies to all the advice that has been given him and all the questions that have been put to him I should like—I hope, without repetition—to add my words to those which have already been expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano on this matter of Garibaldi.

I have had an interest in the development of this area for some 30 years. I have spoken on it year after year in the British Columbia legislature and year after year in this House of Commons. Unfortunately we do not appear to be making any progress and I think the time has come for all the shilly-shallying between the federal government and the province to come to a halt, for something definite to be proposed on the development of Garibaldi.

I say this for very basic and fundamental reasons. I know that area. I have been over it by helicopter and I have hiked into it. I have spoken to authorities who understand the situation of that area, and I say without fear of honest contradiction that under planned development Garibaldi can be a year round recreational resort unparalleled anywhere on the North American continent. In the spring and early summer I have seen there the alpine flora and fauna which world botanists have told me cannot be found in this abundance anywhere else in North America. I know its lakes and terrain. We have already had a report on its potentialities as a winter resort.

Where is Garibaldi located: It is in an area which, with properly developed roads, is within one and a half or two hours of the lower mainland of Vancouver, which contains approximately one million of the population of British Columbia. It is within easy reach not only of that one million population in the lower mainland of British Columbia, in the Vancouver area, but it is within two to five hours' journey of two and a half million people in the United States just below our border. In the Pacific coast area of Washington, Oregon and British Columbia everybody has heard of Mount Baker but Mount Baker, known as it is and used as it is, cannot touch the potentialities of Garibaldi.

What is the situation at the present moment? There is already a road under construction which is completed on gravel and mostly on hard pavement, which within a few months will be a first-class road from Vancouver to Squamish. From Squamish the road distance is very short into Garibaldi. Then we have the potentiality of the town of Haney. There are first class highways from Vancouver to Haney tying in with the trans-Canada highway and with the main United States north and south highways. Haney is at the foot of Garibaldi. The approach is there and it will not take very much to go from Haney, as the access from the south, to Garibaldi, or from Squamish on the north-western end into Garibaldi. Here we have an area of Canada on our Pacific coast which is mighty important now and which is going to grow in importance as the economy of Canada develops and as we open up the Pacific coast.

There are already one million people living in the lower mainland of British Columbia, in Vancouver, and there are two and a half million people to the south of us; and right at our doorstep, I maintain, is the most magnificent potential all-round resort on the entire North American continent.

That is as it is now. Why has it not been developed? It is because it is owned in the crown's name by the province of British Columbia. It is a reserve for park purposes, and no government has yet done anything about it except make promises. We have no national park area whatsoever on the Pacific coast. Therefore I think we are entitled to ask for serious consideration to be given this matter by the minister and the government.

Why has it not been developed? I think I can speak with a little bit of authority here, having been the leader of the opposition in the British Columbia legislature for 12 years before I came to this House of Commons. I think it is because, in particular, of the present government we have in British Columbia who should be most severely damned and condemned for their attitude. They have not yet exercised any preparation or considered the approach of the federal government, and that is the stumbling block. It is not because the government of British Columbia does not recognize the potentiality. It is not because the federal government does not recognize the potentiality. It is not because the federal government is not prepared to take it over and develop it as a national park. It is because of the potentiality of the natural resources. What there may be of a mineral nature nobody knows because this is a crown reserve, but we do know that we have there some of the finest mature, virgin timber in all British Columbia. I have been told that its value is in the neighbourhood of $60 million. That is the information given to me; I have no personal knowledge.

I think the government of British Columbia is stalling with regard to this matter because if the federal government takes over the area it will be on the basis that the resources go to the federal government. The government of British Columbia wishes to retain an interest in the forest resources and in the potential mineral resources. I think it is a crying shame that in 1961 we should still be in a position where because of the rigid attitude adopted by both sides the lower mainland area of British Columbia is stymied and cannot receive the benefit of what, I say again, would be the finest all-round resort and recreational area on the entire North American continent.

I know something about the government of British Columbia, coming as I do, from that province. In fact, I know a great deal about it because I was the first leader of the opposition against the present premier. I know his stubbornness and his selfishness; I know how he operates through expediency. I think this question will not come to a head until the federal government puts the government of British Columbia on the spot. I urge the government to put them right on the spot. Make a definite offer to take over Garibaldi park as a national park. Give them at least an outline of the development that the federal government intends to proceed with and reach an understanding, a compromise if you like, with the province in connection with the resource developments that might take place. I say this in all sincerity and from a knowledge of the government of British Columbia. I speak, also, from a knowledge of Garibaldi park and what it would mean to the million people who now live in the British Columbia mainland area and more than two million potential visitors who live south of the forty ninth parallel and who would welcome the opportunity of coming to Canada after the development of Garibaldi.

This business of negotiating back and forth and getting nowhere because each side accused the other of responsibility of no progress being made, has gone far enough. Somebody has got to take a major step and because I have no hope of Premier Bennett taking it I am going to ask the minister if he and his department have the courage, or —might I use another term—the vision to put something down in writing as a definite proposition and let us see whether we can move forward in connection with the development of the Garibaldi area.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to seek direction from the minister or from the Chair. I have one or two brief observations to make about sea birds, and I should like to know whether this is the correct item under which to make them or whether another item would be more appropriate.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think item 290 would be the appropriate item.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I wonder if I might say a word in respect to the number of members who have been kind enough to congratulate the Calgary Olympic development association on the award of the site for the Canadian bid for the 1963 games. I should like to thank those hon. members, and hon. members collectively, who have offered support, because if we are to be successful we shall certainly need co-operation from the entire country, not from a few limited people. So I thank each individual who has offered support, because I feel that with all this support we shall be successful in 1963 in obtaining the games.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before I make the few remarks I intend to make now, may I say that I think that hon. members of this committee might well take strong exception to being described as "limited people".

Would the minister, when he replies, give us the latest score on the battle of Stoney Creek in which his colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration seems to be so persistently engaged?

Mr. McCleave: Before we leave this item, perhaps a voice from the east coast might be heard in commendation of the St. Roch which made a historic voyage around the northern half of the continent. One of the terminal stops on this amazing trip was Halifax.

Mr. Dinsdale: We have had an interesting presentation this afternoon concerning historic sites and national parks. It is encouraging as we approach the observation of Canada's centennial to find that at long last Canadians from one end of the country to another are becoming more aware than ever before that Canada has an illustrious history. Not long ago there would have been very little interest in the preservation of our historic sites. I think that in the past two hours we have heard representations on the subject from almost every area of Canada—individual members presenting their claims on behalf of their respective constituencies for the consideration of historic sites in their own areas—sites, places and locations connected with the history and development of this country.

Speaking generally, I think it is only appropriate that I should remind hon. members that the function of this department in regard to historic sites is to consider those locations which may be regarded as having national significance. For this purpose a historic sites and monuments board has been constituted over a number of years. It is made up of representative historians from each province to consider various proposals from the standpoint of their national historic significance and who recommend to the minister and to the government on that basis the marking and suitable recognition of those sites.

Theirs is not the only historical interest in Canada. I am made aware of this by letters which come in continually from local historical groups. Right across the nation we have local groups in various communities; they gather together local committees to mark and preserve historic sites which are of local interest. I think I can say that each provincial government is now moving into the area of recognition of historic sites which can be regarded as of purely provincial significance, and are proceeding to preserve these as localized historic areas.

That is all I intend to say by way of general reference to historic sites. I shall come to my remarks in respect to the specific recommendations which have been made in just a moment or two, but before that I should perhaps make a general statement concerning national parks.

This is another area in which the federal government has become increasingly active across the nation during recent years. Actually our national park program is one of the oldest government programs in this particular sphere, going back to the 1880's. A system of national parks has been developed down through the years, but up until world war II, development was not under particular pressure. Since the end of world war II however, with the advent of greater leisure time by reason of shorter working hours, and with the increasing mobility of the population by virtue of our improved highway systems resulting in a tremendously growing tourist industry, we have been placed in the position, in respect of our national parks system, where the pressure for development has been almost impossible to cope with. As an example of this I should perhaps mention the recorded attendance at two of our smaller parks. At the Cape Breton Highlands park in 1950, 107 campers attended. Last year, the number had increased to 24,400. This is an almost astronomical increase. At the Prince Edward Island park there were 183 campers in attendance in 1950, but in 1960 almost 30,000 campers attended. These tremendous increases have taken place in the short period of a decade.

Some reference was made this afternoon to national park policy. I should say it is quite true that national park policy has been under criticism from time to time in this house. It was my pleasure this week to meet my counterpart from the United States, secretary Udall, and we had discussions on the subject of national park development. I was interested to learn that very much the same difficulties and problems that we have in Canada are confronting those officials south of the border.

The hon. member for Calgary South pointed out the precise difficulties with which we are faced, when he made reference to the basic conflict in existing concepts in respect of national parks. National parks were originally developed to preserve wilderness areas in Canada, and to protect them from the incursions of urbanization.

The passage of time, increasing tourism, the challenge presented by increased leisure time, the growing use of parks, and the other influences to which I have referred, all have had a part in creating the great demand which now exists for the development of recreational parks. In the development of our national park system we have been faced with the limitations of the act, as a result of which it is not possible to meet all the rapidly growing demands for the establishment of recreational facilities within the framework of our existing national park program. I think we must reconsider our whole approach to this problem. Creative activity has taken place at lower levels of government. In some instances, municipalities have made moves to meet this growing demand for the establishment of recreational parks. Some of the provincial governments have established a system of park areas designed exclusively to meet the demand for recreational areas.

I do not often have the opportunity to boast about my own province, but, by way of passing reference, I should like to indicate that the province of Manitoba has moved vigorously into this field in recent years, and already three major park areas have been set aside for this purpose. One such area is located north of the national park at Riding mountain in the Duck mountain area. This proposed park occupies a land area almost equal to that of our national park at Riding mountain. The terrain and topography, and facilities in terms of natural flora and fauna, are much the same as at Riding mountain park, but the park will be developed as a recreation park area rather than for the specific purpose of preserving it in its wilderness form. These are some ways by which the pressure on the national park development program can be relieved.

I realize that we have a special problem in the mountainous park areas such as at Banff and Jasper where permanent communities have been established without local forms of government, with the result that all matters pertaining to local government must be referred to the national parks department for consideration. This represents a very difficult, delicate and sensitive administrative problem. It was because of this that professor Crawford was assigned to study and make recommendations regarding the problems of local government in these park areas. There has been considerable discussion concerning the recommendations of the Crawford park report but a few of the non-controversial recommendations have already been implemented. I can assure the hon. member for Calgary South, as well as other hon. members who have spoken on this subject, that there will be no attempt to implement the more controversial aspects of that report without the closest possible consultation.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the minister to address the microphone because, when he speaks directly to the member for Vancouver South, we in this corner, who are also interested in his remarks, are unable to hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you for that suggestion.

I have just said that some of the non-controversial recommendations contained in that report have already been implemented, but that the more controversial ones would not be implemented without very close consultation. One of the recommendations contained in this report refers to the establishment of advisory councils in local communities, and I should say that we are encouraging this in every possible way. As a matter of fact, various officials have met with these advisory boards during the past month for the purpose of establishing closer co-operation and co-ordination, in an attempt to keep open the channels of communication which are so necessary to proper understanding. The deputy minister has met with the advisory councils at both Jasper and Banff, and I believe the director of the parks branch attended meetings with the three advisory councils from Banff, Lake Louise, and Jasper quite recently. During my visits to the park I have had the opportunity of meeting two of the advisory councils. I shall be making a trip to western Canada during this summer and it will be my intention at that time to hold meetings with these local groups in an attempt to establish the closest possible co-operation.

Specific reference was made this afternoon to the selection of Banff as the most suitable site for the winter Olympic games. I want to add my congratulations to the hon. members who were so active on behalf of this site and at the same time also to pay my respects to those who were promoting the interest of other parks such as Garibaldi, Manning and the other park areas which have been referred to. I must say they were most aggressive and most reasonable in their presentations. They presented their cases as best they knew how and, the choice having been made, they have demonstrated here this afternoon that they are good losers and are drawing together to support Banff as the Canadian site for the Olympic games.

As I see it, Mr. Chairman, there is no basic conflict in what would be involved at Banff and the necessary development that will have to take place should Canada make the final hurdle and be chosen as the country sponsoring the games in 1968. Actually—and this shows long term planning at its best—in the backs of the minds of those who have had responsibility for park planning over the years this has always been conceived as a possibility. It was for this reason that the ski runs at Banff were built to Olympic specifications. It is also for this reason that the civic centre, the construction of which will get under way during the current year, was also designed to meet Olympic standards.

In summing up these brief observations, then, Mr. Chairman, I think I can say that we are aware of the problem. We are fully aware of the pressures for recreational services and facilities to meet the demands of our own people as well as of the tourist industry.

As to the best way of meeting the demands, we have no definitive suggestions or plans at the moment. The hon. member for Calgary South has suggested perhaps a zoning or a categorizing of parks, such as parks for recreational purposes, wilderness areas and so forth. This trend is going forward, particularly on the provincial level, as I have demonstrated, where provincial governments are moving in to meet the demands for recreational facilities. But I can say that a great deal of thought is being given to meeting the needs, and we shall be doing everything possible within the framework of our national park program to meet the growing demands on facilities of this kind.

Several hon. members made reference to Garibaldi and suggested that the national parks branch of the federal government might move in now and develop this site which is regarded as highly suitable for a national park development. I can only say, Mr. Chairman, it is two years since the offer was made by this government. One of the basic requirements for development of a new national park is that the provincial government make the approach and indicate that it is willing to make available a suitable area of land that meets all the requirements of a national park development and turn it over to the federal authority free of any encumbrances. I assure hon. members who have spoken very strongly on behalf of Garibaldi that we shall be happy to have such an approach from the provincial government; indeed, we have encouraged that approach. Unfortunately, there has been no reply to those representations.

Mr. Winch: No reply at all in two years?

Mr. Dinsdale: No reply at all in two years. I might add this positive word, Mr. Chairman. We are hoping that one of the useful results of the resources for tomorrow conference which will take place in Montreal next October will be a closer liaison between the federal and the provincial authorities on this whole subject of recreational needs. One of the categories which will come under discussion at the conference is the recreational resources area, and I am quite hopeful that as a result of the spirit of co-operation that has been generated in preparation of the conference we shall be able to come forward with a policy that will meet in a comprehensive way the situation that has been outlined by so many hon. members with respect to park facilities.

Let me deal briefly with one or two specific matters that have been raised here today. Let me deal first of all with the Windemere park suggestion from the hon. member for Vancouver East. Windemere park has been under discussion by the branch. We had hoped it would be considered by the historic sites and monuments board in the meeting this May. Unfortunately, we have not received the necessary data from Major Matthews; therefore, consideration will have to be postponed until the next meeting of the board.

Mr. Winch: The necessary data could be handed over to you right now.

Mr. Dinsdale: Action cannot be taken until we get the information. Unfortunately, I am informed that that information has not been made available, and the board meets on May 23 with a very heavy agenda, as would be indicated by the many suggestions that have been made here this afternoon.

The hon. member for Marquette referred to Fort Ellice. It is close to my own district. I know it; it is one of a series of fur trade posts across the country. I might inform the hon. member that there are the names of 10 that have been presented to the historic sites and monuments board for consideration, and they will be considered on a priority basis. We are aware of their historic significance.

We have encouraging news for the hon. member for Halifax. I have been informed that a vintage cannon has been obtained. The problem remaining in resolving the little difficulty he mentioned is in assuring that the proper type of firing is carried out, which will be authentic, and at the same time assuring the safety factor. The problem is under consideration.

He will also be interested in knowing that we shall be unveiling the restored clock sometime during the maritime visit which will take place as soon as the house rises.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say whether it is a short gun or a long gun?

Mr. Dinsdale: Well, I think it is a compromise, as all good political solutions should be. I believe it is a compromise on that score.

I must apologize to the hon. member for Lisgar for not replying to his representations on behalf of the Nellie McClung home. Here is one of those historic sites that will have to be considered by the board. Whether it is of national significance or not I am not in a position to state, but I thank him for bringing it to the attention of the committee.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat spoke briefly on the subject of museums. Here is another area of rapidly expanding interest at the present time. He dealt with the matter of preserving agricultural implements from the historic past. I am happy to inform him that the Department of Agriculture has an interest in this matter. I am informed also that one of those agriculture museums will be opened in Alberta during the coming summer.

The hon. member for Saskatoon had some comments to make about Waskesiu, which is one of our fine prairies national parks. Perhaps I can just give him briefly information on one or two things which have taken place at the Waskesiu national park. There is a comprehensive program of redevelopment taking place at Waskesiu. Sewer and water facilities were installed last summer. There is a new camp ground and trailer camp under construction at the present time which will help to take the pressure off existing facilities. There is a major difficulty, I am informed, in the waterfront area because of the concentration of tents and camp facilities there. A sanitary difficulty has developed which will require some attention almost immediately to take the pressure off the waterfront area. We are moving forward with a limited relocation problem to deal with this sanitary problem.

In addition, we are establishing a new marina and boating area which will make it possible for boating enthusiasts, who are rapidly increasing in numbers, to have the necessary facilities for launching their boats. Then, a new park area is under development and we are constructing a road to Crean lake which will again, we hope, take the pressure off the main facilities. The length of this road is some nine miles and the cost is about $60,000 per mile.

The hon. member also referred to Emma lake. The Emma lake dam has been completed, and there will be an official opening ceremony during the current season. We pay our respects to the prairie farm rehabilitation administration which co-operated in this project.

The hon. member for Athabasca raised the question of Wood Buffalo national park and the mineral resources which may be contained therein. This is a subject upon which I can make no pronouncement at all this afternoon. If there were to be any change in the status of the park, of course it would have to be only as a result of discussions with the province of Alberta which, initially, turned this area over to the national parks program as a wilderness area.

The summer works program for students was an interesting suggestion, I believe made by the hon. member for Kootenay East as well. The hon. member for Charlotte gave us some more historic facts about Champlain and the initial landings in Canada to add to our knowledge on this subject. He also made reference to the desirability of establishing Campobello as a national historic park. These are matters that will have to be taken under advisement by the historic sites and monuments board.

There was reference by several hon. members, including the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, to the boat St. Roch. I would merely like to say, in passing, that we have a genuine interest in the St. Roch which was turned over to the city of Vancouver at their request, I understand, for their anniversary celebrations. If the St. Roch is not being suitably preserved, certainly we would be happy to have representations on that score. The matter of maintenance is in the hands of the city of Vancouver. This is not an uncommon arrangement right across the country. Certain sites which have been designated as historic sites have been turned over to local communities for maintenance and for development.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot referred to the historical significance of the area associated with the struggle of 1837. I would be inclined to agree that here is a historic site that might well be suitably marked. Certainly, 1837 was an important episode in Canada's development toward nationhood. I thank the hon. member for bringing it to our attention. The matter will be referred to the historic sites and monuments board in due course.

I believe I have almost completed the individual items, except to refer back to an item mentioned by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, namely the desirability of having suitable markings at L'Assomption college which was the alma mater of a distinguished Canadian prime minister, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In so far as the suitable commemoration of prime ministers of Canada is concerned, the practice in the past has been to mark some site in the nation's capital. Laurier House, for example, has been associated with the name of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. On the other hand, colleges at which these men have attended in their earlier days have been marked by groups who have a local interest in these particular associations. I might suggest to the hon. member that this would be a good project for the student body themselves, to find a method of suitably recognizing the fact that one of Canada's earlier prime ministers attended there as a student.

I must apologize, too, for having omitted a reply to the hon. member for St. Boniface in connection with his representations about the Grey Nuns hospital in the city of St. Boniface being suitably recognized. He indicated that I was aware of this problem, and that is quite true. I have had two meetings with a local committee on this matter. We have been negotiating with the government of Manitoba as well as metropolitan Winnipeg, which has expressed interest in this matter. We have expressed our desire to co-operate and I am sure the problem will be settled satisfactorily within a reasonably short time.

I should refer to one brief observation by the hon. member for Yorkton concerning the marking of historic sites along highways. I believe this pretty well exhausts all the points that have been raised in this regard. I would merely say that we are aware of some deficiencies in connection with these markings, but I would direct him to some of our more elaborate markings of historic sites where, for example, complete restoration has taken place. These are examples of the new program of marking historic sites.

I have just been reminded that there was some reference to Stoney Creek, which has been under consideration for some time by the historic sites and monuments branch. There was a meeting held on this subject last week, and a local committee has been formed to iron out all the difficulties at the local level. This is the sort of initiative we like to see, and when the local group has formulated its policy, we shall be very happy to consider representations from them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister forgot the point I raised about Fort Rodd. I asked him specifically when this question was first referred to the historic sites and monuments board, and when they made a decision.

Since the hon. member for Yorkton is temporarily out of the house, I should also remind the minister that the hon. member mentioned Fort Pelly in which a lot of us, the minister included, take a great deal of interest. It would perhaps be useful to know what is going to be done there.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, Mr. Chairman, Fort Pelly is one of those mounted police forts or barracks that is in the same category as Fort Ellice. This question is being reviewed by the board to consider its significance as a historic site. It is quite true the hon. member asked a specific question about Fort Rodd hill when the estimates were last under consideration. I have a report for him on this subject. Fort Rodd hill is part of the Esquimalt harbour defences and involves quite an elaborate complex. The matter of its preservation was first raised in 1957. The historic sites and monuments board considered the matter at that time and recommended in 1958 that it be declared as of national historic importance. In that connection, the board reviewed this matter as well as the preservation of adjacent Fiskard lighthouse in 1960. The latter was declared to be of national historic importance at that time and in 1961 the minister declared Fort Rodd hill to be of national historic significance. By that series of steps the whole complex has now come under the control of the historic sites and monuments board.

Mr. Pickersgill: It always was the property of the crown?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes. It was always the property of the crown so that there has been no difficulty in transference.

Mr. McGee: I am sure the minister was saving the most succulent morsel until the end of his remarks. I am sure he has some remarks to make concerning the Scarborough ossuary.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am greatly interested to hear of the hon. member's continued interest in this subject. It is a subject which will be studied by the historic sites and monuments board.

Mr. Pickersgill: There were two other questions I addressed to the minister just at the end of the time his estimates were taken up on Friday, one with respect to the national park in Prince Edward Island and one with respect to the park in Cape Breton. In looking over Hansard I see that I do not think I put quite correctly the question about Prince Edward Island, according to what information I have. I understand that Mr. Doucette was an applicant for a job, that the job was given to someone else, as reported to me, and that in the meantime, this other man who had thirteen or fourteen children was in great need. I just wondered whether the minister, in answer to that question, could say what principle is applied. Is the situation, as I understand it is in Terra Nova national park, that preference is given to married men, those with families and that preference is given to those who most need the work? Can the minister say whether he has been able to get any information on this matter? I cannot blame him very much if he has not done so in view of the fact that I may have "misled" him a little bit the other day.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes. Considerable research has been required on this subject because, as the question was originally propounded, there was some uncertainty. However, I have some information. There seemed to be more than one Doucette involved in these matters.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have about fifteen.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Mr. Dinsdale: A Clarence Doucette of Rustico was employed as a labourer in Prince Edward Island national park prior to and including 1957. In December, 1957 his services and those of eight other men were terminated. This was the normal lay-off of seasonal employees that occurs every year. He has not sought re-employment since that time and reports confirm that he has since been self-employed in fishing for a livelihood. This man is single and a veteran. I therefore do not think he would have nine children.

Mr. Pickersgill: Thirteen children.

Mr. Dinsdale: Or thirteen children as mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not guarantee that.

Mr. Dinsdale: That does not seem to be the proper Doucette. However, there is another one. There is a Harry Lawrence Doucette, also of Rustico, Prince Edward Island, who has been employed in the national park for each year since 1946. His seasonal employment has been continuous except for the year 1953. During that season he was engaged on May 21 as a labour foreman and was employed through June. His services were dispensed with during the months of July and August but he was re-employed in September and worked the full month. According to information available, his period of employment in 1953 was interrupted following representations that he was engaged in political activities. Following an investigation, and representation by Mr. W. C. S. McLure, M.P., instructions were issued to the park superintendent that if Mr. Doucette's services were satisfactory, he was to be re-engaged. This action was taken effective September 1. No person was employed as a replacement during the period of his unemployment. This man is married, is a veteran, and in 1953 had eight dependents. So perhaps it is some other man. The year 1953 is eight years ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know anything more than what is contained in the information which was conveyed to me. I do not intend to press the minister at all about this matter because I feel that I am not very well informed about it myself. However, I should like the minister to say a little bit more about what the general condition of employment is and to answer the question I asked about the additional information he himself was seeking, according to the answer he gave to the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi.

Mr. Dinsdale: In Cape Breton?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, in Cape Breton.

Mr. Dinsdale: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is quite correct when he said that when I last reported on this matter I said I was seeking further information. I received a report from Cape Breton Highlands national park with respect to this matter and on the basis of that report I wrote to Mr. Boudreau, one of the municipal councillors at Cheticamp, Nova Scotia. Perhaps I can best answer the hon. member's question by quoting this letter. This is a letter dated April 21 and it reads as follows:

Further to my letter of March 16th on the matter of rotation of labour at Cape Breton Highlands national park, I wish to advise that I have received a report from my officers.

The report indicates that the established rotational system was followed, and as far as we can determine, every man hired was unemployed and in need of work. This practice is consistent with our policy, and appears to have been well accepted in the areas where it has been applied.

I checked back into the records and I find that this rotational system has been established for a number of years. There are on file letters which indicate it has the support of the local people and it seems to have worked out satisfactorily.

Mr. Pickersgill: The information was given to me and I do not vouch for it personally. I just put it to the minister that this particular rotation was carried on not on instruction of the park officials but on the instruction of a local political committee. I suppose the minister would say that would be quite impossible.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could have an answer from the minister.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): —I should have made my remarks sooner but, if I am in order, I should like to make some reference to Niagara-on-the-Lake and Fort Mississauga.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. member for Lincoln would allow the minister to reply to my question so that the reply would appear in the record following the question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Looking back on the record of discussions on this matter I find that in Hansard for February 18, 1959, at page 1147, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Port Arthur, my predecessor had the following comments to make:

There has been no trouble in the great majority of the parks but there are certain parks a long way removed from the national employment offices and we do have a policy of employing men who live close to the parks. This applies particularly in the case of Terra Nova park in Newfoundland and the park in Cape Breton. In those districts we have asked people of varying qualifications, ministers of churches, parish priests and so on, to bring to our attention needy people in order to put them to work. We have considered other things such as rotation to make the work go farther and so on. Generally speaking, there has been a pretty fair effort made to move in that direction.

I think they will even accept recommendations from members of parliament.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister this question. It is just a supplementary question which I think will take only a minute. I would ask the minister whether, in order to save me time and personal research, he could bring me up to date on the latest arrangement for patronage in Terra Nova national park.

Perhaps I ought, in fairness to the minister, draw his attention to the fact that one of the people who concerned himself most about this subject in the past has recently obtained a postal contract and with the purity policy of the minister's colleague, the Postmaster General, I would assume he would not accept any recommendations from him any longer.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I am not as familiar as the hon. member with Terra Nova national park. As a matter of fact, if it were permissible I think I might ask him that question and he would be in a position to give me a more adequate reply.

Perhaps I could state the terms of preference in regard to hiring in our national parks. First of all, local residents; second, married men with dependents; and the veterans' preference is also taken into consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one other consideration in respect to the Terra Nova national park which I asked the minister's predecessor and his predecessor also, because I think the minister's portfolio is the only one that has changed hands twice since the present government was originally formed.

I refer to an assurance that was given at the time the park was established to give a preference in employment in the park—and that was to be an absolute, overriding preference and I am very familiar with this, as the minister rightly said, because I had a good deal to do with the negotiations for the establishment of the park—to those persons who prior to the establishment of the park had made their living by engaging in lumbering operations in the park or in working in saw mills which used the timber from the park.

The provincial government asked for this assurance because they felt they were more or less taking away the livelihood of these people in establishing the park. They wanted to be sure that no hardship was effected. The minister's predecessors have never hesitated to reiterate this undertaking and I think have done their best to carry it out. I make no criticism on that score, although I think sometimes it has not got down the line quite far enough that this was important.

However, so far as the ministers are concerned, in this respect I have never had any complaint whatsoever. Since there is a new minister I think it would be reassuring to the people concerned if the minister would just repeat that assurance.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am happy to repeat that assurance, because the policy has been to ensure that any persons who were displaced by reason of the establishment of Terra Nova national park should have preference in employment opportunities.

Before the park was established a number of residents in the vicinity earned their living by cutting timber on lands which are now in the park. Care has been taken to ensure that their means of livelihood have not been adversely affected.

This has been done by making available to local residents a fair share of the employment opportunities within the park, and also by issuing permits to cut timber during the period October 1 to March 31. Furthermore, so there would be no elements of unfairness resulting from the difference between provincial and national parks' timber dues, the national parks' timber regulations were amended in 1958 to lower dues at Terra Nova to those charged by the province.

The highway construction program has also considerably assisted employment opportunities.

Mr. Pickersgill: I apologize to the hon. member for Lincoln.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, I will be as brief as possible. I should like to congratulate the minister on being appointed to this very important portfolio and extend to him a very hearty welcome to come to the Niagara peninsula and visit some of the historic and important sites in that area.

I must make reference to Niagara-on-the-lake which is at the mouth of the Niagara river. Prior to confederation there was always a large garrison of British soldiers there. It was also an important place during the war of 1812 when the United States invaded Canada.

We have there Fort Mississauga, which is an old, stone and brick structure. We have Fort George, which has been restored by the provincial government, and we also have Navy Hall. As I said, prior to confederation there was always a garrison of British soldiers there; there were also a number of British navy units stationed there. Niagara-on-the-lake was also the seat of the first government of Upper Canada. So you will see, Mr. Chairman, that it is a very important and very historic part of Canada.

Across the river is old Fort Niagara, which was built some 300 years ago by the French. It was later occupied by the British and now, of course, by the United States. They fly the three flags there every day, the French, British and United States.

On our side of the river we do not have buildings which are quite so old. Nevertheless we have buildings which are very important in so far as the history of Canada is concerned. There is Navy Hall and Fort George, Queenston Heights and Brock's monument. These are all under the care of the provincial government and they are being well taken care of. Thousands of tourists go there every year.

I am particularly concerned about Fort Mississauga, which was built, I believe, about 1813. Therefore it is almost 150 years old. Unfortunately it stands in the middle of a golf course. This golf course was used by British soldiers and British officers during the colonial days. When one mentions the restoration of Fort Mississauga one of course gets into trouble with the golfers. Nevertheless I do not think that obstacle should permanently stand in the way.

I am pleased that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources went in there last year and did some repair work on the fort to keep it from falling apart and becoming dangerous. However, I do not feel that is enough and I hope that some time in the near future the minister will sit down with some of the people from the Niagara peninsula who are historically minded and work out some sort of long term program so that Fort Mississauga will be preserved.

As I say, it is a brick and stone building. It has about two storeys underground and two above. Troops were garrisoned there, guns were mounted on ramparts and other supplies were kept inside the fort. I feel it is one of the few historic buildings still standing in Canada in its original state.

We have many other forts which have been rebuilt, but this is the original fort. It is just the way it was built, with stone or brick walls. It would be very unfortunate to see it deteriorate and fall apart. Therefore I recommend to the minister that he give very serious consideration to doing something on a long term basis so this building will be preserved.

In this area there are something like 1,000 acres of land. Some of this land has been held by the government since before 1812 and some of it was acquired later. In years gone by it was used as a military training camp, but the change in military equipment has made it obsolete for those purposes, especially the land in the town of Niagara. I feel this should be preserved for some type of historic park. We are using it at the present time for a small amount of civil defence practice and a small amount of cadet training, but the day will come when the land may be disposed of. We hear many rumours from time to time to this effect.

I would be very much against seeing the land sold off for a housing subdivision or some other purpose. I think some kind of arrangement could be made whereby the golf course would be transferred from the Fort Mississauga location, and Fort Mississauga could be restored and made open to the public. The golf course could be put in another place, probably somewhere within these 1,000 acres of military camp land.

People from the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources have visited the area. They are interested in establishing a bird sanctuary on part of this land. I think that would be an excellent scheme because many of the migratory birds that fly south stop over there on the way down. At the present time there is nothing appropriate there. I feel part of that land should be used as a bird sanctuary because it is situated on lake Ontario.

There is also an area a few miles from there where are found the remains of the first Welland canal which was built in 1824 and I feel that since this was the beginning of the linking up of the great lakes something should be done in that area to commemorate the history of the building of that canal. As I say, it was built in 1824, which is a long time ago. There is a committee composed of local historians in the area which is interested in something of this kind and they have contacted the department. I would ask the minister to give consideration to making some arrangements for the disposal of the thousand acres of campsite and for preserving Fort Mississauga. Also, something significant should be done about commemorating the first Welland ship canal on part of the land which is available at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to support warmly what has been said by the hon. member for Lincoln and I do so as a descendant of one of Butler's rangers which, I think, gives me a claim at least as great as that of the hon. gentleman to support claims made on behalf of Niagara. In my opinion this is far and away the most historic spot in Upper Canada and I think it should be preserved in the way Williamsburg has been preserved in the United States. I think the hon. member has been, if anything, too modest. The whole place is deserving of commemoration, not merely isolated parts of it. I suggest that a good many of the buildings in that town should be restored, because nearly every one of them is of historic interest.

I may be biased because of a family interest in the place—it has an attraction for some of us in the house, at any rate, as Butler's burying ground—but I believe this to be one of the most attractive towns in Canada particularly in view of the fact that, like Niagara Falls itself, it is adjacent to the largest concentration of population in the whole of North America. It would be a good national investment if we could persuade some Canadian Rockefeller to treat it as Williamsburg has been treated.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): I should just like to tell the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that Butler's burying ground is well preserved and well cared for. It is a place which attracts many tourists. There is also the old St. Mark's church and St. Andrew's church. The original churches have been there for over two hundred years. They are in good shape. I thoroughly agree we have a setting there for a historic town which would be equal to anything in the United States.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Those last observations of the hon. member for Lincoln and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate have caused me to rise and say a few words about an equally historic centre, the county of Essex and, of course, the city of Windsor. I am not going to indulge in considerations of priority at this time, but since the minister is just in the early months of his administration, I should like to take this opportunity of saying to him that we shall welcome him to Essex county in his capacity as Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

He will find many institutions of great historic interest. He will find the county and the community replete with Canadian history that goes back well over several centuries. In fact he will find families in Essex county who have a direct descendance during this period one of which is recognized by the name of the main street in the city of Windsor, Ouellette avenue. I point out to the minister that I think it would be useful for him to consult with his officials and find details of the generalizations that I am now making. He would find, for instance, in the Baby museum a historical museum that is rich with the memories of the past of this particular area. He would find, too, that his historic sites division has taken a great interest in this museum. I should like, here, to pay a tribute particularly to the late Mr. George Macdonald, one of the leading citizens of Windsor, for his work in connection with that museum as well as other personalities in Windsor among whom was the late Don

Brown, the former member of parliament for Essex West. Then, of course, there is the museum at Amherstburg which will forever be connected with the work of Mr. Murray Clark a former member of parliament for Essex South. These two museums are repositories of the evidence of our rich historic past. When we are thinking of the future it is well for us to dwell upon the efforts of those who have gone before in our various communities.

I belong to a city and am a citizen of a county which has a very long history not only in terms of national achievement and local achievement but in terms of our relations with the state of Michigan in the United States. When the minister comes to visit us, I hope he will give me the opportunity of showing him Peche island which separates the city of Detroit from the city of Windsor. This is a Canadian island, owned privately. It is not as large as Belle island—Belle isle—the island owned by the people of the corporation of the city of Detroit, but it is a beautiful island and its potential value in terms of tourism and in terms of adorning the point of entry for the largest number of people from the United States into Canada is one which might well be considered by the government as making it a property which should belong to the crown either in the right of the province or in the right of the dominion or in the right of both the province and the dominion. I would ask the minister to give consideration to this particular matter. It is one which might, I think, serve a great purpose in the future for Canada as well as for the city of Windsor and the county of Essex.

I invite the minister to come and see us so as to give us an opportunity of showing him something of our history, something of our present achievements, something of our present problems and some of our plans for the future. Among these I include, of course, Peche island. When the minister is in Windsor he will, of course, take advantage of an invitation which will no doubt be extended to him by the hon. member for Essex South of visiting the historic sites in that section of the county. He would want to go to the national park at Point Pelee. He would also want to visit the Jack Miner sanctuary, institutions which I know interest the hon. member for Essex South as they interest all who live in the county of Essex.

I am sure the minister will take advantage of this invitation. He is a man of great modesty and I am sure will not mind my saying that he will profit greatly from this kind of contact with the people of an area so richly endowed in history, as we are in Essex county and the city of Windsor.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have been moved to rise to say a few words in view of the remarks made by the hon. members for Lincoln, Bonavista-Twillingate and Essex East. These gentlemen have all dealt with eastern Canada and I could see, as they were speaking, that the minister was very receptive to their suggestions, particularly those of the hon. member for Essex East.

I should like to bring to his attention that, to the best of my knowledge there has never been to this date a visit, by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, to the Kootenays. This fact was brought to my attention by some individuals interested in the forestry industry. While our history does not go back 300 or 400 years—only to 1811, the time of David Thompson's discoveries—there are many interesting things to see. Some very famous men have originated in the Kootenay area and lived there, as well as some even more famous women. We have some very interesting mining communities and other historic sites there. I should hope the minister will have the opportunity of visiting the sternwheeler Moyie at the village of Kaslo, in order to acquire first hand understanding of what the Kootenay historical society has done.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, not wishing to take up the time of the committee I would, on behalf of the people I have the honour of representing, invite the minister to visit the Kootenays and, should he decide to come, I shall do everything possible to make his visit informative, enjoyable and to the advantage of everyone concerned.

Item agreed to.

286. National aviation museum, $139,875.

Mr. Matthews: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in regard to item No. 286. I should like first of all to compliment the minister for the very fine work he is doing in the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I suggest that it is very fitting that this item, covering the national aviation museum, is included under his department. The minister served with the Royal Canadian Air Force in the 410 mosquito night fighter squadron and was awarded the distinguished flying cross. While I am dealing with this subject, I should like to mention that the hon. member for Calgary South was also awarded the distinguished flying cross and is now the president of the Canadian air cadet league, carrying on very good work in that capacity. While these remarks are not necessarily related to a discussion of the aviation museum vote, I felt that I should take the opportunity of bringing these facts to the attention of hon. members.

I should like to ask the minister if it is intended that other aircraft be added to this display. I understand that the Silver Dart is on display at the museum, and I was wondering whether other aircraft could perhaps be included in that display. I refer particularly to the Curtis JN-4 which was built in Canada 45 years ago, and was probably the first training plane used on this continent to any extent. I am sure that if a search was made in barns around the areas of Deseronto, Beamsville, and Toronto, some of these old aircraft would be found. I understand there is great interest in the United States regarding these JN-4's and that several of them have been shipped down there, rebuilt and are still being flown. I should like to see one of these aircraft placed in that museum.

Many of our pioneer flyers such as the bush pilots who flew in the open cockpit airplanes were trained in these aircraft. If one queries the old time flyers it will be found that a great amount of flying was done in these old planes and that they were considered to be wonderful aircraft.

Not long ago one of the old time bush pilots was asked to describe the difference between crashing in one of the old planes and crashing in one of the new type airplanes. He said there was very little difference. He suggested when an old type aircraft crashed it came down bzzzzt and, bang, it hit the ground. He said that crashing in a new type of aircraft was much the same, it came down bzzzzt, bang, and hit the ground, but a few seconds later there could be heard the tinkle, tinkle of the glass falling out of the windows. That apparently was the only difference.

I am sure the minister, having been a pilot, will appreciate the tremendous amount of work that has been done in the development and design of aircraft, and I suggest to him this progress could be reflected by the display of one of the older types of aircraft at the museum.

I had not intended to take up much of the committee's time but I did want to bring these suggestions to the minister's attention, and I hope in the near future he will be able to inform me that one of the old JN-4 Curtis Canucks is on display at the museum.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, in view of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, I should like to inform the present minister that I have been very interested in this particular subject for some years, and suggest that a comparison could be made between aircraft at the beginning of aviation history in Canada, and aircraft as they exist today by referring to our memory of the expenditure regarding the CF-105 Arrow program. I should like to ask the minister if one of the Arrow aircraft could be included in the display at the museum so as to represent what has taken place in the field of aviation in Canada. If this could be done, it would be of interest to compare the Arrow with the Silver Dart which is there on display now. I made this same suggestion to the former minister who assured me that he would give consideration to it, and I am now wondering whether it has been done, or if one of those aircraft is available for this purpose.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I should like to reply briefly to the remarks made by the two hon. members who have just spoken. I am aware of the subject referred to by the hon. member for Nanaimo, but must inform him that it is very difficult to acquire a Curtis JN-4. It has become a very rare species. I can assure the hon. member that the aviation museum, which occupies almost the entire upper floor of the air terminal, is just a beginning of a much larger science museum, and that an earnest attempt is being made to acquire suitable types of aircraft. The Royal Canadian Air Force is collaborating in this regard.

In reference to the query regarding the CF-105, I should like to inform the hon. member that a replica of the CF-105 will be available for the museum when space is provided.

Item agreed to.

287. Grant to Jack Miner migratory bird foundation, $5,000.

Mr. Thrasher: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to delay the passage of this item, but I should like to extend my congratulations to the minister for his work in this particular department, and in so doing I should like to adopt the remarks made earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Charlotte.

This particular item is of extreme importance in my area. The great work of the Jack Miner foundation is known not only throughout Canada but the whole world. I hope the minister will, in the not too distant future, have the opportunity of visiting this very important bird sanctuary, and will at the same time take the opportunity of visiting Fort Malden museum at Amherstburg, Ontario, as well as the national park at Point Pelee, both of which are located in my riding.

I should also like to take this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to thank the officials of the department through the minister and to tell them how pleased I am with the excellent work done in the area of the county and the excellent co-operation given to the people in that area.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope the minister will take advantage of the opportunity now presented to say something in answer to the hon. member who has just spoken and also to what I had said on a much wider front on matters which concern the whole of Essex county.

Mr. Dinsdale: I must say that I appreciate the kind invitations that have been extended by many hon. members to visit their part of Canada. I am fully aware of the historic significance of the area referred to by the hon. member for Essex South and also the hon. member for Essex East. At the earliest opportunity I do intend to visit the various historic places that have been mentioned by them.

I was interested in the comment made by the hon. member for Essex East with reference to the Baby museum. I understand that that is under private auspices—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Dinsdale: —and has been preserved by Hiram Walker. I do not know just how it has been preserved. That is the sort of development that is very encouraging, especially when we have private groups interested in preserving our historic heritage.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It has been preserved by the Hiram Walker Company located in Windsor. Through the generosity of that company the museum is now one of our treasured institutions.

Perhaps the minister would also give me an encouraging word with regard to my proposal and suggestion respecting Peche island?

Mr. Dinsdale: That is a question that will have to be considered by the historic sites and monuments board.

While I am on my feet I might say to the hon. member for Lincoln that my officials have already had extended conversations with reference to the Welland canal project.

Item agreed to.

288. Grant in aid of the development of the international peace garden in Manitoba, $15,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: One word, sir. I would imagine this would be an item on which the minister would think the taxpayers' money could be saved. Has the minister a word to say about it?

Mr. Dinsdale: I am hoping that some other hon. member will take up the torch on my behalf in connection with this item. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has been so active on so many other matters pertaining to Manitoba I trust he will give this his wholehearted support.

[Mr. Thrasher.]

Mr. Pickersgill: It being so close to the place where I went to live when I first went to Manitoba, sir, I could not help but support it.

Item agreed to.

290. Canadian wildlife service—wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $823,390.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting for this item for a long time. I have no desire to hold matters up but I did receive in my mail this morning a letter from one of my constituents which puts the case much better than I could possibly put it myself. To save the time of the committee and the minister I will read some extracts from it, but I will not try to read the whole letter. I do not think it will be controversial in the partisan sense, though it may be controversial in an international sense. This letter is in connection with the federal law concerning the killing of sea ducks, in which Newfoundland is no exception. The letter reads in part as follows:

First let me have a few words with regard to the open season period, namely November 14 to February 28.

Well, I will not go through that because it says some rather disparaging things about the weather in Newfoundland during the period and suggests it is not a very suitable time to shoot anything. Then, the writer goes on to say:

Next, I ask why the season closes on February 28. If it is because sea ducks or any other sea bird commences mating at this time, I am much to the contrary. Frankly I would not be the one to disturb any bird in any stage of its mating or breeding period. What I am trying to point out is that all species of sea birds are in abundance around our Newfoundland coasts yet the law forbids the taking of same. I might say that the murr or turr may not be any denser than several years ago due to the fact that it is a deadly prey to oil pollution. However, this enemy has very little or no effect to the various sea ducks inhabiting our shores, although it does take its toll.

Sea bird sightings this year have been greater than ever before; I myself being one of the most avid hunters of Bonavista have witnessed the sight of many sea ducks and estimate their numbers to be in the multi-million margin; radio broadcasts near Christmas of 1960 announced sea ducks denser than ever before in the cape Freels-Bonavista area yet conservation measures are still imposed. Why this is so is beyond my comprehension or anyone else's and I think it is about time steps were taken to have this law rescinded.

Now a word concerning the tickleace (killiwak) and bull bird as commonly known to us Newfoundlanders. Those birds are by law forbidden delicacies and like the sea duck are also in abundance. Why those birds are conserved is another law which leaves us all dumbfounded.

Surely the open season can be made to suit each province of Canada or do Newfoundlanders have to refrain from killing sea birds just because

Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or some other province of Canada have fewer sea bird populations than Newfoundland.

Now, the whole point that this gentleman is making, and I summarize the rest of his letter, is in fact that these sea ducks to which he has referred and the other birds to which he makes reference apparently go to the Labrador for their mating. They disappear automatically from the coast of Newfoundland before the mating season. I know that this is probably covered to some extent by an international convention, but I would ask the minister—and I will send the whole letter to him—whether he can give consideration to the fact that Newfoundland is much farther out to sea and a good deal farther north than the maritime provinces and whether there may not be a good deal in the contention of this letter?

Mr. Dinsdale: This is one of several problems of a similar kind. We have the sandhill crane problem on the prairies. Perhaps the best answer I can give at this time is to refer the letter to our wildlife people and see what possible solutions can be arrived at. I know they have been working on this typical problem of the sandhill crane. With respect to this particular problem of the sea duck, are the sea duck and the murr one and the same creature?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I gather not.

Mr. Dinsdale: This particular problem has had no active consideration. With regard to a solution, I think it is something that we shall have to take under consideration.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

THE CENSUS—EMPLOYMENT OF WORKERS

Question No. 210—Mr. Regier:

1. In regard to the forthcoming census, are officers being advised to consult the national employment service offices for potential helpers?
2. If not, for what reason?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1 and 2. The census commissioners were appointed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and, as has been stated on several occasions, he obtained recommendations from a number of sources. Census temporary clerical staff will be appointed by the civil service commission which consults local offices of national employment service. Census enumerators will be appointed by each census commissioner. They have been instructed to obtain competent people and they will, as occasion requires, consult with the national employment service.

APPENDIX "A"

MESSAGE FROM THE CO-CHAIRMEN OF THE GENEVA CONFERENCE ON INDO-CHINA TO THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION FOR SUPERVISION AND CONTROL IN LAOS

The co-chairmen of the Geneva conference on Indo-China represented by the governments of the Soviet union and Great Britain note with satisfaction that in accordance with their instructions the international commission for supervision and control in Laos convened in Delhi on the 28th April 1961 and thereby renewed its activity. The co-chairmen have received the commission's report of the 1st May 1961 and express their appreciation for the recommendations contained in this report.

The co-chairmen consider that the basic task of the commission at the present moment consists in fixing the cease fire in Laos in accordance with the understanding reached by the belligerent parties and in exercising supervision and control over the cease fire. After the conclusion of an agreemnt between the belligerent parties in Laos on questions connected with the cease fire, the commission should exercise control over the execution of this agreement. They have in view that with the agreement of the parties in Laos the commission in the course of its work of controlling this agreement will receive from the parties the information necessary for carrying out this task.

The commission should arrive in Laos immediately after the belligerent parties have ceased fire, having of course arranged its arrival with them, and should proceed to carry out its task.

The co-chairmen express the hope that the commission will carry out the functions entrusted to it acting in close contact with the parties in Laos. In this regard they are taking account of the positive replies which the belligerents have made to their call for a cease fire in Laos.

As regards the functions which the international commission for supervision and control in Laos will carry out on the completion of the first stage of its work the determination of these functions falls within the competence of the international conference on Laos which is being held in Geneva on the 12th May.

On the administrative questions raised by the commission in its report of the 1st May:

(i) the co-chairmen agree with the recommendation that the commission should request the government of India to advance 200,000 U.S. dollars to the commission to meet its immediate minimum requirements on the understanding that suitable arrangement will subsequently be made to reimburse the government of India.

(ii) the co-chairmen endorse the need for the greatest measure of economy by the commission in administrative matters.

The co-chairmen request the commission to furnish them with regular reports on its activities particularly with regard to the manner in which the cease fire agreement is being observed by the parties.
