TRADE

O.E.C.D.—REPORT ON FOURTH MEETING OF DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE GROUP

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief report to the house on the fourth meeting of the development assistance group which took place in London from the 27th to the 29th of March. As hon. members will recall, this group is a temporary body; when the organization for economic co-operation and development comes into being later this year the present group will be transformed into the development assistance committee of that organization.

At these meetings Canada, like the other countries concerned, was represented by officials from the various departments concerned with our international aid program. The other members of the group are Belgium, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, Portugal, the United Kingdom, the United States and the commission of the European economic community. Mr. Kristensen, the secretary general designate of the O.E.C.D., as well as representatives of the international bank and the inter-American development bank, also participated in the London meeting.

This meeting of the development assistance group was one of special significance. It was the first since the new administration took office in the United States. The administration, as hon. members are no doubt aware, has shown a very strong interest in improving the quantity and quality of the aid flowing to underdeveloped countries from the more advanced countries of the free world. In line with this interest, the administration put forward proposals for enlarging and intensifying the activities of the group.

The conclusions of the meeting in London were set forth in a communiqué to which are attached two important resolutions. With the consent of the house I should like to table these documents at this time. By way of summary I might say that the group agreed to recommend, as a common objective, an expansion in the aggregate volume, and an improved effectiveness, of the resources made available to the less developed countries. Accordingly it was agreed that the members of the group would periodically review together the amount and nature of their contributions in terms of multilateral and bilateral aid, and also agreed that a study should be made of the principles by which governments might equitably determine their respective contributions to the common objective, having regard to the different circumstances and capacities of each country.

The group also decided to strengthen the effectiveness of its work by inviting the delegations of the United States and France to nominate a chairman and vice chairman respectively of the group to serve until the O.E.C.D. is formed, and to be available in these capacities thereafter. Under this arrangement the chairman will be expected to devote most of his time to the work of the D.A.G. He will co-operate with the secretary general of the O.E.E.C. and should be able to provide the kind of leadership and continuity of purpose which the important objectives of the group require but which could not be easily achieved under the former arrangement whereby a different chairman was chosen for each meeting, with his responsibilities being confined to the actual conduct of the meeting in question.

I need hardly say that the government of Canada, representing a country which has itself played a significant role for more than a decade in the provision of bilateral and multilateral aid to the underdeveloped countries, is in sympathy with the purport of these resolutions. We recognize that an increasing number of the more economically advanced countries are now in a position to initiate or expand their aid in various directions and by various methods, and that by consulting together in the D.A.G. we can all improve the effectiveness of our assistance programs.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members will have had the opportunity, to some extent at least, to follow in the press the activities of this important meeting in London and the communiqué that was issued at the end of that meeting. On this side we will be happy to support anything that can be done to co-ordinate and extend development assistance, especially on multilateral lines. If the London meeting, as I understand from the minister's statement is the case, has made some contribution to that objective, then I think it should be strongly supported.

O.E.C.D.

There was one omission from the minister's statement, at least according to press reports of this meeting. That omission concerned a reported proposal by the United States that each member of the development assistance group should contribute 1 per cent of its gross national product to international assistance, and also that unless there were balance of payments considerations which made it impossible, there should be no obligation imposed by contributing countries to have their contributions spent within their own borders.

I do not believe the communiqué makes a reference to this proposal by the United States. A great deal of publicity has been given to it, and it would have been interesting to have secured from the minister some indication of the attitude of the Canadian government toward the proposal. Perhaps we will be able to do so on some subsequent occasion.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): We have heard the announcement by the Minister of Finance. All I will say at this time is that we regret the fact the record proves that Canadian assistance in the field of international aid has declined since this government assumed office. As the leader of the official opposition has—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is going beyond the scope of the announcement, which was a factual account of a meeting of officials in Europe, and is commenting generally on the actions of the government in the field of economic aid. These comments seem to me to be more appropriate for a time when the subject can be debated rather than the present time when the hon. member has the opportunity, if he wishes, to reserve comment with respect to this announcement but not to introduce controversial discussion.

Mr. Regier: In the light of your remarks, Mr. Speaker, all I will say is that I hope the Canadian government, at a very early date, is going to reverse this trend of declining participation in the field of international aid to underdeveloped countries, so that there will be more aid given rather than a decline in this respect.

MERCHANT SEAMEN COMPENSATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PAYMENTS FOR ORPHANS OF SEAMEN

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-81, to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to widen the discretion of the merchant seamen compensation board to make an allowance to a person who undertakes the care and maintenance of those orphans of a merchant seaman who are entitled to compensation under the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act. Under the present wording the allowance is paid only if the person moves into the household of the deceased seaman or deceased seaman's widow. This bill would permit the allowance to be paid, in the discretion of the board, when the orphans are cared for and maintained elsewhere than in the former household in a manner satisfactory to the board.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

POSTPONEMENT OF SUPPLY MOTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I make an announcement with regard to the business of the house. When the house rose for the Easter adjournment it was the intention to have a supply motion today and tomorrow. However, during the interval it seemed advisable to change that order of business and postpone the supply motion. After consultation with the parties on the other side of the house we have reached the conclusion that we might move into supply today without debate or amendment and consider the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

I hope this announcement will not take too many members of the house by surprise. Perhaps it will, inasmuch as we have been considering Department of Agriculture estimates on three preceding occasions for about eight hours and there has been considerable discussion on the first item. I presume that everybody interested in agriculture will be prepared to go ahead with the estimates today.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): As I understand it, this is just a postponement of the motion to go into supply. We are certainly quite agreeable to this request made by the government.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, our group is quite prepared to go along with it.

Mr. Speaker: I take it, then, that by unanimous consent the house is prepared to resolve itself into committee of supply without question put, and that the motion to resolve into committee of supply will not be counted as one of the six supply motions provided for in the rules. On that understanding, is it the pleasure of the house that, when the orders of the day are reached, a motion to go into committee of supply be accepted as unanimously adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

UNITED NATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA—CANADIAN INTERPRETATION OF APARTHEID RESOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of a resolution adopted at the United Nations which requested all member states to consider taking such separate and collective actions as are open to them to bring about the abandonment of policies of apartheid in South Africa. My question is this. In view of the fact that Canada supported this resolution, does this mean that the Canadian government, when South Africa leaves the commonwealth, will seek modification of existing arrangements regarding commonwealth trade preferences with that country?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The resolution in question, co-sponsored by India, Ceylon and Malaya, makes abundantly clear the assembly's abhorrence of and concern over South Africa's racial policies and requests "all states to consider taking such separate and collective actions as are open to them in conformity with the United Nations charter . . ."

It is, of course, up to members to interpret United Nations resolutions as they deem fit. The language to which the Leader of the Opposition has called attention is admittedly broad, but as the Canadian representative pointed out in his explanation of the vote, this clause does not in the government's view condone the use of force or punitive measures by member states. Our interpretation of this clause is rather in terms of moral suasion than of concrete measures such as various forms of sanctions.

The general question of trade relations with South Africa is under consideration, but we do not consider that the terms of this resolution would bind us to repudiate existing trade arrangements with South Africa.

Mr. Pearson: I wish to ask a supplementary question. Is it a fact that these trading arrangements with South Africa which the Prime Minister has mentioned are dependent upon South Africa's membership in the commonwealth?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not before me at the moment the various arrangements, but my understanding is that in general these arrangements are the result of bilateral agreements going back to 1932.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

OTTAWA—USE OF UNAUTHORIZED FLAG AT SUPREME COURT BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice, or in his absence for the Solicitor General. Could the minister advise the house what action, if any, has been taken as the result of a prank involving the flying of an unauthorized flag in front of the supreme court building in Ottawa on Wednesday last?

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I must thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. This matter has been investigated by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and is presently being considered by officials of the Department of Justice.

(Translation):

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, following the incident which happened a few days ago with regard to a distinctive national flag when a young student sought to express his enthusiasm for such a flag, could the Minister of Justice or his parliamentary secretary tell us whether proceedings will be taken against this student?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would allow that question to be added to the earlier one on the same subject, and taken as notice.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): No, the question is not the same.

An hon. Member: Do you want them to prosecute?

Mr. Chevrier: That depends on the government. The question concerns legal proceedings, and I think it is a different one.

Mr. Speaker: I have no intention of preventing the minister from answering if he wishes to do so today.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If the hon. member did not hear the answer I gave to a previous question dealing with the same subject, may I repeat that that matter is being studied by the officials of the Department of Justice at the present time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Translation):

SASKATCHEWAN

RESERVATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING MINING CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State or, in his absence, to the acting minister.

Is it true that the lieutenant-governor of Saskatchewan, Mr. Frank L. Bastedo, has reserved a bill on behalf of the crown concerning the right to renegotiate certain ore contracts with private corporations?

(Text):

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I might most appropriately answer that question. The first information the government received on this matter was on Saturday, when the lieutenant governor telephoned the under secretary of state that he had reserved a bill of the Saskatchewan legislature for the signification of the Governor General's pleasure. The bill, I am informed, purports to empower the provincial government to alter mining contracts and is entitled the Mining Rights Alteration Act.

We have no other information on the matter. There was no consultation in advance in any way, and any action in this regard would be taken by the lieutenant governor himself.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

MONTREAL—REPORTED ARREST UNDER OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General and Acting Minister of Justice. Is the minister in a position to confirm the arrest of a Montreal engineer allegedly charged with an offence under the Official Secrets Act?

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, according to the information of the Department of Justice a landed immigrant residing in Montreal was arrested by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police last night under the Official Secrets Act. He is appearing in court today. Under these circumstances I believe it would be improper to make any further comment on the matter.

COMMUNICATIONS

WINDSOR, ONT.—REQUEST FOR EMPLOYMENT OF BILINGUAL TELEGRAPH PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the report in Le Devoir of April 6 to the effect that in Windsor, Ontario, a city of 35 per cent French speaking people, it is impossible to telephone a telegram in French to the Canadian National Telegraphs office, would the minister make urgent representations to the C.N.R. to the effect that bilingual persons in a reasonable proportion be employed at the C.N.T. offices in Windsor and in other comparable localities across Canada?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to make such a representation to the management of the C.N.R.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ISSUE OF STAMPS TO CASUAL EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour, notice of which I sent to his office this morning. In the absence of the minister I would ask that the question be taken as notice by his parliamentary secretary.

Will the minister advise the house whether instructions have been issued by the unemployment insurance commission to all post offices throughout the country to discontinue the issuance of unemployment insurance stamps for casual employees. If so, on what date were such instructions issued, and does this mean that U.I.C. form 419-C has now been discontinued?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, notice of this question was brought to my attention just before I entered the house. I have asked for the information, and it will be given tomorrow.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACTS WITH MONTREAL ENGINEERING FIRM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister say whether the Montreal engineering firm of Surveyer, Nenniger and Chenevert is engaged in performing any contracts for the Department of National Defence or Defence Construction Limited?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has not given notice perhaps he will put his question on the order paper.

NORAD—INTERCEPT ACTIVITIES AGAINST STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): May I address a question to the Minister of National Defence—I regret no notice has been given—and ask him whether orders have been given prohibiting air intercept activity by NORAD planes against aircraft of the United States strategic air command.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Not as far as I am aware, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO DECISION IN RELATION TO BILL OF RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he has any observation to make on a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada that the Immigration Act supersedes the bill of rights and is the supreme authority, and that the bill of rights passed by this parliament is subservient to the Immigration Act.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have not had the opportunity as yet of studying the judgment in question. In any event, I would have no observation to make on the Supreme Court of Canada in the discharge of its responsibilities.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—INSTALMENT PAYMENT ON SALE OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I may address a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and ask whether the firm known as Dimensional Investments Limited has yet made the payment which is already in default in connection with the Indian land at Sarnia.

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I think I mentioned previously in answer to a question on the subject that the firm had 30 days grace in which to make the payment. That time has not yet elapsed.

Mr. Pickersgill: But has the payment yet been made?

Mr. Charlton: I will obtain that information and give it to the hon. member tomorrow.

Supply—Agriculture

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the order made earlier this day, is it agreed that I do now leave the chair by unanimous consent without question put, for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply, the order covering both today and tomorrow?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. MacEwan in the chair.

AGRICULTURE

AGRICULTURAL PRICES STABILIZATION

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, before this first item is passed, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he could make a statement concerning agricultural prices stabilization for the year 1961-62, and especially as regards milk products.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The government still has this matter under consideration. There has been no announcement yet.

Mr. Boulanger: When does the minister expect to make an announcement with regard to the price of butter and cheese especially, and powdered milk?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The same answer applies; this is still under consideration.

Mr. Regier: It is not very often that I have the privilege of speaking to an item of the Department of Agriculture. However, I cannot easily forget that I represent an industrial area. Many of the people of my constituency are pensioners, either because they are veterans of world war I or world war II or are old age pensioners. However, the bulk of the constituents whom I represent are industrial workers.

I may assure the minister at once that the industrial workers of my constituency are very much concerned about the welfare of agriculture. These union members in my riding remember very well the appeal of the Prime Minister who at the time was a leading spokesman in the opposition. They recall when the member for Prince Albert at that time, now our Prime Minister, raised his finger in anger at the prime minister of the day and said, "Canadian agriculture demands parity, not charity."

I have spoken to a great many people at many labour meetings and meetings of unionists, and each and every time I have appealed to them on behalf of agriculture for parity instead of charity they have responded. I well remember one time when the milk producers of the Fraser valley of British Columbia were in difficulty, and the international woodworkers of America went so far as to spend roughly $1,000 of their own union funds to organize mass meetings in the Fraser valley, which were designed to help the milk producers of that area. They organized them most effectively. We had mass meetings of up to 1,000 milk producers. The end result was that orderly marketing was restored in the lower mainland of British Columbia. This was a contribution that organized labour made to agriculture in our province.

Organized labour contends that Canadians engaged in agriculture are entitled to the same rights and blessings as are all other Canadians. We would like to see agriculture organized to the point where it is not merely an organization that is kowtowing to a particular government in office. We would like to see organized agriculture speak its own mind and express its own needs regardless of the consequences. A number of years ago organized agriculture was most vehement in its desire for parity prices. I regret very much that many major sections of organized agriculture have changed in this respect and are now kowtowing to the government of the day asking for little bits and pieces, a little more of this and a little more of that. A few branches of organized agriculture have forgotten the basic rallying call of parity, not charity.

When I look at agriculture on the national scene I cannot help but remind the committee of my observation of agriculture in the Atlantic provinces. The capital needs of agriculture are simply fantastic and completely staggering. A billion dollars and more will be needed by way of capital investment to put Canadian agriculture on its feet. I would say —and I do not think any member from the maritime provinces would refute my contention—that about 80 per cent of the so-called farms in that region of Canada are not really farms at all; they are only farms as a last resort. When we look at the statistics of the income of agriculture in the Atlantic provinces we have to realize that there is an urgent need for major reform. A farm which consists of 18 acres and has three cows, 80 laying hens and four pigs is no longer good enough. Remedial action is urgent and necessary in order to build up economic units of agricultural production.

Hundreds of millions of dollars of capital investment are urgently needed, and I am afraid that existing legislation is most inadequate in this regard. It is equally important that agriculture not only be given parity but that measures be undertaken in order to enable farmers to produce at an economic level. There is room in our nation for the farmer who can operate at an efficient cost of production. However, we have a long way to go before farmers in Canada generally will be producing at minimum cost, and I believe it is one of our major national responsibilities to help to bring this about.

I know that the minister represents a Saskatchewan riding, and I realize that in the main wheat growers are producing at cost. They are very highly organized. However, I do not think members of the House of Commons have ever realized that there are more farmers in Canada who have never produced a bushel of wheat than there are wheat producers. The minister comes from Saskatchewan but I hope he will keep in mind that there are many more farmers in Canada who do not produce a bushel of wheat than there are wheat farmers. There are farmers engaged in all kinds of agriculture in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia. These people are not overly interested in the welfare of the wheat farmer.

I know that because of the history of our party our group has usually been the spokesman for the wheat farmers of the prairies. I know that the minister's predecessors have also come from the prairies. I should like to see the day when the Department of Agriculture will pay some attention to those farmers who do not grow wheat, because there are many more of them in almost every province than those who grow wheat. It is in the interests of all of us that farmers in general receive an equitable share of the national income. I regret that almost everything the present and preceding governments have done has been solely in the interests of the wheat farmers of Canada.

I believe the minister has the intelligence to realize the over-all position of Canadian agriculture. I can remember the Saskatchewan election of 1938. At that time I happened to meet him on the sidewalk outside the Star-Phoenix office and we were watching the election results as they were posted on the signs. The minister and I were both born and raised in Saskatchewan, and I know he has the intelligence to look beyond Saskatchewan, to consider the needs of agriculture in other parts of Canada and to realize that the wheat farmers are not the only farmers in Canada. They represent only one branch of farmers. My great-grandfather, my grandfather and my father were wheat farmers in Saskatchewan, and I admire the wheat farmers. They have come a long way and they have had to sacrifice much. They now have orderly marketing of their product. By reason of their very strength of organization they are able to obtain a certain degree of equity.

However, there are many other types of farmers in Canada. There are dairy farmers, onion farmers, beef producers and others engaged in various branches of farming that I could mention. These people greatly outnumber the wheat farmers. I should like to see the day when the government of Canada will pay some attention to these other branches of agriculture and help them to organize at least to the same extent that the wheat farmers have been able to organize despite the governments that have been in power.

The wheat farmers are not receiving parity at this time, but other farmers in Canada are much worse off. I do not know where the fault lies. I think it lies with these other farmers themselves. They have not organized in order to be able to exert pressure in the same way the wheat farmers have, but I hope they are equally deserving of consideration in this House of Commons.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) whether he has received a request from the government of the province of Quebec, expressing the desire of the provincial authorities to share in the crop insurance scheme, in order to help the farmers generally, and particularly those specializing in certain crops such as cigar and cigarette tobacco?

At the present time, cigar and cigarette tobacco producers in the province of Quebec sustain considerable losses every year as a result of such weather hazards as frost and hail. Of course, producers of special crops can go to private concerns to ensure their crops, but only at prohibitive cost. That is why I ask the Quebec provincial authorities to co-operate with the federal government in the implementation of this crop insurance scheme, which is a necessity for farmers generally, and particularly those who grow special crops like the ones I mentioned a moment ago.

Cigar and cigarette tobacco is grown in the Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm area. It provides considerable income, not only to the farmers but also to the workers involved in the tobacco processing industries, such as Imperial Tobacco in Joliette and the Cooperative des Tabacs de Saint-Jacques.

I therefore ask the minister to indicate whether the authorities of the province of Quebec have been in touch with him, either by telephone or by letter, because I was reading in Le Devoir for February 21, 1961, the following statement made by the provincial minister of agriculture:

> The days of splendid isolation are over; Quebec intends to and will do its share in the development of agriculture and of all aspects of Canadian life, in co-operation with the federal government and with the governments of Canada's other provinces.

I think it is about time that the government of the province of Quebec made up its mind once and for all to co-operate with the federal government in putting into operation this crop insurance scheme which will be of great benefit to the agricultural class of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has been in existence now for 25 years. May I take this opportunity to pay tribute to this national organization which has been and still is of great service to the agricultural class. A great many agricultural associations of all provinces are members of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. In the province of Quebec, the Union catholique des cultivateurs, the Cooperative federee and the Quebec farmers' association are all members. The U.C.C. and the Cooperative federee each pay about $6,000 a year for their membership in the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. However, I would suggested to the authorities of the federation, to its president and its vice president, Mr. Lemoyne, and to its other directors, that the brief which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture submits every year to the government should be in both languages.

The federation recently submitted a brief to the federal government, but it was in one language only. I think it is most important that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture take steps to correct this situation and submit its annual brief in both languages.

Mr. Chairman, Quebec turkey breeders have been living anxious hours at the thought that the federal government would yield to pressures for the removal of controls over the importation of turkeys from the United States. The maximum import quota was 4 million pounds.

I know the members of the opposition support the removal of tariffs. I have a letter from the Cooperative avicole du Quebec, asking me to urge the Minister of Agriculture not to yield to demands or pressure for the removal of tariffs or quotas. I quote:

> In 1960, such imports reached 6½ million pounds, including all turkey meat other than whole turkeys. This figure is equal to one sixth of the total Canadian production, and to 6 per cent of the tremendous American production, estimated at about 45 to 50 million pounds. It is expected that in 1961, there will be an over-production of turkeys in the United States.

Judging from past experience, we have every reason to believe that American turkey producers would immediately object, if Canadian turkey producers ever shipped even a small percentage of that quantity beyond the 45th parallel. In 1959, towards the end of the season, Canada shipped a few thousand pounds of turkey. Representatives of the turkey producers in Washington soon got the authorities to put a stop to those shipments.

The Canadian turkey industry is, of course, concerned. What would happen if, this year or later, we allowed our market to be flooded with low grade incubator eggs or with turkey chicks and grown turkeys?

Whenever Canada imports those products, she is in fact buying birds fed with American grain. That means tons of food, thousands of hours of work, while our own grain remains unsold at a time when unemployment is rife in this country.

To set this right, to avoid failure for our producers and to safeguard the interests of that industry, the government would do well to stand fast and not yield to any pressure aimed at abolishing quotas or customs tariffs, and maintain a controlled ceiling of 4 million pounds.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in maintaining the quotas the government would greatly assist fowl producers.

On February 18, 1960, a brief was submitted by the cigar and pipe tobacco vendors co-operative, to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). That crop being very important in my constituency, may I suggest that those imports constitute a permanent threat to Canadian production.

For instance, in 1960, manufacturers used nearly two and a quarter million pounds of imported tobacco; this was almost 28 per cent of the total quantities used. And there is a new factor: those imports are becoming diversified. Whereas, traditionally, manufacturers import mainly from Cuba and the United States, in 1959 and 1960, there was a trend to buy from underdeveloped countries, like the Dominican Republic and others, at prices which dangerously competed with our Canadian production. A quarter of a million pounds from those countries entered Canada in 1960.

[Mr. Pigeon.]

In order to complete the comparison, let us add that except for imports from Cuba and the Philippines, the American tariff rate is considerably higher than ours. It is 16.1 cents for unstemmed leaf and 23 cents for stemmed leaf, whereas the Canadian rates are 12½ cents and 20 cents a pound respectively.

That is why the Quebec cigar tobacco producers are asking the government to consider the situation and see that nothing is allowed to impair that production which, economically speaking, represents a large amount of money for the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, in closing my remarks, I would like to say a word about the proportion of Canadian bilinguals in the federal civil service, and more particularly in the Department of Agriculture. I know that the Department of Agriculture cannot be blamed for the situation, because the civil service commission is an organization independent from the government.

However, I would ask that each year, if possible, a representative of the civil service commission, or a commissioner, visit the various faculties of agriculture and veterinary medicine in Quebec, or the various research departments of our universities—a procedure which might also be applied to universities in other provinces—in order to explain to graduates and other students what opportunities they have to serve the Canadian government in the federal civil service.

If a member of the civil service commission would visit the universities of Quebec and explain to those about to graduate and to graduates the advantages to be gained from employment with the Department of Agriculture, I think this would help remedy this situation.

Those, Mr. Chairman, were the few remarks I wanted to make in the best interests of our farmers and of agriculture in general.

(Text):

Mr. Thomas: There are a few comments I should like to make on this first item of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. I should like to say a word concerning the difficulties facing all sugar beet growers in Canada. As hon. members are aware, beets are grown in four areas, namely Alberta, Manitoba, southwestern Ontario and the province of Quebec. Due to a number of circumstances the growers, especially those in southwestern Ontario, have had a very difficult time and for some years the industry there has been in a marginal position. It is very questionable under present circumstances whether it pays the farmers of southwestern Ontario to continue growing beets.

However, as a result of the co-operation of the provincial government of Ontario, the federal government, the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company and the growers of Ontario, special arrangements were made to carry the industry through the crop year of 1961. This has been done in the hope that it will be possible, during the course of another year, to create in Canada a national sugar policy which would place the sugar beet industry of this country on a sound financial basis.

The beet growers themselves estimate that a quarter of a cent per pound on sugar in Canada could be used as a stabilization fund which would establish the industry in a sound financial position and permit the producers and the sugar refining companies to lay their plans for the future with confidence. In these days when we are trying to retain our employment in Canada and are trying to build up our Canadian industry I submit that it is important that the matter of a national sugar policy should be given close and careful consideration.

I hope and trust that the matter of establishing a sugar policy will be pursued with energy and vigour, and that it will not be lost track of during this coming year. We should get at the matter without delay, and should continue our efforts until we have arrived at some satisfactory formula for the proper establishment of our sugar beet industry on a sound financial basis. I make this recommendation for the consideration of the Minister of Agriculture.

Another matter I wish to mention has to do with storage for Ontario wheat. As members of the committee well know, the wheat producers of Ontario have established a wheat producers marketing board in this province. They try to finance their own operations as much as possible. They have the authority to levy a charge of nine cents per bushel on all wheat handled in Ontario. This nine cents per bushel is used for the purpose of a stabilization fund to take Ontario wheat off the local market and put it into the export trade. During their three years of operation the Ontario wheat producers marketing board have been seriously restricted by lack of storage space. Ontario fall wheat, which is a soft wheat, owing to the warm weather of the harvest season is subject to bin damage through overheating. It is necessary for the wheat to be taken from the field to proper drying establishments or to be stored where adequate drying facilities are available so the excess moisture can be taken out of the wheat and it can be properly dried for storage.

No such space exists at the present time. For several months the Ontario wheat producers marketing board have been negotiating with the national harbours board, through the Department of Transport, for the use of space in the Port Colborne elevator for the purpose of storing and drying Ontario wheat. I would urge upon the Minister of Agriculture the desirability of using his good offices to assist the Ontario wheat producers marketing board in reaching a satisfactory arrangement with the national harbours board and the Department of Transport with regard to this necessary storage space.

Another point I should like to raise is in connection with the farm loan corporation. I suggest that careful consideration be given to extending the provisions of the legislation so that loans may be made by the farm credit corporation to small or part time farmers. This is a way of life which is becoming more prominent in our Canadian economy. People live on small farms where they are not fully occupied; they take jobs in industry while they continue to live on the farm and enjoy the advantages of rural life. Such loans, if extended to this type of farmer, might require different regulations from those governing loans now being offered by the farm loan corporation. In the interests of our Canadian economy I believe it is advisable to give careful consideration to the extension of loans to small and part-time farmers.

Then again, when the new farm loan act came into effect the deposit which applicants were obliged to make in connection with an application for a farm loan was increased from $10, the amount which formerly applied, to 2 per cent of the value of the loan or $50. Since the value of land and the size of loans have greatly increased, there are few applications which do not call for the full $50 deposit.

This provision acts as a serious brake on the consideration of applications for farm loans. I would recommend that consideration be given to reducing this $50 deposit, which now applies, to the former amount of $10. I submit that the deposit of $10 is enough to prevent nuisance applications having to be considered by farm loan corporation field men, and that the increase to $50 was enough to discourage many people from applying for loans from which they might profit and from which the economy as a whole might reap benefit.

I think that is about all I have to say, Mr. Chairman, with the exception of one point. From time to time representations have been made to the effect that farm labour should be brought under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I suggest to the minister that, in the interests of agriculture, he should use his influence to have this matter given proper consideration. There may be difficulties in the way of bringing farm labour under the Unemployment Insurance Act, but certainly at the present time the farmers are handicapped when they try to obtain help in the labour market. Labourers are loath to accept farm jobs because they are not covered by unemployment insurance. Because of the high wages prevailing in industry it is difficult enough for farmers to obtain the help they need without this added handicap of trying to hire people when those people know they will not be covered by unemployment insurance.

(Translation):

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, before the first item of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture is carried, I would like to make, as briefly as possible, a few remarks on points of particular interest to my district. I will not repeat the arguments already advanced since the beginning of the discussion on the Department of Agriculture estimates; I will simply raise a few questions of particular concern to my area.

I want to refer the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) to the correspondence exchanged with his predecessor since the request I made here, in committee, at an earlier session, regarding the establishment of an experimental farm in northwestern Quebec.

This matter has been brought up regularly for many years—for over 20 years, I would say.

At one time, we had in our region, near Amos, in a locality known today as La Ferme, the beginning of an experimental farm. But one day, the federal Department of Agriculture decided to transfer quietly this farm to Kapuskasing, in northern Ontario.

Since then, farmers of my district have to go to northern Ontario, that is a distance of 300 miles, to get the results of the research and experiments that are carried on at the federal experimental farm of Kapuskasing.

It is generally recognized today in our region—the minister can readily confirm this with his officials—that the experimental farm which serves that part of the country and which is situated in Kapuskasing, Ontario, covers a very large territory between Hearst, Ontario, and Senneterre, Quebec. So, it covers a good part of the Chapleau constituency that I have the honour to represent in this house.

This territory is about 400 miles long in an east-west direction and 200 miles wide in a north-south direction. It is more than a territory; we could even say it is a province.

[Mr. Thomas.]

According to the information I could get from the people concerned and especially from the U.C.C. of the diocese of Amos, several requests have been made in this connection.

The U.C.C. has sent me a copy of a resolution that was passed at a meeting of delegates from 40 branches of the federation of the U.C.C. of the diocese of Amos, which reads as follows:

> Because of our needs and further to the wishes repeatedly expressed at our recent conventions, the officials of the Amos U.C.C. federation urge you to do your utmost to establish in the northwestern part of Quebec an experimental farm that would meet our needs and would be situated in the centre of our region.

I have described the territory which is served by the Kapuskasing experimental farm. May I add that the farms of that region, of which there are about 11,000, are spread on an area of one and a quarter million acres and are occupied by northwestern Quebec farmers of my region. In fact, a great many of them live in my constituency.

This figure of 11,000 farms distributed over one million and a quarter acres is four times higher than that of the corresponding area of northwestern Ontario, where the Kapuskasing experimental farm is situated.

Furthermore, I should like to add that the rapid development of the mining industry will affect, in future, that of agriculture proper. In this connection, I should like to digress a moment to mention the forthcoming opening of new mining districts in the Mattagami lake area where, precisely, the federal government will build a railway line in the course of the next two years; thanks to that new territory, it will be possible to open up a new agricultural area in the immediate basin of the Allard river, about which a fine future is predicted from the agricultural standpoint, since it is one of the most promising agricultural districts not yet developed in our area; I would even say that it is one of the rare districts not yet developed in the province of Quebec where agricultural possibilities are immense.

So, with the development of the mining industry to the north, northeast and east of Abitibi, there is no doubt that agriculture will continue to progress in our area. This means that the most important agricultural part of our territory is in northwestern Quebec, at about 300 miles from Kapuskasing. That, you can imagine, presents some inconvenience both for the personnel of the Department of Agriculture, stationed in Kapuskasing, and for the farmers and agronomists of my area who have to get there to obtain information about agriculture or research being made at that experimental farm.

The agricultural research work of the personnel of the federal Department of Agriculture in that area is enormously handicapped by that distance, since not only does that staff have to cover that enormous distance to carry out their work and observe it results, but also distance makes it difficult for those officials to have direct contact with farmers of my area; consequently, the efficiency of their work is curtailed by the loss of time incurred in covering that distance.

It is the same for the agronomists of our area who have to cover such a distance if they want to keep up to date and study their various problems on the spot at Kapuskasing, and observe the results to the benefit of the agricultural class.

I wish to make these remarks, Mr. Chairman, before this item carries, on account of its importance for the farmers of the area and on account of the representations made several times by the representatives of the farmers' catholic union of the diocese of Amos.

I am not asking, of course, for the closing of the Kapuskasing experimental farm; far from that—I would not even think of such a thing—but in view of the geographical situation of the immense territory to be served by that experimental farm, it is my duty to ask for an experimental farm for the Abitibi area, which will look, at the same time, after the northern part of the constituency of Temiscamingue. However, I presume that if such a decision were taken, it would be wise, before selecting a definite site, to consult the people most concerned, that is to say the farmers of the area as well as the local farm associations I mentioned a moment ago, namely the farmers' catholic union.

Now, before resuming my seat, there is another point I should like to mention. It is about the setting up of a regional slaughterhouse to serve the farmers of Abitibi and Temiscamingue. That matter has been under consideration for several years, and most particularly these last few years. Studies have been undertaken in this connection both by the farmers themselves and by the chambers of commerce in order to prove to the provincial government the advisability of setting up a slaughterhouse in that area, which would help the marketing of beef products obtained from cattle which could easily be bred in our area. Such a regional slaughterhouse would provide a proper market or a natural outlet for the marketing of cattle and other livestock which could be bred in the Abitibi area. That part of the province of Quebec is progressively developing and its possibilities are immense.

I realize that the decision to set up a slaughterhouse in that district must be taken by the provincial government. But already, unofficially, as was suggested by the slaughterhouse committee organized in my area, the city of Rouyn has been selected as the site of that slaughterhouse. Of course, as far as I know, no official decision has yet been taken by the provincial government nor by the Department of Agriculture, although the provincial members of my area have already anounced the selection of that site.

I presume it is in order to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture on the subsidies which might be granted under the Cold Storage Act. Therefore, I strongly urge the minister to kindly consider, as he always does, that problem in order that the farmers from the Abitibi area may obtain the subsidies to which they are entitled, in connection with the setting up of that slaughterhouse.

I shall now bring my remarks to a close. I might add, however, with regard to the slaughterhouse, that our farmers could no doubt arrange, as far as possible, to produce in Abitibi the feed needed for their cattle, because if they have to get it from western Canada, for instance—even though this helps to reduce the surplus of western grain—I imagine that breeding costs would increase and accordingly our farmers would make fewer profits.

Therefore I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the department will look favourably into the two suggestions I have just made, namely the establishment of an experimental farm in northwestern Quebec and the construction of a slaughterhouse in our area in the near future with the assistance of the Department of Agriculture.

(Text):

Mr. Baldwin: I intend to take advantage of the latitude allowed during the discussion of this item to deal with several matters of local interest to my own constituency, but first of all I feel I must take exception to the statement by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam when he suggested that this government had in the main restricted its agricultural legislation to those farmers in Canada who are wheat growers. That is far from being the case, and I am greatly surprised at the statement made by the hon. member. That statement can be explained only by the fact, as he admitted, that he comes from an industrial riding and therefore cannot have information available to him which is available to those of us who come from more versatile agricultural districts.

I think all hon. members recognize that the facts are otherwise. One has only to look at the titles of the statutes which this government has passed in connection with agriculture since it came into power in 1957 to realize that they cover a very broad field. I have here a book which is frequently quoted by members of the opposition when they find that their own sources of information are more unreliable than usual. They turn frequently to this little pamphlet "The Record Speaks", and I am glad to see they recognize true facts when they see them.

This little pamphlet makes it obvious that help for wheat growers is only one of a wide variety of subjects with which this government has concerned itself. Consider the Agricultural Stabilization Act. The very names of the commodities brought under support in connection with that measure speak for themselves. There are nine items, and only one of them is wheat. Then again, anyone who has had experience with the excellent work that is being done by officials of the farm credit corporation will realize that those officials are going above and beyond the call of duty in attempting to round out the farming operations of those who come to them for assistance, particularly those taking advantage of the provision which deals with supervised loans. A notable effort is being made by those officials to make the farming operations of these people more versatile and economic. Certainly in my constituency I know that people who have applied for assistance under that act are being advised, where that is deemed feasible and proper, to round out their farming operations and not restrict them merely to the growing of wheat, in order that there may be several prongs of economic support. Then again, the acreage payments are in themselves a firm indication that this government has not concerned itself with the wheat farmers alone but with all the farmers of Canada.

The amendments which were made two years ago to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act made provision for using grains other than wheat as a yardstick in reaching a decision as to whether or not a particular area should be entitled to assistance under that act. Then, finally, there is what I would call the crowning jewel of the diadem of agricultural assistance, the rural development act which is now before the house for second reading.

That is a brief list of some of the enactments brought in by this government, and it is sufficient to indicate that attention has not been entirely restricted to wheat farmers. I think it indicates a recognition by this government that the problems of agriculture are of long standing in their nature and in time. They are ailments which, like certain ailments of the body, require deep rooted and fundamental changes. That has been the difficulty in the past; we have seen only dilatory, temporary and short term attempts to deal with effects, and no attempt at all to deal with causes. This government has recognized that there are causes responsible for present difficulties, and it has directed its attention to those causes. I am convinced, as are those who live in the agricultural districts of Canada, that, given time, the cures which this government is putting into effect one by one will be efficacious.

I noticed that when the minister was speaking on the rural development act he mentioned that the provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act were to be made applicable to all parts of western Canada. In particular he mentioned the Peace River district. I was very glad to hear him say that, because this is something which all the farmers in my district will be glad to see. I am sure the hon. member for Cariboo, who has joined his efforts to mine in an attempt to make those provisions applicable to the northern part of Alberta and British Columbia, was also pleased to hear that statement by the minister.

Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be good enough to advise me before the discussion of these estimates is completed whether it is correct that it is not necessary to bring in an amendment to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in order to make the provisions of that act applicable to other parts of Canada, but that the same result may be achieved by regulation or order in council. I hope this will be done and that suitable publicity will be given to this action, because I believe there are people in my own constituency as well as in other parts of the north who would very much like to take advantage of the provisions of that legislation this year.

I wish also to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson some time ago with regard to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The provisions of this act have been made far more flexible and useful. I think we can almost say, in fact, that within the four corners of legislation of this kind we have gone probably as far as we can go without actually making it applicable on an individual basis. From an examination of this act and the way in which it was conceived and has been changed and amended I do not think it would be possible for us to make it applicable on an individual basis. But, with that limitation, it has been very useful. The changes have been most effective, and I am sure the people in my constituency would wish me to compliment the government on having made these changes and on the way in which they have been administered.

Recently I noticed that the legislature of the province of Alberta saw fit, in dealing with agricultural matters, to pass a resolution suggesting that the government should embark upon a two-price system in this country. Without in any way commenting upon that, I would think it would be more in the interests of the people of Alberta if the government of that province were to take steps to implement the provisions of the Crop Insurance Act, which they are entitled to do, by passing complementary legislation in the province of Alberta.

The province of Manitoba did a noble job last year in connection with the two or three trial areas. I understand they are going to amplify it this year. I do believe—although I may be wrong in this—that the province of Saskatchewan has passed enabling legislation, but thus far the province of Alberta has seen fit not to recognize in any way that they can, if they wish, take advantage of this federal legislation. I am suggesting that, instead of passing resolutions dealing with subjects which are beyond their competence, they might be better advised to do something which will be of some use to the people of the province of Alberta.

I wish to compliment the personnel and the officials of the department in connection with a most useful service performed by the two experimental farms in the Peace river country. One of these farms is situated in the Fort Vermilion area, some 500 to 600 miles north of the city of Edmonton, in the centre of a tremendous area of unexploited agricultural land. I suppose that at this time none of us knows to what extent in the future the people of the world may require the production from lands not being used at the present time for agricultural purposes. All we can do is to make a guess; but the valuable service which these people are performing in testing and assessing the merits of the different soils and finding out what crops can be grown there has been a great benefit to the people of the north.

I would suggest that when the minister examines the estimates of his department from time to time that he make certain that these people have every opportunity to pursue the very useful work in which they are now engaged. I say the same thing with regard to the experimental farm at Beaver Lodge. As a result of the work done there these people have made available to the farmers of the Peace river country fescue grasses and grains which can be grown in our country. This has enabled many of our farmers to branch out, to diversify, to get out of cereals into the type of agricultural production for which the world has need, for which there is a market and which can be sold for cash. I hope that these people will not be forgotten but will be permitted to continue their experiments.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal briefly with another point raised by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson. I refer to the basis on which acreage payments have been made over the last year. At first blush I think we can say the government was wise to take advantage of existing machinery. The statistical information gathered together by the officials of the Canadian wheat board for the purpose of issuing grain permit books, in large part, gives all the facts and information necessary on which to base those payments. I think the government was wise to do that rather than to embark up on the setting up of expensive and extensive machinery and personnel to go out and gather the facts required to make those payments.

It has been found in the past that where payments of this kind have been made the cost of administration was excessively high. Certainly that has not been the case in so far as the acreage payments are concerned. Nevertheless, I think we should remember that the statistical information gathered up and brought together by the officials and the agents of the wheat board is for the purpose of a specific act, namely the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and will not necessarily suit the purposes in all respects in so far as the making of acreage payments is concerned. I am afraid that this is what has happened in several instances.

I realize it is utterly impossible in any kind of remedial legislation to provide 100 per cent relief and benefit to all people who are entitled to it. There will always be a few left out on the fringes. This is something we have to accept as basic, but I do feel that there could have been more flexibility in connection with the administration of the payments even with the information which was available. I have three particular types of cases up in my district, particularly in the areas more remote from railhead.

Sometimes the farmers will feed as much grain as possible and by the time their feeding operations are concluded they find it simply does not pay them to haul what grain is left a distance of 200 or 300 miles to the elevator at Grimshaw, which is the nearest point to which they have access. Consequently, in most instances they do not bother to apply for grain permit books. When the announcement was made, as it was in this case, that those payments were available up there, they were unable to take advantage of the legislation and obtain payments which other farmers in the country were able to get.

Sometimes a farmer has a poor crop which does not justify his applying for and obtaining a grain permit book. Because of the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act it may happen that they cannot obtain the compensation and benefit which the act makes available to them. They also are left out.

Finally, we have the farmers who grow grasses and oilseeds. I am thinking particularly of rapeseed. We have a great many farmers who have gone in for the growing of rapeseed in our part of the country. When they apply for grain permit books they are told they are not eligible. I am inclined to think that the officials of the wheat board have been too rigid in their interpretation of the legislation. Their interpretation is not altogether acceptable. I want to call to the attention of the minister to section 2, which is the interpretation section, of the Canadian Wheat Board Act. Section 2(1)(a) reads as follows:

"Actual producer" means a producer actually engaged in the production of grain.

I call the minister's attention to the fact that it does not necessarily say "engaged in the production of grain in the particular year in respect of which the grain permit book was applied for".

Second, the interpretation of "grain" is quite significant. The word "grain" is defined as follows:

(e) "Grain" includes wheat, oats, barley, rye and flaxseed.

I emphasize the word "includes" there because I think it is not a restricting word. Elsewhere throughout the interpretation sections of this act and in other legislation we find that the word "means" is used. For example, "elevator" is defined as follows:

(d) "Elevator" means a grain elevator, warehouse or mill—

There is a distinction between the use of the word "includes" and the word "means". When the word "means" is used it is restrictive, and you cannot go outside of it. I submit with all respect that when the word "includes" is used in the act for the purpose of making these acreage payments it could include rapeseed, for example, and the officials should have been more flexible and a little more liberal—I use "liberal" with a small "l", Mr. Chairman—and they should have permitted people within the three categories I have mentioned to become entitled to the acreage payments.

I trust that the minister will pay some heed to these words and that reasonable consideration will be given to those who are still engaged in the process of making application. I know there are several hundred in my constituency who feel they have not obtained a reasonable application of the provisions of this scheme and they would like to be given consideration.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, before item No. 1 of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture carries I should like hon. members to bear with me for a few moments while I make some observations about agriculture. As hon. members know, I come from a riding in southeastern Saskatchewan which is basically agricultural. I had hoped to make some of these observations in a previous debate but sickness in my family prevented me.

Before continuing I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the new Minister of Agriculture. His riding adjoins the riding of Moose Mountain on the north, and during the five years that he was the leader of our party in Saskatchewan he spent a great deal of time doing research into agriculture and its economic aspects not only with respect to Saskatchewan but Canada as a whole. Therefore his assignment to this portfolio afforded me a great deal of pleasure. I am sure we can all look forward to great achievements in this department as he continues to hold this office. I should also like to congratulate his parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Provencher. I am sure that his wisdom and knowledge so far as agriculture is concerned will mean that we can look forward to a great contribution in this field from him.

In listening to the comments of other hon. members in the house from time to time it has come to my attention that apparently there is still a lack of appreciation of what the government has done for agriculture in the over-all picture. In order to summarize the situation I should like to refer to a few statistics and thus emphasize my observations in this respect. For the three years prior to the present government taking office, the following were the figures for the agricultural estimates. In the year 1954-55 the total figure was $88,310,304, in the year 1955-56, $93,881,452, and in the year 1956-57, $90,068,594, or a total for those three years of $272,260,350. The comparative figures for the three years after the present government took office are as follows. In the year 1957-58 this government pumped into agriculture $143,109,180.50, in the year 1958-59, $222,-173,607.75, and in the year 1959-60, $191,626,-946, or a total of $556,909,734.25 for those three years. That was the total compared with a total of $272,260,350 for the previous three years, or more than twice as much money. Simple as they are, I think these figures point up the fact that the government is taking a very practical and active part in doing something for agriculture.

Mr. Regier: Would the hon. member care to say where he got those figures?

Mr. Southam: They are taken from the estimates of the Department of Agriculture for the years in question. I should also like to add that the total figure I have given does not include approximately $58 million allocated to agriculture under the stabilization act which was enacted by the present government to assist agriculture.

In appraising the agricultural situation I was very interested in reading an article on the front page of the Western Producer, a representative farm paper published in Saskatchewan. I refer to the issue of Thursday, March 16, 1961. In this paper there is a headline which reads as follows: "Farmers' net income rises about 12 per cent in 1960". I am not implying that the government has done everything I should like to see done as far as agriculture is concerned but I should like to impress on hon. members and the public at large the net result of the agricultural legislation that we have been able to apply. The article elaborates on the headline in these words:

> Total net income of Canadian farmers last year rose 12 per cent above a year earlier, reaching an estimated $1,352,200,000, the dominion bureau of statistics reported last week. The total was up 6.5 per cent from the five-year (1955-59) average of $1,270,100,000, the bureau said in its annual advance preliminary estimates. Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta were down in net income. British Columbia showed a slight increase. Saskatchewan had the sharpest increase—more than $100 million at $354,373,000.
> Cash income in 1960 from the sale of farm products was only slightly below the 1959 level. On a commodity basis, the more important reductions were recorded for barley, flaxseed and hogs, while the more important gains were registered for potatoes, tobacco, cattle and calves. There was also a substantial increase in cash advances in farm stored grains in western Canada.
> Supplementary payments to farmers in western Canada in 1960 amounted to $77 million and included payments made under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the western grain producers' acreage payment plan and the federal-provincial emergency unthreshed grain assistance policy. This is in contrast to 1959 when farmers received $22 million, most of which was received under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. Boulanger: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is there an increase for the province of Quebec?

Mr. Southam: The article says that Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta were down but British Columbia showed a slight increase. The situation varies, of course, from year to year depending on the type of crop. Last year Saskatchewan was fortunate in having an increase of $100 million which resulted from the very large wheat crop. These variations in income depend a lot on the vicissitudes of nature but the over-all picture is very bright. As I pointed out, however, the over-all increase was about 12 per cent in 1960. This is due in large part to the program of the government and I think we should remind ourselves of this program and discuss it—possibly by criticizing it in a constructive and practical way—so that we can improve it.

I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River who referred to certain observations that the hon. member for Jasper-Edson had made about cash advances. This was one of the first pieces of legislation enacted by the government and in making a survey of my riding last fall I found that the farmers in that part of Saskatchewan had utilized this legislation very effectively. In fact, rural municipal secretaries and elevator agents who are involved in handling this type of payment told me that about twice as many farmers were availing themselves of this legislation, and from talking to municipal secretaries I learned that tax collections were considerably above those of preceding years. I questioned them about the reasons for this and they gave the credit to the cash advances legislation, so that this is one of the most effective and practical pieces of legislation that the government has implemented.

The hon. member for Peace River referred to the farm credit corporation, as did the hon. member for Middlesex East. This has been a most effective piece of legislation and it has been widely utilized by farmers all over the west. Because of the changes that are taking place there was need for a more flexible credit program in order to help to develop more economic farming units.

I should like to associate myself with the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Middlesex West. I feel consideration should be given to a reduction in the cost of the initial application for an appraisal. The charge at the moment is $50, and the former assessment was $10, which I believe was too small. I believe we would have a flood of applications to be handled by an already overworked department if the charge made were too small. In my opinion a more realistic price to charge for the initial application would be $25, and in this way we would get as many people as possible to take advantage of this flexible plan without any undue abuse.

In so far as crop insurance is concerned, I believe it has played a very effective part in our agriculture economy, especially in Manitoba. I have been disappointed, however, at the indifferent attitude displayed by our C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan with regard to this crop insurance plan. I do not know what we can do to rectify the situation unless we change the government. I believe the royal commission headed by Professor Baker indicated very strongly that a crop insurance plan should be instituted for the whole of Canada. Particular reference was made by this commission to the need for such a plan in Saskatchewan. I have been disappointed, therefore, to find that the province which is most in need of a crop insurance plan has been the most reluctant to enter the plan. I do not know the reason for this reluctance unless there is some political expediency involved. I wonder why Saskatchewan could not set up a plan similar to the one which has been working so effectively in Manitoba?

I should like to see the provincial governments take a more practical view of these crop insurance plans. As we know, the federal government contributes half of the administration costs of the plan as well as 20 per cent of the premium. Perhaps the provincial governments, and especially Saskatchewan, could see their way clear to contributing another 20 per cent of the premium, and in this way the legislation would become very effective. A province like Saskatchewan is particularly susceptible to the vicissitudes of nature. This province is about an equal distance from the two oceans, the Pacific and the Atlantic, and as a result is sometimes the most arid region of Canada. Therefore, the need for this type of protection in this area is great.

I find that most of the agriculturists in my riding have been very pleased with this agricultural rehabilitation and development act, an outline of which was presented recently by the minister. On August 30, 1958, as recorded at page 4347 of Hansard, the Prime Minister summed up our national agricultural policy, and the fifth point was as follows:

> Fifth, as a means of meeting the small farm problem the government has under consideration ways and means of improving the level of living for farmers on small farms by means of better land use, encouraging the formation of economic family farm units, improving technical training, extending unemployment insurance benefits to certain classes of farm workers, and by extending the vocational and technical training agreement for the benefit of those who wish to enter new occupations.

This is a long term program and we will have to wait a number of years before we feel the full impact of it. In looking at the Ulster Commentary, dated January, 1961, I find that the minister of agriculture for Northern Ireland, Mr. H. W. West, indicates that Northern Ireland has adopted the same type of developmental policy. I should like to quote this short paragraph from the minister's statement:

> The other source of satisfaction is the development of afforestation which is making tremendous strides, particularly in areas where there is little hope of attaining a good return from the land by other methods. At present some 5,000 acres are being planted annually and it is hoped that within 25 years some 5 per cent of the land area will be covered by forest as against less than 1 per cent in 1945.

I quote this paragraph to ilustrate that Canadian federal governments—and this government in particular—are not the only governments interested in this type of policy.

As the hon. member for Peace River has said, the P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A. have been amended since this government came to power. These amended pieces of legislation have proven very effective, and there has been a lot of favourable comment from the farmers of my area who are interested in water conservation. The amendment of P.F.R.A. to increase grants for dugouts from $125 to $250 and for small dams from $300 to $600 has proven very beneficial, and a great number of farmers in Saskatchewan have reacted most favourably.

In addition, we have heard a great deal of favourable comment on the aggressive sales program of our government in respect of farm products. I am thinking now particularly of wheat. The recent sales to China, to Russia and Czechoslovakia are going to increase our total sales to well over 300 million bushels, the amount the minister suggested as the approximate total sales this year. There are suggestions that we may surpass this target, and this brings a great deal of satisfaction to the people of Saskatchewan who have these large carryovers of wheat and who are looking forward to the results of this aggressive sales program launched by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture and the wheat board which has been working in conjunction with them.

In speaking of a sales policy and its relationship to free trade, I may say that I was interested to notice an article in the Star-Phoenix of March 18 which referred to a statement by Premier Douglas in the Saskatchewan legislature. He was expressing his views on the thinking of the people in the west with regard to free trade. It was very interesting to see the change in attitude, and I should like to quote this part of his statement:

—free trade alone will not solve farm problems, because farmers would be competing with their products on the open market and would be buying things they need on a controlled or subsidized market.

The article continues:

"We are facing a difficult and unique situation in the agricultural economy," he said.

Trying to meet the current problems by seeking to regain policies of the past would not work.

The concept of free trade is out of date, he said. The world is moving towards trading areas and trading blocs and the trend will continue in this direction.

I quote this statement because it does indicate a change in the thinking of some western people with regard to the sale of products.

I should like too see encouragement given to a more realistic approach on the part of our dairy industry in Canada with regard to the mounting butter surplus. This is something which I believe disturbs most of us. Butter production is a very important income producer for our farmers, particularly in eastern Canada. I think there is a trend on the part of the general public toward greater consumption of vegetable oils and an indifference toward butter consumption. This indicates we should take a very serious look at the problem before we find ourselves in a serious situation. Perhaps we could encourage the dairy industry to be a little more aggressive in their sales efforts in this product.

In studying some of the statistics relating to the consumption of butter on a per capita and regional basis, I find that there has been a large decrease in butter consumption in the areas in which the greatest increase in butter production has taken place. This would indicate that many of the dairy farmers themselves have decreased the consumption of their own products and have increased their consumption of vegetable oils. To me this does not seem to be fair, particularly when organized agriculture in this particular facet comes to the government and asks for subsidies in order to help to keep them in butter production. I think they themselves should take a more realistic approach to this situation.

Considering the basic importance of milk as a food, having regard to the health and welfare of our population, I think we could do something to encourage greater consumption of milk among the populace, especially among the younger generation. Possibly milk could be made available to all school children at least of public school age. I also think we should encourage the dairy industry to enrich their milk up to a minimum of about 3½ per cent butterfat rather than have it go through the skimming process which it now goes through, as a result of which it ends up with a larger amount of butterfat that has to be disposed of by other means. I think this is something at which we could take a serious look.

With respect to the stabilization act as it affects two of our basic commodities, namely eggs and pork, may I say this. I am quite in agreement with the switch-over to controlled production, limiting the payment to 100 hogs and, with regard to egg production, on the basis of a flock of 500 hens. However, if we are going to apply this type of legislation, I think it would be more effective if we were to pay this deficiency payment on a semi annual basis rather than on the annual basis that we are now contemplating. Having regard to the nature of the products involved, I think this procedure would be practicable. It would mean a little bit more administrative work on the part of the department but I think it would result in a fair application of the taxpayers' money with regard to agriculture.

As to the problem of farm labour I should like to make a few observations. I agree with other hon. members who have spoken previously that our government, working through the Department of Labour and the Department of Agriculture, should bring in some type of unemployment insurance plan for agricultural workers. I think this is something that is more necessary now than it was in former years. With the trend towards the larger economic unit, the large investment in machinery and the large over-all capital investment in land, we find quite a number of people who are making changes from one location to another and would still like to stay on the farm but possibly have not the required capital or do not want to invest large amounts of capital in order to be the owners themselves. However, they would like to be assistants or farm labourers and work on some of the larger farms. As a result, in order to cover this type of seasonal unemployment, I think it is more necessary than ever to have us take a serious look at this matter of bringing farm labour under the Unemployment Insurance Act. We find now quite a number of our more progressive farmers who are doing a good job and who are more or less self-sufficient with regard to capital machinery and so on but who find themselves quite embarrassed or having quite a problem in the fall with regard to getting adequate help to take off their crops and to assist them with their agricultural industry. I feel that this is a question we should examine seriously as soon as possible.

I should like to see our government continue the acreage bonus payments. I think this has been one of the fairest applications of government help for the purpose of meeting the cost-price squeeze that we know exists in the farming industry. It has been greatly appreciated by the farmers in my riding. There may have to be some modifications as to the administration of it so that any particular discrepancies we find now existing could be removed. But in lieu of a straight domestic two-price system which I have advocated on a previous occasion, I think this is a very effective piece of legislation and that it should be continued.

There is one other problem that affects my particular area of Saskatchewan. It has been referred to by others and I have referred to it myself previously. I have reference to the invasion of the boundary areas of Canada by United States farmers from the Dakotas and Montana. I am personally at a loss to know what is the answer to this particular problem. I think it will bear study by several departments—possibly the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Department of Agriculture—in order to see what steps may be taken to make sure that these people coming into Canada would take a more serious part in the economy of the particular areas into which they come. We find that this invasion by United States' farmers has been the result of the agricultural policy in the United States of subsidizing the farmers there through the soil bank, taking large areas out of wheat production and putting them into grass. We find that these farmers in the Dakotas and in Montana, being good farmers and having large amounts invested in machinery, hate to see it lying around idle. Immediately they look for some area where they can put their machinery, ingenuity and so on to work again and get back into agriculture. They therefore migrate across into Canada and either lease or purchase land. In most cases they lease it because they feel that their own agricultural policy at home may be only temporary. They lease large amounts of Canadian farm land that some of our own Saskatchewan and Canadian farmers themselves would be greatly interested in either buying or leasing. In other words, with the capital they have available from the soil bank they are providing fairly strong competition. In some cases it is increasing the value of the land. In a few cases the Canadian farmers feel that it is making it almost prohibitive for them to compete.

The situation has a few other interesting aspects. One is that in many cases the Americans who are coming over here are producing registered seed and are taking it back across the line with them to sell. This is something which does not aggravate the over-all wheat surplus particularly. In other cases municipal authorities, where some of this marginal area land has been put back into production, find that their tax revenues are up. But by and large quite an opposition is being developed on the part of our Canadian farmers. In order to stay in the agricultural industry those farmers who want to fit into this agrarian change to the larger economic unit especially those who have sons, feel that they should have access to this Canadian farm land rather than that it should be taken by groups coming in from the south.

As I say, I am not just too sure what the answer is to the problem, but I think several departments of government could give it very serious consideration. If our American friends should come in—and we naturally call them our American friends because we work with them on a very friendly basis apart from this matter—I personally feel that they should be encouraged possibly to come in here as landed immigrants and become permanent residents if they are going to take over this land in competition with our Canadian farmers.

In my closing remarks I should just like to say this with regard to wheat quotas. I have watched them fairly closely in our part of Saskatchewan. It happens that geographically we are about equidistant from the port of Churchill, the Pacific coast and the great lakes. When there is a demand for a certain type of grain from European countries I find that the wheat board themselves, in order to meet this demand quickly, have reached out and have drawn the grain from the closest areas adjacent to some of these ports. As a result there has been a big rectangular area, which includes my riding and some areas to the north and west, that has not had its fair share of the quota allocations. I should just like to mention this matter again. It is, of course, a matter of wheat board supervision of quotas. However, I think it is something that should be watched very closely.

We find that our farm population are very jealous with regard to their rights to equal distribution of these quotas, and rightfully so. As you know, Mr. Chairman, we get a quota of only up to about six bushels or seven bushels annually. In many cases, this does not take a great deal of the grain out of the area. As a result, in order to meet the demand of the agricultural economy now, our population in these areas wish to see that these quotas are watched closely.

With these remarks I shall conclude for the moment my observations on the agricultural estimates.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in the remarks of the previous speaker. I noted that at the opening of his remarks he was rather political in what he had to say. He regretted—and I use his own words—that the Saskatchewan government appeared most reluctant to co-operate in the legislation dealing with crop insurance. He also announced with considerable flourish that in Manitoba this was working very effectively indeed.

I believe that no province has yet had any experience with crop insurance and I do not completely appreciate how he can depreciate his own province in comparison with another when we consider that no province has yet had any real experience with crop insurance.

As I understand it, the Saskatchewan government is most reluctant regarding this scheme because of the heavy costs that have to be borne by the provincial government and the individual farmers concerned. In my opinion Saskatchewan is doing nothing less than its duty, and that is to protect the interests of the provincial treasury and the interests of the individual farmers concerned.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre also expressed the opinion that those engaged in agriculture in his constituency were very, very pleased—and these were his words—with existing legislation in connection with agriculture. I believe the hon. member should get outside the bounds of the city of Moose Jaw and visit a number of farmers in his riding. I believe that if he talked to the rank and file of the farmers of his riding he would feel that they were anything but very, very pleased with legislation concerning agricultural matters as it affects them.

Before we carry item 1, which is the main item and involves the salary of the minister, I should like the minister to explain to the committee and the nation why we cannot have parity prices for Canadian agriculture. Why cannot Canadian farmers who are producing those things that are consumed within Canada have the same rights as organized labour to sit across the bargaining table, perhaps with the Canadian association of consumers and the government acting as referee, and determine a price level in order to give them parity of income with all other workers of our nation?

I know this condition prevails wherever Canadian agriculture is adequately organized. This particular condition prevails in most of the major urban areas of Canada for our milk producers who market in those areas. We have milk boards in most of the major cities of Canada; we have milk boards in most of the provinces of Canada, and when the milk producers feel they are not getting a fair deal they argue their case of rising costs or otherwise before the milk board and obtain a certain degree of equity.

Why cannot all segments of agriculture be organized in a similar way? What is the government going to do in order to help other segments of Canadian agriculture obtain at least the limited amount of equity that Canadian producers of fluid milk in the urban markets have obtained for themselves in most of our major metropolitan areas?

Our wheat farmers have a long history in this connection. I believe their history is some 80 years in length; 80 long years of organization, fighting and bitter struggle. Our wheat farmers have at least obtained orderly marketing in Canada. Why cannot other agricultural producers obtain an equal amount of equity? Why can we not have parity prices for those products that are consumed within Canada, and deficiency payments for those products that must be exported?

I see nothing wrong with the two price system for wheat. I see nothing wrong with Canadian producers of wheat being granted equity in connection with wheat consumed within Canada, and in order to give them parity of income why should they not be granted deficiency payments because of the fact that world prices may be lower than called for by parity of income calls?

I hope the minister will explain why the government has deserted and, I regret to say, persuaded many leading agricultural spokesmen of Canada to desert the basic principle of parity of income for Canadian agriculture. I am heartbroken when I have to attend a meeting of organized agriculture and realize that organized agriculture takes a penny today rather than a pound tomorrow and bows down to political expediency rather than obtaining equity and a fair, square deal. Organized agriculture kowtows to political partisanship rather than insisting on the fundamental and basic rights of the man who tills the soil.

If we can have parity of income for the fluid milk producers of Canada—and I hope we are getting near to having this for the wheat producers of Canada—why can we not have it for the potato grower, for the small fruit grower and the tree fruit grower? Why must potatoes be imported into Canada when we are able to produce potatoes at an economical price? This reflects a lack of planning and of organization. Why should strawberries be dumped on our market to the ruin of our own berry producers?

Mention has been made of the family farm. I indicated earlier my opinion that an efficient family farm is not a farm of 18 acres with a couple of cows, a couple of laying hens, a couple of acres of wheat and a couple of sows. I support the efficient family farm, but this government is doing nothing whatever to support such a farm when it introduces legislation which would support a farm which would have 500 laying hens. The minister knows enough about modern agriculture to realize that an economic family farm unit is not constituted by 500 laying hens. If he limits his guarantees to that, all he is doing is subsidizing the inefficient agricultural producers of Canada and helping to prolong the agony of such farm families. We maintain that the efficient family farm should be a farm unit where husband, wife and family are able to recover their cash outlay plus a reasonable percentage of their investment and, in addition, receive an income on a par with that of the ordinary Canadian citizen. This cannot be accomplished by a policy of curtailing production, and I hope the minister will not follow the example of his predecessor who used to march around the country telling farmers: if you want a fair price you have to produce less. The former minister of agriculture was as ill-advised then as he is now in his new role as an advocate of nuclear weapons. The conception of restricting production in order to maintain prices is an outmoded capitalistic idea which even capitalists will no longer buy. However, the Minister of National Defence, when he was minister of agriculture, bought that concept. What an inhuman and unrealistic attitude that is, and what a typically Tory attitude it represents. The present Minister of Agriculture, unlike his predecessor, is a native of Saskatchewan and I know he has a little bit of the progressive in him. The words "Progressive Conservative" are not entirely inapplicable to him, and I hope he will not pursue the policy of his predecessor and advise all kinds of organizations across the nation that if they want a fair and equitable deal they must produce less, create scarcity, and thereby obtain better returns per unit.

I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River. I should like to remind him that the wheat growers of Canada are organized. Even though I sometimes may have to disagree with what they advocate, they have come a long way over many long years. They have made sacrifices, and other branches of Canadian agriculture have not even begun to realize the potentialities of organization. I hope the minister will supply some leadership to these other branches of agriculture in order to help them to help themselves to get a fair deal. We have often heard of lobbying legislators. I know of no group in all Canadian history, outside the investment dealers, the Canadian chamber of commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, who have lobbied more effectively in this House of Commons than have the wheat growers of Canada. I should like to see the day when the onion growers, the potato growers, the tomato growers and the poultry farmers are organized to the point when they can make their unified voices heard, and I hope, as I said, that the minister will supply some leadership so as to enable these people, who together outnumber the wheat growers by far, to obtain equity on the national scene.

Much has been made in speeches of the minister's "trees galore" plan. I admire the plan. I think it is wonderful. I think it is good. However, it will do very little to help the farmers of Canada in either the minister's lifetime or my own. This is a long range program which the minister is advocating and there are matters of much greater urgency to be attended to now.

The hon. member for Moose Mountain had some good words to say about the minister but his words of praise also included the minister's parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Provencher and that, I think, was an error. The hon. member for Provencher, as I understand it, is in favour of the factory farm. We in this group and I think I can speak for my colleagues—are in favour of the family farm as opposed to the factory farm.

The hon. member also mentioned the problem of unemployment insurance for farm workers. I agree that they should be covered by unemployment insurance. However, what is basically needed is to give to the farmers an adequate income so that they can afford to pay a proper wage to their help. If they can pay an adequate wage they will be able to get the help. I realize the farmer is unable to do so because he does not get fair treatment. He is unable to pay the wages that industrial firms are able to pay, and therefore very often is unable to get the help he needs. Unemployment insurance will not provide the answer even though it ought to be introduced and made applicable to farm workers. But that is not the real problem; the real problem is to give the farmer enough net income so that he can pay his employees a wage which would make the position attractive and the wages comparable to those which are paid in industry today.

Mr. Pitman: Before the item carries I would like to ask the minister a question. Is the federal government planning to introduce legislation which will permit the federal government to co-operate with the provinces to pay compensation to farmers whose animals are destroyed because of rabies? I understand that some time ago there was an outbreak of rabies in various provinces in Canada and by order in council compensation was paid on the basis of the federal, provincial and municipal governments co-operating. Since then in my own particular area one or two animals have died and no compensation has been forthcoming. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is unjust. Simply because no epidemic is raging at the particular time certain people suffer losses, they should not be denied compensation. Farmers are quite co-operative with the federal Department of Agriculture. Indeed, they are quite enthusiastic about the help they receive. I think it would build up confidence on the part of the farmers if such legislation were forthcoming. Will the minister inform the committee in the course of his reply.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the item carries, and since I do not think it would be appropriate on any other item, I wish to put one or two queries to the minister to give him the opportunity to explain to us what is happening with respect to the view of one correspondent who described the minister as doing political farming. Perhaps I can make my point clear by reading this piece from the Victoria Daily Times of January 17, by a very distinguished member of the press gallery, Mr. Tom Gould, which is entitled "Political Farming":

> Agriculture Minister Alvin Hamilton has a decided advantage over opposition critics of the government's farm program. Since taking over the agriculture portfolio, the minister has discovered a way of using the taxpayer's own money to distribute what amounts to political propaganda. The information division of the department has for a number of years been producing a twice-monthly publication entitled "Farm News", that is sent to every newspaper and radio station in Canada. In the past, ministers left it alone. It was a purely departmental publication, dealing in matters of concern to Canada's farming population.
> It carried articles on the control of wild oats, on the use of chemical fertilizers, and a wide range of problems studied by the labs and experimental farms operated by the government.
> Mr. Hamilton has decided to take advantage of this publication to spread the government's views on agriculture. He made his debut as a columnist in the current issue, on the highly-controversial subject of allowing feed mills to purchase grain directly from producers without first obtaining delivery quotas from the Canadian wheat board.
> Officials of the information division have been informed that the minister intends providing them with a similar column once a month to start, and may step it up to twice-a-month to make sure he gets in every issue. His first effort takes up one sixth of the print space in the current issue.
> It is an out-and-out defence of the government's action in the feed mills controversy, and a denial of the claims made by critics of the action.
> People close to Mr. Hamilton say the use of what was a purely departmental information outlet is but one of the first steps towards becoming what the minister describes as "the most political agricultural minister Canada has ever known."
> One of his first moves on taking office was to set up a "political file" in his office, something that didn't exist under former minister Doug Harkness, who is now Minister of National Defence.
> Mr. Hamilton obviously plans to spend far more time out on the road, convincing farmers they have never had it better, than in sitting in Ottawa running the department. He has made a dozen major policy speeches.
> This emphasis on the political aspects of agriculture is readily understandable. The Tories currently have a solid hold on the prairies,—

Well, I think some of us would question that.

> —and they want to retain that hold in the next federal election.

I now turn to the Winnipeg Free Press of February 18, and to a report by Mr. Victor Mackie, a respected member of the press gallery, and an exceptionally well-informed one, who seems to be able to get advance information about the reports of royal commissions, who had this to say:

> Agriculture Minister Hamilton is out to build up an efficient, high pressure and extensive public relations and information service for his department. He wants more publicity for his policies.
> He has hired on a contract basis an editorial writer from the Toronto Telegram, Harry Halliwell, for six months to do the job of rebuilding the agriculture department's publicity agencies.

We all recognize, of course that the Toronto Telegram is a leading agriculture journal in an agriculture area of the country, and no doubt that would fit one of their editorial writers specially for this function. I continue:

> Mr. Halliwell has obtained leave of absence from his newspaper.

That would not surprise anybody who is aware of the very close relations, not entirely agricultural, between that newspaper and the government.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Halliwell also used to write for the Star-Phoenix in Saskatoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: He may have written for the Star-Phoenix in Saskatoon—

Mr. Jones: As an editorial writer.

Mr. Pickersgill: —as an editorial writer, but I do not know that that would necessarily qualify him, any more than would writing for the Toronto Telegram as an expert on publicity for the Department of Agriculture. I continue with the quotation:

> Also, at the minister's suggestion, the Canadian wheat board has hired Ralph Hedlin, a free lance writer in Winnipeg, on a contract basis, to act as a part-time public relations man for the board.

I now turn to the Russell Banner, published in Russell, Manitoba, a province quite near to the one in which the minister lives. Incidentally, perhaps I ought to correct what I believe was a misstatement by the hon.

member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. I do not believe the minister is a native of Saskatchewan any more than I am. I understand he was born in that little farming settlement of Kenora, Ontario.

Mr. Regier: I saw him there in 1938.

Mr. Pickersgill: He has been in Saskatchewan quite a long time, just as some others who were not actually born on the western prairies have spent a lot of time there. The Russell newspaper, the Banner, in its issue of February 23, contained this article under the heading "Selling Mr. Hamilton". I do not suppose it was really suggested that there was any reintroduction of slavery; I suppose they were using the word "selling" in that modern sense of Madison avenue and not in the old-fashioned sense of the Louisiana slave market. I quote:

> Surpluses would soon vanish if the federal minister of agriculture put as much effort into selling farm produce as he does in selling Mr. Hamilton to the public. As though he didn't get enough press releases from various government departments, Mr. Hamilton has hired himself a special editorial writer to build up an efficient, high pressure and extensive public relations and information service. And we in the newspaper field are feeling the effects already, for there is hardly a mail coming in without one or more releases from his information service, which often include a text of one of his speeches. All have that stereotype beginning "Agricultural Minister Alvin Hamilton said today." One would need a fair sized daily to relay all the material to the public. Offhand, we would say that 25 mimeographed pages are received each week and multiply this by some 800 weeklies in Canada, as well as dailies, radio and T.V. stations, and you have a lot of paper. No wonder we all have such big waste paper baskets.

Perhaps that would explain the minister's new policy on planting trees. If this proliferation of press releases is going to continue at the rate that, according to these writers, it has already reached since he became minister, he may feel that the existing crop of spruce trees in the country will not produce enough paper for all his press releases and therefore we must increase the production of wood in order to produce the necessary paper and thereby produce a crop that will not be in surplus.

The minister was not here, of course, but I remember the days when the minister's friends were over here where I am now and there was no theme on which Mr. Drew, the former leader of the party, and other members spent more time than the extravagance of the previous Liberal government in its information services in the various departments. Promises were made in those days that when the Conservatives came into office they would fire all these publicity people, get down to the business of dealing with the problems of the country and let their solution of the problems speak for itself. That does not seem to have been the practice that has been followed in many departments but I do not think there is any department where there has been such a conspicuous increase in the crop as in the minister's department where, notwithstanding some of the other undisposable surpluses, I have no doubt that from the look of things it will not be too long until the biggest agricultural surplus will be the surplus of the minister's press releases and other propaganda of one kind and another. Apart from any harvest of votes the minister expects to get out of these press releases, which is hardly a legitimate expenditure of the funds of the Department of Agriculture, it did seem to me that he should explain to the committee precisely what advantage he thinks the farmers get from seeing his picture in this information bulletin which, according to this story, was formerly a compilation of technical information of one sort and another.

I think he should explain just what justification there is for this proliferation of propaganda and expenditure because it does seem to me that we have enough real problems that should engage the full time and attention of ministers instead of their indulging in this practice of building up huge propaganda machines with the avowed purpose or at any rate the apparent purpose—perhaps the minister would not avow it—of political self-glorification. I felt that perhaps the minister had been so busy issuing these things, so busy making these speeches and had spent so much time on the road that he had not had much time to read the newspapers to see what kind of reception his road show was getting and that perhaps it would be helpful to him if this were drawn to his attention. I may say that these are just a few random samples and I could produce many more if it would not weary the committee and take up time unnecessarily.

I know that the minister should not be expected to give an answer when he replies on item No. 1 with respect to another matter about which I should like him to give the committee some information. However, I felt that I might give the minister notice now so that when the appropriate item is reached—I think the matter will perhaps come under the P.F.R.A. item—he can give us a progress report as to water control on the Fairford river in Manitoba. There was an order in council passed on October 28 last, a copy of which I have in my hand, setting out the basis on which the government of Canada is undertaking this work as part of the over-all flood control program, I understand, in Manitoba.

If I understand the situation correctly, and the minister can correct me immediately if I am wrong, the control of the Fairford river is being undertaken by his department as an entirely separate project from the proposed Red river flood control which would come under different legislation and presumably under another department. I might say that I have the greatest possible sympathy for this project and I would not want to be misunderstood at all in that regard. I lived within ten miles of lake Manitoba for a very large part of my life, the most impressionable part of it, and it was one of the saddest things to see the lakeside meadows inundated with water year after year and to see, as I saw several years ago, farmers watching their holdings vanish because of the water.

I know this is a very difficult problem. There is a danger that by running down the level in flooded areas of lake Manitoba you may create a problem on lake Winnipeg. I know it has not been easy to work out a scheme that we can be sure will be satisfactory. I always like to give credit for encouraging things when they do happen. I think it is encouraging that a start is being made on this problem and I think there are many people who would like a progress report under the appropriate item.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would deem it advisable to reply with respect to why farmers cannot have parity of income with respect to Canadian agricultural products consumed within Canada and why they cannot have deficiency payments on exported agricultural products adequate enough to bring prices into line so that the farmers will have parity of income with all other workers in Canada?

I should like to ask the minister one other question. Since the minister comes from a wheat growing area of Canada, namely, Qu'Appelle-Wolseley, I should like to ask him why it was deemed advisable to appoint a parliamentary secretary who comes from the riding of Provencher in Manitoba which I understand is also largely a wheat growing area. I cannot ask the minister about his appointment but why were all the other types of agricultural production ignored in the appointment of a parliamentary secretary? Why was a balance not obtained within the department? Why was an onion farmer from Ontario, a tomato grower from the interior of British Columbia, a dairy farmer from Quebec or even a florist from Nova Scotia not appointed to this office? Why did the government decide that the minister and the parliamentary secretary should represent in the main the wheat farmers of our nation?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Shall item No. 1 carry?

Mr. Regier: No. I think the minister would like to tell us why Canadian farmers are not entitled to parity of income.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, one reason why I was reluctant to speak was the fact that any reasonably intelligent person listening to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam would say that the kindest thing that could be said to the hon. member is that he should have kept quiet because never have we heard such a hodgepodge of contrary views and confused economics in the history of this chamber. I have always felt that those responsible for agriculture have the responsibility of letting the people know some of the facts concerning their industry.

Now, I am not going to deal with all the points raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam because, quite frankly and honestly, I wish the hon. member would read his speech and think about it a little instead of talking. I am sure he will not be proud of that speech when he reads it.

Mr. Regier: I think the farmers will read it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): During the hon. member's speech, Mr. Chairman, he not only attacked the wheat farmer but he attacked the intelligence of farm organizations. He came out against the importation of food supplies into Canada. He came out for producing surpluses beyond our own needs. He came out for controls and he came out against controls. If the hon. member will just read that speech over it will save me the unhappy task of exposing the depths of the ignorance that was expressed.

I have no right to say anything about why my parliamentary secretary was appointed. Once again, I would ask the hon. member to get out of these city districts he represents and learn something about the geography of Canada.

Mr. Regier: I was born in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, I know, but after your speech we are not proud of it.

Mr. Regier: I am very proud of it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member should learn something about the constituency which the hon. member for Provencher represents. He will find onion growers there, sugar beet growers, cattlemen, dairymen, fur farmers, almost every type of farming except wheat farming. I mention that only in passing. I just point out that if it is not apparent to the hon. member it must be apparent to all the rest of us, that it is only kindness on my part that keeps me in my seat.

Research branch—

5. Branch administration including Canada's fee for membership in the international society for horticultural science and $139,045 for grants in aid of agricultural research in universities and other scientific organizations in Canada, $1,899,219.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, on item 5, I should like to say a few words about markets for our agricultural products. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) delivered a fine speech about research and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) himself commended him for it.

I should like, however, to add a few words concerning market research for agricultural products. I feel that the prosperity of our agriculture will depend on our exports to other countries.

Some time ago, I read certain publications where it was mentioned that the British market was quite extensive, but that we were not taking full advantage of it as far as Canadian exports are concerned. For instance—the latest figures I have are for 1957—it is stated that Denmark exported 249,000 tons of meat to the United Kingdom, Holland, 16,000 tons, Poland, 49,000 tons and other countries also exported 39,000 tons of meat, while Canada exported 832 tons.

I feel that in the matter of research, the government should make every effort to expand our markets.

With regard to dairy products, last year, that is in 1959, British imports of dairy products reached $511 million, tobacco products, $228 million, fruits and vegetables, $633 million, while the Canadian contribution was only 2½ per cent in the case of dairy products, 0.9 per cent in the case of tobacco products and 0.7 per cent in the case of fruits and vegetables.

Since the Canadian government maintains rather close relations with the United Kingdom, I fail to understand why we cannot increase our exports to that country.

As for the studies and research the minister intends to undertake during the coming year, that is in 1961-62, since this item in the estimates has gone up by 28 per cent, I would ask that export markets be given prime consideration. This is our only hope to achieve a prosperous, an expanding agriculture.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I should like to tell the hon. member that the subject he has raised is a very important one, namely, the development of market research for products abroad as well as in Canada. This subject should really have been discussed under the item relating to the economics division, but perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words about it under this item. This is one item that I feel has been overlooked.

In the speeches mentioned by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I outlined several proposals that I thought we should follow. The emphasis today is on market research and getting new products in front of the consumer to keep pace with our competitors. Within the last four or five months we have had an interesting experience along these lines. A certain number of potatoes from the United States were coming into Canada. Upon investigation it was ascertained this was because the patent that was held for processing these potatoes into instant potatoes was a United States patent. The department immediately got busy and bought a patent from the United States department of agriculture and then went ahead on its own with the development of a patent under Dr. Asselbergs. This is an example of market research where the laboratories we had were used to develop a process that would enable Canadians to put up a product more suitable for the Canadian market.

I agree with the hon. member that this is one thing we should push. So far the Department of Agriculture has not done too much about it. We are just reorienting ourselves toward this approach. I think I can guarantee the hon. member that I will give it all the push I can.

In so far as markets in the United Kingdom are concerned, I think the hon. member is aware that our prices in Canada for dairy products and almost all other farm products are very much higher than world prices. We have lost our hold on the United Kingdom market. However, this must not stop us from trying to get back into that market. We do have good products such as wheat and tobacco that we can sell on a competitive basis anywhere in the world. We will have to develop specially products, such as high quality fruit, cheese and so on. As I have said a good many times good, plain Canadian products have a taste advantage that makes them attractive even at higher prices.

I should like to thank you, Mr. Chairman, for permitting me to discuss this subject for a moment. I think the Department of Agriculture is well advised to reorient itself and think more of marketing than it has in the past.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, according to the remarks of the minister, he will exert more efforts than were made during the last four years.

I remember that during the election campaigns in 1957 and 1958, they were going all around Canada trumpeting that when the Conservative party would be brought into power, an army of agents would look after the marketing of our products.

After three and a half years, I am glad to note that the minister has at last decided to do something in this field.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Shall item 5 carry?

Mr. Knowles: I have one question I should like to put to the minister. It is in connection with the experimental work that is done in my area in the Delhi substation in connection with tobacco. The people of that area have appreciated the work that has been done there over the years, but we sometimes feel that it would be better if the station were operated on its own rather than under the direction of the station in Harrow. It is not that we have any objection to the work that has been done. There has been the closest co-operation. However, when diseases strike, there have been instances where farmers have lost their whole crop within a very short period.

One example is weather fleck on which the department has done a considerable amount of work in that area during this past year and it is much appreciated. However, we feel that if the station were operated on its own it could probably move faster when some of these serious diseases strike. If it were on its own it could probably bring its staff up to greater strength. We would probably need a biochemist, probably more work in plant breeding and also a disease specialist. I believe these additions would facilitate the work carried on by the station. I do not expect the minister to give an answer at this moment but I should like him to give the matter consideration as to whether this station could be operated on its own in the future.

Item agreed to.

Institutes, stations, farms, laboratories and services—

6. Operation and maintenance including the costs of publishing departmental research papers as supplements to the Canadian Entomologist, $21,175,694.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: I would like to have some clarification on item 6, which shows an increase of $1 million. Could the minister give us some explanations concerning this increase?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This increase is as a result of salary increases. The item is about the same except for the $800,000 increase in salaries.

Item agreed to.

Production and marketing branch—

8. Branch administration including contributions to agricultural organizations to assist in the marketing of agricultural products, subject to the approval of treasury board (also includes the former item for agricultural products board administration), $1,001,970.

Mr. Benidickson: What are the organizations that are referred to under this item? I have looked hurriedly at the details on page 103 but I did not see any reference to the organizations. The main item on page 5 refers to contributions to agricultural organizations to assist in the marketing of agricultural products.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am informed that this changes from year to year but usually it deals with some marketing organizations like honey growers or fruit growers who have a particular problem and to whom we give grants.

Mr. Benidickson: Can the minister indicate what grants were given in the year 1960-61? Perhaps that information could be put on the record later if the minister does not have it readily available.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, if the committee would allow it, I would ask that we revert for a moment to motions. In view of the fact that the function in honour of the prime minister of the United Kingdom and his wife begins at a quarter to six, would it be possible for the house to revert to motions just for a moment so that I might table the report about which I spoke earlier?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to revert to motions for the purpose of tabling a document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—TABLING OF REPORT AND SUMMARY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table two copies in English and in French of the report of the royal commission on transportation. Copies are being distributed to hon. members immediately. At the same time I should like to express the thanks of the government for the public service rendered by the commissioners and their staff and in particular, appreciation to Mr. M. A. MacPherson, Q.C., who took on the onerous duty of chairman of the commission when Hon. C. P. McTague, Q.C., had to relinquish his place on the commission because of ill health.

A statement of information and a summary of the report has been furnished to me by the secretary of the commission. I should like as well to table that summary from the secretary in both English and French.

Mr. Pearson: Is the Prime Minister going to make any statement on the report at this time?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Speaker, I think that any statement will be given in due course but not at this time.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Perhaps the Prime Minister would allow a question or two in connection with the report which he has tabled. Does the report which he has just now tabled involve legislation?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, the report is simply a compendium of the recommendations of a royal commission. After study has been given thereto, the question as to whether legislation shall be introduced will be determined and the house will be advised thereof.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the Prime Minister another question? The Prime Minister will recall that, during the course of the debate on the resumption of work legislation, he indicated that in this interim report or first report of the commission there would be found a formula which would deal with the freight rate structure and also with the resumption of work. The Prime Minister has seen, if not the report, at least the summary handed to him by the secretary. I think the opposition should know whether that formula to which the Prime Minister made reference is to be found in the report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I recall it, I expressed the hope and expectation that the report would contain recommendations which would tend to alleviate or remove the detrimental effects of horizontal increases in freight rates and would suggest means whereby discrimination against various localities and regions in Canada might be removed. After the hon. gentleman has had an opportunity to read the report he will be in a position to understand the nature and degree of the recommendations that are made.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) also suggested that in it would be found a formula which would not only do away with the inequalities but would also deal with the resumption of work and, in effect, avoid the strike. The question I am putting—

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think perhaps the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) should reserve his questions until the orders of the day. What has transpired is that the house, by leave, has permitted the Prime Minister to revert to motions for the purpose of noting the filing of a report, but he has not made any statement thereon. Our practice has been not to discuss a document when tabled, which is all that has been done at this stage.

I intervened because I thought the hon. member had perhaps only a minor matter upon which to raise a question, but if there is to be any prolonged discussion of the matter or further questioning, I suggest it be done on the orders of the day or deferred until the matter can be debated.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I am not complaining about the inference in Your Honour's statement, but Your Honour will remember that the Prime Minister asked for leave to revert to motions which, as is the custom, was granted. However, when that has been done, and particularly when it concerns a report of this importance from the royal commission on transportation, which everybody has been awaiting with interest, I think it is only fair and reasonable that the opposition should be allowed to ask one or two questions.

I had another question or two, in the light of what was tabled, and I thought perhaps the Prime Minister would not have any objection to replying to them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in so far as the hon. gentleman's interpretation of my remarks in the previous debate is concerned, may I say that I do not accept the interpretation of those remarks which he has just given. Therefore a debate would certainly result if any further questions were allowed at this time.

After the hon. gentleman has read the report he will be in a better position to ask questions and he will then receive answers.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask this final question? The Prime Minister has not refused to reply to my questions. The question I was going to ask was—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister has indicated that he felt, as I did, that a series of questions would lead to discussion and debate. At the most, the hon. member for Laurier would have the right to comment on the report, and I take it that he would not wish to do that without having an opportunity to read it.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order arising out of the procedure which we are now following. I am not objecting to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) having asked for unanimous consent to revert to motions. We all agreed to that. However, normally these reports are tabled at the begining of a sitting and therefore the opposition has a chance immediately afterwards, on the orders of the day, to ask questions relating to them and those questions are given publicity at the same time as the report is tabled.

When we revert to motions at a quarter to six we cannot ask questions, as we can on the orders of the day, until the next day. Therefore there is some difficulty about this procedure when we consider the conventional procedure of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure the hon. gentleman understood the reason for the delay until this time. I have found by experience when sitting over there that if I had a little more time to think over the questions I asked better questions than simply shots in the dark.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there would have been a very good reason for delay if the Prime Minister had intended to make a statement. All the Prime Minister has done is table a report and the press release has been issued. He has made no statement. I should have thought this should have been done at the beginning of the sitting.

Mr. Chevrier: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has disagreed with my interpretation of what he said during the course of the earlier debate.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: On that occasion the Prime Minister stated—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but I am afraid I cannot allow a debate to arise out of the tabling of the document. No statement was made other than to record in our proceedings that the document has been tabled. While I thought it would be in order to comment, the procedure that we have followed is quite contrary to our usual practice. I suggest the hon. member for Laurier reserve his questions until the next appropriate time for such questions, which would be at the opening of the next sitting of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he will answer just one question, and then I will resume my seat?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: The question is this. In the light of the report which the Prime Minister has just tabled, has the government a program laid out as to how it will proceed in carrying out the legislation which I understand is contained in the report?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has said, "the legislation which I understand is contained in the report". I can simply say to him that after he has perused it he will be in a position to understand the situation, which apparently he does not at the moment.

Mr. Chevrier: I have reference to the recommendations, which might involve legislation.

Mr. Speaker: The house will now resume the business which was interrupted by unanimous consent to permit the Prime Minister to table a document.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Morton in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Production and marketing branch—

8. Branch administration including contributions to agricultural organizations to assist in the marketing of agricultural products, subject to the approval of treasury board (also includes the former item for agricultural products board administration), $1,001,970.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I was asked a question and I have the information here: 1959-60, materials and supplies; Canadian beekeepers council, poultry products industry, Canadian restaurant association, Corporation des agronomes, Salon national de l'agriculture, Ecole supérieure de l'agriculture de Sainte-Anne, consumer publications.

Then 1960-61, rent for exhibit space and materials at conventions and exhibitions, mat service for consumer section publicity in newspapers and T.V. shows, pamphlet "Canada Observes World Seed Year". Poultry products institute, Canadian beekeepers council and miscellaneous.

Item agreed to.

9. Agricultural Stabilization Act administration, $536,013.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I have a few comments to make on price stabilization of agricultural products.

I think I ought to say a few words concerning figures which were given in an article which appeared recently in a periodical following the Tory convention and which amounted naturally to political propaganda.

It said that during the last three years of the Liberal administration, $234.9 million were distributed to farmers under the Agricultural Stabilization Act as compared to $494 million for the same number of years under the Conservative government.

I fail to see the kind of propaganda they wanted to make with those figures since, after all, those payments were paid by the taxpayers.

Besides, in spite of the millions paid under the Agricultural Stabilization Act farmers still had to sell their products at lower prices.

I have here a few recent prices for beef. In 1959, grade "A" beef sold for $24.80 in Toronto while in 1960 it went down to $24.75. According to the cattle market review, beef graded as "good" was selling for $25.10 a hundredweight in 1959 and only $22.65 in 1960.

Eggs, grade "A" were priced down from 39 to 36 cents.

Butter remained at 71 cents.

Cheese was at 28.7 cents in 1959 compared with an average of 27.5 cents in 1960.

Milk went down from $2.75 to $2.74 a hundredweight.

It is not surprising then that millions had to be poured into the scheme in order to obtain an increase of 12 per cent for 1960. According to Current Review on Agricultural Conditions in Canada and as was explained a moment ago by my colleague, revenues increased by 12 per cent in 1960 compared to 1959. But an analysis of incomes by provinces shows that incomes have decreased in Nova Scotia, Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta while they have increased by 43 per cent in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pigeon: According to the hon. member, incomes have become smaller in the province of Quebec. Would that not be because of the provincial government?

Mr. Boulanger: Here we go again. When serious matters are being discussed, there is always someone to make the most silly remarks.

Mr. Pigeon: Is that your best answer?

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Mr. Boulanger: For an answer, I would refer the hon. member to his friend and colleague, former Premier Barrette, whom he knows so well.

Mr. Pigeon: He is a better man than you on many counts.

Mr. Boulanger: He was defeated.

Let us therefore take a look at the Saskatchewan incomes. According to the report, additional payments totalling $77 million have been made to help the farmers in the western provinces; but seemingly the province of Saskatchewan has benefited more than the other provinces, which would explain why today the incomes are 43 per cent higher than in 1959.

Considering the differences of incomes to be found among the provinces, I ask the Minister of Agriculture what he intends to do in order to increase the incomes in those provinces where they have decreased during last year, and particularly in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Manitoba. In New Brunswick, there has been an increase of 12 per cent over the previous year and, like the farmers of that province, I am happy to note it.

Now, since we are discussing the Agricultural Stabilization Act, I should like to say a few words about the stabilization prices promised to the western farmers for their grain in 1957 and 1958 by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Minister of Agriculture himself and the other candidates at that time.

The government has been in power for four years and a half and they have done nothing yet to meet the demands of those farmers. In 1958 and 1959, they even denied an answer to the farmers who came here to beg stabilization prices from the government. And if we look at wheat prices that are set in other countries, we notice a large discrepancy. Before quoting those figures, Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock.

(Text):

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned for lunch I wanted to show the government the difference in the price of wheat in some countries as compared to the price that prevails in Canada.

In 1960-61, the price of wheat in France was set at $2.07 a bushel for soft wheat and $2.61 for durum wheat. As for rye, the price was $1.34; barley was $1.35, while the Canadian price of barley Canada-West No. 2, was only $0.77 a bushel, in 1959.

The price of oats was set at $0.68 a bushel.

In New Zealand, the price of wheat was $1.85 a bushel in the southern parts of the country and $1.99 in the north.

In Australia, the price of wheat for the current year was set at $1.66 a bushel, or $0.37 more than last year. In Denmark, the price of wheat was set at $1.86 a bushel, or $0.38 more than last year.

If we compare those prices to those we obtained in our own country last year, we notice a marked difference.

Last year, according to the report of the Canadian wheat board, wheat sold for $1.596.

That is an indication of the interest shown by the government in the field of agricultural price stabilization, particularly as regards wheat.

I must say that the Minister of Agriculture and the government he is associated with were more interested in talking about agricultural price stabilization three years ago than they are now.

I would ask the minister, and I base my question on the representations made to me by the western grain producers, whether he intends to announce a price setting policy for grain.

I have more remarks to make about agricultural price stabilization, but I would rather wait for the minister's reply before starting on other farm products. I would like information as to the government's policy on the price of western grain.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): To give a short answer to the question, the prairie wheat farmer knows that his products are sold on the export markets of the world. Until recently, no support or extra subsidy was given to the Canadian wheat farmers; they paid the complete cost of the operations of getting their product to market, and so on.

The hon. member mentioned the high prices in other countries of the world. I could give a list of every country in the world that is a producer of wheat to show that their support prices are very high. In this particular case, we are an exporting country and are trying to get into their markets. Our prices are set on two general bases: first, on the international wheat agreement; and, second, on world prices, which are set by competition according to the laws of supply and demand. Therefore, outside of the existing subsidies for the handling of grain through the payment of the excess storage charges, there is no intention on the part of the government to go into the rat race of trying to compete with those other importing countries and subsidize all export grain grown in Canada.

Mr. Nasserden: With respect to the administration of the Agricultural Stabilization Act, I should like to touch on one or two things that have been bothering some of the people in my riding. One of these is the application of this act to eggs. When I was in my riding at Christmas eggs were selling at about 18 cents to 20 cents a dozen; at the present time they are selling at from 20 cents to 22 cents a dozen. There does not look as if there will be any possibility of deficiency payments being made to individual producers on the national average price as set out by the legislation. I do not think anyone has suggested that 18 cents to 22 cents is a high price for eggs. The producers in the province of Saskatchewan certainly have not been able to share in the benefits of this program to the extent that producers in other parts of the country have been able to do so.

The situation with regard to hogs, of course, is still in a state of flux and there is also that same measure of uncertainty in that industry as there is in the egg industry in all parts of Canada. The other day hogs went down $4 a hundred on the prairies. This was another indication of the uncertainty, and the fluctuation in price certainly is not to the advantage of the producers in that area.

It has been suggested in some quarters that farmers should receive support prices on those products at whatever quota the government wants to set, and that some policy be entered into along the lines of the permit books that we have for the sale of grain in western Canada. There may be one or two objections to such a program but it would give the individual producer solid support for a minimum of production and would certainly have a greater stabilizing effect than does the present policy. The stabilization program in general has been such that Canadian farmers have received greater benefits than they did under the old price support act. However, with regard to eggs and hogs I think there is some danger and producers in Saskatchewan certainly would like to see the policy revised to some extent. Can the minister give us any indication whether there is a possibility of some revision in that regard?

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, before the minister answers the question just put to him, I should like to make a few comments on the Agricultural Stabilization Act, as the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) just did.

I do not think that the act is presently beneficial to farmers and especially to western egg producers. I have here the average price paid for eggs in various provinces for the year 1960. The average price in Alberta for last year was 23.2 cents a dozen; in Saskatchewan, 20.8 cents; in Manitoba, 23.4 cents; in British Columbia, 31.4 cents; in Ontario, 31.2 cents and in Quebec, 33 cents.

Those figures show a difference of eight to ten cents a dozen between the price paid in the west and that paid to farmers in the east. The deficiency payment paid last year under the Agricultural Stabilization Act was 1.2 cents a dozen, which represents a difference between the final price to the western farmers and to eastern farmers. That shows that the act has discriminatory effects against a certain class of producers, and that is the reason why the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) urged the government last year in rather positive terms to change the price setting method, that is, he asked the government to stabilize prices on a regional basis rather than on a national basis. In fact, as reported on page 1367 of Hansard for February 23, 1960, here is what the hon. member said:

> When prices for the same commodity vary from one region to another, a national system of deficiency payments discriminates against those regions where prices are low and which, therefore, need more assistance, and in favour of those regions where prices are higher and which, therefore, need less assistance.

The Agricultural Stabilization Act has been enacted for the purpose of correcting certain shortcomings in the marketing system, and it is normal that the producers in a less favoured area get the same protection from the state as those who live in other provinces where products sell at higher prices.

Due to that policy, which I would call discriminatory, production of chicks will be substantially reduced in the west this year. Thus, in Alberta, production has fallen by 11.7 per cent; in Saskatchewan, by 25.1 per cent, and in Manitoba, by 16.4 per cent, while the national production has only fallen by 8.6 per cent.

I therefore repeat the request put forward last year by the hon. member for Essex East, who is known as an expert on agricultural matters—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to note that hon. members recognize the competence of the hon. member for Essex East, and I thank them for their appreciation.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Therefore, this is the request we are submitting: that a regional price be set in order to protect the egg producers in the west.

(Text):

Mr. Hicks: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two about item No. 9 which has to do with the Agricultural Stabilization Act. First of all, may I refer to page 2561 of Hansard for March 1 at which time I made a few remarks in connection with the sale of butter. I am concerned about the amount that is paid for the storage of butter in the different plants. It seems to me that something should be done to advertise butter rather than having it condemned as one of the causes of heart disease. I quoted figures at that time showing that the consumption of butter had dropped whereas the consumption of margarine had risen and so also had the incidence of heart disease.

I think something should be done to advertise butter. I have before me this evening two advertisements for margarine. One of them is by Canada Packers and it is set forth in the advertisement that a person can get two pairs of 60 gauge, 15 denier nylons for the price of one pair and there is a picture of a beautiful pair of limbs here. That is the enticement to buy margarine. Why can we not do something like that for butter? They also advertise that silverware can be had at half price if a person buys a pound of margarine, tears off the yellow end of the package and sends it in. Here is another advertisement for Parkay margarine. Maybe I am advertising something I should not be but it seems to me that if the people who are selling butter would do something like the people who are selling margarine are doing we might sell more butter.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, is the minister prepared, if he has not already done so, to amplify the indication he gave earlier in the session that he was giving serious consideration to bringing pulpwood under the Agricultural Stabilization Act or some form of legislation that would give a better price to the settlers or farmers for whom pulpwood is becoming increasingly a very large source of income?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, several questions have been posed. The Agricultural Stabilization Act was one of the first major efforts under the government's agricultural development program to get at one of the fundamental weaknesses in agriculture, namely, the rise and fall in prices.

The act covers some 17 products and with respect to most of these products it seems to be working quite well. From listening to various hon. members and having in mind the way the act is working it is obvious it is not entirely satisfactory in relation to hogs and eggs. I think the fundamental reason for this is that as a result of the plentiful supplies of feed, particularly in western Canada, it has been and is so easy to expand the production of these two items. Any slight adjustment upwards in price immediately attracts tremendous production and a surplus situation.

On several occasions I have indicated that I, personally, am not completely satisfied with the way the stabilization act has worked out with regard to these two products. I would suggest that if I have been honest in saying that, then other hon. members could be equally honest by searching their own consciences, and calculating the known effects of their suggestions on economic production in this country, before they make suggestions which have not been thoroughly thought out. If the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska is suggesting that western farmers receive a price for eggs comparable to that received by Quebec farmers, his suggestion would be very well received by western farmers. However, the majority of western farmers are aware that, with their ability to produce cheap feed, they can produce eggs or hogs in unlimited quantities at prices with which the eastern farmer could not compete. If the western farmer did this, then not only would he destroy the price for himself but for all producers of eggs and hogs in Canada. I think producers generally owe the western farmer a great deal because of his restraint in not rushing into the production of these two products.

I should like also to sound a small warning to the eastern producers of products for which prices are not as high as they are in the west. I am referring particularly to sugar beets. If the sugar beet producer in eastern Canada were to ask for a price comparable to that received in western Canada, the result would be a great increase in the production of sugar beets. This, in turn, would destroy the market for the western producer. We have to realize, therefore, that in this country the basic economic rules should continue to apply. Meanwhile, as I said earlier, I do not believe the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska really implies that we should have the same price for these products all across Canada. If he is implying that there should be a regional price, and regional supports, then of course that is something different. I believe that is a suggestion worthy of consideration.

For instance, the differential in the price of eggs between eastern and western Canada usually amounts to the freight from western Canada to Montreal which is one of the main egg markets. If one suggested to the eastern producer of eggs that there should be one price all across Canada, this might win you a good many friends in western Canada but it would destroy the egg producer in eastern and central Canada. I just point out, therefore, that there should be honesty on all sides because with agriculture in the state in which it is, it is a dreadful thing to build up false hopes which, in the end, would destroy not only the producer you are trying to help but other producers as well.

The hon. member for Port Arthur asked about bringing pulpwood under the stabilization act. I think this will eventually come about. However, some time has to pass before there will be active tree growing operations on farms. We are very pleased to see the promotion, through farm associations, of the movement to have trees on farms. I intend to encourage this in every way possible. I believe a good deal of time must elapse yet before we get to the stage of putting pulpwood under the stabilization act. I do not want anyone to get the idea I am opposed to putting pulpwood under the act because, eventually, I think this will happen. If our program under the other legislation is going to be successful, then within a year or two we will have to begin working out some kind of formula for giving to those who are producing trees the protection of the stabilization act.

In so far as the tree industry is concerned, I think the preliminary step will have to be a marketing board set-up or some arrangement whereby the farmers get into an organization to protect themselves. The hon. member for Fraser Valley mentioned the need for advertising butter. No person could agree with him more than I do. We have one item in the estimates for advertising. I believe it is about $200,000, which is not nearly enough to compete with the advertising of the big corporations. I think the producers will have to consider enlarging their advertising program and instead of setting aside an amount each June for this purpose they will have to do so on a monthly basis.

Mr. Fisher: The minister has said he looks forward to bringing pulpwood under this act. I should like to suggest to him that some effort be made under his rural rehabilitation program which he hopes to put through the house this year, to switch marginal areas to the production of wood. I cannot think of a better incentive to get more farmers interested in the production of wood than the knowledge that they will get a fair price for their pulpwood. Despite the inquiry into pulpwood prices in eastern Canada, and despite the penalties that were incurred by the companies for contravention of the combines act, it seems to me that there is no real indication pulpwood prices are a great deal better in the province of Quebec. I think there is a real indication that prices are better because of the action taken by the provincial government to set up marketing boards.

I think perhaps hon. members know, especially the hon. member for Cochrane, that in Ontario there is legislation under which marketing boards for pulpwood could be set up. However, the provincial government will not give any lead in this respect. I have a communication from the minister of agriculture to the effect that he has no intention of encouraging such a step. The department of lands and forests will not encourage it. Surely the minister must concede that marketing boards must develop within a provincial framework. In the second largest pulpwood province we have a government whose policy is diametrically opposed to the policy followed in Quebec, the other main pulpwood producing province. We need some way of resolving this difference in order to arrive at a uniform framework.

Can the minister suggest to us how Ontario could be brought to the stage of establishing some rudimentary marketing organization? Perhaps the minister could tell us how this step could be taken and what leadership his department could give in achieving this development. I should like him to suggest to me what kind of regional set-up would be evolved for pricing if we had pulpwood under this stabilization act. It is quite obvious that the price of pulpwood in Sault Ste. Marie is quite likely to be lower than the price of pulpwood in Port Arthur because in Port Arthur there are more mills competing. It is quite likely that pulpwood prices in Ottawa are almost certain to be lower than in areas where there are very few settlers and very few farmers such as up in northwestern Ontario. Can he suggest to us how he sees this act working in view of these regional differences, and in view of the fact that the province of Ontario has given no lead at all in establishing marketing boards?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have not too much to add to what I have already said. It is a subject on which I have put some considerable thought. However, this is not a problem upon which I wish to elucidate at the present time. We have made great strides in the last few years. Quebec has set up marketing boards for pulpwood production, and this has resulted in increased prices. I hope to have some discussions with the provinces in the not too distant future, and this is one subject we will be discussing. We, on this side, have some hesitancy about imposing our will on the provinces. We do not believe in centralization. We do know that, at least in theory, if you are one who does not consider the powers of the provinces you can push these things upon them. However, I should like to discuss these things with the provinces and do them on a voluntary basis rather than by means of pressure techniques.

Mr. Fisher: There is one last qualifying remark I should like to make in this respect. During the last election campaign the Prime Minister, I believe at Rimouski, Quebec, according to the documented record of some of his promises produced by the Liberal party, gave an indication that pulpwood was going to be brought under this particular act. It is all very well for the minister to say that he does not believe in pressuring, that he is not a centralizer nor is the government of which he is a member, that they want to go slowly, that they do not want to strain things too much. What I am afraid of is this. We are going to have another election campaign shortly. I think it would be a pity if again we had this promise dangled of pulpwood being brought under this act without any clarification as to how it could be done. The minister will remember that his predecessor—who, if I could phrase it in this way, was a bit more of a hard rock than he is—rose in his place in this house a number of times and in effect threw completely chilled water upon this whole idea. The present minister has given an indication that he has more interest in or compassion for the subject. In view of past election promises, in view of an election campaign coming and in view of the switch that he has made in the intentions of the department towards this project, I think we deserve to know more about how this department plans to bring it about.

Item agreed to.

13. Assistance in construction of potato warehouses under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, $134,015.

Mr. Nasserden: I should like to take this opportunity to say how much the people of my area appreciate this particular vote and the money that is available for the encouragement of greater potato production in a province such as ours. At Rosthern the newest industry in the province of Saskatchewan is Prairie Potato Products Limited. It will employ more people than did many of the industries that the government of the province of Saskatchewan have boasted about encouraging in the years gone by. Their product is going out under the brand name Mary Ann Potato Chips.

I know we have some competitors down in the maritimes but I promise them that we will not ship potato chips down to the maritimes for a few years, anyway. It may be that there will be other plants going into operation in Saskatchewan in the next few years. Of course, this will take some acreage out of grain. In view of the money going into our province I feel that this vote is a very desirable one indeed.

Health of animals division—

14. Operation and maintenance including Canada's fee for membership in the office international des epizooties and authority, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act, to spend revenue received during the year from packers requiring special services, $9,940,601.

Mr. Boulanger: I should like to hear from the minister what has been done since last year concerning the eradication of animal tuberculosis in Quebec?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to announce that, after many years, in the year 1961 the Department of Agriculture intends to complete its tuberculosis campaign all across Canada, including Quebec. I hope that I shall be present when the final herd is tested. This does not mean an end to the tuberculosis campaign. It means it will have to continue. But this year, after many years, it will mean that the whole of Canada—every district, every county—will have been covered.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Could the minister tell us the number of Quebec counties which have been certified since last year?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The information is not available here but we can get it and provide it for the hon. member, if he wishes it. I think I am right in saying that every county has been covered in Quebec. However, I will find out what we did last year.

Mr. Boulanger: Every county in Quebec has been covered?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, has been completed.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: If I understood the minister correctly, a certificate has been delivered in favour of all the counties in Quebec. I do not recall having seen the name of the Drummond-Arthabaska riding and I do not think that this district got its certificate concerning tuberculosis and brucellosis.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member would not be confusing tuberculosis with brucellosis?

Mr. Brunsden: He could be doing so.

Mr. Boulanger: No, I know what I am saying.

(Translation):

As far as tuberculosis is concerned, I will admit that an inspection may have been made through the province, but it does not seem to me that all counties have obtained a certificate. However, as regards brucellosis, I think a certain section, the southwestern section of the province of Quebec, has been certified. What I want the minister to do, is to tell us what has been done since last year in order to control brucellosis; what is the situation now?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, we have a program on brucellosis which was started, as you know, two years ago. However, I would have to go back into the records and get the list of the counties in which this program is now operating. Is the hon. member talking only about Quebec?

Mr. Boulanger: Yes, Quebec.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have not the information here with me, but I can get it for the hon. member and inform him.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: I am delighted to learn what has been done. For the last two years, I have been urging the government to make haste and give out a certificate for the Drummond-Arthabaska county, a noted stock farming region of the province of Quebec from which large numbers of cattle are exported to the United States, so that our farmers will not have to go through the 90-day waiting period before they can export their cattle.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Hardly a week passes, Mr. Chairman, that I do not sign applications for several areas to have a brucellosis campaign started. The limit on doing this, of course, is the staff available. I think I am right in saying this, but I am speaking from memory. When an application from an area comes in, we put it on the list of priorities and we do it the minute we get staff. I can examine the records in detail, find out where Drummond-Arthabaska stands and let the hon. member know.

Item agreed to.

15. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $431,910.

Mr. Regier: I should like to ask the minister for some detail as to where the construction of buildings or the acquisition of buildings will take place to the extent of $340,000?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will read this out. Does the hon. member want the amounts as well?

Mr. Regier: Yes.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Saint John, New Brunswick, construction of cattle barn, access land and railway siding, $82,000; St. Stephen, New Brunswick, construction of corral $4,000; North Portal, Saskatchewan, construction of corral, $4,000; Lethbridge, Alberta, administration building $170,000; fire protection system—this is a part of the Lethbridge vote—$80,000 at Lethbridge. The total vote is $340,000.

Items 15 and 16 agreed to.

Livestock division—

17. Operation and maintenance including premiums on purebred sires and contributions for livestock improvement; stockyard supervision and furs, $2,861,681.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, some time ago under this item the members of the House of Commons received a brief from Gerald Rowe, a farmer in the country not far from Ottawa, in which he complained of a conviction recorded against him under the Live Stock Pedigree Act and amendments thereto. This matter concerned the Holstein-Friesian association, the government and this farmer.

I read the information, as I presume other hon. members did, and I am quite sure that most hon. members who took the trouble to read the brief were quite impressed with some of the submissions contained in it.

This may not be important. However, it concerns one farmer whose rights were removed by a summary court of law in relationship to the ability to register pedigree cattle. I think it would not be of much importance in general to raise the matter, except for the fact that the Holstein-Friesian breed of cattle constitutes about half of all the registrations that take place in this country under this act. We now register in the neighbourhood of 80,000 head of purebred Holstein cattle per year, and as an industry the Holstein breed of cattle has grown until we have now reached the position where we are exporting cattle to Argentina and all the South American countries, and overseas.

I think this particular conviction highlighted one of the things—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Order. I wonder whether the hon. member could help me clarify in my own mind whether this particular case is properly discussed under this item.

Do I understand that this matter has been considered by the courts and a decision has been reached by them? If so, I wonder whether perhaps this item would not be more properly discussed under the estimates of the Department of Justice.

Mr. Peters: I think some of the aspects of it could be discussed under the estimates of the Department of Justice, but I believe that the Live Stock Pedigree Act as it is set up has a number of sections that allow for this particular type of conviction because of our thinking of quite a number of years ago. There have been changes in that thinking and in the scientific development that has gone into establishing these breeds. These matters have not been given consideration in this particular case and I think this is the place where it should be discussed.

As I have said, in my opinion this conviction was not justified and I wish to discuss the reasons why I say that, in terms of the technical aspects in relation to the act itself, but not the legal aspect of it.

I am not a lawyer and I am not particularly interested in the legal aspects, but I am interested in the method that we use to determine whether a particular calf is a purebred calf and whether it belongs to a particular cow. In the main, this is what the Live Stock Pedigree Act establishes. It establishes whether a particular animal is qualified for registration as a particular breed under the Live Stock Pedigree Act and the methods by which we establish this and maintain these breeds.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I should like to thank the hon. member for that comment. However, what concerns me—and I am not a lawyer either—is that if there is some movement afoot to have this question examined in the courts, are we not in danger of getting into a discussion on something that is sub judice?

I would appreciate hearing from hon. members who might perhaps be able to give me guidance in this matter.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am aware of this case, Mr. Chairman. It happened several years ago. The case was brought before the courts, taken through all the due processes of the law.

The question of whether or not the calf belonged to a particular cow is a technical matter. People qualified to determine these matters by means of blood tests ruled that it was not. Even though they could definitely prove that it was not, it could not be proved that it was. As far as I, as minister, am concerned, I cannot offer anything more in this case. It was before the courts, and we have to leave it to judicial procedures. Therefore I cannot deal with this matter in my estimates.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): This is the matter I am trying to get clarified. Is this matter before the courts in any form at the present time?

Mr. Peters: No.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): There is apparently a contradiction here.

Mr. Regier: On the point of order that you raised, Mr. Chairman, I understand that this matter is no longer before the courts. The courts have decided the matter, and all the hon. member is attempting to do at this time is argue legislation that is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture.

There is no longer any case before the courts. The hon. member is referring to an event that happened in the past in order to illustrate that there should be amendments to regulations under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I am grateful to the hon. member. I perhaps misunderstood the minister but I thought he indicated that the matter was still before the courts.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Chairman; it occurred several years ago.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I am sorry.

Mr. Peters: My reason for raising this matter is that I believe, from my understanding of the legal aspects of the case, the farmer did get a fair hearing. The prosecution put forward a fair case and his lawyer received a fair hearing but my contention is that the evidence put forward at that time and the reasons established in the case were not sufficient to warrant a conviction. The conviction was obtained by the department themselves because they felt there was a need to establish this kind of precedent. To this extent I agree with the department.

We have now got into a field where we are selling cattle to countries such as Argentina for $20,000, $30,000 and $40,000 a head. If we are not in a position to establish a breed, maintain a fair and honest record of that breed and handle artificial insemination, which is a completely new field of very recent origin, we are going to be suspect when we sell our cattle to other countries.

In this relationship we have had in the last few years something that has been very detrimental to this whole process. I am referring to something in the Holstein-Friesian breed that is called the red factor. The red factor did enter into this particular case. As everybody knows, a Holstein cow has certain definite characteristics. She must be black and white in colour; she must have five points that are white; her forestockings and the switch of her tail must be white before she can be registered as being of the Holstein-Friesian breed. There are also other considerations that enter into this matter.

In recent times two purebred animals have been producing a red calf which is not registerable under this act. This, of course, has become such a big problem in Holland, where the breed developed, that they have now set up a red register; but only very recently in Canada, within the last few months, the Holstein-Friesian association itself, and therefore I presume the Department of Agriculture through its livestock division, recognized this red factor as part of the problem. Today these livestock associations recognize that this red factor is a very real problem and now when they advertise semen they state, where it applies, that a bull carries a red factor and thus people are warned.

You may wonder, Mr. Chairman, why this is of any importance at all. Perhaps I may use an example which happened on the family farm. My brother was very pleased last summer when he was able to obtain semen from one of the best bulls in Canada, a bull worth $45,000 at the time. He bred this bull artificially to one of his cows, a cow which has an excellent record. A bull calf of this stock would normally be worth several thousand dollars, but when this particular calf was born it was a red calf which looked more like an Ayrshire than a Holstein. Anyway, it was worth $22 rather than $1,000 or $2,000 as might have been expected. Neither the government nor the Holstein-Friesian society has given much consideration to this problem until recently but I am pleased to state that the society is now giving some consideration to it and that its advertising now carries notices where necessary stating that a bull or cow is known to carry the red factor. The societies themselves are becoming increasingly aware of the difficulty and one of the units buying a bull at a very large price has stipulated in the contract that if it were proven later that the bull carried a red factor the purchase price would be greatly reduced. While that particular bull still has a favourable background and heritage, the calves produced by that bull are worth very little.

In the case about which I am concerned, the Rowe case, as far as I have been able to find out, Mrs. Rowe—and this is one of these sad cases—decided to leave Mr. Rowe but was unable to obtain a divorce, and because she wanted to get even with her husband she went to the head of the livestock division and laid a charge that he was falsely registering certain calves. That is how the investigation began. Checking the documents provided by the department I was unable to find any information of what interviews led to the proceedings or what the contents of those interviews were. But it appears from the information which I asked to be tabled in the house that the lawyer acting for the crown did interview this woman on several occasions. I should have liked to have seen the herd book in this particular case. The herd book is a book kept by a farmer under certain regulations which require him to record the breeding dates together with the names and dates of calves born to particular animals. Farmers also keep a stable book which gives breeding dates and states whether an animal is artificially bred, to whom it was bred, the dates of the first service, the second service and so on. To date I have been unable to find such a stable book. Anyone who has any experience with dairy herds would be able after consulting the herd book and the stable book to reach a conclusion as to whether or not a farmer was keeping adequate records. Up to the present the closest thing I can find from the R.C.M.P. is that they destroyed these along with certain other documents at the end of a given period of time.

The court case itself involved a number of things which I do not think are of very much interest to this committee and which in my opinion should not have been of much interest to the department. There was a great deal of talk about whether this animal was bred six months after she had been bred the first time, about whether this was technically possible. They used such experts as Dr. Gamble and Dr. Humble and several other leading veterinarians from the Ontario Agriculture College, and they came to the conclusion that this animal could have been bred six months after it was already bred and in calf for that length of time, though this was unlikely. I think it is perfectly true that it is very unlikely that you would breed a number of cattle more than once or twice in these circumstances. In this case the farmer claims to have bred her in January and she had a calf nine months later. This calf was registered. She was bred again two months after that and she had a calf, then, nine months following that, and the second calf was registered. Now the department begins an investigation into this particular case. They question not the second calf but the first calf, and this seems to me to be the stupid part of the whole case. If this cow was bred in January she could have had the calf, as the farmer said, the first time. If she had been bred six months after she had been bred the first time she could not possibly have a six months premature calf and therefore the second calf would not have been possible. It is not physically possible to have a three or four month premature calf in the second instance. But the department has not questioned the right of the registration of this second calf. In reading the evidence and going over it—and there are four or five hours of evidence—I see no possibility of the judge establishing the fact that this cow could have had a second calf if he did not agree with the farmer that she had had the first. The Holstein-Friesian society made a great to-do about the blood testing of cattle, as you know, Mr. Chairman, people have four or five types of blood. I am not too familiar with them but there is type A, type B, type O—there are three or four—

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not know whether the hon. member was here half an hour ago but it seems to me we have already passed item 14 which has to do with the health of animals and that we are now dealing with the operation of the livestock division. I suggest the hon. member might defer this discussion until next year's estimates.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): The description of the estimate before me reads as follows:

> Operation and maintenance including premiums on purebred sires and contributions for livestock improvement; stockyard supervision and furs.

It would seem to me that the phrase "contributions for livestock improvement" would bring this discussion within the terms of the estimate.

Mr. Brunsden: A good try anyway.

Mr. Peters: I do not want to abuse this opportunity to speak and I do not want to go too deeply into this case, because the minister, I am sure, is finished with it. I am of the opinion that the department is not too interested in what happens to this farmer or whether or not he registers his calves. But I am interested in the method used to establish the truth because if we do not give better consideration to this problem than we have in this case we will find ourselves in all kinds of difficulty, because I do not believe there is a superior court in this country which would give a decision which would stand up based on the evidence in this case If we cannot establish this, how are we going to establish breeds when we have to use blood types as a method of establishing certain considerations, because we are now breeding and using bulls which have been dead for many years. We are using bulls which are in countries three, four or five thousand miles away; we are using bulls over which the Canadian government has no control, because this is an international field and these bulls are now in countries beyond our scope.

This is the only case that I know of in the history of the world where there has been this blood typing of animals to establish parentage. We all know of controversies with respect to the blood types of human beings, but I know of none at all in the field of purebred livestock. In this particular instance, where they were using artificial insemination, the department took blood samples from the cow, from the first calf and from the second calf and then established the fact that the first calf was supposed to be sired by a bull that was maintained in the Kemptville artificial breeding unit. They had tested this bull a number of years before and had found 15 factors in its blood. In the period of time that had elapsed they were able to find 80 blood factors in this particular bull. They checked them against the blood factors of the cow and came to the conclusion that the calf was not the result of this mating.

Mr. Chairman, this would not prove that the cow was not the dam. How is the farmer going to prove that the semen that the artificial insemination unit supplied to the agent came from this particular bull? How is the agent who does the artificial insemination work going to guarantee that it came from this particular bull? All the farmer has to do is to assume that the progeny came from this particular cow, not the bull. I do not see how he can be expected to know which bull produced which semen. Of course, they go on to point out that this agent was carrying Jersey semen, Ayrshire semen and semen from one other Holstein bull at the same time. The department did not ask for a review of the other bulls; they did not do blood testing to try to help the farmer establish his case. What they were interested in doing was getting a conviction. I could read some of the remarks made by the head of this department where both he and the head of the Holstein-Friesian association said, "This is going to be a very difficult case in which to get a conviction; this is quite a rascal we are dealing with and we are going to have quite a time establishing a case." I do not think this is the issue. What we should do is to try and establish a much better method of relating the artificial breeding and the insemination units to the purebred livestock cattle so that the farmers, the breeders and the buyers will know that they are getting what they are paying for, and that Canada is doing whatever she can to establish and maintain this breed that has become our most important purebred type of animal.

As I say, they did not prove this; they did not attempt to. Their specialists said they did not prove it, and yet this junior court decided that the farmer was guilty and should pay and lose his privileges in the association.

A great deal of attention was paid to the testimony of the gentleman from the artificial insemination unit. I have no axe to grind in this case. I do not know the gentleman; I have not met him but, according to the evidence, his education in this field was not too great. When he began his operations it was a new field. He was trained by a man who had done very little of the work himself, but he had done this work for a number of years at the time this case developed. I am of the opinion that something remiss must have been happening in this unit. This gentleman was re-breeding many cattle. He claimed that one of the cattle was in calf for eight months, and that he was breeding those cows not once but on a number of occasions. I think that some consideration on the part of the department should be given to this question of first, second and third services. I have some new evidence which I think should have been brought to the attention of the court.

Here is a man who bred the cow the first time. The cow was Silver Bell Root. She was bred on January 26, 1952. She carries the registration number 168534, and the tag number 5160. This cow was bred on April 23, 1952. I have also a slip here which indicates that a cow bearing this particular number was killed and sold for fox meat in March of that year. In other words, the artificial unit was breeding this cow one month after she had been sold for fox meat. This evidence is available to the department.

What I am saying about these artificial units is proven by evidence I received from a friend of mine who is a veterinarian in the Brantford area. He tells me that they now colour the semen. They put artificial colouring in because there were so many mistakes made over such a long period of time. Because of that, most of the units colour the semen so that there can be no mistake. The farmer, or the man who is doing this work, does not now mix up the semen in the test tube in his refrigerator in his home. The colour will give him some indication of which bull the semen happens to come from; therefore, he is assured that the semen he is using in the service he is giving comes from the bull he thinks it does, and the farmer is given much greater assurance that the calf which is born to the cow was sired by the bull he is paying his money for, to perform the service. If hon. members would like to drop into my office at any time I would be glad to show them some pictures taken of these two cows, the mother and the daughter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: Hon. members laugh but they should give consideration to this. This purebred livestock registration is a relatively new field. When you are selling animals for $40,000 to $50,000 it is no joke, and if the importers knew how damned stupid we sometimes are in our legislation and how loose we are in our way of doing business they would not pay $30,000 or $40,000 for an animal unless they were given an assurance that they are receiving what they are paying for.

An hon. Member: The hon. member does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member should get up and say what he knows. I think I know a lot more than he does although I do not know him or where he comes from.

In the main, the farmers used to depend on the Holstein-Friesian association for descriptions. If you check on the back of the registration you will see there is a picture of the cow, there is a picture of the particular animal registered. The farmer draws on all the black and white markings and that is how they were registered for years, and this is still how they register them. There is a similarity in cows as there is in people. There is a similarity between mother and daughter, father and daughter, father and son, and so on. The descendants of human beings show similarities and this is true of animals also.

If hon. members will look over the pictures of these animals, which I would be happy to show them, they will see similarities. In fact, it is surprising how similar they are. The markings on the head of the cows are almost identical. If you look at the markings on the cows you will see a great similarity. It is true that this is no proof. I agree with this, but this is what the Holstein-Friesian people have depended on for years, and they still depend on it. We should not depend on this phony court case. I wonder why the department did not appeal the case? I wonder why they did not take the case to a higher court? Just why they did not I am sure I do not know.

Let hon. members laugh. The government spent a great deal of money on this court case and in my opinion they did not get a conviction that would stand up as a precedent in any other court in the country. The court in question was a small rural court of summary jurisdiction. Most of us have been in such courts. A lot of us have had to go there because of traffic tickets and we know what kind of justice is dispensed in a great number of them. I have been there and I know what kind of justice a person gets. Maybe other hon. members have been more fortunate.

This is a serious matter, Mr. Chairman, and I should like to keep it that way. We are going to have to decide that we should give these associations all the assistance we can. We want to establish the best breeds possible and give the greatest assurance to buyers from abroad that they are getting what they are paying for. Let us not fool ourselves. We should establish these blood types. If Dr. Humble of the Ontario veterinary college has carried on his experiments to the point where, as he claims, he can ascertain 80 different factors in cattle, then we should see that this is carried on and developed to the point where we can make use of it. Let us develop some cases where we know and can prove that the dam is the dam in question. Then we can play around with the sire. If we question the dam and question the sire and cannot be sure of either the dam or the sire no specialist in this country will ever say that you can tell by blood test what particular cow or bull was the parent of the calf in question. You have to have one known parent.

I have read the evidence and many of the articles of Dr. Humble who is considered to be one of the leading experts not only in Canada but in the world and I have failed to find where they have used known bulls rather than unknown bulls. Maybe it is necessary to establish more than 14 or 15 factors and maybe it is possible that it is only necessary to establish a smaller number.

In this particular case I think that in all fairness a blood sample could have been taken from the second calf and so far as blood factors are concerned they might have found a similarity with the first calf. This would have been at least interesting and in my opinion would have established some similarity between the first calf and the second calf.

Hon. members should read the evidence and the letters exchanged because they will see that the government was pleased to get this conviction. I am sure I do not know why. If a good case had been established that could have been used as a precedent I would have thought they had accomplished something but if they only prosecuted to collect $500 from some poor farmer and to take away from him the privilege of producing purebred cattle then I am ashamed of them. If they took this action for the first reason I think they had an obligation to bring forward the best people they could on both sides and try to establish the case.

If the Minister of Agriculture wants to do so, this case can still be given consideration. The cow is still living. The bull has been examined by Dr. Humble on two separate occasions. The blood of the second bull in question was tested but that bull is now dead, although it was not dead, as intimated by the government, at the time of the hearing. The bull was still available and was not killed until November of that year. I am quite sure he was blood tested. I am quite sure that all bulls in the artificial insemination units are being tested now. This case can still be reopened because the cow and the two calves are still available on the farm in question. It was not the farmer's obligation to establish a decent case.

I have talked to a number of veterinarians who are quite concerned about what is taking place in the breeding of cattle through artificial insemination. I am sure all hon. members will be happy to know, if they are not already aware of it, that artificial insemination has been a boon not only to Holstein-Friesian breeders but to breeders of all other types of livestock as well. It means that a farmer for a minimum amount of money can secure the services of the best sire in the field in which he is interested. For $15 or $20 he can secure the services of the best bull in any of the milk breeds, Holstein, Ayrshire or Jersey. Those who are raising the beef breeds can secure the services of bulls for about the same price. This means that the average farmer, even though he is remote from the place where these expensive bulls are located, can secure the services of an animal worth $20,000 to $30,000. This means that the department also has an obligation and responsibility to guarantee that the farmer receives what he pays for.

In this particular case, when the expert said that this calf was not the progeny of this particular mating the government should have been willing to prove that the calf produced from the cow was as a result of using the service of this artificial insemination unit, that the farmer was receiving the service for which he was paying and the protection to which I think he is entitled.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare should also be concerned about this matter because there are great implications so far as humans are concerned in light of the fact that artificial insemination is now being used in that field as well. Every effort should be made—certainly the procedure is going to have to be more exact in the case of humans—to see that there is a method of assuring the farmer that the semen he buys from the artificial insemination unit is semen from the bull for whose services he is paying.

In the case in question a conviction was obtained simply on the finding that the calf was not the result of this particular mating and the silly business of breeding the cow the second time when she was six months in calf was introduced. As I see it, this was simply a red herring so far as this matter was concerned, and I think the department has been remiss in its duties. I am most concerned about this matter. My family has depended for many years on the breeding of cattle by this means. They have spent a great deal of time at the experimental farm at New Liskeard and have spent a great deal of time and money on their own farm in developing purebred cattle. In many cases we are far removed from the services of the best bulls which are found in southern Ontario. Their services are only available to us through artificial insemination. I think the case I have mentioned tonight is a disgrace to the government. It is a disgrace that they should try to establish it as a precedent in connection with purebred livestock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I have read a lot about this case and I hope the minister is going to reply to the presentation of the hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Hicks: Mr. Chairman, as a past president of the Holstein association of Canada I feel I should say a word at this time. Through the press I have obtained some information about the case that has been mentioned and discussed for the last half hour. Personally I am absolutely certain that the president and the board of directors of the Holstein association are on the job for the sole purpose of breeding good cattle and keeping them pure. There is the odd case, of course, where a mistake is made but if a mistake is made that is no reason why these animals should be bred again and again. I know of lots of cases where the bull has cost $40,000 and where the cost of service has been $100 for a proven calf. I want to say here in this committee that any group of men who have been breeding Holsteins for the last 75 or 100 years would want to keep the breed pure. The way to do that is to look after the records properly, and that is what the association is doing.

Mr. Peters: I am pleased to hear—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Peters: Let us not hear these gentlemen say, "No, no". I am getting fed up with some of these western members who are not interested in anything except what concerns the western farmer. They are so ready to pass the other items.

Mr. Grafftey: You are wasting so much time, though.

Mr. Peters: I do not care if we spend a week on this item. It is very important to the eastern farmers. I do not care whether or not the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi likes it. It does not interest me one iota.

Mr. Grafftey: What does interest us is the clarity of thought so that you do not take so much of the time of the committee.

Mr. Peters: You have no thought, let alone clarity.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Order.

Mr. Peters: I have been pleased to hear the words of the past chairman of the Holstein-Friesian association. I am in complete agreement with him. Within the last 40 years, through the efforts of this association, this country has progressed from a position of having no purebred cattle to the point where out of about 130,000 registrations last year the Holstein-Friesian association had about 88,000. I think this is an excellent record. I feel that a good deal of the credit should be given to Mr. Clements and his father because the two of them have alternated in serving as secretary of this association for practically the lifetime of the association. The organization, however, has not been able to keep up with some of the faults that have appeared in it.

The past president of the organization may be interested to know that 16 or 17 registrations of Holstein cattle were discussed in this particular case. He may be interested in reading a transcript of the case, and he would find that the office of the Holstein-Friesian association in Brantford had made minor and major changes in seven or eight of these registrations. This would mean that almost one third of the cards had been changed. The best bookkeeping practices have not been followed. I agree that in many cases these changes have been made necessary because you cannot have two cows known by the same name. If they have the same surname, I suppose you would call it, then you would have to change the prefix.

I have been worried, as a result of reading the correspondence in this case, to find that the secretary of this association is very interested in getting this particular conviction. In my opinion, he was more interested in getting a conviction than in seeing that the case was really established. I do not know who is the mother or father of this particular little calf. If this were the British parliament I suppose we could get this calf legitimized by the simple process of passing an act as was done in England for years when they wanted to legitimize some member of royalty. There was a particular act passed for this purpose. I do not believe that is our intention here. What we are trying to do is to use this particular case as a warning of the type of thing that should not happen in this country. Our little people should be protected. The farmer should be given all the protection he can be given.

I have seen this farmer's herd of cattle and, although they are not registered now, they looked like very good cows to me. I am told that at the time of the investigation this farmer had only one cow on the premises which was not a purebred animal. It would seem very odd that he would jockey these animals around within the herd when that would not do him any good. I believe this was a particularly bad case. Let us take the example of a farmer who is in the milk producing business. Why would he leave a cow for three years without breeding her, when she should be producing milk the second year? Why would he wait that length of time, unless she was showing exceptional promise and her breeding was exceptionally high? He would have disposed of her before the end of the third year. The department maintained that she did not calve until she was three years old. There is no question raised about the second calf she was supposed to have had. If she had this second calf, the calf would have been premature by four or five months.

People can laugh this off, and the minister can say this is a matter of no importance. I am not sure whether or not the present Minister of Agriculture knows about this particular case. I know the arrogant attitude of the former minister, and I can well imagine that he would not have been interested in one little farmer, particularly in eastern Canada. I do feel the government must be interested in this matter. If we have a bill of rights which means anything, then it should protect all people. I have four or five letters commending the character of this farmer. I have letters from the bank in his area, from the dairies, from the cheese factory and from the farmers in the area. They all state that he is a highly respected man there.

If this farmer believes he did not get justice, then I believe the department should bend over backwards to ascertain whether or not he did and try to clear his name. These animals are valuable. Why should I go out and have them blood tested again, just to prove whether the department is right or wrong? The farmer thinks he has a case, and he goes to the Department of Justice where they tell him that the time for an appeal has passed but they would be happy to consider a parole of a remission in this case. This gentleman wants to establish his record again. I am not too sure why he is interested to this extent. I do feel he has been very courageous in fighting this case the length of time he has. More important even than the fact he feels he did not get justice in our courts is the fact that the experts in the Department of Agriculture, in my opinion, do not feel they have a case that will stand up in a major court of this country. Frankly, I have checked with the department and they claim they will not use this case as a precedent.

An hon. Member: They do not give a damn.

Mr. Peters: Perhaps they do not, I am inclined to believe this is true. If it is true, they are making a hollow mockery out of the work of farmers who are interested in establishing a herd of purebred cattle. If the farmers feel the federal government is not interested or concerned in this matter, then they will be worried. This farmer has received the co-operation of the veterinary college and they are willing to supply information. If you will check the information that was given by those officials you will find that neither one of them gave evidence in this particular case that would be detrimental to the farmer. It would just as easily have established the farmer's case as it would have established the reverse. Weeks and weeks went by and pressure was brought to bear on the magistrate before a decision in this particular case was rendered. I am concerned, because, I have said we have always been interested in the increasing growth and the extension of the breeding records of our various purebred livestock in Canada.

In northern Ontario now we are seeing a great increase in the registrations of cattle both with respect to Holstein-Friesian and in the beef Friesian. This is reflecting now in the markets, in the community sales and the value for the products which the farmers themselves are getting. It is resulting in better milk production for the farmer and in increased sales. Among the farmers themselves we are now finding some with only four or five purebred cows who are willing to pay the premium price that is necessary in order to buy local purebred bulls. This was not true ten or 15 years ago. Very few farmers were interested in increasing the breed of their animals. Through the influence of Holstein-Friesian this has been extended into pigs, sheep, beef cattle and now horses. In our area there is a relationship between the artificial inseminating units in the work they do, and this work in the main is of an excellent nature. They are producing and they are giving the service they are supposed to give, but there is a possibility—and it will always remain—of a slip anywhere from the time that semen is collected till it is inserted by the agent in the artificial inseminating unit. It seems to me that the government itself, if it is going to continue to work towards increasing the breed, is going to have a great deal more consideration to the matter and a great deal more assistance from the federal government in this field. Within the next five or ten years the red factor in the Holstein-Friesian breed is going to be a major problem. It is going to be a problem that I am sure is going to cost the farmers thousands and thousands of dollars as it cost my brother this year when he expects a calf worth $1,000, when it is dropped you get a calf that is worth $22.

This is being repeated with this one particular bull. One out of every three calves carried the red factor and were not eligible for registration. The problem is how to eliminate or to eradicate this situation. The answer is not known yet. It certainly has not been tested in hogs where they have developed separate registration for these particular cattle. Any assistance that the federal government can give will be of great help to the farmer. I think that one of the things the minister could do is this. Certainly he is going to have to answer these questions because if he does not do so I will raise them in a legal context next time. I will document them and will go into all the grim and gory details of this particular case. We will go into this matter if the minister cannot give us some assurance that he is interested in this problem.

Mr. Grafftey: Is that a filibuster threat?

Mr. Peters: I will make it a filibuster or whatever you want to call.

Mr. Grafftey: That is what you can call a filibuster threat.

Mr. Peters: I am interested in seeing that justice is done. I will be quite happy in obtaining an explanation. If no explanation is forthcoming, then we will take other methods of obtaining one. I am no expert in this field. If I were I would probably not be here.

I can tell you this, Mr. Chairman. I can look around this building and I do not see many who can class themselves as experts on any subject. I have given some consideration to this particular case. I have read the court evidence. I have read the brief. Almost every hon. member has had the opportunity to do this. If they read it and found nothing of a questionable nature in it, then they are in conflict with the newspapers that have read it and have found a great deal of conflict in it. They are in conflict with a number of people to whom I have talked privately. I think there is an obligation resting on the minister to give us some assurance that something will be done about this matter, that consideration is being given to this matter that has been raised on blood testing. The Holstein-Friesian association, in an article in their magazine, brags of the fact that they were able to establish this case, that now they had a precedent that was established and would continue for all times. In my opinion there was no precedent; there was a very weak case and at a very low level of court. It seems to me—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Order. The Chair has been quite lenient with the hon. member in reference to the courts. I think that he must obey section 152 under which no slighting reference to the courts may be made.

Mr. Peters: I am surprised that this matter always arises, that even if you prove they are wrong, you have not the right to do so. This may be true. However, I will certainly abide by Your Honour's decision on that matter. I am concerned about this matter. If the minister has not studied the case, I would be happy if he would study it and would give us a reply at a later date. I am quite happy to take his word that he will do this. I feel that it is a rather complicated field, and one in which he would have the advice of people like Dr. Gamble and Dr. Humble, world renowned specialists in this field, that he would have the advantage of the experience they have had. If he gave consideration to this matter or if he were to direct his officials to do so, they might come up with a different conclusion in this particular case; and while it is much more important they might come to a conclusion that would allow a much better method of policing the Live Stock Pedigree Act itself.

As I have said, if we are going to be in the export market, we shall also be in the import market. We shall eventually find that our artificial inseminating units are buying cattle from Holland, England and other countries, the same as they have bought horses or purebred sires from Belgium and Percherons from other countries and eventually we are going to have to use this blood testing to establish an international record. They are going to have to have enough known factors. This only proves a negative; it does not prove a positive. However, it proves a negative. If we know definitely and have methods of knowing through control of artificial inseminating units —and we use no control over them now either from the federal government or elsewhere—once we know this, then we shall be able to question the farmer on the dam of that animal. We shall be able to say that we know the sire was particular animal and that these are the factors in the blood of that sire. But at the present time we are taking the word of four or five different people, including the veterinarian who takes the semen, the man who handles it in the laboratory, and they are all put into the laboratory at the same time and there is a great deal of opportunity for a mix-up there. Then there is the shipping and the handling through the transportation and then again the man who travels through the farming area handling the semen at that end. Until the government is in a position to guarantee the sire, how are we going to breed, for instance, a mare in this country to a purebred Belgian stallion in Belgium if we are not going to be able to prove at a later date that the sire of that mating is from that particular mating if the question arises?

We will not be dealing with small figures in this connection. These purebred animals which are used primarily for breeding purposes cost $20,000 or $30,000. This has become big business and anyone who is buying cattle for breeding purposes must be assured under this act that he is getting what he is paying for.

I should like to have the assurance of the Minister of Agriculture that he will consider this whole problem. We have discussed a number of other problems which in my opinion are not nearly as important as this one. We have an industry that has grown from a handful of purebred animals a year to the situation where we are now registering 130,000 such animals. This is not small business; it is a large industry in eastern Canada and it is one of the few industries in the farming field that is growing rather than going downhill. I think the government has an obligation to see that more teeth are put into this act.

We are already spending a considerable amount of money to maintain this particular division. It is doing a good job in other fields. The need is more obvious in other fields, such as compensation for the slaughtering of cattle affected with particular diseases. Obviously this is a more immediate problem and one that is seen more easily. Work has been done in this field.

We have already complimented the department and this branch of the department on the work they have done in the eradication of some of these diseases. I was pleased to note that my area was one of those that was made an area free of brucellosis. Work has been done in this field, but it seems to me that in the Live Stock Pedigree Act itself the department was gleefully happy to obtain this foolish conviction. It is a conviction that in my opinion is more detrimental as a precedent, from their point of view, than it is advantageous. While it may have rapped this particular farmer's knuckles, it seems to me it has raised a question throughout the whole industry. I have talked to a number of farmers in the immediate area of this farmer, and they wonder why this was done. They have suggested to me that the reason it was done had no relationship to the case itself.

For this reason I think the department would be well advised to give more consideration to the technical aspects of this case. I think the department would be wise to reread the case. If they have an expert in the department, I should like him to answer this question. Everybody knows that the gestation period of cows is the same as for human beings, nine months. I should like to know how the department is able to reconcile this fact with the fact of a calf being born within four months after the cow is supposed to have been served the second time and six months after the first service. How does the department justify this in relation to this conviction?

If they can justify it then I think we probably need some new officials and I will be happy, after they have given consideration to this question, to recommend that if it is necessary.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Regier: No. I hope we will hear an answer from the minister in regard to this matter. I received a letter from Mr. Rowe many months ago. Not being an expert in the field, and knowing that the hon. member for Timiskaming and his father were experts in this field, I referred the problem to my colleague the hon. member for Timiskaming.

I feel that there is a danger of bureaucracy arising in any organization, be it of lawyers, doctors, school teachers, Holstein-Friesian breeders or Yorkshire pig breeders. The moment you form an organization a vested interest is involved, and it is up to the government to ensure that the public interest is protected at all times. I believe that the case the hon. member for Timiskaming has presented is worthy of a reply.

I think you will have noted, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Timiskaming was very careful not to sit in judgment on this particular case. He was only appealing for a fair deal. This has not been assured us by the courts. The government hopes to slide out from under by not replying to the hon. member for Timiskaming. I do not think they can get off that easily, and we insist upon asking the government what its intentions are in this regard.

The man who was convicted may well have been guilty, but the many problems which have arisen as a result of this conviction demand that we receive a reply and an assurance that a vested interest is not being established. We have seen vested interests established in so many other fields of Canadian life and I am sure Canadian farmers would hate to think that a vested interest was being established in any one of their particular departments. I believe the minister owes the hon. member for Timiskaming a reply on this particular case.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I have made it very clear that I cannot deal with this particular case because it was before the courts many years ago and was settled. I can say, to make it absolutely clear to the rest of the committee, that under this act we designate to the various breeders associations the right to set the standards and enforce them. If they find people breaking these standards and trying to make false registrations of calves, they come to us and we take the action necessary under the law.

So far as the general question of the scientific aspect of it is concerned, I do not think the Department of Agriculture here in Ottawa has to yield to anyone in its constant search for ways to improve the scientific factors that go into producing pure and true breeds. I am no expert on serology which is simply a big word for the study of blood factors, but I think in their searching for new techniques for finding new ways of identifying breeds, and so on, not only in relation to cattle and horses, but poultry and every other form of livestock under this branch, the record of the department has been very good. I know it will continue to remain so.

As as as this particular case is concerned, it has been before the courts, the courts have ruled on it and I am completely helpless to say any more.

Mr. Regier: In this particular case I would quarrel with the minister and the government, not only this government but perhaps governments of the past. The minister has said that the government has granted the right to certain organizations to set standards and enforce them. To me this is most despicable, because this parliament ought to be supreme and ought not to delegate its authority to any organization.

This is what I regret in the legal profession, the medical profession and even, in this particular case, the Holstein-Friesian association. I think the public interest ought to be protected and that no legislature or parliament ought ever to forget the public interest and give to any particular vested interest the right to legislate and enforce its legislation without an appeal to the law makers of the land.

The minister has said that his department, or the government, has given these organizations the right to set standards and enforce them. I feel this is an abdication of the government's responsibility.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): We enforce them.

Mr. Regier: I may have misquoted the minister and if so I apologize and hope that he will correct me but if ever the House of Commons should delegate to any other body the right to set standards where the public welfare is concerned and also the right to enforce such standards I feel we should be most negligent in our duties. If the minister has any correction to make in that regard I shall be happy to hear him.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member made one serious mistake. If I gave that impression I did not mean it. We—parliament, that is, not the government—delegate to these associations the responsibility for maintaining these standards but the enforcement is the responsibility of the only people who can enforce them, that is, the government of Canada through the law of Canada. If at any time the associations change the regulations they bring in we have to approve them.

We have to have in the working out of democracy some confidence in the professional groups of this country. What the hon. member has said today is an attack on every professional man in Canada and on every professional man and group in the democratic world. It is an attack on school teachers, dentists, lawyers, naturopaths, on any group of people organized in a professional body. Federal and provincial governments give these groups the right to set certain standards—with the approval of the government, it is true—and unless we have confidence in groups of people such as those who form these livestock associations I think the whole democratic process breaks down.

We have seen evidence tonight of this centralizing philosophy, this desire on the part of the new party to order everything under the federal government, to enforce their will upon the provinces, to enforce their will on professional associations such as these. Many of us stand here and have stood here all our lives prepared to defend the belief that parliament should have trust in various groups of people who have come together freely in Canada to carry out their plans. There has been a clear issue put forward here today and I think the hon. member and his friends will within the next few years regret the type of remarks which have been made in the committee tonight and these violent attacks on professional associations. These breeding associations have done a good job in trying to improve the breeding characteristics of livestock here in Canada.

Mr. Peters: That is a lot of poppycock we have heard from the minister. I did not say anything was wrong with the association though I believe they have made a number of mistakes. What I am questioning is the action or the attitude of the department itself. I do not think they are competent to give advice in this case and, incidentally, they did not give any advice in this particular case. Dr. Leslie walked around in the background prodding people but he did not get involved, and his technical advice was not used. Advice was given by the experts and those experts were all from the provincial government's veterinary college and it is certain that the federal government cannot hide behind the technical advances made by the Ontario veterinary college and say how wonderful their department is. Those experts are in Ontario; they are outstanding experts in the Ontario veterinary and agriculture college at Guelph. For the department to take credit for all that seems to me to be going very far.

I was impressed by the fact that Dr. Leslie appeared to want a conviction more than the lawyer did. I am afraid we shall have to make this case over again and let hon. members judge for themselves, telling the story as one would present a case. I had hoped the minister would give consideration to what I asked and that was not really a judgment on this particular case but that the department might be willing to go back on this case in relation to the establishment of the parentage of cattle in looking into this blood factor and making it part of the livestock act. This red factor has a great influence on the genetics of all the generations, yet the department has not seen fit to do anything about it in the form of an amendment to the act. It seems to me we are maintaining a large department with about the same record as that which looks after the Combines Investigation Act. We hear a lot of complaints but they have obtained very few convictions and this department is in the same boat. It has a lousy record. Let us not blame the Holstein-Friesian association and let us not be accused of blaming that association. They police it to the extent they are asked to police it but the department has not put any teeth into the act or bothered to bring it up to date. The act is out of date in my opinion. No doubt it was revised in 1952 along with other acts but it is out of date in relation to the technical knowledge now available in the Ontario veterinary college.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the leader of the house could bring us up to date as to the government's plans for the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: We shall carry on tomorrow with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture followed by the estimates of the Post Office Department. Tomorrow night I will announce, if needed, another department to be considered this week if the house makes rapid progress with the agriculture estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it understood that we go on with the estimates on Wednesday in that case?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, the intention is that on Wednesday we should carry on with the estimates. The same course will be followed on Thursday and Friday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

WHARF CONSTRUCTION, LAKE MEANCE, QUE.

Question No. 141—Mr. Martel:

1. Has the Department of Public Works ever had a wharf built on lake Meance, near La Sarre, Abitibi West, in the province of Quebec, as a tourist accommodation or for commercial purposes?

2. If so: (a) who requested such wharf, and who recommended to the federal government of the day that this wharf be built? (b) who was the foreman in charge of the construction of this wharf? (c) what has been the total cost of the said wharf? (d) what wages have been paid to the foreman and other persons employed in connection therewith? (e) who supplied the materials used in the construction of the said wharf, and what amount was paid to each supplier?

3. Has the federal government obtained a right-of-way on the road leading to this public wharf since the said wharf has been paid with public funds, and, if not, what does the federal government intend to do in this respect?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

TENDERS FOR DECCA STATION, SHIPPEGAN ISLAND

Question No. 144—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Have tenders been called for the installation of a Decca station in Shippegan island?

2. If so: (a) were public tenders advertised, and on what date? (b) has the contract been awarded, to whom, and for what amount? (c) has the construction begun, and on what date?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1. Yes, for a portion of the work only.

2. Public tenders were called in October 1960 for building and site development and erection of antennae, and contracts awarded to Tower Company Limited and Wind Turbine Limited for this work. These contracts covered other stations as well. The work involved at Shippegan amounted to approximately $109,000.

As indicated in the answer given on February 21 to an oral question, the department is still working on plans and specifications for the electronic equipment installation and adjustment. Work on site development commenced on March 2. The work on the antennae has begun at the contractor's plant following the contract award in January.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 11, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE OF REPORT TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to send the report of the royal commission on transportation, which was tabled yesterday, to a committee of this house where spokesmen for the provinces and competing transportation systems could be heard.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know of no case in which a royal commission report has been so submitted, certainly not during the time I have been in the House of Commons. I am not at all impressed by this suggestion.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a supplementary question. Would the Prime Minister tell the house whether steps are contemplated to bring the proposed subsidies recommended in this report into effect before May 15, and if so what procedure is to be followed to this end?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The major recommendations of the royal commission report are receiving the consideration of the government. When a determination has been made as to the course which the government suggests should be followed, the house will be made aware of it.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question at this time. Could the Prime Minister tell the house whether legislation will be introduced prior to the end of this month, when the ceiling on freight rates is automatically suspended, or is the government considering an extension of the freeze on freight rates pending further action by the government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure the hon. gentleman will have heard the answer I gave the Leader of the Opposition. If I must repeat it, however, I would say that when the government has decided on the course to be followed, based on the recommendations of the report or otherwise, that decision will be brought to the attention of the house at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the Prime Minister would inform the house whether the government has taken any steps to bring together the parties to the railway dispute in the hope that a railway strike can be avoided. Is the government prepared to make any recommendation to provide the employees with the benefits of the previous conciliation board report?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in so far as the first question is concerned, the government did bring the parties together. In so far as the second question is concerned, I think I can add nothing more to what was said at the time the debate took place in the house wtih reference to this problem.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, and ask him whether the statement of policy made by him on November 30 last, as it appears at page 347 of Hansard, is still the policy of the government. It reads as follows:

> To require the Canadian taxpayer to subsidize the operating costs of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would be setting a most dangerous and costly precedent.

My question is this. Is that still the statement of policy of the government?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have not issued any statement contrary to what I said at that time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "LE DROIT" RESPECTING LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State. Is the Secretary of State aware of an article published in the newspaper Le Droit on April 10, concerning a rumour that a great number of civil servants will be laid off at the request of the government? If so, would he care to comment on that article?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): I regret, Mr. Speaker, but the article mentioned by my excellent colleague has not been brought to my attention. However, I take note of the reference of the hon. member and tomorrow, if I am able to do so, I will give him an answer.

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Text):

TRADE

PROPOSED U.S. RESTRICTION ON TOURIST IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. My question stems from the concern of many Canadians whose business depends more or less on purchases by United States tourists. Can the minister indicate to the house whether the government or his department is going to seek or negotiate a trade understanding with the United States which would allow U.S. tourists to purchase goods to over the value of $100 to take back with them, an exemption which has been decreased to $100 from $500?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that I could not make out the question that was asked by the hon. member. I will read it in Hansard tomorrow morning and will answer it on the orders of the day tomorrow.

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he can bring us up to date on any communications or negotiations with the British authorities relating to the uranium drama that was interrupted when we broke up two weeks ago.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to report.

RED CHINA—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS FOR SALE OF WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I wonder if the minister would care to comment on a recent press report that officials of the Canadian wheat board are in Hong Kong negotiating the sale of a possible $200 million worth of Canadian wheat to China. Can the minister say whether any credit provisions are involved in these negotiations?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Before the recess I answered a question asked in this house by the Leader of the Opposition in connection with this matter. In my reply I said it was not in the public interest to disclose information as to any of the negotiations which are now in process with the countries with which we are dealing.

All I did say in relation to the discussions at Hong Kong was that we did have a mission there. I would like to leave it at that point.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister like to say whether the chairman of the wheat board is still in Hong Kong, or whether he has returned to Canada?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): As of some time this morning he was still in Hong Kong.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

OTTAWA—USE OF UNAUTHORIZED FLAG AT SUPREME COURT BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Jean Casselman (Grenville-Dundas): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Did the Department of Public Works ever request that a charge be laid against Peter Hargreaves for damages to the flag pole in front of the supreme court building?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. lady for asking the question. The answer is no. I find that the Department of Public Works did not request that any charge should be laid against Peter Hargreaves, and as a matter of fact I find on investigation that no charge has been laid by any authority.

Restitution in full for the damage done to the flag pole in the amount of $135.75 was made this morning by a cheque payable to the Receiver General of Canada from the law firm of Beament, Fyfe and Company. Since restitution has been made in full for the damage to public property, and since the only possible complainant in this matter could be the Department of Public Works, I wish to state that the whole incident can be considered closed. In this statement, Mr. Speaker, I have the concurrence of the Acting Minister of Justice, who expresses the same view.

Mr. Benidickson: It looks as though the press gallery were wrong.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether I correctly infer from his statement that the statement of the R.C.M.P. appearing in the papers yesterday was misleading.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I have not read any statement of the R.C.M.P. I am responsible only for the Department of Public Works.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONS ASKED TO LEAVE CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General and Acting Minister of Justice. Can the minister say whether any person or persons have been asked to leave Canada since October, 1957 as a result of alleged espionage activity?

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, although the hon. member was good enough to give notice of his question, I believe this is the sort of question that is usually placed on the order paper. I wish he would do that.

FISHERIES

SEALS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO SLAUGHTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. On March 20 the problem of the slaughter of harp seals was brought to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries. Could the minister indicate whether his department has made any investigation into the situation, and if so could he inform the house of any action taken by his department.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question.

A rather involved reply is required, and I will be happy to give a more comprehensive reply when my estimates are being considered by the house. However, with the permission of the house I should like to say in reply that harp seals are a species of seal that spend most of their lives in international waters off the west coast of Greenland and, in migration, between this area and the east coast of Canada, where the young are born on the ice floes off Newfoundland, in the gulf of the St. Lawrence and off the east coast of Canada at about this time of year.

The Department of Fisheries took estimates of the populations of these seals, for conservation purposes, by aerial survey in 1950, 1951, 1955, 1959 and 1960. Another survey will be taken in the next few weeks, in the latter part of April and the early part of May, so that a more accurate and detailed estimate of the population of this seal species can be arrived at.

A meeting was held in Halifax on December 8, 1960, at which the scientists and departmental officials outlined to representatives of the Canadian industry the scientific data available and the conservation measures required to ensure a maximum annual sustainable yield. The industry recognized the need for additional regulations but expressed the hope that these could be brought into effect gradually in order not to cripple their operations.

A regulation was passed requiring all Canadian sealing vessels to be licensed beginning in the 1961 season. Notes were sent to the governments of Norway, Denmark and France requesting that they confirm their earlier agreements regarding opening dates for sealing operations and that they give consideration to a proposed closing date of April 30. Norway considered this date too restrictive and suggested May 5 for the current season. Canada agreed to the Norwegian proposal for 1961 only.

I might add that this item is on the agenda for the next meeting of ICNAF, the international commission for the northwest Atlantic fisheries. I should also add that it has been observed this year for the first time that a Russian vessel has been sealing in the international waters off the east coast of Canada. Communications have been sent to the government of the U.S.S.R. requesting that they require their nationals to adhere to the general regulations.

SINCLAIR REPORT—CIRCULATION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. F. Matthews (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries in connection with the Sinclair report, which deals with a study made of the licences of commercial fishermen in the British Columbia salmon and halibut fisheries.

My question is as follows. Has the report been circulated to the fisheries organizations in British Columbia, and does the government intend to get the views of the fisheries organizations and any other interested parties before considering what action may be taken on the report?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The report to which the hon. member refers has been distributed, and the various fisheries organizations in British Columbia have been asked to submit their comments on it in writing before May 31. They have also been asked to submit at the same time any other views or proposals which they may have on the general problem.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I should also like to state that I would be interested in receiving comments and views on this report and on the general problem from any other organizations, such as sports fishing associations or other public bodies, and the general public who may have an interest in the matter.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ISSUE OF STAMPS TO CASUAL EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yesterday the hon. member for Gloucester asked whether instructions have been issued by the unemployment insurance commission to all post offices throughout the country to discontinue the issuance of unemployment insurance stamps for casual employees. The hon. member's question continued:

If so, on what date were such instructions issued and does this mean that U.I.C. form 419-C has now been discontinued?

The unemployment insurance commission advise me that instructions were issued by the Post Office Department at the request of the unemployment insurance commission to discontinue the sale of unemployment insurance stamps except to employers registered with the commission. The post office instructions were issued on March 24, 1961, effective March 27, 1961. The use of form U.I.C. 419-C has been discontinued.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Is the minister aware that such a decision will involve extra expense to provinces and municipalities which are being called upon to pay 50 per cent of social assistance costs in order to take care of those who are being denied unemployment insurance benefits?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—INSTALMENT PAYMENT ON SALE OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked whether Dimensional Investments Limited has yet made the payment which is already in default in connection with Indian land at Sarnia. My answer then was:

I think I mentioned previously in answer to a question on this subject that the firm had 30 days grace in which to make the payment. That time has not yet elapsed.

In answer to a supplementary question by the hon. member asking whether the payment has yet been made, I undertook to obtain this information. Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Can the parliamentary secretary inquire whether there are still proceedings in the courts with respect to this matter, and inform the house at a later date?

Mr. Charlton: I will endeavour to get that information.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—INTERCEPT ACTIVITIES AGAINST STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister had an opportunity to determine whether or not an order has been issued prohibiting air intercept activity by NORAD planes against aircraft of the United States strategic air command?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): I think the hon. member is referring to an order issued, according to press reports, by the United States air force not to carry on any further intercept practices with the particular type of fighter which was involved in the accident with a B-52 a few days ago.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister say whether it was a general NORAD order; and if so, does it apply to Canadian squadrons attached to NORAD?

Mr. Harkness: I have no knowledge of it being a NORAD order.

FLOODS

MANITOBA—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT ON RED RIVER CONTROL PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wish to ask the minister of northern affairs whether any progress has been made recently in the continuing negotiations with the government of Manitoba with respect to flood control on the Red river, and if it is expected that these negotiations will be concluded shortly.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations are currently under way. As to the time of their conclusion, I might say we will be able to announce that when they are completed.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

INSTRUCTION OF ESKIMO CHILDREN RESPECTING UNION JACK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Would the minister care to comment on a report appearing in Le Devoir of April 3 to the effect that a manual in use in Eskimo schools in the Ungava region of northern Quebec contains a statement that the union jack is Canada's flag, along with eight pages describing the union jack in some detail? Does this mean that in the view of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources the union jack is Canada's national flag?

Mr. Speaker: The latter part of the hon. member's question seems to be leading, and suggests rather than asks for information. In regard to the earlier part of the question, I think it would be appropriate to place it on the order paper, because it is a matter of continuing interest.

Mr. Argue: Regarding the point of order you have raised, Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand the article, and I think it is exceedingly important that manuals used in Eskimo schools should be accurate in every particular, and that they ought to—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I quite agree that this is an important question but it is one for which the answer could be more properly sought on the order paper, as it is not a matter of immediate urgency but of continuing interest.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I suggest this is of national importance and urgency, and that there should be no misleading information about a suggested Canadian flag.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has already made that argument. I have given my decision and I hope he will observe it.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether he thinks it possible to expedite the order for return passed by the house in February with respect to correspondence regarding the Prince Edward Island causeway, so it would be available to us before we consider the minister's estimates.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I would like to thank the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate for giving me notice, and I will certainly give serious consideration to his suggestion.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we have to dispose of the baby budget before we commence consideration of the budget for 1961, will the Minister of National Revenue accept a reminder that we have an order for return passed by the house with respect to orders in council under section 38 of the Customs Act as revised in 1958?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think that order is in course of preparation and is perhaps completed. At any rate it will be tabled in the immediate future.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

17. Operation and maintenance including premiums on purebred sires and contributions for livestock improvement; stockyard supervision and furs, $2,861,681.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, it will be recalled that when this item was before the committee last evening I showed some concern regarding the procedures now being used under the Live Stock Pedigree Act to establish the registration of certain breeds of cows. It was my hope that without having to deal with the problem further the minister would give the committee the assurance that he would consider this case again, the only case of major importance that the government has ever used to establish a precedent under the Live Stock Pedigree Act by means of blood typing. I had hoped that the minister would consider the many new developments that have taken place as a result of the scientific advances in blood typing and allied fields, and that he would look into the problem that has been caused by the use of artificial insemination, particularly with respect to this type of case.

During the intervening hours the minister may have had an opportunity of looking into this matter. It is a long, technical, legal case, and I had hoped that he would give it consideration without my having to take the time to deal with it further. However, the minister has said that the case is settled as far as he is concerned and that he is not particularly interested in the developments that have taken place in the years following 1952, when this case was brought to the attention of the department. Therefore I believe it is necessary for me to outline what this case was about and the developments that have taken place since which give rise to the claim by the farmer in question and other farmers in the area that a review of the case should be made, particularly in the light of the new information that is available and which has been presented in the form of a brief to the Minister of Justice and in modified form to all members of the House of Commons so they may peruse it at their leisure.

This case simply started from a domestic quarrel. The earliest information I have goes back to May, 1952. I have here a copy of a family court order which reads in part as follows:

> Enclosed please find copy of interim order 1048 against the above named man, which was confirmed by Judge Allan J. Fraser, on April 29, 1952, for the sum of $20 per month for one child. Case dismissed so far as Mrs. Rowe is concerned.

The family court case concerned Gerald Rowe. I am informed that shortly after the disposition of the case the wife, who had failed to obtain redress and had been informed by her husband that she was not going to be given a divorce, made a statement to one of the officials of the department in which she charged a number of things. An investigation was then commenced by the Holstein-Friesian association and a further check was made by a field man under the direction of Dr. F. J. Leslie, the chief registration officer.

The support case was in May, 1952. In December of 1952 a report was received by Dr. Leslie, the chief registration officer, and in the report there is reference to the number of cattle and some apparent infractions of the Holstein-Friesian registration regulations. The report reads in part as follows:

> I would refer you to the sentence beginning on line 20, page 2, "At the time the inventory was taken it was noted from Rowe's stable breeding book that 25 heifer and no bull calves were born in 1952." In the light of information received from Mr. Smith—

I believe Mr. Smith is a field man for the Holstein-Friesian association.

> —this sentence should read, "At the time the inventory was taken it was noted from Rowe's stable breeding book that 32 heifer calves were born in the calendar year 1952, of which 27 have been registered."

There seems to be a great deal of difference between the first and second sentences. The first sentence was based on what the wife had said, namely that 28 calves were born and that they were all heifer calves. When the field man inspected the herd book at the farm and made an inventory he found this was not the case. The government was now involved, and in my opinion could see possibilities in this case. There is reference to several other cases, and as to one of them it is said that page 3.A.4 should be disregarded in its entirety.

The next step in the case in question was the laying of charges under section 17 of the Live Stock Pedigree Act. Subsection 1 of section 17 reads in part as follows:

> (a) Knowingly signs or presents, or causes or procures to be signed or presented, to the reporting officer of an association or to the person in charge of the Canadian national live stock records, any declaration or any application for registration or any transfer of ownership respecting any animal, containing any material false statement or representation—

In other words, for this section of the act to apply the crown must prove that the man knowingly signed a false declaration or knowingly made or caused to be made a false declaration. Incidentally, in this case there were five or six charges laid, only one of which was proceeded with, that involving one calf known as Mary Bess Supreme. This calf was born on May 8, 1951. The dam was reported by the farmer to be Lady Bess Rena Echo. The sire was reported to be Penvale Supreme. The registration numbers of the dam and sire were also given.

The calf in question was vaccinated under the federal-provincial brucellosis control program on January 26, 1952. Less than a year after the birth of this calf another calf was born on this farm, on March 8, 1952. That calf was known as Joyce Rag Apple Pet Echo. The sire was Bond Haven Rag Apple Marksman and the dam was Lady Bess Rena Echo. This calf was inoculated under the brucellosis control program on January 31, 1953.

The investigation took place in 1952, as a result of which charges were laid. The court case was heard in L'Orignal commencing on October 23 and continuing to November 18. The charge proceeded with was that Mr. Rowe knowingly signed an application for registration with the recording officer of the Holstein-Friesian association of Canada respecting Mary Bess Supreme, a female calf, containing a material false statement relating to the birth of the said Mary Bess Supreme, contrary to section 17(1) which I just quoted.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the evidence adduced by the government in pressing this charge was to the effect that this farmer had claimed the cow was serviced first on July 31, 1950. It was claimed by the artificial insemination unit, or their agents, that she received a second service on January 4, 1951. The farmer claimed the birth of the first calf took place on May 8, 1951. He also claimed and had registered for over a year and a half, when this case was heard, a second calf from the same cow born on March 8, 1952. It seems to me that it would be quite a simple matter for the government to press charges in this case and conduct a blood test on both calves, because I assume they already have on record the blood type of the bull used in the first service. The government claimed it was impossible to get blood from the second bull because that bull was dead.

It seems to me that anyone who understands anything about cattle knows that the gestation period is nine months.

An hon. Member: You told us all that last night.

Mr. Peters: Yes, but perhaps many members were not here last night. Perhaps some hon. members knew this before, but certainly the officials of the court did not know it. If this cow had a calf from the first service the calf would have been born approximately on May 8, as indicated by the farmer on the registration certificate. If the cow had been bred a second time and the gestation period had started on January 4, 1951, then she could not possibly, by any stretch of the imagination, have had a second calf on March 8, 1952, because that calf would have been at least four or five months premature. If the cow, as the farmer claimed, was bred on July 31, 1950 and had a calf on May 8, 1951, there would have been the normal barren period of two months when the calf was very young. The cow would have been bred again around July, 1951, and this breeding would have resulted in the second calf being born as the farmer claimed on March 8, 1952.

A great deal of talk took place during this court case. The evidence is very extensive and covers four very large volumes. I suggest the transcript is not very good reading, because it involves technicalities which I believe had no bearing on the case and certainly have no bearing on the case I wish to make here. However, if anyone is interested he could read it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, under the Live Stock Pedigree Act the crown should have sought to prove that the first calf, Mary Bess Supreme, was registered as being born on May 8, 1951; that the name of the dam and sire respectively were given as Lady Bess Rena Echo and Penvale Supreme; that this information was false and that Mary Bess Supreme was not the progeny of such a dam and sire and also that the cow, Lady Bess Rena Echo, did not give birth at all, thereby rendering the said farmer guilty of supplying a false registration.

This case, if it had been accepted on its merits, would have established the legality of blood testing as a recognized method of establishing the parentage of animals. However, Mr. Chairman, the court case got so many things mixed up in it, such as whether cows can or cannot be bred during the gestation period, whether or not the semen was from this particular bull, that I believe the two agencies with which the farmer dealt should be supervised by the federal government. The first agency was the artificial insemination unit which maintains the bulls for service, and the second would be the people who are doing the work and handling the semen. They must be under federal control in order that the federal government may be in a better position to establish that the semen used is from a particular bull.

I believe the government should recognize the fact that the second calf, the birth of which has never been questioned, could not possibly have been born on the date suggested if there had not been the first calf. This first calf could not have been born from the second service, yet the government did not question the existence of the second calf. They accept this as a legitimate birth from the parents claimed by the farmer, yet the government questions the first birth. This course results, logically, in making the second calf premature by three or four months. I do not know how stupid some of the officials of the department are, but they must be very silly to adopt this technical position and expect to get anywhere with it.

In so far as blood testing is concerned, I may say this is a very interesting field. It is a field in which officials of the government and private research organizations have done a great deal more in the development of blood factors relating to animals than has been done in this field in relation to humans. They are to be commended for this. I do not believe there is any official or any veterinarian who will disagree with me when I make the statement that it is impossible to prove the parentage of a calf if there are two unknowns. If the bull is definitely not known, the parentage can be proven if the factors appear which establish the dam. Then only the sire would be in question. If the factors relating to the sire indicate that he could have been the sire of this particular progeny, then you would have reason to believe that the mating of these two animals could have produced this particular product. If, on the other hand, the cow is not known, by a reverse method and by a negative approach you could prove it was possible that this calf could have been the result of this mating or you could prove that this calf could not possibly have been the result of this mating.

In this case, Mr. Chairman, the farmer said the calf belonged to the dam but made no claim that the calf belonged to the sire, because he was not in any position to know whether that sire had, in fact, produced the semen which the artificial insemination unit sent to him. He was in the position, therefore, of knowing only one of the parents. The department seems to have taken the attitude that if the artificial insemination unit said this particular semen came from this bull, then that was a known quantity and, therefore, this negative approach could be applied; it could be proven that this calf was not the result of that particular mating.

Now I should like to read some statements made by some people because they are very important. I have a letter written to Mr. Rowe from R. J. Humble, D.V.M., department of pathology and bacteriology. He is probably the foremost veterinarian in this field in Canada and has done a great deal of research. This is what he says:

> In regard to your inquiry concerning whether it is possible to prove parentage in cattle, the information you received from the United States is entirely correct on this point. As I have explained in previous letters, we cannot prove parentage. All that it is possible to do with this test is to show that certain animals could not possibly be the parents. Thus by the process of elimination we can usually eliminate all the bulls in a given group as not being the sire which will then quite often, but not always, leave one bull which could well be the sire, since he would possess the necessary factors, but we cannot prove that he is the sire.
> However, if it is possible to eliminate all of the bulls in a given group but one, then it might be reasonable to assume that the one remaining bull might be the sire if there was any chance that his semen could have been used to impregnate the cow.

This certainly does not indicate the falsity of the farmer's statement that this cow is the dam in question, if we do not know the particular bull—and at this particular insemination unit at the time they were using four or five bulls—without doing what Dr. Humble suggests should be done, namely eliminating all other bulls not only in this breed but other breeds. It should be noted in this case that the collection of semen that was made on that particular day in question was from two Holstein bulls. Only one of them was ever discussed and, so far as I know, no one in the court ever asked if the blood testing had been done on the second bull. Obviously it would not have been too hard to have mixed up the semen at the source, and if this had happened this would have been the answer to this particular case.

There are other people who have said that this cannot be proven. This is again from Dr. Humble:

> You may be aware that the parentage test done here at the college does not prove parentage by positive identification but by a test of exclusion. That is, certain facts in each case must be known: let us suppose that the problem is a question of determining which of two bulls is the sire of a calf. The facts of the case must prove that only the two bulls could possibly have bred the cow. Then by the parentage test, it may be possible to show that one of the bulls could not possibly have been the sire. Since there are only two bulls involved and the test has shown that it was impossible for one bull to be the sire, then by the process of elimination it would leave the other bull as being the sire provided it could be proved by other means that only the two bulls were involved. If three bulls were involved, then in order to solve the case, it would be necessary to eliminate two of the bulls and leave the third as the likely sire.

I think this is correct, Mr. Chairman. If it is correct, why did Dr. Leslie not blood test the second bull in the artificial insemination unit on that date? He did not do it for the simple reason that he was not interested in establishing an honest case. He was interested only in getting a conviction on information that was given to him from another source that had absolutely nothing to do with either the Holstein-Friesian Association or the Department of Agriculture. This is why it was not done. This is why Dr. Humble in his evidence proved as well that this case was not an honestly established case, that there was reasonable doubt and that as well he could have established the other side; and it was only by the application of the information he gave the lawyers in the manner in which they used it that they were able to prove that what they did, when it would have been just as easy to prove the opposite.

The University of Wisconsin also had something to say on that matter. In a letter from the department of genetics Mr. M. R. Irwin states as follows:

> In order to make any appraisal whatever of the identity of a calf as belonging to particular parents it would be necessary to have samples of blood of the calf, of the dam and of the sire. Without having samples of all three it would be impossible to state that the calf could not have come from a particular mating. The evidence from the blood tests will tell only that a calf can be excluded as belonging to the particular parents, whereas if the blood type of the calf is such that it could have come from the proposed parents, there are other individuals also which could have been the parents of this calf. In other words, it is not possible to prove parents by the blood test, only to make an exclusion.

There are other sources of information that would indicate that this was so. For this reason I think the government or the department, if they wish to establish an honest case and at least convince me and I think a number of the other members who are concerned about the breeding of cattle, are going to have to exercise much better control over these two aspects that fall within the jurisdiction of the department. I refer to the artificial insemination units and the testing of cattle where there is a dispute and this is used as a factor in the establishment of cases under this particular section of the livestock registration act. I wrote to a veterinarian whom I know and he had this to say about this particular case—

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Milligan: I should like to make a few remarks in connection with this case. I have known Mr. Rowe and of this case for some three years, and I am sure there are other members of this House of Commons as well whom he has contacted in connection with this conviction. I have read the evidence. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Timiskaming for the detail he has gone into in connection with this case. I think this is one case in which a man has not had justice. He has spent a great deal of money. He has worried himself sick over this particular case. I am sure he must be innocent or he would not be doing it. He also retained a lawyer and paid his $100 fee for an appeal in this case. His lawyer allowed the 30-day time limit to run out, and Mr. Rowe has never had any support from anyone anywhere in order to allow him to bring this matter to a new trial. Why it was done in that way I do not know. We do know, as the hon. member for Timiskaming has said, that there are family troubles there that are serious and that they are having a severe effect on this man's whole life and his farming operations.

A great many people may feel that this is a case that does not amount to too much. However, those of us who are producing purebred livestock know this is a serious situation. If this man is innocent he should have an opportunity of another trial and getting this thing straightened out.

Then again, this case might be used as a test case against some of us who are producing purebred livestock. I am sure that in the evidence I have read there is not enough to justify a conviction against this man. I would hope the minister would see his way clear to do something in order that this man might have another opportunity to present his case, to have another trial and to see what the outcome would be. In the interests of livestock producers across Canada I am sure it would be to their benefit and also to that of Mr. Rowe.

The Chairman: Shall vote 17 carry.

Mr. Peters: I am certainly pleased to know that one of the other dairy producers is interested in this case. I have received a great deal of mail from farmers who are interested. I think we can indicate that there is enough of a question being raised for something to be done. I am quite happy to bring this information to the attention of the general public, because I think only in that way will it result in the department taking the legislation and bringing it up to date, which will result in justice in this case and the establishing of a proper use of blood testing to establish cases.

I pointed out a few minutes ago something that is referred to on pages 34 and 35 of volume 2 of the evidence in this case—

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention whatsoever of preventing my hon. friend, the member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), from discussing the case he has been talking about since yesterday. In fact, he has been allowed a great deal of latitude in doing so. I wonder, however, whether the standing orders allow a member to discuss evidence submitted before a court when a judgment has been passed.

Not so long ago I raised a grievance myself in this house and, at that time, Mr. Speaker prevented me from going on when he suggested my grievance had been before the courts and that judgments of the superior court and the court of appeal had been passed. In short, since the courts had given their verdict, Mr. Speaker decided that I could not proceed with my argument. Now, since yesterday, the member for Timiskaming has been arguing about the evidence given. He even said that a certain witness did not testify with all due care.

I wonder whether this debate is in order. I do not wish to prevent any member from making his point, but since we have been hearing about this since yesterday, I wonder if this discussion is not out of order.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make a legal case. I am not fighting that aspect of the matter. I am suggesting that the item we are now discussing involves the improvement of livestock through breeding records and the various protections that are given by this act. I am attempting to indicate that a change is needed in this act to take into consideration artificial insemination, which was not a factor a few years ago when the act was put into effect.

Second, I am trying to influence the minister and stir up public opinion for the establishment of blood typing in a more positive way under this particular act. The only reason we are referring to this particular case is that it is the only one in connection with which the department has ever made any extensive study. As far as I know this is the only case where these matters have been discussed at great length in Canada and I would appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, to allow me to make this point.

I will stay away from the court case itself, except to quote extracts that strengthen or support the argument which I am attempting to make for changing this particular act.

The Chairman: I would agree that if the hon. member intends only to attempt to correct the act concerned under this item, he would be in order. However, I must say that at times he came very close to criticizing the courts. I must remind the hon. member, and also the hon. member who preceded him, that all references to judges and courts of justice and to persons of high official station, in the nature of personal attack and censure, have always been considered unparliamentary. Therefore any discussion of the manner in which the trial of this particular case was conducted may in some respects be a criticism of the court or the judge and would be out of order.

I trust that the hon. member will use the example of this case only as a reason for correcting the act and not for criticizing the court or any justice.

Mr. Peters: I was pointing out that on pages 34 and 35 of volume 2 of the evidence in this case Dr. Smiley says that he drew semen from Penvale Supreme on July 30, 1950, which was a Sunday. On that day semen was also drawn from another bull, Elle Cross Snowflake Triune. On page 36 the doctor goes on to mention the process by which this semen was drawn off, and left open and again it was respecfully submitted that this was a further occasion when the semen could have become mixed.

I was suggesting that if the department in this particular case had thought the matter out more carefully than they did, they would have been fair to the farmer by testing all the bulls that were involved. The department should have tested all the bulls that could have been involved in a very simple mix-up, because semen was drawn from two bulls on that particular day. I think the department had an obligation to do this and not only to obtain a conviction, because I do not think it should be the prime interest of the department to obtain a conviction. In all fairness they should have given the benefit of the doubt to the farmer, to the extent of at least testing the second bull that was being used in the unit.

If the department had done that they would possibly, by the exclusion method, have established that this second bull might have been the sire of this particular progeny. If this had happened—and it may well have happened—there would have been a different result in this case. In any case, the farmer should never have been asked to prove the sire of this particular calf when he had used artificial insemination. When the farmer receives the service slip from the artificial insemination unit he has to take what is on that slip as being the source of the semen, and he has to accept the name appearing on that slip as the name of the bull which sired the calf he registered with the association. He has to do this because he has no way of telling where that semen came from or what bull it was. He obviously has to take the word of the artificial insemination unit in this connection,

When the doctor, during this case, proved that the mating of the dam and the sire in question could not have resulted in the birth of this particular calf, in my opinion all this meant was that one of the parents named in connection with that calf was not the proper one. I should think there would be as much question about the sire as there was about the dam, particularly when a mix-up can occur much more easily in that field than in any other.

I recently received a letter from a friend of mine who is a veterinarian. He had this to say:

> In regards to the Rowe brief, it certainly looks as if he got the dirty end of the stick. Most insemination units now colour their semen so that these mistakes can't happen. If I were the judge and was confronted with such evidence and knowing how some of these technicians work, I would throw the case out.
> In my opinion the cow could have definitely been pregnant and come into heat and be bred by a technician again. Only a great deal of training and experience enables you to tell if a cow is pregnant at five months with certainty. It is possible, although difficult, to pass an insemination tube through a gravid (pregnant) cervix without causing an abortion.
> Human error could have caused a mix-up in the semen at any point along the line from collection to insertion.
> The parental blood test is pretty accurate even with the 15 factors, let alone the 40, but if the semen was mixed this wouldn't apply.
> The fact that units colour their semen now indicates that there have been some admitted mistakes in the past. I personally know of some cases where the semen has been mixed not only by the technician but by the collector.
> I hope this helps a bit. C. A. V. Barker of the college is world known on insemination work and evidently his testimony wasn't even considered, which alone would justify reopening of the case.

This veterinarian owns a large hospital; he is a technician and a highly qualified veterinarian. He points out that artificial insemination units now colour the semen that they use.

I could go on and point out that in this particular case we have further evidence in connection with certain cows on this particular farm. There are affidavits from five people. One declares that three Hereford calves were born of purebred Holstein cows and were sold to Arthur E. Lalonde. There is a declaration from Arthur E. Lalonde stating that three Hereford calves were purchased from Gerald Rowe in the first week of December, 1953, and they were sucking Holstein cows at that time. There is also the declaration of Raymond Lalonde which corroborates the evidence of Arthur E. Lalonde. Then there is the declaration of Robert Lalonde, who is no relation to the other Lalonde, that a Hereford calf was born to a Holstein cow. There is also the declaration of Orville Rowe verifying what Robert Lalonde declared and adding that they were the same cows as were sold to Arthur E. Lalonde.

These things happen. They have happened in this case. I indicated last night that this artificial insemination unit and their technician bred a cow that had been dead a month, as a second service. The technicians are not all exact. This man points out that sometimes his wife looked after the slips and sometimes he did. Sometimes he did them that day and sometimes he did them other days. This case could not have resulted in the statement which appeared in the Holstein-Friesian paper, as follows:

> For the first time in Canada and possibly in any country, result of a blood typing to prove parentage of an animal has been submitted to court and accepted as evidence. In this case it was accepted as proof that the heifer, Mary Bess Supreme, could not be the daughter of the cow, Lady Bess Rena Echo and the sire, Penvale Supreme, as claimed by Mr. Rowe.
> In delivering his judgment, Magistrate Lalonde stated the prosecution had proved by two different methods, practically and scientifically, that the parentage of Mary Bess Supreme, as stated in the application for registration, was false.

That is not correct. This statement which appeared in the Holstein-Friesian magazine it not correct. They did not prove this. They could not prove this. It is an impossibility to prove it when there is too long notice. Dr. Humble has admitted that it cannot be proved. Only an exclusion can prove that certain bulls could not have been the parents of cattle. They could not prove in this case that certain bulls were not the sires, and the Holstein-Friesian association is stating something which is not true.

I have nothing but respect for the interests, the aims and the aspirations of the Holstein-Friesian association, but I am very surprised at some of the bookkeeping they do. I should like to refer to one instance, because the Holstein-Friesian association comes directly under this department. If there is any infraction the department has the right to take it over and administer it. This case was decided in February, 1954. In February, 1955 Mr. Rowe received this letter:

> You are aware in accordance with our letter to you under date of June 2, 1954, that at a meeting of the executive committee of the association, held in Toronto on May 26, 1954, you were expelled from membership in the association and your certificate of membership was cancelled.

The letter goes on to say just what is involved. That was on February 21, 1955, and it resulted from his expulsion on May 26, 1954. But on July 17, 1954 the association sent him a card over the signature of the secretary in which they said his dues were not paid. So he sent them a money order, and that money order was received on July 27, 1954. It was accepted by Mr. Clemons, the secretary of the Holstein-Friesian association, without a protest. In July, 1955 a second notice was sent, saying again that his dues were due and asking him to send in the money to become a member again. After that second letter had gone out they sent him a notice acknowledging receipt of his money order, and when the post office checked on it they found it was received by the same person and cashed by the same person with no protest. They also sent the same gentleman forms to fill in to have his cattle graded as an official member of that association. Yet in their letter they go on to say:

> If you persist in spreading false information among the breeders and members of the association, claiming that you are still a member or that you have been reinstated, we shall have no alternative but to give further publicity in the Holstein-Friesian Journal to the fact that you have not been reinstated and that you are not a member of this association.
> I trust you will see the good sense of avoiding this action by making no further unwarranted claims.

He paid his dues, and he received a receipt for those dues. Again, the second year, he paid his dues, and I suggest he was a member in good standing at the time this letter was written to him. The receipts here can be filed with the minister if he wishes so he may see that these statements are correct.

All I am saying is that the association, as well as everybody else, can make mistakes, and it seems to me that the farmer has a rough enough time in this country in upbreeding his stock and trying to better conditions for himself and for the industry generally without the department working against him. In my opinion this department should be working for the farmer rather than against him. I am happy to think that most departments of government, and certainly most of the divisions of the Department of Agriculture, are working for the benefit of the farmer. Sometimes they are slow, but usually they work for his benefit. However, in checking over this information as a result of the inquiries which have been made I find that all we have done is to assume that the farmer is guilty and that everybody else has been right.

I am suggesting that this case should be reviewed by the department itself in the light of further developments in scientific knowledge which have taken place. We should remember that back in 1952 artificial insemination was not used as widely as it is today, and in view of the many mistakes which have been made—the hundreds of mistakes which have been made—and the fact that semen from bulls is now being coloured in order to prevent mistakes which everybody admits have been made, is it not the fair thing to give this farmer a second chance and at least go back and check the second bull which was being used in the unit and check the second calf involved in this case? Both calf and cow are alive; in this respect we are no further away from the case than we were then. I think the department has an obligation to do this for its own satisfaction.

I should also like to suggest to the department that they take cognizance of some of the mistakes which have been made by the artificial insemination units by insuring that more training is given to some of the officials in the early stages. A better type of training should be given to some of the people who are doing this work at the present time. They have done this work on occasions without any training at all. Certainly this technician had less than no training, because he was trained by a man who had never done the work himself. Though he may have improved over the years his bookkeeping is still as sloppy, according to the last report, as it was in the case in question.

I think the department has an obligation to interest itself in this particular field. It might not be as important as western agriculture or some of the things which concern western producers but it seems to me the farmers in eastern Ontario are going to be watching very carefully to see whether the government is taking any interest in this. They will not be too impressed by the minister standing up and talking about the New party and what it stands for. Frankly, cows are not interested in the Conservative party; they are not interested in the New Party or in any other party. They, and the producers of these cattle, are interested in getting the best guarantee they can that the semen which they buy for the cattle they are producing comes from the bulls that they expect it is coming from. It is only on rare occasions that farmers meet with any question regarding a cow not being the mother of a calf, and certainly in this case when there are similarities in the markings of the cow and calf very little question can be raised.

Last night many hon. members laughed as though they did not believe there was any importance attached to these similarities, and suggested that we remove such references from the back of the Holstein-Friesian registration cards. I suggest that they appear there for the purpose not only of identifying the cow but to establish similarities in certain lines. While it is true that a white cow bred to a black bull may not produce a calf the colour of the mother or the father, it is likely there will be a predominant colour of either the dam or sire in the calf. This is an important enough matter that the breeders of particular types of cattle have used it for purposes of identification over a great number of years. Unless the government is now suggesting a new method of identifying this particular type of cattle I think consideration should be given to the similarity in markings in this particular case.

I will not take advantage of the opportunity, which I think I have and would be justified in using, to conduct a filibuster on this matter. I will leave the decision to the Department of Agriculture, and if it corrects this situation I will have a great deal more respect for it than if the officials sit back and say to themselves that the case is closed and legally cannot be reopened; there is a conviction, and whether it is good or poor, let it remain.

Item agreed to.

19. Grants to agricultural fairs, exhibitions and museums in accordance with regulations of the governor in council; payments pursuant to agreements in force on March 31, 1961, with exhibitions covering the construction of buildings and other major undertakings; and a grant of $50,000 to the royal agricultural winter fair, Toronto, and freight assistance on livestock shipments for exhibition thereat, $967,600.

Mr. Carter: I would like to ask the minister in regard to these grants whether he has a provincial breakdown, and whether any grants are made in Newfoundland.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am informed that we have an agreement with the government of Newfoundland and do not pay grants to particular fairs, but make an overall grant each year to the government of Newfoundland.

Item agreed to.

20. Special grant to royal agricultural winter fair, Toronto, $450,000.

Mr. Hales: I would like to take this opportunity of expressing the appreciation of the members of the royal winter fair board of directors and other interested people for this special grant of $450,000. This is one more evidence of the great interest this party has in agriculture, and I am sure this grant will go a long way towards the improvement of this great show.

I understand that at the closing of the last royal winter fair, work was commenced to remodel the buildings, and that when the new fair opens this fall it will be possible to house within the new building the cattle of the New Queen's class. I understand there will be a new building to take care of swine and a building for sheep. These additions will be a great asset to this fine winter show in Canada. I repeat, that those individuals interested in agriculture will appreciate very much the efforts of the minister in this regard.

Mr. McFarlane: Mr. Chairman, referring again to item 19 I would like to bring the minister's attention to the fact that at the present time grants are made to fairs of fairly good size. I would just like to mention section 5(b) of the regulations, where it says that an application must be accompanied by a statement certified by a responsible officer of the fair showing details of the prize money paid by the fair in respect of specific exhibits in each of the three preceding years, showing that in each year the prize money paid amounted to not less than $5,000. In my own area we are endeavouring, and have been for the past several years, to encourage the establishment of agricultural fairs and exhibitions, and I refer specifically to the East Kootenay agriculture and industrial exhibition which is held in the lake Windermere valley.

I suggest that some consideration should be given to these regulations so that assistance can be made available to smaller exhibitions such as the one I have just mentioned. The larger exhibitions and fairs have various means of raising money and are in a position to post $5,000 in prize money, but unfortunately the smaller organizations cannot do so. The organization to which I have referred, operating in the Windermere valley, has a hard time financing its operations and could use any assistance the department might offer. I have raised this matter on two previous occasions, but so far have had no response. I hope some consideration will be given to this suggestion.

Mr. Roberge: Last year in this committee I spoke in regard to an annual event which takes place in my riding having to do with the promotion of maple products, called the maple festival. This festival was organized two years ago and attracted approximately 4,000 people at that time. Last year there were approximately 10,000 people in attendance, and it is expected that this year somewhere in the neighbourhood of 15,000 to 20,000 people will visit this annual festival. This organization was designed to promote the sales of maple products in the province of Quebec and throughout the country. It was encouraging last year to note that some people from the United States were interested in maple products and attended that festival. I think as a result of the work done by this organization maple products are better known today than in the past.

I suggest to the minister that a grant be made to this organization, if possible, which would be of considerable financial assistance in the holding of this annual event. This festival is taking place this year from April 30 to May 6.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture to explain the increase of $440,000 in the amount he is asking, under item 20, for the year 1962.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The agreement with the royal winter fair has been in effect for some years. There has been an amount in the estimates each year for this grant, which has not been taken advantage of. Last year the grant was dropped to a nominal $10,000. This year the fair officials informed me that they were prepared to go ahead. When we get a statement from them as to the actual amount being spent we will pay one-third of the cost, our estimate is $450,000 for our share of this year's expenditure.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: The Minister of Agriculture has not seen fit to reply to the question of the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge), about the request for a subsidy on maple products.

I support the request of the member for Megantic and would ask the minister to indicate whether he thinks a reasonable amount might be granted for the holding of an exhibition in the eastern townships. The idea is to promote the sale of a national product, coming as it does from a tree whose leaf we hope will some day grace our distinctive national flag.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, periodically we get requests from members for grants to exhibitions or fairs in their ridings. There is a regular procedure to be followed with regard to bringing these matters forward and having them assessed in the light of the regulations in order to see what can be done. I suggest that the hon. member for Megantic submit his application in the same way as anybody else.

21. Special grant to Pacific National Exhibition, Vancouver, $200,000.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I want to make one or two very brief comments about the Pacific national exhibition. First of all, may I say that in my opinion the directors have been doing an excellent job as far as British Columbia is concerned and have attracted to the exhibition a tremendous number of people from coast to coast. I am particularly interested in this item, as are the citizens of Vancouver, because at present there is a certain amount of difficulty as to the type of building and the potential location. I notice that these grants generally apply to buildings located on exhibition grounds. Could the minister outline very briefly the terms of this special grant and tell us whether or not it is possible to establish exhibition grounds in central Vancouver as well as at the Pacific national exhibition park? Is it possible for an exhibition building to be located in central Vancouver which might be used for agricultural purposes and other purposes as well?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The question raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has been before me for the last few months. The conditions of this grant to the exhibition in Vancouver were that the building would be used for agricultural purposes but there would be no objection to it being used for other purposes if the main purpose was agriculture. I cannot make any statement as to the question of location. If it was going to be used for agricultural purposes I think the department would rule that it should be located on the exhibition grounds and not downtown in Vancouver. I wonder whether we could reserve this item until the end of my estimates?

The Chairman: Shall this item stand?

Mr. Drysdale: The minister wants to have the item reserved until the end of his estimates and I would ask that during the intervening time he direct his mind to the point I mentioned, the question of exhibition grounds. As far as I can ascertain, there is nothing in the act or regulations defining exhibition grounds. Let us say that a location was picked in downtown Vancouver and designated as exhibition grounds and a building was erected primarily for agricultural purposes but for other purposes as well which are of considerable interest to the people of Vancouver. I would ask the minister to consider whether or not that is a possibility. It would then be a building on exhibition grounds, and I do not believe the minister has resolved the problem by stating that the building can only be on exhibition grounds.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): All I can say is that such a serious matter would have to be given the most careful consideration. These special grants are given to exhibitions for national agricultural reasons and when any digression from the general terms of reference is suggested it has to be given very careful consideration.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Regier: I understood that the item was to stand.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I asked whether it could stand.

The Chairman: Shall vote 21 stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

22. Grants to agricultural organizations as detailed in the estimates, $260,250.

Mr. Carter: In the details on page 116 I notice that approximately half of this allocation is for 4-H clubs and the 4-H council. I want to commend the minister for the support he is giving this movement and at the same time I wish to pay tribute to the good work that the 4-H clubs are doing in my own province and I am sure all across Canada. Can the minister tell the committee how many 4-H clubs are in existence at the present time?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have the information in my briefing book and I can get it for the hon. member.

Mr. Carter: It is not that urgent.

Item agreed to.

23. To authorize, notwithstanding sections 33 and 35 of the Financial Administration Act, the issue by the Minister of Agriculture, in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council, of premium warrants for high grade hog carcasses, and to authorize the charging to this vote of the value of premium warrants at the time they are issued and the value of any unredeemed premium warrants issued in previous fiscal years, notwithstanding that the total value of all premium warrants to be charged may exceed the estimated cost of the program which is, $6,865,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Under item 23, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether, in view of certain statements he made in recent speeches, he will raise the quota of hogs eligible under the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act. May I also ask him whether he has a statement to make on the raising of the number of dozens of eggs on which the government will pay subsidies under the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act, something he has mentioned in a number of instances in those speeches?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This item has to do only with the paying of premiums on hogs. It has nothing to do with quotas and the stabilization act.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: I realize that this applies to the payment of the premium. However, if I may be allowed to wander slightly from this item, I was just asking whether he had any statement to make. I am convinced that the farmers would be interested in knowing whether the number of hogs and the number of dozens of eggs will be raised during the next session.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): When we were discussing this matter last evening I made a statement with regard to hogs and eggs. In specific answer to the question asked by the hon. member, I should like to point out that during this calendar year the present hog price support and the present limit of 100 hogs are in effect but I hope that during the year I can resolve some of the difficulties I see and come up with a formula that will do a little better job in achieving what we have in mind. I should like to point out that, having regard to the way the trade operates, the difficulties in dealing with this matter are very great.

Mr. Milligan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say something with respect to what the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska has said. I do not quite agree that we should increase the number of hogs. I think that the floor price should be increased to a more reasonable level because in my opinion $22.65 does not bear a reasonable comparison with the cost of production of hogs, particularly in Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes. When we limit the number of hogs on which deficiency payments can be drawn I think the price should be at level that will return to the producer at least his cost of production plus a reasonable profit. I think that is necessary if we are going to have any stability in the hog industry. If a limit of 100 hogs is going to get us into a surplus position, then in my opinion we should reduce it to a figure where we are going to keep production in line instead of increasing the limit.

I should like to say a word in connection with the increase in the premium on grade A hogs. I am quite pleased to see that the minister did increase it to $3. I am disappointed, however, that there has not been a greater increase. I think we should be capable of a little more foresight in our attempts to encourage producers across Canada to produce quality products. It is about five years ago since I took part in a federation of agriculture meeting in Calgary at which the premium on grade A hogs was discussed. Views were expressed both pro and con, but the majority of the members felt the premium should be increased to $4 per hog. In view of the fact the majority in favour of this course was small, the resolution was never presented to the Department of Agriculture with the result that the advantage of this move has been lost for a number of years.

It must be quite apparent to everyone who looks at the results achieved by the $2 premium that we have increased the number of grade A hogs by only a little over 32 per cent. This is rather ridiculous when compared with the 80 per cent of grade A hogs being produced in Prince Edward Island, Denmark and Holland. We should be using our best efforts to find markets for livestock products in Britain instead of trying to find markets for grain. I never could understand why we sell our western feed grains to Holland and Denmark where they are fed to hogs, the production of which is subsidized by the government and which hogs eventually compete with our hogs in the British market. I believe the Danish product has captured the British market only by reason of the quality of that product. I know I was there a few years ago and a chap was showing me a handful of western barley which he was feeding to hogs which were sold on the British market. At the same time this chap was selling his own barley to the brewery.

It seems to me we have to produce a better quality product than we are at the present time if we are going to get a share of the export market. There is no reason why we cannot produce as good a product as is produced in Denmark or Holland and capture a share of that export market. I feel one factor is that it is more profitable to produce a grade B hog than it is to produce a grade A hog. I expect that I am no better feeder than a lot of people, but I have no trouble in producing 70 per cent to 75 per cent grade A hogs. When you realize that only about 32 per cent of the hogs produced across Canada are grade A, it is time to take a look at this situation to ascertain what we can do to encourage a better quality product which would enable us to cope with export demands.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to endorse the remarks just made by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Milligan), requesting that the price of pork and the quality bonus be raised.

The points made by the member for Prince Edward-Lennox are well taken and show that he is an experienced farmer besides being informed on markets and farm administration.

Item agreed to.

25. Freight assistance on western feed grains, $20,000,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out to the Minister of Agriculture an irregularity existing in the Saguenay-Lake St. John area with regard to the movement of feed grain from western Canada.

I have here a table supplied by the board of transport commissioners for Canada. I note that for a distance of 228 miles, for instance, or the distance between Quebec and Chicoutimi, the subsidy is 43 cents. For a slightly longer distance, that is 262 miles, from Quebec to Amqui, the subsidy is 68 cents. In the case of Jonquière, for a distance of 218 miles—which is comparable to Mont Joli located 217 miles from Quebec and where the subsidies are 68 cents in summer and 67 cents in winter—the subsidy is only 43 cents. Chambord, in the Roberval riding, with a distance of 176 miles, receives a 43 cent subsidy, while St. Fabien, with a distance of 179 miles, or 3 miles more, gets 68 cents in summer and 67 cents in winter. And what about St. Arsene, in the Roberval riding—this will be one of the last examples I shall give—for a distance of 199 miles, the subsidy is also 43 cents, while at Bic, for a distance of 189 miles, it is 68 cents in summer and 67 cents in winter.

I could give many more examples, but I do not want to bore the committee with this detailed information. I am asking the minister however—he does not have to answer me today—to have this matter looked into and to try to take appropriate action so that farmers of the four counties in my area will not be discriminated against, compared to other farmers in my province.

(Text):

Mr. Milligan: I should like to say a word in connection with this particular item. During the past few years there has been some criticism in Ontario about the continuation of freight assistance on western feed grains. I would hope that the minister can make this a permanent policy because I think it is good legislation. I would not say it is a subsidy to eastern farmers because I have never felt that way about it. I think those of us who are feeding livestock realize that if the freight subsidy were added on to the price of the grain we buy it would be impossible to feed western grain.

In addition, I think this is a subsidy to the western farmer and I am very glad he gets that much extra for the grain he is producing. I believe the subsidy is a protection to our Ontario wheat and corn growers because I think it results in an increased price for the grain that is sold here in Canada. In any event, this is going to the farmer so I hope this subsidy will be continued.

Mr. Argue: I should like to say a word on this item. I disagree very strongly with the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and who reached a very strange economic conclusion to the effect that the subsidy on feed grains used in eastern Canada goes into the pockets of the people who produce the grain in western Canada. I think my position on this question over the years has been a bit more realistic than that taken by the hon. member, namely, that anything that is done to wipe out part of the freight costs of moving commodities from the prairies to eastern Canada cannot help but be of benefit to both the producer and the consumer.

I was surprised to read that there was some opposition in eastern Canada, or in Ontario, to the continuation of the freight assistance on western feed grains. I hope the minister can assure the committee that not only is the policy to be followed for the present year, but that it is the intention of the government to continue this policy I should like to see this policy placed in legislative form instead of being left in the uncertain form of an item that is placed in the estimates from time to time. There is no doubt about it that this is a subsidy which assists in the moving of feed grains to eastern feeders and results in a price lower than they would otherwise have to pay for the grain they receive.

I would suggest that this is a policy that is in the national interest and is one that should be continued. It brings about a more equal price as between the prices paid to producers and the prices that have to be paid by the livestock feeders in eastern Canada. This policy is the very opposite of the misdirected policy having to do with the removal of coarse grains or feed grains going to feed mills from the wheat board regulations. That was a bad move; it is a move that is unsupported in the prairies because it runs counter to the general principle of this particular measure which is to bring about a greater similarity in the prices received by the western grain producers and those that are paid by the feeders across this country.

I would ask from the minister some comments as to whether or not it is the intention of his department and the government to continue the freight assistance policy which has now been in effect for many years.

Mr. McFarlane: I should like to bring my age old problem to the attention of the minister. I refer to the freight assistance problem. First, I should like to quote from the Canadian Wheat Board Act, section 2 (1) (c) which reads as follows:

(c) "designated area" means that area comprised by the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and those parts of the province of British Columbia known as the Peace river district and the Creston-Wynndel areas, and such other parts of the province of British Columbia and such parts of the province of Ontario—

And so on. This area to which I am referring specifically namely, the Creston-Wynndel area, has never been granted any concessions at all under our freight assistance policy. At the present time the federal government has spent approximately $2½ million in the construction of our Pacific Great Eastern Railway wholly within the province of British Columbia; and we are asked as the taxpayers of British Columbia and the taxpayers of Canada to contribute our share toward the construction of this Pacific Great Eastern Railway which brings a great deal of the feed grain out of the Peace river area. The payment of freight assistance in the Peace river area has been in effect for a number of years especially into the Vancouver markets. In view of the fact that this is a government subsidized railway, both federally and provincially, we feel that our efforts on behalf of freight assistance should be extended to the Creston-Wynndel area.

It has been brought to my attention that relatives, especially those living in the Peace river area who have relatives in the Creston-Wynndel area, are able to ship grain to the coast at a much cheaper rate in view of the subsidy than that at which we are able to ship it from our area. This situation has practically eliminated the Creston-Wynndel valley from this market in Vancouver which is rightfully ours. I have been advised that the province of British Columbia is ready and waiting to restore to the Peace river area in British Columbia freight assistance if they were to be deprived in this area of the federal subsidies.

The action of the department does not appear to me to be logical nor does it appear to be consistent in the interpretation of the act. Just what logic is there in setting one part of British Columbia against another part of British Columbia in connection with freight assistance problems? This creates a geographical and economic barrier against one in favour of the other. No country can ever become unified by such action. In view of the fact that both areas are in British Columbia, I cannot agree that one district should be given consideration on freight assistance and not another. At the present time there is a difference of $11.20 per ton feed grains shipped out of the Peace river area and those shipped out of the Creston valley.

Last year I spoke on this matter and I received the same argument from the department, namely that this area is not part of the grain producing area for the purpose of freight assistance. This does not appear to me to be a logical argument. We are both in the province of British Columbia. At that time I received from the then minister this reply as found at page 4257 of Hansard of May 26, 1960:

I merely point out that this is a situation in which there seems to be no completely logical answer. We are still looking at the matter. The whole question of the movement of grain and particularly of the movement of feeds is tied up with the inquiry being carried on at the present time in the agriculture committee. After their report is submitted we may make changes as far as the movement of grains and the subsidy on grains, particularly from the Peace river area, are concerned.

That answer was given nearly a year ago and I feel that by this time they should have completed their investigation which would bring the Creston-Wynndel area into this freight assistance category. I feel also that we should be given consideration so that we can enter this Vancouver market. The difference of $11.20 per ton is a little bit too much to allow us to compete with the Peace river area.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few comments on this estimate which has to do with freight assistance on western feed grains, by way of an answer to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) who once stated that farmers should buy their grain during the fall and store it.

I gave two examples for the purpose of establishing whether it would pay the farmers or the feed mill operators to buy in the fall or in the spring. This is what I have found.

If the grain had been bought in October to be used at a later date, it would first have to be delivered to Pembroke from the harbour of Prescott. The option at that time was 82 cents a bushel, with a margin of 13 cents and loading charges of 1.4 cents, making up a total of 96.4 cents per bushel, or $56.62 a ton. Subtracting from this price the subsidy of $5 per ton, we get a net price of $51.62. To this price must of course be added shipping charges between Prescott and Pembroke, which amount to $4.60 per ton, plus the interest on the invested money and the storage charges, for a total of $60.06 a ton, f.o.b. Prescott, in October 1960.

Had the same grain been purchased for delivery in March 1961, it would have had to be bought on the basis of the May options, which, at the time, were at 78 cents, plus the spread of 1¼ cents. So if you convert this grain into tons, you find that the price is $46.62 plus a $13.20 spread, minus the $5 subsidy which applies in this case as in the other, which gives a net cost of $54.82.

This will answer the allegation of the Minister of Agriculture to the effect that grain dealers would profit by purchasing their grain and stocking up in the fall. In the case I have just mentioned—the minister can correct me if I am wrong, but I have tried to get the best figures available—I think I am right in saying that the farmer has no advantage in buying his wheat in the fall and storing it until it can be used in the spring.

I think we should look for other reasons to justify the shipment of feed grains to eastern ports in the fall, so as to avoid finding ourselves in the same situation as last fall, a situation which caused the prices of feed grains to rise, thus affecting the income of eastern farmers.

Now, coming back to the statements made a moment ago by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Milligan), I should like to refer briefly to the subsidies paid to western producers and farmers. I am not against such subsidies, as I am sure they are really needed by the western farmers, because I had the privilege of working on a western farm for a year—that was about 20 years ago—and I had occasion to familiarize myself with the thinking of those farmers. I learned something of their language, and I was able to appreciate their attitudes and courtesy.

However, I have made a calculation based on figures provided by the "Current Review of Agricultural Conditions in Canada", wherein it is stated that in 1960, the prairie provinces received an amount of $77 million, including, under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act—the payments being based on acreage—an amount of $42 million, and under the federal-provincial farm assistance schemes for unharvested grain and for western wheat producers, another $35 million, which makes a total of $77 million. The number of farmers in those three provinces, in 1956, was 232,000.

Thus an average of $340, in round figures, went to each western farmer. If we apply the same figures to eastern farmers, including those of Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes—and I am leaving out British Columbia—we find that if the government had given our 315,000 farmers the same subsidies as were given the prairies farmers, it would have meant a disbursement of $104 million so that eastern farmers, and Quebec farmers in particular, would have got an additional $340.

According to a statement made by the management of la cooperative federee, as published in Le Devoir of February 2, 1961, the average net farm income last year, that is in 1960, amounted to $1,475. If the eastern provinces had enjoyed the same benefits as the western provinces, the net income of our farmers would have been $1,800 instead of $1,475.

The minister and the western members might think I am being critical of a policy which is beneficial to western farmers. Not in the least. What I am trying to point out is that there are farmers too in eastern Canada, in the maritimes, in Ontario and in Quebec, and that they too deserve consideration. We will soon have an act on farm rehabilitation. I hope that it will do us more good than did the crop insurance enacted two years ago.

Mr. Chairman, those are the few remarks I wanted the minister to hear. I hope he will consider the representations made by eastern farmers. I would be glad if he came out to visit the eastern provinces, particularly the province of Quebec, if he will allow me to extend that invitation. I also take the liberty of telling him that I will provide him with a chance to talk to our farmers and to tell them of what he is planning on their behalf.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Shall vote No. 25 carry?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I think I should say a few words on this issue of feed grain assistance. This assistance has been in effect for a good many years. Over those years I think that generally speaking, hon. members of all parties have supported it.

A debate is going on among farmers as to which particular group gets a subsidy out of this assistance. The western farmer stoutly maintains that the subsidy is to the eastern farmer, and the eastern farmer maintains just as stoutly that the subsidy is to the western farmer.

I have noticed a growing amount of criticism of this assistance in both the west and the east. Eastern farmers are saying it should be taken off. These are the farmers who are growing wheat in Ontario. Western farmers who are anxious to build up a feed grain industry out west say that it should be taken off because it is subsidizing their competitors in the east.

I will immediately relieve the minds of hon. members of the committee by saying that thers is no intention on the part of the government to change the feed grain assistance system. We have this matter always under review, and at the present time I think it is doing much more good than harm to any particular group. I think that in connection with trying to set the eastern farmer against the western farmer we would all be well advised to remember that we are all Canadians and that eastern and western farming are complementary to each other.

As Minister of Agriculture I have taken great pains to point this out, not only in the house but across Canada. I have pointed out that there is no need at all for quarrels between the two groups. The difficulties in connection with trying to assist agriculture to receive a greater share of the national income are big enough as they are, without starting a fight between the two different groups.

I think that with a little thought hon. members will find there are very few cases of serious clash between eastern and western farmers. If anyone tries to divide up the help which the government has given, on a direct basis of the number of dollars that go into one particular area as compared with another, I think they would be doing a great injustice to agriculture.

A comment was made about freight rates in Quebec. The reason for the recent changes in the province of Quebec is the fact that the movement of western grain to eastern Canada has been based on rail rates. However, of recent years more and more of the feed grain moving to eastern Canada has gone by boat. Since the rates in Quebec are based primarily on Montreal, the subsidy has been equal to that applied to Montreal plus the local rate. When boats discharge their cargoes at Quebec city cheaper than they can be taken by rail, then obviously people in the area around Quebec have the benefit of a much lower rate. It is very confused and I suggest to hon. members from Quebec that they have a considerable advantage in connection with the grain that comes by water because the subsidy is no greater than the actual cost of moving it in.

In some places the difference is considerable. Chicoutimi is a case in point. We have tried to rectify this situation and bring rates into line, and these efforts have improved the situation. The same thing is happening in the maritime provinces. However, I would point out that this is a question of rate reductions; changes are made which we think, in the first instance, improve the situation, but, immediately, we receive representations from other places asking that adjustments be made. I can say, sincerely, that this matter is under constant review. It is under very active review, because the representations we are receiving from the various groups are so contradictory in their nature. We shall do our best to eliminate the differential as much as possible.

I should like to say a word now to the hon. member for Kootenay East. I think the case he has made out during the last two or three years that an injustice is being done to the people who live in southern British Columbia has now been changed through the building of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway. I can promise him that shortly he will get an answer, yes or no, in the case of grain being moved into Alberta from the southern and eastern parts of British Columbia.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I would like to thank the Minister of Agriculture for the information he gave me this afternoon and I hope that he will eventually find a solution to those problems.

I was a bit sorry to hear him say on a few occasions—and I have been listening to him for two or three months—that we are trying to pit the eastern farmers against their western counterparts.

I hope he does not take us for narrow-minded individuals and that he does not pass judgment on us according to considerations I am not aware of.

We favour the western farmers as much as the eastern farmers, but we do want every farmer to have his share of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Even though we come from Quebec, and whatever the minister may think, we are as truly Canadian as he is.

We have at heart the welfare of western farmers as much as that of eastern farmers.

Every time requests came from the west and estimates had to be adopted for the benefit of western farmers, I think we have never shown any reluctance to comply with those requests.

However, we would like the government, the Minister of Agriculture, as was indicated earlier by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) to go in the east, to go in Quebec and see for himself that we are people like others, that we love our English-speaking compatriots as much as he loves them himself.

But, we also want our French-speaking compatriots to get their share of the national revenue.

I would not want to believe in the remarks he sometimes makes in this house because it would give me a poor opinion of his education and his broadness of mind.

As I say, to make us out as being against the western farmers and for the eastern farmers, I realize that may sound well in a debate and that it may be a popular statement in his constituency, but I do not think it is a right judgment to pass on the people of Quebec.

(Text):

Mr. Argue: I appreciate the statement the minister has made with regard to the seed grain subsidy and the fact that it is being continued. In stating that we should not try to divide the east and the west, the minister said that certain organizations both in eastern and western Canada have asked that this subsidy be removed. I should like to know from him what organizations in western Canada are campaigning for the removal of this feed grain subsidy. I am not aware of any organizations engaged in such a campaign and I should like the minister to tell me what organizations are involved because as far as I have been able to ascertain, the farmers of western Canada, certainly the grain farmers, are pleased that this policy is being continued. In their own minds, rightly or wrongly, they feel it is at least as much in the interests of the farmers and feeders of eastern Canada as it is in the interests of those who produce grain on the prairies.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I do not think there is any point in saying much about this. I have been making a tour of western farm organizations during the last two or three months and talking to various members of those organizations and discussing feed grain assistance with them. Several have remarked to me, mostly among the livestock associations, that as far as they are concerned they would not mind if it were cut off. I do not know of any organizations which have passed resolutions to this effect. I have simply pointed out that this feeling is growing. I do not think it is strong enough to warrant any action; I think it is just an expression of opinion that the subsidy is of no assistance to them.

Mr. Argue: I think the minister is engaging now in loose gossip, because he says that no farm organization has passed a resolution suggesting that this subsidy should be discontinued. Yet he comes into this committee and with the authority of the Minister of Agriculture he says that certain officials of livestock associations in western Canada have expressed to him the opinion that this subsidy should be removed. I think it is a disservice to agriculture generally to engage in this kind of idle talk and loose gossip. I have noticed a predisposition on the part of the minister in his policies to weight his policy against the ordinary grain producer on the prairies—

An hon. Member: Oh.

Mr. Argue: That is what has been done. If some producer of high priced export livestock goes to the minister he seems to lend a much more sympathetic ear to him as witness the breaking down of the orderly system of marketing through the wheat board.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member can catcall all he likes from the back. Those interruptions are his main contribution to debates in this chamber. But I would say this loose talk on the part of the minister, this gossiping of private conversations on to the record of this committee when no western farm organization has made any policy statement which is critical of the feed grain subsidies, should not be repeated.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I want to thank the hon. member for his gratuitous advice. We all know from long experience of the hon. gentleman who is the one who talks loosely and who gives misinformation to this committee.

Mr. Argue: No misinformation at all.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking about me in such a loose fashion. I would like to point out that we have had a discussion spread over the last three or four months in the House of Commons concerning feed mills in western Canada, and I notice the hon. member said today in this committee that all the farm organizations in the west were supporting the stand he is taking. That is not true.

Mr. Argue: I said no such thing.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Read the record carefully and you will find you made a misstatement of facts today. I did not get up and criticize it because the hon. member makes a good many of those misstatements and it is difficult to stop them all. I am simply pointing out in regard to this question that I made a statement in this chamber which is true, and I do not like it very much when an hon. member whose record in keeping to facts in this house is not too good stands up and challenges it.

Mr. Argue: I never challenged the accuracy of the minister's statement at all. I did not say that he did not gossip with the officials. I did not question his statement regarding what certain officials had said to the effect that they might just as well take off the feed grain subsidy, but I did suggest that it was loose and irresponsible talk on the part of the minister when he related private conversations and statements, which he alleges have been made by unnamed officials, regarding a policy very much of interest to the agricultural industry in this country. It is difficult enough to maintain a good policy with the present minister in office without his trying to torpedo some of his own policies by this kind of loose and irresponsible talk, the accuracy of which I have not questioned at all. I have, however, questioned the propriety of the Minister of Agriculture in making this kind of statement when the organizations in question, in the words of the minister, have made no such policy statement whatsoever. The minister is merely referring to private conversations and is placing them on the record.

26. Agricultural lime assistance, $1,300,000.

Mr. Peters: Organizations in northern Ontario have in the past been interested in expanding this subvention, and the benefits the farmers derive from it, to include assistance in the field of fertilizer that is imported because of the very heavy cost of transportation. The farmers are at the end of their patience in this regard and have on a number of occasions, to my knowledge, asked for an extension of the subsidy paid, in regard to this fertilizer. I was wondering whether this is feasible, and whether consideration has been given to the representations that have been made during the last two or three years on behalf of northern Ontario farmers regarding the expanding of this lime assistance for agriculture so as to cover fertilizer commodities.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Shall item 26 carry?

Mr. Peters: I would like to have an answer to the question I have asked. The farm union locals in my area have been very interested in this problem and have passed resolutions in the Ontario section requesting this assistance. I might say it is very seldom that the northern Ontario farmers ask the federal government for assistance. I would ask the minister whether he has done anything about these representations or if he intends to give consideration in this regard.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): We have a policy to assist the provinces wishing to build up the capital of their land. The question of lime involves building up the land and is not fertilizer in the sense the hon. member has referred to it. We do not have any policy to date of assisting the provinces in regard to the importation of fertilizer. Our assistance has been directed to the capital lime build-up as distinct from the fertilizer lime. I cannot give the hon. member any more satisfaction than that because this is a different kind of policy from that which we have been considering so far.

Item agreed to.

28. Poultry division, $1,248,856.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Would the minister give us some information on item 28?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Would the hon. member be more specific?

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: There is a decrease of $230,000. I would like to get some explanation in that connection.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think there is an increase in this item of $60,000.

I would like to suggest, while we are looking up the actual increase under the poultry division for this year, that any slight increase like this—$60,000—is almost entirely due to salary changes this year.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, may I call it five o'clock?

The Acting Deputy Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

CO-OPERATIVE LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-12, an act respecting Co-Operative Life Insurance Company.

He said: Bill No. S-12 provides for an amendment to the act respecting the Co-Operative Life Insurance Company, its head office being in Regina, Saskatchewan. Hon. members will notice that there are two proposed changes being made for the purpose of assuring policyholder members throughout Canada that the control of the company will not be centralized in Saskatchewan, and in particular at its head office. In fact under clause 1 precautions are written in to prevent employees of the company from exercising the proxies of other members and thus preventing the control of the company being kept in the hands of head office personnel.

Clause 2 of the bill would add a new section, section 4(a). The purpose of this is to prevent the control of the company being concentrated in any one designated region. In this respect it would mean that the Co-Operative Life Insurance Company would operate in the same manner as other co-operative societies, on a delegate basis. Finally, the superintendent of insurance has indicated that he has no opposition to the proposed changes.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am not rising to register any objection to this bill. I think the purposes of the bill should be supported because I view with very great alarm a situation where it has been possible, at least in theory, for the control of a co-operative life insurance company to fall within the hands of a very few people. I wonder whether the sponsor of the bill could tell me whether steps will be taken to assure that the same co-operative principles will be followed in relation to this life insurance company as have been followed in relation to other co-operative organizations under the Rochdale principle, namely, that one member shall have one vote and one vote alone, and that this principle will be maintained throughout the operation of the company.

When membership in such a co-operative company is spread all across Canada I can appreciate that control of the company from the point of view of voting at conventions would have to be in the hands of delegates. However, I would appreciate it if the sponsor could give me an answer to this question. Will the principle of one member, one vote be followed throughout the operations of this company? I think most hon. members feel that co-operatives can play a very important part in the life of our country but certainly they will fall into ill repute if it is possible for control of such companies to fall into the hands of a few individuals which means in fact that really they are no longer co-operatives in the sense that those of us who are associated with such organizations understand co-operative principles.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member for Melville speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. J. M. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the wording of the bill it is certainly the intention that the members of the Co-Operative Life Insurance Company will be elected and will vote in the same manner as members of other co-operative organizations such as the wheat pools, livestock co-operatives and dairy co-operatives, with which we are all familiar. The bill simply makes provision for the same arrangements to apply to the Co-Operative Life Insurance Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

AURORA PIPE LINE COMPANY

On the order:

House again in committee on the whole on Bill S-2, an act to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company. (Without amendment).—Mr. Woolliams.

Mr. Churchill: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: I note that the house leader is suggesting that this order stand. It would have to be by unanimous consent. Is the house prepared to waive this order by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF MINIMUM RATE OF WAGES FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-28, to provide for minimum wages for employees.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill has been before parliament on previous occasions. It was first introduced by Mr. Stanley Knowles who is now executive vice president of the Canadian Labour Congress and I have introduced a similar measure on several occasions. The bill would establish a minimum wage of $1.25 per hour for all employees under the jurisdiction of the federal government. A number of years ago it was considered throughout Canada that a basic rate of $1 per hour was a fairly good wage but because of increases in the cost of living and the upgrading in the standard of wages throughout industry generally over the years it seems to me that the government should establish a minimum wage not only for all those who are employed by it but also for all those employed in industries over which the federal government has jurisdiction.

Certainly it was made evident in Ottawa recently that it is necessary to establish a minimum wage law. Not long ago a number of convictions were obtained in the case of industries coming under the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario. With each application of the minimum wage law there is a growing indication of the need and desirability of establishing a fair and reasonable minimum rate in those industries in which no organization bargains for the employees.

If the bill were passed it would not have any effect with respect to employees within industries over which the federal government has jurisdiction if those employees are receiving more than $1.25 an hour. The bill will not have the effect of reducing wages. It simply establishes a bare minimum and raises rates to that minimum in all cases where the federal government has jurisdiction. This would be a very simple law. It would be similar to laws that are in effect in all the provinces of Canada. The minimum rates vary from one province to another. The federal government, however, has depended upon prevailing rates, casual labour rates and other rates. We are now suggesting that a minimum rate of $1.25 per hour be established in those fields over which the federal government has jurisdiction.

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate briefly in the debate on Bill No. C-28 having to do with the establishment of a minimum wage for employees of the government of Canada. As was indicated by the hon. member who introduced the bill, this is not the first time such a measure has been before the house. I regret to say that I was caught somewhat unaware. I had intended to speak at greater length on this matter on a previous occasion. However, I have hurriedly got together some of the material I had intended to use and I hope I can make a small but valuable contribution.

As a supporter of the government I do not hesitate for one moment to say that I support the bill now before us. We know very well that such a provision is basic in the establishment of living standards in our country and, so far as employees under the jurisdiction of the federal government are concerned, unquestionably parliament should give leadership by taking this step. Obviously the previous bill specified a lower hourly rate, but I think that is of no great consequence at this time. We all agree that the standard of living in our country is high, and I certainly believe this basic rate of pay would be required to maintain a family on accepted standards.

Back in 1935 the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then prime minister, introduced legislation of this type in this House of Commons and carried it through to its conclusion. The Liberal government which followed referred this legislation to the supreme court and, of course, it was proclaimed ultra vires. Canada had agreed at an international convention to establish certain labour standards, including minimum wages, and the country was therefore obligated by treaty to put such legislation on the statute books. I would ask hon. members to bear in mind that this action was taken by the Conservative government of that day and contested by the subsequent Liberal regime. I am not saying that, in recent days, the thinking of the Liberal party has not changed in this regard.

We must realize that in so far as the subject matter of this bill is concerned, the jurisidction of the federal government is limited mainly to the fields of transportation, communications, a few corporations under federal control, and the banks. Certainly I would say that in those fields there are certain categories that require the assistance that would be extended by the terms of this bill. We cannot really expect that other phases of the economy will carry on at a high standard if the federal government does not take responsibility in the fields over which it has jurisdiction.

There will probably be some objections to be considered before we consider the detailed terms of the bill. No doubt these objections can be overcome during the course of the discussion or they can be referred to the committee and ironed out at that time. One such objection might be the possibility that the implementation of the bill would involve the expenditure of public funds.

There is one particular aspect of this question that concerns me somewhat. It is not that I feel the terms of the bill are wrong, but perhaps we do not have sufficiently in mind, when we are trying to determine what is right or wrong internally in our country, the fact that the federal government should take the lead in this field and establish a rate at least equal to the highest provincial enactment. We should bear in mind the fact that we are setting the standard for other governments.

Recently the New York Times published a comparison of hourly rates for labour in which the Canadian rates appeared. I think this is an important aspect of the matter, especially when we are endeavouring to establish a basic rate such as this of $1.25 per hour. The article revealed that in Canada we have an average rate of $1.72 compared with $2.13 in the United States. In the United Kingdom the average hourly rate is 66 cents; in west Germany, 54 cents, and in France, 38 cents. I do not have before me the figures for Japan, but we know they would be much lower than these figures.

I should like to quote here the figures relating to income per capita in those countries

I have mentioned. I do have the figures relating to Japan in this regard. In Canada the average per capita income is $1,400; in Japan, it is $200.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Winkler: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the hon. member quote the figures relating to the cost of living index in those countries as well as the income figures?

Mr. Winkler: No, I cannot do that because, as I said earlier, I have that material but I prepared rather hurriedly and I did not bring it with me. I admit it is relevant to this matter, there is no question about that. This is precisely where I agree with the hon. member in connection with the establishing of a minimum rate of $1.25. I am supporting the bill in every detail in this regard. However, I do say these factors should be borne in mind and they might lead to the necessity of regulating other things which perhaps the hon. member would like to do but we would not like to do.

In the Soviet union the average per capita income is $500 and in the United Kingdom it is $900; west Germany, $700 to $800.

As I have just indicated, I am not mentioning these factors in the hope they will be used as background material to oppose this bill. However, I believe if one cites arguments in favour of this bill, all the factors should be kept in mind. I will say that if the discussion of this bill terminates this afternoon and it is not brought to a vote, I am sure that in the future the government will put legislation of this type on the statute books. I say that with all sincerity. I have quoted these figures only because I believe we should support the standard of living we have now. I would be the last to suggest we should reduce the standard of living we are enjoying or that anyone should use these figures as a basis for opposition to the bill. However, I believe we must consider all these things when we are making such determinations. As I indicated earlier, I am very much in favour of this bill and I will support it if the opportunity arises.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Before discussing the terms of the bill, Mr. Speaker, I intend to make a few comments on the remarks just made by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler). It is true that legislation of this kind was passed in the late thirties under a Conservative administration and that this legislation was applied all across the board to any class of employees, not just those under federal administration as is the case in this bill, No. C-28. Later on this legislation was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada in order to ascertain whether or not it was ultra vires. There is a good reason for that. Over the years the Liberals are well known for standing in favour of the autonomy of provinces instead of being in favour of centralization as the Tories have been all down through the years. I am not stating anything new here. Besides that, the present administration has been in power for the last four years. They certainly could have brought forward legislation of this kind if they think that minimum wages should be—

Mr. Winkler: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deschatelets: Yes.

Mr. Winkler: Will he indicate to the house whether or not he is in favour of the terms of this bill?

Mr. Deschatelets: Of course, Mr. Speaker. I could not allow the remarks of my hon. friend to go unchallenged.

Mr. Winkler: Will the hon. member answer the question?

Mr. Deschatelets: Of course I am in favour of having a minimum wage.

Mr. Winkler: How does it come about that you were here for twenty two years and did not pass a minimum wage law?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I am just commenting on the remarks made by my hon. friend and I am stating that the present government has been in power for the past four years but nothing has been done to bring forward legislation of this kind. I think that statement cannot be challenged.

I now intend to continue in French, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

I do not suppose anyone is opposed to this bill. Indeed I think the sponsor of this bill was very conservative in setting a minimum of $1.25. In view of the present cost of living, I think it is absolutely necessary that at least $1.25 per hour be guaranteed to employees who come under federal jurisdiction.

I believe that we should set an example to private industry because, in view of the present high availability of labour, a great many business enterprises are taking advantage of the situation and paying wages of 70, 75 and 80 cents an hour.

I think we should give leadership in the matter of wages.

This is a bill which, I hope, will be passed before six o'clock. I hope no member will still be talking at the six o'clock bell, so that the house may vote on the principle of this bill.

I do not want to keep the floor too long but I do wish to say that if this Bill C-28 were adopted, it would have the immediate effect of raising the wages now paid to seasonal employees of the national employment service. It would also have the immediate effect of stepping up the wages we are paying to post office seasonal employees, and many others.

I wish to congratulate the sponsor of this bill. I think it is time we adopted this legislation. I hope we are going to vote on the principle of this bill before six o'clock.

(Text):

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have not in any previous year spoken on this bill but it occurred to me that there was one point relating to it on which I should like to say a few words. I refer to the necessity for the bill itself. I would not want my remarks to be taken to apply generally to business men in this country. I will therefore make it plain when I say that some employers about whom I intend to talk are the reason for or give rise to the introduction of this bill. I cannot tell what the percentage is; I hope it is a very small number of employers. However, there are certainly some across the country here and there who will take advantage of a workman in any way they can, sometimes merely to increase their own profit. Some may be driven to taking an unfair advantage because of the desperate circumstances their business is in and they will try to use anybody whom they can use in order to save that business.

I have had a little bit of personal contact with that type of employer. What I am afraid of in a bill like this is that where you force the employer to pay a minimum wage, it may lead him to feel, "Well, the government has set this fair minimum wage and, if I give the employee this wage, that is all I need to give him". It might in some respects deter an employer who, in trying to satisfy his own conscience without such a law in force, might be a little bit more generous.

I can recall working for a firm just prior to the war. At that time in the province of Alberta the minimum wage was 33⅓ cents per hour. There was an old faithful employee who had worked for that company since 1897. He had started as a teamster driving a wagon delivering their lumber. He had graduated to driving a truck for the company and at the time I knew him in 1940 he was driving the oldest truck in the firm. At that time he had had 43 to 44 years of continuous service with the firm. He was distinguished from the other truck drivers in that he was not on an hourly wage but was on a monthly salary. His monthly salary worked out to exactly what the other truck drivers would get if they put in a few hours overtime in a week. The only difference was that he received his pay every month and I am afraid that he did the same amount of overtime every month.

I was shocked by the treatment of that man when I came back from overseas and checked to find that he was still there but had just that summer been taken ill for a while. At the end of two weeks the accountant took his cheque to the secretary of the firm for signing and the secretary said, "That is his holiday pay". The man still was not back at the end of another two weeks and the accountant made out another cheque and took it to the secretary of the company who said, "He has had his holiday pay. We owe him nothing". I am happy to say that the president of the firm stepped in and said, "This man will continue to get his cheque, no matter what happens".

When we stop to consider the attitude expressed by the secretary of the company toward this man who had been a faithful employee of the company for 50 years, we are inclined to feel that certainly we cannot be too zealous in our efforts to protect some of the workers from some of the employers.

I am sure that the vast majority of employers in this country are not at all alarmed at the thought of a bill like this being enacted. I think the wage scales across the country are probably substantially above the minimum set out in this bill. I am convinced that in most of those industries where the pay is not above this amount there are many sound economic reasons why they are not able to pay it.

This, of course, causes me a little difficulty in connection with the bill. Certainly we all wish to protect workers. In so far as we are able, we wish to ensure by legislation that these workers obtain at least a minimum living wage. We know they require some protection, but we also know that conditions in this country vary considerably from place to place. They vary considerably from industry to industry. The conditions under which people work even in one industry may vary considerably. There are various types of jobs and there are certainly different rates that industries can afford to pay. An across the board minimum wage as would be fixed by this bill would certainly have different effects, depending upon where the people are employed.

I suggest that when we look at the different conditions and standards, a single rate across the country for all industries and all purposes would give some workers absolutely no more protection than they now have. The natural laws of economics, supply of labour, economic conditions, health of the industry, and so on, in one area mean that we are not giving those particular working men any protection whatsoever.

There may be other areas where industry is trying to get started and is struggling along, where the cost of living may be generally much less and where the economic value of $1.25 per hour would certainly be out of all proportion to its value in another area.

I would suggest that this argument is quite realistic, and as evidence of this we have only to consider what is being done by the provinces across the country in their minimum wage laws. I am not familiar with all the regulations and rates, but I do know they vary with regard to the minimum wage rate all the way from perhaps 35 cents an hour in some places for female help, to perhaps a minimum of $1 in other areas—it may be even more—for male help, depending on the job.

I note that this bill deals with more than just the minimum hourly rate. There are other benefits that this bill endeavours to provide. But looking at the provincial legislation—and much of it is of long standing—it seems to me that we would be attacking this problem in a much more realistic way if there were a little more flexibility in this bill.

I cannot pretend to come up with a formula at this time as to how the minimum wage should be fixed for any particular part of the country or any particular industry, other than by reference to provincial legislation. These provincial bodies and labour boards which operate in the provinces are constantly in touch with all the factors that affect rates of pay and the economic situation in their areas. Over the years they have evolved rules, regulations and rates and have set minimum rates of pay for various industries and various sections, taking into account all these factors. We might not be remiss in taking advantage of the work they have done in order to establish our own minimum wage regulations.

I should think that instead of fixing the rate of $1.25 an hour across the country—which, as I have pointed out, might not be too satisfactory for some reasons—it would be better to pass a bill to tie in a minimum wage rate which would rise, fall or vary according to the provincial minimum wage laws prevailing in the area or industry where these people are affected. Then we would be a little more realistic in our approach to the problem.

As the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) pointed out, when he first introduced this bill the rate was $1 per hour and now it is $1.25 because the cost of living and wages have gone up. I have no doubt that over the next few years, if this bill were put into effect, there would from time to time be amendments to increase that rate as economic conditions changed in the country.

If we fix a single rate across the country, paying no attention to the varied economic difficulties which have to be faced, I think it would not be satisfactory now, we probably would not find it satisfactory in the future and amendments would be necessary. I think we would have to bring in more than one figure if we attempted to cover the whole country.

Therefore, my first suggestion in connection with this bill is that we should take advantage of the work, time and money spent by the provinces. We should take advantage of their experience in this field and should make some use of the knowledge and figures they have compiled and the regulations they have evolved.

Let us put this bill, not on the basis of a rate of $1.25 per hour but on a rate which would bear a relationship to the minimum wage laws which are in force in the provinces for the particular area and the type of work being done. We should tie this rate closely to the provincial scheme.

I should point out that I am not advocating that it has to be the same rate of pay as is laid down by the minimum wage laws in the provinces. I am sure that if we looked at the rates now prevailing in some of the provinces most of us would probably be more interested in our own province and would feel a little dissatisfaction with the provincial legislation and consider that it has lagged a little. We would probably think it is time these minimum rates should be raised so that they are more in keeping with modern times.

When I say that we should take advantage of provincial legislation and experience, I am not saying that we should let the provinces set our rate. However, I do say that those factors which have caused the rates to vary from province to province, and in some cases to vary within the province, will probably be good reasons why our rate should vary also. I would suggest, therefore, that our rate should be an amount which varies, as the provincial rates vary, but should not necessarily be the same sum. It could be a percentage; it could be 1½ times the minimum prescribed by the province; it could be 10 per cent more, or 100 per cent more, depending on the area under consideration.

I agree that we should give leadership to this extent. I do not think the federal legislation should set a rate which is less than that set by the provinces. However, I do feel that the most sensible rate, and the one which will provide the best protection for workers, is one that takes advantage of the experience which has been built up by the provinces.

There are a few cases where a minimum wage of $1.25 as set out would impose a hardship on the working man himself. These are individuals and merely because they are working people it does not mean they do not have their own defences, that they do not know their own minds or have to be led by the hand. I have seen examples of cases where a man might feel it is to his own best long term advantage to work for a very low wage at the start because he can see a new industry struggling to get going and believes that his own personal sacrifice will help that industry to get past its formative stage so that within a short time the company will possibly be able to pay him a wage much better than the minimum wage offered elsewhere in that area. A man might therefore want to join with his employer in making the sacrifices necessary so as to improve his position on a long term basis.

I have seen examples of employees who much prefer assistance of a very small guaranteed wage coupled with a share of the profits or bonuses and certainly this system does much for the incentive of the working man. Certainly those who are most vitally interested in the progress of the industry have their own welfare at heart. By setting a minimum wage too high we would make it difficult if not impossible for many of these worth while schemes to be put into effect.

I realize there are some employers who would take advantage of schemes of this sort, who would try to get their employees to work for little or nothing, and when I suggest that workers should be free to enter into such schemes I do so with the intimation that there is going to be some danger that they will suffer instead of gain. Having worked in the coal mines in the west, perhaps conditions there would be a good example of what I mean. I know that most of the miners who were digging coal wanted to be on a contract rate though some others preferred to be paid at so much per day. I have no hesitation in saying that those who worked on the contract rate worked about twice as hard as the other miners. The company man usually turned out to be the one who would do the least work, the last one you would choose to have as your partner if the two of you were working in one place and were dependent on the total output for your daily wage.

I think this minimum wage is going to prevent a lot of ambitious hard-working people who are willing to make short term sacrifices in exchange for long term benefits from being able freely to exercise their choice. I think this will be more detrimental to them than exposing them to possible harsh practices by unscrupulous employers.

I do not like to deal with individual items in the bill but for the purpose of illustrating some of my remarks I cannot help but comment on the amount of money which it is proposed be deducted in respect of meals and lodging. I suggest it is most praiseworthy to make sure that a man is really protected where he is on a job where his meals and lodging are provided by the employer to make sure that the minimum wage provision is not circumvented by the charging of excessive rates for necessities. I suggest, however, that the rates for meals and lodgings must bear some relation to the actual cost of providing them.

We set in this bill a minimum wage rate of $1.25 an hour but we put the value of a night's lodging at 75 cents—that would be the bunk, the shelter and so on—and I think the price set for the meals is 50 cents. I find it hard to imagine how the same employer who must pay his cooks $1.25 an hour as a minimum, who must pay the most useless roustabout around the camp at least that sum in order to get the simplest tasks performed, must still be able to furnish food and lodging at those rates. I am not objecting to a working man getting those rates of pay but I think we have to be practical. We have still a lot of country to open up in Canada. In many of the places where people have to work the only way in which the project can be organized is for the employer to set up a camp. Nowadays wealthy companies with sufficient capital try to set up complete towns together with all the facilities, including facilities for recreation but there are still some areas where only a small development is to take place in charge of someone who possesses only a small amount of capital but large ambitions and lots of courage, the kind of person who originally opened up this country and who are still trying to open it up to the best of their ability. They do not have money for frills. They must be able to get in and provide some facilities for their employees. To put an artificial value on meals and lodging supplied—though these may have cost the employer three or four times as much—is going to make it correspondingly more difficult to get the project started at all.

I hope none of my remarks will be considered as indicating my opposition to the principle of the bill. I take it the principle of this bill is to protect the working man in his dealings with his employer no matter who or where he may be, to the extent that he will get at least a minimum living wage for his services. I am opposed to the flat rate being inserted because I think it would not do the job; it would not operate correctly; it would cause much trouble in some places and leave people without coverage in others. I would suggest that the rate be set at a percentage over and above the prevailing provincial rate in the area and that the item concerning food and lodging supplied need not necessarily be included if we have properly set out our prevailing wage rate.

There is nothing in this measure which takes into account the fact that we have in this country a good many people whom I might perhaps describe as difficult to employ. There is nothing in this bill that will encourage an employer to hire someone who is mentally deficient; individuals for whom we would like to encourage employers to find jobs in order that they might support themselves. This bill does not take into account the halt, the lame and the blind, and those individuals for whom we are attempting to find jobs. If jobs could be found for these individuals they would feel self-sufficient and would feel they were doing their part in this country. These are problems which I think can be worked out, and I would suggest to the mover of this bill that more progress could be made if amendments were included along the lines I have suggested.

Finally, I would say to the businessmen in this country that any remarks I have made about the hard-hearted businessmen apply only to a very few. I think the unscrupulous businessmen are a small minority. I feel most of our businessmen are hard-working honest individuals who give their employees the best treatment possible because they appreciate that their employees will in turn give them their best effort. I thank the hon. members for the patience they have shown.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): I would like at this time to express my views regarding this bill and say to the sponsors that I appreciate their sincerity in attempting to bring about a higher standard of living in Canada by way of minimum wages.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does the hon. gentleman realize that if he speaks until six o'clock he will prevent a vote?

[Mr. Nugent.]

Mr. Grafftey: Demagogue, demagogue.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not in order. It is not relevant to the discussion.

Mr. Grafftey: Twenty eight years of indifference to the working man; let him speak.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): This is a bill which I feel requires a good deal more discussion than we have had to the present time. I have spoken in regard to bills of this type on several occasions in the house and my opinion has not changed. There is, I feel, no hon. member in this house who is opposed to the principles of a bill of this type. However, I feel very strongly that the matter of minimum working rates is a provincial one. While this bill deals particularly with individuals working on federal government projects, there may be a very distinct clash with provincial acts causing a great deal of difficulty. The provinces in Canada have their own departments of labour, in most cases with advanced labour legislation. I feel that if this government supersedes that legislation without thorough discussion and the agreement of the provinces it would be entirely wrong.

For many years I was a member of a trade union and was connected with the enforcing of minimum wage rates in the province of Ontario, and I refer particularly to the industrial standard act. I am familiar with the problems involved in the enforcing of an act of this type. I feel that if this government were to move forward quickly in the passing of a bill of this kind without providing for an enforcement force it would get into serious trouble. The minimum of $1.25 per hour, as set forth in this bill, would be fair in an area such as Toronto but might create hardships in areas such as Newfoundland, Quebec and other areas. This is one reason why I feel that the minimum wage statutes should be matters with which the provincial governments should deal. I do feel that this bill requires a great deal more study before it is passed.

I had intended to deal with a number of other items but will say in summary that I endorse the bill in principle but feel that it must incorporate much more before it becomes a satisfactory formula for every part of Canada. For that reason I feel that it should be brought forward at some later date, perhaps in different form and at a time when all hon. members will have an opportunity to express their opinions. There is no doubt that it is a good bill but we should have the approval of the provinces before it is put into effect.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will now resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

28. Poultry division, $1,248,856.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, on March 16 1960, the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) on the possible removal of the 4 million pound maximum quota on the importation of turkeys from the United States. The following day, as reported on page 3090, the Minister of Agriculture made the following reply:

Mr. Speaker, I examined this question in Hansard this morning. The question is as follows:

Is it the intention of the government to abolish the 4 million pound maximum quota on the importation of turkeys from the United States?

I am not sure whether this question is in order, though I may be subject to correction in that respect. If it is, I should like to say that at the present time we have no thought in mind concerning any change.

It seems that the words "at the present time" have caused some confusion among the public, judging from an article published in the Family Herald for April 13, 1961, under the signature of Jack Trower. I should just like to quote part of that article:

(Text):

It is doubtful, however, if Mr. Hamilton's very brief statement will completely satisfy the turkey industry. Answering a question in commons concerning the possible abolition of import quotas or United States turkeys, he replied simply that: "...at the present time we have no thought in mind concerning any change."

(Translation):

It seems that Canadian turkey producers, particularly in the province of Quebec, are concerned about this situation. I have received a number of letters from turkey producers in my area in this connection; they are concerned and they ask me to seek additional information.

Before going on with my remarks, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture with regard to this 4 million pound quota. Does this quota include all types of turkeys? I should particularly like to know whether it includes turkey poults, young turkeys, medium turkeys and others?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I think the answer to the hon. member's question is yes. It does include all types of turkeys.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct another question to the minister. Has this maximum 4 million pound quota been in force throughout the year 1960?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The quota year is the calendar year. Therefore the quota is for 1961.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: And now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the answers just given by the minister, I must say that several of the letters I have received mention the fact that in 1960 over 6½ million pounds were imported from the United States.

On the other hand, in reply to a question put by my colleague for Drummond-Arthabaska, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Morris) replied, as found on page 2294 of Hansard, that in 1960 the importation of 4,444,298 pounds of turkeys, live or killed, not reported elsewhere, was authorized, under 77 permits.

On the other hand, if we examine the report issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, entitled "Trade of Canada Imports, December 1960" for the 12-month period ending December 1960, and most particularly page 46, we will note that 4,682,777 pounds were imported under those 77 permits, I presume. The same information may be found under item 2261, "Turkeys NOP". Under another item, i.e. number 2013 of the same publication, it is noted that the importation of baby chicks and turkey poults reached 7,614,095 pounds.

I do not have the details of this item; I do not know whether there are any, and the minister may be able to throw some light on that subject. In any case, this item covers chickens, young chickens and young turkeys: 7 million pounds of them. Supposing that even a third of this 7 million were comprised of young turkeys, I feel that the figure of 6½ million pounds which was given was not exaggerated.

Therefore, I ask the Minister of Agriculture why when a maximum quota is set at 4 million pounds, the importation of 4,682,777 pounds of small or large turkeys is permitted, including, I imagine, some 2 million pounds of young turkeys?

Does the department take the necessary steps to ensure that importers will not exceed the quotas permitted under their permits, which quotas are intended for the protection of our turkey and young turkey industry?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the answer to the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, is that the Department of Trade and Commerce compiles figures relating to all turkey imports, whereas our figures deal with turkeys for consumption only. In other words, the trade and commerce figure would include poults that come in for feeding purposes. They are not for consumption.

Mr. Roberge: Is the minister saying that turkeys for consumption did not exceed the 4 million quota?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have not the final figures before me. However, if my memory serves me correctly the final figure was about 4,100,000. A check is made each quarter and the imports cannot go over 2 million for any one quarter with a maximum of 4 million for the year. However, if you get within round numbers of that figure, that is as close as you can get.

Mr. Roberge: Coming back to the article I just read from the Family Herald, the concern of the turkey growers is that the quota will remain. Can the minister say firmly now that the four million quota will stay?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The answer to the hon. member's question is yes, the quota will stay at four million for this year and there will be the tariff of five cents.

Mr. Benidickson: I believe the Minister of Agriculture was one of the ministers who met with the members of the new United States administration. Was this one of the subjects discussed then?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There were a number of subjects discussed between the six United States ministers and the four Canadian ministers, on which there have been discussions over the past years. I do not know whether or not this one was actually discussed by itself, but the whole general problem was discussed.

Mr. Milligan: Does the board of grain commissioners come under this particular vote?

The Chairman: No, it is under vote 29.

Item agreed to.

Board of grain commissioners (Canada Grain Act)—
29. Administration, $166,215.

Mr. Milligan: I should like to say a word in connection with this vote. I certainly agree that the board of grain commissioners is doing a very good job in the marketing of grain. I feel this is an example of orderly marketing that has proven itself. I only wish we could adopt this system of marketing for a lot of other products, and then agriculture would not be in the awkward position in which it is at the present time. I certainly believe we should be doing everything possible to protect the operations of the wheat board.

I am concerned about the restrictions that were lifted from feed mills in western Canada in relation to the buying of grain from the wheat board. I feel I should mention this item in particular because I was one of the people who took part in the negotiations which led to oats and barley being placed under the wheat board. The farmers of western Canada, through their farm organization representatives, came down to a meeting of the federation of agriculture and asked support from eastern Canada to have oats and barley placed under the wheat board. We thought this was good business. We thought it was a step in the right direction toward orderly marketing. At the same time, we realized the result would be an increase in the cost of feed in eastern Canada. However, we were prepared to meet our obligations.

There was no opportunity last fall during the meetings of the agriculture committee for the eastern organizations to present briefs on this subject. These organizations did not know anything about the hearings that were being held. Since that time I have received communications from the co-operative federee" in Quebec, the maritime feed services in the maritimes, from the united co-operative in Ontario and the Ontario federation concerning this move to allow feed mills to buy grain directly from the farmers. I am concerned about this procedure because I think it represents the thin edge of the wedge which may be driven in to weaken the operations of the wheat board. I hope the minister will take a new look at this situation when the authorization expires in July. I think there is discrimination against our eastern feeders.

In addition, there is a principle involved. Oats and barley were put under the wheat board about 1949, and after 12 years the western boys are the ones who come down here and ask to be released from the wheat board restrictions. We in the east are still obligated to pay wheat board prices.

Mr. Argue: They were not speaking for the farmers.

Mr. Milligan: I am buying western oats and I am paying $1 a bushel.

Mr. Argue: That is a crime.

Mr. Milligan: I was looking at the wheat board quotations and they are paying 78½ cents for oats. The minister was kind enough to give us the figures to show what the feed mills were paying the farmers for western grain. In going over this list I find that none of the mills was paying over 55 cents for oats, 65 cents for barley and 95 cents for wheat. Certainly, if I could buy grain at those prices I would feel I could very easily beat the market. After going over these prices, I find they are the initial prices the wheat board is paying the farmer for grain. As I understand it, there is always a payment made to the farmers after the crop has been sold. I do not want to see the western farmer faced with any more problems or expense, but it does seem too bad that he cannot buy his grain as he would like.

I feel we should tie down the feed mills so that they would at least pay the initial price paid by the wheat board. I understand there are freight charges, elevator storage and all the rest of it placed against this grain when it is bought by the feed mills in western Canada. There could be regulations imposed upon the feed mills so that when they buy directly from the farmers they must pay the initial price paid by the wheat board plus whatever return there is from the grain after the crop is sold, on the same basis as we pay in the east.

This is not something new. I have discussed this grain question for the last 15 years in farm organizations. I have been told we need not pay these exorbitant prices for grain. We can buy it directly from the wheat board and store it, and that is exactly what the western farmer can do. Instead of buying from the feed mills, he can buy from the wheat board, store it and then take it over to the feed mill for processing. We have been told for five years that we are being exploited because, as I understand it, there are no storage facilities down here for the grain.

I have been told that the elevator storage at Prescott and Kingston at the present time is filled with export wheat No. 3 which has been there for some three or four years, with the result that there is no room for any more grain to be placed in those elevators. As a consequence we are left to be exploited by the grain trade. I think that is one of the reasons why we pay such enormous prices for grain today as compared with what the western farmer gets. I would not mind paying $1 a bushel for oats if the western farmer were getting that price on the farm, but I know he is not getting it.

For three years many of us have asked for the closing of the grain exchange because of the speculative market. We are leaving it wide open for the speculators to take advantage of the western producer and also of the feeder in the east. That is exactly what is taking place at the present time. We are left in short supply, with the result that we are obliged to depend on rail shipment. We are obliged to depend on the trade. They know we are in short supply and they exploit us and take advantage of the situation. I hope these conditions can be changed. I felt I should mention these things because I was one of the people who sat in at these negotiations. I think a principle is involved, namely the protection of the feeder in the east as well as the producer in the west. It seems to me that we must have one policy for agriculture right across Canada. Unless we have that kind of policy I do not think justice can be done to the feeders in eastern Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: I rise on a point of order for purposes of clarification owing to the fact that this year we have, I think for the first time, the transfer of responsibility for the Canadian wheat board to the Minister of Agriculture, the Canadian wheat board having previously been under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and having been in his estimates. I have no quarrel with that transfer. However, I have spoken to the Minister of Agriculture and have pointed out to him that unless a member of the committee of supply speaks on item No. 1, he might have some difficulty in speaking on problems tremendous in their scope which involve the Canadian wheat board.

I do not think the Canada Grain Act or the jurisdiction of the board of grain commissioners perhaps permitted the discussion we had from my hon. friend from Prince Edward-Lennox. However, I certainly did not want to interrupt him because he is a very conscientious member of the House of Commons and a good friend of mine. Nevertheless with the transfer of responsibility from the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Department of Agriculture I think we should have, as members of parliament, some clarification from the minister as to what debate he would expect in the future.

In my conversation with him, I think he asked me to look up the former practice when the wheat board was under the Department of Trade and Commerce. I attempted to do so during the dinner hour but I could not find that the situation was any different. I could not find under the Department of Trade and Commerce an item, shall I say, that would be equivalent to the absence of an item here in agriculture. It is a very big area of the minister's responsibility, whether he be the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have no particular suggestion to make if this has been traditional. We always have room for change and improvement.

I have already spoken this session making some complaint with regard to dollar items which offer opportunity for debate but which may, in so far as the estimates are concerned, have no real meaning. In this case I think perhaps I should be consistent. Unknown as it sometimes is to some of those interested in agriculture in eastern Canada, the Canadian wheat board operation is an operation of western farmers; and from what we are doing tonight it is obvious that the Canadian wheat board and its western farmer members absorb the cost of operation. We as parliamentarians are therefore not called upon to vote money for the operation of the Canadian wheat board. However, I thought perhaps the new Minister of Agriculture might give this matter some thought because it is extremely important.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has raised, if I may,—

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, we cannot have two points of order at the same time. I spoke to a point of order.

Mr. Argue: I asked the hon. member to excuse me.

Mr. Benidickson: I will defer to the hon. member.

Mr. Argue: I thought the hon. member had concluded that part of his statement having to do with the point of order. As the hon. member has pointed out, it is perfectly true that there is not in the estimates an item covering the Canadian wheat board. However, under the general grain items, the board of grain commissioners and so on, it has been the practice in years gone by to discuss the Canadian wheat board and its operations. The Minister of Agriculture has the Canadian wheat board under his jurisdiction.

I was not able to be here yesterday. The government found it necessary to change the order of business, something about which I make no complaint. However, I feel that it would be in order for the committee to agree that the Canadian wheat board and the items surrounding it—and I am thinking particularly of the existing quotas on the prairies—might either be discussed under this item—and the discussion has already been broadened by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox—or that, after the conclusion of the detailed items, we might revert to the administration item so that I might be able to make some comments on the wheat board quotas and one or two other matters that I should like to mention.

Mr. Benidickson: In response to the hon. member for Assiniboia may I say that I checked some debates in past years during the dinner recess and I find that, under the item respecting the Canadian board of grain commissioners, it has been traditional to have some reference to the wheat board. This practice has gone on for years. I am simply raising the point that I do not think it is perhaps desirable because when I look for the jurisdiction of the board of grain commissioners which is contained in the Canada Grain Act, I cannot find that it is too appropriate for the wheat board discussions.

Mr. Argue: Do you want to discuss that point?

An hon. Member: Wait your turn.

Mr. Benidickson: I join with the hon. member for Assiniboia in simply pointing this out and asking for the usual traditional discussion on this item. It has gone on for a long time. However, I had a previous discussion with the Minister of Agriculture to whom I think only this year has the wheat board been referred for ministerial responsibility. I suggested to him that perhaps in another year a dollar item would be appropriate, which item would provide us surely with the opportunity of discussing the wheat board. I know that the formers minister of trade and commerce who is the leader of the house, knowing the tradition, would not for a moment object to the committee discussing wheat board matters tonight on this item. I was simply saying that for future guidance and clarification we could perhaps have a better arrangement for the estimates of the government.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I should say that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River raised this matter with me before the recess. I said there should certainly be discussion on the Canadian wheat board and its operations on my estimates. I was not too sure about just what the experience and background had been and I asked the hon. member to look it up. In the meanwhile I have also checked. The hon. member is quite right when he says that traditionally the Canadian wheat board has always been discussed under item 1 of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Under item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture this year the wheat board was discussed by the leader of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Assiniboia. Apparently the question now is whether the wheat board can again be discussed under the vote concerning the board of grain commissioners, which is the vote now under consideration.

All the remarks made by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox were, of course, out of order; they had nothing whatsoever to do with the board of grain commissioners.

It is for you, Mr. Chairman, to decide whether at this time we should change our custom in midstream or follow the traditional custom that the house has followed for many years. As far as I am concerned, in answer to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, I think there should be a clear understanding about where this item is to be discussed. I had not actually faced up to it until before the recess, when it was raised by the hon. member.

I should like to suggest that the debate on this matter of where the wheat board should be discussed should be dealt with at this time. My colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, has dealt with this matter on previous occasions and I would ask him to take up the point of order where I have left off.

Mr. Churchill: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, my recollection is that in the session of 1957-58, the summer session of 1958 and the sessions of 1959 and 1960, when I was in charge of the wheat board, it was discussed under the first item of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I think that is where it should be discussed.

I think it would be quite wrong to bring under this vote concerning the board of grain commissioners a general discussion of the wheat board, because the two boards operate in separate fields.

That is my recollection of what has been done in the past. I have a good recollection of the debate last year on this matter. At that time quite considerable attention was paid to the Canadian wheat board, and that was done under the first item.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed to say another word, under the former administration there was no hesitation in allowing discussion of the general grain situation when we came to a grain item. Right Hon. C. D. Howe did not hesitate to allow discussion in detail of the operations of the Canadian wheat board under this particular item which has a specific relationship to the board of grain commissioners. I suggest that the government should be lenient with the committee in allowing us to carry on this particular tradition.

Mr. Churchill: Have you the page references of Hansard to substantiate those statements?

Mr. Argue: No, I have not; but I have been here a long time and I make that statement knowing it to be correct.

I would make a further statement. I plead with the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who is the house leader, to look at this question rather leniently because the progress in this house for the session must depend upon the co-operation of all parties.

It was announced before the Easter recess that the first order of business for last Monday would be a supply motion. For reasons of the convenience of the government it was felt necessary to change the order of business. It is quite correct that the Minister of Veterans Affairs tried repeatedly to reach me in Saskatchewan and was unable to do so through no fault of his own. I was not near a telephone and he was unable to reach me.

However, I think that since the hon. members of this house, including the members of this group, were prepared to give unanimous consent to the government to change the order of business and to take estimates on a day when hon. members had the right to move a supply motion, no matter what the agreement, it is only a fair request to ask that the very important item of Canadian wheat board policy should be open for discussion by hon. members under this item, or, as I suggested earlier, at the end of the detailed items, to allow us to revert to item 1 for a discussion on this particular matter.

There are one or two other specific matters which I should like to discuss, but I do not want to get into them at this time. However, surely the question of the Canadian wheat board policy is of sufficient importance that the government should accede to a request that an appropriate place be allocated, either at this moment or at some later stage by agreement, for discussing this policy.

Because of the visit of Prime Minister Macmillan and certain arrangements which the government had to make, those in the official opposition and in this group were co-operative and I suggest the government should also be co-operative with us on occasion.

Mr. Churchill: Why did you say "on occasion"? We are frequently co-operative.

Mr. Argue: We try to be as co-operative as we can, and so does the minister. If the minister does not like the words "on occasion", I will say "on many occasions", or "on frequent occasions", or "on most occasions".

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, may I reply to the hon. member who was unavailable by telephone on Friday and who was expected to return, according to his office, on Sunday night—and had he returned then I would have been in touch with him in regard to the changes in the program for Monday—that we are quite agreeable to making some reasonable arrangement with the hon. member for Assiniboia.

If we could complete the remaining few items under the Department of Agriculture I would suggest, in deference to the wish of the hon. member for Assiniboia who was unavoidably absent yesterday, that he be permitted to speak on this general subject if he wishes, leaving sufficient time for the Minister of Agriculture to reply.

If that is agreeable to other hon. members of the committee, I presume it will be agreeable to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, having raised this problem because it arises from a transfer of jurisdiction of the Canadian wheat board, may I say that I had a short time for research during the dinner recess. I am informed very authoritatively that affairs relating to the Canadian wheat board have for many years been discussed under the item concerning the board of grain commissioners.

I would agree immediately with the suggestion of the leader of the house that we might postpone this item at the moment, if this is agreeable to the hon. member for Assiniboia, for an opportunity for us all to look at the traditional pattern and keep up the tradition.

I really raised the point because I thought we should have something more reliable to follow next year in our procedure. I thought that the Canadian wheat board was of sufficient importance that no hon. member of the committee should be under any misconception that he must speak with respect to the salary of the Minister of Agriculture or otherwise have no chance to speak at all. It was on that basis that I thought perhaps we could raise this problem.

I do not for a moment suggest that we should depart from our traditional practice, and I hope that is not the intention of the leader of the house. However, if it is acceptable to most hon. members of the committee I would suggest that we continue with other items and in the meantime we will have an opportunity to look at the pattern of debates in the past with respect to the Canadian wheat board to establish the precedents.

Mr. McIntosh: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I trust that the leader of the house did not mean that the debate will be entirely between the leader of the C.C.F. group and the Minister of Agriculture. I hope the house leader meant that the opportunity would be open to all of us to take part in this debate.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, quite.

Mr. McIntosh: I did not take that from what the minister said.

The Chairman: I am, of course, in the hands of the committee but I may point out that the advice I have been able to secure would indicate that this question of the wheat board should be discussed under item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, now that responsibility has been transferred to that department, in the same way as it was discussed in the past under item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. However, I realize I do not have to rule definitely on that tonight if the suggestion of the leader of the house is accepted, because hon. members may have been taken by surprise because of the change.

I would point out, however, that item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture has been discussed on six different days, February 24, March 16, 17, 23 and 24, and April 1. Of course, if I understand the idea behind the suggestion made by the leader of the house, it is based on the fact that the hon. member for Assiniboia was not here yesterday and therefore could not take the opportunity of speaking on item 1. On the other hand it may be that other hon. members who had the opportunity of discussing the same item should not ask for the same treatment. That is how I understood the suggestion made by the leader of the house.

Mr. Argue: I am the last person in this committee to ask for special treatment and I do not ask for special treatment. If the item is to be open for me to speak and for the minister to make a reply it must be open to other hon. members to make comments if they see fit. I say that on the basis of ordinary common sense and the progress this session there must be some agreement by the government that this item can be discussed either now or on reversion to item 1.

Mr. Churchill: Will you finish the discussion tonight?

Mr. Argue: I will finish my part of the discussion tonight but I cannot be held responsible for what other hon. members may do. I will make my comments if I am given an opportunity. But I suggest to the leader of the house that if the government wants the co-operation of hon. members from all sides it should consider this question I am putting forward now because co-operation does work both ways and I think this is a reasonable request. Indeed, I am a little surprised there has been some hesitancy on the part of the government about granting it.

Mr. Benidickson: On the point of order, the leader of the house, the present Minister of Veterans Affairs, was formerly minister of trade and commerce, and responsibility for the wheat board was then his. It has been transferred to the Minister of Agriculture, I think during the present session.

Now, to judge by the remarks made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs the hon. gentleman was just about as uncertain as I was with regard to some of the history behind this. I want to assure him that we in this party are not going to abuse unduly the privilege if a discussion of this item is permitted. I cannot, of course, give a guarantee for all my colleagues but it is not our intention to delay the passage of these estimates. However, I thought it was appropriate to raise the question when I noticed that we have really nothing specific in the estimates under which the wheat board could be discussed. I mentioned to the new Minister of Agriculture tonight that I did have some responsibility, having been associated with the former minister of finance. We did not do better then to provide such an item. We discussed this in a most friendly way. I suggested that there was something wrong if we did not seek to question the vote for the minister's own salary, that somewhere else in the book of estimates members should have no opportunity to discuss the activities of such an important quasi-governmental organization as the wheat board even if the wheat board charges all its costs to the farmers and does not ask the taxpayers for anything in this book of estimates.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In view of the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Assiniboia I think I should make my personal attitude on this subject very clear. I welcome at all times a debate on the Canadian wheat board and its operations but I should like to make it very plain to the committee—and this is a matter of personal privilege which is now raised—that I have had my estimates before the committee on several days this year. On the night prior to Friday, March 24, for example, a decision or agreement was made that I would have the next day for my estimates, the whole Friday. I was asked to step aside for one speaker from the C.C.F. group, one speaker only who would take just half an hour. When the debate began on Friday morning the hon. member for Timmins spoke as was agreed and then he was followed by several C.C.F. speakers all of whom went against the agreement made with me with regard to my estimates.

Mr. Argue: I made no agreement with you.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I wish the hon. member for Assiniboia would let me finish. I understood that when the hon. member who speaks for that party comes across—and the hon. member is present now—and says we have agreed that there should be just one speaker, the word of that member covers the word of all the other members. I agreed to stand down and let the interim supply measure go ahead of me. If hon. members look at the record in Hansard of March 24 they will find that not even a full page was allowed me that day. All I had was about 15 minutes. I think this question of understandings and convenience works both ways, and if this house is to operate as it ought to operate in a democratic parliament there has to be understanding on both sides. I think there has to be some very serious consideration given, Mr. Chairman, before we revert to an earlier item and open up this debate again.

The second point I should like to make is that the hon. member for Assiniboia has spoken on item 1. He has spoken on the wheat board. Now he is again asking for the same privilege. In addition, he wants to open up the subject so that all members of the committee can join in. This was their privilege when item 1 was under discussion and a number of hon. members took advantage of it.

Ordinarily I should like to make arrangements for the convenience of all hon. members. I know the inconvenience which was caused by the change of the order of the government's business, but it should be remembered that before the house rose for the Easter recess I myself was seriously inconvenienced by the actions of the C.C.F. group.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to say just a word on this because my name has been brought into the discussion. I had no intention of speaking to this point of order but the minister has brought my name into it. He said an agreement was made on behalf of this group, that I made a speech and was followed by several other C.C.F. members. That is entirely untrue. We kept that agreement. I spoke—and spoke very briefly—and no other members of this group spoke at that time. A vote was taken immediately after I had finished speaking.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am very sorry to have to contradict the hon. member but I have Hansard here. Turn to March 24 and read the record. There was no vote at all. This was a straight fight between the C.C.F. and the Liberals over old age pensions and who did the most for pensioners 25 years ago. They spent the whole day debating that and there was no vote on it at all until we got to the end of the day on the question of supply. This was on March 24 and the understanding was reached the previous night.

Mr. McIntosh: Before you decide on this point, Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that you have already allowed one hon. member to speak with regard to the wheat board on this item. He has made certain statements to which I feel that we, as western members, should reply. It does not matter whether the hon. member who spoke is the leader of a party or not. The constituents whom we represent are as entitled to the same rights as those of anyone else in this chamber.

Mr. Argue: Before you make a ruling, Mr. Chairman, since the Minister of Agriculture has already apparently vetoed any suggestion regarding unanimous consent relating to item 1 in order to discuss the Canadian wheat board, I would ask you to rule in order what has been a long-standing custom of this house, namely, that this item of the board of grain commissioners and its administration be discussed, to allow a general discussion of the wheat situation in Canada, and a general discussion not only affecting the operation of the board of grain commissioners but also of the Canadian wheat board. The late Right Hon. C. D. Howe has been accused in this house very vehemently on previous occasions by present members of the government of being the architect of closure, but the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe never for one moment tried to thwart a discussion of the Canadian wheat board in the House of Commons, as this government is trying to do at this time. I do not know what the Minister of Agriculture is afraid of, but he—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order—

The Chairman: Order. I do not think the hon. member is correct in raising this argument because it seems to me when the application of the rules is questioned by an hon. member, which he is entitled to do, it is for the Chair to decide whether the point of order is well taken.

Mr. Argue: I am not disputing your prerogative to make a decision. I cannot understand the campaign by the cabinet ministers in an attempt to stop you from ruling that this is in order, as it has been ruled by so many chairmen over so many years. Perhaps the point was well made by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, that you cannot have two rules in this house affecting members. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox was allowed to deal with the Canadian wheat board and the Canadian wheat board only, but not in any way with the board of grain commissioners. I suggest that you cannot have one rule for a member on the government side and another rule of closure for members on the opposition side. I suggest that the wheat quotas in western Canada are a national disgrace, especially in that part of the country from which I come, and that the minister's policy with regard to equalizing wheat quotas stinks, and that we should have a chance to discuss these things.

The Chairman: Order. I have pointed out that when the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox spoke, no point of order was taken, but that the point was raised after he had resumed his seat. It seems to me, therefore, that this is not good reason for saying that an hon. member is entitled to reply. On occasion an hon. member will make a statement which is out of order, but surely that is not good reason for another hon. member to be allowed to continue out of order.

The second point I must raise is that when a point of order is raised the Chair has to decide what interpretation should be applied to the rule, and, therefore, the Chair is not at liberty to make any kind of a deal. If the committee wishes to grant an hon. member permission to speak on a certain topic that is permissible but I must point out to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek that the suggestion of the leader of the house to allow the hon. member for Assiniboia to speak about the wheat board could only have been acceptable with unanimous consent. If an hon. member objects the Chair must apply the rule and declare that such a discussion is out of order. The Chair must apply the rule this way because hon. members wishing to speak on some other subject cannot be forced, for the sake of one hon. member of the committee, to listen to a discussion which is out of order. I would say, therefore, that if the Chair is called upon to rule on this point of order it must be declared that it has been well taken.

Mr. McIntosh: Did you give the first speaker permission to speak on the wheat board when he started?

The Chairman: I did not give permission but, as I indicated, no point of order was raised and the Chair was not aware that the wheat board was not mentioned specifically in the agricultural estimates.

Mr. Benidickson: May I speak to the point of order? I would say that perhaps I was the only one who devoted some time during the dinner recess to a review of past debates in connection with this item.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not require any cheers in connection with this statement. I only wanted to say that I have discovered that invariably over a period of 15 years the discussion regarding the wheat board takes place under this item.

I should like to repeat that prior to six o'clock I indicated that this might not be strictly in order, but I spoke to the new minister in whose estimates this item appears, because this year we had a transfer of this important item to his Department of Agriculture. I want to say that I knew what the situation was when debate started on this item but remained silent largely out of deference to my colleague, a member of the government party, for the constituency of Prince Edward-Lennox, with no thought of interrupting him, when he discussed the wheat board on the board of grain commissioners item because my studies had persuaded me that this had been regular traditionally. I did not think the chairman of the committee would start to restrict us, and I am going to say, with all respect to you, Mr. Chairman, that one of these days I will make a long speech on a point of order with reference to rules that have been made in the committee of the whole and the committee of supply that differ from those made during 22 years under the previous government.

Mr. Argue: I think the ruling which has been made represents a very grave mistake. I think Your Honour by making this ruling has—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Argue: I will not withdraw.

The Chairman: Order. I indicated to hon. members that if no agreement was reached I would make a ruling. If there is no way of satisfying hon. members, such as following the suggestion of the hon. leader of the house, I will have to rule that the only point which should be under consideration is whether some accommodations should be made regarding the rules of the house. As I indicated, if the Chair is called upon to make a ruling there is no choice but to apply the rules. But if the committee agrees to some other arrangement the Chair has no choice but to accept that arrangement.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, are you ruling that a discussion in respect of the Canadian wheat board, which has been traditional since the inception of the wheat board —about 15 years ago—is not appropriate in connection with this item? If that is so, having heard the supporters of the government say that they have heard from the members of their own party, from eastern Canada, cast some aspersions with respect to policies of the Canadian wheat board and that they would like to reply, I would move, I hope with the endorsation of the hon. member for Assiniboia:

That item 29 of the estimates be discussed after item 36 respecting the Department of Agriculture in this committee of supply.

Mr. Argue: I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, whether such a motion is in order in the light of the ruling you have made but I would point out to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that he set a trap for himself by raising a point of order. I thought he had enough experience in the committee to know that the opposition should be careful about raising points of order that may bring about a ruling by the Chair having the effect of preventing the speeches they claim they want to make.

Mr. Benidickson: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Argue: I am speaking to a point of order. When we get around to it we are going to appeal your ruling.

The Chairman: Order. I think the only point of order the hon. member can raise now is whether or not the motion is in order and I thought that was the point with which he was going to deal. If that is the case I will hear him.

Mr. Argue: I thought you had made a ruling. Perhaps you have not. If you are going to accept the motion we will be prepared to support it in the hope that when we get to the item you may make a more lenient ruling and reverse a decision which I suggest is repugnant to parliament and repugnant to the conduct of business in the house.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, on that point I rise to read from citation 72 on page 62 of Beauchesne, fourth edition.

The Speaker's actions cannot be criticized incidentally in debate or upon any form of proceeding except a substantive motion.

I read further from page 63 where Beauchesne quotes Redlich whose work was published some time ago.

"To an Englishman—"

We can substitute "Canadian" there.

"—it would appear seriously to undermine the exalted position and dignity of the Speaker—"

In this instance the chairman of committee of supply.

"—if, in addition to his application of the rules being open to challenge upon special and important occasions, it was competent for every member to call in question the Speaker's authority whenever he chose, and if he was liable at all times to be called upon to defend the correctness of his decisions."

My point is that the hon. member for Assiniboia has risen in his place to criticize the decision of the Chair and he should withdraw his remarks.

Mr. Argue: I have no remarks to withdraw. I say that closure by this means today is just as repugnant to parliament as closure was in the pipe-line debate and I am surprised at the statement made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I am highly surprised.

The Chairman: Order. I trust the hon. member did not mean that in making a ruling the Chair was applying closure because if that is what the hon. member said I will have to ask him to withdraw his words without any qualification.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, you said you had not made your ruling. I said that when you got around to it, having in mind the lack of response on the part of the government, if you were going to rule that we could not discuss under the item for the board of grain commissioners the policies of the Canadian wheat board which over the years we have traditionally discussed on this item—

Mr. Churchill: Give me the page reference.

Mr. Argue: —that that was a type of closure. I do not intend to sit silent while closure by the front door or by the back door is being applied.

Mr. Churchill: Produce the evidence.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Chairman, when did it come about in this house that a member of the C.C.F. party was more important than any other member in the house?

The Chairman: Order. As far as the motion of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is concerned, it appears to me to be out of order because the only motions allowed in committee of supply are motions to reduce the amount of the item or that the chairman leave the chair. I refer to Beauchesne, fourth edition, citation 242, paragraph 2.

I will have to make a ruling on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I have indicated that whatever the feeling of any hon. member may be the Chair has no choice but to apply the rules and the rules are very clear and definite that speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. That applies especially to every item except item No. 1 of a department. On item No. 1 it is the practice, of course, to allow a discussion of all problems concerning a department. In my view a discussion of the wheat board is not relevant under the item we are now discussing. It could have been discussed under item No. 1. It has been discussed generally in the past under item No. 1 of the Department of Trade and Commerce and therefore the proper time to discuss it was when item No. 1 of the Department of Agriculture was before the committee. Therefore I rule that any discussion of the wheat board under this item is out of order.

Mr. Argue: With great respect, Mr. Chairman, I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Benidickson: Have you ruled my motion out of order?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Argue: With great respect, Mr. Chairman, I appeal your ruling that we cannot discuss the Canadian wheat board under this item.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

In committee of supply when the vote concerning the board of grain commissioners was being considered I ruled that debate on the operations of the wheat board was not relevant to the item before the committee, and that as the Chair was bound by section 2 of standing order 59, he must insist on relevancy of debate, whereupon Mr. Argue appealed to the house from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question is an appeal to the house from the ruling of the chairman of committee of supply as follows:

In committee of supply when the vote concerning the board of grain commissioners was being considered the chairman ruled that debate on the operations of the wheat board was not relevant to the item before the committee, and that as the Chair was bound by section 2 of standing order 59, he must insist on relevancy of debate, whereupon Mr. Argue appealed to the house from the decision of the Chair.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the ruling confirmed.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. A short time ago, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton)—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am advised that my duties at this time are limited to the disposal of the appeal.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Board of grain commissioners—
(Canada Grain Act)

29. Administration, $166,215.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, on vote 29—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order. A question of privilege has been raised.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, a short time ago the Minister of Agriculture raised the matter of a broken agreement in which I was supposed to have participated. Since then I have had an opportunity to check Hansard. I believe the minister referred to March 24. I find that the minister is mixing up two different debates.

On March 24 I raised the matter of old age pensions under interim supply. There was no agreement, nor could there have been any agreement because neither the government nor the official opposition could have known the matter I would raise at that time.

I think the minister has mixed this up with the debate on NATO under the supplementary estimates, at which time there was an agreement entered into by myself and the rest of this party.

I know the minister would not like to be unfair. Possibly in the heat of debate he made this error and I would ask the minister to withdraw the implications contained in his remarks at that time.

The Chairman: Shall vote 29 carry?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on vote 29, the administration of the board of grain commissioners. I have some statistics here that I think are rather amazing in light of all the wild and optimistic statements which have been made by the Minister of Agriculture.

Our overseas clearances of barley to date have been only 13.2 million bushels, while a year ago they were 25.9 million bushels. This is a drop of 12.7 million bushels. The amount exported, the overseas clearances of barley this year to date, are just about 50 per cent of the amount last year.

One can only ask why we have such gloomy figures, in light of the minister's boast that everything is well, everything is improving and conditions are getting better. The grain situation in Canada today is probably tighter than it has ever been. There is probably more congestion than there has ever been. The farmers are having great difficulty in marketing grain because of the congestion. I do not see from the figures in my hand that there is any real hope that this congestion is going to be alleviated, because month after month the congestion seems to get worse.

The visible supplies of all grains in various positions to date amount to 413.2 million bushels, whereas a year ago they amounted to 364.7 million bushels. I ask the minister whether this is a deliberate policy on the part of the government to take in every possible bushel of grain to bring about a further congestion, a further filling of available storage space, or whether these visible supplies of grain in all positions—

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Argue: —has been increased because—

Mr. Brunsden: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. This item has to do with the administration of the board of grain commissioners. Our hon. friend from Assiniboia has been away for a few days and since he returned he has been trying very hard to crowd Hansard. I suggest that the hon. member is entirely out of order when he discusses visible supplies and export shipments of grain.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman may be an authority on the rules but he is scarcely an authority on the board of grain commissioners. The statistics that I have quoted have a very great deal to do with the administration of the board of grain commissioners. This is what the board of grain commissioners is all about.

My hon. friend may not know it, but the board of grain commissioners has to do with the assembling, the grading and storage of grain all across this country. The wheat board has to do with issuing tickets and it has to do with carrying out some of the government's policies like this dollar an acre payment, which is still treaty money. The Canadian wheat board has to do with the markets, or the lack of markets.

When it comes to the amount of congestion in the country and the kind of statistics to which I have referred, these matters certainly have to do with the board of grain commisioners. My honourable and learned friend, who is usually very much on the ball and very accurate in his frequent and consistent interruptions, is away off base tonight. The statistics to which I have referred have to do with the administration of the board of grain commissioners.

I want to ask the minister some more questions. Why should the visible supplies of grain be going up by such an amount and so fast? Has it to do with more storage facilities available in the country, or has it to do with the greater congestion that has been brought about by the policies of the government?

I want to know why, after all this tremendous fanfare about new markets, the market for overseas clearance of Canadian oats, should have just about disappeared? It was .8 million bushels of wheat this year, as compared with 3.8 million bushels of wheat to the same date a year ago. I think the minister owes it to the committee to tell us why these statistics are so gloomy, in light of his very optimistic statements to the House of Commons.

I want to know the reason for the figures concerning farmer's marketings to date, 199 million bushels of wheat as compared with 180.8 million bushels a year ago. I want to know why the situation as far as quotas in the minister's province and my own are concerned should be so bleak and so gloomy. I ask the Minister of Agriculture why he does not do something about the quotas.

I do not know why many of the farmers he and I represent should, after eight months of the crop year, be told to market only a one bushel quota, and some of them hoping to have a two bushel quota—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: I hear "Order" from my hon. friends opposite. They are good at interrupting from their seats but they are not very good at explaining why these statistics should be so gloomy and why the minister should make these fantastic statements.

An hon. Member: They have nothing to do with this vote.

Mr. Argue: They have a lot to do with overseas clearances. They have a lot to do with congestion. The hon. member who is no longer parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture knows you cannot market your grain unless you have—

An hon. Member: Out of order again.

Mr. Argue: Oh no, I am right on the subject of the board of grain commissioners. I know hon. members opposite are impatient—

Mr. Brunsden: Speaking to this point of order, Mr. Chairman, I have before me the Canada Grain Act and I quote for the record and for the benefit of the hon. member for Assiniboia, the responsibilities of the board. They include the grading of grain, the weighing of grain, the making of deductions for dockage or shrinkage, elevator shortages, the unfair or discriminatory operation of any elevator—

Mr. Argue: Elevator storage.

Mr. Brunsden: The deterioration of any grain during storage or treatment—

Mr. Argue: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brunsden: —the refusal or neglect of any person to comply with any provision of the act, or any other matter arising out of the performance of the duties of the board.

I respectfully submit that once again the hon. member for Assiniboia is taking liberties with you and the committee in attempting to inject into this discussion the matter of wheat quotas in western Canada and the export trade.

Mr. Argue: I do not think the hon. gentleman can be serious about that point of order, because obviously everything I have referred to is covered by this tremendously wide catch-all definition which he has very accurately read to the committee. There are many items which he has read of which I was not aware a moment ago. That gives me a great deal more latitude than I had anticipated would be mine at this time. The hon. member talks about storage facilities. That raises the whole question of the policy in relation to storage facilities. It raises the whole question of whether this minister is going to allow the grain trade to keep on making tens of millions of dollars at the expense of the producers and the treasury.

The Chairman: Order. I have myself been reading section 9 of the Canada Grain Act and I must say there are many subjects mentioned there, but the export of grain is not one of them. These subjects referred to are all of a somewhat technical nature. If the hon. member would indicate how he relates his remarks to the objects of the board as indicated in section 9 I should be obliged.

Mr. Argue: This section which has already been referred to reads as follows—

An hon. Member: Not again.

Mr. Argue: I know you would not like to hear it again, but after hearing it twice perhaps you would have a greater understanding.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Perhaps after reading it once you will have some understanding.

Mr. Argue: It reads:

> The board and the chief commissioner shall have jurisdiction, upon or without complaint made, to inquire into any matter relating to
> (a) the grading of any grain;
> (b) the weighing of any grain;
> (c) the deductions made from any grain for storage or shrinkage;

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has substituted the word "storage" for "dockage".

Mr. Argue: The hon. member obviously cannot read or he would not be making foolish interruptions.

Mr. Brunsden: Read clause (c) again.

Mr. Argue: It continues:

> (f) the deterioration of any grain during storage or treatment;
> (g) the refusal or neglect of any person to comply with any provision of the act;
> (h) any other matter arising out of the performance of the duties of the board.

An hon. Member: Where are the quotas?

Mr. Argue: The quotas are here. The quotas have a definite and close relationship to the storage facilities because you cannot have storage facilities that are full or over congested, as these obviously are, without having had some quotas. It is like the chicken and the egg; they usually go together.

The Chairman: I must point out to the hon. member that the act does not refer to storage facilities in the sense he has indicated.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a publication put out by the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada, statistics branch, showing the Canadian grain position at close of business on Wednesday, March 29, 1961. The code number of the bulletin is 420.3. I remember Mr. C. D. Howe sat on this for years. I was here about ten years or more before I was able to ferret out this particular publication, but I have it in my hand now and it is put out by the board of grain commissioners. We used to ask the minister of trade commerce what the exports had been, and he would say, "Oh, I cannot disclose the exports of grain because that would put the wheat board in a difficult competitive position". Yet we found that the board was issuing these figures publicly to the trade. Then, when I asked the present Minister of Agriculture about certain items which have to do with the marketing of grain he said, "Do not bother me in the House of Commons; I will send you a weekly letter." Well, the weekly letter comes but the figures get worse. The situation gets worse and I think I am very much in order in quoting from reports put out by the board of grain commissioners though, of course, honourable and sensitive members opposite may say, "Oh, this has to do with the wheat board." It does. It is a publication issued by the board of grain commissioners having to do with the grain situation in this country and it shows what a mess the government has been making of many phases of the situation today. I do not wonder that the minister does not want to try to justify that mess. I do not wonder why he cannot answer and tell us the reason for this tremendous congestion.

Mr. Grafftey: You have missed your calling.

Mr. Argue: Brome-Missisquoi is barking again.

Mr. Grafftey: You have missed your calling.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member has obviously missed his, but that will be taken care of soon. He is on temporary leave.

An hon. Member: You hope.

Mr. Argue: That is all right, Mr. Chairman. He has come here as a young man. He is a personable fellow and he has learned a little here.

An hon. Member: Is this part of the leadership race?

Mr. Argue: These are all interesting comments, Mr. Chairman, and they are undoubtedly in order or you would have ruled otherwise. They are very helpful, but I do not think they explain the mess which has been made of the grain situation. The elevator situation on the prairies, which is within the control of the board of grain commissioners, makes it obvious that there is room for a change in policy and I wish the Minister of Agriculture would do something about it. My hon. friend from Burnaby-Coquitlam has been waiting patiently all evening to say something on this item.

An hon. Member: Well, why don't you sit down?

Mr. Argue: He waits patiently while 200 Tories—or rather, not 200 but about 50—who have wandered in impatiently not wishing to listen to the discussion but only to use their overwhelming majority to control procedures in this committee—

The Chairman: Order. May I indicate to the hon. member that he is far from the subject of the board of grain commissioners and I would say again that he has not succeeded in convincing me that we can discuss export policy under the Canada Grain Act. These are matters, as I indicated before, which really concern only the handling of grain. There is no question of policy being involved in section 9 and I have also gone over the other sections of the act. Unless the hon. member can point to another section which would be appropriate to his argument I shall have to say he is out of order in discussing the export of grain.

Mr. Argue: Surely one cannot be out of order when quoting from a publication.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you make a final ruling I would like to say a word on the point of order. It seems to me, sir, that it should not be forgotten that in past years, until an order was made by the governor in council, the board of grain commissioners and the wheat board were under the jurisdiction of the minister of trade and commerce. It so happens this year that they are under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture, and I think he would admit that this is one of his heaviest responsibilities. It does seem to me that all of us in this committee are taking a very dangerous position when we suggest that one of the most important of all the industries in this country should be precluded from discussion because of technicalities. I do not think that our conduct in this regard will be very well viewed in the country.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I am continuing to point out how very difficult the grain situation is, and I suggest this is very much in order, since I shall be quoting from the board of grain commissioners statistics branch, not the wheat board statistics branch.

The Canadian grain position at the close of business, Wednesday, March 29, 1961 showed that Canadian visible wheat totalled 413.2 bushels reflecting a decline of only 1.2 million bushels during the week under review. Preliminary marketings were steady at 4.4 million bushels but export shipments fell off form the relatively high level in recent weeks to only 3.5 million bushels clear.

The minister may not like to hear this, and may say that it is the wheat board's policy, but I am quoting from a publication of the board of grain commissioners. It shows 1.5 million bushels from Vancouver and 2 million bushels from the east coast ports of Saint John and Halifax. This is a dismal and black showing which the Minister of Agriculture of course cannot defend. Clearings now total 29.9 bushels of wheat, some 5.6 bushels better than export wheat loadings from these two ports during the 1959-60 season.

The minister may take some encouragement from that last sentence but I suggest that these statements are serious and we should have a reply from the minister. He should tell us why, after he goes out across this country telling farmers that everything is well and that conditions are improving—just have faith in John and we will get out of the woods somehow—these statistics keep coming in showing the serious position of the grain trade in Canada at this time. I think our producers would like to know whether there are going to be additional facilities provided for the storage of grain; whether these statistics put out by the board of grain commissioners are likely to show any improvement in the weeks ahead or whether there is going to be continued congestion and a further drop-off—I hope not—of export clearings and an almost total disappearance of the market for oats; a reduction in overseas clearances for barley of almost 50 per cent. The Minister of Agriculture apparently does not want to defend this position but I think he owes it to this committee to tell us what he intends to do about this difficult situation.

I would like to know whether the board of grain commissioners has anything to do at this time with the handling of box cars. In years gone by the allocation of box cars was done by one of the commissioners of the board, a Mr. Milner, who used his authority with railway companies—or persuasive powers, when he had any—to try to arrive at an agreement in respect of the allocation of box cars. The government has removed the transport controller, or has not brought in legislation which would again give a member of that board the all-inclusive power, which the board once held, of allocating box cars. I would like to hear from the minister, when he replies at an appropriate occasion, about the extent of jurisdiction the board of grain commissioners will have over the allocation of box cars. I would like to know the number of complaints the minister has received with regard to the grading of grain and dockage and overages. Clearly all of these questions are within the jurisdiction of the board of grain commissioners.

I would like to know why the government has delayed in bringing the board of grain commissioners under the Department of Agriculture. Did the Prime Minister forget that the board of grain commissioners was under the Department of Trade and Commerce? Was this an afterthought when the Prime Minister discovered he had moved the wheat board to the Department of Agriculture but had left the board of grain commissioners in the Department of Trade and Commerce? I wonder why there was such a long delay in transferring the board of grain commissioners to the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. Chairman, if I see the clock accurately, I would call it ten o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I believe the house leader was to indicate what further departments were contemplated for the rest of the week.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, we will continue tomorrow, Thursday and Friday, with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, the post office and public works.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

YARMOUTH, N.S.-ROCKLAND, MAINE FERRY SERVICE

Question No. 177—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has the government under consideration any subsidy or other aid to provide for a car and passenger ferry between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and Rockland, Maine?

2. If so, what are the details and consideration involved?

3. If not, has the government any views or has it made any statements regarding the proposal that a foreign ship owner operate the City of Havana on this route for a three-month period?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. No statements have been made and the government has not formulated any views on such a proposal. On March 31, a letter was received from the mayor of Yarmouth, N.S., suggesting that the City of Havana could be acquired by purchase and operated between Yarmouth, N.S., and a New England port for the summer months, to supplement the service of the M/V Bluenose. The Canadian maritime commission will examine this suggestion and report.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Livestock division—

17. Operation and maintenance including premiums on purebred sires and contributions for livestock improvement; stockyard supervision and furs, $2,861,681.

18. Supervision of race track betting, $682,786.

19. Grants to agricultural fairs, exhibitions and museums in accordance with regulations of the governor in council; payments pursuant to agreements in force on March 31, 1961, with exhibitions covering the construction of buildings and other major undertakings; and a grant of $50,000 to the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair, Toronto, and freight assistance on livestock shipments for exhibition thereat, $967,600.

20. Special grant to Royal Agricultural Winter Fair, Toronto, $450,000.

22. Grants to agricultural organizations as detailed in the estimates, $260,250.

23. To authorize, notwithstanding sections 33 and 35 of the Financial Administration Act, the issue by the Minister of Agriculture, in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council, of premium warrants for high grade hog carcasses, and to authorize the charging to this vote of the value of premium warrants at the time they are issued and the value of any unredeemed premium warrants issued in previous fiscal years, notwithstanding that the total value of all premium warrants to be charged may exceed the estimated cost of the program which is, $6,865,000.

24. Operation and maintenance including seeds, Plant products division—feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, $2,121,639.

25. Freight assistance on western feed grains, $20,000,000.

26. Agricultural lime assistance, $1,300,000.

27. Plant protection division, $1,283,468.

28. Poultry division, $1,248,856.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 12, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

ESTATE TAX

CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES FOR AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-82, to implement a convention between Canada and the United States of America for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on the estates of deceased persons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

STARRED QUESTIONS

DIRECTIVE RESPECTING RETIREMENT BEFORE 65

Question No. 234—Mr. Tardif:

1. Has any directive been issued in any government department encouraging civil servants to tender their resignations before the normal retirement age of 65 years?
2. If so, what is the purpose of this directive, and under whose authority, and in what department has it been circulated?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): The answer to part 1 of this question is no. Part 2 is answered by the answer to part 1.

R.C.A.F. AIRCRAFT PUBLICATIONS, 1958-59

Question No. 241—Mr. Hellyer:

1. Were any aircraft equipment schedules, repair manuals, parts manuals, or other documents, relating to aircraft no longer in the R.C.A.F. serviceable inventory, printed during the fiscal year 1958-59?
2. If so, what were they, and how many copies of each were printed?
3. Have any of them been burned since the time of publication?
4. If so, how many?

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): The answer to this question is as follows:

1 and 2. R.C.A.F. records reveal that no aircraft equipment schedules, repair manuals or parts manuals relating to aircraft no longer in the R.C.A.F. serviceable inventory were printed during the fiscal year 1958-59.

However, it is presumed that the hon. member is referring to the work which began in 1957-58 to organize into a permanent standardized form the originals and/or copies of R.C.A.F. aircraft engineering drawings and records accumulated over 25 or more years. This work culminated in the fiscal year 1958-59 in the printing by the Zerox process of 40 different sets of books containing the drawings and descriptive material of 70 aircraft which had been in service with the R.C.A.F.

3 and 4. The original estimated need called for 40 sets of this work, but it was later decided that six sets would meet the requirement, including one for the R.C.A.F. air historian and one for the national air museum. The remaining 34 sets were subsequently shredded and disposed of as paper scrap.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, supplementary to my starred question No. 241. Will the minister explain to the house the necessity for the R.C.A.F. to prepare, at a cost of tens of thousands of dollars, standard engineering orders for aircraft no longer in service?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made a misstatement in purporting to ask a question. The cost of this operation was not tens of thousands of dollars—

Mr. Hellyer: Was it hundreds of thousands?

Mr. Harkness:—nor hundreds of thousands, nor anything else along that line. I think the actual cost was $11,004.43. The purpose of preparing those books was to have in one place for historical and checking purposes the specifications, and so on, of the various types of airplanes which have been in use by the R.C.A.F., and thus relieve the files of a voluminous amount of material which is occupying space which could be put to much better use.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister say it was a sort of bureaucratic make-work project?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think purported questions of this kind, which are not questions but interjections which have no real relevance to the matter on which the first question was based, should be ruled out of order.

Starred Questions

Mr. Speaker: I agree with the point of order; the second question was not supplementary, but rather a comment and not in order.

C.N.R. PROPERTY, LUSTER LAKE, QUE.

Question No. 244—Mr. Fisher:

1. Does the C.N.R. own any land or buildings adjacent to Luster lake, P.Q.?
2. If so, was any work done on this property in 1960 requiring the use of a bulldozer or employees of the bridge and building department of the C.N.R.?
3. To what purposes was such work put?
4. If the C.N.R. does not own any property or buildings on Luster lake, were any C.N.R. workers used on private property at that lake in 1960 for any purposes whatsoever?
5. If so, on whose property was it?

Hon. George H. Hees (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answers to this question are as follows:

1. No.

2 and 3. Not applicable.

4. Yes. The owner was charged in accordance with standard practice where work is performed for other companies, municipalities or individuals.

5. Donald Gordon.

C.N.R. MOVEMENT OF BOX CAR STATIONS

Question No. 245—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did the C.N.R. move boxcar stations from Hawthorne, Nepean, and Pontiac to Odinback in 1960?
2. If so, for what purposes were the moves made?

Hon. George H. Hees (Acting Minister of Transport):

1 and 2. Three portable shelters were moved to Odinback in 1960 for use as station facilities and equipment storage.

STUDY GROUP, MONTREAL HARBOUR FACILITIES

Question No. 246—Mr. Fisher:

1. At the present time, or within the past three months, is or has a committee or board or group been engaged in a study of Montreal harbour and its facilities and any extension of those facilities to include Sorel?
2. If so, who are the advisers or consultants or committee members?
3. What are their qualifications, what posts do they now hold, and what remuneration are they to receive?

Hon. George H. Hees (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the answer to this question is very long and detailed I wonder whether it could be included in the record of Hansard without being read?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this lengthy answer be incorporated in Hansard without being read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Harkness.]

[Editor's note: The answer referred to is as follows:]

The national harbours board advises as follows:

1. The Montreal harbour planning committee is at present engaged in a study of Montreal harbour and its facilities, and its terms of reference do not include Sorel.

2. The members of this committee are: Paul Kuhring, former chief engineer of the St. Lawrence ship channel branch of the Department of Transport; chairman of the committee; G. H. Kohl, alternate member, St. Lawrence river joint board of engineers, Canadian section; D. F. Purves, chief of development branch, research department, Canadian National Railways; M. Boudreau, assistant chief engineer, St. Lawrence river ship channel branch of the Department of Transport; G. S. Anderson, assistant port manager (administration), Montreal harbour.

3. Mr. Paul L. Kuhring is a graduate engineer of U. of N.B. (1913); he was employed 34 years with D.O.T. as engineer, assistant chief engineer and chief engineer of the St. Lawrence ship channel branch of D.O.T. until July 16, 1958, when he retired from the public service; now full time chairman of the committee at a salary of $10,140 per annum;

Mr. Geo. H. Kohl is a graduate engineer of McGill University (1910); he was chief engineer of the St. Lawrence river joint board of engineers; is now alternate representative for Canada on this joint board on a per diem allowance when acting as such; is a member of the committee at a per diem allowance of $100 when performing such duties;

Mr. Purves is a graduate in commerce from U.B.C. and holds a master's degree in transportation, industrial engineering and economics (Columbia University); he is chief of the development branch, research department, C.N.R., and does not receive any additional remuneration as a member of the Montreal harbour planning committee;

J. Maurice G. Boudreau is a graduate engineer, University of Montreal (1931), and has been employed with the St. Lawrence ship channel branch of D.O.T. since 1935, of which branch he was promoted as assistant chief engineer in 1958; he is still acting in this capacity and does not receive any additional remuneration as a member of the Montreal harbour planning committee;

G. S. Anderson is a graduate engineer U. of Sask. (1931), has been on the staff of the National harbours board since 1936; he was promoted to assistant port manager (admin).

Montreal harbour, in 1957, and is still employed as such; he does not receive any additional remuneration as a member of the Montreal harbour planning committee.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT DISMISSALS, N.B.

Question No. 247—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Have there been any dismissals in the personnel of the Post Office Department in New Brunswick since July 1957, in group 1 to 30, group 31 to 34, and staff offices, for political reasons?
2. If so, what are the names of the individuals, and the names of the post offices?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, this question asks whether there have been dismissals of certain personnel of the post office for political reasons.

The answer is as follows:

1. No; this government does not dismiss employees for political reasons. However, one dismissal in New Brunswick took place during the period mentioned on the grounds of political partisanship and evidence of unsatisfactory management of the office.

2. The person concerned was Mrs. Margaret Elizabeth MacFarlane, Temperance Vale, New Brunswick.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

JOE SYROTA, SAULT STE. MARIE—R.C.M.P. INVESTIGATION

Motion No. 97—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Justice or the officials of the R.C.M.P. and any other persons relating to an incident at Sault Ste. Marie on the night of February 18, 1961, which involved the entry and search of a room rented by a Mr. Joe Syrota.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my preliminary information is that there is correspondence here that can be produced. I am therefore prepared to accept the motion, subject to the understanding that if there is any correspondence of a nature which would ordinarily be regarded as privileged, it will not be produced.

I make this observation because it may be that there is something in the way of an interdepartmental report, which of course would not be produced, but there is other correspondence which can be produced.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the explanation given by the minister is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

"EMPLOYER'S HANDBOOK ON INSURING FISHERMEN"

Motion No. 98—Mr. Robichaud:

For a sample copy in English and in French of all editions of Employer's Handbook on Insuring Fishermen issued by the unemployment insurance commission from 1956 to date.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

ATLANTIC FREE TRADE AREA—REPORTED STATEMENT BY U.K. PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would care to comment on the statement made at his press conference yesterday by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom indicating strong support for an Atlantic free trade area.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the discussions that took place between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and myself, one of the most important subjects discussed was trade, and in particular the United Kingdom's relationship with Europe. Mr. Macmillan explained at length the position of the United Kingdom in regard to trade, and naturally there was an expression of the need for the widest possible expansion of trade and the strengthening of the economic relations among the countries of the Atlantic community. It was recognized that this relationship which is developing in Europe is one that will take a very considerable period of time.

In so far as the United Kingdom's attitude toward the common market is concerned Mr. Macmillan left me with the clear impression that the United Kingdom government intends to make every effort to work out a satisfactory means of participating in the economic organization of Europe without in any way detrimentally affecting Canada's trade. This he envisages as a major step forward which ultimately may lead to a wider development of trade to encompass the Atlantic community.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to ask a supplementary question. Can we take it from the Prime Minister's statement that he has received an assurance from Prime Minister Macmillan that under any new arrangement Canadian export products—and I have in mind particularly Canadian agricultural products—will enjoy the same preferences and advantages in the United Kingdom market that they enjoy at the present time?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom has discussed this matter with me on a number of occasions. It has been discussed as well by members of the cabinet with their corresponding numbers in the United Kingdom, and the desire is to assure that anything that may be done by the United Kingdom shall not detrimentally affect the exports of Canadian agricultural products and the like.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to ask a further supplementary question. Did Prime Minister Macmillan inform the right hon. gentleman that it was Britain's intention to enter the inner six?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think any announcement in that regard or any steps taken in that direction would be for the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to make in his own time.

URANIUM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONTRACT WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of a statement reported to have been made by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom at a press conference yesterday, to the effect there was a clear understanding on the issue of the commitment of the United Kingdom to purchase uranium in Canada. Would the Prime Minister tell the house what that clear understanding is?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think in view of the attitude taken by the hon. member for Assiniboia I should refrain from making a piecemeal report. When I make a complete statement I shall cover this subject.

Mr. Pearson: I ask this question because this statement was made not in the official discussions between the two governments but was made at a press conference outside of those discussions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It represented, as Mr. Macmillan was reported to have said, the purport of the discussions between us. When I make a report this will be one of those things to which I will refer.

PROPOSED U.S. RESTRICTIONS ON TOURIST IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Yesterday the hon. member for Fort William directed a question to my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the exemption of tourist purchases from tariff duties as between Canada and the United States. As this is a tariff matter it falls under the responsibility of the Minister of Finance. I may say to him that nothing further has occurred since I last answered a question on this matter in the house directed by the hon. member for Nipissing.

TRANSPORT

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—FORMATION OF JOINT U.S.-CANADA COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Transport in the absence of the minister.

(Translation):

Could the minister inform the house about a press report in this morning's paper to the effect that the Secretary of State of the United States is attempting to obtain the views of the Canadian government regarding the formation of a Canada-U.S. joint committee to consider the feasibility of deepening the Richelieu river?

Hon. George H. Hees (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice and bring it to the minister's attention with the request that he answer it tomorrow.

(Text):

[Later:]

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister been made aware of a statement by Senator Aiken of Vermont, as reported by United Press International, to the effect that if Canada has misgivings about the Champlain waterway project, which would provide a waterway from New York to the St. Lawrence river and the great lakes, the United States should proceed with the project on its own? Because of the great interest shown both in the United States and in Canada in this project, would the government reconsider the decision that it took in December last to not engage in a joint economic study with the United States in regard to this project?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the particular remarks of the United States senator. I do not think there is anything I can add to what was said in December. If there is any change in that regard the house will, of course, be made aware of it.

METROPOLITAN TORONTO—REPORTED REQUEST FOR SUBWAY LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister advise the house whether the government has yet taken a decision on granting a loan to the Toronto transit commission for the acceleration of the east-west subway in Toronto?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for always addressing this question to me. However, I am just the Minister of Public Works.

SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether the government has received Bill No. 56 of the Saskatchewan legislature, which the lieutenant governor refused to sign? Has the governor in council given consideration to this bill, and when will the government have an announcement to make?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I read in the press that the hon. gentleman has already made a lengthy statement in this connection without full regard for the constitutional procedure which must be followed.

The course taken is that which has usually been followed throughout the years since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald, with the possible exception of 1937, when the lieutenant governor of Alberta reserved assent for the consideration of the Governor General in regard to three pieces of legislation in that province. The reservations by lieutenant governors have been generally accepted as dependent upon a request from the governor in council. There was no discussion in this regard, as I have already pointed out. We had no knowledge of the action to be taken by the lieutenant governor. However, the action was taken, and as yet the reasons which the lieutenant governor is required to transmit to the Governor General for the course he followed have not come to hand. As soon as they do the governor in council will take such action as is deemed proper, with full regard to the fact that this government has consistently taken the attitude that if legislation is within the legislative competence of the provinces, except constitutionally in extraordinary circumstances there should be no interference with provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, in view of the strong statement the Prime Minister has just made do I take it that the government is considering a replacement for the present lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member I think will recognize that it is improper to ask questions that reflect upon the conduct of one of Her Majesty's representatives. I will of course permit the Prime Minister to comment but I wanted to take that preliminary objection. In this house if any reflection upon the conduct of a representative of Her Majesty is desired to be made it must be done by positive motion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I shall say no more than that even the hon. gentleman should have known that remarks such as he has made are not in keeping with his responsibilities as a member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised in regard to my responsibilities as a member of this house, I suggest that I have already fulfilled my responsibilities in making my position clear, and I suggest that the record will show that the Prime Minister by very definite inference has criticized the lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So there will be no mistake about that, Mr. Speaker, I pointed out that the lieutenant governor had certain responsibilities under the constitution. I also pointed out the manner in which they had been discharged generally since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald. The power is there, and it is not for me to say whether or not at this time the government of Canada is in full accord or in accord at all with the attitude or action taken. Suffice it to say that so long as the lieutenant governor discharges his responsibilities according to his rights, hon. gentlemen should not make statements such as those which so easily flow from the lips of the hon. member for Assiniboia.

SPORTS

OLYMPIC GAMES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister as yet been advised of the findings of the engineering engaged to study possible sites in Canada for the 1968 winter Olympic games?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the engineering consultants were hired by the Canadian Olympic Association with the assistance of a $10,000 grant from my department. I am advised that the report is expected any day by the association, which hopes before too long to come to a decision as to the site that would best support Canada's chance of being selected as the host country.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister comment on the fact that the preponderant volume of opinion is in favour of the Banff, Alberta, site?

Mr. M. L. McFarlane (Kootenay East): I would like to ask a further supplementary question. Has the government considered making a statement on the extent of the financial support it would be prepared to give toward the development of whatever site is chosen in British Columbia?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, Mr. Speaker.

THE CENSUS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the genial Minister of Trade and Commerce. It springs from my insatiable curiosity. In view of large scale unemployment, can the minister assure the house that capable unemployed persons have been appointed as census commissioners and that party affiliation was not a factor in their appointment?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Since the taking of the census is a very important and exacting operation, it must be carried out extremely carefully and well. It is of the greatest importance that only people who are capable and able to perform this task should be selected. With this in mind, the selections have been made by choosing the very best persons available to carry out that task in each area concerned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON VISIT OF U.K. PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he proposes to follow the normal constitutional custom and report to the house as soon as possible on the visit of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and on the subjects discussed between the two governments during that visit?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do so now if the house is agreeable. I did not know whether there would be any desire to have a report. If the house so wishes I shall be glad to give one.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): On that point, I think the time to do it is when motions are called so there could be comments from each of the parties. I suggest that the Prime Minister might make the statement tomorrow when motions are called.

DRUGS

BARBITURATES—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the campaign being waged by newspapers throughout Canada against the distribution of goof balls, will the minister advise the house when the report he has promised us concerning goof balls will be tabled?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I do not think I have ever at any time promised a report. I said I was having an examination made within my department; in fact it involves other departments of government as well. When that is complete I will then be in a position to announce to the house whatever action can be taken.

(Translation):

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "LE DROIT" RESPECTING LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont asked me whether I had seen a report published in Le Droit for April 10 and whether I had any comments to make on this rumour, concerning, and I quote from the newspaper:

> Considerable lay-offs of civil servants at the government's request.

—to which the news item made reference.

Mr. Speaker, I have made inquiries and I am pleased to inform the hon. member that this is merely a rumour, without any basis in fact.

(Text):

COMBINES

INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION OF ELECTRICAL COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether he is in a position to answer a question which I first asked on February 7 and repeated on March 28. In fairness to the minister I must say he was not in the house at the time I asked the question, but his colleague undertook to bring it to his attention.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I will have a look at Hansard for those two days and bring forward an answer as soon as possible.

[Later:]

Mr. Fulton: Since the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo asked me a few moments ago if I would look into the matter of bringing forward an answer to the question which he first asked on February 7 I have checked Hansard. I find his question was, in effect, whether in view of the conviction and imposition of fines as well as imprisonment on United States officials of certain electrical manufacturing companies I would bring the matter to the attention of the officials of the combines branch with instructions that an investigation along similar lines be carried out in Canada.

I apologize to the hon. member for not having answered him directly, but since he asked that question a somewhat similar question was asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West. At that time I made a reply to the effect that it is not necessary for me to bring these matters to the attention of the combines branch because they always have these possibilities before them. I am quite satisfied that it is not necessary for me to alert them to the necessity of being on the lookout for such situations in Canada.

POWER

YELLOWKNIFE—FRANCHISE TO PRIVATE COMPANY IN EDMONTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and I regret the very short notice I was able to give him. Has the minister received a communication form Mr. D. Dale, secretary of the Yellowknife miners union, protesting the granting of a 10-year power franchise by the municipal government to a private company in Edmonton? Will the minister state what steps are being taken to ensure that the citizens of Yellowknife may continue to enjoy the lower electricity rates provided by the publicly owned Snare river hydro development?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No such communication has come to my attention, Mr. Speaker, but I will make inquiries and bring in a reply at a later date.

Mr. Argue: You received it 10 days ago.

CIVIL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONSTRUCTION OF SHELTER AT CARP, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if the Prime Minister would care to comment on a front page story by Norman Campbell in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen that a war shelter is being constructed at Carp. Since this is a rather detailed report I wonder whether members of parliament might be given the same confidence of the government that Mr. Campbell received.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the institution in question has been described in the house as an experimental army signals establishment, and that is what it is. I do not believe the members of the government, including the Prime Minister, should be called upon to confirm or deny speculative stories such as the one referred to by the hon. member, of which there have been a large number concerning not only this location but a number of other locations.

Mr. Argue: Since the substitute prime minister has made this very important reply to my question, I wonder if he would give the house an idea as to the 400 persons who have been selected to occupy this shelter.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is, in effect, calling into question the accuracy of the reply which I just made. I think he is completely out of order in doing so. In addition, he has phrased his question in an offensive manner.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, may I raise a point of order. I understood the minister to say that he was neither confirming nor denying the report. Since he lent that amount of credence to the report, I thought I should ask a further question.

Mr. Harkness: I thought I made it clear, Mr. Speaker, that I was neither confirming nor denying this report, and neither have I done so in the past with regard to the various other reports, of which there have been perhaps dozens by this time, along the same lines but having to do with different locations.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

WINNIPEG—ADDITION TO WHEAT BOARD OFFICE BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the Canadian wheat board is proposing, as an urgent project, to make an addition to its office building in Winnipeg, and if so how soon the construction is expected to start.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I cannot give the exact times, but I believe some time last year a decision was made to construct a new office building for the Canadian wheat board. Last winter the old building next door to the office was torn down. I believe the timetable calls for the new building to be completed in 1961-62. I can ascertain the exact time and give the hon. member an answer later.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister could give me the exact time.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would be able to pursue his inquiry at the next stage of these proceedings.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that yesterday I waited patiently to make this inquiry when the minister's estimates were being considered, but we were denied the opportunity. It was for this reason that I asked my question today.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me the question is one which would be more appropriately asked during consideration of the estimates, but the hon. member has given it an air of urgency by asking if it is a relief project.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—INSTALMENT PAYMENT ON SALE OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): With regard to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, which appears on page 3532 of Hansard, the answer is yes; although the crown is not a party to the lawsuit, we understand that Chief Telford Adams' injunction action against Dimensional Investments Limited is still pending in the supreme court of Ontario.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): If I may, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration with respect to this very important matter. Will the minister give us an assurance that the crown will give no title to any part of this property while any litigation is proceeding?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I surely do not have to reassure the house on the matter of the protection of the rights of the Indians. As long as there is a legal position in their favour, certainly we would not act otherwise.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

"LADY CHATTERLEY'S LOVER"—INQUIRY AS TO INSTRUCTIONS TO CUSTOMS AND POLICE OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Since the appeal court in Quebec has decided that Lawrence's novel "Lady Chatterley's Lover" is obscene under the Criminal Code, have instructions gone out to customs or police officials that the book is now so classified for all of Canada?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, not from my department.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Board of grain commissioners—

29. Administration, $166,215.

The Chairman: This item will be found on page 7 of the blue book, the details on page 122.

Mr. Regier: I understand that recent negotiations with the government at Peking for the sale of Canadian grain, especially wheat, have been handicapped by the lack of adequate facilities for loading grain on the west coast. If newspaper reports can be relied upon, I believe even the minister admitted that the sales might have been larger had there been greater facilities for the loading of the ships.

For a considerable number of years now on the west coast we have been handicapped by the lack of adequate facilities for the loading of ships. I believe I am right in saying that Canadian grain producers have received less than they might have received if at all times there had been adequate loading facilities on the west coast. Many a shipment has had to go by way of the St. Lawrence route or maybe even the Hudson bay route which could have been more economically served out of west coast ports. However, because of the inadequacy of our facilities the grain had to be moved to Hudson bay or to the head of the lakes, or even indeed to Halifax or Saint John. The interest being shown in Asia in Canadian grain has aggravated the problem.

I know the minister was out in British Columbia rather recently and he realizes the conditions that have prevailed. The minister pleaded for more facilities. Like the late Will Rogers, all I know is what I read in the papers, but I understand that the minister appealed to private enterprise to build the additional facilities that are so urgently needed on the west coast. We have a wonderful harbour there on Burrard inlet, covering North Vancouver, North Burnaby and Port Moody; and there is all kinds of room there for the building of additional terminals and facilities for the loading of ships with Canadian grain. If we look ahead and begin to anticipate the movement that grain is likely to follow in years to come, I think we cannot blind our eyes—

The Chairman: Order. May I ask the hon. member whether he would not consider that his remarks would be more appropriate under items 31 and 32, which are concerned with the operation and maintenance of elevators and the construction and acquisition of lands for that purpose. To my mind the board of grain commissioners has nothing to do with the construction or the availability of storage.

Mr. Argue: They do have something to do with it.

Mr. Regier: —If you will let me have a minute or two, Mr. Chairman, I shall be finished. I intend to be only a limited number of minutes and I should like to conclude my remarks. As I understand it, the board of grain commissioners are very much involved in this matter in that they are responsible for considering the facilities that are available. I realize at once, Mr. Chairman, the correctness of your contention that I might also have raised this matter under item 32.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order that has been raised, may I say this. I think what the hon. member is saying is clearly in order under this item. It may also be in order under item 32. The board of grain commissioners has the power to license, and the power to license is closely associated with the availability of storage space. I myself am going to have some remarks to make on this item in that regard, and I think I can show clearly that the ability to license in many instances can mean the availability of space. I would think this discussion is in order.

Mr. Regier: What I was attempting to say, Mr. Chairman, is that I feel that the minister's appeal when he last was in Vancouver is rather a vain hope indeed, when he appeals to the private grain companies to build terminal facilities in the lower mainland of British Columbia. World movements of grain are very indefinite. The patterns may radically alter. I think it is too much to expect private enterprise to interest itself at this stage when we cannot clearly look into the future, and to risk tens of millions of dollars in building new and adequate terminal facilities in the lower mainland of British Columbia.

I believe this is a case in which the government itself must take whatever risk is involved in building additional facilities. I believe the minister is most unrealistic when he expresses the hope that the private grain trade is going to risk the large amount of capital that is involved in this particular matter. I believe the government ought to recognize that in the next 30, 40, 50 or even 100 years the countries of Asia are going to be the major markets for Canadian grain. Private enterprise are not likely to risk this investment because they might have to operate at a deficit for five, ten or any number of years in the future, and in the national interest the government ought to consider that it is responsible for ensuring that at all times adequate receiving and loading facilities will be available on the west coast.

I recommend to the minister that he give up his vain wish that the private grain trade might build additional terminals on Burrard inlet, and I hope the government will give very serious consideration to building these new terminals. I should especially commend Burrard inlet and the city of Port Moody to the minister, and I would ask that no time be lost in this regard, because from the time of the conception of a terminal until its completion a number of years must necessarily elapse.

I hope the government will make up its mind that Asia offers a terrific potential in the way of markets for Canadian grain and that this grain can be most economically exported from the lower mainland of British Columbia. I suggest it is a vain hope to expect the private grain industry to build the necessary facilities, and I hope the government will realize its responsibility to the economy not only of the grain producers of the prairies but also of the lower mainland of British Columbia. I hope the government will take immediate steps to ensure that additional terminals and loading facilities are built as soon as possible on Burrard inlet, and especially within the limits of the city of Port Moody.

Mr. Payne: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in connection with this matter of grain storage and the facilities for their shipment from the port of Vancouver. I was rather surprised that this discussion arose at this time rather than under the estimates of the national harbours board, but as you have allowed a discussion on this matter perhaps it would be fitting that I should say a few words at this time.

I wish to only partially endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. I say "only partially" because the hon. member has taken a situation and is trying to build it up for his own advantage and political use in the future, rather than facing the facts. The facts are that the present Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, by virtue of an aggressive, positive approach to Asian markets, have today brought into sharp focus the need for additional facilities for grain storage and shipping which would not be apparent had not the government, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce created, developed and encouraged these markets.

Having said a few words of appreciation of those who most deserve it, I do wish to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam in bringing forward the need for a general improvement and increase of grain storage facilities, not only in the port of Vancouver but in other logical situations on the lower mainland of British Columbia.

It is perhaps an odd thing for a member for Coast-Capilano to speak on the agriculture estimates. I can, I think, say that few members which have rural areas have less to do with agriculture directly than I have in my riding. However, when it comes to the question of the port of Vancouver and other outlets on the lower mainland of British Columbia, these are our affairs. I should like to urge upon the minister that consideration be given not only to the establishment of further terminal elevator facilities in the area of the port of Vancouver, but also to the establishment of such facilities in the area of Squamish at the upper end of Howe sound to serve the vast output of grain which now has to pass through the port of Vancouver via the Pacific Great Eastern railroad and on a very detrimental basis to the farmers of the Peace river bloc due to the switching and bridge charges which are incurred at the present time in the area of Burrard inlet and within the jurisdictional area of the port of Vancouver.

I should like to again thank the Minister of Agriculture for his wisdom and courage in drawing together the shipping fraternity of the west coast, representatives of agricultural groups and businessmen generally of the lower mainland of British Columbia. We who live around the port of Vancouver take great pride in that very important facility. We feel that as a national harbour it represents a national trust. We feel strongly that we have a responsibility to the farmers of the whole of western Canada to see that adequate storage and loading facilities are available at all times.

The Minister of Agriculture has certainly performed a great service not only to the port of Vancouver but to grain shippers throughout western Canada in bringing into being the committee which is now studying this matter. I think perhaps the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was a little in error in his remarks as I do not think the minister called directly on private enterprise to build terminal grain facilities. The practice in most ports of Canada for many years has been that the national harbours board constructs the facilities. These facilities are in turn leased on a long term basis to the line elevator companies and the various pool and marketing organizations which handle grain in bulk.

I hope and trust that the committee which is now studying terminal grain facility requirements on the west coast will come forward with basic, sound and positive recommendations. This would certainly marry in with the current study, which I believe has been reported to the Minister of Transport, on the development of port facilities in the general area of Burrard inlet.

In concluding my remarks I should like to again point out the great advantage which would be gained by the grain shippers in the Peace river bloc through the establishment of terminal facilities at the head of Howe sound along the Pacific Great Eastern railroad, thus relieving these grain growers of the inordinately high switching charges they now face in moving grain from Squamish to the port of Vancouver and around its complete perimeter.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the question that has been raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, which is now receiving some support from the hon. member for Coast-Capilano—

Mr. Payne: I have put forward this suggestion for three years.

Mr. Argue: It is an exceedingly important one and action should be taken immediately to deal with it. For many years we have been told by government spokesmen that the reason farm markets have been low or inadequate was because of the lack of overseas markets, that nothing could be done about this or, alternatively, that the government was doing everything possible to achieve larger sales abroad. The fact of the matter is that markets can be obtained, but shipping facilities, storage facilities and harbour facilities are inadequate. I think that in addition to the minister's trip to Vancouver and British Columbia, for which we thank him—we are pleased he made it—he should see that definite action is taken to increase storage and handling facilities.

The hon. member for Coast-Capilano says it is worth while raising the subject but that this is not the item on which to discuss it. I am not particularly concerned about the procedural wrangle. I think this is a proper place to discuss this matter because in my judgment storage facilities and terminal facilities would be forthcoming if there were a well-established policy on the part of the board of grain commissioners to license such additional storage.

I think the government of Canada has the funds necessary to provide additional terminal facilities at Vancouver and Prince Rupert as well as to improve the facilities along the St. Lawrence. The St. Lawrence seaway needs a lot of improvement; it has been a fairly drastic failure as far as the achievement of the forecasts made for it are concerned. The government surely has money for this job. But I tell the Minister of Agriculture that if the government is short of money all it needs to do is to make an announcement that additional terminal facilities are required, that the board of grain commissioners is prepared to license them, that markets are improving in respect of sales going through the Pacific ports, and then the producers themselves would put up the money. The grain producers on the prairies have already built the major facilities in the west. The Alberta wheat pool, the Saskatchewan wheat pool, the Manitoba wheat pool and the united grain growers have already done most of this job and if there is a question of a shortage of facilities, as the minister claims there is, and as other hon. members have stated to be the case, if the government does not wish to take the initiative and if the deficit is so great that no more money can be found, then give the grain producers and their organizations a chance and they will build the facilities so that these important markets for Canadian grain may be obtained.

On this item I should like to ask the minister whether there is any possibility of a change of policy on his part and on the part of the board of grain commissioners with regard to the licensing of off-site storage. Five or six years ago the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe together with the board of grain commissioners decided to license certain off-site storage which was not in the hands of the elevator companies. This storage was often owned by community organizations which had storage facilities built in the form of quonset huts, the type of building which could be converted into a skating rink, a curling rink or a community centre, if, some day, it was no longer needed for storage purposes.

Those of us in this group supported that policy. We pointed out that as long as the farmers had to pay the storage and as long as the people of Canada had to pay the storage to a substantial degree through the federal treasury it was far better to bring into being community facilities which would assist communities than to line the already gold-plated pockets of the elevator companies of this country. Nothing, to my mind, is as nauseating and repugnant as to hear private grain companies extol the private enterprise system knowing full well that under the present congested conditions there is little competition and that all they have to do is sit at ease, cash the storage cheques and make a very lucrative profit without having to show initiative in obtaining purchases of grain in a competitive situation.

Mr. Payne: Would the hon. member permit a question? I was wondering whether the hon. member for Assiniboia would like to tell the committee how many elevator installations on the west coast and elsewhere in Canada have been built by these co-operative bodies and how many have been built by the people of Canada to be handed over on lease by the national harbours board to be operated by co-operatives or grain companies.

Mr. Argue: The minister can answer that question. He has his experts in front of him.

Mr. Payne: You don't know whether your statements are correct.

Mr. Argue: I happen to be a member of a number of these organizations and I happen to know that they own facilities, and that I, along with tens of thousands of other producers, own them; and we in the Saskatchewan wheat pool, which is the largest producer owned grain marketing organization in the world, are prepared to build more facilities if the government of which the hon. member is such a proud supporter is not able to do so. But the hon. member can do no better than to interrupt from his seat. My friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam suggested that at Vancouver the Alberta wheat pool has built one terminal; there are two public terminals, and one of those is leased.

Mr. Payne: That one is the only one.

Mr. Argue: I thought the hon. member was in favour of increased facilities.

Mr. Payne: I am.

Mr. Argue: Then, when I start telling him how the increase can be brought about all he can do is to condemn the suggestions.

Mr. Payne: The co-operatives are doing a very poor job.

Mr. Argue: On the contrary the farm organizations are doing a tremendous job. They are the only people who are doing the job and they will not look very kindly on the hon. member or on any of his friends who are associated with him when he sets himself up to criticize the farm organizations after they have done such a marvellous job in this field. The complaint he has made is that the government has not done enough. Now he complains when we say that if the government wants to sit on its fanny the farmers themselves are prepared to do something if they are told it is the policy of the board of grain commissioners and the government to license these facilities and if the statement is made that those facilities are needed and will be used.

I was talking about off-site storage facilities on the prairies and I was expressing the hope that the government would revert to a policy which I think was an excellent one, worthy of being implemented again. In the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba there is a great need for storage facilities at this time and I suggest to the minister that the board of grain commissioners should license such off-site storage immediately. I think the farmers of Manitoba should make a loud protest at the great discrimination which is being shown them under the present marketing system as far as their marketings are concerned. I am wondering whether the inability or the refusal of the government to take steps to give the farmers of Manitoba anywhere near the kind of marketing shake which is being received by the farmers of Alberta is because large parts of Manitoba are a deficit grain producing area and the government wants to keep the grain producers of Manitoba in the clutches of the feed mills where they now rest. I suggest that in Manitoba there is a need for off-site storage so that farmers can get out a larger quantity of grain.

In Manitoba as of April 3, 131 marketing points were on a one-bushel quota. Manitoba's crop year is two-thirds over, and out of the prospects of marketing—I would hope at least seven bushels—they have only one bushel marketed. The minister says everything is fine and the government is taking every possible step to market the farmers' grain but the Manitoba farmers are getting a dirty deal. They have 149 marketing points with a two-bushel quota.

When considering Saskatchewan's marketing position we find that the picture is a little brighter but not much. It is still dark and gloomy. I would like to have the maps that are in the possession of the minister showing the quotas at the various marketing points. I would venture to guess that the farmers in his constituency are among the worst off in his regard. I would venture to guess that the farmers in my own riding have received the same kind of shabby treatment as those farmers in the minister's riding. Out of a total of 1,077 marketing points in Saskatchewan no less than 499, as of April 3, were on a two-bushel quota. I know from practical experience that all of the two-bushel quota has been delivered, or the points would be increased. The majority of farmers in Saskatchewan, according to the statistics, have not had the opportunity of selling to date even a full two-bushel quota. I think this is a horrible situation. I think that in this situation the board of grain commissioners and the government should consider emergency action which would allow the farmers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and wherever else discrimination may exist, as in Alberta —there the picture is much brighter—to get the same kind of treatment as the farmers receive in more favourable positions.

We heard last fall about the terrible grain handlers' strike in Vancouver. The minister's main comment in this regard was, why doesn't Hazen Argue settle it? The minister did not do much to settle it. It is a very strange thing that although this strike—it was a very serious thing which I hope will not happen again—took place at Vancouver, the Alberta farmers were far better off than Manitoba farmers where there was no interference in marketing grain to the east. I do not think there can be any co-relation between a strike and the movement of grain. I cannot see any connection at all, and this would almost prove that the Manitoba farmers should have been doing the same thing to get themselves in the horrible position of the Alberta farmers who have done so well relatively in the marketing of their grain.

I would make the suggestion that off-site storage should once again be considered and provided. I am aware of a situation existing in a little village in Saskatchewan called Drinkwater. A few years ago the residents of Drinkwater built a quonset-type hut that serves as a rink and holds about 80,000 bushels of wheat. They had it licensed by the board of grain commissioners, and that is why it is in order for me to discuss it under this item. This community association, which owns the rink, receives storage payments. They have been doing well. That little town is starting to build some community facilities. On Easter Monday night they had an opening function in the Drinkwater community hall which was built in part under the government winter works program. Let us give the government credit for that; $4,000 was provincial and federal government money representing work and wages. The rest of the cost was money derived from the late C. D. Howe's very short-lived program allowing off-site storage.

The people of Drinkwater own the quonset hut, which is full of wheat, and are receiving revenue from the storage of the wheat. The wheat remains in good condition and will not rot as a lot of wheat used to in the old annexes that the elevator companies owned. These people now have a community hall and are very proud of it. The next community facility they are going to build is a curling rink. They thought they were building a curling rink when they put up this quonset hut, of which I speak, but they promptly filled it with wheat. They are now going to build a curling rink to be paid for out of revenue from the storage of wheat in the quonset hut.

I would suggest that it is much better to give this revenue to similar community associations rather than to the famous Canadian grain company, the Patterson company. I do not think we need increase the profits to the Patterson Grain Company, the McCabe Elevator Company, the Federal Grain Company or the National Grain Company, or even to the Ogilvie Flour Mills Company, because the late C. D. Howe sold that a few years ago. I think it is far better that the profits from the storage of grain, wherever possible, should go to benefit the local community instead of going to line the pockets of the already well-heeled elevator companies in this country.

I suggest as well that this would be a very good program and is a necessary one at this time. It would be an emergency program—I would hope of a more than temporary nature—to deal with this very serious situation regarding grain delivery quotas. At the majority of points in western Canada even today the quotas are one and two bushels per acre. I suggest that the board of grain commissioners, carrying out a policy that I hope will be enunciated by the minister, will license local storage off-site in the villages and on farms. I do not see why the elevator companies should have all the storage while the farmer who has to store the grain receives nothing for doing so. I would suggest off-site storage should be allowed in villages and on farms up to a delivery quota of eight bushels per specified acre. If this were done the farmers throughout the prairie provinces would have the same opportunity of receiving revenue from grain storage and would not have to face the discrimination that flows from the geography of the prairie provinces and from the fact that some of the producers are fortunate enough to live near to Vancouver while some are unfortunate, in a marketing sense, in living closer to the great lakes' terminal facilities.

I would like to see the minister and the government take steps to increase the flow of grain not only through western ports but through eastern ports, and I suggest in all seriousness that the board of grain commissioners should consider off-site storage, to be owned by communities and by farmers, and that this off-site storage should be allowed up to a quota of eight bushels per acre.

Some years ago we had a very long and bitter debate in this house on the question of cash advances for farm stored grain. As I remember we were debating bank loans at the time, and the attitude of the C.C.F. group at that time was that the bank loan legislation was inadequate and should therefore be opposed. This was debated day after day for a week. We continued to oppose the bank loan legislation even though the then leader of the opposition, the Hon. George Drew, had said that it was better than nothing and that his party would vote for it. After the week of debate the official opposition of that day, the Progressive Conservative party, changed its position and joined us in opposing, condemning and voting against—you might even say filibustering, although that is a bad word—the bank loan legislation. We made the bank loan legislation so repugnant to Canadian farmers and generated such a demand for cash advances, interest-free, that this government, when it achieved office, had no alternative but to bring in that kind of legislation, for which we give it credit. I am suggesting that we must have a campaign for off-site storage providing a guaranteed delivery or sale, I suggest up to eight bushels per specified acre. The minister may say that this is too high, but the principle should be established that where marketing facilities have not been available for a standard quota agreed to and announced in advance, that facilities will be provided and licensed by the board of grain commissioners to provide for the sale of grain on this basis. The grain can be purchased in the farmer's bin. The grain elevator agent can go out and look at the bin, measure it, test the grain, dock it and estimate the number of bushels. He will be exceedingly accurate because the agents are used to this and they are able to do that kind of thing.

I suggest that, having licensed the facilities, the Canadian wheat board could issue a cash ticket to the farmer for his grain up to the eight-bushel quota. This kind of legislation is necessary if the western grain producer is to get a fair deal. This must be part of the Magna Carta of the grain producers. I am suggesting that, under this item, the minister should tell us that the board of grain commissioners and the government are prepared to consider the licensing of off-site storage so that the farmers whom I represent will be able to deliver the good quality grain they have on their farms. I feel very strongly about this. I feel it is abhorrent that farmers in one part of the country should face financial hardship through no fault of their own because they are unable to deliver the good quality grain that they have on their farms owing to the inability of our grain handling and marketing facilities to take care of quotas on a more equitable and uniform basis.

No doubt the discussion of this item will take some time. I should like the minister to reply to this suggestion as soon as he can. In any event, before this item passes I hope the minister will be able to inform the committee that the government will once again consider off-site storage and will assure western producers of being able to market their current crop, or a minimum quantity of grain, and that quotas will be equalized in the three prairie provinces and in the Peace river bloc of British Columbia.

Mr. Baldwin: Will the hon. member permit a question? As I understand it, he is advocating a system whereby farmers would be paid storage on farm stored grain. I ask him this question not only as the hon. member for Assiniboia but as a member of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, which he said he was. Can he tell me whether this policy is one which meets with the approval of the wheat pools?

Mr. Argue: I am not certain that the wheat pool has made a statement on this matter in recent times; I am not certain whether the wheat pool has in fact advocated this policy. I have advocated it for many years. The farmers' unions have definitely advocated it for many years. If my hon. friend will take my assurance—he may not wish to—I assure him that if a vote were held among the wheat pool membership I would be very surprised if it did not get at least 99 per cent approval.

Mr. McIntosh: I would suggest that for the last 15 or 20 minutes the hon. member for Assiniboia has been off base, out of order and all wet in practically everything he said.

Mr. Argue: Discuss this with the farmers.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. McIntosh: That is fine; I will discuss it with the farmers. The hon. member has brought into the picture today, much against your wishes and your direction last night, sir, the questions of quotas, storage, cash advances and everything else, which have absolutely nothing to do with this item we are discussing today and which we as government members will not do. We refuse to take advantage of you, sir, in this way. I think last night the hon. member for Medicine Hat laid it squarely on the line in so far as the hon. member for Assiniboia is concerned. He produced the act and read out the duties and responsibilities of the board of grain commissioners, and it was well understood by the hon. member for Assiniboia what those duties were. But still he took advantage of you, Mr. Chairman, today, after the discussion last night, to make this all wet speech.

Generally speaking I think we can say that the board of grain commissioners is the agency responsible for the maintenance of quality standards for Canadian wheat and for ensuring that the interests of the farmers are protected in all aspects of grain handling. Not only is that their responsibility but one of the functions of the board is to see that the farmer gets a proper grade for his grain. I ask the minister what steps he has taken to refute the statement or to procure the evidence referred to by the national farm union in their brief on grain sales to feed mills. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Swift Current Sun, dated January 25, 1961. This is taken from the union brief. They say under the heading "Trading Regulations":

> There is "evidence that grading regulations and the protection which the farmer has known in the past through the board of grain commissioners is completely absent."

I believe the minister knows as well as I do, and as well as do the national farm union and the hon. member for Assiniboia, that the national farm union is deliberately misleading the farmers by such a statement, just as the hon. member for Assiniboia does time and time again. No change was made in the regulations of the board of grain commissioners at that time.

The officials of the national farm union know as well as I do that the farmer who wishes can at any time submit a sample of his grain to the commission independent of any elevator company, pool of anything else, and get a grade that is standard that will be accepted by any line company or any pool. This statement by an organization such as the national farm union, or by the leader of the C.C.F. group in this house has perturbed me time and time again because it is an absolute falsehood and they know it. I wonder what the minister has done about such a statement?

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I have ever listened to a speech in this house that had a greater disregard for the facts than the one delivered by the leader of the C.C.F. today. I think he has been very unfair to the Minister of Agriculture, to those on the treasury benches and to the former minister of trade and commerce, all of whom have done a wonderful job in the marketing of the grain of the Canadian farmers.

Mr. Argue: Why has the hon. member always voted against the suggestion?

Mr. Nasserden: With regard to the matter of quotas in the province of Saskatchewan, I think the hon. member might have brought out different figures and put them on the record. I see by the figures of April 10 that 614 points are on three or four-bushel quotas as against 463 on two-bushel quotas. I believe he said that the majority of farmers were on two-bushel quotas.

Mr. Argue: That was on April 3.

Mr. Nasserden: It would appear to me that the statement was not factual.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, I was quoting from the board of grain commissioners quota distribution of April 3. Perhaps my hon. friend has a later issue. He may have improved facilities, as the bureau of statistics sometimes has, but these are the latest statistics that have come to my attention.

Mr. Nasserden: I am quoting from the same statement that the hon. member quoted from except that mine is dated April 10.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the hon. member what he is quoting from? His pages are in colours different from mine. Maybe it is the same statement; maybe it is the minister's statement.

Mr. Nasserden: It is the Canadian wheat board statement on the distribution.

Mr. Argue: I think the hon. member has the minister's private statement.

Mr. Nasserden: I do not intend to enter into a criss-cross discussion with the hon. member for Assiniboia, but I should like to say that the board of grain commissioners for Canada have done a wonderful job over the period of years. They have been instrumental in building Canadian grades to a standard which has made it possible for the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Canadian wheat board to take our grain into any market in the world with the knowledge that our grades will be accepted. When we consider the conditions that prevailed last fall, we must realize that there was a great quantity of damp and wet grain in western Canada. We must realize, too, the importance of maintaining the quality of our product in world markets. Under those circumstances, we were able to move more grain than anyone in the House of Commons expected at that particular time, and more grain than had been moved by the former administration under similar circumstances. This was accomplished with a minimum of discomfort to the average farmer on the prairies.

It is all very well for the hon. member for Assiniboia to get up today and point to a situation under which the producers in Alberta are in a little better position than those in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. This situation really means that the sales policy of this government has resulted in moving a greater quantity of grain to the markets of Asia than had been moved heretofore. In this connection, I should like to pay tribute to the Minister of Agriculture as well as the former minister of trade and commerce.

When we come to the matter of facilities out on the Pacific coast, I should like to say that facilities cost money, whether they are located on the Pacific coast, on the prairies, at Fort William or the port of Churchill. Every cent that goes into those facilities ultimately comes out of the pockets of the farmers of western Canada. This government, from the very beginning, has sought to move grain and to utilize the facilities that are in existence. This has been one of the objectives toward which farmers and farm organizations have worked over a long period of years. I could quote statements by such men as the president of the farmers' union of Saskatchewan and other leaders of farm organizations which point to the need to move grain rather than to store it in off-site storage as the hon. member for Assiniboia has advocated.

Mr. Argue: I just want the farmers to be paid, that is all.

Mr. Nasserden: Off-site storage has proved to be one of the costliest items to the farmers of western Canada.

The other matter to which I should like to refer is the opening of navigation at the head of the lakes. I understand this will take place in a couple of weeks, and freight cars have been ordered to western Canada so that the movement of grain from Saskatchewan and Manitoba will soon begin.

In so far as the storage of grain on farms is concerned, I do not believe I can recall the Saskatchewan wheat pool ever going on record as being in favour of paying farmers for grain stored on their farms. The cost of this procedure would have to come out of the final payment made to these farm people. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Assiniboia taking that particular line.

Mr. Argue: Half of it comes out of the national treasury, did you know that?

Mr. Nasserden: When we look at the overall situation and what has been accomplished during the last three years, I think it can be said that this government has done more to expedite the movement of grain than was done at any time before. The markets that have been captured in Asia and in other places in the world have been simply wonderful, and this has given great encouragement to the western wheat producers.

I should like to make a few comments about the feed mill situation if I may. This situation was mentioned briefly yesterday and has been mentioned a number of times during the debate on the agriculture estimates by those in opposition. A statement has been made that, on some occasions, grain was selling for 50 cents a bushel less than it used to be sold before our legislation was introduced. This statement is not factual. Everyone in western Canada knows that grain moved at these prices and lower before the legislation was introduced. The result of this legislation has been to bring before the public the price paid for grain moving to the feed mills.

I do not pretend that I am satisfied with every aspect of this policy. Perhaps there are dangers in it that may show up as time goes by. I am satisfied, though, that when the Prime Minister of this country gives his assurance that the marketing system of the Canadian wheat board would be protected and when the Minister of Agriculture backs up that assertion, even the hon. members of the opposition should be prepared to accept that statement.

Mr. Peters: We are not all that innocent.

Mr. Argue: It is just another one of John's promises. They do not mean a thing.

Mr. Nasserden: On this occasion—

Mr. Spencer: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. While the hon. member for Assiniboia had the floor he complained about hon. members speaking from their seats. I should like to hear what the hon. member who now has the floor has to say, and I cannot do that if the hon. member for Assiniboia is constantly interrupting from his seat.

Mr. Nasserden: I was just about to conclude, Mr. Chairman. I should like to say that when the vote was taken on the point of order last night I could not object because the hon. member for Assiniboia has taken every opportunity to say anything he would have to say about the movement of grain. He was merely repeating what he had said, and much of that was not in the best interests of those engaged in the agriculture industry.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I find myself in a very dubious position in view of the fact that yesterday there was a procedural ruling by the Chair that discussion should be on the vote before the committee. I do not believe there are many hon. members in the committee or many people out across the country who will be very proud of what has taken place in the committee last evening and again today.

Mr. Peters: You are just holding up your estimates.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The vote of the majority of the house confirmed the ruling of the chairman that he had to enforce the rules laid down in standing orders. I feel it is a very serious situation, therefore, when a member of the house, who has been here for many years, takes advantage of the fact that the board of grain commissioners does publish statistics on the grain trade in order to reintroduce each one of the subjects he wished to discuss under the wheat board item.

Mr. Argue: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Cardiff: You should listen once in a while and not talk so much, then you will know more.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member knows so little that it is obvious why he does not talk very much.

The minister has made a reflection on the decision of the house last night, Mr. Chairman, and has said it was inappropriate for me to quote from the statistics issued by the board of grain commissioners. I would suggest that the point of order that was raised last night was settled last night. I would suggest that Your Honour allowed me to make my remarks this afternoon and there was no suggestion from any hon. member that I was out of order nor was there any suggestion from the Chair that I was out of order.

I therefore suggest that the Minister of Agriculture has no right to pretend that the remarks I made some time ago this afternoon were out of order and thereby to reflect on the conduct of the chairman himself during the time I was making my speech. I suggest that I was very much in order, that the chairman allowed me to make my remarks and that the minister himself now is casting a serious reflection not only on me but on the chairman and the chairman's conduct of the procedure of this committee. He has no right to reflect on something that took place some time ago in this chamber.

The Chairman: Order. I must say that the hon. member cannot interpret the words of the minister as being a reflection on the Chair. I think the minister is entitled to discuss the conduct of the hon. member from Assiniboia.

Mr. Argue: No, he is not.

The Chairman: Certainly he can comment on the method of speaking of the hon. member from Assiniboia. I may say in passing that the Chair cannot expect to have the rules applied correctly if there is no co-operation from the members of the committee.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, because I want to complete what I have to say. I am not as experienced a member of the House of Commons as is the hon. member for Assiniboia. I simply said this afternoon that he took advantage of his experience by relating every second paragraph to the words "board of grain commissioners" in order to discuss everything but the board of grain commissioners and thereby he was able to get under the ruling of the Chair last night, namely that we could discuss only the board of grain commissioners.

I want to say that I do not intend to answer any of these questions or statements dealing with the Canadian wheat board or any of the subjects related to the Canadian wheat board. This is the ninth day on which I have had my estimates before the committee. I had seven days on item No. 1. The hon. member for Assiniboia spoke on item No. 1. He referred to the wheat board. He referred to all of these matters. Then he came into the chamber last night and asked for special permission to go back, in effect, to item No. 1. The house made its ruling after a very unpleasant debate. I want to abide by that ruling. However, there are certain things I have to say to the hon. member for Assiniboia. I will leave those to the end of my remarks and they will not be pleasant to hear.

Some questions that he asked have a bearing on the board of grain commissioners. First of all he asked a question about the storage capacity and he made quite a point about the visible supply going up and asked whether the wheat board was plugging up the elevators. I am not going to go into all the storage capacity that has been built at the head of the lakes, the new storage capacity at Baie Comeau or the building of increased storage both on the west coast and in the St. Lawrence area. However, I would suggest that if the hon. member would read the statement I have made on storage construction, he will easily see why we have a greater visible supply this year than we had last year.

The hon. member also asked the question whether the board of grain commissioners had any control or direction over the allocation of box cars. He must know that this is not so. He brought in this reference to the ex-chairman of the board of grain commissioners who was at one time appointed as transport controller. When he was transport controller he had some say in the allocation of box cars. Since that time, however, there has been a royal commission on this subject which issued its report. If the hon. member will refresh his memory and go back to two years ago on July 18 in Hansard he will find that the previous minister of trade and commerce outlined that royal commission report and gave the directions in the form of a letter to the chief of the Canadian wheat board as to the allocation of box cars. If he reads it through he will find that the first instruction was that primary consideration must be given to the movement of the kinds of grain and the grades of grain required to meet sales commitments and to facilitate their selling operations. Then it goes on as follows:

> (2) Subject to (1) above and as far as current circumstances and reasonable equality in delivery opportunity permits, it should be your objective to provide:
> (a) that producers should have the opportunity of delivering their grain to the elevator or elevators which they wish to patronize; and
> (b) that elevator companies which act as your agents should have reasonable opportunity of competing with one another in the handling of producers' grain.

In effect, Mr. Chairman, the allocation of box cars today is done primarily by the Canadian wheat board to the elevator company in proportion to their getting grain from the producers and then the elevator company—that is the pools and the private grain trade—allocate their elevators to their own elevators as they wish.

Another point raised by the hon. member today—or rather it was yesterday—had to do with the number of overages and grain complaints. This is a legitimate question to ask under this item. If the hon. member will look up the reports of the board of grain commissioners for Canada for the year 1960 at page 10 he will find the number of complaints through the year. The complaint points total 11 as compared with 19 in the previous year. It tells what happened to those complaints. Then under the heading of "Prosecutions", it gives the story of prosecutions. Then there is the heading "Shortages and Overages" and you have the elevator given in the detail and what was done. I think that answer can be found by the ordinary process of opening up the report and reading page 10.

Mr. Argue: When was the report tabled?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yesterday.

Mr. Argue: It was not delivered to my office. I guess they had no copies.

An hon. Member: Can you not read?

Mr. Argue: I sent to the library and I could not find any.

Mr. Pigeon: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member does not stand up.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, that I would answer only those things that I think legitimately come under this item. However, I have one thing that I must say and it is this. With agriculture in the position that it is in today and with the efforts that have to be made by governments at all levels, and by organizations and individuals to help agriculture move up in the economic scheme of things, it ill behooves us here in the House of Commons to try to destroy some of the things which are good and which we all support. Yet we have this situation developing here.

I think everyone here knows what I am referring to. Yesterday, one of the hon. members from this side of the chamber, speaking out of order, raised a question and it was not dealt with at that time. I am referring of course, to the feed mill issue. I knew how deeply our western Conservatives felt about this issue because it was dealt with in the standing committee on agriculture and colonization last year. The recommendation was unanimous that we should try out for a year more flexible methods of handling feed grain.

Mr. Argue: By those members who were there.

An hon. Member: Why were you not there?

Mr. Argue: I had other engagements.

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I ask whether we must continually be subjected to this procedure of the hon. member speaking from his seat? The dignity of parliament should be preserved.

The Chairman: The Minister of Agriculture has the floor.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): These interruptions make it easier for me to say what I am going to say. I am going to give some advice to the hon. member for Assiniboia. I have done it previously but he did not listen. I am going to give him some advice again. Over the years there has been a great deal of debate in western Canada as to what should be done about agriculture, and one of the loudest spokesmen on behalf of his own opinions was the hon. member for Assiniboia. As he went up and down the country, we did not take him too seriously because to us he was just one of Peck's bad boys. Now he has been in the house for a considerable number of years and he is like a boy who has never grown up. No longer is he just Peck's bad boy. It looks very much as though he has become the "ass" in Assiniboia. In fact, after the type of thing we saw here last night I am going to be very blunt. The hon. member is trying to move up from the league of being Peck's bad boy and from the "ass" in Assiniboia to one of Hoffa's little hoodlums. We have seen this disrupting type of activity in some of the labour meetings across this country. It means that many of the ordinary labour people hope that this type of person does not have any say in running our country in the future.

In the hon. member's battle with the premier of Saskatchewan for the leadership of this new party, one of the reasons why the backroom boys of the labour party—

The Chairman: Order. I am afraid the minister is now going a little outside the subject before the committee.

Mr. Argue: Let him go on.

Mr. Peters: Why does he not answer the questions he is supposed to answer?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister should be allowed to expose the attitude which he takes. After all, I have been here a lot longer than the minister. I think my conduct in the house has been in keeping with the rules. I have not had to heap personal abuse on cabinet ministers in order to make my points. I shall have an opportunity to take this scurrilous attack upon me to the electors of the Assiniboia constituency, which the minister has slurred by his sly remarks.

Of course, the minister has no answer to the proposition I have made, that he should provide payments to farmers on an eight bushel quota. Instead he uses this well-known McCarthy tactic. He uses the Senator McCarthy tactic which was developed so well in the United States, of smear when you have no argument.

I say that this smearing, ill-founded attack upon me by the minister is very ill becoming. I am certain it will not be considered in good taste by the minister's colleagues. It is beneath the dignity of parliament and the dignity of the minister. But I say to him that the people he represents and the people I represent can give the answer to these kind of McCarthy tactics that have been dragged into this chamber by a minister of the crown.

Mr. Chairman, to get back to some of the remarks that I have been making, which I think the grain producers of the west will support—and I am prepared to meet the Minister of Agriculture on any public platform in western Canada—

An hon. Member: Meet him right here.

Mr. Argue: I am meeting him right here. The chairman had to call the minister to order and set him back on his haunches because the chairman knew these smearing tactics were out of order. But I challenge the Minister of Agriculture to meet me on a public platform anywhere in western Canada and to repeat the McCarthy tactics he has been using in this committee. I think I licked him well in public debate on one former occasion, and I would take a chance on doing it again. He can defend his policy if he will, and he can defend these kind of tactics if he will. The hon. member for Rosthern—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, you have ruled me out of order in making any personal remarks about the hon. member, and he is now doing the same thing to me. I wonder whether I could ask for the same ruling to apply to the hon. member.

The Chairman: I think it is about time we came back to the item under discussion. I trust that from now on the comments will be more relevant.

Mr. Argue: I will abide by the request of the Minister of Agriculture, who has now come very subtly to the Chair crying for protection because he cannot take the same kind of attack as he carried on against me.

The Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member please co-operate with the Chair. I have just indicated to the hon. member that the Chair expects hon. members to be relevant in their remarks under this item.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I was dealing with the remarks of the hon. member for Rosthern, who has shown himself on occasion in this house—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I rise again because I held the floor but was interrupted on a point of order. Does that mean I lose the floor?

The Chairman: I thought the hon. minister had yielded the floor at that point.

Mr. Argue: So did I.

The Chairman: If the minister wishes to continue his remarks I think I should recognize him. I thought he had completed his remarks.

Mr. Argue: I took the floor because I thought the Minister of Agriculture had concluded his remarks. However, if you, Mr. Chairman, rule that the minister has the floor I will of course abide by your ruling; but the minister fell back—

The Chairman: Order. If the minister yielded the floor because he was under the impression that the hon. member for Assiniboia was rising on a point of order, I think it would be only fair to give the floor again to the minister in order that he may complete his remarks. I think that procedure would be most orderly.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. It is very difficult for one with just an ordinary voice to compete. I will abide by your ruling and stay on the question of the board of grain commissioners.

The board of grain commissioners has been brought under the Department of Agriculture because it is so closely associated with the handling of grain in western Canada. When the Canadian wheat board was put under the Department of Agriculture it was done for the good, solid reason of trying to put under the Department of Agriculture not only the scientific and production efforts of the government but also the marketing efforts of the government concerned with grain.

The board of grain commissioners is part of the marketing efforts of the government. It is the board's responsibility to maintain, not only the standards of grain sold at every grade but also the standards of handling the grain in the elevator and to see that the farmer's interests are protected in connection with the grading of wheat and every other type of grain operation in the country elevator system.

The reputation of the board of grain commissioners has developed over the years so that today we can go into any market in the world and say we have certain grades to sell and that grade will be accepted as the standard that will be delivered.

This problem of maintaining the standard is not easily held. The question of grading grain is something that has to be seen in order to be understood. I should like to invite every hon. member of the committee, from all parties, to make an effort some time this year to visit the operations of the board of grain commissioners in Winnipeg and see the methods they use in arriving at and maintaining grades at a constant level.

This would enable the rural members particularly to explain to their constituents not only the protection which is afforded by maintaining these standards but also the high level of excellence which Canadian wheat has reached and which enables the Canadian wheat board to sell it abroad.

The second point I wish to make is that the board of grain commissioners have an important function in the movement of grain out of the country. When I looked into the situation concerning the movement of grain out of west coast ports I found that one of the important operations that went on there was the grading of grain as it went into the ships. I was told we could not increase the movement of grain through the terminal elevators into the ships because the board of grain commissioners had to carry out a certain amount of grading in connection with every bushel put into these ships.

We discussed this matter with the board of grain commissioners and worked out a system whereby if they wanted to load at night or after dark, certain types of daylight lamps could be used in order to maintain the very high standards necessary to guarantee the calibre of our grain to any of our customers. I am glad to have this opportunity to point out this one technical aspect of the work of the board of grain commissioners.

I cannot answer the question of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. I have read the criticism of the national farmers' union, but I cannot answer the hon. member's question because to date I have done nothing to challenge this statement. I have made inquiries about it. Naturally, no evidence has been submitted to me. I have not seen any evidence in this regard, and I should like to say at this time that if that evidence is submitted to me, and what the hon. member said is correct, I will be glad to look into this matter personally and see that something is done about it. If there is not, I would expect some sort of remedial action on the part of those who made the criticism.

Mr. McIntosh: There cannot be any evidence. That is the point I was trying to make.

Mr. Peters: I am surprised at what the minister had to say but after a while we shall probably lose that sense of surprise and be accustomed to what we hear. I have a comment to make on a matter which was raised earlier. I may be out of order, but the minister has commented on it. I have a statement here by the national farmers' union in which they made a presentation to the Canadian wheat board dated February 1, 1961 and in this document they point out that the feed mill price as compared with the wheat board—

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Mr. Jorgenson: The hon. member says this was a presentation to the Canadian wheat board. Surely it must be obvious even to him that this is a matter which comes under wheat board jurisdiction.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order it has been said this afternoon I have stated in the past that the feed mill price was 50 cents less than the wheat board's price. This is in answer to an accusation which was made in the committee this afternoon.

Mr. Jorgenson: The hon. member knew full well he was out of order, too.

Mr. Argue: We did not make the statement. It was one of your Tory members.

Mr. McIntosh: On the point of order, the only part of the brief I wished to deal with was that in which reference was made to the grain commission. The statement is made in that brief that it had disrupted the grading of grain at the feed mills. I, too, should like to have got into the discussion about the wheat board in the same way as did the hon. member for Assiniboia, but in this particular case I bowed to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and referred only to the board of grain commissioners and the charge by the national farmers' union that it had disrupted the grading of grain. That is absolutely ridiculous. It had nothing to do with the grading of grain and they know it and so does the hon. member for Assiniboia.

The Chairman: I must say to the hon. member for Timiskaming that if the part he wants to quote from the document he has does not refer to the board of grain commissioners he will be out of order even though his remarks were intended to be in reply to another hon. member, if the other member was out of order. The hon. member for Timiskaming knows very well that many remarks made this afternoon have been out of order. That is no reason, as I indicated last night, to continue to discuss points which are not relevant.

Mr. Peters: I am not as familiar with the activities of the wheat board and the board of grain commissioners as are some other members.

Mr. Jorgenson: That does not stop you from talking about them.

Mr. Peters: I told some of these self-styled agricultural experts yesterday that I saw very few real experts here, and I have not changed my mind since. Certainly the minister has not given me any reason to change my mind or even to think that he is being advised by experts in this field.

In checking over the publications of the grain commissioners I find there is little with which they do not deal. There are two or three pages of items here and I imagine I could cover almost anything. The subjects cover grain supplies, the crop year, the disposition of marketings, country elevator shipments, terminal handling, eastern elevators, exports, domestic use, licensing and so on. There are a couple of pages of them. We are sometimes out of order, but it seems to me that the field is so wide and that the grain commissioners have done so little, or become so badly confused with the wheat board over the years that there is some similarity between the fields that are to be discussed. If we refer only to the publications we can relate them in that manner, if we wish. I only wanted to draw attention to the correction because I, probably, was the one who raised it a number of weeks ago. I am the one who incorporated the statement that the difference was 50 cents and now that we have the brief I think it can go on to the record.

I wish now to raise another matter and ask the minister why it is that the bread we have in Canada is so poor when we have available to us the best wheat in the world?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: Oh, this does come under the grain commissioners. I have a whole sheet of documents produced by the board of grain commissioners published in October, 1960, in particular a booklet entitled "Canadian Wheat". It discusses just the subject I have raised. There are several things I should like to ask the minister and one of them refers to descriptions of wheat. Here they equate Canadian wheat with weak wheat and I am curious to know what weak wheat is and what is the relationship between Canadian wheat and weak wheat.

An hon. Member: You have a weak mind.

Mr. Peters: I am speaking to a number of people with weak minds and perhaps I shall have to hammer in what I am saying with a tack. The kind of wheat moved for the domestic production of bread presents a growing problem. Everyone knows that we have on the shelves of our stores two or three grades of bread, one kind of bread being produced at a fairly low price in competition with bread of a better grade. Then there is a third type of bread—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member has indicated that we have the best grain here in Canada so there cannot be any responsibility placed on the board of grain commissioners with regard to the quality of the bread.

Mr. Peters: In my submission that is not altogether true because they refer in this particular bulletin put out by the board of grain commissioners to flour quality and to dough properties. They describe the tests to which the commissioners have subjected the bread, and the grading of the flour used in making bread, and they reached the conclusion that the scales to be used for the measurement of quality should be as follows: No. 1—I am reading from the document—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: I must tell the hon. member again that I feel his remarks are out of order even if the document from which he is quoting has been published by the grain commissioners. That is no reason why everything in that book should be relevant. The only matters which are relevant are those which come under the jurisdiction of the board as indicated in section 9 of the Canada Grain Act. Were it otherwise, the hon. member will realize, he could go anywhere by discussing any word printed in the report of the commission.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Could I help the hon. member by suggesting that on this subject I agree with him. I love good bread. But, actually, the responsibility for the quality of bread lies with the Department of Health and Welfare, not the board of grain commissioners.

The other question the hon. member asked is in order. He asked what is weak wheat. I believe it is low protein wheat.

Mr. Peters: I submit that the question of the quality of bread does relate directly to the domestic production of wheat. Certainly, the board of grain commissioners has set up standards for grain. They have graded it No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, No. 4 and so on, for the domestic production of bread and it is my opinion that if they take the trouble to send out these bulletins regarding the methods of their inspection they must have given some consideration to this matter. I am not referring to the fact that bread being produced in some of the commercial establishments might contain formaldehyde to keep it from going stale. This would of course come under the health department. I am referring to the fact that it may be a result of the method of our domestic grain production, and I would humbly submit that I am in order in discussing that to this extent.

The Chairman: I have indicated my view and I do not feel that I should change it. The hon. gentleman has changed his attitude in suggesting that it may be because the grade of grain is not as good as he thought before.

Mr. Peters: I would not like to leave that as the conclusion. I have not as yet ascertained why the bread is not as good as it is supposed to be.

I would like to refer to another matter which concerns the people in my area and has been controversial for some time. I refer to the matter of screenings and this, of course, comes within the jurisdiction of the board of grain commissioners. Regulation No. 7 of that board gives the grades of screenings and indicates the composition of screenings. This regulation indicates that screenings must contain over 3 per cent and up to 5 per cent dust, chaff and wheat seeds. The complaint I have received is that individuals purchasing screenings for feed find that the major part of the cereal contained in the screenings is not dust or wheat but is buckwheat. There is a further regulation limiting the amount of buckwheat that screenings can contain in order to be in that classification. I wonder if the grading of these screenings can be made more effective or if there is a factual inspection taking place by the grain commissioners in the field in which they have control before they reach the feed companies who sell to the farmer. I would like to ask the minister if the screenings are inspected by the grain commissioner after they leave the jurisdiction of the pool elevators or grain companies. I would suggest that if the screenings are purchased in bulk the responsibility for the grade stamped on the bags would be that of the department, but in many instances would be some distance removed from the active control of the grain commissioner.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In answer to the hon. member's question I might say that under the regulations it is very clear what the percentages in the mixture can be, but so far as the board of grain commissioners is concerned, it is merely responsible for guaranteeing that the grade stamped on the sack is the same as that which is contained inside. I might say that if screenings are misrepresented we can take action under the Feeding Stuffs Act but, as I have said, the board of grain commisioners, under its regulations, is only responsible for guaranteeing that the screenings are actually as stamped on the sack.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Peters.]

32. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $3,000.

Mr. Argue: I am not certain that I am in order in respect of what I am going to say but I would like the minister to comment regarding this item. I understand this item has reference to the proposal to build an agricultural administration building situated at the experimental farm. There has been a good deal of discussion in the house regarding the government's policy in respect of construction of buildings on the experimental farm and I think it has been accepted—at least it was by the minister's predecessor and by former ministers of the Department of Agriculture, particularly the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner—that the central experimental farm should not be encroached upon by the construction of buildings because of the fact that it is considered to be a valuable piece of property with historical records built up over many decades. It was felt that any reversion or change of this land to some other use would destroy the continuity of these records, and that the experimental farm should remain intact at its present location.

I think the present minister has been modifying the policy as set out by his predecessor. He appears to be on record as in favour of the construction of an administrative building at the location of the central experimental farm but I would express the hope that such a building will not be constructed at that location, and that the farm situated at this very strategic and valuable location will not be sacrificed to commercial interests, so that the valuable records will be maintained.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This vote refers to the terminal elevators owned by the board of grain commissioners at Prince Rupert, Edmonton, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon and so on, and has nothing to do with the building of an agricultural administrative building at all.

Mr. Peters: Could I ask the minister if there is any intention this year of extending the facilities of the elevator at Prince Rupert?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There is nothing included in this vote in that regard. This has regard to necessary repairs to existing equipment.

Mr. Peters: The minister will recall that the hon. member for Skeena has raised this question on several occasions this year and has pointed out that the problem existing on the west coast could be greatly relieved if the facilities at Prince Rupert—I understand that is the shipping point closest to the Orient—were increased, and considerable benefit would accrue to western shipping facilities.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There was a previous vote carried for expansion to docks and wharves so as to take full advantage of the capacities at Prince Rupert. We will be using the Prince Rupert facilities to full capacity this calendar year.

Item agreed to.

Land rehabilitation, irrigation and water storage projects—

Irrigation and water storage projects in the western provinces including the South Saskatchewan river project; the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act program; land protection, reclamation and development—

33. Administration, operation and maintenance, $7,843,075.

Mr. Herridge: This item has reference to the administration of land rehabilitation, irrigation and water storage projects. In this connection I would like to ask the minister a question but will preface it with a little information. In British Columbia only 3 per cent of the total area is suitable for agricultural purposes. Last year there was $125 million worth of agricultural products imported. That includes a great volume of importation from the United States.

The fruit and vegetable growers in the interior of British Columbia are very concerned over the possibility that the storage of water in the Arrow lakes, as a result of the building of the high Arrow dam, will make it possible to irrigate hundreds of thousands of acres in the United States at low cost. They have expressed their fears to the minister of agriculture in Victoria, and he recognizes the danger. He is reported as promising the legislature that when he attends the dominion-provincial agricultural conference he will ask the federal government to consider raising the tariffs on fruit and vegetables to protect Canadian farm producers against the damage that will be occasioned by storage of water behind the high Arrow dam. Has the minister had any communication with the minister of agriculture in British Columbia in this connection? This is of great concern to the producers in the Okanagan and in the Kootenays.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I cannot recall any letter, but I am informed there will be a meeting between the federal government and the various provincial governments later on this month on agricultural services and maybe the minister of agriculture for British Columbia refers to that meeting.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to say I think it is a most absurd situation for Canadians to be providing the money to flood out thousands of acres of good land in British Columbia when we have a market in British Columbia, and then find it necessary to impose a tariff against United States fruits and vegetables which will raise the living costs of all consumers. I do hope that the minister will give this question some consideration when it is brought to the attention of the dominion-provincial agricultural conference because it is of great concern to producers. This water will be used to irrigate thousands of acres in the United States. Here is a suggestion by the minister of agriculture in British Columbia—I am a free trader in principle—that we should raise the tariff, and in so doing increase the cost of living of all Canadians, to pay for the damage occasioned by the action of the federal and provincial governments.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, this item refers to the draining and development of lands. It would have been more appropriate perhaps that I speak on item 5, but I believe that my remarks are relevant to the item under discussion. At all events, I shall be brief.

This problem causes concern to millions of Canadians who suffer in many areas of our country from the curse of mosquitoes and black flies.

I should like to know, since we are dealing with land development, what is being done at present to control this scourge. We are appropriating today a great deal of money for access roads to forests for picnic grounds and for the development of tourist facilities, but during a great part of the summer, millions of Canadians are unable to fully enjoy our lakes and forests, precisely because they are infested with black flies and mosquitoes.

There is also an economic aspect related to this question. It will be remembered that an important film-producing company came to the Laurentians a few years ago to shoot a film and lost money on account of these very mosquitoes because the shooting could not be done according to schedule. When they left, the company officials stated that they would know better next time.

This is not only a question of the welfare of Canadians; we must also consider this economic aspect, which has its importance. I understand that certain marshes, certain waters, have begun to be disinfected with chemical compounds these last few years. I think it is being done around the city of Ottawa.

I would therefore like to know from the Minister of Agriculture—

(Text):

The Chairman: Order. I have strong doubts about the relevancy of the comments of the hon. member not only to the item under consideration but to the Department of Agriculture. Unless the minister says it comes within his responsibility I am afraid I will have to intervene.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, this is a matter which I am sure concerns the Department of Agriculture.

At any rate, I now close my remarks by asking the minister whether this year we are spending or expect to spend any money on the treatment of swamps and lakes to prevent the swarming of mosquitoes, not only to attract a growing number of tourists but for the welfare of all Canadians who wish to enjoy our beautiful scenery.

I would like to have the minister say a few words on that subject.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think your suspicions were correct, Mr. Chairman. This particular vote deals with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I have inquired from my advisers and they do not know of any spraying operations with respect to sloughs or water courses out there to exterminate mosquitoes. Sometimes they may light bonfires and create a lot of smoke to drive down wind, and I can imagine that may be done under this act in some of the pastures at night, but I would not know for certain.

I am sorry about the hon. member's position on this point because he knows of my interest in it; he knows it is the type of thing I have been thinking about under the so-called A.R.D.A. program, but it does not come under these votes at the present time.

Mr. Brunsden: I should like to say a few words on item 33. Those of us who live in the prairie region of western Canada, who, by reason of the Easter recess had opportunity to pay one of our very infrequent trips to our own areas, came back to Ottawa with some grim forebodings.

Mr. Carter: I did not think the hon. member would admit it, though.

Mr. Brunsden: I am not speaking politically. Let me say that if these hon. gentlemen in the opposition would occasionally, even very occasionally, shelve their politics and deal with the actualities of the problems in Canada, this house would gain in dignity and they would render a great service to their own constituencies and to the country at large.

We came back to Ottawa with some forebodings. Those forebodings were engendered by the spectre of drought in western Canada. Up to about four years ago we had 10 years of better than average precipitation. We had no real water worries and yet for the last four years, in each year there has been less and less precipitation, and we find ourselves this spring in a position with no reserves of moisture and a very dark outlook with respect to the forthcoming crop, and, what may prove even worse a real problem with respect to grass.

As you well know, sir, we live in what has been described as the Palliser triangle. More than 100 years ago Palliser recommended that this particular area should never see the plow. Unfortunately, in the enthusiasm of settlement, it saw a good many plows and we cultivated areas which should have remained under grass. There is promise under this government's legislation of placing those areas back under grass. I for one heartily commend the minister in his endeavour to develop a long range program which will bring back to western Canada its own natural advantages. At the moment the great question in the minds of those of us who come from my area is this: Are we going back to the dustbowl conditions of the 30's? Are we going back to the policy—and I am not criticizing that policy—where, under government supervision, we were forced to sell our cattle for what we could get? In the 30's, the price was three cents a pound. We sold thousands of head in order to save them from starvation.

Since the war years we have built a tremendous cattle industry in western Canada. Let me say that this industry has been the bulwark of agriculture in much of western Canada. We talk a lot about wheat but cattle have been the prop under which agriculture has rested in western Canada, especially in so far as the semi-arid regions are concerned. I, for one, am greatly concerned as to what may happen to this industry if dustbowl conditions return and we have insufficient grass and water to carry our cattle through this season.

Let me say very briefly that our water supply is generated on the eastern slopes of the Rockies. The snowfall in recent years in that area has been very light, and it was very light again this year. Our rivers and streams are very low, and there is no indication of improvement unless there are heavy rains within the next two months. After that, it may be too late.

This is all a prelude, Mr. Chairman, to urging upon the minister the necessity for an immediate, dynamic program of water conservation. Again I congratulate him for what he has done. He has been in consultation with men resident in my area and in other adjacent areas. He has met many of the officers of the Western Canada Reclamation Association who long have been and are seized with the importance of this problem. I am quite sure he will make it a point to accept their advice and be guided, at least to a large extent, by their opinions.

This item also deals with further work on the South Saskatchewan river development. I have spoken on this subject before. It is a three-way development. It promises power, it promises a domestic water supply for the cities and towns, and it promises irrigation. Now, we in Alberta are not jealous of Saskatchewan in so far as the South Saskatchewan dam is concerned. However, we do urge that in the dispersal of federal funds, further consideration be given to the already existing irrigation districts in Alberta. My reason for advancing this suggestion is that most of these districts were developed by private corporations. My own district, the eastern irrigation district, was developed by the Canadian Pacific, as were others. The Canadian Pacific found it expensive to maintain. Finally, they went to the farmers in the district and said, "This load is too heavy for us; you take it over and we will give it to you. We will also give you $300,000 as an operating fund and you carry on from there." I am very proud of the manner in which our men have continued that operation. I have had the privilege of managing the district for a few years. Certainly, the farmers have made good.

A stage has been reached in this irrigation project where the main structure, the Bassano dam, is now beginning to go. This is one of the best dams in the world, but it is now 50 years old. There are many other structures, such as the aqueduct at Brooks—which many hon. members may have seen from the train—which is beginning to go. The people of the district and the province of Alberta have not the financial capacity to replace these structures. Last year the minister was very generous in connection with the construction of one project in which we were very interested. The government was very generous. Let me record the thanks to him of the people concerned for that help. Let me say to him that if we are to preserve our existing irrigation districts, we shall require further help. I ask him to see that we get it.

Mr. Carter: I merely wanted to ask the minister if bog clearing is covered by this land rehabilitation program. There is a considerable amount of bog clearing carried out in my riding, and this land has been successfully turned into grassland. I should like to know whether or not it would be possible to have financial assistance given under this item to this bog clearing program?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, strange as it may seem, this vote does contain a small item for a special grant to Newfoundland which covers the subject raised by the hon. member.

I wonder whether, in the absence of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, one of the members of the opposition would convey to him the answer to a question he asked the other day during the consideration of item 1? He asked for a report on the progress of the Fairford works in Manitoba. These works are part and parcel of the overall drainage program of the Manitoba government. The Department of Agriculture, through the agency of the P.F.R.A., has entered into a joint agreement to pay half the costs of the Fairford works as its part of the total drainage scheme. The hon. member asked for a report on the progress of the work. I am told that as of March 14 the control works, which are the main part of the project, were 90 per cent complete. The expected date of completion of the control works is April 15, 1961. The downstream excavation part, which is a follow-up to make certain that the control works effluent gets away easily, will be postponed to this fall. The expected date of completion of the downstream excavation now is December 15, 1961.

I think the hon. member will be interested in knowing, since he originally came from that area, that these works will increase the flow out of lake Manitoba by five times the flow provided by nature.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): This item, which includes land rehabilitation works and water storage projects, is of vital importance to the area which I represent. My constituency includes one of the fertile valleys of southern Manitoba, rich in soil but short on water supplies. I hope that this program of building small dams under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act will be continued. I should like to have the assurance of the minister that there will be no cut-back in this particular program at this time.

Mr. McIntosh: I should like to discuss very briefly—

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, but I should like the minister to reassure the committee that there will be no cut-back in the program of building agriculture dams and irrigation projects under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, the exact opposite is the case. I cannot say there have been new records created but in the calendar year 1960 over 4,000 farm dugouts were completed. We expect to equal that number or exceed it this year. We are working more in co-operation with the provinces, on a 50-50 basis. Incidentally, rehabilitation never ends in any part of Canada and this statement applies particularly to the prairies.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton). Can he tell us how much has been spent so far on the construction of the dam on the South Saskatchewan? Can he also tell us what will be the total cost of this project, and give us some indication of the date of completion of this project?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will read the figures: 1958-59, $1,200,000; 1959-60, $5,700,000; 1960-61, $11 million; 1961-62, estimated, $13,750,000. The grand total is $31,050,000 if my arithmetic is correct. The expected time of completion of the dam, if everything goes well, is the end of the calendar year 1965. The total estimated cost of the dam is $96 million.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could tell us whether plans are being made to reclaim the land along the Saskatchewan river. It is said that the dam will restore to agriculture 500,000 acres of land in the province, and I should like to know if something is being done to develop this land.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Under the agreement signed between the federal government and the provincial government of Saskatchewan, the province is obligated by the time of the completion of the physical work of the dam to have provided 50,000 acres for irrigation. The province of Saskatchewan is busy now making these arrangements to make a minimum amount of irrigated land available for farming at the first year the dam is completed.

Mr. McIntosh: I wish to discuss very briefly the problem of community pastures which comes under this agency known as P.F.R.A. First I wish to register a strong objection to the increase in fees for cattle entry into these pastures. I have written to the minister and have discussed this matter with him. I took his information back to my constituency during the Easter recess and I find that some of the information I received from him is not correct. This is not the first time that it seems to me the policy of P.F.R.A. down in Ottawa differed from the policy implemented by the officials on the ground. The minister knows of several occasions to which I refer.

The minister's answer to me on the raising of the fees was that these community pastures had to pay their way. I do not think there would be any objection to that. However, in one community pasture in which I have a great interest I have been informed that last year there was a net profit of some $19,000. It would seem to me unreasonable that those people should be penalized because other pastures were not operated in as efficient a manner. I would suggest to the minister that possibly he should look into the problem of pasture management before he increases these fees. Where one pasture may make a net profit of $19,000, it would seem to me there was mismanagement in some of the others.

As to another pasture with which I had dealings during the Easter recess, I gave those concerned the minister's explanation and asked them whether they went into the operating account or the operating expenses of the pasture. They said yes, that they had gone into it with the officials of the P.F.R.A. and there was one item, namely the construction of a house amounting to some $4,000, which was in the operating expenses. They knew—as well as the minister knows and as well as the official knew—that the building of a house is not an operating expense but is a capital expenditure and that it should be treated as such. If that is the way in which these books are kept, I am concerned. I understand that the answer received from the official of the P.F.R.A. as to why that item was put in there was this. The officials said it was as a result of faulty bookkeeping of the federal government. Is that the type of people we have representing this department out on the prairies?

Another phase of the community pasture which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister at the present time is that of regrassing. According to the minister's policy down here and according to the letters which I have received from him this regrassing program apparently is supposed to be a continuing operation. The officials on the ground out there disagree with him. They say that the regrassing program has been abandoned, that it is out. Who am I to believe?

I would suggest that this P.F.R.A. agency, like some of the other agencies under this department, are not sure of their policy. I would suggest that we should start right from the top. To prove what I mean by saying they are not sure, may I say this. We have a great deal of discussion on the wheat board which is an agency of this department. In 1959 in the standing committee on agriculture we asked the chairman of the Canadian wheat board what the policy was with regard to permit books. After many lengthy questions and supposed answers he said this, and I will read from the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee at page 236. First of all I will read the previous question:

Mr. McIntosh: I want a definite statement from the wheat board as to who is or who is not entitled to a permit book. You say if he is producing grain and can prove that he owns his own land, then he is entitled to a permit book.

Mr. McNamara: I do not think Mr. Riddel said exactly that. If he owns his own land, is binning the grain he produced off that land, separately, and is merchandising it in his own name.

Mr. McIntosh: What do you mean by merchandising in his own name?

Mr. McNamara: Selling to an elevator company.

That was the policy of the wheat board. Everybody in western Canada knows that you cannot sell to an elevator company unless you have a permit book. Where is the policy in that matter?

I say the same situation exists under the P.F.R.A. I say that they have not a policy. Since this South Saskatchewan dam has been worked on, I contend that the P.F.R.A. administration have spent most of their time on that dam and have forgotten the rest of their program out there. I think it is time that the minister revamped that whole agency out there. I think that he should take another look at this question of community pastures, the mismanagement in these community pastures and the increase in the fees to these community pastures. I might say that since we came into power these fees have been increased 100 per cent and I say that, politically speaking, I do not like it.

The Chairman: Shall vote 33 carry?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think I should like to have a chance to answer some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. I think the hon. member should be congratulated on showing such an active interest in his constituency. However, I have to tell hon. members occasionally that the operations of the department cover more than one constituency.

I should like to speak about the question of fees to the pastures. No person would like more than myself to keep these fees down. On the representations of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek and other western farmers I looked at the proposed increase of fees when I took over the portfolio and I looked at the estimates. These fees were reduced. Originally they were three cents on each head. The fee was raised to four cents under the proposed plan. I had it re-examined and had every figure cut out that was not part and parcel of the operation. The very best that I could do was three and a half cents.

Where the hon. member goes wrong is that he takes an individual pasture which shows a profit and tries to say that the fee should be at cost for that pasture. Actually we have to look at all community pastures as a group. I know this. If I am going to get double the amount of pasture built in western Canada in the next two or three years, as I hope to do, when I go before treasury board I want the figures to prove that community pastures are paying their own way. This amount of three and a half cents per head for cattle, which are the main users of the pasture, is the minimum to which I can get the fee down. If it shows a profit, I will certainly cut it down again. I say that the hon. members has made progress in his representations to me. He obtained a 50 per cent reduction in the increase, at least. Let us try it for a year and see how it works out.

As to the question of the house, may I say that a house should certainly not be in any operating item. If it was a mistake, I hope it will not happen again. I must take responsibility if it does happen. I will accept that responsibility as minister if mistakes are made and will take the necessary action to see that they do not happen again.

On the question of regrassing, may I say that the situation is similar to that with regard to the payment of fees. Generally speaking, the policy of the department in the community pastures is to maintain a continuing policy of regrassing. We have to work on the advice of experts who go in and look at individual pastures. In some cases they occasionally recommend that the pastures be left in native grasses and not reseeded, or left in the same type of grasses which are growing.

Every year there is a vote for regrassing, and generally speaking this policy is followed. However, if the experts recommend that on certain pastures there should be no reseeding, it is not proceeded with. I think that on the whole this is a sound way of handling it.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, the minister said that the hon. member, meaning myself, went wrong. I think I should have an opportunity to refute that statement. I submit that I did not go wrong. I think the minister is the one who has gone wrong in this connection, because he said there should be an over-all policy for all pastures and they should be treated the same.

I suggest that you cannot treat a pasture in an irrigated area in the same way that you treat a pasture in a dry farm area. They must be treated differently. I could say more on this subject if required.

The minister has said that he takes his advice from experts. The minister and his officials take the advice of experts if they want to. In regard to community pastures the advice of Mr. Baden Campbell of the Swift Current experimental farm was to regrass a certain pasture to which he referred. The officials of the Department of Agriculture said no, and they did not take his advice at that time. However, they took his advice in connection with extending the admittance period from April 1 to May 1. They had advice from the experimental farm but they used it just when they wanted to.

The minister and his officials sit here and are not aware of conditions in this respect. I suggest that some of the officials should go out on the ground and see things as we members see them, and then they would understand our problem.

Mr. Regnier: I should just like to commend the minister and the department for the active manner in which water storage projects have been constructed. In my riding we expect this vote to cover two major projects on the La Salle river, namely at Starbuck and at the town of La Salle. These projects are continuing in co-operation with the province of Manitoba and the farmers all along the La Salle river will benefit greatly. I wish to express my satisfaction with the manner in which the department is handling this matter.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, some time ago I raised the matter that other parts of Canada would like to take advantage of programs such as community pastures and benefits which are received from prairie farm assistance.

The minister said recently that you have to do the same thing for one as you do for another. I wonder what the policy is in connection with extending this type of development of community pastures and other assistance into other parts of Canada, to allow these farmers to take advantage of these benefits.

In my particular area community pastures would be a real asset. It is an area in which the federal government, either through grants of land from the municipalities or in any other way designated by the minister, could establish a community pasture program similar to that enjoyed by western farmers. We have the land available and the assembling of it would not be too difficult. I see no reason why we in northern Ontario should not take advantage of community pastures, which is one of the benefits enjoyed by western farmers.

The western farmers have had experience in this regard. There are probably differences of opinion regarding specific pastures, but I think hon. members would be quite happy to extend this particular section of the act to cover farmers in areas similar to my own in order that they may benefit from the act.

Unfortunately many of the things under this item apply only to the prairies, and many of the farmers in other parts of Canada are not aware of the fact that community pastures and other benefits have been established. I am quite sure they would also like to be in a position to take advantage of the benefits that would accrue from the extension of this assistance, and I refer in particular to community pastures.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have just a short answer, Mr. Chairman. I hope the hon. member will support me on the A.R.D.A. program. This is one type of agreement which we hope to make with provinces other than Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which are covered by community pastures at the present time.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. I have been approached by some people concerned with well drilling operations in Saskatchewan and I wonder whether the minister would give consideration to providing some assistance to deep well construction projects.

At the present time there is assistance in some provinces for dug-outs which are successful in holding water. In other cases deep wells have to be dug. I wonder whether some assistance could be given along this line.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This matter has been before the government on several occasions during the past 20 years. The position at the present time is that we know so little about water tables that we are embarking upon a rather hazardous type of venture. Ever since the farmers opened up the prairies at the turn of the century it has been appreciated how much the law of luck concerning water supply enters into digging wells. Therefore the department has been a little hesitant about going into this type of operation.

I would inform the hon. member that in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys a program was started two years ago to carry out studies of ground water tables and water supplies in western Canada. I cannot say how far that work has gone or how much ground has been covered, but I think we will know a great deal more about digging wells after that work has been completed by this department.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two brief items I should like to raise at this time. One has to do with certain conditions on the South Saskatchewan river project.

I should first of all like to raise the question of wage rates being paid along the project. In particular I should like to raise the question of the wage rates being paid to carpenters, because I have received a quite substantial communication on this matter.

I am informed that some time late last fall the carpenters' rate was boosted from $1.80 to $1.95 per hour and that this went some distance towards meeting the criticism that wages being paid on the South Saskatchewan river project generally were not in keeping with those being paid for comparable work in such places as Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, Swift Current, Prince Albert, the Squaw rapids project, and so on.

However, it has been pointed out in the correspondence that has been brought to my attention that in spite of this increase there is still a substantial difference between the wages paid to carpenters on the project and wages in these various localities. I am informed that at Saskatoon and Moose Jaw the wage is $2.25 an hour; at Swift Current it is $2.05 an hour; at Prince Albert it is $2.05 an hour and at Squaw rapids it is $2.05 an hour.

It is pointed out that the Squaw rapids project is about the same distance from Prince Albert as the Saskatchewan river project is from the city of Swift Current, and that the rate paid in the city of Swift Current is ten cents an hour higher than the rate paid on the dam. I am also informed that the rate paid is 30 cents an hour below the closest centres, namely Moose Jaw and Saskatoon. I would ask the minister, if he has any information to give on this point, to inform the committee whether the Department of Labour has laid down any rule or given the minister any advice which might lead to an improvement in the rates paid to carpenters on the project so that wages may be brought more closely into line with wages paid to carpenters in the various centres to which I have referred.

I have also received some correspondence, as have other members—I believe the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar raised this matter in the house at one time—having to do with health conditions at the South Saskatchewan river project. It has been pointed out in the correspondence which has been sent to me that health conditions on the project leave a great deal to be desired. The position has been referred to the Department of National Health and Welfare which undoubtedly has an interest in this field, but since these conditions prevail in camps operated by companies which have contracts for the construction of this project I should think the Minister of Agriculture is actually the man who would have the greater influence and that in the future he could exercise some authority to see that camp conditions are improved. It has been pointed out that the employees pay $2.50 a day for room and board, or $75 per month, and that for this sum they should be entitled to expect a reasonable standard of food and shelter. The letter which has come to me was sent out under the signature of Joseph A. Thain, international representative of the union of operating engineers and it calls for a full investigation into such matters as the condition of the bunk houses and bedding, the immediate removal of the Ingram camp, there being no water in that area; insufficient seating accommodation, no cloak room at the entrance to dining room, inadequate food service, cold food, the insufficiency of the cooking area, the very low standard of meals, the breakdown in the water and lighting systems and the lack of facilities for those who carry lunch, as a result of which they are obliged to eat in washrooms.

Since such conditions are abhorrent, and I am sure the minister would be most anxious to improve them, I should like to know what progress has been made in redressing these grievances and whether there has been any supervision undertaken by the Department of Agriculture or by the Department of National Health and Welfare. As I say, I think the Minister of Agriculture is in a place of authority to see that these conditions are improved. Perhaps he would tell the committee what precautions are being taken to make sure that healthy conditions are maintained for the men in the camps in the years ahead.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I wish to thank the hon. member for having brought this matter to the attention of the committee because it gives us in the department a chance to state what has been done. To deal, first with the question of health conditions, complaints did come in to us and these were transferred to the Department of National Health and Welfare. An inspector did find, in particular, one subcontractor at whose camp conditions were very much like those which the hon. member described. We understand that this situation was corrected and the inspectors of the Department of National Health and Welfare are now making periodic inspections. I think that, generally speaking, the main contractors do provide a high level of health conditions for their workers. The odd subcontractor might, as in this case, not have provided them. Now that the inspectors are going around regularly I think conditions will improve.

With regard to wages, there was considerable quarrelling going on in the first year or so with regard to the differential between the wage rates in Saskatoon and elsewhere. An adjustment was made not very long ago and since that time, as I understand, no complaints have been sent to us in Ottawa on this question of wage rate differentials. I may say in passing that the technique used on any of these projects is to establish a wage rate for the area; you do not take the wage rate in Swift Current, or Regina or Saskatoon as the basis. The impact effect is always changing, of course, and the figures are revised from time to time. As I understand it now, using the name of the person to whom the hon. member has referred, there have been no serious complaints for some time and I gather that the situation is fairly satisfactory.

Mr. Rapp: I should like to express thanks to the Minister of Agriculture for having given orders through the P.F.R.A. to build an irrigation and water storage project for the Muenster college in Muenster, Saskatchewan. Muenster college is owned and operated by the St. Benedict order. We were finally able to see this irrigation work undertaken last year. It was very important because the Muenster college operates a big farm and has many livestock on the farm. During dry years they are very short of water and the project is of great benefit to this college.

Mr. Cooper: I should like to comment on water projects as they affect the constituency of Rosetown-Biggar in central Saskatchewan. First, the policy of water conservation with dugouts and dams has made a big improvement in Saskatchewan. As a young man I went west. I started farming in 1919 at 19 years of age. The first two crops were failures. We had the best of land, but drought caused two crop failures in succession. I did not get out of debt until 1923 and we had a few wet years.

We have wonderful land. A lot of it should not have been broken up, I admit. We have a long growing season and freedom from frost. But our worry was drought. Starting farming at the age I did, the thought uppermost in my mind was water conservation. When you see the fields all flooded in spring you cannot help regretting that the water will all run off into the river and eventually into lake Winnipeg. This conservation program of dams and dugouts has improved our pasture land for stock and irrigation projects.

Speaking of the Saskatchewan river dam, I was down there last week. In fact, they wrote to me regarding conditions at that time. First, I visited the P.F.R.A. camp. If there is in Ottawa or elsewhere a cleaner and better place to eat than the P.F.R.A. camp I should like to see it. I had many meals there. The floors are polished every day. The P.F.R.A. staff are living two men to a room, some of them with bath and toilet facilities. I went from there to the Kewitt, Johnson and Poole camp. That is where I had my dinner that day. The kitchen and dining rooms were clean. There was a choice of T-bone steak with mushrooms or hamburger steaks with onions. They invited me in to see their bedrooms. The bedrooms were clean. I would not mind sleeping in any room that I went through that day.

I went through Pigott's contruction camp on the other side of the river and have had meals there. I do a lot of visiting in that area and accept meals whenever I can. The meals I received at the Pigott camp on the west side of the river were very wholesome. I was informed that the only thing the men were required to do was keep their rooms clean. I was asked to look at the rooms to see whether they were dirty, and must say that some did have dirt on the floors but others were cleaned up and had pin-up girls on the walls and I thought were very nice places to stay.

There was some complaint about a year ago in regard to wages paid at these camps. I made an investigation in this regard and found that labourers building the camps were paid at the rate of $1.25 per hour. Individuals working on bridge construction as labourers received $1.45 per hour, and steam engineers firing the boilers received $1.90 an hour. At Smith Brothers-Wilson Camp carpenters were receiving $1.90 per hour plus $100 per month maintenance allowance while away from home. There were 15 farm boys from the town of Hawarden working there receiving $1.75 an hour driving nails. They were not required to handle a saw because everything was pre-cut before it arrived at the job. I may say that the officers of the Kewitt, Johnson and Poole camp received a letter of apology from Mr. Joe Thain after this investigation.

I do not want to prolong this discussion and feel I have explained as much as I can at this time. This work is progressing favourably. There were 500 men employed over the winter and it is expected that from 1,500 to 2,000 will be employed during the coming summer. Winter work on the diversion tunnels continued all winter. I went into the first tunnel and found that the 25-foot hole has been extended 600 feet with the ring beams and cement. As I say, the work is progressing rapidly and on schedule, and it is expected that the job will be completed in 1965.

35. Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act including authority to make recoverable advances in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of the share of the province of Nova Scotia of the cost of the Annapolis river Aboiteau-Causeway project, $1,034,873.

Mr. Creaghan: In regard to this vote I might say that slightly in excess of $1 million will be spent in eastern New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. The maritime marshland rehabilitation federal agency is designed to provide assistance to these three provinces for the development of tidal marshlands. The estimate this year is about $600,000 less than last year, and this reduction is primarily brought about because of the fact that the Tantramar river dam is just about completed. This dam is located entirely in my riding and is one of the first major projects approved by the federal government in Westmorland since my election to parliament. This dam was first requested in 1949 and an order in council in 1950 authorized a Toronto firm to do the survey.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the present Minister of National Defence for his wonderful co-operation in 1958, 1959 and 1960 and the present Minister of Agriculture for his continued co-operation. The staff of M.M.R.A. consists of well-trained engineers and experts in causeway construction. As a result of their experience and training the province of New Brunswick, in March 1960, requested the federal government to permit the use of their facilities and experts to design a causeway known as the Peticodiac river causeway. The federal engineers working on this program submitted an interim report which was made public during the month of November last at which time it was indicated that a final report on feasibility would be completed by March 31, 1961.

During the Easter recess I made inquiries at Amherst, Nova Scotia, and was advised that the final report was posted on Friday last to the Department of Public Works at Fredericton, New Brunswick, and to the appropriate officials in Ottawa. I would appreciate if the minister would indicate at this time if he has received a report regarding this study known as the Petitcodiac river causeway.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In answer to the hon. member's question, I might say that the report has been studied by the department and I believe a letter is now in the mail submitting that report to the New Brunswick provincial government.

Special—

36. Prairie Farm Assistance Act—administration, $690,483.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, in connection with this item 36, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, arising out of a statement he made recently to the effect that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act would be extended to the whole of Canada. Would he like to comment on that?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The Prairie Farm Assistance Act applies only to the prairie areas. The statement I made some months ago was that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act should be applied to Canada as a whole because it is concerned with the rehabilitation of water and soil resources. I feel a similar type of act should be provided for the whole of Canada.

Mr. McIntosh: I would like to suggest to the minister that the regulations of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act should be considered at the present time because they have not been revised since 1958. I would suggest that payment should now be made on an individual basis rather than on a block basis. I feel some consideration should be given to the areas where ranching is carried out regarding fodder being considered as equivalent to grain because there is a certain amount of bad feeling in areas where ranching and farming is done side by side.

The situation now is such that a farming area adjoining ranch land is not entitled to payment but the rancher who does not sell his grain but cuts it for fodder to feed cattle receives revenue from the sale of the cattle and also payments under prairie farm assistance. I think those ranchers themselves feel that this is unfair and that if this situation were rectified the feeling which now exists in these areas would be eliminated.

Mr. Regier: I would like to ask the minister in respect of this vote how many and what are the areas where contribution is paid but where no advantage has been taken of the benefits under this scheme.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There are about 7,000 townships in western Canada which are covered by the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. There are a few townships which have never received any payments under this act. I think most of them are in Manitoba though there may be one or two in Saskatchewan. The parliamentary secretary informs me that Red River has a few townships which have never had a payment.

Mr. Regier: I notice the minister said there are a few townships of the 7,000 which have never received any benefits. Can he give us any specific figures of how many townships have never yet qualified for any benefits?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I asked this question of the head of P.F.A.A. a week or 10 days ago and his answer was, "Just a few". I think by "a few" he would mean probably less than a dozen of the 7,000. I can get a breakdown of them if the hon. member would give us time to go through all the figures and round them up. It will take some time to check over how many times they received assistance. It would be much easier to give the numbers that have received it many times because we have that tabulation now.

Mr. Regier: I believe the minister is a little optimistic or maybe pessimistic, depending on how you look at it. He says there are only a few which have never been eligible to claim any benefits. Has any consideration ever been given to exempting areas of the prairies from paying their levy because, owing to the elements of nature, they ought not to be included since they are not in any risk area whatsoever?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I can only inform the hon. member that ever since the scheme started the people who have not received as much money out of the scheme as they put in have complained continually, but they have not been allowed to withdraw.

Mr. Argue: They never wanted to.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, I am afraid they have asked on many occasions to get out or to have the payments increased or something along that line. I think the hon. member will find that many have asked to be let out but they have not been allowed to get out because it is a rule that is applied to all farmers, and they stick to it.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I think the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been one of the best acts on the statute books of this country. It is something that should be maintained and improved. I agree with the remarks made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek who pointed out that payments should be made on an individual basis. Some of us, including the Prime Minister himself, over many years have been campaigning for this kind of change in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. We think other changes should be made, especially in the maximum payments for various categories of yield. The payments that may be obtained under the act at the present time are too low and bear no reasonable relationship whatsoever to the cost of production. The government should consider a substantial increase in the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. With crop production costs as they are at the present time, I think a very powerful argument could be made for doubling the payments under this act. That would be a very—I do not like to use this word—"conservative" payment; it would be a very low payment and in no way adequate to meet the farmers' cost of production. Of course, it would be a very substantial improvement over the payments which are being made today.

The government has another scheme which is closely related to this scheme, namely the crop insurance provision. We have had some very critical things to say about the crop insurance scheme. In so far as Saskatchewan is concerned it just is not worth while. Forty thousand farmers were circulated and 200 signed up for the insurance. It is agreed that it is merely an experimental method of gathering some information on the operations of a crop insurance scheme. The federal payment into the scheme is 20 per cent of the likely or the projected future premiums and half of the administration costs. This is a very tiny part of what might be a liability for the provinces in time of widespread crop failure.

It used to be that crop failure resulted almost exclusively from drought. In spite of the fact that the west is dry today I think drought is much less a menace now than it was 10 years or 20 years ago. Farmers use better production methods; they have better equipment. They are able to handle their soil in a much better way. Many of them operate on a 50 per cent summer fallow basis, so that the risk of drought is very much less today, even with a given quantity of rainfall, than it was some years ago.

Can the minister tell the committee how many farmers have been taken out of prairie farm assistance because of the operation of crop insurance? In other words, how many farmers are under the crop insurance scheme in Manitoba and therefore outside the Prairie Farm Assistance Act? How many in Saskatchewan are likely to be outside the scheme? My information is there are a couple of hundred. What is happening to the crop insurance program in Alberta?

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. member permit a question? He suggests that there should be an increase in the payment under P.F.A.A. Bearing in mind the fact that the contribution from the farmer by way of deduction of 1 per cent is something less than 50 per cent of the outgo, would he suggest that the levy itself should be increased?

Mr. Argue: I will answer tomorrow; it is now six o'clock.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I wonder whether we could ask the committee to give consideration to sitting a few moments longer since this is the last vote.

Mr. Argue: No, six o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether the house leader will indicate the business for the days ahead?

Mr. Churchill: We have to make a slight change in what I announced last night, Mr. Speaker. We will finish agriculture tomorrow, which I presume will not take more than another 10 or 15 minutes, and then go on with the estimates of the post office.

Last night I announced that they would be followed by the estimates of the Department of Public Works, but owing to certain unavoidable matters and absences that will be caused on both sides of the house we have agreed to switch to the Department of Fisheries when the post office has been completed. So that there will be no misunderstanding and as an instance of good co-operation, because of other absences on Friday which affect the estimates of the Department of Fisheries, we have agreed that, despite the progress we may make with the estimates of that department, we will nevertheless keep item No. 1 open for further consideration on some future occasion.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

ILLEGAL CHINESE ENTRANTS

Question No. 99—Mr. Howard:

1. Have any of the alleged illegal entrants of Chinese origin been offered any amnesty or been provided with any facilities for regularizing their entry to Canada, and, if so, how many such entrants have been affected?

2. Has the government, or any minister thereof, waived any provisions of the law in so far as the alleged illegal entrants are concerned, and, if so, which particular provisions have been so waived, in how many instances, and by authority of which particular provisions of which statute or regulation?

3. Have any prosecutions been entered into with respect to the said illegal entry, and, if so, what charges were laid in each case, and what has been the disposition thereof?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. The announcement made in the House of Commons on June 9, 1960, stated that "it is not the intention in connection with the current investigation to prosecute or deport from the country any Chinese presently in Canada, who have not themselves engaged in assisting other Chinese apart from their own relatives, to enter Canada illegally".

The announcement affects equally, on the basis of the terms and conditions set out therein, all illegal Chinese entrants to Canada who were in Canada at the time the announcement was made. It is not possible to state the total number involved, since the full number of those who have themselves entered illegally and of those who have helped their own relatives to enter is not yet known.

Facilities have been provided in each of the main immigration offices across Canada to assist individuals who wish to make a full disclosure of the circumstances of their illegal entry into Canada or of the help they have given to other illegal entrants. Special staff members have been trained and assigned for this purpose. Where it is satisfactorily established that full and complete disclosure has been made, each case is then studied to determine what further steps are required to regularize the status of the individual in Canada. In some cases correction of certain information on departmental records may be all that is required. In other cases where an individual has entered under a false identity, or through use of a Canadian passport obtained by fraud, it may be necessary to recommend that permanent landing be granted by order in council under the individual's true identity. In other cases the individual may have acquired Canadian citizenship under a false identity, and this may have to be corrected.

2. No provisions of the Immigration Act have been waived. Section 26 of the act provides that the director of immigration shall order an "inquiry" to be held, which may lead to a deportation order being issued, in cases where he has received a written report under section 19, and "where he considers that an inquiry is warranted". Since the announcement in the House of Commons on June 9, 1960, the director has exercised his discretion under section 26, and has not ordered an inquiry to be held in cases which appear to fall within the scope of the announcement.

3. No prosecutions have been entered with respect to illegal entry, except in cases falling outside the scope of the announcement made in the House of Commons on June 9, 1960.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 13, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHAMBERS—CORRECTION OF NEWSPAPER AND RADIO REPORTS OF REMARKS

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a question of privilege and join the great body of the misquoted. Last night I was a member of a panel at a meeting of the "Voice of Women" here in Ottawa. This morning the Canadian Press issued a story from which I will quote briefly:

> Canada needs Bomarc missiles equipped with nuclear warheads if Canada hopes to defend itself adequately, Egan Chambers . . . said here last night.

What I said was that Canada requires Bomarc missiles and quoted what has been said in this house, that these reach their maximum effectiveness with nuclear warheads. It will be recognized that this does not rule out the rejection of nuclear warheads for other reasons.

Also, this morning radio station CBO quoted me as follows:

> Disarmament pronouncements of external affairs minister Howard Green have lost in general popularity because they are supported by certain radical elements.

What I did was urge the "Voice of Women" to give the maximum support to the practical and realistic disarmament efforts of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and say that I did not feel it was of assistance to him to advocate neutralism or unilateral disarmament.

This was an informal meeting and I had no text, but I have checked my recollection of what I said with other well known newspaper men who were present, and they substantiate my version. I should like to say that I appreciate the difficulty of writing an accurate and abbreviated press account of such a meeting, and I also appreciate the fact that the Canadian Press has issued a correction of its story.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH U.K. PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition suggested that I might give a short summary of what transpired during the visit to Ottawa of the right hon. Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. Though I do not feel free, as he realizes, to reveal the substance of the various private discussions which were held between Mr. Macmillan and myself during the visit, some general indication of the topics which were covered may be of interest.

One of the most important was the United Kingdom's relationship with Europe. This is a matter of major importance not only to the United Kingdom and the countries of Europe but to Canada itself, and indeed the whole western world. It should not be seen in purely economic terms, but as a broad development of much consequence in which there must be a careful weighing of both short and long term considerations and of political as well as economic factors. The United Kingdom government has these broad considerations in mind in examining the question of its relationship with Europe.

Reference has been made to the concept of an Atlantic community. As I indicated yesterday, these relationships among groupings in Europe and groupings in other regions of the world will take a very long time to develop and mature. It is well to recall, however, that to some extent the Atlantic community already exists, not in an institutional form but in a degree of spiritual fellowship and also in the various forms of co-operation in the military, political and economic spheres. It is naturally desirable, if not mandatory, in the interests of reinforcing the collective strength, stability and understanding of the western world, that co-operation should be expanded and intensified as practical possibilities permit.

I took the opportunity to restate the concern of the Canadian government regarding arrangements which the United Kingdom might work out with common market countries; that full account be taken of the trading interests of Canada. I made it clear that this would be particularly necessary in the field of agricultural products in which Canada has a substantial interest, and in respect of which the common market treaty has not yet led to specific trading arrangements. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom left me with a clear impression that the United Kingdom government intends to make every effort to work out a satisfactory means of participating in the economic organization of Europe without detriment to Canadian or commonwealth interests. In this connection discussions will continue from time to time, and my hope is that, through continuing consultation, arrangements will be arrived at in keeping with Canada's wishes in this regard.

NATO is one subject which was discussed at some length, and the imperative need for greater efforts than have been made heretofore to bring NATO into a strong, flexible and understanding partnership was underlined. In addition, the need of moral, military and political capacity if NATO is to pursue its objectives successfully was emphasized.

The Leader of the Opposition, with his knowledge of the operation of NATO from its foundation, will realize that the importance of political consultation has been a subject of consideration throughout the years. Indeed, he belonged to the group known as the three wise men which made recommendations in this regard. I think Mr. Macmillan would agree that what requires development is the will and the readiness to consult well in advance. The machinery is there, and it cannot be blamed now for any shortcomings in consultation.

The question of a meeting of NATO heads of government was discussed. I feel such a meeting is necessary, but I am equally convinced that it should not be held until there has been thorough preparation and investigation in advance of the likely areas of agreement.

In the international field we reviewed the current situation in Laos and the Congo, but I do not think there is anything to report to the house, since the position in both these areas has been adequately reported in the press and in this chamber.

The problem of China is one to which attention was devoted. In particular, Mr. Macmillan and I discussed the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations and agreed that it was important to continue to work on this problem in preparation for the next regular session of the general assembly later this year.

The house is aware of the fact that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom visited the West Indies before coming to the United States and Canada. During the course of our discussions he gave an account of the political situation in the West Indies and the outlook for the establishment of a federation when complete West Indies independence has been attained. The economic problems of the West Indies and the relationship of Canadian aid and other such programs to these problems in the western hemisphere were considered.

We discussed the question of low cost imports from Hong Kong, a matter of very salient interest to Canadians at this time. As a result I believe a better understanding of the problems was arrived at, and further discussions will be continued by representatives of both governments.

Mention was made yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition to the uranium situation. On this matter both Mr. Macmillan and I had a word to say to the press following our meeting on Tuesday. Negotiations are continuing, and it would not be advantageous to go into this matter at this time. I might say that early meetings in London are anticipated to the end that negotiations will be resumed on the substance of this issue. In the meantime there is nothing to add to what I said in this regard when speaking in the house some week or ten days ago.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think we can conclude from what the Prime Minister has said in his report to the house on the discussions between himself and the members of his government and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom that perhaps the most important matter that came up was the United Kingdom making it quite clear—and indeed it was made quite clear by Mr. Macmillan in Washington—that the United Kingdom is moving toward a merger of the European free trade area and the common market. Indeed, as Mr. Macmillan is reported to have said in his press conference, that is the objective that the United Kingdom government has in mind. He was quoted as saying that once that merger has been achieved, and I quote from the press, "Then perhaps we can put together an Atlantic free trade area". These words confirm what Mr. Macmillan apparently said in Washington, and certainly what he said in a very important speech he made in Boston. He is reported as having said in that speech, and I quote from the Winnipeg Free Press of April 10, 1961:

> We need to think not so much nationally or even in terms of greater economic co-operation between nations but in terms of wider groupings.

This is obviously, therefore, as the Prime Minister has indicated, a very important development. The relationship of our own country to that development is also one of major importance. Indeed, I think we will all agree that Canada's reaction should be a positive one, otherwise we may find ourselves carried along by events into an insufficient continentalism.

The Prime Minister also mentioned discussions about NATO. We on this side are only too anxious to support anything that can be done by our own government or by the other member governments, including the United Kingdom, to make that organization stronger rather than weaker. The Prime Minister did not mention something that Mr. Macmillan himself also mentioned in Washington in his talks with President Kennedy, namely the desirability of a nuclear partnership inside NATO. I do not know whether that matter came up, but certainly it invites the question whether a nuclear partnership will make NATO stronger, or whether it may have the opposite effect of making it more difficult for NATO to strengthen its conventional forces.

Mention of NATO and the necessity of strengthening it reminds me of a statement made on this subject the day before yesterday by President de Gaulle, when he said, "It is the right and duty of the European continental powers to have a national defence that belongs to them". I hope, Mr. Speaker, that in any of the steps that are now being taken to strengthen NATO it will be made quite clear that there can be no salvation for the NATO countries in national defence alone.

The Prime Minister mentioned that they had a discussion about China. He said "The problem"—and it is a problem—"of Chinese representation at the United Nations is one that must be worked at against the next United Nations assembly". It would have been interesting, and perhaps we will learn later, to know the line which the Canadian government will be following in trying to work out a solution of that problem because, as the Prime Minister indicated, it is a problem that will certainly now come, perhaps in a concrete form, before the next United Nations assembly.

The Prime Minister mentioned uranium purchases. He is reported in the press as having said publicly "There is now a clear understanding of the position between the two governments in respect of this matter". He said that negotiations in regard to them—perhaps they should be called renegotiations—are about to take place shortly. In the face of negotiations which will be of such importance to Canada and to Canadian trade, I do not desire to do or say anything which would complicate those negotiations. But surely the matter is, as the Prime Minister is reported to have said, quite clear. There is a commitment undertaken by the United Kingdom government. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce said not long ago, it is to be expected that the United Kingdom will honour that commitment, that the discussions to take place in London will confirm that commitment and discharge that undertaking so these orders can be allocated and bring new life, hope and activity to the uranium communities.

I am sure that the conversations which have just been concluded between the prime ministers of Canada and the United Kingdom have been valuable to the governments of both countries. I am equally sure that Mr. Macmillan has gone back to the United Kingdom confirmed in his view of the underlying friendship of the Canadian people not only to himself and his government but to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am certain that the visit to Canada of Prime Minister Macmillan was welcomed by all Canadians, and we are pleased that the Prime Minister has given to the house today something of a report, in general terms, of the discussion that took place between him and Prime Minister Macmillan. However, I think it would be fair to say that there was very little new in the statement made by the Prime Minister.

Certainly many questions are left very much unanswered. Not only are we still uncertain as to what facilities Canada will have for the export of her products to the United Kingdom market in the future, but in my opinion we are also very much up in the air as to the policy of the Canadian government in relation to the inner six, the outer seven and the Atlantic free trade area. We naturally hope that in any new developments Canada's rights will remain unimpaired, but we view with some misgiving the fact that Canada has not enunciated a clear policy of her own.

The Prime Minister made a very general reference to NATO. I am not really sure what it meant. The effect of his remarks was that there should be a strong, flexible and understanding partnership. The whole question of nuclear weapons for NATO, the question of the Polaris missile and so on, are unanswered. The position of our group is clear. We feel it would be a mistake to provide nuclear weapons for NATO at this time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: The Canadian government has not made up its mind. The Leader of the Opposition went both ways. Hon. members may snicker, but at least we are able to say that we are opposed to nuclear weapons being placed in the hands of the NATO nations.

There was obviously no reference to economic development, because economic development under article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty is weak and almost forgotten. It is the O.E.C.D., the inner six, the outer seven and other means of bringing about economic cooperation which are now being put into effect in this field where NATO has failed.

The Prime Minister's reference to China and its possible admission to the United Nations at some future date was interesting but not very informative or clear. I am not certain what the position of the government is. I would hope his statement means that Canada will play a part in promoting the admission of China to the United Nations, because without China as a member disarmament talks are less useful and in our judgment it is more difficult for the United Nations to carry on its very valuable functions.

A general reference was made to the West Indies. We hope that in the future there can be closer co-operation between Canada and the West Indies in the economic and political fields. We hope that our immigration policies in the future will be tailored in such a way as to remove discrimination in this area.

The Prime Minister also made some reference to the uranium contracts. We hope that Canada will stand firm and insist that the United Kingdom honour the contracts for the purchase of 12,000 tons of uranium. We hope that these contracts will be allocated in a fair and generous way and that Eldorado will receive its fair share along with other companies so that the uranium industry of Canada and the communities affected will be maintained with as little dislocation as possible.

Undoubtedly the consultation between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom has been welcome. Nonetheless we are disappointed that the Prime Minister has not been able to report accomplishments arising from this conference in a more concrete fashion.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of his statement. I understood him to say—and I think I can paraphrase this part fairly accurately—in connection with the uranium contracts that early meetings are anticipated when negotiations will be resumed. My question is this. Can he tell us, in a more precise way, when these meetings will take place? Second, will the meetings be between members of the government or between officials of the two agencies?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have not before me my exact remarks in that connection, but I thought I had said that negotiations would be continued rather than resumed, because they have been continuing. I may have used the word "resume". When I am in a position to do so I will make an announcement to the house—and I expect that will be very shortly—as to the membership of the Canadian group which I expect will go to London in the very near future. In that connection may I say that it might be only one person who will go or it might be several.

Mr. McIlraith: I wish to ask a supplementary question. There seems to be a little confusion arising out of something said in a committee in another place. I wonder whether the Prime Minister is now in a position to indicate whether these continued negotiations will be carried on between government members or between officials of the atomic energy agencies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have already pointed out that negotiations will be continued. In the past in general they have been negotiations between Eldorado and the atomic authority in the old country, with the Minister of Trade and Commerce participating or at least being made fully aware of what is going on. What the personnel will be of the continued negotiating group or who the one individual will be, if such should be the case, I am not in a position to say at this time.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to ask a further supplementary question apropos of the Prime Minister's statement a moment ago. The Prime Minister indicated that the relationship between the common market countries and the United Kingdom will take a long time to develop and mature. Then he added an expression of the concern of the Canadian government at the rearrangement which the United Kingdom might work out with common market countries. My question is this. Apart from O.E.C.D., what has Canada done to enter into negotiations with the common market and free trade area with a view to safeguarding our export position in Europe?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, this whole question has been discussed over a considerable period of time between the governments of Canada and the United Kingdom. When I said that the relationship between the Six and the Seven—now the Eight—would be a lengthy process, I think a reading of what I said will indicate that I stated that the establishment of an Atlantic community would be a long time process.

Mr. Chevrier: Apart from the relationship between Canada and the United Kingdom, has Canada approached the common market countries or the free trade area in connection with the formation of an Atlantic area?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the house has already had information in this regard. Discussions naturally are continuing with representatives of several, if not all, of the countries in question.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL AND TERMS OF REFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can indicate what progress, if any, has been made in setting up the royal commission on medical care.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Very good progress has been made, and there should be an announcement shortly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SEATING PLAN PAMPHLET—COMPLAINT AS TO FRENCH VERSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

These last few days, visitors have been handed a folder containing, in addition to a diagram of the House of Commons, some information about the house itself and the procedure of the parliamentary institution. Since the French version is faulty and of a rather poor quality generally, I should like to know whether the minister has seen it and, if so, whether he intends to comment on this matter.

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Roberval for giving me notice of his question and sending me a copy of the folder in question. Here is my reply.

I have read the folder in question with interest. Though I cannot claim to be a grammarian or a professor of literature, something which my hon. friend can do, I have noted certain expressions and phrases which he has drawn to my attention. While I am not scandalized, I recognize that those expressions and phrases appear questionable, to say the least. I therefore intend to submit the whole thing to the superintendent of the bureau for translations that any necessary correction may be made.

MOOSONEE, ONT.—WORKING CONDITIONS AT RADAR BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Has the minister any report to make to the house on the recent investigation conducted by his officials into complaints about alleged working and living conditions at the Carter Construction Company at Moosonee?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have received a report on this matter, and I shall be glad to convey that report to the hon. member if he is interested.

NATIONAL PARKS

QUEBEC—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PROVINCIAL MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. Deschambault (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Speaking on a bill concerning the Quebec tourist industry, the secretary of the province of Quebec made the following statement which appeared in this morning's papers:

> The Quebec government has approached the government in Ottawa concerning the establishment of a national park in Quebec.

Is the minister in a position to comment on that statement and tell us what could be the particular location of this park?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the setting up of a national park in Quebec is a project that goes back to 1937.

I took it upon myself to resume the talks on this matter with the present prime minister of Quebec in November 1960. His colleague, the provincial secretary, has informed me several times of his intention to discuss the situation with me. I am at his disposal at all times for such discussions.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACTS FOR SUBMARINE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government made a decision to award contracts for six submarines for the Royal Canadian Navy? If so, will the Prime Minister inform the house whether these contracts will be distributed among Canadian shipyards so the work will be shared by shipbuilding industries both in the west and in the east?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the latter portion of the question is not in keeping with the facts, as no decision has been made by the government to purchase or build six or any number of submarines.

PUBLIC WORKS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. The question arises out of a report appearing in this morning's Globe and Mail in which the minister is reported as saying, "We should have blue signs hanging over a job we pay for". Can the minister inform the house of the method by which only Tories are assessed to pay for these jobs?

Some hon. Members: Order.

AIR TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING DOMESTIC ROUTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of a reported conflict between C.P.A. and T.C.A. over air routes in the future. Can the minister say whether there will be an air transport board hearing on this question, or whether the government has under consideration the submission by C.P.A. to change the government's policy in this regard?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as far as internal transcontinental or regional air routes are concerned, these matters are dealt with by the air transport board. As far as international agreements in these matters are concerned, these are for cabinet decision. With regard to the particular case which the hon. member has brought to my attention, all I can say is that this matter of national air policy is one that is before cabinet at the present time for consideration.

SHIPPING

TRANSFER OF LAKE CARRIER TO WEST INDIES REGISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport with reference to a press report regarding the transfer of a large Canada Steamship Lines bulk lake carrier to British West Indies registry to save on taxes and operating costs.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Will this ship be entitled to the same rights and privileges, under the Canada Shipping Act, as a ship of Canadian registry? More precisely, will this ship be able to pick up a cargo in one Canadian great lakes port and deliver it to another Canadian great lakes port? Will the sailors pay income tax to the Canadian government or to the British West Indies government if this ship continues to operate in Canadian inland waters?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Has the hon. member given notice of his question?

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Yes, I have.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if this ship is registered in Bermuda it will appear in the commonwealth registry and will be entitled to the rights and privileges of ships which carry that registry.

As far as the income tax of sailors aboard a ship of this nature is concerned, I think that question should be directed to my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Transport. In view of the statement the minister has made from time to time outside the house concerning amendments to the Canada Shipping Act and the vessel construction assistance act, may I ask when the new shipping policy will be announced in the house.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): At this session, Mr. Speaker.

NATURAL RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO INVITATIONS TO CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources a question relating to the resources for tomorrow conference, based on information I received yesterday that the largest labour group in central Canada, with a membership of many thousands of workers in this field, has received no invitation to participate either actively or as an observer at this important conference.

Would the minister indicate whether all the invitations have gone out, and which particular fields are being covered by the government and which by the provinces?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the individual invitations to the various groups are being issued by the provincial governments. If the hon. member will indicate which union is involved I shall be happy to investigate the matter.

POWER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): While I am on my feet perhaps I could reply to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin). The hon. member asked whether I had received a communication from the Yellowknife miners union regarding the granting of a ten year power franchise by the municipal government of Yellowknife to a private company in Edmonton. I have investigated the matter, and have discovered that while no letter was directed to me personally, a copy of a letter that was sent to the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) arrived in my office during my absence in the territories last week.

In reply to the latter part of the question I should say that the handling of local franchises for the distribution of power in the Northwest Territories is a matter that comes under territorial and municipal jurisdiction, just as it comes under provincial and municipal jurisdiction in the provinces. I know from information given to me when I was in Yellowknife last week that the municipal council reviewed the franchise of the distributing company in the light of a report given to them by engineering consultants they retained. I would not want to comment on the action taken by the municipal council in a matter coming within its jurisdiction.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENT OF EXPORT CREDITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that I have not given him notice, would he inquire into and perhaps report to the house tomorrow on the volume of export credits which have been extended for the benefit of winter unemployment since the minister announced, on about November 25, that new facilities in this field would become available, with the co-operation of the chartered banks, that may involve assistance to the extent of $700 million.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad to do that, but the formation of facilities to make these credits available was not linked with unemployment, as I remember it. It was a facility to enable exporters to more readily obtain orders in foreign countries.

GRAIN

BARLEY—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Some time ago an announcement was made with regard to pool payments. I understand that such a payment has been made in respect of wheat. May I ask the minister when the farmers can expect a payment for last year's crop in respect of barley?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take this question as notice.

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—FORMATION OF JOINT U.S.-CANADA COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to put to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister examined the question I asked yesterday in the house concerning the Richelieu waterway and which, I am sure, was brought to his attention by the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been good enough to hand me that question. After reading it however, I found that it concerned my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

RED RIVER FLOOD CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether he has secured permission from the government of Manitoba to table the correspondence which on March 27 the house ordered to be tabled with regard to the Red river floodway.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, there has been no reply from the Manitoba government as yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister aware that the premier of Manitoba has stated in the legislature that he cannot get any consent from the federal government, and could the minister say how long this game of hide and seek will go on?

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

The Chairman: We are dealing with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, votes Nos. 36 and 21. These items will be found on pages 6 and 7 of the blue book, and the details are on pages 134 and 116. Shall vote 36 carry?

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

36. Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration, $690,483.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether under this item I might ask the extent to which the Crop Insurance Act has been applied or is being used in the three prairie provinces. As the minister very well knows, whenever a grain producer or a farmer becomes eligible for crop insurance, or signs a crop insurance contract, he ceases to pay into the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Therefore I think it would be in order under this item to ask to what extent farmers are no longer paying into the Prairie Farm Assistance Act because they have signed crop insurance contracts.

I wonder, also, whether the minister could briefly give the committee some indication of the extent to which crop insurance is being used in each of the three prairie provinces.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, the best figures I have are these; over 2,500 in Manitoba in the calendar year 1960, and I understand this figure is expected to double in 1961. In the province of Saskatchewan some 400 sent their cash deposits to the government, and a request has been received from that province to allow the setting up of special pilot schemes with less than 25 per cent of the farmers in the selected areas for this year only. This matter will be before the government shortly for a decision.

In so far as Alberta is concerned, there have been indications in the press that some thought is being given to crop insurance. I have had discussions with the minister of agriculture in British Columbia about crop insurance in the Okanagan valley. I have had discussions with the cabinet in Prince Edward Island about crop insurance relating to potatoes in that province. I believe there have been reports in the press that certain groups in Ontario are considering crop insurance in relation particularly to tobacco.

Mr. Nasserden: Under the cash advance legislation at the present time I believe that borrowers wishing to secure cash advances and unable to secure the endorsation of a landlord are unable to secure such advances. In some cases these people own land of their own, and I was wondering if new regulations could be brought in to enable such farmers to take advantage of these benefits with respect to the portion of land which they own.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This is a question which has been before the department on several occasions. There are some difficulties, of course, as the hon. members knows, in arriving at a formula which would meet these conditions. I have discussed the matter with the heads of various farm organizations in the hope that we can arrive at some formula which will meet the needs of those who are concerned in this way.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, could the minister give us the details of the expenditures incurred for each province, under this item, in the course of last year?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The payments are not yet complete, but they are almost complete; there are just a few places still to be investigated. The totals up to April 5, 1961 are as follows: Manitoba, $649,537; Saskatchewan, $4,535,499; Alberta, $4,822,018; British Columbia, $90,035. Total for the four provinces under P.F.A.A., $10,097,000.

Mr. Argue: The Prairie Farm Assistance Act item which is before the committee now is an important one, and I think the statement the minister has made about the extent of crop insurance applications underlines the fact that crop insurance to date has been of very little real value. It certainly has not done a job for western producers in the crop insurance field in any way, and I think the results confirm the statements which were made by some of us on this side of the house that unless there is a major overhaul of the crop insurance legislation it is bound to remain ineffectual particularly in the higher risk areas of western Canada.

The minister has told us that last year 2,500 farmers had contracts in Manitoba and that this year perhaps 400 will have contracts in Saskatchewan, provided the government of which the hon. gentleman is a member decides to allow some pilot schemes in various parts of the province where fewer than 25 per cent of the farmers have signed crop insurance applications. Farmers in Alberta are apparently not too interested in the legislation, because there is no scheme operating in that province at all.

If I remember correctly, the Canadian wheat board officials told us when they were before the agriculture committee that there are some 235,000 permit book holders in western Canada. So there are 235,000 farmers, and less than 3,000 of them have been covered by crop insurance. The best the minister could do today was to tell us that perhaps 5,000 or 6,000—2 per cent or 3 per cent of all the farmers in the prairie provinces—are going to avail themselves of crop insurance.

This government introduced the crop insurance scheme with a blaring of trumpets. This was to be another important plank in the magna carta for agriculture. Well, it is a pretty weak plank; very much of a sliver. It has been of a little use in Manitoba under particular conditions. In Saskatchewan, where I am informed the government, which has been promoting the scheme, sent out 40,000 application forms, the minister now says that 400 farmers have shown an interest. In other words, 1 per cent of the farmers receiving application forms have signed them and said they were interested.

Let us admit it; this is just a wee experimental project. This is not a system of crop insurance designed to protect western farmers. This is a little window dressing by the Conservative party with a few experimental projects under way. If I were in the position which the minister holds I would say that this scheme was a flop, a failure. It is not doing the job it was intended to do. I think I would be justified in using some of the strong language with regard to it which the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek used so effectively and, I am sure, so accurately in connection with another matter. The farmers he represents are not interested in crop insurance. I am sure of that. Most of the farmers I represent are not interested in crop insurance under this half-baked scheme which was brought in without prior consultation with the provinces.

Mr. McIntosh: Would the hon. member permit a question? The hon. member says the Saskatchewan government sent out 40,000 application forms. Does he know into which areas in Saskatchewan these forms were sent; into the high premium areas of hail or into the low premium areas?

Mr. Argue: I am not completely acquainted with what has been done—

Mr. McIntosh: Then you have made an irresponsible statement.

Mr. Argue: Not at all. I am willing to give the hon. member my impression of what has been done there but I cannot guarantee its accuracy. My impression is that they were sent out to the low risk high yield areas and not to the high risk low yield areas. That is my impression although, as I say, I cannot guarantee the accuracy of it. I was reliably informed that there were 40,000 applications sent out. If the answer to the hon. member is correct then of course it means that the farmers who would be paying the small premiums rather than the larger ones would still not be interested in this scheme.

Mr. Cooper: Will the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Argue: Certainly.

Mr. Cooper: Can you tell us how many municipalities applied that were turned down?

Mr. Argue: As I have said, I have no information in that regard, but the minister could give us that information. If the minister feels that the Saskatchewan government has not co-operated fully he can say so. I hope they have, and it is my impression that they have leaned over backward to try to get a crop insurance scheme working, and they are willing to co-operate.

I suggest that 20 per cent of the premium paid out of the national treasury is not enough. I remember how the Conservative members used to rip Jimmy Gardiner up and down the back and say he was a terrible minister of agriculture, but Jimmy Gardiner had legislation that functioned for many years. I refer to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Under that system the provincial government did not have to pay at all. Approximately half of the losses have been paid over the years by the federal treasury and half by the farmers.

Mr. Southam: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does the hon. member for Assiniboia realize that Mr. Brown, a member of the Saskatchewan legislative assembly, last year in that assembly advocated very strongly that the provincial government should bring in a practical type of crop insurance scheme, and thought the farmers themselves should be the ones to judge whether or not it worked?

Mr. Argue: I do not know what that question has to do with this discussion. It is about as far removed from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as that man in orbit was a couple of days ago. One individual in the Saskatchewan legislature made a speech and I am now being asked about it.

The crop insurance scheme, as a comprehensive scheme to protect western grain growers or for that matter the potato growers of Prince Edward Island or the apple producers in the Okanagan, is not working. This represents just a few pilot plans which are not producing many results. The reason is very obvious. The federal government is backing away from the kind of responsibility it accepted under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Under that act the federal government has been paying approximately 50 per cent of the losses, but under this scheme it is only prepared to pay 20 per cent of the premiums. They have scaled their responsibility down from 50 per cent to 20 per cent. One need not wonder why this does not work.

I suggest that the government should amend the Crop Insurance Act, and that its contribution should be increased at least to the 50 per cent level, the same level at which they were contributing under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I feel if that were done it would provide at least some incentive to farmers to sign up; because of the subsequent reduction in the premiums. This would provide a more realistic acceptance of responsibility by the federal government.

I have never been strong in my support of crop insurance schemes, as I think my record in the house will show. I remember reading a report put out by the late R. F. Motherwell—he was a good friend of my mine at the university who did not agree with me politically in any way—in which he made very comprehensive findings. I think the main conclusion of his study was that for a long time we should be operating under a general crop protection scheme such as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, with very definite and decided improvements in its application.

I would not like anyone to say that I am against a crop insurance act. On the contrary, I am in favour of it; but I feel we should give the farmers the opportunity to say whether they are getting adequate protection rather than giving them this half-baked scheme which appeals to just a handful of farmers on the prairies.

I feel that the payments made under prairie farm assistance are inadequate and outdated. These payments have not kept up in any way, shape or form with the increase to farmers in the cost of production. If one compares the benefits under prairie farm assistance today with the benefits received when the act was first introduced in the 1930's one will see that there is no question but that the payments under prairie farm assistance have much lower purchasing power than they did when the scheme was first initiated.

The benefit of prairie farm assistance has been allowed to slip and wither away over the years. Some improvements have been made in the basis on which payments have been allocated. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek suggested yesterday that payments should be made on an individual basis. I have been advocating this policy for many years, but we have not succeeded in this regard. When I first came to parliament in 1945, 171 townships in Saskatchewan suffered crop failure. It was then declared a disaster area and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act began to function. As I understand it today, if one township is eligible then one half a township becomes an operating unit, and by splicing them to additional areas, smaller areas than half a township can be eligible.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I think you will find that 12 sections is the size.

Mr. Speakman: Could the hon. member tell me which party brought this amendment into being?

Mr. Argue: There have been a great many amendments brought in over the years. Undoubtedly the Liberal party is responsible for more than the Conservative party, but it was here longer and had much greater opportunity to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: This party was responsible for the legislation in the first place.

Mr. Argue: I think you are right. It was first introduced in 1939. I might say, however, that we have all had a hand in this.

Mr. Speakman: When were you in the government?

Mr. Argue: I have had a hand in many things even though I have not been in government. I remember when Jimmy Gardiner brought forward an amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and he was so opposed to socialism that he said farmers operating on crown land would not be allowed assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. We had a difficult fight and it was hard going, but Jimmy pulled in his horns and decided he had gone a bit too far and gave the farmers operating on crown land a little better shake than he had initially intended to give them. He made some changes which I feel represented improvements to that act.

I suggest that it is now time to increase the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act by a very substantial amount. If the payments were doubled the amount of money a farmer could receive as the result of a complete crop failure would not be a fantastic amount. It would be just $6 per acre providing his yield was less than three bushels per acre. We all realize that today, of course, with improved farming practices, a yield of three bushels per acre is almost unheard of. Even with this proposed improvement a farmer with a crop failure, as defined in the act, would only receive a minimum guaranteed income. I feel there is room for both a crop insurance act and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, but I suggest that it is now time to bring forward amendments to improve the application of these acts.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has he had an official request from Quebec asking that the province take advantage of the crop insurance scheme implemented by the present government?

A great many farmers in the province of Quebec go in for special types of farming. In my own riding, for instance, it is tobacco farming. It would be of great interest to those farmers if the province of Quebec shared in this crop insurance scheme.

I should like to know whether the minister has received an official request from the provincial government.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Chairman. I should just like to say a word about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and crop insurance as related subjects. The policy of the government is to keep both the P.F.A.A. and the new legislation, crop insurance, in effect side by side. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act is a type of special measure to help farmers at a minimum cost in case of a drought in their area. Crop insurance is an altogether different thing. It is a fund set up by the farmers themselves on an actuarial basis so the individual farmer may insure himself against all types of risks due to weather. The amount of coverage will be 60 per cent of the actual value of production in the area, and farmers will soon realize that, over a period of years, for every 80 cents they put in they will receive back a dollar. It is not a form of social welfare or relief whatsoever; it is an individual insurance scheme carried out on an individual basis and on a sound actuarial plan.

For my own part I think I can say that wherever information pro and con has been put before farmers and questions have been allowed to be asked and answers given, the farmers in every case have supported crop insurance.

I should like to put on the record some of the discussion on this matter that took place in the legislature of Manitoba, as reported in the Hansard of that legislature of March 7, 1961. It is in effect, I think, a reply to the hon. member for Assiniboia. These are quotations from a speech by Mr. Hutton, the minister of agriculture:

> The crop insurance program I would say, is a success in Manitoba in 1960, and indications are that it's going to be successful in 1961. We are enlarging two of the areas; another one will be set up; it will be announced in the house. We are extending crop insurance to the beet growers in Manitoba.

I am leaving out some interjections which I do not think add to or subtract from what the minister said. I continue:

> Our experiment has been confined to areas representing about 20 per cent of the province of Manitoba. We have learned a great deal; we have come a long way in terms of getting information. Sooner than you wish to think we'll be in a position to offer crop insurance to the whole province of Manitoba. I think they're going to find out that as we said here in Manitoba that it's an educational program.

Then he went on to discuss classification of land and that sort of thing in connection with the crop insurance program. If hon. members will read the press clippings across Canada they will see that in Prince Edward Island the government mentioned crop insurance in the speech from the throne and declared their intention of bringing in a scheme for tobacco and potatoes. If hon. members read the press clippings from Alberta they will see that the farm organizations, knowing of the existing federal legislation, are asking their government to take positive action to bring crop insurance to Alberta. If hon. members will talk to the fruit producers of the province of British Columbia, the minister of agriculture, or any of those other people who are definitely interested in crop insurance under the present set-up, they will see that the provinces are moving forward under crop insurance not only with respect to cereal crops in the three prairie provinces but also in the specialty crops all across Canada. I would predict that in the next few years every province in Canada, with the possible exception of Newfoundland, about which I am not too clear at the moment, will have crop insurance schemes, and as those schemes demonstrate their soundness on an actuarial basis they will spread to all regions of every province. I believe that before a decade is over hon. members will see crop insurance schemes widely in effect over all the agricultural areas of Canada. It is good legislation.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I should like to make a few comments on this particular item. First, there has been some hold-up in the province of Alberta with respect to P.F.A.A. payments this year. I hope the department has got around this particular snag in the administration of this part of the act and that the cheques will continue to go out to farmers in the east central part of Alberta particularly.

I should like to say I am disappointed that the Alberta government has not made some move to adopt a system of crop insurance. Certainly in the western part of Alberta, particularly, where there is a great threat of hail, the crop insurance plan envisioned by this government and passed in 1958 or 1959 would be of benefit to those farmers. It would at least reduce their losses considerably.

The hon. member for Assiniboia went to great lengths to explain his theory of prairie farm assistance. He also showed his ignorance of the legislation, which did not really surprise me but may have surprised some hon. members. He spoke about areas eligible to qualify and said that it was a township. Actually this has been reduced to 12 sections. If he cares to read his own remarks in Hansard of a couple of years ago, after this government amended the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to a considerable extent, he will find that he complimented the government for doing so. It was one of those rare occasions when the hon. member for Assiniboia found himself in an agreeable frame of mind. He complimented the government on bringing in the amendments and said he certainly thought they would do away with many of the complaints he had received with respect to prairie farm assistance at that time. Today he has made another request. He has said that the payments should be increased. This is an old story coming from him. He is continually wanting increased payments of one kind or another.

Mr. Argue: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): But again he shows his ignorance of the operations of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. He said the payments should be doubled; they should be increased to $6. If the payments were doubled they would be increased to $8.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member is right. I made a mistake; the lowest payment is $4 an acre.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I compliment the hon. member on being in such an agreeable mood that he admits he made a mistake. I point out these two mistakes he made with regard to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I hope the committee will look at all his remarks in the way I have done and question every one of them and look for his errors in most of them. I can find some most of the time.

Under this item can the minister explain the significance of the section marked with an "(S)", where there is an increase of $6,800,000 in the amount of carrying costs of temporary wheat reserves?

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I did not catch the answer given by the Minister of Agriculture to the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) who asked whether the Quebec government had requested that the province be allowed to take advantage of this legislation on crop insurance. I do not know whether the minister has answered that question—

Mr. Pigeon: He said no.

Mr. Boulanger: The minister said no. In that case, I ask him whether the government which preceded that of Mr. Lesage had made that request? I believe it did not, for the legislation could not be applied in the province of Quebec, as we pointed out to the minister while we were considering the measure. We had, however, submitted suggestions and proposals which were not agreed to.

That is why the province of Quebec is not interested, any more than Ontario and the eastern provinces are interested.

I am glad to hear the minister say that, within two years, the provinces will share in the crop insurance scheme. We are noting his words; they will remain graven in our memories and two years hence, we shall be happy to congratulate the minister if this legislation is implemented throughout Canada.

By the same token, I venture to predict that, unless the act is amended, there will be no possibility of applying it in eastern Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the same subject, I should like the Minister of Agriculture to tell the committee how many provinces have taken advantage of this legislation. The act was passed about two years ago, and the government's contribution under the legislation has amounted to almost nothing because all it pays is 20 per cent of the premiums and half the cost of administration. It is only a matter of a loan to the province of up to 75 per cent of the amount if the loss is above $200,000, and if the loss is below $200,000 the federal government and the provincial government do not pay a cent. In addition, we know that at least 25 per cent of the farmers have to join in making an application under the crop insurance legislation, and the governments concerned will never pay more than 60 per cent of the loss. There are so many conditions to be fulfilled before the legislation can be taken advantage of that I believe the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska is right when he says that ten years from now there will not be two provinces that will have taken advantage of it. I should like to know from the minister how many provinces now take advantage of this legislation, which has been in effect for two years.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, before we hear the comments of the Minister of Agriculture, may I be permitted to say that, while it is true that the Quebec government is not interested in coming under this crop insurance scheme, Quebec farmers, for their part, are indeed interested, especially those who go in for specialized farming; I refer to the people in my area who grow cigar, pipe and cigarette tobacco and who suffer considerable losses almost every year due to frost and drought.

I ask the provincial government to co-operate and to help those specialized growers of cigar, pipe and cigarette tobacco, especially so because the present government is not doing anything for specialized farmers. As a matter of fact, grants for the construction of greenhouses and driers have been abolished in Quebec. That is why I ask the Quebec government to co-operate with the federal government in helping out farmers who grow crops of that kind. It is high time the provincial government did something for Quebec farmers instead of discarding the policies adopted by the former provincial government.

Mr. Denis: Why didn't the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm speak along that line at the time his good friend, Mr. Barrette, was in power?

Mr. Pigeon: He was of greater assistance to cigarette, cigar and pipe tobacco producers than is the present provincial government.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I never heard the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm speak on this subject before; he has been mute as a fish about it, although he had an interest in the matter because the Joliette area includes a large section where cigarette tobacco is grown.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm who, I think, has been parliamentary secretary to the minister who later became premier, was in a better position than anyone else here to urge the provincial government to meet with the federal authorities, to call personally upon 25 per cent of the cigarette tobacco growers to meet with Mr. Barrette—the close friend of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm —and ask them to come to Ottawa to meet with the Minister of Agriculture. Since the latter is a friend of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, something might have been achieved. But he did not do anything. This legislation is hard or even impossible to apply and, as the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has just personally admitted, if the provincial government does nothing about it, then it is up to the federal government to do something for the farmers.

If the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm reads the act, he will find that the federal government does not deal with individuals. And what about autonomy?

Mr. Pigeon: You do not know anything.

(Text):

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I think I should say a few words on the question of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and crop insurance, after what has been said by the hon. member for Assiniboia. He made one statement that I think was quite factual, namely "I have never been too strongly in favour of crop insurance and my record shows it". I believe the government of the province of Saskatchewan can be looked upon in the same way. They were strongly in favour of crop insurance during the years when there was a Liberal government at Ottawa which did not bring such legislation before parliament. The government of that province changed its tune after we enacted crop insurance legislation.

The minister of agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan indicated last fall, when speaking to the delegates to the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, that the provincial government was not too interested in going ahead with the plan. About a week later he changed his mind and the statement was made that they would have proceeded with a scheme and would have proceeded sooner but the federal legislation had been passed too late for them to commence action prior to the end of the session of their legislature.

I have here some of the forms used in the province of Saskatchewan by the provincial government to promote, if you can call it promotion, a crop insurance plan there. First of all I want to say that in many areas of the province P.F.A.A. will continue to be the most effective instrument to ensure a reasonable standard of living for the people in those areas. However, there are other areas that have never been able to qualify under P.F.A.A., although in some cases farmers who have suffered crop failures have had to contribute to the fund over a period of years through their sales of grain and the 1 per cent levy.

If you take some of the good townships in the northern part of my riding around Kinistino the cost of crop insurance is $1 per acre, of which amount the federal government is providing 20 cents. The saving on the P.F.A.A. levy on a 20-bushel crop is approximately 25 cents per acre. The hail insurance rate is around 30 cents, which makes a total of 55 cents. That leaves a balance of 25 cents per acre to be picked up by the farmers in order that they may enjoy an all-risk crop insurance plan. It is my belief that even on that basis it would be in the interests of many of them to come under this program and see if it will work to their advantage.

But the significant thing is that the province of Saskatchewan has not contributed a single cent to the crop insurance plan, although that government have advocated it almost since they first took office.

Mr. Argue: The province is paying half the administration costs.

Mr. Nasserden: Half the administration costs but no other charge whatsoever. I think that is one of the things the hon. member for Assiniboia should remember. After all, the provincial government has a responsibility in these areas and it is not assuming that responsibility today. It is my belief that the province can very well afford to pay 10 per cent of the cost, and I believe the balance of 15 cents per acre is an amount the farmers would be glad to pay in order to have crop insurance in the good crop areas of our province.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the last speech we have heard underlines what has been a suspicion of mine all the time; that the members of the Conservative party in the house want to dump into the laps of the provinces the responsibility which the federal government accepted under P.F.A.A. The statement has been made that the provincial treasury of Saskatchewan should pay a certain proportion of the cost of the crop insurance plan, and this emphasizes exactly what some of us have been saying for many years. We think the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is the place where improvements should be made.

As has been pointed out, the largest payment that can be made under the act is $4 per acre with a yield up to three bushels per acre. I would ask the minister to tell us how many farmers received payments in the last year for which he has figures in each of the categories under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. My impression is that a very tiny proportion of farmers received the largest payment.

Therefore if one were to double the amount of payment a farmer who receives $2 an acre now on half the cultivated acreage up to 400 acres, or $400, would get $800 and this would still represent a small part of his general cost of production.

These payments would be higher than those for the lower yield categories. I suggest it is still a very small part or a relatively small proportion of the farmer's main operating expenses. I do not think that crop insurance should be loaded onto the provinces. I have no objection if a province wants to make a payment; that is fine. I think the Saskatchewan government has set up a reserve fund, in case of a widespread crop failure in which case funds would be made available by the provincial treasury.

Another thing the hon. member for Rosthern failed to point out is that under this scheme the provincial government sustains full liability for the losses. This government does not guarantee 20 per cent of the losses at all; it guarantees 20 per cent of the premiums. If there were one or two widespread crop failures in the early operation of a crop insurance scheme that was in general use, the liability for payments out of the provincial treasury would be of absolutely fantastic proportions. The province of Saskatchewan would go bankrupt if there were widespread crop failures, as there were in the thirties, and on the assumption that most of the farmers were in a crop insurance scheme. The provincial government has a definite commitment and a definite liability under the act as it has been drafted.

The Chairman: Shall vote 36 carry?

Mr. Regnier: I believe that Manitoba's crop insurance scheme worked very well last year. I understand that the number of those to be covered this year is going to be doubled. However, I should like to ask the minister whether the premiums charged by the province of Manitoba were sufficient to cover crop losses, how much the scheme has cost the federal government and how much it has cost the provincial government?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): While we are looking up the figures, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say briefly that last year was a fairly good crop year and the surplus on the basis of premiums was very large. If my memory serves me correctly, the losses were $92,000 and the premiums came to over $300,000. That is in a fairly good crop year. If that fund were to build up over a period of years the province of Manitoba plans to reduce the premium in order to keep it strictly on a cost basis and to give inducement to farmers to keep the act working well and not to abuse it.

I wonder whether I might correct a statement I made yesterday to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam when he asked about the number of townships where no P.F.A.A. had been paid. I said I did not have the figures but that if my memory served me from a discussion of some time ago, there was just a handful of those townships. We have been examining the figures more carefully overnight and the correct figures in the last 21 years are as follows. In Manitoba 63 townships had never received a payment. In Saskatchewan 17 had never received a payment. In Alberta the figure is 51. If those figures are added together, out of approximately 7,000 you get a total of 131 townships that have not received any payment in 21 years.

Mr. Nasserden: I never heard anything quite as ridiculous as the statement made by the hon. member for Assiniboia when he suggests that we double the levies for P.F.A.A. in order to double the payments.

Mr. Argue: I never said any such thing.

Mr. Nasserden: All that would do in the good crop areas in our province would be to make a farmer with a 20 bushel crop pay 50 cents for something that he could not get.

Mr. Argue: Speaking on the point of order, may I say that I made no such statement as that which the hon. member alleges I made.

Mr. Nasserden: The hon. member knows very well that if you double the payment you will have to double the levy. Where is the money going to come from otherwise?

Mr. Argue: They do not go together at all.

Mr. Nasserden: They certainly do go together. All I want to say further in that regard is this. Crop insurance and P.F.A.A. are two distinct things and they will serve people in distinct areas as well. I certainly think that trying to say they are both one and the same thing is not shedding any light on the subject.

Mr. Argue: I want to deny very definitely that I said the contributions of producers should be doubled. I made no such statement. I would ask the minister whether he can give the committee the number of farmers that received prairie farm assistance in the last year under the various yield categories?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This is for the crop year 1960-61. From zero to three bushels, 2,515; from three bushels to five bushels, 5,226; from five bushels to eight bushels, 26,334; or a total of 34,077.

Mr. McIntosh: I should like to ask the minister a question on a different topic, if I may. I am aware that the minister has been plagued with many requests in regard to permit books. I wonder whether he has given any consideration to transferring the handling of permit books from the wheat board to P.F.A.A.? The reason I ask that question is this. I believe that the P.F.A.A. officials have more detailed information with regard to all the land on the prairie than have the officials of the wheat board and that it would be much easier for them with their set-up to look after the issuing of permit books.

Mr. Argue: I want to raise an objection to the statement that has been made by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. I would think that this would be a very retrograde step. I think that the farmers have much greater faith and confidence in the wheat board officials than they have in the prairie farm assistance officials. The prairie farm assistance people in the past, under the Liberal government, were in the main only liberal Liberals. The ones I knew were Liberals and party hacks too. They picked up some dough from the P.F.A.A. and then when an election was on you were not sure whether they were travelling for P.F.A.A., Mr. Gardiner's department, or whether they were trying to elect some broken down Liberal candidate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: It is different now.

Mr. Argue: Someone says that it is different now. Now they try to elect broken down Tory candidates.

An hon. Member: No such thing.

Mr. Drysdale: You will not get any broken down C.C.F.'ers.

Mr. Argue: I do not know what one might take from that statement.

Mr. Drysdale: The obvious logical conclusion.

Mr. Argue: I think it would be a mistake to take the issuance of permit books out of the hands of the wheat board and place it in the hands of the prairie farm assistance people in the provinces. I know of no farm organization that has asked for this to be done; at least I have not seen that they have asked for it. I can see no advantage that would come from it and I can see a great many disadvantages.

Mr. McIntosh: The hon. member for Assiniboia said he took exception to the statement I made. I do not see any exception. The appointments of the officials of the wheat board, P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A. are all made by the same people and on the same basis.

Mr. Argue: That is news to me. I thought the wheat board appointed its own people and I believe that it does so. However, I think the minister is pretty much in control of the people appointed by P.F.A.A. However, I have much more confidence in the officials appointed by the Canadian wheat board because I think there is much less of partisan politics there than there is in P.F.A.A.

The Chairman: Shall vote 36 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman has something more on this vote he can go ahead because I was going to ask for the indulgence of the committee.

Mr. Nasserden: What is this item "appropriations not required for 1961-62" on page 8?

Mr. Benidickson: We have not yet come to that item. We have not yet passed this item, have we?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No. That is statutory.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I rise in connection with item No. 36, the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I am rising basically on a question of privilege.

I wish to indicate to the committee the views of the Prime Minister when he sat on the opposition side of the house. I will quote just one short extract from Hansard. This extract is to be found at page 208 of Hansard for 1950.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, could we find out what is the question of privilege before the hon. member reads this extract?

Mr. Benidickson: I am referring to section 12 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. Drysdale: Yes; but what about it?

Mr. Benidickson: I am coming to the point. The Prime Minister said:

> The attitude that an opposition is something to put up with on occasion is prevalent in some quarters.

Then he went on to say:

> If the cabinet is to be trusted; if we are to accept at face value what ministers say, then we had better all be absent from this house.

Then a little later on he said:

> I know that cabinets long in power tend to believe that they rule by divine right; I know that they do not welcome oppositions, but a one-party state is not a democratic state.

Since the new ministry came into office the rights of parliament have been noted and commented upon. I wish to quote briefly from the Victoria Daily Times of February 20, 1960. The title of the article is, "'Restoring' Parliament". The article reads:

> When the Conservatives—

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. Drysdale: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has so far not laid any basis for a question of privilege. He has merely read extracts from Hansard, and he now wants to read an article from a newspaper.

I think it is important that he should first lay the basis for his question of privilege, and if you rule that there is a question of privilege, the hon. member may proceed to take it up. The hon. member mentioned section 12 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, but then he read something that was said several years ago.

Mr. Benidickson: My question of privilege involves the obligation of the minister to provide all members of parliament, including those in the opposition, with information that is available to him in the form of an annual report.

I can sum up this editorial in one sentence. It says:

> Mr. Diefenbaker used to charge the Liberals with submerging the rights of parliament in a sea of autocracy.

On Tuesday night I raised a question in the estimates of the minister with respect to the vote concerning the board of grain commissioners for Canada. I say that it is not accidental that within a few hours of our disposing of that vote the minister tabled—as is indicated in Votes and Proceedings of yesterday—when our debate had concluded on Tuesday night, the annual report of the board of grain commissioners for Canada.

I say that it is another instance of arrogance to table this report only yesterday. I say that it cannot simply be a coincidence that this report dealing with the activities under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is tabled in this way.

Mr. Boulanger: I have not yet received it.

Mr. Benidickson: It has not yet been distributed to our offices. Under our new rules which came into effect in 1955 it is possible for ministers to simply table these documents in the office of the Clerk of the house. Under the former practice the minister rose in his seat in the House of Commons and indicated to hon. members that he was submitting an annual report to parliament before the report went to the Clerk's office.

I have no quarrel with the procedure that was agreed to unanimously, as far as I remember, by all parties of the house in 1955 represented on the committee which dealt with the revision of parliamentary rules.

My point is that under the new procedure a delay of at least 24 hours develops before documents of this kind are available to members of parliament. If tabled yesterday, the document would be known to be available only today.

I had an obligation this morning to prepare an address to a law students assembly at noon. The agricultural critic of our party has said he has not even received this document. I would not have received it if I had not been so distressed at the fact that the minister would so disregard us and treat us so lightly as to present yesterday the report of the board of grain commissioners, within hours after debate concluded on this item in the estimates, and took steps to secure a copy.

This report covers the year 1960. In other words, it is the most up-to-date information available to parliament for the year ending 1960. I therefore subsequently asked the distribution office for the latest available report on the activities under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I did not know what period this latest report would cover.

I have looked into the matter of the statutory obligations contained in section 12 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I have not had much time for research into this matter, and I will therefore read from the revised statutes of 1952. If this section has been amended, the minister or his expert staff seated in front of him will of course inform me and correct me.

Section 12 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, as contained in the revised statutes of 1952, says:

> The minister shall, as soon as possible after the termination of each crop year, prepare an annual report in such form as the governor in council may prescribe, which report shall be laid before parliament.

I emphasize those words "as soon as possible". Is the minister going to tell us that this report of the board of grain commissioners was available only yesterday? The government leader of the house said last night that he did not think consideration of these estimates of the Department of Agriculture would take more than 10 or 15 minutes today. In other words, it would have been quite possible to have slid past the last report under the item we are discussing and have left hon. members of this committee in the dark as far as up-to-date information is concerned.

We thus have had two similar illustrations with respect to the Minister of Agriculture's estimates this year. As I recall it, we also had a similar affront and disregard of the rights of all members of parliament by this massive government majority. This is not the first time we have seen this disregard of the small opposition.

Mr. Drysdale: Oh, come now.

Mr. Benidickson: I am making this charge, and I am making it very seriously. We saw this disregard of the present small opposition in the first session of parliament after this government received this massive support.

Mr. Drysdale: By the people of Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: By the people of Canada, yes; but I remind you of what the Prime Minister of this country had to say about the rights of an opposition, no matter how small.

Mr. Pickersgill: When he was in opposition.

Mr. Benidickson: When he was in opposition. I have had only a few minutes to check this matter, but my recollection starts with the first session of this parliament. The first estimates passed in the House of Commons that session as I recall were the estimates of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. We spent several days discussing those estimates. In that case with too obvious stupidity the government did not delay even two or three days. I think on the day following the passing of all the hon. lady's departmental items the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration presented, in the manner I have indicated, the annual report for her department which report then became public.

On two occasions the Minister of Labour, in matters relating to information on unemployment has followed this practice. Within a day after he was no longer responsible to this house for debate and questioning he filed information that had also been asked for, I assume, by government backbenchers who are interested in unemployment, too. This information would have been as helpful to them as it was necessary to the opposition before the debate was concluded.

Last year, in connection with the Department of Agriculture again, I was interested in this matter and I recall—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I think these remarks of the hon. member would be better stated at another time. The hon. member has strayed quite a way from the subject that is under consideration at this moment.

Mr. Benidickson: We have before us the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. I think the Minister of Agriculture is anxious to dispose of his estimates, as always are all ministers. I have not abused the privilege of criticizing his estimates. It is to my mind more than a coincidence to find this sort of thing happening again and again.

I would refer to another item from the same department. This incident occurred last year when the department was under the former minister. We had a very important discussion about relief to the western grain growers for crops which had not been harvested and were left under the snow, and a bill was introduced to provide some relief under those circumstances. I took an active part in that debate. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate as another former prairie dweller was equally interested. Indeed, he happened to be in Winnipeg during the debate and I remember that as my deskmate he told me when he came back that he had heard the minister of agriculture for the province of Manitoba say certain things with respect to the attitude of the provincial department of agriculture with regard to this emergency legislation for the prairie grain growers at that time.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate after his return immediately put on the order paper a request for the tabling of correspondence between the minister of agriculture in Manitoba and the federal Minister of Agriculture because, naturally, he wanted to ascertain whether the minister of agriculture in Manitoba was putting in writing and letting the federal Minister of Agriculture know the same views as he was voicing publicly in the legislature on the day the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was in the gallery of the legislature. There was no particular shortage of time. My recollection is—and I think I am right because I made a note about it at the time—that again within hours after that debate was concluded the government tabled the correspondence between the two ministers. I say that certainly this provides no evidence of remedy relating to the hullabaloo which the Prime Minister of this country raised when he was in opposition, because I do not think that this ministry can give any examples of any similar disregard for parliament so blatant as those which I have just illustrated.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order, if I may say a word—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think I might be able to save a lot of time—

Mr. Argue: On the question which has been raised, I think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is, generally, correct. I did not raise it yesterday although I was tempted to do so and perhaps I should have raised it.

An hon. Member: Too late.

Mr. Argue: I refer to the fact that the report of the board of grain commissioners was tabled after we had begun to discuss the item. I think this is a very bad practice. I think it is not only an unparliamentary practice but a somewhat cowardly practice not to make the report available to hon. members well in advance so that they can intelligently discuss the item involved instead of waiting until the item is called and then hurrying to table the report.

I do not want to put words which he did not use into the mouth of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, but if I correctly interpret what he said he complained that the report relating to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been just tabled—

Mr. Benidickson: No. My information is that it was tabled yesterday.

Mr. Argue: For what year?

Mr. Benidickson: For the crop year ending 1959-60.

Mr. Argue: Well, I think the hon. gentleman is in error. I have here sessional paper No. 12, the report of the activities under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act for the crop year 1959-60 and according to the information on the front cover it was tabled on December 2, 1960, so I believe the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is in error as far as this publication is concerned. However, he was quite accurate as far as the report of the board of grain commissioners is concerned. The government is only half as bad as he has pointed out. But he still has a very good case.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member for Assiniboia was hardly on a point of order but he has said what I was going to say, namely that the report in question was tabled several months ago. This can be confirmed by a study of Votes and Proceedings, for Friday, December 2. I will read it:

> By Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle), a member of the Queen's privy council, —Report on activities under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act for the crop year, ended July 31, 1960, pursuant to section 12 of the said act, chapter 213, R.S.C. 1952.

However, I think there is a point in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River which has not been brought out. It is not a question of the department not fulfilling its functions under the legislation. That is done as rapidly as it can be done, because the machinery is all laid on. The trouble may be this, and it may apply to this matter of the report of the grain commissioners. There is a distribution list which was set up, I suppose, long before many of us came here, and the distribution list provides only 100 copies for the House of Commons. I think that what actually happens is that those responsible for the distribution presume that certain hon. members get these copies and others do not. I imagine, of course, copies will go to the library. But I can assure the committee that the minute the report of the board of grain commissioners came into my hands it was tabled. There were no instructions on my part to delay it, because there is nothing in that report to cause embarrassment to anybody. However, I think that the hon. member possibly has a point, and I will look into it. As far as my department is concerned, if there is a limited distribution that may be what has caused the trouble.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the minister for his statement, but that is not what caused my protest in so far as the annual report of the board of grain commissioners is concerned. The minister knows that on or before the day required by statute the department must file with the Clerk of the House of Commons a master copy of the report. That master copy, as indicated on page 433 of Votes and Proceedings of Wesdnesday, was only then filed. I will read the relevant entry:

By Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle), a member of the Queen's privy council—Report for 1960 of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada.

That is quite irrespective of how many copies are available subsequently for distribution at the request of members who, having read that notice, wish to examine that particular document further. So, in particular, the explanation of the minister is invalid respecting the tabling officially and for the first time with the Clerk of the house of such a report. It was tabled within hours after we had let the minister off the hook in debate, as it were, on this item, having no further questions to ask on the board of grain commissioners—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): On a question of accuracy, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has made a serious mistake here because the vote on the item concerning the board of grain commissioners was not taken until long after this document was tabled. The report was available in the committee. I saw several members with it in their possession and the statement which the hon. member has now made that first the item went through and then the report was tabled is not true.

Mr. Benidickson: I was in the committee all Tuesday night, and if one looks at Hansard one will find that the vote was carried and, subsequently, the following day, this report was tabled.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No. I am sorry, but I must correct the hon. member. The vote was not carried Tuesday night. The chairman will be able to say exactly when it was carried, because he keeps a record. But if the hon. member examines Hansard he will find it was carried yesterday.

Mr. Benidickson: I recollect that now. I accept that.

Mr. Argue: Your batting average is not too good today.

Mr. Benidickson: My point is still valid. The only notice available to a member of the House of Commons that this report had been tabled would have been the receipt in his mail box today, Thursday, of yesterday's Votes and Proceedings. It would otherwise not be possible to know that this report was filed with the Clerk yesterday, the same day on which the debate was finished.

With respect to tabling the report under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act I simply want to repeat that I have been in my seat since 2.30 this afternoon. While here I sent for the last available report under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. A note came back with the report to the effect that it was tabled yesterday. I excuse the staff completely because I am sure that the individuals concerned had in mind an inquiry I had made before coming to the chamber in respect of the other agricultural report, namely the report of Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask for the indulgence of the committee but if it is not forthcoming I will not proceed. I was not here yesterday when the minister was good enough to reply to an inquiry made in respect of the Fairford river development in Manitoba. There was one point in his answer about which I should like to have a little further elucidation. I understood from his answer that this work is being carried out by the government of Manitoba but the federal government is paying half the cost. Could the minister tell us whether this is being done under some general policy or whether it is an ad hoc arrangement in respect of this project alone? My recollection is that under the legislation that was previously in force there was a $37\frac{1}{2}$-$37\frac{1}{2}$-25 arrangement for the division of the cost of projects of this sort. I wonder if there is some new general policy, and I would like the minister to explain to what categories of project it would be applicable.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): For the last several years—at least five or six—a policy has been developing in regard to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act where certain projects are carried out on a joint basis by the provincial and federal governments. The item to which the hon. member refers is included in item No. 33 but in the heading above it will be seen that this item includes the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act program, land protection and reclamation and development. This program has been evolving over a period of years, but this is part of the regular program.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is, in other words, applicable over the entire area covered by the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act for any project in which the federal government sees fit to participate?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, but in the case of Newfoundland we make grants to the government of that province, which looks after its own projects. I have forgotten the exact amount of the grant in respect of the bog land development.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this a similar formula to that applied in respect of the maritime marshlands?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, it is a different operation entirely. This is a grant we have given in respect of bog land development and it happens to be included under this vote.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister was good enough to concede that reports of the kind to which I have referred should be tabled in the house as soon as available. I wonder whether he would make inquiries to find out when the printed report of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada was first made available by the Queen's printer, and endeavour in the future to see that this type of report is not simply tabled after the opportunity for debate has passed but as soon as possible.

Item agreed to.

21. Special grant to Pacific national exhibition, Vancouver, $200,000.

Mr. Drysdale: The minister indicated yesterday, as will be seen at page 3542 of Hansard, that he would be prepared to make some further comment in regard to this item. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard also had some remarks to make in this regard.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words about this particular grant.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister now have three parliamentary secretaries?

Mr. Taylor: I would first like to say that this grant is most welcome to the people of Vancouver but it is unfortunate that Vancouver, at the present time, has no suitable coliseum. If it had I would certainly not comment in this vein today. The people of Vancouver urgently need a coliseum as well as a livestock building. However, under the present situation we will perhaps not get either.

I should like to refer to a letter which the minister sent me regarding this subject, because it pretty well sets out the objectives he has in mind in connection with the building. The minister stated in his letter of February 20, 1961, as follows:

> We have recognized that the accommodation for livestock at the P.N.E. is inadequate for an exhibition of its size and for the livestock which it attracts to its shows. This applies not only to the accommodation for cattle but, probably of greater importance, to the show ring and judging facilities. We have, therefore, undertaken to assist the exhibition to establish more adequate accommodation.

Mr. Chairman, obviously the minister had in mind adequate accommodation for a livestock show. Later in the letter he indicates how the building is to be financed through the provision, in these estimates, of the sum of $200,000. He further states in the letter as follows:

> I have heard that there has been some controversy in Vancouver in connection with a sports coliseum equipped with ice facilities. In the Department of Agriculture, obviously, we have no interest in a building for that purpose.
> —But any funds provided by this department would be devoted only to the needs of the livestock show.

I presume that the minister feels the contribution of $200,000 will be a major contribution toward the construction of a mink, cat and dog show building, but I wish to inform the minister that in actuality this money will be devoted to a livestock building with some 8,000 seats capable of being used mainly as a hockey arena. The minister has said that this building should be used primarily for agricultural purposes.

I am also informed that in 1959-60 there was a submission made by the Pacific national exhibition that this grant of $200,000 would be insufficient to construct the building.

On December 12, 1960 the minister replied to that submission, stating as follows:

> I am disturbed by the impression conveyed in the submission of September 12 that subsequent funds might be made available by the federal government to a total of $1 million.

If the Pacific national exhibition requires $1 million, and I suggest that it does, then that organization is not really building a livestock building but is building a large, needed coliseum. That is the point I wanted to put forward today. While the minister wants to help the people of Vancouver he really wants to contribute to the construction of a livestock building but he is actually contributing to the construction of a coliseum. Unfortunately we cannot agree in Vancouver as to where the coliseum should be built. If this must be tied to agriculture we will not have the coliseum we need and the building will not be placed where we want it.

The Pacific national exhibition board, and it is an excellent one, certainly has indicated in some of its directives what it proposed, and this indication appears in some of its literature dated March 1 last where the following is stated:

> The second stage provided installation of an ice plant to serve hockey and other events as well as heating equipment for the building. The city was being asked to advance $280,000 in 1960 and a similar amount in 1961. The province would be asked to contribute a similar amount as the city. It was understood $280,000 will be forthcoming from the federal government, while the P.N.E. is putting up $450,000.

The mayor who presided over the affairs of Vancouver in 1958 wrote to us here in Ottawa about this proposed building, and no mention is made in his entire letter of any building being constructed for livestock purposes. The mayor of the day talks about a contribution of a million dollars toward a coliseum. In his letter he said:

> To assist in these considerations would you kindly advise if your government will still make the million dollar grant to the city for this coliseum, particularly if the project were developed in the downtown area, or would the former requirement still stand, i.e. the coliseum must be in conjunction with the operation of the exhibition.

From what I have said, after perusing some of the documents of the Pacific national exhibition and after giving consideration to the mayor's letter, it is obvious that the real requirement of the city at this time is a coliseum and not so much—although this is incidental—a livestock building. This impression is left most clearly when you peruse the many newspaper articles which have appeared over the last four or five years when consideration was given to this proposed building.

When I close my remarks I wonder whether the minister will indicate that in 1956 the federal government made an offer of $1 million to the Pacific national exhibition. If the offer was made, will the minister indicate who made the offer on behalf of the federal government and to whom was it made? I hope the minister realizes that a change has taken place in the situation since the federal offer, that is, the proposed offer, was made in 1956. At that time the government stipulated it could make a grant only to assist an agricultural fair, which tied the coliseum to the Pacific national exhibition grant. Since 1956 the voters have voted upon that issue and they rejected a million dollar bylaw to cover the city's share of a coliseum on the Pacific national exhibition ground. No longer can a coliseum be judged solely as an adjunct of an agricultural fair.

The building is needed today not only as a place for conventions and sports events but as a public works project, which is so much needed in the Vancouver area at the present time. I am not going to take up the time of the committee by referring to other newspaper articles, but I should like the minister to comment upon what was said by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond yesterday when he discussed whether this building could be erected in the downtown area, or whether a downtown coliseum could be used for agricultural purposes, just as much as one in the Pacific national exhibition ground, which obviously operates for only a short time in the year.

The other real point, Mr. Chairman, is the fact that the grant by the department at this time could make possible a proper building for proper purposes erected where the city desires to build it, and apparently that would be in the downtown area.

The courses open in connection with this much discussed building would be, (a) withhold the grant for the time being, a thing which obviously nobody wants because they need the money out there; or, (b) make the grant now, with the condition that no ice refrigeration be installed for five years, which would take the hockey element out of the building. If such a condition were attached then, of course, I feel that the proposed plans would be reduced considerably and immediately and we would then end up with a proper livestock building instead of ending up with a combined livestock and coliseum building, which will be too small and will not be where the people want it.

Another suggestion would be for the minister to consider making a matching grant with the Minister of Trade and Commerce of at least $1 million so that we could have a proper building for conventions, trade shows and agricultural events, and a building in which we could celebrate our birthday centennial in 1967. That is another course that is open.

There is a feeling that in 1956 an offer of $1 million was made. If that is true, then I presume the minister could once again make an offer on behalf of this government or, with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, he could make a grant available larger than this item of $200,000.

I also notice that there was an item in the estimates which indicated that the Canadian national exhibition was to receive a sum of $500,000 from the federal government during the present fiscal year. Therefore, it would appear that the minister has some discretion over the amount to be voted.

I think the minister is aware of the fact that the city of Vancouver owns the Pacific national exhibition, and it is the same city which proposed to erect a building either there or in the downtown area. If adequate funds were made available then, of course, we could have agricultural events take place in the building and other events could also take place there.

Probably the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond will be asking some questions on the same item. I think I have covered the situation pretty well. I hope that the money can be made available and in the right quantity in order that we will end up with the right kind of building that is so badly needed in the area at this time.

Mr. Drysdale: Before the minister replies, I should like to make one or two remarks to supplement those already made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

First, I should like to emphasize to the minister that we in the Vancouver area sincerely appreciate very much this $200,000 grant. I would emphasize that it is urgently needed at the present time for a show ring out at the Pacific national exhibition.

The point that I wish to bring to the minister's attention, and one which I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was trying to draw to his attention, is that in 1967 we shall be celebrating our centennial. I wonder whether the minister could give serious consideration to the addition of $800,000, perhaps by way of a supplementary estimate, to make up a $1 million grant to the Pacific national exhibiton.

I suggest that perhaps he could, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has said, also co-operate with the Department of Trade and Commerce and provide a further $1 million. Perhaps I seem a little bit generous in throwing around millions of dollars, but in item No. 36, which was just passed, we voted some $49 million for the storage of surplus grain. Over the years since 1956 some $200 million has been used for the storage of grain. Perhaps I could say in a humorous way that we would be prepared to have a building for at least the temporary storage of grain if we could participate in some of the moneys voted under item No. 36. But I would point out to the minister that the very progressive Minister of Trade and Commerce has already provided some $300,000 for the Seattle trade fair in 1961 and I have been particularly pleased with the progressive attitude that the new Minister of Agriculture has taken in trying to assist in agricultural matters. I feel that if he could produce this $1 million and make a start toward this agricultural building or agricultural coliseum, which would have a seating capacity of 15,000 and could be used for many other events, the minister would receive the gratitude both of myself and the people of Vancouver generally.

Mr. Hicks: Mr. Chairman, as a governor of the Pacific national exhibition I think it is my duty to say a word about this grant of $200,000. The grant was originally given for the purpose of assisting the livestock business of British Columbia and as the grant comes from the Department of Agriculture I presume it can be used only for exhibition purposes on the exhibition grounds. I do not think I have anything more to say about the matter. We all know there has been a controversy involving the businessmen of Vancouver with respect to having a coliseum in the centre of Vancouver rather than having a livestock building on the grounds of the Pacific national exhibition. To me it is absolutely ridiculous to talk about locating the coliseum in the centre of Vancouver and moving cows, horses, sheep, swine, chickens and everything to the centre of the city just because that is where the building is. After all is said and done, the Pacific national exhibition grounds are only two or three miles from the centre of Vancouver and I suggest that if there is too much controversy over this whole matter the minister may even change his mind and not provide a grant at all, which I hope will not happen.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, as found on page 3542 of Hansard, the minister indicated that he would make some further comment. I hope the item will not pass without the minister making some suitable comment, perhaps only to indicate that he is going to give us the $1 million.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The minister is always very canny when local issues are being discussed. The last official word we had from the P.N.E. officials was in the latter part of February and they assured us that they had dropped all plans for ice facilities in the new building and that it would be devoted to the needs of the livestock industry.

Mr. Taylor: What date was that?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The latter part of February.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, so much has been said about the building that I wonder whether the minister would allow the P.N.E. to have the money to construct a building anywhere in the city of Vancouver, not necessarily on the exhibition grounds? We all know, for example, that McGill university is in downtown Montreal but I have noticed on my way into the city that the part of the university having to do with farming is located to the west of Montreal. If money were given to McGill I imagine that some part of it would find its way into the operation west of Montreal. The same thing could apply in this instance. We could have our livestock show downtown if necessary and we would all be happy.

Mr. Drysdale: On the last day this matter came up I asked the Minister of Agriculture if he could enlighten us with respect to the definition of exhibition grounds and I said that I hoped he would be able to inform himself on the matter during the intervening time. So that the point may be straightened out so far as the people of Vancouver are concerned, I ask the minister specifically whether or not the acquisition of land in downtown Vancouver for exhibition purposes would mean that that land would be considered part of the exhibition grounds? I think there is a general principle involved which would apply to many other cities. Would the minister be good enough to comment?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The regulations for grants to exhibitions are under review and we took up the matter with the provincial ministers of agriculture at the agricultural ministers' conference. I should like to point out to hon. members that the grant to the Pacific national exhibition is completely outside the regulations. It is a special grant as a matter of grace and such grants go to very few exhibitions. It is being made in this case because the Pacific national exhibition has certain national characteristics. The only other exhibition that has qualified is the Royal at Toronto and I believe a similar grant has been proposed for another city. It is only when some national significance can be established that we give these special grants. So far as the location of buildings is concerned, all we are interested in is making sure that the purposes of agriculture are being advanced. We have no responsibility for athletics or public health.

Mr. Taylor: Could we have a further statement from the minister that he will at least make an effort to discuss a larger grant with the Minister of Trade and Commerce? I am completely satisfied at the present time that an ice plant is going to be installed in the building. I am not concerned about what was said in letters. I am satisfied there are going to be ice facilities so if we are going to have hockey in the building why can we not have trade and commerce activities too?

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

308. Departmental administration including Canada's share of the upkeep of the international bureaux at Berne and Montevideo, $2,174,216.

Mr. Denis: Is the Postmaster General going to make a statement before we proceed with the items?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, the greatest volume of postal business ever, the highest revenues in history, the most sweeping expansions in service to the public since 1867 and the boldest and most effective economy moves within the operational records of the department—this, in a nutshell, is the story of the postal service during the period between May 27, 1960, when I last presented the estimates of the Post Office Department for the consideration of the house, and the present.

During the last few years the volume of mail originating in Canada has spiralled upward in an apparently endless climb. When figures for this fiscal year are complete we will undoubtedly, for the first time in our history, top the four billion mark, or well over 200 pieces of mail for every man, woman and child in this country.

This staggering volume of mail is reflected in the department's revenues for the year 1960-61 which will top the $200 million mark for the first time in our history. When our figures are complete we expect to find we have incurred total expenditures in the neighbourhood of $209,500,000, thus showing a deficit on the year's operations of some $9 million. Since salary increases alone have cost us some $13½ million during the year, I feel that our financial record remains most satisfactory. In the year just starting we will have the benefit of increased revenue from parcel post rate changes and our overall operations should therefore again be approximately on the break-even basis which it is my policy to try to maintain.

As a basis of comparison, Mr. Chairman, I might say that in the United States the post office department reported a net deficit of $597.1 million for the fiscal year 1960. Its annual report noted that $6.8 billion of the $15.3 billion increase in the national debt which has occurred since 1946 has been caused by postal deficits alone. I do not propose to deal in any more detail with overall finances since the general figures I have quoted are all that are yet available for the year ended March 31, 1961, and those for the preceding year are given in detail in our published report which is available to each member of the house.

During the year we have accomplished some remarkable economies in the face of marked cost increases that are above and beyond our control. One of the most remarkable of these has been in our Christmas mail operations where I am pleased to report the first major operational breakthrough in streamlined mail handling, a breakthrough that resulted in savings to the department in excess of $800,000.

This tremendous saving has been accomplished in the face of a Christmas mail volume at least 5 per cent higher than that reported last year and despite the fact that no less than 10 new letter carrier offices have been added to the service in the past 12 months requiring a total of some 22,000 new Christmas man-hours in themselves.

In all, this year we cut our Christmas man-hours by some 115,000 over last year. These tremendous savings were accomplished by a combination of tight operational control and a simplified system of handling our Christmas card mail which we call terminal sortation.

Terminal sortation has gone hand in hand with a new system of separating first class mail from Christmas cards at the point where they first enter the mail stream. By a combination of these systems we have been able to provide service on regular mail during December that compares favourably with our standards for other months of the year. In short this past December we handled more mail, faster and at less cost than ever before in our history.

The steady increase in mail volume demands that we continue strenuous efforts to develop and perfect modern and effective mail handling techniques and equipment. One of our major projects in this field is the electronic-mechanical letter sortation system, the experimental model of which is being developed by the post office with the assistance of Canadair Limited in Montreal. We are at a crucial point in this development, for this ultra modern system has now reached the point of operational tests and is actually sorting regular mail for the Montreal post office.

Since this equipment is radically different from anything previously developed for postal purposes anywhere in the world, our present studies will provide the first practical figures for performance characteristics and output of such equipment. I can report that while the accuracy of the sorting system seems excellent, its reliability for continuing performance without mechanical or electronic failure is not as yet satisfactory and our tests indicate that some substantial additional work will be required on certain components.

Before proceeding with this project on any extended basis it is our intention to relate the information we have now obtained with certain other studies of a systems nature; based on the results we will decide the direction of our further advance.

There can be no doubt that during the past year we have made more progress than at any other time toward the ultimate production of an electronic-mechanical letter sortation system. It is frustrating not to have shiny new batteries of such machines already installed in major Canadian post offices, but no other nation has reached this point because of the problems involved; and our system of advancing only as rapidly as we can be certain of the correctness of our advance undoubtedly gives the taxpayer far better value for every dollar spent than does any other method.

For example, our mailmobile system has proved its worth on a trial basis with only a limited number of machines, but the trials also demonstrated the need for a more rugged type of vehicle to meet the unusually difficult conditions of mail delivery. Sixteen machines manufactured by the builders of the famous "jeep" have been placed in service for test purposes along these lines.

Again, the experimental group of plastic letter boxes we tried out demonstrated that the material was completely satisfactory but that certain design changes were required and these are now being made before we proceed. In other words, we test and we determine what is right before we expend the taxpayers' money in large sums in fields where we are not absolutely certain of our position.

With respect to machinery and equipment of a highly advanced nature which is sufficiently proven to justify installation for regular use, we are engaged in a steady program of planning and development designed to improve the capacity of our existing buildings and to add new space to house such machinery. One such item will be a new chain type conveyor scheduled for the new wing of the Hamilton, Ontario post office which will permit mail bags and other loads to be moved at steep angles and guided and controlled by preset remote direction. The new building at Quebec and the new wing at Halifax will contain revolutionary new conveyor systems capable of lifting mail vertically on a continuous basis. They are the first such developments in this country and among the first on the continent. We will be installing at Winnipeg early next year a complex new mail segregator which will for the first time use electronic-mechanical techniques to perform automatically one of the most tiresome and time consuming chores presently performed by hand in post offices.

One tiny item that will nevertheless be of interest to anyone who has ever struggled and tried to write with post office pens is that we are trying a second experiment in the use of ball point pens in 14 of our major post offices. We also have ready for installation 300 of our electric stamp vending machines to which I referred last year and which operate merely by dropping in the quarter without any further effort being required on the part of the patron. These machines will be in use shortly right across Canada in our post offices and other locations.

The handling of the mails within post offices is only part of the over-all job of communication which the post office must undertake. The other basic problem in postal services is transportation, and in this field we have made some of the most interesting and potentially important experiments of the year. One of the most intriguing has been our testing of "piggy-back" mail services which allow us to combine the best features of railway transportation and highway transportation in the swift movement of the mails. It is as yet too early to evaluate fully the results of these tests but it is apparent that the system offers some unique solutions to mail transport problems. Piggy-back services are designed primarily, of course, for the movement of second, third and fourth class mail, since the bulk of our first class letter mail travels by air.

As the number of trains available for the conveyance of mail continues to decline, the volume of mail handled by rail continues to increase, especially between the larger cities and on transcontinental services for whenever it has been possible to do so, we have continued to make use of the railways. In many cases we have made complicated adjustments in order to preserve a traditional railway link. A recent example is the change in service on trains five and six between Truro and Sydney, Nova Scotia. I think it is fair to say that without the determined co-operation of the post office in working out methods of handling mail on a difficult and more complex new schedule, the railway would have been forced to discontinue this line, and this action could have been a serious blow to the entire Cape Breton area.

We have, however, frequently been forced to accept alternative methods of transportation when existing rail links were terminated or reduced to the point where they no longer provided an acceptable service for the transportation of the mails. One such alternative is highway transport. In the last year we added no less than 53 new highway services, and made extensions in 46 existing routes. In addition, another eight routes have been approved and will be going into service shortly and five other routes are being seriously considered.

The final stage in the handling of mail is delivery to the patron. In rural areas during the past year 98 new rural routes have either been established or are authorized and will shortly go into service while 1,157 extensions have been made to existing routes.

Newfoundland, with its rural population largely stretched along the coast, has always presented a special problem for rural mail delivery. We have made a special study of this problem and have developed a plan by which group mail boxes can be introduced in certain areas. This year we have also inaugurated in the Avalon peninsula two rural routes, the first in the history of Newfoundland.

In urban areas the establishment of letter carrier service is often regarded by a community as a sign of growth and maturity, and during the past year more Canadian communities achieved this status than ever before save for one post-war year which followed four years completely barren of such inaugurations.

Letter carrier services were established in 11 new communities during the past fiscal year and 32,678 new calls were thus added. It is difficult to keep right up to date in this rapidly moving field but for the 11 months which ended in February of 1961, the department added door to door delivery to no less than 139,437 householders between new communities and additions to existing services. At March 31, 1961, there were 2,877,131 calls being carried out by Canadian postmen every day. This is, again, another all time high.

During 1960 we adopted a new policy in regard to business calls on mixed walks whereby we would spread the calls in a concentrated area over a larger number of walks. We have set up 223 walks under this new procedure, and this has resulted in a much earlier delivery of mail to most of the business calls in the areas where the change was made. It is also interesting to note that by this change we were able to provide approximately 5,000 additional firms with a second delivery, whereas previously they had received only one delivery each day. At the moment something closely approaching 100,000 business firms and locations are receiving two mail deliveries, or better, each day.

As you may imagine, this procedure has been reflected in a marked reduction in the number of complaints received from business concerns relative to the late delivery of their mail. I refer to complaints, because the Post Office Department is meticulous in their handling of complaints and, in addition, in following up each inquiry very carefully. I have always felt that the number of complaints we receive, in relation to the volume of mail we handle, is one of the best possible measures of whether or not our service is generally improving. The figure continues to drop, indicating beyond any doubt improvements in our service.

the previous Liberal government, the department received 123 complaints for each million pieces of mail handled. In 1958, with nine months of Conservative administration, the figure dropped to 112 complaints per million pieces; in 1959, with a full year of Conservative administration, to 106; and in 1960 to 101. For the fiscal year just ended we estimate a maximum of 94 complaints for each million pieces handled. This compares with 123 complaints for each million pieces handled in the last year of the previous administration.

I say, with all due modesty, that I think it is a remarkable achievement. I hope my critics from the official opposition in this committee, when they pick away at items of post office administration, will always remember that whereas in the last year they ran the post office they were receiving 123 complaints for every million pieces of mail handled, we are now receiving only 94 complaints for every million pieces. There is no better measure available of the progress that has been made in the administration and efficiency of this department.

Mr. Deschatelets: What about the deficit?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I have dealt with that, and you can ask me any questions you wish afterwards.

As our urban populations continue to increase we are faced with a new problem of providing adequate service to communities within communities, to the almost self-contained suburbs, many of which have populations as large or larger than some of our established cities.

One solution to this problem has been the increasing use of postal stations and letter carrier depots scattered at strategic points throughout the cities. During the last year we set in operation no less than 11 new postal stations and letter carrier depots which is, so far as we can judge, the greatest expansion in this type of service in the department's recent history. For the four-year period from 1957 to the present we opened more than twice as many of these stations as during the four-year period from 1953 to 1957.

Speaking of records, the Canadian postal service set another record last October when we established no less than eight new letter carrier services in the same month, bringing some 23,320 new householders under our door-to-door delivery system. No other single month, since the establishment of the letter carrier service in 1874, has seen such a sweeping advance in this field, and no other period within the records of the postal service compares with the last three years, when some 18 communities were added to the list receiving door-to-door mail delivery.

Another additional service for our patrons has been the extension of our, I think I will call it optional additional delivery service on undelivered parcels, other items such as registered mail and the small parcels handled by letter carriers. Previously, when such items could not be delivered in a stated number of calls, they were returned to the post office and the patron had no option but to call for them there. This system is still in effect for those who wish it, but in addition, if a patron wishes, arrangements can be made by telephone for the item to be delivered on a specific day for a charge of 25 cents. This has proved popular right across the country wherever it has been introduced.

Mr. Denis: Of course.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In passing, Mr. Chairman, I might just make reference to a little booklet entitled "Letter Perfect" which was recently issued by the department. I have been surprised and delighted with the response this booklet has received all across Canada from the people to whom it has been sent, who constitute a fairly extensive list. For efficient operation our department depends to a very great extent on public understanding of our way of operation, and until recently there was nothing we could give the public which gave them a general view of the post office and its operations. This booklet fills in that blank spot. As I say, its worth and value has been proved beyond any measure by the reaction it has received right across Canada.

The preceding year has been a significant one for postal employees as well as for the Post Office Department itself. Last July salary increases totalling more than $7,300,000 were granted to 15,758 postal clerks, letter carriers, mail handlers and dispatchers. In August comparable increases totalling some $2,600,000 anually were granted to some 14,000 revenue and semi-staff postmasters and other employees. These two items, along with salary adjustments to professional and executive personnel, have added some $13½ million annually to the costs of the department.

An increase in salary, of course, always tends to improve the relationship between employer and employee, but I can assure the committee that other and equally positive steps were taken this year to improve and consolidate our relations with our employees.

Probably the most significant of these was the establishment of the joint post office-Canadian postal employees committee which has provided a regular and effective channel of liaison between our employees and management. The measure of the effectiveness of the functioning of this committee and its success is testified to by Mr. J. E. Roberts, general secretary-treasurer of the Canadian postal employees association. Writing in the Christmas issue of the Postal Tribune, the official journal of the association, Mr. Roberts had this to say:

> The most important step was the establishment of the C.P.E.-P.O. committee, and the results have exceeded all expectations.

At this point I should like to place on record my considered view that the men and women of the postal service are without peers in efficiency, loyalty and devotion to their work. I should like to record my appreciation for their loyalty and service.

It is a remarkable thing, in these times of changing values and growing materialism, to find so large a group so dedicated in their loyalty to the service. To many the words "loyalty" and "service" may seem anachronisms, but in the post office they are still very real and very important.

I have always been conscious of this attitude and I have always been grateful for the opportunity that has been afforded me, as Postmaster General, to be a part of the organization that draws to itself people who set and maintain such high standards for themselves in their work.

During the year we continued our stated policy of producing a limited number of special commemorative stamps which we felt signified events of real national importance. During the year we produced stamps commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Canadian Girl Guide movement, the historic battle of the Long Sault, the centennial of the birth of E. Pauline Johnson, the Indian poetess, and marking the tremendous strides achieved in the development of the north under this government.

The Des Ormeaux stamp, by the way, won first place in the annual "ten best" list published by the stamp collector's annual of London, England. The award was presented to this Canadian issue from among the thousand or more commemorative stamps published by all countries during the year.

I might note that this is the second year in a row that a Canadian stamp has made the "ten best" list. Last year our "plains of Abraham" commemorative stamp won a place on the list and also received the accolade as "best stamp of the year by a commonwealth country".

I do not ever remember this having been achieved by the previous administration, and I should like to set this achievement alongside the continual carping criticism made, stamp by stamp of the various designs we have issued, by my critic in the official opposition and tell him that no matter what his opinion is, in the opinion of experts Canada's stamps are worthy of being acclaimed internationally.

As I indicated last year, we are pressing forward with plans for a new general issue series of stamps, and at the moment we are studying a number of suggested designs. These stamps will continue to reflect our allegiance to the crown through the portrait of Her Majesty, but will incorporate as a minor element a design or symbol telling something of Canada. It is our hope that the first of this new series will be available before the end of this year.

Also in the field of postage stamps we shall be introducing this fall for regular sale $1 package of stamps sealed in transparent envelopes. These will be specially useful for people who like to keep stamps in their pocket or purse. To the best of my knowledge these new packages have not been attempted anywhere in the world, and represent an advance entirely Canadian in design and production.

This year I was forced to announce the first revision in parcel post rates in ten years. This adjustment was made necessary in order to offset heavy operating deficits in the carriage of parcel post. I should note that parcel post is still by far the most inexpensive method of parcel shipment available in Canada and that the rate increase which went into effect March 1 is in contrast with five separate increases announced over the past ten years by competing services.

I know the hon. member for St. Denis takes a special interest in robberies of post offices and of post office vehicles. In the face of a general upswing of crime across Canada during 1960 which reached as high as 30 per cent in some areas, the post office record shows an actual improvement since 1959.

This record reflects the improved security of our buildings, the added protective equipment such as walk-in vaults and safes with burglarproof chests, additional installations of burglar alarms and more efficient methods of handling post office cash and postal values. These measures, together with additional use of security transfer services and night depository services, have accounted for a reduction in the number of post office burglaries.

During the past fiscal year there were 295 post office break-ins compared with 366 for the same period during the preceding year. For the first 11 months of the fiscal year, the latest figures I have show that cash and postage supply losses had dropped from $162,430 to $92,403.

Early in the year, a committee of senior officers representing the several branches at headquarters concerned with motor vehicle security was formed and set into action. Since that time, although the number of holdups and thefts from post office vehicles is unchanged at 14, this year only seven offences resulted in the loss of public funds or postal values, compared with ten the preceding year.

During the fall of 1960 there was a flurry of street letter box thefts, and the number of attempts on letter boxes and relay boxes increased from 122 to 188 last year. We have now taken steps to improve security with regard to these boxes. In addition to removing the repair of mail receptacles from the penal institutions where this work has been done for more than half a century—a period which, of course, includes the entire regime of the preceding administration—we have publicized offers of rewards up to $2,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of persons committing various types of offence against the post office and the mail it carries.

I might emphasize here that we are dependent in so much of our activity on public co-operation and public help. We hope that these reward offers will attract public attention to the contribution they can make in dealing with these offences by making available to the department any information which they think might help us to deal with particular offences.

In addition to these steps, we are moving to increase and strengthen the staffs of our investigations and protection agencies in the field. We are acutely aware of the problems involved, and acutely aware of our responsibility to protect the mails that have been entrusted to us. In a time of increasing crime and violence, I believe our record has been consistently good. We are striving to make it better.

On the international scene, the Canada post office took advantage of the introduction of trans-Atlantic jet aircraft to offer a swifter regular air mail service to the United Kingdom and continental Europe. This tended to increase the popularity of air mail to overseas points in relation to surface mails. During the calendar year 1960, 1,034,801 pounds of international letter mail was conveyed by air as compared with 848,366 pounds conveyed by surface means, a 22 per cent differential in favour of the swifter aerial route.

Since I dealt at some length with the new Canada-United States postal agreement on March 15 in this chamber I shall not go beyond noting it at this time so that I shall not be accused of having overlooked it.

In the face of great new challenges, I believe the postal service has acquitted itself well. Today, as I report to this committee, the Canada post office is functioning, I believe, with an efficiency never dreamed of a few years ago. It is meeting challenges never anticipated in the last decade, and it is successfully overcoming them to maintain its high and envied place among the most effective and most efficient postal services of the world. I would just add the final word that in these circumstances we do not consider that "Denis" is any menace.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I must thank the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) for his brilliant statement. As usual, he has shown great talent for taking credit for the work done by the officials of his department. Yet the credit goes solely and exclusively to the employees of the post office.

He has also shown skill in disguising the wrongs for which he is personally responsible. The evils of his administration have been dressed up as virtues. When a figure is too high to be revealed to the public, he expresses it as a ratio and that is that.

He has not changed since a few years ago, when he used to make similar statements. He has taken credit for things he has not done, and has tried to justify his poor administration.

The minister reminds me of a type of bird known as the German sparrow, which uses the nests of other birds but never builds any himself.

I have been following the minister's remarks closely. A large portion of his statement was devoted to automatic devices, electronic machines, etc. He discussed the experiments which have been conducted so far, and I think he has been at the experimental stage for at least three years. If this goes on, I am afraid he will soon be overcome by his own party, because just recently, the Prime Minister stated at a Conservative rally, of course: "The experimental stage is over; we will now roll up our sleeves and prepare for the next elections." So I suggest that the minister get cracking if he wants to keep up with his colleagues.

Mr. Chairman, the minister said not a word about achievements coming under his jurisdiction. He made mountains out of mole hills. He talked about service expansion, something which is quite normal, resulting as it does from the population increase and the growth of new communities. All those services which have expanded during the past year under his administration are services that normally grow every year, as they did under the previous administration. In fact, I intend to prove this assertion a bit later.

Mr. Chairman, the minister was very careful not to mention the famous promises he used to make when he sat in the opposition. As far as he is concerned, all that is gone and forgotten.

For instance, he does not remember promising two mail deliveries a day. Naturally nothing has been done in that connection. The minister had also promised that the R.C.M.P. would investigate post office thefts, and had stated that this police force would protect the post offices. Yet no action has been taken in that respect.

The minister had promised to balance his department's budget. When he showed a deficit, he said it was fine. Last year, he came up with a surplus and used the word "tremendous". This year, he reports a $9 million deficit and calls the achievement outstanding. Whatever the situation, whether there is a deficit or a surplus, the minister is completely satisfied. Yet, when the Liberal party was in office, he would cry shame whenever the then postmaster general announced a profit.

When, unfortunately, there was a slight deficit in the past, the present Postmaster General hastened to explain that his predecessor had made a mistake. But when the present minister announces a deficit, it is a remarkable achievement, rather like a success.

Under the Liberal administration, it was considered a serious mistake, but not any more.

Postal workers are ill-treated by the present administration. They have been constantly complaining at many meetings. When it was decided to raise their salaries, it was done by groups, by classes, and there was no retroactivity. Since then, other meetings were held where complaints were voiced against salary adjustments that are not considered satisfactory.

Patrons, since that is what we are being called now, experience delays in the mail delivery. The situation is the same today as it was before, if not worse. I can prove this point.

As far as patronage is concerned, I must say that the minister has dismissed more people than ever. This is another point that can be easily proved.

Not only what he termed the extravagance of the former government was not corrected, but it has grown worse.

If we look at the estimates, we note unjustifiable discrepancies. How is it that in 1960 the estimates showed a $1.8 million surplus while in 1961 they show a $9 million deficit? Does he follow in that field the policy of the government, whose estimates have proven to be wrong?

There is some confusion here in the conception of budgeting, Mr. Chairman. One budget is a $9 million deficit, and it is an achievement. Another one shows a $1 million surplus, and it is still an achievement. One can't make head or tail of it.

On the whole, I believe that the minister, instead of being of assistance to the normal operation of the department, has hindered it. I offer him this advice, given to young doctors before they go into practice:

Primo non nocere. (First, cause no harm.)

I advise therefore the minister not to cause any harm. If he wants to figure out the weight of parcel post items compared to that of diesel engines, that is his business, since he seems to like adding up figures. If he wants to figure out the piling of postal parcels and strike a comparison with Mount Everest, that is his business. But he should not disturb his employees. They are more efficient when they are left undisturbed.

The hon. minister knows that a Russian, Gagarin, has just completed a full circle around the earth. He is quite at liberty, if he so wishes, to compare that distance with that covered by his letter carriers.

With regard to the estimates, it must be said that we are dealing here with a minister who is a spendthrift and an expensive one. As a matter of fact, estimates are increasing by the year.

In 1957, estimates had decreased by $1.2 million. As soon as he arrived, they increased by $11.1 million. In 1959, they were raised by $5.7 million, by $1.1 million in 1960 and $5.6 million in 1961.

For 1961-62, they go up again by $1.1 million. To that must be added the supplementary estimates passed recently, that is $1.2 million.

But that is not all. Income has also increased by $5.2 million in 1958, $4.4 million in 1959, $1.6 million in 1960 and $2.1 million in 1961.

What did he do with that money? How did he spend the money we voted him and the money he collected?

Receipts and appropriations gave him a total of $20 million more to spend in 1958 and $11.7 million more in 1959. The amount for 1960 has not been given, but I am sure it was even higher.

Should we blame the deficit on the wage increases? The minister should be careful here, because operation increases include the wage item.

In 1958, that item increased by only $5.2 million when he secured an additional 20 million in revenue and appropriations. In 1959, salaries account for no more than 4.4 million while the estimates and receipts went up by 11.7 million. It was the same story in 1960 when salaries increased by 1.6 million while he secured 11 million more than the previous year. Therefore salaries do not account for the deficits he is showing now.

Where there is evidence of extravagance, however, is in travelling expenses. The hon. minister is a great traveller. Yet, he pours out thousands of dollars in advertising, urging people to write and to write often; as for the minister himself, he does not do any writing. He and his officials go travelling. As a matter of fact, in 1957, when he came into office, travelling expenses were $337,000 but today they are up to $482,000, a 50 per cent increase. Then, not content with travelling, the minister and his employees use the telephone a lot. They telephone, they wire, but they do not write. The minister and his employees urge us, the customers, to write; as for himself, he has to use the telephone.

When, in 1957, the Conservatives took over, telephone and telegraph costs were $125,000; they now reach $176,400, an increase of over 40 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, the minister cannot boast of having saved any money there.

Take for instance item "purchase of material", such as the famous electronic equipment, those expenses he told us about: "Rental of electronic apparatus, and purchase of material", $1,000,000. The figure is now up to 2.5 million. Travelling expenses, telephone and purchase of material represent an increase of 1.3 million over 1957.

If we look at the estimates for this year, for the previous year and two years ago, we find that each year they grow larger. Where are the savings under those items I referred to?

Now let us deal with transport expenses. They are unchanged. They increased normally, as they did in 1955-56 and 1956-57.

Rail transport expenses are perhaps even less, because they have in many cases been replaced by truck service. The Lord only knows what success he made of it. The same can be said for mail transport by water or by air.

As far as philatelic income is concerned, the departmental report fills a whole page and a half with talk of this successful service which is bringing in $336,000. In 1953-54, philately brought in $418,000 and in 1956-57, $315,000. Why is the minister boasting like that?

I now come to that famous increase in the charges for parcel post, with which we were presented between Christmas and New Year's, by way of a gift. Though the house was sitting in November, the minister could hardly be expected to shoulder his responsibility and come to the house and say: We have to increase postal parcel rates. Or else, knowing that the house would meet again in January, he might have waited until then before taking action. But no, slyly, because this was bad news which he thought people would not notice during the holidays when nobody has time then to read the Canada Gazette, the minister chose that particular time to break the news.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Lesage upped his taxes at that very time.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Missisquoi is the first to interrupt me. Am I ever lucky.

An order in council of December 27, 1960, announced new rates for parcel post within Canada. Why did he not wait for the session to resume? Why not announce the increase to the house, like the brave man he is? Perhaps because he had promised not to increase the rates for this service. In fact he had undertaken to cut letter rates from five to four cents at the time he so unmercifully criticized the minister of the day.

That is not all. If he had been satisfied with a normal and reasonable increase, I would not bear him too great a grudge, but he is quite extravagant and needs a lot of money. But he has done more than that. He has eliminated from the list the special rates for delivery within 20 miles. That special rate has been abolished, not only for deliveries within the same province, but also for an adjacent province, which resulted in increased mailing costs. As a matter of fact, whereas it formerly cost 10 cents to send a parcel, it now costs 23 cents. A 15-pound parcel used to cost 38 cents and now costs

$1.64. Some mailing costs have even been increased by 331 per cent of the former rate.

(Text):

Mr. Johnson: On a point of order, I think the hon. member for Labelle is interrupting the hon. member for St. Denis.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville is doing the same thing as I am doing.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): The hon. member for St. Denis has the floor and if hon. members wish to carry on conversations, perhaps they might do so behind the curtain.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Please pardon him, Mr. Chairman, because the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) as well as other Conservative members have been very nervous since June 22 last, and they are getting more nervous as we draw nearer to the federal elections. I am prepared to put up with him, Mr. Chairman, provided that he does not bother you too much.

As I was saying, parcel post rates have gone up 90 per cent. It used to cost 38 cents to send a parcel from Hull to Aylmer, whereas today, for the same parcel, it costs $1.35. A parcel sent from Hull to Ottawa used to cost 38 cents, as against $1.64 today for a 15-pound parcel. Things have reached a point, Mr. Chairman, where it is cheaper to send a parcel by taxi.

I think the increase cannot be justified, save perhaps by the minister himself, with his pet words: "outstanding" and "tremendous".

When I asked him in the house what revenues he expected from those increases, the minister replied he expected to get $22 million. The estimates, therefore, had been drawn up at the time. The expenditures we will be asked to approve when his department's estimates come up do not include those extra $22 million.

Moreover, I fail to understand why the rate on periodicals has been raised by a third, despite the agreement reached with the United States. Here again, this is a case where the minister offered no explanation to the house until he was prodded by a C.C.F. member. The minister then proceeded to explain that it was another increase, yet it had been announced in the Chicago Tribune before we, in Canada, knew anything about it. This is a 33⅓ per cent increase which came into force today, at a time when the O'Leary commission has just completed its sittings and is working on its report; at a time when we are considering how to deal with the competition from American periodicals. Even before the report is submitted, the Postmaster General decides to raise the rate by one third. I am sure such a measure will in no way prevent periodicals from coming into Canada, because our own periodicals will be subject to the same increase. Canadian publishers were already complaining about low profits. If they are faced with higher rates on top of that, they will either be driven to bankruptcy or will have to raise the price of their periodicals. That is another increase on third class mail matter, as indicated on page 4 of the Post Office Department report.

> Articles of irregular shape, samples or advertising novelties, etc., will not be accepted for "householder" delivery and the rate on items weighing over two ounces has been increased by one half cent.

Therefore, that is another increase which the taxpayer will have to pay.

The minister thought that in taking over the department, he could bring the rates down. On the contrary, he has increased them.

And now, what about the employees? Everyone admits that the morale of the employees is very low; everyone admits today that the employees are afraid of loosing their jobs. When the minister has those electronic machines set up to do the work of 10, 15 and even 20 persons, he cannot have his employees nor Canadian taxpayers believe that those machines will not displace employees. Besides, the minister himself stated —perhaps not in the case of regular employees—that part-time employees might be affected. But those are employees like any others. The reason is very simple. If he does not hire more employees in the Post Office Department, it is because machines are displacing prospective employees.

Unemployment is prevalent across the country and we should set an example. There is no hurry for those electronic machines to displace labour.

The minister has no competition, he is the only one charging for parcel delivery, the only one charging for postal services. He could at least wait until unemployment decreases before thinking of replacing men by machines. Like any private member, a minister must take the human element into account, and bear in mind that hundreds of persons could normally be employed in this country by the Post Office Department, as is the case elsewhere. But not him. He wants to modernize. So he goes to the United States and to Great Britain to see new electronic devices. Some of them are rented at a cost of almost $2,000 a month, only on a trial basis and for experimental purposes. Why not wait at least until those countries proceed with their own experiments and see whether those machines are considered good. Then we can decide whether they should be bought or not. But no, we are being used as guinea-pigs, while our people are jobless. And meanwhile in the post offices—

Mr. Grafftey: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, would you please ask the hon. member to wait. I shall reply to all his questions in due course.

I come back to the morale of the employees. Last year, out of sheer meanness, Christmas and New Year's day were struck out as legal holidays because they fell on a Sunday, so that postal employees who usually work on Sundays and who decided to take the day off on Christmas or New Year's day were not paid. How petty, for the sake of a few pennies. No wonder your division saved money during the Christmas period, for it reduced the salary of workers getting $1.26 or $1.41 an hour. Moreover, they were told that they would be paid $1 an hour if they agreed to take on another type of job. This is a saving made by the minister at the expense of his employees, and he said so in this very house.

And that is not all. It was recently decided that employees working during the Christmas season would be granted holidays instead of being paid in cash. Yet, in 1957, the former postmaster general was giving them the choice between cash and holidays. And even then the present minister was complaining about the situation, as witness those words from Hansard:

I refer to page 1983 of Hansard of March 7, 1957:

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Will the minister please explain to the house why they do not make a practice of paying all Christmas overtime in cash and having the thing cleaned up promptly in January?

Mr. Bourget: It is not the same man at all.

Mr. Denis: Not the same man.

(Translation):

That is what he said. Other times, other ways. The employee who counted on his overtime to pay his rent will have to use his holidays. If he planned to make a time payment on a refrigerator, he has nothing but holidays to offer his dealer. If only he had been notified of this new policy, he would have acted accordingly.

Today the new Postmaster General is making a great show because he saved money on overtime. We are installing electronic machines, says he. There are 200 square feet of space in the Montreal post office which have been left empty for the last six months, waiting for the arrival of electronic devices. It served as a cloakroom during the holiday season. Today, this section is closed up, it is unoccupied. I do not know whether the minister is expecting Elsie and Alf, the English robot. Things of that sort happen every day. And then he stated: "I have no sympathy for letter carriers who complain about their salary". How after that, can you expect employee morale to be good? Here is sound advice for him: primo non nocere (first of all, do no harm). The minister is spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on electronic machines that will take the employees' places. Postal employees are entitled to know the facts. I think the Postmaster General should see to it that there are improvements, instead of trying to have people believe he has brought about improvements.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Does the committee agree unanimously that the hon. member should be permitted to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Is there any objection to going on now so that the hon. member can continue his remarks?

Mr. Denis: I will continue at eight o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I have heard objection to continuing at this time.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank hon. members for allowing me to go on with my remarks, even if the time I am allowed by standing orders has expired. I may assure you that I shall try not to abuse this privilege. However, in doing so, I feel that the public and hon. members may suffer, because I shall not be able to tell all I would like to say about the post office administration. At any event, I believe I have said enough by now to prove that the present minister, far from being as efficient as those who preceded him, just made things worse.

There is one thing I should not hesitate to say; he did more harm to employees in his department than any of his predecessors.

When the house took recess at six o'clock, I was just dealing with a speech made by the minister in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. In his speech, he attributed unemployment to three or four causes, of which the first was competition; the second, the greater number of people on the labour market; the third the lack of specialized and expert workers in this age of automation. Finally, he suggested to those who were listening—at least I suppose they were listening—to buy in Canada, to "Buy Canadian".

Now, if there ever was a minister who disregarded all these alleged causes of unemployment, it was the present Postmaster General. For instance, with regard to competition, the Postmaster General can hardly expect us to believe that there is competition within his own department. Consequently, if he does not take on more employees in his department it is not on account of another Post Office Department, since he is the only one to offer this service in this country.

Second, the increase of people on the labour market. That happens every year. It is normal. Each year, our population increases and there is hardly any difference with former years. As far as the special training which our citizens should have in order to face the automation era, if our workers are not ready to use automatic machines, it is up to the minister not to step up automation excessively. If the minister wants to set up automatic equipment in the Post Office Department and does not have the required experts to operate them properly, I should simply suggest that he wait until we have competent people to do this work. I do not tell him to hurry up, I simply suggest that he wait until the number of unemployed in this country regresses before he replaces people by machines in the Post Office Department.

And the last advice given by the minister to his listeners was to buy Canadian; he added that the Americans were buying American and the British buying British, and that Canadians could get something similar at a better price.

Well, Mr. Chairman, if that is good advice to reduce unemployment, I suggest that the minister should practise it himself because, unless I am mistaken, all that was modernized in the Post Office Department, all the electrical equipment that was installed there was imported. For instance, the Univac-120 equipment is imported; the electronic equipment comes from England or the United States. In fact, the minister even went to England recently and inquired about this famous new equipment called Elsie and Alf. I even believe that he is interested in introducing it in this country. Consequently, before advising Canadian citizens to buy Canadian, he should practise his own advice and buy Canadian whenever possible.

Mr. Deschatelets: Hear, hear.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, if this is true for electronic equipment, it is also true for mailmobiles or scooters, because most scooters or mailmobiles about which the minister makes such a fuss are American or Italian made, and it is only last year that they were finally fitted with a body apparently made in Canada. But the greater part of those mailmobiles is made abroad.

Thus, if the minister wishes to carry on his experiments with scooters or mailmobiles, he should try to find someone in Canada who could build such a mailmobile so that he could do his share to reduce unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, to come back to those mailmobiles, the minister said in the house, in reply to a question of mine, that his department had purchased 57 mailmobiles at an average cost of $81,966 a year. He added that without those mailmobiles, 19 additional civil servants would have to be hired. Now, supposing he had hired 19 additional employees at about $4,000 a year, for instance, instead of buying his mailmobiles, the total expenditure would have been $76,000. Therefore, it would have been cheaper than the experiment he is now carrying out with those mailmobiles.

I see the Postmaster General shaking his head in denial. He seems to feel that I am not right. Well then, let me quote the information given out by the minister, as found at page 787 of Hansard for December 14, 1960. I put my question as follows:

3. What is the average cost per year for (a) storage; (b) repairs; (c) operation; (d) maintenance; (e) depreciation, of such vehicles?

4. How many employees would have to be hired by the department in order to provide an identical service were such vehicles not being used?

And now, for the reply:

(c) $931 each ... (d) $141 each; (e) $366 each.

If we add up those amounts we obtain a total of $1,438.00. Multiply this total by 57, since the department uses 57 mailmobiles and you have a grand total of $81,966.

Here is the answer the minister gave on December 14, last year, as recorded on page 787 of Hansard:

It is estimated that 19 additional employees would be required for delivery duties if delivery were being made to these areas on foot.

Therefore, not only does he reduce the staff, not only is he of no help to the unemployed, but this is more expensive, with the result that these mailmobiles are a source of trouble, for they are always breaking down and cannot be used. And when one of those mailmobiles breaks down, all the second and third class mail, which is too heavy for the letter carrier, is held up and delivered only the next day, whereas if the service were provided by letter carriers, as before, we would be sure to get regular deliveries. We would as a result provide better service to our citizens and employment to more Canadians.

I therefore suggest that there has been enough experimenting with those mailmobiles, and that, if it is considered that in view of our climate they cannot provide adequate service, we should stop using them. Furthermore I think three years of experimentation should be enough. Such experiments should not go on indefinitely, particularly in the way they have been conducted over the past three years.

We are told that this does not affect employment; I have taken notes, and I can say that in a number of fields, for instance in departmental administration, fewer people will be employed next year than this year. In the case of casual jobs, only 50 more people than last year will be hired next year. Under the transportation item there is also a drop, just as there is in the financial services. Whereas 414 persons were employed, only 404 are to be employed next year, and so on. This proves that when the minister claims that electronic machines will not be displacing regular employees, he is getting away from the truth, because perhaps 100, 200 or 500 more employees might have been taken on, so that the result is the same.

I suggest that periods of unemployment are not proper times for experimenting at the expense of the workers. I am all for progress, but I am against it when it is introduced at the expense of the human element, particularly in times of unemployment. I am all in favour of forging ahead and keeping in step with other countries, but when this is done in times of unemployment and particularly when it increases operating costs, I think it is time to put a stop to such experiments and to come back to the principle that despite the improvements or benefits offered by modern devices, the human factor should not be ignored.

I should like to revert to the matter of patronage. We know in what way—

(Text):

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Denis: If my hon. friend would wait a few minutes he will have all night to ask any questions he wishes.

(Translation):

I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that patronage has prevailed even more than previously. All members here have received letters denouncing injustices, claiming that such and such a person, such and such a postmaster, such and such a postman had been dismissed for political reasons.

I will mention two or three cases only, without going into all the details. If the minister wants more details, I am prepared to give them to him. There is, for instance, the case of one Mr. Gingras in the beautiful constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, a veteran, who has been refused the job of postmaster because he was told he would not be able to carry out his work, in view of the fact that he was operating a bakery. There is also the case of a citizen of Louiseville, a veteran who, after having passed the test, was replaced by another candidate who is not a veteran.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Denis: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Paul: If the hon. member for St. Denis is referring to political influence alleged to have been used for the appointment of the Louiseville postmaster—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Denis: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Paul: —I must tell him and even emphasize the fact that the appointment is not the responsibility of the Postmaster General but that of the civil service commission.

The Chairman: If the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere has a question of privilege, he must state what it is about. If it is a matter of disagreement, he will have the opportunity to answer later.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, I understood the hon. member for St. Denis to contend that he is under the impression that the hon. minister has indulged in patronage. On that point, I submit—

Mr. Bourget: Order, order.

Mr. Paul: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for St. Denis has no right to level such an accusation.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, whether it is the civil service commission or the Postmaster General that should be blamed for it, it is none the less a fact.

However there is a point I should like to emphasize. When the Postmaster General was a private member in the opposition he used to criticize the postmaster general of the time and take him to task for various things. Yet the then postmaster general would reply that the question came under the civil service commission.

Therefore, if the present Postmaster General could raise questions at the time, I do not see why I cannot do the same now.

Mr. Ricard: Does that mean that all the charges then made were justified?

Mr. Denis: They are justified today. However the person responsible—

Mr. Ricard: You have been talking for an hour and a half without saying anything.

Mr. Denis: To give another example—several government members feel uneasy—I am referring to a sessional paper concerning Ladysmith, Que.

A mail contract was taken from a courier and awarded to another man who is a Conservative organizer.

Mr. Ricard: You transferred 535 contracts. You are the greatest supporters of patronage.

Mr. Denis: The Postmaster General denies practising patronage. I simply want to prove, quoting certain cases in support of my point, that he does practise patronage.

The minister is as much to blame as his predecessors, if not more so.

I simply submit the case of Ladysmith. A Mr. Pasch was replaced by a Mr. Turcotte, in spite of a petition signed by all boxholders, except two who could not be reached on account of bad roads.

Here is a summary of the petition and this is part of the papers produced in the house.

(Text):

Copy sessional paper 119C, 1st March, 1961.

(Translation):

Here is what the petitioners claimed, among other things on March 1, 1961:

(Text):

As far as we are concerned, Mr. Pasch—

(Translation):

He is the man who had the contract before.

(Text):

—is the best mailman we have had as long as we have had this route. He is just like clock work every Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday morning. We know just when to expect him.

Further down, it says:

To us, so far as James Turcotte is concerned—

Mr. Turcotte is the man who is replacing the former mailman.

—we are certainly against him serving our mail boxes. In the first place he is in his high seventies and he is too old a man to be capable of looking after mail.

(Translation):

I skip a small part, because it is somewhat private and personal. I continue:

(Text):

He is always interfering with politics and that does not suit with post office work. Several of us box holders will certainly have our boxes lifted off the posts if James Turcotte serves our mail boxes as he is anything but honest. We certainly got a shock when we heard of our rural route carrier Reinhold Pasch being changed without any complaints or warning.

(Translation):

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, that petition was signed by all box holders, with the exception of two.

Did that prompt the minister to reconsider his decision? Oh, no.

Another one lost his postmastership because he had signed nomination papers.

We all know that honest citizens often cannot refuse to sign a candidate's nomination papers. What makes it worse in this case is the fact that the nominee was not running in a federal election but in a provincial one. If the postmaster had taken part in a meeting or if he had been an organizer, well and good, but he merely signed to show that he knew the man who wanted to run in a provincial election. He is an honest man and a veteran besides.

He is replaced by another Conservative organizer. Therefore we Liberals have no lesson to take from the new Postmaster General who, while in the opposition, used to complain about the very same things.

If he wants me to recite dozens of cases, I can do so and prove to him that he did worse than the minister of the previous government.

Anyway, Mr. Chairman, there is another promise which he made but never fulfilled.

I come now to that famous question of publicity. I know that our friend, the Postmaster General is publicity-minded. In fact, I have never known a minister to enjoy facing camera as much as does the present minister.

And yet in years gone by he would complain about the high cost of publicity, criticizing the publicity reports for 1956 and 1957.

Well in 1956-57, before the minister took over his present function, we used to spend $326,700 in Canada for his department's publicity. We are now asked in this budget to vote $456,800 for the same purpose, which is an increase of more than $130,000, or one third; that amount is more than sufficient to replace the famous locks the keys of which are now in the hands of Kingston inmates.

I believe that in that field alone he could save enough to change all locks on postal boxes which may be broken into, since it has been proven by the police who inquired into the matter that crooks had keys to open almost any postal box across the country.

As a proof of his propensity for exaggeration, the Postmaster General uses public money for his own publicity. I have here a copy of the publication entitled Postmark, for which the government spends over $34,000 every year.

If you get this little publication, you will notice that every issue carries a photograph of the Postmaster General. It is reproduced sometimes twice, sometimes three times. I have even found an issue showing his picture 12 times. Altogether, these publications printed the picture of our sweet Postmaster General 70 times.

In addition, he has been cover-boy or pin-up boy seven or eight times. He has been photographed standing up, riding a scooter, a car, sorting mail and bowling. He has been photographed from the front and from the back.

In all this publicity we find summaries of things he has said, and references to the places where he has been and where he has eaten.

All that has cost the Canadian public $34,000. We have no objection to the minister making propaganda for himself, and I believe he needs it. He has my approval, but he should do it at his own expense, not at the expense of the Canadian people.

But that was not enough to satisfy him, so he recently sent another 24-page book, printed on de luxe paper. I got one and I believe other members got a copy too.

In this book, he tells us that we do not know anything about postal service. However, on reading the book, we realize that the Postmaster General himself does not know anything about it either.

As a matter of fact, this book contains a summary of the report of the Post Office Department. But the minister being fond of publicity, takes advantage of it.

His name appears on page one, and again on page three.

Another blank page and a nice grey ribbon.

Mr. Gillet: Jealousy is your only inspiration.

Mr. Denis: The third page is blank; further on only a quarter page is printed, then there is a large school-child sketch, and another quarter page.

You can read all kinds of trivialities and stupidities. For instance, how many miles the mail carriers walk: they walk six to seven times the distance from earth to the moon and back.

There is information about the weight of letters, and I think that is where it is said it equals that of 2,000 diesel locomotives.

Really, Mr. Chairman, that information is so interesting that I think I will quote it, the more so since I would not want to misrepresent the minister's statements.

On page 7 you can read:

(Text):

It is more than 3,700 miles from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, B.C. but if all the letters posted last year by Canadians were laid neatly end to end—

Mountain of mail.

(Translation):

I do not know how long it takes to work out those calculations, and I wonder whether the employees are the ones who make them I do not know whether the letters are large or small or whether undelivered letters are included in the statistics.

(Translation):

—they would cover the return trip half a dozen times.

(Translation):

Some letters are a foot long, others are only six inches long; this is part of—

They would weigh more than a thousand diesel locomotives—

(Translation):

It is fortunate that diesel engines were invented, otherwise we would not have obtained those statistics; the old engines were inadequate.

(Translation):

—and stacked in a pile would tower 500 times as high as Mount Everest.

(Text):

This is very instructive, Mr. Chairman, this is really informative for the Canadian people. I wonder how people could be so ignorant before. I wonder how long it took the employees to figure that out.

I remember that we were asked to guess riddles of that sort in school: If it takes 30 yards of cloth to cover an elephant's back, from what height would a monkey have to drop a peanut in order to sink a ship?

I feel that this administrative system is childish. When it is claimed that the Canadian people are being informed by such nonsense, I suggest it is time to change the government if not to change the Postmaster General.

Out of 24 pages, eight at most are made up of reading matter. There is no French version, it is out of the question. The price of this publication is not known. Yet, enough space was available to include a French version.

Mountains. And on page 7:

Here, you see a picture of the minister, sketches, and his famous plastic mailbox which cannot contain much more than Christmas cards because it is no bigger than a matchbox.

In my opinion, the minister had his bit of fun.

(Text):

Ah, we have information on page 21.

What the post office does for you—It carries your mail.

(Translation):

I believe I have said enough—

Finally, the minister asks for our comments. Well, I think he will save me the trouble of writing to him, but I suggest that he read the record tomorrow and he will have a good idea of the Canadian population's opinion on that matter.

Now, with regards to postal service, as I said earlier, we have lots of letters that are returned three months after having been sent; people have come close to being arrested because their mail was late, or have lost their job for the same reason, as a Cooksville alderman pointed out.

The minister boasts of having set up carrier services. However this service has been refused to Ste. Agathe des Monts; and do you know why? They did not have the required population. Therefore, it was not the minister's fault. Well, same goes for those who have obtained their carrier service—it was not the minister's doing either. Carrier service extension is normal, as evidenced by the annual increases of those services.

In 1956-57, street letter box service increased by eight; in 1957-58, it increased by nine; there has been another increase in 1958-59 and an increase of nine in 1959-60.

As far as parcel post is concerned, it is the same thing; each year you add four or five new services—it is normal.

Therefore, the minister should not take credit for it. It depends on the population, the area and the density of homes.

The situation is the same in the case of the other road services.

In the case of rural routes, they used to increase by about 50 each year in the past. The minister does exactly the same thing now. The policy was the same in 1956-57 when those routes increased by 50; in 1959-60, they increased by 54. This is nothing to boast about. There is no reason to take any credit for it. Everything is done according to rules established long before the hon. gentleman became Postmaster General.

As far as the post offices are concerned, the minister cannot boast of having increased their number because, since he took over they have decreased by exactly 382. Some better and larger ones have been built but nevertheless, we have, in this country, 382 post offices less than when the minister's party took over.

A few moments ago, the efficiency of the service which looks after compensation claims was mentioned. In 1957, there were 11,800 claims; in 1959-60, there were 13,020. Consequently, since the minister has been administering the department, compensation claims have not decreased.

Compensation paid in 1957, because they were really warranted, amounted to $128,000, whereas under the present minister's administration, his department paid out a sum of $170,000 in compensation. In short, as far as an improvement of that service is concerned, it can scarcely be called a success.

On the other hand, as far as recoveries are concerned, the amount of $11,200 has been recovered on amounts which had been paid. In 1959-60, the amount was exactly the same. Yet, the department paid out large sums in compensation. The number of compensation cases has increased; and the amount has also risen.

With regard to dead letters, we find that they are more numerous than ever.

And the minister's auction sales, well, they brought in less than in 1957.

As to postal matter, the situation is about the same as in 1957. In 1956-57, there were 3,485 million postal matters; in 1958, there were 3,723 million; in 1960, the figure was 3,600; in 1960-61, we have 3,900 million.

Consequently, the volume of mail is not much bigger now than it was in the past.

An hon. Member: It is costing millions more.

Mr. Denis: I do not think I need continue my remarks in that regard, because we have amply shown that the minister had nothing to do with all the good that came about; rather it was a result of normal operations.

If the hon. minister wishes to hear complaints about holdups, I can give him dozens of them—

(Text):

Mr. Aiken: On a point of order; I realize that the hon. member has been given extended time and that this is his big moment, however, he has been speaking now for 40 minutes. If we are going to extend the time I feel we should at least go through the formality of doing so each half hour.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: I suggest that the hon. member bear with me for two or three minutes. In any event, he knows full well that we are allowed to speak for 30 minutes when the house is considering estimates, and to rise as often as we wish. Furthermore, I do not know whether he was here at the time, but the hon. members have been kind enough to allow me to complete my remarks. I also think the Postmaster General is anxious to get rid of me as soon as possible, and I want to give him satisfaction.

I still have to deal with the matter of thefts. for which I should not need more than two minutes. The present minister used to complain that his predecessor hired thieves. He has risen to office, he has become Postmaster General, and now there are even more thefts. And when he was asked about this, he said: "Yes, there are more thefts, but there is less money involved." This year however, there are more thefts and there is more money involved. I wonder what excuse he will turn up. Let me remind him of what he said on July 26 1958, as recorded on page 2739 of Hansard:

> ...while roberries in post offices did increase from 159 in the previous year to 191, the actual losses in those robberies declined from $161,500 to $130,100. The reason for that is simply that instead of the previous, self-satisfied, take-what-may-come attitude of the former postmaster general we went after this thing.

The minister says he went after this thing. Could it be because there had been less money stolen? In 1959-1960 the number of thefts reached the figure of 813. At the time he complained, there had been 335. So what kind of success can the minister claim? The amount of money stolen at the time was $106,510, as against $295,130 today. In other words, the amount has tripled and the number of thefts has doubled. So, considering that he used to complain about the minister hiring thieves, I wonder what charge I should level at the present minister now.

Mr. Chairman, in order to please the hon. member who finds that my comments are not likely to help the Conservative party, I shall close my remarks in saying that the Postmaster General has fulfilled none of the numerous promises he made when he was a private member.

Second, he has neglected the employees in lowering their morale by his meanness.

Third, he has neglected the services in multiplying delays, in allowing thefts to increase, in allowing, for instance, that deliveries by truck be exposed to thefts much more than when deliveries were made by train. Allow me to remind the house that when one of the first postal services was set up in 1719, highway robbers had been checked by arming mail couriers. The minister could do the same thing; he could also investigate when a mail transport contract is granted. I submit that the present minister is not aware of the behaviour or background of those who obtain mail contracts, nor of the truck drivers. No wonder the mail is exposed to all kinds of thefts, as was the case when the truck driver was himself the thief. I suggest to the minister to reconsider the matter and stop increasing truck transport to the detriment of railway transport.

Lately, we learned that the Canadian National Railways had registered a deficit of $67 million. That would be a good opportunity to reduce that deficit a little by having them keep their contracts.

Once again, I hope the minister will give credit to those postal employees who are doing a tremendous job, and who certainly deserve the congratulations of the Canadian people.

(Text):

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, some 10 minutes ago the hon. member who has the floor said that he would finish in two or three minutes. These have been the longest two or three minutes that I have ever experienced in my life.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, some of us have looked forward with anticipation to once again having our annual entertainment in the House of Commons and I must say that the hon. member for St. Denis has not let us down. He has again provided enjoyment in our discussions. I should like to disagree with him on only one plea that he appeared to be making. If I assess his submissions accurately, he seemed to plead with the department to delay the application of automation to the Post Office Department in the interest of supplying more employment in our nation. To me this would be a most deplorable attitude for the minister or for any department of government or any industry to adopt because I believe that all of us ought to basically welcome the advance of automation. If we can make machines do the work that human labour has done in the past I believe it is in the long term interest of all of us to welcome this type of development. I believe that national unemployment problems have to be resolved in another way and that opposing automation in any department of government or in any industry is a very poor answer to the unemployment problem.

In my initial remarks I should like to remind the minister of the call issued by his own Prime Minister at the last meeting of the national Progressive Conservative party of Canada in their great pow-wow in Ottawa, at which time the Prime Minister announced that the issue the next time we faced the electorate will be free enterprise versus socialism. Since the minister is one of those responsible for the operation of one of the most socialistic enterprises in our nation, I ask him whether tenders have yet been called for the sale of the Post Office Department? Is he prepared to follow his leader and offer for public sale the enterprise known as the post office of Canada because, if I understand the clarion call of the next election, it is supposed to be free enterprise versus socialism. The minister is responsible for one of the greatest socialistic enterprises in Canada, and I am asking him whether the post office is to be sold to private enterprise with or without tenders being asked for and bids being called?

I should also like to join the hon. member for St. Denis in his expression of regret over the "letter perfect" that we received in our mails. I should like especially to express my regret at the particular bulletin entitled the "Letter Perfect." We received a letter signed by William Hamilton, Postmaster General. I suppose it was signed by a mimeograph machine. What I do not particularly appreciate is the opening sentence which asks, "How much do you know about the Canadian post office? If you are like most other Canadians the answer is 'very little'". I think the tone of that letter is regrettable in so far as the recipients are concerned. I know the minister is an expert in the field of public relations and advertising. However, I am sure that no one in the advertising field, or in the public relations field, will agree with him that it was appropriate to address that letter to all members of parliament, and I suppose to all members of the other place, informing them that what they know about the Canadian post office is "very little".

I believe this was a regrettable move on the part of the Post Office Department and it did very little to enhance the prestige of the minister. We may all be experts in certain fields but if we have an understanding of public relations we will never inform people that they are not also experts in a particular field.

I should like to begin my remarks by paying my compliments to the employees of the minister's department. I believe that in world history instances are very rare where public employees can be said to have given as faithful service to the general public as have the employees of the Canadian post office over many long years. They have done so despite inadequate wages and inadequate recognition on the part of the government of Canada in years gone by.

To come to specific matters. I recall that some time ago the minister assured the house that the minimum number of households required before door-to-door delivery service might be instituted in any community was a subject that was under consideration. At the present time the regulations provide that door-to-door delivery service cannot be instituted in any community until at least 2,500 households exist. The minister assured the house at that time that this minimum figure was under active consideration from the point of view of the possibility of reducing it. I should like to have a report as to what have been the results of this active consideration. Have any conclusions been reached and, if so, what are the conclusions?

In the light of existing levels of unemployment I believe very serious consideration indeed should be given to this matter and I should like to recommend that door-to-door delivery be instituted in all communities having 1,500 households rather than the existing minimum of 2,500. Before we go overboard in offering twice-daily service in any of our urban areas for the convenience of a limited number of business institutions, I believe we should first of all give most serious consideration to reducing the minimum number of households required before an urban area, a suburban area or any postal community can have door-to-door delivery service.

I should like to call the minister's attention to page 48 of his latest annual report. I notice that it deals with the year ended March 31, 1960. I suppose that a day or two after we have completed his estimates we will receive in the mail the latest annual report for the year ended March 31, 1961.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Thank you for the compliment.

Mr. Regier: I have noticed this happening in the case of so many departments in the past. The moment the estimates are through we are supplied with a copy of the latest annual report. I can understand that as of today, April 13, the minister can hardly be expected to have his annual report completed and I am willing to forgive him. However, I regret having to deal with a report that is over a year old.

I should like to call his attention to page 48 where reference is made to the operations of the post office savings bank for the past ten fiscal years. In my opinion this is a wonderful institution and I regret that the minister and his department are doing very little indeed to advertise the facilities available to the Canadian public through the branches of the post office savings bank that exist.

I am very pleased to note that the number of depositors has increased. There are now 302,611 accounts compared with 278,595 at March 31, 1951. I believe that is remarkable progress. However, I also notice that the balance on deposit as at the end of the fiscal year has declined from $37,661,920.55 at March 31, 1951, to $29,372,460.93 as of March 31, 1960. In my view this is regrettable. I contend that the minister and the Post Office Department should undertake measures to make the facilities available to the Canadian public more widely known. I look forward to the number of depositors who patronize the post office savings bank continuing to grow and I hope the total volume of deposits will also grow in the years to come.

I should now like to refer the minister to page 50 of his latest annual report where reference is made to the number of post offices. Once again, as I have done in other years, I must call his attention to the fact that there is again a decline in the number of post offices in operation in Canada. During the year ended March 31, 1960, there were 279 post offices closed while only 142 new post offices were established resulting in a net decline in the number of post offices of 137. The reason I raise this issue is that it is a very important one to many people living in the suburban areas adjacent to the metropolitan centres of Canada. There is and there has been for years a deliberate policy on the part of the Post Office Department to lock up post offices in suburban communities in order to enhance the prestige and size of the major post office in the central metropolitan area. The minister should realize that he is not being blamed for the Liberals having built a $14 million lemon in Vancouver. He ought not to sustain the maintenance of that lemon and to penalize all rural communities around Vancouver for the sake of making this Vancouver lemon into a paying proposition. The minister ought to realize that there was a minister preceding him and that there were other colleagues of the minister preceding him who looked with envy at the pork barrels existing in Montreal and in Toronto and who made a very desperate effort to establish a similar pork barrel in the city of Vancouver. We are having post offices closed down and knocked out of business all around Vancouver, even many miles away from Vancouver, because of this initial plot and scheme for which I do not blame the minister. It was a Liberal cabinet minister, and not even a former Liberal postmaster general but a Liberal cabinet minister of the city of Vancouver, who designed this particular plot.

If the minister attempts to tell me or the people of the lower mainland that because of automation efficiency is being increased, he is completely wrong. He can ask any reputable business man in the lower mainland of British Columbia and he will find that our services are deteriorating year by year until the situation has arrived at the stage where every once in a while delivery of a first class letter from Ottawa to my home takes up to five days, while a letter out of South Burnaby into north Burnaby will take up to three and four days. Any man, on behalf of a business enterprise or organization sending out mail in the lower mainland of British Columbia will be very happy to substantiate my claim. The minister is not responsible initially. He ought to stop listening to the big grass in the Vancouver postal district and pay some attention to the local community needs in that area. Our postal services are rapidly deteriorating.

We see no beneficial results whatsoever in this effort to build up this horrible lemon we find on Georgia Street which cost the taxpayers $14 million. A tunnel was built, if you please, to carry the mail from the C.P.R. station. It is an underground tunnel. I do not know how long it is; it is several miles in length and it cost $2 million. It has been a complete flop ever since the beginning. All important mail goes by air as the minister knows. The building was designed for helicopter service from the airport to the post office. I understand there is no such service even yet after many long years. There is no helicopter that takes the mail at the airport and delivers it on to the roof of this $14 million building. However, to handle the advertising of the soapsuds there is a $2 million tunnel in operation.

I would ask the minister whether the interest on $2 million a year would not more than pay for all the trucking necessary for a number of years to come. There is no tunnel to the C.N.R. station. There is just one tunnel costing $2 million to the C.P.R. station. I understand that it is operating most inefficiently and that, as far as economics are concerned, it is really something fantastic and out of this world.

I hope the post office will also soon begin to pay some attention to municipal boundaries. I know the assertion is made that in the interests of efficiency they can pay no attention to municipal boundaries. However, I have in my constituency the corporation of the district of Coquitlam. The residents of this municipality receive their mail either in the city of Coquitlam, out at the city of New Westminster or out at the city of Port Moody —and that is a fantastic situation—simply because of the arbitrary authority. We pay no attention to municipal boundaries. It is ridiculous. If there were a little bit of good will on the part of the postal authorities, they would pay some attention at least to municipal borders and would attempt to align their services so as to cause the least possible disruption. In my opinion it is completely needless that one single municipality must be served out of three separate post offices, each with a different name.

I should also like to appeal to the minister at this time to consider once again increasing the postage on second class and third class mail. I feel that it is absolutely unfair to ask the users of first class mail and the taxpayers of Canada to subsidize all the horrible material that arrives in our mail boxes almost every day. I have a small apartment in Ottawa. I received there several advertisements in the mail this morning the first of which reads:

> Save 10 cents on Kellogg's cereals. Free coupons inside. Canada postage paid, 1½ cents.

The next one reads:

> To the occupant 9 cents off. Canada postage paid, 1½ cents.

It is sent out by Rice Chex, Wheat Chex and Corn Chex. I do not know what that means. The next one reads:

> Save 10 cents when you buy one bottle of New Jim Dandy.

The next one reads:

> Save 10 cents when you buy Swan any size.

There is shown a picture of the new squeeze bottle. That is four advertisements. I have one more which reads as follows:

> 12 cents off any size package of Extra.

I assume that "Extra" is a soap of some kind. Oh, I observe it is alleged that it is especially helpful in the washing of glasses or cut glass. The taxpayers and the users of first class mail are helping to pay for the distribution of this kind of junk. These companies, if you please, can turn around and claim this cost under the Income Tax Act as part of their advertising expenses. I know what happens to this 12 cents. Every merchant in Ottawa has 100 customers who like their merchant and they do not buy the stuff. They just bring the coupons to the merchants. It means in this case roughly 49 cents to these merchants to whom these advertisement coupons will be delivered in time.

I believe it is time that these misusers of the Canadian postal facilities are made to pay their fair share of the cost. This has nothing to do with the distribution of public information as is the case when we speak of newspapers or other valuable publications. However, these people ought to be called to account and be made to pay their fair share.

I should also like to ask the minister about one other matter. How much does his department pay each year to Pitney-Bowes? How much did they pay within the last fiscal year, or the fiscal year preceding that, if that information happens to be statistically more easily available to the minister?

If I want a Pitney-Bowes machine, why do I have to pay much more than the little machine is worth in the first place in order to get it to my business office? Then why do I have to pay a rental every three months on the machine? In the average business establishment the rental alone is more than the bloomin' little machine is worth in the first place.

I ask the minister, does Pitney-Bowes have a complete monopoly in the matter of postage meters; and if so, why? Why does not the department consider owning its own machines and renting them out to business establishments in Canada? Why do we have to pay over $300 for a machine that in its manufacture is worth perhaps $8 or $9, and then have to pay a very heavy rental ever after? What kind of a stranglehold have these people on the post office in this regard?

While I know they have not a monopoly in this field, how much did the government pay Pitney-Bowes in the last recorded year for the rental of weighing scales; and if they rent any at all, have they paid any money to Pitney-Bowes for the rental of folding machines? My inquiry concerns postage meters, scales and folding machines.

I believe the activities of this particular firm in relationship to the post office are due for investigation and I should like to have the minister's observations on these matters.

Before resuming my seat my main plea to the minister is that he should realize that in 1957 he became the Postmaster General of Canada. I know that most of his employees are loyal beyond the call of duty. However, I should not like the minister to think for one moment that he must always and at all times heed the advice of his senior officials without personal investigation into the merits of the arguments put forward by those senior officials.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the Postmaster General on a very interesting presentation of the annual report of his department. The hon. member for St. Denis could not see too much virtue in it, but I think the hon. member is possibly better as a humourist than a statesman, as far as his view of post office matters is concerned.

I think the Post Office Department, the Postmaster General and the government are to be congratulated for taking a forward view in carrying on the administration of this branch of government service. No service given to the Canadian people is nearer to their hearts, lives or emotions than the service given by the Post Office Department.

Steps were taken during the last year to promote good relations with the employees of this department by adjusting their wages and bringing them into line with other adjustments that have been made throughout the civil service. I am sure that the morale of post office employees has been greatly improved over the year on that account.

I know the Postmaster General is well liked by his employees. He has come into my own constituency without any fanfare and has visited local post offices in a quiet and efficient way much to the liking of the people in charge of those post offices. The department has been alert to increase the delivery service in the urban development areas around the city of London, and this has been much appreciated.

On behalf of the people of my constituency I extend thanks to the Postmaster General and the government for the promise of some new post office construction in our riding in the towns of Strathroy, Lucan and the village of Delaware.

I should like to offer one suggestion to the minister and the government for the improvement of the post office service in Canada. I suggest that the government give consideration to extending house-to-house delivery to the smaller centres. At the present time we have house-to-house delivery in the cities and, as was pointed out in the report of the Postmaster General, in the business sections there are two deliveries a day in many instances.

In the well developed rural areas all across the country we have house-to-house delivery through the medium of rural delivery carriers. In the smaller towns and villages across the country people still have to walk a distance of up to half a mile to the post office for their mail. I think it would be worth considering extending house-to-house delivery in the smaller towns and villages where this can be done with reasonable facility.

We are spending large sums of money to encourage the creation of jobs in Canada. Here would be a field of employment really made to measure. It requires only manpower.

It has been estimated by some authorities that in the heavy construction industry it costs as much as $28,000 a year to keep one man working with modern equipment. This is because of the high capital cost of materials and the power equipment necessary for this kind of industry. It would cost virtually nothing in the way of capital to put a mail carrier to work. Every dollar spent would be a dollar in wages. Such a program would constitute the most direct possible form of encouraging employment.

Such an extension of house-to-house delivery would raise our standard of living and assist in the equitable sharing of our national income by supplying more people with gainful employment. On January 22, 1959 I made the same suggestion in the course of the debate on the address and I said on that occasion as reported on page 225 of Hansard:

> On page 2744 of Hansard of July 26, 1958 the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) stated that house-to-house delivery is not provided in municipalities where delivery calls number less than 2,500. The reason behind this policy is that house-to-house delivery is most economical where six carriers can be used, five for regular five-day week route work and one spare man to alternate over the five regular routes so as to furnish six-day service.
> It is respectfully suggested to the minister and the government that consideration should now be given to providing house-to-house delivery in smaller towns and villages where there is sufficient work to provide full-time employment for one man. Rural free delivery is almost universal; so is house-to-house delivery in the large centres. It would appear that the people in the smaller towns and villages may be under a disadvantage compared with others from the standpoint of mail service.

I should like to suggest to the Postmaster General and to the government that an estimate of the cost of extending house-to-house delivery to the smaller towns and villages across Canada be made, and that careful consideration should be given to the proposal I have outlined.

Mr. Carter: Like all hon. members I listened with a great deal of interest to what the minister had to tell us about his department this afternoon. I want to compliment him on the achievements which he related to the committee, although the evident satisfaction which the minister showed in those achievements might perhaps make any further compliments seem superfluous.

Before proceeding, I too, want to pay tribute to the staff of the post office both here in Ottawa and in my own province. As the Postmaster General has said, they are very dedicated people and I wish to record my appreciation of the co-operation I have always received from them and for the thoughtful and sympathetic consideration which they have always given to problems I have brought before them.

Like the hon. member for St. Denis I received one of those little booklets telling the story of the Canadian postal service, and I want to thank the Postmaster General for reminding me that I am both a shareholder and a patron of our country's most essential public service utility. As a shareholder in this great public service over which the Postmaster General presides I must confess that my chest swelled with pride at the great list of broken records and earth shattering achievements about which the hon. gentleman told us this afternoon but I must say also that this pride was rudely dissipated when the Postmaster General announced a $9 million deficit. Deficits are always bad news to shareholders and it came as an anti-climax to all those great accomplishments: the greatest volume, the greatest expansion, the greatest revenue, he said, since 1867. The minister did not say it, but I was wondering whether this deficit was also the greatest deficit we have had since 1867.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No.

Mr. Carter: Well, I did note from the report that this is the greatest deficit we have had since 1951. The largest deficit recorded since 1951 is a little under $2½ million. We had a surplus in 1956 amounting, I think, to a little more than $10 million, which is a far cry from the financial balance sheet which the minister put on record today. The Postmaster General explained that this deficit was due to salary increases. I do not think that explanation is entirely valid. As the hon. member for St. Denis has pointed out there was an increase in the estimate last year as well as an increase in revenue, which should have helped toward paying those salary increases. The question which is uppermost in my mind is this: did any of those salary increases go to revenue postmasters? The minister mentioned two groups and I understood that these were permanent employees. But in most of my riding we have very small communities and very small post offices and I should think the people who work in them are not regarded as permanent employees but, more or less, as casual employees. I was wondering whether they also had shared in these increases. The minister nods; I am glad to know that they did.

In my province, or, at least, in my own riding, the functions of the post office have changed considerably over the past 12 or 13 years. Prior to confederation, or what we call confederation, when Newfoundland became a part of Canada, there were very few if any people in the ordinary fishing settlement who had any interest in the post office. The local merchant would probably be expecting mail together with the teacher, the clergyman and a few professional people. But perhaps not more than a dozen people in the whole settlement would be interested in the post office and therefore there was not too much concern about the service on the part of the people generally. Nowadays, however, everybody is interested in the post office because everybody gets mail. There are unemployment insurance cheques, family allowance cheques, old age pension cheques and so on, and the post office today instead of serving perhaps a dozen people serves practically every family in the community.

This places a greater burden on post office services and gives greater status to the postmaster. In view of this increase in traffic the postal accommodation situation in the small settlements is not satisfactory. We have a great number of settlements comprising 500 or 600 to 1,000 people. Although these settlements have quite a number of inhabitants the post office, because of low revenue, is operated from an individual's home. I am speaking of those settlements where the postal revenue is not great enough to warrant the provision of a post office building in the community. This situation imposes an inconvenience upon the residents because they must line up outdoors in all kinds of weather in order to receive their mail. Generally speaking there is no lobby in the private home and sometimes hardly even room enough to accommodate the mail.

I have repeatedly asked the Postmaster General to change the policy in this regard because I feel that if we are making great progress, as he has suggested this afternoon, the policy should surely be sufficiently flexible as to meet the varying conditions that exist in these settlements. I feel that we are, instead of changing the policy, holding to the old rigid policy of not providing postal services, such as buildings, etc., in those areas unless the revenue is at least $10,000, or something in that neighbourhood. This policy does not allow the provision of that type of service expected by the people in those out of the way settlements. I would like at this time to renew my age-old plea to the Postmaster General to reconsider his policy in this regard, and I hope that when he comes back to present his estimates next year he will be in a position to tell us that another great step forward has been taken in respect of a change in the provision of accommodation in the settlements to which I have been referring.

An hon. Member: That would mean a greater deficit.

Mr. Carter: No, I do not think this would mean a greater deficit at all.

I would also like to bring a problem to the attention of the Postmaster General regarding the basis of remuneration to the postmasters in these small revenue areas, and suggest that it is not entirely fair. As the Postmaster General appreciates, the postmasters in these revenue areas are paid a fixed amount out of which they are required to provide accommodation, fuel, light, janitorial services and maintenance. This is a satisfactory system in some areas but does not work out well in others. One result of this policy is that in two areas, comparable both in size and work load, the cost of accommodation varies, with the result that one postmaster will, in effect, receive less than an other. I realize that there is the one advantage that the total amount paid to individual postmasters can be used as a basis for superannuation, but it seems to me it would be more equitable if the Postmaster General were to accept the responsibility of providing for accommodation rather than placing the burden upon the individual postmasters themselves. Present practice does constitute a hardship to the individual postmasters in many cases. While it is true that, as the Postmaster General told us this afternoon, the salaries to revenue postmasters have been increased, I am wondering if there has been a proportionate increase given to cover the cost of rentals, fuel and other operating expenses, or is the increase in these costs to be taken care of by the one increase he mentioned?

I must now turn to a consideration as a patron rather than a shareholder and in this light must express concern at the increasing postal rates particularly in respect of parcel post services. As the hon. member for St. Denis pointed out, the rate increases have been substantial, ranging from 100 per cent to 300 per cent.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You must remember that the rates have gone downward as well.

Mr. Carter: Yes, they have gone downward as well but in so far as they have gone up it constitutes an extra tax. I have no quarrel with the theory that the post office should pay its own way and I think that is a very sound principle, but in view of the increase in volume that has taken place and considering the modernization that has been effected by the automatic mail handlers, surely there is a decrease in the unit handling cost which would offset any additional expenditures which the Post Office Department may have to make. I believe every large private organization operates on this theory and I feel that the Post Office Department should do the same.

In any case, if we consider last year's report of the Postmaster General we find that over a 10-year period there is a $30 million credit to the taxpayers in respect of postal services. I arrive at this figure by adding the surpluses of 1951 to 1960 inclusive, which total $34.765 million, and subtracting the deficit for the same period which amounted to $4.374 million. I think the taxpayer should be entitled to have this surplus taken into account when considering any increase in postal rates, particularly since increased efficiency of operation would perhaps offset any increase in operating expenditures.

The Postmaster General referred this afternoon to an honourable mention which had been given to a design for a special issue of postage stamps.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I was referring to a first prize rather than an honourable mention.

Mr. Carter: Yes, I should have referred to the first prize and, for my purposes, that is even better. In this connection I am reminded of a letter I received some time ago from a Newfoundland organization which urged that a special stamp be issued at Christmas time depicting, perhaps, the scene of the nativity. I am not aware that the Postmaster General has received a similar letter but it originated with an organization that has dedicated itself to offsetting the commercialization of Christmas. It was pointed out in this letter that seven or eight other countries had issued several stamps in this vein at Christmas. I feel this is a good idea and would support this organization's request, and hope that the Postmaster General will give it favourable consideration.

In looking at the Postmaster General's report for last year I see that his department's greatest source of revenue is derived from the sale of postage stamps. I also notice that revenue from the sale of meters and registration impressions has almost equalled that from the sale of stamps. We have not been given the figures in this regard for the present year and do not know therefore if the increase in revenue from postal meters and registration impressions has taken place on the same scale, but if it has been proportionate then it is now perhaps even greater than the revenue from postage stamps.

Which of these two methods of selling stamps produces the greater net revenue for the post office? I understand that the only expense in connection with the stamps is the printing of the stamps themselves, which should not be too expensive. Is the cost of the meters greater than the cost of the postage stamps? If we are short of revenue, or are running into deficits, then we should encourage the method which will produce the greatest amount of net revenue.

The minister took a great deal of pride in the reduced number of complaints that he has received. Of course, there are two ways of looking at this. People sometimes give up complaining when they feel it is no use to complain. While they may have complained more when the Liberals were in power it may have been because they had more hope of getting action on their complaints. Now they have learned from experience that it is useless to complain to the Tories and they have given up in despair. Therefore, I would not advise the Postmaster General to press that argument too far.

There is just one other question I wish to ask the minister before I take my seat. I notice on the sheet entitled "Standard Objects and Expenses", under "Special categories", the allocation for this year is up by $2.8 million. The explanation indicates that the reason for this increase was the movement of mail by land, air and water. I was wondering whether the minister would tell us if this is on account of an increased volume of mail or on account of the increased cost of contracts that have been renewed? These are all the things I wish to mention at this time. There may be other points that I shall raise when we come to the individual items.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, as a former postmaster for almost 36 years, I am always interested in the estimates of the Post Office Department and especially in the wonderful growth of this organization and the splendid service provided by the Postmaster General, his department and thousands of employees across Canada.

Since retiring as a postmaster over three years ago I have been impressed by the many changes that have been made in the improvement of mail service during that short period.

The booklet entitled "Letter Perfect", about which we have heard quite a bit, the story of the Canadian postal service, published by authority of our Postmaster General, should be of great interest to all Canadians as shareholders and patrons of the Canada post office. The Postmaster General's remarks in the second paragraph of the foreword in this booklet are well worth repeating. I quote:

> Keeping pace with the tremendous growth and development that have marked Canadian business and industry in recent years, the post office has worked hard to maintain a modern efficient organization that handles an ever-increasing amount of business with speed and economy.

The efforts of 40,000 or more employees at more than 11,000 post offices across Canada present to us some idea of the great volume of mail handled so efficiently. Transportation of mail, as we know, is provided by air, water, rail, motor vehicle, snowmobile, dog sled and by other means. Perhaps one of the finest improvements has been the regular letter mail by air, otherwise known as "all-up service". To give the committee an example of the value and speed of such service, a letter mailed at my former office in Elmira, Ontario, on Monday evening at six o'clock was received and ready for delivery in Halifax at 9.00 a.m. the next morning.

Great strides have been made in the rural mail carrier service. This has given an additional number of Canadians the opportunity to enjoy this privilege for the first time. Owing to the increase in volume of mail, we realize that these carriers are spending more time in preparing the mail for delivery and longer hours in covering their routes. Most of these carriers have been compensated for this extra time, but others have not received any increases for some time. Owing to the higher cost of living, may I suggest to the director of transportation, who has made a noticeable contribution to the improvement of rural routes and other services under his direction, that he give this matter his further consideration.

Many other advancements have been ably explained by our Postmaster General in his opening remarks. The indications are that the Post Office Department is ever ready and always on the alert to improve such services for the benefit of all concerned.

The Post Office Department has often been referred to as the barometer of business. During my term of office in this department men of business, industry, labour and agriculture inquired from time to time as to the increases of revenue in order to analyse the development of Canada's economy as a whole. The Post Office Department, along with the district director and his staff, have always been very helpful and considerate in providing advice and information concerning post office problems and opportunities to better the service.

The appointment of area superintendents, according to my observation, has been invaluable to post offices in their areas, especially the smaller ones spread out in those districts. Their frequent visits give them the opportunity of personal contact with the postmaster and his staff and also to correct certain details so essential to the betterment of the postal service. In my opinion they are performing yeoman work.

The appointment of public relations officers has always been commendable. The public relations officer has played a large part in the courteous behaviour of the post office staff to Mr. John Public and vice versa. On various occasions this officer from the district director's department visited my office, at which time he called on the schools, spoke to the service clubs and showed pictures of the advancement of postal service; he explained in detail other important matters such as insurance, c.o.d., special delivery and the benefits of householder mail.

The explanation of the postal service to our younger folks has been carried out for some time. During the spring and fall seasons I would arrange with the principal and teachers of our schools to have the children visit my office in their classes, at which time explanations concerning the service were given.

Perhaps I could mention at this time that the visits of our Postmaster General have been deeply appreciated. It gives the employees the feeling that they are important cogs in this great work.

May I express my appreciation to the Postmaster General and the Minister of Public Works of their interest and concern in postal facilities at Kitchener, Ontario. This city has doubled its population in the last 25 years, and the improvements in the facilities in our area have been beneficial to all concerned.

Kitchener's twin city, Waterloo, where the present post office was built in 1912 and improved in 1948, has doubled its population in the last 10 years and tripled its revenue during that time. Again may I say I appreciate the efforts that are being made to overcome the present inadequate accommodation.

The Ontario postmasters' association, along with other such groups throughout Canada, have been interested in the postmasters and their staffs who work in the smaller offices. I am sure that the Postmaster General, along with all employees, was saddened last year by the sudden passing of Mr. Jay Ferris, postmaster of Campbellford, Ontario. This gentleman held many important positions in the postmasters' association and along with others played a big part in the substantial increases recently received by employees and in other matters pertaining to the welfare of public servants.

As a former member of this association for many years and a supervisory postmaster, I can understand some of the problems facing the postmasters of smaller offices. Many of these people are unable to enjoy more than a few days holidays each year as their services are requested from day to day. May I suggest that special instructions could be given by the postmaster and the department to the postmaster's assistant covering all phases of the work, including the cash account.

I have noticed from time to time the announcements as to how mechanized the post office is becoming and the amount of research that is being done to improve mechanization. Perhaps most of this research is being directed toward the larger offices. This research could also be directed toward the smaller offices as no doubt they would welcome the introduction of small cancelling machines and adding machines in order to provide them with some kind of efficient tools in their trade. Without these machines they must continue to do everything manually.

Their manual labour in this regard and their other duties involving the savings bank, government annuities, distribution of income tax forms, unemployment insurance stamps, et cetera, provide a busy schedule for the postmaster and staff. May I recommend to the department that further consideration be given to the smaller offices with regard to such matters.

Another interesting point that has been discussed on many occasions and which was mentioned by the hon. member for Middlesex West is that patrons in smaller towns find it difficult to understand why they cannot obtain house-to-house delivery of their mail. They feel that the postage they pay is the same as people pay in the cities and that they should be entitled to the same consideration. However, I understand that the Post Office Department has certain minimum requirements that must be met. Perhaps these requirements may be set too high. Older people have to walk quite a distance to receive their mail and parcels while others in the cities have them delivered. After all, the same taxes are paid by the people in the smaller towns. I hope this problem can be reviewed.

My last point has reference to the possible application of the minimum, four-cent local or drop letter rate of postage between Kitchener and Waterloo. I know that the rates on letters are governed by the Post Office Act which stipulates that the rate of postage on each letter posted within one postal area for delivery in another postal area is five cents for the first ounce, et cetera. I know that at the present time Kitchener and Waterloo are classed as two separate and distinct postal areas. I wish to mention that, geographically speaking, you walk from one city to the other without noticing the difference. In fact, they are so close that some people's homes are half in Waterloo and half in Kitchener and they pay taxes to each city. At one time the mayor of Kitchener lived in Waterloo and the mayor of Waterloo lived in Kitchener. Many Kitchener people work in Waterloo and vice versa. Girls working in office positions often take the mail with them at closing time and drop such letters in their home post office with the result that they are marked "postage due", which causes dissatisfaction to the receiver. I understand that this problem is being studied further by the department.

It has been a privilege, Mr. Chairman, for me to take part in the discussion of these estimates. May I again commend the Postmaster General, his genial deputy and all the employees for the success they have achieved in this important department.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the speech made by the Postmaster General was such a really marvellous job of polishing his own flawless diamond that I hate to get up and put any mist on the jewel but I feel that the department is hardly as perfect as the Postmaster General perhaps is. I wish to make a number of comments about the organization of the department and particularly about its deficit.

The minister really did not really speak about the deficit, the amount of money the department is losing on certain parts of its operations, specifically in its handling of parcel post and second class mail, though he did make some reference to parcel post. It seems to me that with that business efficiency he brought to giving us this wonderful pamphlet, "Letter Perfect", with the taste for design he has brought to postage stamps and to letter boxes and the efficiency he has brought to expansions of services he should be able to do something a bit more positive than he has with regard to the deficit.

Another thing he failed to speak about is a subject he brought up in a speech he made when he was in the United States, a speech that I am sure he was delighted to see find a place in that very well known publication, "Vital Speeches of Today". This is not something that happens every day to a Canadian Postmaster General so one would have imagined he would be proud of the remarks he made there and the policy that he seemed to enunciate. I can only be somewhat aghast that he did not bother to work that subject into his speech tonight in leading off on his departmental estimates. Perhaps I can call it ten o'clock and get under way more properly tomorrow on my appreciation of the Postmaster General.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, would the house leader indicate what the business may be for next week? I am assuming, of course, that we will continue with the estimates of the Post Office Department tomorrow followed, as he said last night, by the estimates of the Department of Fisheries. Are we to have a supply motion on Monday in view of the fact that the supply motion this week was postponed or is there other business for next week?

Mr. Churchill: Friday's business will be as the hon. member has mentioned. We will continue with the estimates of the Post Office Department and if they are completed we will go on with the estimates of the Department of Fisheries.

The forecast for next week, subject to change because of changing circumstances as seems to happen almost every week, will be as follows: On Monday instead of a supply motion we will take legislation. We will commence with item No. 3 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff. That will be followed by Bill No. C-82, item No. 5 on today's order paper, having to do with a convention between Canada and the United States with regard to taxation matters. That will be followed by item No. 9 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Labour dealing with the subject of rehabilitation of disabled persons. The estimates for next week, discussion of which may commence on Wednesday, will be those of the Post Office Department if, unfortunately, we do not finish them tomorrow although I am sure the house will want to complete that department. We will then go on with the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I think that is all I will announce by way of a forecast for next week. Perhaps I could enlarge on Monday evening if the house appears to have made good progress.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

R.C.A.F. AERIAL PHOTOGRAPHY

Question No. 155—Mr. Argue:

1. Does the Royal Canadian Air Force conduct aerial photography for the purpose of mapping and charting (a) in the Canadian Arctic (b) in any other area of Canada?
2. If so, are the photographs developed as the result of these flights available for: (a) inspection and future use connected with the economic development of Canada (b) photogrammetry (c) photo interpretation (d) resources surveys (e) structural geology (f) forest inventory (g) overburden and soil analyses (h) land use surveys (i) airborne profile recording (j) photographic reproduction?
3. If not, for what reason?
4. Have all these photographs been kept under the best possible conditions for future use?
5. Have there been any complaints from users of these photographs concerning their present quality because of deterioration due to improper storage?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

1. No, not since the completion of the survey of Canada in 1956. The R.C.A.F. does, however, act as custodian of all federal government survey negatives including those taken by the R.C.A.F. prior to 1956 and those taken by civilian contractors up to the present date.

2 and 3. Prints of federal government negatives are available at a nominal charge to federal, provincial or civic governments, industry or the general public through the national air photo library of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

4. Yes.

5. No.

TRACADIE RANGE FIRE—DAMAGE CLAIMS

Question No. 156—Mr. Robichaud:

1. What is the total number of claims received and accepted by the Department of National Defence for damage caused by a fire presumably started by R.C.A.F. planes in the vicinity of Tracadie target range, in August 1960?
2. What is the total amount involved for claims accepted by the department and for which a settlement has been agreed upon?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

1. Number of claims received, 58; number of claims paid to date, 42.

2. Amount paid to date, $8,042.60.

POST OFFICE SITE, RESERVE MINES, N.S.

Question No. 166—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Has a decision been made on a site for a new post office at Reserve Mines in Nova Scotia?
2. If so, what is the obstacle to a decision?
3. If so, is it intended to build a post office in the fiscal year 1961-62?

1. No.

2. The department was in the process of acquiring land on which to erect this building when local objections were received to the proposed location on Sydney road. However, at that time the acquisition process had proceeded to the stage where it was not practicable to withdraw, and the lot on Sydney road was, therefore, acquired. The obstacle to a decision regarding a site for this post office is still the difficulty in satisfying various local interests concerning the location.

3. Not applicable.

Friday, April 14, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO PRIME MINISTER OF GREECE AND PARTY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have today in the gallery a representative, the Prime Minister, of an ally of Canada's—Prime Minister Karamanlis of Greece. He will already, by the reception accorded to him by the members, realize the warmth of our feelings toward his country. He is accompanied by his wife as well as by the foreign minister of Greece, Mr. Averoff-Tossizza.

Yesterday we had the opportunity of discussing together matters of interest not only to our two countries but, as well, to the strengthening of the bonds of NATO and the assurance that Canada in the days ahead will be able to meet its responsibilities as it has since the date of the formation of NATO. In this connection it is well for the house to note that he has joined with the viewpoint of Canada in believing that it is most necessary, at the earliest date convenient, considering the preparation that must be made in order to achieve the greatest success, to have a meeting of the heads of state among NATO leaders. It is a necessity, having regard to the situation in NATO and in the international field as well.

We welcome him for himself and for the contribution he has made to the stability of his own country. We welcome him as the representative of a member nation in that organization of which I have just spoken. We welcome him for the contribution to and the heritage of culture that his country has given not only to the western civilization but to democracy and its principles throughout the world. We welcome him as the leader of a nation which has given much to Canada in the thousands of immigrants from that country who have come to us and joined in the building of Canadianism, and in the contribution which, in every part of Canada, is made by people of his race.

Therefore, sir, I draw your attention to the fact that he is here, and I again welcome to this country a true friend, an outstanding statesman, one whose dedication and whose country's dedication to freedom and democracy makes stronger the NATO organization and freedom itself everywhere in the world.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, whose absence I greatly regret—an absence that is quite unavoidable—I should like on behalf of our friends to join with the Prime Minister, whose every word I echo, in welcoming the Prime Minister of Greece and those who are with him as visitors to this country today. While I regret the absence of the Leader of the Opposition, it is perhaps not unfitting that a representative of the greatest sea-faring people in the new world should welcome this representative of the first great sea-faring nation of the old world.

If I may be even more personal and recall my youth in the bush in northern Manitoba, one of the most distinguished of the citizens of that community was an immigrant from Greece, whose family were honoured in that community then and are honoured still today. All of us remember from our school days the warning timeo Danaos et dona ferentes, but no one who sits in a free parliament fears the greatest of all the gifts of the Greeks to the world, the idea of self-government, and for that we are eternally grateful to the people represented by the prime minister who is our guest today. Nor shall we forget, sir, that it was the language of Greece which was the vehicle for the spread of the religion most of us profess in Canada. We remember too how Greece fought and suffered for freedom in the dark days of the war. We remember that from the days of Byron to the days of Harry Truman, modern Greece has been on the frontiers of freedom. We are happy that Greece, which has perhaps historically the greatest claim to be the champion of freedom, as the Prime Minister has reminded us, is an integral member of that society of free nations, the North Atlantic alliance, which all of us, I trust, want to see strengthened in every way possible in order to meet the difficulties with which we are faced in the free world of today.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I join with the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in adding our words of welcome to Canada to the Prime Minister of Greece. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who is very often at sea, was probably more appropriately at sea this morning in many of the remarks he made.

We acknowledge that the Prime Minister of Greece, our guest today, was himself instrumental in bringing about peace and independence to the island of Cyprus. The Prime Minister has associated the Prime Minister of Greece with his own views on certain aspects of the NATO organization. We do not agree with all of his comments in that particular regard, but realizing that Greece has done so much for the development and independence of free institutions of the world, we do welcome her prime minister.

FINANCE

STATEMENT AS TO EXTENT OF EXPORT CREDITS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked me a question regarding export financing. Since the answer is of necessity rather long, I wonder whether I could have the permission of the house to place it on Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable to the minister's request?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked a question concerning export financing. In reply I wish to state that following my announcement in the house last November 25 on export financing, two new institutions have been established for this purpose. They are the Export Finance Corporation of Canada Limited, a private institution wholly owned by the nine chartered banks, and the export finance division of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, which is a government agency.

The Export Finance Corporation, using private funds, will finance exports for periods up to five years. The charter of this corporation provides for a subscribed capital of $50 million, with the right to borrow 10 times this amount, for example, up to $500 million, to finance exports from Canada. I understand that to date only $10 million of the subscribed capital has been paid in and the Export Finance Corporation is therefore in a position to borrow and undertake financing up to an amount of $100 million. This amount will of course increase as larger percentages of the subscribed capital are paid in.

The Export Finance Corporation has only recently commenced operations and I am not in a position to give information on the amount of export financing which it may have undertaken. It is my understanding, however, that it has not undertaken any substantial amount of export financing as yet. I would like to emphasize that the Export Finance Corporation is a private corporation which will undertake financing for periods not in excess of five years and that no public funds are involved in its export financing operations.

The export finance division of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation is the government institution which will handle the government's export financing program. Two hundred million dollars is the sum available for this program under the present provisions of sections 21 and 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act. In so far as the government is concerned, the basic principle of its export financing program is that the government is now in a position to finance the export of capital goods for periods ranging from five to fifteen years, or longer, at rates of interest approximately equal to those being offered by major competitors. Government financing is, however, available only for capital goods having a high Canadian content (eighty per cent) minimum and which are intended for use in economically sound projects in creditworthy countries wherein it is reasonable to expect continuing foreign sales.

Although the export finance division has been in operation only for the past three months, Canadian exporters have already applied for extended term financing for 18 projects for transactions in 11 countries, to a total value of approximately $213 million. All such applications are considered by an interdepartmental committee known as the committee on export finance, which determines, in the light of the principles and procedures regulating government export financing, whether applications should be submitted to cabinet for approval. Of the $213 million of applications thus far received, $52½ million have already been judged suitable for submission to cabinet and the remainder are receiving careful examination. I would like to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian exporters are in a position to bid for this potential new business amounting to $213 million solely by reason of the establishment of the government's long term lending program.

In conclusion, I would like to state that although there is no direct relationship between the government's winter works program and the long term export financing program, it is a fact that economic and employment considerations within Canada are an important criterion for determining whether or not an application for export financing should be granted.

TRADE

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO POSTPONEMENT OF TALKS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister give the house any information as to why the United Kingdom-Canadian talks with regard to the uranium contract apparently have been postponed? Can he assure the house that Canada is still insisting that Britain buy 12,000 tons of uranium?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing I can add to what has already been said. The question of uranium is still being considered. As I said yesterday, when a determination is made as to the identity and personnel of the group which will go to London with a view to further discussions, the house will be fully made aware of it.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

CAUSEWAY CONSTRUCTION, P.E.I.-N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I can repeat a question I asked of the Minister of Public Works the other day and ascertain from him whether it is going to be possible for him to bring down a return of the correspondence with the government of Prince Edward Island with regard to the proposed causeway. The minister will realize that the subject is of even greater interest than it was when I asked the question.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I am delighted to be able to say that yesterday I received the consent of the premier of Prince Edward Island to table this correspondence. I am sure the interest which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is taking in this matter can do nothing but good.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope so.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORT

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—FORMATION OF JOINT U.S.-CANADA COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister ready to make a statement in answer to a question I asked the Acting Minister of Transport on Wednesday, April 12, with respect to the Richelieu waterway?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I seem to have received this question by a series of delegations; however, I will take the question as notice.

VANCOUVER ISLAND CAUSEWAY—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have another question I should like to put to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister assure us that any plans he may have on the shelf for a causeway to Vancouver island will be unveiled before May 29?

FISHERIES

SINCLAIR REPORT—ADDITIONAL COPIES FOR CIRCULATION IN B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. My question is based on the great interest of the fishermen of the Pacific coast in the report entitled "Licence Limitation, British Columbia, and Method of Economic Fisheries Management" by Professor Sinclair. I am informed that the union has asked for extra copies of the report to service all its locals as well as its executive and has been unable to obtain them. Would the minister give consideration to the printing of additional copies of this very important report so that those particularly concerned in the industry can obtain extra copies, for which they are quite willing to pay?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, a relatively limited number of copies of this rather extensive report were printed. We thought our estimated number would be sufficient for the purpose. However, I believe the union to which the hon. member has referred requested approximately 200 copies. We have not been able yet to furnish that particular organization with that number of copies because there has been a greater demand for the report than we anticipated, from a great many organizations directly or indirectly interested in the fishing industry. We will do the best we can in furnishing some additional copies.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—REPORTED DEVELOPMENT OF SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister care to comment on an article in this morning's Globe and Mail by Bruce MacDonald to the effect—

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): May I interpose to say that I have not read the article, and would not care to comment on it.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I will put my question anyway and then the minister can decide whether this important statement is worthy of comment. The statement is that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is considering the placing of $750 million in mortgages on the market. I ask the minister whether this is under consideration.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, in connection with our vast problem of creating employment for Canadians and also creating new homes for as many Canadians as can afford to buy them we have all kinds of matters under consideration, and I can assure the hon. member that included among them is the creation of a secondary mortgage market so that mortgages may be more readily available to the public and may be exchanged just as bonds can be exchanged. This matter has been under consideration for some time, and if and when any decision is reached which has the sanction of the cabinet I will be very happy to make an announcement to the house.

(Translation):

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY PRODUCTS—INQUIRY AS TO STABILIZATION MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Early this week, I inquired when he would be able to announce his department's policy with regard to price stabilization for farm products, and more particularly for dairy products. I have had no answer yet. Yesterday I read in the press that farmers are anxious to get this answer.

Could the minister tell us when he will make a statement with regard to price support for dairy products?

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to make any announcement at present, and I do not know when I will be in a position to do so.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

WINNIPEG—ADDITION TO WHEAT BOARD OFFICE BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has been able to ascertain the date on which it is proposed to let the contracts for the extension to the wheat board building in Winnipeg.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a question relating to this subject on the order paper and I am requesting information about it. As soon as I have it, I will make it available.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

308. Departmental administration including Canada's share of the upkeep of the international bureaux at Berne and Montevideo, $2,174,216.

Mr. Fisher: Last night, Mr. Chairman, my theme was the perfect Postmaster General that we have in Canada at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder why the Prime Minister should want to hire John Fisher away from touting Anaconda Brass or Niagara Finance when he has this advertising genius in the ranks of the cabinet. We know from the last paragraph of his speech yesterday that his department has moved into a state of perfection, within no limits. It seems to me we now have a minister who is at a level from which he can move on to greater and greater responsibilities, perhaps to a more important department.

For that reason I should like to draw to the attention of all hon. members of the committee a speech made by the Postmaster General, to which I referred last night and which was reprinted in a publication entitled "Vital Speeches of Today", dated March 1, 1961, in which the minister makes a statement on

United States-Canadian relations and sets out Canadian government policy in this very important field.

I say again that I am afraid he is such a perfect Postmaster General we may not have him much longer as such. He will be moved to greater and more expansive realms. If he should move into a field in which he could devote his tendency to the hard sell, rather than the soft sell, I would imagine he would be selling the doctrine of free enterprise and the new frontier that has been announced by the Prime Minister.

This is interesting to me, because the Post Office Department has quite an odd interest in free enterprise and in supporting free enterprise. One of the things the Postmaster General indicated last year, apparently as a result of some questions I asked him, was that every three or four years the Post Office Department makes an analysis of its operations from the point of view of costs. We have an indication in the speech he gave yesterday that the increase in parcel post rates is the result of one of these investigations. This investigation revealed there was a deficit in connection with the operation, so the rates were increased.

Last year the Postmaster General indicated in information he gave me in reply to question No. 34 on the order paper, which concerned the estimates of loss or profit on second class mail, that during the fiscal year 1958-59, based on the department's calculations, the estimated excess of disbursements over receipts amounted to $21,690,000 for newspapers and periodicals. The revenue in that particular year was only $6,189,125. In other words there was a disparity of some $15 million. We have had no indication in the annual report or in the minister's speech as to whether or not this loss has continued. We know that certain subjects have been considered by the royal commission on publications in this connection.

I must come back to this theme of free enterprise and the part the Postmaster General and his department are playing in supporting free enterprise in this country. I wonder how many members of the house have ever heard of the Siftons, the McConnells, the Thomsons or the Welds, and have ever considered that they were poor people. Are the McConnells, the Siftons, the Thomsons and the Welds in this country poor people? I think the answer is of course a ringing "No". No one needs to be told of the tremendous fortune, at least in terms of assets, that Roy Thomson has built up so that now he is a colossus bestriding the whole publishing field, not only in Canada but in Great Britain. Yet the minister and his department have helped to subsidize these free enterprises of the Thomsons, the McConnells, the Siftons and the Welds.

I give one example in connection with the second class mailing rates. The postage rate, supposedly, in Canada has been kept low on second class publications because they wanted low subscription rates for the farmers. The three biggest publishers of farm periodicals in Canada are the McConnell interests of Montreal, with the Family Herald and Weekly Star; the Sifton interests of Winnipeg, with the Free Press Prairie Farmer, and the Weld family of London, Ontario, with the Farmer's Advocate. I would say that the McConnells and the Siftons probably rank among the wealthiest families and interests in Canada. A great deal of their wealth has come from their publishing empires and from these fantastically successful and very able publications, the Family Herald and Weekly Star and the Free Press Prairie Farmer.

In the light of this kind of wealth I wonder how much longer we have to go on subsidizing not only the farmer, who benefits by cheaper subscriptions, but these wealthy men. It seems to me that we need a real analysis carried out here. If I had any idea that the McConnells, the Siftons or the Welds were about to go to the wall and were near a state of bankruptcy; if I thought Roy Thomson was in a state of collapse financially, I could see why we should continue to give these low postal rates. But this is not true as far as I know. We have had no indication that these big empires of commerce are shaky. As a matter of fact they seem to be getting bigger and better.

Yet their main publications, and certainly I think the publications that probably bring them in the most income, are among the ones that are piling up this terrific deficit for the Post Office Department. I think the minister will acknowledge that there is in Canada a special rate for daily newspapers having a circulation of less than 10,000 a day. What publisher in Canada owns the most daily newspapers with a circulation of less than 10,000 a day? Some poor, struggling fellow who is trying to get along? Are there many of them who are still trying to keep their heads above water? No; it is our friend Roy Thomson.

The Kamloops Sentinel has an estimated circulation, according to the latest figures, of approximately 6,500; the Kelowna Courier 5,100; the Nanaimo Free Press 8,100; the Penticton Herald 4,800; the Moose Jaw Times-Herald 7,900; the Prince Albert Herald 6,800; the Barrie Examiner 8,100; the Kirkland Lake Northern News 6,200; the Orillia Packet and Times 5,700: the Pembroke Observer 6,600; the Woodstock Sentinel Review 9,600 and the Quebec city Chronicle-Telegraph 5,600. These are all newspapers with a circulation of less than 10,000 a day; they are owned by Roy Thomson of the Thomson interests, and they all have a special rate. To me this is one of the most insidious forms of subsidy. It is the kind of subsidy that goes to a free enterpriser who is always shoving free enterprise down our craw.

We have a Thomson paper in our area. Recently it has shown some marked improvement in certain ways in my opinion. I follow the Thomson newspapers fairly closely, and one of their favourite lines is attacking the C.B.C. and the Canada council by advocating the throwing out of such subsidies and saying these agencies are wasting the taxpayers' money. We have a deficit of $20 million in one branch of the Post Office Department—it is not quite a deficit; it is an estimated deficit—and among the prime beneficiaries in Canada is the Thomson chain.

I would have some sympathy for the Thomson papers if they were carrying the odd story or writing the odd editorial on the fact that the Post Office Department is losing money on second class mail. But you do not get that. Instead you get this constant war of attrition against the C.B.C., the Canada council and the C.N.R., these profligate wasters of the taxpayers' money.

This is the kind of insidious inconsistency in the free enterprise approach upon which I should like to hear the minister speak. Are we still subsidizing the poor farmer in bringing him this wonderful information which he obtains from the daily newspapers or the farming publications, or are we subsidizing the McConnells, the Siftons and the Thomsons? I would like an answer to that question.

While I admire the self-made man who can go ahead and build himself a fortune and an empire, not only here but in the world itself, I think we should look at the situation very closely if part of that wealth is accruing in an indirect way by means of subsidy from the Canadian taxpayer. I think it is only fair, in terms of the critique that these gentlemen and their newspapers themselves apply. For that reason I think we should know more about the estimates of the Postmaster General and the costs of delivering this periodical mail.

I know this matter is confused by a fact which is, in a way, a much more important issue. I refer to the fact that at the present time we are not only subsidizing the McConnells, the Siftons, the Welds and the Thomsons, but Time magazine, Reader's Digest and all the other United States publications that come into this country at a fantastically low rate, considering weight and distance carried, in comparison with Canadian publications.

As I say, the one problem tends to dwarf the other, but no person can look at the information given to me and realize the importance of this matter. I would like to put this information on the record, but the Postmaster General remarked his letter "personal and confidential". This was a letter he sent me on July 27, 1960. It was a four page letter which I appreciated; it was full of information on this very point.

However, the Post Office Department is losing money on carrying second class mail. The Postmaster General has the figures here to substantiate this statement. They are especially losing money on carrying United States' periodicals. As I remember from the figures given to the royal commission, the 45 leading United States magazines have a circulation in Canada of over 6½ million, while the eight Canadian magazines that are in comparable fields have a circulation of a little over two million. Therefore there is no question about it, the United States publications have a great advantage over comparable Canadian publications since they are generally heavier and carried further.

However, I still insist that as much as we hope this will be corrected by the royal commission, this is no excuse at all for any longer giving subsidies to men of such substance who control the farming publications and these daily newspapers with a circulation of less than 10,000.

The argument can probably be made, do you want to put the poor people in Prince Albert in the situation where they can only get news about the Prime Minister at a higher price, because this would mean higher priced newspapers? All I can say is that we do not know what profits Mr. Thomson has made from the Prince Albert paper or any of these other papers. It is none of our business. But we assume that he has done very well, because he started with a small radio station in Kirkland Lake, moved to a few newspapers and now has a chain across Canada, some in the United States, he is going down into Africa and he almost sewed up the periodical market in the United Kingdom.

I do not believe money is created magically, or the resources for this kind of empire. It came from somewhere. Where did that money come from? I think we have to assume that it came from the little people in Prince Albert, Kelowna, Woodstock, and so on. If this is the case, I think we deserve a check on the particular aspect I have raised. How much longer are these special rates on agricultural publications and publications with circulation of less than 10,000 or less to be carried on?

I did want to make some complimentary remarks about the employees of the department as well as about the minister. The thing I like about post office employees, and I can say this because I would not say it about very many civil servants, is that they have a lot of militancy and fibre. They have great solidarity. I was delighted to read in this morning's paper that the representative appearing before a house committee took a very strong line on collective bargaining. I enjoy reading the Postal Journal of Canada. It is about the most forthright of all the publications put out by the civil service associations. I must pay the minister at least an indirect compliment by saying I have seen no falling away since he took office in either the militancy or the self reliance or the fibre of the employees. More power to them, and I wish more civil servants had the same attitude as the majority of postal employees.

There is one other aspect of the general question on which I should like to hear the minister's comments. A publication appeared recently which contains a great deal of information on public administration in Canada. It is really an editors' job by Hodgetts and Corbett called "Canadian Public Administration". Included in it is a very fine article by a former senior civil servant of the department, Mr. Turnbull, entitled "Decentralization in the Post Office". This essay was first published approximately six years ago and it indicates that decentralization was already taking place in the department with a promise that it would bring better controls, reduced costs, and so on.

The question I should like to ask the minister in the light, I was about to say, of the bragging—or perhaps I had better call it the complimentary way he has looked at the operations of the post office since they came within his grasp—is whether some of these advances have come about as a result of this policy of decentralization which followed the Woods Gordon report of six or seven years ago, and about which Mr. Turnbull has written. I mention this because I think the minister may in all modesty want to give some credit, if not to his ministerial predecessor then at least to some of the senior civil servants under the former government who might have set up changes the benefits of which are now being reaped so brilliantly, or so forcefully, or in such a hard sell manner by the present Postmaster General.

There is one other point with which I should like to deal. It is a more specific point, and one on which I should like to have some information from the Postmaster General. I should like to know what steps he has taken to stop the development of football sweeps and lotteries of all kinds in Canada. I have brought this matter up before. The two Toronto evening papers, the Toronto Telegram and the Toronto Star, carry, every Wednesday I think it is, the results of a certain football pool in England. I am no legal expert, but it seems to me those pool results indicate—and this I know because some of my friends are involved—that a good many people are playing the football pools in England, and they may or may not be using the mails. I am fairly certain they are, and I think I know how they are getting round the provisions against doing so. The point is that neither the Toronto Telegram nor the Toronto Star would be carrying these excerpts of information if they did not know that there was an interest, and a substantial interest in what is, according to the minister's own actions, an illegal enterprise in Canada. I should like to know from the minister, since his officials have gone to the trouble of opening the mail of some of those little people who are playing the football pools in England, whether he is considering doing anything about stopping the passage by mail of those newspapers which are carrying football pool information.

I refuse to believe that this information, carried regularly every Wednesday evening, giving the winnings and the ratios for the various parts of the pool, is given because Canadians have an altruistic interest in it. I suggest the information is carried because it is known that Canadians are playing these football pools. I believe we should be allowed to play them. That is my personal stand, not a party position at all. If the minister is going to be consistent, what is he going to do about this publication in newspapers, which go through the mails, of information on illegal activities?

I cannot myself make out whether this information is inserted as news or as an advertisement. I have written to one of the newspapers on the point and received no reply. I asked the correspondent of another newspaper to check, and he told me he had received no reply. We do not know whether this information is an advertisement or news. However, I suggest that the regularity with which this information is inserted is something the minister should investigate if he is going to run around opening the mail of the little people who play the pools.

Mr. Drysdale: Would the hon. member permit a question? The hon. member indicated that he was giving his personal expression of opinion concerning these football pools and not an expression of party opinion. If we had a Canadian lottery in Canada I think the problem would be obviated, and

I was wondering whether the hon. member could speak for his party and indicate whether they are in favour of a lottery in Canada.

The Chairman: I would have some objection to the nature of the debate being changed.

Mr. Drysdale: On the point of order, the hon. member has been complaining about the fact that information useful to people who are playing football pools is passing through the mails. I was suggesting that if we had a Canadian lottery the difficulty would be obviated, because those who are now playing the Old Country football pools would then be in a position to play them in Canada. I was trying to find out, since the hon. member has given his personal opinion, whether or not his party is in favour of a Canadian lottery.

Mr. Fisher: I can only refer hon. members to what I think was an excellent speech I made about a month after the house—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Fisher: Well, this is not a time for modesty. If I am going to play in the Postmaster General's league I have to adopt some of his tactics.

An hon. Member: You do not know where your party stands.

Mr. Fisher: I know where the party stands. The party has not got a stand on lotteries. If the hon. member wants to know, what I have tried to do is to see that the party has a stand.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. member will permit me to ask him a question. Since the hon. gentleman says this is no time for modesty, does he not think he should address the committee as "my fellow Canadians"?

Mr. Fisher: Well, as a fifth generation Canadian—I sometimes wonder whether it is worth mentioning in this house. I think I had better let it go. I have one last and rather serious point to bring to the minister's attention. It is a rather ticklish thing, and since it involves in a sense birth control and religion I am sure it may get some attention from the press.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fisher: I think it probably will, but I want to point out to them and to the minister that I should much prefer the press to give some attention to the problem I brought up earlier, which is that these free enterprises are being subsidized by the taxpayer in an indirect way.

[Mr. Drysdale.]

However, on the other subject, I have received two letters of protest from women in my constituency to the effect that they have received, through direct mail, solicitations from a firm in Winnipeg that they should buy contraceptives. This advertisement is perhaps not as shocking to me as it would be to the women who receive it but it is certainly shocking enough, if one has limited knowledge in this field. It is certainly not the kind of information that should be coming into the home. It results probably from someone acquiring a mailing list. This particular one was addressed by name to a person in my own city of Port Arthur, and includes a price list with a sort of decorative statement about the merits of the various gadgets that are offered, leaving very little to the imagination. It includes a most peculiar little statement, which I will read:

> Should this be contrary to your beliefs kindly accept our apology and disregard this advertising. Please feel assured it is unlikely that you will hear from us again.

How do you know you will not hear again in this regard? This is an advertisement from only one firm dispensing this particular kind of contraceptive. If you look at newspapers, such as the Family Herald and Weekly Star, you will find in the classified section all kinds of this type of advertising. What will happen if this type of thing leads to a massive assault upon Canadian householders? What can the Postmaster General do to protect people from receiving this kind of information which stresses that these things are designed solely with regard to health but happen to have, I think it is commonly agreed, a more practical objective?

I suggest that this is something that should be investigated. I certainly object generally to the amount of direct mail that householders receive. I know as politicians and members of parliament we probably receive more direct mail than any other group of people in Canada, which is perhaps as it should be, but why the ordinary householder should be bombarded in this way is something I do not understand, especially in regard to subjects as personal as this. It seems to me that the post office should consider whether the circulation of this kind of information falls within some part of the Criminal Code which makes it illegal. If an individual writes for this kind of information in following up an advertisement appearing in the newspapers that is quite all right, but to receive this kind of information out of a clear blue sky is something of a different nature.

This particular advertisement came from Twin Cities Sales of Winnipeg but, considering the many companies in Canada in this field, if they all follow this type of advertising, using mailing lists or telephone directories, the post office will be faced with a very serious problem. I would like to know what the minister feels his officials can do in this regard, or what advice they can supply those people who receive this kind of information. I might point out to the minister that this advertisement is designed in such a way that individuals will open it. It advertises a saving of from 35 per cent to 75 per cent.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, like my colleagues in the house, I listened closely to the brilliant statement made yesterday by the Postmaster General, in which he reported on the operations of his department. I think he deserves to be commended. There is no thought of flattery in my mind, but I think he and his department certainly are to be admired; so, contrary to what the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) did last night, I should like to pay tribute to the minister and his staff on behalf of my constituents.

The minister knows I am sincere in making these remarks, because he knows better than anyone that I do not always agree with the decisions that are made, but he has a duty and a right—in fact he has no choice—to follow whatever course he thinks is best. I commend him for it, and I bow to the decisions he has to make from time to time, even though they are not always to our satisfaction.

Ever since he took over the Post Office Department, we have seen a number of improvements in postal services.

Let me remind you of a few improvements which have been achieved in my constituency. My purpose in mentioning them is to recognize the integrity, understanding and impartiality which have always been displayed by the post office staff.

I would mention, for instance, a service which is certainly very much appreciated by the people of St. Hyacinthe, and particularly those of Douville; the Douville section, in suburban St. Hyacinthe, now enjoys daily letter carrier delivery service, except on Sundays. This is also true of the Jolibois section of the city of St. Hyacinthe which also enjoys the letter carrier delivery service, thanks to the understanding of the minister and his staff. Representations for those services had been made in several instances under the former Liberal administration, but had always been turned down because of the unbending attitude of the then minister, who would never recognize the needs of the people of St. Hyacinthe.

The same service has also been extended to street sections which previously were not served. The post office people have realized that those taxpayers should not only pay taxes, but should also enjoy the services provided by the department.

Thanks to the understanding of the Postmaster General and his officials, it was found possible, following representations from yours truly, Mr. Chairman, to go ahead with the setting up of five new sub-offices in the city of St. Hyacinthe. The rural mail service was also extended, not only in my constituency but also in Richmond-Wolfe and in a number of other neighbouring constituencies.

The hon. member for St. Denis complained yesterday about the cost of maintaining postal services. He forgot, probably because of his merely occasional attendance in this house in the past years, his own lack of action and that of his colleagues representing rural constituencies, who particularly failed to discharge their obligations as they might have done.

Of course, when the minister extends his services it will cost something. Therefore, there may be an increase in expenses in certain sections.

I also noted yesterday, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) starred in a show which might be called a burlesque, the like of which had never been witnessed before in this house. I noticed—which is really surprising, and also pitiable—that the Liberal opposition had made a rather sad choice when selecting its spokesman on such significant questions as come under the Post Office Department.

During the 70 and more minutes that the hon. member for St. Denis had the floor, he only piled up nonsense upon nonsense, fallacy upon fallacy, inaccuracy upon inaccuracy—

Mr. Johnson: Exaggeration.

Mr. Ricard: Exaggeration upon exaggeration, as my good friend from Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) so rightly said.

He tried hard to sow in the public mind the idea that the present minister did not carry out his responsibilities as he should, and he also threw some suspicion on all civil servants in the Post Office Department, in a way which was unworthy of a member of this house.

Mr. Deschatelets: That statement is false, and you know it.

Mr. Ricard: One of the prompters is starting on the job. That is exactly what he said, because, and I am referring here to the official record, page 3635, where it can be seen that the hon. member for St. Denis expressed himself as follows:

What did he do with that money?

The hon. member for St. Denis was speaking of the Postmaster General.

Is this not, Mr. Chairman, an implication that these sums have not been properly used?

He also tried to maintain that the service given by the Post Office Department is not as good it was under the former Liberal administration. That is completely false and everybody knows that the present Post Office Department is giving us a service not only better than what we had previously in Canada but also better than that of many other countries.

He also tried to say that there were now more complaints than before, whereas the opposite is true.

When the Liberals were in power, Mr. Chairman—as the minister told us yesterday—there was an average of 123 complaints in a million letters, whereas under the present Postmaster General their number has fallen to 94 only.

The hon. member for St. Denis had the cheek to say, Mr. Chairman, that there has been patronage in the Post Office Department.

It is indeed surprising, Mr. Chairman, to hear in this house a Liberal member speak of patronage, and I shall show you, on the basis of evidence, that if there has been any patronage, it was in the days of our predecessors.

When they came into power in 1935, they deprived 535 postmasters of their jobs overnight.

(Text):

Mr. Grafftey: Shame.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Scandalous.

Mr. Ricard: As evidence of the patronage prevailing under Liberal rule, Mr. Chairman, I shall give you a very concrete example of what happened in those days.

Mr. Chairman, I have here copies of official documents concerning the appointment of a postmaster in my constituency; this was under a Liberal regime, that is in 1946. To Liberal members who claim there never was any patronage under a Liberal administration, I suggest that they listen carefully to what I am going to read.

[Mr. Ricard.]

Mr. Tardif: This is all ancient history.

Mr. Ricard: It may be ancient history but true nevertheless. And something tells me this is going to hurt my hon. Liberal friends.

Mr. Johnson: It is going to hurt the redskins.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, here is the text of a request to Mr. Armand Cloutier, then member of parliament for Drummond-Arthabaska:

We, the undersigned, Liberal organizers in the St. Eugene of Grantham parish, hereby recommend Mrs. Gaston Poudrette, née Yvette Forest, as permanent postmistress in replacement of her father Mr. Adélard Forest, who has resigned.

We hereby ask for your support with the Postmaster General in this connection.

In witness whereof we have signed—

And here, Mr. Chairman, follow 11 signatures.

I shall now read a copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Armand Cloutier, on March 23, 1946:

We, the undersigned, Liberal organizers for the St. Eugene de Grantham parish, Drummond county, have signed a petition on March 17 asking that Mrs. Gaston Poudrette be appointed permanent postmistress in the said parish in replacement of her father Mr. Adélard Forest, who has resigned. We respectfully ask the federal member of parliament, Mr. Armand Cloutier, to consider this request as null and void until further notice.

We sign as organizers:

And there too, you may see there are six names.

In the meantime, the Liberal organizers had found that Mrs. Forest had married a Conservative. Imagine the scandal. Surely the wife of a Conservative could not be allowed to secure the appointment as postmistress. And so, on March 25, 1946, Mr. Armand Cloutier, member for Drummond-Arthabaska, wrote to the Postmaster General as follows:

Hon. Ernest Bertrand,
Postmaster General,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Canada.

Sir,

You have no doubt received a letter from Mr. Adelard Forest, postmaster of the St. Eugene of Grantham municipality, Drummond county, who is tendering his resignation and wishes to recommend his daughter, Mrs. Gaston Poudrette (Yvette Forest) for this position.

In view of the difficulties that would result from this appointment at the present time, I would ask you most respectfully to kindly accept the resignation of Mr. Forest and to appoint his daughter, Mrs. Poudrette, only as acting postmistress.

When those difficulties have disappeared, I shall recommend Mrs. Poudrette for permanent appointment.

Yours sincerely,

Armand Cloutier, M.P.,
Drummond-Arthabaska.

The following letter was also addressed to Mr. Adelard Forest, under date of March 25, 1946:

Mr. Adelard Forest,
Postmaster,
St. Eugene de Grantham,
Drummond County, Que.

Dear Sir,

Please find enclosed copy of the letter I am sending to the Postmaster General regarding your resignation and the recommendation in favour of your daughter, Mrs. Poudrette, who will replace you as acting postmistress.

I deeply regret not being able to recommend her permanent appointment since all members of the St. Eugene de Grantham Liberal organization have signed a counter petition asking me to cancel their signature on the petition they had signed on March 17, and to leave this appointment in abeyance for the time being.

This delay is unfortunate for you, but you must realize that I had no alternative under present circumstances, since the municipality of St. Eugene is deprived of a postmaster following your resignation, and since a substitute had to be found, at least on a temporary basis. This is why I have recommended the appointment of Mrs. Poudrette to replace you.

I am sending you copy of that counter-petition. You may meet these gentlemen and if they want to recommend that Mrs. Poudrette be permanently appointed, I shall be pleased to have her appointed.

As you note, Mr. Chairman, there was no patronage at the time the Liberals were in power. Not at all. I go on reading that letter:

I regret very much not having been able to take that decision, but you will understand as I do that even if a member has complete jurisdiction over his constituency, he has to work through the organization of the area—

Mr. Chairman, that is the same method now being used under Mr. Lesage's regime. And I go on:

—which contributed to his victory.

Mr. Chairman, that must hurt the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), since he is now leaving the house.

Mr. Denis: Not at all.

Mr. Ricard: And the letter continues:

As I said above, when these gentlemen wish to have Mrs. Poudrette permanently appointed, they only have to advise me and you may be sure I will be pleased to take the necessary steps.

Sincerely yours,
Armand Cloutier, M.P.,
Drummond-Arthabaska.

Mr. Chairman, here is the last letter I intend to read. It is dated May 28, 1946:

Ottawa, May 28, 1946

Mrs. Gaston Poudrette,
St. Eugene of Grantham,
Drummond Co., Quebec.
Dear Madam:

I regret to advise you that Mr. Remi Duguay will shortly be appointed permanent postmaster in your community.

I wish to tell you, dear Madam, that I was forced to take such a step by a group of citizens of St. Eugene parish who insisted on such a change. I deeply regret that inconvenience for you; however, I wish to tell you that if you ever need my services I shall always be at your disposal. The same goes for your husband and your father Mr. Forest.

Sincerely yours,
Armand Cloutier, M.P.,
Drummond-Arthabaska.

And it is claimed, Mr. Chairman, that there was no patronage under the Liberal regime which preceded us. At this stage of my remarks I should like to ask the hon. member for St. Denis—and if I am wrong he may correct me—how it comes that his nephew was appointed postmaster in Berthier by the Liberals.

Mr. Denis: That is true.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, are we to understand, from what he says, that such appointment was made properly or improperly? The hon. member for St. Denis could certainly have told us yesterday.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, does the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot want me to reply to that question?

Mr. Ricard: You made your remarks yesterday—

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot is asking questions, but he does not want us to reply.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member may ask all the questions he wishes when I am through with my remarks.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member asks questions but he does not give us the opportunity to answer them.

Mr. Deschatelets: He prefers to use innuendoes; it is his way of going about it.

Mr. Ricard: I am surely not using innuendoes. Do you claim that these are mere insinuations? Would you go so far as to question the signature of one of your former colleagues?

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

Mr. Ricard: You are revealing your true colours.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Grafftey: Truth hurts.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot asking me questions. However, I feel that when this hon. member puts questions to the member for St. Denis, he expects to get answers. Since I am ready to answer his questions, the hon. member should give me a chance to do so; otherwise he should withdraw his questions.

Mr. Ricard: You will have a chance in a minute to answer all the questions.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Denis will have an opportunity to answer all the questions he wants once I have resumed my seat.

The Chairman: Order. I would point out to the hon. member for St. Denis that it is a well-known public speaking device to make statements under the guise of questions.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, it has not been only since the Conservative party came to power that the Postmaster General and other ministers have been forced to take disciplinary measures against employees not doing their duty or violating the rules applying to them. In this regard, a well deserved tribute must be paid the present Postmaster General for having done his duty according to his conscience. Is it not a fact that the first postmaster or the first postal employee to be dismissed after the election of the Conservative party was so dismissed as the result of a complaint or recommendation from a Liberal member?

That is how the minister goes about discharging his duties. Therefore, instead of showering abuse upon him, and directing all kinds of innuendoes, as the hon. member for St. Denis did yesterday, we should be taking our hats off to the minister and telling him that he is fulfilling his duties to the satisfaction of all.

I wish the person who was in the gallery yesterday and was so amused by the act of buffoonery being put on by the hon. member for St. Denis, were here today and gave other members the same publicity he gave to the clowning of our friend from St. Denis. But this man is here only when it suits him. I therefore appeal to his colleague who I feel is more imbued with a sense of duty towards his obligations and is more capable of following the dictates of his conscience rather than being beholden to a party.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I urge all hon. members in this house to make constructive criticism and refrain from following the example set by the hon. member for St. Denis.

Mr. Boulanger: I should like to put a question to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. He did not say anything about the 90 per cent increase in rates for parcel post; I wish he would give some explanation in justification of that increase.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, it is no part of my duty to discharge here responsibilities that belong to the minister personally. I am not the Postmaster General and I know that he has all the necessary qualifications and knowledge to justify his stand, and I am sure he will give complete satisfaction to anyone who might want information.

Mr. Boulanger: I know perfectly well that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot is not the Postmaster General and that, having no responsibility whatsoever, he can say anything.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I have just heard the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot make one of his usual wild speeches. He congratulated the Postmaster General for the $13½ million deficit which was announced yesterday. He commended the Postmaster General for having contributed to unemployment through the introduction of mechanical devices and automation. And he said he was quite satisfied with that situation.

I noted some words he used in his speech, such as: clownery, stupidity, misrepresentation, inaccuracy, exaggeration, imprudence and patronage.

Mr. Ricard: I had no choice, I had to use those words.

Mr. Deschatelets: He voiced the complaints of the Union Nationale and the Tory party. Now, I do not intend to follow in his steps. The member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, as I said had accustomed us to that kind of wild and rather ridiculous speech. There is in his constituency a bogey-man roaming around, frightening children, telling them that their catechism may be taken away from them.

Mr. Pigeon: Nothing surprising in that.

Mr. Deschatelets: All those who come from those parts are rather used to his blunders. I would not make too much of it.

Now, for my own remarks. Mr. Chairman, we heard yesterday the speech of the Postmaster General which was as cold as a tombstone, which might have been delivered by a large corporation executive, which had no warmth at all nor human touch. Fortunately, the hon. member for St. Denis followed with an extensive study of the department.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for St. Denis not only for the objective criticism he made of the administration of the Post Office Department, but also for the constructive suggestions he offered. If I wanted to give a piece of friendly advice to the minister, I would suggest that he not take too lightly the suggestions of the hon. member for St. Denis, but that he consider them seriously, that he weigh them carefully, and I am inclined to think that, should he implement the suggestions made yesterday, it would really be to the advantage of the department he administers.

Mr. Chairman, I was elected in 1953 to represent the constituency of Maisonneuve-Rosemont in this house, the same year as the Postmaster General. I have seen him in action as official opposition critic from 1953 to 1957, and I remember that he used to criticize relentlessly. His criticism was often unfair and always very bitter. I am sure that today the minister would like to strike out of Hansard certain pages containing the speeches he made between 1953 and 1957. Today, he realizes that he was lacking in experience and that most of the time he was talking through his hat and making many irresponsible statements. After four years in power he realizes that the Post Office Department is made up of human beings, that there is no such thing as perfection this side of heaven and that, in his department especially, there is the constant possibility of error because year in and year out employees handle millions of documents and letters. That is what we used to tell him from 1953 to 1957, in reply to his gibes and that is what he is now learning at his expense.

As the saying goes, "as you make your bed, so you must lie on it". Well, the minister has made his bed with bitter and irresponsible and often baseless remarks, so he should not be surprised today to find the mattress rather hard. I must say he has certainly deserved our criticism, though our remarks are free from the bitterness he used to display.

A good Postmaster General must at the same time be a good administrator. He should be able to honour his pledges, and also display great humanity in his relations with his staff. The Postmaster General, a good administrator? I want to be fair with him. I only ask him to prove it. He has been Postmaster General for four years now and he has not yet done so. A man who is true to his promises? I have before me four or five clear cases of promises he made while he was sitting on this side of the house. In the four years that he has been Postmaster General, he has done nothing to keep the promises he made at the time. A man who treats his subordinates humanely? Well now, every single time he has a chance to do so, the Postmaster General shows a positive eagerness to experiment with this, that, or the other thing. He would like Canada to take the lead in mechanization, in automation. We are left with the impression that his dearest wish would be to operate his department without the services of any employees, by using machines only, with perhaps only one man to push buttons, providing that person would be himself, the member for Notre Dame de Grace. That is the impression we have.

In this regard, I would tell him that we are not in a favourable period for experiments of that kind. If he does not yet know it, we are now going through the worst unemployment crisis ever experienced since the Conservative or Tory depression of the thirties. This is no time to try to find means of getting rid of employees. On the contrary, it is a time when we should be seeking ways to give jobs to as many people as possible, and see that the government sets the example in this respect.

But before dealing with this matter of mechanization and automation, I wish to make a few comments on certain particular topics. For instance, first of all, the operations of the post office savings bank. On page 48 of the minister's report, we find that the number of depositors has steadily gone up from year to year since 1958. We remember that, when the minister was sitting on this side of the house—the official record is there to show it—he felt it was preposterous to maintain that post office savings bank because, he used to say, it was unnecessary competing with the chartered banks. "The banks are able to provide all necessary services to the public; that post office savings bank is therefore useless", he used to say. Well today the banks have increased their services to the public. Therefore, if this was true between 1953 and 1957, it is even more so today. Today, we can drive over to a bank even at night and make a deposit. And if the banks have so increased their services to the public, it is all the more reason why we should now do away with those savings banks which, according to him, were useless between 1953 and 1957. However, according to his report, he tells us that the question is still under consideration. He acts just like his other cabinet colleagues and, when a problem arises, he shelves it and says: When the time comes, we shall inform the house about it.

I am asking him to tell us in the course of his remarks, whether he still believes that savings banks should be abolished. Does he feel that they should be maintained or does he not? Were the criticisms he made from 1953 to 1957 simply for political or election purposes? This is what we would like to know.

Mr. Chairman, there is another problem that held by attention. It is the work done by casual employees and flying squads commonly referred to as "call girls" by some postal officials. This is the point I wish to make. In view of the present serious situation, I would ask the minister to see that widows are employed on those flying squads, and as for casual workers, to see that his department give work to needy widows and unmarried women. He must also make sure that workers taken on are really in need of work. As far as casual workers are concerned, I trust that he will see that priority is given to persons with dependents, in order to ease, as far as possible, the distress of our citizens in a time of unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Denis raised the question of thefts that are so often committed in post offices. If I am not mistaken, the report mentions that the number of these thefts is on the increase. I must say that I, for one, was the victim of one such theft. I have here a letter dated from Rawdon on October 19, 1960, and signed by the manager of the Canadian National Bank of Rawdon. This is what he tells me:

Dear Sir:

A cheque, bearing your signature, payable to G. A. Perreault, from St. Emile de Montcalm, for the sum of twenty dollars and forty-nine cents ($20.49) has been lost or stolen during a theft committed on the postal truck on August 23 last.

This shows that the improvements that the minister thought so easy to bring about while sitting on this side of the house have not been made.

What I find more serious in the complaints that the Postmaster General was voicing when he was in the opposition is that he was then suggesting that neither the postmaster general nor the previous government were taking enough care of the moneys taxpayers entrusted to them. But today, he is in charge and the thefts have increased. I will not be as cruel as he was to the late lamented minister, Mr. Côté, or the past minister, Mr. Lapointe, but I shall ask him to take the necessary steps in order to try and improve the situation. I would make him this suggestion: I understand that the sub-offices trust the royal mail trucks with sums of money to be delivered to the main office. I wonder if that is not a direct invitation to robbery.

I am wondering whether the moneys from sub-offices could not be deposited in the banks so that the funds could then be transferred by cheque?

I ask him to pay particular attention to this suggestion which, I think could bring good results.

Now, the minister said, trying, I suppose, to lessen his responsibility, that thefts in general have increased in Canada in 1960. On this point, I have an article published in the Montreal Star for January 6, 1961. We find that in the Montreal caisses populaires the number of thefts were fewer by two than the previous year, simply because the caisses populaires now have an effective system of protection.

It might be a good thing if the minister inquired into the methods being used by the caisses populaires to cut down on the thefts of funds.

Mr. Chairman, between 1953 and 1957, the minister was often heard on the subject of twice daily deliveries of mail in urban areas.

He has now been heading this department for four years and nothing has been done. That is another unkept promise, one gone with the wind.

He used to say then that large cities are not to be likened to small peaceful villages, and that the department was bound to give full service to the taxpayers who are paying for it.

Let me ask him today whether he has gone back on the promise he then made, more particularly to the voters in Notre Dame de Grace.

The absence of the twice daily delivery service is hard to believe. Soon he will have to face his electors and the question is bound to come up.

I would ask the minister whether or not he was serious about this matter when he was in the opposition. I ask him today to answer.

The hon. member for St. Denis raised the question of scooters or mailmobiles. He both stated and proved that this vehicle is depriving 19 men of a job. The minister tried to justify their use. I thought I might read in the house a letter I have here—naturally I cannot identify the person who wrote it—which gives an accurate picture of the services rendered by these machines.

(Text):

These machines are known under the name of pushmobiles as hardly a day goes by without one of them having to be pushed or towed in. The worst of the lot—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member identify the person who wrote this letter?

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, the minister realizes full well that I cannot reveal the name of the person who signed that letter.

However, I am going to use it just to show the usefulness of those machines. I think the minister should be the most interested person in this matter.

The Chairman: It is against the rules to read a letter without revealing the name of its author.

The hon. member might possibly say that he has secured an opinion in that regard, without however reading the letter; but he may not read a letter without indicating where it comes from.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I accept your ruling but, before the estimates of the department are passed, I shall memorize this letter; I think I may have an opportunity to read it to you.

Mr. Johnson: You will never have enough time.

Mr. Deschatelets: ...without being obliged to reveal the name of the person who sent it to me.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to a system which is very close to the heart of the Postmaster General, mechanization and automation.

(Text):

Right after the next federal election the story of the administration of the Postmaster General will be written. It will certainly be a sad story, if not a bedtime story. Anyway it would be summed up in two words; "an era of mechanization" in the postal services.

At this time I should like to establish that it is far from being proven that such mechanization has a real, practical economic value. As I said previously, in this period of urgency I think the Postmaster General should endeavour to use other means of running his department than trying to establish a system which has the result of putting people out of work. I should like to mention here an article which has appeared in Le Soleil of December 16, 1959, in which Mr. E. Arthur Racicot, a doctor of physics and mathematics at the University of Toronto, had this to say:

(Translation):

—machines should be built to meet the requirements of industry; it is not industry that should be adjusted to the possibilities of a machine.

And the speaker went on to say:

I may be naive, but it seems to me that the business of a real administration is to control the progress of a company in order to make it efficient.

(Text):

As far as mechanization in the postal service is concerned, it may be that the automatic facing up of letters could render a very good service, but as far as the electronic sortation of letters is concerned the situation is somewhat different. I understand that a large sum of money has already been spent on research work in the post office laboratory in Ottawa. I believe it amounts to nearly $2 million and the project is so far, I am told, only at the stage of experimental installation.

There was an article in the Financial Post stating that this machine is being developed by Canadair Limited in Montreal with a view to a number of similar machines being ordered for installation in post offices. I should like the minister to give us more details about the plans he has in mind concerning the installation of these machines.

I was saying a few minutes ago that it is far from being proved that the installation of these machines—and I refer particularly to machines for the electronic sortation of letter mails—will have a real economic value, because every letter would have to pass through a coding machine manually operated. An invisible code is placed on each letter. This takes time and training, and I think an experienced sorter could sort a letter himself as fast as an operator could code a letter. Between 40 and 50 per cent of the letters mailed at a city office are for delivery in the city of origin. Therefore to code all the letters is a useless task, especially if, as anticipated, they could be processed by a machine which would automatically face them up. Of the balance, of approximately 50 per cent or 60 per cent, I think nearly 80 per cent are destined to the larger cities. These could readily be sorted without the necessity for any coding. Therefore this expensive installation is really being developed to take care of approximately 10 letters in every 100.

I am saying this so that the minister may review his plans for mechanization in the light of the testimony of an expert. What I am saying now will be on the record, and if, as I think will be the case, mechanization at this time is recognized to be a failure the minister will have to take responsibility for it.

(Translation):

Now, Mr. Chairman, in closing my remarks, may I again express to Post Office Department employees my appreciation for their unfailing kindness and courtesy. I believe that the way they handle the mail deserves commendation and that postal employees are entitled to congratulations.

They may well be the country's best servants. I also know the morale of postal employees is quite low and I am very sorry for it, but I ask them to keep on working, to be patient, and to continue suffering in silence because soon I hope, a radical change will take place at the head of their department, which will be of benefit not only to them but to all of Canada.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont who is usually polite, would perhaps allow me to ask him a question. I heard him just now refer to the flying squads of the Post Office Department in Montreal. I would like to give him a chance to clear up a point. Since he is a very able and successful criminal lawyer, as I am told and am prepared to believe, he must surely be familiar with the meaning of the term "call-girl". It might therefore be appropriate if the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont were given an opportunity to assure us that he certainly did not want to imply by this word that postal employees use this word in any derogatory or abject sense with reference to the women who serve on the Post Office Department flying squads. It would surely be regrettable if some people thought this was what the hon. member had in mind. If he cares to answer the question, I will ask him this: "What does he mean by this term "call-girl"?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville for asking that question. I did not think the matter needed clarification. It might be necessary for certain puritans. However I know he is not one, but since he is speaking on their behalf, I will say this: They are ladies, women who work after having answered a phone call.

Now, the term "call-girl", rightly or wrongly, is popular at the present time in post offices; it obviously has no basis on facts, there is no harm in its being used that way and as postal employees have so little opportunity to laugh a bit and enjoy themselves, I think that this designation can still safely be used with no harm to any one.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

Mr. Johnson: I think the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont does not mean—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Edmonton West—

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to refute in any detail the criticism made by certain members of the official opposition about the operations of the Post Office Department, because others are more qualified than I am to do so.

However, I should like to say that, in listening to the criticism made by the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), I had the impression that in some parts of his speech, especially about patronage, I was listening to a speech on sin by the devil. I could also make other comments about his remarks on mechanization and automation, as well as about the remarks made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), who asked that mechanization be discarded and that some devices used in post offices be removed in order to guarantee employment.

Well, if that were put into practice, I think we would go back to the horse and buggy era, or to the full use of labour.

(Text):

There is only one small thing I would like to suggest to the minister. First I would acknowledge that, contrary to what has been said about the morale of postal officers throughout the country, in my particular region I enjoy a very favourable relationship with them. I have received the utmost courtesy from them, and certainly none have complained to me as to their positions. As a matter of fact the situation is rather to the contrary. I have had very laudatory letters about the administration and consideration that this government has given to the postal employees.

The one point I would like to bring to the minister's attention is to suggest that in the regulations which are now interpreted as being in force in respect of direct carrier service to new subdivisions, perhaps a different principle should be applied. Some years ago when I moved to a new subdivision, and I was one of the first there, I had to wait ten or 11 months for postal service, and was highly incensed about what I felt was a rather high and mighty attitude in respect of postal delivery service taken by the department. It seemed to me that the service was provided the citizens of this country through the beneficence of some benevolent power and one had to petition and finally, if all things were done according to the regulations, perhaps postal service would be furnished. When I indicated that I felt that the Post Office Department might be interested in our affairs in the same way the milkman, the newspaper boy, the baker and magazine salesmen were, who after all do not run a greater risk of falling down a drainage ditch or a sunken excavation for a sewage system, these excuses of regulations were given to me as to why services could not be provided until a red carpet was practically rolled out for the postman.

May I say in all fairness that I think there has been some adjustment in this regard, and that the regulations are not now so stringent. I would point out, however, that when people move out to new subdivisions they move there permanently and are not likely to try to escape or run away; and if the milkman, dry cleaner, baker and newspaper boy find it possible and convenient to get around, not only by machine but on foot, in areas where streets and fully completed sidewalks do not exist—after all these subdivisions are not built exactly in swamps or quagmires—perhaps mail service could be provided a little sooner than has been the case. I know there are the group box systems which do provide welcome relief from the full application of the restrictions, but I suggest to the Postmaster General that this matter could perhaps be reviewed so that somewhat more rapid service could be provided in the urban subdivisions. I am particularly interested in this problem because the area in which I live is one of the fastest growing urban areas in the country, and I have received many complaints and met with many difficulties in this regard.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the minister's speech and I noted with what pride he dealt with the achievements of and the developments in his department. As a matter of fact, while he was speaking I could not help but have several Shakespearean couplets run through my mind. I cannot take time to deal with those which came to mind except to say he did remind me of Henry V addressing the troops before the battle of Agincourt; and I paraphrase: "Here we come; here we fight; here we stay to fight again another day".

However, Mr. Chairman, I think it is a truism to say that the minister is a minister of socialist enterprises. I was glad to note how proud he was to be the minister of such a department, one of the most successful departments of the government because there is so little controversy as to policy. If only that principle could be applied, say, to the department of the Minister of Public Works, what progress we would make in this house.

When the minister was speaking I expected for a moment or two to see another halo descend around another member of the cabinet. I have seen a picture of one around the Prime Minister and I thought possibly the Postmaster General was likely to have one descend on him. However, while he was speaking the door of memory was held ajar. What a contrast between the minister of today and, shall I say, the ordinary member of almost yesterday who held up the estimates of the Postmaster General for two days almost single handed. We sat close to one another. I heard his every word and witnessed his every action, two days of caustic criticism of the Post Office Department for failing to have twice-a-day mail delivery. I do not think we yet have twice-a-day mail delivery across Canada. His captious condemnation of departmental administration and what I thought at that time was his callow, ceaseless carping on the details of the departmental administration, about which he apparently knew very little, come to mind.

However, we now have a symbol of democratic evolution. We have a demonstration once again, so often found in British history, that with the descent of the mantle of office come responsibility, understanding and appreciation.

Before going on with my further remarks, I must say that I appreciate the minister's prompt and courteous attention to any matter or complaint that I have brought to his notice. I cannot help but remember, though, that on one occasion he was a bit snappy with me. Later, when he found out I was right, he came and told me so; he wrote me and told me that I was right and I appreciate it. I tell him quite sincerely that all is forgiven.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Thank you; I have so much humility.

Mr. Herridge: I must also express my appreciation of the work of the Ottawa district staffs throughout the country and even of the humblest employee. When we are discussing estimates like these we must remember that this department functions only as a result of co-operation between the top and the bottom, and even the humblest employee carrying the mail and doing these other tasks, which are necessary to perform this great service, is from the democratic socialist point of view—I do not know whether it would be from the point of view of the Minister of Public Works—performing, as the minister is in his position, an equal and necessary service for the state.

Mr. Walker: Perhaps I had better retire. I came in this afternoon out of great respect and admiration for the hon. member for Kootenay West. I wanted to hear his speech but apparently I am drawing his fire. I would just like to sit quietly and hear him perform. It is not necessary for the hon. member to address his remarks to me; because in due course he will have two or three weeks in which to hold forth on my estimates.

Mr. Herridge: I appreciate the minister's comments. We shall look forward to that opportunity in due course, but I made the remarks because of the smile on the minister's face. I thought he was agreeing with me.

Mr. Walker: Good will.

Mr. Herridge: I do suggest, as I think any fair person who has had any association with the Post Office Department realizes, that in recent years there has been a great improvement in morale. There was a period at one time when I and others considered that the morale of the postal employees was pretty low but there has been a general improvement owing to improvements in administration and working conditions and also improvement in the relations between the officials at the top and the humblest employee at the bottom, which means a great deal. I hope the minister will give every consideration to the needs and proper requests of a devoted and loyal staff throughout the country with respect to salary increases, working conditions, pensions, seniority and things of that sort.

I want to say a word or two about the annual report of the minister's department. First of all, let me say that I think it is most attractive. It is well organized as far as material is concerned, its format is excellent and it is well written. In my opinion a report of this type is an example to some other departments so far as the drafting is concerned. Anyone can read this report and get a general understanding of how the Post Office Department functions, and as far I am concerned I have no hesitation in giving all credit to the persons who compiled the report and to the printers. It is an excellent report. If by any chance the Postmaster General had a hand in this matter I will include him in my congratulations.

Without any doubt the efficiency of the department has been increasing over the years, resulting naturally from the expansion of the department, from experience and from changed circumstances, particularly the use of motor transport in highway service and things of that sort which make it possible for the department today to provide services that would not have been economic 10, 15, 20 or 30 years ago.

I think efficiency has been improved as a result of greater departmental diversification into more branches and the decentralization of the administration which I have noticed going on in recent years with respect to various facets of the department's operations and with respect to area or geographical administration. I think that the closer you can get the administration to the persons who are being administered the more satisfactory and efficient the administration is likely to be.

I wish to say a word or two about the engineering and development branch which has to do with buildings, equipment and things of that sort. I have read the report very carefully in that connection. When the minister replies to the various speeches that have been made will he assure the committee that there is no overlapping or duplication with the Department of Public Works? I should like him to define clearly for the benefit of hon. members the relationship between the engineering and development branch of the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works. I notice that the Minister of Public Works is listening very attentively and I am pleased.

Mr. Walker: Just for old friendship's sake.

Mr. Herridge: I am interested in this matter because I know that, according to Parkinson's law, there is a tendency to build up branches and for duplication and overlapping to occur. I mention this matter because I have noted one or two things and have had one or two things brought to my attention.

We will say that a site is being chosen or alterations to a building are being considered by the engineering and development branch of the Post Office Department and naturally by the Department of Public Works at the same time. It has been drawn to my attention that an official of the engineering and development branch will visit an area and then later an official of the Department of Public Works will visit the same area. If there is any correlation between these departments I suggest it would be a good idea to have the two officials visit the sites or the buildings together.

Because it is the people's money that is being spent and because it is the local people who are directly concerned with the new building or improvement, I also suggest that the local authorities should be consulted, whether it be the municipality or, if there is no organized community, a responsible body like the chamber of commerce or in certain cases a trade union or some other local organization. It is very irritating to local people to wait anxiously for years for the erection or the improvement of a building and then to read in the local paper that so and so from the Post Office Department visited the area in connection with the matter last week, or so and so from the Department of Public Works did so. Therefore I suggest that, if possible, these officials should visit these sites together and that there should be consultation with the local authorities or with the appropriate local organizations.

I have had it brought to my attention by quite responsible people, in fact on occasion even by supporters of the Conservative party who very often consult me in my riding, particularly about the Columbia, that these officials come and, as it were, steal away in the night unsung, unheard and unknown until the people read about their visit in the local paper. I should like the minister to explain the relationship between this branch and the Department of Public Works.

There is another branch mentioned in the report which was established in more recent years. I am not quite sure whether it was set up under the administration of the present minister although I think it was commenced before he became the lord almighty in this department. I refer to the public relations branch which is a very useful one. I have met members of the staff of this branch at various larger centres when they have been engaged in presenting an excellent exhibit and giving out information that created a better understanding of the administration of the department and how it functions. However, I have a suggestion to make in this regard, and I may say I am in a rather bright mood today. I had a good sleep last night.

I suggest that the officials would be well advised to visit the smaller places in my constituency. They have gone to places like Rossland, Trail and Nelson—very important and nationally known centres—but many of the smaller communities have not had the benefit of this service. If it is possible, I suggest that these officials should visit the smaller centres where many people congregate for certain annual local events such as fairs and events put on by women's institutes. I am a great believer in getting the co-operation of the women's institutes in things of this sort because in my experience I have always found the ladies a great spur to understanding and action. In passing I might mention the important Inonoaklin valley fair held at Edgewood which draws people from a large area and which would be a very suitable centre for such activities. Then there are the Nakusp women's institute fair and the New Denver and Kaslo fairs. These fairs, in conjunction with those at Nelson and Rossland, are on a circuit. They all run consecutively during the month of September. I suggest it would be very easy indeed to have the officials who go to the Kootenays make the rounds of all these fairs. In that way they would inform a large number of people. At the same time the exhibit would be a nice contribution to a small fair. You will find that in the smaller places people pay a lot of attention to these things and are interested in them. So I make that suggestion to the minister in the very best spirit.

I have got to begin now to turn nasty, shall I say. I want to mention the question of patronage. Mind you, I give the government great credit in many respects for resisting the claims of those who would like to return to the days of patronage. I consider patronage an evil in a modern democratic society but I realize the difficulties. This matter has been brought to my attention even by some Conservatives and also by veterans and other citizens and I should like to mention one example. In fact, it is the only case in the minister's department that has been brought to my attention since I have been a member. I said I would raise this matter in the chamber. It is in connection with the appointment of a person to the post office in Trail.

I understand these appointments come under the civil service. You must remember that in Trail, as in other places, we have capable men and women, unfortunately including some members of the Progressive Conservative party, who are unemployed. The wife of the campaign manager of the defeated Conservative candidate was appointed to a position in the post office. Her husband is the principal of the high school, I am informed, and I understand he receives a good salary. I am not questioning the right of anyone to work, but under these circumstances it is most irritating to veterans, widows and young men and women who are seeking employment to find someone appointed to a position like this, particularly when the people are under the impression it was a political appointment. I should like the minister to inform the committee if there was a civil service examination in connection with this appointment. If there was, would he give us the names of the persons who wrote the examination and their marks, because there has been considerable criticism of this appointment. I said I would bring it to the attention of the minister.

In my opinion, patronage is something that should not be tolerated. I know all the weaknesses of human nature and it is very easy to drift into this situation. I give great credit to the former minister of public works for resisting all the pressure that was brought to bear on him in this connection. He is a man of great character and he stood against it. A party that stands against patronage benefits from that stand because you might please one person by a political appointment but you would create a great deal of dissatisfaction. I believe also that anyone who practises patronage under present day circumstances should be ashamed of himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear the shouts of "hear, hear" from the government benches opposite me.

Another matter to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister concerns the appointment of casual employees to the smaller offices. I understand that these people are paid by the department. I have had a number of associations, women's institutes and veterans' associations, bring this matter to my attention. I understand the veterans' preference is not being respected with regard to these appointments. I do not know whether or not this preference applies directly to these casual helpers, but these casual helpers usually end up on the permanent staff. I am speaking of post offices in which there is a postmaster and anywhere from two to five employees.

One instance which was brought to my attention concerned a person who was not a citizen and who was appointed as a casual employee. At the same time there were quite competent people, such as non-pensionable widows, who might have done the work. I do urge that consideration be given to this matter. When the minister replies, I should like him to inform me as to the basis on which casual employees are appointed to the smaller offices where, apparently, the postmaster is left on his own to make the selection and make recommendations. I should like to know whether or not, after these people are appointed, they come under the terms of the Civil Service Act or if any consideration is given to the veterans' preference.

I want to mention the buildings. I read something in a newspaper a day or two ago to the effect that Mr. Grosart had recommended that communities wanting post office buildings or public buildings should get in touch with their local Progressive Conservative Association. If he did that, he ought to be ashamed of himself, and I have no hesitation in saying so.

Mr. Speakman: Where did you read that?

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Herridge: I have the newspaper up in my office, and I will ask another hon. member to deal with it later. In so far as public buildings are concerned, I usually listen to the representations of the chambers of commerce, the municipalities and other organizations. I can truthfully say that I make it a pracitce never to ask a minister to consider any such representations until I, personally, have visited the area and been convinced, in my own mind, that the building was essential. I have followed this practice throughout the years. I have been very fortunate in having this non-partisan spirit accepted in that respect. The chambers of commerce, women's institutes and municipalities have all respected men—not me personally because some of them think I am a bit odd—as the representative of the constituency. I believe that any lack of respect for a member's office disregards the principle of democracy and shows a lack of respect for the principles of democracy. I trust that Mr. Grosart's recommendation is not accepted by the communities or by the members of this house.

I want to say a word or two about stamps. I have quite a number of constituents who are very keen philatelists. In fact, any letters that come from foreign countries have to have their stamps removed carefully and I apportion them out every so often. As a matter of fact, my secretary and I have a sort of monthly circuit that we follow in apportioning these stamps. Not long ago the Trail Smoke Eaters won the world hockey championship and I asked the minister, at the request of the local people, if he would consider overprinting a northern development stamp or some other stamp as a means of celebrating this important victory.

This is the 60th anniversary of the founding of the city of Trail. It was most interesting that the Trail Smoke Eaters, a team composed mostly of smelter workers, should win the world's hockey championship for the second time. The minister said he had looked at the fire brigade stamp, and that was not appreciated by some of my constituents. Some of my philatelist friends in Trail have sent me this stamp issued by the government at Geneva celebrating this victory, yet the government of Canada does not even consider it worth while issuing such a stamp. Then, again, I have three stamps sent by other philatelists—I will send them over to the minister if he will promise to send them back because they must be returned—issued by the Soviet union to commemorate the winning of the world hockey championship by their team in 1957. I have told my constituents who belong to various philatelic societies, as well as the hockey fans, that I would raise the matter in the house again and ask the minister if he did not think we could do as well as the Soviet union in recognizing the achievement of a great hockey team like the Trail Smoke Eaters.

I wish now to deal with one or two local issues. There has been in the city of Rossland a lot of interest with respect to the proposed new post office building or the alteration of the present one. The citizens generally are very favourably disposed toward the present site because it is central. Rossland is a city built on the side of a mountain, so one does not have much scope with respect to a site. The citizens are interested in maintaining the post office at the present site. I should like the minister to say what has happened to date in respect of the improvement of the present building and what the department is proposing. The village of Fruitvale, a prosperous and growing community in a beautiful valley south of Trail, also has a great need for new post office facilities. The village council, rotary club, chamber of commerce, women's institute and all the other community organizations are very anxious to see a new post office building erected in Fruitvale to meet the needs of this expanding community. I should like the minister to inform the committee what is being done in this connection. He mentioned that the matter was being investigated and wrote me to that effect. I appreciate that, but for the information of my constituents I should like to know what is the state of affairs at the present time.

I must say the building of these small post offices was an excellent idea. The buildings are a credit to the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works, and they are appreciated. Small federal buildings in small communities intrude the personality of the government of Canada into these small communities. I think this program has been very worthwhile and I am glad to hear that other hon. members agree.

I have heard number of people mention that Canada is so vast that many local people are perhaps hardly conscious of the services and importance of the federal government of Canada. I think it was an excellent thing when the department decided to erect these small buildings in the smaller communities to a greater extent than ever before.

I want to mention one or two other matters. I have been asked to bring to the minister's attention the necessity for improving the ventilation in the Nelson and Trail post offices. Trail is the warmest part of our constituency because of our topography. Trail is located in the bottom of a valley and sometimes becomes very hot in the summer months. That post office requires particular attention in this regard. I suggest that air conditioning be installed, or that there be an increase in the number of fans.

With respect to the Nelson post office—and I have been all through it and talked to the various people about it—there is still an unsatisfactory state of affairs with respect to ventilation owing to the lint that comes from the sacks which arrive there. I think it is the centre in which the sacks are opened, and then they are redistributed to other points and taken by mail carriers to various parts of the constituency. However, there is still some complaints about the amount of lint that is floating around in the air. I have no experience of this, although I have visited the post office, but I am told it is quite inconvenient at times and I bring this matter to the minister's attention.

We appreciate the rural mail services. I like the approach to these services and the changes suggested. I notice that the minister has had the local people sign a petition in order to express their wish for this or that service in respect to the arrival time of mail. I think this is an excellent suggestion. It gives the department an opportunity to accurately assess local opinion and determine whether these people would like the mail to come in at a certain time or later. I appreciate that being done, and so do the people.

At the Nakusp post office a petition was signed regarding whether the mail should come from Nelson at a certain time or later. Many people thought this was all right. Some were in favour of one time and some were in favour of another. The majority were very emphatic in one direction. But the point is. they were consulted. They felt they were consulted, and they were.

I think this is an excellent way to solve many of these problems that arise in local communities, where perhaps one or two people are listened to who are not always giving the department the accurate public opinion.

The residents in the Inonoaklin valley have asked for a daily mail service. The minister is looking into this matter. It is a growing community and I trust this question will receive favourable consideration.

I will cease at this point, Mr. Chairman, and look forward to the minister's reply. In the meantime I shall sit here and watch his beaming countenance with interest.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I do not give much credence to the statement made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. The hon. member's statement was that the article about patronage appeared under the name of the national organizer of the Progressive Conservative party.

The hon. member asked that a stamp be printed to commemorate the Trail hockey team. I should like a stamp to be printed to commemorate the Lacombe Rockets who are at the moment sweeping their way across Canada in the intermediate championship series and I hope will be selected to represent Canada in the world hockey championship games next year.

My remarks on this item will be brief, but I could not let this opportunity pass without expressing, on behalf of the people of the Wetaskiwin constituency whom I have the honour to represent in this house, their very great pleasure and appreciation in the increased and improved post office services which they have enjoyed over the past three years.

These improvements have consisted of a great many things, but in a rural area, of course, the most important is rural delivery. New rural routes have been established, existing routes lengthened and the service increased from twice to three times weekly. There has been a general improvement throughout our rural services. As an hon. member said yesterday, mail is one of the most important services that people receive anywhere.

Improved post office facilities are being provided, and I would say to the minister that the people of the towns of Calmar and Devon appreciate being provided with the post offices which are now nearing completion. In addition, the proposed new building for which tenders have now been called in the town of Lacombe will be very much appreciated by the people of that town and the surrounding area.

When the new corner mail boxes are placed around the city the residents of the city of Wetaskiwin will express through me their appreciation of the minister and his department. I refer particularly to our senior citizens and the busy housewives, many of whom at present have to walk over a mile to post a letter.

Wetaskiwin is a growing city and is spreading out quite far. With one post office almost in the centre of the city it means a long and arduous walk for many of its inhabitants.

Unlike my hon. friends in the opposition I am not too concerned or fearful of the deficit in the operation of the minister's department, and I do not think the people whom I represent are fearful about it either. We realize that improved services cost money and we are willing to pay our share of those costs in return for the vastly improved services which we have obtained over the past four years.

Mr. Chairman, I could not close my remarks without saying a word about the Post Office Department employees in my constituency. Perhaps, unlike my hon. friends and colleagues from urban and suburban areas, in my rural constituency I know every employee of the minister's department and count them among my friends. I wish to express to them my personal thanks and appreciation for their devoted and efficient service to their patrons.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I shall not delay the committee very long at this time, but I feel I should publicly thank the Postmaster General for the many courtesies I have been shown and the prompt consideration my requests have at all times received since I have been a member of parliament.

I cannot say that the minister has always replied favourably to my requests, but I think he has at all times given serious consideration to them. I think the Postmaster General is trying to do his duty in a manner that reflects great credit to him.

I must also pay tribute to his officials, especially those in my province, from whom I have always received every satisfaction. I would compliment the postmaster of St. John's and his staff for the very efficient way in which they have performed their duties, especially during the Christmas season.

A few changes were made in my riding which looked like political affairs, but I brought these matters to the attention of the Postmaster General and he has handled them in a manner that was satisfactory as far as I was concerned.

In St. John's we have a group of responsible citizens who are sponsoring a "Christ in Christmas" campaign to bring the Christian spirit back to the Christmas season. Membership of this organization is open to all religious denominations in Newfoundland. The committee is anxious to do something to confirm that ours is a Christian country. In this connection, one way in which the federal government could make a great contribution would be to issue a special two-cent stamp for use on our Christmas cards depicting the nativity scene and painted, possibly, by a Canadian artist. I have already referred this matter to the Postmaster General. I understand that at least nine other countries use each year a postage stamp commemorating the birth of Christ. Because of our Christian tradition I feel that Canada also should make use of a postage stamp in keeping with the Christmas season. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo also made some comments in support of this organization last evening.

Last year my attention was drawn to the wage rate which the government of Canada was paying to casual help employed at the post office in St. John's, Newfoundland during the Christmas season at the period of the peak load. The rate of $1 an hour straight time was being paid, and this involved overtime work after regular hours and on Saturday, a day which I understand is a regular statutory weekly holiday in the federal civil service. Even on Sundays these casual workers were paid $1 an hour. I understand that the unemployment insurance commission rate is $1.13 an hour and that all hours worked are paid at the straight rate of $1.13 an hour. The government recently introduced a bill making it law for Canadian workers to be paid time and one half for overtime worked beyond the regular work week of 40 hours, provision being made for double time in respect of statutory holidays and double time in respect of Sunday work. Why should the government pay the low rates to which I have just drawn attention?

In order to relieve the dread situation of unemployment, the government called parliament into session last fall and appealed to business and trade people to get any possible work done without delay to help the unemployed. The motto was: "Do it now—why wait for spring?" Yet when the government helps out in this case casual help is hired to get the work done. Despite the need of such help the low rate of $1 per hour straight time for casual post office employees is paid.

The same thing happens when casual employees are hired through the unemployment insurance commission except that the rate has been increased to $1.13 an hour. Why does the post office pay only $1 an hour while the unemployment insurance commission pays $1.13? This is all work done for the same government and paid for by the same government.

The idea exists in Newfoundland that the government finds it has work that must be done within a short time and, noting the labour picture and the large number of persons unemployed and the fact that Christmas was drawing near, has really exploited its position and trust and has taken advantage of the plight of the unemployed seeking casual work by deciding to pay them low rates. Labour rates of $1 or $1.13 per hour are not equal to the rates paid for comparable work in industry. Many of these casuals hired for this period are experienced, educated people but were forced to accept $1 per hour through want and necessity. I do not think that this is right or just on the part of the government and I appeal to the Postmaster General to see that this position is changed.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words to congratulate and thank the minister, as well as the staff of the Post Office Department, for their devotion to the Canadian people.

I should like also to thank his office staff, including Mr. Guy Caron who politely replies to our letters or telephone calls, when we are in need of information.

I should like also to draw the attention of the house to the fact that a letter carrier service will soon be inaugurated in Repentigny and Charlemagne, a service which will be very helpful to the people of that part of my constituency.

For many years such a service was expected. Thanks to the co-operation of the Post Office Department, that service will become a reality and the people of my constituency will be on the same footing as that of Montreal.

I should like to emphasize the present situation at the Joliette post office. The staff there is cramped for space, on account of other services which are already set up there. The city of Joliette is growing, and the staff is cramped for space in the post office. In my opinion, the Department of Public works should consider the possibility of enlarging the post office and of increasing its staff.

The possibility of increasing the number of postmen to better serve the city of Joliette should also be considered. Thus, the hours of work could perhaps be reduced and better working conditions be provided for postal employees in Joliette.

I congratulate the government which, since it has been in power, has issued several commemorative stamps that illustrate very well our national history.

Such initiative emphasizes among our young people and the whole Canadian population the names of those who have worked for the greatness of our country.

That is quite a constrast with what used to be done formerly, when stamps were issued to illustrate, for instance, the Rocky mountain goat or some similar thing.

I hope that, in future the government will issue a commemorative stamp at least once a month to illustrate a phase of our national history. I understand that, for a good many years, the Post Office Department has had great difficulty in stopping the flow of foreign lottery tickets.

If, some day, the Criminal Code were amended to allow lotteries in this country, we would at the same time avoid the spread of foreign lottery tickets in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, those were the remarks I had to make, and once again I wish to congratulate the employees of the Post Office Department who are devoting themselves constantly in the interest of Canada.

Mr. Johnson: I have a question to ask the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

(Translation):

Could the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm tell me whether the Joliette post office to which he referred is the same post office which was estimated to cost $152,000, and which actually cost $400,000 at the time Mr. Georges-Emile Lapalme was the member for Joliette?

Mr. Pigeon: I will gladly answer the question put by my hon. friend. His statement is true. Besides, at the time of the erection of the Joliette post office building, which has remained famous in political history, I believe that the Auditor General had strongly blamed the government for what was in fact an example of maladministration. It was even a scandal at the time.

I therefore thank the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) for having raised this point.

(Text):

Mr. McGrath: I should like to again bring to the minister's attention the difficulties encountered by his department in the establishing of rural mail services. The minister referred to this problem in his opening remarks. I come from an area of Canada where two thirds of the population live in rural areas and I should like to again direct attention to the problem, of vital concern to the Postmaster General and the department, regarding revenue post offices. I am sure that every hon. member appreciates the criteria used in determining whether an area should be provided with a semi-staffed post office which, of course, is housed in a regular post office building under the management of a postmaster who is a member of the civil service.

Most of the postal services in the rural areas of Canada are carried out by revenue post offices, and very often the accommodation provided is grossly inadequate. This cannot be deemed to be the fault of the Postmaster General because, in the final analysis, the individual conducting the business of a revenue post office must supply the accommodation, fuel and other overhead costs out of his income which is usually rather small because of the limited volume of service transacted.

The situation existing in rural Canada today has changed from that of 20 years ago because more Canadians have ready access to jet and regular air travel. As a result of this situation more Canadians are travelling to various parts of this country and the world, and in order to maintain contact with their business associates and families they are using the mail services to a greater extent. I think the time has now arrived, in this situation, for the Postmaster General to give consideration to the problem of devising some means of providing more adequate accommodation for carrying out the services of the revenue post offices.

I must confess that I do not possess the answer, but this is a very important function having to do with the transacting of government business in handling Her Majesty's mail. The service provided by these small post offices directly affects the lives and businesses of Canadians in all parts of the country. Perhaps some means could be devised wherein post offices could be provided—such as small inexpensive, prefabricated buildings—for these small rural areas in Canada which do not qualify for a semi-staffed post office. I feel something should be done so that the unfortunate situation that exists can be rectified. In my own constituency I have often witnessed long lines of people standing outside in all types of weather waiting for the sorting of mail, because the facilities provided are not adequate; perhaps just a farmer's kitchen. This problem is an acute one. I realize that one cannot expect to find beautiful post office buildings in every rural part of this country. However, I do feel something can be done to improve the handling of mail at this level. An improvement in the handling of mail in the revenue post offices would certainly expedite the service and give a tremendous uplift to the people living in areas served by this type of post office.

As an example of the situation which exists I can refer to my own constituency which is, for the most part, suburban to the city of St. John's where annually many thousands of dollars in postal revenue are, for very sound reasons, channelled by businessmen through the city post offices. They feel that the facilities provided by the revenue post offices in their villages are inadequate. One cannot expect a businessman to transact his postal business—purchasing money orders and unemployment insurance stamps—in some individual's kitchen. I feel that the time has come for a reappraisal of this whole question of revenue post offices because the situation today is not at all the same as it was 10 years ago. I am sure that the Postmaster General in his genial and competent manner will give this problem serious thought, as he always does, and will find an answer at some early date.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, at the risk of offending the modesty of the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton), and as this is my first opportunity, since my election in 1958, to speak on his departmental estimates, I am taking the liberty of congratulating him.

First of all, I have always been impressed by the human qualities of the minister and especially by the way he runs his department.

Mr. Chairman, like my colleagues, I do not wish to extend this debate unduly, but the fact remains that even though certain matters do not concern the country as a whole, they are nevertheless of importance to the people of an area or even of a riding, and it is with such matters that I should like to deal with for a few minutes.

In the matter of congratulations, I wish to thank the minister for the work done by his departmental officials, under his personal guidance, I am sure, or at least in a general way, with regard to the city of Beloeil and the vicinity. Beloeil is an interesting town on the Richelieu river in Vercheres riding, but forming part of the federal constituency of Chambly-Rouville.

Quite close to Beloeil, is the industrial municipality of McMasterville and opposite, on the other bank of the Richelieu river, St. Hilaire and Otterburn Park.

The over-all population of those four municipalities form a rather important urban area, and I must thank the minister for having given due consideration to the fact that those municipalities, even though they are independent legally speaking, depend on each other economically and socially, because they have common interests. That is what the department came to understand and that is why Beloeil, and other neighbouring municipalities, St. Hilaire, Otterburn and McMasterville, got a letter carrier service. Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, far from taking jobs away, that has meant employment for several letter carriers and several clerks in the Beloeil post office.

Mr. Ricard: Back home also.

Mr. Johnson: Of course, Mr. Chairman, there is a fly in the ointment. Whenever the department decides to organize a postal service and to classify it among the offices with a letter carrier service, certain postmasters or postmistresses may lose their job. True, the civil service commission gives them a chance to write exams and to qualify as postal clerks, but a person may, in certain cases, already be of a certain age and not be in a position to take outside work. Such is the case unfortunately of two persons in the Beloeil area, more specifically in St. Hilaire Station and Otterburn who have, for several years, devoted their energies to the postal service. I am telling this to the hon. members for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) and St. Denis (Mr. Denis) because those persons who had been employed under the Liberal administration found themselves temporarily unemployed, being unable to accept a clerical position in accordance with the terms of the Civil Service Act. But they were postmistresses and as such they deserve to have their case examined with complete sympathy. Since positions, attractive enough but insufficiently paid, were offered them, the Post Office Department should take charge of these cases because there are technicalities which cause friction between the Post Office Department and the civil service commission.

That is one of the drawbacks of this system for which personally I have no use, a system under which we have a commission which does not take into account the requirements of the department, for the reason that it is not within the department.

It is time we ask ourselves whether it would not be better to establish an effective personnel service within each department, in order to allow each department to operate on sound business principles. One may wonder if that would not be better than having a civil service commission too prone to disregard the needs of the particular department and which, for want of more flexible regulations, prevents postmasters with many years experience from qualifying for some other work.

I take the liberty of submitting these cases to the minister. I am however, fully aware that this situation existed under the former government as it does today.

Such things will happen, and they do not involve political considerations. But still those are things which bear on citizens' careers and jobs, and these particular cases deserve to be considered with sympathy by the department.

It may be a good idea when the time comes to revise the Civil Service Act to take into consideration these special cases.

I would also like to talk about the situation of the postmistresses and postmasters in suboffices. In my opinion, they are asked to remain at the service of the public about eight hours a day, and they are too often paid salaries not commensurate with the time they devote to the government's service. As a matter of fact, if, in assessing the postal service we take as a criterion service to the public instead of revenue, we must consider an increase in these postmasters' compensation.

Incidentally, it may be a good idea for the minister to disregard the criticism about the deficit; it is unjustified criticism anyway. If the Post Office Department is a department at the service of the public, its efficiency cannot be assessed only in terms of deficit or absence of deficit, even more when members of the opposition criticize on the one hand the increase in parcel post rates, and on the other hand, berate the minister because he wants to reduce costs. I wonder what they are after.

There is also the case of the rural mail carriers, or contractors who distribute the mail on what is called a rural route.

Mr. Chairman, since a letter carrier service was established in Beloeil, in my constituency, I have compared the work done by a letter carrier who works so many hours and receives rather a good compensation for our area, even though there is room for improvement in the work of such contractors. I have yet to hear criticism from the letter carriers about their compensation, because if we compare the work of a letter carrier to the work of a rural mail carrier who has to supply his own vehicle, who works almost as long hours as the letter carrier, who has to give bond, and who must, in a word, prove that he is responsible and has qualifications equal to those of the letter carrier, I do not see why the government would not revise the rate of compensation, particularly with regards to the calculation of yearly mileage, which in my opinion is an important factor, at least as far as the setting of rates commensurate with the service rendered by a rural mail carrier is concerned.

I think it would be interesting if the government were to make an investigation in this regard.

Obviously, most of those who have rural route contracts do not work full-time like the letter carriers, but there again we must remember that a person who undertakes a contract must be available for government service several consecutive hours six days a week, which completely disrupts the balance of his daily routine. Even worse, it often happens that a carrier cannot quote on a second rural route because mail distribution on both is carried out at the same time to ensure a better service to the public. That situation prevents the rural carrier from having two contracts and thus earn a reasonable salary.

As I told the minister a moment ago, I have been happy to see all that has been done in municipalities like Beloeil, St. Hilaire, Otterburn, McMasterville. But there again a shadow mars the picture. The service has been working well enough, but the municipalities concerned are developing at such a pace that we shall soon have to consider building a new post office, I mean erecting a new federal building, either at Beloeil or St. Hilaire, for those are the two main municipalities, and the most centrally situated of that postal district.

I would therefore ask the minister to see that the officials of his department hurry up matters and, more particularly, make representations to the Department of Public Works so that a decision be made with regard to the matter. And as the service is working out well in Beloeil and the surrounding district, it might be well for the department to consider the possibility of extending such a service to a municipality like St. Bruno, in the constituency of Chambly, where the situation is about identical to that in Beloeil. For postal purposes, St. Bruno might be joined to St. Basile, and perhaps to a section of Beloeil or St. Hubert. St. Hubert is divided into various communities called parks, one of which, Croydon, has already a letter carrier delivery service, operated as a subdivision of the letter carrier service in Ville Jacques-Cartier. It would therefore be a question of organizing new postal routes from Ville Jacques-Cartier into those other sectors of St. Hubert.

Finally we have also the towns of Chambly and Marieville, which are in a similar position.

As far as Marieville is concerned, I would like to thank the department, as well as the minister, for having taken action, after considering my own representations as well as those of the municipality and of the town council, and I also want to congratulate them for deciding to enlarge the Marieville post office. Of course, some minor difficulties have arisen, but I think that the department will be able to settle things, if the new municipal council co-operates as well as the former one. Of course, some people in Marieville should realize, that if they want their post office enlarged, the municipality must be sensible and ready to transfer or sell to the department for a reasonable price the site which it owns near the present post office, thus enabling the department to build in the most economical way.

Mr. Chairman, I would make a suggestion to the Postmaster General. I am not sure that the matter comes under his department, but I think he might do something to carry out what I am now submitting to the house. Voters in the various ridings of the province of Quebec are convinced that their representative has only 125 or 150 miles to travel to the Ottawa session, and that he has enough leisure to come home and meet them on week ends. It is often difficult for constituents to meet their elected member and unfortunately several of them do not even know that members are sitting throughout the week, and they have not the slightest idea that we are sitting seven or eight months a year. It might be worth while for the government to consider giving the members in each constituency one or two rooms in federal buildings, in post offices for instance, so that a member may receive his constituents, especially when the federal building is rather centrally located. It might be something worth trying since it happens that in some federal buildings there is always a room which is not used every day or every hour of the day by the employees of the Post Office Department. The employees of the Post Office Department, who are regularly in touch with the public, could give information to constituents wishing to meet their member and tell them when he would be available.

I already see the hon. member for St. Denis in an office in a Montreal sub-station getting information about the Post Office Department. Perhaps this might give him the opportunity to see for himself how well the Post Office Department is administered since the change of 1957 which was wanted by the public in general, whatever the hon. member for St. Denis may think.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to come back to the topic of congratulations and tell the Postmaster General how convinced we are that there has been a change, even in the Post Office Department, since that famous election in 1957, when the voters gave the Liberal party to understand that it had not inherited the power in Ottawa from God the Father.

Mr. Chairman, for the past three years, I did not have the opportunity of taking part in the debate on the estimates of the Post Office Department because our friends opposite took all the time available in this house for criticizing.

Since I have a few minutes left before my time is exhausted I wish to make a few remarks of a general nature on the administration of the Post Office Department.

First of all, I had the opportunity, at the opening of the new postal service in Beloeil, to meet the authorities of the Post Office Department. I met people in charge of key jobs in the administration of this department for the Montreal region. Whatever the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) may think, those people could smile easily, were in a good mood and seemed quite satisfied with their lot and proud of their minister. I do not believe them to be hypocritical to the extent of telling me about their satisfaction and telling different to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and the hon. member for St. Denis.

I heard the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont criticize the fridigity of the Postmaster General's speech. According to the hon. member there was no humanitarian consideration in the minister's speech and he nearly added that it lacked poetry. But where he contradicts himself is when he takes the minister to task for having presented his report as if he were a chairman of a board of directors.

After all, this man is in charge of a great concern for which he is answerable to parliament in every detail. The opposition blames him for acting like the director of a great concern. I cannot understand it.

I have listened with attention to the first part of the speech made by the hon. member for St. Denis, yesterday, but I did not have the courage to listen to the second part, even after a good dinner; I just glanced through the expurgated and corrected version which appeared in this morning's Hansard.

At all events, I should like to touch upon one point of the speech made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, who spoke about scooters. I wonder why the hon. member is against one aspect of mechanization which the Post Office Department might now adopt, when he demands himself a certain mechanization. Does the hon. member realize that, after having criticized the Post Office Department—because he claims that the staff will decrease on account of mechanization—he is proposing new improvements which mean some re-organization that might involve the dismissal of some employees?

I also note the congratulations offered by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, and no doubt also by the hon. member for St. Denis, to postal employees after having criticized them for half an hour. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, why the morale of those employees should be so low, as the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont claims, if not because of the unjustified criticism which is voiced against them, in order to splash the minister.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that after all those compliments, the minister will take into consideration the few remarks I made on behalf of my electors. I make my apology to the other members of the house for having taken so much valuable time and for shortening the holidays of the hon. member for St. Denis, but it was in the interests of my electors, and I believe I have done my duty.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kootenay West referred to the problem of patronage in relation to the Post Office Department. Personally I am quite concerned about this matter. Certainly the Conservative party should be concerned about it as well as governments generally if governments are going to function in a democratic manner. So far as my riding is concerned, the story has appeared in newspapers across the country that Mr. Grosart, the national organizer of the Conservative party, came to the town of Haileybury in the riding of Timiskaming shortly before the Conservative party convention and told people there, at least two of them being town councillors, that if they wanted a new post office they had better have a delegation, under the auspices of the defeated Conservative candidate, make representations. He said that this was the way to do it, and the best time to do it would be at the Conservative convention.

This statement appeared in the local newspapers and I have no reason to doubt the integrity of the sources of information. There are several people who are closely connected through marriage with the defeated candidate in that area. I am quite sure that the information was correct. It could not matter less to me, one way or the other. If the people of Haileybury need a new post office and a new post office is warranted, then I will fight to get it. I feel this would be true of the Conservative candidate who was defeated at the last election. I do not believe there is anyone who represents a riding in this country who is not interested in getting these things for his riding.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Can the Postmaster General tell me or tell the country that he will give the town of Haileybury or any other place a post office on the basis of patronage, as something in repayment of certain considerations? Will he say that a post office will be built on that basis? Is it not true that in the majority of cases where post office buildings are constructed, the department sends out people to assess the facilities that are available and the number of customers using those facilities? Is it not true also that the Post Office Department sends out inspectors to assess the cost of renting a building as compared with the cost of erecting a public building? Are those things not done on a business basis as we have been led to believe they are? If they are, then what type of service does Mr. Grosart pretend to supply to these communities by lining up the councillors who are interested in obtaining a new building for the area?

Certainly, one cannot blame these people for being interested in a new building. They are told by someone who appears to be quite close to the federal cabinet that this is the way you have to do these things. I should like to give the former Conservative candidate credit because he did tell the council he would need a resolution from the council recommending the erection of a new public building in the town to house the post office. He suggested also that before he carried their representations to the convention—I presume that is where he went because these events occurred only a couple of days before the convention—he would also want a letter from the chamber of commerce and from other interested agencies.

The article appearing in the Northern News, Kirkland Lake, March 14, states in part:

> Mr. Rice recently unsuccessfully sought action from government on waterfront improvements at Haileybury. Mr. Cook—

That is the mayor of the town.

> —said the government did nothing about the defeated P.C. candidate's request then.

Even in these small communities politics enters into these situations because here you have the mayor, a Liberal, arguing with two or three of the councillors who hold positions in the Conservative organization.

> The council did not authorize Mr. Haskett, to forward a copy of the resolution to Mr. Peters, C.C.F. member of parliament for the riding.

This is a "beef" on my part, Mr. Chairman, because I am the only one concerned. I make this grievance in the light of the fact the people seem to have been advised to ask the defeated candidate to look after this matter. If the councils were operated in this manner, then you would have all the defeated candidates for council sitting in the council chamber. If you do not believe that democracy works—

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Peters: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: I thought the hon. member proposed to read from a newspaper article a statement that had been made by Mr. Grosart?

Mr. Peters: No.

Mr. Macdonnell: Then, what was the evidence upon which we were asked to believe Mr. Grosart had made a statement? What are we asked to believe?

Mr. Ricard: Insinuation.

Mr. Peters: I said I had read several accounts of what Mr. Grosart had said.

Mr. Macdonnell: Where?

Mr. Peters: In the Toronto Telegram, the edition of March 14. Incidentally, it may be of interest to hon. members to know that at the time the editor of the Toronto Telegram phoned me and asked me to comment on this particular matter.

I am not the only one who is concerned about this incident. I find a letter appeared in the Northern News of March 17, 1961, and I should like to read a part of it. The letter is signed "Democrat" from Charlton, Ontario. I have not the faintest idea who he is, and I know nothing about it. This is what the letter says:

> In an account of a recent meeting of the Haileybury town council published in your paper it was reported that Foster Rice was being approached to act as a go-between with the federal government in the matter of having a federal building put up in the town. There is nothing wrong about the town wanting such a building and there is a need for one, but why get Mr. Rice to act as intermediary when there is already a man at Ottawa who is being paid to look after the interests of the riding. I refer to Arnold Peters, M.P. for Timiskaming. I am sure that Mr. Peters, our elected member, is as capable of presenting the case for the town as is Mr. Rice, the defeated candidate. Furthermore, I believe Mr. Peters is as keenly conscious of the needs of the district as either of the defeated candidates. It is all very well for our politicians to prate of democracy at election time but when they deny its very principles once the election is over, it is enough to make at least some of us wonder if those who sit in the seats of the mighty know what democracy really does mean.

I underline the words, "At least some of us wonder if those who sit in the seats of the mighty know what democracy really does mean."

> In the last election three men ran for office. Two of them definitely were not elected. Therefore it became obvious to even the most obtuse of the electorate that the one who got the most votes was the one whom the majority of the people chose as their representative.
> With three or more candidates in the field, it can scarcely be said that the term "majority rule" is now applicable. Our present political set-up with the old parties fighting tooth and claw has created a situation of which the C.C.F. has been quick to take advantage. Both Liberals and Conservatives would be well advised to smarten up and stop scrapping, otherwise the New Party will slip in and pick up more of the marbles.

I do not believe the last part of the letter is relevant to this issue. I do feel, however, that the opinion expressed in the letter is shared by many people across the country.

I have never even been asked by the town council of Haileybury to give consideration to a new post office. If the town wanted a new post office, then the obvious method would be to approach the sitting member of parliament. If the town did not wish to approach the member of parliament, and this is quite all right, then I think they should appeal directly to the Postmaster General. They should make their representations to him. I will give a lot less credit to the minister than I do if I find the department does not send inspectors to the area to investigate the facilities available, consider the number of people using the facilities, and reach a decision on the basis of such an investigation.

If we have an opposition member in a riding it should make not one bit of difference, in my opinion, whether or not the sought for post office is built. The post office should be built because there is a need for it, and for no other reason. I have not asked for post offices to be built in any area where I consider the facilities to be sufficient to serve the needs of the community. It is not my opinion that we should build new post offices every two or three years in a given area. We should build post offices to meet the needs of the community and do a satisfactory job in the area. I think that is what the Canadian people want, and it is certainly my opinion.

I have heard nothing more about this matter from either the council or any other source, but I will give the minister the credit I am sure he deserves. I am quite sure that if representations were made to the Postmaster General he did exactly what I have outlined, that is, he sent an inspector to examine the situation. I am quite certain the Postmaster General will say that the decision to build a post office in that area hinges entirely on the need and the information he receives from his own officials.

I was very pleased yesterday to sit in a committee of this house and hear representations from a group of civil servants who called themselves the postal employees' association, which is an organization closely connected with this department. They appeared to me, unlike most other civil servants, to be very aggressive and to have taken a progressive attitude towards obtaining a contract with their employer, and negotiations in general. In fact, they sounded almost like a trade union.

It has been my contention for a long time that civil servants who want to receive the benefits to which I think they are entitled will have to act more like trade unions. They will have to do more of the work themselves and get out and fight for what they want. They must put forward their views in an aggressive manner and be willing to do something about them.

Because of the attitude of this group I asked a number of questions of people closely connected with it. I did this to find out why the post office employees are more aggressive than other civil servants. I was surprised at some of the things I learned. I am told that a civil service clerk, grade III—I am not referring to a postal clerk—has to take an annual examination if he is employed in any one of the 14 district post offices in Canada. Upon the result of this examination depends a salary increase or decrease of $150 a year. If these civil servants do not pass the examination they do not receive an increase. More than that, if they do not pass the examination they are subject to a decrease in salary of $150 a year.

Therefore, when a grade III clerk employed in any one of the 14 district post offices takes the examination, in effect the examination is worth $300 a year to him. He has a chance to increase or decrease his salary by $150 a year.

If these civil servants fail to pass two of these examinations in one year they suffer the salary decrease I mentioned. Why should a civil service employee in the post office be treated differently from a grade III clerk in any other department of the civil service.

In addition to that, I should like to know from the Postmaster General why they are treated differently from the civil service grade III clerks in the headquarters of the post office, where they do not have to take an examination. Is it less important for them to be capable, on paper at least, through examinations, in the postal headquarters as it is in the district offices of the post office?

I should like to know, and I think the committee would be interested in the answer to this question, how many postal employees have suffered salary decreases because of these examinations. Also, what saving has this been to the operations of the Post Office Department?

In northern Ontario we have always been pleased with the fact that we have the benefit of what is called the railway postal service sorting arrangement. This means that a letter leaving Kirkland Lake, rather than going to North Bay and remaining in the sorting process in North Bay for one day and coming back the following day to Englehart, we will say—only 30 miles away—and having a trip taking several days, will be put on the train and in an hour or so will be in the next town and will be dropped off there.

This service is being conducted through a sorting process on the trains. These employees must take these sorting examinations and obtain a mark of 97 per cent or they do not receive an increase in salary.

These examinations are exceedingly difficult. They create a great deal of tension. There can be as much as $300 riding on the result of an answer given in one of these tests. I wonder whether this is any advantage and whether it increases the efficiency of the department. I wonder whether these examinations are worthwhile. If they are not, why must they be continued?

This system means that in most cases employees, particularly those connected with sorting, have to take examinations at least twice a year and continue taking them until they are 60 years of age. It seems to me this is unreasonable and is something more than we ask of any other civil service employee.

In connection with this matter I should like to know what is the Postmaster General's justification for demanding that many of the department's employees themselves purchase the sorting cards and sorting test cases. Why is it that the department does not, after making the initial purchase of test cards and test sorting cases, supply these civil servants with the means of keeping them up to date? Why does the department demand that the employee himself pay for new test cards that are continually being put into use?

I understand that a terrific turnover and change-over of services is now taking place. These employees must have this current information. For instance, if one is sending a letter to Highland Grove, for instance, they have to know that it goes to Lindsay first and then it goes through another little town before it gets to Highland Grove, or that it goes to Highland Grove before it gets to Lindsay, and the next time the trucking arrangement may be such that the letter is taken to some other place.

In each case these cards have to be brought up to date, and they have to be paid for by the employee. Not only does the employee have to take these examinations, but the machinery necessary for him to carry out his work has to be purchased by him. It is not simply a matter of skill; it is a matter of learning and study. This study has to be carried out in his own time and with his own equipment. This is an added burden to these employees.

I do not believe this is justifiable. I believe that if we wish to keep up the standard of our postal employees the least we should do is to supply them with the equipment necessary for them to keep their card indexes up to date. I think this expense should be borne by the Post Office Department.

I am sure the minister will know what these costs would be. He will be abe to give us an over-all figure of how much this system would cost the department. If the department were to supply both the initial test cards, the test cases and the revisions which are necessary from time to time, I am sure the Postmaster General could tell us what costs would be involved.

In the staffed post offices employees get an increase automatically in the first year on the recommendation of the postmaster. The second increase of $150 is granted only if the employee is able to pass a departmental examination, and from the second year onward, the point at which the employee reaches his maximum salary with an increase of $100 a year, he must pass two examinations a year and continue to pass those examinations, in order to remain at maximum salary, for 20 years. After 20 years employees still have to continue to take one of these examinations a year until they reach age 60.

It seems to me that this is requiring a great deal more from civil servants employed in the post office than is required from civil servants employed in any other department of government. I find this system hard to understand in view of the government's claim that it wishes to see equality of treatment as among all civil servants. In this case one employee is treated differently from another even in the same classification. It seems to me that if industry asked its employees to reach and remain at a high standard of knowledge it would at least give them time to do so during their working hours, provide instructions to enable them to keep up to date and, in addition, I am sure, the materials which would be necessary.

In relation to railway post offices I should like to know how many of these offices have been taken out of operation since the period when the number of these offices was at a maximum. I notice from the minister's report that in 1957-58 there were 208 and in 1958-59 only 96. I should be interested to know what the number was in 1959-60 and the estimate for the year 1960-61.

I should also like to ask the minister what is the intention of the department in relation to highway post offices. These are vehicles equipped with racks and sorting tables together with other facilities needed for the sorting of mail, and a great deal of use is already made of them in the United States. In many respects they resemble closely the railroad cars designed for the sorting of mail in transit except that they have been converted for travel on the highways. We should be putting the railway sorting cars on tires, as it were, and allowing them to continue the service in those areas where transportation of mail by rail has been discontinued. I should like to draw attention to one example which is brought to my attention regularly and that is the area of Cochrane North where the service is curtailed generally. In order to reach this area from Toronto by rail one has to make two or three changes and delays take place even in the best of times, delays which affect, of course, the transport of mail as well.

Now that there is no sorting done along the route letters which are collected in the course of the journey have to be sent, sometimes, 200 miles from the source and then, in certain cases, must be returned 175 or 180 miles to the nearest village and considerable loss of time is incurred. I expect the minister has given consideration to the subject and that it will not be long before we see post office bus services travelling along the highways and before the same type of service which has been given to communities in the United States will be extended to us is Canada.

The advantages enjoyed as a result of sorting en route were, of course, considerable. They were advantages of some importance. For example, I might point out that communities along the line of the Ontario Northland Railway get at least a daily service of mail from Toronto. Yet I have been in places such as Collingwood, Dundalk in Grey-Bruce where letters have taken as long as five days to arrive. It would have been quicker to have gone to Toronto to pick them up. One of the endeavours of the Postmaster General should be, by the use of this new type of sorting vehicle, to provide a service equal to that enjoyed by townships along favourable rail routes.

I should like to mention one other matter, and it is one which affects politicians as much as it affects anybody though I believe it will concern all those who are interested in mailing through the use of a directory. I should like the minister to give a fairly extensive explanation of the means used to bring these postal directories up to date, because I am convinced that the one I use has never been revised. In that rural mail directory there are the names of people who have been dead for four or five years. In addition, there appear names of people who to my knowledge have left the country three or four years ago leaving their farms vacant. Every time I get a new copy of the directory I expect that at least the names of those people will have been removed but they still keep turning up. If you send letters to constituents using a rural mail delivery list you get back 25 per cent of those letters in many cases.

The situation is even worse in the urban areas where more than 25 per cent of the letters I have sent have been returned. It may be that some of the communities concerned are undertaking new zoning arrangements—arrangements which have not, to date, been completed—and this may bring in some element of confusion. However, it seems to me that in some cases as much as one third of the mail is returned stamped "address unknown". I believe the postal authorities make an effort wherever possible to deliver these letters. I am not completely in agreement—neither do I disagree—with those who say that mail from the House of Commons is considered to be second or third class material. Nevertheless I believe the volume of mail we get back is an indication of how badly the record in these directories is kept.

I am sure the minister realizes that something must be done in order to ensure publication of a much more up-to-date directory. Arrangements should be made to ensure that we get information as to changes in the areas back to the Queen's printer so that the rural directories are never more than six or eight months out of date when they are published. Some of them are a great deal more out of date than that. In many of the rural communities such inaccuracies are not excusable because the mail carriers and the postmasters or postmistresses know everybody in the area and are in a position to bring the directory up to date in a few minutes.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to unduly delay the passing of the minister's estimates, but I should like to make a few brief comments and shall do so as quickly as possible.

I should like first of all to refer to Post Office Department property. I am from an area which has not always had the privilege of having federal government services. Because I am from an area of that type I would imagine I am a little more jealous of these services than are those hon. members of the House of Commons who have always been accustomed to having them. I feel that, in a town or city, property that is normally called the Canada post office should be as well maintained as is any other institution in that city or town. In the area from which I come there exist a small number of large post offices which are kept as well inside as any post office I have seen on the mainland, but considering the outside appearance of these buildings this is not so.

I recognize, as I am sure the Postmaster General will tell me, that the responsibility for maintaining these buildings lies with the Department of Public Works. However, responsibility is one consideration and interest another. I should suggest to the hon. gentleman that while he may not have the responsibility for maintaining the physical appearance of these buildings and properties I am sure he has a real interest in this regard.

On a recent occasion I went into one of our public buildings and asked an employee there why the building was well maintained inside while the grounds outside were so poorly kept. He replied that it cost a good deal of money to maintain the grounds in a manner comparable to the grounds around other buildings in the city. While that statement is perhaps true, and whether the responsibility is that of the Department of Public Works or the Post Office Department, something should be done in this regard. As a member of the House of Commons I would like to see all federal property maintained inside and out as well as possible.

I would suggest to the minister that he instruct those officials, who visit these institutions commonly known as Canada post offices, to see that these buildings are maintained in a proper fashion. I would suggest that the grounds outside should be kept in a manner compatible with other buildings belonging to the federal government. I would suggest that those areas around these post offices which are considered to be lawns, be kept as lawns so that individuals passing the property, whether they be Canadians or visitors to this country, will realize that the property is being maintained as well as one would expect it to be. Many individuals judge performance by physical appearance, and I refer not only to Canadians but also to those who visit our country during the warmer months of the year. I offer these suggestions very sincerely to the Postmaster General.

I have a few general comments to make and then will specifically refer to the northern part of my riding.

Before Newfoundland became a part of Canada in 1949 it did not have post offices as we know them today. At that time the post office services and telegraph services were combined under one department and the individuals operating these services for us were not only paid as postmasters but also as employees of the telegraph company. This situation exists to some extent today and presents a very real problem.

The individuals to whom I refer perform a service for the Post Office Department and receive a salary in that regard. At the same time they work for the Canadian National Telegraph Company and receive a salary commensurate with the functions they carry out in that regard. I must say that some of the salaries paid are exceedingly small. I have written the Post Office Department officials in this regard and have been informed that the individuals to whom I referred were being paid on the basis of the amount of work they carried out. I then wrote a similar letter to the Canadian National Telegraph Company and was informed that the same individuals were being paid salaries by this company on the basis of the services they performed for it. This problem is batted back and forth between the Post Office Department and the telegraph company.

The minister might well suggest that instead of speaking in generalities I should present a specific case. I will mention an actual case which the minister will be able to understand. There is an assistant postmaster at Flower's Cove, Newfoundland, by the name of Calvin Whalen. He acts as the assistant postmaster as well as the messenger for the Canadian National Telegraph Company. The post office in which he is employed is responsible for distributing mail for 11 settlements and four other post offices serving a population of 2,000. This man receives, as a postal employee, a salary of $48.50 per month.

I do not know where the responsibility for this situation lies, but when I listened to the Postmaster General refer to increases in salary yesterday, I felt that I should bring this situation to his attention. I know that he will give generous attention, as he always does, to the problem I present. He is always very generous in his attention to problems I bring forward and, in saying that, I do not mean he always gives me the things I would like to have. While he does not accede to all my requests he always furnishes the reason why he cannot. In this day and age it is certainly disgraceful on the part of this federal government department to pay a salary of $48.50 per month to an individual whether or not he is working part-time for the Post Office Department and part-time for the Canadian National Telegraph Company.

My hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo as well as the hon. member for St. John's East, for whom I have a good deal of respect, mentioned a peculiar situation which exists in Newfoundland, and I refer to revenue post offices in small settlements. I realize that because of the amount of service provided by these offices as compared with that provided by the post offices in cities such as Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and Halifax, higher salaries than those being paid today are not warranted. However, I suggest to my hon. friend that there is just a little more to it than this.

Let us take a small community where mail is delivered twice a week. This means that while mail is delivered only twice a week, the postmaster or the postmistress has to be on duty for the whole week. I could give instances where the amount of money paid for the month's service by the post office would not be sufficient to pay a charwoman to clean up after the mail has been delivered, and yet today the postmaster has to provide premises and services and the heat and light required to operate the post office in that small community.

In the larger towns and cities, of course, the criticism I am making does not apply at all. I agree with hon. members who have spoken before me that it is about time the Post Office Department paid some special attention to the problems of the revenue post offices. As I said before, we must have a good deal of respect for the service which we are able to offer to the public. We can have respect for those services and demand respect from others only if the services we provide are respected by the very people who initiate them.

I would hope the time is not too far distant when those who operate the small revenue post offices, whether they be in Newfoundland, Ontario or British Columbia, will receive in remuneration a salary not in terms of the volume of mail handled but in terms of the responsibility which they hold in the community in which they live. In my own home city the employees of the postal department are people who have that dedication to duty about which the minister spoke yesterday. I do not think he is wrong when he says that the employees of the Post Office Department are people who are dedicated to their jobs. I think he is right when he says this. On many occasions I have reason to go and visit those people and to ask things of them. They have always been very courteous and very willing to do those things which come within their responsibility. I think those individuals are a credit to the federal service and I wish to pay tribute to those individuals in my area who are employees of the Post Office Department. I know that in many instances they have trials and tribulations which are not usual in the larger centres. They have accepted those with good grace and have given service beyond that which the department would expect of them.

A few months ago I had occasion to ask the Postmaster General what provision was being made for the landing of mail from the C.N.R. boats in a settlement on the north coast of Newfoundland by the name of Bartlett's Harbour. The Post Office Department has made provision for the mail to come from the post office to the jetty wharf. The mail has to be taken from the jetty wharf to the boat which, because of the local land conditions, is some distance from where the C.N.R. boat is able to anchor, about one and a half miles. I was disturbed by the fact that the man who was paid to carry the mail from the post office to the jetty warf also, in order to get the mail on the boat, had to put it on board a small motor boat and carry it another one and a half miles to get it on board the C.N.R. boat.

When I asked the minister what arrangement was made for this mail to be taken from the jetty wharf to the boat and back he said that arrangements had been made with the C.N.R., or with the authorities, which would be the C.N.R. I am asking the hon. gentleman whether he will check on that again. A few months ago when I had occasion to check on this I found out that the arrangements which the Postmaster General thought were in effect were not being carried out. I would hope that in this particular instance the Postmaster General or his officials would make sure that if arrangements have been made by the department to have this mail delivered, and if the expenses of having the mail delivered are being paid by the department, the department is receiving the service for which payment is being made.

I now come to a point that is rather a sore one with me. Yesterday, my hon. friend suggested that there was no patronage in his department. It would be a little difficult —maybe I should put it more strongly—to convince me that this is true. I do not blame the Postmaster General for this, but in the area from which I come the Postmaster General or his officials will have a lot of trouble convincing me, or the people whom I represent, that patronage is not being practised in the Post Office Department. Again I say that I am not blaming the Postmaster General for it.

I will give one instance. If the hon. gentleman would like in private the name of the place and of the person, I shall be glad to give the information to him. We have an instance of a post office inspector coming to a certain place in Newfoundland looking for somebody to take over the post office. Because they need a post office in this place one fellow says, "I will take it". He takes the post office as a revenue post office. He remodels the lower flat of his home so that space will be provided for the post office and he carries on the normal operation of the post office in that area. All at once something happens. One night after dark the post office inspector walks in and says to the postmaster, "We are taking the post office away from you". Everything belonging to the post office is taken from one place and moved to another after dark.

Here is a man who has spent a lot of money to remodel the lower flat of his house to accommodate the Post Office Department. The cost was far greater than anything he received from the Post Office Department. I cannot agree that this is the type of thing which a federal department should be doing. If this man is to be relieved of his duties, then I think he should be told in a proper way. I asked the Postmaster General a question in the house and he replied to me that the man was relieved of his duties because his appointment was only temporary. Surely, if the man's appointment was only temporary, he should have been told of this and then he would not have gone to the expense of changing over the lower floor of his house to accommodate the Post Office Department. What the reason for this is I am not going to say, Mr. Chairman; I am going to leave that to the imagination of the Postmaster General. But I do not believe this type of operation is in keeping with the dignity that we ought to attach to any federal department.

I now come to a regional area of my province, and one with which I am particularly concerned. I refer to the northern part of Newfoundland. The northern part of Newfoundland is commonly known as the Straits of Belle Isle, an area which is in one sense rather densely populated in terms of Newfoundland settlements. From Anchor Point in the south straight through the Straits of Belle Isle to Eddys Cove east we have a population of about 2,500 people. Some time ago I wrote the Postmaster General requesting that some provision be made for the building of a post office in this area and after due investigation he replied that he thought the existing space was sufficient for any duties the Post Office Department had to carry out. I am going to read a few words from his letter. He said:

> As the space available is sufficient for our needs at Flower's Cove—

However, in the preceding paragraph he said:

> The possibility of erecting a mail shed to further solve this problem is also being considered.

If the space in the existing post office is sufficient to take care of the business of the Post Office Department at the present time, then there is no need to build a shed. I do not know where the Postmaster General got his information. I have been there and I know the situation. I know he has not been there although he has visited a number of places in my riding. I appreciate his visits and I extend an invitation to him to come again. If the Postmaster General were able to visit this area, as I have on a number of occasions, I think he would agree with me that the accommodation provided at Flower's Cove to serve 11 settlements both winter and summer is not sufficient to look after the mail operations in that area.

Although I have had a letter from the Postmaster General dated November 10, 1960, stating that the facilities provided at Flower's Cove are sufficient to look after post office operations there, I suggest to him that a second look needs to be taken at the matter. I say again to him that if he were to visit this area as I have on a number of occasions he too would realize that the facilities provided at Flower's Cove are not at all in keeping with the amount of work that has to be done.

Flower's Cove is situated nearly at the northern tip of Newfoundland. It has always been the commercial centre of the area and it is now becoming the educational centre. It has always been the religious centre of the area and has always been the centre of post office operations. With the increase in population, mail service and the amount of mail that individuals receive, this post office is no longer able to look after the requirements of the people. In view of all this I suggest to the Postmaster General that he take a second look at this northern part of Newfoundland to see if he cannot do something to improve the postal service in that area so that when he comes back to parliament next year and reports on the work of the Post Office Department he will be able to say to his credit that he has done something for one of the outlying areas of Canada.

Mr. Creaghan: Mr. Chairman, in commencing my remarks I should like to make a very short reference to the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Timiskaming. The hon. member referred to a recent petition concerning a request for a new post office in his riding. All members of parliament and ministers receive a great many petitions on many subjects. The hon. member did not tell us how the petition came to Ottawa. I presume it could have come through the mail or have been delivered personally to the Postmaster General if Mr. Rice attended the Conservative convention. Regardless of who delivered the petition, I suggest that this incident proves only one thing to me, that the minister's door is open to all citizens; members of parliament, defeated candidates and the public at large.

Many congratulations have been extended to the minister, the senior officials and all other employees of the department. I have a few brief remarks to make and I do not want them to be taken as criticisms but rather as suggestions. First of all, I have received a great deal of correspondence containing criticism with respect to the loss of identity by small communities. This happens when a new rural route is established. Rural routes are generally desired by the patrons and I know they are accepted as an improved type of service. However, in almost every case when a post office is closed and a new rural route service is inaugurated communities of many years' standing lose their identity on the map. I do not know what the solution is because I understand that a rural route must start from a post office. However, it seems to me that in some cases more consideration could be given to the designating of rural routes and perhaps some formula could be worked out whereby communities that have been in existence for a number of years, communities having small boards of trade and business establishments, could continue to keep their original postal names and thus maintain their identity in the country.

Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Middlesex West made a plea for letter carrier service for the smaller towns. At the present time many suburban areas adjoining cities and larger towns where letter carrier service is in existence automatically qualify for home-to-home letter carrier service. On the other hand, in many rural areas small post offices are closed and the people receive the advantage of rural route service which is quite comparable to letter carrier service because there is door-to-door delivery.

However, there are many smaller towns across the country, particularly in the maritimes, with a population under 5,000 or between 5,000 and 8,000, which will never qualify for letter carrier service for generations to come. This is a situation that is causing a great deal of criticism of the Post Office Department. Resentment—I think that is the best word to use—is aroused by the fact that in suburban areas there is automatic letter carrier delivery service—if the adjacent city had such service—and by the replacement of revenue post offices in the country with rural routes and thus door-to-door delivery while residents in towns of 5,000 people must still rely on a semi-staff post office and the type of service they have had for years and years.

While dealing with letter carrier service there is one other point I should like to bring to the minister's attention for his considered opinion. I refer to the extension of letter carrier service. In the last two or three years there have been two or three extensions of letter carrier service in the city of Moncton, New Brunswick. In some cases it took months and months after the service was approved before it was finally started and in other cases the service went into effect very soon after it was authorized.

The reason for the delay in some areas is the requirement that 80 per cent of the patrons must have letter slots, street numbers, walkways, et cetera. I know that the service cannot become effective and efficient until there is 100 per cent co-operation with respect to these requirements. However, in some cases a few citizens refuse to co-operate and consequently the majority of the patrons who wish the service must wait indefinitely for the 80 per cent requirement to be met. I suggest to the minister that the standard might be reduced to about 65 per cent, and then after a short waiting period the service would eventually be put into operation and become 100 per cent effective.

I see my time is almost exhausted, Mr. Chairman, because of the hour, but there are two points I should like to mention. I should like the minister to take a look into the delivery of mail from the main post office at Moncton to the C.N.R. terminal. At the present time there is a large C.N.R. redevelopment taking place and I suggest this is an ideal opportunity for the construction of a tunnel for the transportation of mail from the post office to the terminal building. The procedure suggested would eliminate very serious traffic congestion on main street immediately adjacent to the post office building.

I should also like to thank the minister for the construction of two new post office buildings during the past year, and urge that more and more semi-staff offices be housed in federal buildings. This is something that small communities want, and it is something to which our citizens are entitled. If you go through the country you will find oil companies erecting new service stations, and banks new buildings, and in some cases—not too many in my riding—very poor accommodations rented and occupied as semi-staff offices.

I want ot thank the minister for his attention. Notwithstanding the criticism that he has received from some quarters, he can be assured that the majority of the members, the patrons of the post office and citizens of the country appreciate the fact that last year we received excellent postal service. We know that, as a result of the debate yesterday and today, this service will be improved next year.

Mr. Regnier: I have a few remarks to make on this item. I should like, first, to commend the Postmaster General upon the fine service he has given to the people of Canada generally. The people of St. Boniface are quite satisfied, as are the people in the town of Transcona, which is soon to be a city, and has personal delivery service instituted as well as drop mailing rate. Many sub-post offices are to be opened in the Windsor park area of St. Boniface. Two new sub-post offices were opened this year, one at Landmark and the other at Navin. I understand that plans are being made for a large post office in St. Boniface, and probably we will receive the details of that from the Minister of Public Works.

I should like to say a word about the very small post offices, many of which do not earn more than $300 or $400, out of which the operator has to pay rent. Unless the people operating such post offices have some other source of income it is very difficult for them to continue to operate these post offices. I know that at Charleswood it was impossible to get anyone to take the post office because they were required to keep the building open, and it was neither a home nor a business place.

Last year I suggested to the minister that we issue a stamp commemorating the religious aspect of Christmas rather than its commercial aspect. I was very pleased to learn that two other hon. members have joined in making this suggestion to the minister. Since Canada is a country that is about 99 per cent Christian, I do not believe there would be any objection if the Nativity scene were depicted on the 2-cent stamp. I believe this suggestion would be well received.

The last speaker touched upon a matter upon which I should like to touch, that is, the loss of identity of some post offices. In the case of St. Boniface, it is not quite loss of identity but last year the department gave people the option of addressing their mail to St. Boniface 6 or Winnipeg 6. The city of St. Boniface passed a resolution opposing this move. I believe the premier of Manitoba has written the minister in respect of this matter and I hope the minister will do what he can to restore unimpaired the name of the old city of St. Boniface. This would be greatly appreciated because St. Boniface is the oldest city in western Canada and, in addition, the name should be retained because of its historical connotation.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Peters: No, I think it would be unfair to the Postmaster General to carry the resolution now. I believe he has some answers he would like to make. I would call it five o'clock.

Mr. Churchill: Would it be agreeable to the committee to hear the minister's answers, which would be brief, and then complete the estimates of this department this week?

Mr. Peters: Five o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Will the committee give unanimous consent to proceeding?

Mr. Argue: Five o'clock, Mr. Chairman. The answer is no.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15 as previously amended.

SMALL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT REQUIRING STATEMENT OF TRUE INTEREST RATE CHARGED

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-19, an act to amend the Small Loans Act (Advertising)—Mr. Argue.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that this bill has been standing on the order paper since November 21. This procedure allows this bill to keep its position of precedence on the order paper and precludes other persons from proceeding with their bills. I am wondering if the hon. gentleman should not either proceed with the bill or allow the bill to go to the bottom of the list?

Mr. Speaker: As I understand the rules, unless the government requests the postponement of consideration of the bill it does go to the bottom of the list automatically. In this case, in the past it has been taken that the government has requested that it stand. I shall ask specifically, now, since the point has been raised.

Mr. Argue: The procedure was agreed to by the whips. I realize the bill has been standing a long time but I am not prepared to proceed with it now. I hope to proceed with it next time it comes up. I was in the agriculture committee all afternoon, and I am not prepared to proceed with the bill now.

Mr. Churchill: This is an instance which illustrates the desirability of co-operation on both sides. Just about three minutes ago the hon. member refused to go on with the estimates of the Post Office Department, and now he is in the position of asking that his bill stand. There is no consent from this side.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to move his bill?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-19, to amend the Small Loans Act (Advertising).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to move this bill although, as I have said, I am not prepared for it because I did not expect it to arise.

It is a very simple bill. On a previous occasion a bill similar to this was moved in the Senate by Senator Croll. It was referred to a committee of the Senate and was given quite a thorough airing. I think it has received a tremendous amount of support across the country.

The house leader has taken a very extraordinary course this afternoon in refusing consent—

Mr. Churchill: Similar to the course you took three minutes ago—

Mr. Argue: —with respect to an agreement that had been reached among the whips, as is the usual practice—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is not in order in debating that matter. What he says may be so, but the Chair knows nothing of these arrangements and the hon. member's bill is properly moved before the house.

Mr. Argue: As the record already shows, this is the reason the bill is being proceeded with at this time.

We have always endeavoured to co-operate in the arranging of the order of business of the house. It has been the practice, at any rate, that when the whips have agreed the agreement has been followed by the parties, but this has not happened with the Conservative party.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, these personal attacks are certainly out of order and should not be allowed. If the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is going to make personal attacks, I should have the right to reply.

Mr. Argue: I wish you would.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already cautioned the hon. member who is moving his motion that remarks of this kind are not relevant to the bill. I would ask the hon. member to confine himself please to the issues of the bill.

Mr. Argue: I can understand the sensitivity of the house leader about the breaking of an agreement—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member does not wish to follow my ruling I shall have to ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his last remark about the breaking of an agreement. No breaking of any agreement whatsoever is involved in this matter.

Mr. Argue: I do not intend to withdraw the remark, because the agreement was among the whips—

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: —following the practice of conducting the business of this house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member who has just made the remark objected to knows the rule of the house, that if an hon. member in his place gives his assurance or word respecting a matter about which he knows, his word must be accepted.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I think you misunderstand the point. I am not saying that the house leader himself broke the agreement; I am saying an agreement existed among the whips.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That matter has already been dealt with. As I indicated to the hon. member for Assiniboia, that is not relevant to the debate of this bill. It may be a consideration with which he is concerned, but the Chair knows nothing about that and has no part in any arrangement of that kind, nor has the house.

If the bill is properly moved it must be debated in accordance with our rules.

Mr. Argue: Since there has been no denying by the minister of the agreement—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member persists I really will ask him to sit down, because I do not intend to have my ruling flouted.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house is very simple and straightforward. I hope it will command not only some vocal support in the house but some positive support at this stage of second reading, when I hope a vote will be taken.

I think a bill such as this is an important measure. I think it is very important to the Canadian people that when a person goes to a lending institution to obtain a loan, or obtains money on an instalment credit plan or otherwise, the principle should be followed of setting forth in clear and specific terms the interest charges to be made.

This bill would require that in advertising there be a clear indication of the interest rate that will be charged to any prospective borrower with regard to any loan. The explanatory note of the bill reads:

> The purpose of this act is to amend the Small Loans Act, so as to require any moneylender or small loans company, in any advertising in which the amount required by way of monthly or periodic payments in order to repay a loan is indicated, to state what the cost of such loan amounts to in terms of percentum per annum.

This would mean the prospective borrower would know the actual or the simple interest that would be charged on the loan.

I have placed companion legislation on the order paper. It has been debated on previous occasions. This companion legislation would have reduced the interest rate on small loans to 1 per cent per month or approximately 12 per cent per year. It was aimed at clipping the wings of loan sharks and providing a fixed limit of interest on money put out by money lenders.

However, the Conservative party are hand in hand with the loan sharks and these money-lenders and they are quite happy that these people should keep on pilfering the public. They are quite happy that these pirates in the money lending field should be allowed to go on filching the ordinary person who has to borrow money by charging extortionate rates and reaping profits that are scandalous in a modern society.

Of course, hon. gentlemen opposite do not do what the former government did on many occasions, but not all; that is, allow a vote to be taken. Instead they use the well known device which they have used consistently, of talking out a bill, of putting one speaker on after another to discuss either the pros or cons and talk it out.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not think the conduct of the house is in any way incorporated in this bill.

Mr. Argue: The conduct of the house is not incorporated in the bill, but the conduct of hon. members regarding this bill is involved here.

Mr. Speakman: Not regarding this bill either.

Mr. Argue: I am challenging hon. members on the government side of the house to act a little differently on this bill—

Mr. Speakman: Talk on the bill.

Mr. Argue: —than they have acted on former occasions. I ask them to act differently than they did when this very bill was moved last session, or the companion bills, as I have termed them.

Surely it is in order to plead that hon. members give this bill their support in a real sense, by standing up and voting for the measure if and when they allow such a vote to take place.

Mr. Drysdale: Are we not allowed to say anything? Is it only the C.C.F. who can talk on these matters?

Mr. Argue: This is a new tack. The hon. member says, "Are we not allowed to say anything?" Hon. members on the government side speak one after another, bill after bill.

Mr. Drysdale: Nonsense. The C.C.F. is doing all the talking.

Mr. Argue: I think the record this year is one that has probably never been equalled in other years.

Mr. Drysdale: By the C.C.F.

Mr. Argue: With regard to every public bill that has come up for discussion the Tories have succeeded in talking it out, with the exception of one that had to do with divorce arrangements. When other bills have come up they have talked them out, and I think a great many of them have been pretty important bills.

Mr. Drysdale: Do they not require discussion, if they are important?

Mr. Argue: Hon. members opposite require so much discussion and they never want a decision. They are not content with an hour's, two hours', three hours' discussion, or whatever it may be.

Mr. Drysdale: Only an hour is allowed for private members.

Mr. Argue: They use the parliamentary procedure that is so well known and so well established, of killing the bill—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. MacEwan): Order. I suggest that the hon. member keep his remarks to a discussion of the bill which is before us.

Mr. Argue: That is exactly what I am doing. I hope hon. members opposite will not, in respect of this bill, follow the practice they have followed in connection with others. I am asking that a different treatment be given this bill.

Hon. members on the government side of the house stand up to introduce government legislation and plead with the house for support—

Mr. Speakman: Order.

Mr. Argue: —and they talk in favour of their bills.

Mr. Speakman: Tell us about your bill.

Mr. Argue: It is a good bill, but I know my hon. friends will not vote for it and will talk it out. That is what they have been doing all this session.

Mr. Speakman: Tell us about it.

Mr. Argue: This is why they interrupt from their seats so frequently whenever they know they are on a—

Mr. Speakman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Argue: There is no point of order.

Mr. Drysdale: You are not the Speaker. Sit down.

Mr. Speakman: The point of order I make is that the hon. member for Assiniboia is not talking about this bill at all. He is continuing to discuss the conduct of hon. members of the house with regard to bills which have been before this house from time to time, and I should like Your Honour to bring him back to the bill we are now discussing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): I would ask the hon. member, as I have asked him before, to confine his remarks to the matter under consideration. As to the field covered by the bill, I have explained it fully to the house.

Mr. Argue: I think the leader of the house made an observation. I did not hear it.

Mr. Churchill: I was laughing at your silly remarks.

Mr. Argue: Oh, I thought you were talking —with a face like that. However, my genial friend is a fine fellow, very good natured, good looking and so on; we shall not quarrel about that.

As I was saying when I was so rudely interrupted, this is a bill which, I think, has a great appeal in many quarters. I do not remember any legislation I have seen on the order paper in the name of a private member with regard to which so many letters and communications have been received, all of which have been in support of the measure.

Mr. Speakman: Where are they?

Mr. Argue: The hon. member asks: where are they? Well, they came from a great many organizations across the country. They came from a large number of credit unions.

Mr. Speakman: Oh.

Mr. Argue: They are very excellent organizations in my opinion although the hon. member for Wetaskiwin may not think so. These excellent organizations have sent communications in which they ask hon. members of this house to support this bill on second reading. I think there is a good reason for the interest which has been taken in this matter, namely that prospective borrowers when they are being canvassed by way of advertising by small loan companies should have disclosed to them the interest rates which are in fact being charged.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: My old friend. Go ahead.

Mr. Brunsden: Mention has been made of credit unions, and I would be the last to attack credit unions. I think they are excellent organizations. But does the hon. member realize that the rate charged is 1 per cent a month on an unpaid bill, and that credit union people like others sometimes find it impossible to meet their commitments? Take the case where a credit union lends a person a thousand dollars and he is charged at the rate of 1 per cent a month. Has the hon. member ever estimated the total cost charged on account of that loan?

Mr. Argue: I presume it is 1 per cent a month. I do not know why it would not be. It is very simple. The hon. member is good at arithmetic and it will not be hard for him to calculate that simple question. One per cent a month is approximately 12 per cent or so a year and the hon. member can take it from there.

Many credit unions do not charge a rate as high as 1 per cent a month which is the maximum rate that credit unions have charged, as far as I know, by way of interest. I do know, however, that credit unions are charging 6, 7, or 8 per cent. That is a great deal less than 1 per cent per month and the credit unions are, I believe, performing a wonderful service for the people of this country. I would think that one of the reasons they are interested in the bill is so as to make it abundantly clear to Canadians what interest rates the companies in the small loans field are charging and to inform the budget of the fantastic charges which are being made by certain of the companies making these small loans.

This bill is not sufficiently comprehensive to be a catch-all covering all companies making loans or providing credit in this field but I think the principle is a good one. It is clearly within federal authority to pass a measure of this kind since it affects small loans. I hope this bill will receive the approval and support of hon. members in all parties and if it becomes law, as I hope it will, then we could go on from there to provide that all institutions coming within the jurisdiction of the federal government in this regard should set forth in a clear and distinctive manner the simple interest which is being charged on the loans we are making.

I have had brought to my attention in the past instances of fantastic interest rates which are being charged on many contracts; interest rates on second mortgages running to 20 or 25 per cent a year; interest rates on instalment credit running between 15 and 30 per cent a year. I think the corporations which are providing loans on instalment credit should also set forth the simple interest they are charging. In the case of loans on second mortgages with heavy bonuses attached, even if the interest rate is written into the contract there should, in my view, be a requirement that the bonuses must be translated into terms of an interest rate and that this interest rate should be set forth.

Hon. members opposite claim to be wedded to free enterprise or competitive enterprise. They seem to think, or at least they say they think—often they do not act as if it were so—that government interference and government institutions should be kept at a minimum. If they are so much in favour of private institutions in this field, I ask them why they do not at least go as far as to say that those institutions must present to the public information as to the interest rates they are charging on loans.

This country today is infested with loan sharks and parasites, people living on the hard-earned incomes of ordinary Canadians by providing credit for such necessary things as furniture, automobiles for transportation, money to pay doctors and hospital bills and so on. They have taken advantage of the income situation of ordinary Canadians. They are a disgrace to the nation and, surely, the government should take action in this field. The most important action which the government could take would be to limit by law the interest rates charged by these companies. There is no question that the federal government has jurisdiction in this field and power to legislate in an effective way. The second line of defence—surely the very minimum that should be undertaken—is the passage of a bill such as this measure which would provide for the setting forth of interest rates in a clear fashion—a fashion provided by law—so that the public on accepting loans from small loans companies would know the real interest rate they were being charged.

Mr. Drysdale: Would the hon. member permit a question? I wonder if he could clarify that point because I must say that as the bill exists it appears this applies only to advertising. I am concerned as to whether it would be embodied in the contract, where I think it would be of more importance than in the advertising itself.

Mr. Argue: I do not know which is more important but if the literature instructed people as to the interest charged the public would be perhaps more educated than if they are expected to look through the fine print of the contract. It is very difficult for members to draft a bill which is acceptable because if it is too embracing hon. members say that it is far too sweeping and suggest that it be limited somewhat. If the bill is drafted in a limited fashion then the same hon. members suggest that it does not go far enough. In any experience with hon. members I have met frequently with the argument that a bill is too comprehensive and sweeping.

In the hope that hon. members would be favourable toward taking this minimum step in respect of the advertising and brainwashing campaign in this small loans field I have submitted this limited bill. I felt that interest rates should be stated in the advertisements regarding the loans rather than allowing the type of thing which exists today. These advertisements suggest that individuals seeking loans should come in to see John, who is a fine personable fellow who will not inquire too thoroughly into personal matters, or if the individual is extremely busy he can just telephone and a loan can be arranged in that manner. Everything is very cosy and snug with little difficulty attached. I feel this is a very important aspect of the small loans field and suggest that in the advertisements, whether they appear in newspapers, radio or television, the rate of interest in the different categories should be included. I think this would go a long way toward curbing granting of the kind of loan I think is undesirable and would bring to the attention of the general public the fact that their financial problems can very well be solved by a credit union loan or bank loan at an interest rate very much less than that charged by the small loan companies.

I realize that banks have been quite active in the small loans field charging interest rates up to 10 or 11 per cent, simple interest. I have felt that this was a contravention of the Bank Act, but in any case it is being done. I know the Royal Bank of Canada is making small loans at the normal 6 per cent bank interest rate without any additional charges or gimmicks resulting in higher interest rates.

I feel that this bill is a good bill. It has certainly attained the widespread support of many organizations across the country, and I hope it commends itself to hon. members of the House of Commons.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the presentation of this and a series of similar bills concerning the matter of interest on loans has brought to the attention of hon. members of this house the serious problem of protecting citizens from those who may be termed loan sharks who purposely charge high interest rates on loans. In finding a solution to this problem one must be careful not to offend the legitimate lending establishments so as to keep this money available to those individuals who require it.

In this particular bill the sponsor has suggested—with good reason—that loan companies should reveal the cost and interest rate in their advertising so that people know how much they are paying. I would suggest that the solution suggested by this bill is not as simple as it appears. Any member who has read the recent debates in the other place concerning the finance charges disclosure bill sponsored by Senator Croll will realize immediately that the solution is not as simple as the hon. member suggests. For example, his bill suggests that the cost and interest rates on loans should be set out. I think we are all familiar with the fact that as the amount of the loan increases, the cost and interest rate by percentage is lessened, as the basic costs remain the same. In regard to a small loan the charges seem quite high so it would be difficult to show the graduated rates and costs in advertisements. I think a more effective way of dealing with this problem is to educate individuals seeking loans to the idea of inquiring what interest rate and cost is being charged. I feel that is the time for this information to be disclosed rather than in advertisements appearing in newspapers, on radio, and on television. Unfortunately, individuals making these loans neglect to read the contracts they sign, and do not insist that interest rates be set out.

I am familiar with an incident which will perhaps illustrate what happens to individuals making purchases on an instalment plan. A young couple buying a car had fortunately made arrangements to obtain a loan from a bank at the regular interest rate. Prior to their closing the deal with the car salesman they mentioned this fact, but were informed that it was not necessary for them to take advantage of the arrangements they had made because the company from which they were buying this car could finance it at 6 per cent interest. This young couple did not read the contract carefully—sometimes I suspect that contracts of this type are not even filled in at the time of signing—and did not realize until later that the contract had been assigned to a discount company at an interest rate closer to 18 per cent than 6 per cent. Fortunately as a result of measures taken, this contract was set aside and the young couple were able to take advantage of the arrangements they had previously made with the bank.

In this case I feel that the young couple, as well as the salesman, were at fault for the difficulties in which they found themselves. They were at fault, I suggest, in not reading the contract thoroughly before signing it. I would like to strongly warn individuals who are signing contracts of this kind to read them thoroughly and not be hurried into signing blank contracts, as I suspect many individuals are doing today. Regardless of the legislation we put on the statute books, we cannot protect those people who do not read their contracts and do not understand what is being done.

Judging by the various bills that have been introduced in the house and the information put before the house within the last few years by members on all sides, I would say the time has come when the whole matter of interest, the Interest Act and the Small Loans Act, as well as this proposed legislation, should be reviewed in toto. To my mind it is rather futile to deal with a bill which is trying to bring about a stopgap solution. The time has come to urge the government to send all bills concerning interest to a committee and have them properly reviewed.

Mr. Argue: Let's send this one now.

Mr. Morton: Not by itself. We have the Bank Act, which covers all banking, and in this act there is a proviso which says that it shall be reviewed every so many years. I would suggest that similar legislation be provided in respect of interest and all types of financial transactions which are related to interest. This legislation should be reviewed every five years or 10 years, as the case may be.

It is rather difficult for a private member to develop a series of amendments to solve this problem. The matter of financing has become more and more complicated. Even the bills presented by the hon. member contradict themselves in some ways if we were to accept the amendments as they are presented to us. As he himself has admitted, the bill is not comprehensive; it deals only with a few of the people concerned with financing. If we were to pass the measure as it stands we would be putting a requirement on certain people who lend money but we would be permitting others to advertise as they please. I would suggest that in developing one omnibus act we must also take into consideration the powers of the provinces and perhaps have legislation passed with the consent and concurrence of the provinces. I make this suggestion because this bill deals with a field which, because of our constitutional powers, we cannot cover. We cannot deal with the matter of contracts. Under the constitution we can deal only with the matter of interest.

There is some controversy as to how far we can control charges by claiming they are interest. When the Small Loans Act was passed hon. members acted on the assumption that we could pass the legislation because it was ancillary to controlling interest; but there are many who feel that there are some doubts as to our constitutional powers to do so. I would therefore suggest that in the writing of an all-comprehensive act the concurrence of the provinces be secured in those fields where there may be some conflict of jurisdiction. Some provinces are already taking steps to deal with second mortgages and contracts in respect of financing, and where people have been misled and great injustices have been done. I do not think there is any doubt at this time that injustices have been done. There is no doubt the time has come when the whole matter should be reviewed not only for the protection of people concerned but in making arrangements for legitimate financing companies to serve the needs of the people at the present time.

Banking facilities as such are limited. They do not seem to go into the field of financing which covers instalment buying, and so on. For that reason there is a field for legitimate financing, but if this field is left uncontrolled a great deal of chaos will be created. I would urge that on the proper occasion the government bring forward legislation covering these matters.

An hon. Member: Now.

Mr. Morton: The hon. member says now. These bills should be referred to a committee. The legislation that I am suggesting would be more comprehensive than that which the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. Argue: Put it on the order paper, send it to committee and get on with it.

Mr. Morton: As a humble backbencher I can only make a suggestion. I hope the front bench is listening and will take more cognizance of what I have been saying than they have of what the hon. member has said in the last few years.

Mr. Argue: They are listening to you. The leader of the house is listening.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Morton: I am not going to admit, Mr. Speaker, that the government has or has not listened to me. I do not presume to believe that I am that effective in debate.

Mr. More: On a point of order, it is not so long ago since the hon. member for Assiniboia was ranting and raving.

Mr. Argue: The new prime minister. The hon. member is in the wrong seat.

Mr. Speaker: A few hon. members are in their wrong seats. A certain amount of informality is not to be deplored but I think it is going too far, if I may say so.

Mr. Morton: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was trying to wind up my few words by suggesting that I thought the government should consider this problem seriously. I sincerely suggest this to the hon. member for Assiniboia. Although he has brought forward these things and has permitted hon. members on all sides of the house to bring out the problems and to disclose many of the things that have been done, I will not say illegally, but unethically, now that the suggestions have been received and with the evidence that has been put on Hansard in the last few years, I suggest government would be warranted, perhaps not this session but next session, bringing forward a bill which would cover all of the defects that are now in the legislation on the statute books and at the same time permit legitimate financing to cover the needs of the people who require loans.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief in my comments on Bill C-19. I would not like to prevent the vote being taken on that legislation, quite the contrary.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) once again is submitting to us this year a very simple bill, which seems well drafted and which at all events fills a very urgent need. I congratulate him. It is possible that, from a purely technical or legal standpoint, it could be improved, but we are now on the second reading and what counts at this stage is the fact that the bill fills an urgent need.

At this stage, we have to discuss the principle of the bill. That is why I would not understand why some members would vote against it. I hope everyone will co-operate in order that the vote may be taken before six o'clock.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would not like to go into any detail because I spoke about that legislation last year. We are here, after all, especially to protect the ordinary people, that is those who need protection. That is the object of this bill, which provides that finance companies, from now on, will have to specify in their advertisements the interest rates of their loans per year.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton), who preceded me, made an excellent suggestion to the effect that we should completely revise our position as regards the Small Loans Act. The time has come to do so. I congratulate him for having made that suggestion, and I hope that the government will follow it up.

The hon. member for Davenport is a lawyer who is aware as I am, as well as the other lawyers in the house, that among the public, especially at present, all kinds of contracts are signed without any real knowledge of their terms; in other words the good faith of people is being abused. I think they have to be protected, and that is the object of this bill.

Now, the hon. member for Davenport says that everything should be reviewed. Well, I am going to remind him of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) often tells us when he presents a bill and we say to him: "Why not cover the whole question, Mr. Prime Minister?" He replies: "This is a first step. Let us make this first step and then we will go to the heart of the matter."

I feel that the legislation now before us, Bill C-19, fills an urgent need. It is a step in the right direction. Having been in the House of Commons for a few years, I feel that we must not miss one opportunity and that when a bill such as this one is presented, we must adopt it.

I hope the leader of the house will see to it that a vote is taken. If he feels that there are reasons why this bill should not be put to a vote, he could suggest that we have a free vote before six o'clock so that members may have a chance to express their views. I feel that everyone will be interested to know what members of parliament think of this most important legislation on small loans. In fact, people will be most disappointed if the house does not take a stand and if no protection is given immediately to the general public, which is so often taken advantage of by finance companies.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, I will vote in favour of the bill.

(Text):

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill No. C-19, an act to amend the Small Loans Act, advertising, I should like to say at the outset that I am much in favour of what is spelled out in the bill. As I understand the purpose of the bill, it is to amend the Small Loans

Act so as to require any money lender or small loans company to state in their advertising or in any other medium the amount of loan, the monthly or periodic payments by the borrower and also the cost of such loan in terms of per cent per annum or in terms of per cent for any length of time for which the money is lent.

As the situation is now, small loans companies or other lenders are not required to state a certain rate of interest that they intend to charge for loans or the terms of the agreement as far as repayments are concerned. I think it is very important that it should be stated in any advertising or in any agreement what the interest rate is going to be and what the terms of the agreement are.

I must say that I view with some apprehension the action of some small loans companies and also some moneylenders when they do not set forth in their advertising the interest rate and also their repayment plan. This, of course, does not apply to all small loans companies and money lenders. I want to make that perfectly clear. I do not want to leave the impression that all small loans companies and moneylenders are taking advantage of their clients because they have not advertised their interest rates and the terms of their repayment plans.

Small loans companies are performing a very commendable service in this country but for the protection of the public from unscrupulous lending agencies the government should take action to protect the public either through the proposed amendment to the Small Loans Act or in any other legislation which will achieve the same result, namely, to have the small loans companies and other lending institutions advertise their interest rates and also their repayment plans.

In the case of many small borrowers it may be the first time they have availed themselves of loans and some of these people may not be familiar with the set-up of these lending agencies. However, if the interest rates and repayment plans are advertised they may seek advice from friends or other persons familiar with this kind of business and obtain information before going to a lending institution and committing themselves to something they will regret later. From past experience in serving on a credit union board in my home town I know that an individual wanting to obtain a loan needs all the information he can get beforehand. He should know what he is faced with as far as the interest rate is concerned, the repayment plan and any other agreement to which he commits himself when he signs the contract for the loan.

Since advertising and interest rates come under the jurisdiction of the government I think it would be in the best interests of those people who wish to obtain loans to make it obligatory for lending institutions to state their interest rates and also their repayment plans in their advertising. I can really see no disadvantage to small loans companies and other moneylenders in their being asked to state their interest rates in their advertising. There is nothing else I should like to see done at the present time and I have nothing to add except to say that the house should give serious consideration and approval to the bill and the proposed amendments as spelled out therein.

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill No. C-19 which has been introduced today is to amend the Small Loans Act in order to require any moneylender or small loans company coming under federal jurisdiction to state in any advertising in which the amount required by way of monthly or periodic payment is indicated in order to repay the loan, what the cost of such loan amounts to in terms of per cent per annum. I may say that the principle of the bill is one that I accept wholeheartedly. I think there is wide agreement among hon. members of the house that some legislation of this type is needed.

Many hon. members feel that this is not exactly the type of legislation that is required, but I am sure that they and, indeed, those of the other place would like to see this problem examined very closely and legislation of some type brought in to effect the principle set forth in the bill. I think all hon. members will agree that today more than ever before there is a need for some control of advertising in the consumer lending field.

Over the last decade or so there has been a great growth in consumer credit. We have seen the sources of financing of many of the things we buy today change in this period. There was a time when the money required to finance the purchase of household articles, automobiles and all manner of personal chattels was obtained through the banking system. Today many retailers set up the financing required for articles of this kind or the purchaser will be referred to the finance companies, the acceptance corporations or the credit union. These are the leading types of consumer credit organizations in the modern world.

Since I have mentioned the credit union, I should like to take a moment to express to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house my own experience in the credit union work. As all hon. members know, credit is often more difficult to obtain in rural areas than it is in urban areas of Canada. The credit union has helped a great deal in this field. In my own riding, the obtaining of credit is perhaps the largest difficulty that faces the farmer or fisherman who tries to become established as an economic business unit. In many cases, the credit that he could not otherwise have obtained has been available to him through the credit union, through the co-operation of his friends and neighbours who have joined with him in this very worth-while financing operation.

It is important also to note that perhaps the most important work credit unions have done has been in the educational field. Many people, not only in rural areas but in our urban centres as well, formerly knew very little about even rudimentary financial operations, but as a result of the operations of the credit unions they have learned a lot about what money can do, what it costs and from where it comes. It has been my good fortune for over a dozen years to be a member of a credit union and for perhaps a third of that time to have served on the credit committee of that organization. During those years I was forcibly impressed with the assistance given by credit unions to people who otherwise found the ordinary channels of credit closed to them. I can certainly say to the members of the house that any support they are able to give to the credit union movement or to the work these organizations are doing, will prove of great service to the people of Canada generally.

I have often wondered whether or not there was any way in which this parliament could give encouragement to the credit union by making funds available. The source from which the capital of the credit union is drawn is not the wealthiest segment of the population. These organizations provide credit, not only for education but for other purposes, to people who would otherwise have very narrow sources of credit.

In so far as Bill No. C-19 is concerned, my first impression upon reading it was, why should any moneylender object to setting forth the interest rate which he is charging his customers? Certainly, in so far as any other type of lending is concerned, through the banks, mortgage companies or under the National Housing Act, the interest rate is made known to the borrower. There is no attempt made to hide it from him. There is an area of financing in which interest rates are hidden, as some hon. members have said here today. I think we all know that this is true. I see no reason why we should not ask corporations which lend money in the consumer field to show, in their advertising, what rate of interest they are charging. I think nothing could be fairer than that we ask the lender to tell the borrower how much he is being charged for the use of the lender's money. I wonder, however, if it might not be more prudent to have the bill referred to one of the standing committees of the house, perhaps the banking and commerce committee, for a thorough examination of the problem.

The day will come, I am sure, when we will have to invite the provincial governments to join with the federal government in enacting legislation which will cover all aspects of financing in Canada, not only consumer financing but the mortgage field as well. In view of the high interest rates charged on second mortgages throughout the country, I am sure many borrowers woud be better off if some joint effort were made by the provincial and federal governments towards the establishing of comprehensive, overall legislation to regulate financing in Canada. Certainly no such legislation could cover all aspects of the situation unless it were the result of a joint effort of the provinces and this parliament because many of the aspects of finance come under provincial jurisdiction while only a small part comes under the jurisdiction of this parliament.

I conclude by saying that, along with other hon. members who have spoken, I support the general principle of this bill. I should like to see the matter examined further by a committee of this house. I should be very surprised if many voices were raised in opposition to the general principle that the rates being charged by financing concerns should be shown in their advertising literature.

Mr. Argue: You have killed the bill by faint praise.

Mr. Speaker: Order; the hour for public and private bills having expired, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Dumas: I wonder if the leader of the house will be able to tell us what the business will be for next week?

Mr. Churchill: The business I announced last night will hold for Monday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

SMALLPOX VACCINATIONS AND DEATHS

Question No. 150—Mr. Pitman:

1. How many children were vaccinated in Canada in the years 1958, 1959, 1960?
2. How many deaths from smallpox were recorded among those children vaccinated in each of these years?
3. How many deaths from smallpox were recorded in the above years?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. The number of persons in Canada immunized in Canada against smallpox is not reported to the federal government. However an estimate is as follows: 1958, 1,208,500; 1959, 934,000; 1960, 1,332,000. Probably most of the above are children.

2 and 3. No deaths due to smallpox were reported in Canada for the above years.

PORK EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Question No. 181—Mr. Pitman:

1. What was the total export of pork during the year 1960?
2. What was the total import of pork during the year 1960?
3. What was the total export of pork during January and February 1961?
4. What was the total import of pork during January and February 1961?
5. What was the total export and import of pork during these months in 1960?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. Exports of specified forms of pork during the calendar year 1960 were as follows:—

Class No.	Description	Unit	Quantity	Value
2620	Pork, fresh, chilled and frozen	Cwt.	511,266	$ 15,568,642
2630	Bacon and sides, cured n.o.p.	Cwt.	38,460	3,059,703
2634	Hams and shoulders, cured n.o.p.	Cwt.	21,100	1,409,818
2642	Hams, canned	Lb.	3,940,561	2,891,385
2660	Pork, pickled, in barrels	Cwt.	72,251	930,784
2666	Hams, cooked, not canned	Cwt.	14,419	1,450,703

2. Imports of specified forms of pork during the calendar year 1960 were as follows:—

Class No.	Description	Unit	Quantity	Value
2253	Pork, fresh	Lb.	11,476,124	$ 3,465,073
2261	Pork, prepared or preserved, other than canned n.o.p.	Lb.	5,584,667	1,361,060

3 and 4. Not yet available.

5. Exports and imports of specified forms of pork during the months of January and February 1960 were as follows:— (see readings as above)

	Class No.	Unit	January 1960		February 1960
			Quantity	Value	Quantity	Value
Exports	2620	Cwt.	68,124	$1,488,609	27,213	$ 937,782
	2630	Cwt.	2,861	251,872	2,830	242,207
	2634	Cwt.	1,308	79,601	1,224	83,913
	2642	Lb.	431,386	356,923	360,057	272,709
	2660	Cwt.	6,492	72,500	6,172	81,000
	2666	Cwt.	1,278	123,320	1,105	108,597
Imports	2253	Lb.	3,532	1,775	223,492	61,097
	2261	Lb.	125,489	45,039	105,439	41,246

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 17, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That items numbered 453 to 478 inclusive, and items 494 and 495, as listed in the main estimates 1961-62, relating to the Department of Veterans Affairs, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

ANNOUNCEMENT OF DEVELOPMENT OF SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house of certain actions being taken by the government to develop a secondary mortgage market in Canada and thus to increase the flow of private investment into housing and contribute to greater stability in the construction industry.

Since 1954 the National Housing Act has provided for the purchase and sale of insured mortgage loans. Activity in this field, however, has never been very substantial. The result has been that in periods of reduced private investment in N.H.A. mortgages very large amounts of government funds have had to be made available to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for direct lending purposes.

The first step necessary to encourage an active market is to ensure that there is an ample supply of existing mortgages available to interested buyers. Accordingly the government has instructed C.M.H.C. to offer for sale as soon as possible, at reasonably attractive yields to investors, mortgages now held in its portfolio as a result of the extensive direct lending operations it has undertaken since this government took office in 1957. The saleable component in the C.M.H.C. portfolio exceeds $750 million, and the corporation will make available for sale whatever portion is required to lay a firm basis for an active market.

The government is confident that the development of an active secondary mortgage market will create not only a more regular but actually a larger demand for N.H.A. mortgages. The ability to dispose of mortgages in the market should encourage approved lenders to undertake more lending. However, if a secondary mortgage market is to be developed and maintained it is apparent that there will have to be greater flexibility in the determination and setting of the maximum N.H.A. rate on new mortgages and this rate will have to be kept more closely in line with other long term interest rates. Accordingly the government proposes, under section 4 of the National Housing Act, a semi-annual review of the N.H.A. interest ceiling having in mind the long term yield on government bonds prevailing at that time.

It is anticipated that the market will develop in two ways; through the sale of blocks of mortgage loans by one institution to another or among pension funds and trusts, and through sales to a new type of company, some of which are already in existence, which would enable the small investor to participate in the mortgage market through purchase of its debentures or shares.

The prices at which N.H.A. insured mortgages are to be sold will depend, of course, upon many considerations, including the interest rate at which the mortgage was written, the life of the mortgage still to run and the condition of the capital market at the time of sale. It is quite apparent that a mortgage bearing 6 per cent interest will sell at a price less than one bearing 6¾ per cent interest. Let me make it perfectly clear, however, that the sale of mortgages by C.M.H.C. does not in any way affect the interests of borrowers, which are defined when the mortgage is issued and do not change when it is sold.

There remain several technical and procedural matters to be resolved. I was sure, however, that the house would want to know of this further significant step which the government proposes for the promotion of housing and the development of the Canadian capital market.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like immediately to welcome any intention of the government to establish in our nation a well organized market for the sale of mortgages. This effort is long overdue, because we have regrettably witnessed an undue amount of racketeering which has obtained over the years in this field.

While I welcome what I hope is the basic intent of this government, I regret to note the minister's announced intention of offering to the market no less than—if I heard him correctly—$750 million worth of mortgage paper and to accept a price for this paper that, as he said, is subject to many considerations. As I view the market today, this could cause the taxpayers of Canada a loss of $75 million if we assume that the discount at which these papers are to be offered is not to be greater than 10 per cent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is outlandish.

Mr. Regier: I regret very much that the government has so much allegiance to the money lenders of Canada and so little allegiance—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is entitled to disagree with the announcement of policy, but this is not the time to debate the matter or to make statements of the kind upon which he has just embarked.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not been listening to my statement. He is putting forward a completely false interpretation of the whole matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think perhaps—

Mr. Regier: I wonder whether I might ask the minister a question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister would be in order to correct a misapprehension about his statement which has been made evident by the comment of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, the statement will speak for itself and perhaps the hon. member will read it when it appears in Hansard tomorrow.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works, in the light of his announcement earlier today, whether this parliament may expect legislation in respect of the announced intention of the government to establish a mortgage market for real estate in Canada?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I want to thank the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam for asking this question, but I do not believe legislation will be necessary. We can make the amendment to the regulations.

[Mr. Regier.]

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. What actual loss to the treasury of Canada is contemplated from the sale of N.H.A. mortgages, as announced by the minister earlier?

Mr. Walker: None, Mr. Speaker.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

ESTABLISHMENT OF LEGAL HOLIDAY IN MEMORY

Mr. Jack Wratten (Brantford) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-83, respecting Sir John A. Macdonald day.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Wratten: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is twofold; first, to establish the Monday following February 15 in each year as a legal holiday and, second and most important, to name this holiday Sir John A. Macdonald day in memory of Canada's greatest statesman, the father of confederation and our first prime minister.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

U.K. URANIUM PURCHASES

Motion No. 100—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of any contract, letter of intent, correspondence, or other documents, exchanged between Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited and The United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority since January 1, 1956, in relation to the purchasing of Canadian uranium concentrates by The United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a similar motion was presented just prior to the Easter recess, and when the item was called on March 29 the Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested to the hon. member that the motion be rephrased. In the course of his remarks, which are to be found on page 3459 of Hansard, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

It would be understood, of course, that the production of these documents would require the prior consent of the other parties to this correspondence.

During the Easter recess the views of the United Kingdom authorities were sought, and they have intimated that in their opinion negotiations between Eldorado and the United Kingdom atomic energy authority would be seriously prejudiced if the documents were tabled. In the circumstances, therefore, the motion cannot be accepted.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the explanation made by the minister, what is the wish of the mover?

Mr. Argue: Withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

CANNED PORK DONATIONS, CHARITABLE PURPOSES

Motion No. 101—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the federal government and any agency thereof, and any provincial or municipal government, or any institution or organization, since December 11, 1959, regarding the distribution for charitable purposes of canned pork luncheon meat acquired by the agricultural stabilization board.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): With the usual reservations, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Would the minister specify the reservations?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Those involving the provincial governments. We have to get their prior approval.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

MR. VANDENHEUVEL, GODERICH, ONT.

Motion No. 102—Mr. Badanai:

For a copy of any correspondence between Mr. VandenHeuvel of Goderich, Ontario, and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, or any officials of her department, since January 1, 1961.

Motion agreed to.

Motion No. 104—Mr. Badanai:

For a copy of any correspondence between Mr. VandenHeuvel of Goderich, Ontario, and the Minister of Labour, or any officials of his department, since January 1, 1961.

Motion agreed to.

STATION CHEK-TV, LOWER MAINLAND, B.C.—COMPLAINTS

Motion No. 105—Mr. Regier:

For a copy of all correspondence received by the Department of Transport complaining of the operations of CHEK-TV in the lower mainland of British Columbia, and for a copy of all replies to these complaints.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister when we may expect a statement of policy on behalf of the government in connection with the report of the royal commission on transportation.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that the royal commission report is receiving the consideration of the cabinet, and when a decision is made on the recommendations or any of them the house will immediately be made aware thereof. I realize that early consideration must be given to this most important report, but it is one that requires a great deal of intensive study, as the hon. gentleman will realize. As soon as the government is in a position to inform the house as to the course to be followed, that will be done.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the light of the statement made by the Prime Minister during the debate on the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act, that after the report of the royal commission was tabled legislation would then be introduced, when may we expect this legislation?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing inconsistent in what I have just said. The answer I have just given covers the situation very thoroughly, I think.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a further supplementary question. Has the Prime Minister seen the article by Mr. Blakely in this morning's issue of the Gazette in which he states that parliamentary reaction to the MacPherson report has been mixed and that the government views it with misgivings? Has he any comment to make thereon?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Laurier will appreciate that the question is really not a question, in that it cites an expression of opinion and asks the Prime Minister to express his opinion. This matter might more properly be introduced during debate.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether it is the intention of the government to extend the legislation which provides for a freeze on freight rates, or does the government intend to have other legislation brought in before the end of the month?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think I have made the situation quite clear. The hon. gentleman's question will be answered, of course, when the government makes known its views in respect of the transportation report.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

FAILURE OF MINISTER TO VISIT ARCTIC ISLANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the fact that Canada's claim to the islands of the Canadian archipelago were established by the raising of our flag on Ellesmere island and a proclamation by Commander Low in the early years of this century, and in view of the apparent necessity constantly to emphasize Canada's sovereignty over the islands of the Canadian archipelago, will the minister explain to the house why, in his first official visit to the northwest territories, his itinerary did not include a single point north of the mainland of Canada?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I should like to assure him that Canada's claim to the Canadian Arctic archipelago actually predates the incident to which he refers.

So far as my own visit to the territory is concerned, may I say that during the Christmas recess I visited the Yukon territory. During the Easter recess I visited the northwest territories. As soon as possible I hope to visit the eastern Arctic and the Canadian archipelago. In the meantime my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) made a thorough tour of the eastern Arctic during the Easter recess.

HARBOURS

MONTREAL—REPORTED DENIAL OF ACCESS TO DOCKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Could the minister inquire of the national harbours board authorities about the reason for prohibiting access to the Montreal harbour since last Saturday, to the residents of Montreal and especially to hundreds of anglers who were in the habit of engaging in their favourite sport there? Will the minister see to it that this ridiculous order is cancelled?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire immediately into the grievance voiced by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

(Text):

WATER RESOURCES

TRENT WATERWAY—INQUIRY AS TO MAINTENANCE OF WATER LEVELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): I should like to submit a question to the Minister of Transport. I apologize for being late in giving him notice, and perhaps the minister will take the question as notice. Has the minister received a brief from the Peterborough chamber of commerce with regard to the Trent waterway system? If so, can the minister assure the house that there will be no change in policy in regard to the present water levels, as requested in this brief?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I will take this question as notice.

PUBLIC SERVICE

JOHN FISHER—REPORTED APPOINTMENT AS SPECIAL ASSISTANT TO PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of a newspaper report appearing in Saturday's issue of the Globe and Mail announcing the appointment of the well known Canadian publicist, John Fisher, to the staff of the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister inform the house whether this news report is correct? If so, what are the duties of Mr. Fisher?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the appointment was not announced. The fact was announced that at the end of May John Fisher will commence his duties as a special assistant with particular reference to preparations that are to be made in connection with the centennial to which we are all looking forward. While I am on my feet may I say that when the formal appointment is made, the suggestion that he will receive more than $10,000 a year is completely unwarranted.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask if he will not make a statement in the house at a later date concerning the legislative program he has in mind from now until the end of the session, over and above that which is on the order paper.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): In reply to the hon. member for Laurier may I say this. Today, April 17, is the eighty-fourth sitting day of this session, and I think early consideration should be given to a motion being made in the house to extend the hours of sitting. Recently I was in the United Kingdom and, as the hon. gentleman knows, right from the beginning of the session there the hours are considerably longer than the hours this house sits. I would think we might be in a position later this week to make a motion whereby, if the house would agree, an extension of the hours might take place, at which time we should place before the house in general the legislative program which must be faced in the days ahead.

The session began in November. I had hoped, and it had been the expectation of many hon. members, that they would be able to go home and spend the summer months of July and August with their families, because most of them who are married find themselves separated from their families at vacation time.

An hon. Member: A lot of them are there now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That may also make it necessary for consideration to be given, in the event that the legislative program would carry us beyond the first of July, to the suggestion that if the program should not be completed by that time we might adjourn for six weeks and then return to complete the work of this session, because a lot remains to be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure that in a spirit of co-operation what I have suggested is going to appeal to hon. members in all parts of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: In the light of what the Prime Minister has said, does he not think that before placing a motion on the order paper, or at least before the motion comes up for discussion, he should indicate to the house what the legislative program is to be from now until the end of the session?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have already said that when later this week a decision is reached by the house, at that time, before the decision is made, I should think it would be proper that the house be taken into the confidence of the government and made aware of the very large program which still remains to be dealt with before this session can be completed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE CENSUS

INQUIRY AS TO RECRUITMENT OF WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the present unemployment situation can the parliamentary secretary assure the house that in the appointment of census takers, needy, capable persons will be given first consideration regardless of party affiliation?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is no different from a question which was asked only a few days ago, when I pointed out that the appointment of census enumerators rests with the census commissioners. That policy has not changed.

Mr. Herridge: I might remind the parliamentary secretary that the previous question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a supplementary question to ask, well and good, but he has not the floor if he wishes to make a statement.

Mr. Herridge: Does not the parliamentary secretary appreciate the fact that he failed to appreciate the difference between the census commissioners and census enumerators?

Mr. Morris: I think it unlikely that I would misunderstand the difference between a census commissioner and a census enumerator.

SASKATCHEWAN

RESERVATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING MINING CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he is able to report on the latest developments in regard to the situation created by the withholding of the royal assent by the lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As the house knows, before the Governor General can give consideration to such reservation it is necessary for the lieutenant governor to place before His Excellency not only the legislation which has been reserved but the reasons for the reservation. A few days ago I was asked a question in this connection and at that time, as the hon. member knows, I stated that as yet no report had been received from Mr. Bastedo, the lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan.

However, on April 15 the lieutenant governor sent a letter to the Governor General and a copy thereof to the Secretary of State to which was attached the documents to which I have already made reference, with the exception of one to which reference is made in the report, namely the recommendations of a royal commission known as the grain commission which was set up apparently pursuant to a request by the government of Saskatchewan.

As I say, the material has just now come into the hands of the government, and an immediate and early examination will be made. Any determination in connection therewith will, of course, be transmitted first to the lieutenant governor and then to the premier of the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): A supplementary question. I wonder if the Prime Minister could say whether or not the law firm with which Mr. Bastedo is connected has a direct pecuniary interest in the outcome of this legislation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I had occasion the other day to remind the hon. member that it is not in order in this house to make statements which reflect in any way, either directly or by inference, on the conduct of Her Majesty's representatives, and I trust he will not offend in that respect.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order, is it not in order to ask? I made no accusation. I asked whether or not the law firm with which the lieutenant governor is connected has a direct pecuniary interest—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I heard the hon. member's question and it seemed to me, in my best judgment, that it was a question which cast a reflection on the conduct of the lieutenant governor.

Mr. Argue: Only if he has a connection.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—INQUIRY AS TO SAFETY OF CANADIAN CITIZENS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the hon. gentleman any report to make on the safety of Canadians in Cuba, where some form of civil war has now broken out?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Such reports as are available to the Department of External Affairs indicate that military operations have taken place today in several parts of Cuba. The situation is confused, and it is too early for me to make any useful comments at this time. We have, of course, been in touch with the Canadian embassy in Havana, and are keeping a close watch on events. Plans have been worked out to be put into effect at short notice to assist Canadian citizens in Cuba should that be necessary.

COMBINES

GENERAL MOTORS—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION INTO BUS MANUFACTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of recent proceedings taken by the United States attorney general against General Motors in respect of the alleged monopoly it has in the manufacture of buses, and since buses produced by this same company, in a large part in the United States, may dominate our market for buses, has the minister or his officials of the combines investigation branch considered an investigation in Canada into this particular phase of General Motors operations here?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but if the hon. member has reason to believe that there is an improper monopoly in the manufacture of diesel buses in Canada I should be very grateful if he would bring it to the attention of the proper officials.

Mr. Fisher: I would like to ask a supplementary question. The question did not refer to diesel motors but to buses, and I would ask the minister if he does not remember that we had a bus company close in Fort William because of the competition from General Motors buses.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REGINA—INQUIRY AS TO R.C.M.P. INTERVENTION IN LAUNDRY STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. On March 29 I asked the Associate Minister of National Defence whether the army would respect the picket line established at the Rainbow Laundry and Dry Cleaners in Regina. In view of the discontinuance of army deliveries through the picket line as a result of the associate minister's statement in the house, may I now ask the Minister of Justice whether the R.C.M.P. will, in like manner, respect the picket line.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): While I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question, I was not able to obtain information, in the time at my disposal, as to whether or not the R.C.M. police do in fact make any calls or have any occasion to go in and out of this laundry. I have to make these inquiries first, and will give the hon. member an answer as soon as I can.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-72 is the last of the measures arising out of the supplementary budget of December 20 last awaiting enactment. It is in precisely the same form as the resolution which was reported back to the house by the committee of ways and means on March 2. That resolution, quite apart from the budget debate in December and January last, was debated in the committee of ways and means on February 1, 2, 3, 15 and 27, and on March 2. I trust, therefore, that the ground has been quite fully covered and it will not be necessary to traverse the same ground at length.

In the present debate we are concerned with the principle of the bill. May I define what I conceive to be the principle of the bill. The concept of "class or kind" goods in the Customs Tariff dates, in its present form, from the Fielding budget of 1907. The concept really made its first appearance in the Customs Tariff in 1873. The concept contemplates that there shall be different customs duty rates with respect to goods, depending upon whether those goods are of a class or kind made in Canada. If they are not of a class or kind made in Canada the Customs Tariff rate is lower. If they are of a class or kind made in Canada the customs duties are accordingly higher.

Not only does the rate of customs duty differ depending upon the determination of this question, but the application of dumping duty as well. We have had provision for dumping duties in our legislation since 1904, and it is open to the government to apply dumping duties only in the case of goods of a class or kind of goods made in Canada. The purpose of such legislation, undoubtedly and unblushingly, is protective; it certainly was in 1907 and has been ever since. It is intended to provide encouragement for the manufacture and production of goods in Canada. The expression appears in numerous items of the Customs Tariff, indeed 70 or more.

The interpretation and application of these terms in the Customs Tariff presented really no problem until the last decade, but in this last decade the course of decisions has been to erode the accepted meaning of these words and reduce the intended benefit to Canadian producers. Indeed, the course of decision in this decade has created some quite extraordinary results; one which engaged the attention of the committee of ways and means was the shovel case. This was the case of the import of a power shovel having a 2½-yard capacity. It was competitive with a 2-yard shovel which was made in Canada but, because the 2½-yard size had never been made in Canada, it was held that such machines were of a class or kind not made in Canada, regardless of the fact that the facilities existed in Canada for the manufacture of a 2½-yard shovel.

We are living in the era of GATT, and have for the past 14 years. We support GATT, and under GATT trade advantages in markets of different countries are a matter of bargaining and agreement. For reductions in the Canadian tariff in favour of imports from other countries we bargain, and often bargain hard, for a price: a price in the form of similar advantages extended to Canadian exporters in the markets of the foreign country or countries concerned. When, in the course of bargaining, common ground is reached in regard to the price to be paid, that is to say in terms of mutual exchanges of tariff advantages, then we enter into an agreement with such country or countries. We do not give advantages of this kind away for nothing in this era of GATT.

Under GATT rates of customs duties are bound. Never has the definition of "class or kind" been bound under any GATT agreement. Erosion of the meaning of the expression has, therefore, given advantage to other countries exporting to Canadian markets, advantages for which they never bargained and for which they never paid Canada a price in the form of concessions to Canadian exporters, an advantage which those countries never expected. In brief, it was simply a windfall to them.

We cannot afford to give windfalls for nothing to other countries in terms of advantages in Canadian markets in this way. The erosion which has continued has cost and is costing jobs to many Canadians. This legislation aims at restoring those jobs to Canadians.

The issue presented by this measure is whether we wish to see unemployment in Canadian industries which, as a result of the erosion of the past decade, have lost the advantages they previously enjoyed. I say that the principle of this bill then relates to the clarification of a definition with a view to restoring the value of those provisions in the Customs Tariff to the position that they were recognized to have prior to the decade of erosion.

What, then, is the effect of the bill, Mr. Speaker? The bill—

Mr. McIlraith: Will the minister permit a question at this time, before he leaves the subject of erosion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be coming back to that later, and I think I can satisfy the inquiry of the hon. member at that time.

The effect of the bill is to divide certain imported goods into two classes. First there are shelf goods and, second, there are custom made goods according to specifications. As to the shelf goods which, of course, will be in the majority, the measure will provide that goods will be deemed to be of a class or kind made in Canada if goods of approximately the same class or kind are made or produced in Canada. There is a condition that they shall not be so deemed to be of a class or kind made in Canada unless at least 10 per cent of the normal Canadian consumption thereof is made or produced in Canada. In this respect the condition which now is to be found in order in council No. 1618 of July 2, 1936, will be made in effect a matter of statutory enactment instead of executive decree, which it has been ever since 1936.

As to the second class of goods, namely those custom made according to specifications, goods of this nature will be deemed of a class or kind made in Canada if adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production of such goods within a reasonable period of time.

There is a condition applicable to both the shelf goods and those custom made according to specifications. The goods may be deemed to be of a class or kind not made or produced in Canada where similar goods made or produced in Canada are not offered for sale to the ordinary agencies for wholesale or retail distribution, or are not offered to all purchasers on equal terms under like conditions having regard to the custom and usage of trade.

Sir, the reasons for separating goods into two classes are obvious. The provisions for determining whether goods are to be deemed to be of a class or kind made in Canada are sound and reasonable. They will provide what, in the light of the erosion of the past decade, as a result of decisions, has been badly needed; namely, first a clear definition and, second, a restoration of the law as it was previously construed and applied before this decade of erosion. With the enactment of this measure, Mr. Speaker, we shall have for the first time a positive definition where previously there has been merely a negative limitation.

My next observation concerns the method of determination. Under the present law the decisions of the deputy minister of national revenue are subject to an appeal which lies to the tariff board; that is to say, appeals from his decision with respect to whether goods are or are not of a class or kind made in Canada. The tariff board conducts hearings of such cases, in the legal expression, de novo. The appeals are not argued from the record in the previous stage of proceedings. A further appeal lies from the decision of the tariff board to the Exchequer Court of Canada on a question of law; similarly, an appeal lies from the decision of the Exchequer Court of Canada to the Supreme Court of Canada on a question of law. Both in the Exchequer Court and in the Supreme Court of Canada, of course, the appeal is argued from the record; there is no hearing de novo.

This bill makes no reference whatever to the subject of appeal. It does not abolish the right of appeal on findings on the question whether goods are of a class or kind made in Canada, but it does provide quite simply that as to three elements in such cases the decision of the Minister of National Revenue shall be final.

These three elements are, first, whether the goods in question are shelf goods or are custom made according to specifications; second, if they are shelf goods, what is the normal consumption thereof in Canada; third, as to the other class of goods, namely those goods made according to specifications, whether adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production thereof within a reasonable period of time. A full right of appeal continues with respect to leading elements such as the following: first, whether or not the imported shelf goods are of approximately the same class or kind as goods made in Canada; second, the determination of the amount of Canadian production; third whether or not the number of articles manufactured in Canada does in fact constitute a minimum of 10 per cent of normal Canadian consumption.

Under the provisions of the bill in the matters I have just now mentioned the house will recognize the advantage that the bill offers in that it will simplify procedure and expedite decision, and this will react to the advantage of business, including Canadian importers. Under the present law, with its uncertainties, there have been some very long delays, drawn out procedures, and great uncertainties which have been harmful to business operations.

Sir, as to some of the criticisms that have been heard in this regard, I should like to say at once that in my respectful submission there has been a great deal of exaggeration and misunderstanding. We are not taking away the right of appeal. The bill will provide that with respect to three matters the decision of the minister in such appeal shall be taken to be final. In these three elements the minister is in the best position to make these determinations. They are largely on statistical questions, and moreover depend very largely on confidential information obtained from those engaged in business and trade, information that they are often quite loath to put forward in a public hearing before the tariff board because that information is frequently of advantage to their competitors.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have to say that there has been a great deal of exaggeration in the views that have been expressed on this subject. Perhaps what has been said today will help to clarify the terms of the bill in this regard.

It has been suggested, Mr. Speaker, that there is something arbitrary about the kind of provisions that are contained in this measure. Well, one does not hear ringing cries that there has been arbitrary legislation enacted in similar respects by the mother of parliaments at Westminster. Let me draw attention to the kind of legislation that the mother of parliaments has passed in regard to this subject, and the method of determination that is provided under the United Kingdom legislation. I shall be reading certain extracts from a document issued by the board of trade and the commissioners of customs and excise of the United Kingdom. It is notice No. 339 for the year 1960. This is the way in which the law is described in this official publication of the government of the United Kingdom. The first extract relates to the provisions of the law itself, and reads as follows:

1. Law. (a) Liability to duty.—Under the import duties act, 1958, protective duties are normally chargeable on imported machinery in order to protect United Kingdom machinery manufacturers.

(b) Duty free admission.—Section 6 of the 1958 act and paragraph 1(b) of the fourth schedule thereto . . . provide that the treasury may, on the recommendation of the board of trade, direct that payment shall not be required of any duty chargeable under section 1 of the 1958 act on particular importations of machinery, (other than aircraft and parts or equipment for incorporation in or use on aircraft) if similar articles are not for the time being procurable in the United Kingdom. If duty has been paid on importation, the duty may be repaid under a treasury direction.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, that the law is quite comparable with ours and the provision that is made for customs duty on importation, whether it is at the low rate or at the higher rate, is a matter for decision by the treasury on the recommendation of the board of trade. I have not heard anybody complaining about there not being an effective right of appeal there when both the treasury and the board of trade are represented by their ministers in the House of Commons and can be called to account at any time.

I turn to page 4 of this interesting publication under the heading "The 'Similarity' Condition".

(a) General.—The similarity of machines for the purposes of compliance with the statutory condition referred to in paragraph 1(b) is judged primarily in relation to the product or effect and the efficiency with which it is produced. The appearance, size, shape, method of producing the given product or effect and the cost of machines are not regarded as relevant. To justify a recommendation for remission of the protective duty, it must be shown that the foreign machine has a definite and marked superiority in performance over any comparable machine procurable in the United Kingdom. Where such superiority cannot be shown to exist in general performance, application for remission of duty may be made on the ground that the machine has a definite and marked superiority in performance for the particular use for which the user requires it, provided that it is to be employed to a very substantial extent on the work for which it has such superiority.

On the same page paragraph 7 deals with application on the grounds of long United Kingdom delivery, and reads as follows:

Applications for remission of duty on grounds of long United Kingdom delivery will be entertained only if the user of the machine submits evidence to show that when he placed the order for the foreign machine:

(a) no manufacturer in the United Kingdom could deliver a similar machine within two years; and

(b) where delivery by United Kingdom manufacturers was

(i) between 24 and 30 months, the foreign delivery was within 15 months; or

(ii) more than 30 months, the foreign delivery was within one half of the United Kingdom delivery period.

It will be observed that the conditions for qualifying for the application of the lower rate of duty are much more rigid and difficult of compliance under the United Kingdom legislation than they are under the Canadian legislation, and the decisions in these matters rest with the treasury on the recommendation of the board of trade. So much for the allegations that this legislation is of an arbitrary nature.

I was asked at an earlier stage of the session to give some information concerning appeals pending before the tariff board. The total number of appeal cases registered but not heard before the tariff board on the date on which this information was obtained and given to the house, March 8, 1961, was 69, and of these 69 cases I was informed that 20 might have some relationship to the question of class or kind. There were 17 of these 20 cases that were, I am informed, considered as straight class or kind cases, and there were three others in which the tariff classification, directly or indirectly, possibly might involve the question of whether the goods were of a class or kind made in Canada.

As to those 20 cases, 17 plus 3, I have this further breakdown. In 18 cases the goods were clearly shelf goods within the definition in the bill now before us. One involved goods that under the bill would clearly be custom made according to specifications, and the other case was one in which, I am told, the goods were probably of a kind that would be ruled to be custom made according to specifications under the present bill.

Then there is a further breakdown with respect to those 20 cases pending at March 8. It is a breakdown on the basis of whether or not they would be affected by the proposed amendments to the Customs Tariff in the present bill. I am advised that of the 20 it is quite clear that 18 would not be affected by the bill. One is clearly a case where the decision of the minister, if made under the bill, would be final with respect to the point under appeal, and with respect to the other one of the 20 cases the status was doubtful.

Let me offer a further observation concerning the volume of these appeals. In the calendar year 1960 there were 39 decisions by the tariff board on appeals. Of those 39, 28 related to decisions with respect to class or kind. Of these, only two involved goods that would be interpreted under the present bill as custom made according to specifications. The explanation for the unusually large number of class or kind decisions in 1960 is that from May, 1954 until the Supreme Court of Canada gave its decision in the power shovels case on October 7, 1958 the board virtually ceased hearing appeals involving class or kind questions pending the judgment of the higher courts. It was hoped that the courts or parliament would provide proper criteria, a proper interpretation that would assist the tariff board in future cases of the same kind. But, Mr. Speaker, no assistance was received in this regard from the decisions of the courts and it is needful, therefore, that parliament now supply what is lacking, and what is so obviously lacking, in the way of definition and restoration.

In almost all "class or kind" appeals the issue for decision has involved the question of whether the imported goods were or were not of the same class or kind as the Canadian goods; that is to say, the issue of what were the appropriate limits of the expression "class or kind". There have been very few cases where, having determined the appropriate limit of the term "class or kind", the issue turned on whether the Canadian production constituted more or less than 10 per cent of consumption. One such case, and the only one I have been able to discover in which the issue comes out clearly in the published decision, relates to certain truck cranes, decision No. A-471, dated June 22, 1960.

In this particular case the board accepted, with some publicly expressed misgivings, and used confidential information submitted to it by the department. The board also obtained certain confidential information itself. The board found its own efforts to compile data on consumption difficult, time consuming and not satisfactory. I have the following quotation, Mr. Speaker, from the board's report in this case, and it is informative. I quote:

> At the hearing, counsel for the department requested the board to receive certain evidence in confidence under the terms of subsection 10 of section 5 of the Tariff Board Act. Counsel for the appellant objected to this procedure. After hearing argument from all counsel and assuring itself that the information was indeed "in its nature confidential", the board received the evidence in confidence.
> While the board is empowered to receive information that is in its nature confidential it is very much aware of the dangers and difficulties that may be associated with the practice of receiving evidence in confidence.
> Accordingly, it would hope that in the future counsel would reach an agreement, as they have been able to do in the past, that would enable the board to come to a decision on the basis of evidence that is not confidential.

Mr. Benidickson: Just for the information of hon. members, would the minister indicate either the names of the parties concerned or the nature of the product over which the dispute took place?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I indicated that the nature of the product was truck cranes.

It will be quite clearly apprehended by the house, Mr. Speaker, from that quotation that the board has itself recognized the difficulties that confronted it in making a determination based upon confidential information. This is the type of difficulty that the present bill is intended to overcome. It will obviously be of assistance to the board in that regard.

The real cause of this difficulty that is mentioned, apart from the problem of obtaining information that is available only in confidence, is the non-existence of appropriate official statistics. Reference has been made to this subject earlier, Mr. Speaker. I simply comment briefly on it now by saying that in most cases the dominion bureau of statistics returns do not give a breakdown in sufficient detail to make available the information required for the establishment of the "normal Canadian consumption". The latter figure is obtained by adding imports to the Canadian production and reducing this total by the exports.

I was asked a question concerning this matter of erosion. Here I should like to give the house the benefit of some study that has been devoted to that question. I reaffirm that the words "class or kind", as I have said in earlier stages, were intended to be given a reasonably broad interpretation; that in fact they were consistently interpreted broadly until 1950; that during the period since 1950 former departmental interpretations have been narrowed considerably as a result of certain tariff board declarations, and that the effect has been to erode to some extent the protection afforded Canadian producers.

Reference has been made to certain tariff board cases. In his speech on February 20, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River quoted extensively from two tariff board declarations relating to power shovels. These were dated April 18, 1953 and May 20, 1954 respectively. He drew from them the comforting conclusion that there has been no erosion or narrowing of the class or kind concept.

I regret that I must profoundly disagree with the hon. member. I say instead that these two cases really demonstrate that the class or kind concept had not been narrowed to the same extent in 1953 or 1954 as it has more recently. This may be illustrated by reference to the 1960 case, appeal No. 450, to which he referred later in his speech.

In this connection it is of interest to compare the issues which were at stake in 1953 and 1954 with those which were at stake in 1960. The issue presented to the tariff board for decision in 1953 was whether all power shovels, without regard to size, should be treated as a single class or kind, or whether it was proper for the Department of National Revenue to apply the range principle and to rule separately in respect of a certain range of sizes of shovels. The effect of the 1953 declaration was to endorse the "range" principle, under which the department had ruled that a certain range of shovels, as measured by dipper capacity, were made in Canada and that sizes outside this range were "not made". This decision was without prejudice to what constituted the proper range of sizes.

The second power shovel case, that is appeal No. 306, on which the tariff board declaration is dated May 20, 1954, had the effect of confining the limits of the range of sizes deemed to be of a class or kind made in Canada. In this case the tariff board decided that it was not legitimate to include in the range of sizes deemed to be "made in Canada" any competitive products of sizes larger or smaller than the largest or smallest sizes actually made in Canada. Thus this 1954 decision maintained the range principle, but at the same time cast doubt upon a number of earlier departmental rulings declaring broad classes of goods to be made in Canada without reference to the question of whether the particular sizes under review were or were not within the range of sizes being made in Canada.

I shall refer later to some of these rulings, and to early tariff board cases confirming them. The point which I make now is that the declaration in appeal No. 306 upheld the "range" principle, but that this same principle was undermined by some later decisions. One such case is the only recent case which was referred to by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in his speech. It is the declaration dated September 12, 1960 on appeal No. 450. This relates to a tilting pan filter which had been imported on November 15, 1956. Here the range principle was not even mentioned in the decision, and the case turned on whether the differences which existed between the particular imported filter under consideration and competing Canadian filters were or were not sufficient to set the imported filter apart as being of a different class or kind from those made in Canada.

The board, in effect, decided that this particular filter did constitute a different class or kind. The inference is that under the existing language of the Customs Tariff imported goods must be virtually identical with the competing Canadian goods or the special rate of duty applicable to "goods of a class or kind not made in Canada" will be applied.

Opinions may differ as to whether the board was right or wrong in this 1960 decision having regard to the language of the statute under which it had to make its decision. However, I submit that this decision to which the hon. member referred, as well as a number of other decisions to which I referred on a previous occasion, represent a serious narrowing of the class or kind concept from that which was intended and which was still being applied at the time that present GATT commitments were entered into in 1947.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate at one stage remarked that he would wish to be satisfied by concrete illustrations of what the erosion actually amounted to. I do not know whether it is too much to hope for, but I shall endeavour and continue to endeavour to satisfy him. I have reviewed the tariff board declarations relating to the class or kind cases which are on file in the Department of Finance. This review has confirmed that a substantial amount of erosion has occurred to date, and that there exists a serious danger of still further erosion in the future if remedial action is not taken such as that which is proposed in the bill under debate.

Three class or kind appeals which were heard by the board in the years 1933 and 1934 illustrate the original concept. In each instance the tariff board upheld a departmental ruling applying a broad construction to the words "class or kind". I shall deal with these three cases in turn.

The first is appeal No. 4, concerning dolls, the declaration being dated August 18, 1933. This was the first appeal case on which the tariff board made a declaration, the first three appeals having been withdrawn. The question before the board was whether celluloid dolls which admittedly were not made in Canada were of the same "class or kind" as composition dolls, which latter were made in Canada. The tariff board sustained the department's ruling that the two kinds of dolls should be considered together and that accordingly both celluloid and composition dolls were of a class or kind made in Canada.

The second of these appeals is No. 7 concerning pocket lighters, the declaration being dated July 13, 1933. The question in this case was whether an imported pocket lighter of cheap construction was of a class or kind made in Canada. The circumstances were that no cheap lighters were made in Canada, but that more expensive and better fabricated Ronson lighters were made in Canada. The board upheld the department's ruling that both lighters were of the same class or kind.

The third of these appeals is No. 34 concerning rubber combs, and the declaration is dated March 1, 1934. The tariff board in this case dismissed an appeal from a ruling of the Department of National Revenue that hard rubber combs were of a class or kind made in Canada. The circumstances were that celluloid combs were made in Canada; hard rubber combs were not. The department ruled that both types were of the same class or kind, and the tariff board upheld that decision.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what the election of 1935 was about.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): During the war years and the first five years following the war the tariff board was largely inactive and very few appeals were taken to it on any subject. From 1939 to 1949 inclusive there does not appear to have been a case which is significant for our present purpose. However, for the sake of completeness I should mention that in a declaration dated December 30, 1941, in appeal No. 131, the board upheld a departmental ruling that red kidney beans were of a class or kind produced in Canada.

The next case which is relevant and the case which to my mind represents the real beginning of the process of erosion to which I have referred, is appeal No. 206, on which the tariff board declaration is dated March 16, 1950. This was an appeal from a departmental ruling that Mossberg .22 calibre rifles, models 151M and 152 were of a class or kind made in Canada, and hence not eligible for admission under tariff item 441e. The rifles in question were of the auto-loading type. Another type of .22 repeating rifle was being made in Canada by the H. W. Cooey Machine and Arms Company Ltd. of Cobourg. The question at issue was whether or not the imported auto-loading rifles in question should be considered as of the same class or kind as the Canadian made repeating rifles of the same calibre. The board allowed the appeal from the decision of the department, thus narrowing the broad construction which the department had previously given to the phrase "class or kind". The relevant portion of the board's decision reads as follows:

> Dictionary definitions of the word "class" indicate that it is used both in very broad and for very narrow designations, but in the context in which it is used in tariff item 441e it appears to be more or less synonymous with "kind". Consequently, in interpreting this item the board has taken cognizance of the more precise designation "kind". Auto-loading rifles are of a kind not made in Canada. Accordingly the appeal is allowed.

The success of the appellants in this appeal No. 206 was, as might have been expected, followed by a good many other appeals by importers or their foreign suppliers seeking to narrow the interpretation of the expression "class or kind". As I have already said, they have met with a considerable degree of success during the years from 1950 to 1960 inclusive. I shall not attempt to review all these cases in detail, and I do not wish to suggest that all of them involved uninterrupted progress in the process of erosion. As one might expect, the process was not uniform and continuous. The trend, however, is unmistakable. I suggest that any hon. members who wish to pursue the matter further and to evaluate for themselves both the general trend and the cross currents might consult the declarations of the tariff board in the following cases:

Appeal No. 246—fork lift trucks—November 5, 1951.
Appeal No. 246—fork lift trucks (supplementary)—May 29, 1952.
Appeal No. 272—power cranes and shovels—March 18, 1953.
Appeal No. 286—fork lift trucks—May 20, 1953.
Appeal No. 285—Snyder car wheel boring machine—June 15, 1953.
Appeal No. 292—fire brick—November 4, 1953.
Appeal No. 306—power shovels—May 20, 1954.
Appeal No. 317—42 ft. boring mill—July 5, 1954.
Appeal No. 501—newsprint rewinding machine—April 30, 1959.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister repeat the number of that appeal?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The last one?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is appeal No. 501—newsprint rewinding machine, April 30, 1959; appeal No. 455—newsprint machine—April 30, 1959.

Mr. Benidickson: Was not the law changed before that appeal was disposed of?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I beg the hon. member's pardon?

Mr. Benidickson: Did not the Customs Tariff amendments of 1959 alter the law before that appeal was disposed of.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These decisions, if the hon. member cares to refer to them, will be found to be illustrations of what I have been saying with regard to this unmistakable trend of erosion.

Appeal No. 365—transit concrete mixers—October 26, 1959.

Appeals Nos. 307, 413, 429, 431 and others—June 22, 1960.

Appeal No. 383—ball bearings—June 28, 1960.

Appeal No. 450—Eimco pan filter—September 12, 1960.

Appeal No. 517—rolling mill machinery—November 25, 1960.

I have already given the committee details regarding a number of these cases and I shall not repeat what I said earlier. However, in closing I should like to add a word about the most recent declaration in the list, which is dated November 25, 1960. This case will, I think, illustrate as well as any the trend to which I have referred.

This was not an appeal by an importer from a decision of the Department of National Revenue. Rather it was a request by the deputy minister of national revenue for the board's opinion regarding the "class or kind" status of two pieces of rolling mill machinery. One of these was a combination bloom and plate mill and the other was a vertical edger. Traditionally the department had ruled all such rolling mill machinery to be "made in Canada". However, it was recognized that this traditional practice was open to challenge in the light of a number of recent tariff board decisions which had tended to narrow the interpretation of "class or kind". Accordingly, the deputy minister of national revenue referred the case to the tariff board with the following comment:

"Machinery for rolling iron or steel has consistently been ruled to be dutiable under tariff item 427, as of a class or kind made in Canada. The importer claims entry of the above equipment under tariff item 427a, as machinery of a class or kind not made in Canada."

In its declaration which, as I have said, is dated November 25, 1960, the tariff board noted that both bloom mills and plate mills are made in Canada, and that at least one combination mill, although of smaller size, had been made in Canada. However, it found that the particular Blaw-Knox combination mill in question differed in a number of respects from any rolling mill which had been made in Canada as of that date. While there was no suggestion that the mill in question could not be built in Canada, the fact was that no identical or virtually identical mill had been made here. Accordingly, the imported mill in question was declared to be of a class or kind not made in Canada. This declaration, which, as I have said, is the most recent declaration available on a "class or kind" case, provides a further example of the erosion to which I have referred. Its effect was to admit under tariff item 427a at a reduced rate of duty a rolling mill which under the traditional departmental practice followed prior to the decade of erosion would have been classified under tariff item 427 as part of the broad category "machinery for rolling iron or steel" and probably would have been so considered even far into the period of that decade before the process of erosion had run the full course it has now done.

I shall not detain the house further in moving the second reading of this bill. This is a bill which in my respectful submission is urgently needed to bring some assistance to the tariff board in the nightmare in which it has found itself as a result of the course of decisions, and to supply what parliament ought in any circumstances to supply in connection with legislation of this kind, namely a clear definition.

In addition to supplying that clear definition—a positive definition for the first time—this bill will also bring about one other necessary result, and that is the restoration of the legislation to the effect that it was always understood to have prior to what I have called the decade of erosion. Here is a situation in which Canadian workmen have been deprived over the years, and particularly in these latter years, of the benefit of legislation which parliament certainly intended for them and which they enjoyed from the time that this legislation first became effective in 1907 in Mr. Fielding's tariff of that year right down to these recent years. Surely it is their right to have the benefit of that legislation restored to them, particularly when the jobs of Canadians are at stake in the issue.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): In making some further comments in connection with this tariff legislation, now that we have it before us in the form of Bill No. C-72, I wish to point out that when the minister introduced the bill he just said we have it in precisely the same language as in the resolution. I am afraid that this is what is going to be disappointing to the opposition.

While, as the hon. gentleman said, we had a considerable debate in the committee of ways and means at the resolution stage we are faced now with the exact wording which was so objectionable not only to the opposition but to many elements of the country at large. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) said he hoped there would not be a great deal of repetition at this stage of the debate. Unfortunately, he has again followed the procedure which was so noticeable during the resolution stage when he simply made assertions rather than gave facts or sought to prove arguments which were challenged during the course of that debate.

The minister even brings up the classical case of the dipper shovel. I might remind hon. members that I took considerable time, on February 15, I think it was, to indicate that in connection with that shovel case it had been established that there was nobody in Canada who was capable of producing this 2½ cubic yard machine at the time of the appeal. I read from the Montreal Star in support of this assertion, and, indeed, pointed out that five years after this appeal there was a great celebration when a company in Canada after five years of research and the expenditure of a million dollars found it possible to produce a shovel of this particular kind.

Mr. Broome: To what company is the hon. member referring?

Mr. Benidickson: I think it was the Dominion Engineering Company. Anyway, I did give the details at that time. The premier of Quebec was present. That was five years after the appeal and it was stated that it had taken that length of time before such a shovel could be produced in Canada.

Mr. Montgomery: I have a little machine shop and I could have produced one myself.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton suggests he has a little machine shop capable of doing the work. I think perhaps he had better visit the Dominion Engineering Company who found it took them five years and the expenditure of a million dollars before they could equal the big shovel which was the subject of the appeal in 1953 and 1954.

But despite the nature of the discussion which took place on this case, among other things, at the earlier stage, the minister refers to the shovel again and appeals for an absence of repetition in this debate. The hon. gentleman has referred to a number of other cases with which, of course, I do not intend to deal in detail now. But the fact that he once again simply makes a broad assertion without to my mind establishing any proof of his contention that there has been erosion with respect to a dozen or more cases since 1950, does, in itself, simply invite a very long debate.

I do, however, have some information at hand with respect to the case which, I think in the words of the minister, was the classic or basic case which in his view started the erosion over the past decade. He referred to the automatic .22 rifle case of 1950. Here again we are being invited to repeat ourselves because the minister made no reference whatsoever in his presentation to the house this afternoon to the practice which I outlined during the previous stage of the debate, namely the opportunity that goes to the department itself to make what are called "made in Canada" rulings.

In connection with the .22 rifles' case, the Department of National Revenue had on its books what I think at that time was the last ruling with respect to .22 rifles, a ruling dated 1939. That makes clear a policy of that department which did not accept a range of interpretation because the department was bound by the law of parliament. The law of parliament said that there must be actual production in Canada equal to 10 per cent of Canadian consumption of the particular kind of article that was being imported and being assessed for duty. According to my information it was not until the very day that the appeal was launched in connection with the .22 rifles' case that the Department of National Revenue decided to change its 1939 rulings. I think that new ruling is dated March 16, 1950. This subject could, however, be dealt with in some detail at a subsequent stage of the debate.

The minister again today advances his adherence to GATT. I propose to have something further to say about that this afternoon.

The minister also again refers to appeals, and I propose to have something to say about that in proper sequence later this afternoon, because I think perhaps the public of Canada is more aroused about the taking of this arbitrary power—instead of it being subject to the law of the land and the course of that law—and placing it in the hands of one single minister.

It is sometimes suggested, Mr. Speaker, that there is no consequential difference any more between the party that sits to your right and the party which sits to your left with respect to the administration of tariffs. I think this particular legislation and the legislation that was introduced in 1958, which again gave very fantastic power to an individual minister, indicate very clearly the traditional difference in tariff administration between the political parties of this country. It is not just coincidence that every time a change of government has occurred during the last 40 years we have found one government reversing the policy of the other an example of which we have here, an instance involving the abolishment of appeals from ministerial decision. This happened in 1921 when we had legislation introduced by Mr. Meighen. It was repealed immediately by the Mackenzie King administration which came into office in 1921. In 1930 the King administration introduced sections 427 and 427(a), regarding the machinery items which the Minister of Finance indicates to us are the most important items which are involved in the legislation that is before us today. In the same year, when the Bennett administration came into office, it cancelled that legislation of the Mackenzie King administration, and when Mackenzie King succeeded Mr. Bennett in 1935 and initiated subsequently the Canadian-United States trade treaty, sections 427 and 427(a) relating to machinery were restored.

We have here, as a result of this proposed legislation, a new Conservative government attempting to erode the meaning, habit and practice with respect to the administration of these items. Notwithstanding what I have said, the minister has said that he is doing no more in this legislation than returning to an historical interpretation and concept. The minister made this assertion in substance today and certainly specifically with the introduction of the supplementary budget on December 20, as reported at page 1013 of Hansard.

I have indicated that this machinery legislation was introduced by Mr. Dunning, who was the minister of finance in the Mackenzie King administration of 1930. The present Minister of Finance, on December 20 in his speech as reported in Hansard at page 1013, had this to say:

> The purpose of these items, as stated at the time the most important of them were originally established, was to provide for reduced rates of duty on "machinery or production, not procurable in Canada".

According to my research, it was in 1930 in Mr. Dunning's speech that this phrase "not procurable in Canada" was first used. I want to suggest that is perhaps the origin of this phrase in parliamentary debate.

When Mr. Dunning introduced the items 427 with respect to machinery, he had this to say, as reported in Hansard of May 1, 1930 at page 1628 in explanation of why this was a desirable amendment to the Customs Tariff. He said:

> All other machinery—including engines and boilers and electrical apparatus—imports of which amount to scores of millions of dollars, and a great part of which is machinery or production, not procurable in Canada, is divided into two classes—made in Canada and not made in Canada; the former group is slightly increased under the general tariff; the latter is reduced under all tariffs and made free under the British preference. Among the machinery and equipment in this latter class which formerly was dutiable and is now made free under the British preferential tariff, are included:

This machinery item is the biggest item that is involved in the amendments before us.

The Minister of Finance has been making some very positive statements across the country, since the budget was introduced, as to the innocence of this legislation, and I think he must have given this indication to his followers in some private conversations in caucus because very few of them have offered protests, as I would have expected. If this is so innocent why then do we in opposition receive so many protests with respect to it?

The minister in a speech to the Empire Club of Winnipeg on February 10, 1961 had the following to say:

> Let me speak now of the measures proposed in the supplementary budget regarding the provisions in the Customs Tariff relating to goods of a "class or kind" made in Canada. I do so because these proposals have been subjected to erroneous interpretation and baseless charges of protectionism.

Well, let us have a look at this matter of "baseless charges of protectionism."

Mr. Pickersgill: Page the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Benidickson: I propose to say something about the February 27th speech of the hon. member for Lincoln. He felt rather gratified that, perhaps in so far as industries in his riding were concerned, there would be increased protection and some considerable benefit to them.

With regard to this assertion, I am not going to use such phrases as the minister himself in very recent times has indulged in, whether they are parliamentary or not, such as, "Hopelessly untrue". "Why can't you tell the truth?" "This is an erroneous version with no resemblance to the truth". "It is a reckless misinterpretation". "That is not true. That is not even half true", and so on. What I am going to do is use the parliamentary phrase that Hansard uses when some surprise is registered in the house at a statement made. At that time Hansard records "Oh, oh". This may not be understood by some readers of Hansard and so I am going to say, "Oh, yeah", or "Tell it to the marines".

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that, having read these positive assertions by the Minister of Finance, there is indeed a big gap between rhetoric and reality.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And the hon. gentleman is proving it.

Mr. Benidickson: What we are finding here, as I have indicated in reviewing the history of the past 40 years, is this government again nailing its colours to the old Tory mast of Mr. Meighen and Mr. Bennett, and I am going to have something to say about its adherence to the spirit of GATT.

The minister says there is no increase in protection. He has also gone on to say that there is only one organ in the country that is responsible for some flurry in this connection. In Winnipeg in February he blamed this so-called bogey on the Winnipeg Free Press. Let us have a look at some recent thoughts of the minister himself with respect to these tariff changes. In 1959, when he introduced his budget, he said, as reported at page 2423 of Hansard:

> I have been giving thought to various representations that have been made to the government regarding a very important concept which runs through our Customs Tariff: the concept that the protection afforded to goods which are ruled by the Department of National Revenue or the courts to be of a "class or kind" made in Canada should receive greater protection than similar goods of a "class or kind" not made in Canada. This differentiation, based on "class or kind", is to be found in many individual tariff items and also in our anti-dumping and countervailing duties.
> Some of the representations have suggested legislation which would define or re-define the words "class or kind" in such a way as to enlarge the range of goods that are now deemed to be made in this country and thus given the greater protection. It is questionable, however, whether an overriding measure, involving a departure from present practices and present interpretations, is in the national interest.

Two years later however he is doing exactly that, and in 1959 he gave no hint that he had any conception that the "practices and interpretations" were in any way eroding the intent of parliament.

I noted this afternoon when the minister spoke that two out of three of the important cases he cited as indicative of the law prior to this erosion were decisions from the tariff board during the regime of the former Conservative government under R. B. Bennett. Perhaps there might later be some erosion with respect to the practices of the tariff board during the Bennett regime to which two out of three of these cases he cited relate, and I propose to deal with the third one on another occasion. This seems to differ very radically from the stand taken by the Minister of National Revenue in the debate on a previous stage of this debate. At that time the Minister of National Revenue did not suggest that we must find a remedy for erosion relating to the tariff board practices under Mr. R. B. Bennett. What the Minister of National Revenue had to say to us and presumably particularly to the members of the Conservative party who represent ridings that know it is not in their interests to fight tariffs, was: "Don't be alarmed; we are simply making sure that the type of tariff administration as practised under Mackenzie King is not going to remain eroded." I found this afternoon that two of the three cases were heard in the 1930's when the Bennett administration was in power.

The minister says no tariff increase is involved. I think it would be appropriate to show what some independent thinkers have to say. The minister and I had some discussion at the previous stage when he said, "Oh, you are just carrying on the harangue of the Winnipeg Free Press". I indicated at that time that I would be very pleased to quote at the appropriate time not the Winnipeg Free Press but its opposition in the city of Winnipeg, the Winnipeg Tribune, and I do so now. The exchange between the minister and myself took place on February 15, as reported at page 2086 of Hansard. The extract from the Tribune reads in part as follows:

> Class or kind—
> The proposed "class or kind" changes in the tariff are running into stiff opposition in the House of Commons—and so they should. The changes are objectionable on two main scores: first, they are clearly protectionist and designed to restrict trade; second, the amendments, if approved in their present form, would give the minister authority to make arbitrary decisions against which there could be no appeal.
> The proposed changes would virtually destroy the individual's right of appeal. The minister's decision on custom made goods—a term covering a large volume of imports—would be final. In practice this would mean that a customs officer would make rulings which could not be challenged in the courts or before an appeal board.

The Winnipeg Tribune went on to say that the federal government has taken some pride in the fact that in 1960 its exports have expanded. They point out that those exports expanded while the former law was prevailing, and the Tribune reminds the administration that trade is a two-way street, and it says that if Canada imposes restrictions, even hidden restrictions such as involved here, other countries will reply in kind and Canada will be the loser.

There are people other than the Free Press and hon. members of the opposition who sense in this legislation a very important hike in protectionism, and an unknown hike because it is to be operated in the office of the minister and in large part without appeal. The Globe and Mail of March 13, 1961 —and this newspaper is published in the midst of the Ontario manufacturing industry —had this to say respecting this Customs Tariff amendment:

> This amendment would deprive importers of their right of appeal, in these cases, to either the courts or the tariff board. It is impossible to see any justification for this. The questions to be decided are matters of fact, whether, for example, Canadian industry can really produce a particular article in a reasonable period of time. Issues of this kind are properly settled not by a harassed cabinet minister—

Like the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan).

Mr. Pearson: Is that part of the editorial?

Mr. Benidickson: No. I continue:

> —but by an impartial tribunal which has heard both sides. In the course of the debate on the amendment in the House of Commons earlier this month, opposition speakers also pointed out that it infringed parliament's control over taxation and trade. In effect it gives the Minister of National Revenue power to increase tariffs without the consent of parliament.

Other important journals have expressed a similar view, one of which is the Financial Post, and I may say that I am not speaking today from the point of view of my western background.

Mr. Broome: Western? How far west?

Mr. Benidickson: My present residence is reasonably west, being west of the lakehead, but I was born and raised on the prairies and I have a great affection for that part of Canada. The Financial Post had this to say in an editorial:

> The switch from administrative or departmental decisions, which can be appealed, to ministerial decisions, which cannot, opens the way to all sorts of undesirable developments. If, when ruling on such a customs case, the revenue minister accepted regularly, without question, the advice and decisions of his civil servants, we would get government by bureaucracy.

That is the kind of thing about which we used to hear when my hon. friends opposite were sitting on this side of the house. The editorial goes on to say:

> If one minister after another did throw in his two cents worth, we would very likely get inconsistencies and capriciousness in a very complicated, very sensitive area. Finally, ministerial decision which cannot be appealed makes possible government behind the public's back, changes in tariffs without changes in tariff legislation.

Long before the legislation was introduced a good journalistic friend of the present government who represents another eastern newspaper in the press gallery, the Montreal Gazette, a newspaper generally recognized for its Conservative adherence, had something to say about this matter. I refer to Arthur Blakely who, having read the speech from the throne, had this to say:

> Large sections of Canadian industry, which have been pressing the government hard this past year for additional tariff protection, are persuaded that these sentences in the throne speech were designed as an answer to their prayers.

The Montreal Star made this comment in an editorial on December 28, 1960:

> Much, of course, will depend on the way in which the new powers are used, but it seems fairly definite that the government has embarked on an openly protectionist course.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that not only does this legislation involve opportunities, such as we know were taken advantage of in the thirties by the Bennett administration, for the ministerial hiking of effective tariff rates to mountainous levels but these rates can be set in a cunning, clandestine and cabalistic manner. In addition, members of this ministry in their explanation throughout the country of what is involved in this legislation have brought about as usual a great confusion and conflict. I have quoted what the Minister of Finance said in Winnipeg. I find that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) told his constituents that the activities of the government involved no increase in protection. He made the same assertion in that western area of Canada as did the Minister of Finance on February 10.

It is typical of the double-talk we get from the members of the ministry that at about the same time the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) addressed the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and had this to say, as found in the Globe and Mail of February 8:

> Mr. Hees said yesterday that the class or kind legislation which is now before parliament would impose or raise tariffs on foreign goods closely similar to those made in Canada, and should thus increase domestic sales of the Canadian-made product.

The Globe and Mail made this comment in its editorial:

> This is simply another way of saying that foreign goods closely similar to those made in Canada are cheaper than those made in Canada.

I have been greatly disappointed at the silence of so many of my colleagues in the House of Commons who, I know, will not find that this legislation is in the interests of their constituencies. The Minister of Finance indicated that the major item here has to do with machinery. When he was asked whether it would not be wise to allow an appeal to the tariff board so that we could be sure that all the facts would be made fully known he said, "Oh, no, the administration is a relatively simple matter". He said that, after all, there were only eight or ten plants involved and that they could check on them through the Department of National Revenue without much difficulty. I ask the members of the massive Conservative majority to have a look at this matter. Are they going to approve something that will be primarily for the benefit of eight or ten plants or are they going to have something to say with respect to their own constituencies?

I am not going to single out any western member unless I am asked to do so but I am going to quote from the Alberta Wheat Pool Budget. This is the kind of thing that supporters of the Conservative party are saying in the west when they return to their constituencies.

Mr. Argue: What date?

Mr. Benidickson: November 3, 1960. The article reads in part as follows:

> At a time when there is an increasing clamour for higher tariffs and greater protection for Canadian industry, it is encouraging to hear one of the western Conservative members of parliament speak out forcefully against higher tariffs. Last week in a newspaper interview ... is quoted as saying: "A major battle for higher tariffs on a wide variety of imports into Canada is shaping up"—

This was prior to the speech from the throne on November 17th of course.

> —which, if won by those promoting increases, may well put many western grain farmers out of business, cause more suffering in the already ailing Alberta coal industry and, above all, create even higher unemployment at a time when more Canadians are out of jobs than at any time since the second world war at this time of year.

I indicated I was disappointed that this silent and slavish group of back bench members should support this legislation which I submit will not be of any benefit to the vast number of constituencies which they represent and will in fact be harmful. I notice the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) smiling as I proceed with my remarks.

Mr. Thrasher: Just laughing.

Mr. Benidickson: He may be laughing at me but I am going to have a little laugh at him right now. I am going to suggest something to him and to all the other members of the Conservative party from British Columbia who have been silent on this matter. I say to them that it has been quite a spectacle to find that the Vancouver board of trade, the British Columbia Electric Company, the B.C. loggers' association, the truck loggers' association and a number of other producers' organizations of this kind have had to depend for advocacy so far as this matter is concerned on the C.C.F. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) and the C.C.F. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) who are the only ones from British Columbia who have spoken for them on this matter.

Perhaps the people who spoke like that western member have changed their views because they did not know what was likely to happen this session. Apparently the high protectionists, to whom that member referred, have won out and they decided to jettison the policy they had in mind and just continue to follow John. Even some hon. members who think this legislation might be of some benefit to their ridings are in for some striking disappointments. I do not know whether or not their own research is responsible for some of the misconceptions they have or whether these misconceptions result from the blandishments they have received from members of the ministry who say, "This is fine for you; this is going to do a job for your friends".

The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Smith) was one of the few who had anything to say in this debate, other than those who have official responsibility for the measure. You will recall that on February 27 he was filled with joy. The thought that the manufacturers of heavy chains, made in his riding, would receive some benefit from the measure. He referred to tire chains for tractors and to another manufacturing plant that is manufacturing automatic transmissions. This bill gave him some heart and some courage. I suppose his feelings have been echoed in the Conservative caucus, and those backbenchers with these hopes evidently outnumbered those who could see danger in this legislation.

Let us look at the situation in so far as heavy chains are concerned. I am informed that heavy chains would be interpreted as shelf goods in accordance with section 2 (a) (2) of the new legislation and therefore would have to be produced to the extent of 10 per cent of the normal Canadian consumption. I am informed that the bill we have before us will not help the manufacturers of tire chains for tractors because these chains enter duty free under item 409n as accessories for tractors. In so far as automatic transmissions are concerned, I am informed that under this legislation there is no help for industrial ridings such as Lincoln because the drawback duty is not payable on automatic transmissions. If the hon. member really wants some help in respect of the manufacturing of automatic transmissions, I am afraid he has to go to the government he supports and ask that government to cancel the legislation that it brought in by order in council on November 1, 1959. This legislation allows transmissions to enter Canada free. I think disillusionment will be found in the Tory caucus if hon. members who have presented both points of view there will give this bill further study.

I said it was my intention to say something about the minister's continuous, loud declarations of his adherence to GATT, both in a technical sense and in spirit. We are all very familiar with these resounding declarations of rectitude that constantly flow from the Minister of Finance. Perhaps we should further examine this declaration. On December 20, as reported on page 1014 of Hansard, the minister did actually admit, in mild language, that retaliation against our exports was possible. He tried to persuade us that it was not probable. The minister is not one, in my opinion, who is given to understatement. He is generally prepared to attack a tack with a sledge-hammer. In his speech to the Canadian club at Toronto on January 9, 1961, I think perhaps the minister made, for him, the understatement of 1961. He said:

> While this action has aroused the interest of our associates in the GATT, we are confident that it is within its framework.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to other members of this house that a great deal more than interest has been aroused by this legislation, especially in so far as our best customers, the United States and the United Kingdom, are concerned. I raised this subject by way of a formal question on the order paper on March 8, and again received a rather bland, evasive, innocent sounding statement from the minister, as reported on page 2774 of Hansard for that date. He said:

> —no contracting parties signatory to the general agreement on tariffs and trade... have intimated to Canadian government representatives in Canada or abroad that they will expect Canada to negotiate compensatory tariff adjustments or give trade concessions in the event that the Customs Tariff is amended in accordance with the terms outlined in a resolution therefor introduced by the Minister of Finance on December 20, 1960.

This is the brush-off. This is the indication not to look under the rug. The minister went on to say:

> There have been discussions, as I think I intimated on an earlier occasion, with both the United Kingdom and the United States governments concerning the significance of the proposed amendment. Some of these discussions actually date back to the time before the terms of the proposed amendment were made known.
> The United Kingdom government has intimated that it will be interested in the administration of the proposed amendment, and reserves whatever rights it may possess.

No indication is given in that statement as to the action the United States may take. As I pointed out at a previous stage of the debate, this legislation removes the right of appeal from the board to our courts which, as I read the GATT agreement, is mandatory. In fact, this measure removes in large part the type of appeal that had been operative for almost 15 years before GATT and about 13 years after GATT.

The Minister of Finance may think that these people are paying no attention to these administrative alterations in our Customs Tariff which relate to entries involving hundreds of millions of dollars. I am not so sure. I believe this government will get plucked to its pinfeathers as it proceeds with this matter in an age when more liberal trading seems to be the operation of the day for practically every other country with whom we do big business. During the debate in replying to the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) the minister suggested that activities such as are proposed here probably had a great appeal and a great advantage to labour.

In this connection, I should like to read briefly from what the Canadian Labour Congress had to say recently, on January 26, when they made their submission to the Senate manpower committee. I will summarize what they said. They said that if we advance too aggressively in matters such as these our friends, the United States, would retaliate in their trading relations and would knock the stuffing out of us.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the hon. member quoting?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. Does the minister want the page number?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I should like the exact quotation.

Mr. Benidickson: I thought perhaps it would not be in order, but with the minister's consent, I will read it. This statement is reported on page 284 of the proceedings of the Senate committee on manpower and was made during the presentation of the Canadian Labour Congress respecting unemployment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought the hon. member was referring to the presentation made by the Canadian Labour Congress to the cabinet.

Mr. Benidickson: No, I am referring to their presentation with respect to the unemployment situation to the manpower committee of the Senate. They said:

> Everybody knows what would happen if we raised the tariff on American goods, which, of course, make up over two thirds of our imports: American retaliation could knock the stuffing out of a variety of Canadian industries.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member will agree they are talking about something quite different there, namely raising the tariff.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what you are doing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is not raising the tariff.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is raising it from 7½ per cent to 22½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: There is a 15 per cent hike on a substantial portion, as I say, of hundreds of millions of dollars of potential trade particularly between our two big customers, namely the United States and the United Kingdom. As we found previously, it is rather an invidious position to be in in the opposition to find out whose ox is going to be gored in these tariff negotiations. We are obliged to enquire respecting public hearings down in Washington to find out there what GATT proposals Canada has made, and who Canada is selling out for the purpose of giving some benefit to the eight or ten particular industries which I have indicated seem to be at the very core of the advantages involved here.

This happened in 1958. Then the Minister of Finance would not make available to us any information as to what quid pro quo was likely to follow with respect to these partners of ours in GATT that would require compensation. I suggest that we are going to find retaliation here. If we do not find it directly, we are going to find that it is less easy for us in the immediate future to negotiate with these countries on further proposals that might be to our advantage in the matter of the liberalization of trade. The Minister of Finance seems to want to keep this retaliation skeleton in his closet, but it will come out. Unfortunately we will find who has paid for these concessions. We will find that only by going over to Washington where these things are discussed publicly or we shall have to have somebody who visits Geneva tell us, from the negotiations that are still carrying on there under GATT, what the sacrifices in Canada by exporters are likely to be.

Since we discussed some of these matters in the committee of ways and means, a delegation of the ministers of this government went down to Washington. I think my point is fairly conclusively established in this understanding assembly when I quote what the usual vigorously speaking Minister of Finance had to say as to the attitude of the United States while there. If he had completely sold the United States on the idea that this proposal was innocent in so far as our intercountry trade was concerned and in so far as it affected them, we know that he would be the first to make quite a noise about it. But instead of that—and as I say, contrary to his usual style—we find this, and again I quote from a reporter friendly to the minister namely a reporter of the Toronto Globe and Mail in Washington. He quotes the Minister of Finance as summing up after the conference as follows:

> The Canadian delegation has done all anybody could do to make it clear that redefining of "a class or kind made in Canada" was entirely a proper action for the Canadian government to take.

I think we can all judge what that really meant from the point of view of convincing that conference. I suggest that the real operation resulting from this legislation will be something that the ministry traditionally—or at least it is traditional with them—will tell us nothing about while this debate is on, but that the real battle will take place abroad in Geneva in ensuing days and weeks. There is not any wonder why this would not now take place there. We know that there were protests—and formal protests that time—in 1958 when the Customs Act was amended. Before any legislation was presented and simply on the knowledge that it was likely to be presented, the United States formally wrote our government and indicated their interest. There was no reply. After the legislation of 1958 was introduced they received no reply to a protest. Of course, the government's explanation was that this was correspondence between a junior in the United States embassy and a junior in the Department of External Affairs and that it got overlooked.

Mr. Pearson: Like Eldorado.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, like Eldorado. It turns out that the Canadian junior happens to be of the status of one of our foreign ambassadors; and it happens that the United States junior who wrote the letter is still the senior man representing the United States in this country in commercial matters.

The Minister of National Revenue is one of those who went down to Washington at this time. I can understand why now there was no need for the United States government to write letters to the Canadian government that are likely to be pigeonholed. As the minister has said the United States people have been in contact with the government and its officials informally. They are simply putting in a caveat, as one might say. They know that the real negotiations in so far as any effect on them is concerned will, as I say, take place on foreign soil and until all is a fait accompli the members of this house will know very little about it. But the Minister of National Revenue was also down in Washington on this visit and I find him quoted as saying, "Oh, there is no discrimination here; this is not aimed at the United States". Of course, there is no discrimination here. It is not aimed at the United States; it is aimed at everybody. The idea is to shut out all trade partners. But the people affected of course are our two major customers, namely the United Kingdom and the United States.

In addition to that, if he is quoted correctly in Washington on March 13, several weeks and months after the legislation was introduced, the Minister of National Revenue passed the buck to the opposition, as the government has often done. They say that this legislation does not amount to anything, that it is mainly a political football created by the opposition. At a previous stage of this debate I quoted from one if not two of the Canadian journalists stationed in Washington and I quoted from them at a time before the budget was introduced. I quoted from them with respect to the reaction that took place in Washington simply after reading the speech from the throne. The opposition had nothing whatever to do with that. But the headline that was provided in a Washington paper which I quoted previously under the byline of Mr. Tim Creary of the Southam newspapers was a Washington newspaper headline saying Washington was "terribly" upset by what was announced in the speech from the throne.

What the Minister of Finance is simply going to tell us here is that this is just a little matter; that this is not going to affect our trade relations very much; I want to say that this means a great deal more than what many people in the country and perhaps even in the House of Commons appreciate. It is not only the consumer interest that is affected. The interesting thing is that it perhaps affects most keenly the large and small manufacturers or at least it will harm and affect large and small manufacturers in Canada other than those eight or ten who actually make machinery in Canada, to whom I have made reference. Many of these manufacturers all struggling to export in world markets at competitive prices.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce goes out in the country and his standard speech to chambers of commerce is this. He wants to know why industry cannot compete in foreign markets as well as in our own. If these manufacturers are obliged to buy something in Canada that is of lower capacity, of inferior quality, and at a higher price than that at which their competitors in other parts of the world can buy, how do you expect them long to be able to compete with other producers in other parts of the world? What happens here as we all know, is this. Instead of being able to import from the United Kingdom or the United States the most up-to-date efficient machine that up to now has not been made in Canada but which the Minister of National Revenue in a back room is going to say henceforth could be made in Canada, what will happen is that the cost of that tariff capital levy for machinery will go up in the case of a British machine from free to 10 per cent and 22½ per cent in the case of a machine from the United States.

Many businessmen will come to the conclusion that it would be business suicide to add this tariff differential to their capital costs particularly if they must wait for lengthy periods before finding out what the tariff rate is going to be; when they have to wait for the Department of National Revenue to make these national calculations statistically. I suggest this is very undesirable legislation. Everybody who knows how the administrative machinery operates knows that this does not really mean what it says; it will not be the minister who deals with these matters. The minister is not going to be able to deal with one hundredth of the applications involved in decisions relating to whether or not an article is made in Canada. The potential manufacturers who are concerned about what it would cost them to set up a plant will find themselves at the mercy of some junior official who may be very biased and limited in his knowledge of what is going on in Canada. I say that if we are abolishing the tariff board and giving power to one minister just because we do not agree with the board's decisions it will be just as logical to say that we should abolish law appeals and allow the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) himself to deal with these vital matters. I think that would be just as logical.

Somebody said that if the Russian ambassador were listening to this debate and reported to Khrushchev that such powers were being taken by the minister here in this democracy Khrushchev might die in a fit of laughter because we hypocritically talk about dictatorial action in some other countries.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan):

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this bill be not now read a second time because of new provisions for arbitrary decisions which transfer the tariff making authority from parliament to the Minister of National Revenue, contrary to the principles of responsible government and the essential rights of parliament to tax".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I wish to submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment is out of order. It purports to be an amendment to a motion for the second reading of a bill. As you well know, sir, the kind of amendment which is in order on a motion for second reading is very limited. According to my memory of the rule it requires an assertion of a contrary principle. In my submission this is not the kind of amendment which qualifies within the narrow provisions laid down with regard to amendments to motions for second reading.

It is a clear principle of construction that an amendment cannot be introduced if it merely asserts a negative.

In the next place, it is an equally well established rule that it is not in order to bring forward an amendment simply in order to give a reason. It is in debate that we state the reasons why we take positions for or against certain motions. It seems to me that this amendment on the face of it purports to do nothing more than that. On that account it is clearly out of order. So I think that on three grounds this amendment does not qualify within the narrow rules which have been established governing amendments to motions for the second reading of bills.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I think I can greatly assist Your Honour by bringing to your attention an amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) on September 2, 1958 which read:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:
> "that this bill be not now read a second time because of new provisions for arbitrary valuations which transfer the tariff making authority from parliament to the minister and the cabinet contrary to the principles of responsible government and the essential right of parliament to tax."

The only difference in wording between that amendment and the amendment just moved by my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River is that the word "decisions" has been substituted for the word "valuations" after the word "arbitrary", and "and the cabinet" has been left out and "of national revenue" substituted. Precisely the same objections were advanced to that amendment by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), though not in precisely the same language, as have been advanced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) to the present proposed amendment.

Mr. Speaker made a ruling on all the points which were raised by the Minister of Finance, which ruling is to be found at page 535 of the Journals for that session. I do not suppose Your Honour would wish me to read them, though I could if desired. The Speaker did rule that the amendment was completely in order and I suggest that as the present amendment is entirely on all fours with the amendment which the Speaker ruled to be in order at that time it is, of course, similarly in order. Incidentally, that earlier amendment was based on an amendment which had been moved by a very experienced parliamentarian, Mr. Stewart, and seconded by Mr. Ian Mackenzie in 1930, and it was not even challenged by the government of that day.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Perhaps I may refer briefly to the arguments presented by the minister on the point of order. The hon. gentleman said he had put forward three reasons why the proposed amendment should be ruled out of order. I may have missed one of them, but I recognized only two. The hon. gentleman argued in the first place that the amendment should offer a contrary principle. I should like to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that a motion has often been accepted in this house calling for a six months' hoist which, in effect, is the assertion of a contrary principle.

The minister gave as a further reason why this was not in order the fact that it contained in it a reason which, in his opinion, was subject to debate and therefore ought to be included in argumentation and ought not to be the subject of amendment.

I would like to refer Your Honour to a motion that is very fundamental, namely that a bill be now referred to a standing or special committee of this house in order that this or that particular feature of the bill might be more adequately explored before the house gives second reading. We often have motions that include the reasons for putting the motions before the house, and in the light of many similar motions on second reading, in regard to which we have all had experience in this house, I suggest that the other argument put forward by the minister is completely ridiculous. I hope that Your Honour will consider the reasoning put forward by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) and myself in this regard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This amendment ought to be considered in the light of citation 382 of Beauchesne's fourth edition which reads as follows:

> 382. It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

I would suggest that the proposed amendment is within these limitations being a declaration, or an opinion contrary to some provision of the bill and, therefore, I would accept the amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I just say a word or two before you close this matter?

I did not have before me when I was speaking earlier, the reference to the 1958 decision from which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) read. May I draw your attention, however, to the fact that in that case the amendment did propose to assert a contrary principle, and there was a declaration of a contrary principle. At page 537 of the Journals of the House of Commons of Canada of September 2, 1958, we have a ruling of Mr. Speaker of that day.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was pages 534 and 535.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Speaker was also referring to a reference at page 538, where the same rule appears.

Mr. Speaker, at page 537 will be found a very good example of the assertions of a contrary principle and declaratory statement. In that situation the amendment to Bill No. C-51, moved by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) seconded by the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) read as follows:

"this house reaffirms the adherence of Canada to the spirit and objectives of GATT, which are clearly violated in provisions of this bill."

The mover put this on record as asserting a contrary principle. In my respectful submission, this present amendment does not invite the house to assert a principle. The amendment reads in part as follows:

this bill be not now read a second time because of new provisions for arbitrary decisions—

There is not even a complete sentence here in what follows, and certainly no declaration of principle. This simply purports to state a reason why the bill should not now be read a second time because of certain provisions. With all respect, Mr. Speaker, this is not an assertion of principle and does not contain a declaration such as is found at page 537 of the Journals of the House of Commons of Canada of September 2, 1958. The house is not called upon to go on record as affirming a principle that is contrary to the principle of the bill. This amendment simply asks the house to subscribe to a reason, and the reason does not even contain a statement. The words "because of" simply refer to certain provisions. With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I urge upon you that this is not the kind of provision that is contemplated in the rule respecting the assertion of contrary principles by a declaration.

At page 538 of the same volume in relation to the rules governing amendments to motions for second reading we have this principle stated:

(1) It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill.

I suggest with great respect that the amendment must be a declaration of a principle and not merely a reference to a purported reason.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, since you have permitted the minister to intervene in the course of your ruling I assume I may reply to what he has said. May I point out to Your Honour—I think this is all the reply I need make—that in the case of the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) it was exactly analogous and almost identical in wording to this one and Mr. Speaker ruled that amendment in order. In the case of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin), which the Minister of Finance seeks to suggest would be in order, His Honour ruled it out of order. I suggest the minister has not helped his case very much by this second intervention. I assume, sir, that you will be impressed by the ruling made by His Honour, the Speaker, regarding the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition which was, as I say, almost literatim and verbatim the same as the amendment moved by my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It appears to me that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has expressed an objection which goes rather to the form of the amendment than to the substance. If I interpret correctly citation 382 of Beauchesne it would seem to me that this amendment is an opinion expressed in opposition to the bill which has been introduced and that the question of form would not matter. The amendment reads in part as follows:

—because of new provisions for arbitrary decisions which transfer the tariff making authority from parliament to the Minister of National Revenue—

It is my opinion that these words express an opinion contrary to a part of the bill and I see, therefore, no reason to refuse the amendment. I declare it in order.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill were first announced in a statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in introducing the baby budget on December 20. Since that time this legislation, or the resolution preceding it, has been discussed on a number of occasions, particularly on March 2 when the bill was given first reading. There has been a long delay between first and second readings because the government did not bring it forward. Nevertheless, the fact that almost four months have elapsed since the minister declared to the house and the country that this legislation was to be brought before parliament, and the temper of the debate that has taken place since, indicate to me that this legislation is not only unpopular and unwarranted in the opinion of the opposition parties, but indicate, I would suggest, that the government has been rather timid in proceeding with it, and has taken, in a consistent manner, every excuse to duck bringing it forward to have it approved or dealt with long before now.

The motion that has been presented by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) is that the bill be not now read a second time because of new provisions for arbitrary decision which transfer the tariff making authority from parliament to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) contrary to the principles of responsible government and the essential rights of parliament to tax.

We in this group agree wholeheartedly with the amendment. In years gone by the present Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have been very important champions of the rights of parliament. It is strange that, after a few short years in office, they should move in such a wholesale manner to deny the rights of parliament, to deny the jurisdiction of the courts and to place in the hands of the minister widespread, arbitrary powers of tariff making which, as the amendment points out, in fact are the right to tax. This comes from hon. gentlemen who have been so loud in proclaiming their championing of the rights of parliament.

I suggest that this legislation is bad; it is repugnant to the democratic system. It is legislation that is very much out of step with the times. I noticed that the minister took a long time this afternoon to introduce the legislation in his endeavour to defend it. On other occasions he made very short statements. He brushed off opposition criticism rather lightly. But today he took a long time in an effort to try to defend and to make a case for this legislation. In making his statement I noticed that the Minister of Finance did not follow his usual practice. This afternoon the minister seemed very unsure of himself. He was not the bombastic minister that he usually is, claiming that all right is on his side. He was rather timid, cautious and mild-mannered. I suggest this is some indication that the government itself knows that this legislation is unpopular; that it is, in fact, meeting with very widespread disapproval in the country.

This legislation provides for a change in the definition of goods of a "class or kind". It provides for a change in the definition by saying:

> In the case of goods other than goods custom made to specifications, goods of approximately the same class or kind are made or produced in Canada.

As the minister has so well pointed out, by changing this definition the government will broaden the whole range and the whole class of goods to which the higher tariff of 22½ per cent instead of 7½ per cent will apply.

The minister has made his case on what he really says are misjudgments of the tariff board. He has said that for the past 10 years the tariff board has been incompetent. He has criticized it very widely. He has said that the tariff board today finds itself in a nightmare. I would suggest that the minister has heaped a great deal of criticism on the board and this is a method of rectifying the situation which he claims exists. He is transferring the jurisdiction from the tariff board to the minister. We had understood that the tariff board was to be made more efficient so that it could handle appeals; that the tariff board was to be set up under a two-panel system instead of a one-panel system. It would seem to me that the government is arguing both sides of the case. It is saying it wants to streamline the tariff board procedures, and yet it is taking much of the power and jurisdiction away from the board.

I would suggest that the legislation introduced today is wrong on other counts. It is far reaching in that it gives to the Minister of National Revenue the right to decide on statistics about normal Canadian consumption, and therefore the amount of the 10 per cent, and by this means it removes a large part of the jurisdiction that has heretofore been in the hands of the tariff board.

The minister is also given the power to decide whether goods are custom made to specifications and whether adequate facilities exist in Canada. One wonders how the minister is going to have all this information when the courts, according to the Minister of Finance, are ill equipped and unable to obtain this information. The minister is going to decide whether adequate facilities exist for the economic production of such goods within a reasonable period of time. This is very indefinite phraseology; it is not precise. Large, sweeping, arbitrary powers are placed in the hands of the Minister of National Revenue.

We think that the House of Commons should reject this legislation. We have opposed it on every occasion, at every stage. We intend to continue that opposition. We intend to move amendments at the various stages and procedures of this bill, which will demonstrate again and again our complete opposition to what is being done by this legislation.

This legislation is wrong on every count. It is protectionist legislation; it is arbitrary legislation; it takes powers away from the tariff board; it takes appeals away from the courts. It places in the hands of a minister the right to tax, the right to decide tariffs, the right to decide the 10 per cent quantity.

It takes away from parliament jurisdiction that has been parliament's for a great many years.

In recent years we have been in some difficulty with respect to our balance of payments. Our export-import situation has been rather difficult, but there is at least some evidence that it is improving. I hold in my hand the dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin which sets forth our experience in 1960 in the trading field. It has this to say:

Canada's trade with other countries reached a new peak in 1960, being valued at $10,891,100,000, according to preliminary figures released today by D.B.S. This was an increase of 2.3 per cent over the 1959 value of $10,649,200,000. Total exports in 1960 were valued at $5,395,300,000, a rise of 5 per cent over the previous record attained in the preceding year, while imports at $5,495,800,000 were fractionally less than in 1959. The import balance, estimated at $100,500,000, was reduced to slightly more than a quarter of last year's total and was the lowest since 1954.

According to these figures, our trade position is improving. According to the statistics, our exports have been going up by a substantial amount over our increase in imports. Does the government feel that this desirable trend should not be continued? This legislation is opposed to this kind of trend. It is likely to reverse or will tend to reverse this kind of improvement in Canada's trade position.

The minister talks about helping industry. I suggest that to provide a general increase in tariffs will not help Canadian industry. It will merely increase the costs of Canadian industries, make it more difficult for them to compete and result in higher and higher unemployment, a higher rate of unemployment than would exist if this legislation were not passed.

When Prime Minister Macmillan was in Canada recently the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) discussed with him the attitude of the British government toward a common market. It is clear that the United Kingdom is going into the common market. It is clear that this is a great threat to Canada's export industries. The Prime Minister said he has a clear impression that the United Kingdom will not upset the trading preferences and arrangements that Canada has enjoyed with the United Kingdom in the past. That is hardly a commitment; it is hardly a firm assurance.

I wonder what the attitude of the United Kingdom is with regard to the policy of the Canadian government which we are now considering. At a time when we need good will in the United Kingdom, when we need to protect our markets in that country, this kind of legislation is a challenge to the United Kingdom to discriminate against Canada, to retaliate by equally discriminatory measures in view of the fact that we are undertaking this kind of ill-conceived, high tariff program.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River quoted a number of newspapers, organizations and other authorities that are opposed to higher tariffs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I indicate to the hon. member my concern about the line of his remarks now because the question is on the amendment and the only subject of the amendment is the provision to transfer authority to the minister from the tariff board. Of course, all problems raised by the bill may be discussed but the hon. member will realize that he will have the opportunity to speak again when the amendment is disposed of. Therefore, for the sake of orderly debate I think it would be the wish of the house and I think it would be preferable that the discussion at this time be limited to the subject matter of the amendment.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind advice and I appreciate the tenor of your remarks. I was not intending to speak at any great length even if you had not risen, but I do want to say that during all the time I have been a member of the house the practice has been that an amendment on second reading does not result in confining the debate following the amendment to the terms of the amendment but rather on second reading a wide, general discussion of the bill is in order whether or not there is an amendment.

I think I have been very much in order although I can appreciate the desire of Your Honour and perhaps of members of the house to confine the discussion at this stage solely to the substance of the amendment. However, I do want to state that in my judgment a wide ranging debate is very much in order on second reading even when an amendment has been moved.

Mr. Nowlan: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I must say that my impression and recollection of the rulings made by the hon. gentlemen who have held the office of Speaker in the past are not in accordance with the theory just put forward by the hon. member for Assiniboia. If he has the right to do as he suggests, we will have two wide ranging debates on the whole subject. Having in mind the purport of the amendment as I recall it, I believe that the rule is as stated by Your Honour a few moments ago, that once an amendment is moved speakers who follow are, generally speaking, confined to the wording and context of the amendment. In the past Mr. Speaker has, of course, allowed reasonable leeway but certainly there cannot be two wide ranging debates on two separate motions before the house.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we will gain anything by the minister persisting with this so-called point of order because he is completely wrong. Not only can there be two wide ranging debates but there may be as many as four or five. I can remember that when a certain famous bill was before the house the official opposition of the day used the technique of moving a motion that the question be now put in order that another round of speakers might join in a general debate. Over the years there has been no inclination by Speakers of the House of Commons to try to confine debates to the precise wording and scope of an amendment before the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I add this for the benefit of the hon. member. It may be true that sometimes a general debate takes place when an amendment is being considered but that depends on the nature of the amendment itself. Some amendments may provide for the discussion of the whole subject matter of the bill but when the amendment is on a precise point, as in the present instance, I think the discussion on the amendment should be limited to its subject matter, namely, the transfer of the making of decisions from the tariff board to the Minister of National Revenue. That is the subject matter of the amendment. The hon. member may be right as to the scope of the debate in other cases but in the present case I think the debate has to be limited if the rules are to be applied.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I submit again that it is in order to have a wide ranging debate even on an amendment such as the one now before the house. I state again that it is not my intention to make a long speech at this time. Apart altogether from your intervention, I had almost concluded my remarks and only have one or two more thoughts to leave with the house.

I was saying that this legislation is unpopular, that it provides for the giving of arbitrary powers to the minister and that it is not in keeping with the history of the Conservative party when they were in opposition. This legislation, which provides for this arbitrary transfer of powers, demonstrates that the Prime Minister has forgotten all about his campaign to protect the rights of parliament. It demonstrates that so far as this legislation is concerned the Prime Minister has abdicated his own responsibility and has surrendered it to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance, the arch-Tory of the Tory party, has brought forward this legislation as a pay-off to the financial interests that the minister is seeking to assist by means of this legislation.

Mr. Lambert: That is nonsensical.

Mr. Argue: The Prime Minister's attitude in the past has been to protect the rights of parliament. I have never known him to advocate higher tariffs in the past but apparently he has handed over his jurisdiction in this matter to the Minister of Finance who is now proceeding by this means to bring about a general increase in tariffs without any support that I know of from any major organizations in the country. Organized labour is not supporting a high tariff policy. Organized agriculture is not supporting a high tariff policy. No party in this house with the exception of the Tory party, is in favour of this kind of repugnant high tariff legislation.

Mr. Lambert: That is your word for it.

Mr. Argue: I suggest the government is out of step with the kind of trade procedures that are now being followed in the world, and out of step with public opinion in Canada.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): If no one has anything to say at this time, I should like to say that it seems most extraordinary to me that, in the face of an amendment of this character when there are 200 representatives in this house who are now supporting the government and the number is dwindling all the time and is likely to continue to decline as rapidly as circumstances permit, we find this sort of Quaker meeting with no one on the government side able to make any observations about this far-reaching amendment.

Mr. Lambert: Maybe the amendment is not worth it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman says the amendment is not worth it. The hon. gentleman would not have said that if he had been sitting over here supporting his leader when his leader was over here. At that time there was no more ardent verbal champion of the rights of parliament than the right hon. gentleman. There has been the most extraordinary and complete metamorphosis since the right hon. gentleman crossed to the other side of the house. Nothing could better illustrate that metamorphosis than the legislation which is now before us, and particularly that feature of the legislation about which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainly River (Mr. Benidickson) has invited us to express an opinion in this amendment that is now before the house.

The amendment indicates that this legislation is unacceptable and should not be proceeded with because it makes new provisions for arbitrary decisions which transfer the tariff making authority from parliament to the Minister of National Revenue. I underline the word "new" because three years ago, over our objections, other similar provisions were made. Then the amendment goes on to point out that this is contrary to the principles of responsible government and the essential rights of parliament to tax. These principles were always respected by Liberal governments. The very basis of our constitution is that taxes should be imposed not by one of the 265 representatives of the people but by all of them or by a majority of them after due deliberation and debate.

What this government is seeking to do by this legislation is to permit one minister, not even the governor in council, to divide all the categories of goods that are made in Canada or conceivably might be made in Canada, and the conception need only be in the mind of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan). It does not need to be in anyone else's mind. He never has to explain to anyone, no matter how arbitrary, no matter how unjust the decision. As the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has pointed out one of his minions could make the decision without even the minister knowing about it. He decides that something or other is custom made to specifications.

Mr. Nowlan: We do not have minions in the department under this minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister knows they are exactly the same people in the department, except for a few new recruits, as they were before. No one in this house has more respect for the civil servants than I have. The civil servants are there to do a certain job. The ministers are there to do another job, and parliament is here to do another job. Parliament never intended that a grade 4 clerk should decide what the Customs Tariff of this country should be or what duties people should pay. This, in fact, is what is going to happen under this legislation.

Mr. Nowlan: Sheer nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: The description of that statement as sheer nonsense does not make it nonsense. It merely indicates that the minister believes it is more effective to make an exclamation like that than to attempt to refute the argument.

This afternoon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) used an argument that is always used by good tyrants when he said it would be more efficient for the Minister of National Revenue to make certain of these decisions than for the tariff board to make them. It does not matter whether it is fair; it does not matter whether it is just; it does not matter whether this is an arbitrary tax imposed upon the people, it is more efficient. The other argument is that it could be done confidentially. In other words, the minister decides in secret on the basis of secret information whether the tax shall be low or high or no tax at all. This is precisely what we are doing over the whole range of goods that may or may not be made in Canada. We are going to let the minister decide and the minister will have the final decision in every case.

It is true that, on a certain limited range of facts, an appeal will be permitted if the minister decides the goods are shelf goods. All the minister needs to do is decide they are custom made, and that finishes it. The fact of the matter is that the minister is being given the very widest possible powers, powers that cannot be challenged anywhere except in the House of Commons. Then, of course, we will be told it is not in the public interest to produce this information. If the information is so secret that the tariff board cannot be trusted to receive it, I can imagine how likely this government is to give it to members of the House of Commons.

The plain fact is that even supposing the government does want to change the definition of class or kind—there are a lot of objections to that but I do not propose to go into them because it seems to me that, Mr. Speaker, would be transgressing your ruling which I respect—because they are not satisfied that the courts have properly interpreted the law, some other course should have been followed. This all-wise Minister of Finance knows better than the courts. He knows better than the Speaker what the rules of the house should be. He alone has the key to the mind of the late Mr. Fielding. He has told us what Mr. Fielding meant when this legislation was enacted in 1907.

Mr. Lambert: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, certainly.

Mr. Lambert: Would he inform the house as to whether or not he holds opinions about legislation and expresses them in this house?

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, yes, I certainly do hold opinions. However, I have never, in this house, described the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada as an erosion of the law. Perhaps that is because I am not an eminent barrister like the Minister of Finance. It does seem to me that is an odd way of describing the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada. That has been done over and over again and was done again today by the minister.

The hon. gentleman knows so much more about it. How does he propose to get around it? I grant that parliament has a perfect right to change the law if we do not like the interpretation of the law by the Supreme Court of Canada. We are the legislators, but we are the legislators and not the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue sitting alone in his closet. That is the whole point. If this government were honest and straightforward—I do not mean honest in money matters, but I mean honest and straightforward in putting forward its legislation—

Mr. Argue: When you get the budget, you will talk about honesty in money matters.

Mr. Pickersgill: The fact that it is bungling and cannot tell the difference between a deficit and surplus does not surprise me. We had an indication of that when hon. members of the government talked about the way in which this country was being overtaxed at a time when the debt was being paid off instead of being accumulated. We are aware of the fact that the minister does not understand these things. We know that very well. We realize that this country is burdened with the most incompetent Minister of Finance it has had within living memory.

Mr. Nowlan: That statement is even more crazy than the other one.

Mr. Aiken: I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has allowed himself to be diverted from the subject under discussion by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I think he has now gone completely beyond the subject under discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am always grateful to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) who has helped me out more than once in the house. I am particularly grateful for the last time he did so. I will therefore come back to the point I was making and it was this. On March 31, 1958, the people of Canada did not decide that one or two ministers of the crown should be given the tariff making power. They decided to let the right hon. gentleman who is now the head of his government and his friends carry on the government of Canada; but they did so in large part, in my opinion, because they were told that this was a government that was going to restore the rights of parliament.

I personally confess that I was never impressed with the suggestion that parliament had ever lost any of its rights prior to that time, but I certainly know it has lost some of them since then. It certainly did so in that very summer of 1958. In that very summer of 1958 the first thing they did was to do what they are trying to make a more thorough job of now, that is to say, to take away from this parliament the tariff making power and to put it in the hands of one single minister who will not be answerable in that regard even to the cabinet, whose decisions may not even be known,—

Mr. Benidickson: There is no obligation to publish.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and who will be able to make one kind of decision in the case of one applicant and, when there is in fact a similar set of facts, make another kind of decision in the case of another applicant, with no power whatsoever on anyone's part to do anything.

Mr. Broome: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Broome: Is the hon. member suggesting that such power should be given to the minister only if he has the advantage of a glass ball in order to communicate with the late Mr. Fielding?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) should get the hon. member for Parry Sound to answer that question privately because it is quite clearly out of order and is utterly irrelevant to the matter before us. However, I will say in general terms that, no matter who the minister is, I do not think any minister should be given powers of the character of those which it is proposed to give in this legislation. That is the whole point. I do not think any minister should be given the powers that properly belong to parliament in this matter. That is my point.

If the government wants to come forward in a straightforward way and to change the definition and to allow the law to stand in other respects as it is, that would be one thing. We would probably object to their kind of definition. We certainly would object even to the kind of definition there is proposed today. But it is quite another thing to say that one minister shall be able to decide in one case that the duty will be 22½ per cent and in another case to decide it will be 7½ per cent without any kind of review of the facts of the case whatsoever by anybody or any possibility of any such review. I say that is taking away from parliament the power to determine in an effective manner.

It is true that a broad argument can be made, as it has often been made in other jurisdictions, that you can endow the government with all the powers that parliament has. That is what was done with many of our powers in the War Measures Act in 1914 but only for the period of war. Surely, however, it is not the kind of power that hon. gentlemen opposite think they are entitled to ask for at the present time. If they do so, I could quote many eloquent statements from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and other occupants of the treasury benches on this precise point.

There is no getting around the fact that once opinions instead of facts are to determine what the tariff shall be, once an opinion as to whether there are adequate facilities in Canada to make certain custom made goods and whether they can be economically produced—and these can only be opinions; they cannot possibly be anything else but opinions —there is no safeguard as to the essential point: Are these goods really going to be made in Canda? What is "made in Canada" going to mean? Is it going to mean that all the components will be made in the United States or somewhere else and then there will be final assembly here in Canada and that unless it is done in that way the duty will be 22½ per cent, but if it is done in that way, it will be only 7½ per cent? Is that what is intended? I think it is evident that what we are doing or are being asked to do is to give up our rights as members of parliament. May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: When we rose at six o'clock I was referring to the fact that one of the principal effects of this bill is to take away from parliament in any effective sense the right to make the tariff, the right to determine the duty which will be paid by a taxpayer with respect to a whole range of goods, while the government arrogates to itself the right to determine in a completely arbitrary fashion whether a particular article is custom made or shelf goods.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Was not the former done in 1904, and does the hon. gentleman object to that?

Mr. Pickersgill: By "the former" I presume the hon. gentleman means that a decision was made by parliament in 1904 that if something was made in Canada—which is, of course, a matter of fact, not a matter of opinion—the duty would be a certain amount, while if something was not made in Canada the duty would be a different amount. That is something which is done by parliament. It is true the determination of whether or not something was made or not made in Canada was arrived at by the administration. In the relatively simple industrial conditions of 1907 I do not think those determinations of fact would have required, in many cases, any very expert knowledge. If there is any defence for this bill at all it surely is that the whole distinction between shelf goods and custom made goods is something which no one would have thought of making in 1907. I do assert that if we are to say that in the case of the shelf goods they must actually be made in Canada but that in the case of custom made goods there must merely be a capacity for them to be made in Canada, then at least those questions should be determined publicly and in the open. Parliament should make definitions with regard to them, and then decisions should be reached publicly and in the open instead of secretly and in the minister's office without the right of appeal and in an utterly arbitrary manner.

That is the point which hon. members opposite are either utterly incapable of comprehending or, as I suspect, utterly unwilling to comprehend. The fact is that if the questions of whether goods are custom made or shelf goods is decided before a public tribunal where argument can be heard we could all see whether or not the will of parliament was being carried out. When those decisions are reached in secret, who is to decide? There is no reason why the minister should not say that the most ordinary thing made on an assembly line is a custom made article. That would not be an honest thing to do, but it would be within the power of the minister to do it. I contend that if we are going to make this distinction between custom made and shelf goods, then when a determination is made there should be proper publication of it and of all the reasons for it; there should be a determination before a tribunal and not in secret and in an arbitrary way by the minister.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does the hon. gentleman agree with the distinction in the first instance?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is totally irrelevant to the amendment and to my argument. When I come to speak on the second reading I shall deal with that question. However, I am endeavouring at the present time to confine myself strictly to the amendment—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member seeks to avoid answering the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman can go on muttering, but I suggest he listen. There are three ways in which I suggest the rights of parliament are being taken away. In the first place the arbitrary and secret power to decide whether or not an article is custom made destroys any effective control by parliament over the tariff. In the second place, the arbitrary power to decide whether adequate facilities exist destroys any effective control by parliament or, indeed, anyone else except the minister himself, and, third, the question of what is a reasonable period of time, which is also left to the arbitrary opinion of the minister or one of his officials, also, I suggest, involves an encroachment on the rights of parliament.

Many hon. members will have read in the local newspapers the brief accounts of the budget speech made today by the chancellor of the exchequer in the United Kingdom. They will have seen that the chancellor has asked that he be given the power to raise or lower certain duties there by not more than 10 per cent to meet certain economic problems which may arise in the course of the next year, and that he has also asked to have that power limited strictly to a term ending on August 31, 1962 unless at a subsequent session of parliament it should be renewed. This is precisely the difference between what is and what is not disruptive of parliamentary control. Here, the government of the United Kingdom is seeking, as all governments must at times, certain limited powers to act quickly. But those powers are carefully and clearly defined and a time limit is placed upon them. It will not be beyond the recollection of many hon. gentlemen sitting on the treasury benches how much importance they attached not so many years ago to the matter of a time limit in connection with powers given to the governor in council. I contend that clause 3 of this bill justifies my saying that the power of parliament effectively to determine the tariff is being taken away from parliament.

I said I would deal with one argument which has been advanced from the government benches and I think there is no better way of dealing with the argument raised by the Minister of Finance than to repeat a quotation given a few days ago in this house by my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River. If you think, Mr. Speaker, that I am quoting from another debate, then I am, sir, but what I am quoting is from a debate which took place in another session. I am quoting what the Prime Minister said when he was on this side of the house in 1950 and the words could not be more apt than they are:

> The attitude that an opposition is something to put up with on occasion is prevalent in some quarters ... If the cabinet is to be trusted—

And we are being asked here to trust, not the cabinet, but one minister only—

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

> —and if we are to accept at face value what ministers say, we had better all be absent from this house.

That is really what we are talking about. We are saying that if the taxing power, the determination of the rights of taxation, and the mode of taxation are to be taken away from this house and vested in one minister of the crown without appeal and without publicity, in secret, then indeed we had better not be here.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That was done by Laurier and Fielding.

An hon. Member: Get up and tell us about it.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I must say a few words on this amendment before the vote is put. It is a very strange amendment coming from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) who was a member of a government which, time after time, brought in the type of legislation about which he is now complaining. I do not know what particular passage he was quoting from a few minutes ago in using the words of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) but undoubtedly it was something very similar to the proposal now before us.

I have to admit that the words of subclause 3 of clause 2(a) have troubled me since I first read them, because undue delegation of authority to the executive and the removal of the right of appeal are two principles to which I am opposed. Under the previous government they were used constantly until they almost became commonplace. So far as I know this is the first piece of legislation that this government has introduced in nearly four years in office which contains a provision of this type, in which the minister's decision is final. I feel, therefore, that we have to look at this clause very carefully before passing judgment on it.

Quite a number of matters in this bill will require interpretation. I would like to list them as they appear to me and then examine which of these provisions will require the interpretation of the minister and which of them will require the interpretation of the courts. The first provision that will have to be decided is, what are goods other than goods custom made? The second matter is, how shall the word "approximately" be applied to a given situation? The third is, what is the definition of the words "class or kind"? The fourth is, what is the definition of the words "made or produced in Canada"? The fifth matter is, do adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production of such goods, within a reasonable period of time? The sixth matter involves the interpretation of subclause 2 of the legislation. The seventh matter is, what is the normal Canadian consumption, and the final matter involves an interpretation of subsection 9 of section 6 of the act, as amended by this bill.

I have set forth eight matters in which, it seems to me, a decision must be arrived at for the administration of the bill. Of these eight matters, three are commended to the decision of the minister, and five are left to the courts' interpretation. I realize that we cannot make a decision in respect of the balance of probabilities or because of majority alone. I do want to point out that this is not a case where the act is passed and committed thereupon immediately to the sole discretion of the minister. In certain matters his discretion is final, but in the majority of matters that is not so.

Furthermore, this is an isolated piece of legislation designed to meet a particular need and does not indicate, in my belief, any trend. The minister has carefully and adequately explained the special circumstances under which the three items are committed to the sole decision of the Minister of National Revenue. I accept that explanation and feel that in this particular instance it is sufficient. I must say, however, that if such a trend were to appear in the legislation introduced by this government, or any government, it would cause one to be concerned and, if such legislation became commonplace, I would have to take a much stronger stand. However, I am not going to stand out in the lobby when the vote is taken on this amendment. I am going to vote against it because I do not feel that a sufficient case has been made out against the legislation introduced by the minister.

Hon. members opposite may say I am in an anomalous position in that I am speaking generalities in one case and specifics in another. I would like to point out to them that this is the very situation they are in. They have been talking today in grandiose terms against protective tariffs in generalities. They say they are against protective tariffs and against this type of legislation in general terms but when we come to specific items such as automobiles, textiles, fruit and vegetables and plywood, time and again hon. members in the opposition have risen to ask what the government intends to do to protect these industries. When the government makes some announcement of a policy to assist these various industries, and there have been several such announcements, opposition members are particularly in accord.

I mentioned particularly the fruit and vegetable industry, and I would suggest that if it were not for certain protection given to the fruit farmers they would in certain parts of British Columbia and Ontario have had a very difficult year. As a matter of fact I understand they have had a reasonably good year.

I point out these matters because, as a matter of interest, it is easy for an individual to say in general that he is against something but when dealing with specifics the same individuals are for them. I think the opposition members must also take note of the position and stand they have taken regarding this bill. They state that they are against protecting Canadian producers and manufacturers but when specific items come before us, they say they are for them, in spite of being against them in general.

I have outlined the position as I see it and I suggest that all hon. members of this house must be honest with themselves when speaking on this particular bill.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, this bill is designed to amend sections 2 to 6 of the Customs Tariff with regard to goods of a class or kind made in Canada.

If we look closely at it we note that it is unquestionably a bill that will lead directly to protectionist measures.

I refer the house in particular to subsection (3) of section 2A. It is clearly stated there that the minister's decision will be final.

Therefore, I suggest that the purpose of this bill is to abolish the essential rights of parliament, as well as the powers of the tariff board, and to confer absolute and arbitrary power upon the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan).

I read the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) at the resolution stage. This is what he said then:

> This measure will ensure a greater discretion to the Minister of National Revenue with regard to decisions to be made under section 3.

It is not a matter of greater discretion but of an absolute and irrevocable power. It is nothing less than a reactionary right.

In other words, taxpayers are being deprived of a right recognized by British law and by tradition.

Regarding the dangers of using this discretionary power, I wish to read a few sentences from a book entitled:

(Text):

"Senate special committee on taxation, 1945." I am referring to a brief presented by the income tax payers' association to the Senate committee in 1945. This brief was read by Professor McDougall, associate professor of commerce, Queen's University. Here is what the brief had to say concerning this precise problem of ministerial discretion, at page 297:

> May we recall in this connection the famous saying of the Middlesex rebels, "Where discretion begins, law, liberty and safety end."

In this brief the question is asked, "How is discretion exercised?" The question is answered in the brief in this way:

> Normally it is given to the minister. In practice it is in the hands of the deputy minister and through him it is frequently exercised by other officials including junior assessors. Junior assessors first deal with and report on income tax returns. These reports go to head office and are there either confirmed or overruled by more senior officials. It is reasonable to believe that only the more important or "larger" matters ever reach the desk of even the deputy minister—and perhaps never the minister. The fact is, therefore, that ministerial discretion is exercised, never by the minister, in a few instances by the deputy minister but in the main by various clerks, assessors, other officials of the income tax service. One can well realize that the only safe decision for assessors and clerks to make is against the taxpayer.

Then, at page 299 we find the following:

> We strongly urge therefore that the taxing power be returned to parliament where it belongs and that ministerial discretion be limited to administrative acts only, such as the prescribing of forms, the specifying of dates for filing and similar powers which pertain rightfully to the minister's duties as an administrator. In cases where it appears that it is impossible to avoid the granting of some judicial or semi-judicial functions to the minister or his officials, the exercise of discretion by them should never be final but should be subject to appeal to an independent appeal tribunal in the manner hereinafter referred to in respect of appeals.

(Translation):

Now, Mr. Speaker, the tradition is that parliament enacts legislation and that judicial or semi-judicial bodies are responsible for its interpretation. Such is the custom and tradition.

With this Bill C-72, we are taking a step backward. I say it is unwise to get away from this tradition. No serious reason has been advanced so far to justify such unappealable decisions as are provided for under this bill.

As the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) rightly mentioned, a customs duty is a tax, and the taxing power belongs exclusively to the House of Commons.

The immediate result of this bill will be to evoke feelings of uneasiness and uncertainty in Canadian business circles, because in many cases, very costly goods and considerable amounts will be involved.

Following the fears expressed by the members of the opposition in the debate on the resolution, I would have hoped that the minister would reconsider; apparently, he has done no such thing, or if he has, he has persisted in his initial attitude.

If this bill is passed, it can only be a cause for regret, because some of its provisions are contrary to the traditions and essential rules of parliament.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), in his amendment, proposes, for the above reasons, that the bill be not now read a second time.

In closing, may I add this. It is rather strange to find that the very people who opposed the amendment put forward before six o'clock by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River are those who, in the past three or four years, have been so vociferous in calling for the maintenance of parliamentary rights and those century old rights which we have acquired through parliamentary tradition.

(Text):

Mr. H. C. McQuillan (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as a member from British Columbia, a province whose welfare depends greatly on export industries, I cannot subscribe to anything or any trend which may adversely affect the welfare of those industries or increase the capital cost of the plants and operations which produce those goods. In this I may be classed by many as provincially minded but I do not consider myself so. I sincerely believe I am thinking in the best interests of all of Canada. Furthermore, as a citizen of British Columbia, a province in which discretionary powers of ministers have not always been used in what I consider to be the best interests of the people, I oppose granting such powers to ministers of the crown excepting in circumstances of extreme necessity and urgency. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to support this amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I will vote for this amendment because the bill proposes to remove from parliament certain of its taxing powers. I believe this is the first time I have seen this happen in the house. I recall vividly the debate on the Emergency Powers Act which was to apply for a limited period of time. I recall the minister and other members of the treasury benches found fault with the government at that time because they said the government was assuming powers that rightfully belonged to parliament. At that time the emergency powers bill had a time limit. The bill now before us has no time limit. It will be passed by a big majority in the house and can only be revoked by a majority of the house.

This afternoon the minister referred to the fact that certain measures would be taken because of confidential information. This suggests to me that because certain information would be confidential the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) could not be compelled to give any information to the house concerning why certain duties had been applied. As members of the house we are surrendering our right to tax and also our right to obtain information as to the reasons why certain duties are imposed. If there has been erosion by the tariff board, if there has been erosion by the Supreme Court of Canada, if there has been contraction in the meaning of the words "class or kind", I would much prefer to see the government spell out the remedy in legislation and leave the right of appeal to the tariff board and to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

I think this legislation could lead to abuses. I am not referring to the present Minister of National Revenue any more than to his successors. To all intents and purposes this legislation will become permanent and will be removed only because of abuses or other causes. When the minister replies I would ask him to explain why this particular aspect of taxation cannot be spelled out in legislation as is the case with all other forms of taxation. In other words, is it not possible to bring forward a broader definition of "class or kind" goods which will stick so far as the tariff board and the Exchequer Court of Canada are concerned?

This afternoon the minister said, I think, that the Minister of National Revenue would have the final decision on three points. The first was with respect to whether goods are shelf goods or custom made to specification. It strikes me that these two things can be defined in such a way as to distinguish them. Second, in the case of shelf goods he said that the Minister of National Revenue would have the power to decide whether or not Canadian production amounted to 10 per cent of our consumption. This is factual information which should be available to all and I do not think such a matter should come before the minister for decision. I can see that there might be some difficulty with respect to the third point, namely, whether in the case of custom made goods adequate facilities exist in Canada to make them economically within a reasonable period of time.

So far as the first two points are concerned, I think the government could spell them out in legislation. In the one case factual information is involved and in the other case it is just a matter of a definition to distinguish shelf goods and custom made goods. I do not think that would be very difficult. The only difficulty that might arise, and which I think all of us appreciate, is whether or not facilities exist in Canada for the production of the custom goods made to specifications.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, my remarks at this time will be rather brief. I listened with particular interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) who seemed to be especially concerned about the loss of the rights of parliament in connection with the application of tariffs and duties. I should like to remind him that perhaps one of the last acts of the former government of which he was a minister was to impose a fair value for duty purposes on fruits and vegetables. They took this action and raised the tariff on certain fruits at that time, which was indeed a raising of tariffs without consulting parliament.

I remember the announcement in the newspapers at that time with respect to this action of the cabinet by order in council. It was pointed out in press reports that the then minister of finance, Walter Harris, had seen fit to take this action. He had reached into the closet and pulled out an old act passed in the days of the Bennett regime which had not been used for 22 years. However, when the chips were down and the former government was in trouble it decided to put the act into effect. This is indeed quite contrary to the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate at this time. What was good at that time surely should be good at the present time.

Last year or the year before the matter of fair value for duty purposes was debated in this house and discretionary powers were placed in the hands of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) to take action if he saw fit. We went through the whole matter at that time. It was said that in taking such action we were only looking for retaliation from the United States but there has not been any retaliation, and after listening to all the debate I still feel that to place this reclassification matter in the hands of the Minister of National Revenue is to place it where it should be.

Perhaps the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) would prefer to have the present regulations continue whereby in order to secure a reclassification the matter has to go to the tariff board. Sometimes the board takes a year or two years to make a recommendation and then the matter has to come before parliament which may take six months or more to dispose of it. Therefore I think it is quite in order that we should cut out a lot of this red tape and get down to placing the responsibilities where they belong.

Division

I did not hear all the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) but when I came into the house he was referring to statements I had made at the resolution stage. I think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River will understand that I respect the opinions he expresses in the house on many occasions, though I do not always agree with him. I should like to say that when I spoke on the resolution stage I was speaking more or less in general terms. At that time I referred to several commodities that could be made in Canada, some of which in fact are made here, and the fact that goods of a similar kind came into this country duty free. While the bill might not cover all the commodities I mentioned, I felt it was a step in the right direction and I still feel that way. I know that the house is anxious to get along with the bill, Mr. Speaker, and I believe these are the only points I wish to make. My only disappointment with respect to the bill is that it perhaps does not go far enough.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Benidickson) which was negatived on the following division:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I said earlier when I was making a few observations on the amendment put forward by my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River that I intended to abide by the ruling of His Honour the Deputy Speaker and speak strictly on the amendment, reserving the general observations which I had to make about the bill untill we came to discuss the minister's motion for second reading.

I may say that it does seem to me that extraordinary as it was for the government to introduce this legislation at any time, in the light of what has happened in the weeks, the months, since this legislation was first proposed in the budget speech on December 20, during most of which time the minister has postponed it from time to time so that there would not be an opportunity to debate it consecutively—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is utterly without truth.

Mr. Pickersgill: While the minister has been flitting back and forth to British Columbia in equally futile efforts, during that time we have seen in every other country of commercial importance in the free world increasing indication that the whole trend, except in our own country, is toward the liberation of trade not toward the restriction of trade. Yet here are we under the present government going against the stream of freedom in the world at the present time.

It seems to me that anyone who has paid any attention to what was said as recently as last week by the British Prime Minister when he was here would appreciate how ill-timed, how unfortunate it is for the real interest of the country to be moving in the direction in which we are moving at the present time. It has already been made clear —and I do not intend to traverse this ground again this evening—that all the great export industries of this country, the industries which are finding competition increasingly difficult to meet as other countries rehabilitate their industry and build up their capital, are really greatly concerned about this move by the government which, they fear, as my hon. friend from Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) pointed out at an earlier stage in the debate, will have the effect of increasing their costs or alternatively, driving them into the use of less efficient machinery or more costly machinery than would otherwise be the case.

It seems to me that these broad considerations ought to have influenced the government. It seems they should have taken account of the reaction in the world at large and the reaction of our export industries on whose success the income of about one of every four Canadians depends. It seems to me the government should have been warned by all this that we were moving in the wrong direction and that they should call a halt and abandon this legislation.

The Minister of Finance has told us over and over again that the principal reason for bringing this legislation before parliament at this time is that over the years the tariff board and the courts have eroded the law. In other words, the minister has said that neither the tariff board nor the courts knew what parliament meant and that the effect of the law as it was until 1949 has been changed by the decisions of the board and of the courts. I must say this is the first time in my recollection that a minister of the crown who is also an eminent member of the bar has criticized in this fashion decisions of the courts including the highest court of our country. However, as I said earlier, if the government feels the law as it now stands and as it has been interpreted by the courts does not represent what the majority of the members of this parliament want, then I suggest they should change the law and not attempt to abolish the rule of law.

Even if the supreme court has been as misguided as the Minister of Finance represented it as having been, the hon. gentleman is surely in error in suggesting that we must extinguish the jurisdiction of the court in the future. That, of course, will be the effect of this legislation.

In response to a request which I made at an earlier stage of the proceedings in committee—a request that we should be furnished with concrete examples of this alleged erosion; erosion which I may say the minister repeatedly said had taken place between 1950 and 1960—the hon. gentleman went back and spent some time discussing two or three cases in 1933 and 1934 which could not have had any conceivable relevance to the matter before us nor even to the proposition he himself had made. Then the hon. gentleman went on to cite the case in 1950 of the .22 rifles. This was the only case he took the trouble to discuss in some detail, and the minister was not very explicit even about that. But to the extent that he was explicit he was quite wrong.

What actually happened in 1950 was that the tariff board did not uphold the decision of the deputy minister at that time but, instead, went back to a decision of the deputy minister in 1939 and supported it. So, far from there being any erosion by the tariff board there would appear to have been some misinterpretation in 1950 of the meaning, as it was understood in 1939 of this legislation by parliament, and the tariff board, as one would expect, went back to that earlier decision.

The Minister of Finance, with the vast experience that he acquired over the years in opposition and the very brief experience he has had as Minister of Finance, in which his capacity for sound judgment in respect of financial problems has been demonstrated in such striking fashion to the country and to the house, has made a suggestion that is difficult to accept. The tariff board which, during practically all this period, he said, was characterized by this erosion, was presided over by Mr. Hector McKinnon who perhaps more than any other person in this country was in the confidence of the ministers of finance who were responsible for the law as it was in 1939, and in 1930 when Mr. Dunning first proposed this legislation in its modern form. To suggest that Mr. Hector McKinnon, who made these decisions, did not know what the law meant, but that the Minister of Finance who was opposed to the government that was responsible both for proposing and administering of the law is endowed with some special insight into it, is a proposal which every informed person will find very hard to swallow.

As my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) has pointed out, Mr. McKinnon, after being for many years the principal tariff adviser to the Minister of Finance, and for 15 years the chairman of the tariff board, and even more extraordinary, after this vote of want of confidence by the Minister of Finance in

Mr. McKinnon, he is still employed now, after his retirement, to advise the government and to conduct negotiations on its behalf. It does seem to me that the government would have been wise to think up some different excuse for this legislation than an attack upon Mr. McKinnon's knowledge of the law and on the capacity of the Supreme Court of Canada to interpret it. The Minister of Finance having misrepresented the rifle case to the house, then referred us to a lot of other cases but did not make the slightest attempt to show in any respect whatsoever how there could have been erosion.

Mr. Benidickson: That will take some days to look up.

Mr. Pickersgill: The most serious of all the objections, except the one the house has already expressed a view on, but which is equal to it in its import, is the deliberate attempt of the government to abolish the rule of law, a deliberate attempt on the part of the government to exclude the taxpayer from the court, to which, up to now, he has had access.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would agree with me that the question has been disposed of on the amendment?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir, I do not think that question has been disposed of by the amendment. The amendment we had before us dealt with the taking away from parliament the tariff making powers, but did not in any way deal with the question of the denial of the right of appeal. It may be that—in order to show that the rights of parliament were taken away; there was, incidentally, reference to this other matter, but it does not seem to me that it was in any sense whasoever the subject of the amendment—this denial of the right of appeal, which is clearly set out in the legislation itself, and which is one of the fundamental terms of the legislation which the government has argued is necessary in order to make the legislation effective, is every bit as objectionable as the attempt to take from parliament its power to determine tariffs.

At page 1668 of Hansard of February 2, 1961 while in committee, the Minister of Finance in a reply to an intervention of mine, had the following to say:

> Mr. Pickersgill: —He is denying the right to an appeal in the future, and that is what we are objecting to.
> Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You see, Mr. Chairman, this speech has been introduced under the guise of asking a question.
> Mr. Pickersgill: Well, answer it.
> Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Answer the speech? I shall be prepared to answer anything that is raised in the committee and I shall be prepared to answer this point, but I will first draw to your attention, Mr. Chairman, the manner in which the hon. member, having taken to himself the right to ask a question, then comes forward in typical style to supply his own answer, which is a most erroneous and misleading answer, and then sits down with a look of utter satisfaction although the answer he has supplied to his own question is wrong.
> Mr. Pickersgill: You give the answer, then.
> Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I make my own statement?
> Mr. Pickersgill: Give the answer; never mind all the verbiage.

The minister then went off on some other theme. He has obviously been exceedingly uncomfortable about this matter and has sought, as far as possible, to evade direct answers. There is no way of getting around the fact that on three of the most important questions of fact—indeed one of them is absolutely fundamental—the minister's decision is to be final and not subject to appeal. I do not think that is in question. I have a good many references and am prepared to read them if it is. The minister decides finally on the basis of confidential information, without review or appeal of any kind, even by the cabinet, what goods are shelf goods and what custom made goods. This is a question of fact in respect of which it has never been necessary in the past to have a determination by the tariff board or the courts.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the hon. gentleman going to answer the question I asked in regard to this point?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member would like to repeat it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The question I asked the hon. gentleman earlier, which he avoided, was whether he approved of the distinction that was made between shelf goods and custom goods made to specification?

Mr. Pickersgill: I certainly do not approve of the distinction in the form it is made in this bill. I do not approve of giving the Minister of National Revenue the power to determine whether an article is custom made or shelf goods. As to the broader question which the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) has asked—it is a very important one—I would say this. I have the very gravest doubts as to whether, under the obligations we entered into in the Canada-United States trade agreement, and subsequently in GATT, that it is a proper thing to do; I fear it is a thing that will be regarded as an infringement of obligations solemnly entered into for this parliament to say that goods are made in Canada, and to use that provision of the law, in respect of things that are not made in Canada.

That is made perfectly clear with the definition that is given here of "custom made to specifications", and whether adequate facilities exist in Canada to make them. I am sure that, if I were the representative of another country having commercial relations with Canada, another country which had agreed to the provisions that now exist in the law, I would regard this as an evasion of that law. I am perfectly sure that if the Americans undertook to do anything similar we would, as the minister used to say when he was over here, talk to them in no uncertain terms. Well, he does not talk that loud any more now when he has to go down to Washington and see them. In fact, what began with a bang is ending in a whimper so far as the minister is concerned when he goes to Washington.

But the plain fact is if the Americans made a similar distinction in relation to something that we thought they had conceded to us in a trade agreement there would be a mighty howl in Canada about it, and every Canadian who is honest with himself knows it. To me it looks like pretty sharp practice. But I say, sir, that if any distinction is to be made it should be made clearly and explicitly by this parliament, and that the question of fact should be determinable by the tariff board as other questions have been determinable by the tariff board in the past in respect of these "made in Canada" rules. In the past every aspect of the facts has been open to review by the tariff board. Now certain aspects are taken away from them. This is the whole point.

There might be an argument for saying that there should be no court of appeal, no review instituted on something which has never been reviewed in the past, administrative decisions which have never been the subject of appeal in the past. But here, sir, we are deliberately saying that some of the facts which in the past have been appealable to the tariff board and to the courts are no longer to be appealable. In other words, we are extinguishing an existing right to judicial determination of facts and vesting the decision instead in a single minister. It seems to me, sir, that that is far and away the most serious aspect of this legislation apart, as I have said, from the derogation of the rights of parliament which we believe the bill also embodies.

The most serious feature is, of course, the minister making the final decision. I ask the minister again why? I ask the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), who has some regard for these matters, why should the tariff board not be able to look at all these facts? Surely the question of whether an article is custom made or shelf goods is a question of fact which could be determined in the open, publicly, with argument heard on both sides.

One of the ministers said that it was a very simple matter; the other rather suggested it was not; we have had a good deal of double talk of that sort. To me it should be a matter of fact, and it should be determined in the open and publicly.

This is not a small matter; this is a matter that can affect business operations and affect employment. I understand that at the beginning of the afternoon, before I was able to get into the house, the minister talked about this so-called erosion having affected employment adversely. Well, we are very much afraid that these arbitrary decisions, against which there is going to be no appeal, are going to affect employment adversely.

Then, sir, why should normal Canadian consumption of shelf goods be abstracted from the list of facts which the tariff board can determine? Even when something is ruled to be shelf goods, why should just one of the facts be taken away? I cannot give any rational explanation of that at all and I have not heard any from the other side of the house. The tariff board can determine the production but not the consumption. If anything might have been considered secret, one would have thought that the production would be more apt to be something about which producers would be concerned with maintaining secrecy. Surely the total consumption in Canada should not be a matter of secrecy. The suggestion that there is some mysterious statistic available to the Minister of National Revenue that would not be available to the tariff board is a suggestion that anybody with the faintest experience with administration knows is too ridiculous an argument to be seriously accepted for a moment.

It seems to me, sir, that there is just no rational justification whatsoever for this clause. The result is that the denial of the right of appeal has created in many minds the impression the government is doing this deliberately because it wants to have the capacity to favour some people as opposed to others. I am not making this charge myself. This is an impression that is widespread in the country and it is the kind of impression that is bound to be created whenever these secret and arbitrary powers are given to ministers of the crown.

Why do they want them to be secret? Why do they want them to be arbitrary? What are they afraid of? I remember Mr. Graydon, the former leader of the opposition, would talk about pulling up the blinds and letting in the light. The Prime Minister used to be very eloquent on this subject when he was on this side of the house.

As I say, even if the government does want to change these definitions, even if it does want the rest of this legislation, it is impossible to see why it feels it necessary to deny and to nullify the right of appeal that now exists.

I reminded the committee at an earlier stage, and I should like to recall it once more of a statement made by the Minister of Finance some years ago, which I think all of us in this house should ponder. I may say I do not too often agree with the Minister of Finance. He was not minister of finance then, but I certainly agree with what he said at that time. This is what he said, and it is very apt. It applies with great force to the legislation now before us. On June 7, 1955, the Minister of Finance said, as recorded at page 4524 of Hansard of that day:

> Sir, hon. members, as I conceive it, were elected to this house to legislate, not to abdicate the legislative function to the government. They are elected to preserve freedom, not to open the doors or admit the Trojan horse of executive power into the citadel of Canadian freedom.
> We of Her Majesty's loyal opposition have fought this kind of legislation, and I think we can point to some success.

Well, considering the kind of government we have now, I am not sure, sir, that we will be able to point to any success; but I do say that that is no reason why we should not fight this attempt to abrogate the rule of law, this attempt to take away access to the courts which now exists, this attempt by a government that only a year ago asked this parliament, and got this parliament unanimously to enact a bill of rights, to take away one of the fundamental rights that bill was supposed to safeguard. That, sir, is in the highest degree astonishing to us on this side of the house and, of course, not only to us.

I should like to refer to, and to express as my own views, views that were expressed on March 18 in a journal published in this country which is not a notorious proponent of free trade, a journal which I think may fairly be regarded as a supporter of, at any rate, moderate protection. I refer to the Financial Post. As I say, I make these words completely my own. That paper said:

> For all Canadians, as well as for manufacturers and importers, a very basic principle is at stake in the current revision of the Canadian Customs Tariff Act. It is the right of a private citizen to appeal to an independent tribunal if he believes he has been wronged by those empowered to administer and put into effect government legislation. This is precisely the right that is being taken away in one part of the government bill, currently before the house, to define whether goods are of a "class or kind" made in Canada. In three specific matters, the decision of the Minister of National Revenue will be final and, if the bill passes in its present form, there can be no appeal to the independent tariff board. This is unwanted, unnecessary and dangerous. The thing should be strangled in its cradle.

Indeed, sir, one wonders why it was ever born, especially with the paternity of the right hon. gentleman who also sponsored the bill of rights. Therefore, sir, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer):

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house declines to proceed with a bill the fundamental terms of which, by seeking to deny an appeal by the subject to the courts now provided by law, are repugnant to the spirit and objectives of the Canadian bill of rights."

Mr. Speaker: Before I place this amendment before the house, is there any comment?

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Because of the lateness of the hour, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might be permitted to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Regier: If hon. members object, I shall begin. We have been entertained over a considerable number of days at various stages of this measure by spokesmen for the Liberal party. I can remember very well an election campaign in 1940 when the speaker so adequately and so graphically explained to his audience that, despite the differences or the professed differences of the Liberals and Conservatives on this matter of tariffs, to the consumers and to the producers of Canada each time there was a change of government all it meant was higher tariffs regardless of any election promises or any speeches they had made in years gone by.

I also thought that the Liberals had a great deal of gall to be appealing to the parliament of Canada and to the people of Canada at this stage with regard to the rights of parliament. After all, I do not think I am the only one in Canada who has a bit of a memory. We can remember only too well that a limited number of years ago the Liberal party of Canada showed no concern for the rights of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will agree with me that the issue with regard to parliament delegating its authority was disposed of by the first amendment. The second amendment disposed of another question. The hon. member has a rather limited scope now in the debate on second reading.

Mr. Regier: I should like to express my disappointment. The minister today made it abundantly clear that he was not happy with the decisions of the tariff board. He spoke of erosion of the customs tariff legislation that had occurred because of the decisions of the tariff board. To me the minister came very close to expressing contempt for what is in effect a court of law established by this parliament.

I wonder whether I might move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the house leader what we will do tomorrow and the next day.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will carry on with this debate. If it is concluded, we will then take item No. 5 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-82 which refers to a convention between Canada and the United States of America with regard to taxation matters. If that business is concluded, we will take item No. 9 on today's order paper, a resolution in the name of the Minister of Labour dealing with vocational rehabilitation.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

SEAWARD DEFENCE, HALIFAX

Question No. 167—Mr. Tucker:

1. What is the present role assigned to seaward defence in the defence establishment at Halifax, N.S.?

2. How many personnel are there at seaward defence, and have there been any reductions in personnel since June 1957?

3. If so, to what extent, and with respect to which classification?

Answer by: Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence):

1. The present role assigned to seaward defence in the defence establishment at Halifax, Nova Scotia is as follows: the storage, installation and maintenance of minesweeping towed equipment; anti-torpedo net defences storage, installation and maintenance; storage, installation and maintenance of all Atlantic command ships' moorings and equipment; submarine cable laying and maintenance as required; and general assistance to other dockyard departments requiring the use of specialized equipments and skills.

2. A reduction has taken place in personnel since June 1957. At the present time there are 29 personnel employed at seaward defence.

3. The over-all reduction in personnel since June, 1957, totals 33 personnel in the following classifications: 2 storesmen 1, 3 rigger supervisors, 4 riggers, 10 riggers helpers, 2 labourers, 1 machinist, 1 acetylene welder, 1 electrical cable splicer, 6 naval officers, 1 chief petty officer, 2 petty officers.

C.N.R.—SUPERVISORY PERSONNEL, CAPREOL, ONT.

Question No. 170—Mr. Fisher:

1. Does the Canadian National Railways employ at Capreol at the present time any supervisory personnel with the following titles: trainmaster, area managers, superintendent of transport, superintendent of motive power, yardmasters, and car foremen?

2. If so, how many of each category?

3. How many of these positions are new to the Capreol headquarters since the changes in the management structure?

4. How many senior supervisory personnel worked in Capreol before such changes?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Prior to the general changes in the railway organization structure, Capreol was a division headquarters point under the jurisdiction of a superintendent. Its district headquarters was located at North Bay under the jurisdiction of a general superintendent assisted by a superintendent of transportation, superintendent of motive power and car equipment, and a district engineer. Two other divisions each headed by a superintendent which reported to the same district headquarters were Hornepayne and Allandale. Under reorganization, the district and its divisions were abolished and an area with headquarters at Capreol was established.

2. 3 trainmaster-road foremen, 1 area manager, 1 transportation officer (formerly superintendent of transportation), 2 superintendent of equipment (formerly superintendent of motive power and car equipment). The positions of superintendent of transportation and superintendent of motive power and car equipment were reclassified as transportation officer and superintendent of equipment under reorganization.

3. 2 trainmaster-road foremen, 1 area manager, 1 transportation officer, 1 superintendent of equipment.

4. The organization structure is not specifically comparable before and after the changes but as a division headquarters, Capreol was under the jurisdiction of a superintendent and was assisted by 31 supervisors.

C.N.R. SUPERVISORY ADMINISTRATION, EDMONTON

Question No. 172—Mr. Fisher:

1. What was the total monthly payroll of the supervisory Canadian National Railways administration for the month of November 1960 in Edmonton?

2. What was the total payroll of the supervisory C.N.R. administration for the month of February 1961?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. The total monthly payroll of the supervisory railway administration in Edmonton for the month of November, 1960, was approximately $70,000.

2. Approximately $122,000.

(Prior to changes in the railway organization structure effective January 1, 1961, Edmonton was a district and divisional headquarters. Subsequent to reorganization Edmonton became the headquarters for the mountain region; also located there is the headquarters of the Edmonton area.)

C.N.R. TRACK BALLASTING, WABAMUM SUBDIVISION, ALTA.

Question No. 173—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did the Canadian National Railways carry out track ballasting on the Wabamum subdivision during 1959 and/or 1960?

2. If so, how many miles of track were ballasted?

3. Where did the C.N.R. get the gravel for this ballasting, and at what cost?

4. Did the ballasting prove satisfactory?

5. If not, what remedial measures, and at what cost, were carried out to prove a safe track with a high speed limit?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes—1959 and 1960.
2. 1959—79 miles.
   1960—12 miles.
3. Rosevear and Hinton pits. The prices of the crushed gravel are competitive but the range was between $1 and $2 per cubic yard.
4. Yes.
5. Answered by No. 4.

C.N.R. EFFICIENCY EXPERTS

Question No. 174—Mr. Fisher:

1. Does the Canadian National Railways employ any persons who are used as efficiency experts in studying the railways operations?
2. If so, how many such persons, and with what qualifications?
3. Do they work out of the Montreal head office completely, or are some assigned to work from other headquarters?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1 and 2. The objective of the company is to have all employees work toward the provision of efficient transportation services to meet the requirements of shippers and the travelling public. The company does not employ so-called "efficiency experts". If the question has reference to "work method" employees, as indicated in answer to question No. 82 (Hansard February 21, page 2290) there are 175 such employees. These include work study, methods, machine and material analysts. Candidates for such positions must have above average performance and a minimum of junior matriculation. Personnel so engaged are retrained employees and have an average of 12 years' service.

3. They work at various points across the system as part of the normal staff.

NEW C.N.R. REGIONAL SYSTEM, EDMONTON

Question No. 175—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did the Canadian National Railways announce on December 8, 1960, the creation of a new regional system centered at Edmonton, Alberta?
2. If so, what was the projection of the total staff after the new system was completely inaugurated?
3. How many of this staff are considered to be supervisory personnel?
4. How many supervisory personnel were stationed at Edmonton before the creation of the new regional system?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Canadian National announced in August 1960 a general plan of reorganization whereby five regions were created to replace the existing three. Edmonton is the headquarters of the new mountain region.

2. As at January 15, 1961, 8,251 railway employees in the mountain region.

3. 768.

4. There were 122 railway supervisory personnel at Edmonton before reorganization. At that time, Edmonton was a district and division headquarters under the jurisdiction of western region headquarters at Winnipeg. After January 1, Edmonton became the headquarters of the mountain region with corresponding relocation to that point of various functions necessary for the administration of a railway region.

RAILWAY WAGE COMPARISON STUDY—COST TO C.N.R.

Question No. 176—Mr. Fisher:

1. What was the cost to the Canadian National Railways of its share of the study prepared by Woods and Gordon on the comparability of rates paid railway workers with those in other industries?
2. Has Woods and Gordon received payment from the C.N.R. for its share of the report's cost?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. As indicated in answer to question No. 208 (Hansard March 22, page 3219), the study was undertaken at the request of the six railways making up the joint negotiating committee and the cost of it was borne by the six companies. In view of this, the Canadian National does not feel free to disclose the cost or apportionment of cost.

2. Yes.

T.C.A. FLYING TIME, FORT WILLIAM-VICTORIA

Question No. 180—Mr. Fisher:

1. What is the fastest flying time by Trans-Canada Air Lines to Victoria, British Columbia, from Fort William, Ontario?
2. Is the fastest flying time the most direct route? If not, what is the reason?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Trans-Canada Air Lines advise as follows:

1. Total elapsed time at present 13 hours and 10 minutes. Effective with the new timetable on April 30, total elapsed time will be 11 hours and 45 minutes.

2. No. There is no direct service between the lakehead and the Pacific coast because of the paucity of through traffic offering (69 through passengers booked lakehead to Victoria in 1960 and 66 Victoria to lakehead).

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 18, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

GRAIN

STATEMENT ON SHIPMENTS AND QUOTA POSITION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a number of the members from western Canada have been asking me about grain quotas in Manitoba and in the central and eastern parts of Saskatchewan. I am now able to report that even though, because of ice conditions, navigation has not been officially opened at the lakehead, grain is now moving in substantial volume. Fourteen million bushels have now been shipped, of which 9.9 million bushels were wheat. These 14 million bushels compare with shipments to the same date last year of 10.4 million bushels. There are 15 vessels now loading grain at terminals at the lakehead with grain destined for eastern Canada and export markets.

It is expected that in the weeks ahead a substantial volume of grain will be shipped from the lakehead. This means that producers in western Canada at shipping points tributary to the lakehead can look forward to greatly improved delivery opportunities and a general rise in the quota level.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister should exert every influence to have an increased volume of grain moved eastward because of the very low delivery quotas in Manitoba and in parts of Saskatchewan, particularly the central and eastern parts. As of April 5 there were quotas of 2 bushels or less at 270 points in Manitoba as compared with only 58 in that position a year ago. In Saskatchewan 871 points had the very low quotas of 2 or 3 bushels as compared with 467 in that position a year ago.

I had hoped that the minister would have given the house more information, and I should like to ask him this question on the orders of the day. What is the objective for the quota at the end of the crop year? Is it the target of the government to have an equalized quota? If so, do they hope that the quota will be 7 bushels an acre, 8 bushels an acre, or what does the minister think the situation will be?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I am not the official spokesman with respect to agriculture on this side of the house, but I could not resist the temptation to rise in connection with the announcement the minister has just made to indicate to him that while the announcement is most welcome, there is now every reason why an increase in the movement of grain, certainly eastward if not westward, can be expected because of the additional warehousing facilities that have been established on the St. Lawrence. I refer, of course, to Montreal where large extensions have been made, to Baie Comeau and, I believe, Sorel and Three Rivers.

There is one point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. The former minister of trade and commerce when he was in office announced a reduction in the cost of moving grain of 3 cents per bushel, and I am wondering whether the government has given consideration to a further reduction. I do so because when the former minister made the announcement I think he gave some indication that the reduction might eventually be in the neighbourhood of 5 cents per bushel. I hope the government will find it possible to reduce freight costs to a greater extent than 3 cents per bushel.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if I might ask my question of the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house what the grain delivery quotas will be by the end of the crop year, and does he envisage a general 7-bushel quota, 8-bushel quota or what will the level of the quota be?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, any minister charged with responsibility for the Canadian wheat board would be reluctant to make any definite commitment. However, I think it has been definitely established that a tremendous amount of energy and intelligence is going into the moving of grain out of the country. We will do our level best to equal the record created last year by the wheat board when all but 47 points were equalized at 7 bushels.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THREATENED RAIL STRIKE—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER TALKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question arising out of a statement by the Prime Minister on December 2 that the period—that is, the period between the passage of the legislation preventing a railroad strike and May 15, when that legislation expires—would be one of continued discussion between the parties. Has the government taken any steps recently to bring the parties in this dispute together again?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Ever since the bill was passed by parliament, Mr. Speaker, the government has had this aspect continually under consideration, and we are very much aware that May 16 is the date upon which this legislation terminates. Every effort will be made to bring about a settlement.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Following the tabling of the report of the royal commission, have the railways asked for any instructions or directions from the government in the light of the report?

Mr. Starr: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a supplementary question. In order to take a positive attitude, has the government or the minister made any proposals to the railway companies and to the employees that in the opinion of the government would be grounds for a fair settlement?

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Speaker.

REGINA—STATEMENT AS TO R.C.M.P. INTERVENTION IN LAUNDRY STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia asked me whether, in view of the statement made earlier by the Associate Minister of National Defence, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would respect the picket lines in operation in the course of a strike at the Rainbow Laundry and Dry Cleaners in Regina.

I said I would look into the facts and answer the hon. member today. I am advised —I trust that my information is correct, and if so I am sure the hon. member will be happy about it—that the strike ended on April 11.

GLEN EXELBY—INQUIRY AS TO EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Labour if he can say, in view of the offer made in his letter, whether the national employment service has as yet found employment for Mr. Exelby of Hamilton?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did such an excellent job in regard to Mr. Exelby that we are having some difficulty in placing him now, but will continue our efforts and in spite of that will be able to place him.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA—CANCELLATION OF LAND SALE CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether she can bring the house up to date on the present status of the Indian land deal at Sarnia.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the company involved defaulted on its commitments, and accordingly notice of cancellation of contract was sent to them last evening.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the hon. lady give the assurance that no part of the lands involved in this transaction will be deeded to any other persons?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, if the Indians require some subsequent disposal of the land, that will have to be considered on its own merits, but not under the contract which has now lapsed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not make myself clear. What I was asking the hon. lady was an assurance that no deed resulting from that transaction will be given to any other person.

Mrs. Fairclough: I gave that assurance to the hon. member the other day.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON COUNTER-REVOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister or the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. As we have been informed that news services from Cuba have been cut off at New York since the attacks began yesterday, and we have to depend now on the limited facilities available through commonwealth countries; and in view of the desire of the Canadian people to know the facts and the truth with respect to the present attacks on Cuba, can the minister inform the house whether he has any information as to the countries from which these attacks have been launched and the names of the persons responsible for this counter-revolution?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer to both parts of the question is no.

SPORTS

OLYMPIC GAMES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. L. McFarlane (Kootenay East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has he been advised that the Canadian Olympic association is considering only two sites for the 1968 winter Olympic games, namely Banff and Garibaldi, as stated recently in Maclean's magazine, although the report of the Foundation Company of Canada has not yet been made public?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think the Maclean's article can only be regarded as speculation, since the Canadian Olympic association has not reached a decision on the best site at which to hold the games.

Mr. McFarlane: May I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister point out to the Canadian Olympic association that as of April 9 there was 47 inches of snow at the bottom of the hill and 15 feet at the top in the Fernie area, while Banff is now closed down for lack of snow and Garibaldi has been shrouded in fog all week.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member should ask for an appointment to appear before the Olympic committee.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the minister. Have any ministers of the government been present with delegations making representations to the Canadian Olympic Association in support of the Garibaldi or Banff sites for the 1968 winter Olympics?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

JOHN WITHERS—ALLEGED EXTORTION FROM PERSONS UNDER DEPORTATION ORDERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether the hon. lady or her department is directing an investigation into the activity of a man in Toronto named John Withers, who claims some distant relationship to the hon. lady, and who apparently has been extorting money from persons under deportation orders.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): First of all, may I tell the hon. gentleman that if he will look farther along in the article he will find that the gentleman has denied any relationship, which I do also. In so far as an investigation is concerned, yes; the matter is being thoroughly investigated.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. lady say whether the department had any previous knowledge of the activities of this person before the recent incident arose?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, we had none, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

COMPETITION FROM VESSELS OF COMMONWEALTH REGISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. My question is based on reports that a Canada Steamship Lines vessel has been transferred to foreign registry, and that another ship of the Upper Lakes Shipping Company will also sail with a foreign flag at its mast. Can the minister indicate to the house whether the government intends to introduce legislation which would eliminate the unfair competition of commonwealth registered ships which are now permitted to carry goods between Canadian ports to the disadvantage of ships of Canadian registry?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am looking into the matter at the present time. Further examination by my department is necessary. As I indicated previously, I expect to have something to say about shipping policy generally before this session ends.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

PRAIRIE PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO INTERCITY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising from current reports that at an early date, possibly next week, a decision will be reached concerning the abandonment by Trans-Canada Air Lines of the prairie milk run. Will the minister give assurance that before any act of relinquishment by Trans-Canada Air Lines, and the granting of a franchise to another carrier, public hearings will be held at which interested parties may attend? Will he tell the house when such hearings are to take place, and whether they will be held in the west?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): There is no change in this situation. As I informed the house previously, public hearings will be held on this matter before a final decision is made. However, I am not yet in a position to say when these hearings will take place, but I can say that adequate notice will be given.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED RECRUITMENT OF PERSONNEL IN U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. On March 23 I asked the minister if he would comment on reports that the C.B.C. was recruiting personnel in the United Kingdom. Has the minister yet received information from the C.B.C. with regard to that matter, especially in view of the continuing lay-offs of personnel in the field of private television?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have been told that they have been recruiting architects and specialists for service in Canada. In view of the fact that there has been some need for additional personnel they have made inquiries with respect to the possibility of acquiring some outside of Canada, but I do not believe any action has been taken with respect to that matter at the present time.

ACADEMY AWARDS—PROTEST OVER DELAY IN NEWSCAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of National Revenue.

Will the minister inquire from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation why it places the future of Hollywood over that of the people of the North American continent? My question is based on the blackout of the C.B.C. news on Monday evening, the day following the anti-Castro landings in Cuba, which is an event that could seriously affect all of us. Instead of the news being televised, for several hours there was screened the awarding to several dozen voluptuous ladies—

[Mr. Brunsden.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether the hon. member has finished his speech, but so far I have not divined a question.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would think it was a compliment to the hon. member, because the C.B.C. assumed that he would be willing to sit up late to watch these voluptuous ladies and, having watched them, he would not mind sitting up even later to see the news.

HOUSING

N.H.A.—INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION IN MORTGAGE RATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the alleged statement by an official of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the effect that the differential between a National Housing Act insured loan and an uninsured conventional mortgage is outrageous, does the minister plan an early reduction in the N.H.A. rate?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I do not recall any such statement, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Do you not read the newspapers?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I have a supplementary question to ask the Minister of Public Works. Does the proposal announced by him yesterday permit the chartered banks to participate, in a back room kind of fashion, in housing mortgage lending in a way that has been denied recently by reason of the ceiling put on their lending rate?

Mr. Walker: No, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Finance. Having regard to the statutory ceiling on interest rates for the chartered banks, and having regard to the announcement made yesterday by the Minister of Public Works with respect to secondary mortgage financing, does the Minister of Finance think it would be possible for the chartered banks to buy up old mortgages and take advantage of discounts which would give them an effective rate beyond 6 per cent, and avoid the existing statutory liability on banks with respect to mortgage lending?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can draw no other inference than that this is the same question that was put a moment ago by the hon. member to my colleague the Minister of Public Works, under a different disguise.

Mr. Benidickson: But you are the financial expert.

[Later:]

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. If Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is embarking on a project of peddling $750 million of mortgages at this time for the savings of the Canadian public, to what extent will this interfere with the opportunities normally available to the provinces, municipalities and industries which also have demands on the savings of Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, first I must draw your attention to the misapprehension under which the hon. member is labouring, as indicated by his question. It is not the intention of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to peddle the mortgages it holds at all. Where a proper market exists to absorb mortgages on reasonable terms then the corporation will be in a position to dispose of such mortgages as it chooses.

As to the latter part of the observation of the hon. member, I think I might say it is hoped that the mortgages being offered to a mortgage market will serve to attract into this area of investment money that does not normally flow into capital investment in the ordinary course, of the kind to which the hon. member refers. I do not think it is doing justice to the outlook for this country to assume that we have reached the end of our resources at all. The government is disposed to take a much more optimistic view of both the outlook for and the capacity of the Canadian capital market than evidently the hon. member does.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I can ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question. Would the minister assure the house that this is not an act of retaliation against Premier Roblin?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member seriously advances that question with the expectation of receiving factual information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I quite agree that it is not a proper question, Mr. Speaker, but I am concerned in the event that an imputation of that kind is left on the record without reply. I can only say that a question of that kind is so nonsensical as to deserve only the rebuke of the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT OUTLOOK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Beech (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I wonder whether the minister could give us some information regarding the present housing outlook, and as to the present rate on limited dividend projects.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the rate of limited dividends is fixed by the borrowing rate of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and is presently 5⅜ per cent.

In connection with housing, housing starts in centres of 5,000 population and over numbered 13,200 to the end of March this year compared with 8,848 in the first quarter of 1960, an increase of 82.9 per cent. N.H.A. loan approvals for the first quarter of 1961 involved 12,355 dwelling units compared with 1,802 in this period last year, an increase of 585 per cent. In March alone N.H.A. approvals were higher than in March of any other year except 1958.

Requests for undertakings numbered 13,993 to the week ending April 7, compared with 2,388 in 1960. Commitments by approved lenders included in the total N.H.A., approvals were made for 5,674 dwellings compared with 1,780 in the first quarter of 1960. Loans for limited dividend housing were approved for 1,945 dwellings to April 7, 1961. This involved loans to the value of $15,611,000. In the same period last year 81 units were approved.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I am not sure whether the minister was answering a question, but in the event that he was perhaps I could pose a supplementary question. Does the minister have the figures for unsold houses at the present time as compared to a year ago?

Mr. Walker: No, Mr. Speaker, but probably the hon. member, who is in the business, would have better knowledge of that than I have.

Mr. McIlraith: He would undoubtedly have a much better idea.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO NUMBER DRAWING BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In order to complete the figures of the last release on the labour force, will the minister be kind enough to tell us the actual number of unemployed drawing unemployment insurance benefits?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the release that has been made is complete. If the hon. member wishes to have any other information from the records of the unemployment insurance commission, I shall be glad to supply it if he will place his question on the order paper.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question to ask the Minister of Labour. I wonder whether the minister would care to comment on the dismal figures as far as general unemployment is concerned at this time, when there are 705,000 unemployed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is endeavouring to initiate a debate rather than to get information.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask the minister whether he is prepared to comment on the figures that have just been released today. Can the minister say whether the government has any new proposal to deal with this very grave emergency?

Mr. Starr: If the hon. member refers to these figures as dismal, in his opinion, because they show a decrease in unemployment I can well understand—

Mr. Argue: The figure is 96,000 higher than it was last year.

Mr. Starr: This government realizes that the situation is serious. We have brought in measures—passed by this parliament and introduced in the budget at the end of last year—which we feel will bring about the desired result of supplying jobs for Canadians. This release shows a slight decrease in unemployment. We feel that is a great deal better than showing an increase. If that is a dismal aspect to the hon. member for Assiniboia, we are sorry to disappoint him.

Mr. Argue: The dismal part is in the figure being 96,000 higher than it was last year.

GRAIN

BARLEY—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on April 13 last I asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture regarding the barley payment. Has the minister anything to report with regard to the current payment on barley?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have received a recommendation from the Canadian wheat board. When a government decision is made on the recommendation I will announce it to the house.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

WATER RESOURCES

TRENT WATERWAY—STATEMENT AS TO MAINTENANCE OF WATER LEVELS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough asked a question concerning the water levels on the Trent waterway.

The question of regulation of water levels in the Trent system has been under study for several months. The precipitation this year has been low, resulting in a serious deficiency in the volume of storage; and as a matter of fact unless greater than average precipitation is experienced during the next few months it may be impossible to maintain full navigation levels on the Trent canal system.

It is considered that due to the low volume of storage in the reservoir system, no major changes in the method of regulation are likely to be made this year. The views of all interested parties will be requested and studied prior to any decision to change the existing method and schedule of water control.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister say whether representations have been made to Ontario hydro to reduce the power-making activity from those waters during the months of July and August in order to conserve them until the end of the tourist season? The waters could then be used during the later months of September and October.

Mr. Balcer: Not to my knowledge.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INQUIRY AS TO STRONTIUM CONTENT OF FOODS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister anything recent to report in regard to radiation in Canada and the strontium content of milk, cereal and other foods?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the final quarterly report for 1960 in respect of this subject will be available very shortly, and I am sure the hon. member will find it interesting.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

The house resumed, from Monday, April 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-72, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we heard the minister complain that in his opinion the decisions of the tariff board had done injury to the interests of Canadian producers in that their decisions had eroded the intention to give the necessary protection to those who were engaged in manufacturing in Canada as opposed to importing. I indicated that in my opinion the tariff board was in fact a judicial institution established by the parliament of Canada, and that to express dissatisfaction with the decisions of that board comes very close to being in contempt of court.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I would ask that he be given the attention of the house. It is rather difficult to hear and I am sure it is difficult for him to talk with so many conversations going on.

Mr. Regier: I believe it would be much more responsible, if the government of the day is not happy with the decisions of the tariff board, to find ways and means of altering the responsibility of that board or by replacing its existing members. I believe it ill behooves us to permit individuals to remain in office while continuing to attack and criticize their decisions.

We are most unhappy with the legislation now before us, and we intend to continue to expose and oppose it. We believe the effect of this legislation will be to add to the cost of consumer goods in Canada, and we are more particularly concerned because we believe it is a means whereby the cost of production in Canada is going to be increased beyond the high levels that these costs have already attained. We believe that investment in equipment and machinery in our major fields of endeavour in Canada plays a very important role in respect of the cost level of our production. We would hate to see anything done which would add to the heavy investment burden that is necessary, in this modern world of today, to supply employment to the Canadian people.

We believe this legislation will do that. We believe it will add to the amount of investment capital required to provide employment for our people. I do not believe the government has paid adequate attention to the representations of Canadian entrepreneurs respecting this legislation. I can easily understand the position taken yesterday by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, who is very closely associated with the major commercial enterprise in the Pacific west, namely the lumbering industry. At least this member of the House of Commons had read the submissions of such reputable organizations as the Vancouver board of trade and others in regard to this legislation. All he was doing was, to the best of his ability, defending the interests of Canadian producers. We feel that not only will the consumers of this country be hit by having to pay higher prices but our producers, and especially our exporters, will suffer if this legislation really becomes effective. We believe it will have an adverse effect upon our trading position with other nations.

We look upon this legislation as nothing less than a back door approach on the part of the Tories in office to a return to high tariffs. In my opinion it again underlines what I have said on other occasions, namely that in the field of tariffs at least the Tories are producing ample evidence to indicate that they have learned nothing since the days when they were last in office, the days of the hungry thirties.

The minister is pleading for the passage of this measure in order to provide employment in Canada. It is our contention that this measure, as well as other like measures that he has introduced in the past, is directly responsible for increasing unemployment in our nation. We do not provide employment for our people by ostracizing ourselves from the markets of the world, by raising our costs of production and by raising our tariff walls. In so far as the over-all picture is concerned, what we do may supply relief to individual concerns or individuals, but it will aggravate the very difficult economic situation that now faces us. What will happen is that it will add to the already growing ranks of the unemployed.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak for just a few minutes and express some views on this legislation. I wish to point out at the beginning, as has been pointed out very ably on a number of occasions by the Minister of Finance in dealing with this matter in the house, that this proposed legislation is intended to relieve Canadian producers from unfair competition. It is not a device to give new protection to Canadian industry.

As we know, we have in Canada a customs tariff that has been established over the past 75 years by the various governments that have held office during that time. It is interesting to note that in the adjustments which have taken place in that tariff since this government took office, the number of specific items which have been reduced have outnumbered by quite a wide margin the number of items which have been increased.

So the opposition may not claim that I am urging higher tariffs in speaking on this measure, I should like to spend just a moment to outline very briefly what I said on this matter when speaking to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in Toronto on February 7. This is what I said:

> Some people say the government should give greater protection to industry by raising tariffs against imports. Those who make this suggestion should realize that those against whom they would have us raise tariffs are also our customers for the exports on which we rely so heavily for our economic well-being. They must also realize that one out of every four Canadians is employed in either producing for, or shipping to, the export market. Those countries, against which they would have us raise tariffs, would certainly retaliate by increasing tariffs against our exports. And, for every Canadian who would be helped by raising tariffs, there would be at least one Canadian hurt by tariffs being raised against the products we export.
> I think we must all realize that, if we are to continue to have high employment in Canada, we can only do so by industry producing products which will be competitive, and sell against competition.

These were the views I expressed on that occasion, and I have expressed them on numerous occasions since. They are still my views, Mr. Speaker.

The purpose of this legislation is simply to eliminate the loopholes in the act by which foreign producers can obtain an unfair advantage over their Canadian competitors, by making their products differ in some small technical detail. I think it is clear, Mr. Speaker, that there never was any intention in the minds of those who established our tariff during the past 75 years that this sort of tariff evasion should be possible. The unfair competition that has arisen by reason of these loopholes being there has had a detrimental effect on employment in Canada. I also think it is clear that if these anomalies are not removed, further deterioration in our employment picture will result.

The intent of the proposed changes is simply to give Canadian industry those levels of protection which previous parliaments intended. Again I say that our tariff was established, not by any one government, but by all governments that have held office during the past 75 years. Over the years, those governments intended that industry in Canada should be permitted to build up and prosper. It was for these reasons that certain tariffs were established. They have been agreed to by the various parliaments that have sat during this 75-year period. It was not the intention of the members who sat in this parliaments that those tariffs should be circumvented. The changes which are proposed in this legislation will greatly increase the incentive of Canadian producers to broaden the scope of their production and thereby increase employment.

The nagging opposition to this measure which has gone on in the eight days during which this measure has been before parliament, I believe, Mr. Speaker, is a clear indication of where the opposition stand on the question of providing jobs for their fellow Canadians. They obviously want foreign producers to have all the loopholes possible to get their products into Canada at unfair rates of duty and so take orders which should be providing jobs for Canadians.

Mr. Chevrier: Is that why your own members vote against it?

Mr. Hees: If the Minister of National Revenue does not have the power of decision as specified in this legislation, foreign exporters can continue to enjoy these unfair rates of duty for up to another two years, because appeals to the courts could easily take that long. By their action on this legislation, the opposition have made it clear that they are in favour of workers in such places as Manchester, Dusseldorf, Brussels, Turin, Toledo, Marseilles and all the other manufacturing centres of the world having jobs producing products which are needed in Canada, and which would otherwise be provided by Canadian workers. They are in favour of those jobs being held by workers in other countries.

During this session the opposition has concentrated on conjuring up the gloomiest possible outlook with respect to the Canadian economy. This false picture of doom and gloom has been doing a great deal of harm to industry and employment in Canada from the point of view of the picture that is painted of Canadian industry in countries abroad. During the past few months I have been in Great Britain, the United States, France and Switzerland, and in talking to businessmen in these countries I have been dismayed to learn of the very alarming picture that has been built up in their minds by members of the opposition speaking here in parliament with respect to conditions in Canada. When I asked them where they got these impressions they said they heard reports over the radio and read newspaper accounts of speeches that had been made by members of parliament, and they were shocked at what these speeches indicated as to the state of our economy. I have been told by businessmen in all these countries that this kind of propaganda is having a very serious adverse effect on businessmen who are contemplating the establishment of plants in Canada which would provide jobs for Canadians.

I think it is obvious to all of us from talking to people in this country that the same kind of effect has been created in the minds of Canadian businessmen. When people in Canada who would otherwise be building plants and expanding inventories hear about the picture of gloom and doom that is being painted in parliament, they are alarmed and have a tendency to delay their plans and not do the things they had otherwise intended to do. By their opposition to this measure hon. members on the other side of the house in my opinion have made it very clear that they are in favour of providing jobs for workers in other countries rather than for their fellow Canadians, as this legislation seeks to do.

This legislation simply enables Canadian products to receive the kind of protection that was intended for them by the various parliaments that over the years have established the rates of duty. The people who established these tariffs did not intend that by means of a slight variation, or a small change, a producer in another country could get around the tariff and bring in his product, varying only in some slight degree from the Canadian product, at a very low tariff rate or free of duty.

As these foreign producers are able to do this they are taking away a very large market from Canadian producers, and our producers are not given the confidence they should have to go ahead and expand their production and range of products because they fear that some foreign manufacturer can produce something almost the same and compete unfairly with the product they are producing or would like to produce. The very clearly demonstrated opposition to the bill before the house at the present time has the effect of doing everything possible to deny the right to work to Canadian workmen who would otherwise have jobs in plants manufacturing products that should be produced in Canada, and will be produced provided legislation such as that now before us is passed.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think it is about time the opposition took a realistic and objective look at what they are doing. The time is long overdue for them to adopt a responsible attitude toward the welfare of their fellow Canadians. I think they should stop doing what they have been doing for quite some time, namely trying to paint a picture of doom and gloom in order to create what they would consider a satisfactory picture in preparation for the next election, and get down to a realistic view of what is needed here in Canada.

What we as Canadians must all do is everything we can to make it possible for every Canadian to have a job. The opposition should not spend its time trying to hold up measures directed toward this end, because by so doing, they are doing everything they can in favour of producers in other countries and the provision of jobs for foreign workmen rather than for Canadian workmen. In my opinion it is about time the opposition took a realistic and objective view of what they are doing, and they should let this legislation pass. The legislation is designed solely to provide more jobs for Canadians, jobs to which they are entitled, and the opposition should allow the legislation to pass, so we can get on with the business of the country.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in the debate on second reading of this bill, because our position was made very clear in the contributions to the discussion made yesterday by members of the party, a discussion which the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not hear because he was not in the house when it took place and about which he has obviously not informed himself by reading Hansard.

However, we ought to be grateful to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the patriotic lecture he gave the opposition in his contribution to the debate this afternoon. He put forward his mature and considered view of what our duty should be not only in respect of the bill now before us but in respect of our attitude toward the Canadian economy generally. He gave us his usual sermon, variations on an old theme, part of which he read from a memorandum which I take it was from the statement he made in Toronto yesterday on the same subject. He said that we on this side should not, in discussion of bills of this kind or, indeed, in the consideration of any economic question, indulge in criticism of the economy, or expose the weaknesses of government policy in respect of the serious problems facing that economy because if we do so we are indulging in doom and gloom.

The minister told us once again this afternoon that he has travelled throughout Europe, which is perfectly true, and throughout the United States, which is also perfectly true. He flies from one country to another these days. He told us that he has talked to businessmen in Zurich, Paris and London, which is perfectly true; he spends a great deal of time travelling in foreign parts and talking to foreign businessmen. He has repeated the statement this afternoon that wherever he goes he finds a viewpoint on the economic situation in Canada which has been determined in the minds of these foreign observers entirely by speeches by members of the opposition in the House of Commons.

Mr. Argue: They are all reading Hansard.

Mr. Pearson: Do these distinguished foreign businessmen never read the minister's speeches? Do they never listen to the Prime Minister of Canada in his broadcasts? Do they never listen to the Minister of Finance, who does his own travelling and his own speaking these days? Oh, no; they have no confidence in these statements by members of the government. They understand the spokesmen for the government, and so they pay no attention to them; they get their views about Canada from the statements of the Liberal opposition. Could any greater compliment be paid to the influence of the Liberal party in the world today than to say that Canada is reflected in the minds of foreign businessmen by what we say in the House of Commons, not by what the minister says?

Unfortunately perhaps from the point of view of the government, Mr. Speaker, the minister may be right; because in this house we have never hesitated to point up problems, to produce solutions for those problems if we can, to expose the weaknesses of government policy, and to emphasize the difficulties which this country faces in the light of those weaknesses. That is our duty. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, in the discharge of that duty we have been shown to be accurate and correct in the statements we have made.

Mr. Pickersgill: And by government statistics.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, and by government statistics. This is in startling contrast to the kind of statements made by my hon. friends opposite when they deal in an exaggeratedly optimistic way with the situation in Canada.

However, I ought to be grateful to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for once more underlining the fact that our speeches in this house are those that really matter. The minister began his statement by saying that this was not in any way a protective measure. He first of all talked about freer trade, the historic policy of this country and the policy embodied in the tariff legislation which is now supported by both parties. He knows that in order to sell you have to buy. He does not want to do anything to increase the obstacles in the way of trade, and he says this bill does not do anything like that.

Having exhausted himself of this statement on the virtues of freer trade, he then went on to attack us for opposing this measure because we were preventing Canadian workmen from getting jobs and was giving those jobs to foreigners. We were preventing a bill from coming into effect which would, in fact, so he says, protect Canadian jobs.

The minister cannot have it both ways. The fact is, as the minister would have discovered if he had been here yesterday or if he had read Hansard this morning, that it is now quite clear that is not a measure which is concerned with jobs. We are attacking this measure particularly on two grounds; one, that it takes away from parliament, the tariff making power and two, and even more important, that it takes away from Canadians a right which they have had previously in this field, the right to appeal to the courts from a decision of the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Since these questions were disposed of by a vote of the house, I trust the hon. member does not intend to elaborate upon these two grounds.

Mr. Pearson: I will try not to do that, Mr. Speaker. The only point I am trying to make in answer to what the minister said when he tried to throw a smokescreen around the purpose of this bill is that the issue in regard to this bill is not employment, but is the transfer of arbitrary powers to the government of the day. The issue is the giving to the government of the day of powers which it has not had in the past, and including prevention of the people of Canada from appealing to the courts against the arbitrary exercise of these powers.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): It is not my intention to speak at any length on this particular issue. However, I believe there are one or two things that should be brought to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and which he seems to have overlooked in his remarks today. One of the points that should be most obvious is the fact that those countries he listed, Britain, Germany, Italy and France, have not an unemployment problem as they move toward freer trade. There is no question of finding jobs for the people there; they have jobs now. It is in Canada that we have an unemployment problem, not in Europe.

Today we heard glowing words about the good turn in the unemployment situation. However, the fact that the decrease of 14,000 in general unemployment was matched by a 14,000 decrease in temporary employment was completely ignored. This means that the situation is just as bad as it was last month.

The minister has said that businessmen in other countries are shocked by the speeches of the members of this house. I should like to remind the minister that 206 of the 265 members of this house are Tories, and their speeches shock even us, let alone the people in Europe.

I do not believe I need to reiterate any of the reasons we have for opposing this legislation. This is a situation in which our actions speak louder than words. With this in mind I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman):

That the word "now" be left out and the words "this day six months" be added at the end of the question.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I am prompted to rise, Mr. Speaker, because of the remarks the Minister of Trade and Commerce has made, and which were surprising enough in the light of what he said yesterday in Toronto. He repeated here some of the statements he made on the occasion of his address in that city, and they can be found in this morning's issue of the Gazette under the heading "Gloomsters Blamed For View of Canada". The article reads in part as follows:

> Canada is losing out because businessmen outside this country are receiving a distorted impression of her economy, trade minister Hees said last night.
> He said that "professional doomsters and gloomsters . . . are doing our economy great harm by painting the blackest possible picture on every occasion when they have an opportunity to speak in public."

I believe the Leader of the Opposition dealt satisfactorily with that part of the minister's remarks. However, I should like to put on the record certain statements which appear in this newspaper immediately below the report of the minister's remarks. The heading is "Worst Depression Since 30's", and the dateline is Washington. I quote:

> Five United States rail unions describe Canada's economy as "in the throes of the worst depression since the 1930's".
> The description was contained in a newsletter which the unions send out to "the shipping and travelling public".
> "In the United States," it says, "the unemployment rate is reaching the 7 per cent mark—a sorry record for the most industrialized nation in the world.
> "To the north, Canada is in the throes of the worst depression since the 1930's. Latest reports from Ottawa show 719,000 unemployed—

I believe that is now 705,000.

> —or 11.3 per cent of the work force.

It is now 11 per cent of the work force.

> According to the Canadian Labour Congress, the unemployment roles could reach a staggering 14 per cent."

The point that arises from that statement is this. It is not the speeches from this side of the house which have prompted the unions of the United States to make the statement they have made. The minister certainly will not impress anybody in the house—not even his own followers, I am sure, and certainly not the people of this country—by saying that if the economy of this country has reached a point wherein our affairs are on the decline or have been on the decline, it is owing to the manner in which this party has dealt with the economic situation. It is owing to the fiscal policies of the present government. Any attempt to state that this situation can be related to speeches that are made from this side of the house is certainly ridiculous.

The minister went on to say that the purpose of this measure is to provide jobs, and that those who oppose this measure are encouraging the workers of other countries. I am surprised that the minister would make a statement of that kind. I am sure he does not believe that to be the case.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I assure the hon. member for Laurier that I do very strongly believe that to be the case.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister now states that he does believe that to be the case. If that is so, then may I say that during the time that my hon. friends have been in office a number of Canadian corporations have established manufacturing and other businesses on the continent of Europe. What has the present government done to prevent them from doing so and to encourage them, by assisting secondary industry, to remain where they were and expand, as the government should have done? If the minister believes that the statement he has made is accurate, then he and those associated with him have done very little to assist secondary industry here.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, but that this measure has one end in view, namely the transfer of arbitrary powers to the government. This measure has another end in view. It takes away the right of appeal from a decision of the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Chevrier: I realize that the Speaker has called other members to order for going beyond that simple statement. For that reason I shall not pursue the matter any further.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce says it is not a protective measure. May I say that it has all the earmarks of a protective measure. By some of the statements he has been making outside of this house the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicates that he is in favour of freer trade. Not so the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance had the opportunity on one occasion to consider a proposal from the United Kingdom having to do with freer trade. However, to use an expression he likes to use in this house, he turned his back on it and ran away from it just as fast as his legs could carry him. The minister will probably recognize that expression as one of his pet phrases.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not recognize the allusion at all.

Mr. Chevrier: Then again, Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said about O.E.C.D. by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by the Minister of Finance. But what is being done by the government to meet these great regional blocs which are being established and which have been established now for some time, and whose tariffs are being lowered? If some means are not taken forthwith in order to deal with that situation our trade and our economy will suffer.

I conclude by saying that this is a protective measure. I conclude by saying that this measure has but one end in view, and that is to take away from parliament a right which parliament should have—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Chevrier: —namely the right of appeal to the courts from a decision of the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Customs Tariff

On clause 1—Goods deemed of class or kind made in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: Could I inquire of the minister whether the provisions of the Canadian bill of rights and the regulations incidental thereto have been given effect in so far as clause 1 of this bill is concerned?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is nothing in this bill that runs counter in any respect to the bill of rights.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to draw to the attention of the committee the regulations concerning the Canadian bill of rights, which are to be found in P.C. 1960-1972, which reads:

> Regulations respecting the examination of bills and proposed regulations pursuant to section 3 of the Canadian bill of rights.
> 1. These regulations may be cited as the Canadian bill of rights examination regulations.
> 2. In these regulations, "minister" means the Minister of Justice.

I should like to draw clause 3 of the regulations to the attention of the minister. It reads:

> 3. In the case of every bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons the minister shall, forthwith upon receipt of two copies of the bill from the Clerk of the House of Commons,
> (a) examine the bill in order to determine whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of the Canadian bill of rights; and
> (b) cause to be affixed to each of the copies thereof so received from the Clerk of the House of Commons a certificate, in a form approved by the minister and signed by the deputy minister of justice, stating that the bill has been examined as required by the Canadian bill of rights.

Now, I repeat my question in respect of (a). Has an examination been made of the bill in order to determine whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and the provisions of the bill of rights?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, the terms of the bill of rights have been fully complied with and the procedures prescribed by the order in council passed in pursuance of the bill of rights have been fully complied with.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not the answer which the minister gave me in the first instance. The minister indicated another answer which was somewhat inconsistent with that which he has now given.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, now, the next question which I am prompted to ask is covered by the (b) part of clause 3, which reads:

> The minister shall cause to be affixed to each of the copies thereof so received from the Clerk of the House of Commons a certificate, in a form approved by the minister and signed by the deputy minister of justice, stating that the bill has been examined as required by the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Has that certificate been affixed to the bill?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that that has been done and I repeat that the procedures prescribed by the bill and the order in council have been followed.

Mr. Chevrier: I thought I understood the Minister of Justice to say that as far as he knew this had been done. Perhaps I misunderstood him.

Mr. Fulton: I made no answer; I was advising my colleague.

Mr. Chevrier: I may have been mistaken. Then I address the question to the Minister of Justice and ask him whether a certificate such as that prescribed in clause 3(b) of the regulations concerning the bill of rights has been appended to the bill now under consideration? If so, can we see this certificate so that the committee will be in possession of it, as I think it is entitled to be?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the procedure read by the hon. member was worked out in my department with the greatest care and discussed with the Speaker of the house. I have every confidence that the procedure was carried out. If my hon. friend wishes to see the certificate, may I say the certificate itself, as I understand it, is in the possession of the Clerk of the house. I have no control over the certificate from that point on.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister who is piloting this legislation through the house to let the committee see this certificate. The Minister of Justice says he has every reason to believe that the terms of these regulations were carried out and I am not contesting his statement, but I think the committee is entitled to see it.

Mr. Fulton: The point I made, Mr. Chairman, is that the certificate is attached to the bill which is returned to the Clerk of the house and that certificate would therefore be in the possession of the Clerk. It is not any longer in the control or disposition of the government as such.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister whose department is responsible for this surely should be in a position to tell us whether the certificate is attached to the bill and that ought to be the end of it.

Mr. Fulton: Of course, Mr. Chairman, I can go and get from the department what I think should be obvious, namely a statement that they did in fact comply with the regulations concerning the matter. I said I had every confidence that that was done, but I have not checked on this particular bill. I will check personally, if my hon. friend wishes me to do it, and come back and say to the committee that we have complied with the act and the regulations. I shall be glad to do so, but I still point out that the actual certificate itself, being attached to the bill which has been returned to the Clerk of the house, is no longer in our possession but is in the custody of the Clerk.

Mr. Chevrier: I think the committee would appreciate it if the minister would inquire, as ministers have done from time to time, in the passage of their estimates. I think the committee would appreciate it if the minister would inquire and find out whether the certificate is attached to the bill.

Mr. Fulton: I will not be able to say whether the certificate is now attached because physically it is not in our possession. But I will find out whether in fact the certificate was attached, or whether certificates were attached to the two copies which were returned to the Clerk certifying that the bill had been examined as, of course, I am confident that it was. I will get that information and bring it in.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, there is a particular aspect of clause 1 that in my opinion is rather impractical and unrealistic. I have reference to paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of the new section 2A, which reads as follows:

> (b) in the case of goods custom made to specifications, adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production of such goods within a reasonable period of time.

I also have reference to paragraph (b) of subsection 3, which reads as follows:

> (b) whether goods are custom made to specifications, and whether adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production of such goods within a reasonable period of time.

I do not believe that a Canadian manufacturer or anyone else wishing to obtain certain goods custom made to specifications should have to satisfy the government that every effort has been made to inquire throughout Canada whether or not some Canadian manufacturer may have the facilities to produce or desire to produce this particular article within a reasonable period of time and at a price level that could be considered economic. Especially in this day and age of automation when industrialists are continually looking into ways and means of installing new machinery, much of it of a highly technical nature, I think it is far too great an imposition to have to satisfy the minister that every effort has been made to find someone in Canada interested enough to offer to manufacture the particular article.

I have no particular quarrel with the legislation as it deals with articles of a class or kind that are being made in Canada but I think we are going much too far and will handicap continuing technological development in Canadian industry if it is insisted that the government has a right to ask that evidence be produced indicating that no one in Canada is prepared or able to manufacture the particular article at an economic level and within a reasonable period of time. Therefore I should like to move an amendment at this time. While it is somewhat technical in that it changes the punctuation, its effect is to remove from clause 1, new section 2A, the whole of paragraph (b) of subsection 1 and the whole of paragraph (b) of subsection 3. Therefore I move:

That this Bill C-72, entitled "An act to amend the Customs Tariff", be amended by changing the semi-colon in clause (a) of subsection 1, section 1, to a period, and eliminating the immediately following word "and", and by removing the entire immediately following clause (b) and also in changing the comma in clause (a) of subsection 3 of said section 1 to a period, and eliminating the word "and" in this clause, and by eliminating entirely the whole of clause (b) of said subsection 3.

For purposes of clarification, may I repeat that if hon. members will look at the first page of Bill No. C-72 they will see that the amendment calls for the removal of the two paragraphs (b) on that page.

Mr. Fulton: Before you put the amendment, Mr. Chairman, may I give the information requested by the hon. member for Laurier. I have made inquiries and am informed that the bill was in fact examined as called for by the regulations under the bill of rights. The clerks at the table have been good enough to send me a copy of Bill No. C-72 with the certification called for under the regulations signed by the deputy minister of justice, and I shall ask that it be sent across to the hon. member for Laurier. May I remind him that it is in the custody of the house through the Clerk and should be returned to the table. I should perhaps emphasize that if in the course of the examination in my department it were ascertained there was some provision of the bill not consistent with the provisions and principles of the bill of rights it would then have been my duty so to report. We have worked out this procedure with Mr. Speaker under which certification is given, and it should therefore always be assumed that in the absence of a report from the Minister of Justice there is in my opinion and the opinion of my department no inconsistency between the measure in question and the bill of rights.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the minister for this information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps I might say a word concerning the amendment moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

The Chairman: If there is no comment about the regularity of the amendment I should like to put it first.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think the mover of the amendment, inasmuch as we have just received it, is obligated to explain in more detail what its effect is. I am sure he is prepared to do so for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. Regier: I made an effort to do so before but perhaps I can enlarge a little. It is my contention that the minister should not preside as a judge on a number of indefinite matters that are referred to in the bill. Let us assume that I operate an enterprise and I want to buy an additional piece of machinery. Under the terms of the bill, if that class or kind of machinery, or approximately the same class or kind, is not being manufactured in Canada I have the right to import it at a reduced rate of tariff. However, if it is a made-to-specification piece of machinery then under the terms of the bill I have to satisfy the minister first that it cannot be manufactured in Canada. I believe this is an imposition on Canadian industry.

I do not think the minister would want to be in the position of having to explore all over Canada the possibilities of whether or not somebody might be prepared to undertake the manufacture of this custom made article. I believe this is a handicap to expansion and efficiency in Canadian industrial production. In my opinion great delay might be involved which could mean considerable expense to Canadian enterprises. Who is to decide what is a reasonable period of time? I also believe the present provision could lead to misuse. Someone operating a little machine shop employing three or four men and who possibly was politically influential could claim that he was able to manufacture the article in question and he would keep running to the minister to use his influence to ensure that the order was given to him.

I feel that a new principle is being introduced into the Customs Tariff and that we would be much wiser if we left it out entirely. As I said before, I can see merit in an increase in tariffs on imported goods if such goods are actually being manufactured in Canada. However, to increase the tariff or to potentially increase the tariff because there may be someone who may decide that he wants to manufacture a certain article, within a reasonable period of time, is going too far and will hurt Canadian industry much more than it will help it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The purport of this amendment should be clearly understood. The scheme of the bill, the bulk of which is contained in clause 1 now under debate, is to divide goods into two classes. The first class is shelf goods and the second is goods custom made according to specifications. The criteria laid down in the bill to assist in the determination of whether particular goods are of a class or kind made in Canada are different in the two cases because there is such a difference in the nature of the goods themselves.

This amendment would have the effect of eliminating from the provisions of the bill what is now provided in relation to that one class, namely goods custom made according to specifications. The amendment would confine the criteria in the bill entirely to shelf goods. I think that point should be clearly understood.

Now, the hon. member shows great solicitude for Canadian industry. He does not want them to be bothered gathering information or bringing forward knowledge in relation to whether or not the goods in question can be produced economically within a reasonable period of time. All I have to say is that Canadian industry is not making that kind of complaint or criticism. The expressions of Canadian industry have been to the effect that, at long last, some of the benefits they enjoyed in this regard up until what I have called the decade of erosion are going to be restored to them.

What is the great burden that is alleged by the hon. member to be laid upon Canadian industry? I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that Canadian industry will not be retarded technologically in this regard as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam so erroneously concludes. The fact, which is apparent to all other hon. members of the committee, is that if this measure is adopted it will greatly assist the technological development of Canadian industry. It will give Canadians employment. It will certainly aid in developing productive Canadian enterprise.

Mr. Regier: The minister says this measure will aid Canadian employment. I hinted before that it is my conviction this is going to hinder Canadian employment and add to Canadian unemployment. The minister is attempting, by this paragraph (b), to impose a duty on goods that are not now being made in Canada. I believe this adds needlessly to the cost of production and eventually adds needlessly to consumer costs in Canada. Not only is the minister continuing to attempt to raise a tariff wall against commodities imported into Canada that are being made in Canada now, but he is attempting to erect tariff barriers against articles that are not now being manufactured in Canada.

The effect of this measure will not be to cause Canadian factories to be built. If anything, this provision is going to hinder existing Canadian factories from improving there means of production. A lot of this machinery is very expensive machinery. There is a lot of money involved here. Some of the machinery is of a highly technical nature. I do not see Canadian industry becoming particularly involved in the manufacture of these goods. Even if they were, I think it is most unwise for the Canadian House of Commons to begin imposing tariff walls against goods, ostensibly for the protection of goods Canada hopes may some day be manufactured here.

Let us wait until the goods are being manufactured in Canada before we decide whether or not they need protection against imports. Let us not erect tariff barriers before the goods are actually being made.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The key words in the remarks just made by the hon. member are, "Let us wait". These words make a good summary of his approach to this matter. It does not matter that, in the meantime, Canadian producers have been deprived of what they possessed before under this legislation up until a decade ago. It does not matter that the jobs of Canadian workmen are involved. The hon. member says, "Let us wait". He says, let us wait, notwithstanding the fact that this legislation requires, before goods of this nature can be ruled to be of a class or kind made in Canada, that adequate facilities must exist in Canada for the economic production of such goods within a reasonable period of time. The hon. member says, do not pay any attention to the fact that the facilities are all here. It does not matter that Canadians can manufacture these goods on an economic basis within a reasonable period of time. So long as these specific goods, these identical goods, have not been manufactured yet in Canada, then there may not be any provision here for the assistance of the Canadian producer or Canadian workman.

This is just the sort of thing that has eroded the benefits of this legislation in the past. We are brought right back, by this stand, to the case of the power shovel. There had been a 2-yard shovel made in Canada and all the facilities existed in Canada for the manufacture of power shovels with a 2½-yard capacity. However, because no shovels with a 2½-yard capacity had actually been manufactured up to that point, it was ruled then that a 2½-yard shovel was of a class or kind not made in Canada. This provision is intended to end the nonsense of that kind of interpretation. As long as the facilities exist in Canada for the production of such goods on an economic basis, not on some far fetched or fantastic basis but on an economic basis, and not at some far distant time in the future but within a reasonable period of time under all the circumstances having regard to the custom and usage of the trade in such cases, we say the goods should be ruled to be of a class or kind made in Canada. It is quite obvious that if they were of the kind being made now they would probably be shelf goods anyway. The provision which the hon. member wishes to strike out applies only in the case of goods that are made according to specifications.

Mr. McIlraith: There seems to be a good portion of the minister's remarks that is not relevant to the amendment and therefore tends to confuse the issue rather than clarify it. Frankly, I find it difficult enough to understand without any confusion being added. I do not believe the minister should be permitted to get away with what I consider to be a misrepresentation of the power shovel case.

The minister says, as a matter of fact, that facilities existed in Canada for the production of a 2½-yard shovel, if I understood him correctly. The facts are that five years elapsed between the time that judgment was given and the time that the first 2½-yard shovel was produced in Canada. The cost of providing the facilities to produce the 2½-yard shovel—I have not the figure conveniently at hand—was a million dollars. These are the facts. I should not like anyone reading Hansard or the members of the committee to believe that facilities existed in Canada in that case because that is not in accordance with the findings of the tariff appeal board which dealt with this matter.

Perhaps we are now getting at the nub of why there is to be no appeal in these cases. The minister makes a finding of fact here by way of assertion that is very different from the finding of fact given by those who had the case before them and all the information surrounding it.

Mr. Nowlan: There is a special section dealing with appeals, as the chairman will know. I do not think I will speak on the matter of appeals at the moment, but I certainly will have something to say about it later on when we reach that subclause.

Mr. Benidickson: In introducing this bill on second reading yesterday the Minister of Finance, while he repeated some remarks he had made on December 20 and in the subsequent debate that took place in the committee of ways and means on February 2, 3, 4, 15 and 27 and March 2, introduced a fair amount that was new. He did not in detail introduce the items that are referred to in Hansard of April 17th. I suggest that in large part, by throwing dust into their eyes, he was attempting to convince his mass of supporters in this house that they should support this kind of legislation.

One of the bases of our controversy here with regard to this legislation is whether or not this bill is restoring historic interpretation or whether or not we are going back to the interpretation that was acceptable to the Bennett administration of 1930. In this context I want to go back to an origin that is not the origin to which the Minister of Finance referred yesterday, namely 1873. I want to go back to the origin of a Conservative administration under Sir John A. Macdonald when the minister of finance was Mr. Foster. On that occasion he made clear the reason for the kind of tariff distinction about which we are concerned here. At what time Mr. Foster indicated that for the advancement of the manufacturing industry of this country it was important that they obtain at the lowest possible price the essential elements related to their business and these of course included machinery. I refer to the budget speech of 1890 when Hon. George E. Foster—and he was not a Liberal—said this as found in Hansard of that period. His remarks are to be found in the budget presentation at page 2550 of Hansard of March 27, 1890:

> It is stated that the best and most improved machinery must be used by experimenters who put their money into enterprises the outcome of which they cannot certainly see. It is felt by them that the very best possible machinery should be got. It is felt by some that for a period at least there should be no restriction whatever on the buying of it, and by others, that there should be no other restriction than that imposed by the consideration whether or not the machinery is made in this country. Looking over the whole question, the government—

That is the government of that day, as long ago as 1890.

> —have come to the conclusion that it will not be wise or prudent to resist this demand at the present time, in the interests of the development of that large part of the country's resources, and it is proposed—

That is in the budget of 1890.

> —to allow mining machinery of a class and kind which is not made in Canada at the time of the importation—

That is essential. That is the difference between the legislation we have here now and the concept of "made in Canada" that has been traditional, not made in Canada at this time.

—to be imported into this country free for the period of three years and no longer.

That was the inception of this important element in the tariff structure that had a great deal to do with the impetus given to secondary industry to get going in Canada. On the amendment before us, Mr. Chairman, I am particularly concerned about statements that have been made by the Minister of Finance when he says that no rate change of tariff is involved in the legislation before us.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What I said, if the hon. member will be good enough to quote me accurately was that there is no change in any tariff rate created by this bill.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Finance says to me at this moment that this legislation involves no change in rate with respect to tariff items.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said it involves no change in the rate of any tariff item.

Mr. Benidickson: That is correct. I assert as I said yesterday, notwithstanding this technical sophistry of the Minister of Finance, that in its effect there will be increased costs to manufacturers in this country, to importers who want to compete on the basis of machinery they want to import, that are of import to the extent of thousands of dollars of excess taxes involved in the legislation that is here. The decision is going to be made by the minister and it is going to be made without appeal. I say that this is going to prejudice these manufacturing importers to a very great extent from here on.

In addition to that, we know that the Minister of Finance who has just interrupted has said that there is no change in the actual figures put in the Customs Tariff. There is not anybody who does business internationally through tariffs who does not know that there are two kinds of imposts with respect to tariffs. There is the rate that parliament has been given to decide upon in amendments to the Customs Tariff. But here is the big thing that divides a Liberal and a Conservative, namely the difference between administrative protection as administered in the department by the minister. If one will look at the recent tariff appeals, one will find that fairly regularly officials of the Department of National Revenue have been more protective in their outlook and in their decisions than has been the tariff board or the exchequer court or the supreme court in times when the tariff board, or the exchequer court or the supreme court had a chance to consider some of these matters that parliament had decided upon.

In other words, we have ministerial decision here. I suggest to the committee that this is a serious matter, because it involves something more than the rates about which the minister talks. We are here dealing with an opportunity for ministerial discretion. This will enlarge that which is feared most by our exporters, our traders through GATT, our consumers and other people, namely, the invisible tariff.

The invisible tariff is the tariff created by bureaucrats, the tariff that is created by obstacles and road blocks, the kind of thing to which we object when we try to export to our principal customer, the United States. I say that this is clandestine protection. This is a matter that is sometimes more important than the technical definitions in the clauses of the Customs Tariff.

I said yesterday that Khrushchev might laugh when he sees these provisions. I did not add that I do not think the Minister of National Revenue wants to be a dictator. I have sat with him for a long time in this house. I do not think that is his desire.

Mr. Nowlan: I resented the fact that you called me single, when I have 14 grandchildren.

Mr. Benidickson: I really believe that the Minister of National Revenue wants to be a democrat. I have heard the minister speak in opposition. I thought he wanted the preservation of parliamentary rights. That is why I objected to the fact that the Minister of Finance boasted that, after long debate, not a word was changed in the bill that is now before us, from the wording contained in the resolutions proposed in the budget.

I do not think the Minister of National Revenue really wants these powers. I do not think he is that kind of man. When the government is going to change very shortly, I do not think he really wants to give those powers to his successors.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You are living in a dream world now.

Mr. Benidickson: I say to the minister that I think the administration has been careless in the drafting of this power. Because they have behind them 204 supporters they have too much pride to back down and do something that is reasonable, just, and which should be done.

I am quite confident that on reflection of the debate at the resolution stage and at the stage of second reading the ministry is ashamed, having regard to what the leader of this ministry has said in times gone by as to the rights of a democratic parliament, that they have inserted this ministerial, autocratic right in this bill.

As I say I may have gone a little far yesterday in equating the Minister of National Revenue with Khrushchev, but I repeat—

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate the compliment.

Mr. Benidickson: —that Khrushchev will perhaps have occasion to smile when he finds that in a democracy the Minister of National Revenue has these autocratic powers.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment will please rise.

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. I have not a right, of course, to speak. The hon. member for Ottawa West will perhaps—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are taking a vote.

Mr. Benidickson: No.

Mr. McIlraith: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself to the amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, we are taking a vote.

The Chairman: A vote was called. If there is unanimous consent—

Mr. Benidickson: There is not unanimous consent, and in connection with this particular debate—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: I am speaking to the point of order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order. The position is that the vote was called and I said that if there were unanimous consent to revert to the debate on the amendment, I had no objection. However, as the hon. member said, there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, am I to understand your ruling to be that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: —the vote was under way and I am not permitted to speak, because on a point of order I would respectfully suggest that the question had not been put in the sense in which the rules contemplate and had not gone far enough. You had undoubtedly started to call the vote—

The Chairman: Order. This is purely a question of fact. If I remember correctly, I said, "Shall the amendment carry?" Some hon. members said, "No". I then said, "All those in favour of the amendment will please rise", and some hon. members did rise. It was only after some hon. members had risen that the hon. member for Ottawa West rose.

Therefore I think it is a question of fact as to whether or not the vote had already been called. I will call it again. All those in favour—

Mr. Benidickson: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I refer you to an issue which arose yesterday with respect to this bill. A decision had been given by the Chair on second reading. That decision was given by the Speaker of this house. The Minister of Finance rose after the decision had been given—and he was afforded complete courtesy on this side of the house—to move an amending criticism of the Speaker's ruling which, as far as I know in 15 years' experience in the house, has never before been done.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense. We are taking a vote.

Mr. Benidickson: I am sure that as this is five o'clock and we are approaching private members' hour—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Benidickson: —the Chairman would not want to advance the—

The Chairman: Order. I see no relation between the incident to which the hon. member alluded and the position today.

There is a situation of fact involved. I have given my decision. I have allowed the hon. member to comment further, but I do not think he has advanced any reason why I should change my decision. Therefore I ask those in favour of the amendment to please rise.

Mr. Benidickson: Five o'clock.

Amendment (Mr. Regier) negatived: Yeas, 8; nays, 51.

[During the taking of the vote:]

Mr. Benidickson: Five o'clock. Pipe line. Closure.

[After the taking of the vote:]

The Chairman: Order. I declare the amendment lost. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed to consideration of private and public bills.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to consider private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

AURORA PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. S-2, to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company—Mr. Woolliams—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I am rather surprised by this bill being brought on for debate today. My recollection is that the hon. member for Bow River, who sponsored the bill, stated the last time this bill was debated that he was willing to answer any questions put by hon. members. I then posed three or four questions which he accepted and indicated he would forward to his principal and, in due course, present the answers to this committee. That hon. member is not here today and, therefore, cannot be blamed for not giving those answers for which I have asked. I feel the questions I asked are deserving of answers.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The questions were answered when you were not here.

Mr. Broome: We are now in committee and I will yield the floor to the hon. member if he can supply the answers. So far we have not received answers which would satisfy me at all except that which I feel is a reiteration of a lot of nonsense. When we expressed some concern in regard to the share structure of this company we were told to be quiet because we were not from Alberta. If the hon. member has something to contribute to this debate I will allow him to go ahead.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The hon. member for Vancouver—

Mr. Broome: South.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): —South, presented some questions, to which the hon. member for Bow River said he would endeavour to obtain answers. On at least two occasions the hon. member for Winnipeg South placed on the record the answers to the questions which the hon. member for Vancouver South raised, but he was not here. That was all I wanted to point out. The hon. member may refer to my remarks in any way he likes and I could perhaps do the same but will allow him to continue now.

Mr. Broome: I thank the hon. gentleman. He is very kind. I have read every word of the debate on this bill but have not seen the answers to the questions which I asked. If the hon. gentleman will check the questions I asked, as they appear in Hansard, he will perhaps then see that what he has now said is incorrect.

I cannot repeat in the same words the questions I asked but I suggest they have to do with the ownership of the parent company, Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, and specifically in regard to the percentage of stock held by the public which the committee was led to believe had been offered by the company to the Canadian public. That is just not correct. The rights to purchase shares were given to individual shareholders of the Continental Oil Company and the Hudson's Bay Company. I asked how many shareholders in Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited were resident in Canada—not Canadian nationals—and how many shares these residents owned. I feel that is a rather easy question to answer because the records of the companies would show this. As far as I am aware this answer has not been given. That was one item in which I was interested. The other item I queried had to do with the supervisory personnel of the company.

I do not want to be accused of believing in a narrow nationalism or of being a person who is trying to throttle the development of this country but I would suggest that I have knowledge regarding this industry which is not matched by that of any other single member with the exception perhaps of the hon. member for Calgary South. I refer, of course, to the operation of that industry.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): What do you want us to do, pat you on the back?

Mr. Broome: Have you a question?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You asked me to give you the answer.

Mr. Broome: If the hon. member has a question and will stand up in his place and ask it, instead of talking from his seat, I will be prepared to listen to him.

Mr. Benidickson: I am a friend of yours and will not challenge that boast.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Broome: When I asked the questions in a previous debate I said I would not participate again in the debate at the committee stage. However, these questions have not been answered and I am not prepared to have the committee give approval to this bill until the answers are given. Quite frankly, as I have said before, because of the conditions set out by the sponsor and co-sponsor of the bill, I propose to vote against it. If a vote is called for and recorded on third reading I will vote against it then. I have said this before and now repeat it because the sponsoring company has not taken into account the change in climate in this country regarding the development and use of our natural resources.

I welcome capital from the United States, Britain, Switzerland and every other country in the world but that capital must be used in partnership with Canadian capital. No matter what development takes place, if there are technically trained Canadians capable of holding the jobs, we do not have to bring in anyone to do the jobs in this country, with the exception, of course, of those individuals who have skills not possessed by men available here. What I am saying may sound like nonsense but I have been informed by Mr. Kerr, president of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, with whom I spent an afternoon, that because of the present policy of developing Canadian understudies to executive personnel the company would be within the space of a year, 100 per cent managed by Canadians. He also informed me that the purchasing policy of that company had changed in that the company was giving preference to Canadian suppliers.

Mr. Benidickson: Are you referring to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited?

Mr. Broome: Yes, and I was showing, by its present operation—not its previous operation under Mr. Tanner and Mr. Coates—what can be done. I happen to know that the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company built a pipe line through the most difficult terrain in the world and that company from inception was 100 per cent Canadian.

I have been referring to a number of matters of national import, which override the sectional problems which exist in Alberta, and in respect of which I feel answers should be forthcoming. Natural resources, although under the control of the provinces, belong to the people of Canada as a whole and I feel that the development of these resources must take place having some regard to the Canadian people as a whole.

According to a news item in the Financial Post, Interprovincial Pipe Line is quite prepared to run a line down to Chicago to serve that area with condensates. There are alternative means of allowing this modest amount of 11,000 barrels of condensates per day to reach markets, but some in this house take the attitude "grab it all and fast, we might not have a chance tomorrow." Well, our resources are too valuable and—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Like the coal.

Mr. Broome:—too important to be bartered away in that fashion.

If the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company had wanted to really show that they were trying to operate in a manner which was for the over-all good of this country, and for the over-all good of the company as well, they would have seen to it that part of the ownership of that company was vested in Canada through the stock market, through the offering of shares across Canada.

Do not tell me that Canadians are not willing to risk their money in ventures such as this. This is the old bogey that has been thrown around altogether too long. When the shares of Alberta Natural Gas came on the market brokers right across Canada said they would have to ration the shares. Likewise Alberta Gas Trunk Lines which is a model of financing and a model operation. Certainly they would not handle matters in the way that is proposed for this puppet company or for the parent company. This is the way these developments should be handled; this is the way the financing should be handled. It could be done and it has been done.

There is actually a dearth of opportunity for Canadian capital to invest in the development of Canadian resources. There are not enough places, not enough avenues for Canadian risk capital, and I am no capitalist. All my life I have worked for a salary. I will not be able to take advantage of any of these opportunities except perhaps in a most modest way, if at all. But as long as these developments are offered to the people of Canada, then we have a Canadian outlook in the operation of that company, and this is an outlook we cannot get in any other way. We cannot get it through lip service, by having half of the directors Canadian and the other half representing United States ownership, with a Canadian as chairman, because the control of the company is not in this country and perforce the directors will be simply rubber stamps for the directors of the parent company. In this instance the parent company happens to be Continental Oil Company because they have 67 per cent to 68 per cent of the shares of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas, which in turn owns in its entirety Aurora Pipe Line.

I am not going to labour the points which have been pressed in this committee before with regard to capitalization stretching into millions to build half a mile of pipe line. The testimony in regard to this particular phase of the operation has been gone over in this committee time and time again. But it would be well for hon. members to read the testimony given to the standing committee and try to find out exactly what is being attempted. If they do I think there will be more of them come around to my way of thinking. The chief government whip has said that this is a private member's bill and hon.

members are free to vote for or against it as they so choose to do. This is true.

It may be that if this bill goes through the committee stage today—I doubt whether it will—there will still be a chance for the hon. member for Bow River to answer the questions I have placed before him. No statement has been made by the company, or I have seen no statement by any representative or any spokesman of the company, that they have any idea at all except that the operations of this company in this country can go on in the same manner and with some of the same philosophy that might have characterized a fruit company in one of the banana republics of Central America, or of more enlightened companies in Saudi Arabia, although in Saudi Arabia they are paying 75 per cent royalties and not 12½ per cent.

The fundamental philosophy behind the opposition to this bill is simply that this company, which is gaining wealth through the exploitation of our natural resources, and which is rightly entitled to the profits it can make out of the enterprise, has a duty and a responsibility to the people of this country, a duty and a responsibility of which, as far as I can determine, it is not yet aware.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Chown: I have to take the responsibility for not answering the more significant questions of my hon. friend from Vancouver South as to the division of shareholders, the percentage of holdings in different countries. One reason is that he was not here at the time of the last debate on this bill in committee. On that occasion I answered his second question which has to do with Canadian participation. He will find that answer at page 3428 of Hansard of March 28, 1961, in the letter from management on the subject which I read into the record. I will not waste the time of the committee reading it again, because we have limited time in which to pass this bill through committee stage.

The answer to the first question as to the share participation and the division between individuals of different countries is set out in a letter from Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company to the legislative counsel, dated March 15, 1961. It reads in part as follows:

As of December 31, 1960, the company had 11,954 shareholders (excluding Continental Oil Company and Hudson's Bay Company) who in total owned 1,709,969 shares or 9.64 per cent of the total outstanding shares.

A classification by nationality of these public shareholders and their holdings is as follows:

	No. of shareholders	Per cent of total shareholders	No. of shares	Per cent of public shareholdings	Per cent of total shares
Canada	1,410	11.80	525,299	30.72	2.96
United States	7,324	61.26	831,096	48.60	4.69
United Kingdom	3,055	25.56	348,187	20.36	1.96
Others	165	1.38	5,387	.32	.03
	11,954	100	1,709,969	100	9.64
Continental Oil Company			12,025,967		67.77
Hudson's Bay Company			4,008,592		22.59
			17,774,592		100

The letter goes on to say:

On completion of the initial distribution of the shares in 1957, the number of Canadian shareholders was 1,022 with total shareholdings of 306,287 shares and there has been a steady increase since that time to the totals shown above. During this same period the number of United States shareholders has declined by 747 and the total United States shareholdings by 278,337 shares.

There is increasingly active trading on the Toronto stock exchange in the company's shares. The total number traded in 1960 was 413,326 and in 1959, 327,792.

Mr. Broome: Would the hon. member repeat the figures with regard to Canadian participation and particularly the percentage that Canadian participation represents compared with total public holdings of 9.64 per cent? I think the hon. member said 2.96 per cent but I am not sure.

[Mr. Broome.]

Mr. Chown: The number of Canadian shareholders is 1,410, the percentage of total shareholders is 11.80, the number of shares is 525,299, the percentage of public shareholdings is 30.72 and the percentage of total shares is 2.96. Therefore when you look at the column of figures you will see that actually the majority of shares publicly held are held in Canada and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Broome: I should like to make a few comments, Mr. Chairman. When the shares were first issued Canadian shareholders owned 306,000 whereas their shareholdings now have grown to 525,000. I think this reinforces my argument about the willingness of Canadians to invest in resource development because they have had to purchase these shares either in the United Kingdom or the United States and most likely they have done so in the United States because holdings by people in that country have gone down.

The same story is given by the management of McIntyre gold mine who in their last statement pointed out that their shares had been almost 100 per cent repatriated. Whereas in previous years the majority had been owned in the United States, over 90 per cent are now owned in Canada.

The point is, however, that in the present instance, although Canadian participation has risen to 30.72 per cent of the total public ownership of shares, the total public ownership is only 9.64 per cent of all the shares of the company and Canadian ownership of shares in this company is something under 3 per cent. That does not strike me as being what one would call a reasonable Canadian participation, and I come back to the fact that Canadians have increased their holdings by 66 to 70 per cent over what they were originally in 1957 when these shares were first offered.

This company might well have considered taking some of their treasury stock and making it available across Canada in order to increase Canadian participation to some point where the company might be truly classed as Canadian. Less than 3 per cent does not make it a Canadian company and if it is going to prosper from the development of our resources I suggest it should become more of a Canadian company than it is now.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, this is the first opportunity I have taken to speak on the bill at any of its stages. The title intrigued me, of course, when I first saw it because in our part of the country we have had in the past a rather small but clamorous group interested in secession from the province of Ontario and the setting up of a new province which was labelled Aurora by one of the more imaginative in the group. I have often thought that their scheme was highly imaginative, perhaps too imaginative, and therefore when this measure came before the house I was interested in hearing that some of my colleagues found it imaginative.

Quite frankly, I have enjoyed some of the debates that have taken place on the bill, no more so than the contribution I have heard today by the hon. member for Vancouver South. A number of members of parliament at the various stages of the discussion of the bill in the house and in the standing committee have gone to great lengths to disclaim their own knowledge of what is involved in this matter. When the hon. member for Winnipeg South introduced the bill he made it very clear that he was speaking strictly on the basis of information that had been given to him and was not setting himself up as any kind of authority. There were many challenges flying back and forth across the house on second reading in that regard, and on the part of those who were very anxious to get the bill through the argument seemed to be that we did not need to know anything about it anyway, that it was merely a matter of incorporating the company. Therefore they said that we should pass the bill because the place where members could really find out things was in the standing committee on railways, canals and telegaph lines.

Then there were even some who felt that committee really did not matter too much because the matter would finally have to go before the national energy board and they would really look after our interests and the interests of all Canadians. Then, of course, there were those songbirds from Alberta who told us about the sweet things that happen during the Alberta conservation board hearings. We were all going to be protected, therefore, by these other agencies in any decision we might make to push this bill through on second reading or in the committee.

I should like now, Mr. Chairman, to raise a matter on which I hope you will let me continue for a minute or two before you decide whether or not I am out of order. I believe it is relevant to this bill. I believe the treatment this bill received in the committee—I am not saying this by way of criticism of the members of that committee—is a fine indication it is about time we equipped ourselves with the resources for getting more of the information we need through the establishment of a permanent research group attached to the standing committees of this house. In reading the report of the committee one finds that hon. members of good will such as the hon. member for York North and the hon. member for Calgary South, whose opinions I respect, came forward and expressed some views. The final analysis was that the bill was sort of shoved through because we did not really know the answers to the questions that were asked. I can only assume from reading the report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for Tuesday, March 21, that the house committee was really not able to assist in solving the problem from the point of view that the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Vancouver East were prepared to present.

This situation indicates to me that it is time we gave our standing committees the personnel they need to enable us to know that when we go into a committee we are not completely helpless in facing parliamentary agents or representatives of these companies.

I will not say any more on this subject now. However, I feel that a great deal of the discussion that has taken place could have been prevented if we could have been sure, both in the committee and in the house, that we could have obtained the details we needed instead of obtaining information in dribs and drabs accompanied by a great deal of invective back and forth.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Oh, fiddlesticks; you are just delaying the bill.

Mr. Fisher: I hear an interruption from the hon. member for Acadia. I am glad to have this interruption because I know he represents a definite point of view. It seems to me that in the province of Alberta they have some kind of fossil deposits. They have discovered ancient animals. It is known that that part of the province contains some of the oldest remains in existence. In taking the position that he has, and I say this quite honestly, it seems to me that the hon. member for Acadia is representing one of the oldest positions in Canadian and North American politics and to me it is a fossil position.

I have strayed away from the point—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: I am always ready to permit a question.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The hon. member has gone to great lengths to describe the research group the committee should have. I am sure there is no one more qualified to speak about committee work than the hon. member, and he has done a lot of research in connection with committee work. However, can the hon. member tell me why the hon. member for Vancouver East and others did not ask the same questions in the committee when the parties were there to answer them that they have been asking in the house?

Mr. Fisher: I could not answer a question concerning what role our members played. Normally, I am a member of this committee but I was bumped off the committee because the bill seemed to affect the regions of other hon. members. I do know that I found the committee's reports interesting. As a matter of fact, the central reason for my speech today is the information contained in the latter that the hon. member for Vancouver East received from the Pembina company and filed with the committee. When I compare the information contained in the letter with the information that has been given to us by the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Winnipeg South, I am convinced that the hon. member for Vancouver South has an excellent point. I had not realized that a pipe line company in Canada today was so truly Canadian as this organization seems to be.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am sure the hon. member would permit another question. Did he not see in the committee proceedings a statement to the effect that if Interprovincial Pipe Lines, I think it is, or the Pembina people, were given the contract by the United States oil company, then the United States oil company would be granted controlling interest in the Canadian firm? I am sure this statement appears in the evidence, and the hon. member would not want the members of this committee to be led astray.

Mr. Fisher: I had assumed from the fact they were being given the controlling interest that it was a matter of trade. I want to come closer to the hon. member who has been interrupting me. I want to say that I have never been able to feel money has any flag on it. It does not seem to me that you can really put a flag on capital, especially in North America. It always seems unreasonable to me, especially in view of the part of the country I represent, to get so worked up over the question of the source of capital. We have had to face this problem since Canada first came into being, and the United States faced it before we did.

On the other hand, in recent years we have developed an attitude, which some people credit to the present government, that the principle of Canadian ownership in any further development of resource fields will be the No. 1 principle. It seems to me this subject was debated when the national energy board was created. The Prime Minister has included this topic in some of those lovely little television performances I have observed a number of times. I seemed to feel that I and all the other little Canadians were going to enjoy a chance to get into the development of natural resources.

I talked to a member of the national energy board the other day for whom I have a great deal of respect. I am not going to go into detail about what he said, but he certainly indicated to me he did not have any particular concern arising from what he knew about this particular line. I could be assured, he said, that the national energy board would give the full benefit of all their resources to any hearing on this matter and that they would also take a look at the opinions expressed by the members of parliament. This is fine.

However, if I may return to the point I would say that a principle has been presented, first by the hon. member for Vancouver East but possibly more forcibly by the hon. member for Vancouver South. In the light of this particular principle, I do not see how we can agree to the passage of this bill. It seems to me it is a poor bill in the sense that it is the wrong kind of company bringing it forward. I make these remarks on the question of principle.

However, I should like to turn to a couple of other aspects of the bill that intrigue me. I really have not got a clear picture from anything put forward by the dual sponsors, but it seems to me that the question that was bothering the hon. member for York North was whether or not the launching of this particular organization would cripple, damage, ruin or cause trouble for the Pembina people, the Foothills people, in their attempt to get a much larger share of the product to market. The hon. member for York North was good enough to reveal that he did have a financial interest in the company involved. I think we all respect his integrity, though our views may differ from his. I do not believe the answers we have had from the two sponsors really clear this up. Reference has been made to the fact that this subject is too technical for us and we should therefore let the national energy board deal with it. It seems to me that it is in principle at least a fairly simple matter.

We have a company that has been working for two years part of the time in co-operation with the sponsors of this bill, and they naturally feel that the invasion in the field by the incorporation of this company might cause them difficulty in their attempts to set up the matter. This is the company—this company related to Pembina—that has shown to us that it has a magnificent ratio of Canadian ownership and of Canadian employees, one with which this other company cannot compare at all.

In this regard I should just like to point out that the Pembina Pipe Lines Limited company stresses that all its permanent employees are Canadians. This information was not contradicted before the committee. As a matter of fact, Mr. Burgis, I think that is his name, agreed that the general information contained in it seemed to go along with what had been filed, I imagine under oath before what has been made much of, namely a court of record before the Alberta group. I am therefore left with the feeling that, on a Canadian principle put forward by a number of members very feelingly, the bill is unsatisfactory. But from the point of view of the possibility of this company "snafuing" the works for the company that is already in the field, I have grave doubts that have not been answered.

There are a number of questions that I should like to put to the sponsor of the bill. One of the arguments that he put forward is that in 1957 public shares were offered on the market to Canadians. I observe the hon. member for Vancouver South shaking his head with regard to the point to which I was referring. I was wrong. It is just that the shares of the company were listed on the Toronto stock exchange in 1957 and since that time have been actively traded and have been available for purchase by any Canadian who wished to invest in them. But as the hon. member for Winnipeg South has indicated in his statement, the shares available to the public and traded on the Toronto stock exchange are a pittance in relation to the total shares that exist in the company.

Despite the fact that in the letter he put on record at page 3428 of Hansard in which Mr. Burgis said that the company does not have any need for additional equity capital at the present time, I should very much like to know from him whether it might not be the time, in view of the criticisms that have been made, for these two organizations, namely Hudson's Bay and Continental, to make available to the public more of these holdings they now have. It seems to me that this would be an answer. I should like more of an explanation than we are given in this letter filed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South.

There is another point about which I should like to hear from the sponsors of the bill and it is this. I know I could get this information on my own, but I feel they should provide it. As found at page 3429 of Hansard, we are told that the company has issued and sold to Canadian investors three different issues which in total amount to $28,600,000. I should like to know more about the circumstances in connection with this debt issue. I should like to know whether they were debentures that were issued along with any shares at various times. I should like to know whether this debt issue is held completely by Canadians, or just how the matter came along. It would seem to me remarkable if this company has never, since it got operating here, put on the Canadian market an issue of shares and yet at the same time has offered debentures to the Canadian public. It would appear to me that it has been taking advantage of all the savings that might exist in various markets in Canada. I should like to think that if they could raise this much money on debt issues, they could also find all kinds of purchasers for stock put on the market. I know that the value of shares at the present time, or the median value of shares say for the last year, might indicate whether or not this is a sensible request for information.

In connection with this bill, I have been greatly interested to discover that the two Calgary papers take different points of view on it. I was very much reassured when accusations were ringing in this house that a filibuster was going on. I wondered about the position of the members of this particular party. I wondered whether we were completely off on the wrong track. I therefore went to the trouble of checking in publications in Alberta and in other parts of the country. I was pleased to discover that the position that has been advanced here and has been supported so well by the hon. member of Vancouver East and by the hon. member of Vancouver South, has been supported by three publications, including the Calgary Herald. Even in the Calgary Albertan which rips strips off the C.C.F. for deliberately in a sense abusing parliament, it is conceded that the factor that the company would be United States controlled is something to which this House of Commons should give serious consideration. I was interested to discover that the periodical Saturday Night had an expression of opinion that would seem to indicate that the stand made against this bill has a great deal of merit.

By saying this I am not suggesting that this kind of support or this kind of view of whatever actions we or any other party may take is an essential thing. However, it is somewhat satisfying to find this situation in view of the bitter invective that has been hurled at the members of this party and even at the hon. member for Vancouver South when he has been making his objections to this bill.

It seems to me that the sponsor—I refer especially to the hon. member for Bow River —has been far too aggressive, especially for a sponsor, in making this kind of approach. As I conclude, I can only add to that criticism that it seems to me most regrettable that he has not been here more often to present the case in a calmer and quieter way that may have led us to take a different attitude.

Mr. Peters: The charge has been made that the aggressiveness was not shown in the committee. Hon. members will know that I am not a member of the committee. However, I availed myself of the opportunity of attending the committee hearings and listening to the arguments that were put forward. I believe that the hon. member who raised this problem a few moments ago will agree with me that the discussions that took place in the committee may have certainly been augmented to a great degree by the bits of information that have been continually fed to the house by the sponsors of the bill.

The hon. member for Vancouver East is specifically interested in the financial arrangement as it affects another company that has already been given the opportunity of doing a similar type of development work and the hon. member for Vancouver South is interested in it from the point of view of the Canadian content. Both these hon. gentlemen in particular have been answered at great length and the answers that have been given have been supplemented and have been much more extensive than was the information that was given to the committee in the first place.

Many of the hon. members who sat in that committee were interested in one aspect of the bill and were not particularly interested in the over-all bill in relationship to the viewpoint of the two hon. members I have mentioned. Those hon. members, were more concerned with the financial arrangements than were some others. The information now available to the committee is a great deal more extensive than that available in the committee hearing and we are now more able to make a decision.

I am interested in this matter from another point of view. This is not completely divorced from the point of view expressed today by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I am interested in the relationship which this particular industry, or this particular company —because it is almost all of the industry and will be the key to the industry—will have on Canadian development and the development of Canadian secondary industry in western Canada.

I spoke to someone the other day—the hon. member for Acadia may laugh—who pointed out that this was like putting a tap on the bottom of the oil barrel in western Canada, running this half mile of tap over to the United States and dumping the whole thing there.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a correction? He keeps on pronouncing my constituency as "Arcadia". There is no "r" in the spelling of my constituency. Also, it is in Alberta, not Nova Scotia, as the hon. member probably thinks.

Mr. Peters: I thank the hon. member for his correction. I can assure him that I did not think he came from the maritimes area of Arcadia. I am familiar with the fact that he comes from western Canada and I will try to pronounce his constituency correctly in future.

If this is the tap on the bottom of the oil reserves, it seems to me that consideration of this matter should be extensive because we are discussing a resource that can be as advantageous to Canadian secondary development as the oil industry has been to those areas in the United States which are going to benefit from these oil reserves.

The development that has taken place around these refinery centres in the United States has been phenomenal. It has been accomplished in a very short period of time, and the results of this development have brought untold wealth and benefits to the areas serviced by secondary development in the oil industry.

It is our hope that parliament will give consideration to this matter in relation to this particular bill. It is not enough to say that we should leave it to the Alberta oil and gas conservation board or the national energy board to make the decision. I think it is obvious that the obligation is on parliament to make the decision, and we should do something about it.

As we look around our country and the world today we see that there is a growing desire on the part of the people to keep their countries for themselves. We are witnessing a war in Cuba today, or a counter-revolution to overthrow the government that has as its motto "Cuba for the Cubans". That motto is similar to that the Conservative party adopted in the last election, "Canada for the Canadians".

I think those of us who do not support the Conservative party have an obligation to make sure that hon. members do not forget that particular fact. We have an obligation to see that they live up to the slogan "Canada for the Canadians".

I do not object to United States capital coming into the country. I do not think it is necessary that all the money going into this development should be Canadian, but I do think we should use our resources to the best of our ability. If we are going to drain our natural resources we are not going to develop any type of secondary industry in our country.

The Canadian chamber of commerce, which supports the present government, have this to say in their publication "Policy Declarations":

> The chamber also urges its members to promote and support federal and provincial and business policies which will lead (1) to properly integrated development of Canada's natural resources in the interests of the nation as a whole; (2) to government policies in resources management that will ensure maintenance and where possible expansion of all renewable resources; (3) to fiscal and taxation policies consistent with good resource management and (4) to the development of educational programs with respect to the conservation and efficient utilization of natural resources.

They go on to talk about off shore drilling, and so on.

An hon. Member: You are talking nonsense.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, these interventions continue to come from hon. members from western Canada who appear to have divorced themselves from anything the Conservative party has said about maintaining Canadian industry for Canadians. They seem to be really happy to give all Canadian resources to the people of the United States.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is tommy-rot.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration of the matter under discussion at five o'clock.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

On clause 1—Goods deemed of class or kind made in Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I was unable at five o'clock to make certain remarks in regard to the amendment put forward at that time, and because the amendment has been dealt with since I will not attempt to do so now. My proposed remarks will have to remain off the record of Hansard. Perhaps many hon. members in committee would be better off if their remarks were left out. I would suggest, however, that there is a problem in regard to the discussion of this bill because one clause essentially contains the whole substance of it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are three other clauses on the next page.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, but there is only one main clause. It is subdivided in such a way that it becomes somewhat inconvenient for discussion. Perhaps in dealing with the subject matter of clause 1 it would be as well to raise one point at a time, and I propose to limit my remarks at this stage to one particular point. Perhaps I can do this best by indicating at the outset of my remarks the amendment I propose to move at a later stage. The substance of that proposed amendment, which I will move at the conclusion of my remarks, is that the clause be amended by striking out subsection 3 of section 2A.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Did you say subsection 3 of section 2A?

Mr. Benidickson: Actually this refers to the whole section.

Mr. McIlraith: It will be seen at once that the purpose of the amendment is a direct attempt to leave to the tariff board and the courts, unimpaired that portion of the legislation covering appeals. I do not think it is necessary to traverse ground that has been covered at the resolution and second reading stages but it does seem to me that there are many reasons why the right of appeal should be left in the legislation. I am at a loss to understand why the Minister of National Revenue, who will be charged with the responsibility of administering this act, would want to administer an act which, by its very nature, must be administered by a great number of departmental employees widely spread across this country, who make rulings quickly without adequate opportunity for consultation with the head office.

If there has been any difficulty in this regard in the past at least it has been impressed upon those employees that care must be taken when making these rulings because of the fact that they are aware that the rulings are subject to appeal to the tariff board, as a result of which there is very close public scrutiny given to them. From an administrative point of view I am at a loss to understand why the salutary and beneficial effect on the quality of those rulings, which results from this right of appeal, is being taken away by the minister. It seems to me for that reason, if for no other, the minister would want the right of appeal maintained.

I realize of course that in the administration of a public service many difficulties arise, but in an administration where this type of decision, with such far-reaching effect, is left to employees, as in this case, it is important that the employees realize there is a check being made, and I would hope that the minister would explain frankly to this committee how he would expect to keep up the high standard of administration which this act has received at the hands of employees in his department, when he is removing that which is regarded by most individuals making this type of decision as something which will assist the administration.

There has been the argument made and well expressed by others, that there would be an absolute danger to the economy in this country if decisions under this clause are made carelessly because they are not subject to appeal. These decisions will have a far-reaching effect on the productive capacity of this country. It seems to me that it is common ground to most hon. members that one of the problems facing us today in this competitive society is the ability of our manufacturers to produce efficiently and relatively cheaply. One of the difficulties with which they are faced today is the high cost of production. If Canadian manufacturers are to compete effectively it is important that no added production costs should be placed upon them. Once the right of appeal has been taken away, rulings of this kind may have the effect of increasing the rate of duty in respect of imported machinery used for production purposes. I think it is fair to say that this increase could vary from 7½ per cent to 22 per cent in respect of many of the items imported as production machinery, which will have a bearing on production costs.

That kind of added cost is a very serious thing for the manufacturing industry in this country. The right of a manufacturer to appeal when he feels that a wrong ruling has been made on a point or points in an import application covering that type of production machinery is indeed a very valuable one to him. It is not only a valuable right to him but to all Canadians because of the significance of increased cost in the production of the goods. That increased cost significance would be applicable both to the ability to compete in foreign markets and the ability to compete in the Canadian market against imports. It works both ways.

I am at a loss to understand the minister's taking away the right of appeal when he knows that it has that significance. The right of appeal is one that we have had. Whether he intended it or not, I think the minister did disclose that there have been very few appeals over the years. The personnel of the tariff board has been increased, and increased materially. And yet, with the improved facility for handling appeals, the minister is taking away that right. Surely the minister is not going to suggest that he himself can look at all these cases and make an adjudication on them. To begin with I think it is physically impossible for him to do so, and I think he would be the first to admit that. He may have other views on this. If he has, I should like to hear them. It is an invidious position for him to be put in. It means that there will be no judicial interpretation of this interpretative section built up, none whatever, and that these various phrases used in the clauses will not have the benefit of the precedents in the decisions of the tariff board and the courts, but rather they will be made by the minister. We must remember that in this aspect of his work the minister is not answerable to anyone for these decisions. They are not published, and he can make them on whim or on any ground whatever.

Then, there is another ground for objecting to taking away the right of appeal. I think the Minister of Finance was a little abrupt in his interpretation of this clause when he was speaking earlier this afternoon. The consequence of the interpretation of this clause with which we are dealing is to determine the rate of duty which shall be applicable to a particular import. That is the consequence of the decision. Surely there can be no denial of that fact. I think the Minister of Finance was playing on words unduly this afternoon when he took the stand that this clause did not change the rate of duty set out in the items of the tariff. Of course, it does not. No one would suggest that it does. But surely that is not even a half answer to the problem confronting us; it is an evasion of the real point. The real point is that the decisions made under this clause will change the rate of duty applicable from no duty, or very low duty, in most cases, to a moderate or a high duty. The differential in the rate of duty between the two findings is up to 22½ per cent. In most of the items it is from 7½ per cent to 22½ per cent of the value of the goods.

Perhaps there is no point in picking out particular items and trying to decide what is the applicable—

Mr. Benidickson: Over-all, the hike is 15 per cent.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, the difference resulting from the decision in most cases increases the duty by about 15 per cent. If the decision goes against the importer, even if it is a fair decision, it is an increase of the taxation; for it is 7½ per cent when it is not made in Canada and 22½ per cent when it is made in Canada. It is an increase of 200 per cent in the taxation rate applicable because of a decision made by the minister, which is not subject to appeal. Surely the principle should be that taxation should be set by this parliament. It is no answer to say that the rates of duty on the different items are set by parliament if the minister can, without being subject to any appeal or giving the citizen any right of application to the tariff board or to the courts, decide which rate is applicable. Surely this is something the minister will need to explain more fully than he has done heretofore in the debate.

I do not suggest that the minister will abuse this wilfully of his own volition, but surely he should not be left in a position whereby on his own whim or caprice he can raise the taxation as between two importers of the same article by that kind of percentage or that kind of interpretation. Surely that is not what our system contemplates at all, and surely a minister of the crown ought not to be left in the position where it can be said of him in any particular case that he did that.

It would be possible to elaborate upon the reasons why the right of appeal should be left in and not taken away, and why the right of taxation should be left in the hands of parliament and not given to the minister, as this clause in effect does. One could elaborate on that and bring in all those loud-sounding speeches that were delivered by the Prime Minister and others of his supporters on the bill of rights about the rights of the citizen to not be removed other than by due process of law, but perhaps at the committee stage it is not necessary to go into that. Surely in the light of the clause that is now before the committee, those words were a mockery. Therefore, without further ado, Mr. Chairman, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate:

That subsection 3 of section 2A be struck out.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to start by echoing the words which have been uttered by the hon. member for Ottawa West about the loud-sounding speeches made and the hollow arguments used in this debate so far. Certainly no better description could be given of the speeches made by members of the opposition. Because of the fact that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, refrained from replying in the debate on second reading and I have not spoken at all and also the fact that we have now spent eight days on this debate, I would hope that by temperate statement and restraining oneself from saying the things that one would like to say we might be able to come to a decision on this matter without further prolonged and unnecessarily prolix discussion. I will not say "stupid" although one might be tempted to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a very good way of getting legislation through.

Mr. Nowlan: It is clearly in keeping with what we have had to put up with for eight days but I am trying to restrain myself. I know it is not true of the hon. member for Ottawa West and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who do have some knowledge of this subject, but one would almost think, in view of the debate that has taken place so far, that we were dealing with a new subject entirely of which hon. members opposite had no knowledge whatsoever. There is nothing new about this matter at all.

One would think that a "made in Canada" ruling was something which had suddenly developed or was being proposed in this legislation for the first time. As a matter of fact, "made in Canada" rulings have been in force in Canada under various terminology, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate pointed out, for probably over half a century.

We have been discussing appeals. It might be interesting to point out this fact in passing over these things, and I hope, as I say, that we will pass over them fairly quickly and temperately. Sometimes one hears the late R. B. Bennett referred to in caustic terms as a protagonist of high tariffs. It might be interesting to point out to the committee in passing that the right of appeal to the tariff board was brought into effect by the late R. B. Bennett.

Mr. Benidickson: But his staff had the final say.

Mr. Nowlan: During the years from 1921 to 1930, however, when another government was in power, with the exception of a short period in 1925 and 1926, there was a right of appeal to the customs board which was comprised of the deputy minister of customs, the assistant deputy minister of customs, another officer appointed by the deputy minister of customs, the deputy minister of excise and the deputy minister of taxation. That certainly could not be said to be an impartial board to pass upon appeals, and it was the late Hon. R. B. Bennett who created the tariff board and provided for appeals to that board, to which subject we have referred from time to time during this debate.

As I have said, there is nothing new about "made in Canada" rulings. They have been made over a long period of time. During my short term as Minister of National Revenue I have made scores of "made in Canada" rulings. Sometimes three or four a week come up, sometimes three or four a month. As a matter of fact, I made four last week under the provisions of the statute as it has existed for many years. So there is nothing particularly new about this.

All the bill does is (a) to insert the word "approximately" in order, as the Minister of Finance has pointed out, to restore the ambit of the act as it was intended and as it operated up to ten years ago and (b) to provide for a class of goods which has not heretofore been made but with respect to which the capability to make them exists, and so on and so forth. These are the purposes plus the fact that within a very narrow compass, to which I will refer in a moment, the right of appeal has been limited and in a very technical sense restricted. That is the only difference between the bill now before the committee and the act on the statute books today under which the Minister of National Revenue has operated up till this moment.

There has been a great deal said about doing away with the right of appeal. There has been a great deal said about transgressing upon the rights of parliament, that parliament is the only body that should pass upon tariffs and that the bill before us constitutes an abrogation of the right of appeal and a reflection upon the rights of parliament. As I said, Mr. Chairman, one could refer to that argument in language which probably would prolong the debate for a much greater length of time than I should like to see it prolonged. However, pursuant to an order of the house moved by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River the decisions and orders which the Minister of National Revenue has made under section 38 of the Customs Act since December 1, 1958, were tabled in the house today. Section 38 of the Customs Act as it has applied going back to December 1, 1958, has nothing to do with the bill before us tonight.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to keep the floor if I may until I finish.

Mr. Benidickson: Would he allow me to ask a question later?

Mr. Nowlan: I surely will. I gave this document to the Clerk this afternoon for tabling in the House of Commons.

Mr. Benidickson: After seven days of debate.

Mr. Nowlan: There are, I believe, 44 different rulings which have been made by the Minister of National Revenue under section 38 of the Customs Act since December 1, 1958. This act has been on the statute books for many years. It was in force under the regime of the preceding government, and with various and slight modifications—

Mr. Benidickson: This is a new ruling.

Mr. Nowlan: These are not new rulings. These are rulings which have been made under section 38 of the Customs Act which has been in force in Canada for at least a quarter of a century.

Mr. Benidickson: It was not section 38 before.

Mr. Nowlan: Without taking the time of the committee, I will simply suggest that those who are worried about the effect of making these rulings, and I know there are some who are worried, should peruse the document which was tabled in the House of Commons today. Section 38 authorizes the Minister of National Revenue to fix values for duty without consultation with parliament. The minister has the right under that section to fix the value for duty purposes. I am not going to bore the committee because I do not wish to take too much time. I have marked 20 or 30 different orders which have been made and which are not subject to appeal.

These are ministerial rulings made by the minister pursuant to the act and whether they are right or wrong, and I hope they are right, they are not subject to appeal. So when we hear the talk we have heard about trespassing upon the right of appeal I suggest that one should look at the return which was tabled today and then decide how much substance there is to this argument about infringement of the right of appeal. There are orders here wherein the Minister of National Revenue has said that there shall be cost plus an advance of 25 per cent. There are other orders in which the Minister of National Revenue has ordered that there shall be cost plus an advance of 50 per cent. There have been orders dealing with imported goods from foreign countries where we have said that the value of the goods from that country shall be equal to the cost of the goods from another country.

As an example, I may cite the case of Chinese paint brushes. This is a very minor case, but it is one in which we have said that the value for duty shall be the value of the brushes exported from Great Britain rather than from China. One could go on and on giving examples. I would hope that hon. members who are concerned about this matter would take advantage of the opportunity to read the return which was filed today showing the powers which have been vested in the minister of national revenue, not by this proposed amendment, but which have been vested in the minister for over half a century by the parliament of Canada. This amendment relates to a minor matter. I would suggest, too, that these powers have been exercised, not by minions as was suggested yesterday, but by senior officials of the Department of National Revenue. These are men of experience who have been trained and who have spent a lifetime in the service of the department.

Although I appreciate the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa West a while ago to the effect that no minister could possibly have the time to deal with all these matters, I want to assure the committee through you, Mr. Chairman, that there has not been an order made concerning a "made in Canada" ruling or fixing the value for duty which the minister has not perused personally, checked and rechecked before he signed it. There have been, I may say, scores and scores of such orders. If the committee, in its wisdom, sees fit to pass these amendments, as I hope it will, I can assure you that these rulings and orders will be made in a manner no different from that of the past. I am sure that my predecessor the late Dr. McCann and his predecessor the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley never made these rulings except in consultation with the senior officials who have available to them all the memoranda on the previous rulings, documents which go back almost to confederation and certainly for 60 or 70 years.

The Minister of National Revenue, with the advantage of these documents and the advantage of the experience and advice of the senior officials, has to make the decisions which he makes pursuant to the various sections of the act. As my hon. friend reminds me, there is no appeal from the decisions here. I invite hon. members to look at these orders tomorrow. They will see decisions here in which the value for duty was increased 100 per cent over what was alleged to be the fair market value. There are others in which the value for duty has been increased 25 per cent, 50 per cent and others where it has been marked up specifically by $5 or 50 cents, whatever the case may be. There are 44 of them, and they have been made since December 1, 1958. Every one of the rulings was made by the individual who happened, for the moment, to be the minister of national revenue. They were made without the right of appeal.

Then, we hear talk for seven days about the fact that we are transgressing upon the rights of parliament; that we are depriving someone of the right to appeal. Is it any wonder that one could speak of this matter in a way which would, I am afraid, prolong this debate to a much greater length than I hope it will last. I have been referring to one section, section 38 of the Customs Act, but I have in my hand a list of 64 different sections of the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff Act and the Excise Act under which the decisions of the minister of national revenue are final and without appeal.

Mr. Chambers: How many different sections?

Mr. Nowlan: Sixty four, and of those 64 different sections, 62 of them were on the statute books of this country when the present government took office in 1957. There are two of them which were enacted by the present government, the one fixing the value plus a reasonable mark-up for profit, and the one fixing the values of fruit to be imported. Not one order has been made under either section.

I think possibly some weeks ago I misled the committee when I said no action had been taken under the revisions of the Customs Act in 1958. There have been many decisions to which I have just referred which have been made under the revisions of the Customs Act in 1958. However, the revisions of the Customs Act were all consolidations of existing sections with the exception of the two amendments to which I have referred and under those two amendments no orders have been made. I do not believe I should worry the committee by enumerating these various sections. I have marked a lot of them and if I had the time I believe I would have a reasonable degree of fun by enumerating some of the powers given, rightly or wrongly, to the minister of national revenue and which have been exercised for almost half a century. They have been exercised by my predecessors and, at the moment, they are exercised by me as minister. They will be exercised by other ministers who come after us. In not one single case, Mr. Chairman, is there a right of appeal from the decision of the minister. Rightly or wrongly, the decision of the minister is final.

Then, it has been suggested that these minor little amendments which we are making today are an infringement of the rights of parliament; that they transgress upon the courts or obliterate the courts. As I have said, the language in which I should like to describe this argument is such as I should like to refrain from using at the moment. I have these four typewritten pages which set forth the sections of various acts to which I have referred. On the last page I notice one section which says that the minister's decision shall be final and he shall be the sole judge as to whether printed material is educational or otherwise. Well, that is not too heavy a responsibility but nevertheless it is indicative of the powers which are given to the minister of national revenue.

I have given some of the background of the practice which has prevailed throughout all these years as a result of the authority given by parliament. We are now dealing with amendments which, to some extent, enlarge the power of the minister with respect to goods which are ordered by specification and goods which are approximately of a class or kind. My colleague the Minister of Finance has dealt at some length with these matters and I do not propose at this time to weary the committee by dealing with those matters further. There are several powers of appeal given, but the decision of the minister shall be final with respect to the normal Canadian consumption of the goods described. My good, personal friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said last night he could not understand why this appeal was to the "consumption", and why it was not to the "production" of the goods made in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not advocate that.

Mr. Nowlan: But yet my hon. friend and, I think, various other hon. members argue that the minister can fix normal consumption, that the minister can fix the figure very low, that he can have his friends and give them a hand-out. There was a score of quotations such as that emanating from the mouth of my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Yet in the same breath last night he said that he could not understand why the appeal was from consumption and not from production.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman does not want to misinterpret what I said last night.

Mr. Nowlan: Not at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said that I opposed the abolition of any kind of appeal. However, I said that if one were seeking to make a case for refusing an appeal, I could see slightly more sense in the case of production in Canada than I could in the case of consumption in Canada. I said that because I thought the producers might want to keep their production secret but I could not see why anyone would be interested in keeping the consumption secret. However, I want it completely understood that I am opposed to any abrogation of any existing right of appeal.

Mr. Nowlan: Abrogation of any right of appeal as suggested in this legislation is infinitesimal as compared with the abrogations of rights of appeal which occurred under legislation enacted when my hon. friend was in the privy council and in the privy closet for years preceding me. It is rather refreshing to hear that this wandering gentleman from Winnipeg who sat in the closet here for 11 years and now has arrived fresh and salty from Bonavista-Twillingate, should be suspicious of the activities of the government in this country. It must suggest to hon. gentlemen that the companions and the associations which he had during those years rather twisted his thoughts and suggested to him suspicions.

Mr. McIlraith: Why do you not talk about the bill that is before the committee?

Mr. Nowlan: These suspicions certainly would never occur to any of us on this side of the house. What I am getting at is this. If my hon. friends' suspicions are correct and if the minister of national revenue can arrange for a coterie of friends somewhere in a room or, as he said, in a closet, to look after them, why have an appeal from the decision of the minister with respect to Canadian production, because it is Canadian production that is going to be made by those friends. But there is an appeal from Canadian production, from the activities of the minister's friends, from the activities of anybody who might be associated with this government within Canada. The appeal lies in Canadian consumption. Everyone knows that Canadian consumption—and my hon. friend will well realize this—consists of Canadian production plus imports less Canadian exports.

One question why there should be no appeal on that matter of consumption, I can give one little illustration of a case which was before my department and the tariff board in the end last year and the year previous. It was the so-called "ball bearing" case. As I pointed out on an earlier occasion, and I do not want to trespass on the time of the committee now, the Department of National Revenue, because of its dealings with all of these producers and the importers, the confidential nature of our transactions and all the documents involved, is in the position—and it is the only one—of getting all the information—and we did not always get it all—which is necessary on the case. In the ball bearing case it was necessary for the Department of National Revenue to get the information with respect to ball bearings produced outside of Canada. What did we find? After consulting with the United States embassy and checking the sources of information there we found there were 18 suppliers in the United States manufacturing ball bearings with which we were concerned. We found there were 94 of them producing ball bearings in Europe. We found a large number—we were never quite certain how large the number was, I may say frankly—producing ball bearings in Japan and others possibly in Hong Kong. For months and months the department checked and rechecked through the embassies, through our own commercial counsellors and through every source of information available, trying to find out the number of ball bearings produced and brought into this country.

Added to that, of course, was our own production which could be very easily determined. In the end after seven months, we were faced with the necessity of making a decision and we made one. We fixed the consumption of ball bearings in Canada. It took us seven months to get this information. There was the possibility of an error but there was a much greater necessity for giving a definite ruling and for making it final so that business would know where it fitted and whether it could go ahead or whether it could not do so.

If after having spent months and months in trying to get this information and having used every possible source of information which is available to the department with all its far flung sources of information, some interested person could enter an appeal to the tariff board on some figment of imagination that there might have been a mathematical error in the computation of this consumption, then the situation would have been delayed for another two years before a definite decision could be made. How could business be carried on in that particular field?

Mr. Benidickson: So Queen Elizabeth is wrong?

Mr. Nowlan: I am not sure about Queen Elizabeth but I know that my hon. friend for Kenora-Rainy River is wrong. But that is the reason why we have said that, in so far as Canadian consumption is concerned, it is necessary in the end, having exhausted every possible avenue open to us in order to get it certain. In order to give a decision, in order that business may map its course and know where it is going we say that the decision of the minister in this mathematical computation in this area shall be final and shall not be subject to appeal. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to compare that section with those to which I referred a moment ago in which, on important matters, no appeal has been allowed since the Customs Act was enacted.

Then there are two other areas in which there is no appeal and in which the decision of the minister shall be final. Section 1 is where goods are custom made to specification.

Mr. Benidickson: Whose specification?

Mr. Nowlan: Surely any person with reasonable intelligence and having access to the documents can determine whether goods are being ordered by some hon. gentlemen opposite from a manufacturer according to the specifications of the hon. gentleman opposite or any hon. gentleman, and the person ordering them according to specification and not according to standard production of the manufacturer. Surely there is nothing there which causes any concern. It is a simple little elementary question of fact.

Mr. Pearson: Why take two years to decide?

Mr. Nowlan: My hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition says it might take two years to decide.

Mr. Pearson: That is what you said.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said so. That is what he said a moment ago.

Mr. Nowlan: I said that a capricious person or a person wanting to enter a capricious appeal might take two years, and since they raised this matter, Mr. Chairman, I will deal with it. We have had many motives imputed here. It has been suggested that there are friends with whom one might consort, that somebody must be getting a pay-off. The only reason I can see for this exaggerated or prolonged debate is the fact that there must be somebody, some period of someone on the other side of the chamber who is afraid of the rulings that may be made and he wants to be able to maintain a system of superficial and artificial appeal so that he can avoid rulings for a period of two, three or four years. One argument is just as good as the other as far as that is concerned.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the minister but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let him go on.

The Chairman: Is the committee agreeable that the minister continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I see that the quality of mercy is not strained. I appreciate the courtesy I have been shown and I do not intend to trespass upon it.

The second section of interest concerns the right of appeal being restricted. The third one is whether adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production of such goods within a reasonable period of time. Of course, that is an involved sentence and could be subject to various interpretations.

I am not going to suggest for a moment that there is not some room for debate as to what is a reasonable period of time. If you are making a thermal generator, which takes three years to build, or tin cans—

Mr. Benidickson: What about a 2½ cubic yards shovel?

Mr. Nowlan: —or if you are making a shovel, which takes a month—

Mr. McIlraith: It took in that case five years.

Mr. Nowlan: We can also argue the five-year period but we are not going to do that. Those are the three limited areas in which the power is vested in the minister. The right of appeal still exists in the major field.

It has been suggested that the right of appeal will be taken away by this bill. The right of appeal exists. Also, a great deal of play has been made of the word "approximately". There is an appeal on whether goods are of approximately a class or kind which has been made in Canada before.

With regard to the determination of Canadian production, as I said a moment ago when referring to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, there can be no hole-in-the-corner and no arrangement can be made with your friends, as has been suggested, because in that area there is an appeal to the tariff board and again to the courts. Of course, with regard to whether Canadian consumption is actually 10 per cent or more there is also a right of appeal.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to have taken up so much time, but we have been sitting here for some little while debating this subject and I thought I would be pardoned if I tried to bring this matter into perspective as I see it and as I think, frankly, the Canadian public see it and anyone who has dealings with the department.

I am very proud of the department. I think the departmental officials are recognized by everyone in Canada as being men of ability. The senior officials are recognized as being men of experience and integrity, with a record of service which is unequalled by any other department in this country or elsewhere. To suggest that these matters could be manipulated in any way, shape or form is rather difficult for me to accept.

I hope I have not transgressed the rule of good nature to which I tried to adhere myself with some difficulty when I started and that having had this discussion we can now proceed to pass this bill.

I say again that the amendments which are proposed are rather important. In so far as concerns the extension of the minister's powers by the use of the word "approximately", and extending the type of goods which have not been made in Canada before but for which the economic and productive capacity is here, this is a rather limited area in a field in which the Department of National Revenue has been actively administering for half a century. I suggest that the country and this committee can leave these matters for decision by the department, because after all the final appeal is to this supreme court.

Mr. Benidickson: Is the decision made by a junior clerk, or yourself?

Mr. Nowlan: This is the supreme court of Canada, and no one can suggest for one moment that it is not. If there were any of the suggested derelictions of duty which have been put forward with exaggerated emphasis by hon. gentlemen in the debate on this bill, they would appear before this house within a month of their occurring. Here is the final right of appeal given to the Canadian people, and I am sure they will not find that this section has been abused to the extent, or in any way such as has been suggested during this debate.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I will take only a minute to attempt to deal with the minister's last remarks. We have heard from the minister a moving and indeed impassioned appeal. He will forgive me if I say that I am not impressed. Perhaps I had better put it this way; I was certainly impressed by the facility of his language, but I was not impressed by the logic of his argument, because for most of his speech the minister dealt with administrative decisions from which there is not an appeal now and has not been in the past.

We are dealing now with matters from which in the past there has been an appeal. That appeal is now being taken away by legislation. The minister may say that these matters are, the word he used in connection with one of them was infinitesimal in importance. However, we are dealing with matters of trade and business which may reach $250 million.

However important or unimportant these matters may be—and we think they are important—the fact remains that an appeal has existed from decisions in respect of them in the past and this government, by legislation, is now taking away that right of appeal. No eloquence on the part of the minister can deny that fact.

The minister says these matters are not important and should not cause any anxiety in our minds. The minister says that he and his department can be trusted to administer these matters. We have great respect for the minister's ability and sincerity, and we have great respect for the officials of his department.

However, the fact cannot be denied that something which has existed in the past in the way of an appeal to the tariff board and to the court is now being taken away. That is why so much anxiety has been created not only in the minds of the hon. members of the opposition but throughout the country. That anxiety and worry on the part of the people of this country has been expressed by us in the house, and no eloquence of the minister will be able to deny that fact.

No eloquence on the part of the minister and no effort on his part to read all the decisions on which there is no appeal can deny the fact that an appeal has existed over the years and that appeal is now being taken away by legislation.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, the minister said something about this house being the supreme court of Canada. I should like to remind the minister that the only area in which this house has been the supreme court is in the case of divorces, and it is even running into road blocks there.

The minister is a very able man. In fact, the minister is one of the most eloquent speakers I have listened to for a long time. He can successfully pull wool over the eyes of almost anyone. I happen to be in the fortunate position where I have not much wool which can be pulled over my eyes and the minister cannot do this to me.

The minister talked about the possibility of capricious appeals. There is certainly the possibility of capricious appeals. But is there not also the possibility of a capricious minister if we give him all the power that is involved in this bill? I will not say the possibility is there now. I am not accusing the minister of anything. However, we have to look ahead. When bills are passed they become the law until such time as they are revoked at some future date.

There is another aspect of this matter which rather concerns me. The minister referred to it two or three times. I refer to the remarks of the minister when he said that the government has had to put up with a debate on this subject for a period of seven or eight days. I should like to warn the minister that he is treading on very dangerous territory and would suggest that he think twice before taking a step such as this bill proposes. If this proposes nothing new, as the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have said, then why should we be asked to pass it? Surely there must be something new involved here or it would not be before the committee at this time.

I should like to mention one other matter which comes to mind as a result of the wording of this proposed amendment. I had intended to move an amendment so similar to this that I should like to read it for purposes of comparison. The amendment I proposed was that Bill No. C-72 be amended by removing the whole of section 3 of subsection 2A. It is the experience of this group that any time we find ourselves as close as this in thought to the Liberals we have cause for grave concern and have to search our souls to make sure that we are on the right path.

Mr. Hellyer: Would you be interested in knowing that the concern is mutual?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): We have learned from the hard lessons of history during the 94 years that this country has been in existence that we have no more reason to trust the Liberals than the Tories, and vice versa. They are six of one and half a dozen of the other as far as we are concerned.

An hon. Member: I do not think he even trusts himself.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I would ask the minister whether he would be happy to place such trust in a C.C.F. minister granted these powers?

An hon. Member: No, no.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): If the answer is no, then why should he—

Mr. Grafftey: That is hypothetically ridiculous.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Why should he place such powers in the hands of a Liberal or Tory minister? There is one difference between this party and others in this regard, and that is we would not give this power to even a C.C.F. minister if we were the government.

An hon. Member: That would be even worse.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): There is no place in a democracy for the granting of power in the way proposed by this bill, without any recourse to appeal. There is no place in a democracy for a provision of this kind, and that is why we support this amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Revenue was indeed very careful not to refer directly to anything I said in the hope that I would not reply to his argument. That is a vain hope because I intend to clear up one point at once. I said that a minister under this legislation could do certain things. I did not at any time suggest or insinuate in any way that the present minister would do those things. I am sure the minister will agree with me in that. I do say it is a wrong and unsound principle of government to trust even the most able and upright minister. I should like to quote again from what the right hon. gentleman, who is now the Prime Minister of Canada, said when he was over on this side of the house in 1950 with regard to this precise point. The Prime Minister is reported to have said:

> —and if we are to accept at face value what ministers say, we had better all be absent from this house.

Those words of the Prime Minister ought to be remembered by all members supporting this bill, because it was on the basis of this kind of statement, and on the basis of specious arguments that were made by hon. gentlemen who are now on the treasury benches about their predecessors there, that the Prime Minister made his appeal to the country and got into office. It does seem to me to be most extraordinary that the same gentleman, when on this side said:

> If the cabinet is to be trusted and if we are to accept at face value what ministers say, we had better all be absent from this house.

The Prime Minister is now absent looking after the affairs of other countries than his own.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely what he is doing.

Mr. Grafftey: Shame.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that anyone who read the account of what the Prime Minister had to say today, as it appeared in the newspapers, would see that he was telling other countries how to run their affairs. I suggest that the Prime Minister has a more urgent task, and that is to deal with the way in which the affairs of this country are being mismanaged. That is what he was elected to do, manage the affairs of this country, not give lectures to other countries.

An hon. Member: That is not worthy of you.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say that if the cabinet is to be trusted, as the Prime Minister said, and if we are to accept at face value what ministers say, we had better all be absent from this house. Yet the gentleman who said that now asks us to trust not just the cabinet, but a single minister and as my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition said, to trust a single minister in something which heretofore has been subject to appeal.

This bill proposes the taking away of a right. It does not seem to me that it makes any difference whether there are 64 or 6,400 cases in the statutes where there is no right of appeal and never has been. I think the minister will have great difficulty in finding one single case where a right of appeal, which has hitherto existed, has been taken away by this parliament. Surely, the point is that a right of appeal which now exists is being taken away; that which exists now will no longer exist. Notwithstanding the bill of rights, a right which a subject now has will no longer exist if this bill receives royal assent.

I have only one other point to make in regard to the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa West. It seemed to me that the Minister of National Revenue made a very weak argument indeed when he pointed out that Mr. Bennett provided a tribunal separate from the Department of National Revenue in respect to these appeals. I feel that was a forward step, but I wonder why this government wants to undo, in some respects, what Mr. Bennett did. The minister has suggested, and I think rightly so, that Mr. Bennett set up a tariff board creating a right of appeal outside the department which had not before existed. When Mr. Bennett's successor came into office that right of appeal was made more complete and precise. This was done by the legislation brought forward in 1936 by Mr. Dunning. The whole trend has been to permit appeals and extend the area of them. This bill, which seeks to undo this, is turning back the clock. As my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, has pointed out, these are not insignificant matters. These are matters which may involve one quarter of a billion dollars' worth of business. These are matters which may affect the profitability of our export industries and their capacity to improve their capital structure. These surely are not insignificant matters, however much the minister may say they are.

Mr. Benidickson: I think many hon. members now sitting in this committee will recall that I protested with some vehemence last week with regard to a tendency that I thought had been developed by the ministry in presenting information to parliament after the opportunity for debate had been concluded. The particular instance to which I refer was the presentation of a document after the time when members of parliament would normally have it brought to their attention, and after debate had concluded in respect of a particular item in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. I recall the jeers of last week with respect to this item. Hon. members thought perhaps I was not attentive, or something of that nature.

I wish to refer to notice of motion No. 50, which was a request for copies of orders issued by the Minister of National Revenue since December 1, 1958, under provisions of section 38 of the Customs Act. I wish to pay my personal tribute to the Minister of National Revenue who told me today that return to this order had been tabled. I appreciate that courtesy, but other members of parliament would not know about the tabling of this document until tomorrow when they received Votes and Proceedings, which are the minutes of the proceedings of the House of Commons. Only then would they have been alerted as to what was available to the public and to our colleagues in the house in connection with the business of the house.

In connection with the report of the grain growers association which was referred to by the Toronto Telegram, I wish to repeat that not one member out of the 261 in this house could possibly have known about the availability of the report until the day after the debate had concluded in the house. In this instance, having regard to the matter before us and section 38 of the Customs Act, I thank the minister for drawing the tabling of this document to my attention.

When a committee of this house was set up in 1959, following amendments to the Customs Act in 1958, there was no difficulty whatsoever in providing the estimates committee of this house within a matter of two or three days with a complete list of all orders that had been issued under the new legislation of 1958. I say it is a travesty of the rights of members of parliament, who are seeking information, to receive, despite the courtesy of the Minister of National Revenue, information at the last moment. I would not have known until tomorrow, when Votes and Proceedings are published, had it not been for the courtesy of the minister, what was tabled today in the House of Commons. I refer to material which relates to this debate and to the provisions of section 38 of the Customs Act, which was amended in radical form in 1958 by the new government. I appeal to all on the opposite side not to continue this kind of thing. I want to assure them that to the extent that I am capable I will be alert to all kinds of offences of this nature. I referred to some of them when I spoke last week. This is not treating the opposition as they should be treated and I do not think that the Minister of Finance, who is looking askance, the Minister of National Revenue, or anybody else, despite their oratory in past days, will ever find examples of parliament being ignored to the extent that the opposition has been ignored in the past. After all, the opposition is a component of parliament.

As I say, my return was tabled this afternoon. Other members would not know anything about it were it not for the courtesy of the Minister of National Revenue who indicated to me privately that it had been tabled with the Clerk of the House of Commons. Only tomorrow would members of parliament generally learn that the return had been made.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. McIlraith) negatived: Yeas, 27; nays, 66.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, there is one point that I want to deal with rather briefly. It has to do with the term "custom made to specifications" in clause 2A(1)(a). There seems to me to be a lack of clarity in the language, and I think the Minister of National Revenue rather pointed it up in his own remarks. It seems to me the reference should be to "user's specifications", so that paragraph (a) would read:

In the case of goods other than goods custom-made to user's specifications.

And so on.

Surely, the phrase "custom made to specifications" should have some further definition in it. Whose specifications? Surely, this should be clarified. I admit it is a small point, but it should be dealt with and I propose moving an amendment adding the word "user's". If I put the amendment formally before the committee, then it will limit the discussion to the narrow point. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate:

That paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 2A be amended by adding the word "user's" in line 10 before the word "specifications".

It would seem to be obvious that if this amendment carries appropriate amendments would have to be made to the other subsections but if it is defeated there would perhaps be no need to cover the ground again.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I cannot see anything wrong with the insertion of the word "user's" except that in many cases the specifications are the property of the manufacturer and he is simply meeting a condition of the customer. They are the manufacturer's specifications. There may be modifications to these specifications which are required because of peculiar circumstances with respect to the site, operating conditions or what not, but in very few cases would they be the user's specifications. I can understand the intent of the amendment and I can see that it would perhaps apply to such things as automatic transmissions where the specifications are those of the user, the automobile manufacturing company. If there are facilities in this country for manufacturing such items then the phrase "user's specifications" would be appropriate and I would be all in favour of such a change. However, having a little knowledge of the engineering and machinery field, it seems to me that the amendment would do more to confuse than to help. Although the amendment has merit, in my opinion it would be too limiting.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a brief comment. Normally the specifications that are contemplated by the bill would be user's specifications but there may be cases where the specifications are not those of the user. They may be those of the producer, just as the hon. member for Vancouver South has indicated. If it were not for this fact, one would be glad to meet the point raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West. The fact is there may be cases where the specifications are not those of the user although normally that would be the case. For that reason, I think it would be unwise to limit this provision in the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance one question on that point. I take it this provision will mean that the manufacturer in Canada can allege that goods are custom made to specifications when in fact they are shelf goods. Surely that was never intended, but as I see it that could be one possibility. It seems to me a more precise definition is required than simply "custom made to specifications". I am not arguing particularly that it should be limited to user's specifications but surely it cannot be left open so anyone can say that it is the specifications of the manufacturer of competitive goods or something of that nature. Surely there must be some tying down of the specifications to some person or group of persons. That is my point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not follow the hon. member in his reasoning, either in his reference to shelf goods or in what he has last said. He is overlooking the fact, I think, that there may be a great deal of engineering work to be done in these situations. The user, the intending purchaser, indicates his problem. He does not lay down hard and fast specifications himself but rather indicates his problem. The manufacturer will then contribute not only the goods but the design and he takes full responsibility for a design to meet the particular need indicated by the intending user. In that case the specifications are not laid down by the user. They are the manufacturer's specifications.

Mr. McIlraith: May I ask a question at that point? Does the design not become a design that the user has procured? It is the user's design at that point although the manufacturer has provided it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, that is where I think the hon. member is in error.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the very point. The user may provide the specifications himself or he may procure them from another firm and it may be that the very firm which is to manufacture the equipment will provide them. However, surely they are still the user's specifications. Surely, something more precise than the present language is required.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry, I do not follow the hon. member and I cannot agree with him.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, when we can afford it the minister and I buy new suits and we buy them from swatches that may involve importation from a British woollen manufacturing company. I do not know whether that is desirable—

Mr. Broome: Very desirable.

Mr. Benidickson: —but I want to know what the officials think who are sitting in front of the minister tonight with respect to whether the ordering of a woollen worsted suit under such circumstances is considered to be an ordering of shelf goods—as far as I know the goods are not on the shelf when the suit is ordered here in Canada—or whether it is a custom made order. How is the administration likely to administer this kind of provision? People may laugh but this is a very important matter. With all our respect for civil servants, we are giving bureaucrats rights under this bill that are not subject to any appeal in the traditional way to the tariff board, the Exchequer Court of Canada or the Supreme Court of Canada.

I do not want to draw attention to my suit but let us say that a small swatch of suiting has been created in Great Britain for use as a sample in Canada. I am persuaded that the particular pattern is not run off for everybody. They only run off a few yards in order to have possibly 12 inch by 12 inch samples. After their agents have travelled throughout the world and obtained orders, they may then decide on a reasonable run of this suiting in order to fill the orders that have been received.

In such cases there would be a delay of six to nine months from the time of creation of the first small run and I should like the minister to tell me whether or not Canada is going to regard these suitings as shelf goods. In my view they are not on the shelf, but are importers of such goods going to be regarded as importing custom made goods?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Except for the dumping duty, there is nothing in this bill that has any bearing whatever upon suitings.

Mr. Benidickson: I am not going to be put off in that way. I know that on December 20 the minister asserted that there were no rate increases provided here. He stands on that position.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There is no textile item involved.

Mr. Benidickson: The parliamentary secretary is quite right. There is no specific increase provided in respect of any individual item among the thousands we have in the Customs Tariff. However, as a result of parliament adopting this bill we will find, as we found during the Bennett regime, increases in the amounts of duty by tremendous percentages. There is no question about that. I know that the committee does not want me to repeat the quotations I gave yesterday from reliable sources.

I want to say that there are two things involved here. There is a direct opportunity for the tariff administration in national revenue to make an assessment under the made in Canada or not made in Canada provision. I suggest the department is going to make many decisions in the future that such and such a product is the equivalent of that made in Canada and, as a result, the department will have the right to invoke dumping duties. Otherwise, they have no right to refer to dumping duties.

I want to emphasize to all members of this committee that every student of tariffs has said that he requires no final statute, he requires nothing in the Custom Tariff if he has what was given to this government in 1958 in the way of ministerial discretion. The tariff board has been enlarged. It was said that the final judgments of the board would be worthy and helpful in influencing the administration with regard to recommendations for changes in the tariff schedule. I repeat that from now on if the minister of national revenue has the powers granted by this bill added to the powers given by the bill in 1958, any recommendations from the tariff board, after thoughtful and deliberate discussion, will be a farce.

Amendment (Mr. McIlraith) negatived: Yeas, 25; nays, 71.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not intend to detain the committee with any speech, but since the first amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa West has been rejected and it would, therefore, be improper to enter again into an argument on that amendment, I merely wish to say that since the committee has decided it will not recommend to the house that subsection 3 of the section be taken out, I move:

That a new subsection 4 be added to section 2A as follows:

(4) Any ruling made under this section shall be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette.

It does seem to me, sir, if we are not going to permit an appeal at least we should make a provision for publicity so that everyone will know what is happening. This does not mean that anything more than the ruling itself needs to be published. However, at least there would be a means for the members of this house, and for everyone, to know what the government was, in fact, doing.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not believe the members of the committee are familiar with the fact that for many years a very fine periodical has been published by the Department of National Revenue under the title, "Made in Canada Rulings". This is the normal procedure of the Minister of National Revenue, and the rulings relate to what is considered to be made in Canada and what is not made in Canada. I think the minister should tell us to what extent these new amendments will avoid publicizing a decision in the way it has always been publicized. I will give an example. I have here series "D", decision No. 51, dated October 23, 1953, relating to gasoline engine driven fork lift trucks. Precise details are given as to what fork lift trucks are made in Canada and what fork lift trucks are not made in Canada. I think henceforth we in this committee want to know the intention of the Minister of National Revenue in this respect. In respect of a certain article he will reach a decision that it is going to be regarded as possibly being made in Canada and that the tariff rate will be 22½ per cent vis-à-vis the United States instead of 7½ per cent, I think it is, if it was not an article made in Canada.

The point here to which I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance is this. In fairness to everybody across Canada there should be knowledge of what is going to be done. Inasmuch as it has been traditional for these rulings to be made public, what is the intention of the minister? Members of parliament may think we are asking for something that is unusual. However, this is something that has gone out every day in the week in the past. I refer to rulings with respect to what has been made in Canada and what has not been made in Canada, with definitive descriptions of the article involved. I want to know whether, under the new legislation, the Minister of National Revenue is likely to continue that form of advice to all interested in these trades so that, if he makes a decision under the laws that have been passed today, all people will be treated equally.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): First, may I point out what the situation is at the present time. Class or kind rulings are all made at the head office of the department here in Ottawa. These rulings are public, although not in the sense that they are today published in the Canada Gazette. Copies of the rulings are available to anyone today. Certainly there has been no thought at any time on the part of the government that rulings made under this bill, when enacted, would not be available to the public.

The hon. member's amendment contemplates the addition of a subclause 4 and it reads as follows:

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Any ruling made under this section shall be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette.

I had thought that what the hon. member was principally concerned with was the kind of rulings to be made which become final under subclause 3.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If that is what he has in mind in connection with this amendment, I think we can quickly find ourselves on common ground if he will be prepared to alter the proposed language of the new clause 4 to read after this fashion:

Any decision of the minister with respect to the matters enumerated in subsection 3 shall be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. Pickersgill: That amendment will be completely satisfactory to me. I should be very happy to incorporate it in the language the Minister of Finance has just used. It seems to me that is precisely the point. We feel that there should be a certainty in the law that these findings under subsection 3 will be published. I am happy indeed that the Minister of Finance has seen fit to accept this suggestion, I do not pretend to be a legal draftsman and I am very happy to accept the suggestion.

Mr. Benidickson: I, too, thank the Minister of Finance for his acceptance of this advice. I think this means that all in a certain industry are likely to know of ministerial decisions that are made possible by this subsection 3.

Mr. Herridge: I wish very briefly on behalf of this group to say that, while we frequently question the wisdom of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, in this case we think he has demonstrated some good common sense in putting forward this amendment and we intend to support it. We are also glad to note that the minister has agreed to accept it and that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has agreed to accept the minister's suggestion with respect to the slight amendment. We believe it is a good thing for the actions of the government under this bill to come into the light of day so that the public will know what is being done. At the same time I think the inclusion of this amendment in the bill will make the government conscious of the fact that the public, or the section of the public that is particularly concerned, will know of the the minister's actions in the administration of this act. While the minister mentioned that there are other means or ways of getting this information or that it is obtainable from other sources, we think that the Canada Gazette is the proper medium through which to inform the public of the government's decisions in this respect.

Before concluding my brief remarks I might say that I am under the impression that there must be some mental telepathy on this side of the house because we have been thinking of this matter for some time. That has affected the mind of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. We are extremely pleased on that account.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So that we may have the amendment in written form, Mr. Chairman, may I say that this is what I have drafted, if it is acceptable to the hon. member who has moved the amendment. The proposed clause 4 to be added would now read as follows:

Any decision of the minister with respect to the matters enumerated in subsection 3 hereof shall be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is completely satisfactory to me.

The Chairman: Shall I read the amendment again? Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Do I understand that the committee agrees to having the first amendment dropped and replaced by this one?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Clause as amended agreed to on division.

Clauses 2, 3 and 4 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Next sitting of the house.

ESTATE TAX

CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES FOR AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-82, to implement a convention between Canada and the United States of America for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on the estates of deceased persons.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on February 17 I announced to the house, as recorded at page 2145 of Hansard, that an estate tax convention had been concluded between Canada and the United States. The convention was signed in Washington on that day.

Hon. members may be interested to know that this was the first treaty signed by the new United States administration, just as the Columbia river treaty was the last treaty signed by the retiring administration. The purpose of Bill No. C-82 is to implement this convention.

In my statement of February 17 I described in general terms the purposes and effects of the convention. I do not propose to repeat the comments which I then made. I may remind hon. members that the convention is in addition to the existing Canada-United States convention of 1944 which continues to apply to the estates of persons who died before January 1, 1959.

The new convention applies to the estates of persons dying on or after that date, which is the date on which the Canadian Estate Tax Act superseded the Dominion Succession Duty Act. The convention follows the general pattern of the 1944 convention between Canada and the United States and the conventions between Canada and the United Kingdom, France, Ireland and South Africa. Certain desirable changes have, however, been made.

The convention is attached to the bill as a schedule thereto. The bill itself, in both substance and form, is familiar to hon. members who have in recent years perused a good many bills to approve and implement tax conventions. Since the convention, if approved by parliament, would prevail over the Estate Tax Act in the event of any inconsistency, care has been taken in drafting the convention to insure that the taxpayer secures any relief to which he is entitled under the convention without losing any advantage to which he may be entitled under the ordinary law.

The convention will not come into force until it receives legislative approval in both countries and certain formalities are completed. When it comes into force it will be retroactive to January 1, 1959 so as to provide continuity with the existing succession duty convention. Consequently benefits resulting from its terms will apply to the estates of persons dying on or after January 1, 1959.

Mr. Speaker, I think I may reserve my comments on the major articles of the convention until we are in committee on the bill. I recall that on such measures in times past, because of the fact that they follow a well established pattern, the discussion has been largely confined to the committee stage.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, we are fast approaching the adjournment hour of ten o'clock. This bill involves some technicalities with which I assume very few hon. members of the house are familiar. I confess I am not too familiar with them, although we all participated in the revision of the Canadian Estate Tax Act in 1959, I think it was.

I recall that fairly long and interesting discussions that took place at that time in the banking and commerce committee of this house. I take it that as a result of a rather wholesale revision of Canada's system with respect to the estates of deceased persons, including persons with United States residence who might have a liability, this particular legislation is necessary.

I imagine that having regard to the technicalities involved the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) would be very pleased to accede to my request that we call it ten o'clock. I take it that this does not in any way involve another legislative act that we must pass in the House of Commons relating to a United States-Canadian tax treaty because of the minister's supplementary budget of December. I take it this measure relates only to taxation with respect to deceased persons.

I see it is ten o'oclock. I am sure the Minister of Finance will agree—and I see that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) agrees—that we could discuss this legislation at another opportunity.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair perhaps the house leader will tell us, so it will be on Hansard, what is proposed for the rest of the week.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will have third reading of Bill No. C-72 dealing with the Customs Tariff. Then we will continue second reading of Bill No. C-82, which has just been under discussion, followed by item No. 9 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Labour dealing with the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons.

If those legislative items are passed we will go on with the estimates of the Post Office Department, northern affairs and justice, in that order.

Mr. Pickersgill: That applies for the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 19, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Second report of standing committee on public accounts—Mr. Macnaughton.

FLOODS

METROPOLITAN TORONTO—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN CONTROL MEASURES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like, through you, to inform the house of negotiations now proceeding with the province of Ontario for federal support of flood control measures in the metro Toronto region.

Hon. members will be aware that in 1960 the Ontario government asked us to participate in the metro Toronto and region conservation authority plan for the construction of dams, reservoirs, and channel improvements along the Humber and Don rivers and Black creek. The proposal also involves the use of flood-plain lands for flood control and recreation along five other streams, Etobicoke, Duffin, Highland and Mimico creeks, and the Rouge river.

It is expected that an agreement will shortly be signed under the Canada Water Conservation Assistance Act. Under this agreement the federal government would contribute up to 37½ per cent of the estimated $24 million capital cost of the works. The government of Ontario would contribute a like amount, and the municipalities in the conservation authority the remaining 25 per cent. The plan will also involve the acquisition or zoning of flood-plain lands for flood control and recreation purposes. To use these lands for recreation will require further works amounting to about $2.6 million, which will be met from sources other than the federal government.

The part of the plan affecting Black creek is now fully engineered, and tenders can be called just as soon as the agreement is concluded. These works will cost in total about $4 million, including almost $900,000 which has already been spent by the authority with the assistance of the government of Ontario on a 50-50 cost sharing basis. These works are designed to prevent the recurrence of flood disasters such as the one caused by hurricane Hazel which claimed 81 lives in 1954. The works will also have very important secondary benefits in recreation and in providing a regulated water system.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Liberal party I would like to say that we welcome this announcement on the part of the minister. This rather wide-scale scheme has been under consideration for a long period of time now and it is welcome news that a decision has been taken. With the development of this extended conservation region there will be, as the minister has told us, considerable benefit to the inhabitants of the region. Not only from the standpoint of conserving valuable natural resources but also in limiting the damage which may be done in future from floods and at the same time providing outstanding recreational facilities to the inhabitants for many miles around. We say thank you to the minister for having finally reached a decision, and we hope the works will proceed without any further undue delay.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, cynics might think there is some coincidence between the minister's announcement and the letter Mr. Gardiner received yesterday about the decision of the government not to support the subway scheme, but whether this is cynical or not it is a real advance to Toronto which I have always felt, as an adopted son, has been far more vigorous and attractive than any other city in Canada. I think this will go one step further in making it a genuine model for the rest of Canada.

I would have liked an indication from the minister that this would be a pilot type of project for more than the city of Toronto. We have, for example, in the lakehead region, and I know in other cities as well, similar kinds of authorities that are working to handle flood control and water conservation. I hope this may be merely an initial step which many other metropolitan or urban areas will follow.

STARRED QUESTIONS

VETERANS PREFERENCE, POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 248—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Is veterans preference recognized and applied in the selection of postmasters and other personnel for non-civil service staffed post offices by the Post Office Department?

2. If veterans preference is recognized, were there any cases in New Brunswick since July 1957 where veterans applied for, but did not receive, appointments filled by non-veterans?

3. If so, what are the names of these veterans, and for what appointments did they make application?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): The answer to the question is as follows:

1. Yes; in the selection of postmasters. There are no other personnel, except part time help which is selected by the postmaster.

2. Yes. During the period since July, 1957, 150 appointments have been made in non-civil service post offices in New Brunswick. In seven cases the veteran applicants could not be appointed as they lacked the necessary qualifications.

The answer to part 3 is a list of these people and the post offices, and I should like the permission of the house to have it printed in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave of the house to supplement his answer with the additional material and to have it printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answer referred to is as follows:]

3. Mr. Maxime R. Arsenau, Sheila, N.B.; Mr. Tranquille Chiasson, Pigeon Hill, N.B.; Mr. Joseph Gerard St-Laurent, Tide Head, N.B.; Mr. Robert McLaughlin, Belleisle Creek, N.B.; Mr. James Petrie, Juniper, N.B.; Mr. Arthur McIntosh Bromley, Glassville, N.B.; Mr. Norman H. MacFarlane, Temperance Vale, N.B.; Mr. Walter Blaney, Temperance Vale, N.B.; Mrs. Margaret E. MacFarlane, Temperance Vale, N.B.; Mr. John A. Doucet, Petit Rocher, N.B.; Mr. Omer Ward, Petit Rocher, N.B.; Mr. Adrien Laforest, Petit Rocher, N.B.; Mr. Norman Boudreau, Petit Rocher, N.B.; Mr. Onezime Frenette, Petit Rocher, N.B.

C.N.R. YARDS, TORONTO—VISIT BY ARMY PERSONNEL

Question No. 249—Mr. Hellyer:

1. Did Canadian Army personnel visit Canadian National Railways yards in Toronto on March 14 or 15, 1961?

2. If so, what was the purpose of the visit?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): The answer is as follows:

1. Yes.

2. This visit was included in the movement control officers' course which is conducted annually by the R.C.A.S.C. school at Camp Borden. It is the practice, as part of this course, to visit and thereby become familiar with operating segments of the transportation industry in Canada.

[Mr. McWilliam.]

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence supplementary to starred question No. 249. Can the minister say whether the visit of the Canadian army movement control personnel to the railway yards in Toronto was connected in any way, either directly or indirectly, with the possibility of a nation-wide railway strike in the not too distant future?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): So far as I am aware there is no connection whatsoever between these two matters.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister sure that his awareness is accurate, so that the house can rely on the information he has given?

"CANADA, OUR COUNTRY"—ESKIMO SCHOOL TEXTBOOK

Question No. 250—Mr. Pigeon:

1. Has the textbook used in Eskimo schools in new Quebec and entitled "Canada, Our Country" ("Toward Democracy" series), where the union jack is given a place of honour in the title of one of the chapters, been authorized for use in such schools by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources?

2. If so, how long is it since this textbook has been in official use?

3. Is it the intention of the department to discontinue the use of this manual?

4. Is English the only language of instruction for young Eskimos, even in that part of Canada which is within the province of Quebec?

5. How long has this situation existed?

6. Would it be possible for teaching to be carried out in French also?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The answer is as follows:

1 and 2. The book entitled "Canada, Our Country" ("Toward Democracy" series), is not a textbook and it is not authorized for use in schools operated by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. It is a small work book which was used in one classroom at Sugluk as supplementary reading material.

3. Apart from the one instance referred to, the work book has not been in use.

4 and 5. English is the language of commerce and general use throughout the north. In order that the Eskimos may be equipped to secure employment and to conduct business affairs, English is the language of instruction in the schools established by the department of northern affairs for Eskimos generally. This has been the practice in northern Quebec as well as the Northwest Territories since the first departmental school was established in 1949. It is necessary too, of course, to have the young Eskimos keep in contact with their native culture and language in the interests of family unity and stability.

6. The idea of universal education in the Arctic is comparatively new. In the interests of orderly change and transition, the pace must be matched to the needs of the local population. At the present time it would be difficult to have instruction in the French language for the reasons already indicated. There is the additional problem of shortage of bilingual staff. The schools of the north are staffed by teachers of the same religious faith as the majority of the pupils in the classrooms, and in northern Quebec over 90 per cent of the Eskimo children of school age are of the Anglican faith.

(Translation):

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources following the answers he gave to question No. 250.

At what time and by whom has it been decided that English would be the usual language of the Eskimos in the province of Quebec? Is it the intention of the government to consider changing this policy?

I apologize for not giving notice of my question to the minister.

(Text):

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question regarding this policy, as I understand it the school program got under way in the year 1949.

CANNED MEAT DONATIONS, WELFARE PURPOSES

Question No. 251—Mr. Argue:

1. How many pounds of canned (a) ham (b) pork luncheon meat, held by the agricultural stabilization board, have been donated for welfare purposes in Canada in each year since December 11, 1959?

2. What administrative channels in each province were used to distribute this to the needy?

3. What criteria were used in judging what organizations or institutions should receive this canned meat, and what body established them?

4. To what authorities in each province was this meat released for distribution?

5. Was any of this canned (a) ham (b) pork luncheon meat, distributed in Ontario for welfare purposes?

6. If so: (a) what was the name and address of each institution, organization, or person receiving it? (b) how many pounds did each receive, and on what dates? (c) from whom, or what authority, did these institutions receive this distribution on each occasion?

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, owing to the length of the answer to this question I wonder whether I might be allowed to have it printed and appended to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Has the parliamentary secretary leave to have the answer printed in Hansard instead of reading it?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): On that point of printing answers in Hansard because some of them are lengthy, may I say this. We have no idea how long they are. Would it not be better to have them passed as orders for returns without filling up the pages of Hansard? I think the rules make that provision.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister requests that the answer be made an order for return, that can be done.

Mr. Cardiff: That can be done.

Mr. Benidickson: On starred questions?

Mr. Cardiff: There must be a dozen pages of this answer.

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister requesting that the answer to this question be made an order for return?

Mr. Benidickson: Is this not something new in the way of a departure from our procedure?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, this applies to other questions which are on the order paper. These happen to be starred questions asking for oral answers, but in this instance I understand 12 pages are involved.

Mr. Cardiff: Twenty-four.

Mr. Churchill: There are 24 pages of statistical information, which would unnecessarily clutter up Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has asked that the question be made an order for return.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS

Question No. 253—Mr. Skoreyko:

1. What is the number of men unemployed in the age groups 20 to 34, 35 to 54, and 55 and over?

2. What is the number of men unemployed in the major seasonal industries (e.g., primary industries and construction) in the winter months as compared to summer months in recent applicable years?

3. How many single women are unemployed, and how many married women are unemployed?

Starred Questions

4. How many men and how many women in the age group 65 and over are unemployed?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the answers to this question are as follows:

1. The estimated numbers of men unemployed in the week ended March 18, 1961, in the various age groups are as follows:

20-34 years, 258,000; 35-54 years, 214,000; 55 years and over, 82,000.

2. The estimated numbers unemployed, both sexes, in the major seasonal industries during the winter months and summer months of 1960 are as follows:

	Primary Industries	Construction
First quarter, 1960 ..	91,000	174,000
Third quarter, 1960 ..	34,000	65,000

3. In the week ended March 18, 1961, the estimated number of single women unemployed was 42,000 and the estimated number of married women unemployed was 25,000.

4. In the week ended March 18, 1961, the estimated numbers unemployed in the age group 65 and over are as follows:

Men, 16,000; Women, less than 10,000.

APPOINTMENT OF CENSUS COMMISSIONERS, B.C.

Question No. 254—Mr. Herridge:

1. With respect to the appointment of census commissioners for British Columbia, were any of them appointed on the recommendation of (a) members of parliament (b) defeated candidates (c) officials of Progressive Conservative associations?

2. If so, what are the names of the census commissioners appointed under recommendations of (a) members of parliament (b) defeated candidates (c) officials of Progressive Conservative associations?

3. By whom were the recommendations made in each category?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answers to parts 1, 2 and 3 of this question are as follows. The appointments of the temporary census commissioners required for the census are exempted from the provisions of the Civil Service Act—T.B. 563112 of May 19, 1960—and the selection of these employees is left to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The appointment of each commissioner was made on the basis of his qualifications, which were as follows: a good education with subsequent professional or business experience in a supervisory capacity; intimate knowledge of the census district; proven executive and organizing ability; tact, good judgment and ability to deal with the public.

In making these appointments the minister did receive recommendations from various people, including members of parliament.

Mr. Argue: You are not kidding anybody.

[Mr. Skoreyko.]

CIVILIAN FIREFIGHTERS, R.C.A.F.

Question No. 255—Mr. Creaghan:

1. What was the total number of civilians employed as firefighters by the Department of National Defence at Royal Canadian Air Force establishments in Canada as of March 31, 1961?

2. Where were they so employed, and how many at each location?

3. Has the department commenced negotiations with any municipal government since March 31, 1961, for the purpose of entering into contracts to purchase fire protection for R.C.A.F. establishments?

4. If so, what are the names of the municipalities?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 of the question is 216 established positions.

As the answer to part 2 involves a detailed list giving the names of stations and the number of positions at these stations, I would ask that the list be printed at this point in Hansard, if that is agreeable to the house.

3. Yes.

4. Moncton, New Brunswick and Shediac, New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister would indicate how much material he is asking to have printed in Hansard.

Mr. Sevigny: One page.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give its consent that the answer to part 2 of the question be printed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BENEFIT CANCELLATIONS, UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Question No. 256—Mr. Roberge:

How many claimants for benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act have had their benefit entitlements cancelled as a result of cancellation of contributions during each of the months of January, February, and March, 1961?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the number of persons whose benefit entitlements were cancelled as a result of cancellation of contributions found to have been non bona fide was, January 1961, 1,054; February 1961, 1,150. The information for March, 1961, is not yet available.

FERRY SERVICE, EAST COAST-NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 257—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Has the government given any consideration to the establishment of an east coast ferry to ply between the mainland of Canada and either Argentia or St. John's, Newfoundland?
2. If so, at what time was such consideration given, and what is the result of the consideration?
3. When is it expected that this matter will be brought to a conclusion?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer which I gave on March 29 to a similar question by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria covers this matter, and at the present time there is nothing I can add to that answer.

RELIEF ORDERS, MANITOBA INDIANS

Question No. 258—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Is any direction given by any official of the Indian affairs branch to Indians in Manitoba as to the storekeepers to whom relief orders should be presented?
2. If so, what is the nature of these directions, and under what authority are they being given?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is that in the majority of cases where relief costs are met from appropriation the choice of supplier is left to the discretion of the Indian recipient and no direction in the matter is given by officials of the Indian affairs branch. In some instances due to local circumstances, it may be desirable to designate specific outlets.

C.B.C. INTERNATIONAL SERVICE—PERSONNEL TRANSFERS

Question No. 259—Mr. Cardin:

1. How many of the twenty-one employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation international service, who are being displaced by curtailment of the service, have been transferred to other continuing positions?
2. How many so transferred have had their remuneration reduced?
3. Have employees not yet transferred been retained by the C.B.C. since March 31?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): In reply to this question, the information supplied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is as follows:

1. Twelve employees transferred to continuing positions. Two employees transferred to temporary positions.

2. Seven of those transferred to continuing positions have had their remuneration reduced. Two of those transferred to temporary positions have had their remuneration reduced.

3. No employees have been retained by the corporation since March 31.

Two of the 21 employees in question were on post retirement employment and have now been retired; two more voluntarily resigned to seek employment elsewhere, and three others were separated when they did not accept alternative employment offered by the corporation.

DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME, RAILWAY SCHEDULES

Question No. 260—Mr. Deschatelets:

1. Has any consideration or study been given recently to the possibility of the adaptation of daylight saving time in railway time schedules?
2. If so, what is the substance of the decision in regard to any such consideration or study?
3. If not, will the government consider having this question referred to the appropriate authority for study?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): With regard to part 1 of the question, it should be first pointed out that standard time comes exclusively under provincial jurisdiction and therefore is not a subject for consideration by the federal government. However, the question was referred to the railway association of Canada, who advise that from time to time representations are made that the railways should adopt daylight saving time, and that these requests are given careful consideration.

Starred Questions

As to part 2, the railway association does not consider that the adoption of daylight saving time would be workable. The practice is not uniform throughout Canada, there being some provinces, and communities within provinces, which do not put it into effect, and the association also points out that in the operation of trains requiring interchange with United States railways, which operate on standard time, it is essential in the interests of safety that Canadian trains be operated on the same basis. However, before changing the timetables each year to coincide with the adoption of daylight saving time, the association consults with the provinces and the larger municipalities in an endeavour to provide schedules which will meet the convenience of the majority of passengers.

Part 3 is answered by the answer to part 1.

GARIBALDI PARK, B.C.

Question No. 261—Mr. Taylor:

1. Has any offer been made to secure Garibaldi park in British Columbia as a national park?
2. If so: (a) What was the date of the offer, which minister made it, and to whom was it made? (b) Was it accepted by the provincial government of British Columbia? (c) Is it still open?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): In answer to both parts of the question I would refer the hon. member to page 6850 of Hansard for July 23, 1960 when reference was made to this matter during the debate on the 1960-61 estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. At that time the minister pointed out that on May 2, 1958 he had written to the minister of recreation and conservation in British Columbia, Hon. Earle Westwood, proposing that if British Columbia were willing to turn the area over to the federal government free of all encumbrances the matter would be brought before the federal government for consideration and, should it be viewed favourably by the government, the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources would take over the area in accordance with the National Parks Act and proceed with a program of development.

There has since been no change in the position. I might add that no reply to this letter was ever received.

CROWN CORPORATIONS—PERSONNEL EMPLOYED

Question No. 263—Mr. MacRae:

What was the total number of personnel employed in crown corporations as of March 31, 1960, and March 31, 1961?

[Mr. Balcer.]

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Since the answer to this question is necessarily long, I wonder if it could be included in the record of Hansard. It consists of approximately one page.

Mr. Speaker: What is the extent of the answer?

Mr. Morris: It consists of approximately one page.

Mr. Speaker: Has the parliamentary secretary leave to have his answer printed in Hansard at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editors note: The answer referred to above is as follows:]

Personnel employed by agency and proprietary corporations and other government of Canada agencies as at March 31, 1960 numbered 140,726; and at January 31, 1961 numbered 134,455 (the latest figure available).

The figures include all employees of the following:

Agency Corporations: Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd., Canadian Arsenals Ltd., Canadian Commercial Corp., Canadian Patents and Development Ltd., Crown Assets Disposal Corp., Defence Construction (1951) Ltd., National Battlefields Commission, National Capital Commission, National Harbours Board, Northern Canada Power Commission.

Proprietary Corporations: Canadian Broadcasting Corp., Canadian National Railways, Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corp., Central Mortgage and Housing Corp., Cornwall International Bridge Company Ltd., Eldorado Aviation Ltd., Eldorado Mining and Refining Ltd., Export Credits Insurance Corp., Farm Credit Corporation, Northern Transportation Company Ltd., Polymer Corporation Ltd., St. Lawrence seaway authority, Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Other Agencies: Bank of Canada, Canadian wheat board, Industrial development bank, Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corp., office of the custodian.

C.N.R. PURCHASES OF TRUCKING COMPANIES

Question No. 264—Mr. Fisher:

1. What were the names, locations, senior management officials, value of assets, rolling stock, number of employees, of the trucking companies purchased by the Canadian National Railways in the past two years?
2. Are the original management personnel of these firms still managing them? If not, in which companies have they been displaced?
3. Is there any litigation or notification of litigation between any of these companies and the agents for the sale of the companies to the railway? If so, what companies, and for what general reason?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): This question should stand as an order for return.

C.N.R. DEFICIT IN RESPECT OF TRUCKING FIRMS

Question No. 265—Mr. Fisher:

1. Of the Canadian National Railways deficit for the last fiscal year, how much of the deficit is attributable to operations of those trucking companies purchased within the last two years by the C.N.R.?
2. Has the government auditor examined the accounts of these companies for the last financial year?
3. Are such deficits determined, if any, simply on operating revenues and operating disbursements, or do they include the charges for the money required to purchase the trucking firms?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): This question too, should be made an order for return.

DR. MARCEL CHAPUT

Question No. 266—Mr. Fisher:

Does the defence research board have in its employ a Dr. Marcel Chaput? If so, is this the Dr. Chaput who is the national vice-president of the "rassemblement pour l'independance nationale"?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): This question is in two parts. The answer to both parts is in the affirmative.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence a supplementary question in regard to the answer he gave to this starred question. I would like to ask whether Dr. Chaput, who has turned out to be an employee of the defence research board and vice president of this organization which I understand seeks national independence for Quebec or French Canada, is in a position within the defence research board that might make him privy to any military or other secrets.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, Dr. Chaput is engaged at the present time in some investigations in regard to survival techniques which we hope to have everyone in Canada made aware of and practise.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Speaker: Are there any questions to be made orders for returns?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): May I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Your Honour is chairman of a current committee of the house, which I do not attend, relating to the revision of the rules. As I understand it, the revision of the rules in 1955 provided for starred questions for the first time. I will admit immediately that I cannot say positively that we have never before had a starred question made an order for return, but I suggest to Your Honour that this might be considered by your committee. On many occasions we have had a suggestion such as—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member would be in order in raising a point of order about the disposition of questions today, but he would not be in order in making suggestions for the committee which has been appointed by the house.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I thought I was restrained and in order in my comments on the new procedure which, as I understand it, developed today. I waited until the end of starred questions to make the suggestion I have offered.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): There is nothing new in the procedure at all. It is clearly shown in standing order 39, which permits a member to ask for an oral answer to his question. This is provided for in subsection 2 (a): the hon. member puts an asterisk in front of the question. Subsection 5 of the same rule reads as follows:

If a question is of such a nature that, in the opinion of the minister who is to furnish the reply, such reply should be in the form of a return, and, during the question period on Wednesday, the minister states that he has no objection to laying such return upon the table of the house, his statement shall, unless otherwise ordered by the house, be deemed an order of the house to that effect and the same shall be entered in the Votes and Proceedings as such.

It has been done before, and it was never the intention of the committee, when the rules were changed in 1955, that this practice of having orders for returns should be abolished. Even if an hon. member wishes an oral answer to his question, it is left to the judgment of the minister whether that oral answer can be provided later, or whether it is a lengthy one. If it is lengthy, then an order for return is the proper procedure.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the point of order has been sufficiently answered. The rule provides for questions being made orders for returns at the request of a minister. Perhaps the only point in issue raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is whether this rule applies to starred questions.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: I think it has been made quite clear that it does apply to starred questions. This procedure is provided for in the report of the special committee appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of the House of Commons, which was presented on Tuesday, June 14, 1955, and adopted by the house. In that report at page 37 there occurs this paragraph:

When it is desired to have any starred questions passed as an "order for return", or to have any such questions stand as a "notice of motion", a minister will so indicate when the said question is called on a Wednesday.

Are there any questions to be made orders for returns?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PETITION ON BEHALF OF JOHN BRODIE, JR., JASPER

Question No. 168—Mr. Argue:

1. Has a petition of protest from the citizens of Jasper been received on behalf of Mr. John Brodie, Jr., by the Prime Minister?
2. If so, what reply has been made?
3. For what length of time, and in what capacities has Mr. Brodie been employed by the federal government?
4. Did he attempt a civil service commission examination in 1960?
5. If so, (a) what were the results of the examination (b) for what position was the examination?
6. Was he sworn in to a civil service position in 1960?
7. If so, (a) on what date (b) in what position?
8. Was he subsequently told that his services were no longer required?
9. If so, for what reason?

CANNED MEAT DONATIONS, WELFARE PURPOSES

Question No. 251—Mr. Argue:

1. How many pounds of canned (a) ham (b) pork luncheon meat, held by the agricultural stabilization board, have been donated for welfare purposes in Canada in each year since December 11, 1959?
2. What administrative channels in each province were used to distribute this to the needy?
3. What criteria were used in judging what organizations or institutions should receive this canned meat, and what body established them?
4. To what authorities in each province was this meat released for distribution?
5. Was any of this canned (a) ham (b) pork luncheon meat, distributed in Ontario for welfare purposes?
6. If so: (a) what was the name and address of each institution, organization, or person receiving it? (b) how many pounds did each receive, and on what dates? (c) from whom, or what authority, did these institutions receive this distribution on each occasion?

C.N.R. PURCHASES OF TRUCKING COMPANIES

Question No. 264—Mr. Fisher:

1. What were the names, locations, senior management officials, value of assets, rolling stock, number of employees, of the trucking companies purchased by the Canadian National Railways in the past two years?
2. Are the original management personnel of these firms still managing them? If not, in which companies have they been displaced?

[Mr. Speaker.]

3. Is there any litigation or notification of litigation between any of these companies and the agents for the sale of the companies to the railway? If so, what companies, and for what general reason?

C.N.R. DEFICIT IN RESPECT OF TRUCKING FIRMS

Question No. 265—Mr. Fisher:

1. Of the Canadian National Railways' deficit for the last fiscal year, how much of the deficit is attributable to operations of those trucking companies purchased within the last two years by the C.N.R.?
2. Has the government auditor examined the accounts of these companies for the last financial year?
3. Are such deficits determined, if any, simply on operating revenues and operating disbursements, or do they include the charges for the money required to purchase the trucking firms?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

URANIUM—CURTAILMENT AND ALLOCATION OF CONTRACTS

Motion No. 103—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the federal government, or any agency thereof, and by provincial government, organization or company, since February 22, 1960, pertaining to (a) the curtailment of (b) the allocation of, uranium contracts.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the hon. member for Assiniboia I would ask that this motion be allowed to stand. One of the cases is now before the courts and it might be prejudicial to make public such information as has been requested. We would like to examine the document.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—CORRESPONDENCE WITH QUEBEC

Motion No. 106—Mr. Bourbonnais:

For a copy of the correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged since October 27, 1960, between the government of the province of Quebec and the Department of Public Works, in connection with the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Y. R. Tassé (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works): This motion is acceptable, subject to the usual reservation as to the consent of the government of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitations expressed by the parliamentary secretary, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

SOULANGES CANAL—USE AS TOURIST PARK, ETC.

Motion No. 107—Mr. Bourbonnais:

For a copy of the correspondence and other documents exchanged since January 1, 1959, with the department of fish and game of the province of Quebec, in connection with the use of the Soulanges canal as a tourist park and a centre of pisciculture.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): There is no objection to this motion, subject to the usual reservation as to the consent of the province.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE, FRASERWOOD, MAN.

Motion No. 108—Mr. Benidickson (for Mr. Pickersgill):

For a copy of the replies of the Postmaster General or his officials to the communications regarding the post office at Fraserwood, Manitoba, included in sessional paper 119E tabled on March 27, 1961.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON COUNTER-REVOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Can the Prime Minister give the house any information on the situation in Cuba?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in so far as the military situation is concerned, there is nothing to add to that which has appeared in the press. During the past two days official means of communication have been interrupted and it has not been possible for the Canadian embassy to communicate with the government since about noon on Monday. For the same reason we are unable to give any information respecting the safety and well-being of Canadian citizens in Cuba.

The Canadian government is following events in Cuba with much anxiety and deep concern. The struggle between the contending groups has taken on a new and more threatening aspect with the dispatch by Chairman Khrushchev of a message which revealed beyond doubt the extent to which international communism is prepared to go in consolidating its foothold in Cuba, a bridgehead from which the penetration of the whole of Latin America could be launched.

It is now all too clear that the situation in Cuba is much more than a continuation of the original internal revolution which was to a large extent an expression of the legitimate social and economic aspirations of the Cuban people. Cuba, like so many small and defenceless countries, has become the focal point in the ideological contest which is progressively reaching into every corner of the world. In our country we cannot be indifferent to this new danger which affects the hemisphere in which we live.

Cuba is a casualty of the internationalization of its original revolution. In this process the interests of the Cuban people have been subordinated to the interplay of outside forces beyond their control. Civil liberties are further curtailed in the name of national security, and arbitrary acts of reprisal have become a substitute for justice. These are manifestations of a dictatorship which are abhorrent to free men everywhere.

Any threat to the peace of this hemisphere affects us here in Canada. We have neither the means nor the intention to intervene. What we earnestly wish to see established are stable conditions within Cuba which will allow it to develop in peace and live free from outside pressures as a constructive partner of the nations of the western hemisphere.

As the Leader of the Opposition knows, the matter is before the United Nations. Seven Latin American countries have proposed a resolution to bring about the restoration of peaceful relations at the earliest possible date through placing the matter in its various aspects before the organization of American states.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the Prime Minister's reply, which we appreciate, I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the anxiety and concern expressed in Canada, Great Britain, South America and elsewhere over the threat to world peace of the present situation in Cuba, will the government use every means at its disposal to impress upon the government of the United States the immediate necessity of doing what is possible to promote peace in that area, and of utilizing the United Nations to assist and promote the development of democratic institutions and the stability of the Cuban economy?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is very little I can add to what I have already said. I might say, however, that this morning the Secretary of State for External Affairs had a meeting with Mr. Adlai Stevenson, the United States ambassador to the United Nations, and discussed this matter in all its ramifications and effects. I think I cannot go any further.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has reported on one phase of the apparently deteriorating situation throughout the world, will he say what is the situation now with regard to developments in Laos, in view of the uncertain quality of the Russian note to Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the house would not object to my voicing a word of welcome to the hon. member. The house is not the same without his penetrating capacity to ask questions.

So far as Laos is concerned, as the hon. member has said the reply given was of such a nature as to leave in doubt the course that will be followed in Laos. The Soviet views, however, on a cease fire in Laos, the reactivation of the international supervisory commission, and the convening of a conference to consider a Laotian settlement were made known to the United Kingdom ambassador in Moscow on April 16. As neither the Soviet government nor the United Kingdom government has publicly revealed the contents, there is little that one can say. The Soviet views are being studied by the governments principally concerned. The latest communications do not fully clarify the Soviet position, and further consultations and exchanges will be required before a definite plan for negotiating a settlement can be expected.

OTTAWA—REPORTED SHOOTING OF INDIAN HIGH COMMISSION SECRETARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister any information with respect to the shooting in Ottawa this afternoon of the first secretary of the high commissioner for India?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not. I have no reason to question the accuracy of the hon. member's statement, but I have not heard about the matter. If what the hon. member says is correct, I am certain it is a matter of profound regret to all of us.

HOUSING

SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION AS TO REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works or the acting minister whether it is the intention of the government to acquaint members of parliament with the new regulations governing the proposed establishment of an effective secondary mortgage market before the minister's estimates are presented for consideration by the house?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Acting Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will draw the attention of the minister to this question, and I am sure he will answer it immediately after his return.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since the house will today pass the last piece of legislation flowing from the baby budget, may I ask the minister when the Canadian people should prepare themselves for more bad news expected by way of another budget?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I heard only about one word in ten that the hon. member uttered. I wonder whether he would be good enough to put his question again.

Mr. McMillan: I will repeat my question. Since the house will today pass the last piece of legislation flowing from the baby budget, may I ask the minister when the Canadian people should prepare themselves for more bad news expected by way of another budget?

Mr. Speaker: There are certain aspects of the question which perhaps I should deal with before the minister deals with the kernel of an inquiry concealed therein. The first part with respect to whether the house will pass a bill today is hypothetical and the second part, of course, makes a positive statement which does not indicate a search for information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I say that on the basis of my past record I think the hon. member knows well that I am always a harbinger of good news, not bad news.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO MR. SPEAKER ON BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I should like to acquaint the house with the fact that this is a very important day. It happens to be the 61st birthday of the Speaker of the House of Commons, and I know we would all wish—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): To complete my sentence, I am sure all members would wish to extend to you their very hearty congratulations and best wishes for many happy returns of the day.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members, and particularly the minister for completing his sentence.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—REPORTED STATEMENT BY MEMBER OF LEGISLATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Has the minister seen, in this morning's Gazette, a statement made yesterday by the Quebec leader of the opposition, in which he criticizes and rejects joint programs between Quebec and Ottawa, which will involve expenditures of about $141 million? As a leader of the Conservative party in Quebec, does the minister share the views of Mr. Talbot on this matter?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the article referred to.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, may I ask—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will reflect on his question I think he will conclude that it is not in accordance with our usual practice to have such questions, and that therefore a supplementary would be out of order.

(Translation):

[Later:]

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Could he tell us whether or not he and his Quebec colleagues in the cabinet favour the joint program between Quebec and Ottawa?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not read that article in the Gazette, but I am quite familiar with the part of the speech which is being referred to. In fact, that part of Mr. Talbot's speech contained a statement to the effect that, in his opinion, it was somewhat ill-beseeming for the Quebec premier to sign all those agreements and, immediately afterwards, to denounce them.

An hon. Member: That is true.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

MONTREAL—REPORTED INSTRUCTIONS RESPECTING USE OF FRENCH LANGUAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I assume the minister has this morning read a letter dated April 18 which appeared in La Presse under the signature of Marc Theberge of Montreal.

Mr. Theberge complains that Trans-Canada Air Lines in Montreal have refused him information in the French language. The official involved, one Mr. Dagenais, allegedly stated that he had orders to this effect from the company and would be threatened with dismissal if he failed to comply.

Would the minister investigate the matter, which I consider most important, and if the facts alleged by Mr. Theberge are found to be true, would the minister see that this official, who has shown such poor judgment, stop treating French Canadians, particularly in Quebec, like a bunch of idiots.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for calling my attention to this letter. I must say, in the first place, that in view of the ridiculous allegations contained in that letter, I have serious doubts as to their truth. In any event, I shall order a full investigation of the matter.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORTED NEW POST FOR ASSOCIATE DEFENCE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Could the minister comment upon a newspaper report to the effect that the minister intends to accept an invitation to become ambassador to Portugal?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to any wishes of my hon. friend from Richelieu-Vercheres, I intend to have a long and fruitful political career.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

STATEMENT ON TRIP TO EUROPE FOR INTERVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on March 22 the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) asked a question about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I now have the answer to that question.

The news service of the C.B.C. French network has a permanent special envoy in Paris whose services, for the last 18 months, have ranged through Europe, Africa and the Middle East. The C.B.C. also hires a certain number of free-lance journalists, but these merely manage to answer specific requirements of news services from day to day. For its public affairs programs, the C.B.C. calls upon other newspapermen, career journalists, preferably Canadians, for major reporting and interviewing of contemporary outstanding personalities. When a Canadian journalist is sent abroad, his assignment covers several established programs. It was for such a purpose that Mr. Gerard Pelletier was sent to North Africa to produce several programs.

Under the circumstances, the extra travelling expenses between Algeria and Geneva, since Mr. Pelletier was practically on the spot, were not very considerable.

Mr. Pigeon: What did they amount to?

TRANSPORT

METROPOLITAN TORONTO—REPORTED REQUEST FOR SUBWAY LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Public Works is in Toronto today opening postal station E for the second time, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the Minister of Finance in a position to say whether the government has agreed to make the loan requested by the corporation of metropolitan Toronto to accelerate the construction of an east-west subway?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): A letter has been written to Mr. Gardiner, the chairman of the council of metropolitan Toronto, by the Prime Minister in respect to that subject. It is dated April 17.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. Would the Minister of Finance say that the brief answer was no?

[Mr. Sevigny.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the purport of the letter is that the case put forward by the city of Toronto cannot possibly qualify under existing legislation.

Mr. Hellyer: I would like to ask one further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister propose to introduce legislation which would make such a loan possible?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if the government should form such an intention I am sure the hon. member would learn of it as soon as other hon. members, if he was in his place in the house at the appropriate time.

Mr. Hellyer: I will be a lot older than I am now.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my usual deskmate, who has suffered a grievous loss today, I have been asked to ask either the Minister of Public Works or his parliamentary secretary to refer to Hansard at page 3659, and request an early reply to that request for information with respect to federal-provincial negotiations.

Mr. Y. R. Tassé (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in the temporary absence of the minister, I will draw it to his attention on his return.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. I would like to ask the secretary when this house can expect an answer to my question No. 132 which was passed as an order for return on March 22, 1961. The question was as follows:

1. What was the amount of money spent on advertising by each department of government during the calendar year 1960?
2. What was the value of advertising placed by those departments with each advertising agency which received such business from the government during the calendar year 1960?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will draw this question to the attention of the Secretary of State.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-72, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to make a short comment. The Minister of Finance was gracious last night at five minutes to ten in allowing an adjournment with respect to this motion for second reading.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is the other bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I point out to the hon. gentleman that we are on Bill No. C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Benidickson: We are talking at the moment, Mr. Speaker, I take it on third reading of the bill to amend the Customs Tariff. That is perfectly correct. I misunderstood the arrangement. The next item will be the matter of the estates tax agreement with the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Argue: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

ESTATE TAX

CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES FOR AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-82, to implement a convention between Canada and the United States of America for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on the estates of deceased persons.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, we are now on second reading of a bill with respect to a tax agreement by treaty with the United States for the avoidance of double taxation. As I understand it, this agreement results from an attempt by Canada, and other countries with which Canada is in close touch in these matters, to avoid double taxation. Of course, I understand that the rather radical revision of our law with respect to estates of deceased persons in 1958 made this agreement necessary. We even changed our terminology from succession duty act to estates tax.

Hon. members in assembly here will recognize that the effective date of the new policy was to be January 1, 1959. Before the debate is concluded I would hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) would indicate to us all what the effect has been since January 1, 1959, and the enactment of this law relating to estates that are dealt with in the legislation before us. Under the old provisions which many members of this house discussed in 1958 in the banking and commerce committee under the chairmanship of the hon. member for York North (Mr. Cathers), we then were aware that $5,000 of estate was exempt from taxation on both sides of the border if owned by a decedent on either side of the border. However, I believe this was a disappearing exemption to the extent that, if it was $6,000 in ownership in a country other than the residence of the decedent—Canada or the United States and vice versa—a tax was applicable on the whole amount of the estate.

I do not think that situation is changed under this tax treaty. However, as I understand it—and I hope the minister will inform me and the country about this matter—instead of what we talked about in the committee of banking and commerce in 1958 as a $5,000 fundamental exemption, we now have here before us a $15,000 fundamental exemption. In other words, if a Canadian resident has assets in the United States valued at $15,000 at his death, there would be no tax payable in the United States on those assets; and vice versa, if a resident of the United States had assets in Canada valued at less than $15,000, under the treaty there would be no tax payable on those assets in Canada. I should like to hear the minister say something about that matter in order to see whether it confirms the conception we have on this side of the house. I understand that hitherto, in the assessment of an estate, charitable deductions—even charitable deductions of a kind that would be recognized for tax deduction in this country—would not in the case of a United States resident have been recognized for deduction if the charity was one operating in the United States. Perhaps the minister would confirm that understanding. He may have made that matter clear in his statement on February 17th.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; I dealt with it in that statement.

Mr. Benidickson: Apart from that, I think there is very little disagreement about the desirability of extending, as widely and as rapidly as we can do so, tax agreements with other friendly countries which make it possible for business to be conducted or for assets to be taken over in countries other than the country of residence and to assure that there will not be double taxation of estates after death.

I have personally received no complaint with respect to this particular bill and the negotiations that have resulted since we changed our estate law in 1958. I should like the minister to make some comment as to what happens between January 1, 1959, and the enactment of the present law in so far as the present bill varies the formerly existing legislation passed as a result of the former treaty.

Estate Tax

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker I think I can be brief. With respect to the question which principally occupied the speech of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, as to what happens with respect to estates between January 1, 1959 and the present time, may I draw his attention to article 15 of the convention which provides that the convention shall be deemed to have come into effect on the first day of January, 1959 and that it shall apply only with respect to estates of decedents dying on or after that date.

Mr. Benidickson: Refunds might be possible; is that right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In other words, the estates of persons dying before January 1, 1959, will be governed entirely by the 1944 convention.

With respect to the estates of persons dying on or after January 1, 1959, they will be governed by the new convention which is part of the bill now before the house.

The hon. member asked about the position of charitable organizations under the bill. I did deal with this matter in my statement to the house on February 17. The particular matter was touched on at page 2146 of Hansard.

I may say that article III, paragraph 2 of the convention does contain a new feature in this regard. The effect is that where Canada allows a deduction for a bequest to a charitable organization in Canada, as it now does under the Estate Tax Act, it will also allow a deduction for a bequest to any charitable organization in the United States that would have qualified according to the Canadian definition of a charitable organization if it had been in Canada. In other words the international border, for this purpose, is now being ignored.

This provision is reciprocal and will bring Canadian practice into line with long standing United States' practice. It will, of course, be beneficial to the estates of Canadian domiciliaries where a bequest of this kind has been made.

I think those remarks cover the points raised by the hon. member.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the Minister of Finance would comment on a matter which is not strictly relevant to this bill.

Was I correct last night, in commenting briefly on this item during second reading of this bill, when I said we would perhaps require another piece of legislation that would relate to the baby budget, as some of us call it, of December 20 and the withholding taxes related thereto? Will that require a revision of another form of treaty between Canada and the United States?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: Am I correct in thinking that with respect to the revision of our law in 1958 regarding taxation on estates of deceased persons, under other tax treaties with most countries across the world no legislative revision was necessary, but there is something in the United States-Canadian tax treaty that makes this bill imperative and necessary?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, having regard to the purposes of the legislation.

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to mutual agreement by conventions between Canada and other countries, with what other countries have we tax agreements that will not involve, as are involved here, legislative changes because of what this parliament did in 1958 when it radically revised our estates tax system?

With how many countries have we conventions with respect to the avoidance of double taxation that have not, because of their context, required any parliamentary review since 1958, such as is required here?

I ask this question because I understand that the agreement with the United States was tied in fairly definitely with the dominion succession duty act, which was abolished by the action of this parliament in 1958.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I pointed out last night in introducing the motion for second reading, Canada has at the present time conventions with the United Kingdom, France, Ireland and South Africa as well as the 1944 convention with the United States.

The 1944 convention was the first of these conventions that Canada entered into with another country with respect to the avoidance of double taxation, and it related specifically to the dominion succession duty act.

The later conventions with the other four countries were broader in their terms and also took account of similar legislation. Consequently no amendment is required in the conventions with the four countries I have named, and the enactment of the Estate Tax Act has resulted accordingly only in the revision of the convention with the United States.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, as I understand it this particular convention supersedes anything in the Estate Tax Act that is inconsistent with legislation in the United States.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this present convention, if given legislative sanction by parliament, will supersede any provision in the Estate Tax Act which is inconsistent with the terms of the convention.

Mr. Benidickson: With what we are enacting today?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That was the point I had in mind, because the Estate Tax Act, unwittingly I am sure as far as the minister and the house are concerned, failed to take account of the situation that confronted many taxpayers in the United States who have property in Canada. I think the minister will find that this is right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure the hon. member that this was not overlooked. It was well understood at the time.

In the banking and commerce committee, I think it was, when the bill which later became the Estate Tax Act was under review, this matter was discussed and mention was made of the intention of the government to negotiate a further convention with the United States which would take account of the change in the situation brought about by the enactment of the Estate Tax Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But the fault was not because of an agreement between Canada and the United States. For instance, if the full implications of the treaty of 1944 had been followed the omission in the Estate Tax Act would not have occurred.

This was a matter of very great concern to my section of the country, adjacent as it is to the United States, where thousands of people have property along the great lakes, which they use during the summer months. They are a source of considerable income to southwestern Ontario. I am sure this situation applies to many other parts of Canada.

Now the matter is to be corrected, and this is of course welcomed. However, it seems to me there has been a very long delay in arriving at a culmination of the negotiations—

Mr. Benidickson: Since 1958.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —since 1958. I recall asking the minister a number of times when we might expect some finality between the two governments with respect to this matter. Although on one occasion I got from the minister some correspondence which was encouraging, I was never able to elicit from him in the house anything which was correspondingly optimistic.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You should stick to correspondence. That is the moral.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That may be true. If the subsequent acts of the minister were consistent with the correspondence, that observation would be very pertinent. But that was not the situation.

There must be some reason why there has been this long delay since 1958. My reason for making these observations arises from concern over the situation which affected thousands of people in southwestern Ontario as well as in other parts of Canada and in the United States. What were the reasons for the delay in reaching a successful outcome of these negotiations? It was said at one meeting of the tax foundation by a distinguished lawyer that the Canadian negotiators were dilatory. I do not know that it was said that the minister was dilatory, but the minister must accept responsibility for any delay on the part of the negotiating team. In any event, there was a long delay from the time these discussions began. The minister first gave us an assurance that this matter would be dealt with at an early date, and I should like the hon. gentleman to explain now why the delay has been so protracted. Was it because he himself was so preoccupied that he was not able to give instructions to our negotiators, or was it the fault of the other side? In any event there has been widespread criticism of the government's failure to act constructively and rapidly with regard to these negotiations and in these circumstances I think some explanation should be given.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There has been no delay and no dilatoriness. Negotiations with the United States with a view to such a convention as is now before the committee began in September 1958, just after the Estate Tax Act was enacted and before the proclamation of that act brought it into effect. The negotiations proved difficult, but they were completed, as the convention indicates, and signed on February 17 of this year. That is not an unusual length of time to require for negotiations with respect to such a tax agreement as this. If the hon. gentleman would look back to the days when he was a minister he might recall that negotiations between Canada and other countries with respect to similar conventions very often occupied two years.

Estate Tax

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I just say I have had some correspondence in connection with this matter, not only with the minister but with others, over the difficulties which arose through failure to arrive at an earlier understanding with the United States authorities. As of January 1, 1959, we know that the tax convention between the United States and Canada with regard to the elimination of double succession duties had ceased to exist. The reason, of course, was that the former treaty, the treaty conceived and executed in 1944, applied only in the case of the dominion succession duty act which was superseded by the Estate Tax Act. I had asked the minister in the house what was the nature of the negotiations which were under way and if there was any reason to expect an early settlement of the matter. The minister replied in the house—I do not have the exact reference to Hansard—that that was the case.

Subsequently, I had some correspondence with one of the departmental officials as late as March 16, 1959. I was told then that a tax convention was being negotiated but that the negotiations were not then complete. I believe the minister said I had had some experience in these matters—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say the hon. gentleman had had experience in these particular matters.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thought the minister said I was a member of the government, and I assumed that was what he meant. Well, I have had some experience with negotiations, though not on behalf of the Department of Finance, and I do not believe the minister has given us a satisfactory reply as to why there has been this long waiting period. This delay has had some consequences of serious account to us in ssex county. Some withdrawals have taken place —not as many, perhaps, as one would have anticipated, but nevertheless there have been some. It is hard to explain why results should not have been achieved more quickly, particularly since we have had a pattern treaty since 1944 and other treaties with other countries, including France, as the minister mentioned last night in his statement of explanation which appears in Hansard. However. I can do no more than say it does seem to me there has not yet been a satisfactory explanation given of the delay in bringing about a settlement of matters leading to this convention.

Mr. McMillan: I should like to ask the minister what has happened to the processing of involved estates from January 1, 1959, up until today or, at least, until the signing of the convention. Perhaps I might also ask another question. As reported on page 2145 of Hansard the minister said the taxes included in the scope of the new convention are the Canadian estate tax, the United States estate tax and other taxes of a substantially similar character. I should like to know what those other taxes are.

Further on in his remarks, the minister said:

> However, the United States which uses a schedule of graduated rates, is not obliged to restrict its rates; instead it is required to allow a deductible exemption of $2,000 in all cases where the property is valued at more than $15,000.

I wonder if, in that particular case, that would be advantageous to Canada or not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The dominion succession duty act is still in effect. No doubt it will be in effect for a long time to come. It is still the legislation which governs the tax for federal purposes on estates of persons who died in Canada before January 1, 1959. The Estate Tax Act applies only to the estates of persons dying on or after January 1, 1959. So, as to what has happened since January 1, 1959, I may say that with respect to the estates of persons who died before January 1, 1959, their cases are still dealt with under the dominion succession duty act and so far as the United States property is concerned they are still governed by the convention of 1944 and will continue to be so. As to what has happened since January 1, 1959, with respect to estates of persons who died on or after January 1, 1959, I may say that these cases have not been closed pending the negotiation of this convention, and wide publicity was given to the fact that these negotiations were being carried on.

As I mentioned earlier, when the bill respecting the estate tax was before parliament at the 1958 session, it was made known that it was the government's intention to undertake negotiations with the United States with a view to a new convention applicable to the estates of persons dying on or after January 1, 1959. If this bill is passed, the final clause of the convention provides that the convention shall be deemed to have come into effect and been applicable from January 1, 1959.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): I should like to get from the minister some direct clarification of my own understanding of this bill. In the riding which I represent there are several large corporations, which are subsidiaries of United States companies, whose employees are allowed to purchase stock during their working years. Recently, we have had problems arising from the fact an estate was faced with double taxation in connection with the stock because it was United States stock. Will the passage of this bill eliminate those problems—of course, subject to the amount of stock held in U.S.A. being not over $15,000.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would be very difficult for me to give a definite answer to a question of that kind without having a great deal more information about the circumstances of the individual case about which the hon. member is inquiring. I may say in general terms, however, that the purpose of the present measure is to avoid double taxation; that is, as between Canada and the United States. The specific terms of this convention would have to be examined with respect to the particular facts of each case to determine the result; but the purpose of the convention is to avoid double taxation, and that is its effect within the terms of the convention.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As the minister said when he spoke just a few moments ago, the result is that this bill provides for a retroactive feature, but as of what date?

Mr. Benidickson: January 1, 1959.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This legislation comes into effect as of that date; in other words, the retroactivity goes back to that date? What is the situation in respect of estates which have been disposed of in the meantime, where the amount owing to the crown or to the people of the United States has been agreed on? What is the position of the beneficiaries of the estate or of anyone in any way affected by the estate with regard to the settlement made, say, within the last 12 months?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These will all be adjusted on application in accordance with the terms of the new convention.

Mr. Herridge: I have two questions to ask the minister. Will the minister explain to the committee the difference between a treaty and a convention? Does one have to do with water and the other with money? Second, while we realize that this is the usual procedure and practice with respect to arrangements to avoid double taxation between various countries, has any consideration ever been given to an international approach to this question through the United Nations by which there would gradually come a more or less international form and practice with respect to taxation and matters of that kind?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect to international agreements, the vogue is to employ the term "convention" where the subject matter of the agreement is taxation or matters of that nature.

As to the second question, I would think it is sufficiently complex now trying to negotiate bilateral agreements with other countries in such situations without undertaking a multilateral approach to this type of problem.

Mr. Herridge: I am not suggesting it would be practical at the present time; I only wondered whether there had been any consideration given to an approach, something like that which we have with respect to meteorological services and things of that sort, to get a standard practice, say, throughout the western world?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand that in one of the committees of O.E.E.C. some consideration was given to this problem, but I think I may suggest to the hon. member that it will not be easy. However, I would not exclude the possibility of study being given to such a question under the auspices of the reconstituted O.E.C.D.

Mr. Benidickson: Am I right in thinking that under the radical revision of succession duties made in 1958 with respect to assets of a United States resident with interest in Canada, under no circumstances would the tax be more than 15 per cent of those assets in Canada? If this is so—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct, provided that he was domiciled outside of Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. The desire was to have some simplification of these matters. In so far as the convention between Canada and the United States is concerned, we are not on comparable grounds in all respects. For instance, this 15 per cent over-all tax represents our method of assessing our tax on the assets in Canada of a United States domiciled deceased person, but it would not necessarily be the way that a Canadian deceased person's estate would be treated if he had assets in the United States. Will the minister indicate to the committee what the rates of duty might be in the other circumstance? Am I right in thinking that perhaps those rates of duty, depending of course, upon the volume of assets left by the deceased, might range from perhaps 3 per cent to 77 per cent?

I do not recall referring to this matter when I spoke on second reading following the minister. I do not think I referred to the question of whether or not Canada and the United States, as a result of adopting this convention, will be in harmony in the matter of the definitions of situs of property. Perhaps the minister mentioned this on February 17. I am frank to say I have not read his remarks within the last few days. We are not in harmony with respect to tax rates—that is agreed—on the same amount of assets that might be left by a resident of the United States in Canada. In our case we have simplified this thing to 15 per cent. With respect to definitions of situs of property, will the minister indicate whether or not we have more or less harmony between the two jurisdictions in this matter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, estate taxes in the two countries are, of course, different. This is one of the features that sometimes make the negotiation of a convention of this kind a very complicated matter. In the Estate Tax Act parliament approved the adoption of the flat 15 per cent tax on Canadian property of persons domiciled abroad.

Mr. Benidickson: Regardless of the quantum.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. Well, there is, of course, the basic exemption of $5,000 that is given under the Canadian legislation.

Mr. Benidickson: Now $15,000.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We will come to that. The United States federal estate tax, of course, is different. The rates under that tax rise from 3 per cent to a maximum of 77 per cent and there is an exemption of $2,000 in the case of a taxable estate. This is the beginning from which the convention negotiations follow.

Under the new convention, as we will see when we come to the articles, provision is made for a comparable treatment of assets in either case, that is to say, persons domiciled in the United States dying with assets in Canada or persons domiciled in Canada dying with assets in the United States.

With respect to situs, Mr. Chairman, there have been differences in the rules for determination of situs as between the two jurisdictions up to the present time but one of the achievements of this convention is a harmonization of the rules for determination of situs of assets in the two countries for the purposes of this convention.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Orders and regulations.

Mr. Benidickson: Is this comparable to the 1944 treaty? Is there any extension of executive powers?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is the standard form of bill that we have been employing for some time with respect to these conventions.

Mr. Benidickson: But it is equivalent to what was in the basic treaty with the United States with respect to estate matters, which I think the minister said was made in 1944? Does the cabinet get any greater opportunity under this clause than they had under the old enactment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot speak positively without having the 1944 statute before me. I have with me the convention but not the statute that gave legislative sanction to the convention. However, I can tell the hon. member that this form follows that used with respect to the four other conventions to which I referred earlier.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, we passed over the schedule very quickly and I should like to refer to article VIII. The word "decedent" is used there to indicate, I presume, a person who has gone to his Maker. What is the reason for the use of that rather unusual word instead of the word "deceased"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): "Decedent" is the word that is more commonly employed in the United States than in this country. We are more accustomed to use the word "deceased". I think there is a point here in favour of the use of the word "decedent" because we are speaking here of persons who may die in the future. We can speak of them as decedents whereas it may not yet be quite so correct to speak of them as deceased. I might say that "decedent" is a word that seems to be coming into greater use, and it emanates from the United States where it is the practice to use that word.

Mr. Herridge: I must say that I am rather sorry to see this linguistic intrusion from the United States which is further evidence of their influence even upon the statutes of this parliament.

Mr. McMillan: When we were dealing with clause 4 I let the matter of the inconsistencies with respect to the laws of the two countries pass hoping that I would find an explanation in the schedule. The United States tax on estates over $15,000 is different from that of Canada. I wondered how that matter was harmonized. They have a graduated scale with an initial exemption of $2,000 but their scale of rates is certainly different from that in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister also advise the committee as to what efforts were made by the negotiators to try to harmonize this matter? The hon. member for Welland has made more clearly the point I tried to make. We have a flat rate of 15 per cent with respect to the maximum tax that would be levied against the Canadian assets of a resident of the United States but that is not in harmony, as the hon. member for Welland said, with the situation in the United States. If a Canadian dies owning assets in the United States and the value of his estate is high he may have to pay to the United States on his assets in that country not a tax of 15 per cent like ours but a tax as high as 77 per cent. Is that the minister's understanding?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. The convention harmonizes the rules and avoids double taxation with respect to estates up to a value of $15,000. In the case of estates beyond that figure, of course, the rates that are provided in the general tax legislation will apply. I say that to the hon. member for Welland. This convention is designed particularly to deal with the situation of estates of a value up to $15,000 that would lend themselves to the exchange of concessions of the kind that this convention makes. As the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River points out, if we enter into the realm of property having a value beyond $15,000 and are speaking of property located in Canada and owned by a person dying domiciled in the United States, the United States rates range up to 77 per cent at the maximum, whereas the Canadian rate is 15 per cent on the gross value of the property in Canada owned by a foreign domiciliary.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Mr. Benidickson: Next sitting.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): By leave, now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Fleming (Eglinton), seconded by Mr. Starr, moves that the said bill be now read the third time.

Mr. Benidickson: No. I said next sitting, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES, ETC.

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 14, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Starr—Mr. Flynn in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Labour, with the approval of the governor in council, to enter into agreements with provinces to provide for the sharing of costs incurred by the provinces in carrying out programs of vocational rehabilitation for disabled persons; to authorize the minister to undertake the co-ordination of federal activities in the field of vocational rehabilitation and to undertake research in respect to vocational rehabilitation; and for those purposes to provide for the establishment of a council to be called the national advisory council on the rehabilitation of disabled persons; and to provide further for the payment of the chairman's remuneration and of the travelling and other expenses of the members thereof and for such professional, technical, secretarial and other assistance as the council may require.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes at my disposal on March 14, the last opportunity we had to debate this resolution, I was in the process of expressing hope that this particular resolution would amount to something and not just be further window dressing. I think there is need for real effort on the part of all hon. members for progress in this particular field. This is another field where we have seen far too often what I like to describe as one of the greatest national problems, the problem of self-delusion. I should like to give an illustration of what I mean.

In my constituency we have a television station which presents a program each Thursday night between 10.30 and 11 called "Northern Neighbours". This program is sponsored by the local mine managers' association in the Porcupine-Matheson mining district, and is put forward as a public relations effort. One full program on a Thursday evening was devoted to the promotion of the march of dimes. We all realize that the march of dimes is an organization which devotes its efforts, money and resources to alleviating the problems of disabled individuals.

The self-delusion of which I speak is illustrated by the fact that on the very morning of the day that this march of dimes program appeared I received a telephone call from a local doctor who requested me to use my efforts in an attempt to alleviate the distress of a local miner who was forced to stay away from work for a considerable period of time as the result of a heart attack. A heart attack of this kind is a disability, just as a broken leg or back is a disability. The doctor informed me that he felt a rest of four to six months would allow the man to recover without permanent damage and would enable him to return to work. Then, with proper care, he could carry on his duties and provide for himself and his family. The problem that arose was how the man would maintain himself and family for a period of four to six months without being able to work. The miners in that area, as in many other places, have sickness and accident policies which cover them for a limited period of time. At the end of this time the employee must work at least one day in order to reinstate himself for coverage under this policy for an additional period.

The doctor in question, who was familiar with this requirement, against his better judgment, sent the man back to work for the one day required in order to requalify himself. The miner went back to work for one day at which time he was fired by the company. That same night the company, with others, purchased the half-hour of television time devoted to promoting the march of dimes which, as I have said, devotes its energy to the alleviation of the plight of disabled persons.

I feel that example indicates how we have deluded ourselves. I am sure there are many well meaning people in this group who would be horrified if this situation were brought to their attention. I think this is the kind of thing which was in the mind of that great Scottish poet, Robbie Burns, many years ago when he wrote the following:

> Oh wad some power the giftie gie us
> To see oursels as others see us!
> It wad frae monie a blunder free us,
> An' foolish notion.

I think in cases like this we should realize that it is not enough to make gestures without carrying out the action to give them some meaning. Unfortunately, we have seen far too much of this type of thing done by the present government. It has made gestures in many directions, many of which have not achieved the intended result. We have seen the government make gestures with regard to a winter works program for the alleviation of the unemployment situation, but in spite of that we have had one of the worst unemployment situations since the Liberal rule in 1938. We have seen the advancement of a vocational training program by this government, but every day there are more individuals thrown out of work than this program can cope with. We have seen this government bring in many patches of legislation directed to our railway problems, yet we received just a week ago the report of a royal commission which shows that in spite of these patches of legislation the situation grows worse. In some instances the report shows clearly that these patches of legislation have aggravated the situation rather than cured it.

The problem we are trying to cope with by this proposed resolution is a very important and urgent one. I appreciate this very much, coming from a riding with heavy industry, industry which has wet, heavy, dusty and unhealthy working conditions. We have a great number of employees in this area who have been disabled through back injuries, silicosis and various other things. Many of these individuals receive partial pensions, while others receive no pension at all. The individuals receiving pensions are far from able to maintain themselves and their families. I feel it is not good enough for us to say that this is the responsibility of the compensation board, because these are responsibilities which we must accept. While the compensation board is in itself a good organization, it certainly is not capable of solving all the problems of these individuals.

I should like at this time to list six illustrations with which I became familiar last week end when I was at home. I know of one individual who has been off work for some 10 or 11 years on a silicosis pension of $100 per month. He has been attempting to maintain himself and his wife and provide his children with an education. I do not know how he has been able to do so, but at the present time he is in the process of putting his last daughter through teachers' college. He has done so with the $100 per month pension and whatever he could scrape and scrounge in addition.

Silicosis is a very disabling and crippling disease which does not permit an individual to carry on as a normal, healthy individual could.

In another case a former miner, who has been off work now for five years and has been struggling to make ends meet by operating a little country store, is alleged to have a heart condition but he is called in every six months for silicosis X-ray. He has no pension. Here is a man who is disabled and has been in that condition for five years.

There is the case of another man who lives just about a half a mile away, and who has a chest disability. He also has been off work for five years. Apparently he does not qualify for a silicosis pension from the compensation board because the extent of the silicosis has not reached the required percentage.

Another case is that of a young man, 30 years or 31 years of age, who two years ago was crippled in a car accident, has a broken back and will be confined to a wheel chair for the rest of his life. At the present time he is living at Golden Manor, the home for the aged at Timmins. Surely, under this program that is contemplated today, something can be done for people like these.

We have another case of a man who had two feet smashed while working in the bush. He cannot wear proper shoes. He certainly cannot carry on the job he has always done in the bush. He is badly in need of some kind of retraining in order to enable him to make his living and to get by in life with the disability he has.

The final case is that of a chap who suffered from poliomyelitis some years ago, and who has one bad leg. He also is a bush worker. In the summertime when the ground is firm he can get around. However, as soon as winter comes and he is obliged to pull this crippled leg through the snow, he again is incapacitated.

I am sure that many other hon. members, like myself, have in their files in their offices literally hundreds of cases similar to the ones I have listed here. These were ones that were referred to me on one week end alone or one Saturday alone. I have literally hundreds of similar cases listed in my files. I am sure that other hon. members have at least an equal number and perhaps some of them have more.

This is one of the most serious problems we have to face in this country. The need is desperate in this field. I think we should realize that if some people say the costs involved would be very high, we should stop trying to delude ourselves, and we would find that the costs were not high at all. These costs are being met in any event. They are met or should be met at the present time through municipal welfare, through the assistance of their families and friends and through some other sources. I hope we really are going to take the bull by the horns and do a job in this field of trying to make the disabled people in this country a little better able to fend for themselves and for the communities in which they live.

Mr. Pitman: It gives me great pleasure, Mr. Chairman, to take part in this debate. This resolution which has been brought down by the Minister of Labour has a great deal to commend it, and indeed I am sure it will receive the support of all hon. members. In bringing down this resolution the government, of course, is carrying on the work which is going on throughout the world. I should like to read from the recommendations concerning vocational rehabilitation of the disabled passed at the international labour conference of the international labour organization because I think they contain an important point which we certainly must remember:

> Whereas there are many and varied problems concerning those who suffer disability, and
> Whereas rehabilitation of such persons is essential in order that they be restored to the fullest possible physical, mental, social, vocational and economic usefulness of which they are capable, and
> Whereas to meet the employment needs of the individual disabled person and to use manpower resources to the best advantage it is necessary to develop and restore the working ability of disabled persons by combining into one continuous and co-ordinated process medical, psychological, social, educational, vocational guidance, vocational training and placement services, including follow-up,
> The conference recommends as follows:

I should like to read the second recommendation, which is as follows:

Vocational Rehabilitation

> 2. Vocational rehabilitation services should be made available to all disabled persons, whatever the origin and nature of their disability and whatever their age, provided they can be prepared for, and have reasonable prospects of securing and retaining, suitable employment.

I think this is extremely interesting. I wonder whether there has been full recognition, on the part of those drafting this measure, of the fact that simply preparing people through vocational rehabilitation to do a job and then not being able to provide that job can perhaps do more harm than good. I should like to ask this government, which evidently cannot find employment for people who need no rehabilitation and who are not disabled, whether they can promise that they can organize this economy in such a way that such employment can be found for disabled people who have had vocational rehabilitation. I hope so; because if not, what we are doing here today has very little meaning. I repeat that the international labour organization suggests that the disabled be prepared for jobs, provided that they have reasonable prospects of securing and retaining suitable employment.

Vocational rehabilitation has had both a long history and a short history in Canada. We can find this rehabilitation going on through the Department of Veterans Affairs since world war I and workmen's compensation boards in many provinces have been carrying on effective work for many years. Of course, we are reminded constantly of the work of private agencies. Yet, in many ways, Canada is far behind in this program. Prior to 1951 we had no real national vocational rehabilitation program whatsoever. What we had rather was a great mass of agencies, none of them really very well co-ordinated. We have come a long way in ten years, but we have a long way to go. I hope that the particular piece of legislation, which this resolution precedes will be a long stride in that direction and will give effect to the realization that we have to give those who are unfortunately disabled in our country the opportunity which they must have to take part in the economy.

We are reminded by the Department of National Health and Welfare that we are dealing with a considerable number of people in Canada. According to their booklet, over 500,000 people have been seriously or totally disabled. We are also dealing with a great deal of money, namely some $6 million voted by governments across Canada in support of this kind of rehabilitation activity, exclusive of what is being given to the veterans and to the injured through workmen's compensation. In dealing with this resolution which will allow the government to make arrangements with the provinces to share the costs of a larger, more comprehensive and more efficient kind of rehabilitation program, the government is assured of the support of this group. It is assured of that support for humanitarian reasons, of course. In a civilized country, a western democracy, we can do nothing else but do everything in our power to help those who through some misfortune have lost a limb, an eye or have been disabled in some other way. It is not charity. In a sense, it is merely enlightened self-interest.

I was interested in the statistics of the Department of Labour with regard to a group of disabled workmen who were rehabilitated. It was found that whereas previously only 41 were earning over $2,000 per annum, after rehabilitation over 720 were earning over $2,000 a year.

Only 107 of a given group were earning between $1,000 and $2,000 a year. There were 369 after rehabilitation. In other words, there was a considerable rise in the productivity of the individual, in his ability to support himself.

In a sense, what we are doing in passing a resolution of this kind is not really giving charity but simply indicating our interest, and indeed our self-interest, that these people will be able to play a real part in the economy of our nation.

Certainly we can give money to support them, but how much better it is to give them a means of contributing to the society in which they live. A change is indicated even in the kind of work these people are able to undertake. Whereas before rehabilitation only 39 were able to carry out what can be considered professional or managerial occupations, the figure rose to 123 after rehabilitation. The unskilled occupations of course went down from 215 to 94. These men were able to make perhaps an even greater contribution to the economy, as well as being able to support themselves.

Therefore I do not think the effect of vocational rehabilitation can be seriously questioned. However, we do need greater organization. The remarks of the Minister of Labour in introducing his resolution lead me to believe that the national government will give greater leadership to the provincial governments. It will co-ordinate the work of the Department of Health and Welfare, the Department of Labour and the Department of Veterans Affairs, the polio foundation, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and a great many agencies which are working in this area of vocational rehabilitation.

Unfortunately it could be suggested that in the past there has been too much overlapping; that too many people have been collecting funds and the cost of collecting those funds has in itself cancelled out the benefit, in a sense, because of course the costs of administration rise as you get several groups trying to obtain the same charity dollar from the individual Canadian. We hope that this overlapping, which has in the past been a disadvantage to rehabilitation, will be eliminated through the implementation of this resolution, and enable a real advancement to be made toward more effective action on the part of these agencies. We know this is essentially a provincial responsibility, but we are beginning to realize—and I hope we have already realized—that there are many things which are outside the resources of the provincial governments.

I hope this resolution will do something in the direction of assuring that those provinces which are less affluent will gain more money and greater opportunities.

We on this side of the house have been rather concerned about the darkening picture of dominion-provincial relations since this government took office. We are a little concerned that we are going back, as one provincial premier said, to the jungle of the 1930's and the 1940's. We certainly hope that equality of opportunity will still be the hallmark of this particular resolution, even if in other areas it appears that the government is going in other directions.

We hope that this equalization will not be eroded, to use a favourite word of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), any more than it has been by what has happened here in Ottawa in the last three months.

Part of this resolution deals with research in vocational rehabilitation. Job requirements are changing, and it may very well be that the activity in the area of automation will help the problem of those who are disabled and need vocational rehabilitation. As the activities in the physical sense decrease and the areas of mental excellence increase, the physically disabled will certainly have an advantage over what they now have.

However, I am concerned, and I am concerned as much in this area as I am in any other, that this government does not fully recognize what is going to happen. I am concerned that there will not be sufficient research into the whole strata of jobs, where industry is going, what industries are going to play a greater part in the Canadian economy, and what jobs are going to disappear over the next 10 or 20 years as a result of automation.

I hope that when these resolutions are put into effect we will not train disabled people, any more than we will train people who are able to carry on normal job activities, for jobs which will be obsolete within the next five, six or 10 years.

I wish I could see more activity in this area of research. I hope that one of the activities which will be carried on as a result of the passing of the legislation which will arise from this resolution will be a full scale attempt to find out not only what various groups of disabled can do, but exactly what jobs will be available in the economy of the 1970's and 1980's for these people.

The resolution ends with the suggestion that a national advisory council be set up. I think the Minister of Labour has already told us that this exists. I hope that sufficient professional personnel will be gathered in this national advisory council. I have the greatest admiration for those who work in the area of vocation rehabilitation, but sometimes I think we are overwhelmed by the cult of the amateur. I think helping the disabled is an area in which we need a great deal of professional assistance.

We took a great stride in our democratic system when we recognized that disabled people needed our help financially. We took another great stride when we realized that we should do everything in our power to help them lead a normal life. The third stride we must take on their behalf and on behalf of an even more efficient national economy is to remember that these people must have an opportunity to contribute to the fullest extent to the economy of the nation, thereby being able to contribute in a real way to the society in which they live.

I can assure the minister that this group will support these recommendations. We will support them in the hope that they will provide a more effective answer to the problem of vocational rehabilitation in Canada than we have today.

(Translation):

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words about the resolution now before the house. This resolution is altogether necessary considering the needs of the disabled persons in our country, those who unfortunately, for some reason, are afflicted with a disease that prevents them from finding a job as easily as those enjoying perfect health.

There is surely nothing so distressing as the sight of a very intelligent and talented man or woman having difficulty in finding a job, only because employers are rather reluctant to employ a handicapped person without any formal training. This is why it is absolutely essential to give help to those who unfortunately, through some congenital condition or otherwise, are afflicted with a disability which prevents them from holding in life the position they deserve by their intelligence or other talents.

It is certain that for the morale of those people, it would be very useful to teach them a trade that would enable them to fill an important position within society. It is all the more important as those who will be disabled in the future, following an accident or for some other reason, will, upon entering this new phase in their life, find immediate comfort in the thought that others like themselves suffering from some disability have been able, by means of a trade they learned, to find a place for themselves in our modern life.

The provinces will be responsible for providing those rehabilitation courses, for giving the training that will enable the disabled persons and other outcasts of fortune to learn a trade. May I be permitted to suggest that those who will attend to this in the provinces consider what was done in this field in France, in England and more particularly in Germany.

It is common knowledge today that, as a result of the calamitous second world war, millions of civilians in Europe were wounded, during bombardments or following the invasion of European territories.

In Germany, especially, millions of citizens lost a limb or became paralysed, and this deprived post-war Germany of manpower which it certainly needed for its rehabilitation and reconstruction. But then the country had the good fortune of seeing a genius rise in its midst, Ludwig Erdhart, who gave his country an economic program which allowed it to recover and to attain the enviable position it enjoys today. Well, part of the program designed by Erdhart and his lieutenants was directed toward the rehabilitation of the disabled who could not as easily find jobs as those who, luckily, were in perfect health.

A rehabilitation and retraining program was put into operation, if I am not mistaken, more or less around 1947. Through this scheme, a very high percentage of the disabled civilians who were then unemployed are now usefully employed in the industries of their respective countries.

I think the provincial governments would be wise to send people to those European countries to study the programs which have been put to the test over the past 15 years; I am sure this could be very useful and would help us to improve the measure that is being put forward. Surely, this measure is of exceptional merit and will be supported by every hon. member in this house.

Vocational Rehabilitation

It has been my own fate to suffer a disability as a result of the war. I am thus in a position to state that on my return from the war, I took advantage of the rehabilitation services made available to me by the Department of Veterans Affairs and I was thus able, just as other war amputees of Canada, to adjust myself to a new kind of life. What was done in our case by the Department of Veterans Affairs, can be done for the civilians by the provincial governments.

I therefore commend this measure which will enable the federal government to co-operate with provincial governments with a view to helping those who, as a result of unfortunate circumstances beyond their control, now find themselves suffering from a physical handicap and perhaps are unable to play their part in today's world unless they are given assistance by the nation.

In closing my remarks, therefore, may I say that both for moral considerations and as a means of rehabilitating our disabled people, this program is essential, and I am sure it will be welcomed by every member of this house.

(Text):

Mr. Batten: I rise to lend my support to this resolution, to make a few remarks in regard to this and, particularly, to compare the different parts of the resolution with the agreements which the federal government already has with most of the provinces of Canada.

Looking over this resolution I have been interested in finding a definition of the term "vocational rehabilitation". The word "rehabilitation" would suggest the meaning of returning someone to a former status. I do not think this meaning can be applied altogether to the word in this particular context, because it could also mean restoring somebody to a useful status—a status which he did not have before. After looking for a good definition of the term "vocational rehabilitation" for some time, I finally succeeded in finding one in a recommendation which was made by the international labour conference held in Geneva on June 1, 1955. On page 1 of a pamphlet which I have here, the term is defined as:

> That part of the continuous and co-ordinated process of rehabilitation which involves the provision of vocational services such as vocational guidance, vocational training and selective placement designed to enable a disabled person to secure and retain stable employment.

The resolution which is before us purports to carry out a number of different objects. Taken in turn, they are as follows:

To authorize the Minister of Labour to enter into agreement with the provinces to share the cost of vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons; to co-ordinate federal activities in this field; to undertake research in respect of vocational rehabilitation; to provide a national advisory council, and to provide remuneration for the chairman and to pay other necessary expenses of this council.

It is indeed interesting to compare what this resolution tries to do with what can now be done under agreements with the provinces. Most of us will remember that before 1951 Canada had no rehabilitation program as such. There were organizations, both private and governmental, which were interested in this work, and one can well remember the rehabilitation services of the Department of Veterans Affairs, for example.

But it was not until 1951 that all these organizations met at a conference to decide what could be done on a larger scale for the rehabilitation of disabled persons in Canada. The host of organizations represented at this conference recommended that there should be some program which would co-ordinate the various services on different levels throughout all parts of the country. The result was that in 1953 the government of the day announced the rehabilitation of disabled persons agreements. It is interesting to compare the description of the federal rehabilitation assistance, as given on page 62 of the report of the Department of Labour for the year ended March 3, 1960, with this legislation. In the description of the services which were inaugurated in 1953, we find that the things which were provided then are very similar to the things which are to be provided by the proposed legislation. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would think there is very little new in this particular resolution. That, of course, is no reason why there should not be support for it. I do not think it would be proper for us to think that this resolution is doing something new and something which has not been done in Canada before.

In my own province of Newfoundland rehabilitation services present a very difficult problem not only in case finding and treatment, but also in training, retraining and placement. Many of our people live in small settlements scattered throughout more than 1,200 small communities along the coast.

Special arrangements which must be involved in case finding are sometimes feasible only during the summer months of the year. Suitable employment for those disabled persons who have been rehabilitated can only be found in the larger centres, with the result that those people have to seek employment opportunities away from home. But a more comprehensive rehabilitation program, improved communications, extended educational services, together with a general awareness of what the problem is, have all added to the greater efficiency of the service.

It is indeed rather difficult to single out any special service when one is talking about rehabilitation of disabled persons, but in my own home city of Corner Brook I would commend the fine work being done in rehabilitation by the West Coast Sanatorium, the institute for the blind and also the work being done by the new school for retarded children.

There is little need here to record the history of rehabilitation work done in the province of Newfoundland from the time of the organization of the sunshine camp association in 1937, the efforts at a training and rehabilitation program launched in 1944 by the Newfoundland tuberculosis association and the signing of the federal-provincial co-ordination agreement in 1954. Voluntary and private organizations, together with government at all levels, have provided the assistance so essential in any co-ordinated program.

I do not believe that any program of this nature can be really successful without the necessary research and research facilities which will provide the requisite and essential information. This resolution says that attempts will be made to provide research in the field of rehabilitation. I believe it is necessary, first of all, to decide how many people in Canada come within this class of persons. In 1951, when the population of Canada was about 14 millions there were something like 432,000 who were considered to be disabled persons. The other day my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo gave figures which indicated that the number of disabled persons, not counting war veterans, would amount to about 2 per cent of the population. I do not think there is any reliable information today as to the actual number and type of disabled persons in the Canadian population. I think we need some research to determine how many there are. Next, we need some research to determine as accurately as possible what is the disability, what medical service may be necessary and what training would best suit those particular people. Having decided what training is best for them, then that training should be provided, while at the same time provide special training for those who need special training because of their special disability.

It is necessary next to do some research work among those people who are employers and to get them to realize that sometimes disabled people have just as many abilities as those who are not disabled. There should be research to find out where there are opportunities for people who are trained and to see that society does provide an ample number of jobs and job openings for those who have been trained by these co-ordinated programs.

We sometimes wonder what is the value of rehabilitation. Sometimes it is very difficult to decide just what the value is. It is not easy to measure the human values that accrue to somebody who has been disabled, who has received the benefit of a rehabilitation program and is thereafter able to lead an active, useful and happy life. It is difficult to measure that, but there are other measurements which indicate the work that can be done.

I was interested in reading the report of the Department of Labour for the fiscal year 1959-60 and in noting the figures in the tables on page 64. Here, reference is made to a group of 1,462 persons of whom at the time those tables were compiled full details were available. Before rehabilitation there were 39 of this group of 1,462 in the professional and managerial category. After rehabilitation there were 123. Before taking this training there were 422 in sales and service. After rehabilitation there were 717. Before taking this training there were 718 unskilled and without work. After the courses were completed, there were only 173 out of a total of 1,462.

One might go on and use tables which are given in this report to show the increased amounts of money which were earned by those who had been able to take advantage of the services offered under this rehabilitation program. There is no need to do that because I think it is evident to all that those who can take advantage of these rehabilitation services do benefit greatly from them. I would hope that whatever is done under our present scheme, whether we think of it in terms of the resolution now before us or the agreements that have been in effect with the provinces since 1953, there will be some co-ordination between the work done under this legislation and the work done under vocational training.

I believe that where possible disabled people should be trained in schools that provide training for those who are not disabled. I say that for two reasons. I believe that where it is possible to do so disabled people should be trained among the same type of people as those with whom they are going to work after their training is completed. My second reason for saying that these people should be trained in the ordinary vocational schools as far as possible, if that is the type of training they are going to take, is that it helps those who are not disabled to have a greater respect for those who are.

My final word on this subject is this. I do not believe that any program of this type will be successful in Canada or anywhere else for that matter until we realize that we must emphasize the abilities of people and not the disabilities.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my wholehearted support for the spirit and purpose of the resolution. Before proceeding with my brief remarks, I wish to say that I am sure we are all very pleased to see the hon. member for Essex East again sitting in his seat and looking well recovered from his past disability.

When it comes to a subject like the one now before us, I suppose it is quite correct to say that regardless of party we not only speak with our minds but through our hearts. I am sure that in their experience throughout the years all members of the house have witnessed some rather tragic cases of persons who, through some physical or mental disability, suffered unhappiness and were unable to earn their living or make any contribution thereto because provision had not been made to rehabilitate them, to retrain them and give them an opportunity to live under satisfactory circumstances in relation to their physical or mental disability.

I think that the major task in this country today is to create a social environment in which all Canadians, disabled and otherwise, have the ultimate in opportunity to lead free, creative, happy and purposeful lives. I trust that this resolution, which I presume will mean an expansion of these services, satisfactory financial arrangements and so on, will be another step toward that goal. We have been very slow to move in this direction, Mr. Chairman, when we consider what the majority of us enjoy and having in mind our productive capacity, our scientific knowledge and the facilities we have for the treatment of physical and mental diseases.

The first steps toward rehabilitation of the physically disabled and enabling these persons to earn their own living were taken in Great Britain in 1817 on a small scale but with excellent results. I think it is a shocking indication of the lackadaisical approach of the twentieth century that we should still have thousands of Canadians who are anxious to make a contribution but are unable to do so because we have done so little to make it possible for them.

When it comes to the question of instituting and expanding a program of this type, without doubt knowledge is necessary and to obtain facts and knowledge, research and a survey of the situation are necessary. As far as the technical and scientific aspects of the problem are concerned, I think a great deal of expense can be avoided by reference to the work that has been undertaken in other countries. In recent years there has been some excellent work done in western European countries, the Scandinavian countries, Great Britain and to a lesser extent in the United States as in Canada. But that body of knowledge should produce a foundation of fact and experience which should make it unnecessary to spend large sums on research with respect to principles and their application. The research we require is research into Canadian circumstances and conditions that will make possible the application to Canadian conditions of knowledge already available.

In Canada we have a body of knowledge and experience in the work of the Department of Veterans Affairs in the treatment of disabled veterans with a great measure of success. We have it in the experience of the workmen's compensation boards across the country. I know that the workmen's compensation board of British Columbia has gained a great deal of experience since the second world war in the rehabilitation of disabled persons injured in industrial accidents. No doubt that experience is duplicated to some extent in other provinces. Then we have the experience gained under the federal-provincial program for the disabled which was instituted in 1953. There is a body of experience and knowledge there.

Furthermore, the subject is so important and is concerning more and more people to such an extent that international agencies have given considerable thought to the matter. Quite an extensive amount of research has been undertaken by UNESCO. In that respect I wish to quote briefly from a book entitled, "Welfare of the Disabled", published in 1957. On page 17 I read the following:

> The United Nations educational, scientific and cultural organization has given attention to the education of the handicapped, including the blind, in its program.

It goes on to deal with the question of research, the information received from various countries and so on. I suggest that there must be a great store of knowledge and information that can be obtained from that organization. The book goes on to mention that there are plans for the establishment of three demonstration centres in different parts of the world in respect of the rehabilitation of disabled persons. The program is outlined and should be of interest to hon. members. The salient points are as follows:

1. Joint planning with the specialized agencies and in consultation with the interested non-governmental organizations to develop a well co-ordinated international program for the rehabilitation of physically handicapped persons;
2. Providing fellowships, scholarships and experts under the regularly established U.N. programs;
3. Expanding facilities for the dissemination of information on rehabilitation and the preparation of training materials;
4. Assisting in the exchange of knowledge and materials for the manufacture of all types of prosthetic devices.

There is a full chapter on the details of the program which UNESCO was instructed to undertake at that time. There is a tremendous body of knowledge and experience from which we can draw and apply to Canadian problems.

There are several aspects of rehabilitation. There is the question of rehabilitating young people who suffer from physical infirmities, some congenital, some acquired as a result of disease, and some resulting from accidents. I have in my experience known of two or three fine young men who were dying to find some position where they would have a purpose and would be able to maintain themselves. I know of one place where, after a great deal of difficulty, a position was found for a young man who had been very severely disabled, in that he had lost the use of both legs and one arm. However, he was able to sit at a desk handing out cards to persons entering a certain building. This job provided employment for this man for a few hours each day and transformed his life from one of unhappiness and a sense of loneliness to one of happiness with a sense of purpose and well-being.

We know of cases which exist, in which the compensation board officials take a very great interest, that are not covered by the benefits of the compensation board. I refer to farm workers. There are many young men on farms and in rural activities who have not had the opportunity of using the services of the compensation board but who should have the benefit of an extension in this necessary program. We know there are many blind individuals in this country, and we know of, and appreciate, the great work that has been done for them by the Canadian institute for the blind and others who are interested in their welfare and happiness. We realize the problems facing those individuals who have suffered from tuberculosis and who are able to undertake only limited and light physical activity. We also realize the existence of mentally disabled individuals.

I shall never forget the occasion when the case of a young mentally disabled or subnormal individual was brought to my attention. This individual had been maintained to a certain period of his life and then was taken out to a farm where he received, first of all, necessary affection, and was given some simple duty to perform. Once he had been shown how to do this he was able to carry on all day. Some thoughtfulness, consideration and concern for his welfare coupled with a spirit of understanding with regard to his requirements, solved the problem of this unfortunate, disabled person.

I have been very interested in this subject for years because I am always touched by those who have to go through life with these limitations. I think we have a first responsibility to these unfortunate citizens. In my opinion this program requires close co-operation between federal and provincial governments, as well as between those governments and voluntary organizations, because this is the type of work that legislation and government action cannot bring to complete fruition. It requires the support and co-operation of voluntary organizations, including churches, service organizations and the other organizations distributed throughout the land that would willingly assist in the expansion of the purposes of this program.

Third, I would suggest we must appeal to the minister to avoid taking a penurious point of view when considering the budget for this program, in view of our total production, total taxation, and the amount of money spent in other directions. I suggest that individual citizens should be called upon to make contributions according to their ability, and I feel that, initially the government should set an example in this respect.

I would suggest that when we have finally rehabilitated the disabled through this program, then we must have a placement program to provide employment which will suit the requirements of the individual cases. This is a field which will require the co-operation of voluntary organizations as well as individuals who are interested in this program.

In conclusion, it is my opinion that if we accept our full responsibility in this respect, along with the provincial and municipal governments, voluntary organizations and all those of us who profess to be Christian citizens in Canada we will find that the fruits of this legislation will be happiness, through purpose, and independence for those who do not now enjoy them.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make a speech at this time but I should like to make some observations which I feel may be helpful to the minister in this regard. First of all I should like to express my complete support of this measure. I feel that this program will do a great deal of good for those individuals who require vocational training. I would suggest that nothing gives a greater lift to young men and women who have come to the point where they do not know what to do than an association with a school or group who are interested in their problems. I feel this program should not stop at that point but that there should be a follow-up in assisting these people to find employment after they have received training.

I want to make some observations with regard to a matter which came to my attention last year and the year previous in connection with individuals who are handicapped. I recall that on the Welland ship canal, which runs through my riding, a great number of disabled veterans were employed as flagmen. This was a type of job that a slightly handicapped individual could handle. I believe there were 50 or 60 individuals employed as flagmen on this canal from Port Weller to Port Colborne. Last year the seaway authority saw fit, and I cannot quarrel with it in the light of automation, to install automatic lights on the bridges. The result was that some of these 60 men were out of work. I think some of them were absorbed in other activities.

The year previous the Ontario hydro—we have probably no control here—carried out a similar pattern in the Niagara peninsula with the result that some 50 or 60 men employed as gatemen were automatically let out when the control lights were installed there.

I feel at this time, with the serious unemployment situation throughout the land, departments concerned should give serious consideration to deferring automation so as to retain this type of employment for those individuals who are handicapped. I am aware of the fact that the postal department at the present time, and for several years, has been experimenting with automatic electronic letter sorting machines. While I fully approve of automation in industry in order that we can keep up with competition from abroad, I think that government departments should give consideration to helping these handicapped individuals for the time being by deferring the installation of this type of automatic equipment in respect of functions that can be carried out by those who are slightly handicapped.

I know there are 100 individuals in my riding who have been laid off as a result of this automation and across the country there probably is a sizeable number of individuals in a similar position. I have mentioned these things to the minister with the hope that he will give some consideration to them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in regard to this matter because I have had some interest in this problem both as a minister of the crown and as a member of the House of Commons over a number of years. However, before doing that, I should like to acknowledge with appreciation the words of the hon. member for Kootenay West and, if I may without appearing to be too late, those of the Prime Minister today, when both the right hon. gentleman and the hon. gentleman kindly welcomed me back to the house after my indisposition.

No one of course, disagrees with the principle of the resolution before the committee. We are all in agreement that it is desirable to encourage vocational rehabilitation and that it is desirable to encourage the fullest possible rehabilitation through medical skills of those individuals in our country who are disabled, either permanently or partially. We are all in agreement that everything possible should be done by those levels of government in the country responsible for the formulation and the administration of programs of social welfare. We are all in agreement that voluntary organizations in this, the middle part of the twentieth century, should be engaged in doing whatever they can to improve the lot of those of our fellow citizens who suffer from one disability or another.

Having said that, I think we really should examine what we are called upon to do in this House of Commons at the present time. If one were to examine the resolution in terms of the words as they present themselves for our scrutiny, one would come to the conclusion that we were now embarking upon a pioneering effort in this parliament and that we were now establishing a new program in the field of social welfare and social action. That is not the case. This particular resolution presents us with nothing new whatsoever. It will not in any way add one iota to the responsibilities of government in Canada as now exercised by authority of parliament. I think that is something we must clearly understand when we come to accede to the proposals made in this resolution by the Minister of Labour.

The resolution first of all asks that we authorize the Minister of Labour to enter into agreements with the provinces to provide for sharing of the costs incurred by the latter in carrying out programs of vocational rehabilitation for disabled persons. It also asks us to authorize the Minister of Labour to undertake the co-ordination of federal activities in the field of vocational rehabilitation and to undertake research in respect of vocational rehabilitation. Then it goes on to authorize the establishment of a national advisory council on the rehabilitation of disabled persons.

With all of these things I am in full accord, as is every other hon. member in this committee. But, Mr. Chairman, these are now fields of action in which the Minister of Labour is authorized to act. I think it should be clear that we are not today embarking upon a new principle of action nor are we establishing a new initiative on the part of the government of this country. The reason I mention this matter is that it seems to me that much of the legislation that has come before the House of Commons this session is of a pattern that is open to an interpretation not really warranted by that pattern or by the incidence of the legislation that constitutes that pattern.

Unless there is a careful explanation of of what we are now doing, I fear that it will be open to the propagandists of the minister's party—I do not say to the Minister of Labour—to indicate that in this session of parliament something new has taken place, namely that the government brought forward an act to provide for the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons. That will be in keeping with the façade which I believe attends some legislation already presented in the house such as that respecting the productivity council, the small business legislation and the vocational training act. Those three measures and this one, put in a pamphlet well adorned, carefully written and properly caricatured, can be very effective ammunition on the part of anyone who is so imaginative. I am not suggesting that the Minister of Labour is not imaginative. However, I know that he uses his great qualities of imagination for more laudable purposes. Unless someone gives the proper perspective to this resolution, I greatly fear that the very kind of thing which I apprehend is going to happen.

As I say, what we are being asked to do in this committee today is to give the Minister of Labour powers that he already is given by parliament by an annual vote that is provided for in the estimates with regard to vocational rehabilitation. We already have a council. There is in existence now and serving with great distinction in the Department of Labour a director of vocational rehabilitation in the person of Mr. Ian Campbell, one of the most accomplished men in this field in the country. But he has been at work now for almost a decade doing this very thing, providing for this very kind of assistance to individuals in the country in co-operation with the provinces.

I think it is clear that we should have a proper appreciation of exactly what we are doing. As I listened to the hon. member for Kootenay West in the very appropriate remarks he made when he expressed his philosophy with regard to these matters, I had the impression that he had been taken in or that he was under the impression that he was now being called upon to support something that was not already part of the authority of government in this country.

Mr. Herridge: I mentioned that matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When the hon. member for Peterborough spoke—and there is more excuse for his making this error—one had the impression that he was rising in his place in order to support a new project never before conceived by this House of Commons. However, the Minister of Labour—and I will be fair to him—did not use in the middle of his speech words that would warrant the error which I suspect the hon. member for Peterborough unwittingly fell into. At page 2990 of Hansard the Minister of Labour is reported as having said:

> The passing of this legislation will not commit the federal government to any new areas of expenditure.

That is true. As a result of the passing of this resolution and the bill that will be passed later in connection with it, not one additional cent of expenditure will be authorized by parliament, nor is the government asking for any more money.

The Minister of Labour then put the matter in proper prospective when he went on to say:

> The placing of the authority for the program in statute form will encourage the provinces to plan ahead in developing more effective vocational rehabilitation services.

That is what really should have been in the explanatory part of the resolution. That is what we are really being asked to do. We are not being asked to provide for a program of vocational rehabilitation; we are being asked to put in statute form something that is now part of the law of this country. That is all we are being asked to do.

We might well ask the minister for his reasons for wanting to put in statute form something that is now available by an annual vote in the estimates, as has been the practice with regard to this and companion measures over a period of at least 10 or 12 years.

I know that hon. gentlemen opposite have always taken the position with regard to these social and health measures that the proper way to provide for authorization is by way of statute and not annual vote. When the national health grants were brought down from time to time the present Minister of Finance in particular used to argue that these health grants should be presented to parliament in the form of a statute and not in the form of an annual vote, thereby making the particular measure an uncontrollable expenditure within the meaning of that word as it is understood in the Department of Finance.

There is a strong argument for that contention and this may be the right thing to do in this particular case. I am not now arguing that point; I am pointing out what we are really being asked to do. I suggest that the minister ought to explain, when he closes the debate, more succinctly and in greater detail why it has been decided to put this measure in statute form and not leave it in the form of an annual estimate.

I know that some provinces—I know this is the viewpoint of some federal officials not only in the Department of National Health and Welfare but also in the Department of Labour—felt there would be greater opportunity for flexible action, for greater improvement in the amounts involved and in the character of the program itself, if it were not restricted by a statute and were open to annual discussion during the study of the department's estimates by parliament.

In fairness to the minister, he dealt with this problem at page 2989 of Hansard, where he is reported as having said:

> By placing authority for this program in statute form, we shall give the provinces the assurance of continued support for their work in this connection. The legislation proposed has been developed with the co-operation of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

So the minister has, at least in principle, answered me by saying that by putting this particular program in the form of a statute we are giving the provinces the assurance of continued support. The minister will undoubtedly add to that statement.

However, I feel that the provinces have the assurance of this support. Surely, no responsible government in any province would for one moment think that parliament would renege upon the implied commitment it made when this program was first enunciated and established in this house. Surely no one in this house would suggest this.

No one has so far expressed any view that would warrant the suggestion that there is any danger that any government in Canada would refuse to continue to co-operate with the provinces in providing for vocational rehabilitation grants and all the incidentals which go with this program. Therefore, I am not convinced that putting this resolution in statute form will have the advantage to which the Minister of Labour has referred, namely of giving the provinces the assurance of continued support for their work in this connection. Indeed the Minister of National Health and Welfare in this government is my authority for saying that, as a result of his experience, leaving these matters in estimate form is a more effective way of providing for flexibility of program and for the kind of co-ordination that is necessary.

In fairness to the position of the government in this regard I must say, as I mentioned a moment ago, that in connection with the national health grants the present government, when in opposition, took the position that those grants should be put in the form of a statute and not presented to parliament by way of annual estimate.

Therefore when the present government came into office, armed with my knowledge that this was the view of the present administration when in opposition, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether it was now the intention of the government to put the national health and welfare grants in statute form, or was he going to leave them, as had been the practice since 1949, in the form whereby they would come to parliament as an annual estimate. The minister said that, as a result of the experience he had acquired, he had come to the conclusion that this was the best way to deal with the matter.

The Minister of Labour expresses another view. I am simply now expressing the view that the experience of the Department of National Health and Welfare in this matter is not without some value. I look with interest to the additional reasons the minister will give for the form in which the proposal is to be presented to parliament hereafter, in light of the practice which has been in existence for many years.

My main concern is that in presenting this argument today the government will have this in mind and as a result of my speech will be encouraged to use the form of a statute as a means of enabling some of their protagonists and spokesmen to say, "See what we have done. We have brought forward an act of parliament providing for vocational rehabilitation".

They will also be, not duty bound in law but I think morally bound to say, "Of course, we have not done anything different from what the Liberals did. They really brought this measure in. All we did was to bring it forward in a different form".

I do not like to inject a political note into my first major speech since returning to the house, but I know enough about politics to know that the Prime Minister, who was so gracious to me today, will certainly in the next election hold up a number of acts as a record of the achievement of this government. One of the things he will hold up will be this vocational rehabilitation act, as though it were a new initiative in the field of social reform, when in fact it has been part of the law of this country for over 12 years.

I would have been interested in hearing what the Minister of National Health and Welfare had to say about this matter, because while much has been done in this field by the Department of Labour, very considerable work is being done by the Department of National Health and Welfare in the rehabilitation of disabled people.

When you combine the work of the Department of National Health and Welfare with that of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Labour, the program is indeed much more impressive than the criticisms of the hon. member for Peterborough warrant. The hon. member undersold his country today, not intentionally, because we really have done a tremendous amount in the field of rehabilitation. But I can understand why the hon. member for Peterborough did not realize this fact. It was because we were confronted today with all the trappings and all the setting of something that was new which had been originally conceived by the former administration.

It must not be forgotten that the rehabilitation grants provided for by the government of Canada under the national health program are of the greatest significance. When one thinks of the work of Dr. Gingras in the city of Montreal in the field of medical rehabilitation; when one thinks of the work being done by the paraplegics in Toronto, each made possible as a result of moneys voted by this parliament 10 years ago, I cannot help but think that we should put this matter into proper perspective.

As the hon. member for Lincoln says, the work of the compensation board, the work of the provincial governments, the work of the arthritis and rheumatism society, the work of the tuberculosis association, the work of the muscular dystrophy groups, all this voluntary work throughout the country is part of a continuing effort with the government toward a productive and outstanding program of rehabilitation which, I think, warrants our saying that this is a field which has not been neglected in Canada. It is not being approached for the first time by this government which announces, through its propaganda agencies, that it has done more in the field of social welfare than was ever done in the history of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. members applaud, but the fact is otherwise, and their applause now serves to justify the very warning I am giving to them. This is not an initiative; this is not a new measure. This is merely putting into a new form something we have been doing for a long time, and the kind of applause we have just heard serves to confirm my fears that this measure inter alia will be used for the purpose of conveying the impression that the first effort in the field of vocational rehabilitation was undertaken by the present government. That, of course, is not the case.

Mr. Thrasher: Would the hon. member permit me to interrupt him for a moment? He mentioned various organizations and societies which were doing something in this field. In view of the fact that the cancer society is now engaged in a drive for funds perhaps he would mention them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am very glad the hon. member has mentioned the cancer society and certainly we cannot do too much to assist that society which, by the way, in 1949 was invited to Ottawa by the then minister of national health and welfare—the hon. member for Greenwood laughs, but I tell him this: as a result of that invitation there came into being the Canadian Cancer Institute which is one of the most impressive contributions ever made to attacking this whole problem in our country. The hon. member for Halton—

An hon. Member: An excellent autobiography.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That might be an interpretation, but I think the hon. member should know that I am not ashamed of that autobiography. I was referring to the hon. member for Halton. His father, the distinguished Dr. Best, one of the most outstanding medical research scientists in our country, could confirm practically everything I have said here today because he was one of those along with Penfield at Montreal, along with Collip at Western, along with Brown at McGill, who collaborated with the government. All this really shows that what I have been saying is true, that we are today doing nothing new in this field. Not one additional cent is being expended. If the government had come forward and said: we need more money to do this job better, that would have been an initiative but that is not what we have today.

The Minister of Labour in his opening remarks, after he had cited the resolution, said that it would encourage action which would enable many seriously disabled Canadians to rise above their handicaps. I disagree with that statement. That authority now exists and this parliament will not deny to any Minister of Labour the right to continue to do work of that kind. The minister continued by saying that the humanitarian purpose behind this legislation would appeal to all members of this house because it would bring new hope and encouragement to many of our less fortunate citizens. I think that is an exaggerated statement. This legislation will confirm the hope which already exists among every member of this house in all parties, because the provisions which make such hope possible are now the law of the land. Of course, this resolution deserves support for the reason mentioned by the minister in the middle part of his speech but not for the reasons he gave at the beginning of his speech. Everybody in this house wants to support the disabled.

Incidentally, no reference is made here to disability pensions and none has so far been made during this debate. Disability pensions provide financial assistance for over 60,000 disabled people in this country. That is not covered by this resolution. That will not be covered by the bill. That is already part of the law of the land.

I hope the minister will not think that on my first day after returning from an illness I have been unappreciative of the attitude of my colleagues in this house toward me, but I hope both he and they will recognize that in the analysis I have sought to make of this problem I have simply reconfirmed our belief in the desirability of doing something to help the disabled people of this country. But I have also done my duty in calling attention to the proper perspective which can provide a background to our discussion of this measure.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Starr thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-84, respecting the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and the co-ordination of rehabilitation services.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McMillan: May I ask the leader of the house if there is any change in our business contemplated in the next two days?

Mr. Churchill: No change. We shall carry on with estimates tomorrow and Friday, taking the departments of the post office, northern affairs and justice in that order.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of the debates pursuant to standing order 39:

WHITE BEAR INDIAN BAND FUNDS, SASK.

Question No. 139—Mr. Howard:

With respect to the White Bear Indian band of Saskatchewan, what is (a) the amount in the (i) capital account (ii) revenue account; (b) the amount of revenue for each year since 1948 from (i) leases (ii) royalties (iii) other sources by designation, with an indication in each case of the name of the person or company who made such payments; (c) the amount of band money allocated for expenditures for each of the years 1958, 1959, and 1960, and the purpose of each such expenditure; (d) the amount of money expended by the Indian affairs branch for each of the years 1958, 1959, and 1960, and the purpose of each such expenditure?

(d) Moneys expended out of appropriations by the Indian affairs branch are recorded in the accounts by agency and not by individual band. It would not be possible to furnish the information requested with respect to the White Bear band separately without a detailed examination of each item of expenditure in the Crooked Lake agency, Broadview, Sask., covering the three-year period 1958, 1959, and 1960.

MOVEMENTS OF FODDER—PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

Question No. 161—Mr. Boulanger:

What amount has been paid to each province for moving fodder into areas where shortage existed in the year 1960?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture):

1. Assistance for fodder movement was paid during 1960 to provinces as follows:

Manitoba, $130,714.33; Saskatchewan, $145,-023.58; Alberta, $7,038.47.

GRAIN STORAGE GRANTS, WESTERN CANADA

Question No. 163—Mr. Boulanger:

1. On what date was the plan initiated under which grants are paid for grain storage in western Canada?

2. What amount has been paid each year since that date?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture):

Questions

1. The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act was passed on March 7, 1956. The act was retroactive to July 31, 1955 and thus first applied to the 1955/56 crop year.

2. Payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act in each year since 1955 have been:

Crop year	Millions
1955/56	$31.5
1956/57	28.8
1957/58	35.6
1958/59	39.8
1959/60	43.6

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 20, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PITMAN—ALLEGED ABUSE OF POWER BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects every member in this house. My question of privilege is this. The Minister of Agriculture has grossly violated the rights of parliament and assumed powers beyond those authorized for him by substituting the powers of his department for the legislative powers of this parliament.

If I may direct your attention to the order paper for today you will see item No. 4, which reads "Second reading of Bill C-77, an act to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada." Yesterday there came to my office not one, not two but 50 copies of a pamphlet which announces the agricultural rehabilitation and development act. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no agricultural rehabilitation and development act on the statute books of this nation. This pamphlet was produced by the information division of the Department of Agriculture, and some of us will remember some of the pungent comments that were made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on that particular branch when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were being considered.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a flagrant abuse of the powers of this department. I suggest to you that this pamphlet states how A.R.D.A. will operate. How can the people of Canada be told how A.R.D.A. will operate when this bill has not received second reading? Is there a suggestion that second reading has no effect? Is it the contention that a debate in this house amounts to nothing more than the rubber-stamping of a measure?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has perhaps said enough to indicate the nature of his question of privilege. If he wishes to follow the matter with a motion I shall be glad to determine whether or not there is a prima facie breach of privilege.

Mr. Pitman: I wish to be fair to the Minister of Agriculture. There is nothing in this pamphlet which indicates that the bill has been passed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pitman: I will not, therefore, move a motion of censure or of any kind whatever.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has gone as far as he should go in his alleged question of privilege.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): In view of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peterborough I think it should be explained to the house that in the debate on the resolution I made it very clear that I should like the opportunity to put this bill before not only the agriculture ministers and resources ministers of the provinces, but also the various farm organizations. I should like to inform the hon. member that across Canada at this very moment farm organizations are meeting and using this pamphlet as a guide to their discussions, so that when they meet their leaders they will have a sound basis on which to suggest amendments to the act—

Mr. Argue: There is no act.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —or the bill to be passed. With that explanation I think the country will understand that in order to have organizations discuss a bill before it becomes law, you must have something tangible to put in front of them. I frankly intend to put out a series of pamphlets on how this act will affect various segments of the agricultural population. I hope they too will study it as part of the agricultural program to help farmers help themselves.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement has nothing whatever to do, of course, with the question of privilege. The question dealt with the circulation of a pamphlet dealing with an act of parliament before that act was passed. Therefore, undoubtedly, that action on the part of the minister is treating parliament with contempt.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps it would be unfair to debate the matter unless there is a finding that there is a prima facie question of privilege and a motion. I was interested in the hon. member's point that the department of the Minister of Agriculture had published a pamphlet indicating that there was on the books a statute of this parliament entitled the agricultural rehabilitation and development act, whereas in fact there is—

Mr. Pearson: No such thing.

Mr. Speaker: —such a bill before the house for second reading. It may be that a reading of the pamphlet would support that view. I have not had time to give a full reading to it, but the description on the face of it is "Agricultural rehabilitation and development act". The first paragraph reads as follows:

On December 15, 1960 the Minister of Agriculture introduced to the House of Commons a resolution concerned with improving the economic position of our farmers.

The resolution introduced the agricultural rehabilitation and development act, or A.R.D.A. for short. I think the implication that the act has been passed is not quite as strong as has been asserted. However, there is a point that no one should assert that parliament has acted before it has done so, particularly a minister. If it is borne out by this document, I think the hon. member would have a point to deal with by motion, but as he has himself indicated that he will not submit a motion, I think enough has been said to close the matter.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I wish to ask—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have indicated that I think any further discussion without a motion before the house would be improper.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fifth report of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Cathers.

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER AND CHEESE—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government has authorized the agricultural stabilization board to continue the present level of price support for the dairy industry for the period May 1, 1961, to April 30, 1962.

There are two dairy products presently under price support. Price support for butter is 64 cents per pound for Canada first grade creamery butter scoring 40-93, basis delivery Montreal, with appropriate price differentials for other grades and qualities. Ontario cheese, Canada first grade waxed, f.o.b. warehouse, is presently supported at 32 cents per pound; and Quebec cheese, Canada first grade waxed, basis delivery Montreal, is supported at 31½ cents per pound.

The price support for these two dairy commodities for the 12-month period May 1, 1961, to April 30, 1962, will continue at these levels. In addition, 25 cents per hundred pounds will continue to be paid for whole milk delivered for manufacturing purposes, exclusive of milk from producers who sell a portion of their milk in the fluid bottled milk market.

The stabilization board will continue for the present to support the price of butter and cheese by purchasing these products from suppliers at the prescribed support levels. Should any change be made subsequently in the method of support, an announcement will be made well in advance to give the industry sufficient time to make any necessary adjustments. Regardless of the method of support used, however, the level of support to producers now authorized will continue during the 12-month period from May 1, 1961, to April 30, 1962.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, all one can say with regard to this announcement by the minister is that the statement does not fully comply with the requests made by the dairy producers, as stated recently in the brief presented to the government by the federation of agriculture.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in the light of all the propaganda that is being directed across the country against price support programs for the dairy industry, I am pleased that the government has announced the continuation of support prices on these dairy products. I always give the government credit when credit is due.

The announcement will reassure the dairy industry, particularly as the minister has assured dairy producers that the government will continue to purchase their products at these fixed support prices. This means a real guarantee and is in no way a phony guarantee such as would come from an average price deficiency support program. The minister has left the door open to a change in method, but he did seem to assure the dairy industry that even if the method is changed these particular guarantees to the producers will be maintained. Apparently for the coming year the dairy industry will have the support prices continued that they have enjoyed to date.

The minister left unanswered the question whether consumers will be allowed to purchase butter at lower prices in order to move it onto the markets. Perhaps the minister will have an announcement on this matter at a later time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINTER WORKS—EXTENSION OF PROGRAM IN PICNIC AREAS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that the government has extended to May 31 the winter works program for the construction of picnic areas and camp grounds in the provinces. The program was originally scheduled to terminate on April 30. All participating provinces have been advised by telegram of this decision.

The program, which has resulted in an expenditure of $10½ million over the past four years and has provided 517,000 man days of employment, has been welcomed by all participating provinces as an outstanding contribution to our growing tourist industry.

GRAIN

BARLEY—ANNOUNCEMENT OF FINAL PAYMENT

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Hon. members will recall that on February 13 last I announced the final payment on the 1959-60 oat account. I am now pleased to be in a position to announce final payments on the 1959-60 barley account.

The 1959-60 barley pool was closed as at March 30, 1961. Producers delivered 94.9 million bushels of barley to the pool and the surplus for distribution to producers is $2,022,170.66. The final payments for distribution to producers on the principal grades of barley are as follows:

No. 2 Canada western 6 row	2.173
No. 3 Canada western 6 row	2.173
No. 4 Canada western 6 row	1.183
No. 2 Canada western 2 row	7.123
No. 3 Canada western 2 row	3.658
No. 1 feed	1.182
No. 2 feed	3.960
No. 3 feed	8.138
Tough No. 3 Canada western 6 row	2.173
Tough No. 3 Canada western 2 row	3.658
Tough No. 1 feed	1.182
Tough No. 2 feed	3.960
Tough No. 3 feed	8.138

The final barley payment will commence immediately.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): About this time of the year we expect an announcement about the final payments on various grains. The payment which has been announced now is very tiny, almost insignificant, and this demonstrates that in the selling of barley the wheat board, as far as making a final payment is concerned, was operating on a very narrow margin. While producers will always be prepared to take advantage of the final payments, the present announcement means that the prices for barley now being received are lower than they were a few years ago.

NATIONAL DESIGN

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF COUNCIL

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-85, for the establishment of a national design council.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING MAINTENANCE OF RELATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In view of the latest developments in Cuba and yesterday's statement on the subject by the right hon. gentleman, is it the policy of the government to continue to maintain what the Secretary of State for External Affairs described on Wednesday in New York as normal relations with the Castro government in Cuba?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As the hon. gentleman knows, throughout the years, no matter what our disagreements may be with other nations as far as their philosophy is concerned, we have endeavoured to conduct normal relations.

OTTAWA—SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS AT DIPLOMATIC OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question arising out of a reported statement made yesterday by the right hon. Prime Minister of India in the parliament at New Delhi, a statement which amounts to an implied criticism of what the Prime Minister of India calls inadequate security arrangements made with regard to offices such as those in which the unfortunate incident took place in Ottawa yesterday. Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs not feel that he should make a statement in reply to the reported statement of the Prime Minister of India?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I should like to express the deepest distress which I know is felt throughout this house over the wanton murder of the Indian first secretary yesterday in Ottawa, and our great regret that a frightful crime of this kind should have taken place in this city which cost the life of a respected member of the diplomatic corps. The house will wish to join with me in extending the sincerest sympathy to the bereaved family. I am informed that a complete investigation is under way into this crime, but I fully realize that no punishment can repair the grievous loss of this young man's life or erase the deep shock which all of us have felt at this tragedy.

We have not yet received the text of what Mr. Nehru is alleged to have said in the Indian parliament, and I would not wish to comment simply on the basis of a radio report. However, as the hon. member for Essex East knows, diplomatic missions in Ottawa, like the general public, are protected by the law and order which is assured for all in this city in the normal way by the competent local authorities. It is not our practice to provide any additional security unless such protection is requested by the foreign mission itself or there is reason to believe it is needed. Hon. members will, of course, appreciate that security within the precincts of any diplomatic mission is naturally a matter for the mission itself to arrange and is not the responsibility of any Canadian authorities.

We feel very deeply about this unfortunate incident, and I do not think there is anything further that I can say at the present time.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate this group with the condolences expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on account of this most unfortunate and regrettable event. I would like to ask him whether he is aware of the fact that the protection staff were very concerned about this person and had on a number of occasions warned various secretaries and members about this man being in the building.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, we had absolutely no information about this man being a danger in the community. What knowledge there may have been elsewhere I am not in a position to say.

CUBA—ALLEGED RECRUITING AND ARMING OF CANADIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement by Mr. Kevin Griffin, while being interviewed on a television news broadcast last evening over CJOH, that he was one of 100 Canadians from the maritimes who had volunteered to fight against the government of Cuba as a mercenary at a salary of $800 a month, still unpaid, and further that they were equipped with Canadian army issue rifles, Bren guns and grenades, would the minister inform the house whether he has any knowledge of this recruiting on behalf of the Cuban counter-revolutionary army and of the equipping of these men with Canadian rifles, Bren guns and grenades, which Mr. Griffin indicated may have been obtained from a Canadian army source? Has the minister any comments to make with respect to this statement, which is causing serious concern to many people? I might say that my telephone has been ringing almost continuously all morning.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to this question may I say we have no knowledge of the kinds of activities which apparently were described by this person on television last night. My understanding is that he did not suggest he had been recruited in Canada. The policy of the Canadian government has been and is not to tolerate the recruiting of Canadian citizens by foreign agents on Canadian soil. As hon. members know, no export of military equipment to the Caribbean region has been authorized since July of 1959.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a supplementary question based on my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister enlighten the house further with respect to the statements made by this person on television?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The man in question, Griffin, served in the Canadian navy for some time, from which he was released because of a pulhems S-5 rating. Subsequently he enlisted in the Canadian army under his brother's name and served in the army from January, 1957 to July, 1957. His proper name finally became known and he was released, again with an S-5 pulhems profile.

With regard to the statement which I am told he made on television last night that Canadian .303 rifles, Bren guns and Sten guns stolen from Camp Gagetown were issued to these people alleged to have been recruited in Canada, I am informed there have never been any .303 rifles, Bren guns or Sten guns issued at Camp Gagetown. From the time the camp opened the new rifle was issued there. There have been no thefts at Camp Gagetown since January 1 of 1960, except for one pistol.

Therefore the allegation that these were Canadian rifles, Bren guns and Sten guns stolen from Camp Gagetown is completely incorrect.

Mr. Pugh: Would the minister explain the significance of the pulhems S-5 rating?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I had better go into the whole list of pulhems tests. It is a stability rating.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THREATENED RAIL STRIKE—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER TALKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he will comment on press reports that certain interviews have been held by members of the government with the presidents of the railway companies and the chief negotiator for the railway unions. Can the right hon. gentleman further tell the house whether a settlement seems imminent, and what further action is being taken by the government to bring this about?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The government is naturally interested, as are the Canadian people, in a solution to the differences between the railway companies and the unions, and naturally has endeavoured to bring about negotiations and continuation of negotiations between the principals. Several of my colleagues—three to be exact—have met with the presidents of the two railways. The Minister of Labour has met with Mr. Hall, chairman of the negotiating committee of the unions, and I think I can say that we shall continue to have meetings between the government and each of these parties to the end that we hope—while I am not expressing any certainty in that hope—an amicable agreement may be arrived at.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Will the minister comment on the fact that 38 out of 48 death sentences have now been commuted by the present government, while in only 14 cases has there been a recommendation of mercy?

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this matter involves the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy and is carried out by the Governor General as the representative of Her Majesty the Queen. I do not think I should make any further comment on this matter.

(Translation):

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ST. JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE—DIRECTOR OF STUDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Would he advise the house about the appointment of a new dean of studies at the St. Jean Royal Military College?

Would the minister also avail himself of this opportunity to reply to the recommendations contained in a brief already submitted to him by the federation of St. Jean Baptiste societies, with regard to certain problems concerning the same college?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, I am pleased to inform the house that the new dean of studies at the St. Jean Royal Military College has been selected. It is Dr. Gauthier, aged 40, who was successful in the competition held by the civil service commission and the selection committee. Dr. Gauthier was selected on the basis of his qualifications and ability.

With regard to the second part of the question, I feel that the time available to members and ministers on the orders of the day would not suffice to reply to all the points raised in the brief submitted by the federation of St. Jean Baptiste societies of the province of Quebec. However, it is my intention, at a later date, or probably when the national defence estimates are before the house, to give a full report on each of the points submitted concerning the problems relating to the St. Jean Royal Military College. As for now, may I inform the house that the Department of National Defence authorities intend to maintain the bilingual character of St. Jean Royal Military College. Moreover, they intend to maintain as accurately as possible the proportion of French-speaking and English-speaking students to 60 per cent and 40 per cent respectively.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I should also tell the house that the question of extending the present course to four years is being constantly and fully looked into. Besides, as I said a moment ago, I intend to give the house a report as complete as possible in the near future.

AGRICULTURE

DISTRIBUTION OF PAMPHLET RESPECTING REHABILITATION LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister inform us when he distributed the A.R.D.A. pamphlet and whether he has sent a copy to all the members?

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there has been no planned pattern of distribution. I sent copies to the various ministers of agriculture across Canada and to the heads of farm organizations as a basis on which they could make comments when I had my usual contact with them before second reading of the bill was moved. In the pamphlet it says that if further copies are requested they can be secured from the Canada Department of Agriculture. I should like to point out that not only the farm organizations but provincial governments as well have asked for them, including the government of Saskatchewan, which has asked for 2,500 copies.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I must point out to the minister that nearly three weeks have now elapsed since I wrote asking for this pamphlet which I have not yet been able to obtain.

I should also like to ask the minister whether this particular pamphlet was published in French.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, they will be published in the French language.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the Minister of Agriculture indicate whether he also circulated the bill in the same manner?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The letter I sent to the ministers in the various provinces included a copy of the bill and a copy of the pamphlet, with a request that they study them so that when we met there would be some basis for discussion.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Can the minister inform the house how many copies of the pamphlet have been printed?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I do not know, but I will take the question as notice.

[Mr. Sevigny.]

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister advise the house what was the cost of printing and circulating these pamphlets?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will be glad to take the question as notice.

HARBOURS

MONTREAL—REPORTIAL DENIAL OF ACCESS TO DOCKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): A question was asked on April 17 by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont concerning the cancellation of restrictions placed upon persons who like to go fishing in the Montreal harbour.

I am advised by the national harbours board that its regulations prohibit entering upon its premises without proper authorization. Such prohibition is necessary so that harbour operations may go unhampered and that the public may be protected against dangers it might run against in harbour areas.

The board points out that it does not intend to thwart the legitimate eagerness of anglers provided that the spirit of the regulations be respected.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

FEDERAL ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES, 1960

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Yesterday the hon. member for Fort William inquired as to when he could expect an answer to his question No. 132, which was passed as an order for return on March 22. The officials of my department communicated with the several departments still outstanding and I can inform the hon. member that I hope the return will be tabled shortly.

SASKATCHEWAN

RESERVATION OF LEGISLATION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he will table the report from the lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan and any other relevant documents on the reservation of Bill 56 of the legislature of that province.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I see no objection to that. However, before agreeing to do so I should ascertain whether, in the past, it has been the custom to do so. If there is nothing to the contrary I see no reason whatever for not acceding to the request.

HOUSING

SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET—INQUIRY AS TO SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works in connection with the announcement made by the minister that the government has directed C.M.H.C. to sell mortgages held in its portfolio. Can the minister say whether any such sales have already taken place or been negotiated?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I will take that question as notice. Certainly none have been made under the new arrangements.

Mr. McMillan: May I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister said he would take the question as notice.

SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET—REPLY TO REQUEST FOR INFORMATION AS TO REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Yesterday the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked a question about the intention of the government to acquaint members of parliament with the new regulations. In my statement to the house on April 17 dealing with the subject of the development of a secondary mortgage market, I stated that there remain several technical and procedural matters to be resolved. These matters are presently being worked on, and shortly it will be determined whether we will require regulations to be established by order in council or whether we can establish procedures within the framework of existing legislation and regulations. The house will be informed of the details when the various matters are resolved.

TRANSPORT

MONTREAL—INQUIRY RESPECTING LETTER REFERRING TO SUBWAY PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In today's edition of La Presse there is a reference to a letter written to the authorities of the city of Montreal by the Prime Minister in respect of a subway project. Would the Prime Minister let us know the contents of this letter?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think the best thing to do is for me to table the letter. I will do that tomorrow.

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—FORMATION OF JOINT U.S.-CANADA COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On April 14 I took as notice a question which was asked by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville and which read as follows:

> Could the minister inform the house about a press report in this morning's paper to the effect that the secretary of state of the United States is attempting to obtain the views of the Canadian government regarding the formation of a Canada-U.S. joint committee to consider the feasibility of deepening the Richelieu river?

The answer to that question is that I have seen a press report dealing with this matter which may well be the one referred to by the hon. member in his question of April 12 addressed to the Acting Minister of Transport. There has, however, been no communication this year from the United States authorities regarding the formation of a joint Canada-U.S.A. committee to study the feasibility of deepening the Richelieu river.

FINANCE

PROPOSED U.S. TAX ON COMPANY PROFITS INVESTED ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance based on another telephone call from a gentleman. In view of President Kennedy's reported proposal to congress today that United States companies operating abroad be no longer granted tax exemptions on profits reinvested in those countries, may I ask whether this proposal, if given effect by congress, will restrict investment in Canada and have an unfavourable effect on the expansion of the Canadian economy?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister wishes to answer he may do so, but in my opinion the question is asking for information about a purely hypothetical situation which will not arise unless congress adopts the proposal.

TRADE

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER SALES TO CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder whether the Minister of Agriculture would have anything to report to the house concerning the negotiations between Canada and China for the sale of further quantities of Canadian wheat. Would the minister care to say whether the report that agreement has been reached for the sale of 80 million bushels of wheat to China is correct? If so, will the announcement be made immediately?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): As I said in answer to a question by the Leader of the Opposition some time ago, this matter is still under discussion and it is not in the public interest to say any more.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, is the minister, by his statement, denying that part of the report which says an announcement will be made after seeding so the farmers will not seed additional acreage to wheat?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the hon. member for Assiniboia has a suspicious mind.

Mr. Argue: You did not deny it.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position now to indicate when we may expect the tabling of the royal commission report on the automobile industry by Professor Bladen?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is in the negative.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that Professor Bladen is reported to have discussed matters with the Prime Minister a few days ago, can the Prime Minister say whether the report will be tabled before the presentation of the budget by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am unable to say.

PUBLICATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether we are likely to receive the report of the O'Leary commission before the press gallery dinner?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not know what the contents will be, but I would hope it would be afterward.

ESTATE TAX

CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES FOR AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-82, to implement a convention between Canada and the United States of America for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on the estates of deceased persons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

308. Departmental administration including Canada's share of the upkeep of the international bureaux at Berne and Montevideo, $2,174,216.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, it is really an impertinence to get up a second time on the first item of the minister's estimates, but I think I have a point that will interest the committee and I am sure will interest the minister. The Liberal party established a provisional kind of shadow cabinet to sit opposite the government departments in order to keep check. We all know the flair, the élan, and the wit which the hon. member for St. Denis has applied to this task. He has taken it with a great deal of seriousness. In a sense he has met the minister on many points of conflict, and we have had a great deal of humour and wit in the house with regard to the Post Office Department.

This is in a tradition. When the Conservatives were in the opposition the present Postmaster General was very much to the fore as the critic of the post office in that particular party grouping. We know how, with perhaps not quite the wit or the élan but certainly with even more persistence and study, he continually analysed and criticized the Post Office Department. Just the other day the Postmaster General was taken very much to task for the fact that he had failed to really carry out all the changes and improvements he had advocated when he was in this shadow cabinet position.

I hope that my remarks when I first spoke on this item indicated that I at least as an individual member have a great respect for the way in which the minister has gone into the operations of his department. Whatever the criticisms we may make, I think he has made an inordinate effort in relation to the job, more than most ministers do, in order to master all the details of the department. In fact he has become so knowledgeable about all details that it is really superfluous for him to have in front of him the officials of the department. We have here a minister who really knows all the aspects of his department's operations and who is prepared to give them at the drop of the hat.

Being aware of this situation, being somewhat of a suspicious mind—I hope not in a bad sense—and having a few pipe lines, and by that I mean avenues of communication—to various parts of Ottawa, a couple of things have struck me in relation to this department. As I say, the minister is much more knowledgeable than the average minister about the operations of his department. Normally the estimates of the Post Office Department come in later in the year. This tends to be the pattern. I found out—and I could be corrected in this respect—that the deputy minister of this particular department, the civil servant in charge, seems to be due for retirement in May, 1961. These two pieces of information I began to put together with a little bit of questioning and a little bit of probing. I have a very hot tip, you might say, for the committee and it is to the effect that we may be able to look forward to having this extremely competent and knowledgeable minister of the crown as the next deputy minister in charge of the Post Office Department.

An hon. Member: That knocks you out.

Mr. Fisher: I am afraid I have not the knowledge of the Post Office Department which is possessed by the Postmaster General. It seems to me that this suggestion opens up all kinds of prospects. At by-elections the question will be asked whether it is a case of little furry animals deserting the ship and all that sort of thing. I hate to put it from that point of view, but I raise the spectre for the committee. Suppose—and I am not conceding it for a moment—that at the next election the Liberal party should win.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They will win.

Mr. Fisher: Suppose they pick their shadow cabinet critic, the hon. member for St. Denis to become Postmaster General. I ask you to conceive of this situation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fisher: I ask you to conceive of the hon. member for St. Denis as Postmaster General and the present minister as deputy postmaster general. This leads me to present to the minister several questions. I should like to know whether it is true that we are to have at some time in the near future a replacement, because of retirement or other circumstances of the deputy minister in charge of the department. I should also like him to tell me whether this mastery he has gained of the department is again going to be put to such use as I have indicated or, in other words, whether we can look forward to his being a senior civil servant.

I have not any criticism to present of this particular trend. I know there is some criticism of the other government to the effect that they used to take people out of the civil service and put them into the cabinet. I do not think it is such a bad thing.

Mr. Macdonnell: I always listen with interest to the hon. member. I have followed his remarks today, but up to the present time I have been unable to ascertain whether he is making a political speech or telling us a fairy tale. May we know which it is?

An hon. Member: It is the same thing.

Mr. Fisher: I cannot tell the hon. member whether it is a fairy tale. As a private member the hon. member knows how difficult it is for a private member to confirm all these things. However, I was trying to put together a few points that have come to my attention and, quite frankly, a rather hot tip. I thought this was the place, namely on the minister's estimates just before he makes a statement, to ask him whether he could enlighten us upon this possibility. As I say, I am not being political. I would not mind seeing the Postmaster General as the senior civil servant of the department. I do not know what are the views of other hon. members, but I am willing to admit that he is extremely knowledgeable about this department. However, there is raised, as I said, the issue of the hon. member for St. Denis vis-à-vis the deputy minister. It also raises the question of instead of elevating civil servants to the cabinet, making members of the cabinet civil servants. I believe this to a degree is a new trend, and I think we would welcome the minister's comments upon this particular point of view.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I think perhaps at this time I should deal with some of the points raised in the last day and a half, and perhaps first and immediately with the fantasy which the hon. member for Port Arthur has built upon the one and only piece of information that is known or even under consideration, as far as I know, by anyone. I refer to the fact that the deputy minister reaches the normal age of retirement some time during this summer. The appointment of deputy ministers rests with the Prime Minister. Certainly if the hon. member calls that a hot tip, I call it rather cold information.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Yes.

Supply—Post Office

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that the hon. member for Port Arthur has announced that he does not intend to run for parliament again, would the minister consider the appointment of the present hon. member for Port Arthur as the successor to the present deputy minister in the Post Office Department?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The only thing I have to say on that matter is that undoubtedly if it were done he would be much happier under me than under the other supposition that the hon. member for St. Denis would be postmaster general.

Having as definitely as I can dispelled any of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Port Arthur with regard to the deputy postmaster general, I want to thank him very much indeed for the compliment. The long experience and background of the present deputy and the contribution he has made to the department over the years mean that his shoes are going to be big and difficult ones to fit. Anyone who is even considered for the post should certainly be proud.

Listening to the comments of the various opposition members and the criticisms of the department I could not help but remember a story. I think this perhaps sums up their attitude as I see it. This is the story of the guide who had a rather remarkable hunting dog of which he was very proud. The guide took a member of the opposition out duck hunting. They got into the blind, and after they had been there a little while the ducks started going in. They shot one of the ducks and it fell into the water. The guide turned to his remarkable dog and said "Fetch". The dog started off after the duck, and the remarkable thing about the dog was that, having large paws, he ran across the water rather than swimming to pick up the duck.

He picked up the duck and brought it back into the blind. The member of the opposition said absolutely nothing about this. The guide was rather upset that nothing had been said, and he turned to the member of the opposition and said, "Didn't you notice anything remarkable about the dog?" The member of the opposition said, "Yes; he can't swim".

It seems to me it is possible for the opposition to overlook all the accomplishments of all the different groups in the department and at the same time pick away, without foundation in most cases, at a few things which some hon. members suggest imply that there is something wrong. As far as I am concerned the criticism that has been levelled against me by hon. member after hon. member, of taking too much pride in the Post Office Department and its accomplishments and reporting them with too much pride to this house—to the extent that this criticism is made and is true, I am very happy. I am immensely proud of what this department and every person in it has accomplished. I have no apology to make for the way in which my statement was presented on behalf of the department.

I want to thank all hon. members who have participated in the debate. Their helpful ideas will be given every consideration. I will reply now to as many of the points as possible. Others can be raised on the individual items, or where we have not the information available now we will answer by correspondence as rapidly as possible.

I want to say to the hon. member for St. Denis that I regret the general attitude he took, that this debate is a time for buffoonery. The House of Commons has ample opportunity, and sometimes ample need, for humour. Certainly we appreciate it, but the House of Commons is not a burlesque house, as I felt some of his remarks tended to make it. The report of his speech made news right across the country. However, it was not the type of news which I think in general helped the reputation of this house as a chamber of serious debate. The height of his contribution —if one can dignify any particular item by having any height, though I suppose that among mole hills almost anything is a mountain—was the question of automation, mechanization and postal progress.

I gather that the hon. member is against such measures, although it is a little hard to tell. He is reported in Hansard as saying, and I use his exact words:

(Translation):

I am all for progress, but I am against it—

(Text):

The English translation of these remarks is officially:

I am all for progress, but I am against it.

Again on the same item, as reported at page 3640 of Hansard, the hon. member said:

(Translation):

I am all in favour of forging ahead and keeping in step with other countries, but... I think it is time to put a stop to such experiments—

(Text):

The official English translation is:

I am all in favour of forging ahead and keeping in step with other countries, but... I think it is time to put a stop to such experiments...

I do not think we have ever heard a better example of being on both sides of the fence at the same time and being completely illogical. I think these two quotations from page 3640 of Hansard will go down in history in that respect.

Nor are the hon. member's figures any more dependable than his reasoning. The hon. member's statement that the parcel post rate changes will yield a revenue increase of $22 million is quite wrong. The revenue increase, as previously reported and which is on record in Hansard and available to all, is $9.3 million. The hon. member was quoting the total revenues which the department received two years ago from the parcel post rate.

The hon. member said:

(Translation):

—parcel post rates have gone up 90 per cent.

(Text):

The English translation is:

... parcel post rates have increased by 90 per cent.

The actual increase is 44 per cent. The hon. member says that the department's publication "Postmark" printed my picture 70 times. In 1960, even if you throw in all the members of parliament, my parliamentary assistant and myself, there were only 13 occasions on which our pictures appeared. More significantly, in 1960 some 1,642 postal employees' pictures appeared in our little magazine that is devoted to telling our staff what their far-flung organization is doing.

The hon. member for St. Denis said there was no French version of our public relations pamphlet "Letter Perfect". Such a version, which is an exact duplicate, is available on exactly the same basis and for the same purpose as the English one. I have it here, and I might mention in passing that to the best of my knowledge it was mailed to the hon. member with the same letter that went out to other hon. members of the house. I am looking at other hon. members over there and I am appealing to their honesty. They will know they received the French version of our pamphlet in the mail. Let them deny it.

The hon. member for St. Denis says that this year there were more thefts and more money involved in those thefts. In my opening remarks I pointed out that there were 295 post office break-ins in the past fiscal year as compared with 366 in the previous year. For the first 11 months cash and postage supply losses were down from $162,000 to $92,000, so the hon. member was wrong again.

There is no point in continuing with this recital of his discrepancies and errors, and I do not intend to do so. I merely point out that this is not a matter of differing opinions. This is a simple case of mathematics and facts being completely and absolutely wrong. His entire remarks with regard to the post office bristled with factual inaccuracies and wrong conclusions.

Now let me deal with a few of the other points raised by hon. members. First, automation and mechanization. We find that the Liberal party is against it. We find that the C.C.F. party favour it, each according to their remarks. We find the hon. member for St. Denis saying this on the subject:

(Translation):

He should at least wait until there is less unemployment before thinking about replacing men by machines.

(Text):

The translation is, and this is significant:

We should at least wait until there is less unemployment before thinking about replacing men with machines.

This is one of the fundamental differences between the hon. member for St. Denis and the whole Liberal party and myself and my party. We are looking ahead. Our work and our studies are not being carried out for the next two or three months; they are being carried out for years ahead. Our plans in the Post Office Department are for years ahead. The concept that you should wait until you are faced with a disastrous situation before doing anything about it, which is exactly the concept put forward by the hon. member for St. Denis, is of course completely wrong. The hard facts are that we have to think ahead. Machines must be developed if we are to continue our efficient operation with the increasing volume of mail and the increasing size of our cities. We must do this to keep postal rates reasonable and extend our services as members of parliament have asked us to do.

Look back over past history. We started off with men clearing letter boxes on foot and carrying the mail in bags over their shoulders. We mechanized with horses and wagons, and then with trucks. Do you want us to go back to the days of men clearing mail boxes on foot? We originally started off hand stamping every individual letter in order to cancel the postage stamp. Today we have machines for that purpose. Do you want us to go back to employing hundreds of people at rush times in the post office, who will be standing there stamping one letter after another and handling the mail? We used to have men carry bags from one point to another. It is a rough, difficult task. We put in conveyors to do it, to try to dignify people and free them to do other jobs which make a greater demand on their human intelligence.

I have no apologies to make for that sort of thing. Perhaps the best present example of how foolish is this argument against automation is that just within the past year, by the development of automated accounting processes, we have been able to pay our 8,000 revenue postmasters across this country twice a month instead of only once a month. This is something for which they have been asking for years and years. When I asked them if they would like to go back to a one pay a month system their remarks were not too complimentary, and I can understand why.

On the one hand we have the Liberal party saying the postal workers are ill treated by the present administration and that their morale is low, and on the other hand we have the hon. member for Kootenay West, representing another party of the opposition with no better reason to favour this government, saying that in recent years there has been a great improvement in morale owing to improvements in administration and working conditions. I think we need go no further than to add the fact that postal employees today are better paid and better treated and receive better co-operation from management within the post office than ever before in our history, and that none of them are afraid of postal progress or automation.

Criticism has been levelled at the public relations department generally. I think basically this represents a misunderstanding of one of the major functions of this department. This is not a group designed to get publicity for the post office as such. It is what one might call a customer relations operation in very large measure. The majority of the personnel in the department spend their full time in centres across Canada working with postal users, ironing out special problems, leaving postmasters free to contemplate the day to day administration of their offices.

On the question of the deficit, our policy, enunciated originally and adhered to since, is to so operate the department as to break even on our over-all operation. The estimated $9 million deficit this year is really due to salary adjustments which ran throughout the entire year. There is no complaint about that; they are fair, reasonable and just. Next year when the changes in parcel post rates are in operation I confidently expect the department again to come close to, or reach, this break-even point.

As far as the increase in parcel post rates is concerned, the opposition chose to criticise that as well, and I would remind them that this is the first increase in ten years. The amount of the increase has been very badly misrepresented; one hon. member said the increase amounted to as much as 100 per cent. In fact it represents an average increase of 44 per cent. One of our major actions was to remove a special rate which had previously existed within 20 miles of post offices. This concession had been introduced many years ago at a time when communications were not as good as they are today, and when many farmers were in the habit of doing their shopping by mail. In recent times this particular section of the rates was being misused by some of the largest mailers in Canada, who would bundle up their parcels and send them by freight or car to a particular post office, and thus serve a great mass of people within 20 miles of that post office at a rate substantially below cost. The elimination of that rate will react to the benefit of the small shopkeeper and the small operator.

It must be remembered, too, that over the past ten years rail transport costs have gone up 120 per cent, and that our clerks are making 40 per cent more than they formerly did. There have been five rate increases by our competitors since the last one we put into operation. Finally, parcel post is still by far the cheapest way of sending parcels in Canada. I quote three rates as examples. A one pound parcel for delivery in the same province cost 10 cents under the old rate. The present rate in 23 cents and the corresponding express rate is $1. A five pound parcel sent three provinces away cost 67 cents under the old rate; the new rate is 84 cents, and the express rate is $1.07. A ten pound parcel sent to an adjoining province cost 89 cents under the old rate and $1.14 under the new rate. The express rate is $1.30. I still think that in the field of parcel post rates we have a most satisfactory and economic service.

Then, as to patronage, if you listened only to the words and overlook the examples you would think we were doing terrible things in this field. I tried to look into as many cases of this so-called patronage as I could. In one case I found that the man was operating a bakery and intended to go on operating it. He could not be a postmaster if he was operating a bakery full-time. How can a man bake bread and be able to serve the public in another capacity at the same time? In a number of other cases, including one at Trail, I found that these were straight civil service appointments made by the civil service commission, and if anyone wishes to question the integrity of the civil service commission he is free to do so, though I think it would be regrettable. The hon. member for St. Denis complains because we dismissed a postmaster for signing the nomination papers of a provincial candidate. Well, everyone of us knows that the signing of nomination papers very definitely places you on one side of the political fence as one of that man's supporters. We are not prepared in the department for that to be done.

The hon. member for Timiskaming in this same patronage field got himself into a long and involved discussion concerning a post office in Haileybury. I myself tried to find the newspaper account in the Toronto Telegram of March 14 which was supposed to report this incident. I went through every edition of the Telegram of that date, and the report is not there, Mr. Chairman. I looked at the Northern News, which he also purported to quote from, and I could not find it there although I admit there were two pages torn out of that newspaper. Certainly it is not on record in the library. I finally sent my secretary to see the hon. member for Timiskaming but he could not produce any clippings either.

Actually I have nothing to say about the subject, except that it does not seem to have any foundation whatsoever. That is the sort of case that is supposed to have been made against us, and against me personally, contending that patronage is being practised in this department. In the Post Office Department we make something approaching 1,000 appointments every year, 850 of them, give or take a few, being made on my own authority as Postmaster General. Those who carp about patronage machinations on our part can only come into this house with about three or four trumped up incidents, every one of which can be immediately thrown out as having no effect. That is all I have to say about that subject.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I am not going to follow up, because I am not an expert—

The Chairman: I believe the minister only yielded the floor, and unless the hon. member is rising to put a question he is out of order.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The hon. member is not going to follow up at this time, Mr. Chairman, because I am going to continue with a few remarks.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I thought you had concluded your remarks.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Because you spoke so loudly I thought you had finished.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The hon. member looked at me with his eyes and jumped up with his mouth.

I have dealt as briefly as I could with the general comments which seemed to permeate the debate, as well as a few specific items. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and the hon. member for Middlesex East urged that the regulation in respect of letter carrier service be reduced from 2,500 to some lower figure. It is difficult to assess the exact result in a case like that, but I would suggest—

Mr. Thomas: I rise on a question of privilege. The minister said the hon. member from Middlesex East. I think he meant the member for Middlesex West.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Middlesex West is right. We have a hurried estimate in this regard, and have arrived at the conclusion that if we dropped our limit to 2,000 we would incorporate probably 30 to 35 communities. The cost involved there alone would be somewhere between $1 million and $1,500,000. We are not discarding the idea by any manner of means, but when an expenditure of that volume is in prospect I feel it is certainly something deserving further consideration.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam seemed to feel that small post offices were being eliminated in order to enlarge metropolitan post offices. This is not done as a matter of policy or choice. It does happen on occasion, when it must be done in the interests of efficient mail service. He criticized the Vancouver tunnel, a favourite subject of his. It was built under the preceding administration. It is not as effective as it was hoped it would be, but it is still a project which will bring savings, paying for its cost in about 20 years, so the presumptions he made in that regard were quite wrong.

The hon. member had much to say about Pitney-Bowes of Canada Limited. I can briefly say that it is not the only company in Canada in the postal meter machine business. There are a number of other machines in operation; Commercial Controls Canada Limited have one, the Friden Calculating Machine Company have another. There is another one called Postalia, and one called Neo-Post. This is not a monopoly field. In so far as we are concerned we rent certain equipment from this company merely because we feel it is cheaper from our point of view than to purchase them.

The hon. member for Port Arthur referred to second class mail rates. There is not much for debate in this regard until we are in possession of the O'Leary commission report. The fact remains, however, that the attitude not only of this government but of the preceding government in regard to second class rates has been that they are a concession designed to encourage the circulation of reading material which otherwise might not be circulated, and to that extent we can see value here. In answering another suggestion of his, I might say there is no doubt the post office has made progress as a result of decentralization.

In respect of progress, I would like to express my own personal appreciation to the president of the Canadian postmasters association who, when he introduced me last night, made the following statement, and I am reading from today's Journal. He is reported as saying:

> —Mr. Hamilton had done more for his department than any of his predecessors.

I appreciate that remark and commend it to the attention of the hon. member for St. Denis.

The hon. member for Port Arthur suggested that we stop the passage of newspapers carrying football pool results because there is some connection, at least in his mind, between these football pool results in newspapers and the prohibition against playing the football pools. If we stopped every newspaper that carried news of anything illegal very few newspapers in Canada would move at all.

Mr. Fisher: May I ask the minister a question. Has the minister checked as to whether those are advertisements in the newspapers in relation to illegal matters or whether they are published as news? I agree with him if they are published as news, but if they are advertisements, surely they represent an encouragement to an illegal enterprise.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I will deal with that question later if the hon. member wishes. However, our view is that we cannot check individual advertisements in newspapers. We are not censors; that is the point I am making in this connection.

Finally the member for Port Arthur referred to the advertising of a certain type of commodity. This, of course, relates, as does everything we do, to whether it is legal or illegal in the eyes of the law. In this particular case the actions of one of the companies are under judicial review at the moment, and I think I would be getting into dangerous territory if I discussed this subject now.

The hon. member for Edmonton West urged that some consideration be given to providing carrier service in new subdivisions. I can only say to him that I feel we have gone a long way in this direction in recent years. We no longer require that there be sidewalks as such, but require only satisfactory walking conditions on a year-round basis. We do not even require that the streets be paved.

The hon. member for Kootenay West asks for assurance that there is no overlapping or duplication between the engineering and development branches of the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works. I certainly can give him that assurance without hesitation. That hon. member raised a number of other questions which I will deal with perhaps in correspondence, because I feel they are detailed and of interest primarily to him.

The hon. member for Trinity-Conception was worried about wages paid in St. John's, Newfoundland, at Christmas time. Perhaps the most satisfactory answer is that the dollar that was paid there is exactly the same dollar rate which was paid for similar work in other post offices in Canada. We treat our employees in St. John's on the same basis as we treat employees in any other area. Because I have great love for the hon. member for Trinity-Conception I treat him sometimes a little better than others.

The hon. member for Timiskaming inquired about examinations for grade III individuals in our district offices. Perhaps the short answer to that question is there are no examinations for grade III individuals in district offices. Those of our employees who do have to take examinations in regard to their distribution knowledge must procure their own equipment. This equipment is not particularly costly, but the introduction of it for our employees in Canada would cost something over $50,000. We have not discarded that idea entirely; as a matter of fact we have it under review at the present time.

The hon. member also asked about our intentions with respect to highway post offices. We have no expectation at the moment of entering into the field of highway post offices. There are two reasons for this. First, we find that our existing system of highway services using trucks on which the mail is carried but not sorted is eminently successful. Second, we have noticed with great interest that the United States, which entered this field on a fairly extensive basis, is now in the process of drawing back and eliminating a great many of its highway post offices. In addition, to the best of our knowledge they have no plans for the building of any new vehicles or anything of that kind.

The hon. member asked about the reduction in railway post offices, those that travel along the rails. I remind him that we do not eliminate railway post offices by choice. We have been forced into it by the advent of the rail diesel car and changed services of the railways which leave us no other course. As of the 31st of March in each of the following years, the number of railway post offices in operation was as follows: in 1957, 126; in 1958, 108; in 1959, 96; in 1960, 78 and in 1961, 65. It seems to be bottoming out somewhat but generally speaking we have no other choice in this field when the railways reduce their services.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the minister but his time has expired. Is it agreed that he may carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I will only be about two minutes more and I am grateful to hon. members for their consideration. The hon. member for Westmorland referred to letter carrier service. When we introduce letter carrier service and make it available to a community we require that at least 80 per cent of the houses be equipped with mail boxes, numbers on the front doors and so on. He suggested that the requirement be reduced to 65 per cent. When I came into the picture the requirement was actually 90 per cent and the point he raised applied then. A small portion of a community could deprive the entire community of letter carrier service, but 80 per cent seems to be about right. In most cases we can get the service into operation within a few weeks of its announcement. If we drop below that percentage very much, say to 65 per cent as he suggested, we are going to have the letter carrier bringing back to the post office about 35 per cent of the mail he takes out. This, of course, is not a satisfactory situation.

Many other points were raised which in almost every case involved details. If it is agreeable, I should like to follow the practice of previous years, one which I introduced, of giving the member concerned a lot of information in the form of a letter directly to the member. Otherwise we could take more time in the committee than hon. members would perhaps like to see taken on these matters. On the other hand, if a member wants to pursue on the floor of the house any particular matter that is of interest to him, I am ready, the officials are in the gallery, and we will certainly do everything we possibly can to try to assist hon. members.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be brief. A while ago I heard the minister state how concerned he was about the welfare of the employees in the post offices and I should like to deal with one matter relating to the Ottawa post office. As the minister knows, in other large cities such as Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver the senior employees work the day shifts and those junior to them work the evening and night shifts. The employees of the Ottawa post office have voted three times on this matter. The votes were not suggested by the employees themselves but were requested by the department. The circular relating to the matter says that the decision is to be based on the preference of the majority of the employees.

As I stated, there have been three votes in Ottawa in favour of the senior men having the day shift and the juniors the evening and night shifts just as is the case in all other large cities. For some reason or other, however, the department has refused to abide by the decision. I think this is rather unfair, and the reasons invoked by the department are not very good. Some suggestion was made that everybody did not vote. I suppose it is questionable whether some of us would be sitting in this chamber if everybody in our ridings voted.

In the last vote held I believe that some of the employees were reluctant to vote because there was a number at the top of each ballot and they thought this had something to do with identifying them and how they would vote. In any event, a large number of the employees voted in favour of the junior men taking the night shifts and the senior men the day shift. As the minister suggested, the heavier and harder work is done at night. In any event, I think it is only fair that the same treatment should be accorded to employees in Ottawa as to employees in Montreal, Vancouver, Winnipeg and other places. I simply bring this matter to the attention of the minister in a nice way. I am not criticizing anybody. I think there is an oversight somewhere. It may be that the matter is being held up by a supervisor or a few employees who do not like the system but I think the majority should rule.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I quite agree with the hon. member and I will first look into the matter myself. As I am in Ottawa I can do that. We will see what the situation is and if we can meet the wishes of the employees in matters like this and there are no good reasons for not doing so we will certainly do so.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to advise the committee that I wrongly informed hon. members the other day, as found on page 3686 of Hansard, in relation to the examinations taken by clerks. I obtained my knowledge of the matter recently and I believe that the minister was not fair to those who are interested in this matter by making the references he did as he was probably well aware that I was referring to grade IV and not grade III clerks. Grade I, grade II and grade IV clerks take these examinations but grade III clerks do not. The remarks and suggestions I made at that time related to grade IV clerks.

I have since made inquiries and I find that these examinations are not nearly as simple a matter as might be thought at first. I talked to an employee the other day who told me that originally three or four hundred hours are involved in learning the procedure and therefore, particularly in the sorting section, this is not a simple examination. While it is true that it may take only 20 or 30 hours a year for a man to keep up to date, three or four hundred hours of work are involved in the first instance and the remuneration of $150 semi-annually is not a very large amount of money to compensate for the extra training they have to undergo.

I have already read to the committee an extract from the Northern News of March 14, 1961 and referred to certain letters that are applicable to the matter in question. The other day one hon. member asked me about this matter but unfortunately he is not here now. I told him that when I went home over the week end I would see the reporter. I said I had received telephone calls from Toronto because of the communication that had been sent to the Telegram by the staff reporter. I spoke to the editor of the Telegram and made known certain views that I hold with respect to this matter. I told the hon. member who asked me for confirmation of what I had said that I would see the reporter in question and would get a copy of the communication for his information.

I am not in any position to find anything in the Telegram. I seldom read that particular daily newspaper. I am told there are several editions of it published to cover various areas. I have been assured by the reporter from the Toronto Telegram that this item, at least in part, appeared in the newspaper that day.

May I say that I was surprised at the strength and vigour exhibited by the minister in pursuing this matter. I was surprised also at something else. I give him much less credit than I thought I would have to give him in respect of the question I asked him in relation to the establishment of post offices. I am still curious about this. Was I wrong in my supposition that before a post office is established experts are sent to assess the situation; that the Postmaster General receives briefs from various organizations demanding this type of service, either through an M.P. or some other means? Is it not true that the minister has these people who go to assess the situation from the point of view of the mailing facilities that are available and the financial arrangements that may be necessary before an office can be established? I feel it is more important to have a statement that this is the course followed than to have a strong disavowal that patronage is taking place. People are interested in learning just how to go about getting a post office. Many of them are of the opinion that patronage is the only method of obtaining this service.

I shall read the copy of the telegram.

Ontario Northland Communications Telegram

Haileybury (March 14, Ray De Souza)—A federal building for Haileybury? A department of public works or an unemployment insurance commission branch here?

These are the things which C. Foster Rice, Timiskaming's defeated Progressive Conservative candidate in the late federal election is willing to take up with Ottawa. However, he wants letters from the Haileybury chamber of commerce and town council to back him up on his trip to the capital.

Last night council unanimously approved a resolution calling on town clerk Frank Haskett to request Mr. Rice to pursue the matter of obtaining a federal building for Haileybury.

Councillor Mary Lavigne said the new building if erected here could house a post office and possibly a department of public works as well as a branch office of the unemployment insurance commission.

Mayor Arthur H. Cooke, councillor Ben Budgeon and Mr. Lavigne confirmed they had been advised by national P.C. organizer Grosart to deal with the federal government through the defeated Conservative candidate rather than through Arnold Peters, C.C.F. member of parliament for Timiskaming.

Councillor Ken Buffam thought Mr. Peters was due for some courtesy in the matter as a sitting member.

"It might be simpler to get in through the back door," Mr. Lavigne stated. "Mr. Peters handling the matter might do us more harm than good."

"Here we have a riding lost by 210 votes," the mayor commented. "All we have to do is what has been recommended."

Mr. Rice recently unsuccessfully sought action from government on waterfront improvements at Haileybury. Mr. Cooke said the government did nothing about the defeated P.C. candidate's request then.

Council did not authorize Mr. Haskett to forward a copy of the resolution to Mr. Peters.

I did not make my statement nearly as strong as this telegram because I was making it from reports that I had heard. However, I would ask, who is Mr. Grosart? What authority has he got to go around the country telling people to disregard the democratic processes that are involved in this matter? Is Mr. Grosart the man who runs the Post Office Department? I think we already have had the answer of the Postmaster General who has O.K.'d this post office. What we are asking now is, does he O.K. what Mr. Grosart says or does he O.K. the establishment of a post office because certain prerequisite conditions have been met?

I have no objection, Mr. Chairman, to Mr. Rice coming to Ottawa and asking for anything he can get for my constituency and his friends in that riding. We are both residents of that riding and we both want to get as much as possible for it. I have not really any objection to the town council doing what they wish. However, Mr. Chairman, the situation in the town of Haileybury is a disgrace. We are renting a post office in that town which I do not think is a credit to any town one quarter the size of Haileybury. The town of Haileybury is an up and coming community, and I believe it has a right to expect a much better post office than it has.

Let me relate what has happened with regard to the post office in Haileybury. A number of years ago the postmaster in that town was a gentleman by the name of Hamilton. When Mr. Hamilton died his estate took over the property that belonged to him, namely the post office. The Hamilton estate sold the post office to a Mr. Cooke who is now the postmaster but he has no qualifications whatever for operating a post office. He has a staff of three who operate the office. I am told that Mr. Cooke has no formal training and does not have to take an examination before receiving an appointment as his employees do.

Mr. Cooke is also the mayor of the town. It is not surprising to me that Mr. Cooke has never written to me, as his federal member of parliament, on behalf of the council requesting a new post office because if the town of Haileybury gets a new post office he probably will not be the postmaster. He will be no longer renting the building to the postal department, a fact which gives him the opportunity of being the postmaster. I do not want it to be said that I am opposed to Mr. Cooke himself, and I can see that this type of arrangement has some advantages to it. However, I do not believe it is an arrangement that should be perpetuated.

I have in my hand a copy of a civil service circular which gives notice that a postmaster is required at Elk Lake, Ontario. Under the heading "Qualifications", there is a note to the effect that the postmaster will be required to provide the necessary postal premises. Second, the successful candidate will not be required to give his constant attention to the duties of the position. Unlike the situation to which the Postmaster General referred a few minutes ago, this job will allow him to operate his bakery on almost a full-time basis and he will also be able to operate the post office. The Postmaster General does not need to worry because there is not a bakery that large in the town of Elk Lake. However, we seem to be perpetuating a situation that is causing a great deal of difficulty in the Haileybury area.

I think one of the problems that may be involved here may be the fact that the citizens themselves have been so badly misinformed in the past by the politicians. Certainly, they are being misinformed by Mr. Grosart at the present time. In my opinion, Mr. Grosart should not be in a position to speak for the Postmaster General and make this kind of commitment. Misinformation is going out to the effect that post offices are obtained by means of political patronage. I think I agree with the Postmaster General, and I hope this is his opinion, that post offices are not obtained in this manner. Certain conditions have to be met, and political considerations are not a factor. If this is not true, then this civil service circular to which I have referred should not be sent out by the civil service commission but should be sent out by the defeated candidate. The defeated candidate would be able to appoint the postmaster in this particular town.

I have no reason not to believe that political patronage, in that old fashioned sense, is gone from these appointments. I think this sort of thing is a disservice when we put a man in as head of a municipality. Here are three councillors and the reeve of the municipality who have met with the national organizer of the Conservative party and have been told these things. They obviously are going to take his word because he is from out of town. He also gave them, I am sure, certain assurances. They are going to take his word and this is the word that is going to be distributed and disseminated throughout the area, namely that these things are accomplished in this manner.

I raise this matter only because it seems to me that in this regard democracy can be ill served and that the ends of justice that are inherent in democracy cannot be served if this type of talk is not stopped, and it is not patronage; it is only talk. If this kind of suggestion is not removed from our political scene, then if we look the other way and do not mention it, we are doing a disservice to the cause of democracy that is almost as great as the disservice done by these people that are promising it.

I should like the Postmaster General to rise in his place and indicate just what method will have to be followed in the case of Haileybury if they are going to receive favourable consideration in respect of a post office in that town.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): May I answer the hon. member very briefly. I say first that any suggestion that Mr. Grosart or anyone influences the department in its decisions is completely unfounded. Certainly if Haileybury or any other town feels that they would like a post office, let them write to the department and we shall be delighted to go into the matter with them. The probability is that in most cases, as many communities know to their satisfaction, before they get around to writing we will already be in there in co-operation with the Department of Public Works and building a post office.

Mr. Granger: I listened with great interest to the comments of the minister. I am sure he will bear with me if I mention two matters which really are not new to him but which cause some of us a good deal of concern. One is the matter of salaries paid to postmasters and postmistresses in some of the small communities in Newfoundland. I am thinking of course, of the small communities in my own district of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador.

I readily agree that the revenue in these post offices is small and that if the salary is based upon the revenue, then the salary must of necessity be small. I think, however, that below a certain sum salaries should cease to be the yardstick and that service should then be the means of measuring remuneration. Postmasters and postmistresses are necessary even in small places. The work takes a considerable portion of their time. It demands their presence in the post office. It means they must find a place to operate the post office business. If they are carrying out an essential service and if the revenue from that service is small, certainly it would be a great mistake to take the sum of that small revenue and use it as a basis for salary. As I said, below a certain level, service should be taken as a yardstick for payment rather than revenue. In other words what I am pleading for is a minimum wage for postmasters and postmistresses.

The other point I wish to make is in connection with mail service in northern Newfoundland in what I might generally refer to as the St. Anthony area. During the winter the service is faster than it is in summer because the air mail service is satisfactory and gives a much more regular and rapid service than that which is given in the summer time when the mail is carried by ship. During the season—shall I say the shipping season—when the post offices are served by the coastal steamers, mail deliveries are infrequent. I am told that it is not unusual for a period of two weeks to elapse between the time a letter is mailed and the time it is received. I refer to a letter, say, from the mainland. It would not take very long to get from here to Newfoundland by air but the time is used up by the slow steamship service.

This is a matter which I have brought to the attention of the minister and I agree with him that an air mail service all the year around is expensive. What I wanted to suggest now is that he might consider a limited air mail service during the summer months for first class mail only with a limited number of flights. I am sure that this procedure would improve the service. It could be the case that the cost may be out of proportion to the service rendered, but such a service is really necessary. I should like the minister to give this matter consideration, and I will limit my request to the possibility of a limited service confined to first class mail by air in the northern communities of Newfoundland.

In conclusion I should like to thank the minister for his program of sending mail by road and, wherever possible, with greater frequency or more mails per week. I know that in a number of places which ask that services be increased from one mail to two or three mails per week, it has been done. In thanking the minister I would express the hope that he will continue to pursue that program and enlarge it.

Mr. McCleave: Very briefly, Mr. Chairman, I should like to mention something that the minister could perhaps mull over for the next two years and give an answer say in 1963. With the approach of confederation centennial ceremonies in 1967, it strikes me from perhaps a limited study, that there is only one real opportunity available to commemorate higher education in this country during that time. The year 1964 will be the 175th anniversary of the founding of the oldest university in the commonwealth. I refer to the University of King's College in Halifax. While 175 may not be as convenient an anniversary as say 200 or even 100, nevertheless I think it would be most fitting if the Postmaster General could at least consider the suggestion that one of his excellently designed fine stamps be issued to pay homage to higher education in this country. I therefore turn his thoughts to a fine ancient and honoured institution in my own riding of Halifax.

Mr. Carter: The Postmaster General did not reply to some of the questions I asked the other day. They were not personal questions. I thought they were questions of general interest and I am going to repeat them. But before I do so I want to reply to some of the things the minister said this afternoon in replying to criticisms that have been made of his estimates.

The Postmaster General said that one of the chief criticisms that had been levelled at him was for having pride in his department. I do not think anybody would criticize the minister for being proud of his department. We all pay tribute to the staff of the post office and their dedication to their various duties.

I think most hon. members criticize the fact that the Postmaster General perhaps seemed inclined to take a little too much credit unto himself rather than give it to the staff of the post office. As I listened to his performance I thought he was inclined to be a little truculent and at times was perhaps talking with his tongue a little bit in his cheek.

We do not take exception to that. I think this helps to liven our procedure. However, I do not think the Postmaster General should take too much exception to that kind of criticism. We want to assure the Postmaster General that we are all proud of the post office. We are all proud of his staff and their achievements. However, we do not want the Postmaster General to create the impression that the post office came into existence when he took over two or three years ago.

Mr. Deschatelets: That is very good.

Mr. Carter: I think that is implied in some of the remarks made by the Postmaster General in reply to the statements of the hon. member for St. Denis. He labelled the hon. member for St. Denis and the Liberal party with being against progress. He said we are the people who want to go back to the system of delivering mail on foot and manually cancelling the stamps one at a time, and all these other crazy things.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is what the hon. member said.

Mr. Carter: The Postmaster General represents a party that has entered the electronic age and gone up into outer space along with the Russian astronaut. However, mechanization did not begin with this Postmaster General coming into office. It did not begin with the Tory party. It has been going on in the post office, as a gradual development, ever since the post office was created.

Progress was made under the Liberal regime and I am glad to see it being continued. However, we do not want the Postmaster General to try and create the impression in the country and in this house that there was no progress under the Liberal party and the only progress has taken place during the past two or three years while he has been administering the Post Office Department.

If the Postmaster General had listened to his remarks today as I was listening to them he would have received exactly the same impression as I, that here again he was not being completely non-partisan in the way he was replying to our criticisms.

We can tolerate a little political give and take on this matter, but the Postmaster General must realize there is a limit to it. I think if he will take the trouble tomorrow to read what appears in Hansard—although in cold print it will be very different from the way it appeared when we listened to the spoken word—he will get the impression that he was guilty of the very exaggerations and excesses for which he criticized the hon. member for St. Denis in his speech the other day. In that respect the Postmaster General is perhaps the pot calling the kettle black.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): We are making progress. Which is the hon. member for St. Denis, the pot or the kettle?

Mr. Carter: I asked the Postmaster General two or three questions and he did not bother to reply. Perhaps he thought they were not important enough. They were not questions which applied specifically to my own riding; they were general questions which I thought would be of interest to the public at large.

One of those questions was: which was the most profitable to the post office from the standpoint of net revenue, the selling of postage stamps or the use of postage meters? I think that is a general question, because from the report we received it appears that the revenue from postal meters is increasing at such a rate that it is perhaps equal to, or even in excess of the revenue from the sale of postage stamps. If there is more expense in—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Let us stop this discussion. I will tell you right now. It is postal meters.

Mr. Carter: All right. I asked that question but the minister did not see fit to make any reference to it. I asked another question in connection with the list of special categories. There was quite an increase for transportation of mail by land, air and sea. My question in relation to this matter was: was this increase due to more contracts, or to contracts that had been renewed at higher rates? That was also a question of public interest.

I asked one question to which perhaps the minister might wish to give an individual reply, and I would not press him to answer it in this committee. I refer to the question I raised with regard to putting out a special stamp issue for Christmas. Many prominent people in my province are interested in this matter and I hope the Postmaster General will give it favourable consideration.

After we had a chance to read and study what the Postmaster General said when introducing his estimates we of course were in a better position to ask questions. I think the Postmaster General not only fired our imagination but aroused our curiosity when he told us about the advent of these electronic, automatic mail handling machines.

I should like to ask several questions in connection with this matter. The first one is this: how much money has the Post Office Department invested in the development of this kind of equipment? My second question is: assuming that the equipment passes the test and becomes available, under what conditions does it become available to the post office, and under what conditions will it be manufactured? I ask this question because one can readily understand that this is a very special type of equipment with a very limited market and it is quite possible that its manufacture and distribution could be monopolized by a particular firm. I should like full details with respect to the whole procedure of developing and acquiring this kind of automatic, electronic equipment.

The Postmaster General told us the other day that 100,000 firms in Canada were now receiving twice a day delivery. That is fine. We hope it may be extended. However, I think most hon. members would like to have an answer to this question: on what basis are these 100,000 firms selected? Where does the Post Office Department draw the line between firms which rate two deliveries of mail a day and firms which rate only one delivery a day? These are all the points I wish to make at the present time, Mr. Chairman, but I will probably have other comments to make later on.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, first of all I must tell the minister that the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) could not be present this afternoon. He is the first to regret his absence, no doubt.

It is particularly unfortunate that the minister showed himself not only so cruel but so unfair toward the hon. member for St. Denis. Allow me to show at once in what way the minister was unfair in his remarks regarding the member for St. Denis. He said, in French and in English, that in the speech he made last week, the member for St. Denis stated the following:

I am all for progress, but I am against it—

And the minister suggested that the member for St. Denis would be the laughing stock of everybody for saying such a thing.

If we refer to page 3640 of Hansard for April 13, we note that the minister has been unfair to the member for St. Denis in that he did not quote the whole sentence. Here, in fact, is the textual quotation as it appears in Hansard:

I am all for progress, but I am against it when it is introduced at the expense of the human element, particularly in times of unemployment.

That is something else. I shall come back later to the matter of mechanization, but I fully endorse what the member for St. Denis had to say on this subject.

If the Postmaster General is so confident of the position he is taking in these difficult times to step up mechanization in the postal service to the extent of creating unemployment instead of providing jobs, as he should be doing with a greater volume of business, I am sure that on a matter of principle of such importance, at a time when the government, the first employer in the country, should be setting an example for private industry, the hon. member for St. Denis, myself, or any other member of the island of Montreal, would be delighted during the next election campaign, to meet the Postmaster General in the riding of his choice, and we shall then leave it to the voters to settle the matter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the member for St. Denis is one of the most assiduous members in this house. I think he is celebrating this year the 25th anniversary of his election as a member, and since the second session of 1957 especially, he has shown a tremendous interest in the Post Office Department, never failing to raise matters of very great importance pertaining to that department. He has also made very interesting suggestions.

In my opinion, the speech delivered last week by the hon. member for St. Denis was remarkable; it was a speech that dismayed the Postmaster General, and the minister vainly tried today to minimize its impact.

Mr. Chairman, one may not particularly relish the sense of humour displayed by the hon. member for St. Denis when he is being critical, but if we had more members like him in this house, more members with the humour and the engaging personality of the hon. member for St. Denis, it would afford relief from the attitude of certain government members who, unfortunately, are always down in the mouth. I fail to see what the Postmaster General could gain for himself in trying to minimize a speech replete with figures and facts that are unquestioned.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Erroneous.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Denis—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): He was wrong.

Mr. Deschatelets: —gave facts and figures, and I would greatly appreciate it if the minister replied to this after a while. If those figures and those facts were erroneous, why did not the minister stand up at the time and ask the hon. member what was the basis for those facts and figures? The hon. member for St. Denis would then have been very pleased to inform the minister who seems to be quite unaware of some of the things that happen in his department.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I wanted to ask questions, but the hon. member for St. Denis asked me to wait till he was finished.

Mr. English: That is true.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, the minister is right. I was in the house at the time, but why did not the Postmaster General ask his questions after the member for St. Denis had concluded his remarks? I am sure the hon. member for St. Denis would have considered it a pleasure to reply.

Mr. Chairman, the Postmaster General seems to think we are all being rather hard on him. He has been asking for it. As I said one day, he who sows the wind shall reap the whirlwind. For two or three years, the Postmaster General promised two mail deliveries a day. He promised them even to his constituents in Notre Dame de Grace; yet, he said not a word about it in the statement he made in introducing his estimates. He said not a word about thefts. The member for St. Denis quoted figures which the minister should not be denying. I hope the minister will not force me to read those I have here. I can read them if he wants me to, but I am sure he will not deny them. Those figures show that in the last year, there have been more thefts than in 1957. I hope the minister will not deny this.

With regard to compensation claims for registered mail or insured parcels, the number of claims in 1956-57 was 11,800, as against 13,020 in 1959-60. I do not think the minister will deny these figures. How much money did such compensation claims involve? For 1956-57, $128,202; for 1959-60, $170,134. Some of the money has been recovered; in fact, an amount of $11,281 was recovered in 1956-57, and in 1959-60, the figure was $11,442. Where is the improvement there? These figures cannot be denied.

Mr. Chairman, I raised no objection when the minister told us a moment ago that the publication about which the hon. member for St. Denis raised such a fuss had been translated into French. I cannot say, I have never received it. The hon. member for St. Denis has not received it, nor have I, nor has the member for Papineau (Mr. Meunier). We did get the English version, and that is what the member for St. Denis stated.

With regard to patronage, here is the statement made by the hon. member for St. Denis as recorded on page 3640 of Hansard for April 13:

> I will mention two or three cases only, without going into all the details. If the minister wants more details, I am prepared to give them to him.

When did the minister accept the challenge? Never. I too, have dealt briefly with this matter of patronage.

From 1953 to 1957, how many casual employees were dismissed following the discovery that they were dependent either on their husband or on some other person? So we simply suggested, and again I submit this to the minister's attention, that in the case of casual employees or again in the case of the ladies in the flying squad, why not start by hiring those who are in greatest need? That is the point we have emphasized to the Postmaster General.

Mr. Chairman, turning to automation in the post office, I think the point we raised did some damage to the minister. I also think it really hurt the government, because the government and the minister are now finding that even if automation is desirable in some divisions of the post office, this is not the time to try to develop the most efficient machine in the world, a machine whose immediate effect would be to create unemployment.

We have repeated time and again that the government is the biggest employer and must set the example for industry. How often have we said to industrialists: Even if you have work for certain employees, you must support the employment campaign. Keep those men on the job, and in this way try to cut down a bit on the amount of hardship that is being felt today.

The government and the Postmaster General now feel that they made a mistake when they promoted this mechanization. Let us take the case, for instance, of the electronic sorting machine—and I hope the minister will have a word to say about that—how much money, so far, was spent on experimenting with this device? If the machine is finally put into service, as the minister hopes it will, we will see then that it will cause unemployment.

I will add this: in my remarks I said a few words about the usefulness of that machine, which has not yet been put into service. I told the Postmaster General that the machine, that electronic letter sorter, might not be used for more than 15 or 20 per cent of the letters being handled by the post offices.

Mr. Tremblay: What does he know about it?

Mr. Deschatelets: My hon. friend is asking what I know about it. Well, unlike the minister, I am stating a fact. The minister is here, and I am telling him, I am asking him—

Mr. Tremblay: This is an allegation; it is not a fact. It is a hypothesis.

Mr. Deschatelets: If my hon. friend wishes to make a speech, let him go ahead and do it. If he has comments to make for my benefit, I will yield him the floor then reply to him afterwards. However, I possibly have less patience than my hon. friend the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), and I certainly do not like anyone who speaks in my back when I am up front.

Mr. Tremblay: Back or front, it is not—

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, if you would put a stop to this yapping of the member for Roberval, I would highly appreciate it.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go any further for the time being. I think I have answered some of the minister's allegations, and I am genuinely sorry that his remarks were directed at the member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) instead of dealing with the suggestions and constructive criticism the latter made.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a question to the member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), if he will permit.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont is against mechanization and improvement. Is he in favour of going back to the horse and buggy in the field of transportation?

Mr. Tremblay: He might suggest mechanizing the brain of the member for St. Denis.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) has asked me this question. How many times will we have to explain the stand we have taken, so that the government members can clearly understand it?

Mr. Tremblay: Say that without laughing.

Mr. Deschatelets: We said we advocate mechanization in the postal services where mechanization can be useful, but we specified that, at this time, on account of unemployment, we have no money to spend on the development of electronic devices whose introduction would bring about more unemployment. Besides, I have challenged the minister on this question, and I hope he will take it up early enough for the next election.

Mr. Pigeon: I thank the hon. member.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that I listened with interest to the minister's comments with respect to the criticisms and favourable comments made by members of the opposition. I look forward to his answering one or two questions relating particularly to my constituency by mail, as he indicated he would. However, I rise at this time again because I wish to refer to the minister's positive assurance that the appointment at the Trail post office to which I referred earlier, was made by the civil service commission completely devoid of patronage. I have no knowledge of the circumstances, but when I returned to my constituency I was asked by a number of people to raise this question in the House of Commons. Those individuals are convinced that this was a patronage appointment because the person in question happens to be the wife of the former campaign manager of a defeated Conservative candidate. These individuals include supporters of all parties, and some are veterans. I assured them I would raise this question in this house. I want to be fair, as I always try to be, but I do want to get the facts so that I will be in a position to convey them to those individuals.

I would like the minister to inform me as to the number of applications that were made to the civil service commission in respect to this position; if the veterans' preference was applicable, and the names and marks received by these various applicants. I would also like to know whether any of those applicants were recommended by parties or organizations.

I ask for this information because when I returned to my home I found that this was a matter of current interest, and assured those interested I would raise the matter in the house and get the facts.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Dealing with the last question first, I would say that according to our records the only female employee taken on since 1957, either as a full-time, part-time, or casual employee, is Mrs. Mary Margaret Bride. Perhaps that is the lady the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Herridge: That is not the name given to me.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): She was employed on June 16, 1959 in a regular position of temporary postal clerk, II. She qualified by civil service commission examination for postal clerk, competition No. 57-V1059 and ranked third on the eligible list. This was a recent appointment from a civil service eligible list under which all aspects of the merit system were taken into consideration. This is all the information we have on the matter. Beyond that, it is a matter between the civil service commission and the hon. member, but I do point out to him this one fact.

We cannot exclude Conservative supporters from every position in the government service just because they happen to have supported this party at one time or another during our history and simply restrict our appointments to Liberals and C.C.F.'ers. As I understand it, that is the argument the hon. member has been making. He said that this was a terrible appointment because the lady happened to be a Conservative. I do not intend to see anyone in this country discriminated against in their desire to obtain employment from the government. Personally I am not going to discriminate against Liberals or socialists but I can assure the hon. member I am not going to discriminate against Conservatives either.

Mr. Herridge: In reply may I say that the minister knows that we in this group would not suggest that only supporters of certain parties should be appointed. We want all Canadians to have equal treatment regardless of their political affiliation and it is absurd to suggest that we would criticize the appointment of Conservatives. With regard to other appointments I might say that supporters of his own party have come to me about them. I think the minister does not have the full facts. The name given to me is a Mrs. George, not the name mentioned by the minister, and I understand it is quite a recent appointment.

The people who came to me were convinced that this was a patronage appointment. I do not think the minister has been kept up to date or I have been misinformed and I question that because of the number of people who have spoken to me about this matter. I would not want the minister to suggest for a minute that we would not agree to equal treatment for all persons no matter what party they support. I think the minister was rather twisting the facts when he said that. A Conservative has a right to live as much as a C.C.F.'er or anybody else.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I will look into the matter. Now that the hon. member has given us a name after two days of discussion and two speeches we will be able to do something. We will be able to go into the matter further. We spent a great deal of time getting the information I have given merely because the hon. member did not give us the name. What I had in mind was the remark he made which I picked up. I believe it will appear in Hansard in almost these exact words, that this person was the wife of the campaign manager for the local Conservative candidate and therefore these people think this is a patronage appointment. As far as I can see, this is an argument that has no foundation whatsoever. What I understood the hon. member to say was that every time a Conservative is appointed it must be a patronage appointment and every time a Liberal or a C.C.F.'er is appointed it is white as the driven snow.

Mr. Herridge: That is nonsense.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I think it is nonsense too—

Mr. Herridge: You are talking nonsense.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): —but that was the gist of the hon. member's remarks. To answer very briefly the questions which have been raised by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, may I say that we will be glad to have a look at the possibility of air service in various parts of Newfoundland as suggested by him. I am not at all hopeful it can be brought about because of the economics of the situation but we always like to explore new ideas. The hon. member suggested that the minimum wages of postmasters should be increased. We are not paying our people to any great extent now on the basis of the revenue of the post office but rather on the volume of business that is done, both incoming and outgoing mail and many other factors. Where you have an office handling 10 or 15 letters a week and only three or four people patronizing the office, it is a little difficult to expect that the postmaster should be paid $3,000 or $4,000 a year, which is the logical outcome of some of the arguments advanced.

I have noticed that our revenue postmasters across the country, particularly in the lower brackets about which hon. members tend to complain most, now feel that their remuneration is consonant with the amount of work they do. Any criticism I have heard from people who know in detail what they are talking about because of personal experience has to do with other ranges of postmasters, not those in the lower brackets. We will be glad to consider the possibility of a stamp for King's college. We are always grateful for any suggestions.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo was after me again about my taking pride in the department. I know a lot about the department, and the more I know the prouder I am. Perhaps that is the difference between myself and the previous ministers who were not quite so closely in touch with the postal people across the country and were not quite so imbued with a spirit of pride in the department. I am sorry if the hon. member has misinterpreted the attitude I have taken but I am proud of what the department has done and I am going to go on saying so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A wonderful foundation was laid for the minister by the former minister.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): A foundation of sorts was laid and I think it does great credit to us that we have built such a marvellous superstructure without the building falling down because of the quality of the foundation. The hon. member complained that I had not answered all his questions so I will try to pick up one or two. He referred to the electronic machines. First of the electronic sorting machine developed we have paid a total of $3.8 million for our electronic sorting machines. We control the machine completely in every way, including the patents which go into it, and no one else determines how these machines can be manufactured, to whom they will be made available or any other consideration. I speak now of the electronic sorting machine developed by the Canadian Post Office Department.

We also have an informal understanding with the postal administrations of the United Kingdom and the United States whereby equipment they have or we have can be interchanged between the three of us. One experience we have had in that field has to do with the equipment that is going into the Winnipeg office early next year for segregating and cancelling purposes. It was purchased from a private organization in the United Kingdom and in addition to the actual price of the machine there is a small royalty which is designed to recompense the United Kingdom for some of their development costs. Basically, postal equipment is available under agreement between the three countries, which makes it possible for any one country to get at it without anyone profiteering.

The hon. member asked about the requirements for two deliveries a day. I think the easiest way to deal with this is to say we have four classes of letter carrier walks. First, there is the residential class which comprises those with less than 25 per cent business calls. In this instance we give one delivery a day to all calls. Second, there are mixed walks, those with 25 per cent to 50 per cent business calls, with regard to which we give twice a day delivery to the businesses and once a day to the residences. Third, there are the business walks, those with over 50 per cent business calls. In this case we give two deliveries per day to businesses—sometimes more if the volume of mail warrants it—and once a day delivery to residences. Then, we have, finally, the residential-business type of walk which we develop when it is in the interests of improved postal service to business. With this multiple delivery walk we are able to serve businesses twice a day and residences once. I think that perhaps answers this question.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont made some interesting observations on my earlier speech. I am not going to debate the details with him. We are planning ahead. We are not in the process—this is a criticism which can justly be made of the introduction of automation—of jamming in machines and equipment at a great rate without consideration for the interests and needs or the permanency of the jobs of our employees. We do not take the view expressed by the hon. member for St. Denis, however, that we must not think about progress in automation so long as there is any question of unemployment. Over the last year our actual employment in the post office has increased by something over 700 people. I have no doubt it will increase, year by year, because of the tremendous increase in the volume of mail.

If we are going to give the service we want to give, we will have to introduce mechanization and automation. My own, personal view which I expressed some time ago—it looks as though we will not be too far away from it—is that it will take about five years to develop our equipment and machines, the really complicated part of them, to the point where the machine is ready to go into a post office on a day to day basis. Then, I believe it will take us about another five years to introduce the machine into those offices across the country which can handle it without any dislocation of staff.

I should like the hon. member to remember that we have a turnover in the Post Office Department. It is regrettable, but people reach retirement or they decide to go to other work. Sometimes they even die. This represents, speaking from memory, about 7 to 12 per cent of our staff. There is an opportunity here to install automation, equipment and machinery, without replacing all the people who drop out of the service. I can say to the hon. member that beyond any shadow of a doubt, so long as I am Postmaster General there is going to be no permanent postal employee who is going to be discharged or released because of the advent of machinery, automation or advanced methods. There is ample opportunity to do the things we want to do without that sort of thing.

(Translation):

Mr. Meunier: Mr. Chairman, I would not like to repeat what the previous speakers said. However, I should like to make a few remarks to the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton). As we know, the minister is very strict, both for himself and for others. This afternoon, he tried to belittle the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) in saying that the latter made a humorous speech, implying that he was perhaps irresponsible.

I must say to the Postmaster General that the hon. member for St. Denis made very timely remarks in his speech.

He was severe, as the Postmaster General used to be when he was sitting on this side of the house and criticized his opponents.

The hon. member for St. Denis has an innate sense of humour. We cannot, like the Postmaster General, be at the same time serene and always gloomy. I do hope the Postmaster General will not be too severe on his opponents. Let him judge them as they are, and let him also appraise their remarks and arguments.

The Postmaster General has attributed to the hon. member for St. Denis remarks which would imply that he is against automation.

I would point out to the Postmaster General that, as recorded on page 3639 of the English version of Hansard, of April 13, the hon. member did not say he was opposed to automation. He said:

> As far as the special training which our citizens should have in order to face the automation era, if our workers are not ready to use automatic machines, it is up to the minister not to step up automation excessively.

Later, the hon. member for St. Denis stated:

> I simply suggest that he wait until the number of unemployed in this country regresses before he replaces people by machines in the Post Office Department.

We know, Mr. Chairman, that those machines are still at the experimental stage.

What the hon. member for St. Denis meant was that no costly experiments should be undertaken at a time when our chief concern should be to provide jobs.

There are some points which the Postmaster General did not touch. I submit that, when he was sitting on this side of the house, each time a theft was committed in a post office he used to ask questions. Two days later, he was still asking who the thieves were. To hear him talk, you would have thought that the minister himself was responsible for those thefts and was not doing all he could to find out who the thieves were.

I would not want to blame the Postmaster General or his officials for all the thefts that are being committed. But, I would point out that human nature does not change, that perfection is not of this world, that thieves are not easy to track down and that the personnel must not be blamed for unsolved thefts, especially when the officials have done all they could to solve them.

I would not like to be as strict with the Postmaster General as he himself used to be when he was sitting on this side of the house, but I am glad to note that he knows now that he has to take into account the human factor in everything, and that it is not possible to solve all problems, any more than all thefts can be solved.

There is a point that none of my colleagues touched upon but about which the postmaster would wax eloquent when he used to sit on this side of the house, namely the post office savings bank operations. At that time, the Postmaster General would tell us that these operations were detrimental to chartered banks; that they were useless since anyone could do business with the nearby chartered bank. I now find that, since 1957, the number of depositors has increased. Therefore I should like the minister to tell us what he intends to do about the savings bank. Does he now consider it worth while or does he still cling to his previous opinions?

Those are the only remarks I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman. I hope that if the Postmaster General, who is a decent sort, is to leave us soon, as was intimated by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), he will get along well with the member for St. Denis who, by then, will hold important office in the government.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I should like to answer the one principal question posed by the hon. member, Mr. Chairman. At the moment we are having a good look at the post office savings bank to see whether there might be changes necessary in the areas in which it operates or, in some respects, extensions and, in other respects, a pulling back in order to make it a better operation so far as the government is concerned. However, I still have my own reservations which I expressed previously. The post office savings bank as it was constituted originally has fulfilled the exact purpose for which it was originally intended.

Mr. Crouse: In rising to speak briefly on the estimates of the Post Office Department I should like to commend the minister for his forward-looking program in providing and building new post offices throughout Canada. Since assuming his portfolio in 1957, great progress has been made in developing these new facilities and this program has met, I am sure, with the genuine approval of all Canadians. Certainly the citizens in my riding have been most appreciative of the new buildings that have been provided.

In commending the minister on this forward-looking program there is one thought I should like to advance for his consideration. At the present time, with more and more of our citizens being desirous of moving from the heavily populated cities and towns to the country areas, there is a distinct trend towards developing rural areas. This trend will naturally throw a heavier burden on rural post offices and will certainly constantly increase the additional burdens that are placed on existing rural routes. With this thought in mind I would suggest to the minister that his department give more thought to providing a larger sorting area in the many new post offices that are under construction or at least to having the buildings designed in a manner that will enable them to be more readily enlarged. Under the forward-looking policies of the present Conservative government we know that Canada cannot help developing. I hope the minister will give this proposal consideration for the benefit of present and future Canadians.

Mr. Carter: May I ask the Postmaster General to clarify one point with regard to the electronic equipment. The Postmaster General said that the post office controlled the patents and the manufacturing of this equipment. Does that mean that the post office has contracts with certain companies to manufacture this equipment? Does the post office now have contracts for making component parts of this equipment and assembling it or is that being done in the post office itself?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The hon. member is speaking of only one machine, namely, the pilot model. The short answer is that in the development stage, which is the stage in which we are at the present time, in this case we brought it up to a certain point of development in our own department. We then entered into a contract with Canadair for further work on this machine. I refer to that one single machine. As I stated earlier, we are now coming to the end of that contract. We have obtained the information we want as to the operating capacity of the machine and we are going to review our position. But certainly at the moment we have no commitments of any substantial nature with any company. However, I also say that if the equipment is manufactured, it is certainly going to be manufactured by private industry and not in the Post Office Department.

Mr. Pitman: I should like to ask one or two questions of the Postmaster General. There is very little one can say about this department. I am sure the Postmaster General will recall that the new facilities at Peterborough achieved a considerable amount of notoriety when the Postmaster General was on this side of the chamber. It arose from the fact that television cameras were being used to check on those who were committing misdemeanors in the post office. I rather had the impression that this was almost the beginning of the Conservative desire for a bill of rights.

This matter achieved a tremendous amount of publicity across Canada. During the consideration of the next estimates in 1958, the minister indicated that this was not a very satisfactory operation. I am sure that the employees certainly welcomed that remark which was made in 1958. I should like to know exactly how much more this device has been used since that time, whether its use has been extended to other post offices or whether there has been a general feeling on the part of the post office that this is not a way in which the human dignity of postal employees can be best guarded.

I was particularly interested in what the Postmaster General had to say with regard to pay increases that have been taking place within the Post Office Department. My main complaint would be not so much with regard to what has been taking place within the department as with regard to contracts that have been let under the Postmaster General's department. I realize that this is not entirely his responsibility but that it is also the responsibility of his colleague the Minister of Labour. However, stage services have been set up in various parts of Canada. In one particular stage service about which I made some inquiries the employees were being exploited, to say the least. In this particular case a man was working as many as six days a week, sometimes from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. Not throughout the entire period but for some of the time he was working a total of 28 hours a week for $15.

The computation of this $15 was rather interesting. The individual was on unemployment insurance and his pay was related to what he could make, being half of what he could qualify for as a result of the fact that he was getting unemployment insurance. I think this is an unfortunate aspect to the contract. I realize that contractors are paid only what it is reasonable to pay drivers of trucks of equal size in the area. I think this is something that needs to be the subject of more regulation. I am sure the Postmaster General will take into account the possible disadvantage that accrues to a person who becomes associated with the Post Office Department in connection with the stage services.

I was also rather shocked by a letter I received to the effect that a person who had a village post office received a net income of only $82 a month. He had painted and decorated his post office and so on. I think the Postmaster General might be willing to agree that this income is too low. I hope that the pay increase which he has announced will be extended and that there will be some definite attempt to bring the level of pay up to something which would be commensurate with the services being rendered and the responsibility which is being undertaken by the rural postmasters in this country. I would appreciate it if the Postmaster General could make some comments on these remarks.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): First, as to the television cameras in Peterborough, may I say that our general opinion remains the same. We tested them out there. We found that they were not particularly satisfactory. To the best of my knowledge, there are no plans to introduce them further.

As far as tenders are concerned and stage services or rural route services and things of that kind, may I say that we are bound by a definite act of parliament which requires us to accept the lowest satisfactory tender; and "satisfactory" means or merely infers that the man has the necessary equipment and gets a driver's license.

An hon. Member: And he must be sober.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Somebody points out that he must also be a sober individual. That is a requirement. In our main services, such as the city services, we do require wages to be paid at the going rate for that type of work in the area.

When you get down into rural routes and stage services, which are really just another variety of a rural route, you find that many of them are carried on by the individuals who perhaps combine the rural route with something else at the same time. I think anything which required a stipulated wage in that field would work to the detriment of most of the tenderers on the rural routes. Therefore there is no wage stipulation in those contracts.

However, certainly wherever a contract is such that we expect people will be employed in in order to carry it out, we have a clause in the contract requiring the payment of the going wage for that area. I think that answers the two points raised by the hon. member for Peterborough.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to preface my few remarks with a little "thank you" to the hon. member for Essex East for doing a little touting for me in the job stakes. I think I can locate a job all right; I do not think it will be too difficult, even if it is not in the government service.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): If you talk much more we really will think you are touting for the job.

Mr. Fisher: I should tell the hon. member for Essex East that I have been touting him for a job in politics and meeting with a great deal of response across the country. Very many people feel there is a higher post he can hold within his own party.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Douglas, Argue and Martin; now we have three in the race.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask the Postmaster General some questions. He said this is not the time or place for a debate on second class mail rates. However, he did seem to acknowledge that there is a definite subsidy in this area, or that at least in the operations of the Post Office Department one could find the fact that one side of the operations must be subsidizing another side of the operations in terms of costs.

I think we deserve a statement of the government's position in this particular field. I do not think the Postmaster General's reply of March 15, so far as the United States arrangements are concerned, is quite good enough. I understand that the world postal union has planned a meeting for next year in which this whole problem will be dealt with.

I think we merit a statement from the government before the end of the session, after the royal commission report is available, on this whole question of second class mail, particularly in relation to subsidies.

I raised this question a year ago and made some remarks about the Toronto Globe and Mail. By going through a certain reference book one can discover what portion of a newspaper's circulation goes out by mail. According to the figure at which I arrived the Toronto Globe and Mail had the highest mail circulation in Canada. I therefore inferred that if there is a subsidy in this field, the Globe and Mail is perhaps making more out of it than any other newspaper.

I had conversations later with executives of the Globe and Mail and heard their side of this particular argument. They argued that they and most newspapers with big circulations are trying to get out of the mail circulation field as much as possible. However, they did not deny that there is a subsidy here. Their reason for getting out of this particular field was just the matter of handling involved within their own organization.

This question of increases in postal rates for mailed newspapers is something the United States has considered. I have here an article in the Editor and Publisher for April 15, 1961. I should like to draw to the minister's attention the fact that in the United States there has been a marked drop in daily newspaper circulation through the mail. It is now only about 8 per cent. I should like to know from the minister what is the percentage in Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Would you repeat your question.

Mr. Fisher: In the United States only 8 per cent of daily newspaper circulation now goes through the mail. I should like to know what is the figure in Canada. I ask that question for this reason. This article goes on to say:

> ANPA general manager Stanford Smith said: "Diversion of big city newspapers away from the mails is further substantiated by post office department cost ascertainment reports for the past five fiscal years which show heavy declines in the weight of daily newspapers in second class mail and less revenue for the post office in spite of postal rate increases."

I should like to know from the minister whether this particular point has been considered. The United States postal department has increased the rates on second class mail, especially those affecting newspapers. Why has the Postmaster General's department decided not to do this? Is it because of the principle that they and the previous government have acknowledged, that it is the one way of ensuring the circulation of a certain kind of information? If this is so, I think the Postmaster General should answer my question concerning agricultural publications and small daily newspapers.

I go back to the point I raised the other day. Surely Roy Thomson does not need any kind of subsidy. Surely the McConnells do not need any kind of subsidy. Perhaps it is not a subsidy. Perhaps they could not put out these farming periodicals otherwise. But surely the department should have some kind of appreciation of the situation from a financial point of view. I look forward to later on receiving an answer in letter form on this matter from the minister. I may say that I do appreciate the information he sent me last year in this regard.

I should appreciate an answer from the Postmaster General on the question I raised several years ago concerning a marine post office at the lakehead. If C.S.L. and Scott Misener go through with switching their registry as they have indicated, we will very shortly have almost the whole great lakes fleet composed of foreign ships. This may happen. However, we have certainly had an increase in ships of foreign registry since I last raised the matter. A number of foreign ships are stopping at the lakehead. I should like the Postmaster General to look at this matter again and see whether there is any more justification for a marine post office at this time than there was several years ago.

The last request I wish to make of the Postmaster General is more general. I should like to know what arguments have been used in relation to some newspaper criticism I have seen regarding the letter of the deputy postmaster general to the public accounts committee. I cannot identify it more than that; I cannot find the particular letter here.

I think the minister knows what I am talking about. There was a letter from Mr. Boyle, I think, to the public accounts committee in relation to the criticisms or suggestions made by that committee last year. The letter indicated that certain things were waiting until there were recommendations.

I am interested in the fact that the Toronto Star, for example, indicates that Mr. Boyle's letter oversimplified the problem in relation to second class mail; it oversimplified the variety of rates and the question of the shipping of United States periodicals by mail from a point within Canada.

I do not wish to take up any more time, but I hope the minister will give me a reply to these questions in letter form, as he has done in the past. In conclusion I should ilke to say that if my tip is mere or sheer fantasy, so be it; but I feel there is a certain amount of substance in it and I only hope that the fact that I gave it to the committee will not stand in the way of the minister going in this direction if he feels that is where his future may lie.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I will have to answer by letter many of the questions raised by the hon. member. However, I think I should point out one matter immediately because it does to some extent simplify the situation.

The pressure in the United States to raise second class mail rates arises very largely because of the fact that they are losing from $500 million to $800 million a year in their postal operations. Half the increase in the national debt in the last ten years has been the result of postal deficits alone. They are pushing very hard now, not only in the field of second class mail rates but in the field of all rates.

We will certainly look into the possibility of a marine post office at the lakehead. We will review the deputy postmaster general's letter. Since it oversimplified things for the hon. member for Port Arthur, we will try to complicate it a bit and help him along those lines.

Mr. Weichel: I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General regarding Christmas help. We understand that during the Christmas period notices posted asking those who are interested to apply for part-time or full-time work. If somebody who had applied, say, in 1960 was accepted and applied again in 1961 would such a person be given a preference? After all, this would appear reasonable, because he would have had some experience as compared with an applicant who had never done the work before, especially in post offices where there are still many boxes into which mail is sorted.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): To the best of my knowledge there is no fixed rule. I know from experience that generally we prefer people who have done this work before and there certainly is a tendency on the part of postmasters interested in operating as efficiently as possible to engage applicants who had had past experience.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wish to say just a few words, briefly, about a matter which is of local interest in my constituency, but before doing so I should like to say to the Postmaster General that when he came to Windsor recently to officiate at the opening of the new addition to the post office he extended to me a courtesy which I greatly appreciated. I told him so at the time, and I want to repeat it now because I am grateful for the fact that when he was in Windsor, a distinguished visitor in one of Canada's dynamic communities, he extended to one of the members of parliament who did not share his political views the kind of courtesies which I think are proper and I want him to know that I appreciate what he said.

I neglected to say to the minister on that occasion what I should like to say to him in this committee now, namely that I am sure the records of the department will show that the former member for Essex West, the late Donald Brown, played a great part in arranging under the former administration for the planning which came to fruition with the completion of this addition. I am not taking credit away from anyone who is contemporary, but I do think that in fairness to the memory of that very active public servant and member of parliament, the citizens of Windsor and Essex county generally would appreciate a word in recognition of what he had done with regard to the extension to the post office in Windsor.

However, I rise at this time primarily to ask the minister to give consideration to a matter which I have raised from year to year, and that is the desirability now of giving consideration to the establishment of a post office building in one of the thriving communities of the constituency I have the honour to represent. I refer to the community known as Belle Riviere. That community lies along the shore of lake St. Clair. It has a volume of business now and an importance in the county generally which, I think, warrant special consideration being given to it. I hope the minister will find my words today—words which paid him a tribute which I combined with my request—something of an inspiration to accept the proposal I am asking him to recognize. I hope he will use his good offices with the Minister of Public Works and recommend to him the desirability of building a post office in Belle Riviere.

While he is doing that, as I think he will, I would ask him also to give consideration to the desirability of establishing a post office building now in the township of Sandwich East in Essex county which has assumed by virtue of the increase in the population an importance which I am sure the records of the department will confirm. These are matters which do not seemingly have the importance of some of the subjects which the minister was discussing today but I can assure the hon. gentleman that they are matters of considerable importance in the communities to which I have referred.

I close what I have to say by observing that I thought the minister was a little harsh on the hon. member for St. Denis. I do not think this house suffers from the good humour of the hon. gentleman from St. Denis. I think he has served in this chamber as a very constructive critic of the important department of government over which the hon. gentleman presides. I do not think the minister should be too touchy. He should not resent the kind of criticism which comes from the hon. gentleman, generally with a smile and a touch of humour which has endeared him to all members. After all, the hon. member for St. Denis is a distinguished member of this house. He has been a member of this parliament since 1935 and anyone who has had the long period of public service that he has had certainly qualifies for the succession in a year or so following the next federal election. I have no right to say who the next postmaster general will be in the next Liberal government but I would suspect from the contributions which the hon. member for St. Denis has made that he would have a very strong claim by virtue of his distinguished record as a critic of the Post Office Department during the time the hon. gentleman has been Postmaster General and during the time the present government has been in office.

I hope the Postmaster General, before he leaves that post either to become deputy minister or upon the resignation of the present administration, will take steps to have a post office built by the shores of lake St. Clair in Belle Riviere and also to establish the kind of building in Sandwich East which I think the situation warrants. When the opening of the post office in Belle Riviere takes place and the opening of the post office building in Sandwich East takes place, as I suspect will occur, I not only hope but know that the Postmaster General will extend to me, in the opening of these buildings, the same courtesy which he so generously extended the other day when he visited the city of Windsor.

Mr. Chambers: Now that the hon. member has started so well perhaps he would like to mention the rest of the cabinet that he proposes to bring in.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As we are dealing with each department of government I will be very glad to mention them.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the Postmaster General listened with a great deal of interest and concern to the comments made by the hon. member for Essex East, but I hope in the interests of the citizens of Windsor and area he will not be influenced by the remarks made by that hon. member regarding the next election.

At page 3221 of Hansard for March 22, the Acting Secretary of State gave an answer to a question I had asked. The question was:

1. How many days elapsed between the mailing of Hansard from the Queen's printer and the day to which the mailed Hansard applies?
2. By what class of mail is Hansard mailed?
3. What is the length of time that it takes for Hansard when mailed from the Queen's printer to travel to Vancouver?

The Secretary of State answered as follows:

1. One working day.
2. Third class.
3. Normally three and a half or four and a half days.

I have since that time received communications from individuals who subscribe to Hansard regarding the time it takes for Hansard to reach them.

I received one letter from Captain Baker, a Canadian citizen who, for reasons of health, is living in San Diego, California. He said he noticed the question and answer appearing in Hansard and felt that he should supply me with some information in this regard. The letter is dated April 17, and he mentions that 6 days previous, which would be April 11, he made an examination at his local post office and found that one copy of Hansard reached him 21 days after it was printed. He said that the assistant postmaster came right to his home with a bundle of four copies of Hansard which had just arrived. He informed me that, together with the assistant postmaster, they opened them and tagged the covers which they mailed to Washington so that the officials there could make an appraisal regarding the United States postal system. I mention this as an example of the long period of time which elapses between Hansard being printed and delivered. I think hon. members will agree that 21 days is a rather long time for mail originating in Ottawa to be delivered in San Diego.

I received another letter from a Mr. B. L. Cope of Roberts Creek, British Columbia. Roberts Creek is a few miles north along the coast from Vancouver. This individual also subscribes to Hansard and noticed the question and answer. He listed in his letter a number of dates of Hansard and the time that elapsed between printing and delivery to him at Roberts Creek. The copies of Hansard mentioned are from March 1 to March 23, inclusive. I do not know that it would be in order for me to read the tabulation as it appears in the letter but I would be happy to do so or make it available to the minister. In any event this tabulation shows that one copy of Hansard took five days to reach him, five copies took six days, three copies took seven days, four copies took eight days, one took nine days, two copies took ten days, and one took 11 days. I feel this information is at great variance to that given by the Acting Secretary of State in reply to my question. If one allows even a day or two more than the four and a half days, as suggested in that answer, that is still a reasonable length of time, but an eight to 11 days' time lapse does not indicate efficient operation on the part of postal services.

I might mention that the gentleman in San Diego indicated also that some copies of Hansard had taken nine and 12 days to reach him. I would suggest that the information I have presented would warrant a thorough examination of the postal system on the part of the Postmaster General particularly in regard to the delivery of Hansard. I would also suggest that this situation exists in respect of other classes of mail.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I had completed my initial comments about the two letters I had received concerning the delivery of Hansard through the mail and the long delay which exists in transporting Hansard from the Queen's printer to the subscriber through the postal system. I am sure the minister will take a look at this matter even though I know he has had a number of letters from interested individuals which apparently have resulted in no great speeding up in the delivery of Hansard through the mail.

I should like to raise another matter at this time in which I am sure each member of the committee has a personal interest. I refer to the franking privilege of members so far as the receipt of mail free of charge is concerned. During the time that the house is in session there is no difficulty, of course, but people do get into the habit of sending their mail to members without stamps. I am sure that other members as well as myself receive letters during the recess which do not have postage affixed on them and this results in double postage occasionally having to be paid. While I am not advocating the wholesale use of the frank from any post office in Canada throughout the year, I think that members' incoming mail should at least be transported free of charge during the time that the house is in recess. I understand this is a statutory matter and that an amendment to the legislation would be required. However, I think it would be a most welcome move if the minister would undertake to take this small step and thus save at least some members of parliament the few pennies in double postage that they have to pay from time to time.

I have another comment or two I should like to make. One has to do with a stamp album which I have not seen myself but which was described to me in the most glowing terms by a stamp collector. He received it as a gift from a friend who had travelled on the mainland of China. Apparently these albums are made available to philatelists through the postal system in Peking; at least that is where he said his friend obtained it. I would not attempt to describe it as he described it to me but apparently he felt it was a most worth-while type of album in that it was well prepared, was beautifully coloured and the inside pages did not provide for the usual arrangement of affixing stamps by gummed tabs but rather contained a series of folded plastic holders with slits in which stamps could be inserted and from which they could be removed without the risk of injuring the stamps in removing tabs. I think this is something which might be examined by the Post Office Department to see whether or not a similar type of service could not be provided to stamp collectors through the philatelic branch of the department. After all, attempts are made by this branch to see that first day of issue stamps and so on are made available to stamp collectors and the branch also looks after block sales of stamps to collectors. I think the service they render might be extended to the provision of albums of the sort I have described which would certainly be acceptable to those who collect stamps now and those who may take up the hobby in the future.

I have examined the report of the Postmaster General for the year ended March 31, 1960, and there are two or three questions I should like to pose to the minister with respect to the statement of revenue receipts found on page 42 of the report. I find that the income from the sale of meter and register impressions is almost equal to the income from the sale of postage stamps. In the case of postage stamps the total is $83.9 million in round figures and for meter and register impressions the total is $78.3 million.

I have not had occasion to look at past reports of the department but I am quite sure the income from the sale of meter and register impressions has been increasing substantially over the last few years because the use of postage meters has been increasing. I pose this thought to the minister, and I am sure this is a subject that will interest his colleague sitting next to him, the Minister of Justice, in that it may have some connection with operations under the Combines Investigation Act.

I am not sure of this, but I have been told that there is only one company in Canada, namely Pitney-Bowes, which makes and rents postage meters. I may be incorrect in that, but that is the information I have been given. If such is the case, it would appear to be obvious that Pitney-Bowes is in a monopoly position in so far as the manufacture and rental of postage meters is concerned. The rental arrangements which Pitney-Bowes enters into, of course, are based generally upon the amount of postage which goes through the meter. If Pitney-Bowes is the only firm in Canada which manufactures and rents postage meters or if it is the major firm and by virtue of its size has a monopoly in the field, then I feel some extensive investigation should be made to make certain the operations of this company do not contravene the provisions of the combines act or that the users of these meters are not overcharged.

If the minister has knowledge as to whether or not the Pitney-Bowes firm has a monopoly in this field, I would greatly appreciate a statement from him on the matter and also with respect to whether or not the department, either itself or in conjunction with the combines investigation branch, has made any inquiry into this particular aspect. Perhaps following that statement we may be able to discuss the matter to a larger extent, if not now then when the estimates of the Department of Justice are being considered.

There is another item on page 42 of the report under the statement of revenues and receipts which I should like to discuss. Toward the end of the item "receipts", there is an item "return on investments" which, during the fiscal year 1958-59 amounted to $10.9 thousand and for the year 1959-60 amounted to only $8.7 thousand. There has been a decrease in the return on investments. I should like to know what is the amount of the investment on which this particular return is received. Where does the money come from that is so invested, and in what securities is it invested? What is the interest rate that is payable on this investment?

I think those are a few of the items upon which I seek information. I realize the subjects are rather scattered but perhaps the minister, either now or later on, will obtain this information for me. Perhaps I should resume my seat at this time.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Perhaps I could deal with some of the points that have been raised until now, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Essex East was kind enough to indicate to us at least two points in his riding where he would like new buildings. We will be glad to have a look at these situations. I think perhaps the pleasant time we had in Windsor is an incentive to have him help us open new buildings, and I hope that similar arrangements will continue for some time to come.

The hon. member for Skeena referred to delays in the mailing of Hansard. While I have taken great pride in the operations of the department generally, I have always been very careful to point out that we are not perfect. It is very easy, I think, for any members of this house to bring forward specific instances of delayed mail. We like to know about these things. I would ask hon. members to let us know whenever they find an instance of mail being delayed.

We will certainly follow up this particular situation, although I might say if the situation is the one I think it is I have had a good deal of correspondence from this particular gentleman who resides outside of Vancouver. He is quite elderly and pays great attention to detail, but we do not always find the situation is exactly as it was represented. However, we will follow up this particular situation.

Franking, of course, as the hon. member pointed out is a statutory matter. We can have a look at the suggestion which he made, but it would certainly require a change in the act. In so far as supplying albums is concerned, I would say right away that this is not a very attractive proposition so far as we are concerned. Our policy for our philatelic section has been to stay away from anything which competes directly in the commercial field. We do sell stamps because, after all, we do produce them. There is no appeal in entering the field of selling postage stamp albums and a number of such items in competition with private firms.

I put some information on the record this afternoon regarding Pitney-Bowes. There are a number of other firms in Canada that have postage meters available for rent and, in some cases, for sale. I believe I listed five such firms. We are delighted at any time to license anyone who manufactures a postage meter that meets our primary requirement, that is ensuring that the postage involved is protected and there is no possibility of fraud or loss. Pitney-Bowes, however, is the major operator in this field beyond any doubt. Beyond that, however, I think the hon. member suggested that he deal with the matter on the estimates of the Department of Justice and on behalf of my colleague the Minister of Justice, I take that item as notice.

Finally, the hon. member asked about the item "return on investments". This, of course, is an unusual item. Some government departments, but not too many, have investments. Many years ago the department, in cooperation with the postmasters across Canada, set up a postmasters' guarantee fund or a post office guarantee fund, I think, would be the proper term. This replaced what had previously been the situation under which postal employees and postmasters were bonded in various ways. The fund was derived originally from moneys assessed against people employed in the Post Office Department, primarily postmasters I would think although it was a fairly general assessment, but since 1919 no contributions have been required. At that time the fund had grown to approximately $300,000 and it was considered sufficient to meet any claims which might be made against it. The claims, of course, arise from defalcations on the part of individual postal employees who have been entrusted with sums of money.

We do not have at the moment any detailed list of the investments of this fund. However, if my memory serves me rightly, they are all government bonds of varying maturities and whatever interest is being paid on them is paid to the Post Office Department as such. I am delighted to say that the fund is increasing a little bit each year because of the fact that not too many claims are made against it owing to the honesty of our postal employees.

I might just mention in passing that this is a little item about which the Auditor General writes me periodically because he would like to see all the money nicely gathered into one central fund. We have stood firm on this matter, and so far have done so successfully, because we take the position that this money was contributed originally by postal employees and that we are not going to turn it over to one central fund. We want to maintain it separately because it is in their interests so to do.

Mr. Howard: I should just like to follow this matter along a bit, if I may, thanks to the graciousness of my colleagues. With respect to the delay in the mailing of Hansard, may I say that it was not a specific instance that was referred to me in this letter but rather a number of instances, as I have said, the ones he listed ranging from March 1 to March 23, inclusive. There are therefore perhaps 10 or 15 specific instances in which the times for the mailing of Hansard took longer than the normal three and a half days to four and a half days as announced by the Acting Secretary of State. However, as the minister said he would have a review made of this matter I will certainly give him the particulars that are contained in the letter so that they may be available to him.

I understand that the Post Office Department is also in the banking business and that it thereby competes with private industry in connection with savings and providing a service in that field. That does not seem to be too compatible with the idea of not wanting to compete in the commercial field in so far as stamp albums are concerned.

The minister mentioned the Pitney-Bowes Company as being the major company or, I think he said, by far the major company in the field of providing postage meters. I must apologize for not having been here at the time he mentioned the names earlier this afternoon. I wonder whether it would be possible for his department to provide information that would indicate the percentage of the market, as it were, that Pitney-Bowes and these other companies have in Canada, or whether it is possible to obtain that information in order that we may see how major Pitney-Bowes is in this particular field.

I shall pose a question to the minister with respect to outgoing mails as they are handled by the railway system. Again I have been told—and I have not had a chance to check on the matter—that outgoing mails are sent alternately via C.N.R. and C.P.R. from those communities which are serviced by those two railways when such mail is going to other communities which are also serviced by the same two railways. Otherwise the rail mail is shipped via the system which will go to that place if it is in fact served by only one railway. I wonder whether I have a correct understanding of the system, namely that the mail travels on alternate days or alternately anyway as between the two railroads in the circumstances I mentioned.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The short question to this answer is no. There may very well be occasions on which the railways will have schedules that vary from day to day, perhaps a train which runs on Tuesday and Thursday, and there may be a different routing of that mail on the different days in order to make connections. I think a crossword puzzle, compared with the work of the transportation division, is very simple indeed because of the difficulty in connecting one link in moving mail with another. But basically, if a train is running regularly each day it is our practice to ship all the mail that is available by that train day after day. We do not alternate from one railroad line to another merely for the sake of alternating.

Mr. Tardif: I am a little bit embarrassed tonight because I want to ask the minister for a service and I want to criticize the department. I do not know whether it is best to criticize the department and ask for the service afterwards or to ask for the service first and to criticize afterwards. I do not know which procedure will be the most effective.

Mr. Grafftey: Get to the point and save time. Be brief, whatever you do.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member should listen.

Mr. Tardif: I hope I shall be able to make these remarks without having to listen to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi blowing his horn.

Mr. Grafftey: Brevity has its charms. I thought I would let the hon. member know.

Mr. Tardif: The hon. member for St. Denis, when he made his remarks on the administration of the Post Office Department said that the minister was a brilliant one or rather, if I may correct myself, that the minister had made a brilliant report. The hon. member for Port Arthur said that it was not necessary for the minister to have his advisers at the table in front of him in order to make it possible for him to have his budget carried by the committee. I must admit that he is extremely efficient. In respect of some of the questions that he does not want to answer or for which he does not have the answer he says, "I will send it to you by mail". I think there are a great many questions that were asked here this afternoon the answers to which I would have preferred to get here rather than in the letter that is going to be sent to the hon. member who asked the question, inasmuch as it will probably be marked private and confidential and we shall probably never get to know what the answer is.

It is possible that the minister does not need his advisors in front of him in order to carry his budget in the committee. However, I think he should have some advisors in front of him when it comes to the matter of employer-employee relations. There is a low morale amongst the employees of the Post Office Department. I know the minister will probably deny that. Many of the employees who are not pleased with the treatment that they are getting in the departmen do not wish to make official complaints.

An hon. Member: That was prior to the raise.

Mr. Tardif: That was prior to the raise. As a matter of fact they thought the raise was too long in coming. I do not think that the minister did any bodily harm to any of these fellows but I think he tried to worry them to death because he kept them waiting for two years. It lowered the morale of the department considerably. If the minister had taken the advice of the senior employees of the department I am sure that problem would have been settled before the expiration of two years.

As far as his personal administration is concerned and as far as he is responsible for making policy for the department I do not think there is so much to brag about when at the end of the year there is going to be a deficit of $9 million. It was, therefore, not in order to eliminate the possibility of a deficit that he kept the employees waiting two years. I think it was because the minister himself is of the opinion that he can run the Post Office Department without any assistance. All the employees of the Post Office Department who are trying to maintain the reputation which that department had prior to this present administration taking office, would perform their tasks in a much easier manner and would feel a great deal better about the situation, if the requests that they make for adjustments or the complaints they make with regard to working conditions were listened to and problems were solved much more quickly. I do not know whether the contagious habit of postponing decisions has affected the minister or whether the minister has affected the cabinet. For some reason or other a great many of these problems that should be solved are postponed and there is altogether too much procrastination.

This is what the employees of the Post Office Department have been complaining about. They are not complaining openly because they are afraid of retaliation. I do not mean retaliation in the sense that they will lose their jobs, but retaliation in the sense that they will not get the promotion to which they are entitled, or the next time they ask for an adjustment in salary, instead of having to wait two years they may have to wait longer.

Mr. Grafftey: We do not behave like the Liberal government. Things have changed.

Mr. Tardif: There is a boat in the canal again. I do not think anybody on this side of the house objects to mechanization. I was quite impressed by the statement of the minister that mechanization will not cause any post office employees to lose their jobs.

I know that mechanization is inevitable; we are going to have it. While it may not cause any of the present employees of the Post Office Department to lose their jobs, I am very much afraid that it will prevent other people from obtaining jobs which they should obtain. While mechanization should be gone into, I think it should not be gone into at an accelerated rate, but step by step so as to cause the least possible concern to the present employees of the Post Office Department and so as to bring about a partial solution to our present unemployment problem.

I think an employee or officer of the department should be appointed as a public relations officer. I do not mean a public relations officer to effect liaison with the people served by the Post Office Department, but with the people who serve the post office, the employees of the department.

I do not say that the minister does these things willingly. He is probably too busy. However, if there were an officer of that type to advise him, or if he were to listen to the senior officers of the department I am sure this would benefit not only the employees of the department but all the citizens of Canada.

I do not want the minister to forget what I have said, and I want him to clearly remember what I am now going to say.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You have not said anything worth remembering.

Mr. Tardif: The people of the town of Eastview have repeatedly asked for a post office. Eastview is a town of 25,000 people and I think they are entitled to this type of service. I have received many representations on this matter, the last one being from the Eastview board of trade, and I am told that no other town in Canada of this size is without a post office.

I urge most strongly upon the minister that he include a post office for the town of Eastview in the plans of the department this year. The people of Eastview feel they are being discriminated against as far as postal service is concerned. It is a town of 25,000 inhabitants as I said. Even if they are in close proximity to the city of Ottawa, it is very inconvenient at the moment for the people who live in Eastview to obtain in the city of Ottawa the type of service they require.

A post office in the town of Eastview would not considerably increase the deficit of the Post Office Department. I know the minister will take this matter into serious consideration and I hope this project will be accomplished without too much delay.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, at one time the city of Arthabaska, of which I am the humble representative as member for Drummond-Arthabaska, had as a resident the greatest statesman Canada has ever known, Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

There is in that city a post office of a very special character in that it is topped by an historic clock which the population wishes to keep as a souvenir of the good old days, of the years of prosperity and of pleasant memories.

I was told recently that it had been decided not to undertake certain repairs to the clock and to the belfry of that post office. I am told that the hands of the clock are gone, that the glass is broken, in a word that it needs a complete overhaul. On behalf of the citizens of the cities of Arthabaska and Victoriaville, and of the Arthabaska riding, I ask the Postmaster General whether he could not use $50 to $200 of his budget to make the necessary repairs and thus preserve that memento of the old days.

The city of Victoriaville will celebrate this year the centenary of its foundation and, in order to enhance the beauty of the city, we would like that clock to be repaired in order to show that the Conservative government is still functioning.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I asked a question to the Postmaster General and I should like to get an answer.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The question of clocks in post offices is of course a matter for the Department of Public Works. I will draw it to the attention of my colleague.

(Translation):

We shall do all we can so that the clock will work better in the future than it has in the past.

(Text):

The Chairman: Shall vote 308 carry?

Item agreed to.

309. Operations including salaries and other expenses of staff post offices, district offices, railway mail service staffs, and supplies, equipment and other items for revenue post office, including administration, $121,039,796.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman. I do not wish to delay the passage of this item. I know the Postmaster General is anxious to have the item passed. However, I do want to support the remarks made this afternoon by my colleague the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. My colleague raised the question of a minimum salary for revenue postmasters. The Postmaster General pointed out that a minimum wage was already in effect, and I think he told us it was based on the volume of work carried out by the postmaster.

When the Postmaster General introduced his estimates the other day, in reply to a question I asked he said there had been a general increase in the salaries paid to revenue postmasters. I wish to make one observation and ask one or two questions in this connection.

The observation I wish to make is that "salary" does not seem to be a correct description of the payments to these revenue postmasters. It would have been a correct description a few years ago, but as I understand it, what the postmaster receives now could be more properly described as remuneration. It could more properly be described as remuneration because it includes not only a payment for his services but also an allowance for the provision of accommodation, fuel, lighting, maintenance, cleaning and other janitorial services.

In this connection I should point out to the Postmaster General that if this remuneration is based on the volume of work carried out, that is fine for the postmaster who has the post office located in his own residence or in some building of which he is the owner. However, in the case where the postmaster does not own the building, or where it is not in his own house and he has to pay rent being paid in accordance with the volume of work he carries out. He receives just the for the post office accommodation, he is not same payment as the man who handles the same amount of traffic and who can keep all the remuneration for himself because he owns the building in which the post office is housed.

The person who does not own the post office building and who handles exactly the same volume of work has to pay part of his remuneration to somebody else for renting the post office accommodation. That means an inequality in connection with people who are rendering the same service.

I wish to ask the Postmaster General a question, and perhaps he would prefer to reply by letter. I will not press him for a reply at the moment. The Postmaster General knows that in Newfoundland we have a special situation where the postmaster's salary is made up of two components one paid by the Post Office Department and the other by the Canadian National Telegraphs. In addition the question is still further complicated in that some of these salaries are subject to a ceiling and, I think, have been subsidized by both the post office and the C.N.T. In such cases any increases which may have been made in their pay would not be increases in fact because they would merely mean a reduction in the subsidies. Thus, the postmasters in this category will not be any better off.

I believe there are other cases where increases would only serve to lower the payments of the C.N.T. though I am not perfectly sure. The question I want to ask the minister is whether he would at some time let me have the number of post offices where the postmasters have not benefited at all from these increases. I should like him to tell me also what the minimum remuneration is at the present time and whether the increase was a straight across-the-board increase, and what the percentage rate of increase amounted to.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The minimum salary for revenue postmasters at the present time is $245 per year for our smallest post offices. The increase which we gave the revenue postmasters was practically the same for all the grades although there were some variations to take account of certain special circumstances. Everything was rounded out to the nearest $5, as I remember.

Mr. Carter: And the approximate rate?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The approximate rate is slightly higher, I think, than the average of the increases which have been granted to postal clerks. It has always been our practice to increase our revenue postmasters on the same basis as civil servants. There will always be circumstances which will vary cases but this is the practice we have followed in this case.

(Translation):

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two questions to put to the minister. Could he tell us how much per hour is being paid to casual or intermittent employees? The other question is: Is the same wage paid to both men and women?

[Mr. Carter.]

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Would the hon. member tell me once again to what category of employees he is referring?

Mr. Lessard: Casual or intermittent employees.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I will get the answer with respect to our temporary employees in a moment and give it to the hon. member.

Mr. Batten: Could I ask the minister how the revenue postmasters in small post offices in Newfoundland are paid? Are they paid by the month or bi-monthly, or is the period, in some instances, longer?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No. We are rather proud of this. For many years revenue postmasters across Canada have been paid on a monthly basis. That has not been very satisfactory to them. They have pressed us for payment twice a month. Within the last year we have been able to put the process on one of our machines and the result is that most of the revenue postmasters across Canada now receive pay cheque twice a month. In the case of postmasters in Newfoundland—and perhaps this has led to the hon. member raising his question—they are still on a once a month basis because we have been introducing this change gradually, province by province. I believe that in the next two or three months they also will be receiving their cheques on a twice monthly basis.

Mr. Deschatelets: Has the minister any answer to the question asked by the hon. member for St. Ann?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): It is on its way. My memory of the present figure or the figure which will very shortly be in effect is that with respect to our part-time employees, those who are paid on an hourly basis and sort mail in a city such as Montreal, it would be in the neighbourhood of $1.70 an hour. It is the exact equal of a postal clerk's pay.

Mr. Loiselle: Did the minister say $1.70 an hour?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is my memory of the figure and I am sure it is right.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the minister say if the same salary rate applies to women and casual workers? I should like the minister to check because I am under the impression that his information is wrong.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): An adjustment has been made there. Perhaps there is some misunderstanding but I think the class of worker about which the hon.

member is asking are those people who come in between four and five in the afternoon and on the basis of three or four hours a night work to handle the mail during peak periods. The principle which applies is that these people are paid on the same basis as permanent civil servants who would be doing the same class of work except, of course, that they would be paid on an hourly basis rather than on a weekly or monthly basis.

Mr. Denis: I am told that this afternoon the hon. gentleman made some comments about a speech I had delivered earlier in this debate, and that in the course of those comments he described some of the assertions I had made as absolutely wrong. Well, I may have been wrong in some instances, I agree with him, but I have been reported as having said that the increase in parcel post revenue would amount to $22 million. That is not what I said. I said that the revenue from the parcel post service was $22 million this year. As a matter of fact a few months ago I put a question on the order paper seeking that information.

If hon. members take into account the increase to be expected from the new rate, if they add to that the revenue from the new high rate on United States periodicals; if they add to that this increase in third class rates the total increase will amount, I said, to an increase of about 90 per cent. That prediction may be wrong. Only the result next year will tell us whether the revenue of the parcel post branch has increased 90 per cent, or more, or less. Even the Postmaster General himself acknowledged that an increase of at least 44 per cent could be expected. But this 44 per cent increase would apply only in certain instances. If you live in Newfoundland and mail a parcel to the Yukon the increase in the rate is not as high as it is for parcels mailed to an adjacent province. The majority of parcels mailed are addressed to a destination in the same or an adjacent province. I realize that the majority of revenue received from parcel post service is derived in respect of those areas where the increased rate is 44 per cent.

According to a schedule I have, a parcel weighing 15 pounds mailed in one province to a destination in the same province within 20 miles would cost 255 per cent more than before the increase. The percentage of increase is higher when the parcel is mailed to a destination further than 20 miles, and increases proportionately. A parcel mailed in Hull to be delivered in Aylmer, which is within 20 miles, cost 38 cents before this increase. This category has been abolished and no longer represents a gift from the Postmaster General. The regular price now being paid in that situation is $1.25. If that parcel were mailed from Ottawa to Aylmer or Hull, originating in one province for delivery in another, the rate is $1.64 instead of 38 cents. That represents an increase of 331 per cent.

In view of the circumstances I have outlined, how can the Postmaster General declare that the average increase is only 44 per cent? I presume that is the average, because of the fact that the increase in rate in respect of parcels mailed to the Yukon represents only 13 per cent. To that extent the increase supports the contention of the Postmaster General. However, the majority of parcels I mail from Ottawa or Hull are for delivery within a 100-mile radius and the increase in rate is much higher. In this case the percentage of increase supports what I have said.

The Postmaster General then made a few remarks in regard to the complaint that there was no French version of the pamphlet entitled "Letter Perfect". I have not suggested that there was no French version but said rather that I had not received the French version and would suggest that I should have in view of the fact that I speak French better than English.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Your English is very good.

Mr. Denis: I feel the Postmaster General should have sent me a French version of this pamphlet. I would not suggest that both a French and English copy should have been printed but feel that a saving would have resulted in printing the French and English versions in the same pamphlet. As I said before, of the 24 pages in this pamphlet there were only eight pages of text with the rest blank or containing pictures.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I want to say at once that I agree with the hon. member completely. We should have sent him a French version of this booklet. His English is so completely fluent, as hon. members know, I am sure the English version presented no problem. None the less, one of the standing instructions in my department, and in fact generally throughout the government, is that when a member or a correspondent is French-speaking we deal with him "dans sa propre langue maternelle". This was an error and I apologize to the hon. member as well as any other French-speaking member in this committee who experienced this situation. I will take the necessary action in my own department to see that this type of careless action does not happen again.

I would mention very briefly in regard to the parcel post rates that the hon. member will know that the new rates are still nicely below the express rates. As he has said, a complicated schedule which has hundreds of rates varying in degree is a wonderful thing to argue about because he can choose that which supports his case while I can choose that which supports my case. If he agrees that the average increase is 44 per cent across the board then we are not too far apart. If we began to dig out individual rates this evening we would be here too long.

I would like to say to the hon. member finally that I have enjoyed tremendously the exchanges I have had with him in respect to the Post Office Department during the last three or four years. We have not always agreed and perhaps I have been a little harsh on one or two occasions, but I certainly have appreciated his interest. I hope that remark does not encourage him to go on for the rest of the night.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Just a word, Mr. Chairman, about the minister's contention that there were less thefts than the previous year. I quoted figures: 813—

(Text):

I was referring to everything in the Postmaster General's report. I did not mention that amount only in regard to what he said. This may include break-ins this year and last year. It is the whole picture I referred to at that time.

Mr. Deschatelets: I would like to ask the Postmaster General a question regarding electronic sorting machines—coders and sorters. Would the minister kindly inform the committee if an order has been placed with Canadair in regard to these machines?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No, very definitely not at the present time. I would not expect any production order will be placed for these machines for some time yet.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the minister be kind enough to inform us how many of these installations he is planning to make?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is not an easy question to answer. Using the information we have regarding other postal operations, and the application of the output of these machines, in round terms I would anticipate they would be of principal value in perhaps 10 to 15 offices in Canada. It is an interesting fact that by far the larger portion of all Canadian mail originates in 10 to 15 offices in Canada.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: We have now completed the estimates of the Postmaster General.

[Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace).]

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

279. Departmental administration including Canada's share of the expenses of the "Resources for Tomorrow" conference, $1,105,390.

Mr. Deschatelets: Does the minister have a statement to make before we study these estimates?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Chairman, from time to time it has been my privilege in this committee to consider the estimates of this department as well as the estimates of other departments from the position of a member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. More recently it has been my privilege to take part in these important parliamentary discussions as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. On the first occasion I might be regarded as having been on the giving end of the firing line while on the second occasion I was in the second echelon as far as the receiving end is concerned. Tonight I find myself in the front line of parliamentary action for the first time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Which do you like best?

Mr. Dinsdale: The hon. member for Essex East has inquired which I like best. I shall let him have that answer following the completion of my estimates. Perhaps in about an hour's time I will be able to supply him with the answer.

There is no need to go into detail by way of a preliminary statement on these important estimates. My predecessor, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, on three previous occasions has had the privilege of guiding the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources through the House of Commons. I have reviewed the record of those debates and discussions and I am sure all members will agree that the pattern has been well established for the recent progress that has been made in all the multitudinous and multifarious activities of the department.

Then, too, I must mention the fact that unfortunately we are not able to have with us tonight the hon. member for Mackenzie River who has taken part in these discussions in a knowledgeable way during past years. As hon. members know, the hon. member for Mackenzie River has had a very serious illness extending over a long period of time, and I am sure we all regret his absence tonight and wish for him a speedy recovery. However, we do have another genuine northerner with us tonight, the hon. member for Yukon. He is the only hon. member able to be present tonight representing that great area of Canada north of the 60th parallel which constitutes 40 per cent of Canada's land area and he will carry the main burden and responsibility for bringing all the pertinent problems before members of the committee.

I came to this portfolio less than six months ago and during the intervening time I have been busily engaged in making myself acquainted with the functions of the department in Ottawa as well as with the departmental officials and personnel here in Ottawa. I am very happy to inform members of the committee that during that time I have had the opportunity of meeting every member at work in the department here in Ottawa. That alone is a formidable task. I am not sure of the exact number of personnel in Ottawa but I understand it is approximately 700.

More recently I have visited the territory itself, having travelled in the Yukon during the Christmas recess and in the Northwest Territories during the Easter recess, and within two weeks I hope to be able to have a bird's-eye view of the important area of the north that we call the eastern Arctic or the Canadian archipelago. When I have completed this itinerary I will have had personal contact with the people in places that until recently were almost unknown in the southern part of Canada but which because of the upsurge in activity in recent years are rapidly becoming household words in the Canadian nation.

By way of introduction, I should like to make a brief reference to the administrative responsibility of the minister of this department. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources consists of an administration services branch and five operating branches. There are important interrelationships between these five operating branches. As members look through the blue book of estimates they may find some difficulty in finding any apparent interrelationship with respect to some of the branches that come under the general heading of northern affairs and national resources. It is true that there are some dissimilarities in the objectives, aims and activities of the national museum, for example, and those of the water resources branch or the national parks branch on the one hand and the northern administration branch on the other. Similarly, the Canadian government travel bureau would at first glance appear to bear little real relationship to other areas of the department's work. Yet it seems clear that activities designed to assist such an important resource-based industry as tourism have an appropriate place in the national resources department.

Having called attention to the great diversity in the work of these five interrelated branches, it seems to me it would make for more orderly discussion if I did not attempt in this opening statement to go into any detail with respect to the various branches. I shall therefore restrict myself to a few general observations on the department as a whole, particularly in relation to the votes shown under departmental administration, of which there are four. If it is the wish of the committee I will be glad to make statements on each of the five branches as the appropriate items are reached. I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I am entirely in the hands of the committee in this respect. It might be that members of the committee in their general statements might touch on points that I would otherwise have considered, which I think will obviate the necessity of repetition on my part.

Hon. members will note that the department's estimates for the coming year total nearly $84 million compared with some $88½ million last year when the various supplementary items for 1960-61 are included. Comparisons between the two years, however, are somewhat misleading since last year's estimates included an amount of nearly $7½ million for the forestry branch which is now a part of the new Department of Forestry. It is evident, therefore, that instead of a decrease of $4½ million there is in fact an increase of about $3 million over the previous year when the forestry figures are excluded.

It seems to me that one of the most important developments of recent years in this department was the government's decision to give greater recognition to the importance of the forest-based industries in the Canadian economy by the creation of a separate full-time ministry. This is in line, of course, with the emphasis on national development which was so clearly set before the committee on previous occasions by my predecessor in this office. I should like to pay tribute to Dr. Harrison, the deputy minister of forestry, and his colleagues for the excellent work they have done over the years as an important part of my department, and also to Dr. Prebble and his associates from the former forest biology division of the Department of Agriculture. So far as I am concerned, my contact with these gentlemen was in the form of a hail and farewell because they were already in the process of transition when I took over the portfolio. Already there is evidence that these men, under the leadership of my colleague, the Minister of Forestry, are creating from out of the two units an effective and smooth functioning organization which, in co-operation with the provinces, will more adequately fulfil the federal government's responsibilities in this very important field.

Looking ahead—I must make some reference to this event because of its importance—the most notable event for the department during the coming year will be the resources for tomorrow conference scheduled to take place in Montreal next October. The first item in the estimates, vote No. 279, includes an amount of $80,000, the details of which can be found on page 399 of the blue book, which is the federal share of the expenses for this conference. The provincial governments have agreed to contribute $40,000 which will bring the total budget for the conference to $120,000.

During the course of the session so far certain hon. members have maintained an interest in the plans for this conference as indicated by their questions from time to time on orders of the day. I hope that this interest will continue because I feel that if the success of the conference is going to be assured every hon. member will share some responsibility for publicizing it and making it as widely known in their respective constituencies as possible.

When I was first a member of this house, I can recall that year after year there was an annual call on private members' day for a conference of this kind. At last, the conference is going to become a reality. The hon. member for Port Arthur has been one of the persistent inquirers—I was going to say inquisitors, but I think inquirers is a better word—about this conference. I trust he will have something to say during the discussion of the estimates.

The other day a question was raised about the participants in the conference. I am happy to be able to inform the committee that there will be some 600 persons attending from governments, business, industries, universities and various interested organizations. The conference is long overdue. It is being called to ascertain what is being done across the nation with regard to the management of our renewable resources, the gaps which exist and what should be done in the future to assure wise management of these important resources. Water pollution will be a subject for discussion. Water was once regarded as boundless and plentiful in Canada. In some settled areas of our nation we have been confronted recently by a real problem of polluted waters. Legislation to deal with this matter has already been considered. I refer to the passage of legislation last fall providing assistance to municipalities for the construction of sewage disposal facilities. This is the sort of thing that anticipates what we feel will be the results of the conference.

Another piece of legislation which anticipates what we feel and what we hope will come out of the conference concerns the A.R.D.A. program which is a massive and comprehensive approach to the wise management of our soil and water resources. This bill is still before the house. No doubt there will be much useful and helpful discussion in respect of these important renewable resources. I shall leave the discussion of the resources for tomorrow's conference at that stage and just indicate that the plans are going forward. Perhaps if hon. members have any further questions we can consider them after those questions have been placed before the committee.

Research has been a topic of continuing discussion in Canada, particularly research in the north. Hon. members will notice that the second item in the estimates, vote No. 280, provides for the operation of the northern co-ordination and research centre, including a grant to the Arctic institute of North America and grants in aid for northern research. The act under which the department is established gives the minister of northern affairs the responsibility for co-ordinating federal government activities in the Yukon and Northwest Territories and also for fostering, through scientific investigation, knowledge of the Canadian north and of the means for dealing with conditions related to its further development.

The northern co-ordination and research centre sponsors and conducts research in those areas that are outside the sphere of responsibility of other departments. The increase of $19,780 in this vote is to provide for a modest expansion in the program and meet the increased cost of salaries.

The research program is going forward. There are some who will say that it is not going forward rapidly enough, but I do want to point out to hon. members that there has been a considerable expansion and increase in activity in this important area during recent years.

I think, Mr. Chairman, with these general references to the estimates by way of getting the discussion initiated tonight, I shall resume my place. I could have continued by talking about the progress of our roads to resources program which is covered by vote No. 282. Perhaps I should mention that this program now covers all ten Canadian provinces. In fact, my first formal duty when I became minister was the signing of the agreement with the province of Quebec which completed the national picture for participation in the roads to resources program. The expenditure to date under the roads to resources program is estimated at slightly more than $45 million, and federal payments already made to provinces exceed $20 million. When fully implemented, the program should produce some 4,500 miles of new and important developmental roads in the provinces. At the moment 2,198 miles are under construction and 1,317 miles have been completed. We all recognize that in order to carry forward the program of national development that has been launched, it is necessary to provide access roads to our resources potential.

Before resuming my place I want to repeat that I shall be pleased to reply to general questions on departmental policy on the first vote or to questions of detail on any of these first four items. As I have indicated at the outset of my remarks, I shall be glad also to make short statements on each of the branches as the appropriate items are reached if that is the wish of the committee.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks, I want to congratulate the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Dinsdale) who, today, submits for the first time his department's estimates to the house. I must tell him that his statement made a very favourable impression because he has shown that great quality, humility. Some humility is, indeed, restful after that slight shortcoming we so often encountered in his predecessor.

The minister may be assured that we shall be extremely pleased to co-operate with him in the discussion of his estimates.

As this discussion may be divided in five general parts, I think we may save some time and achieve the same ends if, whenever one of those five parts is called, the minister were willing to make a statement, and, following this, we could ask him all questions we should think appropriate.

Mr. Chairman, I also thank the minister for mentioning the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie), whom sickness keeps away from this house.

We particularly appreciate the recognition of his talent by the minister. Indeed we all remember how he shared with us his considerable knowledge of the northern areas, of their population and geographical conditions.

May I recall a gesture which I found very typical of the hon. member. At the opening of parliament in 1958, he came in dressed in his parka and the traditional garb of those living in the district he represents.

The hon. member for Mackenzie River is very proud of his district and he never misses an opportunity of trying to help those people.

Once again, we appreciate that the minister recognizes the great qualities of the hon. member for Mackenzie River who, we hope, will soon be back among us.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that a sum of approximately $3 million above the amount voted last year is provided for the coming year. Now, I wonder whether, in this amount of $82,707.036 which has been introduced today, the minister has taken into account the other sums of money which will be made available for the northern areas by the Departments of National Defence and Public Works and yet another branch which, I think, usually spend some money there.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I must also tell the minister that we want to pay tribute to Mr. Harrison and Mr. Trimble, and their associates, who have served this department so well.

The minister told us about the resources for tomorrow conference which is scheduled to take place in Montreal next fall. I mentioned it myself when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were discussed. The conference will be of national interest, and that for many reasons. Since the elections which took place last June 22 in the province of Quebec we now have a well-disposed government, and that is why the city of Montreal will have the honour of playing host to representatives from all Canadian provinces who will try to lay the plans to stimulate economic expansion in all parts of this country and the development of our resources. As the minister said, our resources are not inexhaustible. And if in certain provinces, like Quebec, for instance, water resources are still plentiful, there are other provinces where certain resources are exhausted.

If I understand correctly, that conference would undertake planning of our natural resources potential for the benefit of this country.

In conclusion, the minister referred to the special research program for these northern regions. I recall that from 1953 to 1957, he gave special attention to all matters related to research, and I think that we should not be afraid to devote to it an increasing part of our national budget, for I believe that we are not giving research the importance given to it by most other countries, especially in northern Europe.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal generally with these estimates.

How can we discuss this department's estimates without referring to the great vision of 1958? We hear less and less about it now. It has become a mirage over the years. We remember the build-up and the high-pressure publicity that accompanied this vision of the north at election time in 1958. That vision was not based on facts, as I will prove in a few moments. It seemed quite funny to us who had been sitting in this house from 1953 to 1957.

May I point out that there was in fact a vision of the north, but that we owed it to the former government, in particular to the former minister who has now become the premier of the province of Quebec. And to prove this statement—I want to state an historic fact—I will refer to the 1955 estimates. I believe the present minister was then a member of the special committee, as I was also. So, I quote from a statement made by the former minister, now premier of the province of Quebec, when we were about to discuss the planning of northern affairs:

As I intimated the other day, we are firmly convinced that there are two fundamental problems in the Canadian north, problems that we have been actively considering since: first, the achievement of its economic development as an integral part of Canada; second, the adjustment of its native people to a new way of life. As I said last Wednesday we have to deal with two main problems; one is economic, the other is human.

In the economic field our policy is to develop the natural resources of the north to the maximum national advantage. The process will involve gainfully occupying more and more natives and attracting people to the north.

And on page 536:

As to water transportation we have had since January preliminary talks with the officers of the Northern Transportation Company, and we will have a further meeting with them next week. We are hopeful of obtaining a fair reduction in rates to and in the north. As to air transportation, the Canadian Pacific Air Lines has now before the air transport board an application for a reduction in their rates to and in the north. We have decided to have a more vigorous policy of road construction. We have already made provision for more road building.

The second problem is the human problem. This is the problem of the natives of the Northwest Territories. The nation as a whole gives them family allowances, old age pensions, and relief when indigent, but the broader need—and they are immediate needs—are health, education and a sound economy.

On page 539, he said:

The provision of more adequate primary education is most urgent in the Mackenzie valley . . . All the hostels to be constructed within the next five years, except one, will be in the Mackenzie valley. The hostels will be constructed by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, which from the first of April this year—this week—will have responsibility for the education of Indians as well as Eskimos in the Northwest Territories. The hostels will be turned over to either the Roman Catholic Church or the Anglican Church for operation (the Indians and Eskimos are almost entirely of one denomination or the other) according to location and the population to be served.

These proposals have been discussed fully with Bishop Marsh of the Church of England and Bishop Trocellier of the Roman Catholic Church. Both agree that it is the program best designed to meet the special needs of the north and to remove difficulties that have been increasing in recent years because of the inadequacy of school facilities in various localities for children of one faith or the other.

The above program will be implemented over a period of six years, with the first unit being started during the coming summer—1955.

And here is the conclusion on page 540:

Mr. Chairman, I have given an outline of our policy to cope with the human problem of economic development in the north. I do not believe our plans lack imagination, vigour or aggressiveness.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I should like to pay tribute to the former minister of this department, who is now premier of the province of Quebec, because I think we should give credit where credit is due.

I repeat, therefore, what I said a moment ago, namely that if there has been a vision for northern affairs, we owe it to the Hon. Jean Lesage. I thought tonight was a very appropriate occasion to pay him this tribute.

In order to substantiate my claim, I shall also say a few words about a brief entitled:

(Text):

"The Yukon Territory. A brief presented to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects".

(Translation):

—under date of November 22, 1955. I do not want, of course, to go into details, but I shall only quote this document: It mentions the following proposed studies.

(Text):

Natural resources; mineral resources and other natural resources.

Population and economic development; population; economic development and future of the mining industry.

Problems of economic development; climate and transportation.

Promotion of future economic development; roads; tax exemptions and water power development.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, still with a view to establishing the merits of my argument, I should like to mention the brief entitled:

(Text):

"The Northwest Territories—Its economic prospects."

(Translation):

—under date of November 22, 1955. I shall list the various studies suggested in this brief:

(Text):

Natural resources; mineral resources; agriculture; forestry; fishing; fur trapping and water power.

Other factors relating to economic development; population; the problems of the native people; economic development and the human problem; climate; transportation and the distribution of governmental responsibilities.

Ways and means of encouraging economic development; a railroad to Great Slave Lake; development roads and air routes to the Arctic.

Mr. Chairman, two briefs were submitted in November 1955, under the previous government, one on the Yukon Territory and the other on the Northwest Territories. Those briefs show not only the interest taken in this matter by the previous government, but also the awareness of this situation and a well defined plan for their development.

Mr. Chairman, since 1958, of course, it is no longer a matter of vision but of consolidating the studies already made. I trust that the minister, who is surely aware of this program of action, will see to it that it is implemented in the best interests of this area and of its inhabitants.

Mr. Chairman, if I understood correctly, these areas are not yet densely populated, far from it. And before we can populate them, it is obviously necessary to lay down a plan for development. Now I believe the most important problem—the minister has touched upon it a moment ago—is that of highways. For in those areas, it is not unusual for two localities to be 200 to 250 miles apart, and everybody admits that in order to develop the fantastic resources of the north, we must have highways. As the previous minister stated before the committee in 1955:

A railway, if possible, when the project is deemed economically feasible.

Before these estimates are disposed of would the minister tell us what specific plan for development the government can put forward as of now, in order to open that area to agriculture and colonization.

I understand that farming is only possible in and around the Mackenzie district and I would like the minister to tell us—

Mr. Tremblay: At the North pole?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Roberval is trying, it seems, to make fun of me. If he is in earnest, I am prepared to stake my seat and prove to him this very night that the Mackenzie area has possibilities as far as farming is concerned. If the hon. member for Roberval is prepared to do the same, I am going to show—

Mr. Tremblay: Are you going to grow cabbages in Baffin Land?

Mr. Deschatelets: For the benefit of the member for Roberval, who is ignorant not only of the problems of the far north but of many others as well, may I tell him that farming is possible in the Mackenzie area for the simple reason that the summer season lasts three months out there. That is the reason.

Mr. Tremblay: In Baffin Land?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, the minister had a word to say about agriculture—

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Order. We got started in an amiable state of mind and I am going to suggest that members on both sides should recognize that the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont has the floor at the present time and that there will be opportunities for others to speak later.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And now, I would like to deal with a rather ticklish problem. The minister is well aware of it, because he answered a question on that point yesterday which had been put to him by the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon). Today's issue of Le Droit contains an item with this caption:

No French.

Eskimos will have to learn English.

Eskimos, including those in Quebec, will have to learn English, according to a statement made in the house Wednesday by the Minister of Northern Affairs and Natural Resources, Mr. Walter Dinsdale.

Mr. Chairman, I would point out that in referring to Eskimos, I did not mention the hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Tremblay: Is there any reference to Mr. Lesage?

Mr. Deschatelets: And the item continues:

The minister explained that the English language is used in the north for business and other relations, and that the government, in order to help the Eskimos to find jobs and manage their own businesses, had decided that English would be the tongue used in its schools.

Mr. Chairman, I understand the minister mentioned various reasons for the present difficult situation, due to differences in religion and the lack of bilingual teachers.

Further on the article has this to say:

Another question asked by Mr. Pigeon dealt with Eskimo schools in Northern Quebec using a textbook entitled "Canada, Our Country" and where the union jack is said to be the Canadian flag.

The minister having considered those questions did answer them yesterday, but I must say that I am not satisfied. As a matter of fact, according to Le Droit he answered as follows:

Mr. Dinsdale said that the book in question had not been approved, that it was not a textbook but merely an ordinary book which was distributed for supplementary reading in a classroom at Sugluk.

Mr. Chairman, a few days ago, the Secretary of State made a speech in Toronto. In that high-flown way of his, he was celebrating the virtues of the two great races which must unite and respect one another; the two great races be treated the same way. After such a lecture, I wonder if the minister would not consider changing his position. I think it is most urgent for his officers and for the minister to give those school children education in both languages, since the Eskimos are Canadian citizens and I think it cannot be tolerated that in one part of the country, particularly in northern Quebec, only the English language be taught in schools.

I urge the minister to look into that matter, to take the necessary steps in order to secure the services of bilingual people so that the young may receive their education in both languages. I urge him also to see to it—since that comes under his jurisdiction—that no books or manuals carry any detailed information that is not according to the historical truth. Of course, we have no Canadian flag and I fail to see why we should give these young people the false impression that the union jack is the symbol of Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have several other questions to put to the minister. I shall put them as we go on with his estimates. But I hope that he will bring us up to date on a matter which I feel is of capital and vital importance, that is northern development. Surely the question is whether under the estimates we are called upon to pass now the government intends to put more emphasis on the construction of a road system. Since it is the first time the minister has introduced his estimates, I would advise him above all to be as bold as he can.

From 1953 to 1957, we developed a program; we opened the way to the north and I think that everyone across the country will approve of a program for the development of that part of the country.

I must say that the amount of money we are asked to vote this year does not lead me to feel that the government puts enough emphasis for next year on the development and the economic expansion of that part of the country. We are disappointed at this lack of boldness. All through the minister's estimates we shall endeavour to put forward suggestions in order that the expansion—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired, unless it is agreed unanimously that he continue.

(Translation):

Mr. Tremblay: No, no, no.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Order. I hear an objection. The hon. member does not have unanimous consent and the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a few words.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Would the hon. member permit a question?

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): The hon. member does not have the floor to yield for a question.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I would have been prepared to allow the hon. member to carry on but I wished to take the opportunity afforded me to say in all frankness to the minister that my colleagues and I are somewhat disappointed in his department, in that the former minister left it and went to the Department of Agriculture. I had hoped, with all respect to the present minister and his wonderful qualities, that we would have been given a new minister in this department with a tremendous amount of drive and flair. The present minister has been in this portfolio for several months so that we can make some judgment now, although certainly an incomplete one, as to whether he has revealed these qualities. This is a point not worth belabouring, but I can say we are still disappointed.

This department has been bisected, to a degree, in that we have the new Department of Forestry. As a result there have been considerable changes, and I am sure an administrative shakedown. I would like to point out to the minister that this department has probably had a more thorough investigation by a parliamentary committee than any other department of the government. The committee on mines, forests and waters, under the direction of the hon. member for Lambton

West, has examined the operations of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources in some cases twice and thrice over. I do not think anyone looking at the reports of that committee, including last year's report specifically in regard to the water resources branch, could come to any optimistic conclusion as to the state of this department when this government took over. The conclusion I have come to, as a member of that committee for several years, is that the administration of that department is not the finest in the world. One has only to look at the recommendations made by the committee on mines, forests and waters during the past three years to recognize that the members of that committee felt that the administration of this department was falling behind. This applies to almost any aspect of that department. We are disappointed because this department has not had an extremely aggressive minister at the head of it.

I do not wish to press this point further, but one would hope that the minister at the head of the department, as well as the senior civil servants, were possessed of enough drive and imagination to implement some of the many recommendations presented to it by the parliamentary committee. We will be watching very closely to see whether the present minister is able to do this.

The previous minister initiated the gigantic resources for tomorrow conference which is to be held in Montreal in October of this year.

I would ask all hon. members to look at information bulletin No. 1 which we received not long ago. I am sure they will realize then the tremendous scope of this conference, both in breadth and depth, in terms of background papers and material. I feel this will be the greatest conference of its kind ever held in Canada.

In the criticisms I have made previously, relating to this conference, I pointed out to the previous minister that a similar conference took place during and after the first world war. The background papers and material produced at that time were quite extensive. I have had the opportunity of studying this material while a librarian in a forestry library, and I point out the similarity between some of those original papers and the papers regarding this proposed conference. I would also mention the similarity between the proposed topics of conversation for the conference this fall, and those topics of conversation at the conference during and after world war I. This similarity indicates a lack of progress in the renewable resources field.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it ten o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bourget: May I ask the acting house leader if we will continue tomorrow with the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, as previously announced, and then the estimates of the Department of Justice?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, Mr. Chairman, tomorrow we will continue our consideration of the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. If we conclude those we will then consider the estimates of the Department of Justice. If we conclude those, then I will discuss with the hon. members on the other side what estimates should next be called.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C-5 TRANS-ATLANTIC TRIPS

Question No. 164—Mr. Roberge:

1. Has the R.C.A.F. plane known as "C-5" made any trans-Atlantic trips in the last 12 months?

2. If so, when were these trips made, for what purpose, and how many service personnel, if any, were carried on each of these trips as passengers?

3. Were any such personnel carried to and from the United Kingdom on the trips made during the second week of March when this plane was used as a stand-by aircraft for the return to Canada of the Prime Minister?

4. If so, how many?

5. What is the cost of a trans-Atlantic trip and return for this aircraft?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes.

2.

3. Yes.

4. See answer to 2.

5. The average cost for gasoline and oil of a return trans-Atlantic flight of this aircraft is $1,890.

MINOR PENITENTIARY INMATES

Question No. 178—Mr. Regier:

1. At the time of last report, how many inmates were to be found in the Canadian penitentiaries: (a) below the age of 12 (b) in each of the ages from 13 to 20, both inclusive?

2. In the past three years, what measures have been undertaken by the Department of Justice to reduce the number of minors who are being sentenced to serve penitentiary terms?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice):

1. Statistics by ages are tabulated by inmate admissions. These are produced annually by the dominion bureau of statistics. The last report containing the information requested is that of the commissioner of penitentiaries for the year ending March 31, 1960 (Table 6—nature of offence by age on admission):

(a) Below the age of 12—nil.

(b) Age

15	22
16	59
17	115
18	166
19	189
20	217
Total admitted during the year ending March 31, 1960 (under 21 years of age)	776

2. This department does not have any supervision or control over sentences imposed on convictions. However, one of the objectives of the correctional program of the department is to bring about a change in the practice of sentencing young offenders and in the facilities available for the serving of sentences so that in appropriate cases suspended sentences will be imposed and that minors serving sentences of imprisonment will be segregated.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 21, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is he prepared now to give the house a complete listing of all the legislative measures that must be dealt with before the end of the session?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to do that now, but I will do so at the earliest possible date. As I said the other day, on Monday I understand there will be before the house a motion for the extension of the hours of sitting. At that time it may be that I shall be in a position to some degree to bring to the house a general résumé of the intention of the government with respect to legislation.

Mr. Chevrier: I am grateful to the Prime Minister for his answer, but we on this side of the house had hoped it would be possible to have this list before consideration of the motion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—REQUEST FOR PROTEST AGAINST UNITED STATES POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs based on an article in this morning's Globe and Mail entitled: "UN Aghast at Kennedy's Blundering in Cuba". In view of President Kennedy's clearly announced decision to use the power of the United States to bring eventual victory to the counter-revolutionary forces in Cuba, if he considers it necessary; and in view of Canada's strong and proper criticism of intervention by the British and French at Suez and by the U.S.R.R. in Hungary in 1956, will the government now inform the government of the United States in the strongest terms possible of Canada's opposition to this proposed intervention in Cuba?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not the hon. member wants us to declare war on the United States. Issues of this kind are dealt with in a little more diplomatic fashion than the way suggested by the hon. member. Canada never hesitates to put her view before not only the United States but other countries as well.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does not the minister consider that Canada, as a friendly nation, can bring this matter to the attention of the United States and the United Nations and make a public statement as to Canada's policy?

Mr. Green: The statement made by the hon. member and his attitude are not stamped very heavily with friendliness toward the United States. I should not care to go any further than I have. We are in a position to make representations to the United States and to other countries all over the world, and we do this from time to time as we think the occasion warrants.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister say whether any representations on this situation have been made by Canada to the President of the United States?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, if we were to walk into the house and, in answer to questions, explain all the representations that are made to the United States or other countries, it would not be very long before our representations would simply have no value.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED LACK OF MONEY ORDER FORMS IN FRENCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. My question is prompted by an item published in today's issue of Le Devoir.

Why is it that at no time has it been possible for anyone to obtain from employees of the Canadian National Telegraph service, in the Quebec parliament buildings, money orders printed in French?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, since this matter is solely a responsibility of the Canadian National Railways, I will refer the hon. member's question to the company.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—REPRESENTATIONS FROM GRAIN TRADE RESPECTING REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received representations from the grain trade —that is, the pools and the private elevators —along the lines of the brief which they presented to the royal commission on transportation, in opposition to the abandonment of branch lines as recommended by the royal commission in its first report?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been a number of representations regarding the report made by the royal commission. They are of various types and kinds and deal with various phases in the report.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister say whether among these various representations there was one from the grain trade along the lines I have suggested in my question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: At the moment I cannot say there was one that would be representative of the grain trade. Representations have been made by one or more companies in western Canada regarding the problem that would be created in consequence of an accelerated reduction of such facilities as branch lines and the like.

DRUGS

VANCOUVER—REPORTED ESTABLISHMENT OF TREATMENT CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to either the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Justice. I wonder if the attention of either of the ministers has been drawn to a newspaper report containing a statement by Mr. MacLeod, the commissioner of penitentiaries, to the effect that a treatment centre for narcotics addicts will be established in Vancouver. If so, is either of the ministers able to give the house any detailed information upon this subject?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): My attention has not been drawn to the press report referred to, but the house will recall that a month or two ago I announced on behalf of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare and myself the outline of the government's new approach to the question of the apprehension, treatment and supervision of narcotics addicts. This included the information that we would be establishing a number of narcotic treatment centres, and it is no doubt in accordance with that general outline that Commissioner MacLeod, who is presently in the west, has confirmed the decision already announced that the first of these treatment centres will be opened in British Columbia. The exact location, however, has not yet been settled, and I should be very surprised if the commissioner had stated definitely that it would be established in Vancouver. It will be in the lower mainland area.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MONTREAL—PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF HEADQUARTERS IN PARK LAFONTAINE

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Could the minister indicate whether it is true that the government intends to build armouries in the southwest section of Lafontaine park? While this park does belong to the crown, could the minister give us the assurance that the municipal authorities will be consulted before action is taken on this plan?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for St. Henry, I must say no consideration is being given at the moment to building the armouries referred to.

Certainly the Montreal city council will be consulted and advised if the department should decide to build in the Montreal area.

FLAGS OF CANADA

REPORTED RESOLUTION OF CITY OF WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. It is reported in both the Winnipeg Free Press and the Winnipeg Tribune of April 18 that the city of Winnipeg has adopted a resolution to the effect that Canada should have a flag featuring the maple leaf; that Canada show her sovereignty by not borrowing from or using a portion of another country's flag, and that the federal government be advised of their decision.

(Translation):

Here is my question. Is the minister aware of this resolution by the city of Winnipeg, and what position does he intend to take in regard to this request?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me advance notice of his question. Here is my reply.

1. As of this morning, I had not yet received a copy of the resolution referred to by the hon. member, but I have read in the Winnipeg Free Press that by a vote of 10 to 8, such a resolution was passed by the Winnipeg city council.

2. With regard to the second part of the question, surely the hon. member must realize that the problem is not of my exclusive jurisdiction but is rather a matter for the cabinet, to which of course, I will report on the said resolution when I have received a copy.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO DELAY IN ANSWERING CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question based upon a return which was tabled yesterday regarding a Mr. Syrota of Sault Ste. Marie, who had written to the minister on February 19 about the invasion of his property by the R.C.M.P., according to his claim. Can the minister indicate whether the great length of time, amounting to eight weeks, which elapsed between the letter that Mr. Syrota wrote to the minister and the minister's reply was the result of a very deep investigation into the matter, or the consequence of an oversight?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that the Easter recess intervened during that period. If there was any delay I think the responsibility must be mine, caused by the fact that I spent some twelve days in the eastern and northern Arctic and there was some accumulation of correspondence. Prior to that time I was quite heavily engaged in a number of other matters. If there was any delay in my writing to the gentleman in question it is my fault rather than as the result of a delay in the R.C.M. Police completing their investigation.

SASKATCHEWAN

RESERVATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING MINING CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister can report to the house on the progress the government is making in the consideration of Saskatchewan bill No. 56, and has the government yet agreed that the lieutenant governor should sign this bill?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing to report. The matter is receiving consideration, and when a decision has been arrived at it will immediately be made available to the house. There will be no unnecessary delay in this connection.

HOUSING

SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET—STATEMENT ON INQUIRY AS TO SALES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on yesterday's orders of the day the hon. member for Welland asked whether any sales of mortgages had taken place or had been negotiated under the recently announced plan that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will sell mortgages held in its portfolio.

A new type of marketing has to be established. Since it is likely to be a quite important part of the total capital market, it is desirable that there be full discussions in advance with the existent approved lending institutions that may be concerned with the later operations. Accordingly C.M.H.C. is presently working on programs and procedures for discussion with other parties, which include, of course, the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada.

As I indicated yesterday, no sales have as yet taken place and none have been negotiated under this new plan.

TRANSPORT

MONTREAL—STATEMENT RESPECTING LETTER REFERRING TO SUBWAY PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont asked me a question yesterday in respect of a letter to the mayor of Montreal. I have before me just the English copy at the moment. I undertook to table the letter today and, if it is agreeable to the house, I will do so as soon as the other is brought to my office.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

279. Departmental administration including Canada's share of the expenses of the "resources for tomorrow" conference, $1,105,390.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, last evening my preliminary remarks had reference to the outlook for the resources for tomorrow conference which is to be held next October. I was suggesting this would not only be a landmark in the history of this department but perhaps a springboard to the future. However, the point I made earlier about the initiative and vigour of the minister was occasioned by the reaction I obtained from several people in the last few weeks on the resources for tomorrow conference.

Last week an editor of a prominent business magazine in Canada was talking to me. I asked him, "Why have you not mentioned the resources for tomorrow conference? I have not noticed any editorial comment or any indication at all of the conference." This editor of this prominent business magazine in Canada said "What conference?" I said, "The resources for tomorrow conference." I point out that these big files in the main contain material on the conference that I picked up from the secretariat. Here was a man who has not heard of the conference. He was quite willing to accept the onus; he said he had just not heard of it. I ask the minister what kind of preparation he has made for the conference when a man in a position such as this has not even heard of it, and the program has been under way for two years. The preparation has been going on that long and we are having the conference this year.

This is shocking enough to me, but during the Easter vacation I was making a tour of my riding. I encountered the president of the district council, lumber and saw mill workers union, an organization that has approximately 11,000 people working in the bush just at this particular time. It is the strongest union in the woods in Ontario. It is a militant union that carries its organization right out into the bush. It is in constant negotiation and is having conflict with many of the companies, but it is recognized as a very able organization. I could refer the minister to any number of articles in various magazines such as Business Week, Saturday Night and Executive, all dealing with the impact of this union upon this great resource industry in Ontario.

I said to the president of this particular union, "Who is going from your union to the resources for tomorrow conference?". His reply was "What conference?". I said, "The resources for tomorrow conference". He said "I have not heard anything about it. I vaguely know there is some such thing going on, but I have not heard anything about it". I said "Surely you had an invitation". He said "No". I said "Have you considered that you might perhaps get together with the I.W.A. and the Catholic union in Quebec? After all, labour is a very important part of this greatest industry we have in Canada?" He said, "It is funny; I was talking to Mr. Ladd of I.W.A. not so long ago. He did not mention anything about it. I doubt whether he has heard much about it or had any invitation".

My point is that here is an indication that this fundamental conference, which could be a springboard to the future, is really unknown by people who should have an intimate relationship with it and, so far as the labour people are concerned, should be playing a very active part in it. This is one of the disappointments about the papers that are listed in the information bulletin No. 1. There is no indication here that organized labour is playing any real part in this conference; yet wherever one turns to hear about the problems of Canada today in the export trade—and that is where our resources industries concentrate—the accusation or the criticism is often made that our wage policy is pricing us out of this trade or market, or we have not the labour where we need it; we do not have labour mobility.

It does seem strange that one should project a conference of this importance, spend a whole lot of money on it and two years in its preparation, have a secretariat that is spending a fair amount of money and giving a fair amount of leadership, and not get the information out to places and to people who could take a more positive role.

Having said that, I do not want to leave the impression that I think the basic work of the secretariat has not been sound. I have heard from provincial sources that the whole plan of the conference did not crystallize in any dynamic way until the new minister from Quebec came to the fore. I am referring to Mr. Rene Levesque. Without commenting upon Mr. Levesque's politics, I think it is about the most exciting news that anyone with interest in resources could hear that the minister from Quebec was prepared to come in, and not just drag along but to give leadership in putting this conference upon a realistic basis. I think praise cannot be too great for something like this. I know that we need such leadership in Ontario, because there is a tendency for our people in the resources field to slumber along and look at Ontario more as a little nation of our own in a resource sense rather than as an integral part of the nation. If we can be complimentary for a contribution that has been made, we would like to give that support to Mr. Rene Levesque.

Last year when I raised a question about the resources for tomorrow conference I received a letter dated August 11, 1960 from the then minister of northern affairs and national resources. The letter contains this statement:

> To these official policy statements I would add that the conference is designed to put us—and by "us" I mean all participants—in a better judgment position in regard to the many related questions of land and water use and the conservation and development of resources in all their ramifications. It is intended to bring out for discussion all the known facts in this connection through research papers—

Then the letter goes on:

> We cannot, of course, expect the conference—given its composition—to be able to decide or even to be able to recommend clearly upon action. But we will all without any doubt be in a better position after the conference to make informed decisions about how to improve the use of our renewable resources, so that the nation can draw a higher income from them without prejudicing the supply.

Later we find this remark in the letter:

> The question of foreign ownership of capital will be considered indirectly in reviewing the sources of capital for resource development. Perhaps the conference will suggest how best to channel Canadian funds into resource development.

Now, I did ask the minister whether there was any intention of dealing with cost-benefit analysis in this conference, which is a need we have at the present time in order to get resources development. The minister's answers to questions earlier in the session indicated that cost-benefit analysis will be incidental. There are several papers that touch upon that subject and I was delighted to see that according to the schedule the second part of the conference program will include two workshops dealing with capital requirements, income and employment effects. The conference will conclude in plenary session on Saturday, October 28, with a session dealing with capital requirements, income and employment effects of renewable resources development.

This is not the time, Mr. Chairman, for any kind of philosophical analysis. However, as one who believes that planning or democratic socialism is the only future for Canada and the Canadian economy, I recognize that this conference and the approach to it is a step in that direction. For that reason we are enthusiastic about it.

This year the government created something like a national planning board, in effect, with Mr. George DeYoung as its head, called the national productivity council. I should like to ask the minister whether arrangements have been made to have the members of this council attend the resources for tomorrow conference. There is not much purpose in having an esoteric discussion unless there is liaison or some means of carrying out the recommendations and ideas that come forward in the conference. For that reason I should like to know just how much effort is to be made by this national productivity council to work with the conference and the conference secretariat.

There is another question I should like to discuss with the minister. What steps are being planned to see that the initiative that comes from the conference is not lost or dissipated? Is any consideration being given to a continuing secretariat or to making the secretariat a part of the national productivity council? It seems to me there is a very direct relationship here. I would very much welcome any information in that regard that the minister can give.

Referring to another aspect of the minister's responsibilities, I might say that in looking at the map on pages 34 and 35 of the annual report I was astounded to see that one of the roads projected there seems to run from somewhere in my constituency near Armstrong or Nipigon all the way up into northern Manitoba. I have had given to me by the minister a return dealing with the roads in northern Ontario which have been approved. I just cannot match the roads shown in the return with those shown on the map. I should like to ask the minister whether approval has been given for the complete length of the road which is shown by a dotted line running from near lake Nipigon all the way up into northern Manitoba, or whether this represents a survey only. I certainly would like to argue that in time we will need that kind of road to open up that area. However, I have not received any impression from the information I have been given that such a road is a sure thing or that the whole business has been confirmed.

I might repeat to the minister something that he has heard from a number of other members in the last few years. I am sure that one of the great disillusionments with the Diefenbaker government stems from the feeling of people in areas such as I represent, in which we have always talked about our unlimited resources, our untapped resources. They know that these lie much closer to the markets and industries of North America, and when they find that the great northern vision is prematurely focusing on the wrong places, the disillusion is immense. After all, when you have very large iron ore resources in northern Ontario; great forest resources that are still not exploited; when you have oil wells and gas wells capped in Alberta; when within 100 or 120 miles of the border you have all these natural resources that are not being exploited although these areas have been built on optimistic hopes for the future, it comes as quite a shock to have the northern vision put to you at a time when you are languishing yourself. I can only say to the minister that this does not mean that I or anyone else would suggest to him that the responsibilities of the department in this field should be allowed to lapse. I suggest to him that if the northern vision became a southern vision it would probably have a more beneficial effect for the Diefenbaker government in the long run.

Another point upon which I wanted to touch very briefly, Mr. Chairman, concerns one sentence in the annual report of the department. This sentence refers to the standard of living, buildings and morale in the Mackenzie river area as exceedingly low. I think that is the phrase, "exceedingly low". Certain steps are being taken to correct the situation, and I should like to hear from the minister. Here we have a statement as it was provided late last year. I should like to hear from the minister why this is so.

Perhaps the hon. member for Yukon can provide us with the answer. The government has been in power now for four years, or approximately that period of time. We have had this department of northern affairs for a much longer time than that. Yet we have been told that morale is exceedingly low in a very important sector of the minister's responsibility, and it is acknowledged in the annual report. I like this kind of frankness, but I should like to have some documentation as to the reasons and to have a little more information as to the steps that are being taken to change the situation.

I have often felt that frequently parliamentary committees make recommendations that fall away and just disappear. One of the things I should like the minister to provide for me and other members who may be interested, after the minister's estimates are through, is an appraisal of all recommendations that have been made with regard to his department by parliamentary committees, and the consideration that has been given to them. I think this may be something that the committee itself should expect. I see no reason why we should not know.

I may have been off base last night in expressing the suggestion that this department had been the one most criticized by parliamentary committees. However, whether or not I was off base, I know that many criticisms have been made. Having regard to the criticisms and the recommendations, I should like to know what consideration has been given to them by the department and where they stand at the present time. As someone who took part in the deliberations of the committee for a considerable portion of the time, may I suggest that it would bring into some kind of focus what we were doing.

I should hope we could get through the minister's estimates without getting off into any bitter avenues such as those which were revealed here last night in relation to the fact that French is not taught to the Eskimos in northern Quebec. The minister gave us the information that 90 per cent, I think it was, of the children in this particular area are in the Anglican church. The only suggestion I can make to the committee as a teacher is that it is difficult enough to teach children coming from a culture or a civilization that is not as steady or as stable as our own without getting into the question of teaching two foreign languages or having to operate within three languages. I can say this with absolute conviction because, despite the fact that I took French for eight or nine years in school myself, all I can do is read it; I would not have the temerity to try to speak it.

Mr. Deschatelets: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Deschatelets: Am I correct in understanding that the hon. member said that the French language would be a foreign language in Canada?

Mr. Fisher: All I am suggesting is that the French language and the English language are foreign languages to the Eskimos. At least give the Eskimo credit for having his own language. In this sense I was not making any distinction between the French language and the English language. All I am suggesting is that there should be only one additional language. The minister has given the reasons why it should be that one. I do not know how valid they are. If hon. members are going to get worked up about this situation I should just like to ask them to recognize the fact that it is difficult at any time for students to move from their own language to one other language. To attempt to do it in two languages without having any tradition or any long existing school system built up seems to me to be fruitless.

There is one other subject that always decorates the debates on the department of northern affairs. I refer to the Canadian government travel bureau. We have had all kinds of recommendations about things the Canadian government travel bureau could do to improve matters. To any hon. member who is critical of the bureau without having seen its operations I can only suggest that he is being somewhat unfair. Within the limits of the money the bureau spends I have not seen a more effectively organized government operation. I think we get full value for the money we spend on it. The only point we should be considering at this time is whether we should really decide to make tourism a much bigger thing. If we want to do so we must pay for it, and this is the agency that must get the money. However, I certainly argue that it is an efficient bureau at the present time, and that it has the set-up for much greater organization.

Perhaps the minister could enlighten us as to what factors have gone into any decisions about the rather limited expansion of the bureau's functions and operations, especially in the United States. I think we should all be interested in hearing what has been done in the way of making a gigantic effort in this field; and a gigantic effort means the spending of much more money than we are spending at the present time. With the interest in tourism that exists in Canada at the present time I think this effort would be worth while.

In conclusion may I say that the C.C.F. party hope the minister will rise to the challenge of his department. We have already stated that we are none too optimistic that he will do so, but we certainly wish him all the best in his efforts. I know that I and the hon. member for Kootenay West will be the first to stand up in the house and compliment him if we really feel that he has seized the opportunity he has been given.

(Translation):

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks before the first item of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is carried.

I shall avail myself of this opportunity to thank the minister sincerely for the explanations he gave yesterday, and more particularly to underline the fact that, as he said himself in his statement, his first formal duty when he became minister was the signing of the agreement between the government of Canada which he was representing on that occasion, and the provincial government of Quebec, represented by the Hon. Paul Earl, then minister of mines for the province, when the province of Quebec participated in the roads to resources program. It gives me pleasure to stress the fact, as the three roads which were the object of that understanding will be jointly built by the federal and provincial governments, with the federal government paying 50 per cent of the total building costs.

These three roads are within the limits of Chapleau riding, which I have the honour to represent in this house.

The minister also was kind enough to explain the proposed program in a general way, or at least the various divisions under his department. I should like to mention briefly in that respect, a few points which concern his department.

I shall now briefly describe the three roads I mentioned and which are to be built in the northern part of Chapleau riding. I have here a copy of the agreement signed in Quebec on October 19, 1960, which is very elaborate. I have no intention, of course, to read it fully into the official record, but I should like, if I may, Mr. Chairman, to give a description of those roads, as they are located within the boundary of my riding.

First of all, there is the road between Amos and Mattagami, a distance of approximately 118 miles. This is a new road. Some sections were started and even completed a few years ago, but they had to be widened or improved. This road goes northward from Amos, up to the Mattagami lake district, or more accurately to the Allard river, where a mining company owns a very interesting property, the New Hosco mine. That road will also serve other mines in the Mattagami lake district, like the Mattagami Lake Mines, the Orchan Mines and other mining companies which have been doing some exploratory work since 1956 in that area, which is about 100 miles to the north of the town of Amos.

The second road is a section, or a new road, should I say, leading from lake Waconichi to lake Albanel, to the north of the Chapais and Chibougamau region. The new road, 95 miles long, will stretch up to a few miles beyond the 51st parallel, on the eastern shore of lake Albanel, that is to the east of that lake, an area where vast iron deposits have already been discovered. Indeed, the whole area around Albanel lake and great Mistassini lake offers immense mining opportunities.

The third stretch is the road between the cities of Chapais and Desmaraisville.

In addition, in the northern part of the constituency, a 30-mile stretch will link up southern Abitibi with the northern part of the area.

For many years, or at least since the area of Chapais and Chibougamau was opened up, about 10 years ago, there was no connection between the two sections of that part of our area. As a result, people had to travel either by air or by road, covering over 1,000 miles, depending on where they started from in the Abitibi area. Needless to say this road will be a tremendous boon, as it will shorten the distance between the Abitibi and the Chapais and Chibougamau area to approximately 200 miles, depending of course on the particular starting point in the Abitibi.

A fourth item of interest to the province of Quebec, in the federal-provincial agreement, provides as follows:

Resource development roads in various sections of the province, the location of which will be determined by the provincial minister, subject to written approval by the minister.

This refers of course, to future roads planned for northern Quebec. I shall therefore be brief on this subject.

However, I felt it was my duty, as representative of the Chapleau constituency, to mention those three stretches of road. One of them is already under construction, between Amos and Mattagami, while the others are to be built shortly, as soon as the provincial authorities can get around to it, because the federal government has agreed to contribute as its share up to 50 per cent of construction costs.

Another program of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is of particular interest to my constituents and myself. I refer to hydrometric studies, that is to say the study of water streams in James bay, north of Barraute and Senneterre, where important mining developments are under way and where a railroad is also being constructed.

The streams being surveyed in the James bay basin are the Bell or Nottaway, Broadback, Rupert and Eastmain rivers.

This study is being conducted jointly by the federal and provincial authorities. The work was started a couple of years ago, and the provincial government is at the same time making a survey of possible hydraulic resources in those rivers.

I understand that the survey program is still going on and that an office was opened by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources in Senneterre in 1958 or 1959, from which the people working on the survey start off in the spring, after the thaw-out.

Another scheme was also placed before the committee of mines, forests and waters last year.

I asked a question to the minister during this session concerning the Grand Canal project, as it is called in English. That project concerns the Harricanaw river.

I think that is a problem the department should be seriously considering. It should have a complete survey made of the possibilities, in order to decide whether the project would be self-sustaining in the years to come.

[Mr. Martel.]

We all know that in the southern United States, there is a problem of fresh water supply, whose solution may dangerously affect the situation in Canada, since the authorities of the state of Illinois or of Chicago are planning to divert the waters of lake Michigan. In fact, such diversion would channel lake Michigan waters into the Mississippi basin.

Of course this is an international problem, which will require the co-operation of the United States. If there were an increase in the volume of water already diverted into the Mississippi basin, south of Chicago, this will seriously affect the Great lakes, as was explained last year in the committee of mines, forests and waterways. Furthermore, that diversion would be detrimental to navigation on the St. Lawrence seaway.

Again I say this is not only an international problem but a national one. We know that if navigation on the St. Lawrence seaway is threatened or curtailed, our trade will considerably suffer as a result.

Consequently, I think it would be in order to make a complete survey of fresh water supply diverted into James bay and to the north, in view of the urgent need which might develop in the coming years, both in the United States, particularly in those states bordering on Canada, and in this country too, in the Great lakes area.

We know that the southern United States are fast becoming industralized.

I believe that when the survey is completed, we shall be in a position to establish exactly not only the fresh water needs of those states, but also the dangers involved in the diversion of more water through Chicago or south of Chicago.

Again I say that such diversion would affect the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence seaway.

Consequently, if there is a possibility of using the fresh water running into James bay, it would perhaps be wise—I think, for my part, the project is really worth studying—that we should start working on it and try to solve it as soon as possible.

Besides, I think the department has already set up an observation post to measure the volume of water on the Harricanaw river, at Amos, and the statistics that have been compiled for several years may help survey work northward up to the mouth of that river.

Before closing, Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment on some remarks made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr.

Deschatelets), especially when he tried to suggest that the credit for northern vision should not necessarily be claimed by the Conservative government, but rather by the former minister of northern affairs and national resources who is now premier of the province of Quebec.

It is quite possible; I was not a member of parliament in 1953, as was the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. However, he overlooked one point and it is this: if the former minister of northern affairs and national resources was already possessed of that northern vision, as he says, the government of the time certainly did not believe him. It was only when the Conservative government came into power that the program he was then advocating, or at least the development of northern areas was applied.

I am not afraid of saying now that, with the present minister, we are on the right course and that people up north are delighted at the greater consideration they are getting from this government.

Another point I wish to emphasize is that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) is quite conversant with northern problems. This is something I have mentioned during the last two election campaigns, in 1957 and in 1958.

In fact, the Prime Minister has never resided anywhere but in the northern part of this country; he knows the problems of northern Canada and he will no doubt be the best prime minister the people of the north will ever have had, because he knows their problems and tries to find practical solutions for them.

I will now close my remarks, Mr. Chairman. I may have further comment to make, but I will wait until the detailed discussion of the department's estimates.

Mr. Bourget: Would the hon. member for Chapleau allow me a question? If I understood him rightly, he declared himself in favour of a joint program of roads to resources, contrary to the views expressed by his friends in the Quebec parliamentary opposition.

Could the hon. member tell us if this joint project constitutes a violation of provincial autonomy?

Mr. Martel: Mr. Speaker, I may say that the question put by the hon. member for Levis is in the nature of a trap, because this is a matter which comes mainly under the provincial government's jurisdiction. However, the hon. member might be interested to know that action under the roads to resources program had already been taken by the previous administration, and that the present government of the province of Quebec has merely been carrying on negotiations with a view to reaching agreement with the federal government. In fact, I have here a copy of the correspondence exchanged between the two governments in that regard.

As to whether I agree with the views of the leader of the opposition of the province of Quebec, I think this is strictly a provincial matter, and so far I have been concerned only with federal politics.

(Text):

Mr. Nielsen: Before embarking on a discussion of the minister's estimates I should like to thank him and the officials of his department for the co-operation they have given me last year and, indeed, during the whole of the time I have been here. Every suggestion I have made to them has been carefully considered, and I am very grateful to them and to the minister. I should like to express the gratitude of my constituents for the results that have been experienced, since the majority of the suggestions I have put forward have been accepted.

I intend to discuss the estimates of the department under three particular headings; the political development of the north in a non-partisan sense, the material development and the human development. But before doing that I want to comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, who spoke last night on the estimates of this department. Never have I heard so much drivel or so much senseless discussion concerning the north. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont did not make one constructive remark last night, not one accurate statement concerning those areas above the 60th parallel. He made all sorts of show in producing submissions made to the Gordon commission by those two territories, and by quoting sketchy verbal excerpts from these representations the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont attempted to garner credit for his party for the tremendous increase in expenditure and activity which have occurred north of the 60th parallel since the present Prime Minister came to power.

The fact of the matter is that the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont does not know the north, and he is certainly not familiar with the activities of the department in the last three years. If he was, he would know that while the government which he supported was in office, in 1956-57 the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources amounted to $39 million. If the hon. member were familiar with these things he would know that in the following year the estimates amounted to $53,700,000; these figures are approximate. He would also know that as soon as the government changed hands in 1958-59 the estimates of this department rose to $83 million.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. member permit a question at this point? He was referring a moment ago to the credit of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources in 1956-57. Does he know that in addition to this credit we should add also the tremendous expenditures of the Department of National Defence, the Department of Public Works—

Mr. Grafftey: Order. On a question of privilege, the hon. member rose, he said, to ask a question, but he is not doing that. He is making a statement, and that is why I am rising on a question of privilege—

An hon. Member: It cannot be a question of privilege.

Mr. Deschatelets: It is true I made the statement, but I was asking the hon. member to comment on that statement to see whether he was aware of this.

Mr. Nielsen: Of course I am aware of it, Mr. Chairman. But the same story could be told about the estimates of the Department of Transport, the estimates of the Department of National Defence, the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare or, indeed, of any other federal government department which operates in the north. All of them have shown increases in their estimates in ratios comparable to those I am citing now. Activity has increased at least fivefold among all the federal departments in the north. It is very notable if one lives there. One cannot help but notice the difference between then and now.

I will continue the statistics I have been giving and tell the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, in case he should have overlooked this, that in 1959-60 the estimates of the department jumped to $89,898,000—almost $90 million—and this year they amount to $81,500,000, though if forestry is added they amount, as the minister has told us, to $3 million more than last year. So that from 1956-57, when the estimates of the department stood at $40 million, they have increased to almost $100 million. In fact they have more than doubled, the figure standing at $90 million last year.

This is reflected in what one sees in the north as compared with what one did not see in the past. I do not want to be unfair regarding what has been accomplished. There were accomplishments by the previous government in the north, and I will say that the accomplishments were misdirected. I will give credit to the previous government for initiating the Gordon commission study, because that study provided the basis for some of the planning that was done so matters could go ahead when the government took office. Do not forget, however, that the Gordon commission plan, such as it was in so far as roads and other developments in the north were concerned, was predicated on a 25-year program. That program has been consolidated and accelerated into a program for some five to ten years. I do not know the exact time that has been allotted to the program by the department, but undoubtedly the minister will enlighten us. It certainly has been accelerated a good deal.

As a result of living in the north myself I am able to enlighten the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont by telling him that a good many things have occurred in the north in the last three years under this government that do not appear in the Gordon commission report. In my own riding of Yukon, and the story can be duplicated in respect of the Northwest Territories, we have the construction of a new school at Dawson city, a new school and teacherage at Mayo Landing, a health centre at Haines Junction and Watson Lake, a new school at Whitehorse, two $1 million hostels at Whitehorse, a new school under construction at Whitehorse, a new federal building under construction at Dawson city and houses and apartments built for federal civil servants in the Whitehorse area, none of which appear in the Gordon commission report. There has been an amazing and beneficial change in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation legislation which has allowed building to proceed under that legislation in the Yukon where none was in existence before this government took office. Not one single unit was built previously under the National Housing Act in the Yukon, yet this year I anticipate there will be 50 to 70 units under construction or completed under N.H.A.

Let us focus the attention of this committee on the road program in the north. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont has attempted to garner credit for the plans of this government in connection with the road construction program now going ahead in the north for the development of our resources there. During the fiscal year 1957-58 some $3.8 million was spent on construction and development of roads in the north. In 1959-60 some $8.2 million was spent in this regard, and in 1960-61 the sum of $6.2 million was spent. Included in the estimates of the department for this fiscal year is provision for an expenditure of $8.4 million. The average amount provided for this fundamental development purpose by the government is $6.5 million over these years. Contrasting this with the record of the previous administration, where the average was $1.5 million, I suggest to the hon. member that is a very telling comparison.

The attack by that hon. member last night regarding the Liberal planning program referred not to a planning program at all. The planning had to be done when the government changed, and that planning, I must say, has gone ahead, contrary to the opinion of the hon. member for Port Arthur, under the direction of the civil service staffing the department who are devoted, dedicated and altruists of the highest order. The deputy minister is a man who I consider the government, and that department particularly, is fortunate in having at the reins of this important department of government. I have not seen dedication like his for many years. I certainly hope that he stays with the department because I am sure, with his qualifications, the attractions for employment outside the government service must indeed be tempting.

I want to associate myself with only one remark made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, on a matter introduced by the minister, and that is the wish that the hon. member for Mackenzie River will be back with us in this house within the shortest possible time to give us the benefit of his knowledge of the affairs of the Mackenzie river area.

I would point out one further discrepancy in the remarks made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont for which he can perhaps be excused, when he said last night and I use his words taken from page 7 of the translation appearing in last night's Hansard, as follows:

> —farming is only possible in and around the Mackenzie district—

I would like to inform him that there is a good potential for agricultural development in the Yukon as well as in the Mackenzie district. In keeping abreast with developments in this regard I can tell him also that under the very able leadership of the Minister of Agriculture, who is extremely familiar with the problems confronting northern development, a committee has been set up of representatives from his department, the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and other federal government departments, interested, for the specific purpose of assessing that agricultural potential in the Yukon and devising a method of land allotment so that the development can go ahead. I might say this is the first time that this sort of attack has been made in an endeavour to proceed with the agricultural development in my riding.

I think the remarks made by the hon. member for Port Arthur concerning the minister were quite deplorable. He said he was disappointed in the change of ministers. I might say that I was most disappointed that the hon. member for Port Arthur saw fit to be critical of the minister in this rather personal fashion. I certainly do not know this minister as well as I knew the previous minister, but since I have been in the house I have had several discussions with him, and must say that from my observations he has certainly been one of the most active and virile of the members taking part in the activities of this house.

I must say that this is contrary to an interview I read in the Toronto Telegram Week End magazine of July 16, 1960 with the hon. member for Port Arthur. According to that article the hon. member believes that too many parliamentary backbenchers often unwillingly, lead an aimless and frustrating existence as time-servers, merely voting "yea" or "nay" at the call of their party. The hon. member went on to say, according to the article, that he himself is so dissatisfied with life as a member of parliament that he intends to go back to teaching school after the next election is called. While I think this is perhaps—

Mr. Fisher: Could I ask the hon. member to identify the article? If it is the one I think it is I might say that I wrote it myself and do not think it can be attributed to someone else.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, I was referring to an article which appeared in the Toronto Telegram Week End magazine for July 16, 1960, which has quite a complimentary picture of the hon. member for Port Arthur appearing on the front.

Mr. Fisher: I would like to inform the hon. member that I wrote the article myself and was paid for it.

Mr. Dinsdale: You are showing your usual modesty.

Mr. Nielsen: I simply used the article to point out to the hon. member for Port Arthur that the industry displayed by the minister, certainly from my observation of his activities in the house, is not consistent with the views of the hon. member in respect of the activities or non-activities of most hon. members in this house. When it comes to taking part in activities in this house on behalf of my own constituents, I can tell the hon. member that I devote all my time to those activities.

Let me pass to the political development of the north. In this respect I believe that some considerable thought is about due. I am not suggesting for a moment that considerable thought has not already been given to this problem, but I think a concentrated second look at the political development of the north is required. I think I heard wrongly, or that the C.B.C. reported the minister wrongly during the Easter recess, when in a speech before the Yellowknife board of trade he was reported as advocating that the Yukon and the Mackenzie river districts could be best combined in order to create the eleventh province of Canada in due course. I do not believe the minister intended to say that. As a matter of fact I do not believe he did say it. Perhaps the C.B.C. had him all wrong on it.

Of course this is practically, politically, historically and geographically impossible in my view. I feel that the Yukon, with its traditions, its history, its geography and its economy must be created a province by itself when the time comes. I am not suggesting that that should be forthwith, but certainly the economic development seems to be progressing at a pace which makes this look possible within a decade.

Here again I must disagree with the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and other hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Welland, for one, the hon. member for Renfrew North for another and the Leader of the Opposition, for a third, who have been ridiculing the vision, and using the word "vision" with derision in their voices. Not one of them realizes the pace and the tempo that the north is feeling at the moment as a result of this government's activities there. As a direct result of the development road program there I can say that exploration activity has been increased to the point where we in Canada—I do not say we in the Yukon —have the world's largest known tungsten deposit, which was discovered in 1958 and which is slated for production in the fall of 1962. This is a strategic metal of great importance. Before this discovery we produced no tungsten in Canada. We will now be in a position to supply, for instance, the whole of the United States demand for tungsten. This discovery was the direct result of this development road program. Therefore I suggest to hon. members that they do not underestimate the benefit to the whole of Canada of the program which this government is following.

The minister will likely enlighten us on the statement reported by the C.B.C. concerning the combining of the Mackenzie district and the Yukon. There are many reasons why such a suggestion is completely incompatible with practicality.

Another matter that I wish to raise for the minister's attention is the point that the Northwest Territories, as hon. members know, being divided into three districts, namely the Mackenzie river district, the Keewatin district and the Franklin district, is an extremely large area indeed. The hon. member for Mackenzie River has as his riding only the Mackenzie river district. The whole of the eastern mainland above the 60th parallel, the Keewatin district, and the whole of the Franklin district comprising all the Canadian archipelago and the islands of the far north, are without representation in the House of Commons. There are Canadian citizens disfranchised; civil servants, members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, missionaries and a substantial population in those two areas who should be entitled to be heard in this house. I have had correspondence from such organizations as the Baker Lake citizens association, who have asked that this be brought to the attention of hon. members so that some solution might be found.

In my view the solution does not lie in placing the responsibility for representing those people in the hands of the hon. member for Mackenzie River. He has his hands full now in representing his own vast area. I believe the solution lies in the creation of an additional electoral district to take in this area so that Canada may be truly 100 per cent represented. It certainly is not now when we have this vast area with, as I say, a substantial population without a member in this house.

I would also draw the attention of the minister to the fact that neither the Yukon nor the Northwest Territories has Senate representation. The solution of the problem here requires the amendment of the British North America Act in order to qualify the Yukon and the Northwest Territories for Senate representation. Both these matters were covered by bills which I introduced in the house last year. I would judge by the number of bills on the order paper this year it would be very unlikely that, should I introduce the legislation again this year, it would receive any consideration.

I feel that the department should attempt to extract from its very busy agenda some time to develop a political blueprint for the development of the north. It should develop a formula such as that which was developed when Manitoba was created a province in the years prior thereto. I am sure the minister, who remembers the history of his province, will recall the formula which was developed there. When the population increased by 2,000 an additional seat was added to the council. When the number totalled 20 or 21, I forget which, the council was converted into a full-fledged provincial legislature. Some such formula should be worked out for the Yukon territory so that when the economy of the Yukon does reach the stage where we are ready to take on the responsibility of a province, a blueprint will be there and we shall be following an organized course.

I am very grateful to the previous minister for following the suggestion which I put before him as soon as I came to the house of increasing the number of members of the Yukon legislative council from five to seven. This provided for more equitable representation on the legislative council in the Yukon and also enlarged the council so the minister could accept the suggestion of creating an advisory committee on finance, which will be formed after the next election in the territory this year. This advisory committee on finance is the first tottering step toward self-government in the Yukon, in that the commissioner will now be obliged, mandatorily, to consult with the advisory committee before he prepares his budget.

I am sure hon. members realize that in the Yukon Territory the council is wholly elected, as contrasted with the Northwest Territories where four members of a nine-man council are elected and the other five are appointed by the federal government, so that in the Yukon we are substantially ahead, probably because of our historical development, of the Northwest Territories in the development of our political affairs.

The indemnity of our council members should be mentioned here, I believe, because it is much too low to attract the calibre of individual that you want to attract to this legislative body. The present members of the council are extremely idealistic people; if they were not they would not stay around long for the indemnity they get. Some of them are not going to run again simply because too much time is taken from their own businesses and the remuneration is really only nominal. I feel that the indemnity of council members should be increased.

The members of this committee will wonder why I am bringing this point to the minister's attention. The reason is simple. The members of the Yukon legislative council, as a body, cannot introduce or pass legislation which has anything to do with the expenditure of funds. This legislation must all be introduced by the commissioner, who is the personal representative of the minister in the Yukon Territory. The same situation prevails, I believe, in the Northwest Territories.

I want to mention, for want of a better or less inflammatory term, the bureaucratic rigidity of the administration in the Yukon. I do not make these remarks deprecatingly at all, but in the hope that I may get through to those in the administration who may read these remarks, and in the hope that the minister might devise some method of educating those who are responsible to him for the administrative functions of his department in the Yukon. I have no reason to suspect that the same conditions do not prevail in the administrative centres of the Northwest Territories. The bureaucratic rigidity of which I speak is a mental state more than anything else. It is a state in which all suggestions and ideas, unless they are those of the administration, are immediately received in a negative fashion. They are not received in such a way as to give the impression that the administration there wants new ideas. They are not fondled and developed if they are good or discarded if they are not good. These ideas are simply looked at with immediate prejudice and greeted with the remark, well, the department has this plan or that plan and anything less than that is not worthy of the consideration which obviously the person making the proposal has given to it.

I want to make it clear that I do not advance these remarks deprecatingly at all. However, there is a certain outlook toward these things by the administration which I feel has to be changed. If this rigidity continues it can only retard development. As a specific example in this regard I might cite the load limits in the Yukon Territory. The administration, without any real consideration of the matter, at one time imposed arbitrary limits on Yukon roads which affected the outflow of mining products from those areas. This was done without any study by the administration and, I believe to the credit of the minister's predecessor and his officials, without consultation with the department here. Nevertheless this is the type of thing—

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Deschatelets: We have no objection to the hon. member continuing if he has only a few more remarks to make.

The Chairman: Is there any objection to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: I thank the committee for its courtesy. I should like to say also that such rigidity on the part of the administration discourages settlement in these northern areas. In this regard I would point specifically to the hundreds of applications for land in the Yukon. When an applicant decides he would like a piece of land upon which to settle, it sometimes takes years to get through all the red tape and obtain a lease. There are cases in which it has taken as long as six or seven years from the date on which the applicant applied for a plot of land before he has been told he can have the land or he cannot.

I realize that the whole organization has been altered in respect of this matter and I must say that, having read the outline of the reorganization, I consider it to be a great advance over the previous procedures. Nevertheless some impetus must still be given to eliminate these undue and retarding factors that exist in the present policy. For instance, I am sure the minister is aware of the fact that a price of $16 per acre has been set on agricultural land. Here in Ontario this might seem to be a meagre amount for an acre of agricultural land. However, in the north, where growing is a problem anyway, I am given to understand this amount is about five times greater than the same acre of land would cost in northern Alberta or northern British Columbia. Agricultural development will not be achieved when the price of land is completely out of reach of the settlers who are going into this high cost area in an attempt to farm.

The salary and position of the commissioner, I think, should come under the scrutiny of the department. You cannot expect the commissioner of the Yukon Territory, whoever he might be, to accept the responsabilities involved in handling millions and millions of dollars on a salary of $13,000 per year. This position calls for a highly skilled excutive, and the salary should be commensurate with that position and should be such that we can attract the most capable men in industry to undertake the position of chief administrator. Certainly he should be at least at the deputy minister level.

The ordinances that are passed by the Yukon legislative council are all prepared here in Ottawa. This is an absolutely unacceptable process to have the ordinances prepared 4,000 miles from the seat of the local legislature. There is only one solution to that problem, and that is the creation of the position of law clerk for the Yukon legislative council. I believe that if the department looked hard enough and set an attractive enough salary, they would have no difficulty in getting a capable man to fill the position.

There is one other thing in connection with the political development of the north that I should like to mention. Under existing procedures the commissioner alone has the complete management of the territorial civil service, which is fairly considerable. The territory is partly administered by the federal civil service, under the minister's department, and partly by the territorial civil service. This whole system of the territorial civil service should come under the closest scrutiny. Certainly it should not be under the management of one man, because the system is subject to abuse if this continues to be the case. I am not suggesting that there has been any abuse, but all members can immediately see the possibility of playing favourites by hiring friends and the possibility of taking out vindictiveness by firing enemies. The complete absence of any cohesive civil service organization in the territories simply means a denial of the fair application of those principles which we all like to think exist under the civil service commission of Canada. I feel that some miniature civil service commission is required in the Yukon so that we can develop procedures of a competitive nature and put job opportunities in the territorial civil service on a fair basis.

Another reason for a change in this situation is that there are no grievance procedures at all for employees of the territorial civil service. If the commissioner does not feel that he wants to accept the representations of an employee who feels himself to be aggrieved, he is not obliged to do so. There is no recourse for the employees whatsoever.

I have now concluded my remarks concerning the political development of the territory. I have other remarks to make on the material development and on the human development in the north. However, I feel that I should at this stage allow other members of the committee to rise. I will bring these other matters up for consideration at a later stage in these proceedings.

Mr. Carter: Before I come to the questions which I wish to bring before the minister I want to say a word in reply to what has been said by the hon. member for Yukon, who has just taken his seat. From time to time we see in the papers reports about the slow progress being made in the House of Commons, and every so often the leader of the house will tell us that we have spent so many days on this item and so many days on that subject. I wish to put on record here the statement that if we are going to play politics with every question that comes before the House of Commons, that situation can be the only result. If the government or members of the government party introduce political notes, they must expect to have replies made to them. The hon. member for Yukon said that this party had derided the vision. I think he said that he had heard nothing but derision of the vision. I have not been aware of any derision of anything by members of this party, certainly of no derision of the vision.

But if there has been derision of anything it has been derision of the ballyhoo which this government has put forward with regard to the northern vision.

Mr. Lambert: Your own leader lead you in it.

Mr. Carter: How could members of this party deride the vision? The vision did not originate with the Tory party or with the present Prime Minister.

Mr. Nielsen: That is rot.

Mr. Carter: It is not rot. The vision originated with the party that created this department; I refer to the department that is before us now. That is something that was done since I have come to this House of Commons, and that is not so very long ago. If there had been no vision there would have been no Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The hon. member should not allow himself to get carried away with the idea that there was no vision until the Conservative party took office. We do our work in a quieter and more effective way, without all the publicity and the ballyhoo which amounts to words and nothing else. If the hon. member wishes to make invidious comparisons may I say that one cannot just do it on the basis of dollars and cents. We must take into consideration the circumstances that prevailed at the time the allocations were made and when this department was set up. It had to be organized. The groundwork had to be done and plans had to be laid. That was done. Progress was made, and I am glad to note that progress is continuing, but let hon. members opposite not think that the north did not exist until they took office.

Mr. Charlton: Nobody would have known it.

Mr. Nielsen: I think the hon. member would wish to be fair. I gave to the previous administration large gobs of credit—more than I think it was warranted—in connection with planning.

An hon. Member: He was not listening.

Mr. Carter: The people who live in the north are Canadians, as are the people who live in other parts of Canada, and they have every right to be provided with the public facilities and social amenities that are enjoyed by other Canadian citizens. In so far as industrial exploration is going on, that too is all to the good. But when it comes to industrial development of the north, my hon. friend should know that the north suffers from the same handicaps from which we suffer in the maritimes. One of those handicaps is the high cost of living. The cost of living must be high because we are so far away from distribution centres. Because we are far away from distribution centres we are also far away from markets.

If the industrial development of the north is going to be done by private enterprise, my hon. friend must know that nearness to markets will be one of the most important factors that will be taken into consideration. As long as a product can be manufactured in a locality where it can be done more cheaply and with lower transportation costs, and therefore can be marketed at a cheaper price, these developments are going to take precedence over development of the north. That is just pure economic realism. That is the difference between the party which I represent and the government supporters. We wish to be realistic about the matter. We do not wish to create any great fantasies in people's minds. We wish to tell them the plain facts and let them use their own common sense.

I wish to congratulate the minister on his promotion to the treasury benches. I also wish to compliment him on the way he has introduced his estimates. The minister's department does not touch my constituency very closely. In my riding we have a few Indians, but they are fully integrated and are not in receipt of any special benefits from any government department. I think the service from which my riding derives the most benefit is the roads to resources program. I wish to commend the government for instituting that program. It has been extremely beneficial to my province and to my own riding. I hope that program will be continued and extended.

Historic sites come under the minister's department. I should like to remind him that since we have had nearly 500 years of history, we have more historic sites in my province than there are in any other single province. I should like to see these historic sites preserved. At one time the French were in possession of my province and there was a French capital. There are many old sites such as the headquarters of the various people who came out with charters to colonize the country. In all these places there are sites which should be preserved.

In my own riding there is an old lighthouse which has been dismantled and which I think perhaps is doomed to fall down or be taken down unless something is done about it. Personally I should like to appeal to the minister to have this lighthouse preserved. It is not only a relic of an old structure; it is also a famous landmark. A diagram of it was printed on all the mariners' charts right up to the time of confederation. Whether that has been done since confederation I am not in a position to say. However, it is an historic site. It is located at Rose Blanche in my riding. It is a very famous landmark, easily recognized from the sea, and a great help to mariners in identifying their landfalls. It has a double purpose. In that respect it is utilitarian, as well as historic. I hope the minister will look into this matter and do something to enable this old structure to be preserved.

My main reason for rising today is to bring to the minister's attention the situation with regard to seals and whales. We commonly refer to a seal fishery and a whale fishery, but as everybody knows they are animals and not fish. Therefore I presume they come under the minister's department.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I think I should point out to the hon. member that they actually come under the Department of Fisheries. Even though they may be classified as animals and mammals, they are dealt with by the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. Carter: I thank the minister for that information. The reason I raise this point now is that, I suppose quite wrongly, I was under the impression that a few days ago the minister replied to a question put by the hon. member for Kootenay West, or an hon. member on this side of the house, about the seal fishery. I thought the minister replied to that question and I inferred that these matters came under his department.

Mr. Dinsdale: At that time I referred the question to the Minister of Fisheries, who has since dealt with the matter in the house.

Mr. Carter: Thank you very much. In that case I will reserve my remarks on this subject until we come to the proper item.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Chairman, my remarks at this time will be associated in the main with the tourist industry aspect of the department. In this regard may I join the many hon. members who have spoken previously in praise of the efficiency of the Canadian travel bureau and the energetic head of this bureau, Mr. Alan Field.

I should like to quote a few passages from the annual proceedings of the Canadian tourist association at its convention of 1960. In this publication the association brings to everyone's attention the fact that Canada is still showing a deficit in our tourist trade with our neighbour to the south. The association also points to the fact that this deficit continues to be quite substantial and that every effort must be made to reduce this deficit as much as possible. On page 2 of the convention proceedings the association points out that travel expenditures by United States citizens outside the United States have increased by more than 300 per cent in the past decade, and that Canada has unfortunately been able to attract only 23 per cent of this business.

After having attended meetings of the mines, forests and waters committee for two years, before which officials of the Canadian tourist association and others interested in the tourist industry in Canada have appeared, I know that a great many things have been accomplished by this government in an effort to attract greater numbers of United States citizens to Canada. One particular accomplishment was the erecting of a sign, "Great White Way", in New York City last summer. I would appreciate hearing the minister's comments on what the government feels has been accomplished through this unique effort in endeavouring to attract tourists from that area to Canada.

The Atlantic area is tremendously interested in new ways and means of attracting tourists to Canada, and especially to our particular area. The tourist industry is big business in the maritimes, and I feel it is one area where we can give leadership, and have already given leadership, to the rest of Canada in our methods of attracting tourists. In this regard the Atlantic provinces tourist bureaux have worked very closely with the Canadian travel bureau, and I feel they have accomplished a great deal in this matter of attracting tourists. I feel that tourist accommodation facilities in the Atlantic area are second to none in Canada. I am quite certain that the tremendous number of repeat visits by tourists is an indication of the high class accommodation that is available to them in this area. In my province of Nova Scotia this has, in part at least, been the result of the very progressive program initiated by the provincial government in assisting tourist operators to provide the necessary plant and accommodation facilities for those who visit our area.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Coates: At one o'clock I was bringing to the attention of the committee the very progressive nature of the legislation which has been made available to the tourist industry in Nova Scotia and showing how this legislation had assisted to a large extent in making Nova Scotia one of the leaders in Canada in the type of accommodations which are available to tourists. This does not mean that Nova Scotia is satisfied that the accommodations available are the best that can be made available. Indeed, in the field of restaurant operations there is still much that can be done and I am sure all restaurant operators not only in Nova Scotia but throughout Canada will be very pleased with the provisions of the Small Business Loans Act and the benefits which will accrue to them as a result of the facilities provided by this act.

Earlier in this debate we heard the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo express his opinion of the action which this government has taken through the department of northern affairs. In effect, the hon. member said we were doing no more than was done by the former Liberal administration. My own opinion is that many people in Canada will find a great many holes to pick in that argument. Certainly in my own province the roads to resources program put into effect by this administration has proved a boon to the provincial government in providing highway facilities in areas which otherwise would not be able to receive those benefits.

To bring matters closer to home, in my own constituency of Cumberland the roads to resources program has been of great assistance to the provincial government in the construction of two highways. One of them, known as the Tidnish shore road, is just about complete at the present time and makes available to tourists some 20 miles of the most beautiful salt water beaches in Canada. When completed this highway will cost approximately $1,100,000 half of which will be paid by this government through the department of northern affairs. To say that this is no more than was done prior to 1957 is just being unrealistic and such a statement is not justified by the facts.

This is not the only important road in my constituency. There is another highway known as the Parrsboro shore road. As a result of the roads to resources program the provincial government has been able to undertake the reconstruction of this road and its eventual paving at an estimated cost of close to $600,000. This will be of tremendous benefit to the people of the town of Parrsboro and to those who live along the Parrsboro shore. This is an outstanding piece of highway from a scenic point of view. It has been called by many in our area the little Cabot trail because the type of scenery along this shore line is very similar to that found in Cape Breton. No doubt, when this road is completed, there will be a tremendous influx of tourists into the region. These are tourists who apparently would never be as willing to travel along this beautiful highway from Diligent River, to Port Gerville to Ward's Brook, to Advocate Harbour and Apple River, if it were not for the fact that it were paved. This represents the type of thinking, now prevalent in this department, which results in tremendous benefits to every individual in Canada.

Along the same line, we could consider park sites and picnic and camping grounds which are now available to tourists of the type that, until this government put into effect this type of legislation, could not come to Canada because of the lack of money necessary for accommodation in motels or hotels. The popularity of this legislation is indicated by the tremendous use being made of these facilities. We still do not have enough of this type of facility, but one should consider how few we would have if we had gone along as the former Liberal administration did until 1957. Certainly the provinces could not have done this on their own or, if they had, could not have done it to the same extent. In my own constituency, as in other constituencies in Nova Scotia and the rest of Canada, there are a greater number of facilities available which attract tourists and perhaps induce them to stay longer. In this respect the government should be complimented highly for its progressive thinking.

There is in my opinion the need for a second national park on the mainland of Nova Scotia. Cape Breton has probably as beautiful a park as exists in the Dominion of Canada. It is a park with tremendous facilities, in respect of which this government has done a tremendous amount of work. This park attracts and is attracting a great number of tourists who come to Nova Scotia. It is my feeling, however, that mainland Nova Scotia has areas which would be very attractive to tourists. Certainly I would not want to prevent anyone from going to Cape Breton and witnessing the grandeur of the Margaree valley and the Cabot Trail. These places are beautiful beyond compare. I feel everyone who goes to Nova Scotia should certainly make an effort to visit Cape Breton to take in the scenic wonders. However, I do feel that there is room for another national park in Nova Scotia and would suggest that there is an area in my own constituency which would lend itself to this type of development. I would suggest the department give consideration to the establishment of such a park in the Wentworth-Westchester area of Cumberland. This area has many of the features one would look for in the establishment of a national park, and I would recommend it to the minister for consideration.

I might point out that there have been camp sites and picnic grounds established there during the past year which have been of tremendous value to tourists, for which the federal government can assume at least part of the credit. There was a very fine motel established there recently. It was built partially through assistance under the legislation made available under the Stanfield government. In this area we have the very finest skiing accommodation available in Nova Scotia. The eastern part of Canada has a very short summer tourist season and I feel consideration should be given to the possibility of developing tourist attractions during the winter months. I feel that the Wentworth skiing area should be enlarged. If this area were made part of a national park this could be done with a good deal of benefit resulting to everyone in Nova Scotia who is interested in skiing. Since the government has indicated its interest in the physical fitness of our people, I would suggest that there is no better way of providing outdoor recreational facilities than by developing skiing areas.

I would point out that in Nova Scotia, as in many areas in Canada, particularly the smaller communities, no facilities exist for our younger and older citizens to partake in outdoor physical fitness programs except, perhaps, in hunting, fishing and hiking. It may be that the government in considering the different proposals put forward will be willing to give consideration to the establishment of an act under which moneys could be made available to these areas to assist in the construction of recreational centres.

In my home town of Amherst there exists an armoury and a beautiful new arena. In these two buildings there is room for many recreational activities. Many towns in my constituency have neither an armoury nor an arena and, if we could assist these communities in the construction of some sort of auditorium where recreational activities could be carried out, it would be of great benefit to the physical fitness of our citizens.

I would like to add at this time that the citizens of Nova Scotia have benefited from the programs of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources since 1957. Prior to that time I am sure many citizens were hardly even aware that such a department was in existence. As a result of the establishment of the roads to resources program and the camping ground-picnic site program we have witnessed a tremendous difference in the interest and feeling of our citizens toward this department. I am sure that the present minister, as the former minister, will do everything he possibly can to assist those areas of Canada in taking advantage of their national resources.

Last evening the hon. member for Port Arthur made some comments about the minister to the effect that he was disappointed, and that the minister had been long enough in this position to indicate how aggressive he was and where he was going to take this department. Usually the hon. member for Port Arthur is fairly responsible when speaking in this house, but on this particular occasion I would say that he allowed his tongue to carry him somewhat away in expressing his regrets over the ability of the present Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

I think it would be very irresponsible of the minister were he, after a few months, to start making grandiose statements about what he is going to do as the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I think he is being most responsible in assessing what can be done, how best it can be done, and doing so in a workmanlike manner. I think the hon. member for Port Arthur will find that it would be difficult indeed to find a more aggressive individual than the present Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Let us give him a little time to prove this and not knock him before he has had a real chance to prove his ability. Thank you very much.

Mr. Herridge: I apologize for disturbing the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys in his afternoon nap. I will also find it somewhat difficult to speak because when I look a little to my right and up I am reminded of the gargoyles on Westminster Abbey. However, I want to devote a few minutes to these very important estimates. I see I have stirred up an hon. gentleman over there—

Mr. Comtois: The hon. gentleman is quite wrong. My eyes were closed, but I was listening to the very impressive speech of the former speaker.

Mr. Herridge: I apologize most sincerely if I thought the hon. gentleman was asleep.

Mr. More: The hon. member just thought he was being smart.

Mr. Herridge: I have started off by stirring up some people and I must say the chamber is somewhat more alert now than it was a few minutes ago; therefore I have accomplished something in that respect. But I do want to say a few words on these very important estimates. They range over a very wide field and affect the lives of a large number of Canadians who live in a way different from that of the majority of us. The administration required in the area which concerns most of those people is somewhat different from the normal administration of a department, and I am quite sure it tests the ability of the administrators because of the different circumstances and the different conditions under which some sections of this department operate.

I suppose it is only fitting and proper that I should congratulate the minister on his appointment, although I do so with a degree of envy because I have been in the British Columbia legislature and this house for 20 years. I am just as close to becoming a cabinet minister now as I was when I started.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I am very glad I have some agreement on one point, anyway.

I think everyone realizes that the minister comes from a family with an excellent record of public service in the district in which he lives. He has distinguished academic achievements and his record of public service in the welfare council and the Legion and as a university teacher is well known. He had a very distinguished and courageous record during the war period, which we all recognize. Some people think the minister is modest but, you know, he is well able to blow his own horn because I have stood on the street corner and heard him do it. In the very best sense of the word, he is a good musician and I hope he plays in the orchestra of parliament to some public advantage in the days ahead. For some 10 years the minister was a conscientious and industrious private member of this house. With his appointment as minister in charge of this department he faces the test as to his ability as an administrator and, we trust, a creator in so far as policy is concerned and as an innovator because I think a person with these qualities is required in a department of this kind. We hope the minister accepts the challenge that his present position offers him and as the years go by demonstrates his continuing courage in facing new and difficult situations and his understanding of the requirements of the moment.

I wish to make a few comments. Does the member wish to say something?

Mr. Drysdale: We are still waiting for the hon. member to say something.

Mr. Herridge: I shall get to the point. We shall take full advantage of the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to let him realize that his estimates are of great importance in this house.

Mr. Drysdale: Try to deal with these, first.

Mr. Herridge: I shall want to get his views on the export of power in the future.

Mr. Comtois: We should like to get the hon. member's.

Mr. Herridge: They have already been stated publicly. I want to say a word or two about the resources for tomorrow conference, which we all support and of which we are very glad to see this minister in charge. We are happy that he has found time to promote it. However, I do want to complement the remarks made by the hon. member for Port Arthur by saying that every opportunity should be given to all sections of the community to make a contribution to this conference by invitation, and this includes labour and some other sections of the community that have not been invited to date. I know it may appear that a conference such as this may become, shall I say, too cumbersome and top-heavy, but I think every opportunity should be given for wide spread participation and women's organizations should be given an invitation to attend this conference if only as observers because it is a conference that will decide matters of importance to the country as a whole.

I wish to say a word or two about the travel bureau and our tourist industry. Recently I read an article in a paper entitled "Canada's Ailing Tourist Industry; Can It Be Cured?" I think we all agree that during recent years the tourist industry has been somewhat of a disappointment; that Canadians have been spending more abroad, particularly since 1957, than United States tourists and others have been spending in Canada. I am not going to blame the government entirely for that; it is a reflection of economic conditions in the United States as well as here, but I do suggest that some serious consideration will have to be given to this subject and to increasing, shall I say, the tempo of Canadian appeal abroad. I noticed recently that Premier Bennett provided a haven for one of his former ministers, the former minister of agriculture, as tourist publicity representative in San Francisco. He was a very successful salesman of Carnation milk prior to being minister, and I hope he is just as successful in selling British Columbia as a place for tourists to visit. In this connection, I simply want to conclude my remarks on this point by suggesting that the Kootenays are often overlooked in the advertising which the minister's department directs to tourists. Mention is made of the coastal areas and the Okanagan, but I think the minister will find I am correct when I say there is much less reference to the beauties of the Kootenays. I should like him to take action to correct this situation because my constituents who are interested in the tourist industry have made this complaint for a number of years.

While I am on my feet, I should like to say a word or two about the historic sites and monuments board. The hon. member who spoke before me made a reference to it, and I intended to make a reference to the subject when the particular item was under discussion. However, I might as well do so now. I am sure the minister is interested in assisting in the preservation of historic sites and monuments that are worth while and to which the federal government can properly make a contribution.

I want to bring to the attention of the committee the excellent work that has been done by the Kootenay historical society in the preservation of the steamship Moyie at Kaslo, B.C. This is the last of the stern-wheelers that have plied the lakes of the interior since 1884. The residents of Kaslo have gone out of their way to do what they could to bring this vessel ashore, place it on a foundation and make a museum out of its interior. Their efforts have been rewarded by an increasing number of tourists who want to see one of these vessels that sailed the lakes for so many years. The residents of this area have received assitance from the federal government, and quite recently they applied for some further assistance. I merely mention this in the hope the minister will give further consideration to their pleas for the further assistance necessary in completing the preservation of this vessel and its caretaking in the future.

I should like now to say a few words with respect to the concern of the rod and gun clubs of the interior over the possible developments on the Columbia and the effect of these dams on fishing in the area. This has been a subject of considerable discussion. Quite recently I might say all the rod and gun clubs of the interior met at a conference in Vernon. These clubs represent 3,200 members and they unanimously expressed their opposition to the building of the high Arrow dam. They have also given very careful consideration to the effect of these dams, should they be constructed, upon the fish and wildlife of the area.

This resolution was adopted by the West Kootenay rod and gun clubs association, by the interior rod and gun clubs association and by the B.C. rod and gun clubs association. I read it because these men have had a number of committees working which, with the co-operation of the game branch of British Columbia, have been studying the impact of this flooding upon wildlife and fishing. This is the resolution:

Whereas the impact on wildlife of Kootenay river and Columbia river development of power and storage dams will be tremendous and the adequate correction of the problems created will be much beyond the financial ability of the fish and game branch of the department of recreation and conservation of the government of British Columbia,

Therefore be it resolved (1) that a complete and detailed biological survey be carried out jointly by the Canadian wildlife service and the fish and game branch, B. C. department of recreation and conservation, to determine the ecological effect on wildlife of each and all proposed power and storage dams, the report of such survey to be publicly available; (2) that anticipated problems in wildlife management as indicated in the survey be planned for, rectified, and financed as part of said developments; (3) that a definite proportion of the value of the power produced be set aside and other benefits such as navigation, irrigation, etc. (including downstream benefits) produced from said developments for wildlife management and recreational facilities in the Kootenay and Columbia river basins in Canada.

We realize that this study cannot be undertaken without co-operation between federal and provincial agencies. I do urge the minister to give consideration to this problem because it is of great concern to a large number of persons interested in preserving wildlife and fish in the southeastern portion of British Columbia.

I should like to refer briefly to an answer the minister gave in reply to one of my questions some days ago with regard to the Arctic islands. I had mentioned that Commander Low planted the flag on Ellesmere island and took possession of that island and the islands of the north in the name of the Dominion of Canada. The minister indicated that my knowledge of history was somewhat inaccurate and that this taking possession had somehow been accomplished before. In order to refresh the minister's memory, I should like to read to him the terms of reference given to Commander Low:

The expedition had three objectives:

(1) to establish the Royal Northwest Mounted Police (R.C.M.P.) as the law and order agency in the eastern Arctic;

(2) to take formal possession of all the Arctic islands in the name of King Edward VII and the Dominion of Canada;

(3) to gather information on the health of the Eskimos, the geology, botany and other resources, and produce topographical surveys of the areas visited.

Then, there are more detailed instructions given. However, according to my reading of Canadian history and a searching of the record, I find that is the first occasion on which, under instructions of the federal government, the commander or an expedition took formal possession of all the Arctic islands in the name of Canada. If I am wrong I wish the minister would let the committee have the source of his information because, in a very moderate manner, he corrected my statement the other day.

Mr. Drysdale: Will the hon. member indicate the document from which he is reading?

Mr. Herridge: Yes, it is an extract from the book "The Neptune" which was written in connection with the voyage of the Neptune.

I should like to refer to another matter. In Hansard of July 6, 1956, page 5691, I outlined the part Dr. L. E. Borden, who is a personal friend of mine now resident in Victoria and a relative of the late Sir Robert Borden, had played in establishing our claim to the Arctic islands. Then, on August 11, 1956, I had the honour, on Dr. Borden's behalf, of presenting to the house an original proclamation taking possession of Ellesmere land and all the adjacent islands. This important document is now in the archives bound in red leather, if any of the newcomers to the house wish to see evidence of this proclamation, they will find it there.

Mrs. Borden wrote an article in the Canadian Geographical Journal entitled "Northward 1903-04". Since this article appeared a further development of the utmost importance has occurred. I am sure hon. members are all aware of the contribution that Vilhjalmur Stefansson, consultant, polar studies program at Dartmouth college, Hanover, New Hampshire, has made in relation to scientific work in the polar regions. Upon reading Mrs. Borden's article, he wrote her the first thing next morning because of his book "Cancer, Disease of Civilization?" published in 1960. I quote:

> This was the first cancer search among the northern Canadian Eskimo ever formally directed by the Canadian (or any North American) government.

He has written to mention this matter because at the time and since then Dr. Borden never received credit for undertaking the first cancer research with respect to the Eskimos and making a report on that research to the government of Canada, which research has been confirmed by the later experience of the department of national health and this government. In fairness to this unusual work done by Dr. Borden at that time I want to quote briefly from two letters from Dr. Stefansson. He writes as follows to Mrs. Borden on February 5, 1961:

> Your letter of 31 January is both a relief and depressing. When I read your "Northward 1903-04" I had a sinking feeling that I had failed to give due credit to Dr. Borden for an Eskimo cancer search on the Neptune and now I am, though absolved of personal guilt by your letter, nevertheless depressed by the story which is sad news that accidentally, through parsimony, or deliberately, his scientific work, and that of others, was lost or suppressed. If published with the rest of the Neptune report in 1906 then Dr. Borden, Commander Low, and the Canadian government might have had the credit for an important pioneer research on the incidence of cancer—and I am sure his cancer report, which your letter summarizes, cannot have been the only notable thing that would have been established by the publication of his findings.

Then he goes on to say this:

> Monday I shall be sending to you an inscribed copy of "Cancer: Disease of Civilization?" You will find that in this title the "?" is meant to be conspicuous, and you will see how consonant Dr. Borden's findings are with the rest of the Eskimo testimonies, all the way from southwestern Alaska to southeastern and northeastern Canada, and how well Dr. Borden deserves to have his name at the head of the list—if only I had known enough to place it there!

The letter is signed by Dr. Stefansson. I make this reference because I think it is only fair. As I said on July 6, 1956, the accomplishments of this expedition have largely been buried, lost sight of and forgotten. Here I have further evidence of the good work undertaken by this expedition, first of all in claiming the Arctic islands on behalf of Canada, second in surveys and third in botanical research. Dr. Borden produced the first botanical survey of the Arctic islands. Now we have proof that he was the first one to write a report on cancer research with respect to the Eskimos on the North American continent.

I bring this matter to the minister's attention because I think it is only fitting and proper that a gentleman of these accomplishments, who is still living in Victoria, should be recognized and his work brought to the attention of the House of Commons and the country.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I wish that the minister would suggest to the historic sites and monuments board of Canada that they put up a monument on the grounds of the College de l'Assomption, or a memorial plaque on the century-old part of the building, in memory of Sir Wilfrid Laurier who was a student there.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier was of the 22nd promotion. He entered the college in 1854 and left it in 1860.

Founded in 1833 by the Rev. François Labelle, parish priest, and by doctors J. B. Meilleur and J. C. Cazeneuve, the College de l'Assomption has given the church and the state many prominent figures, such as Sir Wilfrid Laurier, one of its most renowned former pupils, Sir Louis-Amable Jette, lieutenant-governor, and, among members of the clergy—let me mention only a few—Msgr. Charlebois, Msgr. Lamarche and the present superior, Msgr. Langlois, P.D.

May I quote from the records of the College de l'Assomption, in which I find the following:

> After the general election of 1900, . . . the superior of the college sent a telegram of congratulations to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Obviously the latter was very pleased and he answered without delay—

I have here a photostat of the letter he wrote:

> Ottawa, November 10th, 1900
> Dear Mr. Villeneuve,
> Among all the congratulations I have received on the results of the general election, none pleased me more than the ones coming from my alma mater. I am always proud of having been a student at the College de l'Assomption.
> Yours truly,
> Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

I feel therefore that a monument, or else a plaque affixed to the hundred-year old section of the College de l'Assomption would remind the people of L'Assomption, and the country as a whole, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was educated at that college.

I express that request with the conviction that it will be taken into serious consideration by the historic sites and monuments board of Canada.

I wish now to refer to a series of questions which I put to the present Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources concerning Eskimo school children of northern Quebec and of other areas in the north. He answered among other things:

—English is the language of instruction in the schools established by the department of northern affairs for Eskimos generally. This has been the practice in northern Quebec as well as the Northwest Territories since the first departmental school was established in 1949.

Mr. Chairman, may I add that that situation was created and has existed since 1949, in other words, under the Liberal administration of which the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), as minister of transport, was a member, as was the present premier of Quebec Mr. Jean Lesage, as minister of northern affairs and national resources and who was therefore chiefly responsible for that situation. I wanted to remind the house that such was the kind of vision he had at that time.

Those are the only comments I had to make.

(Text):

Mr. Granger: As a member from one of the great northern territories—in as much as my district includes Labrador, it is needless to say that I am greatly interested in the estimates of this department. I should like to begin by congratulating the minister on his appointment. As time goes on I trust that he will not forget the vision because, as I have said before in this chamber, far from deriding the vision I agree wholeheartedly with the scriptures where it is written, "Where there is no vision the people perish". As a matter of fact, the record of history shows htat almost every great endeavour could never have been carried through to fruition without vision and the courage and faith which must accompany it. When any new thing is started it must be done, by virtue of its newness, with inadequate knowledge and insufficient evidence. Vision therefore is of tremendous importance.

Northern development is important to Canada. Vast as is our territory, our population basically is strung out on a ribbon along the southern border. If we are to develop into the really great and powerful nation which we can and which I am sure we will become, it is necessary to keep northern development always to the fore.

With regard to the authorship of the vision, I agree with the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, who pointed out that northern development had its roots in the previous Liberal administration. In so far as the vision which began some years ago is carried on and augmented, it must receive our support.

Perhaps I may be forgiven if I again refer to holy writ with respect to the youthfulness of the present Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I think of a text which in my mind couples him with the hon. member for Kootenay West. The text is, "Your young men shall see visions and your old men shall dream dreams".

My criticism of the vision is that it has not been broad enough. The vision of the present administration has been too narrow in its beam. It has been a northwest vision, rather than a really broad northern vision.

I make of the new minister the request which I made of his predecessor, that he beam northern development broader so as to include Labrador to a greater extent. Nowadays Labrador is very much in the news and I need not remind hon. members of the vast developments which are taking place there at Carol lake, lake Wabush, the Twin Falls power development, and so on. However, these developments are largely a result of provincial vision and the foresightedness of Premier Smallwood.

Labrador is a great part of the north and its wealth is now beginning to be recognized. I would ask the minister to take into serious consideration the possibility of building federal roads and airstrips in that great territory, which eventually will be recognized as a veritable treasure house of Canada. Before it can properly be developed and before its tremendous potential in respect to the tourist industry can be developed, a number of airstrips and roads must be built. We must build a road around the coast and a road linking the interior with the north shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence.

With respect to the Eskimos who live in Labrador, as hon. members know Eskimo affairs in Labrador are administered by the provincial government with assistance from the federal government.

I should like to request that the federal government give the same per capita assistance to Labrador Eskimos as it gives to Quebec Eskimos. According to figures tabled in the house, the Quebec Eskimo receives federal assistance to the extent of $400 per person. I think that when the sum total of federal assistance to the Eskimo in Labrador is taken into account it will be found that he receives much less; perhaps less than $250 per person.

This is something to which I ask the minister to give very sympathetic attention and, if possible, as soon as practicable make available to the government of Newfoundland financial assistance for the Eskimos of Labrador to the same degree as that assistance is made available to the Eskimos of Quebec.

I hope, of course, that Indians will receive the same treatment as Eskimos. While on the subject of Eskimos I should like to pay a tribute to the missionaries of all faiths who are carrying on great work amongst the Eskimos and Indians of Labrador. Their dedication, self-sacrifice and invaluable work in connection with these people is very great indeed. There is really no way of measuring its great worth.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister something which I mentioned last year. I refer to the desirability of having a monument erected to the last of the Beothics, the original inhabitants of Newfoundland. The last Beothic was Mary March, and I believe her place of burial is known. It occurred to me that perhaps we could erect a monument in the Terra Nova national park to the last of that tragic race. I think that would be appropriate. It would be a token of remembrance to a race of original Canadians which has completely disappeared.

There is another matter which has been brought to my attention by my constituents in Gander, the desirability of a golf course in the Terra Nova national park. The Terra Nova national park is in the constituency of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. His riding and mine are adjoining. The people of Gander are very interested in a golf course for the Terra Nova national park. Perhaps it is not quite fair for me to ask for a golf course in the Terra Nova national park especially for the benefit of my constituents in Gander, but I think a golf course in the Terra Nova national park would be a considerable attraction to tourists. I hope the minister will keep this in mind.

I would also ask the minister to keep in mind the question of the road to Eastport through the national park. I think a survey was carried out in connection with this road. I hope the survey will be completed in time for the road to be built perhaps late this year as a part of a winter works program. This road is used extensively by my constituents as well as those of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Another matter I should like to mention is the general encouragement of tourists to visit Newfoundland and Labrador and the possibility of extending existing steamship services and adapting one of them for the use of tourists in Labrador.

Labrador is a great and unknown territory. I am justly proud of it and I think more people should have the opportunity of seeing it. Gander itself is a logical place for a centre of tourism, and a ski-run would probably encourage tourists to come to central Newfoundland and would make it more attractive to them.

To return for a moment to the question of Labrador, as I said earlier it is not only a treasure house of the north, or a treasure house of the province of Newfoundland, but it is a treasure house of Canada. I should like to repeat that there is a great need for opening up this vast territory, which to some extent is one of the last unknown and unspoiled areas in the world. Certainly it is to the advantage of Canada as a nation to have Labrador opened up by road and air through the building of airstrips. I think this work should be begun as quickly as possible, particularly the building of airstrips, followed by the building of federal roads.

I am sure it would be a sound investment and an investment which would pay off literally in dollars and cents over the years. It would be a great Canadian project which would be good for Canada as well as for Labrador. I hope the minister will consider this, though it is admittedly a big item, in the light of what northern development really is, a huge undertaking challenging the imagination and requiring courageous action.

Mr. Bigg: It is always a great privilege to stand in this chamber and speak a few words, but this is particularly the case when we are able to congratulate a new and young minister. We in the party perhaps know better than most, the hon. gentleman who now holds office as Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and we have every hope that he will bring new lustre to the vision. Far from the vision not being broad enough I am sure it is only a matter of getting enough appropriation to carry out the plan which he and his ministry have in mind for the development of the north country.

I also represent a great frontier constituency in northwestern Alberta and our main problem up there is transportation. Perhaps unfortunately, our whole district is within the provincial boundaries and for this reason neither the new minister nor his department can take the initiative in providing roads to resources. This is probably not too well understood, but I want to put it on record because it is the case; it is only where a province makes overtures to the dominion government that we are able to assist them in building roads in the province. The district of which I am speaking is some 60,000 square miles in extent and in the northern half roads are almost non-existent. Transportation is essential to any orderly development of the north country. The most important object of building a good road is, of course, to reduce freight rates into the north country. Without such reduction the rate of development is bound to slow down. I know that every co-operation will be given when the provincial authorities seek to put in a road, preferably an all-weather road, to serve the district surrounding McMurray.

The resources in the north have not been touched. In my opinion there are several parts of this region which should be opened up, areas closer than the far reaches of the Canadian shield. I refer to Wood Buffalo park and the Thelon game reserve. At present we are unable to prospect for minerals in that part of the country. It may have been in order at one time to restrict prospecting for minerals in the parks but I think that is unnecessary in Wood Buffalo park. It is a very extensive area and the usual reasons for not prospecting—interference with the beauty of the park or with wildlife—do not apply in this case because the 15,000 or 20,000 buffalo that have their habitat in this park do not live in the area where the prospecting would be done.

We have opened up the park for the clearance of timber. This was instituted under the former administration and I do not intend to go into that question at the present time, but I must say I was not happy at all about the methods used to take this timber out. I understand the timber is over aged. If it can be taken out for the good of the economy and for the good of the park, I see no reason why the minerals should not be prospected for and removed as long as this does not interfere with the natural beauty of the park or the safety and security of the animals.

The Clearwater river area is also very rich in natural resources especially those likely to prove of benefit to the tourist industry. Some of the finest big game hunting in the world can be found in there; some of the finest trophys, the antlers from elk, moose and deer, have come out of the Clearwater river area. But, again, we cannot go into this area without a proper road. I cannot sufficiently emphasize the necessity of pressing for a suitable all-weather road into the McMurray area and I look to this ministry to give every co-operation to the provincial authorities when they are ready to take this initiative.

I should like to congratulate the department for assisting in providing picnic shelters along the various roads of Canada. Wherever you go you see these fine facilities. I do not think the part which the federal government has played in providing the shelters is sufficiently well known and I want to take this opportunity to express my personal thanks. I have used them often myself, and I know they are much appreciated.

I think a larger appropriation should be granted in respect of our national parks so that more employment might be provided for our high school and university students, these fine young boys and girls who are seeking to continue their education and improve their capacities. These young people are going to provide the most valuable natural resource we have in this whole Dominion of Canada and I should like to see a much larger appropriation made in respect of our national parks to provide jobs for as many of them as we possibly can.

I should also like to ask the minister if he can explain the reason for having the R.C.M.P. member dropped from the Northwest Territories Council. As an ex-member of the force I can speak with some knowledge of this matter. It may be misunderstood throughout the ranks of the serving members of the force why a senior officer should not sit on this council, because the prestige of the force, as every Canadian knows, is of paramount importance in the north country. I should like it to be made as clear as possible why this official is no longer required or needed on this council. This is a personal matter and not intended as criticism but as a personal observation.

May I say I would not be in favour of the withdrawal of mounted police detachments from outlying posts in the north country. I know that every young member of the mounted police wishes at one time or another to serve in the north. He wants to be on detachment duty. He wants to have the responsibility for getting to know the natives and of establishing that very special and responsible relationship with the natives which has been traditionally part of R.C.M.P. life and work in those areas in the past. If there is any thought of bringing in outlying detachments and centralizing them in any southern posts, it is my opinion that it will not work. It will not work as far as the morale of the mounted police is concerned and I do not think it will work as far as the natives themselves are concerned. It takes years to get to know these people and you cannot get to know them sitting in Fort Smith or Frobisher Bay. One must mingle with the natives and understand their thinking to be of any use at all to them in standing between the native's way of life and the doubtful advantages of the white man's civilization.

The minister has just returned from the north country and I know that he will now be in a much better position to make decisions in that regard. I think it is very dangerous for someone to sit in Ottawa and make decisions without going first into the Arctic to acquire an understanding of the situation there. I think very careful planning and consideration of the many human resources which exist in the north country must take place before this vision can be successful, as every Canadian hopes it will be.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Port Arthur is not yet dejected and sorry because of the harsh strictures which he passed with regard to the minister, possibly I can say a few more words which will cause him to understand the situation.

The northern affairs and national resources portfolio is a difficult one. With deference, it is my submission that it is not possible for any one man to place himself in possession of all the facts regarding the various projects which are normally attended to in this department, as well as the special projects, one of which was mentioned by the hon. member. I refer, of course, to the resources for tomorrow conference. I would suggest this is a department of government which is tremendously important and complex, and will require very considerable time and effort to master. I am sure the hon. member for Port Arthur will not mind my saying that sometimes we feel that his party considers that achievements are measured by the mileage of speeches, and success, by the amount of noise and confusion. I say quite sincerely to the hon. member that the present position to which his party has now descended is a good criterion that this is not the way to gain the esteem of the people of Canada.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont took it upon himself yesterday to deliver the usual strictures and jeers with regard to the northern development program of this government. I would suggest this stems from the attitude on the part of hon. members of the official opposition, and is recognition of their dismal failure to do those things they should have done which are so important to have been done at the proper time which was, I suggest, while that party was in office.

I have been living in the north for almost one third of a century. I include my own district of Peace River in the north. I do not believe that these developments will take place suddenly and with great rapidity but that we must establish a foundation and move from one position to another. This is precisely what the present government is doing. I have driven along the Mackenzie highway which, during the course of last year, was extended to Yellowknife, and have seen dozens of cars carrying tourists looking for a land of opportunity with the feeling that somewhere in the north there is that area where they can find themselves in a life different from that to which they have been accustomed. It is the bettering of the means of transportation that will lead to this particular achievement.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont tried to disparage this government's achievement while, at the same time, tried to horn in on those achievements by stating that they stemmed from the efforts of the previous government. In support of that contention he cited certain statements which had been made by Mr. Lesage when he was the minister of northern affairs and national resources. I have read the statements made by Mr. Lesage to a parliamentary committee in 1955, as set out by the hon. member, and have come to the conclusion that they are no more than a generalization of policy. It is like saying that one is against sin and believes in motherhood, only more so. At page 7 in the English translation of the speech made by the hon. member, in Hansard of yesterday, he quotes Mr. Lesage as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, I have given an outline of our policy to cope with the human problem of economic development in the north. I do not believe our plans lack imagination, vigour or aggressiveness.

That statement may be so. All they lacked was action.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont made some mention of the Great Slave lake railway project. I would like to deal with this subject in the time remaining at my disposal.

I recall a statement made by the hon. member for Laurier when he was speaking on the resolution for the establishment of the sessional committee on railways. At that time he queried the delay on the part of this government in initiating this plan to construct this railway, which had been announced in 1958 in the speech from the throne. He was suggesting that this government was slow in consummating this project. I suggest that any delay which may have taken place in the construction of this very essential, important and vital project can be laid squarely at the door of the previous government. I have had in my possession for some time information with regard to this particular project but have not made use of it for the simple reason that so long as the royal commission established by the government to inquire into this route was in operation the matter was sub judice.

This commission was set up under terms of reference dated some time in May or June of 1959. Its deliberations were completed, to the extent that a report was forthcoming, toward the end of last session, and consequently nothing could be done last year. This year when parliament reconvened there was contained in the speech from the throne a statement to the effect that a location survey would be made of the western route. I take that statement to indicate, as I feel most individuals will, that the government has accepted the majority recommendation of that royal commission and has decided on a western route for the construction of this railway. If I have enough time left I propose to give the reasons why this is a proper decision.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont made reference to a brief filed by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories with the Gordon royal commission. I read that brief and feel that it was well laid out, well buttressed by facts, statistics and information. As I read the brief, it was specifically and definitely in favour of the construction of this railroad in so far as it dealt with the establishment of a northern development program hinged on transportation. In regard to the construction of this railroad it contained recommendations that a route commencing at Grimshaw and going to Peace river should be adopted. So far as I can find out, up until two or three years ago, this is the only route that had been ever deemed acceptable.

In support of this I would refer to a document or a pamphlet—I think it is called "Canada's New North"—which was put out by the department of northern affairs in 1947, I believe, under the very capable direction of Dr. Camsell, who had a most adequate and informed knowledge of the northern situation. In this particular pamphlet reference was made to this question of the railroad to Great Slave lake. The report took cognizance of various suggestions which had been made in the past and then went on to say it repeated and accepted the fact that the only logical and proper route was the one from Grimshaw. This is the one going from the Peace river country, the western route. All others which had been considered with regard to this particular project had been found to be lacking in so far as the principles of economics and engineering are concerned. Therefore, so far as I can see, up to 1955, when this brief was filed before the Gordon commission by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories there had been no other alternative really considered seriously in so far as this rail route was concerned.

I should say this. In the last 35 years thousands of people have settled in the area from Grimshaw north on the express understanding that this railroad would be built, and that when built it would go through the territory of the Peace river country north from Grimshaw and into the Northwest Territories and Great Slave lake, following that particular route.

During the course of the hearings of this commission it was my privilege to act as counsel for the boards of trade and the chambers of commerce of the Peace river country and to ask people who lived in that area to come forward, or their children, to give some indication as to the reasons which had prompted their settlement in this area. As a result I received hundreds of letters—in fact, I could safely say they ran into thousands—from people who had settled, or whose fathers and mothers had settled in this area, on the specific and distinct understanding that when this railway would be built this would be the route which would be chosen. Consequently, it came as a very distinct shock when toward the latter part of 1957 or early in 1958 it became apparent to many people in our country that serious consideration had been given to another area and to another route. From what I have discovered I am satisfied that this change in planning came into existence or was considered sometime between the latter part of 1955 and the early part of 1957. I think I have ample evidence for stating this, and it is demonstrated in part by these points.

During the hearings of the Manning royal commission as to the route of the railway to Great Slave lake evidence was given by a man called Denney, of the Denney Logging Company, who stated that in 1956 when he was considering applying for timber limits in Wood Buffalo park, which is the park to which my hon. friend from Athabasca made reference, he had been told by one government official that this railroad was definitely planned to go through Wood Buffalo park, which was the eastern route. His evidence also was to the effect that there were also other government officials, probably more highly placed, who had given him some information, but when pressed on examination he refused to give those names.

I might say here, Mr. Chairman, that the man who gave this information to Denney, a man who is called, I think, Evans Essex or Essex Evans—at this time my memory fails me as to his name but he was a government official; I am told his last name was Essex—held a position of some substance in the park. In the fall of 1956 he left his position with the department of northern affairs and became manager of this United States lumber company, the Denney Logging Company. At the same hearing a pamphlet was presented consisting of maps and sketches which dealt with the future development of Forth Smith, which lies in the vicinity of the eastern route. This publication clearly established on one particular sketch that a railway line was projected to go through Fort Smith, and showed evidence of yards and a station which were planned for Fort Smith. This document came out some time in June or July of 1957 and could only have been prepared on information gathered together and obtained over a period of many months preceding it. It clearly indicates just what government thinking had been in the months prior to the summer of 1957.

Finally—this is the third point that I shall present to the committee—although I have others—in 1957, the railway companies, obviously acting in connection with government understanding and no doubt on a decision to which the government of that day was privy, dispatched an engineer for the purpose of considering various routes, but instead of directing his attention to the route which had been the western route first planned and understood to be the one which would be chosen, this engineer directed a lot of his attention to a survey of the eastern route. For this reason, so far as I am concerned, I am satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, at that time under the administration of Mr. Lesage who has now gone on to greater rewards in the province of Quebec, decided to abandon the people of the Peace river country, forget the promises that had been made to them and, under some kind of collusive understanding with the railway companies, build this railroad along the eastern route. The result of this, of course, would have been to leave the railways to charge whatever they thought the traffic would bear.

Mr. Deschatelets: Will the hon. member permit a question at this time? Would the hon. member be able to substantiate his allegations or his assertions with any documents or any publication from the government in office at the time?

Mr. Baldwin: This is all strong circumstantial evidence. All of the facts of which I have spoken can be found by an examination of the transcript of the proceedings of the Manning royal commission, as to the route to Great Slave lake, which are to be found in the library. The three specific facts to which I have referred are mentioned. If the hon. member wishes, I might be able to assist him in finding them.

As I was starting to say, Mr. Chairman, my belief is that this would have been a fine thing for the railway companies and if I were a railroad man I might have said that this was the route to choose. There would be no competition and they could charge what in their opinion the traffic would bear. Again, it would have benefited one or two companies and a few individuals who stood to gain by the choice of this eastern route, but it would have left betrayed the many thousands of people who, as a result of the promises made over a period of years, had reason to expect that when this railroad was built it would be built through the Peace river country.

I mentioned something about logging operations in Wood Buffalo park to which the hon. member for Athabasca also referred. I want to make it crystal clear, Mr. Chairman, that I have no constitutional objection to what can be established as a reasonable amount of logging being done in that park according to proper logging practices. However, I do believe I am entitled to take exception to all the shenanigans that occurred with regard to this particular project.

In the first instance, the berths in respect of which this logging was undertaken were berths which were given by way of order in council following certain amendments to the National Parks Act. Two years ago, I believe it was, I had occasion to comment on that procedure in the house. I said that in my professional opinion there was very great doubt as to whether these orders in council were valid. It may well be that the departmental solicitors have given opinions to the contrary. I have been able in the past to substantiate my professional opinion, at times, against that of the departmental solicitors. Until I have been shown to the contrary it is still my feeling that there is a great cloud of uncertainty and doubt about the validity of these orders in council.

In the second place, these particular orders in council had the effect, when implemented and when certain assignments had been given, of granting to two corporations, one of which was a United States corporation which had recently come into Canada, the entire rights with respect to more than 1.5 billion board-feet of merchantable timber in this park. I believe that this amount constitutes almost the total amount of merchantable timber in the park. Now, this United States firm came in with machinery which, I am told, was not suitable for the purpose for which it was brought here. The company had difficulty in meeting its obligations and probably had some difficulty in meeting its commitments to the government.

For the life of me I cannot see why, if we are going to do any logging in our national parks, we should have to import a United States firm to do it. I feel that all this was done to lend strength and colour to the reasons assigned in justification of this eastern route. It was done in the spirit of the-public-be-damned and constituted a grave infraction not only of the spirit but the letter of the law in connection with the operation of our national parks.

Before I leave this subject may I state that the preambles to these orders in council giving reasons for the allowance of this exploitation set out that the timber in these areas was largely mature and over-mature timber. This issue came up before the Manning commission and there was filed with the commission a thesis by a man named Thorp, a gentleman who had been employed for some years in the national parks, which he had written in connection with his admission to the professional foresters' association in British Columbia. I do not have sufficient knowledge to interpret this brief but it was interpreted to the distinguished members of this commission as constituting a complete negation of that theory. In fact, the professional forester who gave evidence interpreting this thesis to the commission said that there was no larger percentage of mature and over-mature timber in this park than there was in any of the other areas east of the Rocky mountains.

Probably this is all water under the bridge now, Mr. Chairman, and I am compelled to bring it up only by reason of the suggestions which have been advanced by the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member who spoke yesterday. These hon. members were critical of the achievements for which this government has been responsible in connection with northern development. I might add that the people in my part of the country will always regard with esteem the action of the Prime Minister and this government in permitting this commission to hold hearings so that we would have an opportunity to ventilate the facts. It has always been my belief that given a just and proper case with strong evidence, and a determination to pursue it, justice usually results.

The commission has now decided, two to one, in favour of the western route. This is a good decision and I am not going into the detailed reasons for it. The report is there for all hon. members to see. The decision of the government to implement it is a wise and proper decision. Immediately after the estimates were passed in December of this year appropriating money for the surveys to be made, the machinery was set in action. Since then a great deal of work has been done. I am informed by what we in the north call moccasin telegraph that the results which have so far been achieved have been quite remarkable and more than justify the decision. Along this route adequate supplies of gravel have been found to be used as ballast. There is more than sufficient lumber from which ties can be fashioned. It has been discovered, as we have always maintained, that there are large amounts of merchantable timber along the western route far in excess of the amount that might be found along the eastern route, even including what could be found in Wood Buffalo national park. The attention which has been directed to the Peace river area and the north generally as a result of the decision of this government has been quite remarkable.

Just the other day I received a copy of a local newspaper which indicated very substantial reserves of iron ore in the Hines Creek-Clear Hills area of the Peace river country had been found and which would more than likely be developed in the not too distant future. This was, I suggest, an indirect result of the decision of the government to proceed with this railroad. There are areas of agricultural land along this eastern route which I think constitute the last great reservoir of such lands in North America. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that when this decision is finally implemented and this railroad is completed the present population of the Peace river country, which includes part of the area inhabited by those people who live in the constituency of the hon. member for Cariboo and in the area which goes into the lower part of Mackenzie, will be augmented to not less than half a million people by 1975. This is not idle conjecture. I could pinpoint the places where communities will be established, where towns will grow, where lumber operations will flourish, where there is natural gas and petroleum. These are not pipe dreams; these are not visions. These are actual facts which have been brought to the knowledge of the people during the course of the last few years.

I wish to make one more point in connection with the building of this railway. I grant that it will help, and it is intended mainly to help, the people in the Northwest Territories. It will have an immeasurably beneficial effect on the people in my constituency. Primarily, however, the bread and butter motive for constructing the railroad is to enable the ore produced at Pine Point mine to be brought down to Trail to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company for processing. I think we are at the stage where time is of the essence. I understand, and I am supported in this by statements which have been appearing in the press, that Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company at Trail depends to some extent for its economic production on the presence of what are known as smelter residues. These smelter residues will shortly be exhausted. It is for that reason that Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, which holds a large interest in the Pine Point mine, is most anxious that the railroad be completed and the minerals brought down from Pine Point to Trail. The failure to do that may well result in the company having to obtain custom ore, possibly from outside of Canada. I think that would be a great tragedy and I therefore urge the government, particularly the minister, to push ahead with this project as quickly as possible.

I recognize that we are in a difficult period in so far as railroads are concerned. However, it has been my submission, and I urged this two years ago, that this railroad should be constructed as a special railroad within the meaning of the Railway Act. It should not be compelled under the normal provisions of the Railway Act to carry passengers and to submit to the other more costly procedures which in the past went with railroad construction and operation. This is simply and purely a development railroad. It should be built with that fact in mind and it should be built as soon as possible.

Mr. Garland: This is the first opportunity I have had to congratulate the minister on his new appointment. He is a well liked and well respected member of this House of Commons and a man of high principles. I wish him well in his new responsibilities.

I rise in my place today to say a few words about only one subject that comes under the minister's responsibility. I refer to tourism which is an important industry, of course, to Canada and of particular importance in our area. I realize that it can be said that 1961 looks to be a promising year and for this, of course, we are glad. We can refer to modest increases over the years. I have just spent some time with some of the important leaders in the tourist industry of this country who were recently brought together in North Bay, and I can assure you that all is not well in the industry. I should like to refer to one aspect only today. This is a trend which is growing successively worse with each passing year.
